We have not rescinded. In fact, Liberals and Conservatives constantly get together to support the other place, and we are practical. Until you defeat it we recognize that we have to use it. And we are going to use it against you. We are going to use the Senate as we are using it with the GST, to say to them: "If you are sincere Liberals, simply vote against the GST, defeat the GST, do not send it back".

Now a greater principle than that is the principle that there should be no unelected, unaccountable group of men and women sitting in the other place who deny the desires of the elected group. That's not democratic. In fact they not only deny the right of the elected body to pass legislation, but they turn around and impose more taxes on the people of Canada to the tune of $153 a day. That is a tax. It is a tax on the Canadian taxpayer and it is tax free to all those poor, poverty-stricken Senators over in the other place.

Look at them. If Senator Molson does not get that $153 a day, you know what will happen. The whole empire will dissolve. There will be no Hockey Night in Canada. It will be gone. Just think about it!

In fact, all they have to do is check in with the Clerk, walk in through the front door, walk to the back, and they get their allowance.

Brother Lawson was appointed by the Liberals and I assume that Liberals appoint only Liberals. Therefore he is really a Liberal. In fact these people sit over in the Senate, good Liberals and Tories, and all we have now is Allan MacEachen leading the Liberal forces in the Senate.

Of course, the Tories want to get the majority in the Senate. There is a rumour around that the Prime Minister is going to name 11 Senators and then he will have the majority so he can pass all these bills.

The Canadian people must ask in wonder, how can this lower House, the House elected by the people of Canada, countenance and stand and vote for what is being placed on their backs. I know how the member for Mississauga South is going to vote on this because those are his fat-cat friends and he is going to support them right to the hilt. He knows his day is coming, but it had better come before 1993. I think there is a good possibility that the member for Mississauga South will end up in the Senate. I think you would make a fine senator—

An hon. member: High Commissioner to Uganda.

Mr. Rodriguez: If ever there was a reason for putting a stop to the Senate right now, it is the thought that the hon. member for Mississauga South would end up in the Senate.

An hon. member: What about support?

Mr. Rodriguez: He wants my support, Madam Speaker. Who am I? I am a member of Parliament opposed to the Senate. Why would I support you? We have denied Canadian people the opportunity for a guaranteed annual income, and these people sitting over in the other place have a guaranteed annual income to 75 years of age. Those who were there before the 75 year deadline came in or those who were grandfathered, some of them can go on forever.

An hon. member: Some of them do.

Mr. Rodriguez: We are saying to the Canadian people, we cannot give you a guaranteed annual income. But to some people who are friends of those in high places, you could get into the Senate and in fact, you can actually get a guaranteed annual income to age 60 and after the seventy-fifth year get a nice pension. You could get an beautiful pension because there is an allowance for the pension in the Estimates and we are going to pass that.

It does not end at age 75. It continues and that pension is fully indexed because they are over 75. Yet we have said to old age pensioners in this country, we can't fully index your pensions. Isn't that something? Now we have a partial indexation. We cannot fully index the GST tax credits, for God's sake, we cannot fully index that. But, by golly, we can give $153 incentive a day to go to work. To go to work! Imagine what any trade unionist would give. He would give his eye tooth for an incentive over and above his hourly wage—

An hon. member: Or a single parent.

Mr. Rodriguez: Or a single parent. In this country we nickel and dime poor people to death. We have all sorts of forms to fill out to see if you qualify with your income. You have to qualify, but people like those in the Senate have carte blanche. In closing, I call on members of this House to vote for the motion that eliminates the $47 million from the Estimates which then would put an end effectively to the flicks and flacks and other kinds of characters in the other place.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I listened with great attention to the discourse of our colleague and the profound words he just shared with us but I wonder whether Brother Lawson in the other place was listening attentively.

I want to ask my colleague from Nickel Belt that when he says he wants to cancel the budget of the Senate, and therefore abolishing it, is this the same Senate that was asked by his colleague for Yorkton—Melville when he said on the steps of Parliament Hill, on May 7, that he wanted that Senate to abolish the GST? Is this the same Senate he is referring to or is this something else and am I misunderstanding it? Second, the Premiers and the Prime Minister are meeting right now to reform the Senate, and hopefully they may have arrived at a successful conclusion. I think all Canadians wish that. They want to amend the Senate and if they arrive at this unanimous agreement of all premiers and the Prime Minister to change the Senate, but nevertheless to continue having a Senate, does that mean that he wants to remove all the funding for that body of Parliament which may have today already received the unanimous consent of all the Premiers and the Prime Minister? I wonder if that is the specific proposition that he is entertaining. Perhaps he could clarify that for us.

Mr. Rodriguez: I thank my colleague for the questions. I will answer the second one, first. He is too good a politician not to recognize that what will come out from across the street, from everything I have heard so far, is not that they will agree to include that idea of a Senate within the Meech Lake Accord. They are saying that that is an idea that might be discussed at a later time. That is my impression. I do not have the facts but I do not think that is the way it is. I do not think any of that will happen now. Meech Lake is not going to be amended to include the kind of Senate which you have just described.

We cannot get caught in the same trap again with respect to whether we are going to have a second chamber and how it will operate. It seems to me that the lesson we have learned from Meech Lake is that we need to hear from the Canadian people.

First of all, do we want the second chamber, how is it going to operate and what powers is it going to have or should it have? How will the representation from across the country be in the Senate? Will it be by region, constituency or by proportional representation? I think the Canadian people have to be consulted on that question. We are not going to have the same process again where 10 premiers and a Prime Minister sit around in a room and decide the form of parliamentary democracy for the next 50 generations. We are not going to go through that again. That is number one.

What I am suggesting is that we are helping to resolve this problem, because if the Senate was killed and we had to start from scratch, that would be the best way to go. Everybody talks about a triple-E Senate, but if you are going to elect the Senate, then it has to have power. And where is it going to get the power? Obviously, you are going to have to take the power from the House of Commons to give to it. Then you are going to end up with a system where you have to have a check and a balance and voilà, we have harmonized into the American congressional system.

I do not know where you come from, but I cannot imagine this in my own head space that we could go ahead and let these men sit in the building across the way and develop this concept of a Senate without the Canadian people having an input. Surely, we are not going to do that again. Surely, that is the lesson of Meech Lake.

The first question the hon. member asked about our asking the Senate to kill the GST. The reality is that we have a policy and our aim is to work, wherever we get the opportunity, to get the Senate eliminated. We are taking this opportunity today to try to get the government to vote with us to abolish the Senate, but the Senate is a reality, it is there and it is dominated by Liberals. The Liberal Party in this House has said it is opposed to the GST and it voted against it. The Senate Liberals are members of the caucus of the Liberal Party in the House and surely the Senate Liberals have got to be consistent with the Liberal Party. That is what we are challenging you to do. That is the challenge, but the greater issue is to get rid of the Senate and we are taking the opportunity today.

An hon. member: Would you prefer to get rid of the Senate or get rid of the GST?

Mr. Rodriguez: Well, we are killing two birds with one stone.

An hon. member: All Canadians are birds.

• (1830)

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, all Canadians have heard that the NDP prefer getting rid of the Senate to getting rid of the GST.

I want to ask a supplementary question of our NDP colleague. Notwithstanding the Meech Lake Accord and the unanimity clause of the Meech Lake Accord, which means that the Senate cannot be abolished or changed without the consent of all provinces, the NDP position right now is to breach the accord, even before it is fully passed by everybody, and get rid of the Senate notwithstanding everything else. That is the twofold statement that we heard.

One, it is better to get rid of the Senate than to get rid of the GST is the new NDP proposition which we have just heard right now through presumably their official spokesman on such issues. Second, notwithstanding the unanimity required under the Meech Lake Accord to get rid of the Senate, the NDP wants to do it unilaterally.

I do not think that my colleagues and I would agree with either one of those propositions.

Mr. Rodriguez: I will try to draw the picture for my friend.

The first opportunity that the Senate had to deal with the GST was second reading. Everybody knows that second reading is in principle. If I recall, the Liberals in this House on second reading spun out the debate. They absolutely fought the GST in this House with us, toe to toe, jowl to jowl, body to body. Together we fought the GST at second reading because in principle we believed it was a flawed tax. That is what they said, a flawed tax.

Now, lo and behold, the first opportunity the Senate had to deal with the GST was at second reading. What happened? It went in there at 11.30 in the morning and second reading was finished at 11.45 a.m. on the same day. There was not one debate on principle on the GST in the other place, which is the most disastrous tax ever in the history of this country.

I am repeating what the Liberals said in this House. They have sent a message to Canadians. They have said that secretly they agree with the principle of this tax and maybe all they are going to do is patch it up here and patch it up there. So they showed their hand that in fact they do support the GST; it is just a matter of some cosmetics to fix it up and fix it up there.

Second, without a doubt, one of the problems that we have discovered about changing the institutions of government in this country are constitutional ramifications. Surely, the people of Canada have a right to participate in the form of government that will be in place. Surely, that is a principle. Surely, that is something that we have learned from the Meech Lake experience.

The form of the other House, if there is to be another House, has to be dependent on what Canadians think. It has to be modelled on what Canadians think. We cannot go back to having 10 people and a prime minister sit down in one place and decide the form of government.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order. The time for questions and comments has now expired. Resuming debate with the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Madam Speaker, I have listened with interest to this debate. As a 40–year member of the democratic socialist movement in this country, I was very pleased with the motion moved by my colleague for Kamloops, and the speech by my friend for Prince George—Bulkley Valley. He is a couple of years younger than me.

The abolishment of the Senate has been a matter of history since the second convention of the CCF in 1935, and we have never wavered from that position. Our party has been consistent in that position for close to 55 years. So let us set that matter to rest now.

Our caucus, our party, and our leader have called upon the Senate to exercise its constitutional authority to delay, stop, or amend legislation that comes from the House of Commons. That is the reality. There is nothing we in this caucus can do about that.

What we have said is that it is about time the Senate earned its keep. It has a golden opportunity to add to what was said in this place, and said by about three–quarters of the Canadian people, on the goods and services tax. Since there is nothing we in our party can do about the constitutional authority and rights of the Senate until the Constitution is changed, all we have done is called upon the Senate to get off their backsides and do what they are supposed to do.

My colleague, the hon. member for Nickel Belt mentioned the second thoughts. My problem is, when did they ever have a first thought on the GST at second reading? Goodness knows if they will ever come up with a second thought.

I suppose I was under some delusion that the government would like this amendment moved by my colleague, the hon. member for Kamloops. I listened to the Prime Minister, the government House leader, several other cabinet ministers railing away over the last number of months about a Senate of appointed bodies usurping the rights of the supreme body, namely, the House of Commons, an elected body, by delaying, amending and otherwise compromising government legislation. Well now, isn't that sad?

However, I thought that the motion by my colleague from Kamloops would make the government most happy. If members want to put an end to what the other place is doing to government legislation, pass this motion of my colleague from Kamloops tonight and cut them off at the pass, and that includes their $153 a day on any days they might show up.

I know a lot of senators and I have regard for them personally. Some of them have spent many years in public life, in parties different from mine. I have never questioned their loyalty to the country. I have never questioned their motives. I have questioned their sanity lots of times and they do the same to me and that is fair ball.

But if there is any one principle in a parliamentary democracy, and this is why I worry about what was going on across the road yesterday and today, the whole principle of representation by population is so fundamental and basic to a parliamentary democracy that there should not be any question about it.

If one reads some Canadian history going back to the conferences in Charlottetown 1864 to 1866, and a few other places, it was agreed to have a second chamber. It may not be common knowledge, but its primary responsibilities were twofold: one, so–called sober second thought; two, the protection of property. That was built into the reasons for having an appointed second chamber. The problem has been that there is nobody in the other place protecting the property of Canada, in other words, protecting this country.

As I said at the outset, I stand for the abolition of the Senate. I think it is an anachronism, at best. I am not trying to demand that the policy of my party should be implemented yesterday. I recognize the reality. The Senate is there and if we cannot get it abolished, we will get it elected. However, if it is going to be elected, then somewhere in the scheme of things the principle of representation by population has to come into play. Typically Canadian, we compromise here and there on the size of constituencies, the amount of population in each one right across the country. That takes into account and recognizes our geography and where our people are located and we provide a margin of above or below the average. If we cannot get the Senate abolished, then we have to arrive at that compromise.

In fact, many years ago my beloved former colleague, the then member for Winnipeg North Centre, turned pale and went into shock when a former colleague of mine went into his office and said that we need to have two NDPers accept an appointment to the Senate. He asked: "Why would you want to do that?" and we said: "There will have to be two NDPers in the Senate to move and second a motion to abolish the damned thing, otherwise it will never happen". So, I am tempted to volunteer and maybe my good friends the hon. member for Kamloops or the hon. member for Brant would be willing to join me so we could get something started in the Senate to abolish it.

I mentioned earlier that I have listened to government members in this government, and even members of the previous Liberal government, complain vociferously about the activities of the Senate. It is more particularly germane to today's debate. Repeatedly, the Prime Minister, the government House leader, other cabinet ministers and members on the back-benches of the government have complained about the abuse of parliamentary democracy by unelected members of the Senate. Cutting off their funding puts an end to that abuse, to put it purely and simply.

Unless there are a lot of hon. members on the government side or in the Liberal caucus who are preaching for a call and an appointment to the Senate, surely they can do no other. I maybe should exclude the members of the Liberal caucus, but certainly the members of the government caucus who are outnumbered in the other place at the moment, which they will correct some time in October or November, if worse comes to worst. It is perfectly legal and constitutional; they will have a majority and they will get their bills through.

What has that got to do with a parliamentary democracy? It is just a continuation of what has been going on since 1867. They are not there to represent the ordinary people of this country. They are there supposedly to supply second thoughts. They are something like some of the born again Christians that I have run into. They did not learn any better the second time around; their second thoughts, so much for that.

They are also there to protect property. I get phone calls from people who are losing their house or losing their farm because of what the banks are doing, or even what an agency of this Parliament, the Farm Credit Corporation, is doing to farmers in my province and all other parts of Canada. I have small businessmen phone or ask me to drop around and see them. Where is the Senate? It is there to protect them and have been since 1867.

I doubt if any of these words in this Chamber today are going to get across the road, Madam Speaker, but you never know. They might. I think the First Ministers better think again. This is my own personal opinion because it is not party policy. However, I have the right in my caucus to express my personal opinion on this issue and others. All three parties better think again about the whole principle of representation by population, and margins can be made below and above the average in every province or every region of Canada.

I have listened to all three political parties in several provinces over the last 40 years complaining about the gerrymandering and the unbalanced representation in provincial constituencies, for example, if one provincial riding had 7,000 population and the other one had 12,000 or 15,000. I have listened to all three political parties complain about that ad nauseam in province after province, always when they were in opposition.

We negate the principle of representation by population at the peril of a parliamentary democracy, unless we keep in place the paramountcy of the House of Commons. If that is not there, I do not care what kind of Senate reform is brought in we lose the power of the commoners, we lose the authority of the commoners and the government of the day, even if an unbalanced Senate were elected. We have hit very hard at the foundations of a parliamentary democracy. If there is nothing else we have inherited from the British and the French, it is that.

• (1850)

I object to resorting to copying the United States congressional system. God knows they are good neighbours and good friends, but I think the flaws in their system are a heck of a lot worse than the ones in ours.

I for one do not want to adopt the kind of system where a province like mine has x number of senators and another province with four or five times the population has the same number. If they are elected, what does that do to the foundation of a parliamentary democracy?

I have more faith in the Canadian people. Whether they come from Ontario, Newfoundland, or Saskatchewan their basic instincts of decency, civility, getting along together and keeping this country united will always come through. The problem has not been with our own people, except when we fail to provide some leadership and statesmanship. That is where the problem has been too many times in my 22 years here and years before that in active participation in the political process.

If nothing else I hope, because the government could bring in another motion tomorrow and carry it, that it gives a signal to the other place to cut the mustard or it is shut down. It has a constitutional right presently to defeat a government bill, amend it, or delay it. That has always been there. That is the reality, but, by the gods of war, if it wants to survive for at least four, five or six years—I predict that is about the limit of its life—it better start earning its keep.

That is why the NDP demands that members of the Senate stop the GST. They do not have to worry about polls or their own political parties. They can do whatever they want. They talk a good fight. Now is their chance. If they want to do something just for once to present some evidence that justifies their existence, then they better do it now. I think we should cut them off at the pass, tonight. Whatever the First Ministers come up with across the street that they agree on and that will implement Meech Lake, God bless them. I know it will be a big improvement, if they agree, over what we presently have.

I think no harm is done to this House or to this country if we cut off the funding for that other place, because as a famous British parliamentarian said "for what you have done for as long as you have been here, you can do no more. In the name of God, go".

Please, Madam Speaker, I ask this House to pass the motion of my hon. friend for Kamloops.

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Madam Speaker, I sat here and listened to my highly respected and hon. colleague from Regina—Lumsden. I have also sat and listened to the comments and questions made by others in relation to earlier speeches. I could not help but think that if we could induce the public to listen to the debate that has gone on over the last hour, indeed the spirit and essence of the debate would be such that we would be leaving the public totally confused.

On the one hand we have a group arguing that it is essential to abolish the Senate tonight. On the other hand we have another group arguing that the Senate should be in a position to stop completely and totally the goods and services tax legislation before it.

We have the argument from those who are proponents of abolishing the Senate that for them to ask the Senate to abolish the goods and services tax is in effect supporting the existence of the Senate.

It is a totally confused message that the public and those who care to take the time to listen to this debate tonight are receiving.

There is another interesting aspect to this issue too: if we were to support the motion of the member for Kamloops, which would effectively pull out the funding from the Senate, this would, I suppose in a practical sense eliminate the Senate. Further, if you carry this logic to its next conclusion, this automatically means the passage of the goods and services tax because without the Senate or the other place for the House of Commons to send its business for the so-called sober second thought, the goods and services tax bill would be a fait accompli. We would have the matter before us.

We have one argument to cut the funds from the Senate because we do not need the Senate. On the other hand, we are asking the Senate, although we do not believe in it, to discontinue its apparent support up to this time. There has been some argument about whether or not there was support for the goods and services tax at the second reading stage. We have people saying to eliminate the budget for the Senate, which will bring the Senate down and cause senators to have no place to come to work. This would mean the passage of all these bills that are deemed so controversial.

I am totally confused by what message it is that we are intended to have conveyed to us. There are likely some people who are taking parts of my sentence and saying that the hon. member is probably confused most of the time. For those who only pick that out of my comments, I would say to listen to the entire sentence.

I offer some sympathy to my colleague, the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden. While he has conveyed to us that he is given the opportunity to speak freely with an open mind on any subject that he wishes whether or not it addresses his party's policy, he is caught between the proverbial rock and a hard place.

Does he really mean—and I say this in all sincerity—that the Senate, should not have any funds, which will mean the automatic passage of the goods and services tax? Is that what they really want? Or, do they really want the Senate which they do not believe in to step in and annihilate the goods and services tax? By the way, it is a tax about which members of the opposition have spent much time and effort in passing along half-truths to the public so that they are, as is most of the public, totally confused and baffled and object to the imposition of what is perceived to be a new tax?

I present that proposition to the hon. member. Does he not find himself on a shaky fence? I do not mean that he has placed himself there but, by virtue of the motion the hon. member for Kamloops has placed before us this evening, does it not leave him with a bit of a contradiction in principles?

Mr. Benjamin: I thank my colleague and friend from Regina—Wascana. I did not want to repeat the argument that has been put up numerous times today and in the previous few weeks.

We have stuck to our guns on a policy that goes back 55 years on abolishing the Senate. All we are doing is facing up to what we have to face today and over the last 55 years. The Senate is there. The majority of people supported the present government and the previous one on maintaining the Senate, so we lost. I am not complaining about that. In spite of that, a large body of opinion in the country says either do something about it or get rid of it. I hope the latter point will gain sway.

Given that reality—and I said it in my remarks and I say it to my hon. friend—for once will they earn their keep? They are there to provide second thoughts. Just for a change they should protect the property of homeowners and farmers from the GST. They should protect the businesses of small business people by the thousands all over this country. Why do they not protect that property for a change instead of the property of the corporate few? I am not interested in those kinds of bodies being in a first or even second chamber of this place. We do not need it. They have victimized the people of this country for decades and they continue to do so.

May I remind my hon. friend what is going on among financial institutions these days. The Senate is silent about the farmers, the little store keepers and the homeowners in my riding and his as well. But when it comes to the property of the wealthy or the Toronto Stock Exchange, the bondholders, oh my goodness, that is their idea if protection of property. The Senate has failed to understand the reason and purpose for its existence, if there ever was one.

I make no apologies for the position my party has taken since 1935 and the position we are taking today. They either put up or shut up or we get rid of them, one or the other.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Madam Speaker, I do not want to unduly irritate the member for Regina—Lumsden so I hope he will keep calm. I just want to point out something to the House. We understand the nature of the debate on the amendment to the motion and we understand what the New Democratic Party is attempting to accomplish here.

However, I want to point out to my hon. friend and to other members of the House that he has perhaps misinformed himself on the effect of defeating this $27,605,000 item. He said in his speech that we should cut the Senate off at the pass and that this would destroy the Senate. That is not in fact the case. There is another vote applicable to the Senate of some $10 million which provides the salaries, allowances and other payments to the Speaker of the Senate and the members of the Senate. So I am afraid that if we were to defeat this vote for $27 million we would still be left with the Senate of Canada. We would still be left with the members of the Senate receiving their allowances, which the member from Nickel Belt detailed and complained of, and we would not really accomplish anything.

I just want to point out that while it is a very interesting debate, it will not accomplish the end which the members of the New Democratic Party have suggested. We will still be looking at the Senate the day after tomorrow.

Madam Deputy Speaker: A short comment, the hon. member for Regina—Lumsden.

Mr. Benjamin: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the remarks of my friend from Halifax West. At least he was better today than he was yesterday.

If we only have to pay $10 million for the Senate, that is a hell of a lot better than another $27 million. If that is for severance pay and to retire the Speaker and whatever else, we got by cheap, we saved a lot of money. All we are trying to do is get a message through to them.

By the way, as I understand the rules, if this piece of the Estimates were defeated tonight, the government could bring in a new motion tomorrow and round up the troops and defeat it. I have listened to the speeches of my hon. friend the government House leader about how terrible those terrible senators are. We are trying to be helpful. We are trying to help him get rid of these nuts that are delaying or hurting the government's bill. We would like a little thanks and appreciation from my friend from Calgary. We are just trying to help him out and help out the government. I do not understand the logic of kicking the hell out of the Senate and then providing all the money for it.

We could tell the rest of the country, the municipalities, the business corporations and whatnot, that if they want to keep a Senate they can put up the money, but we won't.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Pursuant to Order made Tuesday, June 5, 1990, the recorded division stands deferred until 10 o'clock p.m. this day.

CONCURRENCE IN VOTE 25—PUBLIC WORKS

Hon. Harvie Andre (for the President of the Treasury Board) moved:

Motion No. 3

That Vote 25, in the amount of $1,883,690,000 under Public Works—Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation—Budgetary Expenditures, in the Main Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1991 (less the amount voted in Interim Supply), be concurred in.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Madam Speaker, I would like to speak in support of the motion before the House.

[Translation]

I welcome the opportunity today to address the impact of the Main Estimates on housing. There have been allegations that the federal government has lost interest in housing and is letting the disadvantaged find for themselves. Nothing could be further from the truth.

[English]

As the Minister of State for Housing I ask all members of this House to support the approval of the Main Estimates for 1990–91. With respect to the $1.884 billion included in these spending estimates with respect to housing, I must point out to the House that over 90 per cent of the total included in Vote 25 is associated with commitments made in prior years.

These moneys are required as a result of the contractual obligations entered into by this government and former governments. These are obligations to provincial housing agencies and their reimbursements for expenses which are being incurred as a result of these continuing commitments.

Within the remaining 10 per cent or less, most of the expenditures relate to planned 1990 social housing commitments in accordance with agreements between the federal government and the provinces that have been in place since 1986.

Approval of Vote 25 is essential if we are going to honour the commitments that we have made in the context of our current federal-provincial agreements, and if we are to allow the many non-profit groups to develop and proceed with the needed housing for low-income Canadians.

Finally, in the housing support expenditures that we have planned, the Estimates include some $32.3 million against $33.9 million in fiscal year 1989-90. I should point out that there has been no increase in this proportion of CMHC's expenditures for several years.

Although planned new activity has been cut by some 15 per cent, many people do not realize that the budget is actually continuing to grow. In fiscal year 1989-1990, it is estimated that the federal government contributed some $1.7 billion in social housing assistance. In fiscal year 1990-1991, our total budget will increase almost $91 million.

We will not be able to increase the supply of assisted housing as far as we had planned, but we are still going to provide almost $90 million for new social housing in 1990.

Since forming the government we have been very upfront about the belief that the deficit must be reduced. If Canada is to enjoy a strong and growing economy, one which will increase the opportunities for all Canadians, we must demonstrate our readiness to manage effectively.

In the housing area we have made great strides since 1984. Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation has exemplified the the kind of good management that we need throughout all of the government. For example, the Mortgage Insurance Fund had a deficit of some $786 million in 1984 when the government came into office. Today that has been turned around to a position where it is solvent for the first time in a decade.

CMHC has made some very significant reductions in manpower as well, with a decrease of over 1,000 staff years since 1984, while at the same time improving its performance in a wide range of other areas. As a result of the last expenditure review, CMHC will have reduced its administrative costs associated with government programs by $3.5 million by 1991. In area after area, we have demonstrated the ability to reduce spending, to use assets more efficiently and to provide increased help where it is most needed.

Before 1984, federal government policies provided programs designed for various income levels. Two out of three households receiving federal assistance could afford housing on the private market. In the private sector, a series of intermittent programs cost hundreds of millions of dollars in subsidies which were found to be both ineffective and inequitable and even caused some distortion on the market.

[English]

The two main principles of our housing program since 1986 have been to direct social housing assistance to those most in need and to support rather than interfere with the effective functioning of the private housing markets.

Over the four preceding years, some 80,000 assisted housing units were produced, but only about 40 per cent of those were directed to those in need, perhaps some 32,000 households. In the four years since 1986 we have assisted some 75,000 low-income households, that in comparison with only 32,000 low-income households in the previous four years that the former government was in office.

In 1984, there were less than 135,000 housing starts in Canada. Since then we have averaged over 200,000 housing starts in this country each year. Preliminary numbers for May show that housing starts have actually not fallen this year but have stabilized somewhere around the 200,000 mark, and that in spite of the slowing down of the economic situation that we have seen in recent weeks. We could expect that there will be some drop-off in the number of housing starts, obviously in reaction to current interest rates, but this has not yet materialized and we are still in the neighbourhood of some 200,000 a year.

It is clear that we have provided more opportunities both in assisted housing and in the private market. But that certainly does not mean that the job is complete. In my travels across the country over the past year I have met with representatives of provincial, territorial and municipal governments, with members of the native community, members of the academic community, with people in every aspect of the housing industry and with people who are in real need.

[Translation]

I have listened to single parents who have trouble making a living; to native people in remote areas living in very difficult conditions; to higher income senior citizens and even to young couples who are working very hard to give their children a good start in life.

[English]

I have listened to the concerns these people have and to their ideas. I have seen the deplorable conditions that many face, even in a country as rich as ours.

Affordability is the most immediate concern, one which clearly cannot be resolved by the federal government acting alone. Canada is a vast country with very different regional environments in terms in both geography and history. The complexity of the situation is illustrated by the fact that a single municipal by-law could frustrate the efforts to provide affordable housing in any given area. I could have millions or billions more dollars in my budget and one single municipal by-law could destroy the effectiveness of that funding as far as affordable housing is concerned.

If all Canadians are to enjoy adequate and affordable housing, we require a concerted effort by all levels of government working together and working with the home building industry.

At the federal level we have been building on a strong foundation of our two guiding principles to address the shelter needs of low-income households within our social housing programs and, in the private market, for renters and aspiring homeowners.

Although there is still much to be done, we really have much to be grateful for here in Canada with respect to housing. We have a very mature home building industry which has met the challenge of housing for a growing population. In the short period of some 40 years, from 1941 to 1981, the number of dwellings in Canada was increased from about 2.6 million to over 8.2 million. That is quite an achievement.

What is more, the percentage of homeowners has increased to the point that 62 per cent of households now own their own homes. That puts Canada ahead of most other developed countries in the world as far as giving its citizens an opportunity to acquire an equity hedge for their retirement years. This accomplishment is all the more dramatic when you consider that these mean a seven-fold growth in owner-occupied dwellings in our cities.

Over the five-year period since 1985, Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation has provided mortgage insurance on almost three-quarters of a million dwellings, allowing people to obtain a home of their own with a down payment as low as 10 per cent. This includes many first-time home buyers who were able to achieve the dream of homeownership only through the CMHC mortgage insurance program.

Canada has also developed a large supply of assisted housing providing shelters to some 637,000 households. This portfolio provides decent shelter and affordable rents in settings where the residents can enjoy security of tenure. Over the lifetime of each of these 637,000 dwellings, they will provide a home to many households in time of need. This portfolio is a major component of Canada's social safety-net. It represents a federal commitment this year alone of $1.8 billion in annual subsidies.

Our emphasis now is on preserving this societal asset and in utilizing it more effectively. Now we are looking for ways to serve more low-income households within our existing supply of assisted housing. In part, we are encouraging the project sponsors of projects committed under previous programs to fill vacancies with households in need.

I firmly believe that we need not only to provide decent shelter to low-income families and individuals, but to ensure that these people have the maximum opportunity to take hold of their housing needs, to shape their own communities, and to experience the pride of self and place which so many of us take for granted. Many of the residents of public housing have shown their readiness to play a greater role in the management of their own projects and to contribute to the building of strong and safe communities.

The Doone Street project in Fredericton, New Brunswick, is just one example of what residents can do want they join forces. Not only did they create a drop-in unit headed by a local policeman, but they were able to get rid of community violence and intimidation in the project. At the same time, they were able to take on the exterior maintenance work for their own project, creating work for teenagers who to live in that project. They are also organizing spring clean-up programs in which the entire community joins with help from the project management.

That is just one example of many exciting ways in which tenants in public housing projects across the country have started to involve themselves in the actual management and running of those projects. We are doing our very best to encourage much more of that.

Recently, I wrote to my provincial colleagues, asking them for their co-operation in encouraging more of this kind of effort. I believe that the residents of public housing are ready, willing, and able to play meaningful roles in their own projects, homes, and environments.

I am pleased that most of the provincial response has been very positive to that. Already we have announced a set of initiatives to encourage increased resident participation in New Brunswick and I expect that we will be following that up very shortly with other similar announcements and similar efforts in all of the provinces where the provincial governments agreed to co-operate.

We have a lot to be proud of in our housing, but there are still areas of concern. Young families just starting out are finding that ownership is getting beyond their reach. The cost of homes is escalating much faster than they can afford to save.

Several factors are involved in this situation. One is that we are continuing to produce larger homes which attract second-time buyers but are unaffordable to those purchasing their first home. This is, in part, a reflection of the zoning in place in many areas of the country.

Another problem is that in some of the major centres, such as Toronto and Vancouver, there is a shortage of serviced land that is suitable for housing. We have built up large areas of suburban sprawl that result in extensive travel to and from work, expensive and under-used service infrastructure, and often under-populated city cores.

[Translation]

The federal government has taken steps to deal with these problems. We have freed surplus government property in Toronto and Vancouver. In the Toronto area, for instance, this means developing new communities that will accommodate from 12,000 to 16,000 residents. Many of these new units will be affordable housing.

[English]

A few weeks ago I announced plans to redevelop some 16 properties in the Kitsilano area of Vancouver which are owned by CMHC. This initiative will ensure more appropriate housing to the existing tenants, many of whom are getting on in years, while it frees up land for other uses. It will be a hallmark of our commitment to both consultation and making better use of our land resources. I am sure that we are going to see many more residents utilizing that great federal asset than have in the past.

I have also announced our plans to redevelop the very land on which the CMHC Toronto branch is situated. That is another case of using what we have more effectively. Other sites are under active consideration at the present time.

Just last week I turned the first sod for the redevelopment of a major 43-acre site in the district of Burnaby, in British Columbia, where we will soon see the first new dwellings being built in what will become a new and integrated community of up to 1,200 people.

As I have said, the federal government cannot do all this alone. I am pleased to see that the mayors of Canada's major cities, in their caucus in the Federation of Canadian Municipalities, have recently joined in my call for a more concerted effort to address the housing affordability issue. This is why I have initiated the establishment of joint committees of all three levels of government to identify other potential lands and to overcome some of the roadblocks to meeting the needs for affordable housing. Such committees are already operating in a goodly number of urban centres across the country.

I mentioned the role of zoning and by-laws. Important as they are, we cannot allow them to be cast in stone so that they can prevent the realization of needed housing and the implementation of new approaches to better serve emerging needs. That is why earlier this year, I announced a program called ACT, Affordability and Choice Today. This is a co-operative program of the Federation of Canadian Municipalities, the Canadian Home Builders, and the Canadian Housing and Renewal Association, funded by the federal government through CMHC.

The objective of ACT is to encourage reform of our system of by-laws to better reflect today's needs and to reduce the delays which can add so much to the cost of housing without adding any value.

We believe that consultation is the answer to many of our housing problems. We believe that with consultation we can benefit those who need housing. This is evident in our continuing work on developing housing options for seniors. Recently I have undertaken to have a series of housing conferences for seniors across the country. These are just some of the things that we have undertaken with respect to housing initiatives at the federal level over the last year.

The $1.8 billion in the Main Estimates for federal housing programs are absolutely essential if we are going to continue to meet the social housing commitments we have made over the years and if we are going to be able to produce even more social housing and help more Canadians to be housed better in this coming year. I urge the House to support the motion and vote to make sure we can assist the federal government to do a better job to house Canadians in the coming year.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Madam Speaker, I thank the minister for his remarks. I know he cares deeply about the very serious problem we have in the country today with affordable housing.

I want to ask him two questions. Right now young people cannot get the down payment required on many new large homes being built, especially in major markets. I would cite my own market, Toronto, as one prime example. Not only do they not have the money for the down payments, they also find when they do get a mortgage it is only for three or five years, and with the fluctuation in interest rates there is no long-term stability. It is very frustrating for them and promotes a lot of insecurity in families.

Because this is a very trying and difficult time, would the minister consider asking Canada Mortgage and Housing to supply up to 100 per cent of the financing? At the same time, what is the longest period that Canada Mortgage and Housing is providing for mortgages with the current formula? It was not that long ago that you could have a mortgage for 15 and 25 years. I wonder why we could not get back to that.

Mr. Redway: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the comments and remarks of the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood. I know he too has a deep interest in making sure that Canadians have affordable housing, particularly in his and my city of Toronto. He specifically asked questions with respect to the amount of down payments or mortgage insurance which might be available and also the term of a mortgage.

I will start with his second question first and say there really is no limit on the term of a mortgage that Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation will insure. If a buyer of a home wants to commit to a mortgage with a long term, they can very well commit to that and there is no problem providing insurance as was common a number of years ago.

Unfortunately, because of the interest rate situation and the fluctuations in interest rates over the last few years, many people gamble that they will fall and so accept shorter term mortgages, sometimes as short as six months. As the hon. member points out, sometimes three years or five years but not the longer term mortgages we used to see. It is not because it is not available, it is that the actual borrowers are interested in getting their interest rate as low as possible and then lock themselves into a longer term commitment.

In the last four years we have provided a new program called "mortgage backed securities". A mortgage backed security allows for an investor in securities to sell those securities and provide a secondary market for the securities, which were not available prior to four years ago when the mortgage backed security form was introduced by Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation, the federal housing agency.

At the time, it was hoped that the MBS, the mortgage backed security, would allow investors to feel they could give longer term mortgages, because they could always be sold. There would be a secondary market for their mortgages, and they would feel protected.

The mortgage backed securities have been very successful and billions have been put on to the market. It is a very well accepted program. Unfortunately, in spite of all that, the actual borrowers, the home purchasers or home buyers by and large have been unwilling to commit to longer term mortgages. I suspect it is because they feel that, while interest rates may be "x" today they will be "x minus y" tomorrow. They want to get in and take advantage of the lower interest rates.

I am not sure that answers completely the hon. member's question with respect to the term of mortgages, but I will be announcing shortly some further details with respect to a housing financing conference this fall. We will be looking at all aspects of housing financing, particularly for first time home buyers. We will be examining all the various options that anybody has ever thought of that might be available, to see if there is not a way we can improve the situation with respect to the financing aspect.

The hon. member also asked a question about 100 per cent insured mortgages. As he is aware, now one can obtain an insured mortgage with a down payment of up to 10 per cent. We are exploring this very carefully, and hopefully before too long we will have a 95 per cent insured mortgage with a 5 per cent down payment in place. Quite frankly, there are many people who feel concerned with down payments that are as low as 5 per cent. I guess it is against that concern that one has to balance off the thought of having a 100 per cent insured mortgage and a zero down payment.

Those things have been tried in the past. However, I think it is important that there be some personal commitment by the people buying a home so that they know they have their own stake in the home and it is not just the stake of the taxpayers involved. Still, we are pursuing very vigorously the concept of a 5 per cent down payment and 95 per cent insured mortgage. We are going to be holding this conference on financing housing this fall, which I am sure the hon. member will find very interesting.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, I thank the minister for a very able presentation of his motion.

The presentation of his motion is more able than the government's performance. I am sure he will be able to comment on figures that were presented to us by the Canadian Home Builders' Association concerning what it thinks is the main cause for the disastrous decline in housing starts, which it finds in the interest rate rise.

The Canadian Home Builders' Association commented that first time home buyers who could afford 10 per cent mortgage rates number about 96,000. It requires an income of $51,500, and that includes 24 per cent of all buyers. When the mortgage rates went up to 14 per cent and the income required was $67,500, instead of 96,000, there were less than half. There were 40,500 who could afford it. This is 10 per cent of all potential buyers.

I am wondering what the hon. minister can tell us about the government's plans to relieve the situation of home buyers, home builders, construction workers, furniture makers, material suppliers and all the other many thousands who depend on the building of homes, either to use them or to produce them. If a rise in mortgage rates from 10 per cent to 14 per cent cuts the number of possible buyers to less than half, can the minister assure us, either that the interest rates will soon come down and enable people to buy homes again or that the schemes he has been telling us about will, in spite of the high interest rates, be able to bring the percentage who can afford to buy a home up from 10 per cent to 24 per cent.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. minister. There is very little time left.

Mr. Redway: Madam Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina for his question. As the hon. member is aware, there are a number of factors involved in the question of affordability of housing. One factor is the amount of the monthly payment and that is impacted by interest rates. Other factors relate to the price of the house itself.

Recently, many people have been saying that Canadians should really be applauding the fact that housing prices are now starting to fall and indicating that perhaps it was necessary that we have a situation like that if we are going to avoid a real disaster in the future, so that we can make sure that for future generations housing will be affordable. When housing prices go up, they cause problems. When housing prices come down, they cause problems. All of this, unfortunately, does not help the situation for people who want to buy houses.

At the same time, I would like to assure the hon. member that many of the programs that we have now under way, including the development of surplus federal government lands for first time home buyer housing in the metropolitan Toronto and the Vancouver areas, other initiatives that we hope we will have on stream before too long such as the 5 per cent down payment, all will help the affordability situation and will certainly help people to be able to buy homes, people who cannot buy them now.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to rise and talk about a very important matter, the question of affordable housing. In the Estimates the government is seeking approval of some $1.8 billion. I do not believe this truly represents the situation in Canada today with respect to those people who are seeking affordable housing, be it the home owner, the people in rental accommodation, people wanting to renovate their homes, the single parent, people of social assistance, seniors, or the physically challenged, who are finding it more and more difficult in respect of housing affordability.

While I applaud the efforts of my friend, the Minister of State for Housing, it is the government's lack of a sense of urgency and lack of commitment to housing which troubles me and troubles Canadians generally. I want to say that the stark reality of what is happening in this country cannot be disregarded any longer. While the minister paints a picture that would suggest, "Don't worry, be happy, although we are going through some difficult times, the situation is not as bad as it looks".

Let me deal first with the question of home ownership and what it means to those people who want to keep that dream of owning a home. My colleague spoke of the situation in Toronto and other centres. CMHC has projected that the industry will continue to build something like 200,000 homes this year. In fact, not only has the minister said that, but the former minister and the Minister of State for Privatization have spoken about the fact that the situation is stabilizing, that there is no need to get too excited about the fact that there seems to be a slowdown in the construction industry.

The Toronto home builders and the Canadian home builders have tried to tell the government that 14.5 per cent interest rates are killing their industry. It is not only killing the dreams of people but killing the industry. Not 200,000 homes will be built in 1990–91 but only somewhere between 160,000 to 170,000 homes will be built in the next year. What that means is you have a lot of people who cannot buy these homes because they have become unaffordable as a result of high interest rates. Second, the construction industry and other related industries from window manufacturers to durable goods manufacturers are all starting to lay off people.

The industry is trying to tell the government, CMHC and the finance minister that 25 per cent to 30 per cent are already being laid off. The minister would want you to believe that don't worry, be happy, 200,000 homes will be built next year, the fact is that people cannot afford to buy the homes and the industry is declining very quickly. I hope that CMHC and the minister will meet with these people at the earliest possible opportunity to get the facts right because housing is not only good economics, it is good social policy.

I want to cover a number of topics, especially as they relate to the $1.8 billion that this government commits to people and social housing. I can tell you that if you look at the stark statistics of what is happening in this country, you will see that there are over 1.3 million households in the country that are paying more than 30 per cent of their income toward housing. There are close to 600,000 Canadians across this country paying over 50 per cent of their income toward housing.

Mr. Speaker, I do not have to tell you that is not only a serious economic problem for Canadians but a serious social problem as well. If Canadians cannot afford to pay their rent, or have to pay more rent, they will have to deprive themselves of certain things such as clothing and food. That is why you have over 500,000 people going to food banks each and every day, because it is too expensive for them to live.

I want to deal with this government's commitment to social housing. While the minister has paraded around the country saying: "Give my government hell so that I can do my job and get some more money to help people and so that the non-profit groups and the co-operative groups get more money so they can build more units", every time he comes out of the cabinet room, he comes out with less for housing.

In this year alone there was 15 per cent less for social housing. In the next five years there will be $165 million less for social housing. Over the past four or five years, the government promised the co-operative sector to build 5,000 units to help the thousands of people on waiting lists from B.C. to Newfoundland to Ontario. Every province has waiting lists and people looking for affordable housing.

The co-operative sector was a way of being able to achieve affordability. In 1986 the government promised 5,000 units a year. We are at the end of the five-year term and in not one year did the government provide enough funds to build those 5,000 units. This year it will only be able to fund 1,500 units. Last year it funded 2,000. The year before it may have funded 2,500. What happened to the commitment to the 5,000 units each and every year for co-op housing and for the people who want to share in collective ownership? The government's commitment has been worth absolutely nothing. The whole program is threatened with cancellation because the minister and CMHC is reviewing the co-operative program.

I attended the meeting of the Co-Operative Housing Federation in Edmonton on the weekend. They are seriously concerned that this government will kill co-op housing and kill the opportunity for thousands of people across the country to have affordable housing.

Mr. Speaker, it is also very clear that in this country the homeless and people seeking affordable housing want a government that is responsive to their needs. As I have said, over the past four or five years, we have had a government that talks a good line but in actual fact has shifted the responsibility of housing more and more in each and every year to the provinces and the municipalities. In fact, the minister says tonight that governments cannot interfere in the private market-place. However, they are interfering in the market-place, especially when they will not do anything to lower interest rates.

When the Minister of Finance and other ministers say that it is essential to keep high interest rates to deal with inflation, the fact remains that people paying 14.5 per cent interest rates are potentially going to lose their homes. I think it is important for this government to realize that it can be a full partner in the housing issue. It should realize that it has the provinces, the municipalities, the non-profit sector, the co-operate and private sector which are all working together, and can essentially deliver affordable housing if there is a willing partner in the federal government.

The federal government cannot continue to say to Canadians that it is not its responsibility, that is the responsibility of the provincial government to do something. It has a prime responsibility, as it has in the past. CMHC is the federal agency that produced many homes after the war and worked with provinces and municipalities to achieve the housing objectives that we have for this country. Yet, slowly but surely since 1984, this government has taken itself out of the true partnership that must exist to deal with the housing problems.

We believe that if you house people and give them the opportunity for affordable housing, you will not increase the deficit, you will not have to increase government expenditures but in actual fact, you may decrease them. We know for a fact that subjecting people to inadequate housing or the problems of high-cost housing causes social and family problems. It causes crime and drug problems. In turn, that will cost not only the federal but provincial and municipal governments millions of dollars in extra expenditures. Providing a decent home for every Canadian in this country is the best way to deal with not only shelter, but social problems. We believe the two have to work in tandem.

We as a party some year and a half ago travelled across the country and talked with homebuilders, co-operative people, the non-profit sector, tenants, municipalities, and provincial governments. Across the country we went and essentially the message was clear. Everyone was saying that the federal government must become more involved, must exercise its leadership in housing, be prepared to bring in those programs and be prepared to work with the other levels of government and the other sectors to bring affordability back to housing. We have not seen that.

Our party laid out in our task force report some 25 recommendations that deal with how we believe the housing problems can be solved in this country. They talk about forging those new partnerships which are important and looking at ways of changing those financial instruments with generation mortgages, long-term mortgages, lower interest rates and getting rid of the GST that is going to add at least 2 to 2.5 per cent on the cost of a house, even after the rebates. There are a number of things that can be done to bring affordability back into the equation. We would like the commitment of this government to continue co-op programs with at least 5,000 units per year. We want more social housing built in combination with perhaps the private and non-profit sector working together. We also believe there needs to be recognition for the working poor and people on social assistance. Perhaps their income is not adequate to cover the expenses of their home. There needs to be some consultation and co-ordination with the provincial governments for topping up provisions of income, especially when you have the supply side problem and you are not able to build enough units. There is an opportunity to help those people who are paying more than 30 per cent, or more than 50 per cent of their income, on shelter.

There is another opportunity to deal with the private sector more effectively. The Canadian Homebuilders' Association and other homebuilders across the country should be freed from some of the red tape that exists at the municipal, provincial and federal levels of governments so that they can in fact start to produce the homes that people want and can afford to buy.

We also have to recognize that not everybody wants to buy a home. They have to live in rental accommodation. We know what interest rates are going to do to the supply side and to rental accommodations. Builders will not build. Investors will not invest in buildings when they know that interest rates are 14.5 per cent and climbing. Fewer rental buildings and apartments will be built, exacerbating the problem and the existing waiting lists.

We also believe that this government has shown callous disregard in the renovation market for the existing rental stock. We used to have a fantastic program, RRAP, but it has now been cut by this government. That was one way of being able to rehabilitate our existing stock so that people could have affordable housing. Again this government has cut the housing budget. At the same time it wants us to believe that it is sincere and sensitive to the plight of the people in this country and yet it cut these worth-while programs which in fact provided affordable housing.

Our report and our consultation with Canadians has indicated that we need the reinstitution of the RRAP. We believe there is an opportunity for existing stock to be rehabilitated.

We believe that financial institutions have a very big part to play in delivering affordable housing, possibly the development of innovative mortgage instruments. We also believe that the government, while it talks a great line about Crown lands, essentially has done too little with respect to putting those Crown lands in the hands of the non-profit sector or co-operatives.

Rather than selling that land at market prices, we suggest that the government look at long-term leasing to the co-operatives and to the non-profit sectors, thereby taking the exorbitant land costs out of the total housing construction equation.

We believe that this could be an opportunity to reduce the rent subsidy that might be required. We also believe there is an opportunity for the government to look at community land trusts so that within a co-operative or a non-profit area equity participation or capitalization could be added so that those groups can in fact generate internal capital for other projects.

There are a number of great opportunities in housing but we believe that this government needs to be committed. I do not question the commitment of this minister whose background in municipal government is well known. But I do question the commitment of his government which, over the past four or five years, has slashed budgets, removing responsibility from the federal government and trying to pass it off to the provincial and perhaps the municipal governments.

Finally, I want to speak again of something important. It is not only a question of money and housing.

• (2000)

The minister recognizes full well that if we can use the talents of and involve the private sector, the non-profit sector, the municipalities, and the provincial governments working together to solve the housing problems—and I agree it is complex and not simple—we can get back to the principle of housing affordability. We can give each and every Canadian the possibility of keeping alive the dream of owning a home in their lifetime and give those people who are now in apartments or homes the decent affordable housing they need.

Our seniors need help. They are living in homes, for instance, they cannot maintain because their incomes are not enough. Perhaps reverse mortgages might be the answer for that segment of the population.

I do not have to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that our physically challenged people need to have better opportunities so that they can be full participating members in our society by living in communities and not be relegated to one apartment here or another apartment there. We need to support the handicapped by allowing RRAP to meet their needs and to have them as full participating members in co-operative housing, non-profit housing, and in the private sectors.

I hope this minister and this government really do get serious about housing and get back into the game of making sure that they are doing their fair share.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate all the comments of the hon. member for London East. I felt, however, that we should make sure that the record is straight with respect to the co-op housing situation.

The hon. member well knows, as do I, that five years ago the government and the co-op housing movement entered into discussions aimed at arriving at a program which would produce, both sides hoped, some 5,000 units of co-op housing a year. That arrangement was based on certain assumptions with respect to the mortgage vehicle being used, the ILM mortgage vehicle, and assumptions with respect to the real interest rate that could be achieved. The real interest rate anticipated by the Co-op Housing Federation of Canada was some 4 per cent.

The amount of money that was put into that program by the government at the time was an amount which both sides agreed could produce 5,000 units of co-op housing a year, with a real interest rate on an ILM mortgage of 4 per cent. Unfortunately, as the executive members of the co-op housing movement quite readily agree, we have been unable to achieve that real interest rate of 4 per cent on ILM mortgages. That is the reason we have been unable to reach the target that was agreed upon of 5,000 co-op housing units each and every year.

If we can get the real interest rate on a co-op mortgage down by just 1 per cent, we can increase by 20 per cent the number of co-op housing units that the same number of subsidy dollars will provide.

One of the problems with co-op housing with respect to the government's policies, the policy of targeting all of its funds to the core needy people, is that by definition co-op housing is not core needy people exclusively but is also a range of people so as not to ghettoize poor people all in one place. It does have a range of incomes, which means people with a range of incomes are benefiting from some form of government subsidization.

The program is up for review this year, it being the fifth year of the commitment, as the hon. member knows. Are the hon. member and his party fully committed and supportive of continuing a co-op housing program in this country?

Mr. Fontana: Mr. Speaker, of course our party is fully supportive of the co-op program. I would like to remind the minister that it was the Liberal Party which, some 22 years ago, introduced the whole concept of co-operative housing in this country.

I must remind government members that between 1980 and 1984, 30,000 co-operative units were built in this country—6,000 units a year for five years. We lived up to our commitment to the co-operative housing movement of some 30,000 units.

I can assure the minister that he will not have any difficulties from this side of the House when the budget comes down next year, hopefully, and co-op housing is very much a part of it. If he wants to commit 5,000 units on behalf of the government to the co-operative housing movement, he will not get any complaints from this side of the House. I am sure he will not get any complaints from the NDP either.

I should point out to him that I am happy to see that he is committed to co-op housing and that he is looking at ways to improve the ILM instrument so that in fact it can be the mechanism by which to provide those housing units. However, if in fact it cannot be because of high interest rates, and if the real interest rates cannot be 4 per cent once inflation is taken into account, I hope that this minister will look at other ways of being able to come up with the money so that 5,000 co-op units can be built in the next five years.

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South): Mr. Speaker, I note that the motion would remove $1.883 billion and some odd from the Estimates for housing. I was wondering if the member did not understand that almost all that money, at least $1.7 billion, was spent before the Estimates were even filed by the government honouring its commitment to build some of those 6,000 units each year that the previous government built but did not pay for.

It was a great program—build houses and don't pay for them, put them on the cuff. For the next 30 years or 35 years we will have these houses on the cuff, paying interest on interest on interest.

Does he really think that was a good program? Does he really think that we should default on that obligation that is in the terms of his motion? Or, would he like to withdraw the motion completely because it makes no sense?

If he really believes in housing and really wants the minister to do something, surely he will withdraw his motion. What would happen if we told our creditors that we are not going to pay our bills? What does the hon. member think would happen? We would not build anything.

Surely the member wants to withdraw his motion.

Mr. Fontana: Mr. Speaker, the member should realize that there is no motion on the floor in which we have said that they have to scrap the $1.8 billion. What we have said is that it does not reflect the real needs of this country. It was the minister who moved the motion for $1.883 billion.

Mr. Blenkarn: No, sir, notice is hereby given of opposition.

Mr. Fontana: Yes, of course. I have already explained what our opposition is. It is that that figure does not reflect the true needs of the country.

I am sure the member for Mississauga South would like to relegate those poor people, those hundreds of thousands of people who cannot afford their homes, to living under stairwells—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comment are now terminated.

[Translation]

Mr. Allan Koury (Hochelaga—Maisonneuve): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to rise in the House tonight to address a subject that concerns many Canadians who are waiting for government assistance.

I am referring to individuals, families and senior citizens who are looking for affordable housing, people who depend on government to provide them what many of us consider normal; people who, like us, want to live decently, with dignity; people who, without our assistance, will have to make incredible sacrifices to give their children a roof over their heads; people who without assistance may not even be able to make these sacrifices and thus will not have a home.

Every day, members rise in Parliament to announce that a given industry, province or city needs help. Every day, the government explains how it establishes priorities and what its strategy is. In many ways, the situation of a single mother who is looking for decent housing for her children is similar to that of someone who has lost her home or job.

There are also many analogies between senior citizens coping with rent increases and workers who earn little and are hard pressed to make both ends meet. These people have in common a need for a government that cares.

Mr. Speaker, my colleagues and I are concerned about what will happen to these people. We feel the need to give them a hand, and we do that, but not as often as we would like.

• (2010)

That makes us mad. Mad because in spite of all the resources this great country has to help the needy, the government—the government of all Canadian—must cut down its expenditures as a result of the ill-conceived programs and unpaid bills which the previous administration left behind when it was turfed out.

The government is prepared to lend a hand, but it has difficult decisions to make about the numerous demands made on the public treasury. That is responsible government. Had this kind of leadership prevailed earlier we would not find ourselves in the financial mess left after two decades of unsound budget management.

As I followed the proceedings of the Charest Commission I was deeply touched by the remarks of a witness who recalled his childhood as a Metis living in Saskatchewan, in a shed. He struck our heartfelt emotions as Canadians. Mr. Speaker, what that man had to say means more to me than all the learned arguments about the constitutional basis of federal spending powers. As I listened to him I came to understand that these powers were rooted not only in the law of the land but also in its heart. In its heart because as he was speaking I was saying to myself that never again should he and his children have to bear the cross of poverty and that Canada should continue to offer housing programs which give the less fortunate among us the opportunity to live in dignity and to become productive citizens.

Mr. Speaker, the measures which this government has been taking since my colleague, now Minister of National Defence, addressed this House at the end of 1985 are aimed at those most in need of government assistance. The aim of the measures taken by the government when it revised its housing policy remains unchanged. The government is determined to pool the resources of all levels of government and community groups so they can be used to help the needy.

We are trying to find ways to respond more quickly to the needs of poor families and do a better job than the Liberal government that preceded us. And we are doing just that. During the past four years, since we announced our new policies we have managed to help 75,000 low-income households, while the Liberal government assisted only about 32,000 during the last four years of its term. Mr. Speaker, that is an improvement. It means 43,000 households more than the Liberal, over the same period of time. It means 43,000 households, families, single mothers, people on modest incomes, native people living on or off the reserve, handicapped Canadians and senior citizens.

Perhaps some of my colleagues, those who challenged this government's performance in the housing sector, are already aware of these developments but would rather not talk about them.

Mr. Speaker, I certainly do not intend to ignore the government's performance in the housing sector. In fact, the important thing is not necessarily what the government has done but the fact that it did so at a time when so many other major issues tended to focus public concern.

There is a lot to be said about this government's achievements in the housing sector. As a start, I would like to mention a situation that tells us a lot about this government's leadership. I am thinking of families living in large urban centres like Toronto, Montreal, Halifax, Vancouver and Winnipeg, as well as those living in smaller centres or rural regions; I am thinking of families with children, single-parent families, families on welfare and low-income families.

Mr. Speaker, these families now have increased access to subsidized housing. The present government, whose performance in the housing sector is being challenged, has used its influence to get provinces, municipalities and community groups to agree to focus more attention on the needs of the disadvantaged.

This government, which is being accused of lack of leadership, has managed to convince all parties concerned about easing the burdens of those who are in need to join forces and give these people access to more affordable and safe housing of the right size and quality. You won't read about this in the papers, but it's a fact. That is one example of the kind of leadership we provide.

Another example, Mr. Speaker, is native people. In many ways, they deserve our greatest attention. I was referring to them when I said that families should no longer have to live in poverty. As never before, these people have the attention of this government and its action in the field of social housing. Nearly half the housing provided in rural areas under the housing program for rural and native people is now used to meet the urgent needs of natives who live outside the reserves. That is an example of our commitment. Think of how successful the program for native people in urban areas is and of the money for natives living on reserves.

Mr. Speaker, I think hon. members do not want to hear about our successes. Neither do they want to hear that our government has shown enlightened leadership, a sign of effective and responsible management.

This commitment to work with native people, to offer them the best programs to meet their special needs, continues while the government holds wide-ranging consultations with native communities.

In the speech he gave to the House this evening, the Minister of State for Housing reiterated his commitment and this government's commitment to better housing for Canadians. The initiatives he has taken in the past and the energy he devotes to the housing portfolio clearly show his deep conviction that the government will find a solution to Canadians' housing problems.

But the minister does not boast about his achievements. In my opinion, that is the very essence of leadership. A leader does not spend his time recalling his successes and his accomplishments but he looks to the future, considers new challenges and shows the way.

There is no lack of challenges. In fact, the Minister of State for Housing has met them head on. Some examples are the exhaustive search for suitable housing for senior citizens; joint committees of all three levels of government set up by the minister across Canada, in order to take a collective approach to improving housing affordability; the new ACT program based on eliminating barriers and reducing delay in this area; the minister's efforts to release surplus federal land for housing purposes; his commitment to involving tenants in the management of subsidized housing; and his efforts to promote the tertiary sector. If we look at the facts, we have to admit that the poor have never been better served, and I really have trouble with claims that the government has failed to show leadership in the housing sector. I say that the people who make these claims have no idea of the meaning of the word leadership, and that they either do not know the facts, or, for obvious political reasons, prefer to ignore them.

Mr. Speaker, at the beginning of my speech this evening, I pointed out that our government was committed to helping the needy but also had to balance its concerns because of the urgent need to control government spending and put the government back on a sound financial basis. I can already hear members accusing us of every possible evil; of being guilty of fighting the deficit at the expense of the poor. Nothing could be further from the truth.

Consider the amount we expect to spend on subsidized housing during the current fiscal year: nearly $1.8 billion, or $90 million more than last year. If an increase of this magnitude means reducing the deficit at the expense of the poor, perhaps my colleagues owe the House an explanation of their concept of mathematics.

But they might say that their real concern is that spending is not rising as fast as it should, but then how fast should it rise?

Mr. Speaker, that is not how to run a government. A responsible government balances its needs, takes into account its financial obligations and creates wealth that will make it possible to continue and, who knows, to improve the programs we will require.

We hear that the 15 per cent reduction in spending growth announced by the finance minister in his latest budget is not justified. But when will we hear them explain that in spite of this reduction, our government's ability to reach more needy families and seniors will continue to exceed the levels reached under the policies supported by the Official Opposition? We will not hear such comments, Mr. Speaker, because my hon. colleagues know that they would hurt their own cause.

Mr. Speaker, our government's housing record is beyond reproach and we have in front of us tangible proof that everything is being done to make the best use of the available financial resources.

Our country maintains noble and exciting principles but has come to recognize that to pursue these lofty goals effectively, it must have a sound economic foundation and forever vigorously ensure that it obtains good value from its programs.

That is precisely what our government set out to do in 1985 when it announced a new direction for social housing policy. This turned out to be the right choice and our government has shown beyond any doubt that these new policies are the surest and fastest way to serve those in greatest need and let them know that their government cares about them.

[English]

Mr. Redway: On a question, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are three or four speakers we would like to get in before nine o'clock on the hon. minister's motion.

I will recognize the Minister of State for Housing on a short comment or question.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for his comments. I know that he came to this House from his riding in the city of Montreal as a great advocate for housing and as one who is deeply and personally involved in making sure that social housing is built in Montreal.

The hon. member is aware that in the past few days we have launched a housing conference for senior citizens' housing in the city of Montreal. I was there yesterday.

As he is aware as well, we have assisted the University of McGill to develop the new Grow Home in Montreal, a very inexpensive kind of housing that can be built for some $65,000.

The hon. member knows as well that recently the CRESSOM program was announced for southwest Montreal which included a housing component of $6.5 million.

As the hon. member knows as well, I will be with him in a short time for the opening of several new co-op housing projects in Montreal in the Angus lands with which the hon. member is well associated.

I would like to ask the hon. member if he would give us a brief description of all that wonderful housing that he and the federal government have been responsible for on those Angus lands.

Mr. Koury: Mr. Speaker, I will be very pleased to give you an array of the accomplishments on that particular site.

Of course it all started back in 1975. But the realization of the program came into being in 1985. Thanks to this government 3,000 housing units are now almost completed.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Koury: There is about 600 or 700 more units to go. We will have achieved a 15-year project within a six-year span, as I said, thanks to this government which implicated itself to put in local and charitable housing, low-cost housing, the HLM co-ops and, of course, all the low-cost housing which houses something in the order of 1,400 or 1,500 families that are on the site and who are thankful to this government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated.

On debate, the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, the motion before us is a motion to delete $1,883,690,000 from the budget of the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation.

Obviously, it was a tongue-in-cheek motion put forward by the member for London East and his colleagues since they do not seriously expect that it would be possible for this government—nor would they want it—to default on its mortgage payments which constitute 90 per cent of that amount. Thus it will be necessary to vote in favour of the motion so as not to worry the banker friends of the Liberal and Tory Parties.

It is really difficult to defend the government's program. The fact is that under this government the housing program has declined, and the previous minister responsible for housing was quite explicit about it. When he called for consultation, he did not say about what, he just said: "Give me your views". People told what kind of housing they thought was needed and then he said, "Well, there is going to be less" and he started reducing the social housing program in particular.

At that time, the home builders' association said, "That's fine, just leave us alone. We don't want subsidy for profit housing." Of course, the government was glad to take it at its word. Now we are having the further word from the home builders' association, which I will touch on in a few minutes.

The fact is that this government has been, year by year, retreating from providing housing to people for whom the market does not provide. There simply is going to be no program at all very soon. The government has excused these retreats as being necessary in order to help the core need housing, housing for those who fit their criteria as being needy. However, the core need programs, this year, were cut by 15 per cent and there is good reason to fear that there will be more cuts in the years to come.

The government also cut the rental RRAP program, the program for rehabilitating old housing that low-income people can afford. On the whole, this government has shown that it wants to hand over the responsibility for housing to the provincial and municipal levels of government and get out of it itself.

That is interesting because its alleged reason for doing that is a shortage of money. Even the minister admitted that he would have liked to have more social housing, but he suggested there was not enough money for it.

There is, of course, enough money to increase the military budget by well over $500 million dollars. There is enough money to increase the budget for the secret police, CSIS, by $33 million. When it is for guns for white men, there is money. When it is for housing, especially for lower-income women and children, all of a sudden we seem to be running out of money.

Even as it stands, there is still left, perhaps, $180 million to assist with needed housing. With the money that it is giving to the military budget instead, including the arms manufacturers, the high-profit industry, the government could have increased that by two or three times easily, but that is not the government's budget priority. In fact, the record of the government has been watched, through these years, by the Canadian Housing and Renewal Association. On February 21 it stated, and I quote:

> Despite the budget papers assurance that funding for social housing has grown substantially over the last five years, average expenditures in social housing as a percentage of total federal housing expenditures actually fell by almost 20 per cent in the second half of the decade compared to the 1980-84 period.

The minister has referred to the problem of high real interest rates. If he really feels that is a problem, I wish he would consult with his colleague, the Minister of Finance. We have been telling him all year to bring interest rates down. The comedy is that he gives the same answer as his predecessors gave. When I came to the House, in 1981, my first question was whether the government would bring the interest rates down. We were told the government was keeping the interest rates up in order to fight inflation. Nine years later, we get the same nonsense. Keeping the interest rates up in order to fight inflation is like burning a house down in order to make room for housing. It just does not get you any housing.

The fact is that as the Canadian Housing and Renewal Association has said:

> Now we are faced with increased pressure on provinces and municipalities to come up with social housing assistance funds.

This is only one aspect of many programs on which the federal government is passing on its social responsibilities to the governments that have the lower ability to tax. This government prefers to fund the more high profit enterprises such as arms manufacture.

I mentioned that the Canadian Home Builders' Association has given us some figures on this matter in their brief entitled "A Crisis of Confidence". It is about the housing industry crisis. It points out that in Toronto, new home sales are collapsing. There are only 85,000 sales expected in 1990, which is down 80 per cent from the 40,869 sales recorded in the peak year of the current cycle, 1986. In fact, it is 63 per cent below the average annual sales during the entire decade of the 1990s.

There are people who do not live in Toronto who think everything is all right there. They should come and look at the people who are literally sleeping on the streets, in stairwells, in transit shelters, or in subways. Those are some of the people who have not left town.

A couple of years ago, the employees of Toronto Hydro went on strike and gave one fine reason for it. They wanted to be able to live in the town that they helped to build and maintain. They wanted to be paid enough for providing electric services to live in the city to which they provide the services. They were tired of commuting, perhaps an hour or two hours each way, in order to live in a cheaper place outside the city and come into it to work. The city would not allow them to live there because it would not pay them enough for housing.

The housing problem in Toronto is quite severe. The problem is not only in Toronto, of course, but it is most severe in Toronto of all Canada.

The majority of people in Toronto do not live in dwellings they own. The majority of people are tenants, so we could look at the rental field. CMHC did a survey and, in 14 out of 27 markets, it found that the vacancy rate is less than 3 per cent. That is getting pretty tight.

The government is doing nothing to help with rental housing.

I want to emphasize the point, because 3 per cent may sound very good in some places. In Toronto, the vacancy rate is 0.7 per cent; in Hamilton, 0.9 per cent; in St. Catharines, 1.9 per cent; in Kitchener, 1.3 per cent; and in Sudbury, not exactly a metropolis, but a hardworking town of miners and other producers of natural resources, people are having difficulty providing or finding housing. Sudbury has the lowest vacancy rate, 0.6 per cent. In Oshawa, it is 1.6 per cent. In Oshawa, a General Motors town, people cannot find enough housing to provide rental at a reasonable rate of turnover and a reasonable vacancy rate.

In Ottawa–Hull, the vacancy rate is 2.3 per cent; in Vancouver, 0.9 per cent; and in Victoria, 0.7 per cent. There simply is not enough rental housing available, not only in Ontario and not only in Toronto.

The problem is not only a shortage of decent housing for people to live in, it is also a shortage of employment.

The homebuilders' association pointed out that, at the peak of the recent housing cycle, 1987, there were 165,000 person–years of employment generated by housing in the Toronto area. But for 1990, it is barely half of that, with 88,000 fewer person–years of employment. In fact, that is a little less than half.

For this year, it is expecting less than half the jobs that there were three years ago directly and indirectly generated by housing. It would be the lowest year since the recession year of 1982. On the 1990 projected sales of only 8,500 units, it expects a good deal fewer jobs in 1991. One cannot get much tax revenue from people—whether it is income tax or the goods and services tax loaded more heavily on the low income—if they do not have income. When those housing jobs drop off, it is going to be felt in the revenues.

The homebuilders' association is quite explicit about what it thinks is the principle cause of this downturn. It is the interest rate policy of the government which is hurting the building industry. The association has been warning about it and their brief now gives fairly sharp figures.

It can be argued that there are other costs as well. Of course, land costs are something that both this government and the Ontario government are willing to allow to grow out of reason. They are not willing to impose a tax on speculation which was done for three years in the mid–seventies by the Ontario government and it was quite successful in cooling down land prices. Generally speaking, it is the cost of building a house that is becoming prohibitive.

The homebuilders' association points out in a chart that, when interest rates are at 8 per cent, 34 per cent of people can buy houses. When they jump to 10 per cent, only 24 per cent of the people can buy houses. At 12 per cent mortgage rates, only 16 per cent of people can buy houses. At 14 per cent—and we have gone beyond that now—only 10 per cent of the people can buy houses. When they go up to 16 per cent—and there is no reason to assure us that they will not go up—only 7 per cent will be able to buy houses.

The homebuilders have pointed out that this 14 per cent mortgage rate more than halves the number of potential first–time buyers able to afford a $150,000 home in the Toronto area. Mr. Speaker, I can tell you there are not very many $150,000 homes in the Toronto area. That is a relatively cheap home in Toronto. Therefore, it is the government's policy of high interest rates which is the chief factor in reducing the supply of housing and the supply of housing employment.

The homebuilders' association points it out in a different way. It has a chart that is too small to display and, of course, displaying it would be contrary to the rules of the House. I will point out that in 1981 and 1982, when the interest rates were high, the new home sales were low. Then through 1983–84–85, the interest rates came down and new home sales went up. In 1986–87–88, the new home sales were fairly high while the interest rates stayed low, except for one dip in the middle of 1987.

Since 1988, the interest rates have been climbing and the new home sales are declining. Interest rates are up and home sales are down. That is the pattern shown very clearly on this chart. The future is not very bright either in this matter. Gordon Thompson, the President of the CHBA, the Canadian Home Builders' Association, has predicted:

> —that what happened in Canada in the early 1980s could happen again.

He is referring, of course, to the recession which he maintains was caused partly by the high interest rates on housing, and I remember that. There happened to be a by-election in Spadina in 1981 and I was hearing daily about people who were forced out of their homes. When the interest rate jumps and a working person goes to renew the mortgage on a home and finds that the payments have jumped by one-third or one-half over what they were before, but his or her salary or wage has not jumped by one-third or one-half, it means that he or she loses, not only the home but all the money that was put into it.

Mr. Thompson goes on:

> The decline in housing sales led to layoffs, many firms left the industry, and land development slowed to match the level of demand. When demand recovered in the second half of the 1980s, shortages of labor, materials and land all combined to produce a serious escalation in housing prices.

The minister has commented on rising costs that are not directly the matter of interest, but what Mr. Thompson is pointing out is that the wild fluctuations in the housing market that were generated in part by the interest rate, themselves were a cause of shortages of labour and material which then, in better times, produced higher housing prices, too high housing prices. Mr. Thompson goes on:

> Sales of new housing have dropped in all parts of Canada in the first four months of 1990—In Toronto and Vancouver sales of resale homes have fallen by 44 and 35 per cent respectively compared to last year.

His final point is:

> —that all levels of government suffer from high interest rates because they take substantial revenues from homebuilding.

He maintains that in 1987 the federal government alone collected $2.5 billion in revenues from new housing construction. It is very short-sighted of this government to be cutting back the money for new housing.

The hon. member from Etobicoke was very righteously saying that they had to pay for the housing that had been built by the previous government, that is to say, on mortgages with assistance from CMHC. There is something more short-sighted than building houses on mortgage money and that is, not building houses. That is what this government is bringing about with its high interest rate which, not only the housing industry but many others have pointed out is very likely to hasten a recession, the very thing this government claims it is trying to avoid.

It will be necessary to vote for this money, for the payment of the debts on the existing housing built by CMHC. However, it is very sad that this government is slowly running its housing program into the ground. I hope that this year the government will begin to consider both that it should be bringing down the interest rates so that ordinary people can again consider buying homes or at least so that rental housing may be built, and second, that the government will recognize that it has an obligation to provide housing.

Housing is a necessity, at least in a northern climate. We do not live in the land of palms and sunshine. Housing is a necessity here; it is a right. It is not a privilege that should be given only to those who are well to do. The government has these two duties: to bring the interest rates down and to provide much more substantial assistance to the housing for low-income people.

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to my colleague from Trinity—Spadina who I regard as being very sincere and conscientious.

He proclaimed that it would be of interest to everyone in Canada if the government were to unilaterally reduce interest rates, almost implying that that is a situation that is easily controlled. I want to convey to him a situation that I found myself in a few years ago. I wonder if he would care to comment, giving his observations with respect to it.

The situation was this. My wife and I had put our life savings together and bought a 12-suite apartment block. In that era, it was generally conceived that if one had a 25 per cent down payment on an investment like this, it would generally carry itself. As a result, we did not think it was a silly economic excursion. We thought it made some sense. Both of us worked on weekends and in the evenings to try to make things go. As well, we had to pay the city taxes for the facility out of our own pocket, because there just was not enough cash flow in it.

We bought the place with a 10 per cent interest rate. Shortly thereafter, we found that inflation had risen to 13.5 per cent. Also, we found that interest rates were being used in an attempt to bring inflation rates down. Interest rates caused themselves to take off. Interest rates on our property rose to 20 and 22 per cent. We could no longer afford it. In fact, it was going to break us if we hung on to it, therefore we had to dump it.

It is interesting that we sold it to someone who could afford to make the cash payment and who was not burdened by the high interest rates at the time. The justification that that person had to go to the tenants to raise the rental rates on the property was the increased interest rate situation that we saw in the area.

Does the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina really feel that interest rates and inflation are not closely related? Does he not feel that one controls the other?

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, in part, I agree with the hon. member for Regina—Wascana.

Certainly interest rates and inflation are related, but the relationship is not simply in one direction. Inflation does not simply cause high interest rates. If that were the only cause, then the hon. member would not be able to account for the increasing spread of real interest rates.

The hon. member and I can remember when there were things like 6 and 7 per cent mortgages. The difference between the inflation rate and the interest rate was usually about 1 or 2 per cent. Now, it is 4, 5, 6 and 7 per cent.

An hon. member: It is 10 per cent.

Mr. Heap: Somebody says it is 10 per cent. In other words, the gap between the inflation rate and the interest rate is not a clean take, but a pure take. It is a simple take by the money lenders. In fact, I think what the hon. member's experience that he recounted to us shows is that high interest rates benefit only those who have a great deal of money.

This is why it is so shameful that the government keeps promoting high interest rates. It blames them on inflation, but it keeps the interest rates far above inflation. That benefits the kind of person who is able to pick up the property that the hon. member and his wife had to drop. I think people who have had the experience that the hon. member recounts ought to consider that a interest rate of only 1 or 2 per cent above the rate of inflation is much healthier for most people in the country than the kind of rate that the government is promoting at present.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the hon. member would clarify to which of the three Etobicoke members he was referring.

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, it is the hon. member who is chairman of the finance committee.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I was very interested in my colleague's comments on the situation in housing in Toronto. I could not help but do almost a checklist of similar problems we face in Vancouver.

Recently the mayor of Vancouver led a delegation appealing to the minister for help and reinstatement of some of the federal government's past programs. They were particularly concerned about the cut to rental RRAP. I know in my community it would be a great advantage, not only to older people, but also in adapting affordable housing with rental suites.

The federal government has given up its responsibility for social housing. We got about 100 units last year in Vancouver. We do not know where to go for new developments. We have all the Expo lands waiting to be filled and certainly do not want them to be expensive downtown housing. We want some affordable housing. The federal government does not seem to be able to do anything about that.

I want to ask a couple of things of my colleague. Does he feel that there are federal lands not being used extensively for housing? I am thinking, for instance, of some of the DND-owned lands. Has he any ideas on CPR lands? I think the CPR should be investigated. They were given all kinds of potential wealth in lands by the people of Canada and now Marathon Realty is charging outrageous prices in areas where we need affordable housing.

Finally, I would like to ask him if Toronto, like Vancouver, is becoming a city of adults where children are not wanted and not made welcome because of the housing situation?

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, on the last point, the planning statistics in Toronto do show that there are less children in the centre than in the rest of the city, less children in the city than in metro Toronto, that is less children per adult, and less children per adult in metro Toronto than in the province of Ontario. It is clear that the pyramid housing prices in Toronto are forcing children out of the city.

As to government lands, the government did sell a little bit of DND land for housing a couple of years ago for people who could pay $700,000, $800,000 or $900,000. That did not do much for most of the people in Toronto.

The second most scandalous case was the railway lands in which the government recently declined to intervene to ensure that housing, if it were built for the 1996 Olympics, would then be turned over to low-income people in Toronto who need it. The government has the power to do that through the CNR with those lands and they refused to do it. The most scandalous case was the waterfront. This was bought by the previous government but its mismanagement was carried on vigorously by the present government. Land that should have been used, in part, for low-income and family housing was instead sold to developers who produced luxury housing and other facilities like that. In other words, the plan which the city of Toronto had made in the early 1980s for a mixed community with access to the water on government owned land was simply ripped up by the management of that land under federal government supervision.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, I was most interested in the hon. member's comments with respect to interest rates. I read recently in The Toronto Star comments by Mr. Jack McArthur on interest rates. He said the following:

> There was no chance for substantially cheaper money until the heat went out of the housing prices and demand. They were a major cause of the inflationary dangers that shaped federal monetary policy and kept interest rates high.
> Canadians should applaud the news of falling prices for housing.
> High prices, often a result of huge increases in the late '80s, were creating trends that were highly disturbing. They couldn't continue for many years but the longer they did, the more shocking the eventual adjustment would be.
> In particular, it threatened to victimize future generations with extremely heavy personal costs for accommodation.

I wonder if the hon. member would agree with those comments.

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, just two brief points. I certainly do not defend over-priced housing. When my wife and I sold the house that we had bought and lived in for 21 years, we sold it at a non-profit price so that it could be used for people who have very low incomes. We still got our full enjoyment out of that house. We do not need to follow the extortionate prices.

However, high interest rates are one of the prime causes of these extortionate prices, and interest rates that are 5 per cent or 10 per cent over inflation, which is what this government enforces, do nothing but make the rich richer and the poor poorer.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. On debate, the hon. member for Regina—Wascana.

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased today to rise in support of our government's continuing commitment to provide affordable housing. All too often I have heard misguided criticism of the government's efforts in the area of housing. I would like to take this opportunity to ensure that all hon. members are aware of the significant advances made in the delivery of social resources over the past few years.

Over all, Canada is a well housed nation. The quality of our housing stock is generally high and our home ownership rate is among the highest in the world. The housing market is working well in most areas of the country, although we recognize that actions need to be taken to promote more affordable housing. I maintain that this government is providing support in this area. This is a seemingly endless task.

I had occasion to visit Europe not too very long ago and while visiting Berlin, the downtown core of a fairly large city, I found that individual home ownership was a hopeless dream, if in fact a dream at all. As a matter of fact, the people we stayed with occupied an apartment in downtown Berlin, or at least the periphery to the core, and they told us that in order to acquire this apartment they had to virtually inherit it from the previous person. I was somewhat concerned with the condition of the apartment in that it seemed as though there were certain things that had to be maintained to make it acceptable to what I thought would be the standards that these people would accept. They said that they took this apartment "as is" from the deceased person's estate in a rental situation, and if they wanted any improvements to the property, they had to provide them themselves. I think we take for granted something the major populations of Europe to whose standards we sometimes compare ours have long since forgotten.

However, there is one segment of our population who require assistance and we are going to give it to them as best we can. They require assistance in meeting their every day housing needs. Those are the households around the core housing areas, our seniors, the disabled, single parent households, low income families, and singles, generally. There are the native people living in difficult situations in Canada's north and the urban dwellers attempting to struggle with the cost of living in high cost urban environments.

As a member of Parliament, I have had a number of opportunities to visit with and discuss the most pressing issues of the day with a number of citizens over the past few years. Of particular significance in these discussions was the desire of our constituents for equitable social programs and policies and assurance that long term planning will continue to make Canada a well housed nation. Housing programs and initiatives introduced by this government have gone a long way in achieving this end.

More specifically, actions on the part of my colleague, the hon. Minister of State for Housing, and his predecessors have resulted in a number of bold, new housing initiatives introduced in the 1980s with many more areas of progress identified for the 1990s. These areas of innovation and change have resulted in housing dollars being more finely targeted to households in need, created a new sense of partnership between all players in the housing arena, and introduced a renewed commitment to social justice and social housing policies. It is for these reasons that I stand today in response to opposition criticism of the Main Estimates for housing.

With regard to the equitable targeting of federal housing resources, it was clear to all who assumed responsibility for the housing portfolio in 1984 that major changes were required to ensure that the best possible use of social housing dollars was occurring.

After extensive review and consultation, a number of significant housing policy changes were introduced to the federal Parliament which resulted in a more equitable distribution of federal housing dollars to those households truly in housing need. These households, including the poor, the elderly and the disabled, are the clear housing priority of our federal government.

These consultations involved all of the interest groups in the field of housing, as well as all levels of government. There was broad support at that time that housing assistance should be targeted to the most needy in our society, those who were unable to help themselves. When housing dollars are limited as a result of the current federal deficit we are faced with, our debt situation, many Canadians are opposed to the federal government spending tax dollars on housing that is not fully targeted to the most needy.

The federal government has adhered to a number of basic principles in the development of social housing policies in the 1990s. These include social housing allocations being directed to clients in core housing need and, second, all client groups in the country must have equal access to federal assistance. This ensures that citizens of our far north and rural areas are equitably served.

In conjunction with these principles, the federal government has developed a mix of programs which effectively address all types and forms of housing needs in the country. Families with affordability problems, the disabled, the disabled who may require wheelchair access, all can find housing relief in the federal group of programs.

This government has taken a number of decisive actions to ensure that inefficiencies of past programs are not repeated nor interfere with the equitable targeting and delivery of social housing resources.

Having discussed the importance of effective targeting of our housing resources, I would like to say a few words briefly concerning the manner in which the government has proceeded to involve all players in the housing field in the consultation and delivery process, and of how this process has resulted in maximizing the number of households receiving assistance under the federal group of programs.

In 1986 the government entered into agreements with the provinces and territories to jointly fund, plan, deliver and administer housing programs. These agreements have resulted in thousands of more units being delivered to needy households through cost-sharing forumulae and a reduction in the administrative duplication from competing social housing delivery networks. This means thousands more low-income families with a solid roof over their heads and thousands more children with a warm place to sleep at night.

In recognition of the specific needs of Canada's native peoples, the federal government has designed programs which involve native peoples in all aspects of the programs. Native organizations perform an important function in the delivery of rural social housing programs in that they provide a fee-for-service delivery for the programs. This feature of the rural programs ensures that the native population is directly involved in the determination of housing program planning and delivery in each of the provinces and territories.

But we cannot solely depend on the federal government alone to solve all the problems. Housing is complex, and shared objectives and co-ordinated actions are required.

Recently, my colleague the hon. Minister of State for Housing, initiated a series of local committees which consist of the federal, provincial and local governments to address problems of housing affordability at the local level. These committees, in a number of cities from coast to coast, are dealing with impediments to the supply of affordable housing in their own communities, ranging from land availability and servicing to development approvals, all of which should assist in keeping a lid on housing costs and allow for effective use of housing dollars.

Having been associated with a municipality, I have another observation that causes me to express tonight the hope that municipalities will recognize the ongoing need for inner-city housing. While we encourage them to make the necessary zoning changes to accommodate those needs, if required, I would like to encourage them this evening to recognize this long term need and ensure that they provide long term residential zoning to maintain the residential integrity of our city cores. All to often while a plan of this kind might come in place, it seems that with the increased value of downtown properties, we find that housing stock falls to the wrecker's ball and some office building is located in its stead.

If the cities were to recognize this long-term need, it would serve their cities well and would serve to protect the necessary social infrastructure that is required to be put in place to maintain these inner-city developments.

Co-operative and non-profit organizations, our third sector, are another major group which our government looks to in the area of housing. For many years, the vital component of the Canadian housing scene has been a principal actor in using federal funds to provide services to needy households. In recognition of this role, the government recently increased the fee schedule for resource groups in the third sector to ensure necessary financial returns for their work. I believe that with this initiative, these groups can continue to effectively contribute to the housing of the nation. With their knowledge of housing development and management, they have already been involved in work on non-profit co-op housing, in many areas across our country.

Up until this time, I have been focusing on the partnerships this government has built with other governments and third sector housing organizations. But first and foremost are the individuals to whom housing solutions are addressed. Our government is committed to the involvement of each and every citizen of the country in the determination of how their shelter needs will be addressed. In this regard, for example, regional forums are being conducted to allow for input by seniors into the development of future programs specifically designed to meet their housing needs. This government can be extremely proud of its record of open consultation on housing policies since 1985, much to the benefit of households across this land.

Another area of note in the ongoing consultation of this government with the citizens of Canada is the residential participation initiative for clients residing in our public housing stock. Every person seeks the opportunity to influence their environment, including their particular housing situation. No one wants to sit passively by while others shape their surroundings. This is as true for people living in public housing as for anyone. For low-income families, it is often doubly important that they have the scope to enhance their skills so that they may reach beyond their circumstances and play a fuller role in the broader community.

The interest expressed by public housing tenants in becoming involved in the day-to-day operations of their housing was identified in a public housing evaluation conducted by CMHC. The hon. Minister of State for Housing recently announced a set of initiatives aimed at expanding the opportunities public housing residents have to get involved, to contribute in their own way to improving and maintaining their quality of life.

The mention of community involvement brings me to my last area of comment, and that is the importance of achieving a sense of social justice with all our social programs, including housing. It is in this regard that current housing initiatives are providing a cornerstone to our future.

Approval of housing budgets by this Parliament will allow for the further development of a number of important initiatives which affect the quality of life of a great many Canadians into the 21st century. Included in this package are policies and potential housing program designs which more effectively address senior citizens, single parents and native client group needs. In addition, research efforts are continuing on a number of fronts pertaining to housing and the environment, an important area that must be given immediate priority.

One example of forward planning and research is the ongoing investigation of indoor air quality, perhaps something we could use in this House of Commons. However, CMHC not being involved with the House of Commons as its area of jurisdiction, as you well know, has a long record of involvement in the particular area of indoor air quality in residential housing stocks. I thought I had better make that clear.

In recent years, investigations have focused on specific pollutants such as methane and radon gas which enter basements from the soil. The primary focus has been on finding ways to protect housing from hazards in the soil and ensuring that remedial measures do not adversely affect other aspects of the housing unit. Performance research of this nature must continue if we are to be able to assure our children of safe, secure living environments in the future.

I would ask Parliament's support in the approval of the plans for this government to implement its much needed housing policies. As mentioned earlier, current programs and delivery practices have been significantly improved from the early 1980s with a very clear focus being given to households experiencing the most severe housing needs.

In addition, an efficient and effective federal-provincial delivery network has been developed to allocate and manage our scarce resources. Housing funding for the 1990 period will also allow for the innovative work to continue to ensure our housing future into the 1990s and into the next century.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On debate, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have been listening with great care to the speakers on the government side for the last couple of hours defend their policy. In defence of the government policy on housing, they miss the point. The point is that since 1984 the federal government has totally withdrawn from urban Canada. That can be measured in many ways. Perhaps we could attack directly the role of the Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation because it is the signal to every Canadian that the government no longer cares about the price of their housing, the suitability of their accommodation or the availability of different types of housing stock.

I would like to speak directly about one particular city, Winnipeg, which is having a great deal of difficulty in dealing with the housing crisis as a result of the withdrawal of the federal government.

A lot of people look at the prices of houses in Winnipeg and say "You are very lucky to be from Winnipeg because it is one of the most affordable housing cities in this country". On the contrary, that is an illusion because the quality of the housing stock has dropped dramatically in that the federal government is no longer involved in programs.

For example, in Winnipeg North Centre, four out of ten families live below the poverty level, which is double the rate for the rest of the city. Within this context, at one time the federal government provided a great deal of housing through RRAP and the neighbourhood improvement program in the 1970s, and the infrastructure was built.

One of the neighbourhoods, North Point Douglas, was the most accomplished example of urban reform in North America. When Canadian government officials went elsewhere to talk about housing projects, they always pointed to North Point Douglas in Winnipeg as an example of how the three levels of governments could work together.

As a follow-up to the neighbourhood improvement programs, in 1980 Winnipeg entered the core area initiative with the two levels of government, again with this commitment to urban renewal.

I raise this in the context of the housing programs because when you are trying to do urban renewal you are trying to stabilize in part the housing structure. You are not only concerned with the construction of newer houses, which is very important for low-income families, for disabled persons and for the elderly, but you also have to take a look at the existing housing stock.

In cities again such as Winnipeg and Winnipeg North Centre where most people are renters, the quality of the house is not only dependent upon their own efforts, but also dependent upon the efforts of the landlords. Winnipeg used rental RRAP more extensively than any other city in the country.

Mr. Redway: And Montreal.

Mr. Walker: And Montreal. Of course those are the two cities which stood up to the government and asked that that program be continued. The silence of the minister on that issue last year is well remembered. Toronto has another set of problems. We are asking you to deal with the problems of Winnipeg tonight.

As the minister has taken an interest in this point, he will know that rental RRAP was very successful in downtown Winnipeg.

As Winnipeg housing stock continues to age, the fact that renewal has not taken place, the fact that there are no market dynamics which cause people to invest in housing in a substantial way, and the fact that there is no access to programming make it even more difficult for families and individuals to begin to redevelop those houses.

The reason this debate comes at a very crucial time is that the core area initiative, the second phase of it, is coming to a close next year. There have been no measures put on the table by the federal government to renew that. Not only do we have Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation on its own withdrawing from the city of Winnipeg, we now find that the federal government as a group—all the ministries whether it is employment, transport or the ERDA agreements—is withdrawing its support for the older neighbourhoods in Winnipeg.

As a result, people who are working in housing projects in North Winnipeg, those who are trying to see what they can do about North Point Douglas, those who are looking at the question of the homeless or North Main, and those who are trying to figure out ways of repairing homes in the Woolsley area are turning to their political leaders at all three levels of government and asking: "Why aren't you helping us this time?" Each level of government is turning to the other looking for a signal of support, looking for somebody who will stand up and say: "All right, let's begin to reconstruct these neighbourhoods".

It is a total package to make a neighbourhood work. It requires improved policing and streets. It requires the city to spend a lot of money on infrastructure. It requires the provincial government to make sure that its programming in areas such as welfare are in proper condition. It is also requires the federal government to step forward with the needed capital so that the individual units are also in good shape.

Of particular concern in downtown Winnipeg is the plight of our many aboriginal peoples. It is estimated that within my constituency alone there are more than 20,000 aboriginal people. One of the areas that this government has cut back the greatest amount of money is moneys available for aboriginal groups to develop housing projects in an urban environment. Because of that these groups are unable either to access capital, expertise, or land. None of the components needed for housing projects are available to them.

As the quality of housing and rental units continues to decline because of rental RRAP no longer being available, and as individual families because of lack of jobs cannot buy their own homes and begin to fix them up, the cycle of decline has been accentuated. People are turning to the government right now and saying: "Give us some hope. Give us some reason to expect that in the next couple of years we will see a renewal of the core area initiative in Winnipeg and a redevelopment of our neighbourhoods".

Winnipeg in this respect is the best image for understanding the decline of urban Canada as affected by housing policy. In one extreme, a city like Toronto, where affordable housing escapes middle class and working class families—

Mr. Mills: Or is non-existent.

Mr. Walker: "Or is non-existent", as a member from Toronto properly points out. Then Winnipeg is the opposite extreme on the continuum, having absolutely no access to capital to renovate those homes and rebuild the neighbourhoods.

We have asked the government to listen to these points today and to consider that it has a proper role. Over the years people have come to expect the federal government to understand the impact it has on our cities through its housing, employment, transportation, and regional development policies. It is part of the infrastructure, and because it is not contributing to the infrastructure it is contributing to the problems. As people get more anxious for support, they lose hope when they see the federal government refusing to intervene or get involved.

I ask the minister to reconsider the hardships he is creating for people in Winnipeg and to participate more fully in programs such as the core area initiative and other programs which will provide housing for all Canadians.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, I listened intently to the hon. member's comments, particularly his comment that since 1984 the federal government had been withdrawing from housing in urban Canada. I have to tell you and the hon. member that those comments are absolutely wrong. The fact is that since 1984 when this government came to office some 70,000 new units of social housing in urban Canada have been provided with assistance from this government.

In the previous corresponding period of time under the former government, supported by the hon. member, only some 36,000 units of housing were put in place for assistance.

When this government came to office the federal budget for housing was $1.4 billion. Today it is some $1.8 billion. At least I hope it will be that amount after tonight. The hon. member and his party have put a motion forward this evening, which if he and his party vote for it, could very well mean that there will be no money for housing at the federal level this year as a result of that motion and that vote.

Does the hon. member intend to vote to support the motion that his party has put forward and to strike out all federal money for housing this year?

Mr. Walker: Perhaps the minister, coming from municipal government, is unfamiliar with the House rules and how one proceeds to challenge the government. The purpose of our motion is to challenge the inadequacy of the programs. Of course I will make every effort to challenge the government and support my party in this challenge.

We spent the last year going across the country on a housing task force. Although the minister likes to pick up his pieces of paper and read off how many housing units he has provided and so forth, did we find any Canadians whatsoever coming to our task force and saying: "You guys are on the wrong track. I cannot believe how much money this government is providing. I cannot believe how they have made it easy to buy a house in Toronto. I cannot believe how easy it is to get an apartment fixed up". Nobody came.

This is typical of the comments we received. For example, the Federation of Saskatchewan Indian Nations stated: "The federal government has not adequately carried out its trust and fiscal responsibility regarding shelter for Indian people. The history of policy shifts and funding mechanisms leads one to believe that conditions will not change unless serious consideration is given to a long-term strategy with input on policy development by Indian people".

That is the testimony of one group. I could stand here like the minister would like us to do and read from documents and reports, but the spirit of commitment is not there. That is what people are telling us and that is what the people have asked us to express through this motion in the House. They want us to make the government aware that although it might be content and might want to think that it is doing a lot, the reality is that it is not doing anywhere near enough to help out the people of Canada.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively to the comments of my colleague. I was behind the curtain a few moments ago when he made an excellent speech to all of us, which we fully appreciated, including the minister across the way. I know the minister, being as partisan as he is, cannot compliment my colleague the way he should, so I will do so on his behalf and on behalf of all of members here tonight in the truly objective way in which you would want me to, of course.

I want to ask my colleague about the effects of the goods and services tax on housing. My colleague, who is very knowledgeable in the area of housing, will know that the goods and services tax will add approximately $2,000 to $3,000 to the cost of an average home. This is according to the Canadian Home Builders Association. Depending on the actual cost of the home, it could even be significantly more as other groups have intimated. My very distinguished and learned colleague from Thunder Bay indicates to me that it could actually be in the area of $5,000.

The question that I want to ask my colleague who spoke previously is the following one. The minister says through the propaganda—I am sorry, Mr. Speaker, not through the propaganda; that was a slip of the tongue and I apologize for it. He says through the information leaflets that have been sent out by his government that there will be no impact on housing affordability.

I ask my colleague whom he thinks we should believe: the Canadian Home Builders Association that knows what it is talking about, or the government across the way with its propaganda?

Mr. Walker: That question gets to the heart of the matter and the difference in the strategies developed by this party over the years as compared to the government.

For example, in the early 1980s when we were faced with inflationary pressures we developed what we called the six and five strategy. The member here remembers that strategy very well and we very quickly got the situation under control.

The strategy here is what I call the 14–7 strategy: 14 per cent mortgage rates, 7 per cent GST. If that is their response to inflationary pressures it will in fact ruin the housing market even more than it is.

For the average family trying desperately to accumulate savings from perhaps two people working together, trying to save $5,000, $10,000 or $15,000 to get started and trying to maintain monthly payments, it is going to be an incredible expense to them. I cannot imagine a more difficult situation than trying to counsel a young family of 25–year–olds to 30–year–olds with a couple of children trying to figure out how to put together a house. I would be almost remiss if I could give them any sense of hope with this government in place. I think I would be telling them a falsehood to say that it would be possible for them to do it. They will have to wait until there is a change of heart, and I think a change of heart will only come when there is a change of government.

Mr. Boudria: Let's do it now.

Mr. Walker: The sooner the better. Perhaps this vote tonight will be an opportunity for Canadians to indicate to this government just how angry and how frustrated they are. People deserve housing. They deserve food. They deserve to be looked after. They deserve a government that wants to look after them. I do not see it. I do not think any member on this side sees any willingness on the part of the government to look after people. I look forward to seeing a change.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I listened attentively tonight as we started with the Minister of State for Housing. He made remarks on how he has travelled across the country and listened to single parents, natives, young couples, and seniors. He recognized that there are difficulties. As I listened to his speech I got the feeling that he did not really understand that it is one thing to listen to these people but what are we going to do about the crisis that we are involved with right now in housing?

The member knows that there is a crisis because if you come from Toronto you cannot help but feel the pain, the frustration and the worry. In the city of Toronto today the price for an average home is around $275,000. Young people today are almost ready to throw away the thought of ever owning a home. We do not measure the social costs of this frustration that is building up within our community.

Our caucus, led by the member for London East, met with the Toronto Home Builders Association because we knew we would be having this debate in the House tonight and we wanted to speak directly to those in the community who were involved directly with the home building situation. We can listen to just our own constituents but then we get a view from only one particular part of the community.

We met today with the leaders of that industry. The fact of the matter is that the housing industry in the greater metropolitan Toronto area has almost totally collapsed. One of the most revealing facts we heard from them today was that Canada Mortgage and Housing statistics are about six to eight months behind. The minister talked about a projection of 200,000 units, but these senior officials today from the Toronto Home Builders Association said that it was more like 100,000.

We know that the Governor of the Bank of Canada bases his interest rate policy on numbers he gets from various departments of government, including Statistics Canada and Canada Mortgage and Housing, from which he develops his models. So the whole premise upon which this government is setting its interest rates is based upon a false set of numbers.

The next thing we know, the Governor of the Bank of Canada is saying that the problem is not as bad as we on this side of the House are saying, so the government continues with its financial plan and the Governor continues with his. In the meantime, something different is really happening.

Right now the situation in the city of Toronto is such that 75 per cent of the people in the home building industry, trades and sub-trades, have not hired any new employees in the last six months. In fact, almost 90 per cent of these people are laying off. They said to us today that the housing crisis is far worse today than it was in 1981-82.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, this will not affect only the home building industry. This will ultimately affect the furniture industry and have a chain effect all the way through the system. Every sector of our economy is affected by the home building industry.

Another affect of the crisis in Toronto today is that many of the fabulous craftsmen who are building beautiful homes go into other sectors when an industry collapses like this. They go into the service sector. When the market recovers, we no longer have those skilled craftsmen. As a result we have to retrain at a tremendous cost. That tremendous cost will again be added on to the cost of our housing.

I know that our time is short here tonight. The bottom line is that this government should not be patting itself on the back for the current housing program that it is unveiling. I know this Minister of Housing is sincere but, as he mentioned in his speech, beyond the economic responsibility this a social responsibility to which we have to attend. This minister has to go back to his cabinet colleagues and be a lot more forceful in terms of his requirements.

The Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation is not meant to be a passive operator. Right now it is virtually an organization in mothballs. It needs to be taken out of mothballs. It needs to be much more aggressive. The minister said in his speech that there are municipalities where single by-laws are holding up some of the good intentions and goodwill that he wants to put forward. The national government has many instruments to activate municipalities to move more quickly if the national will of this government is to make sure that affordable housing is available.

Another problem that we have in this country, especially in the greater metropolitan area, is the lack of serviced land. We need to give our municipalities much more help in terms of infrastructure so that serviced land is made available.

I do not shy away from the responsibility of deficit and debt, but at the same time, having people out of work is going to put a tremendous strain on the support systems of this government. That is not going to allow it to keep to its financial plan. The Minister of Housing knows that the best way to get the financial plan of this government in order is to make sure that everybody is working, and he should start with the housing industry.

The Minister of Finance talked today about unit labour costs. His theme this week is unit labour costs. He is really worried about the fact that our unit labour costs are going up. Of course they are going up. If there is no sense of fairness, if one does not get a sense that the job is going to be there for a long time, productivity falls off. The Minister of Finance has stopped listening to the grassroots people in this country. He is not only listening to the technocrats in his own department, he is following those models that are being built in the office of the Governor of the Bank of Canada which are 20 years outdated.

They say that there is not a problem in Toronto. I can tell you that there are bankers who are scared silly because of people who are walking away from deposits on homes. Some are walking away from deposits of as much as $40,000 and $50,000. If we do not put a tighter focus on this housing crisis, we are going to lose two or three trust companies.

I am not suggesting for a minute that this is an easy problem to solve. However, I am suggesting that this is a problem that needs almost as much attention as we are putting into the other problem being discussed over at the Conference Centre tonight. We should make sure that we never let this issue be taken off the front burner until we get our interest rates back down to around 11 per cent, so that we can make sure that we have affordable housing and full time jobs are back again.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, I was most interested in the hon. member's comments with respect to the home building industry and his meeting today with its representatives. I was most interested as well in his comments with respect to interest rates.

• (2140)

Recently a writer in The Toronto Star—a newspaper which I am sure the hon. member reads on a regular basis—Mr. Warren Potter, had some comments with respect to that. I would like to have the hon. member's comments with respect to Mr. Potter's thoughts on the issue. He said:

> It's easy to guess why serious buyers are holding back. They use the high mortgage interest rates as a rationale, but they are really hoping that the falling house prices will tumble even further.
> Builders are crying the blues, but some of them have only themselves to blame.
> They've misjudged the market. They've kept on building these monster homes for the Yuppies.
> The builders who are really hurting are those who, like the sellers of resale homes, refused to believe that the housing boom would end.

I wonder if the hon. member has some thoughts and comments with respect to that point of view on the housing situation.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to tell the hon. minister that I do not read The Toronto Star regularly. I am not familiar with the specific article to which he refers, but I think that Warren Potter is correct to the extent that the province and the municipalities have made a mistake in the plan of subdivisions they have been approving in the last three or four years in the greater metropolitan Toronto area.

When I drive up Bayview Avenue in Richmond Hill just south of the Aurora area I see homes that cost $700,000 or $800,000 and yet I hear of projects like Queensville Properties north of Queensville where they are trying to produce close to 5,000 affordable units at $150,000 apiece but are having problems getting their sewage allocation and zoning. I think there is something wrong with that.

My point is that the national government, with its levers, its resources and its access to various instruments, should come in and correct those situations. It can control the cash to the provinces and to the municipalities. It can use all those instruments. That is how Canada Mortgage and Housing came into being.

I have no problem with cutting back on some of those $700,000 and $800,000 units in Toronto because they are not serving anyone.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, this may be the single most important debate that the people in Canada who are watching this debate this evening and thinking of purchasing a home will view this year and for years to come.

I want to compliment my friend and colleague from London East who moved the motion today in order that we could get into a debate on the vital area of housing and the crisis of housing in Canada.

I looked several times towards the Chair as members on this side of the House were speaking, Mr. Speaker, and I am sure that you were as impressed as I was with the wealth of knowledge and depth of information that the member for Winnipeg North Centre and the member for Broadview—Greenwood have on this vital issue and the crisis in which we find ourselves in the housing situation and the housing industry in Canada today. I am sure that after my short intervention you will be as impressed with our member for Eglinton—Lawrence who has some very important words on this issue.

We have heard a lot about the problems that have faced our housing industry since 1984. I want to reiterate some of the things I have heard in this House since this debate began which really show the crisis we face. One point three million Canadians are paying well over 30 per cent of their combined incomes for shelter. As you know, 30 per cent is the maximum they should be paying and they are paying 40 per cent, 50 per cent and sometimes 60 per cent just to provide shelter for themselves and their families.

Forty per cent of single parents are living in accommodation which is below the minimum standards acceptable in the country.

We have talked about caring for our seniors. Forty per cent of our single seniors spend their final years spending in excess of 50 per cent of their income just for accommodation.

In Ontario alone, as the member for Broadwood—Greenwood stated, 54,000 families in Ontario are waiting to find some form of affordable housing. Today, with the economy that the government has created, the interest rate is soaring to such a rate that the rate on a one-year mortgage exceeds 15 per cent. That takes so many people out of the market. Their dream of owning a home has to be set aside for the next few years until the Liberals take power and bring in a more acceptable program for affordable housing so that our young people can afford to realize their national dream.

Those are just some of the issues that I am sure you are interested in hearing, Mr. Speaker. I wish I had more time to expand on them.

Let me close my few remarks by talking about what I consider to be the national dream for all young Canadian families, young couples who are married with children. Their dream is to own a home. In the economy that has been created by the government since 1984, there is not a chance that they can own a home, given that the average three-bedroom bungalow now costs about $140,000 and interest rates exceed 15 per cent. When most of us buy a home, we have to mortgage it. The payments far exceed that young couple's combined income.

Your generation and mine, Mr. Speaker, and perhaps some of the other generations in the House, have created an economy that requires two incomes in order to purchase a home. This government has failed to provide proper daycare services to enable both husband and wife to go out to work so that they can afford a home.

These are the issues that are facing our country today that are so vital to young married couples in our communities with young children who require, not a home, but basic shelter so that they can live in comfort and dignity, as all Canadians should, and realize their Canadian dream. It is the actions of the government that are depriving them of this dream.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, I was most interested to hear the hon. member's comments with respect to the way his party hopes that it would have the opportunity to manage the economy in the coming years.

I think back to the days prior to the 1984 election and the inspiration that brought me to run for office federally. I remember, for instance, under the former Liberal government, astronomical inflation shooting through the roof, followed by astronomical interest rates with mortgage interest rates reaching 23 per cent. This was followed by devastating bankruptcies and double digit unemployment. That is compared to the unemployment rate that we have today which is very low, one of the lowest in years.

Is this the kind of management of the economy that the hon. member would like to bring back to the country?

Mr. Comuzzi: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the hon. minister's question. It really zeroes in on exactly what I said earlier in my remarks.

What the hon. minister was talking about in the early 1980s was a world economy. What was happening in Canada was being paralleled in every other country in the world. Canada was not alone. The United States was experiencing the inflationary trend and the high interest trend. England was going through the same type of economic revolution. Every free country in the world was going through the same situation.

The difference today, in answer to my friend, is that Canada is going through this terrible period of high inflation, high prices, and high interest rates, but our friends in other parts of the world are not experiencing this. That is the big difference. That is where the mismanagement of this economy comes in.

• (2150)

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I, too, want to add my voice to those of my hon. colleagues who have spoken most eloquently about the deficiency in the housing market in Canada, and most especially in the Toronto area.

I want to compliment my colleague from Broadview—Greenwood who highlighted a very serious problem in the city of Toronto and southern Ontario.

It is no wonder that the problem is as serious as it is when we look at the government's record of cutbacks in CMHC and funds available for the stimulation and development of the housing market. We have inventory of some 200,000 first-time buyers in Canada. In Ontario, we have a prediction of only 52,000 new homes for this year when the Treasurer of Ontario had predicted at least 29,000 more.

This is a very serious problem, most especially in the Toronto area. When one looks at some of the figures and the incomes, one is tempted to say that this is fat-cat city, that people are well-off, and that there is not a problem. However, in Toronto, the average mortgage and taxes for a typical family amount to some $31,829 per annum, when the Canadian average is only somewhere around $17,500. In Toronto, the average percentage of income for financing a house is 49.8 this year, compared to the Canadian average of 35.3 per cent. In 1981, in Toronto that percentage was only 33.1. There has been an increase of well over 15 per cent. In Canada, that average has been maintained at about 34 per cent.

The average family in Toronto can only afford a house in the vicinity of $159,000, yet the average price is well over $100,000 more than that. There are over 500,000 tenant households in metro Toronto, with 372,000 of them considered potential first-time buyers. Yet, there will be 29,000 fewer new homes than predicted by the Treasurer of Ontario.

There is a dual problem with that. The dual problem is that the lethargy in the construction industry has spin-offs, all of them negative, for what is happening in industry as whole.

Of Ontario's workforce, 12 per cent, or some 552,000 men and women, in 1989 were employed in the construction industry. That industry is expected to grow by only 1.3 per cent in this coming year. That is well below the growth rate of all other industries. In the Toronto area, 35,000 workers, as my colleague pointed out, have lost their jobs and many more will join them. This is 35,000 in the construction industry, in skilled trades, where the average salary is somewhere between $25 and $29 per hour.

I know that the minister will agree with me that the big problem stems from the government's financial and interest rates policies. In fact, every increase of 1 per cent in interest rates between 9 and 14 per cent—and we are well in that range—eliminates 100,000 potential first-time home buyers. Every increase of one per cent in interest rates decreases the construction industry's output by 2.5 to 3 per cent and results in the loss of some 40,000 jobs. We are well in that range already.

This government has got to change its policies.

Mr. Ken Monteith (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I realize that my time is short, but I am pleased to address this House tonight on a matter which concerns a large number of our fellow Canadians who look to their government for help.

I refer to the individuals, families, and seniors in search of affordable housing: people who look to their government for what most of us in this House take for granted, people who like all of us aspire to live decently and in dignity, people who without help will need to make untold sacrifices so that their children do not go without a roof over their heads, people who without help may not even be able to make these sacrifices and will go without a place they can call their home.

Every day this House hears about the need to assist this industry, that province, or this other town. Every day this government explains how the competing needs of the people of this land are weighted and the strategies that are in place. In many ways there are several analogies to be made between the single mother seeking a decent home for her children and the person who lost a job, between the senior facing rising rents and a low income worker unable to make ends meet. The common thread between these people is the need for a caring government.

My colleagues and I feel for these people. We feel a need to reach out to them and we do, but not to the extent we would like to. This is when we become angry because with all the resources that this country should be able to draw on to help those experiencing hard times, the government of all Canadians must at the same time practise fiscal restraint because the legacy of the previous government has been a series of ill-conceived programs and unpaid expenditures.

The government reaches out but must play the delicate balancing act between competing demands on the public purse. This is responsible government, the type of government which if it had been in place earlier would have avoided the financial mess bequeathed by over two decades of mismanagement.

When I watched the proceedings of the Charest Commission I was touched by the words of Mr. Jim Sinclair when he recalled his childhood as a Métis in Saskatchewan living in a barracks. He touched the fibre of what being a Canadian means to most of us. What Mr. Sinclair related meant more to me than any of the learned dissertations about the constitutional basis for the use of federal spending powers. When he spoke I understood that the powers were not only rooted in the law of the land but also in his heart and the country's heart. When he spoke I told myself that neither he nor his children should again experience the violence of poverty and that Canada should continue to offer the type of housing programs which offer the poor and less fortunate among us a chance to live in dignity and to become productive citizens.

The measures that this government has taken since my colleague the present Minister of National Defence stood in this House late in 1985 were and continue to be measures to serve those who need the government's help most.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being ten o'clock p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 81(16) and order made Thursday, May 31, 1990, to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the business of supply.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

CONCURRENCE IN SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A), 1990-91

Hon. Harvie Andre (for the President of the Treasury Board) moved:

That the Supplementary Estimates (A) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1991, laid upon the Table Tuesday, May 22, 1990, be concurred in.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: On division.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, we are not passing this on division. We would like to force a vote on this motion.

Madam Deputy Speaker: May I dispense with the yeas, the nays, and the ringing of the bells?

Point of order, the hon. member for Calgary West.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, the House might save some time. It is my understanding that the majority of the members of the House will be voting for this motion on Supplementary Estimates. Is that correct?

I wonder if we were to give an opportunity for anybody who wanted to vote against it to be recorded and the balance of the members who voted on the previous motion be recorded as voting in favour. That might save the House some time.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion made by the hon. member for Calgary West.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There is not unanimous consent.

The House divided on the motion which was agreed to on the following division:

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

• (2310)

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I believe there are 13 more supply votes. I wonder if you would not find unanimous consent to deem it that we have leave to introduce, that we have first reading of the supply bill, that we have second reading of the supply bill, that we go into committee of the whole and have eight votes. Then we report the bill with no amendment and that we deem it to have been concurred in, we deem it to have been read for the third time and we apply the same vote as we applied on the main concurrence motion.

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, that is acceptable to members on the government side.

Mr. Gauthier: Same thing here but get it in writing, Madam Speaker.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Let me see if I get it right. Accordingly Bill C-75, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Public Service of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1991, is deemed read a first time, deemed read a second time and referred to a Committee of the Whole, deemed reported back to the House without amendment, deemed concurred in at the report stage and deemed read the third time and passed.

Mr. Andre (for the President of the Treasury Board) moved that Bill C-75, an act for granting to Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Public Service of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1991, be read the first time.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

Bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Prud'homme: Point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Saint-Denis on a point of order.

Mr. Prud'homme: Madam Speaker, I think this is the first time in the history of Parliament that we have obtained something, which I wish to point out to my colleagues, especially those whose language is French. I see big smiles on those who do not know exactly what I am going to say. I think that we should congratulate the Clerk and the House for having kindly agreed to a proposal that I have been making for years and that I repeated twice publicly: finally in the appendix we have "Alphabetical" in English on one side and "Alphabétique" in French on the other for items in alphabetical order. That was never done before. We had been told that it was totally impossible. And for those who want to follow, and some here may be interested in following what happens occasionally, we finally have a working document that makes sense and is understandable. The only suggestion I would make is that the items under each heading could also be in alphabetical order. But I want to say that for the first time we can work in either language.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I wish to thank the hon. member for Saint-Denis who for many years, I know, has made this request in the House. I also want to congratulate him for pointing out that it has finally been done. We are all very proud of it.

It being 11.12 p.m., the House stands adjourned until 11 a.m. tomorrow, pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 11.12 p.m.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

BILL C-39—TABLING OF THE LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE REPORT

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Madam Speaker, I have the honour of tabling, in both official languages, the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-39.

[English]

This is an act to apply federal and provincial laws to offshore areas and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof, with amendment.

FINANCE—SEVENTH AND EIGHTH REPORTS OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the seventh and eighth report of the Standing Committee on Finance on Bill C-52, an act to amend the Income Tax Act and related acts.

The seventh report contains the bill as amended. The eighth report contains other information which is relevant to this bill that has been arrived at with co-operation of all three parties of this House, along with officials from the Department of Finance and others.

I would also like to acknowledge the outstanding contribution of a former member of this House, Mr. Paul McCrossan, who was finally assisted in bringing a resolution to this matter which has been of concern to this House since well before I got here.

Mr. McDermid: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would just like to add that I have had the opportunity to examine the eighth report of the Standing Committee on Finance.

The contents of this report have also been discussed by the finance department officials and representatives of the finance committee. I wish to confirm that income tax regulations will be drafted to give effect to the measures outlined in section 2 of the report. In addition, the finance department will report back to the committee, as requested, on the three issues set out in section 3 of the report.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the intervention by my hon. friend, the minister, on this critical matter.

It is a timing situation. I wonder if the minister could be a bit more specific or at least give us some indication of the timing in terms of when the regulations would actually be made available to the committee.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Does the hon. minister have an answer?

Mr. McDermid: No, Madam Speaker, I cannot give the member a definitive time. It will be as soon as possible. We have just made our agreements with the finance committee, as the hon. House leader of the New Democratic Party knows. We will have them available for the committee as soon as possible.

As the hon. member also knows, this bill does not come into effect until 1991, although there are a great deal of arrangements that have to be made with pension firms and companies that have pension plans. We want to have them as soon as possible so that they can get their house in order to have this come into effect on January 1, 1991. We have made the commitment to the committee, to its chairman, and its members that we will get that to them as quickly as possible.

INTERNATIONAL HUMAN RIGHTS

AUTHORIZATION FOR SUBCOMMITTEE TO TRAVEL

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I have a couple of motions for which Your Honour will find unanimous consent. The first one is a travel motion and reads:

> That three members of the Subcommittee on International Human Rights, representing each party, be authorized to travel to Copenhagen from June 9 to June 16, 1990, in order to participate in the Conference on Security and Co-Operation in Europe and meet with representatives of international human rights organizations, and that 2 staffs do accompany the subcommittee.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Does the parliamentary secretary have leave to move the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I have a second brief motion which deals with tomorrow's business. There is also unanimous consent for this motion. It reads:

> That on Friday, June 8, 1990, during Government Orders, dilatory motions and calls for quorum not be receivable by the Chair.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Does the parliamentary secretary have leave to introduce the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENTS

APPOINTMENT OF PRIVACY COMMISSIONER

The House resumed from Wednesday, June 6, consideration of the motion of Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre):

> That, in accordance with subsection 53(1) of the Act to extend the present laws of Canada that protect the privacy of individuals and that provide individuals with a right of access to personal information about themselves, Chapter P-21 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1985, this House approves the appointment of Bruce Phillips as Privacy Commissioner.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I thought the motion was going to be read into the record but, if it is not going to be taken off my time, I would like to read the motion as follows:

> That, in accordance with subsection 53(1) of the Act to extend the present laws of Canada that protect the privacy of individuals and that provide individuals with a right of access to—

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order, please. The hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, because of the agreement we had yesterday and without any intention of reducing the length of time for debate, I wonder if there would not be unanimous consent just to take a few more minutes and complete Routine Proceedings before we move on to the motion before us.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There does not seem to be unanimous consent to complete Routine Proceedings. The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, because of the limited time, I think there could be an agreement that at three o'clock we continue with Routine Proceedings and finish Routine Proceedings at that time instead of going to Orders of the Day. That would be acceptable to us.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I do not really want to get involved with this little lovers' quarrel that is going on across the aisle. I can assure the House that we on this side are quite happy to complete Routine Proceedings at this point if they prefer and revert to motions, by consent. We would give our unanimous consent for the House to do that or, if the House chooses, we can pick up the end of Routine Proceedings at three o'clock. We are comfortable, either way.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent that we revert to Routine Proceedings at three o'clock?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: We are under Motions. The motion was put yesterday, but it can be reread into the record.

Moved by Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre), and seconded by Mr. Andre:

> That, in accordance with subsection 53(1) of An Act to extend the present laws of Canada that protect the privacy of individuals and that provide individuals with a right of access to personal information about themselves, Chapter P-21, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1985, this House approve the appointment of Bruce Phillips to the position of Privacy Commissioner.

Debate resumes. The Hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier (Mr. Gauthier) has the floor.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, this debate shows once again that parliamentary democracy is strengthened when the House of Commons reaffirms its right to advise the government concerning appointments to important positions, such as officers of Parliament. We wish to protest such appointments today by requesting a debate on the appointment of the nominee for the position of Privacy Commissioner, Mr. Bruce Phillips.

Madam Speaker, we do so today with much regret, because the consultation which should have taken place, or which was indeed conducted was a one-way process. The government has indicated, at least to the Official Opposition, that it wanted to appoint Mr. Bruce Phillips. We said that the caucus which I represent might object to this appointment, and that it might be possible to negotiate or to arrive at a compromise. There was no mention of any leeway and, since the government did not wish to negotiate anything or consult on anything other than the appointment of Mr. Bruce Phillips, this debate is taking place. I think it is good, in a democracy, that the people of Canada should state their positions clearly and that in the case of such an important appointment as that of the Privacy Commissioner, a commissioner to protect the privacy of Canadians, Parliament should take time to reflect on the matter. In raising this issue, Madam Speaker, it is not in any way our intention to pass judgment on Mr. Bruce Phillips personally. We do not intend to question Mr. Phillips' integrity or honesty, nor his ability as a journalist, which he was for many years. We simply wish to remind the House of important elements to be considered by all when selecting a Privacy Commissioner.

When privacy is under attack, individual human dignity is under attack. That is why it is of the utmost importance that the members of this House should be able to discuss the appointment. As I said earlier, parliamentary democracy is strengthened when we can discuss in such an open and democratic manner.

We feel, Madam Speaker, that the role of the Privacy Commissioner, the public's perception of this role and of the person performing it, and the Commissioner's ability to act on behalf of all Canadians are most important and that is why we wish to raise objections to Mr. Bruce Phillips' appointment.

The Privacy Commissioner is appointed for seven years, as we all know, and he is empowered by the Privacy Act to receive complaints from Canadians and to investigate and report to the House on issues under his purview. He also reports regularly on the following five or six points: a refusal to provide personal information concerning an inmate in a federal institution; secondly, a request to correct or annotate a record of personal information, which is turned down by a federal institution, thirdly, when a federal institution has not provided within 30 to 60 days the personal information requested, the Privacy Commissioner can be asked to lodge an appeal.

Where the description of a record of personal information shown in the directory of personal information is not adequate, a correction can be requested.

Where a federal institution has used personal information in a manner not provided for in the directory of personal information, one may seek correction and justice.

Finally, Madam Speaker, when a federal institution has not carried out the collection, conservation or retrieval of personal information concerning an individual in accordance with the act, the commissioner can again be asked to act on behalf of Canadians.

Therefore, not only has the commissioner the right to consult records held by the government, that is personal information records, he also has the responsibility of checking their content and, occasionally, of seeing that they are amended. The commissioner, Madam Speaker, is the ombudsman, the master and the defender of privacy in Canada. He is a most important person in a democracy, a person in whom we must all have total confidence.

[English]

Yesterday, the Minister of Justice shared her reasons with the House for the proposed appointment of Mr. Phillips. In doing so, she tried to draw a parallel between the outgoing commissioner, Dr. John Grace, and the proposed new commissioner, Mr. Bruce Phillips. I do not know Mr. Bruce Phillips. I have never met him in my life, but I might take this opportunity to reflect on the careers of both men, thereby establishing once and for all that comparing Dr. John Grace and Mr. Bruce Phillips is like comparing apples and oranges. It cannot be done.

Dr. John Grace has served as Privacy Commissioner for seven years. Previous to that, he served the CRTC as a public servant. Yes, he was a distinguished journalist. He was editor-in-chief of The Journal, a very respected newspaper in Ottawa that had to close down a few years ago because of reorganization of newspapers in Canada. Dr. Grace was the editor-in-chief of that paper, and it was not a Liberal paper. It was a well known Tory newspaper.

Mr. Grace did his job seriously and competently. For years, he was very involved in the community of Ottawa. He has our respect. He has proven over the last seven years as Privacy Commissioner that he could do the job well and in the interest of all Canadians. Therefore, he has our absolute confidence, and we will support the nomination when the motion to appoint Dr. John Grace as Information Commissioner is brought forward.

We oppose the nomination of Mr. Phillips. Let us look at his career. From 1984 to 1987, he was the Minister of Public Affairs at the Canadian Embassy in Washington. He was there to filter information from the Government of Canada to the Americans. In 1987, he was brought to the front line of the Prime Minister's Office as Director of Communications for the Prime Minister. As we all know, he was responsible during 1988 for the message that went out from that office. Mr. Phillips was in charge of the PMO press office. He controlled the media's access to the Prime Minister. His partisan allegiance was well known.

It was quite evident to us that during the campaign Mr. Phillips was even in charge of what some newspapers alleged to be the dirty tricks campaign. He never denied The Globe and Mail articles we have and could read into the record which showed that Mr. Phillips was doing a job for the Prime Minister. We do not object to that.

Mr. Phillips was playing a political role. He was a competent journalist being put into a communications job to give Canadians the point of view of the Prime Minister. We do not object to that, but is it reasonable to ask Mr. Phillips to stand on guard today for Canadians on the privacy dossier and to stand up to the government which, in many cases, is the institution that is being questioned by Canadian individuals in regard to privacy?

Are we to buy, to approve or to rubber stamp the nomination of somebody who we know has been very partisan and who we know worked for the Prime Minister who surrounds himself with Tory hacks? We know that. Why should we accept that one of those go to a position of importance in Canada, Privacy Commissioner? He could be put into another job by Order in Council, even to the Senate if they want to. We would not mind that. Why not?

Mr. Kaplan: He would get $153 a day.

Mr. Gauthier: He would get an additional $153 a day just for showing up.

We do not object to that, but we object strongly that Parliament, both Houses, the House of Commons and the Senate, be called upon to approve the nomination of a person who we all know is very partisan, who would have access to information on the opposition members of Parliament, into the privacy of every one of us. He will be able to go into the records and see how we are doing. I do not want that. I do not think I can accept that.

I do not think he would be very objective in that regard. I do not think he could stand up here at the bar or anywhere else and defend the integrity of his impartiality in respect of opposition members, because he has over the years shown that he is not an impartial person. He is a very partisan individual.

That is all right. We do not mind that. We have some partisan people. I am a partisan individual, but I would not expect to be named Privacy Commissioner. I do not think the Tories over there would agree to that. They would certainly object, and I would agree.

Mr. McCreath: How could you ever appoint anybody Governor General then?

Mr. Gauthier: You do not do that by Order in Council. That is the problem.

There are many appointments here. I put the question to the Speaker on Monday of this week, asking what the difference is between an officer of the House and an officer of Parliament. There is no straight answer to that question.

I know that there are many, many positions. For example, the Auditor General, appointed by Order in Council. He answers to the House of Commons, not to the Senate. There is absolutely no way that you would agree that he is not working for Parliament. The Auditor General is a nomination of this House and of this House exclusively, not of Parliament. Yet he is responsible for public surveillance of the expenditures of the government.

It would not be appropriate to name the Minister of Finance to the position of Auditor General of Canada. I have a lot of respect for the Minister of Finance and his competence, even if I do not always agree with everything he does. I think it would be unacceptable to us if he was named Auditor General of Canada.

Needless to say, we have many articles in the press about Mr. Bruce Phillips' appointment. I will read an article here from Frank Howard on June 4, 1990. This is interesting. It states:

> Bruce Phillips has had so many different appearances over the last few years that it is asking too much from the public to accept this latest persona of probity, impartiality and conscience.

The sensitive nature of this post is such that we cannot have a reasonable doubt as to the probity, the impartiality and conscience of the Privacy Commissioner. There must be no doubt that he is absolutely above any reproach. We have hesitations and serious doubts.

I find the words of the outgoing Commissioner, John Grace, in his annual report of 1983–1984, interesting. He defines privacy as follows:

> Privacy is not simply a precious and often irreplaceable human resource; respect for privacy is the acknowledgement of respect for human dignity and the individuality of man.

If nothing else, I would hope that all members of this House would want to provide this definition and apply this definition to the Privacy Commissioner. As I said, privacy is dignity. It is essentially what one has and once one has lost it, one has lost his dignity. We would like to reinforce the view that we would have somebody who has probity, impartiality and, of course, is perceived as being a person who will in all cases apply his judgment to these principles.

Madam Speaker, we are not the first to raise the question of the importance of the choice of a Privacy Commissioner. I could find you quotes from debates on access to information right from the start, in 1981—lots of quotes, from practically every member of the present cabinet, and here is one from the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Clark), when he was Leader of the Opposition, back in 1981, and he said, "Those who have the information have the real power".

In the case we are concerned with today, not only does the government have the information, a great deal of information, but into the bargain it is putting in charge of that information a person who was for a long time responsible for government propaganda. Now they are putting him in charge of information, which as we know is held by the government, sometimes to the detriment of Canadians.

Madam Speaker, at a time when Canadians' confidence in their government is at its lowest ever, I have trouble understanding how the government can persist in an appointment like this one. What Canada needs, Madam Speaker, is a watchdog, not a lapdog! We want someone in this position who will do a job that all Canadians can approve. And given that the Office of the Privacy Commissioner is an administrative tribunal—because in a sense that is what it is—it must be, and be seen to be, objective and absolutely impartial.

Madam Speaker, I could cite you quotes from Professor Patrice Garant, who in his Précis de droit des administrations publiques (summary of the law on public administration) says, "In our constitutional tradition, the quasi-judicial act is in the same category as the judicial act, and it must issue from a body protected from any political control or interference, as our courts of justice are."

The test, Madam Speaker, is this: should this position be protected from any government interference? We believe so, very strongly. The people of Canada must not feel that the government has any influence or might bring any pressure to bear on the Commissioner's office. This rule is all the more important for the administrative tribunals that make decisions affecting the public at large. For example, as far as the positions of Privacy Commissioner and Information Commissioner are concerned, we want them to be seen as totally and absolutely separate from this or any other government.

[English]

It has to be at arm's length. It has to be so far out there that they cannot touch him. He must be seen to be and perceived by Canadians to be totally independent of government. That is going to be very difficult for Mr. Phillips to do. It will be very difficult for him to meet the criteria that I just put.

I cannot see why he would want to, unless he has got something that I do not understand. How can he wash, clean up, and possibly eliminate his reputation of the last six or seven years as a Tory hack in charge of certain programs. We do not object to that. We have Liberal hacks too.

Mr. Crosbie: Quite an admission.

Mr. Milliken: There is no such thing.

Mr. Gauthier: Sure, there is one sitting over there. He changed, remember, the minister there. He was once a Liberal and now he is a Tory. They change according to circumstances.

Mr. Crosbie: You are a Liberal quack!

Ms. Clancy: Is that onomatopoeia, John?

Mr. Gauthier: I will end this short exposé, Madam Speaker, by saying that we would like this debate to come to an end. We know there is an agreement. We have agreed that we will vote on this. This caucus will vote against the nomination of Mr. Phillips, with regret.

I would like to end with one last comment. Frank Howard, in his article of June 4, 1990 in The Ottawa Citizen, said: "The person who is put forward as the candidate for the privacy job should look like he or she could stand up to the government of the day, not like somebody who is being rewarded for loyalty to the Prime Minister".

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam speaker, I would like to put a few questions to the hon. Member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Phillips, who is going to be appointed by the government to the position of Privacy Commissioner, has a responsibility which is extremely important. As the person in charge of the government's propaganda during the last federal election, it seems to me that he is in no position to have a sound opinion on what ought to be protected and what information ought to be made available to the public.

As you know, confidential Cabinet documents are protected for at least 20 years. In 1987 a recommendation was made by the Standing Commitee on Justice and the Solicitor General, on which I had the honour of sitting at the time. Our recommendation at that time dealt with the question of reducing the period during which more or less important documents, such as draft bills, for example, should be available to the public.

How can draft bills, which have to be debated by Parliament, be subject to confidentiality until they are tabled in the House? How can we as MPs discuss draft bills if they are kept confidential?

Mr. Phillips will certainly have every inclination to keep all these bills, all these documents, secret. I do not think he will be able to make a valid recommendation to the House once he has been appointed, because he will want to protect the government.

I would like to put this question to the Honourable member for his comment.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I covered that aspect of the Honourable Member's question in my opening remarks when I said that we in the Official Opposition were not satisfied with Mr. Bruce Phillips' impartiality.

On the basis of the perception we have of this individual, even if we do not know him, but the perception of the information available to us, the perception of having seen Mr. Phillips act for the Prime Minister for seven or eight months, as information officer in Washington, or here in the Prime Minister's office during the last election, we all, including the hon. Member, know that Mr. Bruce Phillips, during the 1988 federal election used his position to tell the media what we say were untruths about the conduct and relationships of the Leader of the Opposition, to destroy in many cases his credibility—it was his job, but he destroyed the credibility of our leader, the hon member for Vancouver Quadra.

[English]

I have a quote that I would like to put on the record. It is from the first annual report of John Grace, the present Commissioner of Privacy, and it states: "Unlike trees or oil, information can indeed be renewed. Better computers linked to better communications systems can renew and expand information almost to infinity. But human privacy is not renewable, once lost to an indiscreet computer, a person's privacy is gone forever. The computer never forgets".

We are into an era of computerized information access. I, for one, am very nervous about naming a person who would have access to all government information when I know that he is less than objective in regard to his political affiliation.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Madam Speaker, I think this could be a interesting debate for my colleague, because the man who has just spoken is certainly, among all the MPs, one of my best friends. So I shall try, while making one small comment, not to disagree wih him too much.

But during my political career, which after all has lasted some time, and even before as a student, I have observed this phenomenon. I have studied and observed this phenomenon which is still referred to as political partisanship. I have seen in Canada, for example, Supreme Court Justices who had been very partisan politicians, and yet who became great Supreme Court Justices. The question about Mr. Phillips, since it does seem that he will be appointed—I do not know at this time how I shall vote—but I do know what will be expected of him once he has been appointed to such a sensitive position, such an important position, and that is that he should be aware that he enjoys the protection of the House of Commons. He will not only have to be extremely prudent, but he will also have to renounce all political partisanship as we have seen in the past when certain individuals were appointed to high positions, such as the Bench.

And it is of the utmost importance for appointees to the Bench to know that they are fully protected by the law precisely to make sure that they are no longer political partisans. I find it unfortunate, since one may dream— and when I look at my colleague for Ottawa—Vanier, I like to think that maybe someday, if I had been the Prime Minister, he might have been—and I look at him as he is otherwise occupied—but if there is anyone that I would recommend as Commissioner of Official Languages, for instance, he is the one. Everybody will say no, he is a political partisan! Yet, if there ever was a man who is competent and qualified for this position—

Mr. Saint-Julien: Senator— Hear, hear!

Mr. Prud'homme: The member is getting excited again.

Indeed, I wish to make an early announcement to the effect that if ever this position were to become vacant and if he were to decide to end his political career, I would certainly agree to sponsor my honourable friend from Ottawa—Vanier—

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Prud'homme: As you can see, you already enjoy the support of all political parties, and yet my friend is very well-known in that regard.

In a nutshell, then, I repeat that this gives us an opportunity for which I thank you, Madam Speaker, to reflect once again as parliamentarians on the true meaning of political partisanship and to inform the people we appoint to such sensitive positions. And in that regard I agree with my colleague that we should make sure, since it does seem that Mr. Phillips will be appointed— I know him, he is a friend of mine, I am neither afraid nor ashamed to say so, I have known him for a long time. But I want to be certain that he understands the message of the House, which has been voiced by many members, not by myself, but by my esteemed colleague; now that it seems he will be appointed to this sensitive position, he will have not only to renounce all political partisanship but also to be seen as having done so. And I think he will understand quite well this message from my esteemed colleague and friend and from myself.

Mr. Saint-Julien: Congratulations, Marcel!

Mr. Gauthier: Very briefly, Madam Speaker, my colleague from Saint-Denis obviously still has a knack for comparing the incomparable. When you compare a judge with an officer of Parliament, I think there is still a difference. He is a lawyer. He knows there is a great difference between a Supreme Court Justice and an officer of Parliament, since one is appointed for seven years while the other is appointed for life. There is a time limit, and there is also a limit to the duties of those two persons. Such a comparison may appear valid to the Member, but I do not find it acceptable.

As concerns Mr. Phillips' purification, once he has been appointed—because the fact is that the government has a majority and will likely carry the vote—I shall be the first to applaud if he does. But he has a lot, really a lot of purification to do, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The period provided for questions and comments is now over. Resuming debate. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has the floor.

[English]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am a reluctant participant in this debate. In my view, this is a debate that ought not to be happening in the House.

I do not claim to have been here a long time, by any means, but it is the first time I can recall that an appointment by resolution of the House of Commons has had to be debated in the House. Normally, the subject of these appointments is by all-party agreement. Instead, we have this jackboot tactic from the government in proceeding unilaterally to impose its will on the House and the people of Canada in appointing someone who is a Tory hack to a position as an officer of Parliament. It is a disgraceful way to proceed. It is contrary to all the precedents. It is contrary to all past practice.

The normal procedure in making appointments to parliamentary posts is to consult with all the other parties and agree. In this case, it was obvious there was no agreement. In spite of that, this pig-headed government is proceeding with this resolution in the House.

As I say, I am reluctant to debate this kind of resolution, but I feel it is incumbent upon those of us who object to this appointment to make clear our reasons for so doing.

I have heard the hon. member for York Centre and the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier make very useful contributions to the discussion. I am not going to repeat all their remarks, but I will say at the outset that we on this side, as the others have said, have no dispute whatever with the distinguished career in journalism that Mr. Phillips brings to this job. In our view, that is not the issue.

I know some members may have reservations about columns that he has written or disagree with things he has said on the air, or whatever he may have done. That may be so. But we accept that that is part of journalism, that is the way it works, even though we do not always agree.

If the government had come forward with someone like Mr. Jeffrey Simpson, who is also a distinguished journalist as a nominee for this post, we would not object. But I would say right off that he writes columns that look like pamphlets for the next Tory campaign and he has been doing that for years. It is not the bias that we are concerned about in this case, it is the fact that this gentleman, Mr. Phillips, occupied a post in the Prime Minister's office that necessarily involved him in highly partisan activities.

As I said before, I would have no objection to someone like Mr. Simpson, who writes for a Conservative newspaper, one that has become a sort of phoenix of the Ottawa Journal, which was one of the most Tory papers you could ever find in Canada. It was dreadful reading from our perspective. You could hardly find a picture of a Liberal in the paper; it was a dreadful thing.

The Globe and Mail seems to have taken over that role now and writes this apology for the government constantly, trying to justify the government's ill-conceived policies. Mr. Simpson writes these columns, as I say, that could easily be used as pamphlets for Conservative candidates in the next campaign, and my hon. friend from Halifax says they probably will be.

I am not going to argue that the gentleman is disqualified on the basis of partisanship. It is the fact that he has occupied a post that is beyond journalism, that in fact he was working in the Prime Minister's office as a party hack, as my hon. friend for Willowdale puts it so eloquently.

Yesterday in her speech, trying to justify this ridiculous appointment, this travesty, this outrage on the Canadian people, the Minister of Justice made some points that I want to deal with.

Mr. Reid: The outrage is that you have the guts to stand up and say this.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. member for St. John's East might listen. He might want to vote against this appointment at the appropriate time.

Ms. Clancy: Yes, he might, but it is not likely.

Mr. Milliken: I hope they are going to have a free vote on this issue in the House. I think we would find out what the Conservative back-benchers really think of this appointment.

Mr. Peterson: Since free trade, you will never get anything free.

Mr. Milliken: The Minister of Justice said, "If we are to say that any professional journalist who takes that job is thereafter tainted and cannot—take some other position without being tainted—that has very, very negative implications for the ability of governments to have the highest quality people serving them".

Is that fact, Madam Speaker? I say it is not. That is nonsense. The government can have Mr. Phillips serving it in any capacity it wants, and I stress the word "government". What we are talking about in this appointment is Parliament and Parliament is not the government. Parliament is not just the government; it is more than the government. Parliament is all the members of this House; it is all parties in this House. It is supposed to be the representative of the aspirations of all the people, not just the governing party.

The government is saying, "We would like Mr. Phillips to serve us as a government worker doing the job in Parliament". In other words, instead of representing all the people, it is putting him in as a government appointee as though this were a government job.

They could name him deputy minister. Maybe the Minister of Justice would like to have him as her deputy minister. She can make him that and we will not be in a position to stop it. The Minister of State for Finance might want to have him as his deputy minister. Fine. They might want to appoint him as head of the CRTC. They might want to make him chairman of any board or commission. There are lots of jobs and they are all full of Tory hacks. But they choose not to. They want to put him in a parliamentary job instead. That is what we on this side object to and our objection is one that is fundamental and it is fair. The minister also stated: "Therefore it is incumbent on those who wish to impugn Mr. Phillips' ability to provide some kind of evidence that he is not able to act with independence". What nerve the minister has in making that statement.

First, we have no obligation whatever to provide any evidence that he is not able to act with independence. That is not our job. Second, we are not impugning his ability. We are impugning his capacity—and there is a difference—to do this job. This is a quasi-judicial position. This position involves exercise of judgment, discretion, and exercise of considerable decision-making power over other people. The incumbent in this position must be seen to be acting impartially. Mr. Phillips will not be seen to be acting impartially. He will be seen to be acting as a party hack.

Third, the minister stated: "I would point out that in the period of time that he has been Assistant Privacy Commissioner, he has participated in putting together the report on drug testing that is very critical of the government". She seemed to suggest that because he had been critical once, we could assume that he would be critical whenever it was necessary. That is not evidence of impartiality. I am surprised that the Minister of Justice, as a lawyer, would even suggest that it was such evidence, yet that seems to be what she is putting forward. It is the only evidence that she has got.

The other tactic that the government has tried to use in this case came from the Minister for International Trade. I am glad he is here because perhaps he will want to bellow again. On Tuesday during Question Period he had quite a lot to say when very proper questions were being put by the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway.

The hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway was trying to ascertain certain facts about this dreadful appointment and the Minister for International Trade sort of exploded. There is no other word to describe it. He started to bellow from his seat and this is what he yelled, as recorded on page 12291 of Hansard:

> What about Broadbent? What about the rest of you socialist horde?

I know he was not addressing our party.

> What about what's his name, Lewis, who we appointed to the UN? What about that turkey? You don't protest about him. What about buddy down on the civil service board? What's his name? Ian Deans, what about him? That was all right. If Phillips was a socialist it would be all right.

It just shows the distorted thinking of the government ministers on this. I hope this is not a unanimous nomination. I hope it is just the Prime Minister, because if the other cabinet ministers agreed to this they have put their foot in it in a big bad way.

The fact is that these socialists were appointed to these positions and I am not, of course, agreeing necessarily with the words, the intemperate language used by the Minister for International Trade in describing some of the appointments. After all, he made the appointments. He and his cabinet made these appointments and they have to accept that responsibility. If they put turkeys into the jobs, they cannot complain to us in the opposition about that. But there they are calling their own appointees turkeys. It was not very complimentary of the minister, I must say.

But the fact is these appointments are not to parliamentary jobs. These are government jobs. These are outside the purview of Parliament. They are appointed by the government by Order in Council. They do not come to this House and ask for a resolution of the House.

The Privacy Commissioner is different. The Auditor General is different. The Information Commissioner is different and the Chief Electoral Officer is different. Each of those posts are appointed by resolution of this House and then a subsequent Order in Council. If that is the way the appointments are done, then it seems to me there is an obligation on the government to come to this House and say we want all-party support for the appointment, not ramming some party hack down the throats of the Opposition. That is what is going on in this case.

For the Minister for International Trade to suggest that because they have appointed some socialists to government jobs, and I stress that, "government" sinecures, not parliamentary jobs and, therefore, somehow we should not criticize this appointment because this happens to be a Conservative, is rubbish. It has nothing to do with the issue that we are confronted with here which is whether or not Parliament is going to appoint some party hack to a position under the control of Parliament.

The Ottawa Citizen, which is hardly a newspaper said to favour the Liberal Party, has published today an editorial on this subject. I will only read part of it for the benefit of the hon member for St. John's East and perhaps the parliamentary secretary to the government House leader who I suspect too would want to vote against this appointment. It states:

> The honourable men and women MPs of the Progressive Conservative Party will carry out a dishonourable act today if they approve Bruce Phillips as Canada's next Privacy Commissioner.

That is The Ottawa Citizen writing. They make it clear that the distinguished career that he has had as a journalist is not the problem. It is his close association with the Prime Minister's office that disqualifies him from an appointment to a parliamentary post.

The importance and independence of this position is evident from the fact that the appointment is to be made by Order in Council after resolution of both Houses. The appointment is for a seven-year term. This is not a short-term one or two-year appointment. This is a seven-year term and it is designed to ensure continuity in the job and independence in the appointee.

The government is dishonouring the post and this House in using its majority, if that is its intention and it is not going to declare a free vote on this issue, to thrash this unpopular nomination through this House of Commons.

I suggest that the appropriate course is for the government to withdraw this motion at once and come back and discuss it with the opposition parties—I know the New Democratic Party shares our view on this—and allow us to agree on an appointee worth putting into the job.

What the ministers have done is appoint people they are going to subsequently call turkeys, as the minister did the other day, and then try to say, look we have appointed these people, it is all right for us to go ahead with the others. We have allowed some of your people into jobs, so you have got to agree to ours.

That did not work with the New Democratic Party. They are still opposing this, in spite of the threats and bullying tactics of the Minister for International Trade. They cannot use that argument on us because they have not appointed the good Liberals to the jobs that they might go to.

I have one point of disagreement with the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier. I do not believe there are Liberal hacks. There is no such thing in the definition book, and the Minister for International Trade knows that and I think that he would agree with me on that point.

In conclusion, I urge the government to withdraw this motion at once and allow us to discuss the matter of this appointment in the usual way and come to an agreement. We are not disagreeable, but we have been given no alternatives. This was the only name put forward and I believe that it is inappropriate.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I would like to make several comments and ask the hon. gentleman for his opinion. I do not know why there is all this emphasis on hacks. Hacks are essential to the political process, whatever a hack is. Our people who want to assist in public service are being denigrated, attacked and scorned by having appellations such as the name "hack" applied to them—

Ms. Clancy: Like poor Ian Deans?

Mr. Crosbie: The person who I suggested was a turkey is somebody in public life and there are many turkeys in public life, as we all know, but I am now addressing myself to somebody who has been called a hack.

My experience with the person under discussion is that he is a person who did a first-class job when he was a public commentator. When he was in the communications field on television, he was a perceptive observer of the Canadian political scene and fair and impartial in his comments.

Does the fact that he accepted a government appointment and then worked for the Prime Minister have him categorized, after a lifetime in the communications and other businesses, as some kind of a hack who is not capable of performing the duties of the office that we are now discussing? The course of action of the present Official Opposition is deplorable in this instance.

It is hardly relevant, of course, that they appointed, during their years in office, all sorts of persons who came with the same kind of background who had served them briefly or otherwise, and with that experience they should not be up with hypocritical remarks like this today. It is difficult to understand. One can understand the NDP because hypocrisy is a part of their make-up and they really do not know when they are being hypocritical and when they are not. I want to ask the hon. gentlemen who just made these remarks whether he agrees that Bruce Phillips is an outstanding person with a long background in public life, well able to understand and to enforce rights such as those he will have to enforce or comment upon during the next seven years that he would be in office, and that he is therefore a fine and suitable person for this office.

In ending, I want to put this piece of poetry forward for the consideration of the House.

Why take the track of Colleen Hack?
Why don't they just go quack, quack, quack?
All that is happening is just the fact
This action follows their well-laid track.
The NDP as ever, quake and shake
With indignation completely fake.
They never quivered, shivered or shook
When Ian Deans was given the hook.
The Public Service labour boards
Only wanted the NDP hordes
Appointed to important posts
By we PC governmental hosts.

Gratitude not an NDP virtue.
Forgotten now are Broadbent and Lewis,
Still going forward to put screws to us.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I will not attempt to emulate the minister's poetic skills.

An Hon. Member: You are not from Newfoundland.

Mr. Milliken: I am not from Newfoundland, that is true, but that is not the only reason I would not sink to emulate the hon. member's poetic skills. He reminds me of the great poet, McGonigal with his doggerel—I think it would be properly referred to.

To answer his question, no, I do not agree. I think he knows the answer to the question. He was simply taking advantage of the question and comment period to huff and puff a little. I am surprised, frankly, he did not apologize for his intemperate remarks that I quoted on Tuesday, insulting as they were, to the appointees that his government put forward. It was not the Liberal government that appointed these socialists to these posts. It was a Conservative government. It was not our responsibility to pass judgment on the quality of those appointments. They were done by the government on its own.

I want to say that we do not agree that this is a good appointment. I do agree with the minister when he says that Mr. Phillips is a very distinguished and competent journalist. That we have stated throughout and I do not think any member on this side has suggested otherwise. What I do say is that his past work in the Prime Minister's office disqualifies him from taking a job as an employee of Parliament. I stress that. The minister keeps missing that distinction. If he wanted to have Mr. Phillips on the Human Rights Commission or some other judicial body, that is the government's sole concern. What we are dealing with here is an appointment by this House and that is not just the government, it is all parties in this House. Surely the minister understands that distinction and he should cease trying to blur it because all the ministers on that side can do is blur that distinction and say we are doing exactly as we would normally be doing with any other appointment.

The three he has named and the socialists they have appointed have been named to government jobs not appointed by Parliament by resolution in this House. There is an important distinction and the minister should bear it in mind.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Thank you, Madam Speaker. May I address a question to the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

This government, as we all know, has taken patronage to a new art form. The public finally rebelled. Even the journalists brought this to the attention of Canadians because they could not stomach it anymore.

An Hon. Member: That is right.

Mr. Peterson: So what did the government do? It appointed the three socialists to say: "Oh, we are non-partisan". Then they call these socialists turkeys. Are they saying that all of their other appointments are worse than turkeys because they tried to clean up their act by appointing turkeys? This is obviously what this government is attempting to do. It has finally admitted to Canadians that its appointments throughout that rampant run of patronage were worse than turkeys. Does this mean that the government is going to recall all those appointments, ask for their resignations and make sure that we get a clean barnyard at least?

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, the point taken by the hon. member for Willowdale is a very good point. I was tempted in my remarks to cover the wide range of patronage for which this government has become so famous. Really, its disgraceful record of appointments since it took office in 1984 has left any past record of any prior government in tatters. This has really been a shocking, shocking orgy of patronage and that from a Prime Minister who in a national debate in the election campaign in 1984 protested his outrage at the 10 or 12 or 21 or 22 appointments, whatever the numbers were, that the Liberal government made just before that election. For this government to suggest that the three socialist appointments make up for the complete outrage it has perpetrated on the Canadian public is ridiculous.

I agree with the hon. member for Willowdale when he says that the minister is really letting the cat out of the bag in calling these three appointments turkeys, because these were the three star appointments. Every time we accuse the government of being biased in its appointment process, it points to these three as examples of how pure it is, how virtuous it is, how non-partisan it is in making appointments. Now we are told by the minister that these three are turkeys. One wonders what the others are. Perhaps, when the minister makes another contribution he could enlighten us on that subject, perhaps with another poem about some of the other appointees.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise on debate with respect to these motions. Before commencing my remarks and putting this in a bit of an historical context, I do want to just set the record straight with respect to any suggestion that any of the three very distinguished appointees, about which the Minister for International Trade was bellowing and braying in the House when I questioned the Minister of Justice, could properly be described as turkeys. Surely, nothing could be further from the truth. These three individuals have served and continue to serve the country with great distinction. I know that the hon. minister would not want to associate himself in any way with the suggestion that these individuals might be fowl of any description.

I also want to express my shock and surprise at the comments of the member for Kingston and the Islands. I know that member was not a member of this House in 1984, as I was. I was here, as was the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce and the member for York Centre, and I remember well that incredible orgy of patronage in June 1984. I know the member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce and others were embarrassed and humiliated by that. When the member for Kingston and the Islands stands up in his place and says that the Conservatives have taken patronage to a new art form and so on, they merely learned from the masters; of course, the masters being the former Liberal government that appointed every former hack and flack and carrier-on and bag-person and member of Parliament who was terrified of facing the electorate. It put them all into juicy positions of one sort or another. I do not think the Liberal Party of Canada has any lessons to teach anyone about the debasing of the political coinage in this country through patronage.

Let us look at the appointment that Parliament is being asked to deal with today, because this is a very serious question. The Minister for International Trade has made light of it. The Minister of Justice in her extraordinary defence of this appointment has come up with arguments that boggle the imagination. She suggests that the fact that the Information Commissioner, John Grace, is a good friend of the former Leader of the Opposition would somehow mean that it is okay to appoint Bruce Phillips as Privacy Commissioner. What an absurd leap of logic.

The reality is that by appointing Bruce Phillips to this position, Bruce Phillips who had a highly partisan political job in the office of the Prime Minister, the government and the Prime Minister in particular are degrading and debasing the office of Privacy Commissioner.

Some people might say: "What is so important about the office of Privacy Commissioner?" I think we have to look back at the history of this appointment. I had the honour of serving on the justice committee which passed the legislation on protection of privacy and access to information. I believe the member for Willowdale was in the House in those days as well. He did not get appointed from 1984 to 1988 to one of those positions that his colleagues were appointed to, but he was here during the debate on that important legislation.

An essential element of the legislation was that the individuals, the men and women who were appointed to these positions of Privacy Commissioner and Information Commissioner would not simply be named by the Prime Minister or by the Minister of Justice. They would be appointed following a resolution of the House of Commons. The clear understanding of the purpose for that appointment process was to ensure that those appointments met with broad approval in this House, and that they not be foisted upon the House and the country by a government seeking to pay off its political friends. That is what has happened in this case. It is a very generous pay-off, I might add.

The Privacy Commissioner is a seven-year appointment with a salary of about $140,000. It is a nice way for Bruce Phillips to end a career in the Public Service. The pension is very generous indeed. But today, the purpose of dealing with this motion is to express our anger and sense of betrayal that the government would abuse the powers that it has in terms of numbers in this House to railroad this appointment through Parliament.

I want to point out that the threats to privacy in Canada are very real. In fact, in the most recent annual report of the Privacy Commissioner, John Grace, who has been moved to Information Commissioner, said just a couple of weeks ago: "The exponential growth of public and private data bases risks open season on Canadians' personal information".

"The last decade of the century," Grace said, "represents a rapidly closing window of opportunity, if the dignity of individuals is to be rescued from the voracious jaws of uncontrolled information and biotechnologies."

Who has the Government of Canada decided to appoint in this last decade of the 20th century to protect the privacy of Canadians? Who has it chosen to appoint to challenge the Prime Minister when he attempts to attack the privacy rights of Canadians? Why has it chosen to appoint a former officer from the Office of the Prime Minister, a former hack, a former political crony of the Prime Minister?

No one is questioning the credentials of Bruce Phillips as a journalist. That is not the issue. What we are saying is that in this appointment perception is as important as reality, and that the perception of those Canadians who are deeply concerned about the protection of their privacy against attacks by the government and the erosion of their privacy, is that a person who comes out of the Prime Minister's Office and goes into that position is not going to effectively stand up and defend his or her privacy.

This is not just any position. This was not a low level appointee in the Office of the Prime Minister. Bruce Phillips was the Director of Communications in the Office of the Prime Minister. He played a very active partisan role during the 1980 election campaign. In fact, Bruce Phillips admitted that during that campaign he called a lot of reporters and did whatever he could to attempt to get them to write articles and columns that were critical, such as hatchet jobs on John Turner.

That was the role that was played by Bruce Phillips who is now being proposed by this government as the guardian of privacy against the Prime Minister and against the Conservative government. It is unbelievable that the government would actually appoint a person with that kind of partisan, political background in the Office of the Prime Minister to such a position. As the member for Kingston and the Islands has pointed out, this position is an officer of Parliament.

Politicians can stand in their places and be critical of this appointment, but I think the most effective criticism of this appointment comes from a very distinguished professor who has been acknowledged as an internationally respected expert on privacy. I am speaking, of course, of the very distinguished professor from the University of Western Ontario, David Flaherty.

I will quote what John Grace had to say about David Flaherty in his annual report:

> Professor David Flaherty of the University of Western Ontario is an internationally recognized authority on data protection. He served as consultant to the Justice and Solicitor General Committee's review of the Privacy Act and he has been reported before in (reports of the Privacy Commissioner).
> He has written one of the internationally respected texts on privacy called Protecting Privacy in Surveillance Societies.

What does Professor David Flaherty have to say about the appointment of Bruce Phillips, the Prime Minister's buddy, to this position of Privacy Commissioner? Professor David Flaherty said that he was disgusted by this appointment. Professor Flaherty, by the way, is certainly no socialist. I understand he may even be a red Tory. His credentials in the area of privacy are recognized throughout the world. He may be as red a Tory as the member for Rosedale. I am not sure if that is possible, but he certainly is a respected privacy expert. He said that he was disgusted by the appointment. He went on to say that this appointment of Bruce Phillips ruins the integrity of the Office of Privacy Commissioner.

I would have hoped that hearing those words from this respected professor, this international expert on privacy law, the Minister of Justice might come back into this House and say: "Yes, I have made a mistake. The Prime Minister made me do it; the Prime Minister forced me to do it. I had no choice, but I am not going to carry through on this appointment. I respect the fact that Professor Flaherty and others have said that this is an unacceptable appointment".

Even the hon. member for St. John's East, I know, is cringing in embarrassment at this appointment. I would have hoped that perhaps the Minister of Justice might come back and say: "Okay, I am prepared to withdraw the appointment". Or, at the very least she could accept the reasonable suggestion that has been made on a non-partisan basis that this appointment be referred to a parliamentary committee.

The Standing Committee on Justice and the Solicitor General or another committee would then have an opportunity to call witnesses, for example Professor Flaherty or Ken Reuben, another very respected commentator in the field of privacy law, who has also expressed deep concerns about the appointment of Bruce Phillips. The committee could call Bruce Phillips himself before the committee and ask him just what it is in his experience in the Prime Minister's Office that qualifies him for this very important position.

I cannot over-emphasize the significance of this position in Canada today, the position of Privacy Commissioner. One has only to read the most recent annual report of the Privacy Commissioner to know the range of issues which are dealt with. We know that the Privacy Commissioner has tabled a number of important reports in the area of random testing for drugs, for example, and the whole area of AIDS and the importance of dealing sensitively and compassionately with privacy concerns in the area of AIDS.

We also know that there will be occasions when the Privacy Commissioner will be called upon to challenge directly the Office of the Prime Minister. We know and we remember all too well the fact that the Information Commissioner Inger Hansen has issued a number of very serious criticisms of the role that the Prime Minister's Office played in attempting to screen and vet information which was released to the public.

I might just say on that point that the treatment of Inger Hansen, an outstanding public servant, a woman who has contributed a great deal to this country as Information Commissioner, in her previous capacity as Privacy Commissioner and as the corrections ombudsperson has been shabby and beneath contempt. To treat a woman of this calibre and with this kind of distinguished record of service to her country in the way that this government has treated her is absolutely unbelievable.

We know that she has been critical of the government. In fact in a number of speeches she has been particularly harsh in her criticism of this government's failure to move forward in respect of openness and accountability in government. In 1988 she said: "Investigations often reveal a picture of a government that uses every opportunity to say no or, if that fails, to delay the process."

In September 1988 she said: "With few exceptions, there is no longer any clear message from the government, whether from the politicians or the bureaucracy, that Canadians have a legislated right to access and that the law ought to be obeyed in a willing, forthright and timely fashion."

Inger Hansen spoke out independently, not always perhaps as strongly as some of us might have liked, but she spoke out independently and was prepared to take on the government.

The concern of Canadians is that the appointment of Bruce Phillips signals that instead of putting into place a strong and effective watch dog for the privacy of Canadians, we are getting a docile lap dog that will do what the Prime Minister's Office wants and will not challenge in any effective way decisions which are made by that office.

The debate today gives us an opportunity to voice our concern about this abuse of the appointment power of the Prime Minister to put into this sensitive and important office one of his former political colleagues. I would hope that this House might take the opportunity, when this comes to a vote as indeed it will, to issue a stern rebuke to the Prime Minister and to the Minister of Justice to tell them that this position, which after all is an appointment of Parliament, is too important to debase by appointing an individual who was a political crony of the Prime Minister.

I would hope that members of this House would recognize that we can send a clear message to our constituents and to all Canadians that we believe strongly in the protection of the privacy of Canadians. The most effective way of doing that is by putting into this important office an individual who is seen to be independent, strong, effective, and not in any way tied to the Prime Minister's Office or to the government of the day.

Bruce Phillips does not meet those criteria; in fact quite the opposite. It is for that reason that I am rising in my place to oppose this appointment, to urge the government to withdraw this appointment, and to urge all members of this House to show their disgust and their revulsion at the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice in their decision to politicize this appointment by voting against it when the opportunity comes in a few minutes.

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Madam Speaker, I hesitate to enter this debate, but I have been drawn into it by both my friend here from Burnaby—Kingsway and my friend from Kingston and the Islands.

Perhaps I am in a unique position in this House, having been a political hack myself for a number of years, having worked with Mr. Phillips in the Prime Minister's Office, and having had to deal with Mr. Phillips supposedly as a Tory journalist. He was a most difficult, terribly unco-operative person. I can remember the 1979 budget when all we asked was that they not go until the Minister of Finance had read his speech. This Tory laughed me out of his office.

This man was a journalist, a respected journalist in this city and across this country. When he was asked to serve his country in our embassy in Washington, one of our most important embassies, he decided to do it not unlike a number of other people who have done exactly the same thing. Like a number of public servants and others, he then accepted an appointment in the service of the Prime Minister of this country.

There is no question, absolutely no question that one assumes some political responsibility, but as in many cases people return to the Public Service.

Having been a hack, a word I have used myself, I absolutely resent the concept and thesis that one cannot continue to serve one's country after a political life whether in the service of Parliament or in the service of the government. Whatever party we are from now or in the future I resent that we are all absolutely tainted with partisanship. It is offensive to me and to everyone else who served in the political system for whatever party he or she is in.

Mr. Robinson: Madam Speaker, the hon. member may attempt to make up in volume what he lacks in substance to his argument.

The reality is that the hon. member for St. John's East who is generally a thoughtful and learned member of the House has fundamentally missed the point in this instance. No one is suggesting that Bruce Phillips has disqualified himself from continuing to serve in a whole range of other occupations.

However, what is being suggested in this instance is that because the Privacy Commissioner is an officer of Parliament and because that position must be recognized as being fundamentally independent of any attachment whatsoever whether past, present, or future to the Office of the Prime Minister, it is a fundamentally different situation.

As the hon. member for St. John's East has indicated, Bruce Phillips has served his Prime Minister with distinction. Indeed he played a very vigorous role during the federal election campaign. That is fair ball. He has served his country in our embassy in Washington, but this office is an office that reports directly to Parliament. It is an office that is charged with the responsibility of protecting the privacy of Canadians from ever encroaching demands on their privacy. For that reason it is essential that there not be the slightest suggestion that the holder of that office have any tie whatsoever with the Office of the Prime Minister.

It is like the hon. member for St. John's East. After the next federal election he will be looking for a job. No one would suggest that he should not be in a position of serving his country in a variety of capacities, given his lengthy service to the public. I am sure that Prime Minister McLaughlin will keep that in mind.

What must be understood clearly is that if there were any suggestion at the end of the term of Bruce Phillips that the hon. member for St. John's East were to be appointed to that position despite his very strong and distinguished credentials, it would be seen as unacceptable. I doubt whether he would suggest that somehow his experience in the Prime Minister's Office or as a member of the House, albeit for one term, would qualify him for that position.

As Professor Flaherty has said—I remind the House that he is not a politician— this appointment ruins the integrity of the office of Privacy Commissioner. It is not because Bruce Phillips has in the past served his country. It is because of the fact that he is being appointed to this office that this appointment is fundamentally unacceptable to not only us in the opposition but to all Canadians I am sure.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I want to congratulate the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway on his speech and on his reasoned comments.

I must say that the hon. member for St. John's East is beginning to sound like his counterpart, the hon. member for St. John's West in his intemperate outbursts. My question for the hon. member for Burnaby—Kingsway will be more reasoned and sensible.

In the last few days, in fact most of this week, the New Democratic Party has been stressing the importance of the Senate under our Constitution. It has urged the Senate to exercise its constitutional right to stop government bills. I know this new-found interest in the Senate represents quite a change of heart because their policy had always been to urge the abolition of that chamber of sober second thought. We witnessed the spectacle of them having moved a motion on Monday, pointing out the Senate's powers, and last night voting against paying the Senate any of its money so they could continue to do their work. It was something of an amazing feat and gives some credence to the comments that the Minister for International Trade made earlier.

Leaving all that aside, I wonder if the New Democratic Party today is urging the Senate, when it considers its resolution in respect of this appointment to block this appointment. Is it part of the New Democratic Party policy to urge the Senate to stop this appointment by refusing to pass the counterpart of this resolution in the other place? I would be interested in the hon. member's views.

Mr. Robinson: Madam Speaker, I am pleased that the member for Kingston and the Islands has given me an opportunity to voice the sense of outrage that Canadians from coast to coast are feeling about Liberal senators voting for themselves $153 a day just for showing up in the Senate.

The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands, I know, is probably as embarrassed and as ashamed by the actions of his Liberal colleagues in the other place, at getting up and tottering to their seats and raising their hands and saying, "Yes, yes, I want $153 a day just for showing up". It is damned outrageous.

That is the position that Liberal senators, each and every one of them in the other place, have taken. It is shameful. I think Canadians from coast to coast are recoiling in revulsion at this spectacle of Liberal and Conservative senators. Liberal senators have the majority, and if the Liberal senators had the intestinal fortitude and the spine to stand up and say no, that they were not going to vote themselves $153 a day just for showing up, things might have been different.

When we talk about hyprocrisy, I suggest that the member for Kingston and the Islands and the member for Willowdale, go down the hall to the senate chamber and talk to the Liberals senators and beg and plead with them to reverse this decision to grant themselves $153 a day. Canadians are appalled by this kind of Liberal wallowing at the public trough.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, I have listened to the unctuous outflow of words from the member for Burnaby—Kingsway. My hon. colleague for Kingston and the Islands asked him a very simple question, a question that the member from Kingston and the Islands even felt that he might be able to understand.

Mr. Milliken: He didn't answer it.

Mr. Peterson: He was afraid to answer. It was a simple question. If, in all his outrage, he is prepared to say Canada does not deserve Bruce Phillips as our Privacy Commissioner, will he ask the Senate to scupper this appointment?

Mr. Milliken: That's right, why won't he do it?

Mr. Peterson: Why will he not come clean and confess that he is being a hypocrite on this issue?

Mr. Milliken: He is waiting for Audrey.

Mr. Peterson: What does he want? Is he waiting for instructions from his new leader? Does he only want to criticize the Senate, but not use it in an instructive way? Is he suggesting that the country should be burdened with the goods and services tax even if the Senate has a possibility of stopping this iniquitous tax from going through? Is this what he is saying? He would refuse to answer that question.

Let us return to the issue of Bruce Phillips as Privacy Commissioner. First we have to make the record very clear. On this side of the House, we believe that Mr. Phillips has been a distinguished Canadian journalist.

Second, he has served with distinction his own party, the Tories. Third, because of point number two, he is disqualified from serving in any one of four posts.

Our position is that anyone who has served the government or any other party in such a partisan way, is disqualified from only four government appointments. One of those is the Auditor General, the person charged with overseeing on a non-partisan basis the expenditures of government.

The second office for which he would automatically be disqualified because of his past, is that of Chief Electoral Officer, again an appointment of Parliament, a servant of Parliament and not of the government.

The third position for which he would be disqualified to serve would be Information Commissioner, a person charged with ensuring that Parliament itself has access to all the relevant information.

The fourth position is the one to which this government is appointing him, the Privacy Commissioner, dealing with the rights to privacy of all Canadians and again, a servant not of the government, but of all Canadians through all members of Parliament.

We are saying there are only four positions that we feel a person in Mr. Phillips' position is not qualified to serve in. This is not to denigrate from the individual, but this appointment is taking to the height of partisanship what should be an appointment totally beyond reproach.

Let us look at this government's record of appointments. We remember before the 1980 election when there was a certain prominent Tory in this country who talked about the beauty of getting one's snout into the trough; another barnyard analogy taken to new heights by the member for St. John's West. There was also that statement when this particular leader of Canada was asked if he would ever appoint a Liberal to any government position, to any Order in Council appointment? The answer was: "Not as long as there is one living Tory".

We saw a spate of appointments which were an embarrassment even to the most partisan of Canadians. We saw the appointment of one person to the board of Air Canada. This person was asked about qualifications to serve on the board of Air Canada: "What do you know about transportation?" The response was: "I drive a car".

An Hon. Member: Really! Profound!

Mr. Peterson: This was the quintessential type of appointment that was made for so many years by this government. Finally, it was so revolting to even members of the Tory party that they smartened up. They started to make some non-partisan appointments so that they could say their hands were clean. They appointed three prominent NDPers, socialists, to high positions. I must say I do not criticize those appointments because I thought all three of those NDPers had served their country with great distinction before those appointments were made, and are doing so or have done so in the posts to which they were appointed.

Was it out of a genuine interest in filling these posts with distinguished Canadians that they appointed Mr. Lewis to the UN, Mr. Broadbent to his position, and Mr. Deans to the Public Service Commission? Was this out of a sense of wanting to fill these posts with the best people? That was not their motive, even though they might have inadvertently made fine appointments. Their motivation was to attempt to cleanse their bloody hands from the past record they achieved of taking patronage to an all-time art form.

Mr. Milliken: An orgy of patronage.

Mr. Peterson: An orgy of patronage, as the member for Kingston and the Islands says. This did not just bring only the Tory party into disrepute. I must say that I think it cast all politicians in a bad light. When one politician does not act with the best interest of Canada in mind, Canadians do not say that it is just another Tory stunt, I think all of us suffer and are diminished in the minds of Canadians.

• (1240)

As elected representatives of whatever political stripe become diminished, we lose the ability to lead Canadians. We lose our ability to encourage Canadians to pull together. We have critical roles to play in order to make Canada great. We must be united as Canadians. We must work together to tackle global markets, rather than fracturing and fighting among the provinces, among sectors and among regions. When we as politicians make this call for Canadians to act together, but some politicians have misbehaved, we have lost our credibility. This is the tragedy of the Tory record of downgrading politics in Canada, through terrible appointments based strictly on patronage.

I am not saying that governments prior to when the Tories took over some six years ago always made appointments based totally on merit. However, when I look at appointments we made such as Gordon Fairweather, a prominent Conservative—

An Hon. Member: A cabinet minister.

Mr. Peterson: —cabinet minister who Prime Minister Trudeau appointed to head up the Human Rights Commission. The fact that he was a Tory did not enter into the issue at all. There was a human being whose record on human rights, before he went into that post and before he was appointed, qualified him as the most pre-eminent Canadian to fill that post and Canadians rejoiced. They did not have to ask about his political stripe. It was an appointment of distinction and merit.

I can think of lots of examples where the same type of non-partisanship was followed; Mr. Duff Roblin, Ernest Manning, and Premier Smith to the Senate. These were appointments that brought distinction to the institution to which they were appointed. It brought distinction to the government that appointed them and it brought distinction to all politicians because we are all part of a process which was regarded as being higher than the levels to which this government has brought us through its grovelling in the trough of patronage.

Bruce Phillips is a journalist of distinction and a person who has served his party with distinction, albeit in a highly partisan way. We are saying that there are only four offices for which that individual cannot be qualified because of his former partisan activities; Auditor General, Chief Electoral Officer, Information Commissioner and the Privacy Commissioner. Every other government Order in Council appointment office would be open to this individual.

That does not mean we would not reserve the right to criticize an appointment were he not qualified to fulfil that task. We no longer want the qualifications for serving on the board of Air Canada to be the response: "Well, I know how to drive a car".

Let us, as politicians from every side of the House, think about how our constituents, the people of Canada, look on us. What are the highest possible standards they can expect from us?

[Translation]

What would Canadians' reaction be if it could be said that this man or this woman was the best qualified for the position, the best qualified of any Canadian, with partisan considerations completely set aside, no importance given to his or her political affiliation? The government must, for the first time, become a leader. A leader that can set an example with its appointments to these very important posts. It would be very simple for the Prime Minister to say to Mr. Bruce Phillips, "I'm sorry, I made a mistake in asking you to take on this job. We have something else for you. But the Parliament of Canada must be safeguarded, it must be protected, and we must appoint people who have not previously been partisan." For four positions, that is all.

[English]

We are looking for leadership from the government. All it has to do, not only in order to win the respect of Parliament, but to give a new attitude to Canadians, is to say to Mr. Bruce Phillips: "I am sorry. This one post is not open to you. We will give you something else and then we will judge based on qualifications."

I think Canadians expect more of their government. They expect more of all politicians of whatever stripe. If we are going to start winning back their respect so that they will listen to us, is this not a marvellous opportunity, by a simple act, reversing a partisan appointment which is an abuse of Parliament? This can be done by reversing one simple nomination. Bruce Phillips does not have to suffer because of that, because he can be named to some other post for which he is better qualified. It is a simple act of reversing this one nomination, therefore restoring the integrity of this institution and restoring the faith—

—the faith of Canadians in our government, in our system of government, in the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Madam Speaker, I would like to put two questions to my hon. colleague. I should start out by saying that I greatly appreciated his speech, his comments. My first question is this: I wonder if he remembers the debate in 1984 about this important issue, and the commitments Mr. Mulroney had made at the time. What was it that he supposedly intented to do? You will remember, I am sure, that he made some serious commitments. What serious commitments. What bothers me is that I have the impression that his commitment in this important area, which affects the very soul of politics in Canada, seems to be just like all the other commitments—what is said and what is actually done are two different things. I would like you to elaborate on that.

My second question is the following:

[English]

Could the hon. member not only elaborate on the promise that was made during that debate, but perhaps say a few words about the record of the government in terms of what the commitment was then? I think that is rather important. In fact, I think it is critical and I think Canadians want to know what was said and what was done.

[Translation]

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, those are both good questions. The first related to what the Prime Minister said during the 1984 election campaign. He said two things to the people of Canada. He promised that there would never be any patronage, that his would be an open, an honest government.

• (1250)

He said a new era was opening up for Canadians as far as government appointments were concerned: appointees would be qualified people, experienced people, good people. That is what he said to Canadians.

But this is what he said to the Quebec Conservatives when he was asked if he would appoint a Liberal to any position—he said, "Yes, but not if there's even one Conservative still alive". So he said two things.

But what he did, as my hon. colleague from Manitoba has suggested, what he did after the election was something else entirely.

[English]

We saw exactly what happened. There was a spate of appointments and competent people who had served in posts with distinction were "unappointed". I will give you a very good example.

The Hon. Barney Danson, who had been our distinguished Minister of Defence, had been appointed to serve in a top post, representing Canadian business in Boston in the United States. It is not an incredibly important post in terms of the posts that are created, but the Hon. Barney Danson went to Boston with his wife and they created a whole new set of industries involving Canadian trade because he knew how to promote Canada. The Dansons worked hard at that post helping to put forward Canadian interests. What happened? A person with unquestioned competence, integrity, and ability did not get re-appointed so that the post could be filled by someone else.

There were so many appointments it started to gall Canadians. Every day the headlines read: "Another snout in the trough". Even Conservatives were embarrassed after 1984, through 1985 and 1986, by the appointments that were being made.

The hon. member, my esteemed colleague from Manitoba, points out that the appointments made after 1984 were not in accordance with the promise made to Canadians. However, perhaps we can give the Prime Minister the benefit of the doubt; they were precisely in accord with the promise he had made behind closed doors to Conservatives in Quebec.

What we have seen is an attempt by the government to clean up its act and its image by appointing some prominent NDPers to posts.

Mr. Crosby: How would that clean up the act?

Mr. Peterson: The hon. member from Halifax asks how that would clean up the act. The Prime Minister has cited those as being great appointments, but obviously the member from Halifax is disagreeing with his own leader. I have never seen such lèse-majesté.

We have behind me here a member from Calgary who was kicked out of that caucus for a lesser disagreement and one of greater principle than what the member for Halifax West exclaimed right now.

If the member for Halifax West is saying that he disagrees completely with the appointment of the three socialists made by his Prime Minister, then I submit that, if he does not resign from the Tory caucus right now, it is greater cause for being drummed out of caucus than the member from Calgary sitting behind us on this side who resigned on principle simply because he refused to support the GST.

An hon. member: Because he listened to the people.

Mr. Peterson: The member for Halifax West might have a point, because the member for St. John's West earlier called these three appointments, which the Prime Minister has lauded and touted throughout Canada, the appointment of turkeys. I assume that the member for Halifax West and the member for St. John's West are in agreement that their Prime Minister was wrong in making these appointments. They are now publicly criticizing their own Prime Minister for having made these great appointments.

I would hope they would do the honourable thing and submit their letters of resignation to the Prime Minister. They could do a joint letter signed by Halifax West and St. John's West. They could say: "We do so because we disagree with your appointment of those three socialists to these posts, appointments that were made in an attempt to cleanse our image even though, before Canadians, our hands are still bloodied. Like Lady MacBeth, these hands the multitudinous seas would incarnadine."

I suspect they will be sending this letter to the Prime Minister, doing the honourable thing, because the Prime Minister tried to clean up his act by making some non-partisan appointments.

I suspect that the hon. members opposite are happy with this appointment of Bruce Phillips. I am talking about only two members, the member for St. John's West and the member for Halifax West. They must be happy with this appointment of Bruce Phillips because they feel that other appointments by the Prime Minister have been wrong, when he appointed socialists. Bruce Phillips is obviously not a socialist. He has been there in the troops with them, he has been there in the forces, and he has been in the trenches. He was manipulating the fifth estate on their behalf in order to give the spin that the Tories needed in order to bring home victory to them in 1984. He was doing it afterward and he has been good for them.

All we are saying is that Mr. Phillips, a distinguished journalist, a strong hack for the Tory Party, has disqualified himself, because of his previous partisan activities, only from serving in four posts which are parliamentary and not government.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I was trying to get order in the House to allow the hon. member to conclude and I knew he was having some difficulty with one of his colleagues. The hon. member for Willowdale.

Mr. Peterson: Madam Speaker, the only difficulty I have ever had with my colleagues is, they are such great team players and they are so full of integrity, ideas, and enthusiasm for forming a new government and getting the country going, that we sometimes have trouble getting to bed before one or two in the morning.

I am so impressed with my colleagues on this side of the House and Canadians are as well. Look at the polls, Madam Speaker: 15 per cent on your right-hand side, and at least triple that on this side of the House. We are the government-in-waiting. We are the people who have to bring new directions to Canada, including the integrity of our very institutions which can best be demonstrated by the Order in Council appointments which are so fundamental to the operation of our government, to our Parliament, and to democracy in this country.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being one o'clock p.m., pursuant to order made Wednesday, June 6, 1990, it is my duty to interrupt the proceedings and put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the motion now before the House and of the proposed motion standing on the Order Paper in the name of the Minister of Justice for the appointment of John Grace as Information Commissioner.

The question is as follows. Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre), seconded by Mr. Andre moved:

> That, in accordance with subsection 53(1) of the act to extend the present laws of Canada that protect the privacy of individuals and that provide individuals with a right of access to personal information about themselves, Chapter P-21 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1985, this House approves the appointment of Bruce Phillips as Privacy Commissioner.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some Hon. Members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some Hon. Members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Madam Deputy Speaker: Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion, which was agreed to on the following division:

Madam Deputy Speaker: I declare the motion carried.

[Translation]

The next question is on the following motion in the name of Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre).

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) moved:

That, in accordance with subsection 54(1) of the Act to extend the present laws of Canada that provide access to information under the control of the Government of Canada, Chapter A-1 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1985, this House approves the appointment of John Grace as Information Commissioner.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I will be very brief and merely wish to say, on behalf of our caucus, that we endorse the appointment of Dr. John Grace as Information Commissioner. For seven years, Dr. Grace has been known as a competent and absolutely impartial—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think we should avoid getting into debate.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Riis: On division.

Motion agreed to on division.

Mr. Prud'homme: Madam Speaker, on a point of order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Saint-Denis, on a point of order.

Mr. Prud'homme: I merely wish to say, Madam Speaker, that I was in the House for the previous division but decided not to vote.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being 1.29 p.m, I do now leave the Chair until two o'clock this afternoon.

At 1.29 p.m. the House took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I would like to read a message which I received from the students of St. Boniface Diocesan High School. They met the day before yesterday in front of the legislative building in Manitoba to show their commitment to national unity.

I quote parts of this letter:

> We, the undersigned, are proud of who, where and what we are. We are proud of Canada's unique identity as a friendly nation that extends from sea to sea, but more importantly, as a country capable of sustaining two separate cultures in relative harmony.
> The present situation has brought, perhaps, the beginning of the end of our concept of Canada.
> Those in Quebec have been exposed to some very inaccurate representations of English Canadian feelings towards French Canada. The media have shown isolated incidents involving anti-French rallying and have continued to dwell on the negative. It is the purpose of this letter to show that positive feelings do exist and that we are very worried about the unity of our country.

They go on to give an example of the sharing of the school between St. Boniface Diocesan High School and École Precieux Sang. The letter continues:

> We are feeling that, perhaps, the people of Quebec do not realize just how much support they have in the west. To reinforce our confidence in the strength of Canada, we publicly proclaim our support of Quebec and a united Canada.

[Translation]

I ask all young Canadians throughout Canada to express their feelings right away on this extremely important issue and to show that they really want a strong united country.

LOCKEPORT HIGH SCHOOL

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I wish to commend and congratulate the students of the grade 10 English class in Lockeport High School and their teacher, Cliff MacKay.

These students collectively wrote a play entitled "The Lockeport Story: Past, Present, and Future". It tells the story of their town and its difficulties in recent years with the trials and tribulations of the fishing industry. This play which was collectively written by the 24 students and their teacher was performed before over 300 people in three performances.

The play reflected the heart, the soul, and the character of the town of Lockeport, a town in which people recognize that they are the best ones to deal with and solve their own problems. The recent history of Lockeport has been one of trial but with the type of leadership and self-reliance demonstrated by these students of Lockeport, I am confident that the Lockeport story will have a happy ending very soon.

AIRLINE INDUSTRY

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, analysts of Canada's airline industry are sounding warning bells. There is every chance that only one of our two major airlines will survive this decade.

New Democrats warned the government of this issue. Symptoms of serious illness in this industry are now undeniable. Air Canada posted a $13 million loss this year in its first quarter, for the second year running. It would have been even worse had it not sold off $21 million in assets.

Canadian Airlines is in no better shape and may well be doing worse with PWA haemorrhaging cash, 1,600 lay-offs since the Wardair purchase, and 1,900 more jobs slated for the axe in the near future.

The signs are there that soon there may be only one airline, and the government must be ready. That means preparing to protect consumers from monopoly price gouging and preparing to protect communities from service cuts.

I do not want to cry wolf, and perhaps some miracle may yet happen, but the government has a responsibility to Canadians to be prepared for a shrinking industry, especially when it helped to bring it about by deregulation.

CITIZENSHIP CEREMONY

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure to tell my fellow Canadians in Québec-Est about a wonderful event that will take place in our riding on July 1.

Mr. Speaker, as part of Canada Day festivities, we will have the honour to celebrate the citizenship ceremony at the François Charon Centre in Quebec City.

Since this rehabilitation centre symbolizes humanitarianism, dedication and generosity in all respects, I think it is the ideal place to show our new Canadian citizens the spirit and determination that characterize our people.

Thanks go to the president and general manager, Louis Champoux, for the receptivity and eagerness he showed in granting this request. I look forward to attending this most important celebration soon.

UKRAINIAN CANADIANS

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, between 1914 and 1920, approximately 8,500 Ukrainian Canadians were interned in 26 concentration camps across Canada. Just because they came from an area of the world under the Austro-Hungarian empire, they were used as forced labour in internment camps and had their property confiscated and never returned.

In October 1988, the Ukrainian Canadian Congress submitted a proposal to the Canadian government for the acknowledgement of and the symbolic redress for this injustice. This three-page proposal has taken over 18 months to study, and still this government is incapable of a response.

This is a legitimate concern and this government has the responsibility to respond. This is an issue about fundamental civil liberties, and it is important to all Canadians. This government must show a commitment to addressing these concerns by responding with action instead of silence.

Canadians must right a wrong. The federal government must right that wrong for them.

NEW HORIZONS PROGRAM

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, there seems to be some misunderstanding, and I hope not purposely, by members of the New Democratic Party. They are saying that the Department of Health and Welfare has cut $4 million from the budget of the New Horizons Program.

I would like to take this opportunity to set the record straight. Fifteen million dollars was allocated to New Horizons projects in the main estimates. Of that, $4 million was temporarily set aside, not cancelled, pending a review of the program.

The purpose of the review is to see how the money could be better spent on projects within the New Horizons Program. As part of this review, senior citizens across the country will be consulted. I believe this is a positive step in ensuring that the taxpayers' money is spent on worth-while programs and that within those programs it is put to its best possible use.

This statement is made necessary in an attempt to negate the scare mongering that I attribute to those who use their information selectively.

SEX OFFENDERS

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, last week I asked a question of the Solicitor General on the issue of treatment of sex offenders, and he said that he was still studying the subject.

This week, a new book was published called Criminal Neglect: Why Sex Offenders Go Free. It is a horrifying account of the epidemic of sex offences and abuse in this country. I do not know whether the issue has always been around and is just becoming public, or whether there is a particular rise in the issue.

What is clearly documented here is the failure of society in general to respond to this problem, and the particular failure of Correctional Service Canada and the Government of Canada to deal effectively and fairly with the problem of sex offenders.

I urge the House and the public to take a look at this important book.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, this is Canadian Environment Week. I would like to pay tribute to Stora Forest Industries Limited of Port Hawkesbury, Nova Scotia for its bold initiative in environmental awareness.

Earlier this year Stora launched an environmental awareness program for all 1,000 of its employees, as well as more than 200 woodlands contractors and related personnel. The program, the first of its kind in the pulp and paper industry in Canada, enabled participants to educate themselves on global and local environmental issues, on forest management, and on what Stora as a pulp and newsprint producer was doing in the area. Through these workshops employees participated in the development of an environmental policy for the company.

On Monday I participated in this workshop, along with 21 other media, educators and community leaders. The session was engaging, informative, and frank. Stora admitted that it was not perfect but was honestly committed as a corporation to conducting its affairs consistent with the principles of sustainable development and of sharing its successes and failings openly with the wider community.

This is responsible corporate citizenry, and I urge industry across Canada to follow Stora's lead.

BRAVERY AWARDS

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow morning at Rideau Hall His Excellency the Governor General will present bravery decorations to 13 Canadians for acts of heroism. The recipients have each demonstrated the strength and courage that we each like to have in times of trial.

One example of the unselfish heroism that will be recognized occurred last year north of Drumheller, Alberta. Eighteen-year old Derrick Wilson watched from the ground as his uncle Dale's crop dusting plane slammed into a field and burst into flames. Without apparent thought for his own safety, Derrick ran to the upside down plane, pulled his semi-conscious uncle free, and extinguished his burning clothing.

Derrick will be recognized with the Medal of Bravery but more important is the knowledge that his unselfish act saved his uncle's life. When interviewed by the media he was quoted as "not wanting to brag about it".

• (1410)

On behalf of this House, I would like to congratulate Derrick and the other 12 recipients of the bravery decorations. They are Canadians we can all be proud of.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, after some intense negotiating, the Federation of Canadian Municipalities managed to bring the GST for municipalities down from 7 per cent to 3 per cent.

The Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) said that the FCM had been very diligent and effective in its defence of the interests of municipalities, and that all parties had to show some flexibility in order to deal with a number of complex issues and obtain a satisfactory GST rebate for municipalities.

The government's goal, said the minister, was to ensure that after the sales tax reform was ratified, municipalities would not take up a heavier tax burden than the one they have now.

Mr. Speaker, we want to thank the Minister of Finance who made a major concession and reduced the GST to 3 per cent for Canadian and Quebec municipalities.

FISHERIES

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, on April 17, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans stated:

> Fishermen need safe, accessible harbours as much as they need serviceable vessels and gear.

The fishermen of my riding of Egmont and the other three ridings of P.E.I. would very much like the minister to translate his statement into action.

Across the island wharfs are collapsing because minimum maintenance has been neglected for several years. Fishing boats are running aground because harbours are being blocked by silt and dredging is not being carried out.

Many harbours are overcrowded because facilities which should have been expanded have actually diminished. Requests from fishermen have been ignored. Warnings from fishermen have been ignored. Fishermen's boats have been damaged and fishermen's lives have been put in jeopardy.

Fishermen of P.E.I. want this government to do its job: get the dredging done, get the wharfs repaired, and give the fishermen of Tignish, Alberton, Miminegash, Howards Cove, and Higgin's Wharf a chance to do their job and do it in safety.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mr. Ken Hughes (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, we all know that there exists those sceptics, those whose vision is short and whose aspirations are narrow who believe that Canada does not have a future united.

Do not believe these wistful dreamers. Let Canadians of good faith show by their actions that the vigour and the vitality of our nation is unimpaired, that our determination is to uphold the spirit of Canada, that our voice of reason shall be heard in the councils of the world, and that we remain a strong, a vibrant, a modern and a generous nation, one which is accepting of all Canadians.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, how many toxic waste dumps are there in Canada? The government does not have a clue.

There is no complete inventory of toxic waste sites due to budget cuts in 1984. Across the nation there is a wide disparity in classification and even definition of toxic waste, so some provinces have become pollution havens with laws full of loopholes.

The rules and regulations for toxic waste under the Canadian Environmental Protection Act are gutless. Each province is held responsible under CEPA, but no equivalency agreements have been signed.

Why can this government not realize that strong national standards are the only effective way to clean up the environment? Today we have an unravelling patchwork of provincial regulations. Illegal dumping continues, water supplies tainted, and toxic waste produced by the tons, and yet green plan public relations is costing nearly $1 million already, while we are told to wait for action.

Where are the government's priorities? In fact, where is the government?

THE SENATE

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, talk about hypocrisy in this House.

Early yesterday the Minister of Finance and other members of cabinet called the Senate's $153 bonus for showing up for work inappropriate. Others call it ridiculous, some call it scandalous, others call it unacceptable, and others call it contemptible.

Yet, later in the day, who voted in favour of supplying the Senate with money to provide the $153? The Minister of Finance, the government House leader, the deputy government House leader, the chairman of the finance committee, and the chief government Whip. As a matter of fact, all the Conservatives voted to support the Senate and all of the Liberals voted to support the Senate as well.

When it comes to telling the truth, let us face it, what they say is one thing but what they do is another. Shame on you cabinet ministers and shame on you Conservative Party members.

KOREAN–SOVIET SUMMIT

Mr. Bill Vankoughnet (Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington): Mr. Speaker, with the dramatic changes in eastern Europe and the excitement of the Gorbachev visit to Canada and the United States, almost lost in this excitement was the Korean–Soviet Summit between Mr. Gorbachev and the South Korean President Roh Tae-woo in San Francisco on Monday.

The two leaders agreed to exchange visits and are likely to hold ministerial talks on opening ambassador-level diplomatic ties this year.

This will end a gap in relations between the two nations that has lasted 86 years.

Mr. Speaker, this is further evidence that the cold war is thawing globally, and hopefully will lead to positive change in Asia.

This unprecedented meeting is another significant step to improved relations on the divided Korean peninsula and relations between South and North Korea.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I will direct my question to the Minister of Finance.

There is not a single economist in the country outside of the government service, nor is their a business leader in the country who will stake their reputation on the projection of the Minister of Finance in his February 20 budget that interest rates for the calendar year 1990 will average 11.1 per cent. Nobody in the country believes that.

Does the minister know if there is any chance of reaching the target of 11.1 per cent and, if not, will he introduce the corrective measures that he discussed this week in his appearance before the finance Committee where he said the government would take major corrective measures if those were in fact required? Does he not believe that they are required now?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the interest rates have come down today by 20 basis points. The bank rate was just announced. That is on top of another drop which I believe was about one–eighth of one per cent last week. I would not, if I were the hon. member, jump to as fast and as hard conclusions as he has.

I indicated that the interest rate levels are higher than we had anticipated at the time of the budget. That obviously has the effect of putting upward pressure on the deficit, but since then we have announced the budget deficit number for last year which is $1 billion lower than what we had previously been expecting. That is the fourth time in a row that we have come in under our projection, I might add. That is because there have been higher revenues last year and those higher revenues are continuing into this year. We have two counterbalancing forces.

As I indicated to my hon. friend in the committee earlier this week, we will be reviewing this on an ongoing basis. If it is appropriate for us to take mid–term corrections then we will do so.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary for the same minister.

This week, when the Minister of Finance appeared before the Finance Committee, he said that uncertainty about the constitutional question had been a factor in increasing interest rates in this country.

Since the bank rate went down by 20 points today, I want to ask the Minister of Finance whether in view of his statement this week before the Finance Committee about the Meech Lake Accord, the minister can give Canadians the assurance that, if the constitutional impasse is resolved, interest rates in this country will continue to show a significant downward trend.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: The minister may want to answer that question, but it was a hypothetical question and I just point that out.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, thank you very much. I was going to caution my friend in drawing too fast conclusions again in his second question.

There is some element of risk premium in interest rates in recent weeks as a result of the uncertainty surrounding the Meech Lake Accord, but the fundamental problem our country is facing that is causing interest rates to be as high as they are is the inflationary pressures, which I have discussed at great length in the House to date.

What I have pointed out to colleagues is that the underlying cost pressures in the economy, as measured by unit labour costs, increased from 4.9 per cent at the start of 1989 to 6.9 per cent at the end of 1989, at the same time as those of our major competitors were staying steady at 5 per cent or less. These are the pressures that are causing the higher interest rates. If we are able to get these inflationary pressures under control, if we can see them turning down, then we will be able to see lower interest rates.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, Laurent Thibeault of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association says the government's monetary policy is going to perhaps permanently cripple Canadians' ability to compete in the international market. Steel industry representatives came in and talked about an 80 per cent drop in their profits in their latest quarter compared to last year.

George Petty of the pulp and paper industry called for the resignation or the dismissal of the Governor of the Bank of Canada because of his high interest rates and the artificially high dollar.

I know that the Minister of Finance is not prone to listen to advice from members opposite, but will he now listen to a wide variety of Canadian business leaders who are telling him that the high Canadian dollar is killing the manufacturing sector in this country and he must change his policy?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Well, Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend would be the first to admit that he is selective in the witnesses that he has chosen to quote. Yes, my hon. friend is acknowledging with the shake of his head that that probably is a correct statement.

The point that I want to make is that other witnesses before the Finance Committee have acknowledged that the monetary policy of the government is the right policy to follow, precisely for the reasons that I have suggested. That is, the competitive pressures in the economy are strong, the upward pressure on competitive costs is strong and we must continue this policy.

I point out that Mr. Rubin of Wood Gundy who is the author of the study that was quoted in the The Globe and Mail on Tuesday, is also very supportive of the monetary policy that this government has been following.

ROUTE CANADA

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Minister of Transport suggested that the cabinet had no dealings with Manfred Ruhland, and I quote from Hansard:

> It was sold as a going concern to the Fingold brothers. That is exactly the way it happened. Any other suggestion is absolutely incorrect.

I have here a copy of a sworn statement given on December 22, 1988, to the Official Receiver in Bankruptcy. The question asked by the Official Receiver: "Who represented CN in the negotiations and sale of Transport Route Canada Inc.?" The answer given by Manfred Ruhland included, amongst others representing CN, the name of the then Minister of Transport, the present Deputy Prime Minister.

Will the minister now want to reconsider the statement given to the House yesterday?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend, as a lawyer, will know that he should also have suggested as to exactly what time my friend was referring to. Were they discussions he talked to before or after the agreement of purchase and sale was signed?

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary, if I may.

On June 4, the Minister of Transport advised the House that CN Route was sold on an arm's length transaction with advice coming to the government from CN. The same sworn statement seems to state that that is not quite correct, when the then Minister of Transport was involved with the negotiations, as stated in this sworn document, given to the Official Receiver in Bankruptcy on December 22, 1988. I wonder if I could have a comment on that.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, under different circumstances, we could probably try the entire case here, but that is not what Question Period is all about. I quote from CN's letter which says. "CN and no one else decided to sell its subsidiary after discussions with more than 30 companies beginning in 1985. Our negotiations on the sale were held directly with David Fingold, representing himself and his brother Paul as principal purchasers. Their financial credentials were very solid".

FISHERIES

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

The Fisheries Act amendments introduced yesterday called for increased fines for those found guilty of dumping fish at sea, misreporting catches and for the alteration or pollution of fish habitat.

However, what assurances can the minister give the House that his department intends to do any more than pay lip service, given that officials in British Columbia region stated in a memo dated November 15, 1989: "DFO friendly corporations will enjoy relative immunity from the Fisheries Act"?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, was that a question or a statement?

If the hon. member, in a socialist way, is trying to make Canadians believe the acts of Parliament apply only to the poor fishermen and not to the big corporations, I invite him to check the facts.

The proposed amendments to the Fisheries Act are laid out in the bill. If he wants to be truthful to Canadians—socialists love to be truthful—he should tell Canadians that for the first time officials of companies, licence holders and big corporations will be liable, for the first time, to be prosecuted under the amendment to the Fisheries Act.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, under the Coastal Fisheries Protection Act, today, foreign vessels can be fined $500,000 for illegal entry into Canadian waters and $750,000 for illegal fishing.

In his final report, Dr. Harris said: "In practice, penalties have not even approached those levels". Will the minister explain why anyone should expect that the new penalties will be imposed when the existing ones are being ignored?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member may want to reflect on the judges who are appointed to the courts in Canada. That is up to him. The Parliament of Canada is empowered to set what the fines can be, and it is left to the judiciary to apply the law.

If the hon. member is suggesting that the executive branch should infringe upon the powers of the judiciary, we do not share that view.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, may I just remind the hon. minister that it is not the New Democrats who appoint the judges.

According to the Fisheries Council of B.C., the ability of the federal government to protect the groundfish fishery is totally ineffective. Press reports tell of federal authorities routinely ordering the dumping of hundreds of tonnes of groundfish in order not to exceed DFO quotas. The destruction of the resource which has crippled the Atlantic industry is, with the connivance of the federal government officials, beginning to occur on the Pacific coast.

How will this legislation do anything to correct mismanagement on the part of federal government officials?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, again the socialists are trying to blame the government officials for what is happening to the fishery.

The fact of the matter is that the act empowers the government to pass regulations.

When the hon. member speaks about discarding fish, it is not something that we advocate. We do not want to see our fish resources depleted. We are in the process of looking at ways wherein we can ensure, for example, that people are not encouraged to discard fish at sea.

This is why the amendments that I introduced to the Fisheries Act yesterday will provide for the first time the minister of the Crown to make regulations for observers on those vessels where they will be enabled by law to take the necessary steps and measures to ensure that the awful things that the member sees do not happen anymore.

ROUTE CANADA

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for privatization. It is bad enough that after Route Canada was taken over money was wasted on European vacations, luxury yachts, and private jets, and that 2,000 workers lost their jobs, but to add insult to injury, company assets and pension plans were used to attempt to finance an American trucking firm takeover.

Since the government was actually involved in this transaction, what policies has the government put in place to prevent this type of leverage buy-out in the future?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend knows very well that there is a full investigation being carried out by the RCMP. As well, this is also before the courts as a matter of bankruptcy. At this point, I am not prepared to comment on anything that is either under investigation or before the courts.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question was simply one of asking what the government policy is, but obviously there is not any.

My supplementary question is directed to Minister of Transport.

We know that the government got its friends to do the dirty work in getting rid of 2,000 CN Route employees. We know that the government dealt directly with Manfred Ruhland. It is not good enough for the minister to try to wash his hands of this matter. When will the minister take his responsibility for the 2,000 jobs that he helped to destroy, and what is he going to do about it?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, earlier we had mention of the gentleman my hon. friends were complaining about yesterday, and today evidence was introduced using an affidavit by this same individual. I am not sure they are exactly certain in their own party as to where they stand with this individual.

Here is where CN stands with the employees. It stated: "We negotiated special agreements to help ease the impact on employees not required to operate the new company profitably. We have met every one of our commitments to employees, pensioners, customers, and communities, including the payment of $23 million for separation and related costs of former CN Route employees".

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, for five days, the 11 First Ministers have been meeting behind closed doors to try to find a solution to the constitutional impasse over the Meech Lake Accord. Given Canadians' great interest in this subject and the concern that still prevails, I wonder whether the Deputy Prime Minister could give the House an up-to-date report on the negotiations and perhaps also tell us a little about the issues that are now in dispute.

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, all I can say to my hon. friend and to the House is that the First Ministers are still meeting and working.

There is, I am told, step-by-step progress. There is a mood of co-operation and trust. However, there are a number of difficult issues that still remain unresolved. Consequently, there is not an agreement on a total package and, until such time as there is agreement on a total package, they will continue to meet.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I thank the Deputy Prime Minister for that answer.

I want to know if the government would commit today to tabling all the documents that were used or distributed by the federal government for the consideration of the federal-provincial conference as soon as the conference comes out of the meetings in secret and is made public? I would like to get a copy of these documents for the House.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that an exchange of various documents is taking place as a part of the discussions. Before I undertake to do that, obviously, it would require the consent of the First Ministers as well.

At this particular time, as long as progress is being made—and I know my hon. friend and his colleagues hope to see this evolve to a satisfactory conclusion—it is very important to let the process work. At the appropriate time, there would obviously be a desire on the part of everyone involved to ensure that the public is informed as fully as possible.

For the time being, I simply want to reiterate that, as long as discussions continue and as long as progress is being made, there is always a ray of hope.

ROUTE CANADA

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In addition to the revelation that Mr. Ruhland swore that the member for Vegreville, in his former capacity as Transport Minister, was among those who represented CN in the negotiations and sale of TRCI—

Mr. Mazankowski: That is nonsense!

Mr. Angus: He also went on to state:

> CN were aware of the real estate split (intended) prior to purchase and knew that other (split–offs) reorganization things would happen. They were party to the deeds being conveyed to the other companies. The deeds of various pieces of real estate.

Given those comments by one of the principals, will the minister now admit that the government, as the sole shareholder of CN, knew all along the plans that Ruhland had for the 2,400 employees of Route Canada? Will the government now take its moral, if not legal, responsibility and immediately announce an aid package that will give back to the workers the back pay, the vacation pay, the severance pay, and the pension moneys that are owed to them?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this is amusing. On the one hand, the Opposition has all sorts of allegations against an individual and, on the other hand, they quote him. They cannot have it both ways.

There is no question that CN, and no one else, decided to sell its subsidiary after discussions with more than 30 companies beginning in 1985. Our negotiations on the sale were held directly with David Fingold, representing himself and his brother Paul as principal purchasers. Their financial credentials were very solid. That is it. CN sold the assets.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I take it from the minister's answer, which did not deal with the specifics of my question, that one can only assume that the government was at the table and that the government and CN did know in advance that this particular company was going to carve off sections of land and assets in order to assist in the situation. The government knew what this company was going to do.

Will the minister indicate yes or no? Did the government know in advance that these folks were going to carve up CN Route and sell off its assets?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I dispute all of the assertions and allegations in my hon. friend's preamble. The answer is no.

AIDS

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. The minister will know that yesterday some 20 members of Parliament, as well as senators, issued a report entitled Confronting a Crisis, the Report of the Parliamentary Ad Hoc on AIDS.

I would like to ask the minister if he would concur with recommendation no. 1 which reads, and I quote:

> The Committee recommends that a Special Joint Committee of Parliament be established as soon as possible to study and make recommendations on all aspects of the AIDS epidemic in Canada.

Does the minister concur with that recommendation and, if so, when will he make that announcement to the House?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, it was at my initiative that the special ad hoc committee was formed. I was the one who encouraged the formation of that committee. I want to thank the members of that committee for the report which they released yesterday. It will be very helpful to us in the completion of our work on the national strategy.

There is already a House of Commons committee on health which gives members of Parliament the opportunity to raise all issues related to health, including AIDS, and the ad hoc committee itself provides a non-partisan forum for members of the House of Commons and of the Senate to look specifically at the issue of AIDS. We will be looking at all of the recommendations that have been made. I thank the members for their constructive suggestions and we will be responding when the national strategy is released on June 28.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to remind the minister that the members who participated in this ad hoc committee did so on a non-partisan basis and recommended that particular recommendation in a non-partisan way as well. I would hope that the minister would give serious reflection to that very important recommendation.

My second question for the minister has to do with the recommendation whereby "the Department of National Health and Welfare, in co-operation with the Correctional Service of Canada, immediately set up a pilot study—with appropriate ethical safeguards, to assess the level of HIV infection in federal prisons."

Could the minister indicate to the House what has transpired between his department and that of the Correctional Service in regard to the possibility of a pilot study in order to ascertain this much needed information?

• (1440)

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I can indicate to the hon. member that, both in terms of recommendation no. 1 and in terms of all 50 recommendations that are made there, the government will actively look at every recommendation that has been made. We will be responding in the form of the national strategy on June 28. Where there are recommendations that involve more than one department, I certainly will be discussing those recommendations with my colleagues on an active basis.

IMMIGRATION

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Earlier this week, the Conservative majority in the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration tabled a report recommending slower growth in Canadian immigration levels. Will the minister now reject this timid, pessimistic recommendation, and give us her position on this important matter?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the committee for its report and what has actually been a very interesting debate in the country over the last six months. We have engaged in a series of consultations across Canada about immigration levels and what they should be over the next five years, as well as the composition and services that should be provided within that context.

This is the first time in 15 years that there has been a national discussion of immigration and the committee's report has made an important contribution as well. I will be looking at it and the careful work that the committee has done, as well as the work from the other groups we have been discussing the issues with, when I discuss this with my cabinet colleagues.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, does the minister not know that our immigration levels were over 200,000 several times in the past, when our population and services were smaller, and that several experts before the committee demonstrated that immigrants create jobs, produce wealth, and pay substantial taxes? Why then is she supporting this retrograde recommendation?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that the hon. member consult with his colleague, the member for York West, who has thrown out all sorts of numbers on what immigration levels should be. In 1988 he talked about 150,000 to 170,000 and then he talked about 185,000. I would like to know where the opposition stands and what it thinks immigration levels should be, because it changes every month.

ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

The minister will know that in testimony before the standing committee both the Atomic Energy Control Board and the National Energy Board have confirmed that they will be doing EARP reviews of various projects within their respective jurisdictions. That includes everything from a possible new nuclear plant in New Brunswick to the northern gas pipeline, the Hibernia project, and others in the future.

The problem is that neither board has the ability to grant intervenor funding to those who otherwise would not be able to afford to appear before them in the environmental assessment review process.

When will intervener funding—in fact, will intervener funding—be put in place that these boards may disburse to allow those who do not possess louder voices to appear before them?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is correct when he says we have discussed this issue before the standing committee. I am sure that he would recognize, as all members of the House would recognize, that one cannot preclude what legislation and the form of legislation will take prior to its tabling.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, setting aside the question of legislation that may or may not be introduced in this House, will the minister undertake to guarantee the House now that no major EARP proceeding will go forward under either board without provisions for intervener funding in place?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member has made the representation. I say to him that when the Minister of the Environment tables the legislation, these questions can all be answered.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

For two years, you have been co-operating with the Federation of Canadian Municipalities on the GST to reach the Conservative government's goal of ensuring that municipalities will not have a bigger tax burden when the GST takes effect next January 1 than they already do.

Can the minister explain to Canadians today the major benefit that municipalities will derive from a 3 per cent GST?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I made a commitment a year ago that the GST would not be a bigger burden for municipalities, universities, schools and hospitals.

We reached an agreement with the municipalities for an effective sales tax rate of 3 per cent, as I announced last week. Therefore I have respected my commitment.

[English]

I have respected the commitment that I made. I believe that the municipalities are pleased that we have been able to reach this agreement. The fact is that we have a treatment for these institutions which we can follow with the hospitals, the universities and the schools so that they also will not have an increase in the federal sales tax that they will pay.

WHARFS AND HARBOURS

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. Dredgers and fishermen in Atlantic Canada are demanding that harbours be dredged. Fishing boats have run aground in several harbours creating dangerous situations. Also, dredgers have no employment.

Could the minister explain to the House why his department is stalling on the dredging issue and why dredging has not begun in most Atlantic harbours?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, all I can say to the hon. member is that as recently as a couple of weeks ago, I authorized a lot of contracts to be given for dredging in communities in all of Atlantic Canada. I suspect that if the hon. member wants to take the time to have a little ride in Atlantic Canada, he will see some dredging taking place.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, there are a lot of dredgers unemployed in Atlantic Canada.

My supplementary question regards the lack of wharf repairs. Many wharfs in Atlantic Canada are in serious need of repair. Last month, the wharf at Stanley Bridge, P.E.I. collapsed on the eve of the lobster fishing season.

I have made the minister aware of which wharfs are in the most urgent need of repair. Given these facts, will the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans act immediately to repair these wharfs?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I know there are requirements for wharf repairs in many of the communities in Atlantic Canada. We do not have the resources to do all of them. We are doing some of them, according to priorities established by Small Crafts and Harbours.

The hon. member could check with his colleague from Beauséjour. This member could tell him that imminently, probably next week, a lot of repairs will be taking place in his own riding. We can do some. We try to answer the priorities and we will continue doing that.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister responsible for the Status of Women. She has now had time to read the report on the crisis situation facing women who are living in poverty. Instead of cutting women's programs, could the minister tell the House what she intends to do now to help these women?

[English]

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, the report to which my hon. colleague refers was a background document for the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women.

I met with the council yesterday and we discussed the recommendations. As my colleague knows, they are very broad and cover many different aspects, some under provincial and some under federal jurisdiction. I have asked the council to advise me as to what the priorities should be, what should be the most important areas.

Also, I am pleased to advise my colleague that this government has already undertaken a variety of initiatives that are consistent with the recommendations of the report.

For example, my colleague the Minister of Employment and Immigration, is proposing to expand training funds by something in the order of $8 million, which will assist women to attain the training which is required to assist them out of poverty.

Along with a variety of other initiatives, this will ensure that we will continue the important trend we have seen since 1986, where we are reducing the number and the percentage of women who are living in poverty.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, if only the picture were so rosy for the 60 per cent of Canada's poor who happen to be female.

The minister and I both attended the Women in Power Conference in Montreal this week. The host country, Canada, allows the feminization of poverty and slashes the few programs that do assist women.

Will this minister fight for the recommendations made by the Advisory Council, specifically increased pay equity and more public sector jobs for women, or is she too as a woman simply powerless?

Hon. Mary Collins (Associate Minister of National Defence and Minister responsible for Status of Women): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised that my colleague would ask that question. I think the women in this House are, as are the women in Canada, full of power, energy and the improvement of our status throughout this country. The conference in Montreal was an interesting example.

My colleague also knows that it was this government that has provided the leadership on pay equity, that has in fact negotiated the first pay equity settlement for our own public servants. This is the kind of work that starts at home.

Last week, as I met with my provincial colleagues, the ministers responsible for the status of women, we reviewed the situation across the country. We have seen the good efforts that the province of Ontario has put forward. Many of the other provinces are considering similar kinds of approaches, as we move forward to a more comprehensive implementation of pay equity across this country.

DIEFENBAKER CENTRE

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister from Saskatchewan, the Minister of National Defence, and it concerns federal government funding for the Diefenbaker Centre at the University of Saskatchewan.

As we all know, this unique centre houses an invaluable resource covering Mr. Diefenbaker's tenure as Prime Minister of Canada, as well as much more. Two months ago, the minister was reported as saying that an announcement of federal funding would be ready within two weeks. As the minister knows, the federal funding support is not available—

Mr. McKnight: That was your announcement, that was not mine.

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): —if federal funding support is not forthcoming, the centre will close at the end of the month.

Can the minister advise this House whether it is his government's intention to save the Diefenbaker Centre and, if so, when and with how much money?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to see there is so much interest in preserving the memory of the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker, but I can assure the hon. member that the Department of Communications will take care of the situation.

[English]

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, as we all know, time is running out and the centre will close at the end of the month if money is not forthcoming. It is an important western institution, recognizing the achievements of an important western Canadian. It is time the Diefenbaker Centre and the University of Saskatchewan had the answer.

Can the minister not tell us, with three weeks left before the centre will close, when the centre will get an indication of how much money it will get, and would he commit himself to making sure that this happens right away?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the socialist member that this government will be far more zealous in preserving the memory of John Diefenbaker than the New Democratic Party ever was.

FISHERIES

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, I was delighted to hear that the Department of Fisheries is going to start major repairs in my riding, because we certainly need them.

The fact remains that lobster fishermen in my region, in the province of New Brunswick and throughout Atlantic Canada, are very disturbed about the negative decision by the free trade panel. How does the minister intend to compensate these fishermen for the $30 million they stand to lose as a result of U.S. protectionist measures?

The fishermen are very disturbed about this.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I realize fishermen are disturbed, in the present circumstances. However, we must admit that although people asked us literally to throw millions at problems when prices were lower, we now see the situation is improving and that prices are going up.

Concerning the decision of the free trade panel, as my colleague, the Minister for External Affairs said before, steps have been taken, and at the present time, the parties are trying to see whether a conclusion can be reached that will benefit both U.S. and Canadian lobster fishermen.

The process is continuing and we hope everything will turn out all right.

Mr. Fernand Robichaud (Beauséjour): Mr. Speaker, I hope means will be found to help the fishermen because they are in a very difficult situation.

With respect to marketing and promoting fish products, the staff at the Department of Fisheries and Oceans is now at its lowest level in years. Can the minister tell us whether he will hire more staff to deal with the marketing and promotion of fish products?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member would know that quite recently the government, with the co-operation of colleagues in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, has earmarked $2.4 million for marketing lobster products. For the first time my colleague the Minister for International Trade has launched very aggressive sales promotion campaigns on the European and Asian markets. Lobster fishermen can only benefit from all these measures— Mr. Speaker, the hon. member does not seem to agree with me, but I can tell him that a few months ago we had huge lobster stocks in the Atlantic region and, thanks to the promotion efforts of the federal government and the provinces of Prince Edward Island and New Brunswick, these stocks have been drastically reduced.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

This spring the minister said that it was too soon to set targets for reducing carbon dioxide emissions. However, this week the new Environment Minister said his government is committed to stabilizing carbon dioxide emissions at the present level by the year 2000.

I want to ask the minister whether he agrees with the Minister of the Environment.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of the Environment, along with a number of his colleagues, is having consultations with Canadians on The Green Plan. I have had the opportunity to be with him at a number of consultations. As we have announced before, the purpose of those consultations is to finalize what are the recommendations from the public. They will then be put together in a green plan, approved by Cabinet, and announced.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of the Environment said that the policy of the government was to stabilize carbon dioxide emissions by the year 2000.

I would like to know whether the Minister of Energy agrees with that statement, yes or no? If he does, when will he have a plan in place to meet the carbon dioxide emissions target?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to quibble with the hon. member. Just as a matter of detail, the hon. member mentions CO2. If she checks the statement, she will find that it was greenhouse gases rather than CO2 specifically that the minister mentioned. As to the timing and the announcements, I answered that in the first answer.

NORTHERN BENEFITS

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance, who eight months ago received the report of the task force on northern benefits and northern allowances. Hundreds, almost thousands of communities in northern Canada have been waiting in limbo for eight months for some idea as to what is happening to that northern allowance. I ask the Minister of Finance today: Is he prepared to reject the recommendations in that task force now, and is he prepared to announce a new program that provides fair and equitable tax treatment for those people in our communities?

• (1500)

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would like to call to the attention of the hon. member the fact that we did put in place a permanent regime as opposed to the very temporary regime that had been in place prior to our taking office in 1984.

There are some problems with the current regime, as my friend is only too aware, and it is for that reason we have asked the task force to consider these problems of the borderlines between communities that receive the northern benefit and those which do not receive the northern benefit. We are looking at the task force report. I have also asked for some considerations for some options that might be considered in order to meet the needs of the people in these communities. I have not completed that work but when I have completed it, I will make those views known.

Accordingly, I have addressed my warrant to the Chief Electoral Officer for the issue of a new Writ of Election for the electoral district.

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): As House Leader for the Official Opposition, I would like, like every Thursday, to ask the government house leader what will be the business of the House tomorrow and also next week, particularly Monday, Tuesday and Wednesday.

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow I intend to call Bill C-69, the expenditure restraint bill, to commence third reading and to continue with third reading on Monday, hopefully to completion. On Tuesday it would be my hope to call for report stage and third reading if possible of Bill C-52, Income Tax Act amendments respecting pensions. On Wednesday, June 13, I would hope that we would be able to consider three bills for which there is a fair amount of agreement and little contention, namely Bill C-54, joinder of counts; Bill C-66 animal diseases; and Bill C-67, dealing with plant pests.

In any event, I may require consent of the House to proceed with those if they are not back from committee to give the required notice to the House, but I will engage in discussions with the House leaders of the opposition parties on this issue.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could put a question to my hon. friend, the government House leader regarding Bill C-46. A lot of people are anxious to see the rapid passage of Bill C-46, that is the conflict of interest legislation. Has the hon. member decided when he is going to bring that forward?

Mr. Andre: No, a final decision on that has not yet been made but just as soon as it is, I will get back to my hon. friend.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, to follow up, one of the things that I know the government House leader is interested in is the obligation of the government to table its reports and papers on a speedy basis. The Treasury Board prepares this quarterly report to Parliament on those reports. I note from the most recent report that the Royal Canadian Mint has not yet tabled its 1990-94 corporate plan summary and its 1990 capital budget summary which were due on March 9 of this year.

I know that the government house leader is most interested in ensuring that these things are done on a timely basis and I wonder if he could let us know if he would look into the matter and have those documents put before Parliament promptly.

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I will do that in my own self-interest. The phone has been ringing off the hook by people demanding to see that report. I will get after the Minister of Supply and Services to make sure it is tabled as soon as possible.

Mr. Speaker: Members of this House will be interested to know that a former colleague of some of us and a former member of this place, Fred Stenson, died on June 5. Some members have requested the House to give tributes. I know the House would be in accordance with that. I call first the hon. member for Peterborough.

TRIBUTES

THE LATE FRED STENSON

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute today to the late Fred Stenson, who was a member of Parliament between 1962 and 1965. Fred represented the riding of Peterborough which I now have the honour to represent. Fred passed away this past Tuesday at the age of 75. His funeral service is being held today in Peterborough.

To my knowledge there are only two members left in the House today who were here when the Right Hon. John Diefenbaker was Prime Minister and when Fred Stenson was an MP. They are the member for Windsor West and the member for Saint-Denis. I am sure they both have very fond memories of Fred. I should also point out that the Hon. Stanley Knowles, now honorary clerk of the table, was also a member of the House during Mr. Stenson's term of office.

As reported in The Peterborough Examiner last night, Fred was often referred to as a doer. He was guided by the principle that instead of sitting around and talking about something, it is better to simply get up and do it. This philosophy was followed by Fred throughout his very distinguished career.

Prior to his election to Parliament in 1962, Fred served as trustee on the North Monaghan School Board. He then was elected to the North Monaghan Township Council for 10 years. He served as Reeve for four years and Deputy Reeve for two.

Fred Stenson was perhaps best known in the Peterborough area for his very successful farm. This love of the land remained with him after his election to the House where he maintained an acute interest in agricultural issues, working diligently to improve the plight of the farmers not only in his own constituency but in all parts of the country.

After his defeat in the election of 1965, a defeat that he took with distinction, Fred returned to his farm at which he worked tirelessly right up to the time of his death. It was also in this capacity, as an avid farmer, that you would see Fred every Saturday at the Peterborough Farmers' Market working at a very large fruit and vegetable stand. In fact, even last Saturday Fred was there at his usual spot doing what he loved best, keeping in touch with the people and listening to their concerns.

It would be there at the Farmers' Market that I would often run into Fred. I would occasionally get his assessment of what he saw as the important issues in the region. This ability to fully understand the Peterborough area right from the grassroots level and up was what made Fred Stenson truly unique.

For myself, stepping into Fred's shoes some years later, it was these qualities that made him such an invaluable source of help and guidance to me. I will miss him a great deal.

To his wife Bernice, their children, Sally, Robert and Arthur, his sisters, Beryl, Muriel and Norma and all of their families, on behalf of myself and all members of this House, I extend our deep and sincere condolences.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I was very sorry to learn that Fred Stenson had passed away. I recall him as a serious concerned individual, a person who built on his previous career as a school trustee, as a member of township council, as a Reeve, to provide an example of serious, solid public service.

Fred Stenson provides an example of the kind of serious, solid public service which has helped to build so many of our communities and our country at large. This example should be important to all of us and, therefore, I am pleased to pay tribute at this time to Fred and to his memory.

I would like to express my deep and sincere sympathy to his wife, his children and his entire family. I hope that the memories of Fred and his contributions to family life and his community will help them surmount the sadness they face at his passing.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I rise to pay tribute on behalf of my colleagues in the New Democratic Party to Mr. Fred Stenson.

While I was not a parliamentarian when Mr. Stenson served in a very distinguished way in this House, my friend and colleague, Mr. Stanley Knowles, the hon. clerk at the table, was.

Earlier today I spoke with Stanley about his recollections of Fred Stenson. Stanley remembers Fred as a respected colleague, a colleague who was admired by all and was a very likeable man. He was a grassroots politician. Stanley described him as a person who spent a lot of time serving his constituents well and with distinction.

He was a hard worker. Mr. Knowles indicated that in committee work, in the House, in his constituency and about the country, he worked hard and spent time on a one-to-one basis with people, serving them in that capacity as opposed to speaking in the House of Commons at length.

He was an active man, involved in politics at the local level, indeed at the federal level. He was a realtor, service station operator and, above all, he was a farmer. In that capacity, Mr. Knowles and Mr. Stenson spent many hours discussing ways and means of assisting the farmer and the farm community during his time as a member of Parliament.

He was very active in his community. As the present member for Peterborough has indicated, only this past weekend Mr. Stenson was working in his stall in a Peterborough market. People over the years always knew him to be there serving his constituency and representing the community.

On behalf of a former colleague, Mr. Knowles, and the New Democratic Party, I say to Mrs. Stenson, his family and friends, our hearts and thoughts are with you today.

Mr. William Scott (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am rising today to speak of the late Fred Stenson. I enjoyed the privilege of his company and his advice.

He was the first man to lead me through the House of Commons. He did so in a very capable manner. That was prior to the election of 1965, when I was a young aspiring candidate.

Fred had quite a reputation as a good community man. He was a man people trusted. He was a man well respected throughout the entire county of Peterborough. He was involved in civic politics also. He was a doer, not a taker. He was ready to help an individual anywhere in the country. This is what Fred leaves. He leaves a great legacy that some people will follow and for which Fred is respected.

I join with other members of the House of Commons here today in paying tribute to Fred Stenson. I want to offer my deepest condolence to his family, his good wife and his many associates in the city of Peterborough, and the county of Peterborough in which I live.

I have many present and past reflections of his community activities, his style of life and his belief in his country.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, I had the honour of being here when Mr. Fred Stenson was a member of the House and I think that the leader of the Opposition, my party leader, has ably put into words our feelings on this occasion. I join him in extending my sincere condolences to Mr. Stenson's family. I sat with the hon. member in this House and I can say that, like you and my two colleagues, we remember him very warmly.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a further petition against the goods and services tax.

It is interesting to note that I received this petition from one of the petitioners just a couple of weeks ago, an accountant in the town of Grand Forks.

It is clear from this petition that the people of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt are still diametrically opposed to the goods and services tax and ask the government to bring in a fairer tax system, fairer to all Canadians.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition signed by numerous residents of the province of Newfoundland: Dunfield, Bonaventure, Goose Cove, and Trinity. These persons are opposed to the government's proposed goods and services tax.

The petition was gathered by my hon. and gallant colleague from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception. I know he has expressed the views of his constituents as set out in this petition.

They object to this unfair tax. They are sick and tired of Tory taxes being imposed on them one after another. They call upon Parliament to reject this tax.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, I too rise today to submit a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, from a number of constituents in Ontario, and Ottawa particularly, who have expressed their opposition to the goods and services tax.

Canadians have not given up the fight against the goods and services tax. They have asked those of us on this side of the House of Commons to continue to voice our opposition to this tax in the hope that the government will come to its senses and withdraw the bill.

GUN CONTROL

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Madam Speaker, I rise to present a petition on behalf of more than 1,000 Canadians who have signed a petition urging Parliament and in particular calling on the government to bring forward tougher gun control legislation.

CANADA POST

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise under Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by hundreds of my constituents in the riding of Malpeque, Prince Edward Island.

Canada Post has plans to amalgamate several of the rural routes in the Kensington area. These constituents feel that it will lead to a delay in postal services of up to six hours for some people.

They call upon Parliament to resolve that Canada Post does not proceed with plans to amalgamate the rural routes but instead maintains the rural route system and upgrades postal service.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I rise pursuant to Standing Order 36. I have the duty and honour to present a petition from the constituents of my riding building on the numbers that were just put forward by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

I have 45 signatures here from the northern part of my riding: Templeman, Wesleyville, Pound Cove, and Newtown.

These petitioners are very concerned about the level of economic activity now existent in Newfoundland, the difficulty in the fisheries, and all the other dismal economic outlooks that have been put upon them. They have recently been given the benefit of a northern tax allowance change, and there is a recommendation that that be abolished as well.

They consider the goods and services tax a very definite hardship, and they are asking Parliament to reject this measure of the government.

LITHUANIA

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, it is my duty and honour to present further petitions signed by Canadians from Windsor through Hamilton to St. Catharines to Toronto regarding the issue in Lithuania.

The petitioners are very concerned that the Soviet Union has put an economic blockade around Lithuania, cutting off fuel to the country and cutting off even basic medical supplies.

• (1520)

Yesterday we hosted a delegation from the Soviet Union. We appealed to them yesterday. I appeal to them today while they are still in our country that when they return to the Soviet Union they sit down with officials from Lithuania and negotiate a resolution so that all three Baltic States can work and trade on a friendly basis with the Soviet Union as they want to do, but they want to do it as individual, independent states.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, I have the duty to table a petition again today of more Canadians joining millions of others in protesting the planned imposition by this government of a 7 per cent sales tax on goods and services starting in January 1991.

These people—and there are hundreds in this petition—claim this tax will be hidden from Canadians, that it will impose upon them a serious and unfair hardship, and that the imposition of the tax will create onerous burdens for small business.

They believe this to be the biggest unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians in the history of Canada which will hit Canadians not only with higher taxes and higher inflation but higher interest rates and higher unemployment. They pray that this Parliament refuse to go ahead with this initiative.

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is my honour to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 on behalf of a number of constituents from Kamloops, British Columbia, who point out their concern in terms of the increasing number of children living in poverty in Canada.

They are calling upon the Government of Canada to introduce a comprehensive bill of rights for children in an effort to remove child poverty from this country.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I rise on behalf of a number of residents from the constituency of Kamloops who point out their concern regarding the government's decision to cut back on passenger rail service.

They are asking the government to invest in a modern, first-class transportation rail system to move passengers across Canada like every other country in the world is now doing.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, they do not give up, these petitioners. Nearly 21,000 petitioners from Kamloops alone are opposed to the goods and services tax. That is about one-third of the population.

If they were here they would ask the Liberals in the Senate to do the honourable thing and defeat the bill in the Senate. I think they have given up on the government in terms of stopping legislation, so their appeal goes to the Liberal dominated Senate.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I too am pleased to join with the hon. member for Kamloops and indeed with so many of our Liberal colleagues this afternoon in rising to present a petition. This one is signed by a number of residents of the city of Ottawa and its environs.

They humbly pray that Parliament reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax.

I would note that Parliament includes the Senate where the Liberals do enjoy a majority. I would, on behalf of these petitioners, entreat the Liberals to put their Senate majority where their mouth is and kill the GST.

Mr. Alex Kindy (Calgary Northeast): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the privilege to present a petition, certified correct by the clerk of petitions, from 28,133 Calgarians and Albertans who feel that the GST is regressive, will hamper the competitiveness of the Canadian economy, and reduce the standard of living of the average Canadian.

These 28,000 signatures have been collected by a great Canadian, Mr. George Deveau from Calgary. Mr. Deveau and the petitioners feel that the government should withdraw this unfair form of taxation immediately.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, question No. 291 will be answered today.

[Text]

POSTAL AREA OF ORANGEDALE, NOVA SCOTIA

Question No. 291—Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso):

For the postal area of Orangedale, Nova Scotia, (a) what were the total operating costs of the Post Office for each of the fiscal years from 1987 to 1989 (b) how does Canada Post arrive at the value of contracts for retail postal outlets which replace existing post offices? (c) what is the negotiation process involved in awarding such contracts and in particular the retail postal outlet in Orangedale (d) what were the amounts offered to local stores to act as retail postal outlets (e) what would be the cost of Rural Route delivery?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): I am informed by Canada Post Corporation as follows:

a) The revenues and operating costs of individual post offices are not made public by Canada Post Corporation.

b) The value of contracts for retail postal outlets is based on actual work performed. Individual details are a private contractual relationship which are not disclosed by Canada Post Corporation. Remuneration is on a gross margin and fee–for–service basis.

c) Canada Post discusses the service requirements and remuneration (as in (b) above) with interested businesses and evaluates all applications received. Canada Post does not negotiate between businesses with regard to remuneration. Service, security and credit considerations dictate the successful applicant. At this time, Canada Post has not secured a retail postal outlet in Orangedale.

d) The contractual arrangement between Canada Post Corporation and local businesses is a private business relationship and the values of such contracts are not made public.

e) Rural route delivery is provided by a contractor. The value of this contract, as any other, is not made public.

The value of a rural contract is determined by the tender process, and the value will ultimately be determined by the number of customers served and the distances travelled. Contract values are not made public.

[English]

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I ask that the remaining questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The question mentioned by the hon. parliamentary secretary has been answered. Shall the remaining questions be allowed to stand?

HIBERNIA DEVELOPMENT PROJECT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Friday, February 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. Epp that Bill C–44, An Act respecting the Hibernia Development Project and to amend certain Acts in relation thereto, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee; and the amendment of Mr. Barrett (p. 8146).

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to have the opportunity to speak for a few minutes on the bill before the House today. It is a very important piece of legislation for the province of Newfoundland and Labrador and as a matter of fact for Atlantic Canada and for the country as a whole because it will have substantial economic benefits not just for eastern Canada but across the country, including the great province of Alberta and the provinces of Ontario and Quebec as well.

Of course the legislation deals with the Hibernia project. I believe in 1979 the consortium led by a Mobile Oil and the others who participate in it—Chevron, Gulf Canada and Petro–Canada— discovered oil off the east coast of the Avalon Peninsula in Newfoundland in what is known as the Hibernia fields. It is now 11 years later, Madam Speaker, so you can see how difficult it has been to resolve all the issues involved in bringing this oilfield into production. It has taken 11 years to get the project to this stage.

It is a massive project. It is a project that is taking place physically in an area—I have not had a chance to research all the statistics for this occasion because we have been busy in other directions—something like 170 miles off the shores of Newfoundland in an area that is frequently ice traversed, particularly during the winter and spring and where there are many problems to be faced and overcome in preparing to develop and take out the oil which lies beneath the surface of the land and sea in that particular area.

In 1985 there was finally a breakthrough with respect to jurisdiction over the offshore oil and gas resources that lay off Newfoundland and Labrador. That was a matter that was in dispute for a period of three or four years. It was settled by the government of which I am a member. I am very delighted and proud to have been a member and to be a member of the government that solved the conundrum and entered into an agreement with the province of Newfoundland and Labrador to provide for a fair way of managing this resource in which both the province and the Government of Canada would share.

That agreement known as the Atlantic Accord is being carried into effect by the legislation before the House today. From the summer of 1985 it took a further three years to July 1988 for all the detailed negotiations to be completed among the Government of Canada, the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador, Mobil, and the Mobil consortium. The consortium that is going to develop and produce the oil of the Hibernia field is headed by Mobil Oil of Canada, and I think I have named the other parties involved in the consortium already. It took three years of hard negotiations to bring the project to the stage where all the issues were resolved with respect to agreement in principle. That was completed and announced in July 1988.

However, the completion of the final legal agreements necessary for this project took longer than expected. It was hoped it would be only a year, but rather than the project going forward in its final form in 1989, it is now our hope and our objective that the project will get its final approval in the summer of 1990. I want to thank and congratulate the present Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources and his two predecessors for their work in bringing the project forward to this stage.

We have heard much in this House this year about the economic difficulties suffered by the people of the province of Newfoundland and Labrador, particularly those who are connected with or associated with the fishery. We have heard considerable discussion both in this House and in the province of Newfoundland on the need for economic diversification in Newfoundland.

We have had an extensive regional development program in effect in Newfoundland for many years, including an accelerated program under the aegis of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency which has been operating for the last two or three years, and I think quite successfully.

However, it does not matter what financial assistance is made available, it is a very difficult matter to diversify economically the province beyond the natural resources of the province, its advantages of location or what have you. These resources in Newfoundland, the fishery, the minerals and the forests have been developed. What further are we going to diversify in? If there are problems in the fishery and we have to diversify so plant workers and those who are now fishing may have other economic opportunities, what are they going to be?

I have been in politics or public life for the last 25 years. My conclusion is this. There is no opportunity for any great economic diversification in the province of Newfoundland and Labrador that is not associated in some way with the sea; either what is in the sea, what goes on the sea, or what lies under the sea, as well as with our geographic location and the other natural resources that I have mentioned.

Our only major opportunity for economic diversification other than what already exists in Newfoundland lies with this offshore mineral potential, not just the Hibernia field but with the Terra Nova field and other fields that have already been identified and that will be developed once Hibernia is under way.

Since 1979, we have developed a number of high-tech industries in Newfoundland. These are companies which over the last several years have been just clinging on. Some are successful doing work in other parts of the world. There is a whole series of high-tech companies and persons now in Newfoundland, particularly located in eastern Newfoundland, who are ready to exploit the opportunities of the offshore once Hibernia starts and they are very anxious to see this project going forward.

I am very pleased to support this bill because I think that anyone who appreciates the need for economic diversification or other economic alternatives for the working man and woman of Newfoundland and Labrador will realize that this is the only real alternative that presents itself.

This is a project that is receiving very considerable economic assistance from the Government of Canada. If Newfoundland was not part of the great Dominion of Canada, as it used to be called, I do not know where the necessary assistance would come from to see that this project was developed. I think that is something the people of Newfoundland and Labrador might well keep in mind at the present time.

I have not had a chance to refresh my memory today as to all of the means of assistance of the Government of Canada on this project, but I believe that our basic assistance is $2.7 billion which the Government of Canada is providing by way of grant or by way of guarantees of loans for this project. While I cannot guarantee these figures, the Hibernia project itself is going to require a cost, roughly, before it comes into production, of $5.1 billion.

So the investors in this project are going to have to put in $5.1 billion before they have an opportunity to receive one cent of return on their investment. The total capital investment will be $8.6 billion before the Hibernia field is completely developed and the oil removed. The operating costs during that same period will be another $12 billion.

These figures may be outdated, but the positive estimate of the contents of the field are 680 million barrels. The minister indicates that has since gone up with a probability of 890 million barrels. The minister can bring these figures up to date as there may have been improvement.

There has been some degree of cynicism in Newfoundland and Labrador as to whether this project was ever going to go. This is not unexpected when one remembers that the Hibernia was first discovered in 1979. Nevertheless, since 1984 when the present administration headed by the Prime Minister took over, there has been steady progress. It is not a question of there being just promises, there has been considerable performance.

I would just like to mention in that connection the fact that in 1985 Canada and Newfoundland agreed that there should be a Canada–Newfoundland offshore development fund to help Newfoundland and Labrador get ready for the development of Hibernia. That was a $300 million fund, 75 per cent being put up by the Government of Canada and 25 per cent by the Government of Newfoundland.

As of the end of last January that fund had been used for a great many projects. It was used to prepare the province and the people for the project to go ahead so that they could take the maximum advantage of it when it started. To date, the projects approved in principle amount to $132,601,000, with total costs of projects approved and approved in principle to date of $236,625,000. A great deal of that money has already been spent.

Hibernia is not merely a promise repeated by politicians. Hibernia is already performance. From that fund we have constructed the Centre for Earth Resources Research at Memorial University in Newfoundland, $27,100,000; an offshore survival centre, $5,000,000; skills training projects, $3,000,000; computer aided design facility in engineering, $1,150,000; the centre for Cold Ocean Resources Engineering, $5,000,000; the Centre for Excellence in Marine Signal Processing, $7,400,000.

These are not projects for creating temporary jobs. These are all devoted to the long–term training of the people of Newfoundland and Labrador, the young people who will be trained in these kinds of facilities.

Other projects include the Offshore Technology Transfer Opportunities Program, $3,000,000; Petroleum Technology Training Programs, $21,100,000; access road to the Cow Head Oil Rig Repair Facility in Placentia Bay, $614,000; the Institute for Marine Dynamics and the new wave generator, owned by the Government of Canada in St. John's, $3,500,000; the Marine Offshore Simulator Training Centre, $12,818,000. On and on it goes, moneys expended from this fund, provided principally by the Government of Canada with a substantial contribution by the Government of Newfoundland.

Approved in principle is $34,500,000 to enhance the offshore fabrication capability of Marystown shipyard, the great Newfoundland shipyard in Placentia Bay. The sum of $95 million is being committed to the construction of the gravity–based structure and the main support frame facility for Hibernia. This is $95 million to ensure that the gravity–based structure, along with other facilities, the main support frame facilities, the top–side facilities and the like can be constructed in Newfoundland. As a matter of fact the main site is going to be at Bull Arm in Trinity Bay in the district of the hon. member sitting opposite, Bonavista—Trinity—Conception. It is just a mile or two from the great district of St.

This is going to be a great shot in the hon. gentleman's Bull Arm. It will be a great employment generator in the area of Placentia Bay and the district of St. John's West, in fact in all of eastern Newfoundland, and I hope in all of Newfoundland, Quebec, Ontario, and Alberta, which will be the other main centre.

We are dealing with a project that is imperial in size and concept, difficult to carry out and execute. But I think that Mobil and its associated companies have the people who can pull off this construction feat and get this field going. But they cannot do it, because of the frontier conditions under which he project must go ahead, without the assistance of the people of Canada, through the Government of Canada, with the $2.7 billion and other means as described in the bill that is now before the House.

There was a change of government in Newfoundland a year ago last April and former Premier Peckford was associated with the great battle to ensure that Newfoundland had at least joint management of this offshore resource. Mr. Peckford did not run in the last election and was succeeded by Premier Wells who led the Liberal Party to victory in April, 1989. Mr. Wells is in the capital today in connection with the Meech Lake Constitutional Conference.

Premier Wells said, and I really do not think he can be serious, but he did say publicly several times that this project was the equivalent of two fish plants being established in Newfoundland. That misses the point entirely.

I do not have the exact employment creation figures but I believe that during construction there will be approximately 35,000 jobs connected with the project. Once it is finished and the field is producing, direct employment will be in the area of 1,100.

That, of course, is directly on the project, but there will be dozens upon dozens and hundreds and thousands of Newfoundlanders employed in companies servicing the development and servicing further developments that will come once Hibernia is established. A lot of those jobs will be high tech, very skilled jobs, just as they have been from the beginning.

We have dozens and dozens of entrepreneurs in Newfoundland who have prepared themselves, many of them with the help of government, for the opportunities that will come with this development.

This is a development not just in the economic interests of Newfoundland and Labrador, or the other parts of the country I have mentioned. It is a project in the national interest because it is in the national interest to overcome regional disparity in Newfoundland. If this project did nothing else, if it only assisted Newfoundland in overcoming regional economic disparity, it would be justified on that basis alone. But it is justified as well in developing a frontier offshore oil resource that Canada is going to need in the future as our on-land and more easily accessible oil and gas resources are steadily used up.

It is in the national interest that this development should go forward. It is certainly in the interest of overcoming regional disparity and of advancing regional economic equality in Canada that this project go forward.

Where are we at the moment? We are completing negotiations with the Government of Newfoundland and with the Mobil consortium as to what proportion of this great project must be carried out, from the benefits point of view, in the province of Newfoundland and Labrador; what must be carried out in the nation of Canada; just what these benefits are; and, how the benefits are going to be distributed in that manner. I think we are at the end of that process. Good progress has been made. We have to go on to see. There has to be a test on the market to see whether a lender risk-sharing arrangement is viable when it comes to financing and issuing the bonds that will be required to finance the project, from time to time, as it is under way over the next few years. I believe 1996 is the year in which it is expected that production of oil from the field would start.

Those negotiations are now approaching their end. There seems to be no reason why we cannot conclude all this during the coming summer, in the next month or two. All the final documents could be signed in time for this year not to be slipped when it comes to the project being accomplished.

However, for that to be the case, the Parliament of Canada has to enact this bill before we adjourn for the summer. I am hoping, and I have no reason to doubt, that we will have co-operation from the other parties in the House so that this can be accomplished. If Parliament does not enact this legislation before we rise, during the month of June, then of course we will not be back until September and there would be real doubt as to whether or not a year would be lost with reference to the Hibernia project and the project, itself, could be in some jeopardy as a result.

Therefore, I would like to ask fellow members of the House to deal with this bill as expeditiously as they think possible, keeping in mind that there is this urgency. If we hope to complete all of the documents this summer and not to lose this year, it is important for the House to deal with this bill which was introduced last November. It is not something that we are just introducing at a late date. It has been debated at second reading on December 18 and on February 9.

I do not want to take up any more of the time of the House, except to say that I am honoured that I am still in the House of Commons when this legislation goes through the House. I have supported this project since 1979. I did all I could to assist Mr. Peckford in his struggle to acquire some rights over the offshore oil and gas resources. It was a monumental struggle that he was engaged in with the government that preceded us. I intend to do what I can to work with Premier Wells to ensure that the project goes forward now because the province and the federal government have to work together for that purpose.

In closing, I want to thank the hon. minister for the fine work he has done in this connection. I hope that members of the House will co-operate with us in seeing that we do all that is necessary before we adjourn for the summer.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I listened with interest to the hon. minister's presentation and noted particularly his appeal for rapid consideration of the legislation.

I find it rather odd, when we have had a gestation period now of nearly nine months since this bill was first introduced. Nine months have transpired and nothing has happened. Nine months later, at the eleventh hour, the minister stands up and says that he hopes that, now that we have sat on this for nine months, the House of Commons can set everything else aside and expeditiously deal with this one piece of legislation. I just say we will do our best. Of course, we always do. We will work as hard as we can.

I just find it odd, I must say to the minister with all due respect, and I mean that with all sincerity, that after having a piece of legislation sitting on his desk for nine months, suddenly he wants to move it in a matter of hours.

As the minister has said, it was introduced in December. Why was it not introduced again? It is the government that decides what we do in here, not the opposition. It is not the Official Opposition and not the New Democratic Party. It is the government that decides the business of the day. It has not called this business of the day for month after month after month—for nine months.

I ask my hon. friend, the minister, with all due respect, that, if this is so urgent, if this was such a high priority for the government and if this was such an important matter, why is it introduced on the day that Premier Wells is encouraged to make a decision at the First Ministers' Conference? I realize there is no association, of course. Why has the minister taken nine months to begin serious debate on this important legislation?

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, the hon. gentleman is suggesting, of course, that the House has not been doing anything since December or February. As far as I know, the House has had important legislation before it the whole time.

He asks why this has not been brought forward. The last time it was brought forward, the House was in the mood to pass it with the exception of a few members who did not want to see it passed on that particular occasion. I have forgotten the date.

An Hon. Member: It was the member from Juan de Fuca.

Mr. Crosbie: It was the member for Juan de Fuca. One could easily be accused of profanity when one mentions his district. He did not want it to go through at that particular time.

I do not want to be bellicose today. I cannot avoid being "belly-cose", but I do not want to be bellicose today. I want to be in the mood of sweet reasonableness and simply say that this is not connected, of course, with anything that is going on in Ottawa today.

If the hon. member knew Premier Wells, he would know that it would be a wrong tactic to try either to encourage or discourage him. He told me that the Constitution was for 1,000 years. Hibernia is not for 1,000, it is only going to be for 20 or 25. He has a long-term view of the Constitution. Frankly, I think that Meech Lake will be forgotten long before Hibernia is. However, that remains to be seen.

The legislation that the province is required to pass is being debated in the Newfoundland House of Assembly now. I think the timing is right in both Houses. My hon. friend from British Columbia happens to be lucky enough to live in one of the booming parts of the country. Of course, they have had good government there for a number of years—

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I want to correct the hon. minister. I think he has his politics wrong. The Social Credit Party has been in office in British Columbia for the past few years.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, on this same matter, I took the minister to imply that the government's hands would be tied in proceeding with further negotiation as required, or even with the disbursement of certain funds relating to the project, if this bill did not make it out of the Commons today or before the summer adjournment.

I am a little puzzled. If this is, indeed, his contention, would he be so kind as to inform the Minister of Finance of these requirements so that the Minister of Finance may stop securing rented accommodation, hiring staff, and renting and purchasing machinery and equipment for the purpose of implementing the GST, which, as we all know, has not yet cleared this Parliament?

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, with respect to the Hibernia project, this legislation authorizes the government to do certain things which it cannot do unless the House of Commons approves the legislation. Unless I am advised mistakenly, the government cannot sign the final agreements or execute final agreements without the legislation being passed first.

With respect to the offshore development fund, the spending from it has been approved from year to year in the Estimates and the budget.

With respect to signing and executing agreements, giving guarantees, and doing what the government agreed to do in July, 1988, we need the approval of the House. That is why it is important. If the legislation is not passed before we adjourn, then we will not be able to do anything until next fall and a year will slip from the construction schedule.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso—Scotia Synfuels Project; the hon. member for Chambly—Riding of Laurier—Sainte-Marie; and the hon. member for The Battlefords—Meadow Lake—Canada Post.

Resuming debate. The hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception.

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Madam Speaker, I would like to begin by congratulating my colleague from Newfoundland, the hon. Minister of International Trade, on the history and background of this project that is so important to Canada, to Atlantic Canada, and, in particular, to Newfoundland.

This project is about jobs, technology, and energy. As far as Newfoundland is concerned, it is about hope. Where hope is involved, I am not interested in being bellicose or in laying blame. I am not interested in political rhetoric. I am interested in getting this bill through the House of Commons so we can get on with this hope and make the hope a realistic thing, as opposed to the hope that it has been for almost 20 years now.

In as brief a time as possible, I would just like to recapture some of the background to demonstrate the tortuous history that this project has had. One may consider it a relatively short time, but if one is looking at it as an item of hope, it has been fairly tortuous.

The field itself is located 315 kilometres southeast of St. John's. The oilfield covers about 20,000 acres and the last capacity I saw was in the range of 600 to 900 million barrels. When capacity production starts, this amounts to roughly 100 million barrels, but the daily production would be somewhere in the vicinity of 120 million barrels a day.

An Hon. Member: That is impossible.

Mr. Mifflin: One hundred and twenty million barrels a day?

An Hon. Member: One hundred and twenty thousand barrels a day.

Mr. Mifflin: One hundred and twenty thousand barrels a day. One of the things we are really concerned about is the total capacity.

As far as the hope is concerned, I would like to translate this into jobs and what it means to Atlantic Canada, indeed to the whole of Canada.

In fact, the exploration activities took place as far back as 1971, but there were really no successes until Hibernia was discovered. The exploratory drilling began in May of 1979, and it was by Chevron Standard in partnership with Mobil, Gulf, then Petro-Canada and Columbia.

In August of the same year, oil was discovered and a series of evaluation wells were drilled between then and 1984. From 1985 to July of 1988, a series of project-owner cost estimates, government proposals and tax reforms were exchanged between the parties. Then on the magic of July 18, 1988, a series of project-owner cost estimates and a series of statements of principles were discussed and signed in St. John's, Newfoundland by Prime Minister Mulroney and the then Premier of Newfoundland, Premier Peckford, together with the Government of Canada, the Province of Newfoundland and Labrador, Chevron Canada Resources, Columbia Gas Development, Gulf Canada, Mobil Oil and Petro-Canada. These were the organizations involved in the initial findings.

I recall that day. I was in St. John's and I believe the hon. minister was there as well. It was a day of jubilation across all sectors of Newfoundland. It cut across party politics, it cut across everything. It was a day of rejoicing for Newfoundland because the crisis in the fishery had arrived and as we are all aware in this House, it has got considerably worse since then. We felt that things were going to get better.

In the words of Premier Peckford at the time—and it may have been overstated—it was an indication of the way Newfoundland felt about this. He talked about the sun shining and "have-not will be no more". That was based on something tangible happening on March 31 of the next year, 1989. March 31 came, and for reasons that I think are well known by the House, to our great disappointment, the agreement could not be signed.

We are looking at a delay of a year and a bit. During this time, we have had considerable discussion in this House. If my figures serve me right, the first reading took place on November 7. Some discussion went on over those days. The second reading took place on February 9. That is roughly four months ago. And we had some discussion just before we closed at Christmas time.

The purpose of the bill is to give the federal government the statutory authority to enter into a legally binding agreement based on the statement of principles put together in July of 1988 and subsequently negotiated between the Government of Canada, the Government of Newfoundland and the Hibernia project owners. Essentially, the bill will allow the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources, with the approval of the Governor-in-Council, to enter into one or more agreements on behalf of the federal Crown in respect of the development project itself.

I think it is safe to say that the reserves of oil are not truly known. The main concern of all of us in the House is employment benefits. The construction phase will take about five or six years. It is estimated that the field will last around 20 years. During the construction phase of the projects, the partners targeted 14,500 person-years of direct Canadian employment and 32,600 person-years of indirect Canadian employment. I stress if my constituents are watching this, it talks about 14,500 for direct Canadian employment. That does not necessarily mean it will all be in Newfoundland, although we certainly hope that the majority of it will be.

Specifically, after the construction phase, the targeted Canadian employment figures—if the ones that I have are not right I know the Minister of Energy Mines and Resources will correct me—we are looking at are 1,100 direct person-years, that is those directly employed with the production and 2,450 indirect person-years. That is wild compared to the opportunities for employment that one has right now in Newfoundland and in Atlantic Canada.

With respect to the construction stage, as I understand it, the winning bidder would be able to construct a community near Come-By-Chance, as the hon. minister said, in Bull Arm. Specifically, I think it is called Mosquito Cove. They would construct a community in this area for about 2,000 employees, would pour the 500,000 tonne base, join it with the topsides and then would tow the 1.5 billion tonne gravity based structure out to its spot out in the area where it would begin production, which is roughly 315 kilometres off Newfoundland.

I recall we had an enthusiastic and a very hopeful discussion here on February 9. I spoke to the main bill on second reading and my feeling was that we were within days of having this thing go through. In fact we were making some arrangements with the House leaders for the next week. All of a sudden we hit a little bit of a snag and there were some concerns. Whether the concerns are legitimate or not, I would like to speak to that later on. However, I was disappointed and, quite frankly, I have had a bit of a rough ride from my constituents when I go back home because they wondered what was the House of Commons doing to prevent this from going forward.

We have had enough obstacles in the way. Again I promise, and I am going to stick to that promise, that this is not a time for political rhetoric. This is a time to get on with doing something for a region of our country which is badly in need and needs this particular project. I think we should look at the positive side, while still being concerned about those aspects that have been raised by a number of my friends on the left.

Newfoundland takes its resources from the sea and whether it is fish, or whether it is oil, or whether it is the tourist attraction of the beautiful bays and villages around the area. That is what we have in Newfoundland and Labrador, and in other parts of Atlantic Canada. It is not surprising that there should be concern about the environment, and it is really this concern that is the source of the amendments that have been put forward today.

One of my party's policies is to use energy in the most environmentally responsible way. Indeed, it is my understanding that after we get through with this business and we get approval, that the revised project, scaled down from the 17 to the four or five modules that have been the result of a scrubbing down to reduce the cost of this project, is going to be submitted to the Canadian Newfoundland Offshore Petroleum Board for approval, along with the plans for the eventual abandonment of the Gravity Bay structure. When the production is completed, we will have to win environmental approval again before Ottawa makes a decision on this. My understanding is that this environmental decision will be made by an intergovernmental body involving the Department of the Environment, the Canadian Coast Guard and Canada Oil and Gas Lands Administration.

I would suggest that when Hibernia gets that far down the pike we will have a number of options at which we can look. We could dismantle the topside and leave the structure manned. Perhaps by that time we will have found some other use for it. It would provide a structure for search and rescue, which is badly needed in that area of Newfoundland. We could take the structure down approximately 180 feet so that the largest vessel could navigate safely, or we could take the structure completely out of the ocean floor and either dismantle it or find some other use for it.

If this bill passes second reading and goes to committee, it is important that the committee concern itself with these particular concerns that have been raised by the NDP. Hopefully, we will not only be able to get this approved, but I am hoping that we can get it through committee and back for third reading before the House adjourns for the summer. Quite frankly, I do not think we can afford to wait another three months.

We have been working on this very assiduously and we have had some difficulty in getting the thing under way. Now we have reached the point where we can get something done. I would find it very difficult to support any impediments to this bill.

In the short time that I have been in this House there are many issues that have divided us. Heaven knows, we have seen so many of them here in the House. There is a place for partisanship, a time for political rhetoric, a time for being, perhaps, politically different from each other. However, I think this is one of the few issues that I have seen since I have been here where not only are members anxious to approve this project but to go on record as having had their names behind approving this project. Everyone wants to get on with fuelling the hope of those people who are counting the days, in fact counting the moments, when some announcement of substance can be made and we can get on with tapping the vast reserves, and translate this into jobs, into the economy and into a working production.

Then we, in Canada, will not only be able to secure a sounder energy foundation and not have to worry about importing foreign oil, while at the same time being environmentally conscious. This will ensure the economic diversification that we have been groping for in Newfoundland since 1947. This is one of the hopes that we have. I am going to call on all members to put aside partisanship and, perhaps, the minor concerns that they might have so that this bill is approved and passes third reading before the House closes for the summer.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to make a comment or two, if I might, to the Minister for International Trade and to the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception. Let me thank both of them for the comments which they have made today.

It is not my purpose to take the time of the House, but I think possibly it is important that I just put some figures on the record so that people in the oil industry and, more importantly, the people of Newfoundland and Labrador have the latest play. If that is acceptable, I will use this opportunity to do so.

First of all, in terms of the number of barrels in the Hibernia field, members have been putting certain figures on the record and none of them are wrong because all of them have been in the public domain at one time or another. The best seismology work and information that we can put to that question is that existing reserves of Hibernia are in the range of 525 to 650 million barrels. I appreciate that while the science is specific, until one gets into the work, the actual results are subject to a fair bit of verification and one can only do that when the work is being done. The low estimate is in the order of 725 million barrels and the high estimate is one billion barrels-plus. Possibly that answers it just in quick form.

Additionally, what should be recognized is that this is light and medium crude. As our light crude, especially in the western sedimentary basin, starts declining, as it has already, there is also an additional advantage in terms of mix of crude for Canada.

The last point that I want to make is that in terms of the project now contemplated, we are looking to produce an average of 110,000 barrels of oil per day with a maximum production capacity of 150,000 barrels per day.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I was wondering if perhaps the Chair, the minister, and indeed, the House, might agree to allow questions of the minister, being that the minister has just participated in the debate.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I do not have unanimous consent. The hon. minister has used the period for questions and comments following the speech by the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception to add a few things to the record. The hon. House leader.

Mr. Andre: Madam Speaker, I understand the member for Edmonton East is going to be speaking next and if he has questions to put, the minister will be delighted, I am sure, to try to answer them at the end of that period.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Further questions or comments. Debate. The hon. member for Edmonton East.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, in rising to participate in the debate today, I would like to note that what we are debating is the reasoned amendment proposed by my colleague, the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, which would have the effect of rejecting this bill for the three reasons stated. First, granting a project more than $1 billion without securing an equivalent equity in the project for the people of Canada is wrong in principle. Second, the bill fails to contain specific provisions which provide environmental protection measures in connection with the project. Third, the bill fails to contain specific provisions which provide for the creation of job opportunities in relation to the project.

These are very large topics that the reasoned amendment addresses and, in consequence, we will be dealing with each in turn through three speakers this afternoon.

I would like at the outset to make it very clear that the New Democratic Party caucus in this House opposes Bill C-44 for those reasons. We do not oppose the Hibernia project per se.

If I may draw the analogy, Madam Speaker, it may be a very good thing to have a hospital constructed in your community. Presumably everyone in your community, if there is not one there now, would be very much in favour of having a hospital constructed there.

However, if the government that proposes to build the hospital proposes to do so with straw and plasticine, your constituents are not going to be terribly thrilled at the prospect. Although the project itself may be praiseworthy and commendable and certainly worthy of public support, the form and nature that that public support takes, as well as the consequences of the form and nature of that public support, are very much a matter of attention for this House.

If the form of that support is inappropriate or inadequate, then it is the business of this House to defeat it until such time as more proper form and content are brought forward.

For these very good reasons we oppose this bill. We do not oppose job creation. On the contrary, we want jobs in Atlantic Canada. That is why we oppose the government's cuts in transfer payments. That is why we oppose the reduction in important government services in the Atlantic. That is why we oppose the government's cuts to UI. And that is why we oppose the continued mismanagement of the Atlantic fishery.

We New Democrats believe that it is vitally important to create as many jobs as possible with the money available. However, before I consider the subject of job creation in greater detail, I would like to touch on the historic background of this project and very briefly on the specific contents of this bill. Given time limitations, I will have to leave the other important subjects of economic development and environmental considerations to two of my colleagues who will be speaking a little later this afternoon.

The history of the Hibernia project has been a dizzying roller-coaster of rays of expectations and dashed hopes. When the first major oil discovery was made on the Grand Banks in 1979, the expectation was that Newfoundland would blossom to become the Norway of North America. Unfortunately, the first estimates of the amount of oil in the field were soon proved to have been much too high.

In 1979, it was estimated that Hibernia contained about 1.8 billion barrels of oil. In 1985, this estimate was halved. The field was estimated to contain, as the hon. minister noted, between 800 million and 900 million barrels in all likelihood.

The estimate on the most recent Hibernia background papers is down to just 525 million to 650 million barrels. The estimates and the benefits from the project that would be enjoyed by Newfoundlanders have similarly declined steadily. Initially, many Newfoundlanders believed that the province owned this offshore resource and that it could be used mainly to provide much needed jobs and to boost the Newfoundland economy.

This hope of exclusive provincial ownership and control was dashed by the rulings of the Supreme Court of Newfoundland and the Supreme Court of Canada in 1983 and 1984 respectively, rulings to the effect that the federal government has jurisdiction over this offshore mineral resource. The Atlantic Accord, a long-term agreement on the joint management of offshore oil and gas development was, therefore, signed in 1985. As Newfoundlanders know only too well, the agreement does not change the fact that Hibernia will not by itself transform the Newfoundland economy.

On top of the disappointing realization that Hibernia would not be the bonanza that many initially thought, Newfoundlanders have been disappointed that politicians have repeatedly used the promise of the project for political purposes. Politicians have regularly raised the hopes of Newfoundlanders by big, glitzy announcements of deals before or during election campaigns. The project was announced once in 1979, again in 1982 and yet again during the 1988 election when the federal Conservatives made Hibernia an important plank in their campaign in Atlantic Canada. Each time the impression was given that a final deal was done and that this would mean great things for Newfoundland.

Listen to what the Prime Minister said during a pre-election speech in St. John's on July 18, 1988. I quote: "Hibernia has been the dream of the people of Newfoundland and Labrador for decades". Given that he said this nine years after it was discovered, that is a bit hyperbolic, but let it pass.

"Today the dream has been realized". During the last election campaign on October 6, 1988 the Prime Minister waxed lyrical about the project, saying, and again I quote: "For me, Brian Mulroney, Hibernia meant a lot more than barrels of oil. Hibernia to me was about dignity. Hibernia is about the future, about jobs for our kids. It is about a new tomorrow".

For his part the hon. minister of trade who spoke earlier this afternoon told more than 1,000 invited guests in St. John's on July 18, 1988 that the announcement "has nothing to do with politics. This has to do with justice". That was in 1988. That was yet another announcement that has come to very little after it was made. It is no surprise that Newfoundlanders are just a wee bit cynical about Hibernia announcements and just a mite suspicious about what repeatedly appears to them to be political opportunism of the first order.

Speaking of healthy cynicism, Newfoundlanders will recall the minister of trade has already suggested that the Opposition is somehow to blame for holding up this bill. This is a minister of a government that did not hesitate to use its majority in the House of Commons to stifle debate and ram through the hated GST, and that out-voted the Opposition to cut VIA Rail, to chop transfer payments and to slash UI benefits. This is the same government that introduced this bill on Hibernia last November 7 and then delayed further consideration of it until December 18, then until February 9 and finally, until today, a full seven months since the bill was introduced.

The government will still try to blame Hibernia delays on everyone but itself claiming that we are against jobs for Newfoundlanders, that we are against the Hibernia project itself. This is not true. We, New Democrats, do not oppose Hibernia. Again I say, we oppose this bill.

What is in Bill C-44? In a nutshell, Bill C-44 is meant to give the federal government the statutory authority to enter into one or more legally binding agreements based on the statement of principle signed in July 1988 and on the results of subsequent negotiations. It essentially sets out how the federal government will spend money on this project.

We are talking about a great deal of money. The bill proposes that the federal government contribute up to $1.04 billion toward capital costs in free grant money; up to $1.66 billion in loan guarantees for the capital project; $175 million in loan guarantees for a temporary financing facility; $300 million as a loan and no cap on the amount contributed as interest on the $1.66 billion in loan guarantees should interest become payable in consequence of those guarantees. In sum, this bill proposes that the federal government pay up to $1.04 billion in absolutely free grant money and up to $300 million as a loan and at least $1.835 billion in loans and interest guarantees for a total potential outlay of up to $3.139 billion or more. That is a lot of money.

The question we have to ask ourselves in considering this bill is: Is it a wise use of money? Does it provide the most jobs and economic development that can be had for the money?

In the rest of the short time available to me to speak today, I would like to focus if I may on the employment opportunities that will result from Hibernia if this bill passes without change.

The people of Newfoundland and Labrador need jobs.

Nobody in this House disputes that it is indeed incumbent on the Canadian confederation to come to the aid of the people in Newfoundland and Labrador to the degree necessary to bring them up to some kind of economic equality with the rest of the country. It is the contention of other people who have spoken here this afternoon that not only will Hibernia do that, but Hibernia is virtually the only vehicle that can do that.

It is true that the people of Newfoundland and Labrador need jobs. They need real economic development. Hibernia could help provide that but it is not likely to happen with this bill. Indeed, the terms of this bill will necessarily see a great many potential benefits to Newfoundland and Labrador squandered. In fact, this bill provides inadequate employment opportunities for Newfoundlanders for the public money invested and given away. Even Premier Clyde Wells recognized this publicly, pointing out in an interview published on October 2, 1989, in The Financial Post, that the number of permanent jobs generated by Hibernia would be about the size of the workforce of two fish plants.

The hon. Minister for International Trade disputed that contention earlier this afternoon. If he looks at the job creation figures involved, the 35,000 person-years created over the entire projected 25-year life of the project with construction and operation, if you take those person-years and you divide that by the 25 years, you will wind up with a figure of about 2,000 jobs a year. That is about the size of two decent fish plants. As Mr. Wells put it at that time on October 2, 1989, in The Financial Post: "The former government painted it as a saviour", he said. "It isn't."

The current estimates of job creation are much lower than the consortium that Premier Peckford predicted in the early 1980s. The 1989 Hibernia background papers suggested that up to 10,000 person-years of direct employment could be created in Newfoundland during the construction phase, and another 25,000 person-years of indirect employment and that makes up those 35,000 person-years during the construction phase. It is estimated that the 20-year operational phase will see the creation of 1,100 permanent jobs.

As the Federation of Labour President, Bill Parsons, pointed out in an interview published in the July 19, 1988 edition of The St. John's Evening Telegram: "Those jobs are just a fraction of what is needed to turn the province's struggling economy around. As he put it, and again I quote: "The thing is there are 40,000 Newfoundlanders out of work and we won't get any revenue from Hibernia for 15 years".

In addition, some observers who suggested that because jobs are urgently needed in Newfoundland, the government's emphasis should shift to creating jobs more quickly by tapping the existing Terra Nova discovery, reportedly a much less complicated venture, leaving the more difficult Hibernia field for later.

This leaves but one alternative available. Hibernia jobs will be enormously expensive. Even if we use the government's own figures, which we know to be optimistic, Hibernia is a very expensive way of creating jobs. For example, let us use the figures published in the Hibernia background papers. These figures we know to be overestimates because they do not take into account the recent design changes. Redesigning the project to reduce costs by assembling the Topsides rig in five 'supermodules' rather than the 18 to 20 smaller components originally planned could mean the loss of 10,000 construction jobs in and around St. John's. Let us be very generous and use these earlier more optimistic figures anyway.

On page 9, this 1989 government document states that for both the temporary construction period and the production period and I quote: "The combined total direct employment for residents of Newfoundland will be in the order of 32,000 person-years over the entire life of the project".

The total government involvement is $3.139 billion. That makes almost $100,000 of government money alone for the creation of every person-year of work. If we assume a 37.5 hour work week and a 50-week work year, that works out to over $50 an hour for the work. Let us be clear, that is not what people will be paid, that is the amount of public money the government is proposing to invest or spend to create that job. That is $50 an hour in government money alone, Madam Speaker.

As Newfoundland and Labrador New Democrat leader Cle Newhook put it, and I am quoting from an article in the September 15, 1980 edition of The Evening Telegram, he said:

> It looks like an incredibly expensive way of creating a few jobs up front and a few industrial jobs during production while making the companies rich.

This is a telling and accurate assessment in my opinion. There are not many Newfoundlanders who would not agree that there are literally thousands of community economic development projects featuring hundreds of thousands of well paying jobs that can be created for the same outlay of money. In fact, when it comes to maximizing the number of jobs or getting the biggest bang for the buck, Hibernia does not stack up very well against other existing programs in the region.

Between 1984 and 1988 just over $14.5 million was spent by the provincial and federal governments under the CEIC, fisheries and rural development programs and the like, creating 775 person-years of work. That works out to just under $19,000 in government spending for every job. That is less than one-fifth of the cost per job that can be expected under the most optimistic predictions for Hibernia.

Allow me to quote at length an article from The Financial Times of July 25, 1988. The article was written by William Mackness, the Dean of the Faculty of Management at the University of Manitoba. He writes:

> As a regional development scheme, the project may have some merit, but not in terms of capital cost per job. Energy is one of the world's most capital-intensive industries and, accordingly, is a strikingly expensive vehicle with which to deliver regional employment. Temporary construction jobs in Newfoundland will carry a capital cost in excess of $500,000 per job. Permanent production jobs will carry a capital cost of several million dollars per job. Granted, the oil is there, but it would be difficult to find a more expensive way to deliver either oil or jobs in Newfoundland.

But, expensive or not, 32,000 person-years of work sounds like a lot of jobs.

Unfortunately Hibernia is primarily an energy project. It is not designed to be a job creation project. It will not provide nearly the boost the province needs, especially when one considers the funding and service cuts the Mulroney Conservatives have made since coming into office.

The Canada Employment and Immigration Advisory Council issued a report on Hibernia in July 1988. The 30-page report states that Hibernia "covers only one of the many aspects of economic growth possibilities in Newfoundland".

I would like to emphasize that point: "only one of the many aspects of economic growth possibilities in Newfoundland". When the hon. minister stands up as he did earlier this afternoon and says it is Hibernia or nothing, it is he who is betokening a terrible and even tragic lack of faith in the initiative and indeed the entrepreneurial zeal of Newfoundlanders.

In fact that same report, the CEIC advisory council report of July 1988, goes on to say that at least 70,000 permanent jobs are needed to bring Newfoundland's employment and economic figures up to the national average, just to the national average. That report was issued before the latest devastation in the Atlantic fishery.

Hibernia jobs will also be dangerous jobs. No one needs to be reminded of that awful night eight years ago, February 15, 1982, when 84 people, including 54 Newfoundlanders, lost their life when the world's largest semi-submersible drilling rig, the Ocean Ranger, capsized and sank in 18-metre lashing waves in a screaming 145-kilometre per hour wind.

There have been changes to procedures and safety equipment since then. Some people suggest that such a tragedy could never happen again. Other people are deeply concerned that we have let our guard down on safety since the Ocean Ranger disaster. The fact remains that offshore drilling takes place in one of the most inhospitable and dangerous places in the world. Offshore drilling jobs, by their very nature, are dangerous. Clearly we need to make worker safety a priority. This should include a review of the precise details of the provisions for worker safety on the Hibernia project before it proceeds.

Offshore jobs are also very stressful. According to a recent government and industry financed study, offshore oil jobs mean month-long shifts at sea, $60 for a five-minute phone call home, and a work environment some compare to a prison or a war zone.

This 118-page report based on a survey conducted in 1985 and entitled Family Life Adaptations to Offshore Oil and Gas Employment concluded that 40 per cent of women married to rig workers and nearly 20 per cent of married men working on offshore rigs were deeply unhappy with their jobs. What is even worse, many of these jobs could also go to Americans because of the free trade deal. The Mulroney Conservatives signed a deal that specifies that U.S. firms have, and I quote from the deal, "a right of national treatment". Remember that, John, the right of national treatment in seeking business opportunities.

That means that the Hibernia companies cannot discriminate against U.S. firms under the trade deal, and that means governments cannot insist on local employment and procurement guarantees. As a result, the target of 45 per cent to 50 per cent Newfoundland content in jobs and procurement—and do not forget that is the target 45 per cent to 50 per cent, half of jobs and procurement benefits—will remain just that, a target. This cannot be guaranteed because it runs directly contrary to the provisions of the free trade agreement.

In any event, the Canadian content rules in the Hibernia agreement were relaxed in the summer of 1988. Instead of regulations the Hibernia deal translated Canadian content goals of previous Hibernia policies and the Atlantic Accord into targets—again, targets not regulations—which are stated so generally that they permit wide open bidding, but this too is required by the free trade agreement.

I am trying to keep within my time here. Before I run out of time, I want to focus on one way in which the Hibernia project demonstrates this government's ongoing, indeed continuous, stunning hypocrisy. We will remember that the Mulroney Conservatives campaigned in 1984 on a promise to provide jobs, jobs, jobs. They now claim to support this bill in part because it will create jobs, albeit expensive ones, in a region that desperately needs employment. At the same time, the Conservatives have proceeded to destroy existing job opportunities by cutting federal transfer payments, slashing VIA, closing rural post offices, closing CFB Summerside, and continually failing to address effectively the long-standing crises in the fishing industry. Then, to top it off, they slash unemployment insurance benefits for those people who do lose their jobs.

The people of Newfoundland and Labrador do not want yet another set of politicians dangling visions of prosperity in front of them. They do not need smoke and mirrors. They do not need more raised hopes and dashed expectations. They need well paying, long-term jobs—lots of them. It is about time their government began a concerted effort to assist them to achieve what they need, what they want, what they deserve.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, I just want to make a comment following the intervention by the hon. member for Edmonton East.

First of all the hon. member mentioned job creation. He has heard many times in this House since September 1984 that approximately 1.6 million jobs on a net basis have been created by the economy during the tenure of this government.

The hon. member should just give some attention to this since he comes from a province that is energy rich, a province that recognizes more than possibly any other province that government policies can seriously damage the resource and the jobs related to that resource. He and I might disagree on the philosophical basis in terms of development of energy resources, but what he and I should not disagree on is that the energy economy, by and large, has been an engine of growth particularly for his province. He should remember that, regardless of the political differences we might have in this House.

He also should recognize, regardless of partisan differences, that all of us have been concerned, for example, that the resources belong to the provinces and that the provinces and the people in those provinces get the maximum benefit from the ownership of those resources. He should also remember that resources regarding the offshore only were clarified with the accords, and particularly the Atlantic Accord, to which my hon. colleague the Minister for International Trade referred in his comments.

I say to the hon. member, let us look in committee at the differences we have. Let us look at the rationale for Hibernia, but at end of day let us remember that permanent jobs are not created by government or by governments transferring tax points or tax dollars. Those are needed for basic services. That is why the federal government and the provincial governments agree with equalization and Established Programs Financing. Let us not hinder the people of Newfoundland and Labrador from having the permanent jobs which he talks about, as well as the benefit of resources which that part of the country needs.

If anything has impressed me as minister of energy, it is when I go to St. John's particularly and Newfoundland and Labrador generally. The people there are no different from any other Canadians. What they want is the development of their resources to be done properly and prudently. At the end of day they want to have permanent jobs based on the merits of the case, not simply on the largesse that might come from Ottawa or other taxpayers. They are no different from anyone else. This project, while not being the panacea for all ills in Newfoundland and Labrador, it goes some distance in meeting that objective.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I agree with some of what the hon. minister has just said. I agree that it is not for the government to attempt to put everybody in Newfoundland on the dole, definitely not. It is the proper role of the Government of Canada to foster and encourage that economic development in Newfoundland which will result in stable, long-term, well paying jobs. There is no question of that.

As long as we are remembering things, let us remember not to be mesmerized by the prospect of oil megaprojects. I come from a province which has had a great deal of experience with oil megaprojects. I come from a province with a great deal of experience with energy as the engine of growth. Madam Speaker, I can tell you it can be the engine of destruction for many. I can tell you that when the price of oil collapsed in 1985 somewhere between 15,000 and 40,000 Albertans lost their jobs and had their lives wrecked in consequence.

Beware of oil megaprojects. Beware of the energy economy. If ever you have the alternative, if you are talking about the expenditure of public funds, not loans but direct expenditures, direct free grant money, I would advise you to look long and hard at other possibilities because among other things a great deal of that expenditure will be to the benefit of people who do not live anywhere in this country. We are told that a great deal of the production from Hibernia could be destined to go straight to the United States and never see a Canadian refinery.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, I want to ask the member for Edmonton East whether he could be clear and tell the House, given all the concerns he has raised during the course of his remarks in this debate and looking at the amendments that are set out here, whether or not the NDP in essence is saying that this project ought to be put on hold. Is that what he is saying? I think the House should be clear on it.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, especially for reasons that will be outlined in far greater detail by my colleague from Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing, the NDP is saying that this bill is sufficiently flawed to warrant its defeat regardless of what one thinks of the Hibernia project itself. The principal problem is the proposal to give away more than $1 billion in government money without taking a penny in equity in return. That is the main problem, but there are others.

The Hibernia project itself, if we assume it to be a worthy vehicle in the energy market which is apparently the yardstick used by the government and the Official Opposition these days, fine, no problem. But to give away $1 billion in an area that could profit from that scale of government investment much more in other areas is to fatally flaw the bill in our opinion.

Mr. Tobin: Madam Speaker, I will have my own remarks with respect to the member's position in a moment in my speech, but I want to ask him a question about the principle of not putting money in without taking equity in a project. I happen to think that Hibernia benefits all of Canada. It benefits the nation, assists in the area of self-efficiency, and is good for the whole country.

But putting that aside for a moment, given this principle of cancelling the project if there is $1 billion and no equity, is the member saying that, in the case of the farmers of western Canada who have received each year over the last four or five years approximately $1 billion of federal assistance, it is the position of the NDP that the government should take equity in their farms or no assistance should be forthcoming? I am interested in hearing what he has to say in the House.

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, the analogy is completely unreasonable. It does not apply. It is not individual Newfoundland oil producers who are heading out to the Hibernia site and digging up pails of oil and taking it in.

Nor, Madam Speaker, is it individual Newfoundland oil producers who work that field, sometimes for generations, building up an economic base that is fundamental to the survival of Canada as a whole.

No, there is no comparison between the two. Mobil Oil does not farm in western Canada.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): The hon. gentleman for Edmonton East says he supports this project. I hope to God he does not support any other projects that I am interested in, if he thinks stopping the bill will make the project possible. The people of Newfoundland have waited 11 years for this project. The hon. member supports the project, but, by golly, he is going to stop this bill going through the House so that he can really show the people of Newfoundland and Labrador how he supports the project. Talk about logic!

What about the question of jobs and comparing this to two fish plants or whatever. This is not just a question of the jobs that may be created directly by this project, and a great many jobs are going to be created directly by the project, it is a question of changing the nature of the economy of Newfoundland so it is not dependent just on the fishery or on some jobs in pulp and paper.

It is to give the people another alternative, highly skilled jobs, not just the jobs out there on the rigs or in construction, or the jobs at Bull Arm, although we hope there will be more fields.

There is the Terra Nova field. There is the White Rose field and there are indications of other fields out there. Hopefully they will be able to construct rigs and so on at Bull Arm for another 50 or 60 years, as well as in the Newfoundland dockyard and the Marystown shipyard where we are putting $34.5 million with the province so that they can take full advantage of this.

It is not just the direct jobs. It is all of the companies that have been created in the last 10 or 12 years, the high technology companies and the kind of jobs they are going to be able to provide. Anyone who wants to compare this with another two fish plants for Newfoundland has something wrong with their mental processes or does not have sufficient scope to visualize what this is going to do.

I do not think for a moment that Premier Wells meant it. This is not creating 500 more jobs for women to go on a fish line and cut fish. This is not the kind of job this process is going to create, or jobs for 12 or 14 weeks of the year in an inshore fish plant and those types of jobs, though God knows they are welcome enough.

I would suggest to the hon. gentleman that he and his party take a different approach to this. They are supposed to be the party that represents the labour movement and the like. When they have an opportunity to support a bill that is going to change the nature of the economy of Newfoundland and create some better paying, more skilled work, they oppose it. How else is this going to start if the government does not assist in getting it started?

If the NDP is going to vote against any assistance to the project, then how is the project ever going to start? If the NDP supports this project which took 11 years of struggle to get this far, they cannot really come down to Newfoundland and tell how helpful they were if they are going to vote against this bill and do everything they can to stop it going through the House.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The period for questions and comments is now over. Resuming debate. The hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Madam Speaker, I must say to the member for Edmonton East who spoke on behalf of the New Democratic Party that I am really quite amazed at the attitude of the New Democratic Party with respect to the Hibernia development. More particularly, I am quite amazed at the attitude of the new Democratic Party about Newfoundland and Newfoundlanders. I frankly find it patronizing. I find it insulting, if not by design, I hope at the very least that it must be by accident, to the intelligence of the people of Newfoundland and Labrador.

• (1650)

The Hibernia project is not something new that materialized as a matter of debate before this House at the first reading of Bill C-44 on November 7, 1989. This project, its potential, its development, has been around for a long time, several decades.

I want to tell the hon. member who has been here for less that two years—and I am not reflecting upon him in any way, as he has been an active and engaged member all the time he has been here. The debate we are attempting to have today has its genesis in a debate between jurisdictions several decades ago. Certainly that debate has gone on in an intense fashion for the last decade.

I have to tell him in all frankness that to have an hon. member from Edmonton East, as well-intentioned in his own mind as he might be, stand and purport to speak for the people of Newfoundland, to understand the history and dynamics of this project and suggest that he and his party are going to save Newfoundland from a tragic mistake, I find patronizing and insulting. It displays an abysmal ignorance of the history of this development and the kind of agreements that have been negotiated and understandings that have been reached over a very long and difficult debate.

What do we have at the end of a very difficult and long process, sometimes a partisan process between parties and sometimes a difficult process between jurisdictions? We have at the eleventh hour the New Democratic Party storming into the House of Commons and suggesting that they are going to put the brakes on an important project not only for Newfoundland but for Canada. That is an incredibly patronizing attitude.

Let me say, in all sincerity, that this is not the kind of approach we expect from the New Democratic Party. It is not the normal thing we see in this place. I find the member's attitude absolutely incredible, because what is Bill C-44?

I find the attitude incredible. I listened in silence to the hon. member and he ought to listen in silence to me. What is Bill C-44? The Canadian public has listened to a lot of rhetoric. In reality, it is a piece of enabling legislation. That is all it is, enabling legislation. It makes possible agreements. It makes possible the participation of the federal government with two other partners, one being the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador and the other being the private consortium.

This legislation represents the approval of Parliament for the government to participate with two other partners in an offshore oil development, the Hibernia Field specifically and other fields, if and when they have been proven viable. That is what it does. What does the New Democratic Party say? It says in essence—and I find this amusing—that it wants to impose certain conditions upon the Government of Canada—more particularly the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador which is not in this House but in another jurisdiction—and upon the private consortium. It wants the federal government to impose arbitrary conditions, without consent, knowledge, dialogue, discussion and the agreement of the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador, representing the people of Newfoundland and Labrador and the consortium.

The amendment moved by the New Democratic Party asks that the bill be not now read a second time because granting the project more than $1 billion without securing equivalent equity in the project for the people of Canada is wrong in principle. There is provision in this enabling legislation for the Government of Canada to take an equity position, but it is an equity position that will arise out of negotiation with the consortium and with the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador, the two other partners in the project. That ability is contained in the enabling legislation.

The hon. member is asking the Government of Canada to move in arbitrarily, like a bull in a china shop, to state upfront what its position is going to be, notwithstanding changing circumstances. God knows, world prices change and therefore circumstances change. He wants that provision included in advance of any discussion or negotiation with the players.

That is not a reasonable amendment. That is a patronizing amendment that displays an abysmal ignorance about the agreement that has been reached between all of the partners and players in this agreement.

The second paragraph of the amendment states that the bill fails to contain specific provisions which provide environmental protection measures in connection with the project. The reality is that in 1985 the environmental review on the Hibernia project was completed. It was an extensive, very complex and public process. It was debated and circulated. It is debated still today, with many players and broad representation.

There has been an environmental process and there is provision on any additional or new field other than Hibernia which is being considered, for additional environmental review. I have no hesitation in saying as a member of the opposition Liberal Party that it would be subject to the full weight of guidelines that have now been laid out by the Minister of Energy. That is proper.

There is nobody in Newfoundland and Labrador, which for 500 years has depended upon the fishery, the harvest of the sea, who wants to risk the cod stocks in any way, shape or form. God knows they are in bad enough shape now because of the exploitation by man, both in this country and many other countries of the world.

We are not prepared to take that environmental risk, we have to be satisfied. The heritage of our province is the bounty of the sea. We have the patronizing attitude of the New Democratic Party, a party that rushes in at the eleventh hour, to say there must be an environmental review. There has been a review and we shall remain vigilant on the environment. To assume that that vigilance is not there, that Newfoundlanders are a people so much in a rush for a bit of prosperity that they would turn their backs on their heritage, is an insult to the people of Newfoundland. Frankly, I find it insulting, and the hon. member ought to have known better.

The third provision in the amendment states that the bill fails to contain specific provisions which provide for the creation of job opportunities in relation to the project. Again, it is an amendment which displays a total lack of knowledge about what has gone on for 10 years and what the debate has been for 10 years between the national government, the provincial government and the consortium.

What has the debate been about? Hibernia is adjacent to the province of Newfoundland, located close to the province of Newfoundland. The debate has been about whether the benefits from that project would flow to the province of Newfoundland and Labrador. That is what the long history of conflict, over a period of time, and negotiation has been all about, governments of Newfoundland and Labrador ensuring that, within the bounds of viability, there should be some long-term, permanent benefit to the people of Newfoundland and Labrador.

We are sensitive to not having a boom and bust economy. We are sensitive to not overheating the economy, as occurred in Scotland, and seeing that the people prosper. We are sensitive to having a pace and control of development, not allowing it to be done totally by the private sector. That is why we as a province in a collective sense, essentially put away our ability to have this project six or seven years ago, earlier than it would otherwise come on stream. We said no to unplanned development. We wanted a plan; to know what the effect is on the society, the social structure, the values of our community, before we proceed.

The hon. member and his party, the New Democratic Party, now want the federal government to arbitrarily write into the bill what the pace of development will be, when the federal government is now obligated to consult with the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador regarding the pace of development. The control and the assurances for the people of our province is vested in the legislature and government of the people of Newfoundland and Labrador and the hon. member wants to take that away.

The hon. member believes that we here in Ottawa, in this gilded chamber, are somehow supreme, wise and, in our wisdom, we can do better than those people down in St. John's, that fog-infested capital, in telling them what the pace of their development should be. The hon. member is saying, "We in the New Democratic Party, given our usual bleeding-heart consideration for those unfortunate, unintelligent people, unable to help themselves, we will determine here in Ottawa, from this ivory tower, what their pace of development will be, because they cannot help themselves".

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will have 10 minutes remaining, plus 10 minutes for questions and comments when we return after six o'clock.

It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed on today's Order Paper.

REGIONAL RATES OF PAY

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider abolishing the Regional Rates of Pay, now in force for certain federal government employees, in accordance with its stated policy of pay equity.

He said: Mr. Speaker, on December 7 of last year, I spoke in the House on a very regressive piece of back-to-work legislation, Bill C-49. That will go down in the history of this Parliament as one of the most regressive, callous attacks on organized labour in Canada in recent history. I said at that time that I would hope that never again in this Parliament would I have to address the House on the discriminatory wage practice called regional rates of pay.

The government opposite has not listened to logic. The government shows no change of attitude at all in its perpetuation of discriminatory wage practices that primarily affect those individuals who live on the east coast of Canada.

Here is a little bit of history about regional rates of pay for anybody out there who is watching and wants to know what it is all about. Regional rates of pay have been practised by governments for a number of years. Over that period of time governments of the day put in a system of regional rates of pay, probably reflecting society's view that it was all right to pay people based not on the work that they did, but on where they lived. There was all kinds of rationale used at the time, but most important of all, one has to understand that it was acceptable behaviour 27 years ago to do that.

The many times when I have raised the issue of regional rates of pay in this place, I received the rebuttal from the government members that previous Liberal governments did the same thing. We are now into 1990. What society may have accepted in 1957 is not necessarily what society will accept today.

The government's rhetoric on pay equity has been incredible. Time and time again we have government members speaking in the House and different mouthpieces of the government outside of the House talking about the government's commitment to pay equity.

Pay equity means equal pay for work of equal value, but time and time again in this place, in committees, and in public, when asked if it supports abolishing regional rates of pay, the government has said no, it does not support abolishing regional rates of pay.

Only 18 or 20 months ago, during the federal election campaign, we had a potential strike situation develop in a very important part of the public service. It was the CBRT and GW, the dockyard workers. On the east coast, there were over 1,500 men and women who work in the employ of the Government of Canada in the dockyards in Halifax and Dartmouth.

At that particular time, the primary issue that almost forced a strike was the issue of regional rates of pay. Quite simply, what the union was looking for, and what the men and women who worked in the CBRT and GW down on the east coast were looking for, was not a lot of money. They were not looking for great changes to their work environment. What they were looking for was fairness and equality. What they wanted was pay equity with their brothers and sisters working for the same employer, the Government of Canada, doing the same job, with the same job description on the west coast.

But the government dug in its heels and told them no, and there were offers going back and forth across the table. Eventually, in the middle of the election campaign, there was an offer on the table which perpetuated the regional rate of pay and perpetuated that discriminatory wage gap.

Unfortunately, the vast majority of Canadians who oppose the government—now 85 per cent—would now say unfortunately the Conservative government managed to bluff its way into another electoral term, one that will most likely be its last electoral term.

After the government got that term, it basically blackmailed the union. It told the union that the offer on the table during the election campaign would get worse, because now it had another term and it did not like what the union had been saying about the federal Tory policies in this regard. The union had better darn well accept it, and accept it now, because the offer would get worse.

Those individuals who were working at the dockyards in Halifax, in my humble opinion, are no less worthy of their pay for their day's labour than the people who are working on the west coast in the Victoria shipyards. The government insisted on perpetuating disparity based, not on colour, not on religion, or not on language of choice, but based on where people live in the country.

When we talk about pay equity and the need for the government to remove immediately regional rates of pay, we are talking about a matter of equality. That is what it boils down to.

It is rather appropriate that my motion got drawn to be debated this week, because unfolding across the street at the conference centre is a drama about the very future of our country. A key component of what is taking place is the discussion about preserving the equality of individuals who live in every province of the country, no matter if their mother tongue is Gaelic, as it may be down in my home province of Nova Scotia and as my grandfather's mother tongue was, or if it is French or English, or if they live in the Northwest Territories, populous Ontario, or in small Prince Edward Island. The whole debate that is taking place is about preserving that unique relationship of equality between all Canadians.

Yet, at the same time that it constantly and consistently talks about its desire to achieve wage parity, equal pay for work of equal value, and at the same time that the great debate is going on about the very future of our country based on that fundamental principle of equality, the government continues to support policies and programs which discriminate against workers, most particularly in Atlantic Canada, not for any other reason than the fact that they live on the east coast and not in the golden triangle of central Canada or on the west coast.

I have said it in the House on a number of occasions, and I will say it again: Discrimination based on where a person lives is no less abhorrent to me and the people I represent—and I hope to all Canadians—than discrimination based on race, creed or colour. No longer does our society accept these discriminatory practices.

Last December a situation developed right across the country, on both coasts, with the ships' crews through PSAC when the ships' crews went out on strike. The ships' crews went out on strike again primarily for one reason. They were going to stand tough and stand on principle because they wanted to be treated equally.

The ships' crews, those men and women who work out in 15 metre swells at times on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, but specifically on the Atlantic coast, said that they were going to go out on strike and did not care if they starved because it was a matter of principle. They were striking against the federal government because the federal government refused to move on the issue of removing regional rates of pay.

When that dastardly bill came to the legislative committee examining this legislation that Sunday—and I want to quote from this because this is absolutely incredible—I asked the President of the Treasury Board: Is your government not committed to eliminating regional rates of pay?" The response of that Minister was very short but it spoke volumes. His answer, clearly, unequivocally was: "No." I asked for some clarification and I said to him: "You are not in favour of eliminating regional rates of pay and I would like that clarified for the record." I am again going to quote the President of the Treasury Board who stated: "The labour markets are not national, they are regional. If the federal government decided to pay all of its employees the same wages it would pay, for example, in downtown Toronto, it would wreck the local economies in many regions of this country."

That is the most bogus argument I have ever heard put forward in the House of Commons. The minister knows, as well as anybody else who has been involved with those two labour disputes I mentioned, that on the east coast of Canada those men and women who were going out in 15 metre seas on coast guard vessels to protect the individuals trying to eke out a living from our fishery and the marine transportation industry earn an average of $21,000 a year.

Even in Atlantic Canada, where the economy is almost in ruin because of the government's economic policy, those same individuals were being paid as much as 32 per cent less than individuals in similar occupations in the private sector in Atlantic Canada. Yet the minister had the nerve to come to a committee and misrepresent the facts. But, then again, the government is quite good at coming before the Canadian public and misrepresenting the facts, especially when they are facts relating to its commitment on pay equity and paying a person based not on where they live or their gender, but on what they do.

In the debate on regional rates of pay, we see a government that is committed to maintaining the disparity between various parts of the country. We are not asking for much in this motion that is put forward. We are asking for fair treatment. My goodness, how can anyone possibly tell me that, if I am a pipe-fitter in the dockyard in Halifax, or if I am a ships' crew working in the engine room of a coast guard vessel in Atlantic Canada, that somehow my labour is not worth as much as the same job being performed by another individual in another part of the country? It is outrageous.

If we were dealing with a minority group, this would not even be attempted. However, because we are dealing with groups of workers, particularly on the east coast of Canada, the government thinks that it is quite acceptable to perpetuate this incredible disparity.

Members opposite from Atlantic Canada have continued to support it, especially in light of the two labour disputes that I talked about, and knowing full well that those dockyard workers who fought hard to get wage parity, a decent living, and to be paid the same wage as their counterparts in other parts of Canada who are employed by the same employer, the government of Canada. The workers are now in a position that they are going to have to start negotiating a new contract in July.

It is quite appropriate that at this point we are debating my motion in the House today. It suggests that the government abandon its perpetuation of this discriminatory, abhorrent regional rates of pay and start paying the people who are in the public employ of the country according to the work that they do and the worth of that work not based on where they live in the country.

We went through that strike and I have talked about Bill C–49, that infamous back–to–work legislation. The government had bargained in bad faith with the ships' crews. However, the government and the President of the Treasury Board were not prepared to close that wage gap between the east and west coast workers. In that particular strike situation, that was the major problem they were having with the government of Canada. All they wanted was to close that wage gap. They were not looking for a 50 per cent increase in their hourly wages. They wanted to be treated fairly. However, the government said: "No, you do not deserve it."

It went into the arbitration process and we finally got the decision which we found quite clear. The ruling of the conciliation board was as follows: "Upon signing, we will close the wage gap between the east and west coast ships' crews". Second, it was going to be paying payments over the course of the contract to try to raise the pay of those workers who were part of the ships' crews, so that they could try to achieve a more equitable parity with the private sector.

That proves the bogusness of the arguments the government uses that it cannot pay because it will disrupt local economies and that there is no basis for eliminating regional rates of pay. They should read very carefully the conclusions, recommendations, and orders of that board.

I would hope that today, as other members debate this particular motion, they realize this is not a partisan issue. It is a pocket–book issue affecting thousands and thousands of Canadians. Representing many of those Canadians who have suffered unfairly under the perpetuation of regional rates of pay, I ask this House to reconsider, as my motion asks, this government's commitment to perpetuating the regional rate of pay system in this country. Canadian workers deserve better. The men and women who work in the public service of Canada deserve better than lip service from this government in this regard.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is proposing that the government consider abolishing the regional rates of pay now in force for certain government employees in accordance with its stated policy of pay equity. I respect the hon. member's sincerity, but from his remarks I still sense a little confusion.

I want to concentrate on the mistaken impression that the hon. member has that regional rates of pay and pay equity are somehow one and the same. They certainly are not. In fact, I recall the hon. member was told that quite explicitly by the President of the Treasury Board during debate on Bill C–49.

I think that a review of the Canadian Human Rights Act will help make it clear to the hon. member that what he calls pay equity is distinct from regional rates of pay. This act spells out what the federal government, as an employer, must carry out in order to eliminate discrimination, and in this particular context pay discrimination. The government's policy, as has been stated many times in this House in respect to what the hon. member calls pay equity is based on section 11 of the Canadian Human Rights Act.

It may be helpful to quote section 11 of the act which states:

> It is a discriminatory practice for an employer to establish or maintain differences in wages between male and female employees employed in the same establishment who are performing work of equal value.

What do we learn from this section? We first learn that what the hon. member is referring to is not pay equity but is in fact equal pay for work of equal value. More importantly, we learn that the government as an employer shall not maintain differences in pay between male and female employees performing work of equal value. That is to say that the government shall not discriminate on the basis of pay between male and female employees performing work of equal value.

Section 11(1) of the Canadian Human Rights Act does not give us any guidance as to regional rates. It merely states that there shall not be any pay discrimination based on gender. Section 11 goes on to spell out the criteria to be applied to determine the value of work including the composite of the skill, effort and responsibility required in the performance of the work and the conditions under which the work is performed.

Further, section 11 deems that separate establishments established or maintained by the employer solely or principally for the purpose of establishing or maintaining differences in wages or maintaining differences in wages between male and female employees shall be considered a single establishment.

I have just paraphrased sections 2 and 2(1) of section 11 of the Canadian Human Rights Act and as yet we have seen no mention of regional rates.

I am trying to show that the hon. member has confused equal pay for work of equal value, or as he calls it pay equity, with regional rates of pay. I believe that by going through the Canadian Human Rights Act and the equal wage guidelines in a logical manner, as I have done up to now, it will be eminently clear when I have finished that the government's policy on equal pay for work of equal value is not in conflict with the government's policy on regional rates.

Let us go back to the equal wage guidelines. Sections 10, 11, 12, 13, 14 and 15 deal with who is an employee of an establishment, complaints made under the act by individuals and complaints by groups.

The last area of the equal wage guidelines that I want to deal with is section 16 which spells out the reasonable factors that justify for the purpose of subsection 11(3) of the Canadian Human Rights Act a difference in wages between male and female employees performing work of equal value in an establishment.

• (1720)

I believe that this section of equal wage guidelines is terribly important and as such I intend to quote the entire subsection. However, before I do, I want to remind the House, as I have already stated, that the government's policy on equal pay for for work of equal value is based on the Canadian Human Rights Act and as such the following quote from section 16 will reinforce that the government's policy on equal pay for work of equal value is not in conflict with the government's policy on regional rates.

16. For the purposes of subsection 11(3) of the Act, a difference in wages between male and female employees performing work of equal value in an establishment justified by

(a) different performance ratings, where employees are subject to a formal system of performance appraisal that has been brought to their attention;

(b) seniority, where a system of remuneration that applies to employees provides that they receive periodic increases in wages based on their length of service with the employer;

(c) a re-evaluation and downgrading of the position of an employee, where the wages of that employee are temporarily fixed, or the increases in the wages of that employee are temporarily curtailed, until the wages appropriate to the downgraded position are equivalent to or higher than the wages of that employee;

(d) a rehabilitation assignment, where an employer pays to an employee wages that are higher than justified by the value of the work performed by that employee during recuperation of limited duration from an injury or illness;

(e) a demotion procedure, where the employer, without decreasing the employees wages, reassigns an employee to a position at a lower level as a result of the unsatisfactory work performance of the employee caused by factors beyond the employee's control, such as the increasing complexity of the job or the impaired health or partial disability of the employee, or as a result of an internal labour force surplus that necessitates the reassignment;

(f) a procedure of gradually reducing wages for any of the procedures set out in paragraph (e);

(g) a temporary training position, where, for the purposes of an employee development program that is equally available to male and female employees and leads to the career advancement of the employees who take part in the program, an employee temporarily assigned to the position receives wages at a different level than an employee working in such a position on a permanent basis.

(h) the existence of an internal labour shortage in particular job classification;

(i) a reclassification of a position to a lower level, where the incumbent continues to receive wages on the scale established for the former higher classification; and—

Here it is, and I appreciate your waiting:

(j) regional rates of wages, where the wage scale that applies to employees provides for different rates of wages for the same job depending on the defined geographic area of the workplace.

There it is, Mr. Speaker. Subsection (j) of section 16 of the Equal Wages Guidelines makes it perfectly clear that it is reasonable and justifiable to have a policy of regional rates while at the same time having a policy of equal pay for work of equal value.

As I stated earlier, I felt that it was quite important to quote the entirety of section 16.

I did so because I did not want to leave the impression that regional rates of pay was the only reasonable and justifiable factor that allowed a difference in wages between male and female employees performing work of equal value. Section 16 specifies 10 different reasons, including regional rates, that justify a difference in wages between male and female employees performing work of equal value. I think the answer is clear that there is absolutely no conflict between the government's policy on regional rates and the government's policy on equal pay for work of equal value. The government's policy on equal pay for work of equal value is based on the Human Rights Act where I have shown that regional rates of pay are permitted.

Let there be no mistake about the government's commitment to the concept of equal pay for work of equal value. I need only remind the House about the government's recently announced equal pay adjustments for clerical and regulatory, secretarial and education support employees. It is important to note that the employer took the incentive in making these adjustments.

While the government is committed to equal pay for work of equal value, it is also committed to its compensation policy included in which are regional rates of pay. The government's compensation policy, which has been explained many times in this House, is to compensate its employees with wages and other terms and conditions of employment that are comparable to but do not lead those employees in the private sector who do similar work. The compensation policy recognizes that the federal Public Service compensation should be sufficient to recruit and retain qualified employees. However, where there is a locally identifiable labour market and it is possible to recruit locally then the compensation policy calls for regional rates of pay. Regional rates of pay that are comparable to but do not lead those of employees in the local private sector and are sufficient enough to recruit and retain locally qualified employees.

A few examples of regional rates of pay are the general labour and trades group and the general services group. While it is true that in the context of collective bargaining with unions representing these employees, the number of pay zones have been reduced over the years, this was done in direct reaction to local market conditions. Obviously, when it is no longer possible to identify or recruit from a local market, then market conditions demand a change in the regional pay zones to one that does reflect existing conditions.

To come back for a moment to my main theme of equal pay for work of equal value, the government's commitment to regional rates of pay does not interfere with equal pay but works in harmony with it, because it is obvious now that within any given regional pay zone equal pay for work of equal value applies and, as I have already stated and elaborated on, it does not operate between pay zones. Differences in wages for male and female employees performing work of equal value is justifiable and reasonable in terms of the Canadian Human Rights Act, but also in terms of a responsible employer, which the government certainly is.

This House has been told many times about the practice of private employers in respect of regional rates. The recognition of local labour conditions by other employers is growing yearly. I would say that the government is acting in complete concert with the private sector by paying regional rates when the local market warrants it. To do otherwise, would be a sign of an irresponsible employer.

What would be the result if the government were to abandon its policy of regional rates? What would be the affect on the local labour market? Let me note a few of the effects of such an action. Paying national rates of pay when regional rates of pay are warranted would only serve to over–pay employees in some regions and under–pay employees in other regions in relation to the rates of pay prevailing in those regions.

A far more serious effect, I believe, would be the effect on the private sector in the different regions. They would be faced with the dilemma of the federal government paying national rates while their employees were paid local rates in response to local economic conditions. How could those employers possibly survive when faced with the prospect of having to raise the rates of their employees beyond what local conditions warranted in order to compete with a federal government for qualified employees.

Let me conclude by summarizing my approach to the hon. member's motion. Regional rates of pay are not in conflict with equal pay for work of equal value, but in fact are consistent with the Canadian Human Rights Act. Regional rates of pay are part of the government's compensation policy and, as such, match the practice of private employers and respect local market conditions. They are fair, reasonable and simply make common sense.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am delighted to rise in support of this motion. I particularly want to compliment the member for Calgary Southeast who has just spoken for having made himself familiar with the Human Rights Act.

A number of actions by the government over the years have made it clear that it is not familiar with the act, and it has insisted on sending tens of thousands of its own employees off to the Human Rights Commission to prove their right to pay equity. It is only when court cases are hanging over its head that the government takes any action on pay equity. So I am not reassured by the fact that the member has read the act because it requires more than to read it, one should live by it.

However, the member seems to be rather poorly informed on how regional rates of pay are related to this issue.

I want to say that the government likes to rely on laws and only go as far as the law demands, which is usually until it is faced with a court challenge that it cannot ignore and cannot resist. But there is a simple matter of justice here. One person's day's work is worth the same as another person's day's work when they are doing the same work. It is a principle of Canadian society that opportunities and rewards should be relatively equal wherever you live in Canada.

The attitude towards regional rates of pay that has just been expounded by the member for Calgary Southeast is just another tool to keep poor regions poor while wealthier regions prosper. There is absolutely no justification for a west coast worker risking his life to be paid more than an east coast worker risking his life. Does this government really want to tell me that the life of a worker in Atlantic Canada is worth less than the life of a worker on the west coast.

The government has tried to put forward the argument that these regional rates of pay are necessary because they are consistent with the local labour market. The member in making that argument merely showed that he is uninformed, totally uninformed, about this situation. On the east coast the old regional rates of pay, which discriminate depending on where you live in Canada, were 32 per cent below the private sector.

Now the principle put forth by Treasury Board when it went to the conciliation board on this matter was that the government should be able to pay more to keep up with the local market where it is necessary to do that. Here it was paying substantially less. Let me give a good example of where the member is totally out to sea on this and simply does not know what he is talking about.

On the west coast, public employees working as search and rescue personnel were being paid $11.68 an hour, while ferry workers were getting paid $20 an hour.

The conciliation board, fortunately, recognized both regional rates of pay and non-conformity with the local rates as being inequitable. It has added over 10 per cent over the term of the contract just to bring government rates a little closer.

The conciliation board admits that it is only inching closer and is not anywhere near parity with the private sector. It felt it had to do that as well as get rid of the regional rates of pay. It recognizes that with both those measures it is not being fair to these workers and that this is a long-term prospect that is going to have to be addressed in future contracts.

It is shocking that this country went through what it did last fall and winter. It is shocking that this government would jeopardize shipping on the Great Lakes, would tie up for over a week millions of dollars worth of shipping because it could not treat its employees differently. It knew and the conciliation board has confirmed that regional rates of pay are inequitable and I say, iniquitous. That is why I applaud the motion my colleague has brought forth today.

The government knew that and, instead of making a fair settlement, it allowed the economy of this country to suffer for weeks on end while the strike went on, while it brought in back-to-work legislation, while it forced these people back to work for inequitable wages because it did not want to do what was right and fair.

The conciliation board that dealt with these issues in depth and issued this lengthy report did not even have to give arguments for its decision. It simply said: "We are bringing east coast rates of pay to parity with the west coast rates of pay". It did not even feel it had to justify this decision. For this simple decision which the government could have made any time since 1988, it disrupted the economy, disrupted shipping on the Great Lakes, and disrupted search and rescue operations on both coasts of this country. There is no excuse. It is time to get rid of regional rates of pay.

If nothing else, I think the government had better be practical. It had better recognize that this conciliation board decision set a precedent and that it is not going to be able in the next round of contract negotiations to avoid the issue of regional rates of pay.

It is going to have to decide whether it is a game and negotiations will be dragged out at great cost to the taxpayer, or whether it is going to do as it did with the ship crews workers, force them to go on strike to get what is only fair and just. Is it going to do that or is it going to do the sensible thing by getting rid of the regional rates of pay and treating the day's work of one person the same as another who is doing exactly the same job?

Surely the government does not need a law to tell it to do that, or a court case, or another long and multi-million dollar strike that adversely affects not only the public sector but the private sector. Surely it just needs to face the inevitable and do what is fair.

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address the motion which was presented by the hon. member for Dartmouth concerning the payment of regional rates for certain federal government employees in view of the government's policy of pay equity.

Compensation policy for the federal Public Service since Confederation has embodied a number of guiding principles which have emerged with relative regularity and consistency. The public sector compensation must be fair to both employees and to the tax-paying public. That is very important. It must be fair to both. The Public Service compensation must be comparable to that found in the private sector, but does not materially exceed the compensation paid for similar services by private sector employers.

Public Service salaries should be sufficient to attract and retain qualified employees. In comparing the compensation paid in the federal government with the private sector for similar jobs, the terms and conditions of employment as well as the relative advantages and disadvantages of employment in the two sectors must be taken into account.

Restraint should be exercised in times of economic adversity as an example to the private and public sectors and that Public Service settlements should be fiscally responsible and contribute to the containment or the reduction of inflationary pressures.

Regional rates of pay should be established for groups where private sector data indicate significant variations and labour market rates among regions in Canada.

Compensation levels for the vast majority of the Public Service employees are established through the collective bargaining process. When collective bargaining was introduced in the Public Service in 1967, there was a concomitant revamping of the entire compensation system, including classification and pay.

In order to prepare the way for collective bargaining, the new system was designed to serve several objectives. The first was to provide a logical framework for the determination of bargaining units and a negotiation of pay rates.

The second was to make it possible for the government to respond flexibly to changes in outside rates of pay and at the same time to retain a relatively high degree of stability in the more important rate relationships between jobs and the Public Service.

The third objective was to permit different approaches to wage and salary administration and to personnel administration generally for different types of employees.

The fourth objective was to provide attractive career patterns and strong incentives to superior performance. This included the provision of classification and pay system which would support and encourage the best and most effective employment of human resources in the Public Service. Attractive career patterns marked by the absence of both artificial barriers to mobility and lateral transfers and by the opportunity for advancement by merit to higher income levels were advocated. A related objective was the provision in the pay plans of strong incentives to superior performance.

These objectives of the current compensation system, as well as the principles of government compensation policy are reflected in the legislation which currently governs employer–employee relations in the determination of compensation levels for the federal Public Service employees.

The compensation policies of different organizations vary accordingly to the objectives and goals each seeks to achieve. Within the collective bargaining context it is conventionally assumed that an organization's objective is to establish wages and benefits at a level necessary to attract and retain employees with skills and abilities sufficient to fulfil the requirements of the firm or organization. Normally this involves the payment of wages and benefits which reflect conditions prevalent in the appropriate labour market, a competitive policy.

For example, no one forces people to take a job in the Public Service. They can always look in the job market and take one with the private sector. One would assume that people take jobs in the Public Service because of the stability of employment, the pension benefits, and other benefits. What would happen if we increased the level of regional rates of pay? It would distort the local labour market and make people want to leave the private sector to go to the federal government, bidding up wages in the private sector, making them less competitive.

An analysis has been done, and I say this for my friend from Dartmouth, and it would cost the federal government $100 million. What would happen is the regional rates would rise to the highest national rate. A hundred million dollars. Now, where are we going to get that? Should we raise taxes? Is the hon. member in favour of another rate point in the GST? Where would it come from?

Does the hon. member want to distort the local labour markets all across the country, making the private sector uncompetitive? That is what the member is advocating. The member is advocating structural imbalances in our Canadian economy which bid up interest rates, inflation, and so on.

It is the structural imbalances created by the previous Liberal government through these programs which makes it harder to change the competitiveness of our economy. We have been doing that gradually and it has been proven in the number of jobs created.

The government's aim is to pay a going rate in the labour market for the various classes of employees. The government expects a reasonably good quality of labour and it expects to pay employees fairly with respect to one another so that employees themselves feel that they are properly paid.

As I said before, and I will say this again for the hon. member's benefit, when you join the Public Service you join for a variety of reasons. One may be the stability of employment, or the pension plan, or other benefits.

Most private sector businesses do pay a regional rate of pay on a local market basis, particularly for operational, administrative and technical support jobs. The reason given most frequently by these firms for having geographic salary differentials is the nature of local salary and wage markets.

As an employer, the federal government is committed to paying rates of pay which are equitable and competitive with rates being paid outside the Public Service for similar occupations. Where the outside pay data of occupational groups indicates significant variations from the Canadian average and where the area of recruitment and the mobility of employees within the public service is limited, the government as an employer considers it appropriate to pay regional and not national rates of pay. As an employer competing with other employers, it is the government's view that the payment of regional rates contributes to the achievement of fair and competitive wages in the local market.

Currently most federal Public Service employees receive national rates of pay. However, some 30,000 employees, or approximately 16 per cent of the total Public Service workforce, are paid according to regional rates of pay.

The abandonment of regional rates of pay in the Public Service would have a negative impact on regional development and the fiscal framework. It would be very unlikely, or even undesirable, to have national rates emerge which would be based on an average of regional rates. National rates would gravitate to the highest regional rates. These rates would pose unfair competition to the private sector in the traditionally lower wage areas of Canada and would serve to dissuade industrial development in these regions. Is that what the hon.

member is asking for: less industrial development in his region? No.

Fiscally the estimated cost of moving public servants presently paid on a regional basis to a national rate is $100 million. Where are we going to get that? Are we going to raise taxes? Are we going to print money and create inflation? Is that what the hon. member wants?

As my colleague, the hon. President of the Treasury Board has stated in this House, this government is committed to maintaining regional rates of pay, where it is indicated that such an approach is in the best interests of the local labour market.

In summary, I think we want to be competitive in Canada. We do not want to distort the local labour markets. We do not want to raise taxes, which would cost us $100 million. I would say that our system is working very well now.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to rise and speak in support of the motion put forward by my colleague, the hon. member for Dartmouth. He proposes in his motion that "the government should consider abolishing the Regional Rates of Pay, now in force for certain federal government employees, in accordance with its stated policy of pay equity".

It has also been said that it is necessary for us to remind the government of its responsibilities as an employer and as a role model for the private sector. The government seems determined to be dragged into the 20th century, much less the 21st, kicking and screaming all the way.

As has been said here, last November we witnessed a strike by ships' crews and hospital services workers that could have been avoided if the government had respected the groups' concerns and sat down with them before the situation reached a critical stage. These people were trying to convince the government of the fundamental injustice of discriminating between workers who perform the same jobs but who live in different parts of the country or are of different genders. The government resorted to back to work legislation but still refused to acknowledge any responsibility for the terrible situation. When the conciliation board recommended that wage parity be given to these groups, the government filed a minority report objecting to the recommendations.

This attitude is shameful. If the government refuses to pay the same wages for the same job, then its so–called commitment to pay equity is a sham, as has been said before here today. We challenge the government to put its money where its mouth is. The government has made a tiny gesture toward these demands, but it is an empty gesture. Regional rates of pay differ according to zones and the general labour and trades groups have seen the number of zones reduced from 15 to 10. This is meaningless. The basic principle remains: certain people are paid less than others for doing the exact same job.

Pay equity is a thorny issue, but in this case the problem could not be clearer. The majority of trades personnel, as I said, are classified under the general labour and trades group. There are some interesting and some shocking figures to consider. The group is divided into 17 subgroups, and in 7 of the subgroups hourly wage rates in Atlantic Canada are the lowest in Canada and in 5 other subgroups they are the second lowest.

For instance, construction inspectors in the Atlantic provinces earn between $10.16 an hour and $13.30. For the same job in British Columbia, excluding metropolitan Vancouver and metropolitan Victoria, the pay is $11.82 and $15.63. What makes the job more valuable in British Columbia than it is in Prince Edward Island? This is the question Atlantic Canadians are asking. There are other examples, and they form an unmistakable pattern. An Atlantic Canadian makes less than his or her counterpart anywhere else in this huge country of ours, simply because of where he or she lives. There is no other reason.

I am sure that my colleagues on the other side of the House, and they have already done so, will rush to tell me that indeed there is very good reason for this. When the President of Treasury Board appeared before the legislative committee on Bill C–49 he said, and I quote from the minutes of the December 12 meeting: "Labour markets are not national. They are regional". This has been said here today. "If the federal government decided to pay all employees the same wages as it would pay in downtown Toronto, it would wreck the local economies in many regions of the country".

I suggest that the government is already doing a very good job of wrecking local economies, such as that of Atlantic Canada. If this theory is sound—and since I am not an economist I will not pass judgment on that here—I say that pay equity would be but a drop in the bucket. Our regional economy is already in deep trouble largely because of federal measures such as the gutting of the UI program, the failure to renew the ERDAs, the cutbacks to ACOA, the mismanagement of the fishery, and the inadequate package offered in its place.

Some members might respond that regional rates of pay only reflect the fact that the cost of living varies between areas. I will grant you it is true that it costs less to live in some parts of Atlantic Canada than it does, for instance, in downtown Toronto, but I have other problems with this argument.

How does reducing the individual spending power do anything to help the local economy? I should think that if more money, whether in the form of consumer spending or income taxes, goes into the local economy everyone benefits.

The argument avoids the fact that workers are discriminated against because of where they choose to live and raise their family. This is just another way, as was said over here today, of preaching resettlement to Atlantic Canadians as an answer to their problems. They say: "You want to earn more money for the same job? Fine, move to Toronto and you will get it. Abandon your home. Abandon your friends. Pull up your roots". No, no, Atlantic Canadians refuse to accept this.

The minister stated, and again I quote: 'I will not in any way make a commitment that this government is going to get rid of the concept of regional rates of pay. It would not make sense".

What does not make sense and what is so offensive to workers is that the government is basically saying that some people are worth more than others. This has never been more obvious than it was last November when the east coast ships' crews were striking for wage parity with those on the west coast. Both groups risk their lives on the high seas to protect their coasts and to keep foreign fishermen from stealing even more of the fish than the government is already giving them. Both groups leave their families for months at a time to do this. According to their pay cheques, west coast lives were more valuable than east coast lives. No matter what anybody says that is the impression left.

It is my fundamental problem with any argument against pay equity that it is a matter of dignity and of respect for the individual. Pay equity is based on responsibility, not on geography. If this government's commitment to pay equity is more than just hollow rhetoric, it will abolish regional rates of pay. The government must stop treating Atlantic Canadians as second-class citizens.

I have heard much rhetoric here today about the differences between pay equity and regional rates of pay. What it all boils down to is that people are being paid less for doing the same thing, and this is wrong. I am pleased to support this motion put forward by my hon. colleague from Dartmouth.

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak to the motion of the hon. member for Dartmouth which reads:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider abolishing the Regional Rates of Pay now in force for certain regional federal government employees, in accordance with its stated policy of pay equity.

I feel quite qualified to speak on this matter as an employer from Atlantic Canada with a lot of experience in competing with the government for employees. I am sure the hon. member has good intentions, but in my view his motion will be very, very damaging to our economy in Atlantic Canada.

I will bet dollars to doughnuts that neither of the previous speakers have experienced the frustration and anger of losing their very best employee, the highest quality employee, the highest productive employee with years and years of training in whom they have invested or seeing them just walk away to go to a government job and leave them abandoned.

It is a frustrating experience and we cannot fight it because the private sector cannot compete with Ottawa for benefits and pay. The only way we can compete is to increase wages in our own business and sector to a level where we can compete and therefore the whole business expires and declines.

I believe it is absolutely essential to maintain equal pay for equal value in the private sector. It is interesting that the private sector with strong quality people will grow and prosper, but a government with strong quality people will not grow and prosper and will not add wealth and jobs to the economy. It will just do the opposite.

I would challenge the members from Dartmouth and Charlottetown to take a survey of their small shop owners and small industry owners in their towns. They should ask them if they would like to compete with Ottawa for their wages and employees. Maybe they could set up a 1–800 number and have the employers call and vote as to whether they want to compete with Ottawa for their employees.

This motion does not seem to recognize that the government compensation policy for its employees already takes into account many factors, including the issue of pay equity. This government has an enormous responsibility in its role as an employer. This responsibility extends not only to its valued resource, our employees of the federal Public Service, but it extends also to the taxpayers and other important employers across the country.

It appears to me that the other speakers do not take into account the other employers. They only consider the government as an employer. For the government employees, we must pursue a policy on rates and pay that recognizes the valuable contribution made by our public servants to the delivery of government programs and the continued high quality of service delivered to the public at large.

The government's policy on compensation recognizes the following principles: First, that the terms and conditions of employment for federal public servants should be comparable to but not lead those employees in the private sector who do similar work. I ask those members to check with employers in their towns and see how they feel about that one.

Second, that comparison with the private sector shall take into consideration factors of employment such as job security, pensions, hours of work, and other benefits. Sometimes the private sector just cannot compete with these.

Third, the federal Public Service compensation should be sufficient to recruit and retain qualified employees and be determined so that appropriate compensation relationships are maintained among Public Service occupations.

Fourth, most public servants should have the right to participate in the determination of their own compensation and particular conditions of employment through responsible collective bargaining.

Fifth, federal compensation settlements will contribute to reducing inflation and be fiscally responsible.

Sixth, recognition of pay equity implementation under the Human Rights Act is based on entirely different principles from those contained in the employer's policy on compensation, that is, the Canadian Human Rights Act does not take into account either the relevant market salaries or internal organizational salary relationships. The objective of the Canadian Human Rights Act is to change purposely these relationships where there is evidence of gender or sexual discrimination.

The government's policy on rates of pay is based on a job classification system that recognizes the skills, the effort, the responsibilities, and the working conditions encountered in the employment in the federal Public Service.

It is these factors which must be scrutinized in the analysis of the appropriate level of compensation for our employees and then compared to a similar job classification in the private sector to determine if the rate of pay is comparable to that of the private sector.

As I stated earlier, it is the policy of the government as an employer that the compensation for its employees should neither leave nor trail that of similar occupations in the tax paying private sector.

Coincidentally, it is these same factors—skill, effort, responsibilities, and working conditions—which be analysed when comparing jobs within the Public Service to ensure that the principle of equal pay for work of equal value is being adhered to.

It should be pointed out that geographic location is not considered by the Canadian Human Rights Commission as a factor in determining whether wage discrimination is occurring.

In addition to comparing the rates of pay for public servants with those of their occupational counterparts in the private sector, the government as an employer must in accordance with the Canadian Human Rights Act, must also consider all the factors of employment, not just rates of pay.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

MEASURE TO CHANGE NAME OF DUVERNAY CONSTITUENCY

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Duvernay) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-312 entitled an act to change the name of the electoral district of Duvernay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When shall the bill be read the second time? By unanimous consent, now?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Duvernay) moved that Bill C-312, an act to change the name of the electoral district of Duvernay be now read a second time and referred to Committee of the Whole.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order I think it would be appropriate if the hon. member from Duvernay would explain briefly to the House why he wants to change the name of his riding.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member can do that in Committee of the Whole.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and, by unanimous consent, considered in committee, reported, concurred in, read the third time and passed.

HIBERNIA DEVELOPMENT PROJECT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Epp that Bill C-44, an act respecting the Hibernia Development Project and to amend certain acts in relation thereto, be read a second time and referred to a legislative committee; and on the amendment of Mr. Barrett (p. 12464).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte had 10 minutes remaining for his speech, plus 10 minutes questions and comments.

Mr. Brian Tobin (Humber—St. Barbe—Baie Verte): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to continue my remarks on Bill C-44, particularly on the amendment put by the New Democratic Party.

When I spoke earlier, before debate on this bill was suspended, I dealt with each part of the amendment proposed by the New Democratic Party on Bill C-44, one after the other. I think it is illustrated quite clearly that none of the amendments being moved by the New Democratic Party to Bill C-44, upon serious, sober reflection, have any substance. The net effect of the amendments proposed by the new Democratic Party is, in essence, to suggest to the government and the people of Newfoundland that they have no role to play in the Hibernia development.

It represents an attitude on the part of the New Democratic Party that, in essence, big brother in Ottawa, as represented by the House of Commons, has to provide a degree of assurance in a whole variety of areas for the people of Newfoundland and Labrador because they are unable to provide for themselves any assurance about their future prosperity, the pace of development, the question of environmental protection, and, frankly, the question of equity participation by the federal government.

I think I was able to point out to my colleagues in the NDP, who I have to assume moved these amendments by accident and not by design, that, in fact, this motion is not well founded. It is my sincere hope that the New Democratic Party will withdraw these amendments and will not insist upon a vote on these amendments. Having heard something of the history of this development over the last decade or two, but in particular the last decade, for the New Democratic Party to insist upon these kinds of amendments in the House of Commons can only be seen as, first, an effort based upon an abysmal lack of knowledge about the history of the development. Second, it is essentially an attitude by the New Democratic Party—a paternalistic attitude at best—that says that the people, and in particular the elected representatives in the government of Newfoundland and Labrador, are composed of people who have some kind of inferiority that prevents them from representing their own best interest and from participating in a full way as a partner in this development.

As a Newfoundlander, and one who has watched the 10 years of debate that have gone on, I cannot accept, no matter how well-intentioned, the paternalistic attitude of the New Democratic Party which says that Newfoundlanders are intrinsically incapable of seizing and seeing their own best interest and representing themselves; and that we, as members of Parliament from Edmonton East or elsewhere in the country, as well intentioned as we may be, really ought to look after those people of Newfoundland because they are not able to look after themselves.

I hope that it not the intention. In fact I have difficulty believing that is the intention of the New Democratic Party, and I would expect that members of that caucus upon reflection will withdraw these amendments which can only be considered by any rational, intelligent, informed, and engaged human being as, I hope unintended, insult and offence to the people and the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador.

Clearly, it is unusual in the first instance for amendments to be moved on a bill even before that bill has gone to a legislative committee. That is rarely done in this place and, in essence, the attempt to move amendments becomes a form of filibuster. It becomes a basic vote of no confidence in the bill. They have not even given it a chance to be amended or studied in committee. They have not even heard witnesses and already they want to amend the bill.

I say to my colleagues in the New Democratic Party that, if they do not withdraw these amendments, no amount of woolly language and no amount of slippery words are going to convince Newfoundlanders of anything other than that the New Democratic Party of Canada, the national New Democratic Party, is opposed to the Hibernia development. The national New Democratic Party, as they say right in their amendment, does not believe that Hibernia deserves the financial participation of the Government of Canada, and thereby of all Canadians, in this project on behalf of the notion of security of supply and, frankly, on behalf of the notion that Newfoundlanders deserve to share in the wealth and the opportunity for prosperity in the country.

My friend from Edmonton East, a member from Alberta, stood up and said: "I am from Alberta. I know all about energy development. It brings prosperity, but it brings problems too. It can bring disaster. It can bring misery. It can bring tremendous problems for the people who live in the province where energy development occurs." I found that an incredibly arrogant remark from the member.

I want to tell the member from Alberta, the member for Edmonton East, I know that energy development means challenge. I know and Newfoundlanders know that we have to be concerned about the pace of development. I know and Newfoundlanders know that we have to be concerned about protection of the environment, but let me tell him that the problems of prosperity are infinitely preferable to the problems of poverty. It is insulting and arrogant to suggest that he has suffered prosperity and that Newfoundlanders are far better off continuing to live in poverty.

It takes a special kind, may I suggest humbly, of pomposity to say: "I have had the wealth. We have rolled around in the prosperity of development and, believe you me, we have had difficulty from the vantage point of Alberta handling that prosperity, both the good and the bad. We want to keep you Newfoundlanders in your quaint little village with your high unemployment, with your particular culture, and with your particular way of life, shielded from the problems of prosperity, because you are really quaint, cute, valuable, and unique in your poverty." Well, I cannot accept that kind of reasoning from the New Democratic Party.

I have to believe that a couple of people ill-informed in that caucus, without the knowledge of the greater number of the members, hopefully without the knowledge of the leader and certainly without the knowledge of the New Democratic Party of Newfoundland and Labrador, moved this ill-considered amendment. Right now, as I speak the truth of the words that I utter on behalf of the people of Newfoundland and Labrador, I have to believe the confidence that I expressed in the ability of the Government of Newfoundland and Labrador to be a partner in this project and to participate with the national government and the consortium, and the confidence that I have that the legislature of Newfoundland will represent the views and interests of Newfoundland will permeate the fog that obviously prevails around the minds of those who drafted these amendments, Mr. Barrett and others, and the New Democratic Party will withdraw these amendments. The choices are two: Withdraw these amendments, recognize the ability of Newfoundland to speak for itself and to be a full partner; or have the courage to stand up and say clearly and without any equivocation that the New Democratic Party of Canada opposes Hibernia development.

The New Democratic Party of Canada is saying to Newfoundland that it does not believe, as a party, that the investment by the national government is warranted in Hibernia. It does not believe that the opportunity for new kinds of jobs, high-tech jobs, and permanent jobs should happen in Newfoundland and Labrador.

That is the challenge to the New Democratic Party. It is not to hide behind weasel words, not to hide behind phoney concern for Newfoundlanders, and not to assume that only the New Democratic Party can speak for Newfoundlanders, that they are unable to speak for themselves. The challenge is to admit honestly and openly that the party, the New Democratic Party, with these amendments, is saying to Newfoundland and Newfoundlanders everywhere: "You are not deserving. Hibernia is not deserving of the financial support of the federal government, and we oppose this project." Say it openly and say it honestly. At least it shall have the admiration of the people of my province for the courage of its convictions as much as we disagree. But do not hand us paternalism, do not hand us big brotherism, and do not tell us that they are doing it in our best interest because we, in our ignorance, know not what is good for us.

I say to the NDP: "Have the courage of your convictions, withdraw these foolish and insulting amendments, or stand clearly and say that you oppose the development of Newfoundland. Stand clearly and say that you genuinely believe that the so-called joy of poverty is preferable to the problems of prosperity. Say that to Newfoundlanders and they shall hold this New Democratic Party in judgment for this foolish delaying tactic of a project that is long overdue and urgently needed in the province of Newfoundland and Labrador."

Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I listened very intently to the member's speech and I was astounded when he spoke of pomposity and arrogance because what I was hearing was exactly that. I heard a member who totally ignores, as perhaps governments in Newfoundland in the past have done, assistance or ideas from those outside.

I point the member to events in the have-not province of Saskatchewan under Tommy Douglas and the New Democratic Party. That was a party that knew where it wanted to go and how to get there. Unlike the Liberals and the Conservatives, this was a party with ideas, this was a party that was willing to come up with new ideas.

I ask the member, how many New Democratic Party governments has Newfoundland and Canada seen? Which parties have led the country and the provinces to the economic problems they have now? Which parties has it been?

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I was asked a question and I am glad to answer it. The member has asked how many New Democratic governments has Canada had. I am tempted to say in response to this so-called question that obviously we have had too many New Democratic Party governments in the country.

I am not one who usually spends much time having knee-jerk, philosophical reactions to the NDP. Frankly, on occasion, I find myself in agreement with it. But I must say that when I see this kind of bill I do not hesitate to tell my friends in the New Democratic Party that I think they have lost their minds. I do not think they have done their homework. I think they have been misled. I think they are confused. I think they do not even realize this is offensive.

The issue here is not that parties or people from other parts of Canada cannot give advice to Newfoundland. They are more than welcome to give advice to Newfoundland. They are more than welcome to come and visit my riding and give all the free advice they are willing to pass out. In many cases, it will be genuinely and happily accepted.

I do not subscribe to the notion that I am not able to speak about British Columbia, Ontario, Quebec, Saskatchewan, or Manitoba. I think I am and I have an interest, as a Canadian member of parliament, in those provinces.

What I do subscribe to, as well as a right to speak about B.C., is a responsibility to understand what it is I am speaking about, a responsibility to have done my homework, a responsibility to understand the issue, a responsibility to understand the history of the development and an understanding to have knowledge not just biases or instincts as forces upon which I make my statements.

All I am saying to my hon. friends in the New Democratic Party—and they have not responded in detail—is that this amendment, moved even before we go into the legislative committee, the normal process, is a vote of non-confidence in Hibernia. I asked the member for Edmonton East earlier whether or not this meant that the bill should be defeated. He said that whether the amendment is passed or not, the bill ought to be defeated.

The member for Edmonton East had the courage to say that the New Democratic Party of Canada is opposed to Hibernia. In reality he said that, hidden behind this agenda of so-called amendments to help the quaint people of Newfoundland, is a clear statement by the New Democratic Party, the party of the little people, the party of the impoverished, the party of the poor, the party of the least advantaged, that it has given a boot to the people of Newfoundland, the province of highest unemployment in Canada.

Hidden behind the so-called party of energy self-sufficiency and security of supply is the party that says that offshore oil and gas ought not to be developed. That is what we have, hiding behind the party that has a member from Alberta who has prospered and seen some prosperity from energy development. It is the hypocrisy that the prosperity can be handled by those who live in Alberta, as difficult as it is, but Newfoundland really is better at handling poverty. They say we ought to stop this bill.

The hon. members of the NDP ought to stand up and be counted, speak forthrightly and quit these weasel words, pretending to have an interest in somebody and in an issue on which they obviously have not done their homework.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I would have hoped that the hon. member who represents a riding in Newfoundland would not take this debate to such a low.

The hon. member has succeeded in doing that. What is happening is that the hon. member for Edmonton East happens to come from Alberta—I am treading on dangerous ground and implying motives. What we are seeing now is a dynamic that is tearing our country apart. We are seeing it on a daily basis, and it is this kind of analysis that only feeds that dynamic.

The New Democratic Party represents all of Canada and works for the interests of all Canadians. The hon. member can very well cloak himself in the Newfoundland flag and feel that he is speaking for his riding. That is his right and duty. But we see things on a larger scale. We speak for all of Canada.

In fact, I think there are international aspects to this deal that need to be looked at, and I will address those in my speech. I just caution the member that the kind of regional hit-list that he is invoking today is not creative. It does not bring a solution to the problem. Because the hon. member who moved or supported the motion was from Edmonton East, it does not disqualify him from making comments on economic projects, on billions of dollars of taxpayers' dollars.

I ask the member this question. Does he believe that, because the hon. member for Edmonton East is from Alberta, it disqualifies him from commenting on this expenditure of Canadian taxpayer dollars?

Mr. Tobin: Mr. Speaker, I made it very clear in my last comments that I would invite every hon. member of the New Democratic Party to come to Newfoundland to visit, to comment and to do some research to understand the history of the issue.

This hon. member has not been standing up and suggesting that hon. members outside Newfoundland have no right to comment, quite the contrary. In his last response, this hon. member made clear that he has a right and a responsibility to comment on issues affecting every other part of Canada. I frequently do in this place.

Along with the right to comment as a Canadian about Canadian issues, comes a responsibility to be informed. Because I have a right to comment on what is happening in every part of Canada does not give me the right to comment without having done my homework. All I suggested to members of the New Democratic Party is not that they have no right to speak about Newfoundland issues, but that you have a responsibility to have done your homework. The issue I raise is not that members should not speak because they are from Alberta or British Columbia. What I have said is that the NDP should have done its homework on the issue.

Bill C-44 is a piece of enabling legislation which allows the federal government, the provincial government and a private sector consortium to reach arrangements for the development of Hibernia. However, the effect of the NDP amendments will eliminate the role of the government of Newfoundland and Labrador. The NDP are saying that there is only a role to be played by the federal government and the consortium.

The Minister of Energy is across from me now. The effect of these amendments is that the Newfoundland government has no role. There is a role for Ottawa. There is a role for the big boys in the corporate towers of Toronto but there is no role for Newfoundland. I cannot accept that. I am saying that if the NDP do not understand that is the effect of their amendment, perhaps it is by accident, not by design. It is one or the other. If you have not understood that is the effect of the amendment, Mr. Speaker, is what I am saying to my colleagues in the NDP, if it is an accident, withdraw the amendments and we will understand you made a mistake. If it is by design that you moved this kind of a motion, then have the courage to say it honestly and you will be judged accordingly by every region of Canada. This is not an issue about which you cannot speak. You have a right to speak. You have a responsibility to speak, but you have a responsibility as well to be informed. That is what I say to my colleagues in the New Democratic Party.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, it has been over 10 years since significant amounts of oil were discovered off the east coast of Canada. In that short time there has been a revolution in the energy sector in this country. Oil is not just oil anymore. How we find it and how we use it is still part of our energy policy, of course, but there is a new way of looking at energy policy. There is a new criterion by which energy policy is to be judged. That new criterion is the effect the exploration, development and use of our energy resources have on the environment. After all, in the words of the Brundtland report, Our Common Future, "choosing an energy strategy inevitably means choosing an environmental strategy".

When it comes to the environment, this bill does not cut the mustard. In the absence of other concerted ameliorative actions, Bill C-44 proposes a course of action that is environmentally unsound. It promotes unsustainable development.

In my remarks this evening I would like first to address some of the serious environmental problems associated with offshore drilling and development. Second, I would like to take a broader view. I would like to consider how this bill fits into the government's sorry environmental record. What name comes to mind when you think of oil tankers plying our coastal waters? How about when I mention tankers running aground such as the Exxon Valdez. Oil tankers, waves, rocks and in the inevitable human error make a dangerous mix. Add fog, darkness, icebergs or screaming winds and tanker accidents, given time, become a virtual certainty.

Marine accidents do not just happen off the west coast. On October 9, 1984 a 30-thousand tonne Liberian-registered bulk carrier nearly rammed the drill rig Sedco 706 which had about 80 people on board. The ship came so close to the rig that it actually came between the anchor chain and the rig before being intercepted by supply vessel.

Canadians will also remember the tragic loss of life that occurred when the semi-submersible drill rig Ocean Ranger capsized and sank in 1982 during a furious storm. Busy tanker traffic to and from Hibernia's tanker loading facilities will inevitably increase the chances that just such an accident involving an oil tanker will occur. After the television coverage of the Exxon Valdez disaster, I do not have to remind Canadians of the environmental devastation that is caused by the thousands of tonnes of oil that can spew from a stricken tanker. I do not have to remind Canadians of the damage to fish stocks and to other marine life so fundamental to the lives of hundreds of thousands of Canadians in Atlantic Canada, people whose livelihoods are already threatened by actions of this Conservative government.

Oil spills also occur when offshore petroleum wells blow out. Since 1970 there have been six natural gas blowouts on the Canadian offshore, the most recent of which occurred in the Beaufort Sea just last June. In the Atlantic, three blowouts have occurred recently. On February 22, 1984, machine failure and lack of proper blowout prevention procedures caused a gas blowout of the semi-submersible drilling platform Vinland.

Another natural gas well blew out of control 290 kilometres off the Nova Scotia coast in February, 1985. That blowout lasted for several months. Yet another gas well blew out at West Venture, N-91, off Sable Island in April, 1985.

Natural gas well blowouts are more common and less harmful than oil well blowouts. But oil wells can blow too.

That is why I was shocked to learn that Canada is simply not prepared for an oil spill off the coast of Newfoundland. This fact is outlined in a report entitled Oil Spill Preparedness in the Upstream Petroleum Industry, released November 22, 1989, by the Canadian Petroleum Association and the Independent Petroleum Association of Canada.

This report which was reviewed in the November 23, 1989 Financial Post, and again in the March 22, 1990, Globe and Mail, concluded that:

> On the Grand Banks, industry does not presently have appropriate equipment or sufficient support vessels to respond immediately to an oil blowout and to clean up a blowout spill.

The report goes on to say that in a worst case scenario, as much as 32 times the volume of oil lost by the Exxon Valdez could be spilled into the most productive fishing grounds in the North Atlantic.

Moreover, the report states that in the event of a blowout during a storm on in the presence of significant amounts of ice:

> —containment and recovery efficiency would be reduced, likely to zero per cent.

My colleague, the member for Edmonton East quizzed the president of the Canadian Petroleum Association, Mr. Maciej during a meeting of the Standing Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources on February 8, 1990. Mr. Maciej said that:

> —if the project proceeds it will be accompanied by the necessary preparedness to deal with oil spills.

When my colleague asked how this was to be guaranteed, Mr. Maciej replied: "It will just happen." He later elaborated slightly by saying that: "The approval of the department plan—requires that kind of action."

Well, most Canadians would not be very reassured by those comments. You can bet that my colleagues and I will be watching the situation very, very closely.

There is another significant threat to Hibernia and other similar projects that is not well known among Canadians who do not live in Atlantic Canada. Icebergs, huge icebergs towering like skyscrapers above the water, some weighing up to 50 million tonnes, are one of the most serious threats to east coast offshore activities.

Icebergs and bits that break off them are obviously a serious threat to tankers in the vicinity of Hibernia.

Drifting icebergs are also known to have forced personnel on movable drilling rigs to halt activities and flee their destructive presence.

Such icebergs are capable of gouging massive trenches in the sea bed, trenches up to 15 metres deep, 200 metres across and several kilometres long. This enormous power threatens Hibernia's proposed loading facilities and oil-gathering lines.

To be fair, this issue was considered during Mobile Oil's Environmental Impact Assessment in 1985. However, Cle Newhook then executive director of the Ocean Ranger Foundation, now leader of the Newfoundland and Labrador NDP, was quoted on October 17, 1985, in The Chronicle-Herald from Halifax expressing serious concerns that Mobile's assessment contained, in his words, "dangerous underestimates" of the wind, wave, current and ice conditions on the Grand Banks.

Many other people remain unconvinced that Hibernia's cement gravity-based structure, huge though it will be, together with its more fragile pipelines and tanker loading facilities will be capable of withstanding the full force of a massive iceberg during a raging storm.

It seems clear that many environmental questions about this project have not been answered, and indeed are difficult to answer definitively.

Oil industry analyst Ian Doig asked a crucial question in a Financial Post article on September 16, 1989, when he wrote:

> The gravity based structure, GBS, will not just disappear when its use is finished. How do you hide 450,000 metric tons of concrete standing 357 feet tall?

Mr. Doig then suggested that, and I quote:

> The revised project will probably have to be submitted to the Canada-Newfoundland Offshore Petroleum Board (CNOPB) for approval. And certainly the plans for the eventual abandonment of the GBS structure will have to win environmental approval from Ottawa before work begins.

Speaking of environmental reviews, the Environmental Impact Statement conducted by Mobil and released in 1985 did not even consider or mention carbon dioxide emissions that will result from this fossil fuel megaproject. It is possible by aggressively pursuing the development of energy alternatives and energy conservation to ensure the Hibernia development would not result in an increase in Canada's CO_2 emissions, even given the emission reduction target that we should be setting for ourselves in the next decade.

A major report released last August by the Toronto consulting group, DPA Group Incorporated, indicated that Canada could combat the greenhouse effect by slashing carbon dioxide emissions by 20 per cent by the year 2005 and save $100 billion in the process.

The point is that the government, through this bill, has effectively ignored the global warming issue altogether. I imagine some hon. members across the way are asking: What has carbon dioxide got to do with Bill C-44? It is simple. Bill C-44 provides for the extraction of a whole new source of CO_2 emissions. Listen to what the Prime Minister said on June 27, 1988, at the International Conference on the Changing Atmosphere held in Toronto.

> The world is coming to recognize what we believe to be self-evident—that development and environmental protection are mutually reinforcing, not mutually exclusive. Our economic activity must be increasingly compatible with today's environmental facts of life.

Later in the same speech, the Prime Minister stated:

> In no area is the link between our economic activity and environmental disruption more evident or more troubling than in the area of energy policy. Canada is committed to applying the principles of sustainable development to our energy future.

So what about CO_2 and global warming? The conference statement for the 1988 Toronto conference entitled The Changing Atmosphere: Implications for Global Security stated that, and I quote:

> The earth's atmosphere is being changed at an unprecedented rate by pollutants resulting from human activities, inefficient and wasteful fossil fuel use and the effects of rapid population growth in many regions.

It was stark language that the conference used in speaking of the changing atmosphere.

I want to draw the particular attention of the House to this quote:

> Humanity is conducting an unintended, uncontrolled, globally pervasive experiment whose ultimate consequences could be second only to global nuclear war.

It should be noted that the Prime Minister did sign the Hague Declaration entitled Our Common Future: It's in our Hands. That declaration emphasized the importance of all countries doing their bit to prevent atmospheric pollution. It stated:

> Because of the nature of the dangers involved, remedies to be sought involve—the duty of the community of nations, vis-à-vis future and present generations to do all that can be done to preserve the quality of the atmosphere.

• (1850)

More recently, before his untimely departure from cabinet, the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean made many statements about global warming on behalf of his government. He stated in a Toronto Star interview published on April 18, 1990 that:

> We have sufficient indications (of global warming) to implement whatever action we can now.

On April 17, 1990 in Washington, D.C., speaking to reporters after a conference on global warming, the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean said that:

> The price of inaction is too high to wait for further research.

In a column published in the November 1, 1989 edition of The Finance Post the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean wrote:

> We can accept our responsibilities as leaders or we can abdicate.

Even the Energy Minister admits that actions need to be taken. He stated, during the December 11, 1989 meeting of the Standing Committee on Energy, Mines and Resources, that:

> Based on information I have received in the department from scientists and others who are working on global warming within the department, I am convinced that we have to reduce emissions, that they have negative effects on climate.

Clearly, on the level of government pronouncements, the Mulroney government is quick to agree that much needs to be done to protect the environment.

For its pronouncements to mean anything significant, Canada has to begin to put its own House in order. We clearly have a valuable role to play. After all, although Canada is directly responsible for about 2 per cent of the total global CO2 emissions, we are one of the most energy-inefficient countries in the world. Canadians consume more energy per person than is the case in the U.S.A., Sweden, Germany, the U.K. and Japan, and the situation is getting worse.

From the perspective of energy use per thousand dollars GDP, we also use more energy than the U.S.A., Sweden, the U.K., Germany and Japan.

We live in a cold country, it is true, but in addition we are extremely wasteful. We could use substantially less energy, thereby polluting much less, without making significant changes to our way of life, but so far the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has been heading in the opposite direction.

In the 1989-90 budget the government closed 12 conservation and renewable energy offices across the country. These offices provided information to people in the regions on how they could save money and energy at the same time. In fact they did not even interfere in the market-place, they only provided information, but the government closed them down. The government cut funding for conservation and renewable energy, according to figures from the Energy Department, from $410 million in 1984-85 to $40 million for 1990-91. That is a 90 per cent cut. This simply boggles the mind and it surely qualifies for yet another example of this government's stunning hypocrisy.

The Mulroney government publicly support the Brundtland Report and claimed to be very concerned about global warming. At the same time, it cut already limited funding for the most effective government programs to combat global warming and, instead, poured billions of dollars into Hibernia, a fossil fuel project that will add to global warming.

In conclusion, I urge the federal government to examine much more closely the environmental consequences of this project in particular, and its energy policy in general. This government has a long way to go to address environmental concerns.

The hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean is quoted as saying in The Globe and Mail report on April 19, 1990:

> I don't think we should be afraid to be taking the lead.

Unfortunately, as this bill stands and in the absence of other concerted ameliorative actions, Bill C-44 proposes a course of action that is environmentally unsound and which constitutes unsustainable development.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, earlier today my New Democrat colleague, the member for Edmonton East, outlined why we in the New Democratic Party oppose this bill. He emphasized that we do not oppose the Hibernia project itself, but that we oppose this bill because it will not provide, among other things, the employment opportunities that the people of Newfoundland and Labrador deserve.

I do not propose to go into the sad history of dashed hopes and political opportunism that lies behind this bill, nor will I enter into a detailed description of the financial arrangements in the bill itself. Instead I will proceed directly from the remarks of my colleagues and focus on another serious shortcoming of the government's legislation.

This bill fails to provide adequate economic benefits for the people of Newfoundland and Labrador in particular, and for the people of Canada in general.

The Conservative government claims to support this bill, in part because of the economic spin-offs associated with the Hibernia development.

The Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources has repeatedly emphasized this point. For example, he was quoted in the Toronto Star on September 13, 1989, as saying:

> We want the Hibernia project to take place. It is a project of national importance and it is a project for regional benefits, particularly for Newfoundland and Labrador.

In the House of Commons when my colleague from Edmonton East, the New Democratic energy critic, questioned the minister about plans the government might have to minimize the project's environmental effects, the minister responded by claiming quite wrongly that we opposed economic development for Atlantic Canada. He stated and I quote:

> New Democrats are opposed to Hibernia. I guess they want the unemployment in Newfoundland. They do not want the industrial benefits in Newfoundland. I am simply saying, you want all the benefits, but you do not want to take any of the responsibility.

I am pleased to say that the minister was totally wrong. We on this side of the House care very much about job creation, about everyday folk getting a fair deal, about our children having an even better opportunity in life than we have had.

That is why we examined the bill closely from the perspective of economic development. That examination demonstrated to us that the bill will not provide nearly enough benefit to Newfoundlanders and Canadians.

Contrary to the impression left by the minister that we imposed regional benefits, we want Newfoundlanders and Canadians to benefit from this project, and that is exactly why we oppose the bill. Just for a change, we want the federal government to take seriously the notion of economic diversification.

The simple fact is that the government, through this bill, is promoting a huge energy project that will bring precious little in the way of economic benefits to ordinary Newfoundlanders. That, to put it politely, is shameful.

The government should pay careful attention to the following statement contained in the background report prepared in 1986, written for the Royal Commission on Employment and Unemployment in Newfoundland and Labrador. It recognizes that Newfoundlanders will come up short in economic spin-offs. It states:

> It is must be recognized that the majority of Hibernia development expenditures will be incurred outside Newfoundland. The skilled labour force in the province is limited. The number of local companies capable of significant involvement in the offshore industry is also relatively small.

Let me repeat that quotation from the Royal Commission on Employment and Unemployment in Newfoundland and Labrador.

> It must be recognized that the majority of Hibernia development expenditures will be incurred outside Newfoundland.

Newfoundlanders will remember the two cabinet ministers holding a news conference in July 1988 to tell Quebecers that they could look forward to landing a large portion of the Hibernia contracts available to Canadian companies. At that time the Minister of Regional and Industrial Expansion estimated that Newfoundland would receive about $770 million worth of Hibernia contracts, while other provinces between them would get more than twice as much, about $1.83 billion in contracts. All that was before the free trade agreement and its national treatment provisions.

One of the original hopes of Hibernia was that it would provide Newfoundlanders with considerable economic benefit. This bill certainly will not satisfy that aspiration.

A study about how much money from offshore oil and gas exploration actually stays in Newfoundland was conducted by the offshore Business Development Division of the provincial Department of Development in 1985. That study found that in the preceding five years, while oil companies spent nearly $1.5 billion in Newfoundland, less than 20 per cent of that stayed in the province.

Newfoundlanders have also been led to expect that Hibernia will bring royalty and tax money into the province. Incredibly, Newfoundlanders will gain much less than they thought they would just a few years ago.

Last year the official in charge of Norway's multi-billion dollar petroleum industry was quoted in the St. John's Evening Telegram of March 11, 1989 calling the Hibernia deal "more generous to the oil companies" than would be allowed in his country.

In fact, even before the recent redesign of the project which will result in fewer benefits accruing to Newfoundland, the Hibernia deal was severely criticized for being a very bad deal for Atlantic Canada.

For its part the provincial government has given up an enormous amount in potential benefits by granting a sales tax holiday, providing corporate income tax concessions and designing a royalty regime that will result in the province forgoing billions of dollars on royalties. Many observers have pointed out that the provincial government made so many concessions, and Newfoundlanders will benefit so little from the project.

The people of Newfoundland and Labrador deserve more than this. Yet the Conservative government insists that Newfoundlanders should be grateful and they want us to support this bill, this financial strait-jacket for Newfoundland and Labrador.

We New Democrats are not the only ones to recognize that the Hibernia deal is not a good one for Atlantic Canada. A former federal Liberal energy critic indicated that a much better deal could have been struck. While in opposition the present Premier of Newfoundland was a vocal opponent of the deal. Mr. Wells' opposition is rather more muted these days, but he certainly was strongly opposed to the deal at an earlier stage when he was in opposition. It was instructive to remember what Mr. Wells was saying a few months ago. He said:

> Mr. Peckford and the federal government did a terrible job on the Hibernia deal. The agreement in principle gives away more than we are getting in return. There are no significant benefits for Newfoundland.

He also said:

> Unless there is a massive increase in the price of oil, which nobody at this stage is predicting, there will be very low royalties to start with, and the royalties that are paid will result in virtually a dollar for dollar reduction in (federal) equalization payments. So the net cash value to Newfoundland will be virtually nil.

The problems with the deal do not end with the provincial royalty and tax regime. What about the economic spin-offs? What about the opportunities for business in Newfoundland to supply goods and services for the project?

They do not look good. Based on the offshore oil experience in Norway and Scotland, Newfoundland's development minister is already warning local companies that they might have a hard time meeting the exacting standards the owners of the project will demand. He said: "Alarm bells should be going off in company heads right now".

The article from which I just quoted went on to refer to what he called a typical purchase order of Mobil Oil and said:

> The quality control requirements imposed by the offshore oil industry are more stringent than those normally encountered by Canadian contractors and suppliers, excepting perhaps those involved in the nuclear industry.

That sounds a lot like a foreign multinational letting Newfoundland business know that it is going to be out of luck. But there is more: perhaps the government will help local businesses meet those exacting standards imposed by the oil industry.

According to one article, about $500,000 has already been spent on this, but according to the province's energy minister right now only three or four businesses meet the specifications for quality control. Three or four businesses only, Mr. Speaker, and according to the minister only a number of others will be able to meet those standards. That is clearly not economic diversification.

What about using the old to diversify the Newfoundland economy? There will be no luck there either.

In Alberta, petroleum feed stocks were provided to the petrochemical industry at a reduced price to give it a competitive advantage. The trade deal prevents Newfoundland from enjoying this diversification tool. The deal prohibits government policies intended to result in energy prices for domestic purposes that are lower than export prices. It is practically impossible for Newfoundland to spur local refining or develop a profitable petrochemical industry using oil stock from the Hibernia and nearby fields.

Similarly under the trade deal there is no possibility that Newfoundlanders in particular, or Canadians in general, will have priority access to Hibernia oil subsidized with Canadian public funds.

What seems more likely is that most of the Hibernia oil will be shipped straight to the United States, and that most of it will not even be refined in Newfoundland.

Not only will Newfoundlanders not get the jobs that refining represents, not only will the province not get the economic spin-offs that could come from refining it, on top of it all Canadians by subsidizing Hibernia will in effect be subsidizing American consumers.

That is not what we in the New Democratic Party call economic diversification for Newfoundlanders.

Aside from these forgone financial opportunities, there are also very real social costs associated with any megaproject like Hibernia. These often receive very little attention, even though large energy developments in other provinces have all too frequently led to serious social problems resulting from rapid population shifts, inadequate planning, and a lack of human services and facilities.

The Community Services Council recommended to the Hibernia environmental assessment panel that Mobile should be required to set aside adequate funding for social planning and research. The Canadian Mental Health Association indicated that not enough base line data existed to forecast accurately the social services that will be required.

Other organizations have stressed the need for additional day care facilities in the province so that women are not prevented from obtaining those employment opportunities that will exist.

All these things take planning. All these things will end up costing the people of Canada and Newfoundland money.

Given these often ignored costs and given the deal's shocking paucity of benefits for Newfoundland, it is not surprising that even the Premier of Newfoundland stated in a state of the province address on January 11 the following:

> It may well be in the best interests of the people of this province to leave the oil in the ground until we get the real benefits.

Whenever I think about this bill and the agreement behind it and about all those people who believe that it makes no economic sense for the people of province or the country, I am reminded of the great myth that Conservatives are supposed to be good economic managers. I think this is a good example of hypocrisy on the part of the government.

On the one hand the Conservatives frequently portray themselves as good economic managers and foster the ideology of the market oriented approach. Yet here they are using billions of dollars of public funds and a massive intervention in the market-place to subsidize a project that makes little economic sense and will bring few benefits to Newfoundlanders. This point is not lost on business commentators. Oil analyst, Ian Doig, points out that of all oil production in the world 99.5 per cent of it would be less costly than Hibernia oil. The Associate Editor of The Financial Post, Terence Corcoran, in an article on July 26, 1988 wrote:

At best, Hibernia and the other megadollar sinkholes re-establish corporations as corporate welfare bums—

Quite clearly, the Conservative market ideology demands that ordinary Canadians survive as best they can in the market–place. The wealthy and the powerful, however, apparently have to be induced to venture into those inhospitable climes.

And what an inducement Hibernia backers will get: up to more than $3 billion in free money, loans, and loan guarantees. Of that, more than $1 billion will be in the form of a direct grant, free money with no strings attached. A billion dollars in free government money can be a wonderfully comforting thing to have when the chill winds of the market start to blow.

Not even the Alberta government, which for years was rolling in petro–dollars, was ever that profligate. When the time came for it to ante up its contribution to the giant Syncrude oil sands plant in Fort McMurray, the Alberta government made sure that Albertans could share in the project's successes. Through a combination of equity and convertible debentures later converted to equity, the Alberta government came to hold 16.74 per cent of Syncrude directly. The 16.74 per cent share generated returns for the people of Alberta of more than $410 million in the 1980s alone. That is almost twice the original cost to Alberta of its participation in the project.

By investing in Syncrude through equity and convertible debentures instead of simply giving away money as this government is doing, the people of Alberta secured a tidy profit over time and have retained share holdings which have doubled in value over the years going from about $250 million to over $500 million. What is more, the $500 million is still there to be used in any future projects the government might desire.

The question which hangs on this bill is: Why not equity? Why did the Conservative government not obtain an equity participation in the Hibernia project? Why not secure for the Canadian people a dollar's worth of equity for every dollar they put into the project? Surely, if the Conservative Government of Alberta is capable of realizing and acting upon this sensible concept, the Conservative Government of Canada should take the hint, but no it prefers the role of corporate Santa Claus, giving billions of dollars away, to the role of prudent husbander of the public purse.

In summary, this bill fails to provide for adequate economic benefits for the people of Newfoundland and Labrador in particular and for the people of Canada in general. That has been pointed out by many in Newfoundland, including the present Premier of Newfoundland. For this reason alone, as well as for the other reasons presented by my colleagues, the bill deserves defeat at second reading.

For those reasons, I support the amendments of the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The question is on the amendment standing in the name of Mr. Barrett. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the amendment?

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

SCOTIA SYNFUELS PROJECT

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, tonight I would like to return to a question I raised in the House on May 25, 1990 to which the leader of the government in the House of Commons responded on behalf of the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. The question concerned in a narrow sense the Scotia Synfuels Project for coal liquefaction in Cape Breton and specifically the approval by the government of an application by the company for a package of assistance containing principally the Cape Breton Investment Tax Credit and certain loan guarantees available through the department of Industry, Science and Technology.

The Scotia Synfuels Project in its proposal to use a liquefaction process to convert high sulphur Cape Breton coal in an oil mixture into a clean source of energy to serve the needs of Atlantic Canadians and for export has been under development for several years. The technology has been proven.

The jobs and the spin-off benefits in eastern Nova Scotia are well established. As well, the general soundness of the project in environmental and other terms are widely acknowledged and well established. They were enumerated at some length in a speech in this House by my colleague, the member for Cape Breton—The Sydneys on May 28.

While the question concerned the narrow issue of the government's support for this project, it concerns broader issues as well. It concerns the seriousness of this government's commitment to seeking out more environmentally friendly ways of producing energy sources from our fossil fuels. It concerns the seriousness of the government's commitment to ensuring that Canada is on the leading edge of technology in an area in which we should have an important comparative advantage and which is definitely going to be vital for the future success of our economy. It concerns as well the seriousness of this government's commitment to fostering industrial development in Atlantic Canada. It concerns the willingness of this government to take risks, even moderate risks, in support of progressive technology in a part of the country that badly needs it.

In his reply to my colleague's remarks on May 28 the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Employment and Immigration pointed out that his government had funded to the tune of 50 per cent the cost of a feasibility study on this project. He also said that "this government wants to be certain that an investment of public funds results in durable and viable jobs for the long term".

The principals of this project are anxious to do whatever they can to prove to this government and to demonstrate the technical and commercial viability of this project. They have been doing so for several years. They have had Wood Gundy, one of the prominent investment firms in Canada, produce a study which declared the project commercially viable, provided that the regular incentive programs available through this government were made available to the project, including the Cape Breton Investment Tax Credit. They have responded to the concerns raised by the Department of Energy, Mines and Resources about the economics of the project and have proven that the economics of the project are indeed favourable because and not in spite of its location in the east coast of Canada.

The principals are anxious to proceed with the next stage of the project, to firm up the cost estimates, to establish the market sources for the product, and to secure the necessary financing so that construction and jobs can commence.

The people of Cape Breton, and in particular the people of the Strait of Canso area where industrial activity has lagged since this government came to power in 1984, are anxious to see this project proceed. They are anxious to see the benefits and the jobs which will come through the commencement of this important project, but the government keeps waffling. It keeps passing the buck from one department to the other, from Energy, Mines and Resources to DIST, from DIST to ACOA, and from ACOA back to Energy, Mines and Resources.

The company is frustrated. It wants to know what more it can do. What other information can it provide this government? What concrete conditions does it need to meet in order to be able to get a firm, positive answer on the part of this government as to whether it will be able to receive this investment tax credit which is vital to the success of this project? What is more aggravating is that the government does not really need to share the risk upfront on this project. The investment tax credit will only cost the government money once the company has developed investment sources and the project has begun to earn taxable revenue. The project could earn up to $800 million in tax revenue for the government during its life, not to mention some of the other benefits.

Although there are some risks in the loan guarantees and other incentives that the government would have to provide, they pale in comparison to the opportunity of developing an economically depressed region in Canada with a leading, environmentally efficient process for coal and oil liquefaction, a project which is Canadian owned and which will use our local coal resources in a cleaner, superior way which can lead to lower acid rain emissions and which can be a show-piece to Canada's future environmental agenda.

This government's failure to support fully the Scotia's Synfuels initiative is incomprehensible and amazingly short-sighted. The U.S. government is not so short sighted. It has already indicated through the Department of Energy its support for a similar project in Ohio. It has urged this government to support that project.

We have our own project in Cape Breton. Why does the government insist on demanding additional information from a company which has been so co-operative in the past? Why does the government not simply approve this project, take a risk on Atlantic Canada and allow these jobs to commence.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I very much agree with the hon. member when he says that the Scotia Synfuels proposal in Cape Breton has considerable potential to economically benefit eastern Nova Scotia.

I would like at this time to reiterate some of the points which the minister responsible for ACOA made last week in this Chamber. Certainly the Government of Canada has been trying to enhance economic opportunities in the Atlantic region by considering every alternative employment opportunity that will help to diversify the economy. I would suggest that the very creation of ACOA has been a step forward in that regard.

It must be pointed out, however, that while the hon. member has again pressed for the approval of investment tax credit for the Synfuels project, it is really Industry, Science and Technology, as the hon. member knows, rather than ACOA which has the lead role for the federal government on this project.

ACOA, as the development agency for small to medium sized businesses can, of course, and will play an advocacy role.

That being said, I wish to point out that federal officials have devoted a great deal of time to looking at the long term economic viability of this project, and its potential to create long term employment.

I wish to point out, as the hon. member has already indicated, that the federal government did help fund 50 per cent of the costs of a technical feasibility study to which he referred, at a very significant sum of some $650,000. That study, of course, was completed in November of 1989.

As has often been the case in the past, I speak of prior to 1984 when governments were interested in establishing projects in order to produce a quick fix, this government wants to be certain that any investment of public funds results in durable and viable jobs for the long term.

With respect to Scotia Synfuels, ACOA and Industry, Science and Technology officials want to be sure, and I think most Canadians would understand why this is so, that this project valued at well over $400 million is sufficiently viable to justify the substantial expenditure of public funds which would be required from Investment Tax Credit.

While a number of jobs this facility promised to create is certainly impressive, there is still more study required before any decision can be made.

RIDING OF LAURIER—SAINTE-MARIE

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, almost a month ago, I had a question for the Prime Minister concerning the people of the riding of Laurier—Sainte-Marie. In my question I asked the Prime Minister when the government was going to provide economic measures to help the residents of Laurier—Sainte-Marie. I was not satisfied with the Prime Minister's answer, and that is why I am asking the same question today, although I will be more specific. When will the government take economic steps to help the people of Laurier—Sainte-Marie?

I would like to explain that the unemployment rate in this riding is almost 20 per cent. At a time when direct government assistance is needed to help these people, it would seem the government is doing the exact opposite.

I will mention some of the economic measures that have had a disastrous impact on the people of Laurier—Sainte-Marie.

First of all, there is the GST, the Goods and Services Tax that will soon come into force. It will be a heavy burden for people who are in no position to pay this kind of tax, any more than other Canadians.

Second, a federal Budget has just been adopted, obliging the provinces to take over an increasingly larger share of the responsibility for various social programs. I will name some of the programs that are vital to Laurier—Sainte-Marie—medical care for the elderly, for instance. Federal budget cuts are going to affect medical care for senior citizens. Even the Government of Quebec has condemned the cuts affecting these people.

Third, this Budget is a blow to students who need federal assistance for postsecondary education. This budget will not provide the assistance we received in the past.

Furthermore, we also have a problem with the unemployment insurance reform legislation. The people in Southeast Montreal need the safety net. They need the unemployment insurance they have been paying for for years. Unfortunately, the so-called reform adopted by the federal government—I wonder whether this is not misleading advertising, because the reform gives less to these people. Instead of protecting them, it provides less protection than they received in the past.

That is why the Churches, unions, charitable organizations, local citizens groups and others objected to this so-called unemployment insurance reform. I deplore the fact that after all the work done by Jean-Claude Malépart, who was very much a populist, to protect his people—and I think we in this House must recognize one thing, and I believe everyone will agree, Conservatives as well as Liberals, that Jean-Claude Malépart, the former Liberal member, did a terrific job of representing his constituents— not just Liberal voters but all his constituents. This was a guy who worked for the poor—people who are vulnerable, people who have no hope. He did a good job. And now, for more than six and a half months, these people have lacked representation in Parliament. And instead of providing tax measures to help these people, the government does the exact opposite.

What I would like the government to do is implement three things: first of all, measures to provide subsidies under the Employment and Immigration Act, through Challenge 90; second, provide grants for job development programs, and I am sure it would be a great help to the people of Laurier—Sainte-Marie; and finally, drop this unemployment insurance legislation, because it will make matters even worse for the people of Laurier—Sainte-Marie. This time I expect a reply, and I hope it will be a clear and sensible reply, one that will give genuine consideration to the needs of the people in the riding of Laurier—Sainte-Marie.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his question. However, I think it would better for both of us if I answered in English.

[English]

The hon. member, when he asked the question originally in the House, was asking about the date of the by-election because of the vacancy caused by the death of our colleague Jean-Claude Malépart, and he also asked us when the issues would be addressed.

Mr. Speaker, I think, as you know and I am sure all members of the House know, that by-election has now been called for August 13 and I know that the Progressive Conservative candidate, who will make a very vital contribution during the course of that by-election, will be responding to those issues and we look forward to the campaign.

CANADA POST

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, on May 3 of this year I rose in my place to put a question to the Minister responsible for Canada Post because I had just learned that 92 Canadian communities were going to lose mail-sorting operations and jobs within their communities.

One of those 92 communities is my own home city of North Battleford, Saskatchewan, a city and an operation that I know quite well. Canada Post announced on May 2 that they were going to increase efficiencies. I put quotation marks around that word "efficiencies" because that is the word that they use, but which is yet to be really defined in terms of Canada Post. Canada Post said it would increase efficiencies by streamlining the mail sorting process. The whole thing is to take effect on September 1 of this year.

What are these efficiencies that they are talking about? They are going to put a second mail collection box on street corners where ones already exist. These twin boxes, as they call them, will allow the postal user to deposit mail for local delivery in one box and mail for out-of-town delivery in another box. What on the surface seems very simple is otherwise crazy. In implementing this twin box policy, Canada Post will reduce the number of street box locations where mail can be deposited and across Canada reduce its work-force of inside sorters by 800 to 1,000 persons.

In North Battleford they eliminated positions that equal six full-time and two part-time, a situation the postal workers estimate in the city of North Battleford alone to be as much as $300,000 a year. There is no reason for this loss to these workers, their families, to our communities, and the disruption is as great on the service where the so-called simplification situation will actually lead to more handling of the mail.

Let us use the example of the mail going from North Battleford to Lloydminster now. This mail is now sorted in my home town of North Battleford. It is put on a truck in North Battleford and brought to Lloydminster where it is delivered. It is a very simple process.

Under the new system, after September 1, the mail will now be deposited in these out-of-town mail boxes in North Battleford. It will be trucked east to Saskatoon for sorting and then trucked west again through the city of North Battleford on to Lloydminster. The extra handling will result in slower mail and likely more losses. There are no efficiencies here.

Other small communities around the city of North Battleford will be effected in exactly the same way. Today, mail going to Maymont just a few miles outside of North Battleford to the east, is sorted and sent for delivery to Maymont, but after September 1 that mail from North Battleford to Maymont will first go through Maymont to Saskatoon for sorting, back through Maymont to North Battleford for putting on the contractor's delivery truck and then back to Maymont. That mail which previously took about 40 minutes to get delivered will now pass through Maymont three times before it gets to its destination. The more handling there is the greater the incidents of error.

Let me give one other situation concerning the town of Meadow Lake. Meadow Lake is north of the city of North Battleford. Mail posted before midnight in North Battleford today will arrive in Meadow Lake the next day. In September that mail posted in North Battleford will first go to Saskatoon in the south, then back through North Battleford to arrive in Meadow Lake. Unless mail is posted before 4.30 in the afternoon, it is guaranteed to take an extra day for delivery between North Battleford and Meadow Lake, just a short 100 mile distance. The service has obviously been reduced to these communities as a result of the new efficiencies introduced by Canada Post.

Let us not forget one other situation. If you are mailing locally, and you happen to make a mistake and your mail goes into the wrong box, your mail from North Battleford now goes to Saskatoon, whether you want it to or not.

Therefore, since this rationalization is not more efficient, it can only be for one other purpose, to get a reduced workforce, lower costs and a greater chance to increase the profile of the corporation. In this way, the government can sell it to the private sector as recommended by a government committee.

There is no justification for a privatized post office which would never provide service to rural Canada adequately. The Crown corporation exists to meet certain communication needs for Canadians and only a Crown corporation accountable to Canadians through Parliament will meet those needs.

On May 3, I called this latest move by Canada Post a stupid idea and I called on the minister to maintain the Crown corporation and establish a full-time postal commission to return accountability to the post office and give Canadians some control over the type of service they deserve.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, Canada Post's network rationalization program is another step in the corporation's efforts to optimize the use of both mechanized sorting equipment and better transportation links.

Once the program is implemented, as it has been in a number of communities already, mail will be streamlined into mechanized plants for maximum efficiency and faster sortation and distribution. Some delivery improvements will be achieved, particularly forward mail, and in all cases the corporation will maintain its present delivery standards. The program allows for the elimination of one step from the existing mail processing operation.

Through the twin-letter box system, local mail will continue to be sorted by the local post office in most cases, while mail destined for other locations will be moved immediately to the nearest mechanized facility for speedier handling. Similar changes have already been successfully implemented in other communities.

The changes undertaken with the network rationalization program are proven methods of increasing efficiency, while at the same time improving service.

So I ask, why is the hon. member so opposed to this positive accomplishment, when the corporation has already stated that no one, and I repeat, no one will lose their employment because of this, and all affected employees will be dealt with in accordance with their respective collective agreements. The allegations that this program will cost jobs, as some have alleged, of close to 1,000 postal workers is clearly based on erroneous information.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 10 o'clock, the motion to adjourn the House is now deemed to have been adopted. Accordingly the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 o'clock a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 7.33 p.m.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES RESTRAINT ACT

Hon. Mary Collins (for the Minister of Finance) moved that Bill C-69, an Act to amend certain statutes to enable restraint of government expenditures, be read the third time and passed.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to speak in support of Bill C-69, which implements the policy of spending restraint that we announced in the Budget of February 20.

The measures in this bill have a clear goal: controlling inflation and securing steady non-inflationary economic growth in Canada. I am sure that our friends opposite will support these objectives, especially the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, who is very interested in properly promoting the interests of our country. Attaining this goal will lead to the bright economic future that, of course, we all want for this country.

[English]

These measures contained in Bill C-69 are part of the February budget which, through a wide ranging expenditure control plan and with no increase in taxes, reinforces our commitment to address the fiscal challenge. The budget keeps the deficit on a downward track and we will see it cut in half in four years.

Our expenditure control plan takes real action affecting a wide range of federal program spending but it is also sensitive to the financial circumstances of individual Canadians as well as government. Our plan is helping us to meet the fiscal challenge in a fair and consistent way.

The expenditure restraint measures must be examined as an integral part of the economic strategy we have been following since 1984, and of our response to the current fiscal economic situation. They are part of the government's consistent, comprehensive plan to ensure that Canadians benefit from a standard of living and quality of life that is second to none.

A lot of progress has been made. For example, the burden of government has been significantly reduced. The growth of spending on all government programs and services has been kept well below the growth of the economy and even below the rate of inflation. This is quite a performance.

Our progress toward a better fiscal balance has not been easy. We have all felt the impact of the measures needed to protect and strengthen our future. Many Canadians have had to face difficult adjustments, but the economic pay-off has been considerable.

The success of our economic management plan set out in 1984 is clear. It was the right policy then, and it remains the right policy now. But, as the budget warned, its continued progress is threatened.

Despite our fiscal progress, the burden of the public debt continues to grow, primarily due to the compounding interest on the original debt we inherited. To get off the debt treadmill, we must reduce the burden of high interest rates. To do this, we must deal firmly with high inflation.

The expenditure restraint measures in the February Budget are designed to do just that. I am convinced that our friends oppose, especially the hon. member who is attracting attention as he comes in, will support this policy which is so important for our country. Lower inflation and interest rates and lower deficits will be mutually reinforcing and lead to strong, sustained growth.

Everyone who is able must do their part to help restore the nation's finances to health. That is why our expenditure control plan has an impact on a wide range of government program spending while at the same time remaining sensitive to the financial circumstances of individual Canadians and provincial governments.

I would like to begin by going over two major elements of the plan as it is set out in the legislation.

First, federal program spending. Under the plan, 60 per cent of government program spending is affected to some degree.

To protect modest-income Canadians from the full impact of our expenditure restraint measures, we have exempted major federal transfers to persons, such as old age security, which is not affected, the guaranteed income supplement, which is not affected, spouses' allowances, which are not affected, Madam Speaker, family allowances, which are not affected, veterans' pensions and allowances and unemployment insurance benefits.

So these budgetary measures are extremely sensitive to the needs and interests of people who are less well off. I would like to emphasize one point because I know it is of concern to many individuals: no limit is placed by the expenditure control plan or by this legislation on programs such as old age security, family allowances or veterans' pensions.

[English]

The second element I want to touch on concerns transfers to the provinces. Significant deficit reduction cannot be achieved without affecting transfers to the provinces. They are simply too large a part of federal expenses to be ignored. And so this bill includes measures to bring the growth of major transfers to provinces approximately in line with general federal programs spending. This, everybody will agree, is a very reasonable measure to bring the transfers to the provinces in line with our own expenditures.

In 1990–1991 tax and cash transfers to provincial governments will total more than $35 billion. As a whole, transfers to the provinces have risen at an average annual rate of 6.5 per cent since 1984–85. At the same time, spending on federal programs in general has been held to an average annual growth rate of 3.6 per cent. We believe the provinces as a whole are in a position to bear more of the burden of their own spending. At a time when 35 cents of every federal dollar is used to pay interest costs on the debt, the average figure for the provinces is 12 cents.

As a result of this bill transfers to provinces will grow. I will repeat that. Transfers to the provinces, as a result of this bill, will continue to grow by about 3 per cent annually over the next two years, roughly the same rate as that of total program spending for the federal government.

The reduction to transfers to the provinces represents about 1 per cent of total provincial revenue. At the same time, we recognize the special circumstances of lower-income provinces. Federal support to provinces remains large, total transfers will still increase, and the poorest provinces will receive more growth than others. For example, total entitlements for the major federal-provincial transfer programs are expected to grow an average of about 4 per cent over the next two years for the Atlantic provinces, a growth higher than our own expenditures. While, in the higher-income provinces, they are expected to average 2.3 per cent.

I want to go briefly over the three major programs under which federal support, about $36 billion in 1990–91, is given to the provinces and territories. These are: Established Programs Financing, equalization, and the Canada Assistance Plan.

Under EPF, Established Programs Financing, the federal government provides equal per capita financial assistance to all provinces through the transfer of tax points and cash payments. These transfers were originally designed to help provinces carry out their responsibilities in respect of health care and post-secondary education, but since 1977, provinces have been able to use these transfers according to their own particular priorities.

Established Programs Financing reached $20 billion in 1989–90, an average annual growth rate of more than 6 per cent. The legislation we are discussing today will hold EPF per capita transfers for the next two years to the 1989–90 level. Total transfers will continue to grow with the population increase of each province or about 1 per cent nationally.

In addition to EPF, the federal government provides substantial additional assistance to the lower-income provinces through the equalization program. Equalization transfers have grown from over $5 billion in 1984-85 to close to $8 billion in 1989-90. They exceed Established Programs Financing as the largest form of federal support in the Atlantic provinces for example. Equalization transfers to the lower-income provinces are not affected by the budget. They are expected to increase about 6 per cent to 7 per cent annually over the next two years, considerably faster than the expected growth of total federal program spending.

Madam Speaker, I want to make two important points about the effect of this legislation on these transfers.

First, payments will not be cut. Over all, they will continue to increase.

Second, the provinces have complete control of the spending of this money. Whether all or none of it, or any proportion in between, goes to post-secondary education and health care depends on decisions made in provincial capitals, not in Ottawa. It is and remains the responsibility of the provinces themselves.

It is therefore wrong to say this legislation is intended to cut federal support for post-secondary education and health care.

Third, under the Canada Assistance Plan, the federal government provides funds to provincial and territorial governments to help them pay for social assistance benefits and services. These transfers, which are based on a 50-50 cost-sharing of eligible provincial spending, have grown at an average annual rate of about 6.6 per cent over the past five years.

The federal contribution in the form of cash and transfer of tax points has increased from $4 billion to $5.5 billion. The average rate of growth in each province has varied from 1 per cent to 3 per cent in Saskatchewan, British Columbia and Quebec to nearly 14 per cent in Ontario.

For the next two years, growth in CAP transfers will be limited to 5 per cent a year in Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta. All provinces receiving federal equalization payments, that is, all provinces whose income is less than these three, will be exempt from this ceiling on growth. They will continue to have open-ended access to federal dollars to meet any growth in expenditures eligible for cost-sharing under CAP. This measure provides for resumption of the present regime on April 1, 1992.

The 1990 federal Budget, Madam Speaker, will slow the growth of federal transfers in a manner which is sensitive to the situation of low-income provinces—that is very important. The impact on Established Program financing is spread broadly and evenly across all provinces. Low-income provinces will continue to receive large and growing support under equalization. Provinces receiving equalization payments, namely those with lower revenues, will be exempted from the 5 per cent growth limit on cost-sharing under the Canada Assistance Plan.

Despite the enormous difficulties we face in reducing this country's debt and deficit and improving the nation's finances, these are balanced, reasonable decisions geared to the ability to pay of provinces and individuals. We are not like the Liberal government that spent without regard to revenue. We are doing what is right for the country and we want to keep our ability to help people with programs of this kind in future. If we did not act quickly, the Government of Canada would lose its ability to help the most disadvantaged and we will never allow that to happen.

While the provinces are being asked to do their part under the Expenditure Control Plan, as I explained, it is clear that we have restrained our own costs and we will continue to do so. Over the next year, total expenditures on programs other than those that are exempt or capped will decline to a level that is $800 million below that of the current year.

[English]

These are real cuts. They reflect the fact that, after several years of restraint, there are no painless ways to cut spending. At the same time, our expenditure control plan balances prudence in managing public finances with the responsibility to protect Canadians who are least able to afford income restraint.

This bill takes a further step along the path we have been following since 1984. It does so with sensitivity toward those in our society who are less well off. It does so in a manner that respects the importance and rights of the provinces, and that takes account of their economic situations as well as that of the federal government.

I have every confidence that the measures in Bill C-69 are appropriate for our situation and that they are fair and effective.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, in debating Bill C-69, which the minister has explained in some detail in the past few minutes, I think we are perhaps getting to the very heart of Canadian federalism.

I suppose sometimes the people who watch our debates on television think that they are somewhat strange and maybe irrelevant. Today, more than ever, they hear us debating what sounds, I suppose, rather arcane visions of federal-provincial funding arrangements, when, a couple of blocks down the street, the First Ministers are at this moment discussing the fundamental arrangements among the provinces and the federal government, in fact, the fundamental arrangements among all Canadians whereby we live together in the country.

It would be inappropriate to engage in debate simply on this matter of Established Programs Financing and federal-provincial fiscal arrangements without a word about the more important discussions that are going on down the street, not to debate the merits of the arguments that are being put either way, but merely to say that in a way all that we argue about on Bill C-69 becomes irrelevant if the good will and the wisdom of the First Ministers on behalf of all Canadians do not find a solution to the more fundamental problems that seem to trouble us as a nation.

As we look back into the history of how we fund things like post-secondary education in Canada, we find that there is quite a sense of déjà vu. Some of the current debates between the provinces and between the federal government and the provinces sound very much like the ones that occurred in 1864 and have been repeated many times in Canadian history. I think the vast majority of Canadians hope and pray for wisdom and solutions.

These are the fundamentals of our federation. In some ways, the more esoteric topics that we debate as a country about our Constitution are the frills and the extras. The federal-provincial fiscal arrangements, the way we finance the kind of country we want to be, perhaps those are the nuts and bolts. That is the essence of the Canadian federation. How do we fund the country being and becoming the kind of country that we want it to be? How do Canadians want Canada to develop?

If we could get into a time machine and spin forward into the next century, different scenarios would present themselves; some good, some bad. If you can imagine arriving in the national capital in the year 2020, you might hope, if you could describe the kind of Canada that you want, to discover a country where the people are well educated, where the people interest themselves in examples of the highest of human culture and human awareness. You would hope to find a population that by and large understands the nature of how the world functions, how the economy functions, where the people appreciate the value of literature and art and where the people appreciate the importance that culture brings to the way they live. You would hope to find an economy where we produce high quality value-added products that we sell to the world. You would hope to find a country in which the care for those who are least able to look after themselves is exemplary, where health care is affordable and available to all.

You would hope to not find a country in which the ordinary citizen is not well educated, where illiteracy is rampant, where you find that we no longer debate the harvesting of forests on Vancouver Island because they have all been harvested, where you find that we are still surviving as a nation on the sale of the things that we can dig out of the ground, cut down, grow, or catch in the sea and where we are strictly basing our economy on the sale and production of resources, where we failed to train our people to move forward in competition in a global economy where the need to add value and to make things that the world buys is crucial.

If you look at those two scenarios, Madam Speaker, and say that we definitely want the first one, you might want to go back then and ask what policies should governments in Canada be following in order to ensure that we arrive at that first scenario and that we avoid arriving at the second one.

That in a nutshell for me expresses why the subject matter of this bill is so crucial, so important. I look at it, not strictly as the minister did in his remarks, as a means of getting our financial house in order, although it is that and I understand that, and I will add my words of explanation to the public about why that is the case. However, it goes beyond that.

How we spend money on post-secondary education, on health care and on assistance to the needy in Canada is of crucial importance to the kind of nation we are and are becoming. If this bill does anything, it highlights the critical necessity for Canada, the federal government, and the provincial governments, to overcome the type of debates that are currently going on down the street and to get on with, at least in my opinion, the far more important debate about what kind of country this should be and how do we get there from here. Included in the debate has to be the funding of post-secondary educational institutions, health care and assistance to the needy.

The idea that perhaps we should use these arrangements as a way of trimming back the deficit is something to which the current Minister of Finance seems to have been recently converted. At least back in 1982, when he was in opposition, he did not think that this was really the way to go about cutting back on federal spending. Let me read to you what he said in this House on March 24, 1982 in reference to cuts in Established Programs Financing:

> —could have disastrous effects on the universities and on the colleges, on the hospital funding and on the operation of the hospitals. Let us not make hospitals, universities and colleges a battleground between the federal government and the provincial governments. Let us solve those problems not on the backs of hospitals and universities; let us solve those problems outside of that arena.

I agree entirely with the remarks of the Minister of Finance.

First, let me talk a bit about post-secondary education. When we talk about how important it is for Canada to emerge from this century and go forward into the next one with an economy that moves from our traditional hewers of wood and drawers of water mode into one that highlights the value-added production of new goods, new services, the ability to provide new technologies, and provide information to the world, this requires a broad base of well-educated people. We need a population that is characterized by its commitment to excellence, to its level of literacy and education. It is essential to Canada. This is not merely a provincial matter.

When you go back in history, you discover that this is not a new debate. Back as early as the Confederation debates, 1864, one of the Fathers of Confederation, George Brown, said this about the division of powers:

> In thus defining the functions of the general and local governments, it will, no doubt, be objected that we have committed certain matters of an important character to the local bodies which the people of Upper Canada would have been well content to have seen left to the general government. But if the details of the scheme are closely examined, it will be seen that we have given nothing to the local bodies which did not necessarily belong to the localities, except education and the rights of property, and the civil law, which we were compelled to leave to the local governments—

That comment by George Brown is very similar to one made in 1864 by Sir Arthur Hamilton Gordon, then Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick, who stated:

> I am fully aware of the great difficulties attending the subject of Education, but it is with extreme regret that I see it committed to the Local Legislatures. At all events, the Universities should have been placed under the guardianship of the Central Power. The local governments—

These are his words, not mine.

> —needy, rapacious, and ignorant, with little money at their disposal, are pretty certain to appropriate the University Funds to what they will call more useful objects, that is to say, objects which will enable them to scatter the money among their political adherents.

That is what was said by one of the Fathers of Confederation 126 years ago.

Interestingly enough, as an historic footnote to the constitutional negotiations, the Charlottetown draft of the first constitutional arrangements left the universities under federal jurisdiction. It was only later that that was changed to leave the universities with all education in provincial jurisdiction.

It did not take very long for the federal government to become involved in post-secondary education. As early as 1874, the first military college was established, located at Kingston. In 1885 land was dedicated by the federal government for the University of Manitoba.

In 1910 we had a royal commission on industrial training and vocational education which ultimately gave rise to grants being made by the federal government to the provinces for the purposes of developing agricultural techniques and training and upgrading vocational, technical and industrial education.

By 1916 the federal government established the National Research Council in order to assert a federal presence in research in Canada.

This basically continued along until after World War II when the federal government, with the assistance of what became the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, initiated a program whereby universities received $150 grants for each veteran who attended their institutions.

Therefore, the federal government, at the end of World War II, perhaps partly as a means of rewarding those who had gone to fight for Canada, acknowledged the importance of a broadly based, well-educated population. Surely, to a great extent, the success of the Canadian economy through the 1950s and 1960s reflects the fact that we had a higher than would otherwise have been the case influx of well-educated, well-trained people into the workforce, the trained veterans.

In typical Canadian fashion, we have had a whole series of royal commissions, task forces, studies, and special groups study the issue of post-secondary educational funding over the years. We had the Massey Commission in 1951. We had the study of the Bladen Commission sponsored by the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada. We have had a series of discussions and studies about this issue, most recently in this House. We had the Breau report in 1981. We have had the Senate study it and we have had the Nielsen task force.

What continually comes across when you back through those studies and the discussions and debates that occurred around them is the fact that it was acknowledged by everyone that post-secondary education was too important to the national interest to be only left as a responsibility of the provinces.

For example, on June 15, 1951, Prime Minister St. Laurent said:

> The Government has also reached the conclusion that it is in the national interest to take immediate action to assist the universities to perform functions which are quite essential to the country.

Partly, this evolved from the fact that universities had expanded their facilities to take care of the increased enrolment resulting from the veterans who were attending university following the war. In consequence, the expanded facilities had given rise to a greater cost of operation, larger teaching staffs, and so on. In order to maintain the increase in facilities after the veterans had gone through the system, federal participation became essential.

What began then was 16 years of payments of grants to support university education in Canada. Interestingly enough, these grants were made to all provinces except the province of Quebec, which declined to accept any federal participation in post-education within that province. In fact, the funds that would have gone to Quebec were turned over to the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada and held in trust in the interest of the institutions in that province until 1960 when an agreement was entered into between the governments of Quebec and Canada which allowed Quebec to make the grants directly from the provincial government to its institutions within the province.

All of this went through an evolutionary period until about 1966 and 1967 when part two of the Federal-Provincial Fiscal Arrangements Act was passed to allow the federal government to make the payments to provincial governments rather than to the institutions in the provinces through the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada.

In leading to this arrangement, we have a statement by the then Prime Minister of Canada, Lester Pearson, about the importance to Canada of post-secondary education. In 1966, he stated:

> Education is, under our constitution, a matter of provincial jurisdiction. The federal government does not dispute this or wish in any way to do so. At the same time, education is obviously a matter of profound importance to the economic and social growth of the country as a whole—While education itself is provincial, the federal government accepts primary responsibility for employment and economic activity generally in the country.

He went on to state:

> The preparation of our young people for productive participation in the labour force of the country is a matter of vital concern to all Canadians. We have also to keep in mind that young people of a particular province do not necessarily receive their education and training in their home province, and that people, after graduation, do not necessarily live out their lives and take up employment in the province where they received their education.

Again, it is a very important acknowledgement of the importance of education to the well-being—economic, social and cultural—of Canada as a whole, of Canada as a nation.

What happened under the 1967 act was that the federal government committed itself to provide to the provinces, for post-secondary education, either $15 per capita of the provincial population, or 50 per cent of eligible post-secondary education expenditures incurred in the province, whichever was higher.

From 1967, for 10 years the federal government was essentially paying half of the cost of post-secondary education in the provinces. There was some revision to that in 1972 when the federal government limited its annual increase under that provision to 15 per cent, and that was pro-rated among the provinces. However, the commitment at that time was clear. Half of the cost of running the university system was federal responsibility.

That created several problems which were overcome with the 1977 arrangement which is really what we are debating today. That program, the 50 per cent support program, tended to distort provincial spending priorities because it encouraged the provinces to spend what were effectively 50-cent dollars. Every time the province spent 50 cents, the federal government, by law, was committed to throw in another 50 cents. Provinces, especially British Columbia, Quebec and, to some extent, Ontario took advantage of those 50-cent dollars in a period of a very broad expansion of the post-secondary education.

The federal government, having undertaken to pay 50 per cent, had no control over the growth of these expenditures. That is a problem clearly for any government; a lack of control.

Third, the federal taxpayer not only had no control, but not necessarily any particular awareness of what the money was going to be spent on. By the time the program was in its last years, more than $10 billion was going from the federal government with no direct control.

The most critical problem with that 50 per cent program was that it required substantial auditing requirements. In other words, in order to ensure that the provinces were receiving the correct amount of money, the federal government had to investigate what they were spending. This led to all kinds of complications.

Some provinces, for example Ontario, had Grade 13. Other provinces did not. To make it fair, Grade 13 had to qualify for these 50-cent dollars. That meant an argument about how much of the secondary educational system was devoted to Grade 13. Was it pro-rated in some fashion, or how was it worked out? There were even simple problems such as whether Grade 13 students used school buses and, if so, was the federal government not responsible to pay 50 cents of every dollar that was spent on school bus transportation for secondary school students in Grade 13.

Then Quebec introduced the CEGIP system which also was a quasi post-secondary educational institution. Again, there were questions about how much the federal government was obliged to contribute to that.

This led to the Established Programs Financing arrangements of 1977, which is what we are debating the amendments of today. It provided for block funding for, among other things, post-secondary education to the provinces. Those arrangements to the provinces set in course the freedom of the provinces to put the money into whatever they wanted, so much so that, according to a study prepared for the Secretary of State in 1985, some of the provinces were actually spending less on post-secondary education, in terms of the operating costs, than the federal government was giving them.

In 1984-85, according to this study, the provinces of Newfoundland, Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, Manitoba and British Columbia were all spending less on operating their universities and colleges than they were receiving in grants from the federal government. Where the money was going was entirely up to the provincial governments. They could build roads or bridges. They could give it away. They could do whatever they wanted with it and let the post-secondary education system erode.

This itself is not a satisfactory arrangement. For this reason, I must confess to having some sympathy with the problem the federal government has in this area. To some extent, these arrangements have resulted not in nourishing the post-secondary education system, but in allowing the provincial governments an additional source of revenue from the federal government. Meanwhile, across Canada we see many instances of the decline of our universities and colleges.

This latter point is one that we need to be chiefly concerned about. As I said earlier, the health and well-being of the post-secondary education system in Canada is of absolutely crucial importance to our ability as a nation to move forward in the global economy. Surely to goodness, the time has come in Canada—when the First Ministers succeed, as they must down the street in finding a solution to the fundamental problems of the Constitution—for the federal and provincial governments to find an arrangement between themselves to ensure that universities and colleges in Canada are adequately and fully funded.

If we do not do that, it will inevitably lead to a country in which our people are ill-educated and ill-equipped to compete in the 21st century.

All that being said, and recognizing the problems that the federal government has, in my view, it is not enough to go ahead and cut back on EPF right now. I think the Minister of Finance had it right back in 1982 when he said that this is not the appropriate battleground for federal-provincial relations. Many of the things that have been said since the announced cut-backs bring into stark relief the problems that are occurring in our university system in Canada.

In some of our larger universities, the class sizes are enormous. The problems now are totally different from what they were a generation ago. The problems now are technological problems. For example, how do we provide in a lecture hall adequate sound systems and lighting systems so that the vast number of students who have to sit in the lecture hall can see and hear what is being said or taught? We have a need for special lighting systems so that people at the back of enormous lecture theatres can see things that are being written either on over-head projectors or in the odd case on blackboards.

In fact, students in many classes, in many subject areas, are having to go early to their lectures in order to get a seat in the lecture hall.

I am from the generation where we went late, as a matter of religion.

The Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada has stated: "It is no secret that overcrowding, meagre library budgets, outdated laboratories, deteriorating physical plants and demoralization of staff and students are all too common on Canadian campuses today. Faced with a funding squeeze, several universities have adopted enrolment restrictions and others are seriously considering such measures".

Since 1977-78, when the current EPF arrangements went into effect, the university system has received a reduction of about 20 per cent in its support per student. Not only are these facts a harbinger of ill things to come in Canada's future if we do not address them because they are of critical importance, but they also directly contradict the kinds of things this government has said.

For example, in August 1989 the Prime Minister stated: "This government will carry its fair share of the burden to ensure that all young Canadians receive a first-class education as they confront a world-class challenge". He is right. Is this the way to go about it, to cut back the one remaining method there is of assisting the provinces in adequately funding education?

The government, I am sure, is going to say that I have not got it quite right, because after all the government does fund research in the universities through the granting councils. Fair enough. The National Sciences and Engineering Research Council, the Medical Research Council and the Social Sciences and Humanities Research Council are very important. I wish I knew how much they were going to be funded next year. The government has not told them what it is going to do about the matching grants policy that expires this year.

On top of that, there are situations where the universities are going broke because of grants from these entities or from problems arising out of the network of Centres of Excellence. Why? Because the granting councils will not participate in funding the overhead for the research. In other words, they will not participate in the costs of laboratories and so on when the research grants are given.

On the one hand, the cut-back in EPF and the failure of the provinces to put what should be put into post-secondary education is stripping the universities of the resources they need to maintain first-class institutions with good equipment and top flight teachers to make sure we have the qualified personnel we need to go into the future.

On the other hand, the money that is coming into research is inadequate to make sure that the universities have the infrastructures and overhead costs covered to carry on the research they are being funded to perform.

We get many examples of what this means. According to an article in the Hamilton Spectator on October 18, 1989:

> Tight financial situations and increasing enrolment at universities like McMaster mean faculty are forced to teach more students with fewer resources—
> The result is "undergraduate students at McMaster are no longer receiving a decent undergraduate education".
> As an example, Dr. Maurer, a psychology professor, said when she came to the university in 1973 she taught a third year-class of 20 students. This year that class has expanded to 170 students.
> "Grading 170 10-page essays is like reading War and Peace," she said. "It's clearly impossible."

I suggest that this problem is one that transcends federal-provincial arguments. It is of such critical importance to Canada that we must address it in the context of an over-all review of how we fund post secondary education in Canada.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I will now interrupt the hon. member. He will be able to continue after Question Period.

ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Madam Speaker, this week for the nineteenth consecutive year is National Environment Week, from June 3 to June 9. I need hardly recall how much the environmental awareness of Canadians has grown in the past few years.

All governments have a duty to show leadership in this area and promote all environmental initiatives so that, by the year 2000, Canada will have the best relationship with the environment of all industrialized countries.

In this connection, I would like to draw your attention to an announcement made today by the federal government that $100,000 has been earmarked under the Environmental Partners Program for a major project in the Rouyn-Noranda region. The project consists in placing 28 containers in as many schools to provide for recovery of recyclable waste.

Madam Speaker, this is a concrete example of co-operation between government and the community to provide for better management of our environment and also to ensure that our young people, the elite of tomorrow, acquire good environmental habits.

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENT WEEK

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, for Environment Week the government produced this beautiful 29-page book on what Canadians can do to help the environment.

One of the useful bits of information it contains is that a single growing tree can absorb up to 21 kilograms of carbon dioxide in a year. A major cause of destruction of trees is, of course, the excessive use of paper.

How well does Environment Canada respect its own admonition to "get involved"?

Of the 29 pages in this book, two are the covers which are on glossy paper, not recyclable; one page contains only two lines of type; there are seven pages which are blank, except for a half-line title, and not one of these pages is printed on the back.

I urge the government to heed its own message, get involved, use paper wisely and save a few trees.

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENT WEEK

Mr. J. W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Madam Speaker, I am also pleased to speak this morning about the environment and to join my colleague from the environment committee in bringing to the attention of Canadians the realities of Canadian Environment Week for 1990.

I am certainly proud to represent a government which is committed to the environmental imperative as a fundamental principle of its mandate. Indeed, government decision-making has changed dramatically, as environmental considerations gain equal status with economic factors.

Both streams of policy—environment and economics—are critical for resolution before action occurs, if we are ever to truly practise the compelling concept of sustainable development.

The Green Plan consultations which are now being held across the country, constitute a responsible and comprehensive process to bring all Canadians into Canada's environmental movement. Each of us must be a part of this process. It cannot be decreed or imposed upon us, it must be shared. We must all understand the environmental implications of our daily lives.

The Green Plan program arrives in my riding of Fredericton next Monday and Tuesday where citizens will have the opportunity to help build our national environmental consensus. By developing the Green Plan together, we shall ensure its ultimate success which is so essential not just for the sake of our own future but for—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time is up.

PERLEY BRIDGE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, on May 31, the hon. member for Argenteuil—Papineau (Ms. Bourgault) went to Grenville, in her riding, to make an announcement about the Perley Bridge on behalf of the President of the Treasury Board.

She said that Treasury Board had given the Minister of Public Works a mandate to negotiate with Ontario and Quebec representatives with a view to eventually building a new bridge. One wonders whether the Department of Public Works, which has been negotiating this dossier for the last two years, has been doing so illegally, Madam Speaker.

The hon. member also announced, and this made more sense, that funds designated for the requisite environmental assessment would be released following an agreement among the parties concerned. The hon. member also indicated that a three-party meeting was to be held today, June 8, and that the parties agreed that these funds would be released at that time.

The President of the Treasury Board should immediately authorize spending on the environmental study, even if federal-provincial negotiations are still in progress. Otherwise, we may all be faced with a crisis and have to scramble to keep up with events.

ABORTION

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, this week doctors in Alberta joined doctors in Manitoba and Nova Scotia to say that they will stop providing full reproductive health services as soon as their waiting list is exhausted because of the government's new restrictive abortion legislation.

One doctor said: "I don't need the hassles." Another said: "I am being forced into this situation by a crummy law. As an individual I cannot fight the government. We have all tried. It is now out of our hands."

Other doctors, worried about criminal prosecutions and jail sentences, will require signed statements, witnesses and expensive psychiatric evaluations.

The government's unjust abortion legislation not only violates women's basic constitutional rights, it will result in fewer services for women who need them. This unjust law not only reduces Canadian women to second-class citizens in their own country, it tries to make criminals out of women and their doctors.

This unjust law not only violates Canada's U.N. commitments to promote women's equality, it deprives women of full personhood.

This unjust law not only ignores the real issues of unwanted pregnancies, it does nothing to promote family planning, better contraceptive research, and more supportive services for women and their children.

Madam Speaker, women are not children. Doctors are not criminals. But this government is guilty of depriving women of their basic rights.

THE SENATE

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, there is a place in this very building which they call the red chamber. In the Senate they pay unelected senators $62,000 a year. Last year this amounted to 68 days of work, half the number of days of two years previously.

But $62,000 is not all. There is also $9,800 in expenses, and now an extra $153 a day for every Senator showing up for a meeting.

Canadians should know who their tax dollars are supporting. I think we should have a Senator-of-the-Week contest.

The envelope, please.

This week's senator is Michael Pitfield. He is a former civil servant, with a civil service pension. He is an employee of the huge Power Corporation. He is a Senator. He earns $62,000 a year. And now he gets $153 more.

Mr. Senator, welcome to the trough.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I believe that talking disrespectfully about the other place is not really in order.

LEBANESE REFUGEES

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Madam Speaker, last week I appealed to the Minister of Employment and Immigration on behalf of Lebanese refugees who are being returned via the United States to war-torn Lebanon.

For the first time Christian and Moslem leaders representing a multitude of denominations have joined together to plead on behalf of the refugees.

I personally know some of these leaders and they are profoundly distressed by the situation of the people in Lebanon. They are calling upon Canadians who have a great reputation for humanitarian values and their government to open their hearts to these victims of war in their country, perpetrated by some of their neighbours.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Madam Speaker, this past hour the 11 First Ministers began their sixth day of discussion to resolve the impasse on Meech Lake. At no time have these negotiations been more important. Few Canadians would disagree that the future of this great country of ours, as we know it, is at stake. They are watching and waiting anxiously to hear of success.

One such citizen is Tony Pacheco of Sarnia, Ontario. Yesterday he sent me a letter from which I would like to quote:

> We are a country built on geographic, cultural, ethnic, and political diversity and adversity. Certainly we are proud of and celebrate our ability to forge a common purpose and still respect and cultivate our differences.
> Accommodation, tolerance and compromise are the historical pillars of this country and must continue to be if Canada is to exist.

I am hopeful that in current discussions our First Ministers can embrace these principles. For his part, the Prime Minister continues to demonstrate his commitment and leadership throughout this process.

I, like a majority of Canadians and the members of this House, wish him and the premiers success in today's negotiations of constitutional change.

TRANSPORT

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, the Government of Canada yesterday decided to risk the health of air passengers and airline employees on the flimsiest of evidence. Although the Non-smokers' Rights Act passed with the support of all three political parties, the Minister of Transport has elected to ignore the will of Parliament and the Canadian people. He has decided to protect Canadian airlines from their own failure to market a unique product, smoke-free international flights, by endangering the health of thousands of Canadians. By delaying the implementation of the smoking ban on overseas flights of more than six hours, the minister is setting back the cause of public health and is discriminating against Canadian workers.

Canada has been a world leader in protecting employees and the public from the carcinogenic effects of second-hand smoke. Rather than convince the world of the benefits of breathing clean Canadian air on Canadian airlines, the minister has accepted the airlines' argument that they will lose money, even though no evidence has been produced by them to demonstrate this.

Tobacco is the only legal product that injures and kills when used exactly as directed. I call on the Minister of Nation Health and Welfare to explain the serious health dangers from tobacco smoke to his colleague, the Minister of Transport, so that he will act to protect all Canadians and re-establish Canada as an example to the world of the advantages of butting out.

THE SENATE

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Madam Speaker, enough is enough. Earlier this week the Liberals who dominate the Senate voted to reward themselves, over and above their generous salaries, by paying themselves $153 every time they show up for work.

Canadians were rightly outraged, as so was I and every member of the Conservative caucus, including the Finance Minister, who correctly labelled the Senate's actions obscene. The so-called rationale that went into that proposal defies logic and is an insult to every hard-working Canadian.

When I read of the senators' plan I thought I had heard it all. Then along came the member for Kamloops who, in an astounding twist of the facts, accused the government yesterday of supporting the senators' proposal—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, I cannot let the member go on. The hon. member for Mount Royal.

EMERGENCY RADIO LICENCE FEES

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, it seems this government's grab for cash in the deficit battle knows no bounds. It continues regardless of the human and local impact. They have moved now to tax public safety by charging volunteer fire-fighters in municipalities exorbitant 1,000 per cent increases and more for licences to operate emergency radios. In my own riding, the city of Côte St. Luc could face an 1,100 per cent fee increase because of the government's action. My colleague from Dartmouth has told us of the incredible burden this places on volunteer fire-fighters in his own area.

I warned back in 1986 that the government's Bill C-3 could lead to this but the former communications minister assured Canadians on December 1, 1986, that the changes as they affect municipalities, volunteer fire-fighters and fire departments would not be proceeded with. That has become another hollow promise. We can only hope this budget action does not cause the reduction of emergency fire, ambulance and other services.

Not only has this government imposed the highest income taxes ever, but it now has decided to tax public safety. Canadians are saying, "This has just got to stop. Enough is enough."

THE SENATE

Mr. André Plourde (Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup): Madam Speaker, a recent decision by the Senate, with its Liberal majority, to give senators a tax-free salary increase is incredible.

At a time when the federal government is trying to control public spending and keep a tight rein on inflation, the Canadian Senate has once again demonstrated it does not live in the real world.

It is absolutely incredible to see senators giving themselves $153 per day in compensation, in addition to their salaries, especially when we see how the Senate obstructs the bills of a democratically elected government.

Madam Speaker, I think the government must reject this increase. In fact, I think the Senate deserves a cut in salary or should disappear altogether.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, the United Nations environment program report, issued this week, once again raises the serious question of child mortality in the developing world. Pollution and other environment-related problems cause the deaths of 14 million children under the age of five each year. In the developing world alone 4.2 million children die annually from respiratory diseases caused by air pollution.

Imagine if you can, Madam Speaker, half the population of Canada dying before Christmas from poisoned air and water, preventable diseases or lack of food. Such a situation would be unacceptable here, and it is unacceptable elsewhere.

We have heard the word "crisis" used a great deal this week. The real crisis is in the developing world where 1.4 billion children live in abject poverty. The time is long past for discussions and debate on the issue of environmental protection. We have the means to inoculate and feed the world's children. What we lack is the political will to do it.

In the minute it has taken to make this statement, 27 more children have died. We must act and act swiftly.

THE SENATE

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, during the last few days, there has been a lot of misinformation spread concerning the Senate's proposed pay increase of $153 per day.

Everyone knows that the government controls the order of business in the other place. One of its cabinet ministers is the House Leader there. Yet, who proposed the pay increase? Was it our former colleague, Senator MacEachen?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Milliken: Was it the NDP senator, Brother Lawson?

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Milliken: Was it a Liberal senator?

Some hon. members: No.

Some hon. members: Order.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order, please. Oral Question Period.

MANUFACTURING SECTOR

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

This morning, Statistics Canada reported that 43,000 Canadians lost jobs in manufacturing last month. This brings to 120,000 the number of Canadians who have lost manufacturing jobs under the government since January of this year alone.

Why is the government deliberately pursuing a policy of destroying manufacturing jobs in the country?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Madam Speaker, the government is not following the policy of deliberately destroying jobs. That is a statement that is completely inaccurate.

Five and a half years ago, the hon. member and his party predicted some disaster as far as employment is concerned when the Government of Canada brought out a program for renewal in our economy. The Minister of Finance presented that some five and a half years ago.

In that period of time, we have had unprecedented growth in the economy and in employment. Our record is very good.

At this time, the economy has slowed down somewhat. There is still growth, albeit slow growth. Over the last year, we still created a net 139,000 new jobs. Although the economy has slowed down, we are on our plan to get interest rates and inflation down. Once we get those pressures down, we will see the economy moving again in Canada.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, this reply is simply incredible. According to Statistics Canada, an agency of this government, in May 43,000 workers lost their jobs in the manufacturing industry. Since January, 120,000 jobs were lost this year.

I want to ask the minister whether this is a deliberate policy on the part of the government, and when the government will change its policy and introduce measures that will create manufacturing jobs instead of destroying them.

[English]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Madam Speaker, I would never have believed that the Leader of the Opposition would give me the chance to ask Canadians: How can he say what he says?

We want to remove a federal sales tax of 13.5 per cent that totally disturbed the manufacturing sector of the economy of Canada, and he is against the GST.

[Translation]

You are against the Goods and Services Tax. We want to remove the old sales tax to help Canadian manufacturers be more competitive, but no way! Madam Speaker, this party is against any measure that would let the government boost Canada's economy.

• (1120)

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, no wonder the government has no credibility, considering the reply given by the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology. It was he and his government who increased the existing tax four times since they came to power, a tax which according to him is harming our economy, and now they want to introduce a GST that will increase inflation in this country!

[English]

Yesterday, Robert Blair, chairman of Nova Corporation, said at the meeting of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association that the government's "crude and cumbersome" economic policy "has driven up the value of the Canadian dollar, hammered our exporters, and is endangering the nation's standard of living".

Will the minister admit that his policies are endangering the country's standard of living, and that the people who have to bear the brunt of his government's mismanagement are the 120,000 Canadians who have lost good manufacturing jobs since January?

Why does the minister and his government continue with these policies when he knows they are creating massive job losses and are expected to cause the loss of thousands more at plants such as Kelsey-Hayes in Windsor over the coming months?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Madam Speaker, I would like to go back to what the Leader of the Opposition said about the manufacturing reality of Canada.

He knows very well that, at the present time, the international economy is going toward globalization. Because a lot of Canadian industries have to rationalize their operations, we face a lot of operation on that level. As a Canadian and as a minister of the government, I would hope that the member agrees that one of the ways that we have to help the manufacturing sector is through decreasing the federal sales tax.

The hon. member does not agree with that. He does not agree that we can totally remove the manufacturers' sales tax to put in a goods and services tax, which will be applied not only to Canadian manufacturers. I do not understand him, but I know what the economy that they had in 1980-84 gave to Canadians.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister and concerns the constitutional impasse. Negotiations are entering their sixth day. The atmosphere is pretty negative, and Canadians are very worried about the course of events. I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister whether he could give the House a progress report on the negotiations and let us know whether, should the impasse continue, the plan is to continue the negotiations over the weekend.

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, obviously the discussions of the First Ministers have reached a critical stage.

As the hon. member is aware, I am sure, the talks did reconvene this morning. I am satisfied that there is still a strong will to reach a satisfactory conclusion by all First Ministers and others who are involved in the process.

We can only hope that their deliberations this morning will result in further progress toward reaching a satisfactory conclusion.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): I have a supplementary question, Madam Speaker.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister assure us that the Prime Minister will give a full accounting of the situation to the House of Commons today, or whenever the negotiations are terminated, even if it means calling back the House of Commons during the weekend?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, that has always been the Prime Minister's intention.

On previous occasions when these discussions took place, at the first opportunity, he sought to come before the House and to report in full detail. I have no reason to believe that that would not be the case on this occasion.

MANUFACTURING SECTOR

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology as well.

As the minister responsible for the manufacturing sector in the country, does he not have a sense that in fact there is systematic destruction of our manufacturing base taking place right across the country? Since November, 1988 when the Conservatives were elected again, 183,000 manufacturing jobs have been eliminated. The minister can suggest all sorts of red herrings such as the manufacturers' sales tax.

Is he not prepared to admit clearly that his ministry has not taken action to protect the jobs of Canadians in the manufacturing sector and has not been able to take action against the present government's policies which are so detrimental to the manufacturing sector in Canada?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is entirely inaccurate in what he is saying.

For example, there was just a major announcement in his own community of Windsor where Chrysler is investing some $400 million in two or three plants to upgrade and bring up to standard, which will preserve and increase employment for people in his own constituency. He knows that. For him to stand up and make a statement in the House as he did is totally wrong.

The other problem in the manufacturing sector right now is that the wage demands being asked now are inflationary. We are seeing it, and the Minister of Finance has said it many times. They are forcing Canadians to be uncompetitive.

I draw the hon. member's attention to the fact that labour costs grew 8.2 per cent last year, while productivity increased only 1.7 per cent. That is why we are uncompetitive. Wage demands must get more in line with productivity if we are going to compete. That is the message that is out there. It is inflationary to have an 8.2 per cent increase in labour costs. It causes the problems we are experiencing at the present time.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): I have a supplementary question, Madam Speaker. I would just say that the minister should get real.

According to the latest Economist, the rate of growth of industrial production in the country is the worst among the G-7 countries for last year. We are not succeeding.

The minister has mentioned my community. Let me ask a question with respect to my community. Yesterday, over 1,500 people from Windsor, from right across the community, protested against the shutdown of Kelsey-Hayes. It was a shutdown of a company which made $8 million last year and yet has shifted three of its production lines to Missouri.

Will the government use the two million shares it owns in Kelsey-Hayes and Varity Corporation to see that these jobs are protected and saved for the future of our community?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Madam Speaker, I agree with the hon. member who knows very well that Varity had a covenant in that it had to protect, maintain, or create jobs in its companies. I expect that the company will live up to its commitment.

The question is not that jobs have to be protected specifically at Kelsey. Jobs have to be protected by Varity within the plants belonging to Varity. The hon. member knows that very well. The covenant will be respected.

I believe that, as far as the headquarters is concerned, the 1986 agreement determined that the number of jobs will be protected and that will be done. However, the company does not have to give the guarantee that it will be done at Kelsey, specifically.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, the point is that this company has an important government shareholding in it. In the past, the minister responsible for small business said that the shareholding would be used to help protect jobs in this company. It has not been.

Is the minister not prepared to listen to those 1,500 people who in the streets of Windsor yesterday said: "Our jobs are being hit and our families are being hurt"? Is he not prepared to listen? Is he not prepared to act for the sake of our country? Do something.

• (1130)

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Madam Speaker, I hope the member from Windsor does not want to give the House the impression that we are not sensitive to people who lose their jobs. We are as sensitive as the hon. member. We do not have the magical answers that the hon. member seems to have.

I never said that we would not be open to listening to those people.

My friend knows very well that a great many steel wheels are being replaced with aluminum wheels. This is something that creates problems in that type of industry. We are sensitive to that. We are working with the company.

We are very sensitive to what happened to the workers. It would be more sensitive to look to having an industry which could continue to be competitive with industries across the world.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

When Manfred Ruhland and his partners were given Route Canada they paid $29 million, none of which was their own money. Then the government turned around and asked CN to give Route Canada $40 million so that it could lay off 1,500 workers. What a deal!

How can the government possibly say that it made a good deal when it gave away $11 million more than it got in return for a $100-million corporation?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, there are a lot of allegations and a lot of figures in the hon. member's question. Let us put everything in perspective.

The purchasers of Route Canada paid $29 million for a company with an asset base of $40 million or $50 million. The company was losing $40 million to $50 million a year. That is not much of a return on investment in any business, in any country. That is what happened.

In the efforts, CN, the company which sold the asset base, felt that selling it as a going concern would give those employees a better opportunity to see if they could make a go of it. Unfortunately, they did not make a go of it. Everybody regrets that. Nobody takes any pleasure in people losing jobs. But that is part of the competitive system that we all believe in.

CN came to the assistance of some employees who wanted to take their pensions, and they did so. I do not think CN should be chastised for that either.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Madam Speaker, Route Canada which was given $40 million and which got rid of 1,500 employees still could not make a go of it.

During the election campaign the government was afraid that Route Canada truckers were going to disrupt the election campaign, so it got CN to carry out negotiations with them. When the election campaign ended so did the negotiations.

Why did the government lead Route Canada workers to believe that negotiations were being carried out in good faith when all the government wanted to do was to shut them up until the election campaign was over?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I think what we have to decide here is whether we take into account the unfounded allegation of my friend or a letter written on CN's letterhead to The Toronto Star in an effort to put in writing the facts as they are, not on an unfounded allegation.

In that letter it is stated: "In the process we negotiated special agreements to help ease the impact on employees not required to operate the new company profitably. We have met every one of our commitments to employees, pensioners, customers and communities, including the payment of $23 million for separation and related costs of former CN Route employees".

I ask the House and everybody watching to compare that with the unfounded allegation of my friend.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Madam Speaker, I would like to follow up on the question that I asked in the House yesterday. It is with respect to the sworn statement of Manfred Ruhland, who stated that he had dealings in this transaction with the then Minister of Transport, Donald Mazankowski.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister tell the House if he had any dealings with Manfred Ruhland before the sale of CN Route, during the negotiating process or after CN Route was sold to Manfred Ruhland?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): I believe, Madam Speaker, that my friend has inadvertently misread what the actual question in the alleged—heavy on the "alleged"—affidavit of the individual concerned is. I do not think he did it intentionally.

It states: "Who represented CN in the negotiations and sale of TRC?" That is not as put by my hon. friend.

If he is going to read all the names, I would hope he will pay attention to the word "maybe" in the sixth line.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Madam Speaker, I have read the document fairly thoroughly—

Some hon. members: Fairly!

Mr. Comuzzi: I appreciate the comments of my friend with respect to that transaction. I might say that I am very pleased to hear the answer that I suspect I heard, that is, that there were no dealings. That just goes to show that this company was sold to a person, a most undesirable person, who took this company and destroyed the lives of 1,900 people.

Since we cannot always deal with legal obligations between parties, does the government not now have the moral obligation because of this transaction to look after the affairs and the pension benefits that rightly belong to those people who devoted so many years of their lives to CN Rail?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I want to start off by thanking my friend for withdrawing the allegation of yesterday. I think it is important to this whole affair that that be done. I appreciate that.

I think we should look at the letter in total. It lays out the facts of what kind of money was being lost. I have read a previous statement to the House so I shan't read the same statement. There is another statement that is very important. It is: "Our alternative to the sale was to close down CN Route and lay off all staff in 1985". To lay off all staff and close down was the alternative.

The letter continues: "We chose to sell to purchasers who agreed to use their best efforts to continue in business as a national common carrier. As a result, this is what happened".

"CN and no one else decided to sell its subsidiary after discussions with more than 30 companies beginning in 1985".

This letter is on CN letterhead, and I will table it. It continues: "Our negotiations on the sale were held directly with David Fingold representing himself and his brother Paul as principal purchasers. Their financial credentials were very solid".

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, three times in the recent past my leader and I have raised questions in this House with both the Minister of Finance and the Minister of National Health and Welfare about what the government plans to do to ensure that GST rebates to those on welfare will not be deducted by the provinces.

Three times we have received vague and sanctimonious answers. My provincial colleagues have been asking the same questions of ministers in their provinces.

My question is more specific. It is directed to the Minister of State for Finance.

Has the deputy minister been instructed to clarify this concern with the provincial governments at the upcoming Deputy Finance Ministers' Conference?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Madam Speaker, I will have to take that question as notice and discuss it with the Minister of Finance. We will get an answer for the member.

• (1140)

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to get yet another succinct reply.

I would then like to ask this question of whoever over there answers these questions. Will they give an undertaking that they will attempt to get from the provincial counterparts to the Minister of Finance an assurance in writing that the millions of Canadian on assistance will not have their GST rebates clawed back and that the matter will not be left in the laps of the gods, who in this case are the provincial finance ministers?

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Madam Speaker, the Minister of Finance has expressed his concern many, many times about the behaviour of provincial governments when benefits are provided by the federal government. There are certain jurisdictions in this country that give provinces and the federal government certain powers. We are all becoming very much more aware of that in the discussions that are proceeding at the present time.

The Minister of Finance has been very vocal in his concern that the benefits that flow from the federal government to beneficiaries in this country of ours are received by them and are not taxed back by the provincial government. He will continue to make those representations in the strongest possible manner.

MANUFACTURING SECTOR

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, can the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology give us the name of one Canadian manufacturer who has phoned him up and said: "Keep up the good work. You are doing a great job, Minister. Your high interest rate, high dollar policies are just what we need to compete"?

[Translation]

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Even in French, Madam Speaker—excuse me, obviously it would take me far too long to give the hon. member all the facts although he must be familiar with the situation that prevailed before 1984. I believe the government's record for industrial development has been excellent. The results are there. I repeat, we are now in a phase where Canadian companies must adjust to international competition and, as a result, are restructuring their operations and must also deal with anti-inflation policies. We are coping. However, I am inclined to think the hon. member was being funny when he asked his question.

[English]

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, this government's industrial policy is not funny. It involves cuts to R and D and cuts to employment and training. It involves a high interest rate, high dollar policy that is driving Canadian manufacturing jobs south of the border, just so that they can compete under free trade.

What is the result? The result is that since free trade we have lost 172,000 key manufacturing jobs.

Is it a deliberate policy of the government to drive Canadian jobs south of the border? When will it realize that its economic policies are destroying our future? When will it wake up and stand up for Canada?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, it is amazing that we should hear such comments in the House of Commons. Even the Premier of Ontario is promoting a free trade agreement in the United States and all across the world.

The Royal Bank said: "Trade deal fuelling investment jobs". "Free trade helping Canadian business" was another statement made. We have a lot of examples.

The premises are wrong. We want to put money into employment. The bill is being stalled in the Senate. It is a bill for money and for jobs.

The Liberals are not serious. They never had a policy. We have sound industrial and economic policies.

BILL C-21

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister or the Government House Leader.

As the minister knows, the Senate, in order to break the impasse with the House of Commons has introduced a—

Mr. Valcourt: They voted themselves an increase. That will help the impasse. Your Liberal friends now have an incentive to come and sit down and do their jobs.

Mr. McKnight: They are looking for more days of work so that they can get the $153.

Mr. Allmand: Madam Speaker, as I said, the Senate, in order to break the impasse with the House of Commons, has introduced a motion to refer Bill C-21 on unemployment insurance to a conference between the two Houses, which is the established way of dealing with such differences between the two Houses.

Mr. Valcourt: They have a self-interest now. We are paying them to sit down.

Mr. Allmand: As a matter of fact, there have been 10 such conferences since Confederation.

I want to ask the minister responsible if the government is now ready to respond to the Senate and participate in such a conference to resolve the differences between the two Houses.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, you can tell from the reaction to that question that we on this side are tremendous admirers of that other place.

We think they have been acting very responsibly, particularly recently.

The Senate has sent back its amendments to Bill C-21 which, incidentally, would have added $2 billion to the deficit. This House rejected those amendments and sent them back.

The Senate has sent back a message insisting on those amendments, something that is questionable, certainly from a propriety point of view, since it is this House that establishes the fiscal policy of the country and not that House.

This House has sent back an answer. It is now up to the Senate to respond.

The hon. member is asking us to rely on some arcane procedure that has never been used successfully in this country, one which has not been used since 1947.

It is unconscionable to me for the senators to continue to insist that they have the right to deny the opportunities that Bill C-21 provides to those who are unemployed, pregnant women and so on, and to demand that we take on an additional $2 billion in deficit at a time when the deficit is already causing tremendous pressures on the inflation rate and so on.

I think the responsible thing for the Senate to do is pass Bill C-21 now.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Madam Speaker, there is overwhelming public opinion in this country against the government with respect to Bill C-21. There has been overwhelming testimony before two committees which opposes the bill. We do not accept the argument of the minister.

The established practice for resolving differences between the two Houses, and it has been done 10 times since Confederation, is to have such conferences. Am I to understand from the minister that the government refuses to enter into a conference to resolve the differences with respect to this bill? Is that the answer of the government with respect to this serious issue?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, the hon. member is wrong in terms of the views of the public. Sixty-seven per cent of the public is in favour of using UIC funds for retraining, for example.

He is wrong if he suggests that the public is opposed to the reforms of the UI system that are in the bill. I think he should check his facts.

The fact that the Senate went around and heard the same group 200 times does not mean that it somehow reflects public opinion. There is something a little bit obscene about an appointed body saying that it represents the people.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Andre: If senators want to represent the people, then they should run for office and be accountable.

The reality is that every Senate scholar in recent memory who is still alive has acknowledged that Senates not behave the way this Senate is behaving.

The conferences the hon. members talks about were last held in 1947. None of them were successful. If the member were to read Beauchesne's sixth edition he would see what he thinks is the required procedure is no longer the required procedure.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

THE ENVIRONMENT

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, now that we have wasted more time of the House during Question Period—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Ms. Hunter: My question is for the minister responsible for the environment today, if we have one.

We on this side of the House have been calling for action in the environmental assessment review process. At present, the Export Development Corporation does not require environmental review when considering the approval of export loans.

In committee the president of the EDC stated: "If EDC were required to apply environmental standards that other export credit agencies were not, the Canadian exporter would lose the deal".

Does the minister, whoever that might be, accept the view that the bottom line is more important than the global environment?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, the minister, whoever that might be, is me.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Crosbie: The Export Development Corporation is a body set up to assist Canada in its exports. It makes loans to foreign buyers and ensures exports against various risks. It assists in providing jobs here in Canada so that the orders sold to foreign buyers, assisted by our finances, are purchased from Canada so that jobs are created in Canada.

Why is it that the New Democratic Party seems to be totally against anything that is to help workers here in Canada be employed, to be creative and to be paid good wages? That is the whole purpose of the EDC.

Mr. Peterson: Then why did you cut it back by $100 million?

Mr. Crosbie: Madam Speaker, I wish Premier Peterson were as voluble as his brother. He makes as much sense as his brother, but he is not quite as voluble.

Mr. Peterson: You have some wonderful brothers, John.

Mr. Crosbie: I wish I had more of them, Madam Speaker.

If I might continue, Madam Speaker, the EDC fully complies with current federal environmental legislation which does not oblige it to undertake such screenings.

Who are we to say that we will have extra-territorial jurisdiction and to decide what projects should and should not go ahead in other countries? The effrontery of it is amazing.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, my interpretation of that answer is that the economic priorities of the government take precedence over environmental priorities. We have all known that for a long time.

The Export Development Corporation administers a multi-million dollar budget. The list of environmentally harmful projects in which the EDC is involved is as long as my arm.

It supports CANDU nuclear reactors in Argentina and Mexico, hydroelectric projects in China and India, pulp and paper mills in Indonesia.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there a question?

Ms. Hunter: My question is this. Will the government commit itself today to including EDC in the pending environmental assessment review process?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, there will be new environmental legislation coming before the House shortly. Of course the policy that it contains will be dealt with then.

I am not surprised by the question from the hon. member because that hon. member was the one who said yesterday that Newfoundlanders were not of sufficient intelligence and qualifications to be able to take advantage of the Hibernia development and to fulfil the jobs that would—

Some hon. members: Shame.!

Ms. Hunter: Point of order, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James.

JUSTICE

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

There has been yet another dramatic development in the David Milgaard case. One of the chief Crown witnesses now says that he lied at the trial 20 years ago. Ron Wilson says he was pressured by police and manipulated by them.

I now want to know whether the minister takes this latest revelation seriously. I understand that the RCMP contacted Wilson only hours after he went public.

Can the minister confirm to this House that the RCMP and an official from the Department of Justice will be interviewing Ron Wilson in the next few days?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I cannot make that specific undertaking because I am not aware of those specific circumstances.

I would point out that this is the hon. member who has been pressing me to make a decision on this case when in fact clearly all of the evidence that the applicant wishes to bring forward has not been brought forward. I would say that after the hon. member's last question, which I think was on about June 5, on June 6 counsel for Mr. Milgaard identified a former trial witness whom he said had relevant evidence, and this may be the person to whom he is referring.

We are taking into account all of the evidence which counsel for Mr. Milgaard wishes to bring forward. When we are assured that the case is complete from their point of view, the review will be completed and I will make the adjudication as Minister of Justice.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

As the minister well knows, Ron Wilson is not the only Crown witness to have changed his story. Another witness recanted on the stand at the trial and was declared a hostile witness. In fact none of the testimony of the Crown witnesses appears to be solid at this time. This whole case against Milgaard is unravelling before our eyes.

I want to know from the minister whether the Department of Justice has interviewed all the Crown witnesses in the last few weeks or months and, if not, why not?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, the Department of Justice has reviewed all the evidence that has been brought to its attention. A report is being prepared for my consideration. I will review it.

I do not believe that this House is the proper place to re-enact the trial of David Milgaard. I want to ensure that the case that he and his counsel bring forward to me—and it is a very serious responsibility to question the findings of not simply a trial court but an appellate court—are considered in the fairest and most dispassionate way, and not in the kind of media circus which the hon. member seems to prefer as a process in this country.

HEALTH

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

We all appreciated the decision to end exposure to tobacco smoke on Canadian air carriers as an integral component of the program to reduce both health and economic costs to our nation.

Now his colleague, the Minister of Transport, is considering an extension of three years before implementation of this policy, which is clearly a cave-in to the airlines. It is jeopardizing our health objectives for air travellers and for flight attendants.

How can the minister possibly approve of his colleague taking such a backward step?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, if the hon. member had checked the facts, she would know that Canada is a world leader in terms of the fight against tobacco. Today, some 95 per cent of all flights by Canadian carriers are smoke-free.

Canada is the one country that is determined within three years to eliminate all tobacco usage on Canadian carriers.

Canada will be reducing by 25 per cent the seats available for smoking as of July 1 of this year.

Canada will be operating internationally with IATA to seek international co-operation to reduce and eliminate smoking on flights around the world.

Canada has spelled out to the airlines that we are serious about ensuring that they must co-operate in eliminating the use of tobacco on airlines in Canada and around the world.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I believe the minister has just confirmed to me that they have already approved that extension of three years.

Mr. Lewis: That is what we said, yes.

Mrs. Gaffney: What does the minister say to flight attendants and travellers who are concerned about three more years of high levels of concentration of tobacco smoke? How can the minister explain to flight attendants that money to the corporations is more important to him than their health?

• (1200)

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, perhaps I can assist my hon. friend in her quest for information as to how the flight attendants feel. I could provide her with the correspondence that I got from employees of the airlines who are concerned about the fact that if this arrangement had not been made Canadian airlines would have been forced to compete on an unequal playing field, because all the other airlines in the world allow smoking and Canadian airlines are going to be smoke-free in three years.

They have asked me, as Minister of Transport, to be sure to take into account the health of workers, yes, but also the health of the airlines they work for.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Madam Speaker, I have a couple of questions for the Minister of Transport who insists that the sale of Route Canada was purely a decision of CN and that it was done only by CN.

Would the minister tell us who was present at the negotiations before cabinet gave approval to the sale? Prior to the government approving the sale, who knew that up to 1,900 workers would be out of a job? Will the minister take some responsibility for those 1,900 workers?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, despite the time, I am pleased to answer a question that has already been asked during the normal Question Period time.

CN and no one else decided to sell its subsidiary after discussions with more than 30 companies, beginning in 1985.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Madam Speaker, the government was the representative of the shareholders of Canada of Canadian National. It has the responsibility to protect the shareholders, namely the people of Canada.

The government brags about using sound business practices. Could the minister tell me what boneheads agreed to sell a company for $29 million when it was appraised by experts at $72 million? Who would be dumb enough, using sound business practices, to do that?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to quote from a letter from CN to The Toronto Star:

> CN was a money-losing trucking subsidiary of Canadian National Railways. Canadian National, with a debt load then approaching $3.5 billion, could not continue to absorb annual losses of $40 million without affecting our railway operations.

CN, and no one else, decided to sell its subsidiary after discussions with more than 30 companies, beginning in 1985. Our negotiations on the sale were held directly with David Fingold, representing himself and his brother Paul as principal purchasers. Their financial credentials were very solid.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Lewis: Oh, are we out of time?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. minister for giving two more minutes of his precious time to the House.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, I am rising on a question of privilege. During Question Period earlier today the Minister for International Trade accused me of making statements that were very insulting to Newfoundlanders.

I would offer him an opportunity now to retract and to apologize to me.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Madam Speaker, I would certainly be glad to apologize to the hon. member if there was anything to apologize for. However, I think we should wait until Hansard is available to see exactly what the hon. member said yesterday when she was denigrating the workers and people of Newfoundland.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Madam Speaker, that is what happened in the debate yesterday. The hon. member strongly opposed the bill in favour of development and workers in Newfoundland. If you check page 12502, you will also find that her colleague, the member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing, played a very interesting game quoting a royal commission as follows:

It must be recognized that the majority of Hibernia development expenditures will be incurred outside Newfoundland. The skilled labour force in the province is limited. The number of local companies capable of significant involvement in the offshore industry is also relatively small.

That leaves the distinct impression that Newfoundlanders would not get benefits, they are not capable, and that is wrong.

Ms. Hunter: Madam Speaker, I would ask you to rule. I ask you to look at the speech that I made in the House yesterday. You will see that I was not talking at all in insulting terms about Newfoundlanders. I was talking about our party, as the party for all of Canada, having a right to talk about the expenditure of billions of dollars of taxpayers' money.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think this is actually a continuation of the debate we had yesterday.

POINTS OF ORDER

STATEMENT PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. During the statements under Standing Order 31 earlier today, Your Honour cut off me and the hon. member for Calgary Southeast in the course of our presentations, and also the hon. member for Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup.

I want to object to that on behalf of at least two of us. I presume that Your Honour's view was that we were making statements that were disrespectful of the other place. I deny that. My statement was not in the least disrespectful of the other place. I was simply pointing out who in the other place had moved the motion to increase the allowance paid to senators. It was, of course, the assistant government House leader in that House.

The hon. member for Calgary Southeast had not said anything in his statement that I heard that was disrespectful of the other place and none of the members on this side of the House were objecting to his statement for that reason.

I suggest that to be fair, Your Honour ought to give us additional time to repeat our statements.

Now the hon. member for Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup was a little close to the line, I will admit, and maybe Your Honour was correct in interrupting him. However, the two of us had been very careful to avoid speaking disrespectfully. I would not speak disrespectfully of the other place. I have defended the other place in this House on numerous occasions, to the great annoyance of the government House leader, and I would be pleased to do so again at the appropriate time.

I think the two of us are quite innocent of any wrongdoing. Our statements were in order and we ought to have been allowed to complete them.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Madam Speaker, I too would like to rise on a point of order with reference to being interrupted today during my statement pursuant to Standing Order 31 about the outrage of Canadians about the Senate rewarding themselves an extra $153 a day over and above their already generous salaries.

I referred to the Standing Orders to note that no member shall speak disrespectfully or use offensive words. I do not recall using any disrespectful words about the Senate. I did not call them our national unelected boondogglers. I did not call them appointed profiteers. I made no disrespectful mention.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Both hon. members have risen on this point of order and referred to our Standing Order that says that no one in this House should speak disrespectfully of the other place.

I think the hon. members will accept my judgment that in either content and/or tone the remarks made today could very easily be construed as disrespectful to the other place. That was my decision at that time and I stand by it.

ROYAL CANADIAN MINT

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands rose in some concern that the anxiously awaited reports of the Royal Canadian Mint were somehow not tabled. I just want to acquaint him with the fact that Votes and Proceedings of April 11, 1990, point out that the report of the Royal Canadian Mint was tabled in this House.

Perhaps we might both anxiously leaf through this document to see if the information he and I were both anxiously seeking is there and available for us.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, the government House leader's office was very quick to call my office and inform me of that tabling. In fact, I have asked for another copy of it. However, I believe he will find, if he checks—and I hope he has taken the time to do so—that that is in fact the annual report of the Royal Canadian Mint. I did not ask, in my statement yesterday, for the annual report.

If the hon. member will look at page 12459 of Hansard of yesterday, he will see that I requested the capital budget summary and the corporate plan summary. Those were the two documents I requested. Those are not the documents referred to in Votes and Proceedings on the date in question.

I am informed that it was the minister's own publication that listed these as late. I realize it was his colleague, the President of the Treasury Board, who happened to point out the fact that they were late. I hope that he will check, as I am trying to do, to ascertain that the document referred to in Votes and Proceedings was in fact the annual report, which may or may not have been on time, but which is at least before the House. It is the other two documents that I asked for. I did not ask for the annual report and I hope that the minister will check this out.

Hon. Paul Dick (Minister of Supply and Services): Madam Speaker, I think it appropriate, as the minister responsible for the Canadian Mint, to point out that the reports for which the hon. member made a request yesterday will be tabled very soon.

I know he will be extremely pleased to know that the reports, when tabled, will show that for the fifth year in a row the Mint showed a profit, this year of over $7 million.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: I must inform the House that there is an unfortunate error in today's Order Paper. Senate Public Bill S-14, an act respecting the laws prohibiting marriage between related persons, is incorrectly indicated as having been deemed read the first time. It was placed on the order of precedence under Private Members' Business.

In fact, the bill should have appeared on this day's Order Paper under the heading "First Reading of Senate Public Bills" in Routine Proceedings and is therefore eligible to be considered for first reading at this time.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Madam Speaker, the roll of petitioners gets longer and longer and goes on and on, and will continue to do so.

I wish to present a number of petitions with over 1,900 signatures of Canadians who are protesting the implementation of a goods and services tax because it is unfair to low and middle income families.

They call upon this House to reject the proposed tax, to bring in genuine tax reform based on the income tax system and to put an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations. For this, your humble petitioners will ever pray.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have a petition containing close to 1,000 names from citizens in virtually every province of Canada who are opposing the cuts in funding to the Northern Native Broadcasting Access program and also to the Native Communications Program which has been cut by 100 per cent, even though that program provides a valuable service in promoting and enhancing literacy among aboriginal peoples and also in preserving and enhancing the aboriginal languages and cultures of aboriginal people.

The petitioners call on the government to consider the advisability of reinstating both the Native Communications Program and the Northern Native Broadcast Access program at full funding levels, and also to conduct consultations with groups affected before any of these types of cutbacks take place.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I have another petition, again from several hundred Canadians mainly from my constituency, calling on the government to cancel the proposed goods and services tax.

The petitioners call on the government to reject the current proposal for the goods and services tax and to reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations.

FORESTRY RESOURCE DEVELOPMENT AGREEMENTS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Finally, Madam Speaker, I have a petition with respect to the federal-provincial Forestry Resource Development Agreements.

The petitioners encourage the Parliament of Canada to renew this important agreement with British Columbia and therefore to provide for renewed commitment to restocking our forest land, advancing forest research, promoting silviculture, and assisting the forest industry in developing the new products and markets that will provide us with forestry jobs in the future.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition signed by numerous residents of Newfoundland, particularly from Melrose, Bonavista, Port Rexton, Deer Lake, and Labrador City.

These persons have signed a petition objecting to the goods and services tax being imposed by the government, its thirty-second major tax increase since taking office in September, 1984.

These residents of Newfoundland, like many other Canadians, are groaning under the burden of Tory taxation. They call upon Parliament to reject this additional burden being imposed in the goods and services tax.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Madam Speaker, petitions against the goods and services tax continue to pour in. I have some in my hand right now.

Despite the fact that the GST legislation has passed through the House and is currently in the other place, Canadians, it is quite evident, are still very much opposed to the GST. They are still hoping that the government will come to its senses, sooner rather than later, and abolish this proposed tax.

The petition I have in my hand is certified correct as to form and content. It cites the usual strong arguments against the GST and calls on the government, at the eleventh hour, as it were, to put a stop to this unfair tax.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, it is my honour and duty, under Standing Order 36, to present four different petitions. The first one is a petition with more than 890 names from many parts of Canada, but especially from Toronto and from Trinity—Spadina.

The petition opposes the goods and services tax for reasons that I will not cite. It gives specific alternatives by saying that the undersigned residents of Canada call upon Parliament to reject the current proposal for the goods and services tax; to cancel the tax breaks for rich individuals and corporations; to reduce the need for a sales tax by reducing the bank interest rate to 2 per cent, so as to reduce interest payments on the federal debt and increase small business and general employment; and to increase employment in such useful work as protection of the environment, restoration of needed roads, sewers and bridges, air traffic control, improved VIA service, and industrial research and development.

I have another petition on the same subject, Madam Speaker, which simply calls upon Parliament to reject the goods and services tax.

I have still a further petition which is much more specific. It concerns the fact that skating lessons will be taxed. The petitioners point out that the sport contributes significantly to the physical and mental health of our youth. They pray that Parliament will consider instruction in skating as an educational service and therefore exempt skating educational expenses from the proposed goods and services tax.

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHT TRAINING

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Finally, Madam Speaker, I have over 1,000 names on a petition from all parts of Canada from people who are deeply opposed to the low-level flight training being continued by our government in Labrador and eastern Quebec.

They call upon Parliament to join with the Assembly of First Nations, the Innu of Labrador and other aboriginal peoples in opposing the use of their land for NATO-NORAD attack training. They demand that Canada cease NATO operations in Canada, including the proposed tactical fighter and weapons training at Goose Bay which is considered for expansion. They demand that Parliament redirect Canada's NATO-NORAD funding toward enabling Canada's aboriginal peoples to regain control of their lands and their livelihood and toward promoting sustainable development for all Canadians.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, like my colleague, I have a series of petitions which I present to you pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The first is a petition with respect to VIA Rail travel and the cutbacks to that service. The petitioners bring to your attention what they consider to be the shameful attack on Canada's infrastructure and the cutting back of service which enables them to travel and to meet their commitments, both to the health and welfare of their children and in the light of certain handicaps. They feel it is absolutely essential that we maintain the transportation needs of people in outlying districts.

Therefore, they call upon Parliament to maintain, improve and modernize VIA Rail services in those areas of the country where it can provide a more rapid, economical, safe, convenient, environmentally sound, and energy efficient alternative to other means of transportation.

I will not read all the whereases for you, Madam Speaker, but it is interesting that these petitions are coming in again at this time. It must be travel time for a lot of people from the Gaspé area, for example.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, I also have three different forms of petitions with respect to the goods and services tax. Again, I will not remind you, because we have heard it so often, of how unhappy the population is about the goods and services tax.

This particular petition comes from those who are involved in the distribution of cultural properties. In this instance they call upon the government and Parliament to reaffirm the historic principles embodied in the tax-free status for the printed word by retaining the zero-rate in the goods and services tax legislation and its regulations. That is with respect to the book industry.

Those who are involved in occupational therapy, physiotherapy, social services, speech language pathology, and audiology call upon the House not to impose the goods and services tax on any health care services, whether in public institutions or in the community.

Again, hundreds have signed the general petition that has been circulating calling upon the House simply to re-examine the goods and services tax and find a more fair and equitable way to improve the tax structure.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, it is indeed a privilege and a pleasure to present, pursuant to Standing Order 36, yet another petition against the goods and services tax.

The people of British Columbia, in fact the people of Canada, have not given up hope that the government will come to its senses. They continue to sign and send in petitions against the goods and services tax, asking the government to look at reasonable alternatives that will be fair to all Canadians rather than a tax system that will simply help its corporate and wealthy friends.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House): Madam Speaker, I suggest that all questions stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES RESTRAINT ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-69, An Act to amend certain statutes to enable restraint of government expenditures, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Madam Speaker, before Question Period, I was giving a few examples of the problems we find in our post-secondary education system here in Canada, and I mentioned some problems at McMaster University in Hamilton.

[English]

There are problems though throughout Canada in post-secondary education. They are a signal to us that we are at risk in Canada of imperilling our economic well-being in the future because of the failure of our system to produce trained and well educated people.

I will take you Madam Speaker, on a brief tour across Canada.

In the University of Manitoba Department of Computer Science, for example, courses for non-specialists in computer science have had their class sizes increased to over 200 people and line-ups to use computer equipment are commonplace because there is not enough equipment to go around. One computer course for non-specialists was eliminated altogether due to lack of funds. Three faculty members in that program have resigned—one to go to the United States, one to teach in high school and one to join the private sector. In all three cases, it was in order to obtain pay increases.

Another professor says that in his classes he has embarked on trying to shake down the class size, since they are so large, through a process of intimidation and refusing the students the right to ask questions so as to encourage them to drop his course.

In Newfoundland at Memorial University, Dr. Leslie Harris, the president, has recently had to announce an interim hiring freeze. He says that further measures are going to be taken to make up the difference in the short-fall in the university budget. Dr. Harris stated:

> We have eliminated approximately $4 million from capital operating costs and many of the projects we have had to drop are of critical importance. These include such things as roof repairs, road improvements, classroom renovation, replacement of desks and other classroom equipment, repairs to tunnels and other necessary projects.

Dr. Harris said that inadequate funding is reflected in the ability of the administration to provide services and facilities for students. He said:

> The fabric of the place suffers. Old plant and equipment which breaks down, the deteriorating quality of classrooms and classroom materials, desks, audio visual equipment, the lack of space for recreation and social activities—these are some of the prices we pay when we cut back.

With regard to the University of Alberta in Edmonton, a newspaper report in The Leader–Post of Regina in April of this year stated:

> The University of Alberta has adopted a plan to freeze enrolment at its current level next year.
> The board of governors voted in a closed meeting last week to limit enrolment for 1990–91 to the present level of 29,500 students. This means entrance requirements could be raised to a 73 per cent average mark from 70 per cent.

The problem is also reflected in the level of tuition fees in the universities. The Canadian Federation of Students has made this point and has raised the prospect that many qualified Canadian students are unable to pursue their education because of the sky–rocketing tuition fees and other costs.

For example, between 1989 and 1990–91, tuition fees have climbed at Memorial University in Newfoundland from $1,280 to $1,344; Dalhousie University, from $1,710 to $1,771; and Mount Allison in New Brunswick, from $1,935 to $2,135. Quebec is exemplary in respect of tuition fees, but even it has had a significant increase. McGill University went from $570 to $890. At McMaster in Ontario it went from $1,516 to $1,637. I could go on across the country, province by province.

If I might be permitted, I will comment on the relevant weight of tuition fees.

[Translation]

The Province of Quebec has set an example for the rest of Canada in the way it handles tuition fees for students. If we want our students to be well educated and well prepared for the future, we must reduce, not increase tuition fees.

• (1230)

Quebec has set that example; tuition fees are as little as one–third or one–quarter of what they are in other provinces. Surely, if we put a high value on education we would see to it that cost does not prevent people from pursuing their education.

Going on, George Pedersen, President of the University of Western Ontario, issued this stern warning:

> The university system in Canada is in trouble. Serious trouble.

Mr. Pedersen said that the quality of instruction available to university students today is not nearly so good as that provided to their parents who attended an Ontario university 30 years ago. Class sizes are now much larger, laboratory equipment is outdated, students get more of their instruction from graduate students and part–time instructors instead of regular professors. Mr. Pederson further stated:

> The reinstatement of quality in our universities is, without question, the number one challenge to the system.

I go back to the question I posed at the very outset of my remarks. What kind of Canada do we want in the year 2020? Surely, if we want a Canada whose hallmark is a well–educated, skilled, capable population able to enter into the global competitiveness in an energetic and enthusiastic way to meet the best that the other nations of the world have to offer, we have to focus our resources on post–secondary education. It is of critical importance. It is not an option. If we think education is expensive, we ought to stand back and figure out what the cost of ignorance is.

There are other aspects of this bill that I would like to comment on as well. Before I do though, I want to restate this question because I want these remarks not to be considered as being highly partisan. I do not intend them to be highly partisan. I have already said that I understand why the government must be frustrated with what the provinces are doing in education. What I really want to stress when it comes to post–secondary education is that we need a national strategy in Canada to ensure that our post–secondary educational system is not compromised by the need to achieve fiscal responsibility at all levels of government.

This calls for very great skill and judgment on the part of the leaders of the provinces, as well as the leaders of the federal government, to find a new method of funding the universities that ensures quality and accessibility of education for all qualified Canadians. It is crucial.

In addition to reducing the transfer payments to the provinces in respect of post–secondary education, Bill C–69 has a similar effect on the transfer payments for health. Again they work in the same way, a block amount of money. Cash or tax points are transferred to the provinces on a non–accountable basis so that they can be assisted in paying for the health care. I suggest that what we need to do is appeal to the health ministers in Canada to agree on what standards of health care are needed across Canada, and then ensure that adequate funding from the proper level of authority is available to achieve that.

I suggest that block funding is no longer working. We get many reflections of this. Some of these have come in through the testimony that was presented to the Standing Committee on Finance of this House when it examined the provisions of Bill C-69.

I would like to cite the evidence of Mrs. Carol Clemenhagen, President of the Canadian Hospital Association. She said this to the Standing Committee on Finance:

> Prior to the February 20 budget, the CHA (Canadian Hospital Association) calculated that the cumulative loss the provinces have already experienced from 1986-87 to 1989-90 because of the 2 percent reduction in EPF growth was $2.6 billion, and the projected cumulative loss to the provinces from 1990-91 to 1995-96 because of the combined 3 percent reduction in EPF growth is $19.4 billion.

That is a lot of money, no matter who is counting. She goes on to say this:

> Reductions in the EPF transfers challenge provincial governments either to reduce health care and post-secondary education budgets or to increase taxes. We believe a national framework of stable and adequate EPF funding is a prerequisite to achieving health goals. In the case of health manpower, cuts to EPF threaten both the health system in which health professionals work and the education system in which they are trained.

There are many examples of the way in which the strain on health budgets is affecting health care in Canada. Some of these examples came forward before the finance committee when it was considering this bill. It is interesting that governments at all levels are cutting back on funding which is going to hospitals. I think all of us are conscious of the enormous effort that the volunteer sector is now having to put into raising funds for health care in the communities across Canada; volunteer contributions of time and money are becoming crucial. In the face of that, there are government initiatives which are responsible for increasing the financial burden on hospitals. The evidence at the finance committee showed that increasingly the only option appears to be to divert resources from direct patient care to meet some of these regulatory requirements.

There are some examples that I can give. The workplace hazardous material information system involves an extensive, in-house training program to comply with new initiatives which took effect in 1989. There is environmental legislation, including legislation dealing with transportation of dangerous goods, very important legislation, critical legislation, and yet it is imposing an additional financial burden on the hospitals of Canada. Pay equity legislation is another example. Unless the governments, whose responsibility it is to fund a health care system, are able to come forward and to assist in bearing these burdens, the health care system is in peril.

If you would permit me one last quotation from the evidence before the finance committee, it is very striking. I am quoting from the witness, Ms. Heidemann, who appeared before the finance committee as Chairman of the Board of Directors of the Canadian Hospital Association. She said:

> In some provinces, Quebec for example, the pressure has become so intense the hospital associations have expressed the desire to debate the merits of alternate sources of health care funding, including certain privatization options.

I think it is evident that the pressure on the system is inevitably going to result in poorer or more expensive or privatized service in the health field. I do not think that this is what any of us want for Canada. Again, I go back to the original question. What kind of country do we envisage for the year 2020? Where do we want to go, as a country? What kind of society do we want this to be? Surely, it is one in which we are assured that health care is adequate and generously available to all Canadians.

The other aspect of this bill that I would like to comment on briefly is the decision to put a 5 per cent limit on payments under the Canada Assistance Plan to three provinces in Canada, those three provinces being Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. The Canada Assistance Plan is the source of assistance in our society for the poorest members of our society. CAP is not a luxury. CAP is a bare essential to ensure that everybody in our society maintains at least a minimal standard of living.

I think that when we put this kind of limitation on CAP, what we are saying again about the kind of society we want to be in 30 years time is that we are going to leave it to everyone to fight for their own well-being, without any concern for our weakest, our poorest, our disabled, and so on.

The question I feel we need to address in asking what kind of country we want this to be is, does this kind of decision bring out the best in Canadians, or does it do otherwise.

There are always those who are going to say to us that poverty is a self-inflicted wound, that hunger, where it exists—and many deny that it exists in Canada, and they are quite wrong—can be relieved if people are only willing to work hard.

I suggest that those of us in positions of leadership have every responsibility to address those arguments and to expose them for the lies that they are. The reality of Canada today is that there are increasing examples of poverty and hunger among children especially, and we must not take measures that make it harder for those people to make do in our society. If so, we deprive ourselves because we are making this a country of much less compassion and care.

I think that deprives all of us of the satisfaction of knowing that we share not only enormous natural wealth, but we share it fairly in a way that ensures that everybody has adequate resources.

When you look at what was happening at the end of the decade of the 1980s, when you look at the share of national income, you find that high income people have increased their share of the national income beyond what it normally would have been at the start of the 1980s. Given ordinary projections, that share of national income which goes to high income people is about $4 billion more than it would have been if it had followed the same course as in 1980.

What this suggests to me is that inequalities in Canada increased over the decade of the 1980s. We are conscious of the number of people who rely on food banks for food; we are conscious of the number of single parents and of children who live in poverty in Canada. Is this the time, for whatever good fiscal reason there may be, for the federal government to signal that now they want the poorest in Canada to look after themselves? I suggest not.

I know that the government is going to say: "Well, we didn't put this limit on the Canada Assistance Plan payments across the board. We only put it on the three richest provinces."

The data shows that the three richest provinces have most of Canada's poor people living in them. Fifty-four point nine per cent of Canada's poor individuals, and 49 per cent of Canada's poor families live in Ontario, Alberta, and British Columbia. The CAP arrangements were strictly a 50 per cent federal contribution to the costs of the social welfare system based on federal-provincial agreements.

To intervene in this is not only callous and unfeeling, not only does it send out the wrong kind of signal as I mentioned earlier but it means that, in a very cold, calculating fashion, the federal government has reneged on agreements with the provinces and is shifting the burden of its deficit on to the provincial treasurers.

This is really where I would like to finish. Underlying what we have seen in the context of Bill C-69 highlights for us the problems of funding and post-secondary education, health care, social assistance payments and other things that I have not mentioned between the federal and provincial governments.

After that, the federal government justifies these cut-backs on only one solitary ground. That ground is it wants to reduce the deficit. The reality of the situation is this. It is not benefiting Canadians as a whole one bit with these measures, even though deficit reduction is a valid and good objective. All it is doing is shifting those burdens from the federal government to the provincial governments.

These are not luxuries that we are talking about. Post-secondary education, health care and social assistance are not optional or things that we can have if we have a good day or a good year. These are essentials for our society. If we are going to continue to build the best kind of country that we want, we have to ensure the adequacy and security of our post-secondary education, health care and social assistance programs.

This may require new kinds of arrangements. In fact, I believe it does. It may require very difficult negotiations between the federal and provincial governments. I am sure it will, but it does not require the callous cutting back of payments to the provinces for these vital ingredients of our national life.

The present Minister of Finance was a member of the opposition when he said in 1982, long before he became Minister of Finance, that cuts to EPF could have disastrous effects on universities and colleges, on hospital funding and on the operation of hospitals. He had it right. Now he has the gall to stand in this House and say: "Well, it is all block funding anyway. The provinces do not pay their share." Maybe they do not. I might even acknowledge that.

I am not contending to defend the provincial governments in this matter. I think they bear a heavy burden of responsibility in the area of funding. I think it is also true that, when we pick these areas to reduce federal spending programs, we do it at the expense of those critical things that the provincial governments have the responsibility of providing.

In concluding, when I think of the kind of Canada that I would like to live and grow old in and that I would like to see my children grow up in, it is one in which education is considered a basic and fundamental right, where the very best education is readily available to Canadian students so that they can afford it and so that it will provide us with a base of highly qualified people to help build the strong, value-added economy that we talked about.

It is a Canada in which health care is readily available, not only adequate, but the best in the world, and again, universally affordable for everyone. It is one in which those who are too weak, too poor and too powerless to adequately care for themselves are taken care of in a compassionate and caring way.

As long as we share those values as a nation, many of our other conflicts and difficulties will find ways of sorting themselves out.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise to participate in the debate on Bill C-69, the Government Expenditures Restraint Act.

There are two things on which I would like to concentrate my comments. The first relates to the two-year freeze on transfers to the provinces of money which has traditionally been targeted for health care and post-secondary education. Of course, this two-year freeze means that, with the impact of inflation running at around 5 per cent a year, moneys transferred to the provinces for health care and post-secondary education will be reduced by about 5 per cent a year.

The second point I would like to discuss is the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan. The Canada Assistance Plan will increase to the richer provinces by only 5 per cent a year. This 5 per cent will cover inflation and, consequently in real terms, the financial assistance provided to the richer provinces in Canada by the federal government for the social welfare system will experience no growth whatsoever.

The government's expressed preoccupation is with controlling the deficit. The question is not whether to reduce the deficit but how to reduce it. I do not want to appear unrealistic. I do not want to appear to be overly challenging the government's pessimistic view of the importance of the deficit. I share the importance of the deficit to Canada.

The question is: How are we going to reduce the deficit? Bill C-69 represents 70 per cent of the government's deficit reduction program contained in the 1990 budget. Fully 70 per cent of the reductions in expenditures are expressed. Under this bill, who will be affected?

Those people who will be affected are the sick, because these are expenditures which have been reduced to the health care system, students and those working in our post-secondary education institutions because of cuts to post-secondary education. Third, the poorest in our society, those who are on social welfare in the provinces of British Columbia, Ontario and Alberta will be affected.

This is a disgrace. To call it, as the minister did this morning, balanced and reasonable is the rankest of hypocrisy. There have been statements by the government and indeed by the Prime Minister on enhancing and improving social services. We all recall the statements regarding the sacred trust, the need and importance of a world-class education system and a world-class health care system in Canada. We recall, too, the argument that the Prime Minister has been making since 1984 that the social system in Canada is a priority of the government and would not be cut. It would be enhanced.

This is all well and good. The expenditures on post-secondary education, health care and social welfare should be a priority of all Canadian governments. But, actions speak louder than words. It took the Conservative government two years to turn its mind to attacking federal transfers. Perhaps it looked at the damaging cuts of previous Liberal governments, perhaps it needed to bolster its fortitude.

By 1986, the attack on funding to the provinces, which had traditionally gone to health care and post-secondary education, had begun with a vengeance. Between 1986-87 and 1994-95, if the government makes no further cuts—and we cannot rule that out—the reductions in federal transfers to the provinces for post-secondary education and health care will amount to almost $29 billion. That is according to the Library of Parliament figures, not my figures.

My province of Saskatchewan, during this eight or nine-year period, will lose $1 billion in funding from the federal government. The federal government commitment to post-secondary education and health care has been longstanding in this country. It is at least since 1912 that the federal government supported agricultural education. Since the late 1960s, it instituted the national health care system.

In 1977, the Established Programs Financing Act—that is how it is traditionally described and is what we are working under now—was passed. Although the grants under that legislation are unconditional grants to the provinces, clearly they are designed for post-secondary education and health care. The history of the 1977 act makes quite clear that governments have, over a long period of time, intended and required these moneys, prior to 1977 to be spent on health care and post-secondary education. The present government members when in opposition accepted this. Indeed the present Minister of Finance, while in opposition in 1982, said in referring to cuts in transfer payments:

> The minister is proposing to cut spending in two very important areas. He is prepared to risk major cut-backs in medical care and post-secondary education. Rather than rush into this on a unilateral basis and force spending cuts and service cuts on the provinces, would the minister and the government consider entering into two or three national conferences on health and post-secondary education so that we can set out the national objectives of the various levels of government in these two important areas before we cut spending, and before we cause closures of hospitals and cut-backs in post-secondary education?

The government members cannot have it both ways. They cannot argue as they did in 1982 that the transfers to the provinces are for health care and post-secondary education, and then in 1990 argue that transfers are not for those purposes.

The Minister of Finance, in making his statement in 1982 in response to cuts by the Liberal government of the day, could in fact be making statements which apply today. The arguments are as telling today as they were when the Minister of Finance made them in 1982. The only difference of course is that now we have a Conservative government making those cuts rather than a Liberal government making the cuts.

Indeed it is an interesting comparison to look at what Liberals say in government and in opposition, and look at what the Conservatives say in government and opposition on this particular issue, we see that the important thing is not which party you are in but whether or not you are in government. If you are in government then the cuts are made and argued for as a need to reduce the deficit, whether you are a Liberal government or a Conservative government. If you are in opposition, the cuts are criticized as being an attack on the future of Canada and the future of our health care system and post-secondary education system.

I would point out that the New Democratic Party has been consistent in its opposition to these cuts, whether they are made by Liberal governments or Conservative governments.

Why is the federal government involved in funding post-secondary education and health care in the first place? It is clear that it is in the national interest to do so and to ensure equal accessibility and high quality health care and post-secondary education.

This is as it should be. The federal government should be involved in ensuring that no matter where you live, no matter what your economic resources, you have access to appropriate health care facilities and appropriate post-secondary education opportunities.

The cuts which have taken place by Liberal and Progressive Conservative governments have indicated a lack of commitment to these national interest goals when they are in government. When in opposition they talk of the importance of adequate funding for post-secondary education and health, but then when in government, in the name of deficit reduction, they make cut-backs.

Let us look briefly at the impact of these cuts. With regard to health care, we have seen line-ups for medical services. We see the British Columbia government being sued at this very moment for failure to provide appropriate health care facilities. We see patients in British Columbia and Ontario being sent to the United States for treatment and, of course, that treatment being paid for with Canadian dollars.

Patients have even died because of problems in the health care system. All the actors in the health care system, doctors, nurses, all the health care professionals, consumer goods, patients' rights groups, have all pointed out the critical condition of our health care system.

We have to add to that the fact that costs may continue to rise as a result of an aging population. Clearly, we have a critical situation in our health care system, and yet the federal government chooses today to make its third attack on its support mechanisms for health care.

It cannot be doubted that this is short-sighted and in the long run it will add both to Canada's health problems and to the costs of running our health care system.

It is clear, and everyone in the health care system points this out, that if a person is required to wait in order to obtain health care treatment, then the cost of the system increases as the illness becomes more acute.

We have major and critical problems in our health care system and yet the federal government chooses a time when those problems are acute to cut funding to the provinces for those very facilities.

In terms of post-secondary education, we have all heard considerable discussion of the critical condition of our post-secondary education system.

• (1300)

Dr. Pedersen, the President of the University of Western Ontario and President of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada has said that our post-secondary education system verges on being a national disgrace because of its inability to effectively take on the challenges of the 1990s. We know of overcrowded classrooms, we know of inadequate libraries, we know of crumbling physical plants, of out of date laboratory equipment and facilities.

Universities and colleges are bursting at the seams and are finding it increasingly difficult to provide the high quality post-secondary education that the Prime Minister has recognized Canada needs and Canadians are entitled to.

Our universities receive fully 40 per cent less per full-time student than comparable U.S. institutions, and this at a time when the U.S. has begun a major effort to increase post-secondary education participation rates, even though their rates are already considerably better than ours. The United States and other countries clearly understand the importance of increasing funding to post-secondary education. As our government continues to remind us, it is one of our major competitors.

The government also talks about the importance of a level playing field, and yet in terms of federal funding for post-secondary education, the Conservative government is doing what it can to ensure that we will never reach a level playing field, that our young people will never have the same educational opportunities as their colleagues in the United States will have. At a time when the federal government should be investing more in the future, it is cutting back by billions of dollars.

At the finance committee, witnesses appeared to discuss the impact of Bill C-69, and not one witness supported this bill. They all had very interesting things to say about the impact that this bill would have. All witnesses from the health care field pointed out that these cuts in the name of restraint, in fact, will add costs to the health care system not only in the long-term, but also in the short-term, and that the short-term and long-term costs to the economy due to cuts in health care will be considerable.

Cutbacks in funding to health care can only mean quality of services will be reduced and/or quantity of services will be reduced, leading to adverse consequences to the health status of Canadians. In terms of economic impact, let alone the impact of pain and suffering, this can only lead to increased absenteeism and reduction in efficiency and effectiveness at work, in other words, to important economic consequences and economic costs.

The Canadian Hospital Association has said that cuts could reduce the ability of provincial governments to fund medical care adequately. The Canadian Medical Association went further by saying that we were headed toward a two-tier health care system with one quality of health care in the rich provinces and a second or third rate service in the poorer provinces. We are already seeing moves toward that in health care reports coming out of some of the provinces and, in particular, coming out of Alberta. It is a departure from our traditional commitment to one health care system for all Canadians irrespective of financial abilities. It is a move away from our notion of health care as a right. The federal government, along with provincial governments, has to accept a responsibility for this in its cutbacks.

Increases in short-term and long-term costs will flow from these supposed restraints in expenditures to the health care system. It is not restraint at all, but an additional cost on the system, both now and in the future.

The representatives from the health care system also pointed out that they were considerably concerned about what they saw as the lack of understanding on the part of this government and its officials as to the impact of cut-backs to the provinces for health care expenditures. In their lobbying activities, they meet frequently with members of the government and members of the bureaucracy. They were concerned that the people with whom they met did not understand what these cutbacks would give rise to.

They did recognize and they did state that the government is fully aware, as they see it, that there is not very much fat left in the health care system. Consequently, if it cuts funds, it actually cuts into the bone of the health care system.

All the witnesses from the post-secondary education sector made the same criticisms. They pointed out that short-term and long-term costs would flow as a result of cut-backs to funding for post-secondary education. The costs to the economy would be considerable when one considers that Canadians would not be able to receive the level and quality of education they need in order to take on the challenges of the 1990s and beyond.

In other words, as far as post-secondary education cuts are concerned too, it was pointed out by those on the front line, representatives of faculty, students and university administrations, that this would not give rise to a saving but, indeed, would give rise to increases in expenditures in the short-term and the long-term.

In his response to the committee, Dr. Pedersen stated: "The signal is that Ottawa is no longer willing to fund the core educational research activities at Canadian universities, an activity in which they have been engaged for some 30 years".

He also stated: "We say to the federal government that you cannot have it both ways, talking about the need to improve the education system while at the same time pulling the plug on federal cash transfers for post-secondary education just does not square".

Again, those witnesses who spoke upon the post-secondary education system pointed out that they felt that officials in the Department of Finance and in the government did not fully understand the impact on the economy that these cuts in post-secondary education funding would have. All witnesses pointed out the great frustration they felt at having to continue to make these points to a government that refused to listen.

In questioning the finance committee officials, it became clear that in their deliberations and in their quantifications of the impact of these so-called expenditure restraints in Bill C-69, they did not consider the economic impact that would flow as a result of young Canadians finding it impossible, as a result of cut-backs to post-secondary education, to obtain an education needed in order to take on the challenges of the next decade and beyond.

In other words, they did not consider the short-term or long-term implications to our economy of cut-backs to post-secondary education. They did not take into account the full implications of what these cuts will do.

The only conclusion one can make is that these cuts are not based upon solely a concern about funding, but more on a concern with the philosophical commitment of this government to get out of funding health care and post-secondary education. If this trend continues, in a few years the government will not be providing any funding to the provinces for health care and post-secondary education. Consequently it will be unable to use its funding as a means of persuading the provincial governments to effectively run health care and post-secondary education. For example, it would not be able to ensure that user fees and deterrent fees did not return to the provincial health care systems. There would be no mechanism by which to penalize the provinces should that happen.

It is part of an over-all scheme of privatization, of ensuring that those who can pay get the best and those who cannot pay get the worst. It is a philosophical commitment which is pushing the costs of health care and post-secondary education on to users in our society. Canadians do not agree with or accept that philosophy. In many different ways, Canadians have told this government not to cut funding to post-secondary education and health care and yet, as with so many other things, this government refuses to listen and goes ahead against the wishes of Canadians. The government has been told of many other ways to deal with the deficit, rather than attacking the sick, students and the poorest in our society.

One last comment that I would like to make is with regard to the cap on the Canada Assistance Plan. Witnesses pointed out another interesting phenomenon. Placing restraints on the growth of assistance to Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta for social welfare support systems would stop innovation, reform and experimentation in social welfare systems in Canada and would indeed prevent the provinces from exploring ways of making the system more efficient and more effective. Consequently, we would not see improvements to the system in the future.

This is perhaps the most misguided and short-sighted piece of legislation that the government has put forward in the last two years.

Mr. Heap: Worse than the GST?

Mr. Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): I think worse than the GST. It is at least as misguided as that. It is misguided and short-sighted because it will be a major attack on the future. It will result in a major burden of costs being transferred to the next generations. It is unwise from an economic point of view. It is unwise because it prevents this country's citizens from being healthy and well educated. It is unwise because it attacks the poorest of all Canadians.

• (1310)

Finally, as I mentioned, Canadians, an overwhelming majority, some 80 per cent, have told this government not to make these particular cuts and yet it has done so anyway.

Unfortunately, Canadians will pay for this government's stupidity. The government will pay ultimately at the next election.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Robitaille): Resuming debate with the hon. member for Winnipeg St. James.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to take part in this debate on Bill C-69. It is an important debate about a bill that raises serious concerns right across this country.

The formal title of this bill is "Government Expenditures Restraint Act". There is a saying, "What is in a name?" When it comes to this particular bill, there is a lot to this name and all of it is very bad.

The name is a euphemism for a nasty bill, a euphemism for a bill that attacks the poor and penalizes poorer provinces. It is a euphemism for a bill that only makes worse the inequities of our system.

That should not come as any great surprise, I suppose, because this Tory government does not give a hoot about social justice in Canada.

I want to zero in on one particularly pernicious provision of Bill C-69. It is the freeze on federal transfer payments to the provinces. It is nothing short of shameful, for this is the third time the government has attacked federal transfer payments to the provinces.

Let us consider the seriousness of the situation from this perspective. Let us take the time period between the fiscal year 1986-87 and fiscal year 1994-95. The cuts in that period amount to an astronomical $31 billion. If these cuts had not occurred under the government, there would have been $22.2 billion more for health care in the provinces, and $8.9 billion more for secondary education.

Let us look at the effects of this and other Tory initiatives on health care. If current government practice continues, the federal government will soon cease paying a single cent for health and education by the turn of the century. That is alarming. There will be no more federal funds for health and post-secondary education in about nine or ten years.

Years ago, the federal government was committed to 50-50 cost-sharing, but that was abandoned in favour of allocating more income tax points to the provinces. Now look where we are. The government is saying goodbye to health care and post-secondary education. Bill C-69 continues that trend.

What does a small province like my own province of Manitoba do when it faces a loss of federal government support of this kind? It has two choices: cut back services or raise taxes. It is estimated that the provinces would have to increase taxes on average $576 over five years to make up for the cuts proposed in Bill C-69.

If they do not raise taxes, the provinces will be forced to make cut-backs. For example, they would be forced to close hospital beds, limit costly operations, or find other reductions. There is no other way around it. Students would have to face higher tuition fees, overcrowded classrooms and other cost-cutting measures.

Freezing federal transfer payments to the provinces makes a mockery of the Prime Minister's promises. We all remember what the Prime Minister said about medicare. We all remember his description of medicare in Canada. He called it a sacred trust.

Also, I want to repeat something the Minister of Finance said eight years ago in the House of Commons on March 24, 1982 when he was in another incarnation:

> Let us not make hospitals, universities and colleges a battleground between the federal government and the provincial governments. Let us solve these problems not on the backs of the hospitals and universities; let us solve these problems outside of that arena.

That is what the Hon. Michael Wilson said in the House of Commons on March 24, 1982. So much for the Finance Minister's promises. So much for the Prime Minister's promises.

If broken promises are coupled with three successive reductions in the rate of growth of federal transfer payments, what does that say about the future of Canada's health care system? Well, the future looks mighty gloomy. The prognosis is not good. The Canada Health Act is fast becoming irrelevant. It is the Canada Health Act that outlawed user fees and extra billing. We all know that. We all remember that. However, there is concern that the government has already decided it will not enforce the penalty provisions of the Canada Health Act.

Provinces that allow user fees and extra billing can have their federal health payments withheld. If the government were not to enforce the health act, in my opinion, Canada would soon drift towards a two-tier health care system. This is not far-fetched. It is a very real danger.

Already we are told of two provinces, Quebec and Alberta, which are flirting with a two-tier health care system. Earlier this year, a former Quebec Health Minister who is also a major business executive, reportedly told a Quebec Assembly committee on health care that it is time to bring the private sector into the health care field. He claimed that competition is needed to keep costs down. Perhaps that is all that was needed for a senior Quebec cabinet minister to say, a short time later, that Quebec may not be able to continue having a free universal health care system.

I submit that this is the thin edge of the wedge. Destroy universal health care, allow private sector competition ostensibly to control costs, and the country is put on the slippery slope toward a two-tier health care system. It cannot be avoided.

We have heard alarming and disturbing words from Alberta where a government task force actually advocated a two-tier system. One tier would provide basic services and it would be paid for by the government. The second tier would provide additional services—the word "additional" not defined—which would be purchased through a supplementary insurance plan.

It can be seen why we on this side view with alarm any reduction of federal government support of the health care system. If the government does not take its responsibilities seriously, and as soon as the federal government backs away from its full commitment to health care, we soon hear talk of user fees, extra billing, competition, and the like. That will lead to a balkanization of Canada's health care system where there are no national standards, no guaranteed access for the poor, and of course the loss and destruction of universality. It would be, in the end, without any doubt at all, one system for the poor and one system for the rich.

There are powerful forces out there who would love to see this happen to satisfy some kind of crazy lust produced by a cruel ideology of the privileged few.

Michael Walker of the Fraser Institute, that nutty but dangerous right-wing think tank in Vancouver, wrote a series of articles last spring in which he claimed that the United States' health care model was superior to Canada's. Can you imagine turning something like that upside down? There are 35 million to 40 million Americans without any health insurance at all, and twice that many with only limited insurance coverage. In that country, having a catastrophic illness can destroy everything you have. Yet, somebody such as Michael Walker, who should know better, suggests that its system is superior.

Despite all that, that wretched system which does not deliver to its people, costs more per capita than does Canada's universal system. Yet there are these powerful forces in Canada, whose only battle cry is fiscal restraint, who would move our health care system closer to that of the U.S. model.

I say to the government: "Wake up, open your eyes, and smell the coffee or smell the flowers—whatever is appropriate. Freezing federal payments to the provinces is a virtual invitation to destroy medicare."

The government's backing away from payments to the provinces and medicare is consistent with what this administration has been doing since it was first elected in 1984.

The 1980s were really a lousy decade, in some ways reminiscent of the Dirty Thirties. What started as a disturbing trend at the beginning of the 1980s was greatly exacerbated by Tory policies.

I would like to make reference to a newspaper column which was written May 16 last by Frances Russell of the Winnipeg Free Press, one of Canada's leading commentators on public affairs. In her column, she makes use of facts and figures provided by the Canadian Council on Social Development, and she quotes comments made by one David Ross, an independent social economics consultant based here in the nation's capital. I want to quote from that column because it paints an absolutely superb picture of what has been going on in Canada in the last few years and it points the finger where it ought to be pointed—right at the Mulroney government.

> The decade ended with 155,000 more Canadians unemployed than at the beginning. There were 62,000 more poor children. There was a virtual standstill in household income. Whereas average family earnings rose 27 per cent in the 1950s, 53 per cent in the 1960s and 42 per cent in the 1970s, in the 1980s they went up a meagre nine per cent, largely due to a decline in family size.
> The rich got richer and the poor got poorer. The share of national income enjoyed by the lowest 29 per cent of Canadian families shrank from 10.7 per cent to 10.4 per cent. By contrast, the wealthiest 20 per cent of Canadians saw their portion rise from 42.1 per cent to 43.2 per cent.
> That means, Ross says, that during the 1980s, about $4.2 billion was transferred from the poor to the rich.
> Ross says the starkest images of the 1980s poverty were the homeless bedding down in shelters and the hungry queuing up at food banks. "Not since the breadlines of the 1930s has Canada witnessed such a shameful reminder of the shortcomings of the labour market and the holes in the income safety net."
> Government policies were intent on heightening social and economic inequality.
> "The decade was marked by the status quo or retrenchment in existing social programs. More decision-making was transferred to the marketplace. Thus began the era of trickle-down, an economic philosophy that wealth should be generated at the top simply by removing economic shackles (mainly taxes) with ensuing gains eventually trickling down to middle and lower income workers".
> Ross attributes the phenomenon of homelessness and food banks to the tightening of unemployment insurance, which threw more people faster onto social assistance, and to the failure to maintain social assistance rates even at the poverty line.
> No social policy area was harder hit in the 1980s than family benefits, he says. As a result of partial de-indexing, they lose 3 per cent of their value each year. Already, the worth of family allowances has shrunk 12 per cent since 1980.
> The new clawback of family allowances and old age security from "rich" Canadians will work down the income scale at 3 per cent a year (again due to partial indexing) until middle and finally, lower income Canadians will be shut out.
> Ross contrasts this contraction of public pension benefits with the piling on of tax breaks or private pensions, also out of the public purse—The federal government's 1985 tax reform was a further giant step back to inequality. The tax changes between 1984 and 1990 meant, for a one-earner family of four, an increase of 21 per cent at the $20,000 level, 28 percent at the $50,000 level, 3 per cent at $80,000, but a saving of 1 per cent at $100,000.
> Ross is not optimistic that the 1990s will bring immediate change.

"The liberalism of the 1970s, characterized by strong government involvement and high levels of public spending, was replaced in the 1980s by a conservative trend. The decade will be remembered for government cutbacks, privatization, concern with the deficit and market decision-making—"

That is the end of that particular series of quotes and that column says it all. It really does, it says it all.

I would submit that those who are watching the Parliamentary Channel right now, whether in Newfoundland, British Columbia, or my home province of Manitoba, will understand why we Liberals are dead set against Bill C-69. It contains just more of what we have come to expect from this government: VIA Rail services cut; postal services cut; farm support programs cut; unemployment insurance cut; native programs cut; federal transfer payments—it all depends how you express it—either frozen or cut, but either way inimical to the best interest of the provinces, inimical to the best interest of Canadians, inimical to the best interest of the health care system, and inimical to the best interest of post-secondary education in the country.

Sad to say, it is the same old story from a government that does not believe in government, that does not believe in governing. This government has completely, absolutely, without reservation, abdicated its responsibilities. I think it is time to put this government away and put it away for a long time. May it never be seen again. If it does not want to govern, if it does not want to take its responsibilities seriously, I know a group of people on this side of the House who are more than happy to take on that responsibility, more than happy to govern the country in the best interest of all Canadians and not just a privileged few. It is palpable that it is not only us who are saying this. Canadians are saying it by the millions through the polls.

Bill C-69 is a very bad bill. The government is going to regret this legislation. It will regret this legislation and the Canadian people will make absolutely sure of that.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I want to congratulate my colleague for a very fine speech, a speech that accurately and adequately represented the comments that we are hearing from Canadians right across the country, and certainly that I am hearing from people in my own riding of Nepean.

• (1330)

He talked about reduced transfer payments to the provinces for education and health, in particular. He talked about the goods and services tax, the imposition of this tax upon Canadians and how it is going to hurt them. In addition, he talked about how the cuts in transfer payments and how the GST are going to hurt the provinces. The speaker talked about the clawback, how it is going to hurt the senior residents and about the cut-backs to the native programs.

These are only a few of the cut-backs that we see in this bill. The one thing that comes to my mind when I read of the dreadful measures in Bill C-69, is that Canada, as we have known it for 123 years, is being changed. How the programs have been administered all these years also comes to mind.

In my opinion, with the federal government giving more responsibilities to the provinces, I see a serious abdication of what we have considered to be and what we have known as the federal responsibility in this country for 123 years. It is decentralizing the federal powers and putting them on the backs of the provinces. Then the provinces, in order to maintain the level of the programs that we have known, obviously will have to increase taxes at that level. I would like to have the hon. member's comments in regard to an abdication of responsibilities on behalf of the federal government.

Mr. Harvard: Madam Speaker, I want to thank my colleague, the hon. member for Nepean. I think her beginning words were far too generous.

Let me pick up on what she said. There has been an abdication of federal government responsibility, especially the responsibility toward the provinces. My understanding of Canadian history, and, particularly, Canadian government history, is that there has been what one might call a family compact of provinces. At the centre of the compact is the federal government, the central government, that has a strong responsibility to all the provinces, especially to the poorer provinces.

The provinces cannot be left to fend for themselves. The provinces cannot be left to drift. The federal government has a responsibility to all the provinces, to the entire country, so that we, regardless of where we live, enjoy a certain basic standard of living. That is not going to happen under these cuts to or freezing of federal transfer payments.

As sure as God made little green apples, this is going to hurt the poorer provinces. Eventually it may even hurt rich provinces like Ontario or British Columbia, but it will hit the smaller provinces like Manitoba and Newfoundland especially hard.

What we are facing is the balkanization of Canada. In the current constitutional proposals, we see an allowance for provinces to opt out of a national scheme, and at the same time get federal money. I find that provision enormously alarming. That is going to work against the best interests of the smaller, poorer provinces.

Perhaps a rich province like Ontario can make it on its own, but the smaller provinces cannot. This calls for a strong central government that cares about all the provinces and has policies that bind the country together to make it whole. One makes the country whole in many ways. We have heard this expression very often through the Meech Lake discussions.

There is a lot of truth to it, but one does not make a country whole through only some constitutional niceties or constitutional rules. One makes it whole through social programs and federal transfer payments, which constitute very important social programs. If the federal government, at the very centre of a program diminishes it, it diminishes the country.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, we are this afternoon on this late spring day discussing whether or not the government should cut $8.3 billion in assistance to the provinces. My colleagues and I say no. We say the government has no moral authority, has no possible excuse or reason why it should want to cut $8.3 billion in program money to be transferred to the provinces. That is exactly what the government wants to do with Bill C-69.

On February 20, 1990 this House heard the second budget from the Minister of Finance since the November 1988 election. Contrary to the previous year's budget, this budget was all released on the same day, rather than over a series of days as was done the previous year.

All members were sitting in this House listening attentively to the Minister of Finance. We thought we would hear words of wisdom from him. We thought we would hear a thoughtful speech on how this federal government wanted to work together with the provinces in order to provide a decent quality of assistance, not just to the provinces, but, to Canadians generally who utilize the services which are offered by the provinces. That is really the most important thing of all.

Instead, my colleagues and I were shocked to hear the following, and I quote from the minister's speech:

> We have capped the growth of a number of programs at 5 per cent per year for the next two years. These include Canada Assistance Plan payments to the fiscally stronger provinces of Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta; and certain expenditures for science and technology, and Indian and Inuit programs. In the 1989 budget, defence and foreign aid expenditures were substantially reduced. In view of the tight fiscal situation, their growth will also be limited to 5 per cent from this lower expenditure base.

If that was not bad enough, he then said further:

> We have held a number of programs at their 1989-90 levels for the next two years. Total per capita cash and transfers to the provinces under Established Programs Financing will be held constant.

This is newspeak, "will be held constant". That means the same as "will be frozen" but the newspeak expert across the way, the Minister of Finance who brought us other similar weasel words, this time told us that the financing will be held constant which of course, as I said previously, is a euphemism for a freeze.

This is what he announced and Canadians listened to him. At first, I suppose, one could be almost tempted to believe that these cuts were necessary. I say almost tempted, because of course no one truly believes any more what the government across the way says. In the unlikely event that some might have been tempted to slightly believe some of what the Minister of Finance said, we came to a rude awakening once we started to make the calculation and determined that provinces would have to cut back on services that they offer to Canadians, or increase their own provincial income tax or in turn, if the provinces could do neither, they would have to transfer some of those same expenditures by reducing their own transfers to municipalities.

Madam Speaker, this expenditure restraint program, as I said earlier, announces the government's intention to freeze federal transfers to the provinces under Established Programs Financing for the next two years and, during the same period, to cap federal transfers under the Canada Assistance Plan to Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta at 5 per cent.

I would like to expand on this particular point, Madam Speaker. There are those who will say that since Ontario is richer than the other provinces, these cuts will have practically no impact. Well, that is not true. Anyone who thought that was the case is badly mistaken.

My colleague, the hon. member for Winnipeg St. James (Mr. Harvard), pointed out earlier and very eloquently, I may add, that of course the poorer provinces would be hit more severely and would possibly feel the impact even more quickly than other provinces.

Madam Speaker, although some people may think everybody in Ontario is rich, that is not the case.

[English]

I have made a comparison of electoral districts in the province of Ontario. The Minister of Finance represents the riding of Etobicoke Centre and perhaps he feels that all of Ontario is the same as his own riding. That, of course, is not so.

I have made a comparison of the riding of Etobicoke Centre and the riding of Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, which I represent. The information I am quoting is from a document entitled, Profiles: Federal Electoral Districts—1987 Representation Order: Part 2, a publication of Statistics Canada. These are quite valid, genuine Statistics Canada figures in case someone would think that I was partisan and perhaps would use statistics other than official ones.

This is what these statistics show about these electoral ridings. First of all, Etobicoke Centre has 89,160 people living in it; Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, as of the 1986 census that is, had 87,140 people. As you see, Madam Speaker, both ridings are just about the same in terms of total population.

Let us look at some statistics which indicate the general socio-economic condition of the riding that I represent and demonstrate to this House that it is not the same as the riding of the Minister of Finance, notwithstanding the fact that it is also in Ontario.

If we look at the following statistic, total population with level of schooling less than grade nine, 6,960 in the riding of Etobicoke Centre and 13,845 in Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. It is the same size in population but has twice as many people who do not have a grade nine education.

The number of people with a university degree in Etobicoke Centre is 13,255; in Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, 3,780, with the same size population, notice the difference.

Let me read the following statistic to you: total labour force 15 years of age and over, 52,000 in Etobicoke Centre, and 42,000 in Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

As you see, Madam Speaker, not all of Ontario is the same, and perhaps the Minister of Finance should look elsewhere rather than just his own constituency when trying to determine what he thinks is good for all of us.

Let me read a few more statistics: managerial, administrative and related occupations—let us see how many have big-boss jobs in Etobicoke Centre versus Glengarry—Prescott—Russell; in Etobicoke Centre, 6,155; in Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, 2,780.

Continuing with the statistics: females in the workforce, 23,825 in Etobicoke Centre, 16,760 in Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

The total number of occupied, private dwellings is given as 32,000 in the riding of Etobicoke Centre and 28,000 in Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. That is nearly the same, Madam Speaker.

Now let us look at the average value of a home, which is usually a fair indication of the socio-economic standing of the people: $176,149 in Etobicoke Centre and $77,036 in the riding that I represent.

The statistics show government transfer payments offered to various electoral districts and in Etobicoke Centre, 5.7 per cent of the revenue comes from government transfers. In my own riding it is 11 per cent. This clearly indicates that any cut made by the minister has an effect which is twice as bad in the riding that I represent than elsewhere.

I am trying to indicate that my riding needs assistance. It needs the help of this government, and it deserves the help of this government.

Mrs. Gaffney: It has a right.

Mr. Boudria: It sure does have a right, as my colleague from Nepean said very eloquently. However, when it comes to getting what is rightfully yours, this government of course does not deliver.

I want to read about income characteristics. The average income for males with income 15 years of age and over in Etobicoke Centre, $35,916; in Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, $22,127; average income for a female in Etobicoke Centre, $17,428; in Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, $12,243.

If cuts are justified any place in Ontario, surely my colleagues in this House will agree that the riding I represent cannot afford to share in any part of the cut-backs imposed by the government across the way.

Finally, I would like to read one last statistic which will indicate beyond doubt the difference in economic situations: average family income for all census families in Etobicoke Centre, $60,725; Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, $36,771.

What we need in the area I represent is not cut-backs. What we need is not the cold, callous way of doing things which this government has shown it can do so well. What we need are programs to assist the region I represent, enabling it to gain a higher standard of living similar to that enjoyed by people elsewhere.

The riding I represent is not located thousands of miles from Parliament Hill. It may be surprising to some to know that the statistics I have just read apply only 40 miles from Parliament Hill. That is the distance to the heart of Prescott County from where we stand right now.

Under the previous Liberal administration there were a number of programs which had succeeded in attracting industries to our area and improving the living conditions. These have all been abolished by the government across the way.

The government through these cuts will affect grants to the provinces, and if the province has to cut back, which area can afford it the least? The one that I represent and others like it.

It is all very well in the government's eye to talk about cut-backs, but I say to them that if any area is equipped to absorb them it is surely not the one I represent.

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, we must not think for one minute, just because Ontario happens to be very well off compared to other provinces, that this applies to every single person in the province of Ontario, because it certainly doesn't apply to Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. The riding I represent will certainly have trouble surviving and coping with the cutbacks the Minister of Finance gives us in his Budget and in Bill C-69.

The government sees Tory members applauding and supporting the initiatives proposed by the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister probably imagine the applause of Tory back-benchers reflects the feelings of Canadians in general. That is not the case, Mr. Speaker, and it is certainly not the case among the people I have the honour and the privilege to represent in this House.

What we need, Madam Speaker, is a government with heart, a government that will be mindful of the needs of Canadians on low and modest incomes, and as I pointed out earlier, there are a lot of people in my riding who belong to this group.

I want to ask the Minister of Finance to swallow his pride for a few minutes, and I even challenge him to rise in the House now, Madam Speaker, and withdraw Bill C-69. We on this side of the House, my colleagues and myself, would be delighted to give the unanimous consent that is necessary to withdraw a bill from the House of Commons. This bill will cause a lot of suffering both in provinces that are less well off and in the so-called rich provinces.

This bill certainly does not contribute to national unity because we know as long as such great regional disparities exist, they create tensions.

Furthermore, this bill certainly does not help my constituents.

I therefore appeal once again to the Minister of Finance and to the Minister of Transport, who is known for his generosity, Madam Speaker, and ask them to withdraw this bill. We know that the transport minister is generous. The Department of Transport showed its generosity in the past when they gave a Crown corporation worth nearly $100 million to one Manfred Ruhland. We already know how generous the finance minister is. Some people, or rather a very small group of two or three rich people, benefited from his generosity in the past.

What we want, Madam Speaker, is to be sure that low- and middle-income citizens can also benefit from the generosity of the government opposite.

[English]

In closing, I ask the Minister of Transport to pretend for a minute that my constituent's names are all Manfred Ruhland, that every single one of them is called Manfred Ruhland, and let us have the Minister of Transport treat my constituents with that kind of generosity. I am not asking the Minister of Transport to give airline passes to my constituents to fly all over the world or anything like that. I am just asking him not to impose those unfair cut-backs that he is proposing to us today.

The Minister of Transport may be speaking for the Minister of Finance today, although I think the Minister of Finance who is here among us is quite able to defend himself. In any event, for some reason the Minister of Transport wants to defend the Minister of Finance. I would hope that he would stand now and withdraw this bill which is unfair, not only to less financially-able provinces, but indeed has a severe impact on all Canadians, on their health care and on their level of education. Most of all, it has a negative effect on what we are all trying to do, which is to ensure that all our citizens are able to improve themselves and participate on an equal basis in the society of tomorrow.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the presentation made by the member. I thought it was very effective, especially in the way he compared the constituencies in Ontario, and demonstrated that there are some low-income people who are going to be suffering as a result of the cuts in transfer payments and the capping of the CAP in Ontario.

I want to talk about Manfred Ruhland. The hon. member suggested that he hoped all his constituents would receive the same treatment as Manfred Ruhland did. Unfortunately, if all his constituents were Manfred Ruhland, he would probably be representing a Tory riding. The guy who could not get a credit card most likely had a PC card.

I would like to talk about another constituency in Canada. It is a constituency all across Canada. It will be taking the hardest impact of the EPF cuts. Low-income Canadians will be taking 46 per cent of all the cuts in this budget. These are people who are living at the poverty level in Canada. There are millions of them across the country. They are single parent families headed by women, most of whom are found below the poverty level.

As you know, Madam Speaker, poverty goes hand in hand with illiteracy. The same people who tend to be poor also have difficulty with literacy skills. They will end up having difficulty as a result of the cut-backs in EPF funding. In fact, it has been pointed out that something like 6.8 million Canadians between the ages of 16 and 69 are unable to accomplish everyday tasks such as reading newspapers, making out cheques, reading bank statements and, generally speaking, functioning as normal Canadians.

These people lack the kind of literacy skills that are needed in order to function on a day-to-day basis in the modern world. All the government is giving to these people is something like $110 million over five years. Madam Speaker, you will know that in the national capital we spend $105 million a year watering lawns in the area.

Certainly, it shows what kind of priorities we attach to poverty and illiteracy in the country. We are supposed to be joining with countries internationally to conquer illiteracy. We spend five times as much watering the lawns in the national capital area as we are going to be spending on literacy this year. At the same time, we are cutting back on programs that help to support health care, the elimination of poverty and post-secondary education in the provinces across Canada.

I think it is tragic that the Conservative government holds those kinds of priorities. I appreciate the statements that the hon. member has just made on the priorities of this Tory government.

Mr. Boudria: Madam Speaker, I want to take a moment and indicate to my colleague who has just spoken the fact that single parent families are a phenomenon of all our constituencies.

In the riding that I represent, there are 2,000 such families. Perhaps that number is slightly lower than the number in other electoral districts, but I invite my colleagues to compare it with the fact that the average female in my riding who is working earns $12,243 a year, something like one third of what the average female in the constituency of the Minister of Finance would earn. It has a very devastating effect.

In closing, I do indicate that, in terms of the comparison, the literacy problem is a very serious one. I do not dispute that, but I am not one who would advocate that we stop maintaining the public property around the national capital. This building, and other government buildings, are monuments to the people of Canada. We have to continue to maintain them, and not allow them to deteriorate.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being 2 p.m., the House will now proceed to the consideration of Private Members' Business as listed in today's Order Paper.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—MOTIONS

FINANCE

FEDERAL TRANSFER PAYMENTS

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing) moved:

> That, in the opinion of this House, the government should consider the advisability of ensuring that federal transfer payments to provinces for the purposes of education and health care are spent directly on those services.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to discuss the question of accountability of provincial governments for funding provided to them by the federal government under the Established Programs Financing system for the support of health care and post-secondary education.

If I may just read my motion, I am suggesting:

> —the government should consider the advisability of ensuring that federal transfer payments to provinces for the purposes of education and health care are spent directly on these services.

Essentially, this motion calls upon the government to explore making federal transfer payments to the provinces accountable for the purposes for which they are transferred. Particularly in the context of transfers under the Established Programs Financing legislation, the motion calls for ways to make sure that that part which has been traditionally transferred to the provinces to fund post-secondary education and health care is used for those purposes and not for other purposes.

As is well known, the federal government became involved in financing post-secondary education, at least by 1912, when grants were made in support of agricultural education. The involvement gradually increased from these modest beginnings with the temporary program of support for veterans returning to Canada after the Second World War.

In 1951, the federal government introduced a matching scheme of direct grants to universities. Starting at 50 cents per capita per annum, the grants rose to $5 per capita per annum by 1966.

With the 1960 Technical and Vocational Training Act, the federal government laid the foundation for the establishment of community colleges through federal-provincial agreements. The federal government paid 75 per cent of provincial expenditures for community colleges.

In 1964, the federal government became involved in student assistance when, in conjunction with the provinces, it launched the Canada Student Loans Program.

In 1967, a fiscal arrangement was entered into by the federal and provincial governments whereby federal government direct grants to universities were replaced by a shared-cost arrangement with the provinces. Under this agreement the federal government paid 50 per cent of the costs of post-secondary education institutions. At the same time, the shared-cost program for technical colleges, begun in 1960, was replaced by the direct purchase of student places at community colleges.

In 1977, the federal government withdrew from shared-cost financing and replaced it with unconditional fiscal transfers under the EPF arrangements, the arrangements which we are now living under. As is well known, these transfers were in the form of cash and the transfer of tax room to the provinces.

During this development of funding support for post-secondary education the federal government, of course, also instituted its participation in funding research in Canada and, perhaps more important, its participation in funding health care in Canada.

I set this out not just as a walk down memory lane, but to make it clear that the federal government has long been involved in funding post-secondary education and health care in Canada.

Even though the EPF legislation introduced in 1977 provided for unconditional transfers to the provinces, both the federal government and the provincial government have been fully aware of the history and the intention for these funds to go toward health care and post-secondary education.

When present ministers were in Opposition they pointed out the importance and the fact that these funds were designated or intended for health care and post-secondary education, although they do appear to take a different point of view now.

There was no intention for such payments to be for highways or for other expenditures over which the federal government had little interest. The federal government's funding of post-secondary education and health care stems from a national interest to ensuring a high quality education system in Canada to which all Canadians have equal access, and to ensuring a high quality and accessible health care system in Canada.

The national interest in both post-secondary education and health care clearly persists today, as statements made by the Prime Ministers and others in the present government have indicated.

Much has been made of the fact that some provincial governments have been spending some of the money transferred from the federal government under the EPF program for other than post-secondary education and health care. In earlier times this was used to argue for a return to some accountability on the part of the provinces for the money transferred from the federal government. This argument at least recognized the importance of two things—federal financing, because of the national interest in high quality, accessible post-secondary education and health care on the one hand and, on the other hand, making sure that federal money designated for post-secondary education and health care was in fact used for these critically important purposes.

However, and to disastrous effect, the present Conservative government has used the problem of provincial governments using EPF funds for other than post-secondary education and health as an excuse for cutting back on the funding, thus accentuating the very serious financial problems faced by Canada's post-secondary education institutions and by our health care system. This irresponsible and short-sighted action by the Conservative government is in sharp contrast to its rhetoric about the importance of both post-secondary education and health care in Canada. It has led to a critical situation.

With regard to education, for example, Dr. George Pederson, President of the University of Western Ontario and current President of the Association of Universities and Colleges in Canada, has publicly stated that the state of Canada's universities is a national disgrace and places Canada in serious jeopardy of being unable to train Canadians to meet the demands of the country's economy in an increasingly competitive world. Without immediate and drastic corrective action, this can only lead to Canada's deterioration to Third World economic status.

Canada's post-secondary education systems and health care systems are suffering from a sharp decrease in federal government funding, inadequate provincial government financial support and misspending of federal funds intended for post-secondary education and health care to other purposes. All this has led to a critical deterioration in the ability of Canada's post-secondary education system, for example, to offer the type and quality of post-secondary education which is required today in Canada, and has led to the situation in which our health care system is unable to cope effectively with the health care needs of Canadian citizens. This is illustrated by the fact that many Canadians in British Columbia and Ontario, at least, are having to go to the United States for certain health care procedures, and that we have had long waiting lists at hospitals for surgery. Indeed, we have had examples of Canadians dying because of being turned away from our hospitals.

Again with regard to post-secondary education, the federal government in spite of the hope generated by the Saskatoon forum has shown no leadership whatsoever in attempting to ensure that Canada's post-secondary education system is world class, as it needs to be. In fact the federal government has instead attacked the system through major cut-backs in funding support.

The federal government has been roundly criticized by all actors in both the post-secondary education system and the health care system in Canada for its disastrous policies and lack of leadership for which future generations will pay dearly. Instead of complaining that provinces do not always spend Established Programs Financing funds on post-secondary education or health care, the federal government should take steps today to ensure that the provinces spend these dollars as required, that is, on post-secondary education and health care. It is in the national interest to do so. It is irresponsible, short-sighted, indeed, foolish and dangerous not to do so.

It would be prudent for the federal government to ensure that EPF funds intended for post-secondary education and health care are spent by the provinces on those two things.

The current pleas of the federal government are to reduce the deficit and to ensure that federal revenues are spent wisely. Surely, such arguments should also go for EPF transfers and should ensure that those transfers are indeed used for health care and post-secondary education.

Both the post-secondary education institutions in Canada and our health care system are in severe need of adequate funds to do their job adequately, as far as education institutions are concerned, to prepare Canadians for the 21st century and to ensure Canada a viable future; and as far as the health care system is concerned, to ensure that Canadians are able to lead a happy, healthy and dignified life.

Ensuring provincial accountability is a critical component of resolving the funding crunch experienced by our universities and colleges and by our health care systems. Many have called for greater accountability on the part of the provinces.

For example, a 1980 parliamentary task force called for a tight accounting of how provinces used federal transfers. The Johnson report argued for the federal government tying its increases in federal funds to increases in provincial expenditures. Indeed, the Nielsen task force argued that there should be a different approach to the use of EPF funds and, indeed, that they should be more accountable in the hands of the provincial governments.

I will just quote briefly from the Nielsen task force. It states, in part: "We note that provincial governments would object to any new option"—that is to say a new procedure for ensuring that they spent the moneys on post-secondary education and health, as required—"because no other arrangement could likely offer them the combination of revenues and unconditionality with respect to post-secondary education that the present EPF arrangement provides. Nevertheless, in the view of the study team, it is of the greatest importance that the government develop a new direction in consultation with the provinces".

I am not alone in calling upon greater accountability. As we all know, prior to 1977 there was total accountability on the part of the provinces with their funding for post-secondary education and health care in their use of federal transfers.

If the federal government was truly committed to high-quality, accessible health care and high quality, accessible post-secondary education in Canada, then it would ensure that its financial transfers to the provinces are increased to meet the needs of universities and colleges in Canada and the needs of Canadians. It would not drastically cut funds, as it has done. It would also ensure that the moneys transferred to the provinces under EPF are in fact used for post-secondary education and health care.

It should begin discussions immediately with the provinces to ensure the accountability of federal transfers. It should use the influence it has, stemming from its spending powers, to make sure that post-secondary education and health care funds are used for those purposes.

There is no excuse for not acting on this right away. Indeed, not doing so and not transferring adequate funds to the provinces will be disastrous to post-secondary education and health care in Canada and for Canada's future itself.

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak to the motion before the House.

The motion suggests that the government should ensure that federal transfers for health and education are spent directly on those services. There are a number of reasons for rejecting this motion.

Let me reiterate that supporting such a motion would be contrary to the spirit of the Established Programs Financing arrangement which the federal and provincial governments agreed to in 1977 when they moved from cost sharing to block funding for health and educational services.

Under EPF the federal government provides a contribution to provinces in respect of both health and post-secondary education. Provinces can allocate these funds according to their own priorities which may vary greatly in different parts of the country.

Requiring the provinces to provide a detailed accounting of every dollar they spend on post-secondary education and health care, as the motion suggests, would be a tiresome and unjustified administrative burden for both the provinces and the federal government. We would prefer the money went to the provision of services to Canadians, not to do unnecessary accounting.

Re-imposing conditions on the provinces with respect to how they spend EPF money would also be legally contentious. For example, at present there is no accepted definition of what constitutes post-secondary education. Attempting to arrive at a legal definition would no doubt launch the federal government into a lengthy and expensive legal wrangle.

Above all, re-imposing what would have to be detailed conditions on the provinces would reduce their flexibility in providing innovative health and education services. This would, in a very real way, inhibit the development of Canada's world-class health care system, and it would smother creativity in Canada's first-class post-secondary education system.

Canadians are proud of their health care and education systems. They are a good measure of the wealth and the compassion of our society.

Education, in particular, is increasingly important to making our way in the competitive world in the 1990s and beyond. Canada must have an education system that is responsive to change, that can adapt to help Canada meet the challenges of international competition. Education and human resource development and training will determine which countries are in the vanguard of economic development and which are in the rearguard of economic decline.

Canada already spends ample amounts on education, second only in per capita terms to Sweden among the industrialized countries. What is more important here is not money. It is value for money—it is results. We must not put policies in place that threaten to constrain innovative approaches to post-secondary education. This is obviously even more important in the field of health care where human lives are at stake.

The federal government has been and remains committed to quality education and health care in every region of Canada. While education and health generally are assigned to provincial jurisdictions under the Constitution, there has always been a federal role in these areas. Federal involvement in supporting post-secondary education can be traced back to its role of providing direct support to veterans and to universities in the post-war period. Joint health programs began with the national health grants which were part of the post-war reconstruction program.

With the development of a nation-wide health insurance system, and the rapid expansion of Canadian post-secondary education facilities in the 1950s and 1960s, the federal government's role in financing both health and post-secondary education increased dramatically.

Under cost-sharing arrangements, the federal government contributed about 50 per cent nationally of what were defined as the eligible costs of hospital insurance, medical care, and post-secondary education institutions. The cost-sharing approach was taken at a time when both health and post-secondary education programs were in a stage of major development and expansion, and when the Canadian economy was growing rapidly and governments could afford to devote large sums for these purposes.

By the mid-1970s, it had become quite clear to both the federal and provincial governments that the cost-sharing approach was no longer viable. The open-ended nature of cost-sharing arrangements reduced the federal government's ability to control and predict its expenditures. Wide per capita variations in federal transfers to different provinces appeared inequitable. Cost sharing of specific expenditures led to rigidities and an inefficient allocation of resources. The arrangements were cumbersome to administer because of auditing requirements and difficulties in defining eligible expenditures. The approach encouraged expenditures at both levels of government through 50-cent dollars.

In an effort to overcome these problems, the federal and provincial governments accepted in 1977 that cost sharing would be replaced in favour of Established Programs Financing.

Let me briefly review the objectives of this financial arrangement. They are to maintain across Canada the standard of services to the public under these major programs, and to facilitate their improvement; to put the programs on a more stable footing so that both levels of government are better able to plan their expenditures; to give the provinces flexibility in the use of their own funds which they have been spending in these fields; to bring about greater equity and equality among the provinces with regard to the amount of federal funds they receive under the program; and to provide for continuing joint policy discussions relating to the health and post-secondary education fields.

Under EPF, the federal government provides equal per capita financial assistance to all provinces through the transfer of tax points and cash payments. The federal government continues to pay a substantial share of the costs of provincial health and post-secondary education programs. In 1990-91 federal EPF contributions will amount to over $20 billion.

Let me reiterate, Madam Speaker, that since 1977 the provinces have been able to use these transfers according to their particular priorities rather than in the more restricted fashion required by the previous cost-sharing arrangements. This system works well. It has given Canada a health care system that is the envy of the world. It has provided us with world-class universities and post-secondary institutions.

I would ask hon. members to bear these facts in mind when considering the motion before the House.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I listened to our colleague for Calgary Southeast and might have to reconsider my position because I agree with him. I do not want to agree with Conservative members too often. You, Madam Speaker, will understand the bad precedent that that could create from time to time. However, I do agree with him this time.

Mr. Thacker: You might even get re-elected.

Mr. Boudria: I hear a member across the way saying that the member for Calgary Southeast might even get re-elected.

Mr. Thacker: You might even get re-elected, if you become a Conservative.

Mr. Boudria: I suppose there is nothing impossible, Madam Speaker. That member might get re-elected. But then again he might not, as most Tories will of course go down to defeat in the next election. It could very well be that that particular member will as well. But who knows. The voters will decide ultimately and the member from Lethbridge will find out, as we all will on election day.

I listened attentively to the proposition set forth by our colleague, the member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing. He said that the government should consider the advisability of ensuring that federal transfer payments to the provinces for the purposes of education and health care are spent directly on those services. The only way of achieving that, as was pointed out earlier, is to amend the cost-sharing agreements that the federal government has right now with the provinces.

Right now we operate under a block funding type of arrangement. What that means is that, if we ensure that federal transfers to the provinces go to a specific area, then we would unilaterally change the agreement we have now with the provinces. I do not agree with that proposition.

It was only moments ago that we were discussing Bill C-69. With respect to Bill C-69 I said, and colleagues from all sides of the House said, how wrong it was for the federal government to cut back unilaterally on funds going to the provinces. If it is wrong to cut back unilaterally on funds to the provinces, I ask my colleagues this. Is it not similarly wrong to amend unilaterally the agreements we have with them?

You can see, Madam Speaker, why I am tempted here to agree with the member from Calgary Southeast. The only reason I agree with him is because he is correct, not because he is the Conservative member for Calgary Southeast. I do think he is correct in the sense that we should not be trying to impose this kind of a proposition.

If my colleague from Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing would have proposed instead that the federal government consider the advisability, when it renegotiates agreements with the provinces, of ensuring that those new agreements have a provision whereby health care dollars would be assigned specifically as opposed to the present arrangement which provides for block funding, then perhaps I would look at the issue slightly differently.

At the present time what is proposed is not that. What is proposed to me sounds very heavy-handed. It sounds very doctrinaire. I have difficulty with that kind of socialism that is so doctrinaire that it wants to impose that kind of central authority on just about everything. You can understand, Madam Speaker, how I would be hesitant to support that kind of a proposition.

Therefore, I regret to say that I cannot agree with what the hon. member is suggesting to members of the House. I usually consider the opinions of the member for Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing as being very worthy and supportable opinions, generally. I do think, particularly at this time in the history of our country—and I need not remind hon. members of what is going on right now across the street—that it certainly is not a good time to talk about making the kind of changes that are being proposed here today.

Indeed, the arrangements we have now have been in place since, I believe, 1977. Before that, post-secondary education and health care were funded by mechanisms which were different, at least very different in the case of post-secondary education in particular.

I will recognize that negotiators, when these agreements expire, may want to negotiate them federally. At that particular point, as I said previously, I would be willing to offer my input as to how I think that should be done.

Needless to say, I do not think at the present we should be supporting the motion brought forward by our colleague for the reasons I have just described.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Madam Speaker, this motion that is before us brings the whole question of federal payments to the provinces and, in particular, payments under the Established Programs Financing Act. It is a very important subject.

In 1977, we saw a major change in the way in which federal assistance was delivered to the provinces. The federal and provincial governments agreed back then to replace the old shared-cost program and shared-cost method of assistance with a very different kind of program which we now know as EPF.

Through the EPF program the federal government continues to support the financing of a number of programs, including, of course, post-secondary education and health care. Provincial programs are supported through payments made directly to their governments.

The change in 1977 was to move away from the old shared-cost system, where federal assistance met up to about half the cost of certain programs, to a system of what is called block funding.

Federal assistance is now based on a formula related to the growth of the economy and of the population of each province and is therefore more equitable across the country. The provinces are happy with this arrangement. I am certainly not aware of any objections since 1977 to that arrangement, since it allows the provinces more flexibility in designing programs to use their revenues, both those raised by themselves and those provided by the federal government.

Over the years there have been changes in the EPF program, but all have respected the basic principles of that act and the agreement between the provinces and the federal government.

Most recently, the federal government has responded to our financial situation by proposing changes which ask the provinces to share in the national burden of fighting the deficit and inflation. These changes, too, respect the outlines of the EPF program.

I want to take time now to look at these recent changes in light of our situation with respect to this motion.

At this point, it is important to remember that total federal transfers to the provinces through tax points and cash payments amount to over $35 billion. These transfers have grown at an average rate of 6.5 per cent per year since 1984–85—a rather significant growth rate. This compares to spending on federal programs which has grown in the same period by an average rate of 3.6 per cent per year. That is certainly less than the rate of inflation, but substantially less than the rate at which we have been transferring payments to the provinces.

We believe that the provinces are able to carry a larger share of the burden of their own spending, especially the more prosperous provinces.

At the present time, 35 cents of every federal revenue dollar is being used to pay interest on the accumulated federal debt, while the comparable figure for the provinces together is only 12 cents.

I have talked about more prosperous provinces sharing the burden that we at the federal level have. I would like to talk specifically about the province that I live in, the province of Ontario. I heard the doom and gloom about funding for various health care and education programs because of this cut that we have proposed in EPF. I say cut, but it really is not a cut. We are increasing transfers to the province of Ontario by over 2 per cent, almost 3 per cent.

Having said that, in all the doom and gloom that members of the Opposition have talked about, the province of Ontario this year was able to increase its spending on health care by 12.8 per cent in its budget. Where in the world is the doom and gloom that members of the Opposition are talking about?

Not only was the Government of Ontario able to increase its spending by 12.8 per cent in the field of health care, it was able to balance its budget. It was able to pay off some of its debt. All in all, it was doing a pretty remarkable job. I give it credit for that. The fact is that the province was able to raise the money. Yet here we are in the House saying that the province of Ontario could not afford to get only just under 3 per cent more from the federal government. That is nonsense.

Our expenditure control plan will limit the rate of growth of these transfers to about 3 per cent for the next two years. This is about the rate we ourselves are holding to for federal program spending. In other words, all we are asking the provinces to do is to carry the same load that we here in Ottawa are putting upon ourselves. We are asking them to do as we are doing—not more, not less.

Having said this about the provinces in general, however, we are sensitive to the fact that some provinces are not in as good a position as others. I understand that, yes, the province of Ontario was able to do some things because of some economic health that it has. As a result of our planning, our plan is sensitive to the needs of individual provinces. Federal transfers will grow by about 4 per cent a year in the next two years to those seven weaker provinces, while the stronger ones, including the province that I come from, will only grow at just over 2 per cent a year.

However, I want to underline another important aspect of our proposal. It is that the reductions we are proposing are really not reductions. They are reductions in the rate of growth, but they only amount to about 1 per cent of the provincial revenues. It is not 10 per cent, 20 per cent or 40 per cent. I realize opposition members have not used those numbers, but the hysteria they create by the way they are carrying on suggests that we are decimating provincial revenues. That is nonsense. It is about 1 per cent.

Transfers will, of course, continue to grow. The weaker provinces will benefit more than the stronger provinces. That is part of what Canada is about.

I want to look more closely now at one particular area of federal transfers, the Established Programs Financing, which is the focus of the motion that is before us today.

EPF is the single largest element of over-all federal transfers to the provinces which amount to about $36 billion in 1990–91. EPF itself has grown from $14.5 billion in 1984–85 to about $20 billion in 1989–90. That is a growth rate of over 6 per cent a year.

We at the federal level have been controlling our spending at a rate of 3.5 per cent a year. We have been transferring money to the provinces at the rate of about 6 per cent a year. They certainly have not been very hard done by and now we are only asking them to match what we are doing.

Mr. Turner (Halton—Peel): What about Ontario's spending?

Mr. Soetens: Ontario's spending is a very good question. It has been increasing spending over-all at a rate of just under 10 per cent a year for the entire period that we are talking about. We held ourselves to 3.5 per cent while Ontario managed to raise its spending to 10 per cent. No wonder they have an inflationary problem in southern Ontario.

I want to remind you that under this program the federal government gives assistance to the provinces both in tax points and in cash transfers. The purpose of these transfers has been to assist the provinces in providing acceptable levels of programs in certain areas.

Since 1977, however, the provinces have been able to use the money in accordance with their own priorities. They have not been dictated to by the federal government. Each and every province can set their own priorities in using the money that we have been transferring to them.

Of course, in 1977, I need not remind you, Madam Speaker, and unfortunately for Canada, there was not a Conservative government in Ottawa. An awful lot of bad things have happened since 1977 because of another government that existed in Ottawa, but in this particular case on that point that government transferred responsibility to the provinces. That, in essence, is what Canada believes in, that the provinces have the responsibility to deliver. We give them that responsibility.

Our proposals will continue to transfer under the EPF for the next two years at the same per capita rate as they got in 1989–90. It is not a new formula. It is the formula they used in last year's budget that we are asking them to use it in this year's budget and in the next year's budget.

Transfers will therefore continue to increase as provincial populations increase at an expected rate for the country as a whole of about 1 per cent. Because transfers are based on an equal per capita figure for each Canadian, the effect of our program will be equal for each and every province.

In 1992–93, the rate of growth will return to that set out in the law and in the agreements which provide for the payments to increase by the rate of inflation less than 3 per cent, as announced in the April, 1989 budget. After 1992–93, the rate of increase will not be less than the rate of inflation.

The second program under which the federal government assists the provinces is the equalization program, which provides help to provinces with weaker revenues and which may be directed to health care and post-secondary education. These payments have also grown strongly in recent years, from about $5 billion in 1984–85 to nearly $8 billion in 1989–90, a 60 per cent growth rate in about five years.

In the case of the Atlantic provinces, these payments are more important than payments under the EPF simply because of the sheer size and volume of the payments. Equalization going to the less prosperous provinces is not affected by the restraint program presented by the government. They will continue to grow at a rate between 6 per cent and 7 per cent a year, which is substantially higher than the projected rate of increase in federal program spending.

The facts I have set out in explanation of what this government is doing with respect to EPF and equalization underline the importance we attach to the goals of these programs.

While we are asking the provinces to share the burden, as I have explained previously, we are continuing to spend a great deal of money, up to $27 billion in 1990–1991, on the two programs in actual cash. That is a substantial proportion of federal government spending and an even higher proportion of spending of federal programs.

These moneys are being transferred to the provinces because we believe the provinces, which have the constitutional authority in the areas of education and health care, are the level of government best suited to make the practical decisions about what services are to be delivered and how they are to be delivered. Without an increase in the size of the federal bureaucracy, this is the most efficient and effective way to ensure that Canadians receive the services they need.

I am not persuaded that these are appropriate messages being sent today. I am glad to put on record my opposition to the motion put by members of the opposition.

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Madam Speaker, in addressing this particular motion I can agree with the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. I think he spoke some very eloquent and intelligent words on this particular matter. I would like to compliment my friend.

When he said that this was an example of heavy-handed doctrinaire politics, he was right. This is an example of the ugly side of socialism in this country. This motion typifies the attitude, the doctrine, the belief that a federal government can walk into Canadians' lives, and provincial affairs, that the state can intervene in other jurisdictions. It is the state rearing its head, the jackboots of a central government which is totally wrong. It may be pure socialism, but it is wrong. It is wrong for Canada.

The member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell also mentioned what is happening here in Ottawa as we attempt to achieve constitutional reform. The symbolism of what is happening as those discussions go on, compared to the political reality of this kind of a motion, shows very dramatically different styles of government. It shows a government style that this government has adopted that is conciliatory, that is negotiating, that represents that it understands that there are other interests out there, that the government needs to work with Canadians, with other associations and other governments rather than dictating to them as, perhaps, the NDP would have us do. It is clearly not right.

I do not think Canadians want anything other than a partnership. They want a partnership that works. They do not want a dictatorship.

There is one thing, however, that the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell said with which I must take a moment to disagree. He said that Tories will go down to defeat in the next election. Well, I do not know where he got that. Maybe it is because right now Tories have the conviction to reform the tax system. It would have been easier to leave an unfair and invisible hidden tax in place that hurts the economy. That would have been easy. In fact, for years governments have taken the easy way out. It is not easy to take an invisible, hidden tax and make it visible. It is not easy to take a tax that consumers do not know they pay and all of a sudden tell them about it. That is tough.

Maybe he was referring to spending cuts that this government has made. Maybe he was referring to the fact that we have stood up to special interest groups. The government has admitted that it is difficult to cut off the funding once it has been started, but the government has decided to do that and maybe that is why the hon. member thinks that the Tories are unpopular right now.

Maybe it is the fact that we have reformed the unemployment insurance system to try to make it fair, to channel more money into retraining people rather than just paying them to sit at home. That is not easy either and maybe the hon. member was referring to that.

Then again, the member may have been referring to the government's stance on fighting inflation. Maybe the hon. member thinks that interest rates are too high, that maybe we should abandon the fight for long-term economic stability into which we have entered. The hon. member may have been talking about the politics of convenience rather than the politics of conviction. Politicians of convenience are there to get elected again. That is what they care about. In fact, all that politicians of convenience care about is getting elected again. But there is something more important than that.

More important than being a politician of convenience is being a politician of conviction, politicians who do not care if they are popular. Popularity comes and popularity goes, polls rise and polls fall, and at the end of the day convenience does not matter. At the end of the day you have to look back and say, when I was a member of Parliament, while I was part of the government, while I was in the House of Commons, did I just do things that would get me elected again, or did I do things that I believed in and things that I could go back and tell people that I supported?

If the hon. member wants us just to be politicians of convenience, maybe it would be easier to get elected again and again. But to be popular, Madam Speaker, is easy. I will give you a recipe for popularity right now.

The government would scrap the GST. The government would not try to fix the constitutional impasses to which we have come. The government would print more money. The government would ignore the debt. The government would ignore the deficit. The government would ignore inflation. That would make us very popular very fast.

In the short term, we would have been politicians of convenience. We would have been politicians who became popular. We would be politicians for the short term, because that is how long the popularity would last. Very soon this country would have chaos on many fronts: social, political, economic, financial. We would have problems then that politicians who came after us would not be able to solve, and it is bad enough right now as we members of Parliament, we the government, try to cope with the problem that we inherited.

In 1984 the debt that we inherited was $170 billion. Today it is more than double, almost entirely because of interest on that debt that we inherited. If you have a mortgage on your house, Madam Speaker, and you cannot make the mortgage payments and you borrow enough to make them every year, pretty soon you are going to have a much bigger mortgage and will have a harder time paying it off. It is that simple.

We do not want to be politicians like the politicians who came before. We want to break the cycle of the last 20 years. Those of us who are in the House for the first time want to make a difference. We realize that making a difference for the future means solving the problems of the past. That is what all this is about. It is about conviction, not convenience. It is about the long term and not the short term.

We have to do things today which will have consequences throughout the 1990s. It will not be an easy decade. There are going to be lots of problems. There are going to be economic problems and environmental problems, linguistic problems and social problems. To solve all of those we have to take actions today so that we can reap the benefit in the future. This is what this government is doing now.

I have to take exception to the comments of the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. I think they were ill-conceived.

We are not here to talk about that anyway, and a few words on the funding program now would be worth while. As I said, I think the philosophy of the NDP is totally wrong, but I only have two minutes now to cover this subject in my remarks, so I will not even try, Madam Speaker. Two minutes is really not enough time to deal with this, but two minutes is enough time to say that all of us here on this side of the House are trying to accomplish an agenda.

Canadians will know that right now the government is not very popular in the polls. Canadians, however, recognize in their hearts that the polls do not matter. It is very easy to say that you would support some other politician or some other political party. It is very easy when there is not an election going on. It is very easy when there are so many issues of national importance on the agenda.

But, Madam Speaker, the polls do not matter right now. They do not matter to me as the member for Halton—Peel, they do not matter to the member for Ontario and they do not matter to the member for Calgary Southeast. All of us do not care about the polls. We care about doing what is right, what is constructive and what is beneficial for our country.

We will continue to do it. We have not lost any resolve. We do not look at the polls with any alarm or with any fear. We look at them with a passing curiosity because we know that when Canadians are asked to make a decision they will have only one decision to make, and that is to support those politicians who truly fight for Canada.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Before I begin, Madam Speaker, let me congratulate my colleague for his excellent speech. I think he conveyed his position with great maturity.

In 1977, there was a very important change in the way federal aid was given to the provinces. The federal and provincial governments agreed to replace the shared-cost assistance with a considerably different funding mechanism, now known as Established Programs Financing. Under EPF, the federal government continued to fund a large part of provincial post-secondary education and health care programs by transfer payments to the provincial governments. The difference is that starting in 1977, the federal government would no longer contribute on a 50–50 shared-cost basis with the provinces. The federal contribution would be calculated on the basis of the economic growth and population of each province. The federal government's contribution to these programs thus became more uniform across the country. The provinces were satisfied with this arrangement because it gave them much greater flexibility in using funds both from their treasury and from the federal government.

Much has happened since then and our assistance continues in spite of straitened circumstances. In the current fiscal year, transfers of tax points and cash to the provinces will total over $35 billion. On the whole, transfers to the provinces have increased at an average annual rate of 6.5 per cent since 1984–85. By comparison, spending on federal programs in general has been held to an average annual growth rate of 3.6 per cent, which is less than the rate of inflation. In general, the provinces are able to carry a bigger share of their spending, especially the provinces that are in good financial shape.

At a time when 35 cents of every dollar of federal revenue is used to pay interest costs on the debt, the average figure for the provinces is only 12 cents.

Under the Expenditure Control Plan which was part of the last budget, the tranfers to the provinces are expected to grow over the next two years by nearly 3 per cent a year, roughly the same rate as the federal government's total program spending. In other words, we are not asking the provinces to carry a burden heavier than our own. We are asking the provinces to do their part, that is all.

If I may, Madam Speaker, I should like to emphasize the federal government's contribution to the provinces, a contribution which remains very significant. The transfers generally will continue to increase and the less affluent provinces will benefit from a higher growth rate than the others. Because the transfer payments to the provinces represent very significant amounts, I should like, if I may, to deal a little more in detail with the way the governement helps all provinces.

In 1990–91, the federal government will provide nearly $36 billion in total financial support to the provinces and territories.

The greater part of this assistance comes under three major programs: Established Programs Financing, equalization payments and the Canada Assistance Plan. Under the Established Programs Financing, the Federal Government provides equal per capita financial assistance to all provinces through the transfer of tax points and cash payments. These transfers were originally designed to help provinces carry out their responsibilities in respect of health care and post-secondary education.

Since 1977, provinces have been able to use these transfers according to their particular priorities. EPF transfers are the largest single form of federal support to provinces, and have grown from $14.5 billion in 1984–85 to about $20 billion in 1989–90, an average annual growth rate of more than 6 per cent.

In addition to Established Programs Financing, the federal government also provides substantial additional assistance to the lower income provinces to help them provide public services including health care and post-secondary education through the equalization program. Equalization transfers have grown strongly in recent years, from over $5 billion in 1984–85 to close to $8 billion in 1989–90. For example, they now exceed EPF as the largest form of federal support in the Atlantic provinces.

Under the Canada Assistance Plan (CAP), Madam Speaker, the federal government provides funds to provincial and territorial governments to help them pay for social assistance benefits and services. These transfers, which are based on 50/50 cost-sharing of eligible provincial spending, have grown at an average annual rate of about 6.7 per cent over the past five years. The federal contribution, in the form of cash and transfer of tax points, has increased from $4 billion to $5.5 billion. The average rate of growth in each province has varied from 1 to 3 per cent in Saskatchewan, British Columbia and Quebec, to about 14 per cent in Ontario.

For the next two years, growth in transfers under the Canada Assistance Plan, or CAP, will be limited to five per cent a year in the fiscally stronger provinces of Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. Other provinces—those receiving federal equalization payments—will be exempt from this ceiling on growth. They will continue to have open-ended access to federal dollars to meet any growth in expenditures eligible for cost-sharing under CAP. Implementation of this measure will provide for resumption of the present regime on April 1, 1992.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat that federal financial assistance to the provinces is distributed on a progressive basis. Fiscally weak provinces receive far more substantial per capita assistance than the richer provinces. The facts show, beyond a doubt, that the federal government has done its share despite a financial context, a financial situation of which everyone is well aware, and I am referring to our very substantial national debt and deficit. I believe that in times like these, we must be realistic. We must be realistic because everyone wants more assistance. Everyone wants better programs. Everyone wants an even more progressive increase in programs. However, we must consider the country's financial situation, and I believe that Canadians are very well informed in this respect and are very proud of the fact that we are able to act responsibly as a government.

As my colleague from Halton—Peel (Mr. Turner) said, we were not elected to this House or to government just to win beauty or popularity contests. We were elected to show leadership and the ability to run this country well.

I think that for this reason, Canadians will be grateful to us for having done the right thing at the right time, Madam Speaker, for having made the right decisions when they had to be made and for not trying only to win popularity contests in the short run.

Madam Speaker, thank you for your attention.

[English]

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, it is a privilege to rise on this Private Members' Motion dealing with federal-provincial relations. I speak from some 11 years of sitting in this House and listening to the same debate over and over again. One hundred years from today members will still be debating this because the bottom line reality is that we live in a federal country with a federal power that has enormous taxing power against all Canadians in all regions of the country. It deals with provinces which represent much smaller areas, often with much less strength to be able to tax their people and industries.

Since Confederation mechanisms have been developed to transfer cash through the central Parliament back to regions that do not have the same taxing authority.

I can remember soon after 1980 sitting on a federal task force of all three parties in the House looking at the question of federal-provincial transfers. We travelled to every provincial capital and interviewed dozens of Canadians, provincial governments and officials. It became crystal clear that there is one thing that the provinces are absolutely unanimous on, and that is that if they can help it, they are not going to give up any fiscal power to the federal government and that they want more and more fiscal power back.

Indeed, the genius of Canada is that in times of crisis, war and depressions, for example, power can centralize in Ottawa as happened in World War I, World War II and during the Depression. However, during peace time there has been a steady devolution of fiscal responsibility to the provinces.

To me the most important thing for this Parliament is to ensure that we never give to the provinces that residual power that we have, i.e., peace, order and good government, so that at a time of crisis, whether an economic crisis or a political crisis such as war, power can be taken and used by Parliament.

In the meantime, during peace times, very likely the principle that the government closest to the people gives the best government is a good principle to operate by, and so we should not be frightened by that.

In terms of federal-provincial fiscal arrangements, we know from the speeches given earlier that the federal government, using its spending power, moved into areas of exclusive provincial jurisdiction. That is the real critical point. We are talking about that limited area where there is exclusive provincial jurisdiction— property civil rights and education. Property and civil rights includes hospitals.

We should not easily move into those areas and try to take them away from the provinces. Indeed, if we did, the Supreme Court would throw it out and declare any act of Parliament to be unconstitutional. So we have had to enter into arrangements.

The first one was shared cost under which the provinces would get 50 cents for every 50 cents they spent. Under that, the provinces, particularly the ones that had strong fiscal capacity, built up their hospitals, schools and colleges very fast. The weaker provinces did not have even the 50 cents so they were falling further behind.

The result was that there was uncontrolled federal spending and the federal government had no idea how much it was going to have to budget each year. So in 1977 the government came out with block funding, the idea that the provinces would just get a certain amount and would then decide how to spend it.

It is true that some provinces have abused that formula. Indeed, there are instances where they have received under the formula more than they have actually spent, for example, on post-secondary education. Nonetheless, it gave more certainty to the federal government and so, on balance, I think that was not so unwise.

The government then moved into a formula that was based on a moving average. The result was that we in Parliament were transferring to the provinces moneys well above the annual rate of inflation. That was not right because we were then giving up the right and responsibility of parliamentarians to act responsibly in a fiscal sense because, of course, it is the same people being taxed, whether federally or provincially. We have no more right to be irresponsible than do they. Thus, under Bill C-69 with which we just dealt, which is to try to cut back the rate of increase to the provinces, it is still going to be above the rate of inflation, but it will be a lower rate than before.

CANADA WATER PROTECTION ACT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops) moved that Bill C–221, An Act to protect water in Canada, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee

He said: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have this opportunity today to introduce for debate, Bill C–221.

I would like to begin my comments by suggesting that when people think of Canada or when Canadians think of our own country, there are a number of things that spring almost instantly to mind. One of those would be the term Meech Lake. I think that has been associated with being what Canadians are and what being Canadian is all about.

I suspect water is another item which makes one think of Canada. It has become almost a Canadian experience to take advantage of an abundance of water, since many other countries are not necessarily so fortunate to have such a vast resource.

It could mean houseboating or cottaging around our lakes, canoeing down rivers or across lakes, fishing in streams, boating on our coasts or in our inland waterways. It could be kayaking, yachting or sailing. The association of people with water has become a Canadian experience. I suppose the beer ads reflect that most clearly, in terms of people having fun in Canadian water.

On the other hand, there is another side to this water issue. We find that there are hundreds of lakes in the greater Ottawa area that are lifeless because of acid rain. While they look nice, very pristine and glacier clear, the fact is they look like that because there is nothing living in them. They are dead lakes. We hear of increasing pollution of waterways, streams and lakes and find, with horror, that many Canadian cities, large and small, still today dump raw sewage directly into our river systems and lakes.

It is almost incomprehensible that a country as sophisticated and developed as Canada would still find it acceptable to dump vast quantities of raw sewage directly into our rather pristine river systems on a daily basis. We are getting close to that time of the season when people would like to go to the beaches and go swimming. They will find the beaches closed for swimming because the water is polluted.

We have to ask ourselves what kind of a country are we that will allow beaches and water bodies, particularly those adjacent to large metropolitan areas, to be closed regularly every summer because of increased levels of pollution in our waterways.

I realized the need for this bill a few months ago while boating in the gulf islands, off our west coast. The boat was tied up with a whole set of other boats for an evening in a very secluded and safe cove. I recall getting up early in the morning, leaping into the water as one does to refresh oneself and enjoy an early–morning dip, only to notice as I am swimming around, a lot of indefinable bits of debris floating in the water around me. I then realized that everyone who had gotten up at the same time had decided to flush their toilets on their boats directly into the cove, and here I am swimming around with all sorts of interesting other objects. I got out of the water very quickly, I will tell you.

I had to ask myself what kind of a country we had that would allow this. I started to look at the laws and decided to introduce Bill C–221 as a result. I went back and looked at the federal water policy in 1987, when Environment Canada issued the federal water policy for the Government of Canada. This was a report outlining the major issues facing Canada's water resources, along with a comprehensive list of initiatives that the Conservative government would undertake. That was in 1987.

We saw 1987 end, 1988 end, and 1989 end, and now we are into 1990. Quite frankly, little substantive movement has been made in any legislative forum to address the many issues cited in the report as being fundamental to the continued availability of our fresh water stocks when it comes to fishing and the whole matter of clean water and safe drinking water in our country.

Bill C-221, the bill before us today, takes the necessary step beyond rhetoric. It encourages us and, in some respects, compels us to examine seriously our water usage today in order to assure the availability of this precious Canadian resource for generations to come. Across Canada, I think we would agree that communities have acted and reacted differently to the challenges presented to them in recent years when the essential nature of coherent water management policies became a concern, not only for the federal government, but also for provincial governments and municipalities, including the nation's capital, Ottawa.

To be fair, I might say that there have been some outstanding efforts to clean up polluted waterways and lakes in some areas while, in others, the policy and problems of pollution control have become worse. The matter worsens by the day.

What we need is a commitment from the government to embrace a comprehensive water policy for Canada. We need federal leadership to establish maximum contaminant levels in drinking water. A national standard is necessary to ensure that all Canadians can be guaranteed clean water, regardless of which area one happens to reside in.

I think it is fair to say that in a country like Canada, blessed with the natural water resources that we have, safe drinking water is a fundamental right that any citizen ought to expect. Quite plainly, the necessity of clean water is no longer debatable. Today, we do not and ought not debate the need for it. We should debate the methods and ways of achieving it.

Clean water is a social good that goes beyond being an issue for ourselves. It has become an issue about our responsibilities toward our children, their children, and so on. We need a mandate to establish a minimum level of stewardship or our water will not last, at least in any usable form.

The federal water policy recommends that the government undertake "physical, chemical, biological and socioeconomic investigations". I am pleased to say that this bill makes this a reality. It directs the Minister of the Environment to cause research to be conducted into a wide range of water-related issues such as the causes, diagnoses, treatment, control, and prevention of adverse health effects associated with contaminants; the researching of new methods of purifying water; and investigating the sources of surface and ground water contamination, just to name a few.

This bill would force the government to keep its promises of expanded research in an area so vital to Canada's interest.

There are some in this Chamber who would say we have no business talking about water in the House of Commons because it is a provincial responsibility. I would say, with all due respect, that they would be incorrect.

The federal government and Parliament have a vested interest in the protection of navigable waters, shipping, drinking water in areas of federal jurisdiction, international water management, and federal-provincial-territorial co-operation in water resources, planning and management. Following the recommendations of Environment Canada, this bill would make the federal approach more anticipatory in order to protect the health and safety of Canadians. It is time that we became more pro-active in the matter of water policy development, as opposed to waiting for problems to happen and then simply reacting.

The government promised to bring forth legislative initiatives which would address interjurisdictional water issues. This bill, Bill C-221, would provide a mandate for the federal government to co-ordinate and formulate the implementation of inter-basin transfer policies, along with research into the effects.

At the moment, there are no penalties for surpassing the federal guidelines on water contaminants. This bill establishes a process by which testing is implemented, results are made public, and those supplies which fail to meet standards are not used until able to comply with the minimum standards of purity.

The government promised public participation in making water management decisions, but I cannot recall any opportunity for the public to become involved in the development of a comprehensive national water policy. As a matter of fact, there has been no opportunity for citizens generally, who are either marginally or very seriously interested in this issue, to participate in the formulation of such a policy. Without a plan before Parliament, there is no avenue for public discourse on the subject. Bill C–221 ensures the public's right to know by providing for public disclosure of the results of water testing.

Bill C–221 would require water suppliers to be responsible for testing their water supplies at least every month. This would encourage suppliers to be vigilant in their efforts to ensure the integrity of the water they supply to Canadians. Not only would they test monthly, but the results would be available for everyone to see because they would be required to be mailed to every user with their monthly water bill. This would be a direct way to involve the public. Not only would they know that their water is being tested, but they would be aware of what standards are being used and to what extent the supplier would comply with those standards.

During the debates on the free trade agreement, many alarming questions concerning large–scale water diversions to the United States were raised. As we are all aware, water was not given an exclusion from the free trade agreement, as were logs and beer. I find it rather odd when one considers we made a specific effort to exclude beer in the free trade agreement, yet we did not take the same measure with fresh water. Although anyone in a liquor store would notice that the American brewing industry has found a way around this. Even though beer was excluded from the free trade agreement, Canadians now drink even more American beer.

We are all aware of our friends to the south looking covetously at water in Canada. In the American southwest water supplies are drying up. Usage is increasing at alarming rates and a shortage is imminent, particularly when considering the drought conditions faced during the last few years. I suspect that more and more our American friends are looking northward to Canada.

We are all reminded of the North American water and power alliance from the 1960s when American engineers brought before the Senate a plan to divert a number of Canadian rivers into the United States. That plan is still on the books. A number of senators from the western states recently indicated their interest in the NAWAPA plan, the North American Water and Power Alliance, and major diversions of western Canadian rivers into the United States as far south as northern Mexico. Perhaps when the United States and Mexico begin their free trade agreement discussions, Canadian water will be part of those deliberations.

Canada is perceived to be in possession of massive amounts of fresh water which could be used to shore up faltering American water stocks. The fact is that Canadian water supplies are just able to meet our own needs and talking about huge diversion schemes at this point is completely unacceptable.

Canada comprises 7 per cent of the world's land mass and has approximately 9 per cent of its renewable water. According to a federal government report, this is very misleading because 60 per cent of our fresh water drains north, while 90 per cent of our population lives within a 300–kilometre area of the southern border with the United States. This means that even though water is technically available it is not always where it is needed. We have serious problems here with our own internal water management policies which must be addressed. The exportation of water through diversion schemes should be taken off the table as a topic for debate completely. The social, economic, and environmental costs of major inter–basin transfers to the United States are completely unacceptable regardless of what the short–term benefits may be.

The government also promised that it would take the strongest possible steps to prohibit the export of Canadian water by inter–basin transfer. Several ministers have assured us that such diversions are out of the question, but we still have no concrete legislative initiatives to ban the diversion of our waters. There are no laws in the books which would prohibit large diversions of our precious water resources. Bill C–221 would fill this legal loophole by specifically prohibiting the exportation of water from Canada by inter–basin transfer.

Canadians will feel a lot more secure once Bill C-221 passes later today. We will then have a law in place that the House of Commons would have supported that would prohibit the exportation of water from Canada southward.

Not only does this bill allow consumers to get involved with water concerns by making a broad base of information now open to them, it also provides for individuals to be able to file for damage against those who have violated the tenets of this bill. This would not only be a powerful incentive for water suppliers to be honest and very forthright in their dealing with the public, but also would enable those who use the resource to keep a watchful eye over would-be polluters.

After all is said and done, getting the public involved and aware of the importance of water management is an essential element of any national water policy which would be successful. The average Canadian must know that their contribution to water conservation does make a difference and that they do count in the process. That is why Bill C-221 involves people directly in the process.

This bill would provide very stiff penalties with first offenders facing up to $1,000 fines. Repeat offenders would be fined up to $1 million. Any person may petition the courts for damages caused by contravention of this act or any regulation made thereunder from the person who made the violation.

Finally, any person can ensure that this act is being carried out by the Minister of the Environment by applying for a judicial review. This allows individuals to take part in a first-hand way in ensuring that Canadian water supplies are maintained. Anyone would be able to apply for review whether they have suffered damages or not.

In a sense, that summarizes the contents of Bill C-221 and the motivation for its introduction. I also must take this opportunity to acknowledge the preparatory work that was done to make this presentation possible by Mr. Kenneth Ross who is an intern from the University of Michigan. I appreciate the support he has provided in making this possible.

Mr. Lee Clark (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of the Environment): Madam Speaker, Bill C-221 does refer at some length to the issue of water quality in Canada. The government very much appreciates the support of the hon. member for Kamloops in his efforts to support good water quality in Canada. The quality of raw or untreated water is of vital importance to the country and to the health and life-style of Canadians.

Canadians are very fortunate in the fact that we have access to a disproportionate amount of the world's supply of fresh water. As all members of the House know, fresh water is a scarce resource which Canadians sometimes, perhaps too often, take for granted.

The government does not believe that we can continue to ignore the importance of the water resource. As pollution and environmental issues rise on the public agenda, so does the need for clear, reliable information on water quality; information that is based on scientific knowledge of water and its response to chemical and biological threats; information which reports the findings of monitoring efforts; information that describes the cleanliness of particular waterways; and information that details the actions by governments, industry, and the public to resolve problems.

The hon. member for Kamloops is right to remind the House of the importance of water quality. He is also quite right in suggesting in Section 6 of his bill that the government undertake research on water quality, on the linkage between water and public health issues, and on water quality assurance technologies. His proposal to regulate against contamination of the aquatic environment and to penalize those who ignore water quality is laudable.

However, none of the ideas present in C-221 are new. In fact, the government, working in concert with the provincial and municipal governments, is already active in protecting waterways.

In the St. Lawrence River, the Great Lakes, Halifax Harbour, and the Fraser River, the government is playing a key role in identifying pollution sources, ensuring that they are cleaned up and in preventing further environmental deterioration.

We have in place the legislative authority for our actions. The Canadian Environmental Protection Act, otherwise known as CEPA, the Fisheries Act, the Pest Control Products Act, and the Transport of Dangerous Goods Act all serve to control the threat of toxic contamination of our waterways.

Water quality cannot be isolated from the wider environmental context. We believe that the best way of protecting water quality is by prevention, by effectively controlling the creation, use and disposal of toxic substances, whether they be in rivers, lakes, oceans, in the air we breathe or in terrestrial resources such as trees or crops. That is why in 1988 we brought in the Canadian Environmental Protection Act. The bottom line for this government has been and will continue to be that threat of toxic substances to the environment and to human life must be eliminated.

That is why the Fisheries Act restricts dumping of harmful materials into Canadian waters. In fact, this government recently used this provision to propose stringent regulations on effluent from pulp and paper facilities. We will be taking similar action on other major sources of water pollution.

I would also like to point out that the Government of Canada has considerable internationally respected scientific expertise in water quality. I would like to take a moment to praise those many, many public servants who work on our behalf and whose efforts are all too often, unfortunately, denigrated by the public at large. This expertise provides a foundation for the articulation of water quality guidelines.

To be clear, water quality guidelines are a way of defining how clean water must be for each major use. For example, how clean must the water be for swimming, to which the hon. member has just referred, for irrigation, watering livestock, industrial uses, supporting aquatic life or for feeding into municipal drinking water treatment plants. The guidelines are nationally accepted yardsticks. As such they provide the basis for provincial regulation of industrial pollution and municipal sewage treatment.

We now have guidelines in place for over 50 substances, and more are currently being developed.

Our scientific work links environmental and health impacts. It draws on the findings of the world's best experts, be they Canadian or from other countries. Our scientific evaluation, carried out in co-operation with the provincial governments, produces water quality guidelines which are credible, and which have the support of all the governments involved.

Our water quality monitoring work serves several purposes. It supports the development and enforcement of federal regulations. It also supports the preparation of public information on the state of Canada's aquatic environment.

This monitoring information tells Canadians just how clean particular waterways are, and whether or not they meet quality requirements for swimming, irrigation, watering livestock and fishing, among other things.

These guidelines are also used by decision makers as targets for pollution control measures. For example, in the case of pulp and paper mill effluent, water quality guidelines are being used as a basis for scientific requirements for each mill, whether they be new or old.

The Canadian public is increasingly concerned about water quality. This government shares that concern. We recognize the vital link between water quality and human health. However, we are not and must not be satisfied with the status quo. We have begun to expand our assessment work to examine the quality of the marine environment. This means monitoring shorelines and estuaries. It means testing marine waters as well as sediments. We will also be looking at national quality guidelines for groundwater.

In closing, I would like to say that I very much appreciate the effort of the hon. member for Kamloops, but I would suggest that Bill C-221 addresses many of the issues which are already being addressed by the government. I look forward to his support and participation in the debate as time proceeds.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, I am sure the proponent of the bill, as well as all members of the House, are awaiting anxiously the opportunity to support new environmental initiatives and are somewhat perturbed that they have been so long in coming. We are certainly hoping before the end of the session to have the opportunity to deal with the environmental assessment legislation which has been promised for such a long time.

I would like to comment on the bill. I certainly support its objectives. First, I will make some comments on the specifics.

The kind of action recommended in the bill is long overdue, given the report Currents of Change that was produced for the government in 1985 by Dr. Pearse, and which to date has seen virtually no action. It is not much wonder that the opposition feels constrained to bring forward a bill to protect the quality of drinking water for Canadians, as well as the quality of our rivers, lakes and oceans in terms of effluents, and to deal with the very serious problem raised by Dr. Pearse in his 1985 report concerning the diversion of major waterways and water systems.

Having said some very complimentary things about the intention of the bill, I have to say that the specifics of it show exactly why the New Democratic Party has never been elected to govern this country and why it never should be, at least not until it gets a little more in touch with reality. What this bill does, and I have certainly heard the NDP criticize the government for exactly this, is simply take a federal responsibility, push it down through two layers of government to the municipal level of government, in most cases, which can least afford to do what this bill proposes.

For instance, it asks municipalities to monitor, to inform and, most unrealistically of all, to provide an alternate water supply if there is anything found wrong with the supply of water available through the normal system.

Most municipalities monitor their water quality on a regular basis. From time to time things do happen that temporarily, usually for a very brief time, affect the quality of water. They are beyond the control of the people managing the water supply. To suggest that a totally parallel system be put in place so that a replacement water supply is immediately available for anyone who wants it, for whatever purpose they want it, is so out of touch with reality that I can hardly believe that the member has brought such a proposal forward.

I suggest that if the member is interested in having a bill that can be enforced practically and sensibly, then one of the things he might want to do is talk to the leaders of municipal governments across the this country, as members of my own caucus have done in preparation for a report that will be reproduced in the next couple of days. He would find out who could and who could not afford to live with the requirements that he is putting forward in his bill. Those who could not afford to live with them are the very communities in those regions that are already the most economically disadvantaged.

The member has to remember that the municipal property tax base is not income sensitive and that when 30 per cent of a community is unemployed the municipality still has the same obligations to meet in terms of providing water supply, sewage services as well as all of the other services that are within its mandate.

If the member has been keeping his eyes and ears open at all in the last six years, he would know that one of the crucial issues confronting municipalities right across this country is a shortage of resources even to bring their existing infrastructure up to par. For instance, in Newfoundland alone it will cost $1.6 billion just to provide basic water and sewer services to the homes which are not now provided with such services. It is estimated that $2.5 billion is needed to upgrade and replace existing water services.

We are talking about homes that have no water service aside from what they are able to get out of the ground on their own. We are talking about whether communities in some of the poorest regions of Canada can even meet the basic health requirements for a clean supply of water for their communities and their populations.

If the member were serious about bringing forward a bill like this he would have addressed the need for a municipal infrastructure program. He would have addressed the need for renewed federal programs to cost share with municipalities and the provincial governments, upgrading both the ability to provide clean water across the country and the ability to treat that water when it is returned to our waterways.

I must say I do support and urge the member to pursue the idea of national standards for both drinking water and discharges. As the Pearse report on water quality demonstrated, those standards were needed five years ago. They are even more needed now.

The need for research is also supported in this document, as is the deep concern about diversions which the government has so far failed to address in any whatsoever. We have to face the fact that Canada has more diversions of major water systems than the United States and the U.S.S.R. put together.

We have no idea what ecological, environmental, atmospheric damage or impacts we have caused by those diversions. We must certainly stop doing any more until we know exactly what we have done. Again, the Pearse report makes it absolutely clear that we have no idea what the impacts of those have been and what their long-term affects not only for Canadians but for systems beyond our borders will be.

I am sorry that the parliamentary secretary did not choose to address this extremely important report which so far the government has chosen to put on a shelf and largely ignore. It addresses all the issues raised in the member's bill. I think it proposes more concrete solutions for many of them. While being critical of the way the member chooses to put through this bill, I am entirely supportive of the need for action to preserve the quality of our drinking water, the quality of our waterways, the quality of our oceans. We must preserve the natural systems that we have in place in Canada in such abundance and stop the desecration that we have allowed to occur in the past.

I put forward a challenge to the government to deal with this issue in a sensible way in consultation with the provinces, municipalities and the private sector, as Currents for Change recommends.

We must deal with these issues on an urgent basis, and the issue of exports of water is certainly one of the most urgent that needs to be dealt with.

I thank the member for his attention to this issue and for the opportunity to debate it today. I suggest to him that there is a great deal more that needs to be done on how his proposals should be implemented.

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Madam Speaker, it is an honour and a pleasure today to have an opportunity, short as it is, to make some comments on Bill C-221, put forward by the hon. member for Kamloops. I might add, Madam Speaker, as I think you know, that he has an ability when he is out in his riding, his province and across the country to identify what people are concerned about and to be able to translate those concerns into measures and suggestions that can be raised in this House.

While I have not been swimming lately where the hon. member may have been last year when he found funny things in the water, I think it is to his credit that he has identified this problem and brought it to the House and of course to the attention of all Canadians. That is part of our job here today.

I want to comment on some of the remarks made by the Liberal member. First, I know the member knows that in Private Members' Bills we are not allowed to recommend expenditures by the Crown. I know that the hon. member for Kamloops will be a minister in the next NDP government after the next election. We can then bring in legislation that will in fact deal with many of the questions mentioned by the member, including a municipal infrastructure program, a program which was cancelled by the Liberal Party when it was in office and which has yet to see any action from the Conservative government.

I think the issues raised by the member for Kamloops in this bill are clear. They are finally giving some guidance and direction to the country when it comes to the important necessity of dealing with water and water quality and, in particular, water management in our country. In Canada we all know how important a role water plays in our lives. We are made up of water. Much of the mass of Canada is made up of water. We know how important our everyday reaction and interaction to water is.

In my own particular area is found the headwaters of the Fraser River. It starts in the eastern end of my riding. We have flowing out of the western end of the riding a major tributary of the Fraser River which flows into Nechako Lake, Fraser Lake and Ootsa Lake. Thus we are very cognizant of the need to take a look at water management issues in northern British Columbia and across the country.

I think the member's legislation is well written because it deals with how we have to govern and work on an issue that is perhaps jurisdictionally difficult as water. Water does not respect provincial boundaries, let alone fiscal years or election years.

Part of the member's bill talks about entering into agreements with various governments, something which I think is particularly apt for the provincial government in my own province of British Columbia.

You have probably seen news reports, Madam Speaker, which have outlined the horrendous, outrageous, environment policies that the Social Credit government has had over the past number of years.

Some 3,000 pollution permits are issued in the province of British Columbia. Just recently information was released which showed that some 14 pulp mills are still in violation of those permits. It is absolutely incredible that we have a provincial government that allows this to happen.

We also have had attempts by previous governments, as well as this government and its departments, with respect to the Heritage Rivers Act. The province of British Columbia, because it is on the other side of the mountains or because of Social Credit thinking, which is out of touch, has a government which refuses to participate in that heritage river policy. Rivers have played an important role in the development of the history of Canada and of British Columbia. Yet our provincial government still refuses to recognize that.

What this legislation attempts to do is address some of the concerns that we now face when it comes to water quality. All members have just received copies of a booklet entitled: What Can we Do for Our Environment?. While water issues are different in different parts of Canada, there have been various suggestions made to save water, such as putting a brick in the toilet, or taking what is called a sailor's shower which means turning off the water while you are shampooing. It is always a bit of a start when you have to turn the water back on because it always seems to be a little cold right at the start.

Those are some of the things that we should take a look at when we are dealing with water quality. They lead to the importance of ensuring that across the country, in co-operation with provincial and local governments, we develop the kind of guidelines that ensure that the water we get from the tap is safe for all of us.

What struck me most prior to the election when we were running for office, knowing that the environment would be a concern, was the whole question of beluga whales in the St. Lawrence. That struck me because when we are in school we learn about the big fish eating the smaller ones and so forth. We learn about the accumulation of DDT and dioxins in the livers and internal organs of these fish. When these belugas were dying because of that, it came pretty close to home.

It struck me as to how important it is that we pay attention to water quality in the country. What we have to do is take this little green book we all received in our office the other day that lays out the guidelines for Canadian drinking water quality.

What this legislation can do and what the Government of Canada should do, instead of putting out guidelines for Canadian drinking water quality, is legislate drinking water quality for Canadians so that we can ensure that the water we drink and the water that is in our environment is protected from the deleterious substances that flow into it from industry and development. This would ensure that our water is pure and clean.

If there is one effort that this House can make, and I know it is something that my friend from Kamloops has been pursuing, as has our environment critic, the member for Skeena, it is to ensure that water, one of our basics, is protected. We could go a long way to doing that if we were to pass today Bill C-221. It would have a tremendous positive impact on water quality.

[Translation]

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I am very happy to have an opportunity to discuss the subject of safe drinking water which is most important to all concerned Canadians. The introduction of Bill C-221 concerning drinking water safety is encouraging.

Under the Canadian Constitution, resources, including water, are considered to be under provincial jurisdiction. It follows that the provision of drinking water and the legislation of standards and regulations are the primary responsibility of provincial governments, rather than the federal government.

The federal government has demonstrated leadership through the development of national guidelines for drinking water quality which have been undertaken largely on a collaborative basis between the federal and provincial levels of government.

The Department of National Health and Welfare fulfils the role of health adviser, as prescried under the Department of National Health and Welfare Act. Measures that are designed specifically to protect public health, such as the drinking water guidelines, are normally undertaken under the auspices of the Conference of Deputy Minsters of Health. A permanent subcommittee on drinking water, composed of representaives from all provinces and territories and from the Department of National Health and Welfare, develops and revises the guidelines on a continuing basis.

The first comprehensive Canadian drinking water guidelines were pulished by the Department of National Health and Welfare in 1968. These were first revised in 1978, then again in 1987, and have now been revised as the fourth edition, released in 1989.

The guidelines are not legally enforceable, unless promulgated as regulations by the appropriate provincial agency.

The guidelines are the primary means of assessing the safety, from a human health perspective, of drinking water supplies for lifetime consumption. The guidelines also take into consideration aesthetic parameters such as color, taste and odour.

The guidelines, though, are not sufficient to ensure that problems with drinking water, arising from our modern society, are adequately addressed. Canadians from all provinces have recently become increasingly concerned about the quality of the drinking water which their municipalities deliver. In fact, in a survey that was conducted by a major Canadian magazine, 44 per cent of Canadians indicated that they believe tap water will not be drinkable by the year 2001.

Although major epidemics of typhoid and cholera are a matter of history in Canada, we cannot afford to be complacent about the presence of pathogens in drinking water. Giardiasis is emerging as a concern in Western Canada. There have also been outbreaks of viral diarrhea and occasional outbreaks of typhoid traced to water treatment plant failures, cross-connections and the flooding of wells. These have served to demonstrate the potential public health significance of organisms that may escape sanitary barriers. The current emphasis on chemical contaminants in drinking water, therefore, should not divert our attention from the need to control microbial pathogens in drinking water.

Over the last decade scientists have identified, and the media have reported on more than 1,000 organic chemicals that have occasionally been found to be present in drinking water. Fairly frequently, a dozen or more chemicals have been detected in a single water supply.

These have generally occurred at relatively low concentrations, in the parts per billion range, or less. This detection is largely a result of the significant advances made in our ability to measure such low concentrations. In most cases, concentrations are so low that they do not represent a health hazard, but, in other cases, guidelines or objectives are needed to enable an assessment to be made of possible harm to human health.

We know that the general public is concerned that conventional water treatment processes, which are designed primarily to control bacteriological contamination and to remove inorganic contaminants such as metals, may not adequately remove certain trace organic contaminants. This concern has been manifested by the purchase of home-use treatment devices. It is believed that in-home devices to treat municipal water supplies are used in about 3 to 10 per cent of Canadian homes.

Although many of these water treatment devices may be safe and useful, it must be noted that the quality and safety of these devices is not regulated by any government department, and that inaccurate advertising claims have been known to occur. It is apparent that some control over these devices is required, as has been expressed by consumer groups, provincial agencies and the public.

It is now known that some compounds, generated during the treatment of drinking water, may also present health hazards. One of the most widely used treatment chemicals is chlorine, which is used as a disinfectant. Chlorination can give rise to the formation of chloroform and other chlorinated by-products, many of which may be harmful under certain conditions.

A look at alternative disinfectants, though, suggests that the well-proven chlorination process should not be abandoned, since there is very limited knowledge about the alternatives. One example is ozone, which is becoming increasingly popular in Canada, particularly in Quebec. Ozonation reaction products are still relatively unknown, but they are being studied by scientists in the Department of National Health and Welfare. Another alternative is chlorine dioxide, which does not give rise to the undesirable by-products formed during the chlorination process. A major disadvantage, though, is the production of chlorate and chlorite, which may be of health significance when ingested regularly at high concentrations.

Some chemicals may enter our drinking water indirectly, as a result of the use of certain pipes, paints, coatings or other lining materials in water storage and distribution systems. Here, chemicals may be released in small amounts as the material ages, or contaminants of the original material may be released. Examples include asbestos from lined pipes and vinyl chloride monomer released from polyvinyl chloride pipes. Any new legislation should address the problems of lack of mechanisms to evaluate and regulate drinking water contaminants arising from both direct and indirect means. Bill C-221 does not mention them.

The bill before us today does not adequately address these issues. Nevertheless, this government is committed to introducing legislation on drinking water. The Minister of National Health and Welfare intends to introduce a Drinking Water Safety Act for all Canadians.

Guidelines for drinking water quality, including microbiological, physical, chemical and radiological characteristics, would continue to be established in a similar fashion to the present. For reasons outlined previously, these guidelines will not be mandatory Canadian standards, unless made so by the provinces, as is the case at present. The present system for establishing guidelines has worked well for the past 20 years, thanks to the continuing high degree of co-operation demonstrated by all the provinces and the territories. Thus, there would be no change in legislative status, but current practice would be given legislative authority.

Consideration is also being given to regulating devices sold for home water treatment. At present, there are no control requirements or performance standards to ensure both efficacy for the purposes claimed and the protection of human health.

A review of the current and emerging issues—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry but I must interrupt the hon. member.

The hour provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), this item is dropped from the Order Paper.

It being two o'clock, the House will now proceed to Statements by Members pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, we as a nation can thank the Prime Minister for the constitutional mess we find ourselves in today. It is he who got us into the situation.

On the supremacy of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, we are to rely on a letter that has no legal value. In the definition of Canada, the aboriginal people are still left out, as are several million Canadians whose ancestry is other than English or French.

The promotion of the official languages, of great importance to linguistic minorities, is also relegated to some future date. The spending powers of the federal government are subject to the whim of the provinces. On the Senate, one province could become the power broker in future negotiations. What a strange way to practise equality.

Despite his promise of national reconciliation, under this Prime Minister Canada is more divided than ever, but that is what you get when you lock 11 in a dark room for six days. A constitution should be developed in daylight, not in darkness.

Will the Prime Minister ever learn that secrecy is not the road to nation building?

HOUSING

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, Canadians owe a great deal to the seniors of this country. The Government of Alberta and the Government of Canada have recognized the social debt and invested in residences, both apartments and lodges, to provide accommodation with varying levels of service for our seniors.

Last month, the minister of housing paid tribute to the Lion's Club in Edmonton for initiating the first seniors' residence accommodation in Alberta. The Lion's Club deserves to be praised, but we believe recognition for the first seniors' lodge in Alberta, possibly in Canada, belongs to the Kiwanis Club in Red Deer.

Working with the seniors in co-operation with the city and county of Red Deer, the Kiwanis Club started with financing approved by CMHC in 1953. A commercial housing project was opened in 1954 and the first lodge facility in 1955. The Kiwanis foundation remains active with support from numerous other groups and individuals.

Next year we will celebrate the thirty-fifth anniversary of the opening of the Piper Creek Lodge, which we believe to be the first senior citizens' lodge in Canada.

NATIONAL ACCESS AWARENESS WEEK

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, this week is National Access Awareness Week, a week dedicated to disabled Canadians, a week where communities in Canada are invited to celebrate the accomplishments of disabled persons. This is also a week for assessing the availability of services and facilities for disabled persons and planning improvements for the future.

Mr. Speaker, you are to be congratulated for your consistent support and leadership in making the House of Commons truly accessible to the disabled. Because this week is a time to reflect and plan to improve accessibility for the disabled, I would ask all hon. members to give serious thought to accessibility in their constituencies. Are their offices accessible?

I would urge all members to join some of my New Democrat colleagues and I and take advantage of the service provided by the Secretary of State to have business cards done in Braille.

Celebration of the accomplishments of the disabled is important, but we ought not join the celebration until our own job is done.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, Saturday, June 9, 1990 was an important day for Canada. For the first time, Quebec was no longer isolated at the constitutional table.

In today's La Presse, Alain Dubuc wrote in his editorial under the heading "Quebec holds its ground": "The past week reminded us that Prime Minister Mulroney is one of Quebec's allies. Lévesque trusted him in 1984. Six years later, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Mulroney has delivered the goods. Throughout this past week, his attitude was impressive. Mr. Mulroney was a true statesman whose confidence and authority inspired his provincial counterparts to do the impossible".

Mr. Speaker, Canadians today admire the perseverance of the Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Hon. Brian Mulroney.

NATIONAL ACCESS AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity today to recognize that Canada is celebrating National Access Awareness Week. While we acknowledge a record of achievement for and by disabled persons, we are nonetheless mindful that there are many initiatives yet to be taken.

It is my hope that by focusing on the economic integration of disabled persons, we shall remove barriers which are preventing complete participation by these Canadians in every facet of our society.

Priorities and initiatives such as those announced recently by the Minister of Transport with respect to transportation are welcomed as evidence of our growing awareness that people with disabilities have been denied access to full participation.

The time has come for the Government of Canada to join in partnership with people with disabilities, the private sector, the voluntary sector, organized labour, and us as members of Parliament to inspire new initiatives aimed at economic integration. Our task will not be complete until every week reflects the initiatives highlighted through National Access Awareness Week.

MINERS' MEMORIAL DAY

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, today, June 11, is Miners' Memorial Day in Cape Breton. This day holds a special place in the hearts of Cape Bretoners as it commemorates the work of coal miners.

The life of a coal miner has changed through the years, but the danger of working underground continues to be a haunting element of that industry.

Today is a day when we recognize the hard work of our miners and remember those who have sacrificed their lives for that industry. Today is an emotional day for many. For some it brings back a sense of pride, and for others it brings back a sense of fear and sadness.

The coal industry has taken many of our miners. Today we reflect with respect, admiration, and a sense of loss upon those men who have died in our mines.

Today we also remember the families of our coal miners: the mothers, the wives, and the children who waited on the surface only to hear their worst fears come true.

On behalf of my constituents in Cape Breton—East Richmond, I salute our Cape Breton miners for their contribution not only to the economy of Cape Breton but also to our culture, our history, and sense of pride on our great island.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, I rise in the House today to ask all Quebecers and all Canadians to do just a little more to make our country's future secure.

I wish each and everyone of us would take five minutes to read in full the agreement concluded on the weekend by our first ministers.

Canadians would then realize that the Meech Lake Accord makes everyone a winner.

It is time to stop this constitutional bickering which makes us forget what is really important for our future.

The Meech Lake Accord is not perfect. No constitutional document in the world has ever claimed to be perfect.

We also realize that however honest and sincere our attempts may be, we will never be able to please the Jacques Parizeau's, the Robert Libmans, the leaders of APEC and all those who, while not sharing the same ideology, are intent on defending their own selfish interests, unlike the majority of Quebecers and Canadians to whom this country still is, and always will be, the most wonderful country in the world.

NATIONAL ACCESS AWARENESS WEEK

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, June 10 to June 20 has been designated as National Access Awareness Week in Prince Edward Island and across the country.

This week is dedicated to creating a greater awareness of the needs of people with disabilities.

Islanders have been active in their commitment for equal access for persons with disabilities by improving designated parking spaces, wheelchair ramps, elevator lifts, and slanted sidewalks.

Islanders began National Access Awareness Week on Saturday with a kick-off party and open house. Other events include the employment "buddy" events, a sports night, as well as a host of other activities.

In order to create greater access and independence for persons with disabilities, we must work at all levels, especially the community level, to make our country the best place to live.

Together, we must ensure the needs of persons with disabilities continue to receive greater access.

TRANSPORT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, as a result of the free trade agreement and deregulation, the Canadian trucking industry is now moving toward a crisis situation with increasing numbers of truckers facing bankruptcy proceedings.

• (1410)

Competition has become so intense that the rates received by the truckers are insufficient to enable them to provide for their families and at the same time pay for and maintain their vehicles properly. The result is reflected in a spot inspection test done recently in Kamloops, British Columbia on the Trans-Canada Highway, which found one in five trucks unfit to operate, and almost half the trucks checked were failed for various safety violations. Only 30 per cent actually passed inspection.

National safety standards are necessary across the country and they must be enforced. Minimal hauling rates must be established. Proper use of log books must be introduced, and operating authorities must be limited.

In other words a public review of the industry is now necessary, which would lead to re-regulation of the industry. The Minister of Transport should act expeditiously to ensure our trucking industry remains viable and that our highways remain safe.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, Canadians have been caught up in the Meech Lake drama for days, but if this government thinks for a moment that Canadians have forgotten about the goods and services tax, this government can think again. Canadians are still very upset about this unfair tax.

Last week I received a letter from a constituent of mine who is a hotel owner deeply concerned about the GST. The letter said that the proposed goods and services tax "may be the final straw in an already declining industry". The letter went on to say:

> I will also be circulating this information to my employees to let them know that their jobs may be at risk.

I urge the finance minister to come to his senses and cancel this regressive and unfair tax before it kills thousands of jobs and drives the economy into a recession.

SOUND OF THE FUTURE

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, Canada is on the communication frontier once again. I was happy to join the Canadian Association of Broadcasters, the CBC, and the Department of Communications this morning in launching for the first time in North America the Sound of the Future, an historic, digital radio demonstration project in Ottawa.

Digital radio breaks new ground. It will eventually replace the AM-FM band. It will make interference-free, compact disc quality sound available on radio stations from coast to coast whether in the home, the car or on your portable radio. I can tell all members that the clarity, brilliance and range of the signal I heard this morning were truly magnificent. I could picture young and old alike enjoying everything from country to classical wherever they were through the wonders of digital radio.

In reaching out to bring the future to Canada, this digital radio experiment also proves Canada can remain at the forefront of global change in the communications area. Now the federal government must do its part by convincing governments around the world in 1992 to make room on the spectrum for this new technology. Then Canada can capitalize on the excitement this Canadian project has generated around the world and bring all Canadians the Sound of the Future.

THE ECONOMY

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, this government's economic policies are systematically destroying the manufacturing base of our economy. In the past year alone, 165,000 people in manufacturing have lost their jobs. In my own province of British Columbia, 20,000 manufacturing jobs have been eliminated this year. Who is to blame?

The Minister of State for Privatization told this House last week that workers who have lost their jobs have only themselves to blame. Workers find this hard to believe, as they have seen their real wages decline by 3.5 per cent since 1984, while executives and senior bureaucrats have had increases of 20 per cent to 30 per cent. Small businesses, which are being driven into bankruptcy by high interest rates and an overvalued Canadian dollar, would also dispute the minister's claims.

Businesses are folding, and good, solid jobs are being permanently lost while this government blames the workers and trumpets the creation of "McJobs" with "McWages".

When will this government listen to the people of Canada and work to save our economy instead of blame the taxpayers for all our problems?

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, I want to congratulate the first ministers for their tremendous accomplishment in signing the agreement on the Meech Lake Accord on Saturday, June 9. Support for the Meech Lake agreement is now absolutely unique.

For the first time in history, out of 10 premiers, 13 have now endorsed this agreement, and 13 out of 10 is good at any time.

For the first time in history, the first ministers representing four parties, including Social Credit, Liberal, NDP, and Conservative, have endorsed the constitutional agreement.

For the first time, as far as I know, some premiers invited opposition leaders to attend the conference and play an active role in the results.

For the first time in history, the Prime Minister has signed this agreement not once but twice, not to mention that in this House of Commons we have unanimously had an all-party support for the Meech Lake Accord.

Never in our history has an agreement received such absolute, resounding support by the political leaders of this country representing every party in every corner of the country. I say let us move on now with optimism and enthusiasm and address the many challenges and issues facing us in the future.

On a quick personal note, I just want to say I was there for 16 hours yesterday—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Gabriel Desjardins (Témiscamingue): Mr. Speaker, today I wish to pay tribute to the ten provincial Premiers and the Prime Minister of Canada for their efforts and determination which, on June 9, lead to the ratification of the 1990 Constitutional Agreement, by which first of all, Quebec will now again become a member of the Canadian family.

Technically, to be legal the accord must first be ratified by the legislatures of New Brunswick, Manitoba and Newfoundland. New Brunswick and Manitoba have made it quite clear that they intend to have this accord adopted as soon as possible. The Premier of Newfoundland has just announced his decision to put the Accord to a free vote in his legislature, before June 23.

The Premier of Newfoundland has shown great leadership by honouring the signature he put on the constitutional document on the evening of June 9.

Mr. Speaker, I am convinced that the vast majority of the members of the Newfoundland legislature, like all other legislatures have done, will say yes to Quebec, because they believe in the strength and energy of a united Canada.

CONSERVATIVE PARTY

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River) Mr. Speaker, today is the seventh anniversary of the election of Brian Mulroney as the leader of the Conservative Party.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Cooper: On behalf of our caucus, I would like to say that we appreciate his leadership over the last seven years, his vision and, as was demonstrated over this last week, his patience and love for our country.

Seven is a lucky number. We want to wish our leader and the Prime Minister another seven years in his role as leader of our party and of the country.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. The process by which the Prime Minister and his provincial counterparts met behind closed doors on the weekend to resolve the constitutional impasse was termed unsatisfactory, faulty and imperfect, by the Premiers themselves and the Canadian public. Canadians are convinced that you do not build a country by twisting the arms of reluctant premiers. Under the Accord negotiated on the weekend, the first ministers made a commitment to review the process and include compulsory public hearings. I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister or the Acting Prime Minister, whoever is going to reply, what kind of mechanism will be set up to review this process and when the review demanded by Canadians will get into gear.

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as hon. members are aware, the final decision was signed by Canada's first ministers early Sunday morning. Today is Monday. Prior to the process we want to implement, there will of course be consultation among representatives of the parties here in the House on the most effective ways to give substance to the agreement signed by the Prime Minister of Canada and the provincial premiers.

[English]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, a commission with equal representation from each of the provinces and appropriate representation from the federal and territorial governments will study Senate reform and will report before the end of this year.

Will Parliament be asked to approve, by resolution, the federal participation in this commission? Will members of Parliament be included? Will the process include public hearings across the country? When will the process begin?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the next step is to have three legislatures ratify the agreement that was signed deliberately by the 11 heads of government late on Saturday night with their reasons stated that night and early on Sunday morning. That is the next step.

There are a range of details to be worked out. Certainly, it is the intention of this government to work out the details that relate to the House of Commons in close consultation with other parties in the House of Commons.

• (1420)

It is our expectation that there would be a general desire to have the commission to which the hon. member refers begin work early.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, the proposed Senate changes would reallocate 10 seats; six from Ontario, two from New Brunswick and two from Nova Scotia.

Since this proposed amendment will have great impact on the representation of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia in Parliament, can the Acting Prime Minister tell us if this proposed redistribution of Senate seats becomes the floor representation in the House of Commons? In other words, will New Brunswick and Nova Scotia eventually lose House of Commons seats to accommodate this amendment?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I think the hon. member knows, the proposal to which he refers, which would have the result of a reduction in the Senate representation by Ontario, New Brunswick and Nova Scotia would come only if we were unable, through a process that was agreed by first ministers, to find a basis for a more thorough Senate reform.

I think there is a general understanding and disposition in the House that there needs to be a very serious pursuit by this House and by other Canadians of the goal of Senate reform that was agreed to by all the first ministers in their conference last week.

Certainly, I and the government anticipate that that pursuit will lead to an effective Senate reform. If it does not, there is a procedure set out that would take effect not before 1995. There will be ample time to consult the Acting Leader of the Opposition and his colleagues on that matter.

PUBLIC SECTOR SALARIES

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board and concerns the juicy pay increases and bonuses given to Deputy Ministers and heads of Crown corporations. This will result in $40,000 to $100,000 a year salary increases.

I want to ask the President of the Treasury Board why he told the House on May 11 that the salaries were limited to a 4 per cent increase in 1988 and 4.2 per cent in 1989? Will he now do the right thing and roll back these obscene $100,000 a year increases?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague asked why I said to the House that the increases for the senior management category for 1988–89 were 4 per cent, and for 1989–90 were 4.2 per cent.

The reason is simple. It is the truth.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, if someone's pay increase was $100,000 a year, imagine the basis it had to be to start with in order to create the 4 per cent.

I have a supplementary for the same minister concerning unethical increases granted certain officials.

I have here a Treasury Board document dated September 1989 indicating ministers' executive assistants received a 17.5 per cent increase over 20 months, while Canadian workers had to make do with 4.2 per cent per year.

Could the minister explain why it is caviar for Tory pals and stale bread for the rest?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member would do well to check his facts before asking questions based on hearsay.

The budget for ministers' exempt staff has hardly gone up this year. As I said earlier, the budget for senior managers in the Public Service has increased at the same rate as that for all government employees, including senior officials. I feel I have to mention this because the article on which the hon. member based his claims contains a serious mistake where it says that bonuses are not included in the 4.2 per cent.

I can inform the hon. member that they are included. The 4.2 per cent includes benefits, salaries and bonuses. The wage bill for this group of employees has increased 4.2 per cent, as has the wage bill for unionized employees in the Public Service.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue.

It was reported this weekend that the former owner of Route Canada withheld employee pension and income tax contributions in order to pay bills to other companies including, I might add, a noted Tory advertising agency.

In the same report, it is alleged that the owner, Manfred Ruhland, was given written authorization from Revenue Canada to not pay $5.4 million in employee tax benefits.

Did Revenue Canada write this letter as claimed, and if so, why? Would it not be an admission on the part of the government that it knew its privatization deal had gone rotten?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, obviously when I read those reports I immediately checked into it. We could find no record of any letter sent by Revenue Canada to Route Canada. We subsequently contacted the solicitors for Route Canada who confirmed to us this morning that, in fact, it was an erroneous statement made by Mr. Ruhland since the solicitors for Route Canada confirmed very categorically that no such letter was sent.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I hear someone say I should not believe everything I read in the paper. I did not. I asked the minister if it was true and he told me otherwise. We will see, over the next few days, what other things might come to light about this particular deal.

I want to ask the Minister of Transport, or whoever is answering for him, about the possibility of tabling the sale agreement between CN and Mr. Ruhland. The minister indicated in the House last Friday that he would be willing to table a letter written by CN explaining the deal. I checked with the Table this morning and that letter had not been tabled.

I ask the government, when it gets around to tabling the letter the minister promised to table, to also table the purchase and sale agreement for Route Canada so we can see just what commitments were sought by CN, what promises were made and by whom with respect to promises of job security that were given to workers and subsequently broken?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind my honourable colleague that the Minister of Transport reported in the House last week that a letter had been sent to The Toronto Star by the vice-president of CN on June 7. It states specifically in paragraph three:

> CN, and no one else, decided to sell its subsidiary after discussions with more than 30 companies, beginning in 1985. Our negotiations on the sale were held directly with David Fingold, representing himself and his brother Paul as principal purchasers. Their financial credentials were very solid.

This indicates that the sale was decided by CN, and CN alone.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, is the government saying, and perhaps someone could say this very clearly on behalf of the government, that neither the former Minister of Transport nor any other government official was involved in any way in the negotiations between CN and the buyers prior to the sale of CN Route? Is anyone on the government side willing to stand up and categorically state that the government had nothing to do at any stage with this particular fiasco?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I will repeat again what my colleague, the Minister of Transport, has said repeatedly, and no matter how many times the question is asked, the answer is the same; the sale was negotiated by CN officials alone, alone, a-l-o-n-e.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Transport, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister.

New information about the mismanagement of Route Canada by David and Paul Fingold and Manfred Ruhland continue to come forward almost on a daily basis. We find out now that over $21 million was owed to employee benefit plans alone.

• (1430)

The question is fairly simple. Does the government not feel a moral, if not legal, obligation to come forward and look after the workers and their families who were seriously affected by this disastrous deal?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, we have in the past looked after the workers. In fact, some of the statements and figures that have come out in this case are quite erroneous.

In specific answer to the hon. member's specific question, if employees can show that the deductions were made from pay cheques we will, of course, recognize those deductions and give appropriate credits. That has not been the case in the past.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister. Included in that $21 million I just mentioned was $3.5 million in direct pension benefits, $3.7 million in workers' compensation payments owed to several provinces, and $3.9 million in income tax deducted at source.

The Fingolds and Ruhland ripped off eight unions, eight provinces, and Revenue Canada, but more important, they ripped off 1,900 workers and their immediate families. The amount owing the workers and their families is peanuts compared to the over-all picture of what has transpired in the sale of CN Route.

I ask the government once again, will it stop hiding behind this charade of a sale, show some compassion and caring and compensate the families and the workers affected by this terrible disaster?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out to my hon. friend that when Labour Canada learned that CN Route was going to close its operations in September, 1988, we immediately proceeded to audit the company's records under Part III of the code.

I am happy to report that we were instrumental in ensuring that employees received their wages owed up to the time of closing and vacation entitlements of $1.6 million.

We also instituted, under the Canada Labour Code, charges against the employer for failure to comply with the group termination provisions of the code and the company was eventually fined by the courts $10,000 on each of seven counts. After that the company went into bankruptcy and therefore this has become a procedure under the Bankruptcy Act to pay back the creditors.

PUBLIC SECTOR SALARIES

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the President of the Treasury Board. In an answer he gave earlier this afternoon, he indicated that somehow a bonus is not a bonus. It seems to me if it looks like a pay increase, acts like a pay increase and, above all, spends like a pay increase, it is an increase.

The government has managed to increase the salary range for its highest paid employees by 31 per cent in the last three years while keeping the majority of its employees well below the rate of inflation, below 12 per cent, over the same period of time. Why is the minister being so outrageously generous with the best paid public servants in the land and so miserly with the rest?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I gave the numbers a few days ago and I will give the numbers again. For the senior management category in the Public Service the increase in total compensation, including bonuses, benefits, and salary, was 4 per cent in 1988–89 and 4.2 per cent in 1989–90. That is well in keeping with the pay increases that have been negotiated through collective bargaining for the rest of the Public Service.

Those, Mr. Speaker, are the real numbers.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, the President of the Treasury Board can ignore the real figures if he wants to. However, when the government is telling public servants and all Canadian workers they have to tighten their belts to make up for its mismanagement, how can he have a different message entirely for those who are the best paid and the least affected by the negative financial policies of the government?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I guess there is some advantage to having written notice of questions. I have said quite clearly in the House on numerous occasions now that the treatment afforded the senior management category—

Mr. Harvard: Just tell the truth.

Mr. de Cotret: Mr. Speaker, this is the truth. These are the numbers. The treatment given in terms of compensation for the senior management group in the federal Public Service is roughly the same as or very close to the treatment that was negotiated through the collective bargaining process.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): My question is with regard to the same issue, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of Finance said the other day: "I don't believe labour should ask for more". That was in terms of compensation. He said: "The government will set an example for the private sector".

We were reminded some time ago that the Governor of the Bank of Canada and his staff gave themselves what can only be described as obscene increases as a result of being the major inflation fighter for the country. Then we find out that the heads of our 13 largest Crown corporations received between 15 per cent and 25 per cent pay increases.

Now we find that, to quote the President of the Treasury Board, "certain senior public servants received bonuses far beyond 4 per cent in terms of salary increases". That is selected senior public servants.

What signal does the Minister of Finance plan to send? Certain senior public servants are receiving huge increases, up to 30 per cent over three years. The Bank of Canada staff is given huge increases. The heads of our major Crown corporations are receiving increases of 30 per cent over two years.

What kind of a signal was the Minister of Finance referring to with these incredible salary and bonus increases?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, I think it is useful to remind my hon. colleague that the management compensation package that is offered in the federal Public Service as well as in the Crown corporations is based on recommendations from a private sector commission that was appointed by the former government.

That commission had as its mandate to study the responsibilities and the functions of senior public servants and heads of Crown corporations and to compare those to the private sector to make sure that we could have a compensation package that was responsible in the total environment of the economy.

Increases are kept within an over-all range that corresponds to what is done in terms of collective bargaining. Some may get more, some will not. But we have to make sure that we retain our managers, that we retain the heads of our Crown corporations, and that the compensation package is fair and equitable throughout the system.

MANUFACTURING SECTOR

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance. We found out on the weekend that Statistics Canada revealed that 165,000 jobs in the manufacturing sector were lost last year. The minister responsible for privatization said over the weekend that this was the result of greedy and lazy workers.

Does the Minister of Finance support those incredible comments by the minister responsible for privatization, or will he admit that the 165,000 jobs lost is more a reflection of his high interest rate policy and the free trade deal?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I would like it very much if the hon. member would table in the House where he got those words that he attributed to the Minister of State for Privatization. My understanding is that those words were never stated by the minister. They were some interpretation, if anything, by a journalist.

The very point we have been making as a government is that the cost structure of the economy has to be maintained intact or our ability to create jobs will be undermined.

In 1989 the unit labour costs of business in Canada started at an increase of 4.9 per cent. They ended the year increasing at 6.9 per cent. Throughout that same period of time in the United States they were level at about 4.9 per cent and they are a good deal lower in Japan and Germany.

If we lose our competitive position, we will lose business. If we lose business, we will lose jobs. It is for that precise reason that we have been taking the position that we have as a government to encourage business, labour, consumers, and all Canadians to do everything they can to maintain that competitive position.

TRADE

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for whoever is answering for the Minister for International Trade.

The unjustifiable 15 per cent export tax on softwood lumber and an artificially inflated Canadian dollar propped up by high interest rates has taken 30 per cent off the top of the income of the lumber manufacturers and has caused massive job losses.

When is the minister going to negotiate his way out of the 15 per cent tax on softwood lumber? When will he talk to his Minister of Finance in order to bring some sanity back into the interest rate policy of the government in order to give the Canadian lumber industry a fighting chance to survive?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, as I think the hon. member knows from answers in the House, the government has put the United States on notice that we intend to return to discussion of the memorandum of understanding on softwood lumber. My colleague, the Minister for International Trade, as recently as the middle of May—I think May 18—in Toronto raised this issue again with American officials.

Naturally there have to be discussions with the industry and with the provinces in order to ensure that the Canadian side is in a position to negotiate effectively the issues raised by the memorandum of understanding. Those negotiations are being pursued.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, the town of Renfrew has lost more than 1,400 industrial jobs in recent times, some of which can be directly related to free trade and others due to that famous term "industrial rationalization". It is a disastrous situation.

When is the government going to bring out its free trade adjustment programs which it promised to assist communities in Canada that are going through these horrendous economic problems with sordid times for many homes?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position today, as the acting minister, to give a precise answer to that precise question. I will inquire as to the government's timetable and will advise the hon. member.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, we see today the joint statement by the Presidents of Mexico and the United States initiating trade discussions between those two countries leading, as they say, to a new comprehensive trade agreement.

We understand that such negotiations will have substantial and major impact upon Canada and the trade agreement that we have with the United States.

In light of this announcement today, can the Secretary of State for External Affairs tell us what the government response is to the statement? Is the government prepared to share with the House and the public studies and analyses to show what impact it will have upon Canada so Canadians will have some understanding of the significance of this announcement today?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the question from my friend with respect to the possibility of some arrangement being reached between the United States and Mexico. He will know that there were questions raised in the House on the basis of incomplete information at an earlier time. Those questions might have had the effect of alarming Canadians about a sudden rush to an agreement, either between the Americans and the Mexicans or an agreement that might have implications for Canada.

What was agreed, as he would know from reading the communiqué from the President of Mexico and the President of the United States, is simply that they have directed two of their representatives, Carla Hills and Dr. Serra Puche, to undertake consultations and preparatory work which will allow the two presidents, when they meet in December, to consider whether they want to proceed.

As to Canada's position, we are keeping in very close touch on a bilateral basis, with Mexico on the one hand and with the United States on the other hand, to see what impact there might be upon Canada's interest.

An Hon. Member: How close is close?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I am asked how close is close. We have had very close consultations with the governments of both countries so that we will be in a position to judge whether the Canadian interest is affected.

The member asks me if there will be an opportunity for consultation with the House. My colleague, the Minister for International Trade, is scheduled to appear before the standing committee later this month. He looks forward to the opportunity to discuss with the hon. member and other members of the committee the questions that are raised by this agreement between the Americans and the Mexicans.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): On a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker, I want to clarify. I did not ask about consultation, I asked about direct public participation and open hearings in Parliament.

In view of the fact that this process will now be of a preliminary nature until December, can we get a commitment from the government today, first, that it will make public all its own studies and impact analyses that have taken place thus far and, second, that no decision of any kind will be taken by this government to involve Canada in any discussion or negotiation until there is an opportunity for this Parliament to hold open public hearings and to make a decision on what that participation should be?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Mexicans and the Americans have decided to discuss whether they would enter into an agreement. That is where things are. The member is asking me if I have an impact study of their intention to discuss. Of course I do not, but if the hon. member is seriously interested in ensuring that there is a broadly based discussion in Canada as to the implications to Canada of any agreement that might be entered into between the Mexicans and the Americans, of course we agree with that.

I just said to him that my colleague, the Minister for International Trade, will be appearing before the standing committee in the normal course in the next couple weeks. He would look forward to discussing this matter with the hon. member and with others. We would welcome views expressed by affected industries, by provinces and by interested Canadians. We want any decisions that Canada takes to be based upon full information and informed public opinion and not to be based upon the kinds of fears that some members of the House were seeking to raise not very many weeks ago.

LABOUR

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister. General Motors has demanded of the workers in Windsor that they substitute Memorial Day for Victoria Day, American Thanksgiving for Canadian Thanksgiving, and Independence Day for Canada Day. This is a condition to keep their jobs.

Some Hon. Members: Get serious.

Mr. McCurdy: It is serious, it's bloody serious.

Will the Acting Prime Minister send a letter to the president of General Motors with a calendar showing Canadian holidays and a map indicating the territorial limits of our country and tell them that as a condition of doing business in Canada they obey Canadian laws and respect Canadian traditions?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I do not contest the information put on the record of the House by the hon. member. I have not had the opportunity to see it myself. Certainly it seems to me that a proposal of that kind is pretty unreasonable. That would be the view which the Government of Canada, were it in our jurisdiction, would express.

I would certainly hope that persons with whom the hon. member may have influence, Bob White among others, might also be encouraged to stand up for Canada on this issue.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, the Acting Prime Minister will know that I think it is outrageous for him to suggest that Bob White be more Canadian after they sold the country out with a free trade deal that gives American companies the opportunity to try to impose on Canadian workers American holidays. Maybe next we will have to swear allegiance to the American flag.

Will the Acting Prime Minister serve notice that this is not an appropriate kind of harmonization under the free trade agreement and that the cost of doing business in Canada for any American-owned company is to obey Canadian law and respect Canadian traditions?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is doing violence to his reputation for sobriety and calm, rational argument in the House.

But he raises an issue that is, of course, important, and that has to do with the extraterritorial application of foreign law, American or any other, in this country. That is the principle that this government very vigorously opposes. We have done that in a number of cases, most recently, as the hon. member will know, with respect to attempts made by certain congressmen of the United States to take actions with regard to Cuba that would have an implication upon Canada.

That principle with respect to extraterritorial reality is of great importance to this government. We have defended it vigorously in the past and we will in the future.

He is raising another kind of issue. I have noted it and I have expressed my opinion, not my acting opinion but my opinion as Acting Prime Minister on the issue, and I will consider whether it would be useful to make a more formal communication to the parties involved.

TRADE

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I should like to get back to the question raised earlier by my colleague concerning the agreement between the United States and Mexico. I direct my question to the Acting Prime Minister.

Canadians remember that the Prime Minister saddled the country with a comprehensive trade agreement with the United States after campaigning against the idea in 1984. This badly negotiated agreement gave rise to a very emotional debate in Canada, and now we learn that one of the results of this agreement was the loss of 172,000 jobs in the manufacturing sector. Will the Acting Prime Minister assure the House that Canadians will indeed be consulted before we enter into similar negotiations with the United States and Mexico?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): First, there are no negotiations involving Canada, Mexico and the United States. In fact, there are no negotiations between the Americans and the Mexicans. The presidents of both countries have agreed to consider whether such negotiations ought to be undertaken. Earlier today I told the House that the Canadian government is keeping in close touch with Mexico and the United States to determine whether this might have an impact on Canada. If so, and under the circumstances, Canada will have to make a decision. I said that my colleague the Minister for International Trade intends to meet with standing committee members to discuss this issue. I believe I gave clear answers to the questions raised by the hon. member.

[English]

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, we know there has not been an agreement. We are just putting the government on notice that the Canadian people want to be consulted fully before any major decision is taken on this matter of vital Canadian interest. That is the only point of this question. That is why we are asking the question now before the government determines its position without consulting Canadians as has been the case in the past.

So I re-ask the question: what form of participation does the Acting Prime Minister have in mind for consulting Canadians on this question?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, let us look at the record of consultations on trade negotiations of Liberal governments and Progressive Conservative governments.

When this country entered the General Agreement on Tariffs and Trade in the 1940s under a Liberal government, the matter was not brought to Parliament, it was not brought to the public, it was decided by the government as executive order ignoring the provinces, ignoring Parliament and ignoring the public. When the free trade agreement was introduced, as this country and the House know, there were the most extensive possible negotiations.

We do not know if there will be negotiations between the United States and Mexico or whether Canada's interest will be affected. But if Canada's interests are to be affected, those will be discussed by this government with the people of Canada in the consultative tradition of the Progressive Conservative Party and not in the secretive tradition of the Liberal Party.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

FISHERIES

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. As part of his response to the inshore draggers' 1990 quota allocation proposal the minister has brought in 130 millimetre square mesh for the inshore draggers on Georges Bank.

If the minister accepts that the large mesh size is a better conservation measure, why then is it not mandatory for the large offshore boats which are also fishing on Georges Bank and which are catching hundreds of thousands of pounds per trip?

[Translation]

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, there is no suggestion from the Department of Fisheries and Oceans to take any action whose sole purpose would be to hurt our inshore fishermen on the Atlantic coast.

[English]

This suggestion that we will try to impose measures that will cause harm or trouble to the inshore fishery and leave the offshore to rape the resources and do whatever they want, is completely—

—I dare not use the word—

[English]

But we will not do that of course. I can assure the hon. member that we will be trying to work out the implementation of these conservation measures with both sectors of the fishery in Atlantic Canada, the inshore and the offshore.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I will repeat my question because I think the minister misunderstood.

At present the inshore fleet is using 130 millimetre square mesh brought in for this fishery by the minister for those boats under 65 feet which are allowed to fish there at certain times. The offshore, which can catch up to 400,000 pounds of fish a trip, is fishing at the same time, side by side, and it does not have the same 130 millimetre square mesh. In fact, it has diamond mesh which is very destructive.

I agree with the minister that we need conservation. But I do not see the reasoning for the small boat enforcing conservation while the large boat is not. I do not see how it is reasonable for one fleet, which is catching hundreds of thousands of pounds per trip, to be without it. I do not see how you can explain that to the people. If there is a reason for it I would like to hear it from the minister.

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, I could play with the issue and ask the hon. member why, when they restructured the offshore back in 1982 and 1983, these measures which she now advocates against the offshore sector to protect the inshore were not taken. However, I know this would not add much to the debate.

The important thing is that we have to take measures to conserve our resources in the Atlantic Ocean. From my conversations with both the inshore and the offshore sectors we have determined to work together to implement measures to do that.

The hon. member suggests that within a matter of days or weeks we can turn around a whole way of harvesting fish. She knows that that is not possible. There has to be consultation and this is what we are doing with the fishermen. If we were not doing that, she would criticize me for not doing it.

TRADE

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, who suggested that somehow there is something hypothetical about these Mexican-United States talks, that they are talks to talk about whether to talk or not.

I want to quote from the communiqué which comes from the Embassy of Mexico which says: "The two Presidents have determined that a comprehensive free trade agreement is the best vehicle to achieve their ambitious objectives and, therefore, agree to move toward that end".

Does the Secretary of State for External Affairs not recognize, with this kind of commitment on the part of the two senior political leaders from these two countries, that it is time for Canada to get its act together and start taking a position? Will the minister tell the House what is the position of this country with respect to these talks?

• (1500)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, for the third time, I hope that I am neither hypothetical nor hysterical in the House.

There has been an agreement by the Presidents of two other countries in this hemisphere to pursue the possibilities of a trade agreement. The hon. member read with remarkable clarity the communique jointly issued by the Presidents of Mexico and of the United States.

The position of Canada is to determine what impact, if any, those negotiations, if they occur, may have upon Canada's interests. If there is an impact upon Canada, we will then determine what course it is best to follow.

I was asked three questioners ago whether or not the government would be prepared to consult with parliamentarians as to how we might proceed. I have answered that my colleague, the Minister for International Trade, will be before the standing committee in the next couple of weeks. I hope the hon. member is there and I hope by that time he has a new question.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Essex–Windsor, a short supplemental.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I hope by that time the Secretary of State for External Affairs has actually read what has come from the Embassy of Mexico and from the President of the United States.

I ask the minister if, as in the case of the free trade negotiations with the United States, he is prepared to see established in this Parliament a special committee to investigate the various ramifications of this negotiation which is already taking place, or is this government simply going to sit back until such time as General Motors starts to ask Canadian workers to take a holiday on September 15, Mexican Independence Day?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I really feel sorry for the poor hon.

member that he does not have a question of his own; he has to borrow the question from the member for Winnipeg South Centre, or he has to borrow a line from his colleague. I have answered his question.

If Canadian interests are affected in these discussions, then Canada will develop a policy designed to protect Canada's interests. There will be consultations with Parliament. Those consultations, as I have said three times now in the House, this is the fourth, will begin when my colleague, the Minister for International Trade, meets with the standing committee later this month.

If there are particular proposals as to means of discussion that the hon. member wants to put forward, then I hope that he would take the opportunity of that committee hearing or other opportunities in the House to make that kind of suggestion.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister, as was committed to by the Deputy Prime Minister last Friday, would like to come into the House and make a statement respecting the Meech Lake negotiations.

There has been a little bit of a delay. Normally that would be done under statements by ministers, but the Prime Minister will not be able to come until about four o'clock.

There have been discussions with the opposition and I think you will find unanimous agreement to revert to statements by ministers for the purpose of hearing from the Prime Minister and the opposition leaders at about four o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the proposition by the hon. government House leader. Is there agreement?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed and so ordered.

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I started to rise before you put the question. Is this going to be an ordinary ministerial statement with only the House leaders responding, or will there also be an opportunity for other members to make comments on such a matter?

Mr. Speaker: According to the proposal put forward by the hon. government House leader, he asked the House to agree that we would revert to statements by ministers at four o'clock and we would be then bound by the usual rule which is that the minister, in this case the right hon. the Prime Minister, would speak and there would be a response from each of the spokespersons of the Official Opposition and the New Democratic Party in exactly equal time. That is the rule and that is what the House has agreed to.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have received written notice from the hon. member for Hillsborough that he is unable to move his motion during Private Members' Hour on Tuesday, June 12, 1990.

[Translation]

The motion having been designated as votable, it is not possible to make an exchange in the order of precedence, pursuant to Standing Order 94. I order the Clerk to move this item to the bottom of the order of precedence.

NATIONAL HIGHWAYS ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Robert D. Nault (Kenora—Rainy River) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-313, An Act to establish a national highways system and a national highways authority.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Nault: Madam Speaker, it is my intention to introduce this bill for the specific reason of rectifying a flaw that we have in our national system. Under the present act, the National Transportation Act, there is no mention of the highways that we have to be called the national highways system of this country. I would like to make the explanation short, so that we can hopefully go on to debate this bill in the House. I hope all members will get involved in this debate, if it is accepted.

• (1510)

We are presently at a point where our roads are deteriorating quickly and the highway system is doing a disservice to the economic development of Canada.

It is hoped that by introducing this bill that the debate will enhance the process. It is also hoped that members will understand that without a national highway system, the national government cannot enhance regional development in all parts of the country. I am hoping, Madam Speaker, that you will allow us another opportunity to discuss this further, at which time it is my intention to explain in detail how important this is to Canada.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed an honour to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 on behalf of a large number of constituents from Kamloops, British Columbia, as well as other communities in western Canada, who are opposed to the goods and services tax being implemented by the government.

They point out a whole set of reasons why they oppose the tax. Basically, it will increase their cost of living which will result, presumably, in higher interest rates.

I am going to add a little section saying that they would like to call on the Liberal senators to kill the tax by voting against the bill.

To be fair, Madam Speaker, it does not say that in here, but I know that if they were here, they would want me to say that.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition which has been signed by hundreds of residents of my constituency of Burnaby—Kingsway. The petition includes the names of teachers, staff and students at Burnaby North Secondary School who are expressing their concern about the Minister of Finance's proposed goods and services tax as an unfair form of taxation because it forces small businesses to carry a disproportionate share of the tax burden.

The petitioners point out that the tax will prove an implementation nightmare for small businesses, that it does not address the concerns of small business with regard to the manufacturing sales tax, and they call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax, to consult with business, labour and consumer groups to reach a broad consensus on reform of the tax system before implementing alternatives to the manufacturers' sales tax.

Finally, they call upon Parliament to ensure that there is real reform of the tax system to provide a healthy climate for small business in Canada.

I present these signatures on behalf of the students and teachers of Burnaby North Secondary School. I congratulate them for their initiative in collecting the names for this petition.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, I once again rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 and present a petition which shows that people across Canada are against the goods and services tax.

In this particular case, people from the area in Ontario around Chesterville have signed the petition in great numbers, advising this government that they too, like the people in my province of British Columbia, are against the goods and services tax, and they want the government to implement a taxation system that is based on fairness to all Canadians, not just to the corporate and wealthy friends of the government.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to present a petition signed by hundreds of residents of the province of Newfoundland, a petition gathered by my hon. and gallant colleague from Bonavista—Trinity—Conception.

The petitioners, from communities such as Harbour Grace, Bryants Cove, Salvage, Bishop's Cove, Gooseberry Cove, and other communities in Newfoundland, oppose the government's proposal to introduce a goods and services tax. They feel that 31 tax increases in five disastrous Tory years are more than enough, and they call upon Parliament to reject this unfair and unjust tax.

PROTECTION OF LIFE FROM MOMENT OF CONCEPTION

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): The day before the vote on Bill C-43, Madam Speaker, I received a petition to be presented to the House of Commons urging Parliament to pass legislation to protect life from the moment of conception, legislation which would seek to save the lives of both mother and child at the same time.

The signatories wanted me to present the petition that very day, but unfortunately it had not been certified. So I am pleased today to present, on behalf of my constituents who claim the right to be heard in the House of Commons, this petition duly certified by the Clerk of the House.

WHARFS AND HARBOURS

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, I rise today under Standing Order 36 to present a petition signed by some of my constituents who are very concerned about the poor condition of wharfs and harbours in Prince Edward Island.

This petition states that the Government of Canada has not maintained its responsibilities to the maintenance of wharfs and harbours in Atlantic Canada and that many of the wharfs in Prince Edward Island are in a deplorable and unsafe state and require major repairs.

These petitioners call upon Parliament to evaluate the state of wharfs and harbours, proceed with the necessary maintenance and repair, and ensure the safety and future of the fishery of Prince Edward Island.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, it is my honour and duty to present two petitions pursuant to Standing Order 36, both from Saanich—Gulf Islands and both from the Mayne Island portion of that riding.

These petitions are expressing my constituents' outrage at the imposition of the goods and services tax and are calling upon Parliament to withdraw this bill, Parliament consisting not only of the House of Commons but also the Senate, I am sorry to say.

Until that revision of our Constitution is intact, I call upon Parliament, consisting of the House of Commons and the Senate, to withdraw the bill on behalf of my constituents.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES RESTRAINT ACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-69, an Act to amend certain statutes to enable restraint of government expenditures, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to Bill C-69. First of all, however, I would like to congratulate the Prime Minister of Canada on his concluding, for the second time, an agreement that is historic both for Quebec and the rest of the country. I also would like to emphasize the work done by the ten Premiers, and I think that is appropriate considering the subject of Bill C-69 which deals with transfers to the provinces.

Madam Speaker, Bill C-69 has various objectives and follows announcements by the Minister of Finance and the President of the Treasury Board, with respect to cutbacks in government spending. There will be cuts totalling $3 billion in 1990-91, and $3.8 billion in 1991-92, all of which will cut directly into government spending. This means we have a projected deficit of $28.5 billion for 1990-91 and $26.8 billion for 1991-92.

Madam Speaker, since 1984, this government has started managing the country the way it should be managed, by reducing the annual deficit, which was enormous, and at the same time gradually getting the national debt under control, a debt that was a legacy from the previous government.

So there have been cuts, madam Speaker, including cuts in transfers to the provinces. However, we should be careful when we talk about transfers to the provinces, because often people tend to confuse Established Programs Financing with equalization. Quebec, for instance, receives under Established Programs Financing, certain amounts of money, like all the other provinces. As you know, all provinces receive the same amount per capita under this program.

Furthermore, Madam Speaker, as you know, equalization payments are only paid to certain provinces. These are amounts of money for provinces who are considered the most in need. And Quebec is one of those provinces.

If we look at the figures for 1989-90, the province of Quebec will receive $9.9 billion. In 1990-91, this will be $10.3 billion, and in 1991-92, $10.6 billion. Madam Speaker, this means an increase of about 3 per cent per year. I agree the increase is not as high as the province or other provinces might have expected. However, as a result of Draconian measures we had to take to control the government's annual deficit and the growing national debt, we had to announce a number of reductions in annual increases received by the provinces.

Bill C-69 confirms that the provinces will receive more money next year than they are getting this year, and it also confirms federal participation in helping the provinces.

Madam Speaker, I may point out that since 1977, the provinces have the right to spend the money they receive from the federal government at their own discretion.

This means, and I am taking Quebec as an example, if the province receives $10.3 billion in 1990-91, it can invest that money in hospitals, schools, highways, day-care—whatever. That is its personal decision as a province. British Columbia can do the same, and Newfoundland as well. These are sums of money that are allocated in terms of the needs and expectations of each province, but itis strictly discretionary spending.

Madam Speaker, I believe this bill should be passed as soon as possible so that we can get on with our legislative and economic agenda.

[English]

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Madam Speaker, one thing has become tragically clear as this government's mandate unfolds. Put simply, the Minister of National Health and Welfare has surrendered, without a fight, his responsibility for social policy in this country. It is clear that it is the Minister of Finance who now makes social policy for this government.

What is the result of this abdication of responsibility by the Minister of National Health and Welfare? It is Bill C-21, which will punish the unemployed for this government's failure to come up with a full employment policy. It is Bill C-28, which ends the universality of old age pension and family allowance. It is Bill C-69, which saddles the poor of this country with a disproportionate share of the national debt and which threatens the future viability of our health care system and our post-secondary institutions.

This process, most aptly described as social policy by stealth, has resulted in the polarization of Canadians. The facts are that what we are witnessing is a drastic decline in the numbers who can be considered in the middle class in this country. We are seeing more poor and more rich, with the disappearance of those in the middle; more highly paid jobs and more poorly paid jobs; more children and single parents living in deep poverty; and more people with only a part-time or marginal attachment to the workforce.

This bill, which the government is ramming through, is illustrative of the re-emergence of the Conservative belief in an ordered society, a society of haves and have-nots, a society of rich and poor. It is a rejection of the concept of collective entitlement and an embracing of paternalism.

The government asks that we all share in the strong medicine needed to control the deficit, but its actions betray its words. This government does not spread the burden equitably but punishes and overburdens those least able to cope.

In this House, as reported at page 10673 of Hansard, the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance stated:

> The effort that we are requiring from the population with the cuts and the tax hikes is a collective effort on the part of all Canadians. We are asking everyone of them, whatever the province they live in, to share in this collective effort—

However, is this the case, Madam Speaker? Is everyone being asked to share? Of course not?

Bill C-69 is a direct attack on the income support of poor Canadians. It is a direct attack on those who are least able to put food on the table, to clothe and house their children, to find meaningful employment. This government has not gone after the incomes of the wealthy. It has not even sought out the deferred taxes of profitable corporations. It has sought out the powerless and gone after them.

As reported at page 10672 of Hansard, the parliamentary secretary also had the following to say about the ceiling placed on Canada Assistance Plan payments by this bill:

> The expenditure control plan will not affect the amount received by low income Canadian men and women.

Where in this bill are we to find this? Are we simply to take the word of the parliamentary secretary? If the purpose of this bill is to control expenditure, how can he say that it will not affect the amount received by poor Canadians?

The stated purpose of this bill is to force the provinces to absorb a greater share of the national debt. How, one must ask, are they to do that if they do not cut expenditures? How can the parliamentary secretary claim that no one will suffer a loss in income if the provinces are forced to cut income support payments because of the federal government's reneging on its constitutional and contractual responsibility to cost share these expenditures?

It is evident to all who care to look that to live on social assistance is to live in poverty. Absolutely nowhere in this country are social assistance rates above the poverty line, no matter which poverty line is used.

The shallowness of understanding demonstrated by members opposite is even more clear when one reads the words of the chair of the finance committee, as reported at page 10551 of Hansard, who had the following to say about Bill C-69:

> This bill is a sensible bill because it comes to grips with the EPF, the CAP, the growth of expenditures and the transfers made from the federal government to the provinces.

No reference is made to the abandonment of the poor, the abandonment of universality, the abandonment of the social safety net.

The difficulty with the observation of the chair of the finance committee is that it ignores the facts. The Canada Assistance Plan is not a transfer to the provinces; it is a transfer to individuals. The federal government writes the cheque to the province, but what it is paying for is previously agreed upon services and income support payments to those Canadians who are in dire need of this support.

To claim that the cap on CAP is an attempt to control transfers to provinces is to indulge in a purposeful misunderstanding of the Canada Assistance Plan and how it is used by the provinces.

• (1530)

The chairman of the finance committee went on to say on the same page that:

> We cannot pay our bills by encouraging profligacy in the hands of the provinces.

Profligacy means recklessly extravagant. Again, I hope through ignorance rather than a deliberate attempt to mislead, the hon. member reflects the dearth of knowledge on the government side of the House.

Payments made under the Canada Assistance Plan are demand led expenditures. They come from the commitment made by the provinces and the federal government to assist individuals in providing the most basic requirements of life for themselves and their families.

These expenditures are the result of the requirements of the act to provide services having as their object the lessening, removal or prevention of the causes and effects of poverty, child neglect or dependence on public assistance. Is the hon. member, his party, or the minister actually suggesting that the provinces are being recklessly extravagant in their spending in these areas?

Are they suggesting that neglected children should suffer while this government kisses the ring of the knobby finger of corporate Canada? The finance committee heard witnesses representing 20 groups and organizations, many of which are national organizations.

From these groups not one came before the committee to praise Bill C-69. They came to bury it. It needs to be noted that they often sat before the committee without the benefit of a single Tory member of the committee, save for the chair of that committee.

The absence of Tories from the committee room provided real and tangible evidence of the lack of concern this government has for the poor, for our universities and colleges and for our health care system. It demonstrated in more than a symbolic way the lack of understanding and caring which is becoming the hallmark of this government.

Before the committee, the Minister of State for Finance made much of his government's plan to get its fiscal house in order and that Bill C-69 represented a way to have the provinces share in that responsibility. It has chosen to do so by limiting its constitutional, contractual and moral responsibilities.

The government has chosen to do so despite the overwhelming evidence provided by a series of government-sponsored studies which demonstrate in unequivocal terms that the Canada Assistance Plan works. It is an effective and efficient use of government resources, and any changes to the Canada Assistance Plan should be made in co-operation with the provinces and those responsible for the delivery of the services covered by CAP.

Such changes should not be ad hoc as they are in this bill, but ones that provide for improved service delivery and a real commitment to getting people off welfare. It should not be a kind of punitive, mean-spirited measure that we see in this bill.

The most recently completed study of the Canada Assistance Plan is now in the hands of the minister, and one cannot help but wonder why he is permitting Bill C-69 to go ahead when he knows it will threaten the most basic component of our social safety net, when he knows that no one in this country with any knowledge of CAP supports the imposition of a ceiling on federal expenditures.

This study brought together acknowledged experts on CAP and this is what they had to say: "CAP is something that is really the best we have got right now. If anything, we should look at improving it rather than taking shots at it."

Another said: "CAP has been called the best example of co-operative federalism—.The province's inputs were respected—.and they were committed to a new approach of social assistance which would eliminate all the vestiges of the poor law and make the concept of need really meaningful."

A third quote is: "The impact of CAP has been enormous—for good or for ill, anything that existed before was incredibly punitive—.It was a terrible, terrible system—.The level of brutality was spectacular."

A final quote is: "I would like to state that if anything happens to the CAP agreement and the transfer monies—effect on the provinces in the next five years would be chaotic. It would be one of the most disastrous things Ottawa could ever do."

Those quotes are from references submitted to the Program Audit Review directorate of Health and Welfare Canada by the DPA group incorporated.

I would suggest that it is the desire of the government to return to the brutality that is referred to in those quotes, to see a return to the belief which pervaded the poor laws, a belief which regarded the disadvantaged as at fault for their plight.

If this government was really concerned about saving money it would look to creative and positive ways to alleviate poverty in this country. It would be supportive of the provinces in their attempt to deliver the services low-income Canadians need. It would embrace a policy of full employment. This bill proposes to cut short that creativity and sentence the poor in Canada to further hardship. In short, this bill needs to be defeated.

In closing I would like to make reference to an article in The Globe and Mail of June 7, written by Hovi Echenberg from NAPO:

> So, despite the silence of ministers traditionally playing the lead in social-policy changes, the web of federal policy initiatives has changed things for the worse for people at the edges of the marketplace. It may be that what used to be a safety net is becoming a trap, or even a noose, for Canada's poor.
> In British Columbia, Alberta, and Ontario, the provincial governments will resist real increases in social assistance income levels because, for the first time in more than 20 years, these increases will not be cost shared by the federal government. In these same provinces, the same limit on cost sharing will likely preclude new child care spaces, or increased civil legal aid services to support appeals of any disentitlement.
> In every province in Canada, low income people will likely find that few health services are insured under medicare. Whether annual physicals, ambulance services or drugs prescribed during a hospital stay, new costs will be borne by individuals. Affordable housing units will be slower to come by on the market, as federal funding for non-profit housing programs is reduced.

Madam Speaker, my caucus agrees with Hovi Echenberg when she says that the safety net is becoming a trap, or even a noose, for the poor.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Madam Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to my colleague from Mission—Coquitlam and I would like to compliment her on a very thoughtful presentation of the arguments. It was very well thought through.

I join her and members of my caucus to speak on Bill C-69, an act respecting restraint of government expenditures. This bill implements four measures for budget restrictions announced in the budget of February 1990. First there is the freeze to federal transfer payments to the provinces for post-secondary education and health care under the Established Program Financing. Second, there is the limit on the increase of federal transfer payments to Ontario, British Columbia, and Alberta under the Canada Assistance Plan, which includes social programs. Third, there is the elimination of the Canada Exploration Incentives Program which affects mining, gas and oil industries. Fourth, is the measure that freezes public utilities income tax transfers over the next two years.

This bill represents, in a sense, the entire lack of balance in this government's approach between what I have always called two important pillars of Canada: economic opportunity and social justice. In my view, the two must be pursued simultaneously for both are critical objectives if we are to have the kind of Canada we have always striven for.

To forsake one for the interests of the other is to fail. To blindly fight the deficit without regard for the human and social toll is also to fail as a government and ultimately as a society.

Yet, that is this government's approach, as this bill demonstrates. This government concerns itself solely with the deficit at the expense of all else. While concerning itself with the economic side of the balance, pursuing deficit reduction and what it calls economic stability, it is forgetting how important it is to have social stability and a truly caring society.

There is no question that the people of this country need policies that are fiscally sound. They need to address the deficit. They also need policies that have no regard to class or place but provide for equitable consideration. Only our government can be expected to serve as that dependable link and ensure non-discrimination between the densely populated areas of our country and small-town Canada. Towns and villages should not be preferred over our cities, or prosperous communities to the less fortunate. Equality of service has been a valued Canadian hallmark and it seems to me that it is being eroded on a daily basis. A wonderful safety net is becoming less and less so.

The government has not seen it this way. I believe it has chosen to disrupt, to dismantle and even destroy much of this country's vital infrastructure, conceived to answer our very unique geography. Our huge land mass, with communities of varying sizes dispersed around this vast region, many sparsely settled, all need service. Be it social service, education or health, they have to be shared with our provinces; be it the national mandate on job skills, retraining, communications and transportation, these are all the key elements in the building and linking of our people to ensure a bright future and a sense of national unity.

The government has cut back on the CBC. It says this was needed to fight the deficit, forgetting that it is a bridge for Canadians to bring a national voice to all parts of this land, with the technology and vital infrastructure which brings about an informed Canadian society.

Today, I was pleased to participate in the launching of Digital Radio, La radio numérique, which will fill in the blanks that you would normally have as you drive from your home to Ottawa when the sound fades and there is interference from American channels. We will have new technology to correct that.

We must not destroy that infrastructure. Without the money that the CBC needs, we will not have the required infrastructure to ensure that we will have the kinds of communication that we require across this land.

What else has the government done? It has torn down VIA Rail because of the deficit. Forget about the social costs and the hardship it causes the elderly, the sick and women who have to take their children from distant locations to Montreal but cannot travel on the buses because it is inconvenient and uncomfortable. It is the same hardship for the disabled and the handicapped who cannot afford air fare. They were forgotten while it dismantled the wonderful transportation net that we had set up. The government would rather forget about the social costs of removing vital links across this land; the deficit is the only thing that matters.

Bill C-69 continues to implement the cuts of the government's 1990 budget. As I mentioned, the CBC capital budget has been cut by $20 million. That would certainly affect radio transmission and, I suggest, cuts very important services to the north. Telefilm Canada was cut by $13 million, affecting our Canadian content for film and video. The Export Development Corporation which helps our companies compete around the world, which is supposed to be another goal of this government, was cut by $100 million. The Secretary of State was cut by $113 million, much of it to womens' support programs and aboriginal communication infrastructure. The Small Craft Harbours Program was cut by $29 million. The Canada Mortgage and Housing Corporation funding for social and co-operative housing was cut by $165 million in the face of acute shortages in low-cost housing and a growing homeless population in many of our major cities.

The trickery being played here is obvious. The government makes these cuts while its rhetoric speaks of strong undying support for the varied programs it is cutting. Who are those members they trying to fool? The smoke and mirrors are easy to see through. Canadians have certainly not been duped with these hollow words.

After six years, Canadians know all too well how the game is being played on that side of the House: a government claiming support for programs while cutting them; and a government claiming it has performed miracles of fiscal management, when it has doubled the national debt and taken Canadian taxpayers to the cleaners. There have been 31 tax increases, with the thirty-second in the wings.

I am not saying that we must ignore the deficit, not at all. Nor do I believe any of my colleagues believe that—

An Hon. Member: Sure, they do.

Mrs. Finestone: —but we must apply to any deficit action the traditional Canadian approach of balance between the economic and social goals.

I certainly would not use the hon. member's very narrow point of perspective. I remember him on one of my standing committees and it was not a pleasure.

In other words, we must examine the social cost of any given action on the deficit. If we give up on that principle, we give up on what has been one of the fundamental values of Canada. I would argue we would be vastly impaired, not fairly meeting all of our citizens' basic needs. It would pander to the well-to-do and be quite insensitive to the growing needs of the working poor.

With the budget, Bill C-69, and all the other blind cuts that have occurred, the government has failed on this question of social responsibility. I would suggest to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, if he is truly concerned, that his voice has been silenced. He has failed to have an impact on the thinking of his cabinet colleagues. He has failed to have an impact on the budget of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance and he has succeeded only in loosening the web of the Canadian social fabric.

What a strange irony as we open the newspapers today and we see that the Minister of Finance is busy asking workers and unions to limit their wage increase demands. At the same time, the government treats its own public servants quite differently. I would suggest, again, that that fancy rhetoric does not really reflect reality. It is really quite a scandal, what we learned today.

We learned that, while telling workers to cut their wage demands, the Tory government has been quietly topping up the salaries of high level federal executives with bonuses of up to 25 per cent. I told the Minister of Transport that he should change jobs. At the 25 per cent limit, the estimate is that he would get a bonus of almost $40,000 as the head of VIA Rail and $100,000 as the head of Petro-Can.

I recall in Question Period today the President of the Treasury Board spoke in the most unctuous tones, using holier-than-thou terms. He ended by saying: "I've told you that the government bosses received exactly the same pay increases as the workers of the country. As unionized public servants, they got a 4.2 per cent increase." He just forgot about the bonuses. It seems to me it just banks all these people bank who certainly got more than 4.2 per cent. There has been a lack of full exposure of this issue.

The salary range for the Bank of Canada Governor, John Crow, has risen by 35 per cent since 1987. We had to get information, not through Canada's access to information legislation, but through the American access to information system. We found out that the five top executives at CN received pay raises averaging 18.7 per cent last year, the same year that CN's profits plunged. Then, two days ago, my colleague, the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Nipigon, came into the House and asked the Minister of Labour what he plans to do for the 1,900 CN workers who just lost their jobs—

[Translation]

I ask you, is that really fair? Personally, I find it really unacceptable.

[English]

The cuts we have had to the Canada Assistance Plan, in the provinces of Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta, will increase the strain on the already insufficient resources available, not only for the general welfare services but also for services for the disabled, for child care, for foster homes—the whole range of social services. This is the first time in the 24-year history of the Canada Assistance Plan that the federal government has placed a limit on its contributions. Created in 1966, this legislation provides the basis for social assistance in the country.

• (1550)

By cutting CAP, the federal government is hurting the poorest of the poor. Under CAP, the federal and provincial governments share equally in the cost of welfare payments and basic necessities such as food, shelter, clothing, utilities, and other household supplies. It also provides important services such as dental care for the poor, essential services for disabled persons, foster homes for abused children, shelters for abused wives, and child care for low income families.

The data for 1987 shows that 49 per cent of Canada's poor families and 54 per cent of Canada's poor individuals live in these three provinces. The cuts that the federal government has imposed are unilateral, defying at least the spirit, if not the wording, of the CAP agreement with the provinces. The contesting provinces believe that under the CAP agreement, CAP can only be modified after a year's notice and with provincial consent. This is the government that is building a great sense of national reconciliation and goodwill. I will not comment further right now on that issue.

I would suggest to you that neither of these provisions have been met. Madam Speaker, don't look so upset. The truth is the truth, even if it hurts and makes you unhappy.

Mr. Nicholson: You didn't mention the 5 per cent increase the Ontario government was implementing.

Mrs. Finestone: Then what is the freeze that you are putting into place? You forget to take account of that.

The problem with the hon. members opposite is that they are a bunch of penguins. They do not read the documents. All they do is flap their wings and their lips.

Through capping the Canada Assistance Plan, the government claims it will save $151 million over two years. That is what it has done through capping. That is its bottom line. What are the costs? The Canada Council on Social Development has stated:

> Poor children will suffer when the federal contribution to the Canada Assistance Plan is capped for Alberta, B.C. and Ontario. The plan provides direct payments to poor people with no other income, 40 per cent of whom are children and half of whom live in the three provinces that are affected.

The poor in these three provinces are just as poor as those in other provinces and this is a very odd way for the government to come to the aid of those in need.

That is the human toll I am talking about, the cost in human and social terms of this deficit cutting action. Yes, perhaps the provinces will fill in the gap left by the federal government where they have been able to maintain their resolve and their commitment to the caring society. I say, thank goodness someone will, because it is surely not going to be those on the benches across the way who will act in the interest of our poor, especially our children.

Something is dreadfully wrong in the orientation and planning for our country. Something is wrong with the vision of the government.

While the Minister of Finance is very pleased with his budget, all he has done is transfer the burden of tax to the provinces and the municipalities. By the government's shirking of its duties to make its budget look better, other hands are going into the taxpayers' pockets to meet important needs in terms of assistance, health, re-education, and training.

Let us look at the Equalization Payment Fund and education cuts. What is the impact of the minister's cuts? What is the implication of these freezes, cuts, or whatever you want to call them? It is less money going into the province to support the importance of education and the future of our children.

Will the provinces faced with less than their expected federal contributions have any choice with provincial transfers being strained? Have they any choice but to give further limited resources to the universities? Will they have any choice but to increase tuition or to put capital projects or new equipment purchases on hold? Who suffers then? The student suffers because either tuition increases have closed the door to college or to university, or the institution cannot afford all the resources to prepare him or her for the fierce competition of life and career.

This only serves as a stumbling block in maximizing the potential of our young people who are our human capital of tomorrow. These are the kinds of things the government must be able to see and duly consider—the full consequences of its action and not just the effect on the balance sheet. Unfortunately, Canadians do not have a government with that kind of balanced vision. We do have a government that knows how to package pretty packages, empty boxes, but it does not remember its own strongly held view.

Unfortunately I have misplaced one of the minister's famous quotes, but it indicates that he does not feel we should be cutting on the backs of the hospitals, health care, or the universities when we look at how to plan. He said this in 1982 but I guess when one becomes minister there is another reality that sets in.

These are not the first cuts to education transfers by the government. Cumulatively, since 1986, it has cut $31.1 billion from all EPF programs—$22.2 billion from health care and $8.9 billion from post-secondary education. Across the way, members may not call them a cut nor a freeze but any name they want. It is $31.1 billion: $22.2 billion plus $8.9 billion. Most people do not even know how many zeroes that is. They just know that it is a heck of a lot of money being cut from the needed services for their children and for their future.

This is being done at a time when inflation is running above 5 per cent, heating costs are up, library costs have risen, new equipment is sorely needed, and laboratory costs are on the increase. Again, the government has made the cuts in education transfers to the provinces just when what is really needed are greater resources for education, better facilities, and more professors to make our young people capable of competing in the 21st century.

In an address to a public policy conference for journalists convened by the C. D. Howe Institute in April, 1989, George Pederson, the president of the University of Western Ontario, issued a very severe warning saying that the university system in Canada is in trouble, serious trouble.

I am going to wrap up by saying that it is certain that we have pockets of excellence in our various educational institutions, but there is no single university in Canada that can compete with the best in the United States, Britain, Western Europe, not to mention Japan. If we want to be on a fair and equal footing to compete in the international world of tomorrow, we had better make sure there is a reinstatement of quality in our universities. That is what Pederson maintained and he is quoted in an article in The London Free Press of April 28, 1990.

When one cuts into the health care of the people and the basic promises for the infrastructure of our health services, and when the world looks our medicare system and says that this is an incredible system, this population is no longer prepared to accept the kinds of cuts the government has put in. We find that we are closing beds and have long waiting lists in our hospitals and overcrowded emergency wards—all things which are taking place as we cut $22.2 billion from the EPF. With respect to our health services, the cutbacks announced are absolutely amazing and 70 per cent of that $31.1 billion comes from that health care side.

Madam Speaker, I would have liked to continue. Another time I will have something else to say.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception—Fisheries; the hon. member for Dartmouth—Regional development; and the hon. member for Prince George—Bulkley Valley—Forestry.

Hon. John McDermid (Minister of State (Privatization and Regulatory Affairs)): Madam Speaker, I listened with great interest to the hon. member's speech this afternoon. She made three very interesting points. She criticized the government for cutting expenditures; she criticized the government for raising taxes; and she criticized the government for not handling the deficit problems.

There is a certain inconsistency in that type of speech. There are two areas where the federal government can save income or gain income. One is through taxes and the other is through cutting expenditures. If we do have a deficit problem the hon. member will have to admit to the House—at least I hope she would admit to the House—that one, the other or both is a way to try to get the deficit situation under control. That is what the Minister of Finance has done in a very responsible manner.

• (1600)

She talked about the deficit of this country. When we took office, it was $200 billion, it is now some $350 billion, 80 per cent of which is just compound interest on the $200 billion deficit that was left to us.

Mrs. Finestone: Why don't you do something about it?

Mr. McDermid: That is exactly what we are doing. The hon. member can stand up and criticize all she wants. That is very easy. The minute the Liberal Party has something concrete to put on the table to solve the deficit problem, we will be very pleased to listen to it, and if it makes sense we will take action.

Mrs. Finestone: Madam Speaker, this government has been in place for over six years, six of the best earning years in the history of Canada, and all it has managed to do is double the national debt and not decrease the deficit. Go and find out what you are supposed to do. They didn't elect me to do it. They elected you to do it. Why don't you take your responsibilities seriously. And by the way, why don't you eat crow or fire Crow, but stand behind what you do?

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member may want to speak through the Chair. It would be appreciated.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Madam Speaker, I too have a question for the hon. member for Mount Royal. She mentioned during the course of her speech that members on the other side were not able to get their message through to the Minister of Finance. She made that point very well. She also made the point that the hon. member for Jonquière, the hon. member for Niagara Falls, and the hon. member for St. John's East, and finally the Minister for Privatization did not get their message through to her either, and I hope they never do, because she did a very good job.

The Minister of Finance said in Toronto in August, 1984 that he would not increase taxes in Canada in order to cut the deficit. He has raised them 31 times and is coming up to 32 times. He also said he would not make a battleground out of post-secondary education, hospitalization and medicare in this country, but he has done that very thing in Bill C-69.

While we are talking about inconsistencies, I would like to put this question to the hon. member for Mount Royal. Do you think these are greater inconsistencies than the phoney arguments raised by the Minister for Privatization?

Mrs. Finestone: Madam Speaker, I could not have said it better than my colleague, and I thank him for those remarks. I would just like to remind him about one thing the Prime Minister had to say. At the PC general meeting on August 25, 1989, he said: "This government will carry its fair share of the burden to ensure that all young Canadians receive a first-class education as they confront a world-class challenge". Certainly, the Minister of Finance did not hear that. I would like to remind him of what the Prime Minister had to say and recall his own words for reconsideration so he might withdraw the bill. On March 24, 1982, he said: "Cuts to the EPF could have disastrous effects on the universities and on the colleges, on the hospital funding and on the operation of the hospitals. Let us not make hospitals, universities and colleges a battleground between the federal government and the provincial governments: Let us solve those problems not on the backs of hospitals and universities; let us solve those problems outside of that area".

We think the Minister of Finance has a very sad, clouded vision of how to govern this country, and perhaps should listen to the minister of health and social welfare who would have better advice to give.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Madam Speaker, the hon. member has spoken very forcefully about salary increases. Has she had a chance to take up this matter with her colleagues in the Senate who voted themselves an increase? If she has, has it done any good?

Mrs. Finestone: Madam Speaker, I must say that I was wondering whether or not my hon. colleague has taken up with his federal minister the 25 per cent increase that he has just given to all these big functionaries? Do you know how much money you have just finished spending? You ought to be ashamed of yourself. It is obscene what you have done.

Some Hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, I noted with interest some of the comments the hon. member for Mount Royal made on this particular bill. I note she went into the clawback of the old age pensions and alluded to the cutbacks to the Unemployment Insurance Commission, the CAP, welfare payments, the EPF cuts to hospitals and post-secondary education.

I have been in Parliament over the last year and a half, and as I look at this I see a thread of harmonization. Can the member see any tie-in with what this government seems to be doing with these cuts and the free trade agreement?

Mrs. Finestone: Madam Speaker, I would have to ask for a clarification on the nature of the question that was asked.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, I would like to ask the hon. member for Mount Royal a question, bearing in mind the comment in her speech that Canadian universities are not as high in excellence as those in other countries, such as the United States, England, and others.

First of all, I want to submit that while she may be basing her quote on a newspaper article, I do not think most Canadians or most international observers would agree with her. I would like her to indicate what universities in Canada she believes to be inferior to those international universities. I would think that the foreign students coming to Canada will claim that part of the reason they come here is because our universities stand in their excellence, par excellence, second to none. I ask her if she has any empirical evidence to support that unsubstantiated sentence.

Mrs. Finestone: Madam Speaker, I am not the research team. I have quoted extensively from some very important research. I would like to point out to the hon. member, that he is close to my era, perhaps a decade or so away. I would like to suggest that at the C. D. Howe Institute, which I think is rather a credible institute, the observation has been made that the quality of instruction available to university students today is not nearly as good as that provided to their parents who attended Ontario universities 30 years ago.

I would suggest the hon. member falls into that category. I would also suggest that one of the reasons foreign students come here is because our universities are much less expensive. It has nothing to do with the quality of the university.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The period for questions and comments has now expired. Resuming debate.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am reluctant to start a speech in the circumstances because I am aware that at four o'clock we will probably be interrupted when the Prime Minister arrives. Perhaps in the meantime I could start. Having a captive audience of over half of the Cabinet is a particular treat for me as it is very rare, during debate, to see so many here and I am delighted.

I want to say that discussing Bill C–69, the act to restrain government expenditures, is a misguided effort on the part of the government. We hear constant complaints about how we never make suggestions on this side of the House. I can tell the ministers opposite, through you, Madam Speaker, that I have made many suggestions for measures to do with the economy, such as cutting the advertising budget on the goods and service tax, which would save millions and millions of dollars for the taxpayers of Canada every year, cutting the size of this Cabinet in half, which would reduce expenditures significantly and possibly increase the effectiveness. It could not reduce it.

I say that we could consider all these suggestions and yet, when I have made them, I have been blithely ignored. The Minister of Finance has not even come in and made a speech in response, agreed, or said that he would not agree to my suggestions. They have been politely and firmly ignored.

I am afraid that this attitude on the part of the government is regrettable, and particularly so when it is the educational facilities of Canada that are suffering as a result of the cuts that are proposed in Bill C–69.

My own community has in it two universities; one of which is not directly affected by these cuts since it is funded solely by the federal government, being the Royal Military College. The other university is directly affected, as indeed are all universities across this country.

I want to confine my remarks on Bill C–69 to the educational aspect of these cuts so the Minister of National Health and Welfare can relax.

Mr. Beatty: I'm virtually comatose.

Mr. Milliken: He says he is relaxed already. I suggest that if he and his colleagues had a proper interest in health care delivery in this country, they would not relax when they are trying to pass this particular bill through the House of Commons. He knows, as well as I do, that this bill will significantly reduce the ability of the provinces to fund health care in their jurisdictions as a result of the federal government trying to dump the problem to the provinces.

On March 14, 1989, the Canadian Association of University Teachers wrote to the Prime Minister to make him aware of their particular concerns regarding post-secondary funding. That association argued that the transfer of funds under the Established Programs Financing Act, "has a direct and profound impact on the quality of our universities and of our research effort". That is not me talking, it is not some other member of the opposition bleating, this is the Canadian Association of University Teachers expressing their concerns about these cuts. They ask the Prime Minister to show his support for post-secondary education by announcing, in the government's Speech from the Throne, a renewed commitment to education funding.

How did the Prime Minister respond to this request? What did he do to strengthen Canada's post-secondary institutions? In his April 1989 budget, the Minister of Finance reduced by 1 per cent the escalator provisions used to calculate the level of funding that each government receives through EPF. This was in keeping with his decision in 1986 to lower the escalator by 2 per cent.

Continuing this assault, the Prime Minister now plans, through this bill that we are now debating, to impose a two-year freeze on per capita EPF transfers to the provinces. He plans to remove the inflation protection from these transfers precisely when the new goods and services tax bill, which is now sitting in the other place will, on the finance department's own admission, cause a 1 per cent jump in inflation.

We in the opposition know that those projections are incorrect. It will be more than 1 per cent and yet that is what the Department of Finance is maintaining, you cut the transfers to the provinces while you increase the costs through your own taxation measures. That is unfair and that is what this government is doing by these bills.

In addition, the rate of growth of the transfers will be restricted to 3 percentage points below the rate of growth in the economy when the freeze is lifted after 1992. This will result in a further erosion and deterioration of the moneys available to provinces for education purposes. The cumulative results of this government's assault on EPF transfers has meant that from 1986 to 1995, provincial governments will have lost $8.9 billion in post-secondary education funding. Of this loss, approximately $2 billion, that is about a quarter of it, is attributable to Bill C-69 alone.

Back in 1984 when the Prime Minister's party was trying to get elected, it wrote to the Canadian Association of University Teachers in a newsletter that they were "committed to sustaining the current federal financial commitment according to the formula set out in the 1977 agreement. We believe that financing post-secondary education is an important priority for both levels of government". I note that that was before an election. How their tune changed after the election, after they duped the Canadian people into voting for them, they changed their tune and then began slashing and cutting all over the place. Talk about honesty in government, talk about the obligation to maintain your promises, this is a shocking record. Since 1984 the government's support of post-secondary education has become so weak that the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada has projected that, as a result of Bill C-69 and the February 1990 budget, federal cash transfers in support of post-secondary education could disappear before the year 2000 in Ontario and before the year 2010 in the rest of the provinces.

The government's record fails to match its rhetoric and its promises. Instead of being given the straight goods on this bill and its effects, we are given fudged figures that cloud the issue and make it look as though this somehow is a bonanza for the provinces. It is not. The Canadian people know it is not and the government, in truth, knows it is not, but simply will not reveal the facts.

While the government has initiated some worth-while programs in the education field—

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Name one.

Mr. Milliken: My hon. friend from Winnipeg South Centre asks me to name one.

I must say I have not heard anyone over there suggest any because I do not think they know of them. But, in fairness, there has been an increase—and I will deliver a compliment—in the funding levels to the various research councils. On the other hand, the increase has been less in almost every case than the level of inflation. It is not much of an increase, but there has been some additional funding, and I am corrected every time I say that.

The EPF cuts will reduce the effect of these few positive initiatives because there are several factors to be borne in mind in relation to university research. Perhaps hon. members opposite would like to learn something about it. First, research work in the universities incurs expenses not covered by research grants. If a university receives a grant to conduct certain research, it has to hire staff and provide space and facilities of various kinds for the researcher to do the work.

The report of the task force on federal policies and programs for technology development prepared by the ministry of state for science and technology in July 1984 stated: "Because most federal funding covers only the incremental research costs such as supplies, technicians' salaries and equipment, it is estimated that each grant dollar a university receives from Ottawa via the research councils forces it to spend at least another dollar on facilities and other overheads". There has been no increase in the funding for universities for overheads and increased costs of research facilities, none whatever. This is another item the government leaves off the plate. It announces with great trumpet and fanfare that it will increase funding for universities, but it does not pay the costs. It gives you a little dollop and says: "Here you go, this is funded. All this money has been paid". The government will not pay the increased costs to universities that are obliged to make up out of the dollars that come from the province through EPF transfers, dollars that are not now coming at the same rate. They have dropped and Bill C-69 is one of the principal instruments by which these moneys dropped.

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): It depends on the provinces.

Mr. Milliken: The hon. Minister for Science and Technology, who should know more about this than I do, says that it depends on the provinces. He should also know that the province of Ontario passes on the bulk of this money. I agree that perhaps the government of Premier Vander Zalm does not pass the money along to its universities, but that is a Social Credit government with close ties to the PC Party, and I am not surprised that it does not pass it on. Liberal governments are far less tight-fisted with the few federal dollars that they get from this minister.

Since it is the EPF transfers which pay for these other costs, it is obvious that cutting these transfers will mean that post-secondary institutions will not have the funds they need to make effective use of the research and development grants that they are now receiving, both from this government and from the provincial governments.

Speaking at the University of Waterloo in 1987, the Prime Minister himself said these words: "I have been speaking and writing about the urgent and pressing necessity of increasing our national commitment to R and D, not only in the amounts we spend, but in the way we spend. We cannot be satisfied with what we have accomplished". He was certainly right there. Things have got worse at his behest since 1987. This government has cut what it accomplished before. How can he be satisfied today? He was not satisfied in 1987. The implication of his speech—and I note that this was before an election campaign in 1988—indicated that he was not satisfied and felt the situation should be improved. I notice that this improvement has not occurred. This bill makes the situation worse.

I urge the Minister of Industry, Science and Technology to plead with his colleague the Minister of Finance to withdraw this bill so that we can increase payments to the provinces, not cut, slash and reduce in the way in which the government proposed to do.

Mr. Speaker: Before continuing, according to an order made with unanimous consent earlier today, I would say to the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands that he will understand the interruption. The hon. member will have the floor after the proceedings.

FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is with a sense of national pride that I rise to inform the House of the results of the recent First Ministers' conference.

Since I became leader of my party, I set out as one of my basic goals to bring Quebec back into the Canadian constitutional family. That goal is now within reach, and if all goes well within the next few weeks that goal will become a permanent reality.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Once the three remaining legislatures pass the Meech Lake Accord, Quebec will formally rejoin our constitutional family and Canada will be able to face its future united and strong. We will then be able to address ourselves to some other constitutional issues. In particular, Senate reform. It is so important to so many Canadians in the east and in the west. We will be free to concentrate more of our time and attention on creating the requisite economic and social conditions for Canadians to prosper and for Canada to thrive.

There is, as we all know in this House, a new world to be won. Canada needs to turn the page, at last, on a long, and controversial and often debilitating period of our constitutional history so that we can move with firmness and confidence into the next century.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I think that will soon be possible with the passage of the Meech Lake Accord as is. I have consistently said that Meech Lake must be passed by June 23 and that other constitutional concerns would be met subsequently. Anyone who carefully reads the document we signed will see that I kept my word and that my government kept its word to Quebec and Canada.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: I kept my word on the accord and, Mr. Speaker, I will also keep my word on the other matters on which we reached agreement last week.

It was taking a chance with Canada's future when, in 1982, it was decided to go ahead with constitutional amendments without the assent of the National Assembly of Quebec. Isolating Quebec once was once too many as we all recognized. I resolved that it should never happen again in this country. For Quebecers, it was a bitter outcome to the 1980 referendum because the whole 1980–82 constitutional round was undertaken pursuant to a solemn undertaking, given just six days before the referendum vote, by the then Prime Minister of Canada on behalf of all of us who were members of the "Non" committee. At the time, the Prime Minister said, and he spoke for all Canadians, and very eloquently, I may say, and I quote: "We're telling you in the other provinces that we won't accept that a "Non" be interpreted by you as an indication that everything is fine and can remain as it was before." Well, Mr. Speaker, and I say this without malice, there is no doubt things did change, but it was not the renewed federalism Quebecers thought they voted for when they voted yes or no to Canada on May 20, 1980.

On August 6, 1984, at Sept–Iles, I made a commitment to pursue Quebec's signature on the Canadian constitution, provided we could establish ground rules to meet the minimal conditions of success. Some people believed the 1980 referendum closed the books. As a Quebecer, however, I had my doubts, I had serious personal doubts. I saw it on the North Shore and I saw it throughout Quebec, and I thought that the sense of estrangement in Quebec was too deep and too broad to take the risk, because the 1981–82 process and its results had raised some serious questions throughout Quebec about the value of its ongoing association with Canada. I felt this was very unfortunate, because as a Quebecer, I have always thought that Quebec had a future, a brillant and dynamic future, within the Canadian federation. I was therefore very disturbed by what I heard across the province.

However, mindful of the sensitivity of this issue, we did not reopen the file until there was a federalist Premier in place in Quebec. My government decided to proceed with the reform process then because we did not think there would ever be more favourable circumstances for doing so. The harrowing memory of the Referendum was still fresh in people's minds, but a federalist government was and is today in office in Quebec: the Liberal government headed by Robert Bourassa. A spirit of reconciliation prevailed in federal–provincial relations. I refer now, Mr. Speaker, to 1986 and the beginning of 1987.

[English]

It was also obvious that the sense of alienation was not exclusive to Quebec in any way. The people in the east, west and north were also not satisfied with the status quo. Certainly, they appeared not to be. Without Quebec at the table, however, the result of the 1981–82 constitutional reform was effectively blocked. I saw that firsthand, and I discussed it with some of my NDP and Liberal colleagues in this House. We all saw it firsthand in 1985 when as Prime Minister of Canada I chaired the First Ministers' Conference seeking a constitutional amendment for aboriginal groups. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that we came within a whisker of success, but we eventually failed. I believe we would have succeeded, we would have avoided failure that day, had Quebec been participating fully in the Constitution, because the Government of Quebec had signalled clearly and publicly its support for the amendment.

• (1630)

Thus the first victims of 1981–82 were not Quebecers. They were our aboriginal peoples who should have received justice that day in 1985 and will now, with Quebec at the constitutional table, have an infinitely better chance at that justice they have been seeking so long.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: At the same time my colleagues and I recognize that attempts to resolve all constitutional problems at once had generally failed in the past.

On July 14, 1986 I therefore wrote to the premiers suggesting that "the only realistic way I believe to proceed is, first, to bring Quebec back into the fold and to undertake a more extensive revision of the Constitution at a later stage".

The premiers agreed and, at their conference in August of 1986, the premiers of Canada issued the Edmonton Declaration. By that declaration, under the chairmanship of Premier Getty, they "agreed that their top constitutional priority" was "to embark immediately upon a federal-provincial process, using Quebec's five proposals as a basis for discussion, to bring about Quebec's full and active participation in the Canadian federation". They also agreed that other matters would be dealt with in a subsequent round.

Over the fall of 1986 and the winter of 1987, Senator Lowell Murray and his officials began a long, difficult and time consuming series of consultations with their provincial colleagues and with all others in Canada interested in the process, for example with aboriginal groups, with women's groups, and with those advancing the cause of special interests.

In April of 1987, I invited the premiers to Meech Lake to see, as I said in my Law Day Address on April 15, 1987, if we could reach an agreement or whether it was better "to close the books" on the entire question.

I wanted it clear before we got to Meech Lake that we were not engaging with parti pris but that we were going to take a hard look at it, examine it carefully in an objective atmosphere with all the best possibilities for success, but that if it did not work they would have to decide whether it was not better in those circumstances to cut it off once and for all.

I said then that to reach agreement would "require us to find an appropriate balance between the principle of the equality of all the provinces and the need to protect them and enhance the distinctiveness Quebec brings to Canada".

On April 30, 1987, as hon. members know, the first ministers met at Meech Lake and reached an agreement in principle. Over the next weeks, legal experts from all governments developed a constitutional test.

On June 2, 1987, first ministers met at the Langevin Block and agreed upon a legal document that incorporated improvements that met the concerns that had arisen in the interim. On June 3, 1987, the premiers and I signed the Meech Lake Accord.

The accord itself resulted from an obvious process of give and take. On that morning of June 3, 1987, I genuinely doubt, Mr. Speaker, if it had occurred to any of us that we would still be talking about this three years later. But then three governments changed and commitments that had been given were re-opened.

It is against this background that we have tried to create a new consensus, one that respected the Meech Lake framework while responding to concerns that have been raised in many cases quite unexpectedly over the subsequent or intervening three years. As members know, we have spared no effort to bring the dissenting provinces into the Meech consensus, while responding to their sincere concerns and to those of many Canadians that have arisen from both the process and the substance at Meech Lake.

The House established a special committee under the chairmanship of the member for Sherbrooke, the hon. Jean Charest, to conduct hearings on the New Brunswick proposal.

The Charest committee reported on May 17. I want to take this opportunity to thank all members from all parties of the Charest committee who worked so hard and who gave such devotion to Canada, all members from all parties. This was a remarkable contribution, and in underlining the tremendous work——done, not just for Canada but for Quebec, by the Hon. Jean Charest, I also wish to express my unqualified appreciation for all members of all parties in this House.

[Translation]

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Mulroney: I wish to thank in particular the Leader of the Opposition, Mr. Gray, and the Leader of the New Democratic Party, Ms. McLaughlin, for the sensitivity of their approach and for support they and members of their parties, some of whom I see on the front benches and elsewhere in this House, accorded the government on this issue of crucial national importance.

I wish to offer special thanks to Mr. Turner and Mr. Broadbent for the leadership they have provided on this issue from the very beginning. Canadians will remember that Mr. Turner never wavered from his deeply held conviction that the accord was right for Canada and that Canadian unity took priority over political considerations. Mr. Broadbent likewise stood firm in defence of the accord and deployed his considerable energy and persuasiveness on behalf of its adoption.

In retrospect, it is very clear to me that the success we achieved last weekend would not have been possible without the leadership and the support in the very beginning of John Turner and Ed Broadbent.

I want to thank as well all of those Canadians who helped so much in our darkest hours to keep the struggle for Meech Lake alive. Editorialists, constitutional experts, scholars, students, working mothers, and mill workers all contributed highly to our initiative.

In this past week in Ottawa the problems were complex and the disagreements were very, very difficult to narrow, but the premiers and I persevered for seven long days—it seemed like years—and bridged the differences and worked out an agreement. None of them had an illusions about the stakes involved.

Premiers Peterson, Bourassa, Buchanan, Vander Zalm, Ghiz, Devine, and Getty remained true to their vision of Canada and despite enormous political pressures stood by their original endorsement of the Meech Lake Accord.

Premier McKenna will be tabling the Meech Lake Accord and two companion documents in his legislature this week. Premier Filmon will be initiating the ratification process by convening public hearings shortly. Premier Wells phoned me earlier today to indicate that he will be submitting the accord for a free vote in the Newfoundland House of Assembly.

According to the terms of the agreement reached in Ottawa, Saturday, he will use every possible effort to achieve a decision prior to June 23, 1990. Once the accord is adopted, the Governor General will be advised to proclaim the amendment and the Meech Lake Accord will at last be entrenched in the Constitution and Quebecers can feel truly part of this great Canada.

Since the accord was signed three years ago, concerns have been raised by women, native people, northern Canadians, and minority language groups. The premiers and I heard these concerns. We have committed ourselves to seek approval as soon as possible by Parliament and the provincial legislatures of constitutional amendments directed to them.

We have agreed to make it explicit that the equality of the sexes is fully protected under the Constitution of Canada. We have also agreed that First Ministers' Conferences on aboriginal constitutional matters be held every three years, and that representatives of Canada's aboriginal peoples and territorial governments participate in the conferences at the invitation of the Prime Minister of Canada.

With respect to the territories, we all agreed that they be empowered, like the provinces, to submit names for consideration when vacancies occur in the Senate of Canada and the Supreme Court of Canada. It was also agreed that representatives of the territorial governments participate at annual constitutional and economic conferences in discussions of issues that, in the judgment of the Prime Minister of Canada, directly affect them.

We agreed to address the options for provincehood for Yukon and the Northwest Territories in future constitutional discussions. Agreement was also reached on adding issues of interest to English and French speaking linguistic minorities to the agenda of constitutional conferences. It is most important that it never be forgotten that the protection of linguistic minorities remains a fundamental obligation of the Parliament and the people of Canada.

It was agreed that the equality of the two linguistic communities of New Brunswick be reflected in the Constitution.

We have further agreed to accelerate the process of Senate reform. After proclamation of the Meech Lake Accord, a commission will be established comprising federal, provincial and territorial government representatives to conduct hearings and to report to Parliament and provincial legislatures prior to the First Ministers' Conference on Senate Reform to be held in British Columbia by the end of this year.

The commission will make proposals to give effect to the following objectives. The first is that the Senate should be elected. Second, it should provide for more equitable representation of the less populous provinces and the territories. The third is that the Senate should have effective powers to ensure the interests of residents of the less populous provinces and territories figure more prominently in national decision making, reflect Canadian duality, and strengthen the Government of Canada's capacity to govern on behalf of all citizens, while preserving the principle of the responsibility of the government to the House of Commons. I have undertaken to report semi-annually to this House on progress toward Senate reform.

First ministers agreed to seek adoption of an amendment on comprehensive Senate reform by July 1, 1995. If, by then, comprehensive Senate reform has not been achieved, Senate representation will be amended automatically pursuant to a formula that we have all agreed upon.

Premier Peterson, on behalf of Ontario, proposed that his province relinquish six Senate seats. Premier Buchanan and Premier McKenna joined in this nation building gesture in giving up two Senate seats each. These 10 seats would be distributed to the four western provinces and to Newfoundland and Labrador, bringing their representation in the Senate to eight senators each, the same number as Nova Scotia and New Brunswick would then have once the modifications are in full play.

This provides for some rebalancing of Senate representation in favour of the less populous provinces in case Senate reform is not achieved by the target date, and notwithstanding the tremendous pressures that we have placed upon ourselves, on the institutions, and on members of this House to pursue very actively the objectives of legitimate and thoughtful Senate reform.

With respect to a statement of constitutional recognitions, we took note of the repeated unsuccessful attempts over the last 20 years to draft a text acceptable to all concerned. We agreed, as part of our future constitutional agenda, to refer drafts submitted by the Government of Canada and by the Governments of Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Ontario, and British Columbia to an all-party committee of the House of Commons for public hearings starting July 16.

A report on the substance and the appropriate placement of the clause in the Constitution will be prepared for the consideration of first ministers at their constitutional conference later this year.

This, Mr. Speaker, in brief is a general outline of the main elements of the agreement.

With respect to the relationship of the distinct society clause in the Meech Lake Accord with the Charter of Rights, the concerns of Canadians were heard by the First Ministers and were considered with great care. The advice of eminent counsel was solicited. Based on that advice, First Ministers concluded that no amendment was required. We sought that advice to reassure all Canadians of our commitment to the Charter. For that reason, the opinion of counsel was appended to the communiqué.

In re-integrating into the constitutional family, Quebecers are saying yes to the statement of values contained in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. In its April 3, 1989, Speech from the Throne, the Government of Canada committed itself to strengthening the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in future constitutional negotiations. Accordingly, we welcome the commitment of all First Ministers to a continuing review of the Constitution and the Charter as part of the process of annual First Ministers' Conferences on the Constitution.

With respect to the amending process that we followed this past week, Canadians should know that by and large it is the same process that was followed in 1987, in 1982 and, indeed, with some variations all the way back to Charlottetown in 1865. We did not invent the process of the last few weeks or the last few years. We very clearly inherited a process. This process has proven to be increasingly unsatisfactory in several respects and must be changed.

There should, first and foremost, be ample opportunity for Canadians to participate in the process. I propose today that we change the rules of this House so that once this chapter in our constitutional evolution is over public hearings will in future become mandatory in advance of all constitutional amendments so that the people of Canada will truly be heard.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Another aspect of the process that must be changed is that set out by Article 39(2) of the 1982 Constitution. That is the clause that mandated the three-year ratification period. In retrospect, it is obvious that that length of time makes our reaching agreement more difficult rather than facilitates it. Even if you are Harry Houdini, you could not get it done, and that must be changed.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: With respect to the spending power, I wish to state unequivocally that neither the Meech Lake Accord nor the agreement reached here last week diminishes the federal government's commitments on regional disparities and equalization—including programs to pursue the commitments set out in Section 36(1) of the Constitution Act of 1982.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, we should soon be able to turn the page on this chapter of constitutional reform but we must not forget some of the lessons we learned from it. It is clear that there are serious misunderstandings in this country that we cannot afford to ignore. And so I appeal to all Canadians to join us in healing the damage in the months ahead. We need to rebuild a sense of community and, especially, to promote more contact amongst Canadians right across this country. On one level, we need to recapture the sense of tolerance and common interest and common purpose that lies at the root of our success as a nation. At another level, we need to reaffirm the advantages we enjoy as a bilingual, multicultural country in a shrinking world.

My government will take a series of national policy initiatives that will both help to refurbish national unity and respond to the economic and social needs of all Canadians. At a time when it is becoming increasingly important to have a knowledge and an understanding of foreign cultures and international affairs, Canada is in a unique position to promote its own interests while helping developing countries. While western Europe is merging into a new, supra-national entity, eastern Europe is undergoing rapid change, Asia is experiencing spectacular growth, democracy is taking root in Latin America and economic development in Africa is at a standstill, Canada has interests to promote and a remarkable contribution to make.

Blest with one of the strongest economies in the world, Canada is part of a handful of countries that have a real and decisive impact on the international scene. I have said before, in other circumstances—

[English]

We do not want to make Canada a superpower; we just want to make Canada a super country.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Mulroney: However, Mr. Speaker, all this would be impossible if we were not a united country.

As a Quebecer myself, I appeal to all Quebecers to join in the healing process. With the passage of the Meech Lake Accord, Quebec will achieve our essential objective: security for its cultural and linguistic distinctiveness. Quebec finally returns to the Canadian family by the front door. It was my dearest dream, because I could not conceive of Canada in all its splendour without Quebec. Today, Quebecers and all Canadians continue together again on the path to a brillant future.

[English]

Let us co-operate to reinforce the ties that bind this great country together.

Over the past several months, Canadians have said with one voice that they want to remain together in one Canada united and strong from St. John's to Victoria to the Arctic Islands. We have our differences in this country, even from time to time as we have them in this House.

But the history of Canada is one of perseverance and co-operation and tolerance. It is a history of aboriginal peoples, two major language groups and the multicultural mosaic, all seeking to respect each other's differences and each other's convictions.

I always felt that the greatest attribute of Canadian citizenship was the tolerance that it brought to each and every one of us, tolerance for minority groups, respect for others' religions, respect for others' values however different from our own, respect for the values that are brought to this country, to our shores by immigrants from all over the world. Canada began that way, and we have been enriched decade after decade. If we maintain that kind of vision, that kind of openness and that kind of spirit Canada will always remain a land of tolerance and opportunity. That is the commitment I am sure that exists on behalf of all members of all parties of this House of Commons.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Because from our pluralism comes a tolerant society, a society that is ready to look out on the world again, rather than in onto itself, unfailingly.

The challenge of nation-building did not end with the BNA Act in 1867. It did not end with patriation and the Charter in 1982. It did not end with the Meech Lake Accord. Nation-building is much more than writing a constitution. It continues every day in this House and in your house—in the cities, towns, villages and farms across this country. It is an act of the heart. May it ever be so.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, like most Canadians, my colleagues and I closely followed the efforts of the Prime Minister and the provincial premiers in recent days to seek a resolution to the present constitutional impasse. We believe that the final communiqué signed by the provincial premiers and the Prime Minister this past weekend can provide the basis for the successful resolution of that constitutional impasse.

[Translation]

We understand the importance of the 1987 constitutional amendment, the purpose of which was to make Quebec a full member of the constitutional family. With Quebec back in, we can fully discuss all the constitutional changes being called for by groups and regions throughout our country.

[English]

We regret, however, that the Prime Minister waited so long to call a meeting of First Ministers. Canadians, generally, will recall that we on this side of the House have been calling for a First Ministers Conference for some months.

We believed that only when the provincial premiers and the Prime Minister were sitting and talking together at the same table would the dynamic arise that could lead to a breakthrough. We believe that the Prime Minister's delay contributed to the crisis atmosphere that pervaded the recent discussions among the premiers and himself.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): This unfortunate crisis atmosphere has led to a situation whereby there is very little time for the provinces who have not yet approved the 1987 constitutional amendment to do so by June 23.

Another result of the Prime Minister's approach has been that the discussions have not been as open as they might have been. Therefore, the public feels that they have been excluded from the process. We share the concern of Canadians about the process that took place last week and about its lack of openness. Canadians feel, and rightly so, that they have been excluded from a process that affects their future and the future of their country.

We were encouraged, therefore, that the Prime Minister and the provincial premiers have identified the need to review the procedure for amending the Constitution.

We agree with Canadians that never again should we undergo this kind of stressful process. We believe that open public discussion and debate are essential to constitutional change.

• (1700)

Furthermore, we believe that, had the Prime Minister himself shown more leadership and begun to seek a resolution of the constitutional impasse sooner, rather than waiting for the proposals of Premier McKenna, we might well have resolved this matter some time ago. After all, constitutional negotiations are not labour negotiations.

Also, the Prime Minister spoke of taking steps to cure and to heal the divisions and damage that have arisen in our country in recent months. Canadians will recognize and remember what we consider to be the responsibility of the Prime Minister, the responsibility he must bear for the development of the unfortunate situation he now calls upon all of us to help cure.

[Translation]

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): Mr. Speaker, I hope that the New Brunswick, Manitoba and Newfoundland legislatures will accept this agreement and thereby will approve the 1987 constitutional amendment before June 23.

[English]

In his televised address to the nation on March 22, 1990, in response to the proposals of the Premier of New Brunswick, the Prime Minister said: "I know" that the accord "is not perfect." That is what he said. In fact, in 1987, we submitted a number of amendments which we believe would have strengthened and enriched the accord. We believe, if the Prime Minister had listened us to us seriously three years ago, that we might not have ended up in the current impasse.

The process of nation building in Canada is never easy. It is never complete. It is an ongoing challenge which faces every government and every individual elected to a position of trust in the country.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, we have succeeded in building a stronger, more united Canada by listening to the Canadian people and trying to meet their needs. We will reach consensus through dialogue and discussion. But to do so, Canadians across the land must become active participants.

[English]

This country, in order to exist, needs all its people and all its regions. We need each other to build the kind of country we want for ourselves and our children. We need the people of Quebec, just as we need the people of Atlantic Canada, Ontario, the west and the north.

Everyone in this country must realize, yet again, that Canada is greater than the sum of its parts. Canada is worth preserving and must be preserved. If the country stays together, anything and everything is possible by way of constructive change and improvement in our Constitution and the way we live together.

We are all aware, for example, of the constitutional concerns of women, aboriginal people, minority language groups, multicultural groups, and the north, as well as of those calling for a reformed Senate. If Canada does not remain united, everything we have been discussing by way of reform of our institutions and the enhancement of our identity as Canadians will be meaningless and irrelevant.

The pressures that we saw last week at the conference centre in Ottawa have been transferred from the premiers and the Prime Minister to the members of the legislatures of Newfoundland, New Brunswick, and Manitoba. The members of those legislatures now have the burden and the responsibility for the future of the 1987 accord and what it could mean for the future of our country. I am sure they take these responsibilities very seriously.

I was very impressed by the words of Clyde Wells, the Premier of Newfoundland, to his legislature, the House of Assembly of Newfoundland, this morning. He said: "I am confident that the members of this honourable House, and indeed all Newfoundlanders and Labradorans, will express their views on the basis of their own sincere convictions and with the future of Canada foremost in their minds and hearts."

These are wise words, words of sincerity and conviction. Let these words serve as inspiration for all of us here in the House and for all Canadians. Let us always put the future of Canada foremost in our minds and our hearts.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, as I rise to respond to the Prime Minister's statement today and as we watched the events of the last week and saw the kind of pressures and stress that the First Ministers and the Prime Minister underwent—and all of those who were not a part of that process underwent—certainly, I am not here to criticize those people who were involved, but to say constructively that we have to be honest and say that the process has not been a great reconciliation. It has been a possible accommodation.

I appreciate the Prime Minister's comments on process and I, too, would like to address that as well. As I begin, I want to state clearly that the New Democratic Party sees constitutional negotiation from the first principle that we must work to strive for the unity of the country.

As a party, we have consistently supported the five principles put forward by Quebec, including the distinct society. We also accept that the current round of constitutional negotiations were primarily to bring Quebec into the Constitution.

[Translation]

We heard many passionate speeches last week. Unfortunately, the constitutional process rarely gives concrete expression to the deep love these many participants showed for our country.

[English]

As I have watched the constitutional process unfold over the past few years, I have come to the conclusion that too often we fail to come to terms with our identity as a nation. We fail to take that unique identity and turn it into a constitution that will guide us over the next few years, the next decade, and beyond. After this week, what we and all Canadians have seen is that we have to rethink that process of doing that. The process of executive federalism that we saw in action this week has been shown in some ways to be a flawed process. We must re-examine that.

[Translation]

Before embarking on a difficult and divisive constitutional process, we did not mange to achieve a national consensus on the identity of Canada.

[English]

People look at Canada and define it by our identity as a vast northern country, with the Yukon and the Northwest Territories; the existence of two separate groups in the country, identified by the distinctiveness of Quebec, its language and its culture; the existence of aboriginal people as a vital part of our society as the first nations of the country; and, the emerging nature of our multicultural and our multi-racial society.

[Translation]

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Ms. McLaughlin: I deeply believe that our national identity, as defined by the characteristics I just mentioned, must be the basis of our Constitution. Even if we accept that this was the Quebec round of negotiations, and we do, some clauses of the Meech Lake Accord do not take into account the aspirations of other people and groups, in particular the North, native people, women and ethnic groups.

• (1710)

There has been talk of closing the circle of Confederation. I strongly hope that the signature of Quebec allowing Quebec to be a full participant in the Constitution that we saw on Saturday will begin that process, but the circle of Confederation will not be closed until the aboriginal people, northerners, women, and all Canadians become participants in the constitutional process.

The Prime Minister spoke to a commitment to opening up that process. I remind the Prime Minister that in this document it is the Prime Minister who has the ability to say when the territories and aboriginal people shall be present at the table. I will urge the Prime Minister—and I will continue to raise this issue with him—that aboriginal people and the territories be full participants in First Ministers' Conferences.

Particularly, Mr. Speaker, I want to mention that I hope when the first ministers meet in 1990 on the Canada clause aboriginal people are there when their rights are being discussed.

About a month ago the Charest report was released. It seems as quickly as that report was put together as a result of public hearings—it was in a short time frame—it heard about 160 witnesses. It was also the result of the hearing of some 800 briefs and presentations. The report was signed and endorsed by all parties. The Charest committee had a process and a result that we New Democrats could endorse.

However, it seems that in this process we had two parallel activities going on: the Charest report on one hand and the events of last week that we must say bore little or no relationship to each other.

[Translation]

The recommendations of the Charest Report are very similar to those the New Democratic Party made in 1987. Its recommendations are almost identical to a resolution the NDP adopted last December in Winnipeg.

[English]

The NDP has fought consistently for improvements to Meech Lake, recognizing and accepting the five important principles of Quebec. The agreement signed on Saturday that we are talking about today contains some of those improvements but not all. The victory has been at least getting the concerns on the table and in having the discussions take place.

I want to remind all members of this House that the issues of the aboriginal people, women, multi-racial and multi-heritage communities did not get on the table just because of us. They got on the table because those groups stood up and demanded to be heard. Now we as politicians must listen to those voices and ensure that they are incorporated in future constitutional talks.

In the strongest possible terms I want to say that as much as we appreciated that those issues were on the table for discussion and appear in this communiqué, my party and I cannot endorse the process as it took place last week.

What we witnessed was a nation literally with its faces pressed against the glass of the TV to try to get some bit of information not just about the future of the Constitution but about the future of the country. We saw women and aboriginal people marching outside the Conference Centre waiting as 11 people decided their fate, but they were not included.

We saw the elected Premier of Yukon and the elected Government Leader of the Northwest Territories on the outside of those negotiations and not included. We did not see openness. We did not see openness, we did not see consultation, and we did not see a public process.

[Translation]

I was saddened and discourged by the attempt I saw last week to reject the process and the accord. I do not reject the accord; it is the process I reject.

I do not reject the accord because the unity of this country has become the key concern. We must go beyond constitutional discussions and deal with other issues.

In conclusion, while I feel sad and discouraged, I say yes to the imperfect agreement reached last week. I cannot accept the events that took place last week.

[English]

I appreciate the Prime Minister's comment about mandatory public consultation, but we must also listen to those consultations and include their results in the final resolution. All of us must work, as politicians and as Canadians, to bring this country together.

The discussions on the future of our country have not ended. Let us strive as a united country to include all Canadians from sea to sea to sea in these discussions.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, with the permission of all hon. members of the House and pursuant to their remarks and mine, I would like to table the document called The First Ministers' Meeting on the Constitution: Final Communiqué, June 9, 1990.

[Translation]

With a French version, of course, to match the English, "The First Ministers' Meeting on the Constitution: Final Communiqué, June 9, 1990."

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES RESTRAINT ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-69, an act to amend certain statutes to enable restraint of government expenditures be read a third time and passed.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, before I was interrupted by that tumultuous round of applause, I was speaking about the cuts in transfer payments to the provinces as contemplated in Bill C-69. I am sorry that the Minister of Transport is otherwise occupied.

As I was indicating, the cutting of these EPF transfers will hurt universities and colleges in many other ways. I would like to list some of them. First, the lack of funds will mean that new buildings will not be built, causing further overcrowding of both students and faculty. This overcrowding will force universities to start restricting employment levels, thereby reducing accessibility to higher education in Canada.

The lack of funds will mean that laboratories will not be updated and modernized and that library budgets will be too meagre to meet demands placed on libraries by students and faculty. Schools will not have the funds to hire new faculty. Thus the student-teacher ratio, which has increased dramatically over the last few years, will continue to increase.

For example, while the number of full-time university and college students in Canada increased by 31 per cent from 1977 to 1988, the number of full-time professors has increased by only 10.5 per cent. While everyone realizes that there has been more part-time faculty, the fact is that more full-time faculty has not been retained in the numbers that are commensurate with the increase in enrolment.

Despite the increase in enrolment, this government is slashing EPF transfers to the provinces, thereby debilitating the province's ability to pay the money to these universities and colleges. In fact, according to the estimates of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada, about one-fifth of all federal program spending reductions over the next five years, as announced in the February 20 budget, will fall on transfers that are in support of post-secondary education.

Of course, with this government we can expect more cuts. The figure may be inaccurate because maybe in next year's budget we will have even more. At the moment, that is the way it looks from the figures that the Minister of Finance presented, as analysed by the Association of Universities and Colleges.

In addition to those policies, this government is pursuing the goods and services tax. This bill is one that the goods and services tax will affect in that, in addition to cutting the payment to the provinces as I previously indicated, the beneficiaries of those payments will now be paying out additional funds in the form of the goods and services tax. For some of those reasons the government of Alberta has taken a firm stand against this tax. It has recently come to my attention that the it has published the book Protecting Alberta's Future, Why We Oppose the Federal Goods and Services Tax.

The book is a government publication and I urge you to read it. It is published under the name of the Hon. Don Getty, Premier of the province of Alberta, and the Hon. Dick Johnston, the Treasurer of that province. It talks about the evils of the goods and services tax, evils we have been preaching about in this House. Unfortunately our pleas have fallen on deaf ears with respect to this matter and in terms of the government listening to us.

Here we have a case where the premier of one of the provinces has gone to the length of publishing a pamphlet outlining his difficulties with this tax. The disappointing thing is that the members from Alberta in this House have not been able to echo their premier's views on the goods and services tax. We have not heard about this publication from those members. Why have they not been criticizing this tax the way we have been when their own premier says that the tax is no good.

The only two members I have heard suggest that the goods and services tax is bad and ought not to proceed are now sitting on this side of the House as independents, the hon. member for Calgary Northeast and the hon. member for Calgary Southeast. And I understand the only reason they are sitting there is because they got the heave ho from the Conservative caucus. I see the whip is here, and I am surprised he would have countenanced this particular injustice to those members who, after all, were seeking to represent the interests of their premier in his opposition to this tax as outlined in this book.

I am not going to quote extensively from the book but I am sure that the arguments advanced in it are ones that support our objections to the goods and services tax. I am delighted to see we have an ally in the form of a Conservative premier in the province of Alberta. I am very sorry that the Conservative members from Alberta do not feel free to speak their minds on this issue and criticize this tax.

I would enjoy hearing from the parliamentary secretary, or any of the other members from Alberta. I know that we have the views of two on the record.

Let me summarize again, going back to Bill C-69 and our problems with this bill.

We have a case where the government is cutting the transfers to the provinces for education. I have to ask the question, are these policies of cut, cut, cut, slash, slash, slash that the government has engaged in those of a government which has a clear vision of its country, a clear vision for the future for educational purposes of its young citizens? I suggest it is not.

Would a government with foresight and intelligence seeking to invest in the country's future pass legislation like Bill C-69? I suggest it would not. It would not even propose it.

I suggest that the government is not interested in securing our future through education. Instead, it is determined to cut the deficit at all costs without taking into consideration any of the long-term ramifications of its actions. I suggest it is cutting the deficit of our country in the wrong place.

How is this country supposed to compete in the world? We keep hearing from the Prime Minister that under the free trade deal Canada will move forward to greater competition in the world and will do extremely well and we will prosper under this deal.

How can we do that if we cut back on education payments, if we cut back on the amount of money that we invest in our young people. This particular government seems indifferent to that fact, notwithstanding its boasting about the free trade agreement.

What we are doing by these cuts is saying to our universities and colleges: "Cut back your enrolment, reduce the number of students, lower the quality of your education because we cannot afford to pay on the basis we have been paying in the past." That is the message the government is sending and I suggest it is the wrong message and it ought not to be sending it.

It is saying that for libraries and student facilities in universities, cut back. We cannot afford to have lavish expenditures on libraries; we cannot afford expenditures on classrooms and laboratories; we are going to have to cram more students into the space. You are going to have to cut back on enrolment; you are going to have to provide less faculty, fewer books, fewer quality books, and so on. That is the message the government sends. Cut, cut, cut.

I suggest it is doing it in the wrong area. The country cannot compete if it is restricted to its old ways. The government is cutting initiative with this bill. It is reducing the opportunity for expansion of educational horizons, educational opportunities and for education urgently required by students, younger persons starting out in life, and for more senior persons returning to school for educational purposes when we should be competing in a world-wide environment.

I suggest the policy adopted by the government is short-sighted and wrong and I urge the minister to withdraw this bill.

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Madam Speaker, I listened with interest to the comments of the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. Obviously, his speech really was taken to heart because once he stood up the House cleared of many members. Having said that, I would like to comment on some of the things he mentioned.

The member is really concerned about the EPF transfer. He is a member from the province of Ontario, just as I am. In the province of Ontario this year the government was able to balance its budget, pay down some debt by about $400 million, set aside $300 million for a special fund for capital projects in education, increase spending by 7 per cent, increase funding for education by 7 per cent and increase health care funding by 12.8 per cent.

The federal government keeps its expenditure increases to 3 per cent. Does the member for Kingston and the Islands in the province of Ontario agree that Ontario should contribute and help deal with the financial problems of Canada? Does the hon. member agree that the deficit is a problem that should be addressed by the federal government? If so, does he agree that all sectors of the Canadian economy, all those who help spend taxpayers' dollars should contribute to help control the expenditure problem of the federal government? I would be interested in hearing the member's comment on that situation.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, it is delightful to hear the hon. member for Ontario cite statistics showing the wonderful record of the Liberal government in office in Ontario. Like him, I am delighted that I live in a province which is blessed with a government that cares for the people, that believes in education, that believes in the importance of education for its people, and delivers on its promises.

The Ontario government of Premier Peterson promised in the last campaign that it would improve educational opportunities, that it would reduce the deficit in Ontario and bring the Ontario economy into a surplus position. It has delivered on its promises. What a comparison to the government that he supports in this House. It has a most disgraceful record of broken promises right down the line.

The hon. member says Ontario should help with the federal deficit. The responsibility for the federal deficit should be shouldered by the government here in this House, not by cutting transfers to the provinces. I think he may have missed the boat. He cited the example of the province that is best able to maintain itself in spite of these cuts. The purpose of the transfers is to equalize opportunity across Canada. If we cut transfer payments to provinces that cannot afford to maintain educational facilities without these moneys, we are going to make it extremely difficult for them to match the opportunities available in Ontario.

The purpose of transfer payments is to equalize opportunity across Canada. Cutting the transfer payments is not equalizing, it is destabilizing. It is unequalizing because, in a province that does not have the financial resources the province of Ontario happens to have at the moment, the educational programs cannot be maintained on that basis.

I urge the hon. member, if he thinks the payments that have been increased on education in Ontario are so great, to go to the universities and colleges and ask what they are getting in the circumstances. They are being faced with additional costs imposed by the province of Ontario and the federal government that have to be paid out of the 7 per cent increase given to education. They have to pay the goods and services tax out of those funds starting next January. It is fine to say that education is exempt but there are many things that are not exempt, and the hon. member knows that. That will have to be taken out of the 7 per cent.

There are, in addition, the increases in the unemployment insurance that this government has imposed through its budget. Those payments are made by the universities and colleges in respect of all their employees at very significant additional cost to them.

In addition, there is the new provincial tax which has replaced the OHIP premiums and the employment tax in Ontario which will have to be paid. There is additional money to be paid for equalization programs within the colleges and universities to bring wage rates for women in the universities into line with those paid to men. Those programs are also costing a significant sum to colleges.

So even if they were to receive a full 7 per cent, before they can start allocating that money, statutory claims on that money will reduce the effective rate to a very low one. I am not being critical of the province of Ontario, but the 7 per cent is barely enough to keep any progress going in universities and colleges in Ontario.

If the hon. member would take the time to meet with some heads of colleges and discuss these issues with them, I am sure he would find, as I have, that the situation is much worse than he describes, that money is urgently required.

The cuts proposed by the government in Bill C–69 are seriously hurting the ability of the province of Ontario to make the payments that are required to these places of learning when they are facing the Draconian measures imposed by this government. It is time to stop this whittling away of the transfers, to change this policy around and to get this bill out of here.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean–Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, this is the third time that the Conservative government has attacked Established Programs Financing, EPF. Altogether since 1986, the sizable sum of approximately $31.1 billion has been withheld, of which $22.2 billion was for health care and $8.9 billion for higher education. In his most interesting speech, for which I congratulate him, the hon. member said that the government is obsessed with cuts, cuts here, cuts there, and of course services, both for post-secondary education and for health, would suffer because the provinces must find the necessary funds in these established programs or elsewhere, that is, from taxation. That means the provinces will have to get more money from their own taxpayers to pay for these services that we all recognize as essential for a country that wants to keep our commitment to our youth and the importance of a good education and proper health care.

My question for the hon. member is fairly simple, given the importance of Bill C-69, the impact it will have on the provinces and on the taxpayers in general of these provinces, I wonder if he does not agree with me that since the provinces were not consulted before the bill was brought forward, since the government is unilaterally deciding to cut already established programs that require prior consultation if they are to be cut, I wonder if he agrees with me that while the courts are being asked to rectify, change or correct this measure, it would be better for the government and this Parliament to suspend discussion on Bill C-69 until the courts determine if it is constitutional.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier for his question. Yes I agree with him that the government would be well advised to withdraw this bill now before the House while court proceedings on its legality are under way, perhaps all the way to the Supreme Court of Canada. Quite obviously if the government goes on with the study of this bill the Supreme Court might declare it unconstitutional. I also believe that the changes introduced by this bill, where certain provinces are considered as being very rich and others poor and where transfers to some provinces are reduced while others are not, are a new attack against federal-provincial programs.

We would be better off with a program under which all provinces would get similar payments determined under a fair, equitable and written agreement. The new program advocated in Bill C-69 is a far cry from that. It is an indication of failure on the part of the government.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The time for questions and comments has expired.

Point of Order

[English]

I wish to inform the House that because of the ministerial statement, Government Orders will be extended by 51 minutes.

POINT OF ORDER

FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE—FINAL COMMUNIQUÉ

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I have not had a chance to have any consultations with my colleagues, but just a few moments ago the Prime Minister tabled the final communiqué of the First Ministers' meeting on the Constitution. I wonder if you would seek unanimous consent to have this particular document appended to Hansard as opposed to it simply appearing some day in the appropriate papers. I am seeking unanimous consent, Madam Speaker, as I think it is of sufficient importance that it ought to be part of today's proceedings.

I apologize that I did not have a chance to raise this with my hon. colleagues, but I do think it is of sufficient value.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, during the Prime Minister's speech I made the recommendation to the government House leader that the document be tabled. I would certainly want to amend that, if possible, if the House agrees, to have the document appended to today's Hansard. It would be easier to find and easier to refer to when constitutional questions are raised.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, these things are usually decided through consultation but it is not a mammoth document and I think it would be relatively easy to print. It is a very important document for all of us. If it represents our way through the maze to a Canada that is more united and stronger for the future, then perhaps history should record it as an appendix to today's Hansard. We would give our consent as well to that initiative.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion made by the hon. member for Kamloops. I understand there is unanimous consent.

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

[Editor's Note: For text of above document, see Appendix.]

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-69, an act to amend certain statutes to enable restraint of government expenditures, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I am delighted to have an opportunity to say a few words on the final stage of Bill C-69, but I think there has been a mistake made in the title of the bill. I should have drawn this to the attention of the government House leader earlier. It says that Bill C-69 is an act to amend certain statutes to enable restraint of government expenditures. Now, that is not very clear and perhaps we should have amended that. It should read that this is an act that attacks the sick people of the country, or that this is an act that attacks young people, or that this is an act that attacks students, or that this is an act that attacks the poorest of Canadian society. It is an attack on research and development at our universities. It is an attack on our health care system and will likely result in the creation of a two-tier health system.

It is an euphemism, as my hon. friend for Winnipeg—St. James says. The title of the act is not a very clear indication of what the government is doing. It is a form of doublespeak or mis-speak in which you say one thing and really mean another.

It sounds sick to say that this is an attack on the sick, but it is true. Anyone who has taken the time to look at what Bill C-69 does knows that it limits support for health care in Canada. It seriously curtails support for hospitals across the country. It tells the provinces that we are not going to share, in the way we usually do, in the support and development of Canada's health and medicare systems.

The province of British Columbia believes that this is even unconstitutional and is taking the federal government to court on this matter.

One might ask why Canada is involved in health care anyway. That is a provincial responsibility. Why is the federal government participating in this system at all, as it does in post-secondary education? Well, the truth of the matter is that we want to have in our country a health care system that is the same in Newfoundland and Prince Edward Island as it is in Alberta or British Columbia so that no matter where a Canadian citizen happens to live in this country, they have access to quality health care, just as they ought have to have access to quality post-secondary education, whether that means a technical school, a training institute, a vocational school, a college or university. That is why the federal government is involved.

For the first time in decades this Conservative government is saying that we are about to abandon that support, that we are not going to be providing the same level of support to the provinces for health care or post-secondary education or social services.

It is very serious when you pick out certain groups like the sick and the elderly and begin to attack them. More and more every year the predominance of people seeking support in our hospitals are those who are getting on in age, and the greying of Canada is a reflection of increasing health costs. At the same time this government says that we are not prepared to provide that type of support as we have done in the past.

Let us recognize what this actually means. This is very bad news for places that I represent. For example, in Kamloops the Royal Inland Hospital serves a vast area of central British Columbia. Here is what it is experiencing today. Wards are closed off, padlocked closed, because there simply are insufficient funds to run a hospital ward properly. There are over 400 special needs children in Kamloops requiring special therapy with no opportunity of receiving it whatsoever. As a matter of fact, the wait is three to four years. That is what is going on in Kamloops.

We have a waiting list for elective surgery of nearly 3,000 people. Nearly 3,000 people who need surgery are on a waiting list months and months long. A lot of people cannot wait months and months.

People who have a requirement for heart surgery are often told to go to the United States because there are simply no facilities in British Columbia to care for them.

We have serious shortages of nurses. We have problems with practical nurses and nursing aids who are being under-utilized. Doctors are calling for a fairer fee schedule and are now at loggerheads on a battleground with the provincial government. Not only do we have a shortage of nurses, but nurses are calling out to be more involved in the health care system. Psychiatric and community health care nurses are right now very close to a strike situation because of the inadequate and unreasonable compensation they are receiving.

I could go on and on about the health care crisis, not only in the country in general, not only in the province of British Columbia in general, but specifically in the community of Kamloops where there are nearly 3,000 on the waiting list for surgery.

How does this government respond? It curtails financial support for health care. That is a direct attack on sick people. I do not think Canadians realize that is going on. If they did, they would be feeling very much differently about—well they could not feel much differently about this government. About 85 per cent now would like to turf it out. That would be about 95 per cent if people understood what the government is doing to those people in our country who are sick today and will be sick in the future.

That is not the end of it. Bill C-69 went to committee. When legislation goes to committee, the idea is to bring in witnesses from around the country who are experts in education, health care and various forms of social services. We ask these very knowledgeable experts what they think about this legislation. Is it good legislation? Is it bad legislation? Can it be improved?

Every witness who was brought in to review Bill C-69 was totally against the bill. They went on in their own areas of expertise to lay out whole sets of reasons why this bill should be torn up and abandoned; not improved, changed or modified, but abandoned totally.

When the most knowledgeable witnesses in the country on health care, education, and social services are virtually unanimous that this is bad legislation which should be rejected, one would think the government would do the honourable thing, pull the legislation, and start over again. But did it do that? No. It is jamming it through the House of Commons knowing full well that with its majority it can probably get it through. Then it will jam it into the Senate, the Senate will have a look at it, and so on.

We have seen that with piece after piece of legislation. Whether it is Draconian changes to unemployment insurance, clawing back pensions from people who have provided for their pension years, or clawing back family allowances from certain families, on all sorts of Draconian measures the government simply uses its majority muscle to ignore information and the experts who are knowledgeable about these areas in a father knows best or government knows best view.

When every witness says this is bad legislation, one would think that the government would at least pay some attention to it.

I am going to quote from one of the witnesses, Mr. George Pedersen, Chairman of the Board of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada. This is now moving toward post-secondary education. This man represents 89 different degree granting institutes across Canada. In other words, this is someone who speaks on behalf of tens of thousands of students and thousands of faculty and staff members from right across the country. He said:

> The combined results of Bill C-69, and Bill C-96 passed in 1986, mean that federal cash transfers in support of post-secondary education may well disappear before the year 2000 in Quebec and Ontario, and before the 2010 in all the other provinces. Yet there is nothing on the horizon to replace this cornerstone of federal support for post-secondary education.
> Bill C-69 imposes a two-year freeze on per capita transfers to the provinces in support of post-secondary education and health. The bill removes inflation protection from those transfers precisely during the period in which the GST will, by the government's own admission, cause a one-time jump in inflation.

The Chairman of the Board of the Association of Universities and Colleges of Canada is completely condemning this legislation and forewarning Canadians that in all provinces of Canada, aside from Ontario and Quebec, by the year 2010 the federal government will not be making any cash payments to post-secondary education or health care. They will be gone by the year 2000 in Quebec and Ontario. That is not far off. It is just a handful of years. There will not be a single bit of contribution.

Do we want the country to abandon its support for its most valuable natural resource: its young people? Who is going to be hurt by this legislation? The students in our institutions are primarily the ones who will be casualties in this battle between the federal and provincial governments in terms of funding. That is to say nothing of the faculty and the staff who work in these institutions. Of course that means that research and development programs will suffer. We will be setting ourselves back significantly.

If we look at the evidence we find that the United States is investing significantly more in its post-secondary education system on a per capita basis than we are. Its students are getting a better deal, to say nothing about the students in western Europe and countries like Japan. Those countries have recognized that the most valuable and significant investment they can make is in young people, in the development of their talents and expertise, because that is where the action of the future is going to occur. Those are the people who will be leading the way in industry, business, education, politics, religion, and the arts. That is the best investment. Yet this government is curtailing investment in students and in our universities and colleges. It is cutting back at the same time as all of our competitors are investing heavily.

• (1750)

That is madness. That is taking us as a country on a suicidal course to failure. We have to be able to compete with these other countries and, if we do not have the trained young people with the necessary expertise and background, we will be unable to do so. That is why some of us feel so strongly that to proceed with Bill C-69 now is absolute madness. One would have to look long and hard to find justification for curtailing expenditures on young people and our post-secondary institutions, to say nothing about challenging medicare.

One may ask what I mean when I say "challenging medicare" and what I mean when I talk about a two-tier health care system. That is what I suggested the bill should be called, an act for the creation of a two-tier health care system in Canada.

When representatives of the Canadian Medical Association appeared before the committee they said that this will create a two-tier health care system in Canada. They said that the richer provinces, the have provinces, would likely be able to sustain a reasonable level of health care but that there was no way for the poorer provinces. If you happen to be living in a poorer province your access to quality health care will be significantly less than if you live in a wealthier province. That is their definition of a two-tier system.

We must also look carefully at what is happening in Alberta and Quebec, but primarily in Alberta where increasing numbers of people are advocating a two-tier system. That means that we would have a general public health care system as we have today: regardless of who you are, where you live, what your income is, as a Canadian citizen you will have the right to access quality health care. However, if you have money and you can buy private health care, you will get special care and everybody else will be left with public health care.

We have seen that in England. That is now being advocated by a number of leading political voices from Alberta. I read with horror recently that Michael Walker of the Fraser Institute, that conservative think-tank in Vancouver—

Mr. Harvard: Ultra-conservative.

Mr. Riis: Ultra-conservative in some respects but just conservative in my mind. He claims, in a series of articles written last year, that the United States health care model was superior to that of Canada. There is no one in this House who has not experienced, through our constituents, the horrors of the American health care system. If you have an accident down there and you do not have proper insurance, God help you.

Nearly 40 million Americans do not have any health care coverage whatsoever. They just cannot afford it. If you are picked up by an ambulance there they ask you if you have a credit card first. If you do not have a credit card you might not get the kind of care that you would expect in a western country.

For the Fraser Institute to suggest that this ought to be a model for Canada is absolutely frightening. He goes on to say that we should have that type of a system. It is scary that the conservative think-tank is now suggesting that we have private health care, health care for profit.

From the very beginning my party has fought and struggled for the principle that you ought not to profit from sick people; you ought not to profit from someone's ill health. I think one of the things that makes Canada stand out among nations around the world is that one of the rights of being a Canadian citizen is that you have access to quality health care.

Funding to post-secondary education, health care, and the Canada Assistance Plan, which directly funds the various social services systems that we have in the provinces, is going to be capped.

This is all happening at the same time as other things are happening. For example, the staff of the Bank of Canada gave itself a nice increase the other day. We think John Crow, the great inflation fighter, the model for the country, gave himself an increase since 1987 of 35 per cent. This is all secret, as you well know, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Milliken: Tory times are hard times.

Mr. Riis: Tory times are tough times for some people, but if you happen to be a privileged person like John Crow these are very good times. What is sinister about this is that we do not know the facts. This is all secret. We cannot get the information. This ought not to be the case.

We also find out that while the heads of our largest Crown corporations are telling their employees to take cuts in pay or make very modest demands, they are giving themselves some nice increases. One of the vice-presidents of CN, while asking his employees to take a 4 per cent increase in pay, himself last year took a 39 per cent increase in pay. This is an example of don't do as I do, do as I say.

This is to say nothing about some of our senior public servants. The Minister of Finance is saying that we have got to hold the line, yet some of our senior public servants were getting increases over the past three years of 31 per cent.

There is a lot the government could cut. It could cut the size of cabinet. It could cut the size of the Prime Minister's Office, the largest PMO in Canadian history in terms of personnel. It could certainly make cuts to the government propaganda that we are bombarded with almost on a weekly basis telling us how good the GST is and so on.

Speaking of cuts, what about cutting some of the breaks that our large, profitable corporate friends receive? This is not a criticism of our large corporate friends. It is a criticism of the government that permits thousands and thousands of large, profitable corporations to pay no income tax at all year after year.

Since those corporations do not pay any income tax at all, the government has to get some money some place. What does it do? It uses Bill C-69 to attack the sick and students by curtailing funds to our hospitals and post-secondary institutions.

You can gather from my comments, Mr. Speaker, that we do not support this bill. The New Democratic Party is opposed to this bill. As was every single witness who appeared before the committee, we are in complete and total opposition to this course of madness. That is the only way I can describe it.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I was interested in listening to the member for Kamloops and his usual erudite comments, but I was listening in vain. I sat here waiting and waiting for the magic formula that I was expecting to come out in this speech, that is, his clarion call to the other place to reject this bill when it gets there.

I know there is another step that has to be taken first, but he and I know that we get out-voted in this House on a fairly regular basis. We oppose this bill and the New Democratic Party opposes this bill, but it seems that in spite of our pleas many of the government members will vote for this bill.

I know that the member has found a new interest in the Senate. His party has changed its policy on the Senate. It no longer wants to abolish the Senate. It wants to preserve the Senate. It supports the Senate. It wants the Senate to chuck out government bills right, left, and centre. I wonder if it is now his party's view that the Senate ought to reject this bill if and when it gets there. I wonder if he could tell us about that.

Just so that he does not have to concentrate on one question that he might find a little embarrassing, I will ask a second one. The second question he could deal with is about the recent increases in Public Service and Crown corporation salaries which in the view of our party, as discussed today in Question Period, far exceed the wage rates the government is paying to other employees and far exceed the government's own guidelines. I wonder if he would care to comment on government waste in this regard as well.

• (1800)

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I am always pleased to respond to my hon. friend from Kingston and the Islands. His questions are not necessarily that thoughtful, often, but interesting nevertheless.

Let's tackle the last one first. He asked me what I feel about the increases that senior managers at the deputy minister level, including their bonuses, received in the last year or so.

I was looking at a graph which shows that over the past three years deputy ministers and senior managers received compensation increases of 31.2 per cent. To be fair, that is not across the board, but to a select number of the senior mandarins in our system. That is not bad, Mr. Speaker, when you consider that over that period of time almost everybody else received about a 10 per cent increase. The deputy ministers and senior managers received in excess of 30 per cent.

It is that kind of symbolism that bothers people. While the government states that it is trying to hold the line, we find out that there were many senior officials who received these huge increases in pay.

This is not an increase to a salary of $30,000, nothing of the sort. Quite the contrary. As a matter of fact, if we compare the rates of our senior civil service to those in the United States, ours are significantly higher. They are getting increases and bonuses on top of relatively high salaries to begin with. However, that is only one small area, but symbolically valuable.

More appropriate is what happened in the Bank of Canada, where all of the senior staff got huge increases, including the Governor of the Bank of Canada himself. That was what bothered people most.

My hon. friend talks about his friends in the Senate, the persons who just voted themselves a $153 a day bonus to show up for work. If they simply show up and sit there, they get $153 on top of all their other regular pay.

I want to clarify a point that my hon. friend made. He was not certain whether or not I oppose the Senate. He will remember very vividly, I suspect, just a few days ago when we had a vote in the House of Commons, and I might say at the NDP's urging, questioning whether we should even vote to provide operating funds for the Senate. We raised this and we decided to have a vote on providing operating funds for the Senate. I noticed with interest that all of the Conservatives voted in favour of supplying that money to the Senate to enable them to operate. All the Liberals in the House that day voted in favour of support for the Senate, but no New Democrats. The New Democrats voted unanimously against supplying a single cent of operating money for the Senate.

I do not know how much clearer you can get in terms of how you feel about the Senate.

Ms. Clancy: But you want them to stop the GST?

Mr. Riis: No. I said our position is to vote at every opportunity no money for the Senate. The fact that they are sitting there and are now getting an extra $153 a day, let them do something, particularly the Liberals over there, because the majority of the people in the Senate right now are Liberal appointees. We think that the Liberals sometimes speak two languages. I would not say double speak—yes I would, double speak.

On the one hand, they say that they are opposed to the GST, but I guess they did not mean the Liberals in the Senate were opposed to the GST. The Liberals here voted against it, but already in the Senate the Liberals have voted in favour, in principle, of the 7 per cent goods and services tax. We are suggesting to those Liberals in the Senate to do what their colleagues in the House of Commons did and vote against the GST, because it means that the bill will be killed. We will save the taxpayers of Canada an incredible nightmare, not only in terms of compliance, if you are a small business operator, but also the nightmare of having to pay out hundreds and perhaps thousands of dollars in additional tax every year.

I make an appeal to my hon. friend, the member for Kingston and the Islands to wander down the hallway, talk to some of his Liberal pals in the Senate and ask them to do what they do in the House, and say: "If we are going to say as a political party that we oppose the GST, surely to goodness you folks in there should now vote against it".

I encourage my hon. friend to do just that. While it is there, let's take advantage of this group. However, it seems like those appeals are going in one ear and out the other, as far as the Senators are concerned, because they do not seem to be taking the opportunity to defeat the GST very seriously.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): A supplementary question, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): I would not call my question supplementary, Mr. Speaker. I do not know whether you noticed, but the hon. member for Kamloops did not answer the question I asked him. He made a lovely speech about the Senate again, trying to defend his party's cock-eyed policies in this regard.

On the one hand, they came in here with their little motion the other day suggesting we cut the expenditure to the Senate, while on the other hand, his leader is in Montreal trumpeting that she wants the Senate to block this bill. Honestly, Mr. Speaker, they cannot have it both ways. Either the Senate has its money so that it can operate and block the bill, or it does not get its money and it closes down, and we get rid of it.

The member for Kamloops has it all mucked up. His leader on the one hand says, "block the bill". He, on the other hand, says, "close her down". I really wish the party would make up its mind. However, I will leave that debate aside for the time being.

I will go back to the question I put to the hon. member. Does he now call on the Senate to block Bill C-69, if and when it gets there? This bill is undoubtedly going to pass in this House because undoubtedly the members opposite are going to vote for it when the vote takes place. I am asking the hon. member for Kamloops, never mind telling us all about his views on the Senate, will he call on the Senate to block this bill as his party has called on the Senate to block the goods and services tax bill, Bill C-62? That is all I ask, and I would be delighted to hear his answer.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There are 30 seconds left for the hon. member's questions or comments. The hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, let me respond this way. We had a motion before the House a week ago reminding the House that the duties of the Senate are clearly understood, that they have the right and the constitutional authority to stop legislation. I do not like that idea, but that is what they have. As a matter of fact, that is why we brought in the motion to do away with them and put them out of their misery. At the moment, they do have the authority.

Every group that I am aware of that appeared before the committee on Bill C-69 has asked in one way or the other for this bill to be stopped. I am hoping that there will be consistency with my Liberal colleagues. We have not voted on this last stage. I assume that my Liberal friends will vote against this legislation. I assumed that they would also vote against the Senate, but they did not do that, so they surprise me from time to time.

However, I am going to assume that the Liberals will vote against this legislation because it is so Draconian. If they do, then I will also assume that their colleagues in the Senate will. Presumably, they act as a group. When I say Liberals, Mr. Speaker, I do not differentiate between Liberals who sit here, Liberals who sit there, or Liberals who sit in Ontario, Quebec, or anywhere else. Liberals presumably take the Liberal Party position. That is not the case. They seem to take different positions, depending on different parts of the country. I am assuming that however the Liberals vote here, the Liberals in the Senate will vote accordingly.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The questions and comments are terminated. On debate, the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, we just heard another evasive answer from the NDP whose members avoid the question all the time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Kamloops on a point of order.

Mr. Riis: Since we are talking about the Senate, and whether people respond or not, it appears that we have a new senator who has been appointed. Mr. Waters from Alberta has apparently been appointed to the Senate. The dynamics are already starting to change.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier on debate.

Mr. Gauthier: I am sure the Speaker will feel a warm sentiment towards that appointment.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to participate in this debate briefly, as I did at second reading, and make it clear that the Liberal caucus will be voting against this measure. We will, as we have all along this process, keep telling the government how the proposal before the House is negative and bad.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, in my opening comments I would like explain that the purpose of Bill C-69 is to restrain the government's public spending by a two-year freeze on federal transfers to the provinces under Established Programs Financing, including post-secondary education and health care.

Second, this bill proposes to cap federal transfers under the Canada Assistance Plan to Ontario, British Columbia and Alberta at 5 per cent for the next two years.

Third, Bill C-69 proposes to eliminate the Canadian Exploration Incentive Program and finally, it proposes a two-year freeze on Public Utilities Income Tax Transfers to the provinces.

Mr. Speaker, two aspects of particular interest to me are of course Established Programs Financing which has a direct impact on Canadians because it affects health care and postsecondary education, and the Canada Assistance Plan which is also very important to Canadians because it plan helps families or individuals facing serious problems due to poverty to cope with these problems.

Mr. Speaker, cutbacks in transfers to the provinces for post-secondary education and health care—in fact, the three provinces that are most severely affected are Alberta, British Columbia and my own province Ontario—will force these provinces to accept a reduction in services, reduction in service quality or a reduction in access to these services, or if the provinces so decide, they will have to substantially increase the provincial tax burden of each resident. According to the figures I have before me, in the three provinces in question, the tax bill for each citizen will increase $576 during the next five years.

This is the third time, Mr. Speaker, that this government has attacked Established Programs Financing since 1986. All told, total cutbacks in program financing between 1986-87 and 1994-95 will reach the astronomical figure of $31.1 billion, as follows: $22.2 billion which should have gone to health care and $8.9 billion to higher education.

Were the provinces to choose not to raise their taxes they would have to shift these reductions on to hospitals—as I said earlier, fewer services, fewer beds, limit on costly surgery—or to students who will be expected to pay higher tuition fees in exchange for the privilege of attending overcrowded lectures and working with outmoded equipment which badly need to be replaced. The ultimate effect of all this will be lower post-secondary education quality throughout the country.

Mr. Speaker, let me remind you of a statement made by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Wilson) in March 1982. The Minister of Finance said to the House, and I quote his very words: "Let us not make hospitals, universities and colleges a battleground between the federal government and the provincial governments. Let us solve those problems outside of that arena".

That is what he said barely eight years ago, Mr. Speaker, but today the same Minister of Finance has changed his mind, as he often does, and imposes restrictive measures on universities and hospitals in spite of the fact that he once stated that we should not shift the fiscal burden on to these two services.

With respect to the Canada Assistance Plan, the lower benefits to poorer people in the provinces of Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia fly in the face of this government's commitment to help, and I quote, "— to help people in need".

Mr. Speaker, I should think that poor people in Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia are just as poor as other poor people who live in Quebec, Manitoba or Nova Scotia. Being poor is a sad situation, but we do have poor people in Ottawa—Vanier. Mr. Speaker, who will tell me that a poor man in Ottawa—Vanier does not have the right to the same kind of attention and the same kind of assistance as everybody else to meet his own needs? Who will argue that a poor man in Ottawa—Vanier is not as poor as a poor man in Nova Scotia or Quebec?

Mr. Speaker, I find this formula totally unacceptable and I object to it, and others have decided to take the matter to court. Hon. members would know that a province has gone to court to argue about the constitutionality of Bill C-69. I wish it good luck, Mr. Speaker, because this measure has been introduced by a government which is running out of steam, which is discouraging and discouraged, and which may well need help from the courts to get back on course and steer the country properly.

As for mining exploration, I will let other colleagues speak to this issue because for the time being it does not seriously concern my constituents.

I would like to make a few remarks about two or three important aspects of education. In my riding, Mr. Speaker, are the University of Ottawa; a community college, Algonquin College; and a French-language college that is being set up. Besides suffering from the federal government's transfer payment cuts since 1986, these three institutions have been the target of many government policies. In addition to the extra costs for health insurance in Ontario, the University of Ottawa, which is entirely in my riding, will be hard hit by the new goods and services tax. I suggest that hon. members give a little thought to the impact this goods and services tax will have on university administrations. The Unemployment Insurance Act, Mr. Speaker, will cost them more; for example, for the University of Ottawa alone it will cost $400,000 more a year. With the freeze in fiscal transfers, we have reason to fear that the University of Ottawa will have to spend more time claiming the funds it needs than being concerned about an effective teaching program. That worries me, Mr. Speaker. When the administrators tell me that they spend more time asking for money and claiming their due, it is disturbing.

We listen to the students, Mr. Speaker. Here is what the Student Federation of the University of Ottawa said recently when it spoke against the freeze in transfer payments, and I know these students. It considers the freeze a major loss for post-secondary education. Marc Molgat, the vice-president for external affairs of the federation, said, "Post-secondary education is a right and an investment in our country's social and economic development." He thinks it is unfair of the federal government not to require that the provinces spend what they receive or not to spend fixed amounts on education. The federation is understandably opposed to any increase in tuition fees charged to students.

Mr. Speaker, I have tabled in this House petitions signed by hundreds and thousands of students in my riding who are worried about the condition of their institutions. I will read some of the complaints contained in their petitions: overcrowded lecture halls, deteriorating lab equipment, lock of library resources, high student-teacher ratio, elimination of certain courses, deteriorating buildings and facilities. All this is true. It is typical today of Canada's post-secondary education system. This is not just in Ottawa. It is like that across the country.

I shall continue: native students, the handicapped and other students who are socially and economically disadvantaged are under-represented at the post-secondary level. We all know that. These are the consequences of 12 years of declining financing per student since the present legislation on post-secondary financing was passed in 1977.

Mr. Speaker, this is still going on today. These students reject injustice, soaring tuition fees and other costs that today are a consequence of the deteriorating quality of our post-secondary education system. These students have sounded the alarm. They want us to understand, as Canadians, that this neglect on the part of the government will cost us dearly in that we will have to change our policy towards these post-secondary institutions and perhaps loosen the purse strings a bit.

When it appeared before the finance committee on May 16 this year, the Canadian Federation of Students protested these new measures and said it doubted the federal government's commitment to quality and fully accessible post-secondary education. I quote the federation: "Regardless of these pre-election commitments, the Conservative Party has repeatedly reduced the rate of growth of transfer payments for post-secondary education." The chairperson of the federation, Jane Arnold, stated, and I quote: "In constant dollars, the cuts to post-secondary education are even more drastic when consideration is given to the rise in course costs and educational materials. In addition, tuition has doubled at most institutions in the last 10 years. The crisis in education funding means larger classes, decreased resources for research, inadequate library facilities and deteriorating institutions."

[English]

For members of the House who represent universities and post-secondary institutions as I do, it is an important debate on the quality of education and the access to education.

I was reviewing my notes and looking at the history of EPF transfers. It is disquieting. It is worrisome to me to see post-secondary education and research in those institutions going down, and to see the access to those institutions being restricted to those who can afford to pay. I find that difficult to accept in my Canada, because I was brought up in that period of time when one went to university if one's father and mother had the money to pay. I thought we got rid of that. I thought that now post-secondary education was available to all those who met the basic requirements of admission to the institutions.

Every day I meet young people who say to me: "I cannot go to university because I cannot afford it." I thought we had addressed that problem. I guess we still have a long way to go before we have paid justice to that issue.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I remember the Nielsen Report. I do not know if hon. members will remember it. But this statement that I am going to read is more disturbing than anything I have read so far. The Nielsen Report was prepared by the government, by their Deputy Prime Minister and a committee or task force charged with examining education and research programs. The Nielsen Report says that no longer contributing to the basic funding of post-secondary educational institutions would be justified because the Constitution gives the federal government no specific role in this field.

Mr. Speaker, that is the way the Conservative government is going. According to Statistics Canada, the federal government spent $6.7 billion for education and training, an increase of 1.8 per cent compared to a 3.6 per cent increase for total government spending. In 1975, 7.3 per cent of federal government spending was for education, whereas in 1988, it was only 6.7 per cent. Although the number of students attending post-secondary institutions rose 4.4 per cent between 1985 and 1989, government spending for education rose by 2.3 per cent (annually) compared to a 4.2 per cent (annual) increase for the consumer price index.

Before slashing the spending of higher education institutions by cutting transfer payments to the provinces, the federal government, together with the provinces, should draw up a specific plan setting forth a coherent policy covering the administrative and financial responsibilities for post-secondary education.

[English]

I know I only have a few minutes and I want to address the other very important question, health care.

I received a letter from a constituent of mine, Dr. Robert Walker, and I want to read one paragraph of that letter because it touches on the subject matter. Dr. Walker stated: "I am writing as a constituent and, in particular, as a family physician who works daily with economically disadvantaged families and individuals in an Ottawa community health centre. My concern is the ceiling placed on the Canada Assistance Plan moneys for Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia in the recent federal budget. I want to relate my strong disapproval of this decision. As it so adversely affects the lives of many of my patients, I request that you direct efforts to ensure that the proposed ceiling on federal dollars directed to the provinces for people in need be deleted from Bill C-69."

Dr. Walker goes on to explain that a large percentage of patients are either low-income or welfare recipients. Dr. Walker makes the case that these people need our assistance, need our help, and that Bill C-69 does not address the problems of those people.

Indeed, by voting against this bill, I will try to register in the name of all my constituents, a strong vote of protest against the government.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I rise to compliment my colleague, the hon. member from Ottawa—Vanier, and to say that, as a member from another city where the universities are an integral and vital part of the life of our city, I was particularly taken by his comments with regard to what the cutbacks in funding in this bill will do to our universities.

I would like to ask the hon. member if he has had much dealing with the students, in particular, with regard to the increases in tuition fees. I know it is not quite the same in the province of Ontario as in the province of Nova Scotia. The situation that is becoming more and more crucial in Nova Scotia is that as the universities have to cut back, the tuition fees go up and the university students cannot any longer possibly earn the money to supplement student loans or find other sources of income to pay for their university tuition. Even if the student finds a job, it is just not possible to earn enough in one summer to supplement whatever he or she may have to pay tuition fees.

I am wondering if this particular problem exists in the Ottawa area as well.

• (1830)

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for Halifax for her question. It is an important question because constitutionally, education is a provincial matter. We have a variety of programs in certain provinces so that access to universities is nearly a right, whereas in other provinces the access to universities is pretty near impossible.

I have some press clippings here from the Federation of Canadian Students which explains the lack of equality of access to post-secondary education across this country and how difficult it is to pursue a career with university training today unless one can go into post-graduate studies or, for that matter, graduate studies.

I know for a fact that in my riding many students planning to go into the sciences, arts or other faculties at the University of Ottawa cannot because of financial difficulties. Students must pay the academic fee that is required plus cope with the expenditures that they have living outside their homes.

We must never forget that every community, hamlet, village and every town of this country must have access to post-secondary education. We must have a program that is designed to give everybody, wherever he lives, a chance on an equal basis, to have access to not only the post-secondary education which he or she chooses, but the financing allowed.

We have some good programs. We have some good student loan programs, but we have to think up new theories and new good programs to give our young people wherever they live in this country, a chance for a post-secondary education.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I too am very pleased to have an opportunity to speak again to Bill C-69. I feel that it is very important to speak, because this bill strikes at the very heart of what it is to be a Canadian.

If you ask a Canadian to define a Canadian, probably the initial reaction may well be that we are different and that we are special. But what is that difference? As Canadians, we are forever wrestling with defining that difference. We are seemingly wrestling with our identity, trying to define just exactly what it means to be a Canadian.

We know that we are different from our southern neighbours, yet we cannot always define what those differences are. Yet we are all tremendously proud to be Canadian.

Upon a closer look, there are many differences between our two nations, the most obvious being the social programs that we have in Canada. Canadians pride themselves in the manner in which they take care of their children, the poor, the elderly and the sick.

We take extra special care to make sure that all Canadians, regardless of their social, economic, cultural or linguistic backgrounds, are given every opportunity to succeed and lead a successful, satisfying and productive life. Canadians have always held on to these values as being distinctively Canadian.

We have always placed more emphasis on our government's role in these areas. The present government seems intent on becoming more American than on maintaining our sovereignty and programs that are essential to the Canadian value system. It seems intent on changing our value system and I say that that is wrong.

Bill C-69 cuts at the very heart of the Canadian value system. It sets a new agenda on how we spend money on post-secondary education, health care, and on assistance to the needy in this country. In 1982 the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre rose in his place in the House and declared that any cuts to Established Programs Financing: "could have disastrous effects on the universities and on the colleges, on the hospital funding and on the operation of hospitals. Let us not make hospitals, universities and colleges a battleground between the federal government and the provincial governments. Let us solve those problems not on the backs of hospitals and universities; let us solve those problems outside of that arena."

That quote was from the hon. member for Etobicoke Centre in 1982. Had I been a member of this House at that time and on that day, and had I been sitting in this House I probably would have applauded that member of Parliament.

Since then, we know that he is on the government side of the House and has become the Minister of Finance. My only comment to him at this time is a great big resounding, "Boo."

Everyday Canadians are becoming less tolerant of the hypocrisy of the government. In particular, the Minister of Finance is one whose words are often radically different than his actions. If we look at the proposed goods and services tax, there are so many broken promises that I am now embarrassed for the minister. I wonder how he could go back on so many of his promises, as he has, and still look at himself in the mirror.

Look at the government's promises on child care, environment, unemployment, Atlantic fisheries and income tax. There are all kinds of examples. We can talk about what we read today on the front page of our local newspaper, The Ottawa Citizen. It states that while the government asks Canadians to tighten their belts, federal bosses received bonuses up to 25 per cent. Some of these bonuses work out to as much as $100,000. That is absolutely disgraceful.

Again, let me talk about what Bill C-69 will do to post-secondary education. I have said in this House in the past that funding for post-secondary education should not be seen as an expenditure. It is an investment in our young people and an investment in Canada's future. Bill C-69 is set to act upon the 1990 budget, which in effect freezes any growth in federal funding for post-secondary education.

The EPF helps the provinces to carry out their responsibilities with respect to health care and post-secondary education. Since the federal government provides equal per capital financial assistance to all provinces, the freeze means that the payments will grow only with the population increase of each province, or about 1 per cent nationally. The impact of the EPF cuts on federal transfers to the provinces will amount to about $3.1 billion over five years. When coupled with previous EPF reductions since 1983, the cumulative effect of the cuts is obvious and amounts to $8.9 billion.

The cumulative reduction in federal contributions from the 1986-87 to 1994-95 fiscal year amounts to an incredible $31.1 billion. All these cuts, coupled with the government's recently imposed 3 per cent fee on student loans will increase the cost of post-secondary education to all students, particularly to those who can least afford it.

Federal spending on education has increased at an average annual rate of 2.3 per cent since 1985, while the consumer price index has averaged 4.2 per cent per year. This shows that, despite its rhetoric, the present government is doing very little for education in this country. The government should be encouraging students to participate in higher education, instead of slashing its affordability. Ironically, early last month, the junior science minister complained that a lack of skilled scientists and engineers threatens the ability of Canadian industry to compete in the world. He pointed out that Canada has only 90 scientists and researchers for every 100,000 people compared with 280 per 100,000 in the United States and 240 for 100,000 in Japan.

While his complaints are justified, his accusations as to who is to blame or who is at fault are not. He puts the blame squarely on the backs of Canadian business, without mentioning the inaction of his own government.

• (1840)

While it is true that less than 3 per cent of Canadian companies are involved in R and D on any scale, the government must begin to accept its vital role in this important area. This is clearly not being done. Despite repeated promises by the Prime Minister to double the amount of money Canada spends on research and development, statistics indicate that Canada's percentage of R and D spending has actually decreased.

Recently in Edmonton the minister rejected a key recommendation for a major R and D funding boost from 10 provincial and two national science and technology advisory councils.

Canada has a negative trade balance and a growing trade deficit in every single sector of the advanced technology industry. According to Dr. Fraser Mustard, President of the Canadian Institute for Advanced Research, unless the Canadian scientific community receives more money, "we might not be a trading nation, we might be a fading nation".

The government is just standing by and letting our high tech sector become more and more of a branch plant economy. Increasingly, companies specializing in R and D, such as Lumonics, are being sold to foreign interests. If we look at what happened to Leigh Instruments as an example of the type of commitment foreign interests have for our workers, we are in big trouble. Dr. Polanyi, a Canadian Nobel Prize winning scientist advises Canadian scientists to go to the United States, which would result in a terrible brain drain if our brilliant young minds are forced to leave Canada for higher prospects elsewhere.

We need our scientists and researchers to remain in Canada. We need our scientific and technologic advances and potential to remain in Canadian hands if we wish to have long-term prosperity. It is the responsibility of the government to work with business to ensure this happens. Cutting back EPF transfers to the provinces does not go in that direction. It is a step backward.

The cuts to EPF transfers will also have a detrimental effect on health care here in Canada. The President of the Canadian Hospital Association, Mrs. Carol Clemenhagen, told the Standing Committee on Finance that:

> —prior to the February 20 budget, the CHA calculated that the cumulative loss the provinces have already experienced from 1986–87 to 1989–90 because of the 2 per cent reduction in EPF growth was $2.6 billion, and the projected cumulative loss to the provinces from 1990–91 to 1995–96 because of the combined 3 per cent reduction in EPF growth is $19.4 billion.
> Reductions in the EPF transfers challenge provincial governments either to reduce health care and post-secondary education budgets or to increase taxes. We believe a national framework, a stable and adequate EPF funding is a prerequisite to achieving health goals. In the case of health manpower, cuts to EPF threaten both the health system in which health professionals work and the educational system in which they were trained.

Let us hope that the government will realize before we have gone too far down the road to turn back, that by breaking the commitment to a vital social program, the government is breaking a long-standing Canadian tradition of caring for the sick. This bill lashes out at that fundamental Canadian belief. This is appalling.

Now I would like to turn to the cuts to the Canada Assistance Plan, which are cuts to the poorest in the provinces of Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia. The poor in Alberta, B.C. and Ontario are just as poor as the poor in the other provinces. It is my belief that the cuts to CAP contradict the government's commitment to come to the aid of those who are in need.

As I outlined at the second reading of this bill, under CAP the federal and provincial governments share equally in the cost of welfare payments and basic necessities such as food, shelter, clothing and dental care for the poor, and essential services for the disabled.

This is the first time in the history of the program that CAP has been limited. It is a shame. While the government has raised taxes 32 times since it took office and collects $48 billion more today than it did five years ago, I find it incredible that it has cut this essential program. It claims that it is cutting these things in the name of deficit reduction, but I believe that most Canadians feel that certain things are essential, and that health care is one of those things.

Cutting CAP will force the provinces either to raise taxes or more poor will become even poorer with no hope.

Finally, the government has also frozen public utilities income tax transfers over the next two years. These programs provide for over 95 per cent of the federal income tax collected from certain privately owned electric and gas utilities. The program was initiated in order to put private electric and gas companies which pay federal tax on an equal footing with Crown corporations in the resource sector which do not pay tax.

I firmly believe that Canadian opportunities must be fundamental to our way of life. They have been in the past and will continue to be in the future, especially when the present government is replaced by a Liberal government in two or three years.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, the present government has attempted to tear at the very heart of what it is to be Canadian and I firmly believe that Canadians will, nevertheless, maintain those same values. Canadians will stand up and overcome the hypocrisy of this present government. As I said at second reading, this government has lost all sense of propriety and this is a reflection of the extreme limits to which it will go to force its will on the people.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I have looked at Bill C-69 and gone over the remarks of the Minister of State for Finance in first introducing this bill. Part of the difficulty I have had over the last 18 months that I have been in Parliament is my difficulty with the plan or the concept that this government seems to be heading toward. I looked at the remarks of the minister for some consolation in this particular area. I would like to just pull out some of the remarks that he talked about in referring to this bill.

The minister talked talks about the measures in this bill "having a clear goal, controlling inflation, and securing steady non-inflationary economic growth in Canada". He went on to say "that attaining this goal will lead to a bright economic future that, of course, we all want for this country". We have no argument with a bright economic future.

He went on to say that "the restraint measures as set out in this bill are part of the government's consistent comprehensive plan to ensure that Canadians benefit from a standard of living and a quality of life that is second to none". Once again, it is a goal that certainly we in Canada would like to strive toward. Later he goes on to say "this bill takes a further step along the path we have been following since 1984". I think that is the crux of the matter right there.

It is this path that this government has been following since 1984 and more and more seems to be leading Canada into a polarity; a polarity of economic regions, a polarity of economic roots and a polarity of individuals, some who are poor and some who are rich. More and more the legislation that we have seen put before the House of Commons has been an attack on middle income groups and the poor in this country.

Once again, as we look through Bill C-69, I suggest that this once more is an attack on that which the minister said we were striving toward, an attack on economic equality for the regions and for the individuals of Canada.

I point to an article in The Toronto Star, February 26, 1990. It is an article on social policy by Leonard Shifrin and I quote from it:

> The two-year freeze on federal contributions to the provinces for health and post-secondary education affects everyone. Freezing contributions for legal aid and cutting funds for social housing aims directly at the poor.
> And so does the ceiling on Canada Assistance Plan (CAP) contributions to Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia, because CAP is the funding program for welfare payments and services to the poor.

It points out in that article that all across the political spectrum, here in Ontario and in the rest of Canada, we have been appalled to learn that children are the largest group on welfare and the chief victims to the rules that keep mother-led families dependent on it. Once again, I point out through these quotes that what we have seen in the capping of the Canada Assistance Plan is a direct attack on the poor.

I wonder about the methods that have been used in this process, the process in the UI bill, in the clawback legislation and in the goods and service tax, of setting specific deadlines and then pushing to try to meet those deadlines. When looking at some of the history of this, I looked at the twenty-seventh annual premiers conference in Edmonton, Alberta, in August 1986, and what the provincial premiers saw when they looked at the Canada Assistance Plan and Established Programs Financing.

I want to quote from various sections of that conference to make the point that what we have seen is a breaking down of the consultative process between the government and the opposition, the government and the provinces, the government and the regions and the government and groups that will be affected by the legislation that they bring in. They quote, first of all, from the federal-provincial agreements section of the communiqué which states: "Premiers recognize that federal-provincial agreements and arrangements have become an important instrument of government. They expressed concern that unilateral changes to these agreements and arrangements are very disruptive".

Later, under tax reform, it states: "The premiers stressed that tax reform must not be used by the federal government as an excuse to erode provincial health and post-secondary education support by further cutbacks and transfer payments. The process of tax reform must be open to consultation among all Canadians. The premiers emphasized the need for federal-provincial consultation, co-operation and consensus building".

What we see in this bill is a breakdown of that system. There have apparently been very few consultations. I recognize that the premier of the province of British Columbia, in his zeal to advise the federal government on how to manage its financial problems, suggested that it cut the Established Programs Financing and the transfer payments from the federal to the provincial government by up to 15 per cent, and cries when that has been done. That is not what we in British Columbia have been looking for. We have been looking for a proper priorization and a proper consultation process as to where some of these cuts, if they are needed, should take place.

The committee went through hearings in a very short time span, hearing some groups and refusing others the opportunity of appearing before the committee. Once again, the consultative process has broken down. The federal government has not consulted with the premiers, the provinces, the medical profession, the post-secondary education institutions or the poverty groups in trying to come up with some fair and equitable way for the future. Let me just touch briefly for those in the riding of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt on exactly what this bill is and what it attacks. The Established Programs Financing is the method by which the federal government transfers to the provinces funding for such things as post-secondary education and health. It is put into the general provincial coffers to be used primarily for health and education, but not necessarily in that manner. The Canada Assistance Plan is to be used for welfare payments, social assistance, counselling and other things dealing with the social assistance and welfare areas.

Having said that, I would like to turn directly to the Established Programs Financing and look at how this will affect, in my province, things like hospitals and universities. Specifically, I fear, in looking at the cutbacks in these areas, and this fear has been set out by some of the university groups which have appeared before the committee, that we are looking at a move toward the gradual privatization of our universities. More and more, funding is being cut out from our post-secondary education units and more and more they are having to turn to the private sector to try to get their funding.

I have a fear of that move toward privatization because, as I said in my introductory remarks, this polarization we have seen, a polarization toward the poor getting poorer and the rich getting richer, is going to translate into the area of higher education. Access through privatization will be cut off, the cost will increase for tuition and, therefore, we are again going to set aside a whole group in our society who will be unable to attend university. We therefore put down those most in need of the assistance.

We have a problem within the Okanagan and Similkameen regions in that we have a very high percentage of seniors in those regions, in some cases triple the national average of 11 per cent. One of the larger hospitals in the area, the Penticton Regional Hospital, has done a paper that looks at age-related cost in their particular facility. The Penticton Regional Hospital is a 200-bed acute care referral hospital for the south Okanagan and the Similkameen regions and serves a population base of approximately 65,000 people. In reviewing some of the costs that they have added, over and above other areas within the province of British Columbia alone, they note that the hospital costs for our seniors is substantially higher. I point particularly to the populations in the towns, for instance, like Keremeos, where over 34 per cent of the residents of that community are over 65 years of age. Oliver is pushing 35 per cent of the population over 65 years of age, Osoyoos is in the area of 33 per cent, and it goes on.

This study used 1981 figures which are now substantially out of date and it states that in the over-all area it was almost 20 per cent at that time in 1981. Those figures have been shown, in a recent study, to be substantially lower. But the added costs in that area are for seniors, who have been shown to have additional hospital care costs, because of the very nature of the time of their life. The cuts in these particular programs are again attacking one area of our society.

We know that recently in the communities of Grand Forks, Merritt, Kelowna, and Oliver residents have gone through the traumatic experience of having one of their number not able to get adequate health care, in that they required transplants or specific operations to the heart or other parts of the body. They were not able to get that care without having their names placed first on long waiting lists. By the time their names were at the top of these long waiting lists it was too late; they had already died. That is the type of thing that I am pointing to.

The nurses have made the situation clear in some of their submissions. They have said: "Pressure is growing to get rid of the medicare system Canadians know and cherish". They tell us further that medicare is in trouble. "Canadians had better watch out or there won't be a public health care system left in this country". Those statements come from a release dated May 1989, in which they referred to some of the cutbacks at that time.

They tell us that each day the nursing shortage in all provinces continues to grow. Each day our Canadian standards of safe, quality patient care is becoming just a memory. That is not what we in Canada want. We want a health care system that is a system second to none, that provides for all our citizens regardless of their ability to pay, their economic circumstances, or the region in which they live. We want to provide them with health care, post-secondary education, and adequate welfare payments so that they can live in some happiness and harmony as they go through their lives.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I want to put a question to my hon. friend from British Columbia.

Let me say off the top that I happen to believe that strong federal government support for a national health care system is absolutely crucial. Without strong federal government support, I do not think we can have a universal health care system that will last that long into the future. When there is a slippage of government support, soon after there is talk of user fees, extra billing, and that kind of thing.

I would ask my hon. friend from British Columbia whether he is concerned about the coming of a two-tier health care system in the country. Once the erosion begins, once there is talk of extra billing and user fees, then it will not be long until there is a two-tier health care system. There will be a publicly paid for system for the poor and one for those who can afford user fees and extra billing. They will be the rich. That is how you get a two-tier health care system, if you do not have strong federal government support. I am wondering whether my friend has a concern in that area.

Mr. Whittaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any doubt about it. As we look at what has happened over the last six years in particular we have seen a major attack on our health care system and on our universal programs.

I firmly believe—and I pointed it out in my earlier remarks—that we are seeing the poor getting poorer and the rich getting richer. This is leading us to a two-tier system. We have already seen that in the hospitals in British Columbia. I would suggest that it is also the case in hospitals in other areas. If you have the money, you can get in to get your operations. If you have the money, you can get in to get your heart transplant or your bypasses. However, if you do not have the money, you sit on the rolls and wait for that opportunity. Sometimes, as I have mentioned, in places like Merritt, Grand Forks, and Kelowna that time did not come. It was too late for some.

It has been pointed out by Harry Lali, an alderman in Merritt that as a result of cuts in unemployment insurance more people will be forced into social assistance programs. Merritt is an area that has over 1,000 people on the unemployment insurance rolls now. The cap put on those programs by this particular bill will cause us to see that more and more people in the city of Merritt will have difficulty in keeping up to any semblance of being above the poverty line.

Another area I would like to touch on briefly concerns day care. In the city of Merritt the Snoopy Day Care Centre is no longer in operation because of a lack of funding. Funding for day care is provided through the Established Programs Financing. It gives an opportunity for day care facilities in those areas to operate. It is very difficult for those looking for jobs, single mothers and single fathers, if they do not have somebody who is near to look after their children. Now in that city there is no day care, thanks to both provincial and federal cuts. This is the type of thing that we have to look at and look after in the future.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to take part in the debate this evening on third reading of Bill C-69, An Act to amend certain statutes to enable restraint of government expenditures.

I spoke before on this bill during the second reading stage. At that time I explained to the House how poorly this government managed its affairs in the cancellation of the CEIP, the Canadian Exploration Incentives Program. The government announced the cancellation of this program without any consultation with the industry, without talking to the people involved.

The same thing happened with regard to CFB Summerside. This government announced its closure in the budget of April 1989 without any consultation with the people of Prince Edward Island, and obviously without any thought or planning for what would happen to Summerside and the entire area.

The role of government has always been managing the present while planning and organizing for the future. I grant that there are a number of times and situations when government cannot plan, but the goal and certainly the intention of government should always be to plan ahead.

Obviously this government is not planning ahead. Here we have another piece of legislation, Bill C-69, which is one more example of the government's lack of planning.

Within the title of this bill we see the words "enable restraint". Canadians want to see restraint take place but certainly not at a cost to the future development of the country.

Islanders also want restraint. They want to help and do their fair share in tackling the tremendous deficit that we have in this country, but, again, they do not want to do it at the expense of important policy programs such as health and education.

• (1910)

The government's financial plan for 1990-91 contains several measures which will cost the province of Prince Edward Island millions of dollars. The largest cut of course comes in the form of reduced transfer payments for education and health. Certainly we on Prince Edward Island, all Islanders, feel that education and health are top priorities. Transfer payments for education enable our young men and women to get a university or college education, remain on the Island, and put their skills to work for the province.

This helps Prince Edward Island develop as a province, makes it more self-sufficient and of course less dependent on the federal government, but here before us we have a piece of legislation, Bill C-69, which really works in the opposite direction. It would reduce federal spending, money that goes into post-secondary education. Thus it is not contributing to the development of the future of our youth and tomorrow's leaders.

Canadians are also very proud of their health system, and rightly so. We have one of the best health care systems in the world. It is certainly a system that we do not want to lose. Yet this legislation, Bill C-69, means that Prince Edward Island will receive less money for health.

As I just mentioned, Prince Edward Islanders put great emphasis on education and health care, but we are disturbed by the record of this government. As we know, the funding formulas for education and health are based on the GNP. As the Gross National Product goes up, so does the federal funding to the provinces for education and health. That is the way it was supposed to work, at least until this government got involved.

Since the Tory government came to power in 1984 it has on three separate occasions—not just one, but three separate occasions—reduced the amount of transfer payments to the provinces for medicare, hospital services, and education.

First it reduced the Established Programs Financing funding in 1986 by 2 per cent. Then it brought in Bill C-33 wanting to reduce that funding by another 1 per cent. Now we have before us Bill C-69 with which the government wants to freeze the payments. The impact of all these cuts will mean a loss of $155 million to my province up to the year 1995.

It is plain to see that this government is simply eroding the post-education system across our country. To put things in a political perspective, the Prime Minister promised before the 1984 election: "We are committed to sustaining the current federal financial commitment. We believe that financing post-secondary education is an important priority for both levels of government".

That is what the Prime Minister said before the election in 1984, but actions speak louder than words. The actions of this government have certainly not been to carry through on that commitment. I say that because we have had on three occasions transfer payments cut or reduced. This is the money that goes to the provinces to pay for health, hospitals and education.

The government has now certainly abandoned the commitment that the Prime Minister talked about, as we see in this legislation before us, and as we have seen in previous legislation. Clearly, this government does not know how to determine policy in view of the future of this country.

I had the opportunity to be a member of the legislative committee which studied this bill on the day the committee heard representatives of the Canadian Federation of Students who came before the committee to tell us what they thought of this legislation. I want to quote one sentence from their brief.

> The Federation shares the opinion of many in the educational community that Bill C-69 is one of a series of cutbacks which have resulted in the serious underfunding of our post-secondary education system.

They went on to indicate to us in their brief just how Bill C-69 will affect the education system. They indicated to us the negative impact that will be felt across this country in our universities and colleges.

The funding of universities and colleges is not the only way that students are being hit by this government. This government has also failed to update the student loan system which has not kept up with inflation and which discriminates against part-time students.

A student advisory group was set up to provide the government with input on these student aid matters. That group was in existence for over two years before the minister finally decided to meet with it to get its input. I understand that meeting took place in March. It was a very short meeting. The students feel that that meeting was to no avail.

So what we have is a government that is really continuing to ignore the concerns of students. That seems to be the story of this government. It really fails to consult with the people who are going to be affected by these decisions.

The same thing happened with the decision to close CFB Summerside. As I mentioned earlier, the government announced this decision in its budget of 1989. Out of the blue the government announced that it was going to close CFB Summerside.

There had been no consultation with Islanders, with the people who would be affected by this decision. Obviously, there was no planning whatsoever as to what was going to happen to the economy of Summerside, Prince Edward Island after the base closed. In fact, the lack of forethought put into this dramatic decision is really frightening.

The closure of CFB Summerside will mean the loss of 1,300 jobs. The effect of this announcement was to put the economy of that whole area on hold. It left the people uncertain about their future.

I would like to outline very briefly the order of events for my colleagues here in the House today so that they have a good understanding of how the people of Summerside and area have been treated by this government since the announcement of that decision in the budget of 1989.

The announcement was made public on April 27 of that year. For an entire year the people of Summerside and the surrounding area were left in limbo, not knowing what was in store for them. The people who work at the base did not know. They still do not know whether they are going to have jobs. They do not know whether they should try to sell their houses, move to Toronto or elsewhere to try and find a job. That still has not been cleared up.

What the federal government did in July is set up a federal task force which was headed by the Minister of Employment and Immigration. That task force was to look into the possibilities for CFB Summerside.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration visited the Island at the end of October. That was three months after the task force had been set up, and six months after the announcement that this base was going to be closed.

Another six months went by, until March 27 of this year, when the Minister of Employment and Immigration visited Summerside and announced that a development corporation would be established to take on the assets of CFB Summerside. That meant that interim management would be appointed for the corporation to negotiate with any prospective tenants between now and 1992 when the base is to officially close.

One of the questions that Islanders are now asking is why this interim management for the corporation has not been appointed. Has it been appointed, but simply not been announced? It has been three months since the announcement. Yet we on Prince Edward Island have heard nothing.

Here again it seems the government has left everyone in limbo. It appears that there is no plan ahead at all.

The people in Summerside and area are really frustrated with this whole process. The chairman of the crisis centre in Summerside, which has been looking after the needs of those affected by the decision to close the base, said just this past weekend: "We are frustrated. We are gravely concerned. It has been 10 weeks since the announcement was made and still the interim management team is not in place".

That is how the chairman of the crisis centre feels. I think it is time that this government made some decisions and got on with it. As every day passes without interim management in place time is wasted. It is time that could have been spent in attracting tenants to the facility. I know that there have been tenants who have certainly expressed an interest.

I have a lot more to say about this situation. There was an announcement made months ago that interim management was going to be set up. We still have no information that it has been set up.

ACOA has been showing this facility to prospective tenants, but it has no authority to negotiate contracts with the tenants. In other words, there is nobody there to give any answers.

I think we need to know the answers to these questions. When will the interim management be put in place? What will be the terms of reference for this interim management? To whom will this interim management be accountable? How will it be accountable for that $900,000?

Since my time is running out, I would like to end my comments by saying that certainly Prince Edward Island wants to participate in the Confederation of Canada. We know that that means sharing the responsibilities of deficits as well as surpluses. We are certainly willing to do our fair share, but this government's economic policies go far beyond being fair and equitable.

What we have is a transfer of the deficit of the federal government to the provinces. It is certainly a burden which will erode the economy of my province and the quality of life in Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): I have a question, Mr. Speaker.

The hon. member discussed very succinctly the problems that are created by these cuts because they do not stop here at the federal government. We all know that the federal government is just dumping them on to the provinces and on down the line. They end up on John Q. Public's doorstep.

With regard to the cuts in post-secondary education and medicare, the moneys that the provinces must raise in order to keep up their services will eventually come from other programs that they are operating. How does the hon. member see these cuts affecting the services that the government in her home province would be witnessing? How does she see the moneys being taken from these other programs to finance post-secondary education and medicare affecting the other services that governments have to deliver?

We are not talking here just about the items mentioned in Bill C-69, the cuts in transfer payments to the provinces. We are talking about lesser services somewhere else because the difference must be made up, or the provinces in turn will have to tax the people much more heavily in order to meet their demands. How does the hon. member see this affecting the over-all picture of provincial governments?

Ms. Callbeck: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his question. It is certainly one that concerns me a great deal. In order to provide these services you have to have the money.

It is very difficult for a small province like Prince Edward Island, but what is happening under Bill C-69 is that the government is cutting back on the amount of money that it is going to give the provinces for education and health.

That means that the province either has to cut services in health or education—and that is something that all Islanders would hate to see because we consider them to be top priorities—or it would have to increase taxes. Certainly, no one wants to pay more taxes. We are taxed to the hilt now. We will have an added tax, the GST, that is coming in January of 1991. The average person just cannot afford to pay any more taxes.

We come to the third option of the provincial government and, as my hon. friend alluded to, that is taking money from other departments and putting it into health and education in order to provide the same quality of service in those two areas. What might happen is that money may have to come from the Department of Agriculture, from Fisheries, Tourism or what have you. The bottom line is that, in order to provide the service, the government has to have the money. One way or another, Islanders are going to have to pay for this.

When speaking earlier, I did not have time to talk about how Bill C–69 is going to affect Prince Edward Island in terms of health care. Seventy per cent of the Established Programs Financing transfers that come to the province are for health care, which means that that is the area that stands to lose the most.

This is the area which affects the sick and the elderly and on Prince Edward Island, we have a larger number of senior citizens as a proportion of the total population than the rest of Canada. That means our health care costs are going to be high. The province does not object to this at all. We believe that seniors have contributed greatly to society and they deserve the best quality care system that Prince Edward Island can afford. As I said, however, these federal cutbacks are threatening to reduce the quality of health care that the province can afford.

In answering the question, these cutbacks may show up, not only in education and health, but they may come in agriculture, tourism, fisheries or in any of our government departments. I am very concerned about this because I think it could have a severe impact on my province.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, in rising to participate in this debate on Bill C–69, I would like to draw the attention of the House to a principle that goes back to the report of the Rowell–Sirois Commission of the 1930s. It has become so fundamental to the design of the Canadian federation that, in 1982, it was expressed directly in the Constitution. That is the principle that I would term as regional equity. It is commitment of Canadians living in more well–off provinces or regions to share their resources with less well–off regions, so that the latter may, as a minimum, enjoy the same or similar basic levels of public service without, I might add, being obliged to bear an undue burden of taxes.

It was the recognition in the early years of this century that a growing imbalance had occurred in the fiscal capacity of different provinces and regions that led to the formation of the Rowell–Sirois Commission. It was that commission's far–seeing report that began the establishment of the framework of federal–provincial fiscal arrangements that exist today.

The principle that all provinces should be able to provide their citizens with comparable levels of public services at comparable levels of taxes is the basis for the equalization payments system worked out since the 1950s. It has been supplemented by the combination of shared–cost programs and tax transfer programs, some of which were consolidated in the late seventies under the Established Programs Financing and which apply to federal transfers for health and post–secondary education, as well as the whole framework of other cost–shared programs which exist in Canada today.

This framework was supplemented in the 1960s by active programs to limit and ultimately to eliminate the problem of regional disparities, the widening of the gap in income opportunities across various regions of the country. These positive, progressive programs were introduced by Liberal governments over the years.

It is these programs and this framework of federal–provincial arrangements that are being undermined, that are under attack by this Tory government and have been since it took office in 1984. It is these same programs and the underlying principles that are under attack with Bill C–69.

One of the four components of Bill C–69, the one with the greatest fiscal impact, is the one that would alter the formula for federal payments to provinces under the Federal–Provincial Fiscal Arrangements and Federal Post–secondary Education and Health Contributions Act.

This component, which is expressed in clauses 5 and 6 of this bill, would freeze federal transfer payments to the provinces under Established Programs Financing for the next two years. With costs rising elsewhere, this actually translates into an effective cut in federal transfers to provincial governments.

In effect, along with those Canadians who, unlike its corporate friends, cannot escape this government's tax net, provincial governments are being asked to bear the burden of the belated preoccupation of the Minister of Finance with deficit reduction.

In 1990 and 1991, the total amount of these cuts across Canada will be in the order of $869 million. For the full five-year period the amount will be more than $7.3 billion. The effect of these measures on the fiscal capacity in particular of less well off provinces which the system was designed to help is being compounded by the government's high interest rate policies and the damper that this is causing on local economic activity, not to mention municipal and provincial borrowing charges.

Of course, Canadians are already bracing themselves for the impact of the GST which will be an unprecedented tax grab by the government.

The effects of cutbacks in Established Program Financing this year and in previous years has already meant provincial cutbacks in services and increases in taxes and charges to residents who can least afford to pay.

Let us take my province of Nova Scotia as an example. In his budget, released on Friday, April 27, the finance minister of Nova Scotia, Mr. Greg Kerr, reported that federal funding cutbacks for health and post-secondary education for 1990-91, alone, would cost the province of Nova Scotia $140 million.

Provincial revenues from this category which comprise about 9.3 per cent of total provincial revenues are actually expected to drop in absolute terms down from $377 million for 1988-89 to $350 million for 1990-91. Even if the provincial finance minister was a prudent manager of the provincial treasury, a drop of that magnitude in these difficult times would be tough to absorb without either losses in basic services or increases in taxes.

As we in Nova Scotia know, prudent management of provincial finances has not been a trademark of the Tory government of Nova Scotia. These are lessons it may well have imparted on the federal Tory government in Ottawa since it took office.

Nova Scotia has experienced, as a result of that budget, both an increase in taxes and a reduction in services. For example, children in Nova Scotia will now be charged an additional $3 fee for dental services and seniors will now be expected to pay fees for prescription drugs under the Nova Scotia Pharmacare Plan. These are costs the Nova Scotia government is now imposing indirectly on Nova Scotians as a result of cutbacks by the federal government in its transfers to that province.

Of particular concern in my riding of Cape Breton—Highlands—Canso is the upheaval these changes have produced in the secondary education system, particularly in rural Nova Scotia. The government of Nova Scotia has cut back on funds to municipalities and schools boards across the province with the result that schools in those areas already hard hit, which are strained to the limit, over-crowded and have not received capital funds over the years, are now being asked to bear an additional strain. The result is an attitude on the part of parents, students and teachers that enough is enough. There have been demonstrations of outrage at the cutbacks to education in communities across Cape Breton—Highlands—Canso and the province of Nova Scotia.

These cuts have also produced additional tensions in the school system. In Richmond County, parents and teachers are being asked to choose either closing schools and double-grading students or busing young students long distances to school.

In other parts of the province there is a conflict emerging between French and English classes. French immersion programs and English classes are competing for dwindling funds with the result that tensions arise between students where French immersion courses are offered.

The numbers of teachers have been cut and in some cases schools have been reduced or closed. All this is an indirect result of cutbacks by the federal government in its transfer programs. The result is additional tensions in rural parts of Nova Scotia.

These cuts have also had an effect on post-secondary education. Tuition fees in Nova Scotia are already among the highest in the country. These cutbacks by the federal government will put additional burden on our universities. As my colleague mentioned earlier, student loans have not kept up with the escalating costs of attending university and therefore students face more difficulty attending university.

Cut-backs in job-creation programs for students in the summer are also placing a strain on students who are seeking summer work. I am encountering students who are coming to me and saying that summer has arrived and there are no jobs available for them. These are students who contemplate going to university, who will not have access to funding, who see university costs escalating and who, as a result, are faced with the possible choice of not going to university and not acquiring the education which we, in Canada, have led people to believe is their right. At least they should have the opportunity to get such an education.

These are the kinds of direct impacts which Bill C-69 is having and will continue to have on federal, provincial and municipal services, on our education system, and on our health system across the country, particularly in areas in which the fiscal capacity, the tax base, the capacity of provinces to bear the burden of these increases is the smallest. As a result, provinces like Nova Scotia increasingly are being asked to tighten their belts and cut back on basic services which we in Canada have come to expect as a kind of right of citizenship in this country, in this day and age.

In conclusion, I want to say that I am personally opposed to this legislation, to its thrust and to the implications which these cutbacks will have, particularly in those parts of the country which need these transfers the most.

I go back to my original point, which is the withdrawal of a basic fundamental service. This goes back to Rowell—Sirois. Canadians have come to accept this commitment as a fundamental part of our citizenship, of sharing, of enabling all parts of the country to have an equitable, comparable and equal level of public services for our citizens, without having to bear an undue burden of taxes. The key participant in this program is a federal government, which is committed to ensuring that fiscal equity is maintained and is not allowed to erode as this government has allowed this program to erode and as we have seen with Bill C-69 and so many other measures that have been introduced by this government since it has taken office.

I hope that members opposite will realize what is going on here, that they will see these measures in their broader perspective and, with the wisdom of the summer, will choose not to pass this legislation and will allow these transfer programs to be maintained so that the less well-off regions of the country can reach an equitable level of services and continue to provide for their citizens.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I am not delighted to take part in this debate because I feel somewhat ashamed about my province and about this legislation. I want to start by pointing out that my province, with the same ideological drive as this government, is a province that deducts from welfare payments under the Canada Assistance Plan, federal benefits such as family allowances. It is the only province to do so and it makes deductions for orphans and survivor benefits. Now, that has to tell you something.

I do not blame the Government of Saskatchewan entirely for this. Because of the monetary and fiscal policies of this government, it has left provinces with little choice other than to make cutbacks. The problem is that provincial governments have made cutbacks in the wrong places. Imagine, Mr. Speaker, deducting family allowances from welfare payments and deducting payments for orphans and survivor benefits. It is un-Christian and uncivilized and immoral, if I have used enough adjectives.

The Tory government of Saskatchewan has set up a system where it decides who are the deserving and the undeserving poor. This sounds like the lords, the dukes, the kings, the queens and the princes of the Middle Ages. The government decides who are the deserving and the undeserving poor. If there is a breadwinner who will not take a job, why would you cut off the spouse and the children? Funds in Saskatchewan are being diverted from the Canada Assistance Plan to fund what is called Workfare programs. That sounds like Bill Vander Zalm of eight or 10 years ago, buy them a shovel. I do not recite this with any kind of pride, I feel some shame, because we were the province which led the way in dealing with our poor, our unfortunate, our disabled and our sick and set an example for the entire country.

I want to say a word about the whole matter of keeping your word. Governments are no different than individuals. A person is only as good as his word. Whether you give it verbally with a handshake or whether you give it in writing, you do not change your word, unless you have negotiated a change with the person or other government to which you gave your word. If your word is no good, as far as I am concerned, you are no good as an individual. If the government's word is no good, this government is no good because previous governments, both Conservative and Liberal, gave their word under the Canada Assistance Plan, and under the funding for education and hospitalization and medicare, it gave its word.

I hope the province of British Columbia, supported by two other provinces, wins its case in the courts. I have a fond wish that this federal government would support those provinces, but then that would defeat its own case. The programs that this bill affects are the national programs, shared by federal and provincial governments, in which the federal government sets standards to apply everywhere, in rich and poor provinces as well as the middle ones. The provinces make the decisions as to what they are going to do under those programs which have been arrived at by agreement and under which governments at all levels gave their word.

Initially, in the late fifties, sixties and the early seventies under the various programs that had come in, the federal government was committed to pay half the cost as long as the provincial jurisdiction met the standards that were laid down in the national program to provide a degree of equity, fairness and co-operative federalism no matter where one lived in this country. At least, that is the way it was supposed to be, and that is the way it used to be. This bill destroys the way it is supposed to be now and the way it used to be.

When I listen to people talking about secondary education—an hon. member today made an excellent remark about what federal and provincial governments put into secondary education—it is not an expenditure. It is an investment. If one bought a blue chip stock on the stock market, it would be an investment. When the students graduate, they go on to the labour market teaching in universities or whatever. They earn good incomes. If one wants to look at it strictly as a private enterpriser, the amount of taxes the government collects from them more than recovers whatever the costs were of federal and provincial contributions to their university education. In fact, not only the governments, but the country as a whole is ahead of the game.

Also, I want to say something about poverty and food banks. I am a child of the dirty thirties, if you think I might be a little childish now. I grew up in those years. I remember. What kind of a commentary is it on our country? There are more people lining up now for food banks than there were for soup kitchens in the dirty thirties. Hundreds of thousands line up every month for food banks. It amounts to one million or two million a year in a country that is wealthy. The federal funds will not keep up with what it costs. God knows most of that is handled by volunteers.

Volunteerism has always been there. However, there are costs that even the volunteers cannot handle. Imagine. We have more people lined up now in food banks—that is a nice name for what were called soup kitchens—than in the dirty thirties. Under child care, it is a choice, but what kind of a choice is this? Less spaces? Or less income assistance? Or, a combination of both? In the name of God, why would any self-respecting government with any kind of conscience resort to that? I do not understand.

When one talks about welfare payments and the government of the so-called "Devine" in Saskatchewan who would pick on orphans, widows and those who get family allowance while eligible for welfare, it has to be some kind of a sad commentary on the state of mind of a number of governments in this country. I include my own province and this Parliament.

• (2000)

I want to say something about universality. After 1949, not long after Louis St. Laurent became Prime Minister of Canada, old age pensions were made universal and were increased very modestly. It was no big deal in terms of the amount of money. But I will never forget when Prime Minister Louis St. Laurent publicly accepted his first old age pension cheque when he reached 65, not because he was bragging about it but to shore up the whole principle of universality. I am sure he did not need the money; that was the last thing that was on his mind.

I was an avid reader of Hansard in those days. I subscribed to it. M. J. Coldwell and Stanley Knowles got up and complimented him for shoring up the principle of universality. It is a matter of right of every citizen of this country.

I just drew my first old age pension cheque. It arrived last Friday. I know I do not look a day over 29.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Benjamin: It arrived two weeks late, and I must have some words with the minister about that.

I take that as a matter of pride. From about 1950 or 1951, during my working years on the railroad and as party secretary in Saskatchewan, every year when I made up my income tax there was a line in there that said: "Old Age Security Fund". You paid 3 per cent or 4 per cent of your taxable income for the old age security fund. For 20-some years I paid for my old age pension, as did hundreds of thousands of Canadians. It was an extra tax.

Now when I meet the Minister of Finance in the washroom on the fifth floor, I ask him why. The only place I can meet him is in the washroom. I am not lying in wait for him. I ask him why. I paid for the damned thing. Now why do you have to claw it back? He says I am making too much money. I say fine, if you want to hit me one or two points on my income tax, which is the most fair system of all, fair ball, but don't touch the old age pension cheque, don't touch the family allowances. Those are universal, those are a matter of right which has been built into our system for the last 30 or 40 years for every Canadian citizen.

My Conservative colleagues spend a lot of time trying to get rich. The Premier of Saskatchewan hit orphans, widows and family allowance recipients. He found $300 million and some for the Cargill grain company for a fertilizer plant. I call that nothing but male bovine excrement, and you can translate that any way you like in Hansard.

I say to my colleagues on the government side that there are no pockets in the shroud and there are no cubbyholes in the coffin. All of us who can afford to pay more should be made to pay some more, and I include myself. But those of us who are in a position of fortune, however limited it is, must pay more of a share. That means increasing income tax for high-income earners and corporations because, while we have been spending all the past months and years building a constitution, we must not build it at the expense of the poor, the deprived and those in deplorable situations through no fault of their own.

The test of how civilized and how Christian a society is, is how it treats its young, its sick and its old. This legislation flies in the face of those kinds of teachings. As Jesus said: "Inasmuch as you have done this unto the least of these you have done this unto me".

I urge government members to think about that, especially when they are having a prayer breakfast, and to apply it to this legislation and defeat it.

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the last part of the hon. member's speech. I want to take this opportunity to congratulate him on his birthday. He is certainly one of the members in this House who is well preserved. With the experience in debate that he brings, I am sure we all want to congratulate him.

Having said that, Mr. Speaker, I think it is pure chicanery and fluff when the hon. member says in the debate that he is willing to see the government increase income tax to the same level that we are going to tax back part or all of our old age pensions from those people who are now in a position to be able to pay.

What difference does it make if the income tax is increased or the old age pension is taxed back? If the dollars were the same, what difference would it make? I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that this is pure semantics.

I appreciate the hon. member being able to quote scripture. That is honourable and enviable and we hope he will continue to do so.

Mr. Benjamin: Mr. Speaker, the difference is that when you have a universal program it is universal. You cannot be, if you will pardon the expression, half pregnant. It is either universal or it is not. If it is universal, you do not touch it with any other tax law.

That is the one side. Now let us separate it. The government needs more revenue. All the government has to do is go through its own books to see who is not paying their fair share. Damn it all, a teller working in a bank branch in Regina pays more income tax than the bank she is working for. Don't talk to me about clawing back pensions.

I will only have three things when I am through in this place, although I am tempted to outlive my hon. friends around here. I will have my MP's pension, my Canada pension, and old age pension. That is it. I try to live up to there being no pockets in the shroud. As long as I have enough to be comfortable, to have a roof over my head, to keep my bills paid, to bury myself and go on a holiday or two a year, what the hell more do you need? That is not living like a monk in the hills.

• (2010)

Surely, it is time for my hon. friend and all of us to fight this appeal to the worst in all of us, greed and selfishness. When is that going to happen? Whatever happened to the principle of being our brother's keeper? You bring in a principled program, a universal program, and you do not touch it. You leave it off the income tax rolls. You leave it off the tax form completely.

Mr. Fretz: You said to include it in income tax.

Mr. Benjamin: No, I did not. I did not. I am sorry.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. On debate, the hon. member for Burin—St. George's.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I too have a few words to say on third reading of Bill C-69. I listened with great interest to the gentleman from Regina—Lumsden who, among other things, told us that he was the recipient of his first pension cheque. There was some muttering up in this end of the Chamber, not from me I assure him, as to whether he was in some kind of conflict of interest receiving two pay cheques from the public purse, one on behalf of his job here and the other because of his age. Of course, nobody would suggest that seriously.

In responding to that point I want to say something that he had already implied, that he must have lied on the application because certainly that young fellow who just spoke is not 65 years of age.

Mr. Speaker, let me come quickly to the point. I understand you, sir, have some pressing duties elsewhere. Duty calls for you to be the umpire at a game between members of Parliament and the pages.

An Hon. Member: It's already over.

Mr. Simmons: It is never over until Mr. Speaker gets out there and invokes some of his rulings. If they are as good as the ones he invokes in this House, I have great fear for the pages.

I firmly believe that the proposed cuts in Established Programs Financing will have a disastrous effect on universities, colleges, hospital funding and the operation of hospitals.

"Let us not make hospitals, universities and colleges a battleground between the federal government and the provincial governments. Let us solve those problems, not on the backs of the hospitals and universities, let us solve those problems outside that arena".

Those who know the manner of my participation in the debates in this House will know that I rarely read directly from a script. I did so in the past few moments for a very particular reason. I will tell you what that reason is in a moment. Let me remind you what I have just said. I have said that I firmly believe that the cuts in the EPF funding would have disastrous effects on universities, hospitals, education generally, and so on.

I read that word for word because that conviction is mine. I am concerned that the cuts in EPF funding will do damage to the operation of hospitals, to the functioning of universities and colleges, and to the access of young Canadians in whatever province to an education beyond the secondary level. That is a conviction that I hold very strongly, and that is why I stand at this stage of the bill to protest one more time what the government is proposing to do.

I have read those words. Not only are they my conviction. They were, to be more accurate, also the conviction of the present Minister of Finance. A moment ago I read word for word what the gentleman who now occupies the post of the Minister of Finance said in this very House on March 24, 1982. Eight years ago and a bit the Minister of Finance in this government was saying exactly what I am saying here today: do not cut EPF, it will have a disastrous affect on universities, it will adversely affect hospital care. That is what the gentleman was saying eight years ago when he was sitting over here in opposition.

The first question is: Why did he change his tune? Why did he, the advocate as I am today and as I have been over the years of properly funded hospital care, of full participation by the federal government in the funding of that hospital care, of adequately funded post-secondary education, and of adequate financial participation of the federal government in that post-secondary funding, change his tune on that particular issue? If we had the time we could show other inconsistencies between what the Minister of Finance said when he was in opposition and what he is perpetrating on the people of Canada at this particular time.

This bill brought in, in the guise of restraining the expenditure of government money, will indeed, as we have already said, play havoc with the lives of many people who because of the cutbacks in funding will not have as complete access to hospital care as they would have had without this cutback. It will play havoc with the lives of many young Canadians who because of these cutbacks will not have the same access to university education, community college education, or post-secondary education opportunities generally.

Let us for a moment look at the impact of some of the figures in various areas of this country. Do you realize, Mr. Speaker, that as a result of the actions of this Minister of Finance, this Prime Minister, and this government since they took office in 1984, the cumulative effects of the cutbacks in Established Programs Financing, and the reductions in federal transfer payments to the provinces in respect of this program amount to $684 million in the case of Newfoundland alone. That is from the time they started the cutbacks in 1986 until they run their course in 1995: $684 million. That is an awful lot of money for a small province such as Newfoundland and Labrador with a pretty limited capacity to pay and collect provincial tax revenues. At the same time it is an overwhelming burden in terms of the need to provide adequate university education and the need to provide adequate hospital care. That is $684 million less that the Newfoundland government will have received as a result of those particular cutbacks.

P.E.I, a smaller province than Newfoundland in terms of population, nevertheless will suffer a $155 million cutback over the life of the cutbacks in this bill and the bills preceding it since this government took office.

Nova Scotia will lose more than $1 billion that otherwise would have been transferred from the federal government to the provincial government in Nova Scotia so that that government could continue to meet its obligations in terms of post-secondary education and health care generally.

Often we hear the Prime Minister talk about how we are a caring society. Those are great words. It is difficult to see how that is supported by his actions as a leader of a government which is racking up new records in terms of its capacity to batter the weak, the less fortunate, and the old.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that after six years this government is not working. I am not saying that the government is not doing things. I am not saying that it is not busy. I am not saying that it is not trying things, but it is not functioning any more. If you back off for a moment and ask what a government ought to do, you will see that it is not doing what a government ought to be doing. It has stopped functioning as an effective government.

You can be effective without being completely popular. That is a different issue altogether, but this government is not carrying out its mandate. It is not functioning as the government of this country. This government no longer works, for a number of reasons.

First, it has lost the collective goodwill of the people. People out there do not trust this government any more. They do not believe in or give the government the benefit of the doubt any more. Normally in polls asking what kind of job the Prime Minister is doing or what kind of job the government is doing on a given day, you will find a fairly large pool of people who are prepared to give the government the benefit of the doubt. They are prepared to say that the government or the Prime Minister is doing a reasonable job, and so on and so forth.

Now, almost for the first time I believe in Canadian history, we are finding, and to a degree not experienced in other countries like Britain, Japan, West Germany, or the United States in similar polls, an overwhelming rejection of the Prime Minister and of the government of the day. The polls are absolutely astounding. From my standpoint in opposition it is encouraging, but in over-all terms these are absolutely astounding results, watershed results, Rubicon results, in terms of what the country is saying about the performance of this Prime Minister and the performance of this government.

This government has lost the goodwill of the people of Canada. This government has certainly lost the goodwill of the people of Newfoundland and Labrador, the province that I have the honour to represent in this Chamber.

This government has also stopped listening to the people and the people sense it. What more graphic example could you have of that than what is happening in terms of the proposed goods and services tax. The government has been told by 85 per cent of the Canadian people, through a succession of polls, that the people of Canada do not like, do not want, do not believe in, or do not think they need the goods and services tax. Yet the government insists on ramming it down the throats of Canadians. This government is not listening to Canadians any more.

Third, it must be clearly evident to most Canadians now that this government is riding roughshod over the people of Canada. Many examples could be drawn of how this government and how the Prime Minister, in particular, ride roughshod over people's wishes, and how the Prime Minister takes the view that he is right all the time, whether it is on the cutbacks in Established Programs Financing, on the goods and services tax, on the closure of rural post offices, or on the abandonment of railway lines.

One of the more recent and more despicable examples occurred on national television in the last few days. I refer to the incident during the course of the Meech Lake coverage on Saturday morning, the case, as the press were calling it, of the missing clause. I watched the Prime Minister explain for about 10 minutes in the most complete detail. This was the case of the clause that was absent from the draft agreement Saturday morning, the clause that Mr. Wells, the Premier of Newfoundland and Labrador, wanted to have included in the document. That it was omitted was a matter of some concern for Mr. Wells.

The Prime Minister showed up and, in the scrum outside the Conference Centre, assured everybody that it was an innocent mistake and that if the press would stop asking him questions he would rush off inside the door and fix it all. He said that it was just a typographical error, that some typist had slipped up and forgotten to include the paragraph that Mr. Wells wanted.

We all know, as subsequent events have shown us, that that is not what happened at all. We all know that it was a very deliberate act to leave that out. We all have it on the authority of a number of people that an instruction was given that that paragraph not be put in there. Mr. Wells is a premier representing a province of this country equal, I was led to believe, with every other province in this country. One would wonder in terms of the treatment we have gotten the last few days, but that is another issue.

Not only was an instruction given to delete the paragraph, but the Prime Minister stood there publicly, after having given that instruction, and said that it was not so. He assured us all that it was a completely innocent oversight that he was going fix as soon as he got inside the door.

We saw that kind of lie, that kind of untruth being played out on national television by the master of sleight of hand. I am not saying the Prime Minister had to accommodate every concern. I have some feelings on that, and they are not different from those of Mr. Wells.

However, to stick with the example, whether or not all the concerns should have been accommodated, the very least you would expect from the Prime Minister is some candour on the issue, either to say nothing or to tell it as it is instead of standing there for 10 minutes reading into the record what in terms of subsequent events was shown to be a clear falsehood, an absolute untruth, with no basis in truth at all. His assertion that it was an innocent typographical error, that somebody erred in the typing pool and left out the paragraph and he was going to fix it as soon as he got in the door, was wrong. He knew at the time he said it that it was wrong, blatantly wrong.

When Canadians have come to expect that kind of duplicity, that kind of double-talk from the Prime Minister of this country, is it any wonder that I can read into the record what the Minister of Finance said a few years ago and then demonstrate to you by holding up Bill C-69 that now the Minister of Finance, with the acquiescence of the Prime Minister, is doing the exact opposite?

• (2030)

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, because I understand my time is just about up, I submit that it is unconscionable that we have this piece of legislation in front of us. However, it is not at all surprising when you realize that the artists who perpetrate this are the same people who put together that constitutional circus last week. The sleight of hand artists do one thing and say something else, tell you one thing while they are doing something quite different. They told us in opposition that Established Programs Financing would be protected for people who need health care and post-secondary education, but when they came into office, they did the same despicable kind of dancing around on money matters as they did last week on the Constitution.

On both matters, on financial matters in terms of this bill, and on constitutional matters, their duplicity will come back to haunt them. Not only will it come back to haunt them, unfortunately, it will also come back to haunt the country. That is the sadness of it, that a lot of people who are not responsible for this duplicity will have to pay for it in spades both constitutionally in the one case, and financially in the present case down the road.

There is so much more I could say but I see from your signal, Sir, that my time is up.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On questions or comments, the hon. member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member mentioned his own province and how this bill affects it. He discussed medicare and post-secondary education at some length. However, what does he see down the road as the real effects of these cuts? It is all right for the government members to get up and say that they have got to cut the deficit. We all know that. However, they are really doing it on the backs of the other governments in this country, and we have to include municipal governments because the buck will eventually stop there too.

What effect does the hon. member really see these cuts having on provincial government administrations? How does he see them affecting the division of the tax dollars between federal and provincial governments in Canada?

Another member talked about the Rowell-Sirois report, one of the most thorough studies of financial divisions and jurisdiction ever held in this country. How does he envision the available tax dollars being divided in the future if the federal government is going to continue to slough off what is their burden onto the shoulders of the provinces, the municipalities and John Q. Public in this country?

Mr. Simmons: Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my colleague and friend for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke for the question. I say to him, do not fall for that line about cutting the deficit, and I know he does not fall for it. I know he put it to me as a preamble to his question. But I say to the Canadian people and to myself, let us not fall for this absolute nonsense about cutting the deficit.

If cutting the deficit was such a priority, then let me use another cliché. I always believed and was taught that charity begins at home. If there is to be some effort in cutting the deficit, why is it that we see the government, the Prime Minister, and the ministers still living very high on the hog. This burning desire to cut the deficit does not seem to stop the Prime Minister when it comes time to fly the limousines down to Costa Rica or to generally live high on the hog here in Canada.

We can take examples that in dollar terms do not mean a lot to this government in terms of total budget, but they mean a lot to the people who are living out there on welfare and whose welfare is going to be further threatened by this particular bill.

So, I cannot get very excited, Mr. Speaker, about cutting the deficit when I watch the way this government operates.

Let me come to the second part of the question of my friend, the hon. member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke. He asked, what do I see down the road as the effects. I say to him that we are seeing the effects. Already, I am talking to young people who cannot go to university. Already, I am talking to provincial finance ministers. I talked to the one from my own province in the last few hours who tells me that it is becoming very difficult to make ends meet, to meet the financial needs of the university and the hospitals in Newfoundland and Labrador because of the effects of this bill. The cumulative effect of this bill and the others before it since this government came to office is $684 million. That is $684 million less that Newfoundland is going to get to pay its medical bills, its university bills than it would have received if this bill was not before us.

Provincial governments are going to have to either cut back services or raise their taxes. A larger segment of the total revenue is going to have to come from provincial tax dollars. There again, if there were time and I were to digress away from this issue, I could draw a parallel between what was happening last week in the constitutional talks and the way they were being manipulated and what is happening here. It is the same whole mug's game where you shift the blame all the time to somebody else.

In the case of this particular bill cutting back expenses, funding for university and health costs expenditures, the government is shifting the blame to the provincial treasurers, the provincial finance ministers, the provincial premiers so they will be blamed if they raise provincial taxes, if they cut back on health care and on university education programs.

I say to my friend from Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke, that is the sadness of it all. The people most affected, the elderly, university students, the people on social assistance, are having to put up with this continuing smoke and mirrors game by this government that smiles while putting the knife in all the time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. On debate, the hon. member for Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, this bill is so wide ranging that one can talk about almost anything. I would like to first outline the specifics of the bill. What Bill C-69 actually does is freeze federal transfer payments for the next two years to the provinces under the Established Programs Financing, which is another term for transfer payments with regard to post-secondary education and health care. It limits the increase for federal transfer payments to Ontario, to British Columbia and Alberta under the Canada Assistance Plan.

It is eliminating the Canadian Exploration Incentives Program which is hurting small exploration companies. It freezes public utilities income tax transfers over the next two years.

The budget cutbacks alone to these four programs amount to $1 billion in 1990-91, $1.8 billion in 1991-92, and a total of $8.4 billion over the next five fiscal years that the provinces are not going to get. The cutbacks to transfer payments to all provinces for these essential areas of post-secondary education and health care, and cutbacks to transfer payments to Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia under the Canada Assistance Plan, will force the provinces to simply increase taxes.

This government is not cutting the deficit, as my hon. friend just said a while ago. It is transferring the debt to the provinces, or passing the buck, as it is called. As a result of this bill passing, and the cutting of transfer payments to the provinces by this government, the provinces are going to have to collect another $576 per taxpayer in their provinces over the next five years. When Canadians see their provincial taxes go up, they are actually paying the taxes for this Minister of Finance who is passing the buck to the provinces.

This is not the first time it has happened. It is the third time that the Conservative government has attacked the Established Programs Financing or transfer payments since 1986. Cumulatively, these transfer cutbacks between 1986 and 1987 right up to 1994 and 1995 will amount to the astronomical sum of $31.1 billion, of which $22.2 billion should have been allocated to health care and $8.9 billion to post-secondary education.

I just want to repeat in particular, the figure of $22.2 billion that should be allocated to health care and is not going to be by this federal government. Is it any wonder that the people out there are worried about the medicare program across Canada because the federal government is backing away from its share of the contribution and indeed its responsibility. Then they say the people who talk about it are fear-mongering. What a farce.

An interesting conversation took place today between me and the Minister of Finance across the floor. I like to keep reminding the Minister of Finance that in a speech in Toronto in August, 1984 he said that he would certainly not attack the deficit by increasing taxes but would rather do it by cutting government programs.

Not only has he increased taxes 31 times, and the GST will be the thirty-second time, he has certainly kept his promise about cutting programs. Right here, we see where he is cutting these transfer payments to the provinces by over $31 billion in a five-year period. They are not just programs, they are institutions of this country, namely, medicare and post-secondary education.

He has cut the other government programs with a vengeance. The national debt is still growing. The sad part is that he is not making any gains because the national debt of the country has more than doubled since the government took office. The simplicity of the economic measures promised by the Minister of Finance in 1984 can simply be classified as schoolboy rhetoric.

If the provinces decide not to increase taxes, they will be forced to make cutbacks. In turn, hospitals will have to close beds, limit costly operations or find other reductions. Students will have to face higher tuition fees, overcrowded classes or other cost-cutting measures.

On March 24, 1982, the Minister of Finance had the following to say in the House, and I do not think this quote can be repeated often enough:

> Let us not make hospitals, universities and colleges a battleground between the federal government and the provincial governments. Let us solve those problems, not on the backs of hospitals and universities; let us solve those problems outside of that arena.

Here he has brought his very solution to it and he has brought those things right back into the arena. In Bill C-69 that is before the House today, he is doing the very things he suggested should not be done when he was sitting in the opposition in the House of Commons.

Today, he said that I was living in the past. When the Minister of Finance makes a promise or a commitment, if one reminds him of it, one is living in the past. I brought him a little more up to date and mentioned his recent statement with regard to post-secondary education and medicare. It seems that when the Minister of Finance makes commitments and one reminds him of them, one is talking about the past. I wonder what he would say if we criticized him for something we thought he was going to say in a year from now. I do not think that would be very good logic to follow. The Minister of Finance always has a way to slough these things off.

The reason for the Minister of Finance said that I was living in the past must be due to the fact that the minister has been making commitments for so long, that to him these commitments have become traditional, rather than becoming something new. As soon as he says them, they are old hat.

The real fact that we see in this bill today is the fact that the provinces are being dumped on by the federal government of Canada. The Minister of State for Privatization, when he was once before a legislative committee I was a member of, complained because the provinces had little or no debt and they should have. He was ready to dump on them then, and he certainly has since.

It is very important at this stage to come out simply with the real challenge about this. It was mentioned in the House today that the Province of Ontario had a balanced budget this year. Because the provinces have no debt, in the eyes of the federal government, that seems to be a sin. Because they have a balanced budget, it wants to dump more on to them.

When these transfer cuts were announced, a few days after the budget was tabled British Columbia and Ontario announced that they would challenge the cuts to the Canada Assistance Program in court. This legal battle could delay implementation of this measure until the court makes its decision. Alberta supports the action taken by these two provinces.

The contesting provinces believe that the Canada Assistance Plan can only be modified after a year's notice and with provincial consent. After all, the province must be given some notice if it is going to get its financial house in order, instead of having this cut thrust on it overnight.

Also, the government did not seek consent of the provinces, so neither one of these conditions have been met. Right now the provinces look as if they are in a very good position.

With respect to post-secondary education, the Prime Minister betrayed, once again, his own promise to have first-class education for our youth and, in so doing, made a mockery of the national task force on education that he had created. On August 25, 1989, the Prime Minister stated: "This government will carry its fair share of the burden to ensure that all young Canadians receive a first-class education as they confront a world-class challenge".

One cannot challenge someone to do something one minute and pull the rug out from underneath them then next.

• (2050)

When the provinces are called upon to make up the difference in financing important items such as post-secondary education and medicare, the money must come from somewhere else. There is a very important part to that with respect to the Canada Assistance Plan. Cuts in assistance to the poorest in Ontario, Alberta and British Columbia contradict the government's commitment to "come to the aid of those who are in need".

The poor in these three provinces are just as poor as those in any other of the provinces. Moreover, British Columbia and Ontario, supported by Alberta, are carrying on their court case challenging that budgetary item right now as we study this bill.

These are great words by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance, but there is no commitment. The additional financial pressure that will be brought to bear on provincial governments will affect other services provided by provincial governments such as the building of roads and forestry. Agriculture and forestry are industries that need a lot of help today, and energy projects are very expensive, as we know.

We have a major issue here in eastern Ontario with regard to Highway 17, travelling up the Ottawa Valley from Ottawa. There have been a lot of unfortunate deaths on that highway, but they have not all been attributable, by any means, to the highway itself.

I would like to make a very important point. The amount of money that Ontario lost when the federal government cut its transfer payments this year would have practically built that entire highway. The province has announced the building of Highway 316 from the 401 into Ottawa, four lanes. After 123 years of Confederation, it will be the first four-lane highway into the National Capital from southern Ontario. It has announced the continuation of building of a four-lane highway from the end of the Queensway to Arnprior. The highway continues from there is for another 75 miles or so. That will come, but I want to point out that financial stress has been placed on the province of Ontario by the lack of transfer payments from the federal government and indeed through Bill C-69 today.

It is very important to note that the province of Ontario, which faces drastic cuts in transfer payments, is now faced with major construction items in eastern Ontario to be done over a very short time-frame. There were 42 years of Conservative government at Queen's Park in Ontario and eastern Ontario was neglected. Today, the province of Ontario under Premier Peterson is faced with catch-up programs because of neglect during those more than four decades of Conservative government in Ontario.

There were times when 14 out of 15 members of the Ontario legislature from eastern Ontario were Conservative members. So there is no penalty for not voting the right way. They voted for the government and still did not get those improvements and eastern Ontario was neglected.

When the Hon. Joe Greene was Minister of Agriculture and later Minister of Energy, he called Highway 17 the Ottawa Valley's goat trail in a speech in the House of Commons more than 25 years ago. If he were here today, he would be very interested in the debate that is going on on that issue now.

I am simply saying that it is unfair to call upon the present provincial government under Premier Peterson to do in a half dozen years what the previous Conservative government failed to do in 42 years.

As a finale, I mention that I asked a question previously about the Rowell-Sirois report and the division of finances between the provinces and the federal government. I am absolutely convinced that, with the way we are going, we will need another in-depth study of the financial structure of the country.

The changes in transfer payments are undermining the basic financial arrangements of the country that have been in place for years. They have served the country well at both federal and provincial levels and now that they are changing, there will be some bad effects and things will certainly be mismanaged as a result of that.

No one wants to see another great depression such as the one in the thirties that brought about that report. It affected families. People could not even pay their taxes. It was a lost generation. Everybody has a right to fair education and to medicare in the country.

I can only say in conclusion that the government is going to have to change its mind. It is going to have to start living up to the basic agreements under the Rowell-Sirois Commission report and get back on track and pay proper transfer payments to the provinces if we are going to maintain any standard of living in that regard.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, my original intention was not to enter into this debate, but when I realized that Bill C-69 is the largest cut to social programs in Canadian history—the largest cut that slashes health, education, welfare, child care and transition shelter spending—I would be negligent in my duty as a member of Parliament not to lend my voice in protest at the actions of the government.

Is it not ironic today that during Question Period we heard the government defend major increases to its top bureaucrats, increases of $40,000, $50,000, $60,000, and I heard in one case of over $100,000. The justification here is that we have got to make these top management positions competitive with the private sector.

Indeed, in the last number of years we have seen tremendous increases in the salaries and the dividends that the top of the corporate sector has received. On the same day that the government can justify these tremendous increases on the upper income scale, it is introducing Bill C-69 that would cap the transfer of the assistance payments from the federal government to three provincial governments, the governments of Ontario, Alberta, and British Columbia. Perhaps those are the provinces where the poor need assistance the most, because the cost of living and the cost of housing, particularly in cities like Toronto and Vancouver, have made it almost impossible for poor people to continue to live in those urban centres.

On the same day that the government attempts to justify these tremendous increases to its top echelons in the Crown corporations and departments, it attempts to move through a bill that cuts back on programs like medicare and post-secondary education. As a country we are in a period of tremendous economic transition, much of it brought about by things like the free trade agreement. This brings about tremendous human dislocation. People who have worked in their jobs, developed a career, developed skills, all at once find that those skills are no longer needed. It is a time when those people need some support, for education, for retraining and as a social net. This government has been attacking that social net. On the one hand, it has created a greater need for a social net, and on the other hand, it is yanking that social net away. I do not believe the people of Canada will endorse and support this.

Of course, we hear the government justify this because it says it is fighting the deficit. I have no problems with that. Let us not forget that it is not the poor of this country who are to be blamed for the deficit. They did not create the deficit, and the victims should not be attacked. We have heard Tories say that we are living beyond our means and that we should tighten our belts.

Looking at Canada's record, compared to the other industrialized countries, such as OECD countries, what we spend on social programs as a percentage of Gross Domestic Product is the second lowest. We spend less on social programs, on health, education, welfare, family allowance, medicare, you name it, as a percentage of our Gross Domestic Product than Holland, Italy, Germany, Denmark, Sweden, Great Britain or Ireland. Only the United States, as a percentage of its Gross Domestic Product, spends less on social programs than we do.

Do not tell me it is the poor and the social programs of this country which have created the deficit. Do not blame the victims. This is the traditional Tory line of blaming the victims, and saying that the people on welfare have got it too good, that our medicare program is too rich, that our child care program is just too expensive and too costly. If the people in Germany, Holland, Italy, Sweden, and Denmark are able to afford programs that ensure that there is decent medicare, that there is child care, that the elderly are taken care of in dignity, that there is a proper education system, particularly in terms of retraining and higher education, then in heaven's name, I cannot understand why a country as rich as Canada, with our tremendous resources, with our sparse population is not able to afford the same.

I want to touch particularly on the cutbacks to the EPF program and the effect that this will have on higher education. Earlier this spring, I visited several universities around the country. When I visited Carleton University, here in Ottawa, I was told by students that at times there is a five or six day waiting period for a particular book at the library and even then, when they get there they might only be able to have this resource book for maybe an hour or two, because the university cannot afford to replenish its library with the needed research material. I visited the university at the Lakehead, where I was told that the plant and equipment in their research facilities had been bought at the beginning of this decade and now need to be improved. Repairs are needed and equipment needs to be updated and they cannot afford it. Mr. Speaker, I visited the university at Lethbridge and the university in Calgary and I heard about the same problems, that the tuition fees are being increased, the size of classroom is being expanded and the ratio between the instructor and the number of students is increasing. The same problem exists at the university in my home city of Regina, a university that I attended. I was president of the students' council in the 1960s. At that time we talked about a community of scholars.

I walk in those university halls today and it is not a community of scholars. It is a McDonald's fast food chain. That is what higher education has come to in this country, a fast food outlet with huge lecture halls and professors with whom you will never have an opportunity to have an intellectual discussion or discourse. Forget about the notion of the community of scholars.

Our universities are becoming second rate. They do not have the research equipment in order to help graduate first-rate researchers. That is what this country needs. This is what we need if we are going to grow into the 21st century.

We need scientists. Our young people need a world first-class education. Unfortunately we are becoming a second-rate nation because our education system is becoming second rate.

That is the saddest part of all. We are denying and robbing our young people of the possibility of being able to get good jobs because they are not getting a first-class education. I find that so sad, Mr. Speaker.

What this government is doing with Bill C-69 is attacking the poor through such measures as medicare and post-secondary education, measures that help the young, the old, the aged and the sick. Now they must bear the burden of fighting the deficit.

Meanwhile the Governor of the Bank of Canada and his staff and minions are able to get large increases in their pay. The upper echelon of the Public Service is getting good, fat bonuses.

An Hon. Member: It is gross.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, my colleague says it is gross. It is gross that on the one hand we have the attack by the Tory government on the poor, and on the other hand it is helping the well-to-do. What a mix of priorities.

I think we all feel ashamed to be Canadians when we begin to develop a record like this. It is denying our future; it is denying those who are less fortunate than ourselves in our society; it is resulting in a less caring society and so therefore a less civilized society, all in a country so rich with resources and wealth.

Those are the comments I wish to make in this debate. I join with my colleagues in protesting and speaking against an act which is the largest cutback in social programs in the history of this country.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I want to take a couple of minutes to commend my colleague from Regina for a very eloquent speech, commenting on Bill C-69.

This legislation in a very fundamental way will change the social contract of this country. These are changes that this Conservative government has embarked upon some time ago.

We remember all too well the promises the Prime Minister made that social programs were to be a sacred trust. We also remember that this same government, this same Prime Minister who promised that social programs would be a sacred trust, has cut back on benefits to the elderly, cut back on family allowances, and has cut back on unemployment insurance benefits.

As well, we know that the provisions of this government's so-called restraint—obviously there is no restraint for senior civil servants in this government—has frozen contributions for legal aid, has cut in real terms programs for young offenders, and we know they have cut funding for social housing in this country as well.

The effect of Bill C-69 is particularly serious in my province of British Columbia. As we know, it has imposed a cap on transfers under the Canada Assistance Plan of 5 per cent per year in the provinces of Ontario, Alberta, and my own province of British Columbia.

The combined effects of Bill C-96, the budget, and Bill C-33 will mean for British Columbia that up until 1995 we will have lost, in real terms, over $3 billion which would otherwise be directed to the province of British Columbia. That will be in the area of health care, in post-secondary education, and in a number of other important areas. All these areas under the Vander Zalm Social Credit Government are already reeling because of devastating cutbacks.

With regard to health care, we have seen people who are on waiting lists for heart surgery actually dying because of the heartlessness of the Vander Zalm Social Credit Government, now aided and abetted by the Conservatives.

We have seen devastating cuts in post-secondary education in my own constituency in Simon Fraser University and the B.C. Institute of Technology. Both of them are suffering from crowding, cutbacks in resources for libraries and research, and all the other areas that my colleague from Regina has pointed out so eloquently. We know as well that in terms of the health care effects of Bill C-69 this has dealt a very serious blow to the Canada Health Act. The executive director of the nurses' association has said that the Minister of Finance has just sounded a death knell to the Canada Health Act. As my colleague has indicated, and I see the Speaker signalling that I should wrap up my comments, this bill will attack the people who are already the poorest in our country.

I want to ask my colleague if he would like to comment briefly with respect to the impact that this bill will have, particularly on the poor in the provinces of Ontario, British Columbia, and Alberta where after all almost half the recipients of the Canada Assistance Plan are located. Many aboriginal people are already struggling in devastating poverty, a condition that has been described as a national shame by the chief commissioner of the Canadian Human Rights Commission. I wonder if my very distinguished colleague could comment on this point.

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, yes, indeed it gives me pleasure to respond to my colleague's question.

I suspect the best way of describing the results of these measures that the government has taken on the poor is to say that it is sentencing the poor to deeper poverty. It is affecting, in particular, poor people in metropolitan areas like Vancouver and Toronto and like Edmonton and Calgary as well where the price of housing increased significantly in the last number of years and where to pay the rent now has become a substantial part of people's incomes. Certainly the people in lower income groups have not seen their wages rise the way the cost of living has risen for them.

I remember one case of a person I know quite well who lives in the city of Vancouver. She is a single parent, works in a restaurant, and has some cooking abilities. She clears around $1,200 to $1,300 a month. She spends $450 of that on rent and $450 on day care. That amounts to $900, which leaves her about $400 to pay for her transportation, food, and all the other necessities in life. This is a hard working person who is trying to keep off the welfare roles and who wants to live an active and productive life. It is not easy for people in that situation. In fact it is darn hard. I wish the government would show some consideration and heart for these people, but it does not do so. Its fixation on the deficit is such that it is willing to inflict greater hardships on our poor people in order to solve the problem and the economic mess that it has created. I find that unconscionable.

Mr. George S. Baker (Gander—Grand Falls): Mr. Speaker, just a couple of words in the dying moments of this debate.

The bill before the House says in its title "restraint of government expenditures". The very areas that it restrains government expenditures in are in the areas of health and education. If there were two areas that one could come up with in which government should not restrain its spending, it would have to be in health and education. Those are the two main, basic areas. They are the two areas in which we need more expenditures, health and education.

Today, in the federal riding of Gander—Grand Falls we have to send people to Halifax, Nova Scotia, to receive certain types of medical treatment not available in the province of Newfoundland. I am referring to the fact that the only litho triptic machine in Atlantic Canada is in a hospital in Halifax, Nova Scotia. That is the only one of which I know.

Four hundred and fifty Newfoundlanders a year get on a plane and go from one of our airports in their local community and travel all the way to Halifax, Nova Scotia, to wait in line for a relatively uncomplicated procedure that was invented about 10 years ago. There are machines that are perfected that cost around $2 million. When one talks about the cost of hospital machines one has to keep in mind that the major cost is in actually operating it sometimes.

There are 450 people a year who have to go to another province to receive treatment. The cost is very great to the provincial treasury, but it is greater to the people who have to make that journey. To modernize at a time when more expenditures are needed, when provincial governments are struggling to keep up-to-date with their machinery in hospitals, the federal government turns around and announces that it is cutting its money for the operation of hospitals. What used to be called the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Care Act was changed in 1977 and is now called block funding.

As well, a major problem with a student going to Memorial University in Newfoundland is this. Can the student take the course that he or she needs to take in order to go to a professional school? In other words, you go into someone's house and ask: "How is your son or daughter doing"? The mother looks up and says: "Well, not too bad, but they can't seem to be able to take the courses they need in order to get the degree or in order to go on to a professional school". Just imagine, in this day and age, a student registered in the university, paid the tuition and cannot do the courses they need to do because there are not enough places.

Ms. Clancy: Shame.

Mr. Baker: Just imagine the major problems of a student going to university today .

Mr. de Jong: It is shameful.

Mr. Baker: At a time when that is happening, what does the federal government do? It turns around and cuts transfer payments for post-secondary education to the provinces.

I suppose it would be bad enough if we could make up for it on the provincial end. If you cut $684 million in transfers from the budget of the province of Newfoundland from 1986 to 1995, if the federal government were doing something that would make up for the loss, then fine and dandy, we would end up square and would at least be able to progress.

Speaking of the riding of Gander—Grand Falls, we just had a paper mill close because the company is building a new one in Alabama. Another one is in Venezuela on the Oronoco River.

An Hon. Member: With faster growing trees.

Mr. Baker: Yes, faster growing trees, cheaper labour, encouragement of the federal Government of Canada to invest in the United States, invest in other parts of the world at a time when we face cuts in these areas, when industries are closing, on the encouragement of the Government of Canada, increasing their business in the United States, the Government of Canada turns around and actually issue up to 58 factory freezer trawler licences for foreign nations to fish off our coast.

Mr. de Jong: Who speaks for Canada?

Mr. Baker: They are licensed inside the 200-mile zone. If you were to say that is $1 a pound for every pound of fish they caught, on last year's figures that would be $1 billion.

If we were to tell the Soviet Union, Cuba, Norway, and all the foreign nations and all of these people that we want to go over there and fish off their coasts, we would be blown out of the water.

The Government of Canada has just increased their licences. For the first time in our history we have mackerel being caught off the coast of Newfoundland and Nova Scotia and in the Cabot Strait. The government just gave out licences last week to the U.S.S.R. to fish off Labrador and northern Newfoundland to within 12 miles of the coast. The point is if you made it up on a dollar-per-pound basis, that would be $1 billion and Newfoundland could build hospitals and get its litho triptic machines. But, we do not see any of that. We see just the reverse happening.

All in all, this bill should really be defeated by the House of Commons. It should be thrown in the ashcan of history. It does not deserve to be before the House at this time or at any other time and we hope that government members will vote against it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

FISHERIES

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, I rise on this occasion to discuss a question I asked in the House of Commons on April 3. The question was directed to the Minister of Fisheries.

My concern was that in view of the extraordinary gap in the surveillance and control mechanism off Canada's coastline, the longest in the world, and particularly in light of Recommendation 22 of the Harris Report, which talked about additional resources to undertake the task of surveillance and control, particularly in fisheries surveillance, I asked the minister to inform the House what plans he had to redress this well known and serious deficiency.

Either the minister misunderstood my question or he chose to answer one particular portion of it because, in fact, he did discuss one aspect but it was the aspect of the recent contract that had been signed. That was with Provincial Airways in Newfoundland for the two King Air 200 Beechcraft aircraft that were going to carry out their surveillance in lieu of the trackers. I think the contracts were to the tune of $28 million. I was delighted to hear that but I had already known that. In fact, let me read what Recommendation 22 of the Harris Report says: "The Government of Canada should undertake the provision of additional patrol vessels" and I stress patrol vessels, "for offshore surveillance to provide adequate on-site action in respect of violations reported by aircraft or by observers".

My concern is essentially for the vessels, which is a follow-up to any surveillance that may be done. Surveillance alone is not good. The business is surveillance and control, if you are interested in controlling your fisheries areas.

Since the mid-seventies off the east coast of Newfoundland, there has been a tremendous change in the pace in the fisheries. There have been more people involved, there have been more foreigners, more species being fished, better technology and larger ships going out to a much greater distance than had taken place in the mid-seventies.

Before I go any further, I would make the statement that it would be very hard to deny that the surveillance and control activities that we have now are probably less than we had in 1975, with a tremendous magnitude increase in the fisheries that are taking place.

When we look at surveillance and control in Canada, there are really three aspects of this. Right now, the offshore patrols are a combination of air surveillance, ship patrols and observers that we place aboard most of the foreign vessels out to the 200-mile limit. Let's forget about the observers. I will not talk about them any more this evening. I would like to concentrate on air patrols in a general sense.

Canada has the world's largest coastline, 60,000 coastline miles. To patrol that, we have a total of 18 Aurora aircraft; we used to have 25 or 26 trackers but they will eventually be gone. To my knowledge, in the east coast, we have recently contracted for two Beechcraft King Air 200s, which granted us a very effective aircraft with the new Litton radar. I believe there is one more in the making. That is 18, 19, 20, or 21 aircraft, if you count them. The 18 Aurora are long-range maritime patrol. The coastline is 60,000 linear miles.

• (2130)

The Netherlands has a coastline of 228 miles. It uses roughly the same number, 13 maritime patrol aircraft.

Japan has 5,000 linear miles of coastline. It has presently 130 maritime patrol aircraft and is about to order another 100.

If you want to put this another way, Mr. Speaker, Japan with one-tenth the coastline has 10 times the patrol effort off its coast, and Holland has roughly the same number of maritime patrol aircraft to patrol one-two hundred and fiftieth of the coastline.

Mr. Speaker, I think you can see the comparisons there which indicate that either these two countries are awfully high or we are awfully low. I would suggest that it is the latter.

I want now to look at the specific recommendation related to the patrol vessels. As I stand here tonight there are only patrols vessels off Canada's east coast. The two vessels are the William Colley and the Cape Roger. I believe the Cape Roger is in refit now. Statistically there is really one and a half patrol vessels to patrol the east coast of Canada and the south coast of Newfoundland.

When you look at the area that is covered, Mr. Speaker, and just picture now the south coast of Newfoundland, all the area of the northern cod out around the Grand Banks and way up as far north as Baffin Island, there are just two vessels. To say that that is inadequate is a gross understatement. In fact to say it is a token is ludicrous. It is nothing more than a joke. It is a joke. The brunt of the joke is Newfoundlanders and Atlantic Canadians. Out of the two patrol vessels one is stationed on the Banks pretty well all the time, and the other one therefore has to patrol that vast area.

Mr. Speaker, as anybody with a maritime background would tell you, that is a joke. That is the best way I can put it.

The point of this whole business is that surveillance and control is a team effort. The aircraft locate and identify, but they are incapable of actually taking any action that would force the proper follow-on from these illegal pursuits.

Aircraft certainly has some advantages, that is, they cannot be rammed by an aggressive trawler, as the Saguenay was rammed by the Concordia just before Christmas last year. I have to stress that you can locate as many fishermen as you can, but unless there is a surface vessel to go out and actually board and examine the catch, and unless there is enough aircraft to continue with continuous patrol, then you are in serious trouble.

I would like to make a suggestion. We have 21 trawlers now that seem to be of surplus use, I guess largely because of the reduction in the effort of the fisheries which has been a forced effort due to the dismal state of our stocks. These 21 fisheries vessels include the six mid-distance fleet off Newfoundland that have been decommissioned.

I would like to suggest that the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, the Minister of National Defence, and perhaps the Secretary of State for External Affairs get together to see if somehow we can acquire these vessels. We can lease them, rent them, or perhaps even buy them. We can man them with qualified skippers, maybe some of the skippers from these trawlers who are out of work. We might even consider putting them in the naval reserve and having them operate under the Maritime Coastal Defence Organization that was recently formed in Maritime Command.

Mr. Speaker, I can assure you that if this is not a no cost it is certainly a low cost recommendation that I believe—in fact I am seriously convinced—should have further investigation. I leave that to the goodwill and imagination of the Ministers of National Defence and Fisheries and Oceans.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the hon. member's time has expired.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Forestry)): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak on behalf of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Valcourt) and remind the hon. member that recommendation 22 of the Harris Report suggests that the Government of Canada make arrangements to increase the number of ships assigned to maritime surveillance.

The purpose is to provide sufficient resources to be able to follow up on violations sighted by airplanes or pointed out by observers. This measure will also make it possible to combine the use of helicopters and smaller patrol boats for surveillance of coastal fisheries. Similar recommendations were made by the Scotia–Fundy task force on the ground fishery. In the course of departmental consultations throughout Atlantic Canada, the industry, fishermens' organizations and provincial governments also pointed out the need for more efficient and effective surveillance, both inside and outside the Canadian zone.

More efficient and effective surveillance and enforcement of the regulations will require full integration of all aspects of the surveillance program, including air surveillance, coverage by observers, surveillance at sea and ashore, and monitoring of quotas.

The Department of Fisheries and Oceans recently awarded a contract to Airways Limited for 3,815 hours of air surveillance of the deep sea fisheries in 1990–91. This represents more than twice the number of hours of surveillance provided by the trackers of the Department of National Defence in recent years. The new surveillance which will be in addition to 420 hours of flying by the Aurora aircraft provided free of charge by DND, represents a substantial upgrading of our deep sea fisheries air surveillance program off the Atlantic coast.

The minister realizes that effective management of fish stocks means that we must have appropriate and adequate air surveillance and control. To this end, the department will monitor and assess all components of its surveillance and regulatory programs to determine the levels of air, sea and land patrols to be maintained to guarantee effective management of Canada's fish stocks.

FORESTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today in the House to follow up on a question I put to the Minister of the Environment, which in his absence ended up being answered by the Minister of Forestry. This was on May 7, which was in National Forest Week. This was a very important week in Canada, something of which I think all Canadians are aware.

The question that I put to the minister at the time was along these lines. I asked him in light of the commitment and the talk from the government about the importance of our environment and the announcement of The Green Plan what kind of commitment there was from the government to plant some trees. It was a very simple question.

During National Forest Week and on Earth Day everybody across the country—indeed, across North America and the world—were out doing their thing for the environment. Part of that was people planting trees. Everybody was out planting trees except for this government.

The reason we call on this government to try and plant some trees I think is pretty obvious. We know all the concerns about global warming, the role our forests play in our ecosystems, and all the employment that people from coast to coast get from our forests. There are over 300 communities dependent on the forest industry.

How does the federal government plant trees? It does it through a very effective vehicle that many provinces have come to be aware of. It is through forestry agreements, as they are called, that are signed with all provinces. They have been used in different parts of Canada for different purposes, often for research, assisting with the development of new species, and what have you.

In British Columbia, my home province, and in my own riding there has been a great deal of assistance given to replanting harvested land. This is because the government of the day failed to do any serious work in reforestation or any intensive silvicultural work, which left these lands unproductive with no seedlings to grow and no future for forests.

The government of the day came up with what are called the Forest Resource Development Agreements. I have raised this issue in the House on a number of occasions, primarily because we are faced now with the incredible situation that despite the rhetoric of the government and its so-called concern for the environment, it has allowed forestry agreements in Ontario, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, and Alberta to expire well over a year ago. In British Columbia our forest agreement expired on March 31. We have been without a forest agreement for some 72 days now, despite six commitments by the Minister of Forestry to the people of British Columbia. One of the main commitments was that he would find the money in the Supplementary Estimates or elsewhere. We asked the department to produce that information for the forestry committee two months ago, and it has yet to find out any of that basic information.

• (2140)

The minister also made a commitment to us that he would have an agreement signed well before the planting season would start. The planting season for seedlings across the country varies, but in some cases in British Columbia it started as early as April. The time is coming fast, if it has not passed already, for contractors to gear up to plant trees. A number of contractors in British Columbia are now scaling down operations in the light of the absolute failure of the federal Conservative government and the Socred government in British Columbia to reach and sign a forest agreement. It is critical that we do that in this country.

I want to read into the record from Forestry Canada's own 1990-1991 Estimates. This is important information for all of us. It concerns how many trees we are planting versus how much we are harvesting and what we have left over. I quote:

> —in 1987, of a total harvest estimated at just under 1 million hectares, 285,000 hectares were successfully planted or seeded while a further 500,000 hectares are estimated to have regenerated naturally, leaving a shortfall of 210,000 hectares.

These figures are likely small c conservative. Just under 250,000 hectares are being added to the non-forested land in this country because of the lack of forest agreements, the lack of the kind of forest management policies that we should have in this country. We have called upon this government and the provincial governments to move as quickly as they can to ensure that those agreements are signed.

I understand that the Minister of Forestry is meeting this Thursday with the provincial minister in B.C. I urge them to get on with the job and sign those forest agreements. Let us start planting some trees for once.

[Translation]

Mr. Michel Champagne (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Forestry)): Mr. Speaker, I was greatly interested in the comments of my colleague who, in the course of his remarks, stated that in recent years the federal government, our government, the Progressive Conservative Party has not accomplished anything at all in terms of reforestation. I would remind him that since 1984 our government increased the forestry budget by more than 300 per cent. Our government also signed in excess of $1.2 billion worth of investment agreements with the Canadian provinces, including British Columbia, Quebec, Newfoundland and all the other provinces. We are talking about investments of more than $1.3 billion dollars' worth of seedlings we have planted.

My colleague ought to acknowledge the boost our government has given to Canada's forest sector by establishing a full-fledged Department of Forestry. He should also admit—and it is unfortunate that he would not say so—that most cases related to public forests fall under provincial jurisdiction. This is something the federal government takes into account in all such agreements signed with British Columbia and Quebec. He cannot ignore the fact that it is the provinces' responsibility.

The Minister of Forestry said yes, we are prepared to work together. Yes we are prepared to renew the forest agreements inasmuch as each province demonstrates genuine interest in this natural resource. Mr. Speaker, that is our approach in the ongoing negotiations.

I would remind my colleague that the March 31 agreement has ended, It is true, there is a certain delay. But it is better to take the time required to sign an agreement that will benefit the provinces, the forestry industry and our young people's future than to sign an agreement prematurely to satisfy the very short-term needs of individuals who want to keep their original businesses running some way or other. The goal of the federal government and the Department of Forestry is to reach solid, lasting agreements for sustainable development in the interests of future generations. That is what we want, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The motion that the House do now adjourn is deemed to have been adopted. The House therefore stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m. pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 9.46 p.m.

FIRST MINISTERS' MEETING ON THE CONSTITUTION

FINAL COMMUNIQUÉ

June 9, 1990

1990 CONSTITUTIONAL AGREEMENT

WHEREAS on April 30, 1987, the Prime Minister of Canada and the Premiers reached agreement in principle on means to bring about the full and active participation of Quebec in Canada's constitutional evolution;

AND WHEREAS on June 3, 1987, all first ministers signed the 1987 Constitutional Accord and committed themselves to introducing as soon as possible the Constitution Amendment, 1987 in Parliament and the provincial legislative assemblies;

AND WHEREAS the Constitution Amendment, 1987 has been authorized by Parliament and the legislative assemblies of Quebec, Saskatchewan, Alberta, Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia, Ontario and British Columbia:

1. THE MEECH LAKE ACCORD

The Premiers of New Brunswick, Manitoba and Newfoundland undertake to submit the Constitution Amendment, 1987 for appropriate legislative or public consideration and to use every possible effort to achieve decision prior to June 23, 1990.

2. SENATE REFORM

After proclamation, the federal government and the provinces will constitute a commission with equal representation for each province and an appropriate number of territorial and federal representatives to conduct hearings and to report to Parliament and the legislative assemblies of the provinces and territories, prior to the First Ministers' conference on the Senate to be held by the end of 1990 in British Columbia, on specific proposals for Senate reform that will give effect to the following objectives:

— The Senate should be elected.

— The Senate should provide for more equitable representation of the less populous provinces and territories.

— The Senate should have effective powers to ensure the interests of residents of the less populous provinces and territories figure more prominently in national decision-making, reflect Canadian duality and strengthen the Government of Canada's capacity to govern on behalf of all citizens, while preserving the principle of the responsibility of the Government to the House of Commons.

Following proclamation of the Meech Lake Accord, the Prime Minister and all Premiers agree to seek adoption of an amendment on comprehensive Senate reform consistent with these objectives by July 1, 1995.

The Prime Minister undertakes to report semi-annually to the House of Commons on progress achieved towards comprehensive Senate reform.

The Prime Minister and all Premiers, reaffirming the commitment made in the Edmonton Declaration and the provisions to be entrenched under the Constitution Amendment, 1987, undertook that Senate reform will be the key constitutional priority until comprehensive reform is achieved.

If, by July 1, 1995, comprehensive Senate reform has not been achieved according to the objectives set out above under section 41 of the Constitution Act, 1982, as amended by the Constitution Amendment, 1987, the number of Senators by which a province is entitled to be represented in the Senate will be amended so that, of the total of one hundred and four Senators, the representation of Ontario will be eighteen Senators, the representation of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Newfounland will be eight Senators each, and the representation of all other provinces and the territories will remain unchanged. In the case of any province whose representation declined, no new appointments would be made until that province's representation had by attrition declined below its new maximum. In the event of such a redistribution of Senate seats, Newfoundland would be entitled to another Member of Parliament in the House of Commons under section 51A of the Constitution Act, 1867.

3. FURTHER CONSTITUTIONAL AMENDMENTS

(1) Charter—Sex Equality Rights

— Add section 28 of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedom to section 16 of the Constitution Amendment, 1987.

(2) Role of the Territories

— In appointments to the Senate and the Supreme Court of Canada.

— In discussions on items on the agenda of annual constitutional and economic conferences where, in the view of the Prime Minister, matters to be discussed directly affect them.

(3) Language Issues

— Add to the agenda of constitutional conferences matters that are of interest to English-speaking and French-speaking linguistic minorities.

— Require resolutions of the House of Commons, the Senate and the legislative assembly of New Brunswick to amend that province's Act Recognizing the Equality of the Two Official Linguistic Communities in New Brunswick (Bill 88).

(4) Aboriginal Constitutional Issues

— First Ministers' constitutional conferences to be held once every three years, the first to be held within one year of proclamation; representatives of aboriginal peoples and the territorial governments to be invited by the Prime Minister to participate in the discussion of matters of interest to the aboriginal peoples of Canada.

The Prime Minister of Canada will lay or cause to be laid before the Senate and House of Commons, and the Premiers will lay or cause to be laid before their legislative assemblies, a resolution, in the form appended hereto, and will seek to authorize a proclamation to be issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada to amend the constitution of Canada as soon as possible after proclamation of the Constitution Amendment, 1987.

4. AGENDA FOR FUTURE CONSTITUTIONAL DISCUSSIONS

(1) Creation of New Provinces in the Territories

The Prime Minister and all Premiers agreed future constitutional conferences should address available options for provincehood, including the possibility that, at the request of the Yukon and Northwest Territories to become provinces, only a resolution of the House of Commons and Senate be required.

(2) Constitutional Recognitions

The Prime Minister and Premiers took note of repeated attempts by First Ministers over the past twenty years to draft a statement of constitutional recognitions. All such attempts were unsuccessful.

The Prime Minister and Premiers reviewed drafts submitted by the federal government and Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Ontario and British Columbia, and agreed to refer immediately the drafts to an all-party Special Committee of the House of Commons. Public hearings would begin across Canada on July 16, 1990 and a report on the substance and placement of the clause--in a manner consistent with the Constitution of Canada--would be prepared for consideration by First Ministers at their Conference in 1990.

(3) Constitutional Reviews

The Prime Minister and all Premiers agreed jointly to review, at the constitutional conference required by section 49 of the Constitution Act, 1982: the entire process of amending the Constitution, including the three-year time limit under section 39(2) of that Act and the question of mandatory public hearings prior to adopting any measure related to a constitutional amendment, including revocation of a constitutional resolution.

Pursuant to section 50 of the Constitution Act, 1982, as proposed in the Constitution Amendment, 1987, the Prime Minister and the Premiers also committed to a continuing review of the operation of the Constitution of Canada, including the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, with a view to making any appropriate constitutional amendments.

5. SECTION 2: CONSTITUTION AMENDMENT, 1987

The Prime Minister and Premiers took note of public discussion of the distinct society clause since its inclusion in the Meech Lake Accord. A number of Canada's most distinguished constitutional authorities met to exchange views on the legal impact of the clause. The Prime Minister and Premiers reviewed their advice and other material.

The Prime Minister, in his capacity as chairman of the Conference, received from the above-noted constitutional authorities a legal opinion which is appended to the final Conference communiqué.

6. NEW BRUNSWICK AMENDMENT

— Add a clause that within New Brunswick, the English linguistic community and the French linguistic community have equality of status and equal rights and privileges.

— Affirm an additional role of the legislature and government of New Brunswick: to preserve and promote the equality of status and equal rights and privileges of the province's two official linguistic communities.

— The Prime Minister of Canada will lay or cause to be laid before the Senate and House of Commons, and the Premier of New Brunswick will lay or cause to be laid before the legislative assembly of New Brunswick, a resolution, in the form appended hereto, and will seek to authorize a proclamation to be issued by the Governor General under the Great Seal of Canada to amend the Constitution of Canada as soon as possible after proclamation of the Constitution Amendment, 1987.

OTTAWA

Dear Prime Minister:

In response to certain concerns which have been expressed in relation to section I of the proposed Constitution Amendment, 1987 (Meech Lake Accord), it is our pleasure to confirm our opinion on the following.

In our opinion, the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms will be interpreted in a manner consistent with the duality/distinct society clause for the proposed Constitution Amendment, 1987 (Meech Lake Accord), but the rights and freedoms guaranteed thereunder are not infringed or denied by the application of the clause and continue to be guaranteed subject only to such reasonable limits prescribed by law as can be demonstrably justified in a free and democratic society, and the duality/distinct society clause may be considered, in particular, in the application of section I of the Charter.

The Constitution of Canada, including sections 91 and 92 of the Constitution Act, 1867, will be interpreted in a manner consistent with the duality/distinct society clause. While nothing in that clause creates new legislative authority for Parliament or any of the provincial legislatures, or derogates from any of their legislative authority, it may be considered in determining whether a particular law fits within the legislative authority of Parliament or any of the legislatures.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

BILL C-66 AND BILL C-67—REPORTS OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEES

Mr. Brian White (Dauphin—Swan River): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the reports of the legislative committees on Bill C-66 and Bill C-67, with amendments.

TRANSPORT—THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to report, in both official languages, the third report of the Standing Committee on Transport, which is its review of the document entitled Strategy on Substance Use in Safety Sensitive Positions in Canadian Transportation.

Pursuant to Standing Order 109 the committee requests a comprehensive response to this report with 150 days.

CRIMINAL RECORDS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Don Blenkarn (Mississauga South) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-314, an act to amend the Criminal Records Act and the Criminal Code in consequence thereof.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the bill?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Blenkarn: Madam Speaker, this bill arises out of the fact that when a young person, for example, receives an absolute discharge from a court he finds out sometimes three, four, or five years later when he seeks employment that he still has a criminal record.

The object of the absolute discharge and indeed the conditional discharge as produced in the Criminal Code was to make sure that young people in particular and people who receive absolute and conditional discharges do not have a criminal record.

Under the current circumstances they have, and that criminal record can only be removed by an application to the National Parole Board. That is a travesty and this act attempts to clean up that matter in law.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is an honour to present a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, on behalf of a number of constituents from Kamloops, British Columbia. They point out a whole set of reasons why they are disappointed with the government's decision to cut back on passenger rail service in Canada.

They are asking the government to reconsider that action and, quite frankly, not only to reverse the decision but to invest in a first-class passenger rail service as we would find in virtually every other country of similar size in the world.

CHILD POVERTY

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I have a second petition to present.

The petitioners are again from Kamloops and from Stratford, Ontario and point out that one-sixth of all Canadian children live in poverty. The number of children living in poverty in Canada has increased by 13 per cent between 1980 and 1986. The number of children living in some provinces is as high as 26 per cent of the child population.

• (1110)

They are asking that the House of Commons move to rectify this situation, and the first step they suggest is the production of a comprehensive bill of rights for children.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I have another petition to present on a third matter, the one that I repeat most days. Again it is on behalf of a number of constituents from Kamloops, British Columbia.

The petitioners point out their opposition to the government's 7 per cent goods and services tax. They suggest that any tax which taxes virtually everything, now including I guess in corner grocery stores all food in an indirect way by having one levy on all commodities, is regressive and ought not to proceed.

They suggest that Parliament do whatever it can to stop it, which means that the Liberal dominated Senate should stop the tax.

TAX BENEFITS FOR NORTHERN AND ISOLATED AREAS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I hereby present 16 petitions from Lebel-sur-Quévillion and Chibougamau, in response to the recommendations of the Task Force on Tax Benefits for Northern and Isolated Areas.

The signatories reject the Task Force's conclusions, Madam Speaker.

[English]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Madam Speaker, on behalf of 100,000 Canadians I have the honour to present a petition duly accepted by the clerk of petitions concerning the goods and services tax.

This petition has been signed by nearly 35,000 people in the province of Quebec and 30,000 people in the province of Ontario.

[Translation]

In particular, Madam Speaker, I want to thank the people who worked so magnificently to ensure that the government was aware that the GST legislation which has been approved by the House of Commons, must nevertheless be rejected because it has harmful implications for the Canadian economy.

[English]

Newfoundlanders, Nova Scotians, New Brunswickers, Albertans, people from Saskatchewan and British Columbia—107,804 people—signed these petitions.

I am very pleased to give particular recognition to the hundreds of people who operate bowling alleys and whatnot across the country because they helped out in this in a very significant way, recognizing the tremendous damage that the goods and services tax will do to the economy.

The petitioners beg the Senate to do everything possible to block this nefarious tax.

NORTHERN BENEFITS

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Madam Speaker, I would like to present seven petitions under Standing Order 36 in which the petitioners call upon Parliament to reject the report of the task force on tax benefits for northern and isolated areas.

The petitioners are residents of my riding of Cochrane—Superior, namely from the town of Hornepayne, Ontario which is situated 100 kilometres north of Highway 17 and some 500 kilometres from the town of Thunder Bay. Along with Manitouwadge, it is the most isolated community in my riding below the 51st parallel.

On average, food and gasoline prices are 25 per cent higher than any heavily populated city of Canada. This tax benefit is the only compensation these people have and should not be taken away.

On behalf of the 527 petitioners who rely on this tax I must reiterate the importance of this tax deduction to northern communities.

The government is presently studying the report. It is imperative that it rejects the recommendations of that report in its entirety.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise to table a petition signed by numerous residents of the province of Newfoundland concerning the goods and services tax.

The petitioners note that the government has imposed 31 tax increases already since September 1984. They are opposed to this tax and say it will cause serious and unfair hardship for low and middle income Canadians, in particular. It will create an onerous burden on small businesses in Canada.

For those and for many other reasons these petitioners pray and call upon Parliament to reject the goods and services tax proposed by this government.

STUDIES OR AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCE OF QUEBEC WITH REGARD TO PROPOSED CONSTRUCTION OF A LOCK FOR PLEASURE CRAFT ON THE RIVIÈRE-DES-PRAIRIES

Question No. 267—Mrs. Gibeau:

Has the Government undertaken or participated in any (a) environmental (b) legal (c) economic (d) costing studies or any agreement with the Province of Quebec with regard to the proposed construction of a lock for pleasure craft on the Rivière-des-Prairies where it is bounded along its south shore by the constituencies of Bourassa-Ahuntsic and Anjou—Rivière-des-Prairies and along its north shore by Duvernay, Laval and Laval-des-Rapides and, if so (i) what are they, (ii) is the government prepared to make them public?

An Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Insofar as the Department of Industry, Science and Technology is concerned, the response is as follows:

The federal government, under the Canada-Quebec Subsidiary Agreement on the Economic Development of the Regions of Quebec, in cooperation with the province of Quebec, commissioned a study on the possibility of opening up the Des Prairies River. This study focused on the project costs, commercial feasibility and economic costs/benefits, without considering the environmental aspect in any great detail. Before considering publication of the said study, the Management Committee of this Sub-Agreement intends to submit its recommendations to the Ministers responsible for the Sub-Agreement.

NUCLEAR REACTORS IN CANADA

Question No. 289—Mr. Caccia:

For each nuclear reactor currently operating in Canada (a) does the government expect a particular method of de-commissioning to be used and, if so (i) which one (ii) at what estimated cost in 1990 dollars (iii) which agency is expected to pay this cost (b) is there an estimated cost of permanently dealing with high-level radioactive wastes and, if so (i) what cost (ii) estimated over what period of time (iii) using what method (iv) which agency is expected to pay this cost?

Hon. Arthur Jacob Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Atomic Energy of Canada Limited reports as follows:

(a) (i)—(iii)

Each nuclear facility owner is required to submit a decommissioning plan to the Atomic Energy Control Board. The selection of a decommissioning method and the costs thereof are the responsibility of the nuclear facility owner. Substantial reactor decommissioning experience exists today. Since 1960, some 65 research, test and demonstration reactors world-wide have been decommissioned.

For the prototype nuclear facilities decommissioned by AECL, a method of long term isolated, secured storage for the reactor system has been used. All active process materials are removed from the system and then the reactor containment building is sealed and secured for a period of about 50 years. During this period, radioactive decay will very substantially reduce the radiation fields present when final decommissioning is subsequently carried out, making the work easier and safer. Most of the nuclear facility area outside of the reactor containment building can be cleaned and reused immediately. This includes the administration buildings, most of the service area and the turbine hall. Based on experience, through the decommissioning of the Nuclear Power Demonstration (NPD) reactor in Ontario, and the Douglas Point (Ontario) and Gentilly (Quebec) prototype power reactors, typical costs for this method would be expected to be about $30M (1990) for a commercial power reactor. The cost of final decommissioning after the 50 year radioactive decay period is estimated at $60M (1990). Potentially, the site would then be used for a new nuclear facility.

It is expected that the utilities would follow this practice. The utilities are already charging a small amount in the power bills, which is being accumulated with interest, to cover the cost of decommissioning. This amounts to 1 percent or less of the price of electrical energy produced.

(b) (i)—(iv)

In 1981, the governments of Canada and Ontario announced the review process for the concept of deep geological disposal of nuclear fuel waste. The process provides for regulatory and public hearings before site selection for a disposal facility begins. The governments stated that no site selection would proceed until after the concept had been approved. However, conceptual design studies related to site selection and the construction and operation of a disposal vault are being addressed. These are conceptual in nature and deal with reference situations with respect to both schedule and cost. No firm schedule or costs exist at this time. Accurate estimates can only be given when a specific site is selected and an actual vault designed.

Although no nation has yet disposed of its used fuel permanently, there is considerable experience in a number of areas related to disposal, e.g. mining, immobilization, packaging, transportation. Costs of a reference disposal vault including design, construction, commissioning, operation, transportation, decommissioning, and other activities have been estimated. Ontario Hydro has estimated that disposal of all used fuel from Pickering, Bruce, Darlington, and a future Darlington-type station could be carried out at a cost of $8.5 billion (1988 dollars), expended over a period of 80 years. These costs are estimated to be 5.1 percent of the levelized unit electrical energy cost (LUEC), of a future Darlington-type station.

This estimate is consistent with cost estimates of International Atomic Energy Agency member countries, whose estimates range from 2 to 10 percent of electricity production costs. The Ontario Nuclear Cost Enquiry has noted that there is no practical way of checking the validity of Ontario Hydro's cost estimates at this time. Nevertheless, the Enquiry points out that, although the expenditures will be high when they are incurred, they comprise a very small portion of the levelized unit electrical cost, because of the long time-frame involved.

Canadian nuclear utilities include a charge in customer billing to cover future costs of nuclear fuel waste disposal.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-52, an act to amend the Income Tax Act and related acts, as reported (with amendments) from the Standing Committee on Finance.

Hon. Shirley Martin (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

An Hon. Member: On division.

Motion agreed to.

[Translation]

Mrs. Martin (on behalf of the Minister of Finance) moves that the Bill be read for the third time and carried.

Mr. Pierre H. Vincent (Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I would like to express the government's support for Bill C-52, which the Finance Committee reported to this House on the 7th of this month.

Bill C-52 constitutes a revision of the regulations governing retirement savings providing entitlement to a tax advantage, such as registered pension plans, deferred profit sharing plans and registered retirement savings plans. By setting out the objectives of tax advantages more clearly, this reform makes it possible for Canadians to accumulate a reasonable income for their retirement years.

With your permission, Madam Speaker, I would like to point out that the proposed measures are added to other reforms carried out previously to meet the need to promote retirement income security for our population. This, in a nutshell, is the proposal: Improvements in the benefits payable under the Canada Pension Plan and the spouse's allowance program; amendments to the contribution rates to guarantee the funding of the Canada Pension Plan; major improvements in the minimum contribution standards governing private pension plans, including particularly a shortening of the benefit purchase period and an improvement of the benefits to be paid to the surviving spouse.

This reform of the tax regulations is important because the present ceilings on tax assistance for retirement savings are not structured so as to help Canadians provide for an adequate retirement income. They vary widely depending on one's employment status; there is hardly any possibility of compensating for the loss of savings during past years; and, finally, it allows certain taxpayers to obtain excessive tax benefits by using various tax planning techniques.

The measures proposed in Bill C-52 deal with these problems directly. They provide for a standard ceiling equal to 18 percent of earnings, up to a maximum number of dollars. This uniform ceiling applies to all types of retirement savings with a tax benefit, whatever the plan or combination of plans.

They make it possible for taxpayers to use RRSP contributions to complement the savings they build up in employer-sponsored retirement plans—again up to the 18 percent ceiling. This uniform ceiling is therefore accessible to all Canadians, whatever their employment status.

By making it possible to carry unused RRSP contributions over for 7 years, they give Canadians a better chance to compensate for losses of savings sustained in previous years.

Finally, they are more equitable and provide for better cost control because they eliminate a number of tax planning mechanisms which allowed high income individuals to obtain excessive tax benefits.

The members of the Finance Committee have thoroughly studied the measures proposed in Bill C-52. They also heard a large number of witnesses and held consultations with labour organisation representatives and pension plan specialists. Following this consultation process, the Committee suggested a number of major changes in both the Bill and the regulations. Those changes were meant to simplify some of the legislative measures and to give plan administrators more flexibility in improving benefits and in offering additional pension entitlements in the case of family related leave or early retirement due to plant closures.

• (1120)

On June 7 last, before this House, the Minister for Privatization and Regulatory Affairs expressed the government's commitment to amending the first draft of the Income Tax Regulations to make it possible to implement the changes recommended by the Finance Committee.

On behalf of the Minister for Privatization and Regulatory Affairs, I would like to take this opportunity to congratulate the members of the Standing Committee on Finance for the diligent manner in which they conducted their detailed examination of a lengthy and complex piece of legislation.

You will undoubtedly allow me to point out, Madam Speaker, that the tax payers of the electoral riding of Trois-Rivières are anxiously awaiting this Bill, which provides for a major improvement of pensions in Canada and for the best possible combination of different pension plans.

In closing, Madam Speaker, I would point out that the examination performed by the Finance Committee followed a lengthy period of development and consultation concerning these important measures to improve the security of Canadians' income.

I hope that the Members will see fit to adopt this Bill, which is necessary and important for all Canadians, as rapidly as possible.

[English]

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Madam Speaker, I rise today to speak in favour of Bill C–52. I must be very honest and say that it is not a perfect bill. There are many problems with trying to correct inequities within the pension field, but I feel that this bill will right some wrongs and therefore I can say, as the lead speaker for the Liberals, we will support the bill.

Bill C–52, as amended, is designed to correct the inequities of the existing tax system which treats retirement savings for people who are members of the defined benefit pension plan differently from those for members of, for instance, deferred profit–sharing plans, and differently again from the ordinary self–employed Canadian or the employee whose company does not offer a pension plan at all.

This bill will also eliminate excessive and unintended tax deferrals. There have been, over the past few years, some loopholes, so to speak, which have allowed some very high income earners to use the tax system to accumulate very lucrative forms of pension. We feel that these loopholes must be closed. This bill addresses these loopholes and will prevent any further abuse of the system, we hope.

The objective of the tax reform in Bill C–52 is to ensure, with reasonable limits, fair and consistent access to tax assistance for retirement savings to encourage increased private savings now to meet pension needs in the future. We all agree that the current system is in need of revision and has been for some time.

Bill C–52 and its proposed system, as originally introduced in the House of Commons, needed a great deal of study. At the finance committee, we heard numerous witnesses, gave the bill much thought, and come up with a very different bill which is being considered today. The bill has been amended. There is an agreement to draft regulations that will implement all the suggestions that the finance committee has made. The finance committee and all parties worked together co–operatively to bring about perhaps the best bill possible at this time.

In the past, the system of pensions in place in the past was simple. The only tax reporting was for employee pension contributions, deferred profit–sharing pension contributions, and RRSP contributions. There were no carry forwards. If one did not use up to one's RRSP limit in one year, one lost it.

The present pension regime is very inequitable. All non–contributory defined benefit plans are treated equally, regardless of how generous benefits are, as are all contributory defined benefit plans. Therefore, employees with very poor pensions and employees with very rich pensions all were able to contribute $3,500 to RRSPs according to their income. However, an employee with a poor 1.25 per cent contributory plan with a 5 per cent contribution earning $35,000 was restricted to an RRSP contribution of $1,750.

The proposed legislation attempts to right this inequity. I have talked about some abuses of the present pension system and we have all heard terms such as "flip–flop", "double–dipping", "off–side plans", and "designated plans"—a host of loopholes that benefited very high income earning people. We have absolutely no objection to high income earners preparing for retirement with a very high pension, but we object to them having tax assistance to do so. All people have to be treated equally with regard to tax assistance up to a certain level. If one wishes to have a better pension plan, then one is free to invest one's money, but after tax.

Canadians with company pension plans and those without will be given more equal treatment when it comes to saving for retirement. About two out of every three private sector workers do not have corporate plans, or about six million people out of a total workforce of 14 million. Currently, people building pensions only through RRSPs do not get the same tax assistance as those with company plans. Bill C–52 enables those self–employed persons to have the same tax relief as those with employers to invest in pensions for them. This bill will equalize the treatment between these groups. That is the main purpose of Bill C–52.

There are two basic types of plans. The first, to which most pension plan members belong, is the defined benefit plan. A defined benefit plan means certain benefits are guaranteed upon retirement. There is a wide range of plans. A rich plan may guarantee upon reaching the age of retirement 60 per cent or 70 per cent of the average salary earned five years prior to retirement. A good defined benefit plan may have the pension fully indexed. Some have no indexation whatsoever. It all depends on the kind of plan. Basically, these plans give a guarantee of what one will get on retirement.

The other basic type of plan is a money purchase plan which has a defined level of contribution, but no fixed level of benefits. What one receives in the end depends on how well the investment of these funds has done. The legislation attempts to equalize all kinds of systems.

• (1130)

The current limits place many Canadians at a serious disadvantage in saving for retirement. This includes many of those who are dependent on RRSPs, a group which includes the self-employed and employees without pension coverage. We know that in Canada the small businessmen, self-employed people in small businesses, are the ones who create the largest number of jobs, especially in the last few years. It is the biggest growing sector in our economy.

It is extremely important that these average Canadians—and they are very average Canadians who are out there working very hard trying to earn a living—also have the opportunity to invest in a reasonable type of pension. In this case if you are self-employed, then it will be through RRSPs. You will also be able to benefit from a similar advantage upon retirement after 35 years.

It is especially important to make these changes to the pension system now while the baby boom generation ages and prepares for retirement. The present pension system with all its unfairness in retirement tax assistance is improved under Bill C-52.

In the next 40 years the percentage of Canadians over 65 will double to 30 per cent.

The new rules attempt to standardize by 1995 the amount of tax relief for retirement savings which a person can receive from the government by contributing to a pension plan, a deferred profit- sharing plan or to an RRSP. The proposal would set a uniform limit of 18 per cent of earnings that are eligible for tax assisted retirement savings.

One of the reasons for the 18 per cent is that if you invest 18 per cent of your wages over a 35-year period, you will be guaranteed roughly a 70 per cent return, or 70 per cent of your best three to five years of earnings in those five years. That is why the 18 per cent is used and not 20 per cent as is presently in place.

Most members of company pension plans will be able to contribute more money to their RRSPs under these changes. This bill, say many tax experts, goes a long way to correcting the unfairness and inflexibility of the current 13-year old pension system.

If individuals do not make their maximum RRSP contribution in a given year they will be allowed to carry forward for seven years these unused amounts. This will allow them to contribute more than the prescribed RRSP limit in one year, if they have under-contributed in a previous year. But pension income cannot be rolled over into RRSPs.

Why is there a seven year carry forward? It has been observed by the Department of Finance over the years that high-income Canadians are regular users of RRSPs over the course of their careers. However, the average taxpayer tends to concentrate RRSP contributions over the last 15 working years, which are particularly good economic years.

The average family in its early work life will save to buy a home and have a family, all extremely harsh economic realities which all families face. As the family ages, the children grow up. When the last few years of employment are reached, one may be in a better economic position. Children may have left home, or be self-supporting. The family home will probably be paid for. Therefore there will be more income to dispose of and one is more able to invest in RRSPs. That is the beauty of the seven year carry forward.

It will allow one to save that RRSP room, if one cannot make it this year or next year because a house was purchased. Perhaps four years from now one will receive a bonus and wish to use it to catch up on RRSP contributions. This can be done, thereby safeguarding one's retirement years. Even though this may not always be done each year, there is a catch-up time.

Those who use RRSPs exclusively will have this seven year carry forward. Those who have pension plans ranging from poor plans to good plans will have in effect close to working lifetime carry forward periods. This provides a very positive incentive to establish even poor pension plans.

You have heard of the factor nine, Madam Speaker. There is quite a bit of controversy over the factor nine. The factor nine is a factor used to establish the value of the pension adjustment, an amount that will be shown on a person's T-4 slip. That in itself is what will give the person with a pension plan the amount of RRSP room that will be available for them to invest on a yearly basis.

If one has a poor pension plan, then clearly one will be better off dramatically because of the seven year carry forward. If one has a maximum pension plan, then one will be worse off. Those with average pension plans these will be considerably better off.

There is a form of rough justice. It is not perfect, and we are very much aware of that. It is felt that people contributing to pension plans under the age of 45 may be far more penalized in that their pension contributions before the age of 45 are not worth as much as what this pension adjustment will be. However, we are also very much aware that younger people tend not to take advantage of the RRSPs. The seven year carry forward will offset some of these disadvantages.

Under the pension reform in Bill C-52 very definitely the winners will be self-employed Canadians who do not belong to any pension plan at all. The winners will also be those who belong to very poor pension plans. They will experience the largest increase in RRSP contribution limits. The average Canadian is very much the one considered by this legislation.

I would like to describe the new RRSP limits proposed under Bill C-52. If you are not a member of a pension plan, currently you can contribute $7,500, or a maximum of 20 per cent of earned income to a registered pension plan. In 1991 this dollar limit will rise to $11,500, or 18 per cent of the previous year's earned income. The limit will then rise by $1,000 a year until 1995, when the limit will be $15,500 per year. After 1995, the limit will be indexed to inflation.

If the individual is a member of a contributory pension plan where both the employer and employee make contributions, you can currently put $3,500 minus your pension contribution into an RRSP. In 1991, you will be able to contribute up to 18 per cent of your earned income, or $11,500 minus this pension adjustment, or PA as it is called.

This pension adjustment will be a figure that is calculated for each individual by their employer. It will be put on their T-4 slip. The greater the benefits from the pension plan the larger will be the pension adjustment. This pension adjustment will also include a $1,000 tax free area so that people in a defined benefit plan will still be better off than those just investing in RRSPs.

If you are a member of a non-contributory pension plan where only the employer makes contributions, you are currently allowed to put up to $3,500 in an RRSP. In 1991, this limit will increase to $11,500, minus your pension adjustment.

If individuals do not make their maximum RRSP contribution in a given year, they will be allowed to carry forward for seven years these unused amounts. This will allow them to contribute more than the prescribed RRSP limit in one year if they under contribute in a previous year.

We know that pension reform has been long overdue. It has been put off for far too many years. I would like to point out some of the recommendations made by the parliamentary Task Force on Pension Reform set up by the Liberal government in 1983 and chaired by my predecessor, the member for Sudbury, the Hon. Doug Frith, which made the following recommendations.

First, it was recommended that people without pension plans be put on the same tax footing as people with pensions plans regarding RRSP limits. This has been addressed in Bill C-52.

It was also suggested that the existing system of RRSP tax deductions be converted to a fairer system of tax credits. This has not been implemented by Bill C-52, although the finance committee did study the implications of it. There was no easy answer. I will address this particular point as I go on with my speech this morning.

Third, it was recommended that a homemaker's pension be established and funded through the Canada Pension Plan and Quebec Pension Plan. That issue has not been addressed by this bill.

Fourth, the government should establish a 25-year contribution rate schedule for the CPP. Again, that has not been addressed by this bill.

Fifth, all private and public pension benefits should be indexed to some extent. Again, that has not been considered in this bill.

Some of these recommendations are not within the scope of this bill. Some others we will be looking into as quickly as possible.

In 1984 the then Liberal government in its budget proposed the very limits that are being proposed today because it was felt that it was only fair to allow the average Canadian to invest in an RRSP to ensure a pension at retirement.

In 1985 the present government promised pension reform. After announcing in the May, 1985 budget a new 1986 RRSP limit of $7,500 with further planned increases in the maximum RRSP contribution limits to 1990, in October of 1986 the finance minister announced that these future increases in RRSP limits were being changed. He announced that the maximum RRSP contribution limits for subsequent years would be lowered from what he had announced in 1985.

In June of 1988 before these changes could take effect the Minister of Finance announced that there would be a freeze in the maximum RRSP contribution limit for 1988, after which the maximum limit would rise to $8,500 in 1989; $10,500 in 1990; and rising by $1,000 a year until a limit of $15,500 was reached in 1995.

In August, 1988 the finance minister announced that these planned increases in the maximum RRSP contribution limit from $7,500 to $8,500 for 1989, which were announced in June of 1988, would be cancelled until after the election. In December of 1989 the government introduced the current pension reform legislation.

I have said that we do support this bill. We have some very serious fears in some areas where we feel that the legislation is perhaps not the best. Perhaps it is an issue of timing. The timing is wrong. We want to continue to support this bill. But we feel that the pension reform package and the goods and services tax, which will both take effect in 1991, will discourage consumer spending at a time when the economy is predicted to be slowing down. We wish that were not so. I would rather see the government withdraw the goods and services tax than withdraw Bill C-52.

Higher RRSP limits will encourage savings and discourage consumer spending. The GST will also discourage consumer spending and encourage saving. Both take effect at the same time.

This pension reform will benefit average and better off Canadians who are in a financial position to take advantage of RRSPs. Many social groups such as the National Council on Welfare and the Canadian Council on Social Development have stated that these tax savings for relatively well off Canadians are excessive.

In 1986, 61 per cent of individuals with incomes over $45,000 made RRSP contributions averaging $4,057, while only 28 per cent of tax filers with incomes between $1,500 and $30,000 made RRSP contributions, averaging $1,987. Clearly, the better off received the majority of the tax benefits from RRSPs. By "better off" I am talking about people who are just above being very poor. They make up the bulk of the taxpayers. They are the ones who help finance the social programs which help the poor. We must allow that group of people the right to save toward better retirement.

We must also consider the problems of the poor. We at the finance committee have suggested that we study the Canada Pension Plan within the next year. We think it is extremely important that we consider the position of poor people, but not to the exclusion of average Canadians.

Another problem in terms of the timing of this pension reform package is that at the same time the government is giving this RRSP tax break to average Canadians, it is also implementing the clawback of senior citizens' pensions, imposing the GST and cutting unemployment insurance for the unemployed. The net result is that the burden of deficit reduction is being shifted from the wealthy on to the backs of lower income Canadians and the unemployed. Those least able to pay are being forced to pay more.

That bothers me very much because we are really not fully indexing the old age pension. We are not fully indexing the family allowance benefits, we are clawing them back. At the same time we are recognizing that full indexation is needed with pension reform so that after 1995 the $15,500 limit will be fully indexed.

In actual fact this proposal reduces what low income Canadians can contribute to RRSPs. For example, a person currently earning $25,000 and not part of a company pension plan can now contribute up to 20 per cent of their income to an RRSP, or up to $5,000. Under the new rules this amount will be reduced to 18 per cent of income, or $4,500 in 1991, $500 less than before. So while someone earning upward of $35,000 will have RRSP contribution limits increased, low income Canadians will be able to contribute less to their RRSP than before this particular bill. That is the fact.

It is also a fact that low income Canadians find it very difficult to invest in RRSPs, especially when they start off in their careers. It is hoped that because of the seven-year carry forward they will be able to recoup some of this loss.

• (1150)

We realize it is not an absolute answer, but 18 per cent is very much on what a lifetime pension is based. Thus we must for the sake of all stick with this 18 per cent.

The tax proposal does not require the indexing of pension benefits for all private and public pension plans, as was recommended by the 1983 Parliamentary Task Force on Pension Reform.

Ninety-three per cent of all members of private sector pension plans have no indexation against inflation for their pension benefits. It would have been very nice had this bill been able to put in place that type of indexation, but I believe it is not within the scope of this bill.

RRSP tax deductions are an unfair way of distributing income because the tax benefit from a $1,000 RRSP contribution is larger for higher income individuals than for low income people. The fairer solution would have been to convert RRSP tax deductions into tax credits. Currently, the tax benefit from a $1,000 RRSP contribution provides a tax saving of $450 for a person earning $45,000. The same $1,000 RRSP contribution provides a tax saving of only $264 for someone with an income of $15,000. High income people save more in taxes because their marginal tax rate is higher.

Because of this unfairness caused by the deductibility of RRSP contributions, the 1983 Parliamentary Task Force on Pension Reform recommended that these deductions be converted into tax credits. With a system of tax credits the tax benefit from the $1,000 RRSP contribution would be the same for all taxpayers regardless of income. This would be a far more progressive and fair way of distributing the tax benefits from RRSP contributions.

The finance committee studied the implications of tax credits versus tax deductions. Consider, for instance, if we were to give a 26 per cent or 29 per cent credit to individuals. This would clearly benefit low income taxpayers with little or no adverse consequences for high income earners. However, the Department of Finance has estimated that such a move could add $1 billion annually to the costs. As you know, Madam Speaker, these are times of very strict budget controls. It is not at this time something that the government was prepared to recommend, nor was the finance committee prepared to recommend that at this time.

The recommendation of the finance committee is that it be studied so that perhaps a graduated percentage can be used. It has to be done in an economical way so that it does not cost the government gobs of money to implement.

We have asked the Department of Finance for a report on the possibility of changing tax deductions for retirement savings into tax credits. Included in this study would be the possibility of having more than one rate of tax credit, such as what is currently used for charitable organizations.

Under stage one of tax reform most deductions were converted into credits, a move that was supported by Liberals and social groups as being an improvement for the tax system.

Our present finance minister declared then that converting deductions to credits is a key element in achieving a fairer income tax system because credits give the same tax savings to all.

I know that an answer can be found when it comes to RRSP contributions. It must be found as quickly as possible.

Another problem is that Canadians will have to rely on their employers to calculate correctly a completely new number called the pension adjustment which will determine just how much they can contribute to their RRSPs. They may not have that figure as quickly as they would like, especially in the first few years. I believe that if most employees consult with their employers, they can be given a rough estimate of the amount of RRSP room they will have.

If they miscalculate in some way and are not given the total amount they would be allowed to invest in RRSPs, then because of the seven year carry forward they will be able to catch up that amount the following year. That will ease the transition. It would be far more serious if it were as it is today. That is to say, if you do not use it, you lose it. If, because we are not as comfortable with the new system as we should be, the wrong information is given out, then all is not lost. The following year you will have an opportunity to recoup.

One of the recommendations of the 1983 Parliamentary Task Force on Pension Reform was homemaker pensions. This is a very serious problem in Canada. It is a problem that by and large affects women. Women sometimes do take breaks in their careers. They do stay home. By and large, they are the ones who stay home and raise their children. They are often the ones who end up, perhaps, looking after an elderly relative. As a result, when they reach their retirement years they may have very little retirement income. It is a serious problem. It is a problem today when we look at many of our seniors, especially senior women who live on very, very low incomes. It is a problem that must be addressed.

This legislation does not set up a homemakers pension. I believe that the Canada Pension Plan people should definitely look into the matter. What this legislation does is allow that carry forward. For instance, say you have worked for 10 years and you could have invested in RRSPs but did not because you were interested in buying a house, buying furniture, getting established and then you start your family and leave the workforce. You would be able to carry forward those seven years of that RRSP room which you had not used in the last seven years of your work life. If you do not work for 10 years, then when you do go back to work you can have a substantial portion of that carry forward in order to invest in RRSPs when you do return to the workforce.

That in itself is very much an improvement over the status quo. I know that there are many women out there who will be pleased with this. Again, it certainly does not go far enough. I will be the first one to say it. I have no illusions.

We must as a government give serious consideration to implementing a homemakers pension so that these people who do provide a very essential service within the home, the family and the community have the chance to accumulate some kind of retirement income.

The other area that is not considered by this bill is retirement income for part-time workers. Again, these people who work part-time, sometimes for the better part of their lives, must also have a chance at a good pension plan. There has to be some answer for these people. This is not within the scope of the bill. I recognize that, but I hope that in future we can right that wrong also.

• (1200)

The government's proposed Bill C-52 really does not address the issue of portability of pensions. Again, that is an issue which has to be considered. Other than a few minor technical changes nothing in Bill C-52 improves the portability of pensions, that is the ability of individuals to transfer lump sums from one pension plan to another when they change employers.

The 1983 task force made several recommendations that would give employees the right to take their accumulated pension benefits with them when they move to a new job. That has not been addressed in this case.

During the course of the finance committee's hearings on the bill we heard much testimony about the complexity of Bill C-52. There is no doubt in my mind that this was and continues to be an extremely complex bill.

For example, in a brief to the committee from the Canadian Institute of Actuaries the following was stated: "The degree of complexity inherent in the proposed system introduces the following problems: the level of comprehension of the new system among retirement plan members may be quite low, particularly in the first two or three years, thereby threatening the acceptability of the system by the public."

I am convinced the changes that have been made to Bill C-52 take into consideration a lot of that complexity. I think the bill has been simplified to a very large degree, and I think that is extremely important.

The finance committee's eighth report to the House has tried to simplify the legislation to address most of these concerns. We as a Liberal Party want something in place, and that is why we are supporting this bill.

The eighth report has been tabled, so I do not want to go through the full report. I believe anyone who wishes to read it may do so and will realize that some of the suggestions in Bill C-52 have been totally removed, such as pension adjustment reversal. That would have included in the bill an extremely huge component of complexity. By removing these PARs from Bill C-52 I believe that we have by and large reduced the level of complexity of the bill.

This bill definitely will not satisfy everyone, but we felt that by removing some of the complexities of the bill we were making the legislation simpler. We are leaving a certain amount of rough justice in the bill, and I believe that it important.

It is important that we have a pension bill which is easier to understand and easier to administer. It is always extremely difficult when one adds reams of complexities. It becomes an accountant's dream come true but an administrator's nightmare. We want to keep that nightmare down as much as possible.

Let me end by saying that I sat on the finance committee dealing with this bill. The huge amount of co-operation among all parties made me believe in this parliamentary system. I believe the finance committee should often, and perhaps at all times, work in this co-operative manner for the good of Canadians.

I realize that this was an impossible task for the committee when we were dealing with the GST legislation, but it felt very good to be able to work as a group with this particular piece of legislation and to add as many changes as we felt were feasible, with the co-operation of all parties and with the finance officials.

We as a Liberal Party are aware that it is not a perfect bill, but it is better to have an imperfect bill than to carry on the way we have for the last number of years. It was absolutely essential that we curb all excesses and that we close those loopholes. The closing of those loopholes means that the changes this bill is bringing forward will in effect be revenue neutral.

It is important that we not impose harsher penalties on the economic system of this country and on deficit reduction. I am pleased to see that that is a part of it. Perhaps the timing of the bill is not right, but that is not the bill's fault. It may be the fault of other pieces of legislation before this House with which my party and I happen to disagree.

I will end by saying that we are supporting this bill.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, this bill in front of us this afternoon in fact is a piece of legislation which is tremendously important to people in the millions right across the country. We are going to see marked changes occur in the system by which the tax system of this country assists people to put money aside for pension purposes in the future.

I have to say that I am disappointed a minister has not come from the government to present this bill and to answer some of the criticism put forward from different directions since the final version of the bill was reported back to the House last week. I think some of those questions deserve answers. The correct and responsible people to be putting those answers forward are in fact members of the ministry of this Conservative government. It is very unfortunate that they are not here to meet those responsibilities.

The finance committee which has looked carefully at this bill reported back some changes the government agreed to accept. They were the consequence of significant negotiation between the finance committee and the Department of Finance. As members of the finance committee, many of us are here to take part in this debate today, but it has to be said very clearly that many of the points we wish to see brought forward as a finance committee had to be moderated in the negotiation with the Department of Finance because of its strong views with respect to this legislation.

If indeed it had been the finance committee itself which had been drafting this piece of legislation, it would have been a different piece of legislation than that which is before the House at the moment. This again puts the onus on the ministers responsible to be here to defend this legislation and its many important ramifications for those receiving pensions, those contributing to pensions, those contributing to RRSPs and so forth in the years ahead in Canada.

• (1210)

The NDP has three main criticisms with respect to Bill C–52. The first and most basic criticism is that back in the 1960s we started in Canada to put in place the Canada Pension Plan, a plan which would be organized as pension plans are in so many other countries in the world through the public governmental system of this country. This would permit people to contribute throughout their working lives. Regardless of where they worked, whether they worked for someone or were independent small business owners, they could contribute to that plan. If they moved from job to job they could still contribute. There would be no cost for moving from one place of employment to another. There would be no cost in deciding to open a small business for a period of time and then coming back into the workforce. The Canada Pension Plan was something which would give people a pension to which they could contribute under any circumstance and in which they could accumulate benefits on a consistent continuing basis from year to year regardless of their circumstances.

Instead of recognizing the significance of the Canada Pension Plan initiative in the 1960s as the basis on which to move forward, with this approach to pension reform the government decided instead to take the Registered Retirement Savings Plan deductions available to people in the tax system and mesh this tax break with the private pension plan system in the country: registered retirement plans which take the form of defined benefit plans, money purchase plans, and profit sharing plans. There would be an heroic attempt to mesh together these different systems.

Inevitably in the process there have been some serious problems, difficulties, and inequities created. Although the finance committee has tried to improve upon them, we have certainly not been able to come up with anything close to effective and comprehensive answers to the ridiculous complexities and inequities created by the RRSP system, which in many respects should be the tail of the much larger pension dog. Instead in this approach we have the tail of the pension dog wagging the whole system. We have the RRSP system and the need to make some kind of fair access to it for people in different circumstances in respect of private pension plans. We have that goal shaping what happens to the broad pension plan system. In the process, we miss the fact that we had a basic Canada pension plan system that could and should have been expanded. Therefore it would have given a system of portability and indexing that responds to Canadians and which would have been straightforward, fair and the same for people regardless of whether they were in small businesses in good parts of the economy or in declining parts of the economy.

The Canada Pension Plan would have provided fairness and equity. Also, it would have given a level of retirement earnings to people across the country once they were outside the workforce. This would have provided security for them once they faced older age. That is not the approach which is taken.

The other thing an approach relying on the Canada Pension Plan would have done is what has happened in Quebec, for instance.

[Translation]

One can see in the province of Quebec that a public savings system has created a large fund to promote development within the province. The Quebec Deposit and Investment Fund, for example, is a product of the public pension plan.

[English]

This kind of approach, which would have given us funds created through pension plan creations and contributions, would have given us a basis for really promoting economic development fairly and effectively throughout the country. We have missed that, too, by the fact that this approach to pension plans and pension reform has not made the Canada Pension Plan the central part or central concern of pension reform.

Our second broad criticism is that Bill C–52 gives most of its benefits to relatively well–off Canadians. It does so by expanding the RRSP contribution limit from $7,500 a year to $15,500 per year for those outside a pension plan. It is true that this higher limit is phased in until 1995. In 1995, the projections are that it will be at a level of 2.5 times the average industrial wage, which is in fact a lower level than was the case in the past for maximum RRSP contributions.

Nevertheless, it is a significant increase in benefits to those making between $40,000 and $80,000 per year. The cost of these improvements to those relatively well-off Canadians comes first from eliminating something with which we agree, a series of abuses by high income earners in our pension system. I will talk more about that later. I will talk more about that later, Madam Speaker.

• (1220)

Second, the cost of these improvements for better off Canadians also comes from a reduction in the amount of RRSP contribution which is possible for some existing pension plans in which there are high employer contributions and low employee contributions. For example, the telecommunications workers' union in British Columbia will see their members lose from $1,000 to $2,000 per year in potential contributions to RRSPs.

It does not make sense to see losses for lower income Canadians such as those in the telecommunications workers' union in B.C. coming at the expense of benefits going to those high income earners who are going to receive these extra benefits from the significant increase in RRSP limits. That cannot make sense if we are talking about improving equity in the pension reforms that are before this House.

Finally, the last crucial criticism we make of this legislation is that the rest of the income tax system now works on the basis of tax credits. Tax credits provide a benefit to those people who are low-income earners, which is just as important to them in dollar terms as the tax credit provides to higher income people. If you have deductions instead of tax credits, the consequence is that the person who benefits most is the person with the higher income who is in that higher tax bracket. Therefore, there is a bigger gain from the same amount of benefit because it is a deduction at a higher tax bracket.

Our party argued hard within the finance committee to move to a system of tax credits. This is what we have in the rest of the tax system now. It has been proved that it is not impossible to do. But in fact the Department of Finance was not prepared to give ground on this issue. They have agreed, and it is an important agreement which our finance committee has managed to achieve, to investigate this and come back with a report to the finance committee to see if there is some way of putting tax credits into effect in the future in the pension system. But it is something that should have been done before this broad set of pension reforms came into effect rather than as an afterthought.

There are improvements which our work in the finance committee managed to achieve. As originally drafted, the bill reduced significantly the possibility of trade unions bargaining for improvements in company pension plans through new collective agreements. We fought for and won changes in the regulations so that unions will have much more scope to bargain for such improvements.

For instance, the original bill blocked early retirement options in the case of plant closures or automation. We fought for changes to this and we were successful. Women were hit in the original bill by limits on the period of broken service for child rearing which they could take advantage of. These limits have been extended from five to eight years and made more flexible. This is another victory about which we feel good.

The original bill had a strong bias against defined benefit pension plans, the kind that most unions work out with their employers. These biases have been changed by simplifying administrative procedures, by increasing the amount of RRSP contributions that members of these plans can make in a number of cases and by making the rules clearer for pension portability.

Finally, we won commitments from the Department of Finance to examine tax credits for use in the future and also to look at how it is possible to use RRSP contribution space in a way that limits it for higher income earners in the future. We also won commitments from the finance committee to review the system in operation in three years and to examine how the Canada Pension Plan itself could be expanded in the future.

There are problems that remain but the last point that we would want to stress, is that this bill does plug some very important loopholes by which upper-income individuals were taking massive advantage of the tax system. We put pension maximums in place for higher income earners. A person with a $86,000 income will be able to get 70 per cent of that as a maximum pension. You will not be able to go up to massive levels as in the past.

The current practice for many senior executives was to give themselves maximum RRSP room until close to retirement, then create a pension plan into which they could make retroactive payments. That double dipping is blocked.

We have blocked a number of important loopholes but we still do not have the pension reform system which our party envisions. We should have started, but did not start, in this case, from the Canada Pension Plan and which would have given us a chance to give portability, a chance to give fairness and a chance to give openness to every employee throughout this country.

I hope in the future that that is what we achieve in pension reform.

[Translation]

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Madam Speaker, I have been listening to my colleague, and I found him very eloquent and most interesting when he discussed the reform of the retirement pension system in Canada. I am always interested in knowing, when he talks about tax credits vs. deductions—I know that the government is carrying out a study to see how it could perhaps do one or the other, how it can use tax credits to reform pensions, but I would like my colleague to explain why, in the past, the government has objected to use a system which appeared much more progressive, more sensible, a system which, I can say it here in the House of Commons, is rational. Why has it refused until now to resort to a tax credit system? Secondly, if the government had objections to using such a system, what were they?

Those are my two questions, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex–Windsor): Madam Speaker, I agree with my colleague that it is difficult to understand why the government did not accept suggestions to have a credit system rather than a deduction system. But I think it may have had two reasons to do so. The first reply given by the government was that it was too complicated to grant credits rather than deductions. But I find that very difficult to believe, Madam Speaker, because we already have credits throughout most of our income tax system.

• (1230)

We have credits for charitable donations, and we also have credits for such things as the expenses of children attending university. We can continue with this part of our income tax system.

If it is not too complex for this part of our income tax system, I do not think it can be said, then, that it is too complex for our retirement pension system.

The other objection raised by the Department of Finance, to the effect that it may cost more than at present, is in my view very difficult to understand, considering that the credit system can be organized in such a manner as to give the same result for income as for expenditures, just as we have now with the deduction system.

I really do not think that this reply is acceptable. The Bill would need to be amended considerably to establish a system of credits, but then it has already been amended considerably in other areas. I believe it is possible to do the same thing with regard to the credits.

[English]

Mr. Howard Crosby (Parliamentary Secretary to President of the Treasury Board): Madam Speaker, I want to put a brief question to the member for Essex—Windsor.

In his presentation, he mentioned the practice of double-dipping. This concept has provided difficulties over the years. I suppose there are arguments that might be made in favour of double-dipping. If a person has legitimately earned a pension and after retirement can provide services that have a specified value, it is proper that they make a claim for those services.

The case that we often find is where two payments are being made from the same source, particularly when that source is public such as the Government of Canada, and a person is receiving both a pension and a salary or fee for services.

However, one could argue that the combination of past government services and a fee or salary from the private sector is all right. If it is all right in those circumstances, why should the government not take advantage of services from persons who have already retired and are receiving a pension?

I would like to ask the member for a more definitive statement from his point of view. Is he in favour of two payments being made to one person from the same source, whether that source is government or a private concern? If he is not in favour, does he think legislation should be enacted to prevent it?

Mr. Langdon: Madam Speaker, I appreciate the question. Frankly, one of the things which is a problem with pension legislation like Bill C-52, is that it has a special, complicated vocabulary all of its own. We spent hours in the finance committee talking about PAs and PARs and PSPAs and all sorts of other acronyms that I am sure left many people who were watching the committee completely confused. At times it left many of us as committee members completely confused.

Double-dipping, as used with reference to this bill and in discussing what the bill attempts, is a different issue than the one raised by the hon. member. The member has raised the question of whether somebody who has been appointed, for instance, to head the CBC or something like that, should be receiving a pension as, for example, for time spent as a member of Parliament. I could make some personal comments with respect to that. I cannot make a comment with respect to our party's position on it, so I would prefer to stick to the meaning which is dealt with in the bill itself.

In the bill itself, double-dipping refers to the practice whereby people make RRSP contributions to the fullest possible extent for the period of their working life. This tends to apply especially to the owners of corporations and businesses of various kinds. Having made those massive RRSP contributions which would not be possible if there had been a pension system in place in the operation previously, just before they are due to retire they create a pension system for the business. They make back payments which make it possible for them to receive, after they retire, both the complete benefits of a pension plan and the complete benefits of the largest possible RRSP contributions. They would not have been able to do that if the pension plan itself had actually been in effect all those years that they were making RRSP contributions.

• (1240)

This bill prevents that kind of back payment from taking place and therefore prevents double-dipping. It is in that sense that we very much support what is suggested in this bill.

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, I would like to commence my little talk here today with a quote that I would like to expand on as I go along.

This quote comes from the Hon. Stanley Knowles, the former member of Parliament for Winnipeg North Centre, who stated in the House of Commons on November 9, 1964:

> What I like most of all about the Canada Pension Plan—about the two stage plan which we are now developing for Canadians in their years of retirement—is that we are trying to reach a position where we are providing pensions that are adequate—I do not suggest that the levels which will be achieved by combining the Canada Pension Plan, at its best, with old age security, at its present level, are really the last words in adequacy, but at least we are talking about pensions of quite a different order from that what seemed to be accepted a few years or decades ago. I hope that, having accepted the principle that retirement security should be on the basis of adequacy, we will go on improving that basis, finding means and ways of raising the levels of our pensions so that all Canadians can look forward to a retirement in decency and dignity.

I would suggest that what we have at present is a continuation of that thrust toward adequacy, decency, and dignity. I wonder whether in fact we are choosing the route that we should be taking when we look at the lower and middle income earners in Canada.

Personally, I have no objection to some form of registered retirement savings plan that all Canadians can benefit from by putting away some of their extra earnings now to be used at a future date. It ensures that they do not have to live in abject poverty and that they can live in some comfort in their older years.

However, I question the thrust we are going in. If this is pension reform that we have on the table before us, then I question the direction in which we are proceeding in that pension reform.

It seems to me and the New Democratic Party that we should be looking at more basic reforms that look at the adequacy of the Canada Pension Plan and reforms that look at ensuring that all Canadians, regardless of how much money they have in their younger years, can live at least at the same level, or at a reasonable level, in their retirement years.

Can that be done through the present registered retirement savings plan? Certainly, if we look at the changes that are before us, we can see that in the present system those who have $7,500 in additional income at the end of any one year can put that money away for later years, tax-free for the time being. They can draw on that and pay the taxes perhaps at a lower income level. I do not have too many difficulties with the concept, but let us look at what we have in this bill.

The proposal is that in 1991 the registered retired savings limit will go up $4,000 to $11,500; in 1992 to $12,500, in 1993 to $13,500, in 1994 to $14,500, and finally in 1995 to $15,500. It is interesting to note that those who will be able to contribute the limit in 1995 of $15,500 are those who earn $83,111. How many people in Canada will be able to use that?

I would suggest that people with earnings in the $80,000 plus bracket have other means of investment, and can look after their retirement years without the necessity of looking at a program that allows them to defer even more taxation.

This brings me to another section of this bill, which drops the limit from 20 per cent to 18 per cent of earnings. Who does that drop help, or who does it hinder?

Dropping the earning limit to 18 per cent as the maximum which can be put in registered retirement savings plans again hits out at those in the lower and middle-income scales, those of us who make $30,000 or $40,000 and are able to take some of that money each year and invest it for our retirement. I would put an asterisk beside that because at some of those rates it is very difficult for a one-earner family to make a living, and support children and a spouse. However, if there was money left over at the end of that period time, if you were an excellent money manager and wanted to put in the maximum amount, we have seen the maximum amount eroded for those in the lower-income levels.

Where are we going with our legislation? Is this how we are going to look after the vast majority of people in Canada? I would suggest no, because perhaps 5 per cent of the people of Canada will benefit by the upper limits by 1995 of $15,500. Where is the fairness? Where is the equity for average Canadians? It is not within this bill. There are definite problems, I believe, with dropping that limit. It strikes out at the 95 per cent of wage-earners in Canada who do not have an $83,100 income and the ability to use the maximum. As I stated, it is those in the upper limits who really do not require that additional amount of money.

There is now a deferral system within the new legislation which allows contributions to be carried forward for seven years. I have said this in the past and I would like to repeat it. On the surface, it appears this is and can be a provision that can be used reasonably by Canadians who, perhaps, one year through some particular problem within their own employment area have had an income drop and they have the ability to carry forward. However, once again for the most part, this is a provision that can be used most beneficially by those in the higher income brackets.

It is not hard to imagine a person in a higher income bracket finding an investment opportunity to invest part of the money he would normally put into a Registered Retirement Savings Plan. He invests that money because, for one reason or another, he can get a higher return on it than he can deferring his $15,500 in tax through the Registered Retirement Savings Plan and the following year or years he then takes the money, adds on, and receives the tax deferral. I would suggest that this will be of limited benefit to lower and middle-income Canadians.

I cannot emphasize strongly enough that to benefit the majority of Canadians, the thrust of pension reform must be through a proper reform of the Canada Pension Plan. Then all Canadians, regardless of the amount they earn during their working years, can live with some dignity and comfort, as was stated by Stanley Knowles in the House of Commons in 1964.

Would it not be nice to be able to have a Canada Pension Plan system in place that allowed all Canadians a reasonable income of one-half of their earnings throughout their lifetime. This is not beyond our grasp. If it is something that we as parliamentarians want and set as a priority, I would suggest that it is within our grasp, something that is attainable.

All Canadians deserve to be treated reasonably and fairly in their declining years. As the population curve for seniors goes up, we know that across Canada 11 per cent of our population are over 65 years of age. The projections show clearly that will be doubled within approximately 30 years.

From my own personal experience in the riding of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, there are pockets of population within Canada where the seniors' population is sometimes triple the national average. People cluster together. People go to areas that are easier on them in their old age. As we go on into the next 30 years, these people need some assurances that there will be something to assist them in their declining years, not simply because they have had the good fortune to be high income earners—some of the 5 per cent—but because we as Canadians are willing to assist each other with our equalization payments.

We are proud Canadians. We are proud because we have through history assisted and helped each other. We have the start of a system that can be second to none, but we need the political will to proceed with that system and to do exactly what I have stated. Let us give seniors and our own generation some hope for the future, some hope for that dignity, some hope for that decency, some hope for that equality in the retirement years.

Let me move on to some of the other measures within the bill and some of the problems about which other people have spoken.

In a news release on June 8, 1990, the Telecommunications Workers Union talked about the legislation and emphasized that the only people who will be helped are the higher income earners. Mr. Larry Armstrong, president of that union, stated in that release:

> There is no good reason for this legislation. It will harm pensions plans. It will harm individual Canadians. It will make our prospects of adequately taking care of an increasingly older population much more bleak. The only clear beneficiary will be the government treasury.

He goes on to state:

> Starting in 1991, if this bill passes, Michael Wilson knows that he no longer will have to give millions of Canadians as much tax relief for saving for pensions. This could well add up to billions of dollars of tax revenue for the government.

Mr. Armstrong tells us further that the minor changes recommended by the chair of the finance committee will not undo the terrible damage this legislation will create.

A recent article on the pension bill in the Financial Post stated that actuaries were opposed to the provisions which are before the House today. In the article it states that they:

> —object to the committee's proposal to drop provisions known as pension adjustment reversals (PARs) to simplify the new rules.
> The legislation reduces individual registered retirement savings plan limits if the worker is part of a corporate pension plan. The formula used to reduce the RRSP limit is called a pension adjustment (PA).

The article quotes pension consultants at William M. Mercer Ltd. as saying:

> —the proposal means young people who switch jobs lose retirement savings opportunities. They said some measure must be adopted to reflect the age of a pension plan member.

The amendments proposed by the finance committee make matters worse. "If PARs, pension adjustment reversals, are dropped, pension adjustment must be adjusted by age. The amendment approach is a disaster", states vice-chairman, Robert Dowsett, of William M. Mercer Ltd.

Another Canadian Press release of June 8 states:

> —one pension expert said last-minute amendments have turned the legislation into a disaster for younger workers who may change jobs several times during their careers.

The article quotes Mr. Mercer as stating that because the bill no longer lets people increase their RRSP contributions to make up for lost pension benefits when they change jobs that this particular section is a disaster.

It appears that there are many difficulties with this legislation. The difficulties are not simply in some of the things that the pension adjustment people have pointed out. I would suggest part of the problem is the complexity of the terms and conditions within the bill.

How do we, the average wage-earner in Canada, look at these bills and find out how they are going to affect pension plans that we have within our unions, within our companies or, for that matter, carry forward some of the provisions within the bill. How is the bill going to affect us, the average wage-earner?

I would suggest that many of us legislators do not fully understand all of the implications and provisions of this bill. In looking at what some of the experts have said, it is obvious they feel that this is a disastrous bill. The complexity is one of the things that has been criticized by tax experts and adjusters.

How are we, the average wage-earners, going to find out where we should go? We are going to have to pay out more of our hard earned income to go to tax experts to have them tell us how we can best use this bill, how we can invest for our future, instead of having a simple system of deductions for Canada Pension Plan.

That is the route we should be going in the future, a look and a review of the basic Canada Pension Plan so that all Canadians, regardless of income, can live their ancient and dying years in comfort.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. member. After Question Period we shall proceed with a period of questions and comments relating to the speech.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

MEMBERS-PAGES ANNUAL BASEBALL GAME

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Madam Speaker, a parliamentary tradition was fulfilled last night when the pages met the MPs on the ball diamond.

It was a hastily organized match that even required assistance from Hansard. We forgot the need for bats and balls, but Bob Allen from Hansard was there with what we needed.

The MPs spotted the pages an average of 25 to 30 years. It was a classic match of experience versus youth and enthusiasm. All three political parties were represented, and the outcome proved that when we in this House co-operate, play by the rules and work together, the outcome will be obvious.

The MPs broke tradition and easily defeated the pages. We won in more ways than on the field. We got to know a few of the pages better, and the more I know of these young Canadians the more impressed I am. They have served this House well during the past year, and they have proven to be a credit to themselves and to this country.

We owe them our gratitude. I thank them for their sportsmanship, their patience, their sense of humour and for being young Canadians of whom we can all be proud.

FREE TRADE

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister told Canadians that free trade would mean lower prices for consumers who would save $800 a year as tariffs were removed on manufactured products. Now, consumers are being told by the government that, with the GST, they can expect the cost of manufactured goods to drop 6.5 per cent.

I have a list of prices for manufactured goods such as washers, springs, flanges, saw blades and so on covering 1988-90 which shows the Canadian consumer was sold a bill of goods on free trade as prices have increased on an average of 5.2 per cent while tariffs have decreased by 2.3 per cent.

With free trade, consumers called for independent monitoring of prices to ensure the consumer benefit. The government said the market will take care of it. The market players did take care of themselves.

Now with the GST, the government is again ignoring consumers' calls for an independent monitoring to ensure savings between the MST and GST are passed on to consumers. Again, the government says the market will take care of it, meaning that the market players will take care of themselves.

It is time this government took care of the taxpayer, instead of taking care of only big business.

NATIONAL ACCESS AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. Gilles Bernier (Beauce): Madam Speaker, since this is National Access Awareness Week and also International Literacy Year, I would like to emphasize the importance of providing literacy training for people with functional disabilities.

In a rapidly changing world, where competition is becoming increasingly fierce, it is a foregone conclusion that education is more important than ever before.

A good education offers better employment opportunities. It opens the door to a whole new world of ideas, to new knowledge and skills that will help the individual realize his full potential.

However, for some disabled persons, access to education may be limited due to the very nature of a functional disability that makes it harder for them to learn to read and write.

Since this is International Literacy Year, Madam Speaker, I urge those who work with the disabled and are involved in teaching to join forces, in order to adapt literacy training to students with special needs and thus give them a chance to take full advantage of the opportunities that come their way.

CITY OF LAVAL

Mr. Vincent Della Noce (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Revenue): Madam Speaker, last week, the three members from Laval—Guy Ricard, former member of the Laval executive, Jacques Tétreault, first mayor of Laval, and myself, a permanent resident of this beautiful city for 24 years, jointly tabled three bills aimed at changing the names of the ridings of Laval-des-Rapides, Laval and Duvernay.

Madam Speaker, today Laval, which consists of 15 former towns, celebrates its twenty-fifth birthday—25 years of love and friendship.

When I entered politics in 1984, Madam Speaker, believe it or not, the riding of Duvernay was designated as Montreal—Duvernay, which I had changed to Duvernay. I fail to see why the federal ridings still bear the names of former towns, and I am thinking of my own riding, Duvernay, which includes five of these former municipalities: Auteuil, Vimont, Pont-Viau, Saint-François, Saint-Vincent-de-Paul and Duvernay.

The new bills will substitute Laval East for Duvernay, Laval Centre for Laval-des-Rapides and Laval West for Laval.

These changes will make it easier for Laval residents to identify with their respective federal ridings.

Thank you, Madam Speaker, and happy birthday to all the people of Laval!

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Madam Speaker, over one year after the Exxon Valdez violated the Alaskan ecosystem with 270,000 barrels of oil, Canadians are still waiting for the report of The Public Review Panel on Marine Spills. The panel, announced by the Prime Minister last June, is all the more important while Petro-Canada courts disaster on the Grand Banks off Newfoundland.

PetroCan is drilling a wildcat well, but is unable to drill a relief well to contain a blow-out. An oil spill 32 times greater than the Valdez could occur without necessary emergency response. The chances of a spill from the well may be remote, but that is what they said about the Alaska tanker route during its years of safe operation. Until last March.

In the event of a major chemical or oil spill in the Great Lakes or on either coast, the Coast Guard, Transport Canada, the Auditor General and even the interim report on spills say that the government is not ready.

I urge the government to finalize the marine spill report so Canadians know that all plans and policies are in place for a disaster in our waters.

RADIO LICENCE FEES

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, in January, the government removed exemptions to radio licence fees for municipalities. The licences cover radios used by emergency services such as ambulance, fire and police.

The new regulations which in effect downloads costs on to local governments have had an enormous impact in my riding. Municipalities from Saanich to Sidney are faced with increases of 400 to 1,400 per cent. This not only imposes an excessive tax on over-burdened municipal budgets, but clearly demonstrates this government's willingness to raise revenue at the expense of health and safety.

This creative bookkeeping may help the federal balance sheet, but it hardly meets the needs of taxpayers. Forcing another level of government to choose between public safety and reductions in other services may be the most cynical deficit-cutting move the Conservatives have attempted.

Once again, this government has failed to consult. It has failed to act in the interest of the people it is supposed to serve, and it has failed to admit an error and roll back the radio licence fees. On behalf of my constituents, I strongly protest this outrage.

FIRST NORTH AMERICAN INDIGENOUS GAMES

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, The "City of Champions", Edmonton, the Hobbema Four Nations and Enoch, Alberta, will host the First North American Indigenous Games from June 30 to July 8. I invite all members of this House to attend these historic games and encourage all their constituents to do likewise.

The games will open with a traditional Ceremonial Run from Wyoming, after elders offer prayers in our spiritual ceremonies. Todd Buffalo and Dennis Samson's rodeo will follow at the Penee AgriPlex in Hobbema on June 20.

Welcome to all those 3,000 plus indigenous athletes from North America and elsewhere who will be competing in these Olympic-style games. Events include archery, basketball, shooting, wrestling, soccer, track and field, volleyball, canoeing, boxing, lacrosse, a marathon, swimming, softball and golf. Welcome also to those who will be participating in the cultural events, which is the important centre of our way of life.

Thank you in advance to two brothers, Charles Wood and John Fletcher, the sponsors and the hundreds of volunteers who are making my dream come true. This is a good, positive contribution that will encourage indigenous youth all over to pursue excellence, whether it is physically, mentally, culturally or spiritually.

HOUSING

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Madam Speaker, this government's high interest rate policy is crippling the housing industry in this country and killing the hopes of thousands seeking affordable housing.

Housing starts and sales are down 40 per cent from last year. Thousands of construction workers and thousands of workers in related industries are losing their jobs.

Housing is a very important contributor to the Canadian economy and to our social well-being. It represents $43 billion and 670,000 person years of employment; that is 5 per cent of the total employment in Canada.

Housing is more than bricks and mortar, it is about people, young families, seniors and the physically challenged. This government, instead of telling Canadians "don't worry, be happy", should immediately reduce interest rates, scrap the GST and recommit itself to housing Canadians, especially the homeless and those on waiting lists for social and co-op housing.

Housing is not only good economic policy, it is good social and family policy and it is good environmental policy.

PARISHES OF ST. IGNATIUS LOYOLA, IN GIFFARD, AND ST. GREGORY'S, IN MONTMORENCY

Mr. Charles DeBlois (Montmorency—Orléans): Madam Speaker, in the life of every community, there are milestones that should be pointed out. This is the case for St. Ignatius of Loyola parish in Giffard, which is proudly celebrating the 75th anniversary of its founding this week, and for St. Gregory's in Montmorency which throughout the year is celebrating its 100th anniversary.

Madam Speaker, I wish to pay tribute today to the builders of these two communities in the riding of Montmorency—Orléans who have laid the foundations for the economic and social development of their communities.

Now part of greater Beauport, these two formerly independent municipalities contribute actively to the development of Quebec's fourteenth largest city.

I want to thank the celebration organizers for their dedication. Thanks to them, the people of Giffard and Montmorency will have an opportunity to find in their past the values and examples that will help them ensure the future of their community and of the generations to come.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, last week Statistics Canada informed Canadians that 165,000 jobs were lost in the manufacturing sector last year. The Tory government's disastrous policies have claimed another victim. This morning, it was announced that Fruehauf Canada, this country's largest trailer manufacturer, is closing its Brantford plant, resulting in a loss of 334 direct jobs and as many as 1,500 indirect jobs. It is quite clear that a trio of Tory policies are directly responsible for this closure: free trade, deregulation and high interest rates.

In 1988, United States freight companies hauled about 15 per cent of all freight in Canada. This year that will rise to 60 per cent. The result is that Canadian manufacturing jobs are being lost and Canadian industries are being killed off.

Quite clearly, the level playing field promised by the Mulroney government is anything but level. Equally as clear is the fact that the government's free trade deal, its blind drive to deregulate and its policy of squeezing out Canadian jobs with high interest rates are killing the Canadian manufacturing sector.

SENATE REFORM

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Madam Speaker, I was very surprised to learn that the leader of the Parti Québécois in the National Assembly, Jacques Parizeau, prefers appointing senators to electing them. It is especially surprising given the opinion of former Quebec Premier René Lévesque that the Senate should be abolished.

For many years, at least twenty, Madam Speaker, Quebecers like Canadians from coast to coast believed that the Senate needed to be thoroughly reformed, not totally abolished.

Therefore the arguments the leader of the Parti Québécois is making in the National Assembly to Premier Bourassa are directly opposed to what Canadians and Quebecers want on the question of Senate reform.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Etobicoke—Lakeshore): Madam Speaker, these days just about everyone is an environmentalist and that is a very good development.

It is also important to be an informed environmentalist. A lot of members of parliament, broadcasters, journalists, and others, quite often refer to aerosol sprays as containing CFCs. I know, because a lot of these products are made in Etobicoke—Lakeshore.

Since 1976 industry itself has been phasing out the use of chlorofluorocarbons or CFCs as propellants in aerosol sprays. In fact, only a small number of aerosol sprays, those that are used in prescription pharmaceuticals, which are less than 5 per cent, are still used in Canada.

Within the next two weeks, regulations will be promulgated under the Canadian Environmental Protection Act which will further solve this problem by closing off any remaining imports of aerosol sprays with CFCs.

THYSSEN–BEAR HEAD INDUSTRIES

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, Canada has always been recognized around the world as an international peacekeeper. We have the prospect of being a world leader in environmental technology. There is a project before the government that can support both objectives.

Thyssen–Bear Head Industries has proposed to provide our Armed Forces with a modern multi–purpose vehicle for use in peacekeeping and other defence–related activities. In addition, it promises to bring to Canada access to German environmental technology that is state of the art and in use across Europe.

Thyssen–Bear Head Industries, therefore, could be a vehicle by which Canada becomes a world environmental leader. Moreover, Thyssen–Bear Head, along with Scotia Synfuels, offers two of the most promising industrial opportunities for the Strait of Canso area, an area where lasting jobs are urgently needed. We have the facilities: a world–class superport and excellent industrial training centres. Our skilled tradespeople are second to none.

I have spoken before in support of the Thyssen–Bear Head Industries project and the economic benefits it would provide in eastern Nova Scotia. I want to express this support again.

I urge the Canadian government to act soon to enable this project, which has been in abeyance since 1988, to go forward.

UKRAINIAN CANADIANS

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, few Canadians know that between 1914 and 1920 thousands of Ukrainian Canadians and other east Europeans were interned unjustly in 26 camps set up across Canada.

Subsequently tens of thousands more were designated as enemy aliens, disenfranchised, and subjected to various other discriminatory measures legislated by the Government of Canada. The property of many so–called enemy aliens was confiscated and never returned. This is a shameful episode in our history.

Today I met with the redress committee of the Ukrainian Canadian Congress. The Ukrainian Canadian Congress has joined with Italian, Chinese, and Japanese communities to form the National Redress Alliance.

The New Democratic Party supports the creation of a national redress commission to deal expeditiously and justly with these dark episodes in our history.

I call on the government to establish immediately such a commission to deal with the issues of Ukrainians and other groups which deserve a fair hearing for the injustices of the past.

EUROPEAN BANK FOR RECONSTRUCTION AND DEVELOPMENT

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Madam Speaker, I would like to congratulate the government on its decision to participate in the newly formed European Bank for Reconstruction and Development. This bank will assist east bloc countries make the transition from socialist economies to free market economies.

I know that many people across Saskatchewan will welcome this effort to assist their friends and relatives in improving their lives. After 40 years of stagnation and repression it would be almost impossible for these nations to rebuild without help from the west. As well, Canadian participation in the bank will help to enhance the Canadian business access to commercial opportunities in eastern Europe.

I believe that despite our own difficult financial situation it would be short–sighted and inappropriate to ignore the plight of newly reformed democracies in eastern Europe.

CZECHOSLOVAKIAN ELECTION

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, the National Institute for International Affairs sponsored a delegation to observe the June 8 and June 9, 1990 Czechoslovakian election, the first truly competitive election since 1946.

I was pleased an invitation was extended to me to join this observer team. The delegation was led by U.S. Senators John McCain of Arizona and Chris Dodd of Connecticut. In addition to business representatives, parliamentarians from Panama, Hungary, Chile, Columbia, Australia, and other nations were present.

The election marked the culmination of a remarkable series of events that have transformed Czechoslovakia during the past seven months. The election demonstrated the vitality of Czechoslovakia's democratic culture and the country rejoining, at least in part, the European community to which it historically belonged.

We should also congratulate Elections Canada for contributing advice in the planning of the Czechoslovakian voting. Its guidance and assistance was noted to me by the Czech election committee.

I was most pleased to be invited to be a witness in this historic event. I saw a country that has now just ran the first yard of a 100-yard dash and, in their own words, Czechs and Slovaks acknowledge they have many hurdles yet to overcome.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

In his speech to the House yesterday, referring to his recent closed door marathon sessions with the provincial premiers, the Prime Minister said:

> This process has proven to be increasingly unsatisfactory in several respects and must be changed.
> There should, first and foremost, be ample opportunity for Canadians to participate in the process.

Yet, in an interview published today in The Globe and Mail referring to these recent seven-day marathon closed sessions he held with the provincial premiers, the Prime Minister said:

> That's the way it had to be done. You're asking me if I had any regrets? None whatsoever.

I ask the Prime Minister: How can Canadians take the Prime Minister seriously when one day he says he wants to change the process and the next day he says he has no regrets about it whatsoever?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Because, Mr. Speaker, there is no contradiction whatsoever. In regard to the process that we followed, it was a process that I inherited pursuant to both past practice and events that developed from the 1981-82 constitutional debates and negotiations here in Ottawa.

• (1420)

Yesterday I was speaking of my personal opinion in regard to this process, which personally I find unacceptable and I announced yesterday will be changed presumably by the House of Commons for all constitutional matters in the future.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, our Constitution as adopted in 1982 does not require the sessions between himself and premiers on constitutional change to be marathon sessions, nor does it require these sessions to be held in secret. Certainly he was not bound by anything in that regard in our Constitution.

In the same interview in The Globe and Mail the Prime Minister, speaking of this meeting with the provincial premiers, said:

> I told (my advisers) a month ago when we were going to meet. It's like an election campaign; you count backward. I said: "that's the day we are going to roll the dice."

Yet, for weeks the Prime Minister left the impression with Canadians and with this House that he and Senator Murray were engaged in a difficult search for common ground as a prerequisite, as a basis for calling a First Ministers' Conference and not deliberately waiting until the last minute to call a First Ministers' Conference in order to roll the dice with the country possibly at stake.

I ask the Prime Minister: Why did he tell Canadians that he was trying to find consensus among the provinces before calling a First Ministers' Conference when he now admits that all he was doing was waiting until the last minute to roll the dice with the premiers? Is this the way the Prime Minister is really attempting to carry out national reconciliation and build the future of this country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know why the Leader of the Opposition is so offended. The process produced the signature of 10 premiers promoting the concept of a united Canada. I would have thought he would would celebrate that.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: There is nothing very mysterious or sinister about the statement. When on May 11 I met with my advisers the first thing we had to look at was the entire schedule of commitments I had entered into as Prime Minister of Canada from June 23 leading back to May 11.

At that point in time this was the relatively fixed schedule that I faced. The Charest committee would report the end of the following week, and during that week there was a state visit of President Gonzalez of Spain. After the Charest report on May 17, Senator Murray would carry out consultations across the country with each premier. That took three days and had to be done before any calling of a conference.

My friend will remember that a House order had already been passed in regard to Bill C-43. Along with most members of the House I was here until late the night of May 23 with the report stage votes.

I began extensive meetings with each premier a day and a half later. They took place over four days from May 25 to May 28. These meetings were obviously necessary before convoking a full conference.

On the day of the last meeting, May 28, there was an official state visit to Ottawa by the Secretary General of the United Nations, and I had undertaken on behalf of all Canadians to speak at a state dinner in his honour in Toronto that night.

On the next day President Gorbachev of the Soviet Union arrived for May 29 and May 30.

Some Hon. Members: Time, time.

Mr. Mulroney: That left three days before the First Ministers' Conference. My hon. friend should be congratulating the Prime Minister of Canada for doing all that with his colleagues, representing Canada, and trying to bring Canada together with the support of all members of the House of Commons.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

[Translation]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister did not give any of those explanations to the Globe and Mail. Why, in his interview with the Globe and Mail, did he only mention how he planned the process like an election campaign? There was no reference to the Prime Minister of Spain. Even though he said in the interview that he had no regrets about the methods used, will he give us a commitment today that he will seriously try to change a process everyone now says must be changed?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, of course I do not for a moment question what was reported by the Globe and Mail journalists. Certainly not! I said yesterday in the House that it was an outdated procedure that obviously needed to be changed. I announced yesterday that we intend to change the procedure to provide for more active participation by all Canadians before a new constitutional amendment is ratified.

The hon. member talked about methods. In 1981-82, we had a Constitution with nine provinces out of ten. I managed to get ten out of ten.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

ROUTE CANADA

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the House was advised that shortly after Route Canada failed there were charges laid under the Canada Labour Act.

We are not dealing here with employer-employee relations. We are dealing with over $21 million of taxpayers' and employees' trust money that was spent out of trust. Mr. Speaker, when money is spent out of trust by a company like Route Canada or Route Canada Enterprises, you can pierce a corporate veil and look to the directors of the company for reimbursement of those trust funds.

I ask the Minister of Transport to pierce the corporate veil and make sure that the directors of that corporation, including the Fingolds, reimburse the employees of Route Canada and the taxpayers of this country in excess of $21 million.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate my hon. friend's comments about the corporate veil and trust. My hon. friend will know that the company holds those funds in trust for the various government departments and is required to remit those to the department.

Once a company goes into bankruptcy, all the assets are seized by the receiver in bankruptcy who takes charge of the assets, calculates the liabilities, and pays the appropriate liabilities, whether they are secured or preferred, out of the funds that he or she receives.

I expect the Registrar in Bankruptcy will take care of that matter in due course.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I guess the essence of the question to the same minister is: if there is a shortfall, does the minister intend to go after the directors of that company to make up the shortfall in the trust funds that were spent out of trust by the directors of Route Canada and Route Enterprises Canada Limited?

I think what this situation needs is a full, open and complete investigation into all the affairs as they affect the disposition of Route Canada by CN and CN Rail. I ask the minister to commence a complete, open investigation into this aborted transaction.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, to the best of my knowledge the bankruptcy proceedings have not been wound up. I would think that in the normal course of events the Registrar in Bankruptcy will report as to whether or not there have been any illegalities.

All the creditors will be paid in accordance with their preference, preferred or secured. I do not think it would be appropriate to step in with a full investigation until the bankruptcy proceedings are completed.

THE CHAREST REPORT

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. About a month ago, the Charest Report was published. The committee had heard 160 witnesses and received 800 briefs and papers. It was an exercise in public consultation. Now we hear that the Prime Minister already had the whole thing planned, even before the committee started its work. It would seem the Charest Report has now become the "charade" report.

I have the following question for the Prime Minister: Is the Prime Minister saying that the committee's work was just a façade to hide the government's real agenda?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have already had occasion to praise the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville, from Saskatchewan, who was an active participant in the committee, so I think it is clear I was very serious about its proceedings.

I said earlier to the Leader of the Opposition that the explanation was quite simple. The Charest Report was released on May 17, before a long weekend. We had three weeks left. During the first week, we had Senator Murray's visits and my meetings with the Premiers. During the second week, which started on May 27, I had an official visit by Perez de Cuellar and the official visit of President Gorbachev, and in the third week we started the process of meeting with the Premiers on June 3. So there is nothing out of the ordinary in all this.

It was simply a matter of looking at our agenda for the period from May 11 to June 23 and deciding when we could send Senator Murray on his mission, when I could meet the provincial Premiers, individually and together, at my residence, and when I could fulfil my international obligations on behalf of Canada, with the meetings with President Gorbachev, the Secretary General of the U.N. and the president of Spain. I did all that, and then I held our meeting.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear.

• (1430)

[English]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, obviously the Prime Minister cannot answer the question. The members of this party participated in the Charest committee in good faith. The public participated in the Charest committee in good faith. Yet this government has not shown good faith with the public of Canada.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister about the process that happened over this past week. We know that late Thursday night the Prime Minister's office met with Jean Chrétien's national chairman, his policy adviser and one of his lawyers, while aboriginal people and women stood on the outside.

Even though the future of aboriginal people and women was at stake, can the Prime Minister explain why meeting with Mr. Chrétien's campaign officials was so central to his plan?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there are many things that I have in mind for Mr. Chrétien but that is not one of them.

I think my hon. friend should know that I spent the time before the meeting of the First Ministers meeting, as well on the Sunday, with the leaders of the territorial governments, Yukon and the Northwest Territories, both of whom had an agenda very largely committed to the concerns that my hon. friend has just raised.

I trust that my hon. friend will not blame me for failing to meet with anyone other than First Ministers and territorial leaders. I sought to meet with many more but there are only so many hours in a day.

I think that my hon. friend, had she the time to listen to the speeches made by the territorial leaders late Saturday night at the Conference Centre, would agree that they seemed to indicate generally that they were very pleased with the way the matter had been conducted and that they were very pleased with the results, and hoped for even better results in the future.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, aboriginal people were on the outside of this process. Women were on the outside of this process. Yes, the Prime Minister's office met with the elected premier of the Yukon, the elected government leader of the Northwest Territories.

Will the Prime Minister explain to this House what the role of Mr. Chrétien's advisers was in his plan which he said was necessary to bring forward the constitutional talks of last week?

Mr. Gauthier: He's the next Prime Minister, your successor.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I was asked by the Liberals to say it is because he is the next Prime Minister. They also asked me to say that about the last leader of the Liberal party, and I do not want to damage Mr. Chrétien before he starts.

My hon. friend raises some very good questions. With regard to the issues that are raised, I think she would be pleased to note that in the final document that was published there is great care in the matter of gender equality, which was a matter of concern to the Leader of the NDP in Manitoba for example. There are provisions to ensure a fundamental new process—

Ms. McLaughlin: Are those Mr. Chrétien's provisions, or what?

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I am trying to answer the Leader of the NDP on a very important matter.

Ms. McLaughlin: Answer the question.

Mr. Mulroney: We put in place a brand new series of provisions for a constitutional process for aboriginal Canadians.

The Northwest Territories were ensured of a priority analysis of their provincehood requirements, not based on 1982 but going back to Confederation, namely, provincehood on the basis of an agreement between the federal government and the territories themselves.

There was further consideration in respect of appointments of senators and justices of the Supreme Court from the territories. There was very ample consideration given to the concerns of the north as reflected by the statements of the two territorial leaders.

If my hon. friend is blaming some member of my staff or anyone else for listening to constructive ideas from members of the Liberal Party or the NDP, then I do not think that that would be appropriate. I listened to and received very many constructive ideas and helpful suggestions from the NDP and from all kinds of Liberals. I acknowledged that publicly yesterday.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to members' attention the presence in the gallery of Volodymyr Yavorivsky, National Deputy to the Supreme Soviet of the U.S.S.R. and Ukraine and Vice President of Rukh.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Speaker: I also wish to draw to members' attention the presence in the gallery of Volodymyr Mokry, Deputy to the Polish Parliament.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

TRADE

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

While the Prime Minister has been preoccupied with constitutional matters, I am sure he is aware of the important decision taken by the Presidents of the United States and Mexico to begin talks leading toward what the U.S. President calls a North American trade agreement. I think he also recognizes that it is equally important that Canadians understand what this government intends to do about it.

In those circumstances I would like to ask the Prime Minister to confirm that the cabinet has already met on this very important item and has decided not to become involved in negotiations. Will he confirm that that decision has been made? Will he tell us what in fact the cabinet has authorized government officials to do to respond to this very crucial initiative that will affect Canada in a dramatic way?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the cabinet has made no decision as to whether we wish to be further involved in this matter or not further involved in this matter because the matter has hardly even commenced as yet.

There has been a decision between the U.S. and Mexico that they wish to have preliminary discussions and consultations to see whether or not they wish to engage in negotiations with reference to a free trade agreement.

Our own government is reviewing the situation to make a decision after we consult with the provinces and after we consult with the private sector to see whether or not we want to be more closely involved in that.

We are certainly going to be very close observers of what happens in any event. But as to whether we want any closer connection than that, we will decide in due course.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

It is reported that discussions were held between the Prime Minister and President Bush on this very topic yesterday or the day before.

In the press conference yesterday, the U.S. President's spokesperson announced that he sees these discussions leading toward a North American trade agreement.

• (1440)

I would like to know if the Prime Minister indicated to President Bush that Canada is in agreement or disagreement with the objective of leaning toward a North American trade agreement? Did we convey that we are not going to be part of these discussions and negotiations? In other words, what is the position that the Prime Minister took in relation to this very important negotiation with the U.S. President?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, on Sunday night, I believe, the President of the United States called me in advance of his meetings with President Salinas to tell me that it was his anticipation that this matter might be raised by President Salinas. It was a courtesy call to advise me of that.

With regard to the question of a North American trade agreement, it never came up at any time in discussion with President Bush, least of all Sunday night.

CONSUMER INFORMATION OFFICE

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): My question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Today, the minister announced his so-called Consumer Information Office to prevent consumers from being exploited by the hidden goods and services tax.

Can the minister really expect us to believe that a Mickey Mouse outfit of 20 people can keep 20 million consumers informed on the pricing of goods produced by over 1.6 million businesses?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) and Minister of State (Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I announced this morning a body that is going to look after and help consumers to monitor the situation and to make sure that we will pass on the benefit of the actual federal sales tax to the new GST.

I must point out that with Mr. Nicholas Murray, who was the President of the Canadian Consumers Association, as the Chairman it will be a very good body.

[Translation]

It will be very good for Canadians, Mr. Speaker. It will help Canadian consumers be better informed on what is happening. An informed consumer can make better buying decisions. Consumers will be in an excellent position to do so on January 1, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): According to the minister, the GST consumer information office will have to make sure that the expected "savings" will be passed on to consumers.

How can the minister make such a statement if the information office will have no authority to file complaints or to lower prices and only 20 people to do all the work?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I am a little surprised at the hon. member's reaction, since the great majority of those who spoke at the hearings of the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs in recent weeks recommended against having a price-control organization. Mr. Speaker, in this country, we must not take consumers for fools. They are quite able to make a valid choice when they buy. They just need to be well informed. I am surprised at what he said because even people in his own party who took part in these discussions, just like members of the New Democratic Party, were not in favour of having such a body that could roll back prices. I do not think, also, that Canadian consumers want to be in court for two or three years to find out if they paid too much for their refrigerator. What they want is accurate information so that when they buy in January and February, they will pay a fair price, Mr. Speaker.

CORPORATE TAXATION

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Revenue, the minister who is in charge of arranging tax holidays for large corporations.

The minister was quite categorical on April 4 when he told this House that he was urging all Canadians being clawed back on their old age pensions and family allowances to pay the tax, even though the legislation had not received Royal Assent.

Will the minister stand in this House now and be just as forceful and categorical in urging large corporations, most of which have been on tax holidays for years, to begin paying the large corporations tax?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, you will know that we have been encouraging large corporations to comply with Bill C-28, the large corporations tax, which is currently stuck in the Senate.

In the first year we had anticipated over $400 million of revenue as a result of the passage of that piece of legislation which is stuck in the Senate. We have been able to collect less than half of that.

For this fiscal year, the anticipated revenue is some $900 million. Therefore, I urge my hon. friend and all members, particularly my Liberal colleagues across the way, to encourage senators to pass this bill so that Canadians can take advantage of the positive elements and so that the Canadian government can reap the benefits of the revenues due it.

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I want to remind the minister that the function of the government is not to beg corporations but to demand that they pay their fair share of taxes.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Rodriguez: As the minister knows, interest may be charged to the corporations that do not pay the tax until the bill is approved in the Senate.

Can the minister give a guarantee in no uncertain terms that those corporations that do not pay the tax until the bill becomes law will be charged interest? Will the minister guarantee Canadians that large corporations will not be treated differently from those Canadians collecting pensions or family allowances? Let them pay the interest, the same as ordinary folks do.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, instead of acting for an Academy Award for the cameras, the hon. member should do his homework. If he did do his homework he would know that in fact once this bill is passed by the Senate—and we hope that the Senators would get off their bums and pass this bill at the earliest opportunity—that it is retroactive to January 15.

In fact, if the hon. member would do his homework instead of practising to be a movie star or Academy Award winner he would know that interest will be charged retroactively to January 15.

FIRST MINISTERS' CONFERENCE

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

Yesterday, the Premier of Manitoba alleged publicly that the cellular telephones of the Manitoba delegation to the First Ministers' Conference had been monitored. The Prime Minister has also stated that he had warned the premiers that such eavesdropping of private communications could occur.

Will the Prime Minister confirm to the House that electronic monitoring of the premiers' conversations did take place last week and that such monitoring is a criminal offence? Will he tell the House just what he is prepared to do about these serious allegations?

• (1450)

Mr. Blaikie: Are you bringing in Erik Nielsen again?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am being heckled by the NDP on a matter of electronic bugging, and that surprises me.

Some Hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, indeed, at a point during the conference it was brought to my attention that a press report existed to the effect that members of the Manitoba delegation, in particular, because of the presence of the two opposition leaders, were communicating with one another using cellular telephones. I simply took the liberty of telling all the participants to be very careful in their use of these kinds of devices because we had been advised by Government of Canada security people in the past, in entirely different circumstances, that these are considerably less than secure.

I pointed that out to the participants in the hope that they would exercise prudence. I have every reason to believe that they did.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, last February during a budget lock-up here in Ottawa, government officials revealed to the press that they had put technology in place to detect leaks and eavesdropping through cellular phones.

If that technology was already in the hands of our government, and if the Prime Minister knew that cellular monitoring was going to take place during the First Ministers Conference—

Mr. Mulroney: And if my mother-in-law were a bus.

Mr. Lee: —did the Prime Minister use the technology to protect his own communications? If so, why did he not make the same security measures available to the provincial premiers at the Conference Centre?

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Prince Edward—Hastings.

TRUCKING INDUSTRY

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

The Canadian trucking industry is being crippled by past actions of this government and the present inaction of this government. Bill Swan, a transportation lawyer in the United States, said last week: "If something is not done to deal with these problems in the next three to five years, Canada will have precious little trucking industry left".

What concrete action is the government taking to level the playing-field that even the Americans say is tipped 20 per cent in their favour?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend will know that during the recent difficulties in Windsor I met with the Ontario Minister of Transport and took a look at what we could do on a federal basis in all provinces vis-à-vis the trucking industry.

We agreed to a crackdown on cabotage which we came back and discussed with officials from National Revenue and Canada Employment. That crackdown is in place with the co-operation of the various provinces.

We agreed to deal with unfair business practices, given any evidence that came to our attention.

We agreed to look into the possibility of a different type of taxing on fuel that is brought into the country.

Those discussions are ongoing with the various provinces. We think we have done everything we can at an official level to deal with the problems of the truckers.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed the same minister.

The reason I bring this to the minister's attention is because I have yet another trucking firm in my riding that is negotiating to move into the State of New York for reasons of high interest and fuel taxes that tip the scale in the wrong way.

For example, in order for a Canadian trucking firm to get permits and licences to go into a U.S. state, it must give permission for the U.S. government to audit its books here in Canada to see that the proper taxes are paid into the U.S. state.

However, American firms refuse to have the reverse be the case. They refuse to have their books audited.

Will the minister tell me specifically what is being done to ensure that Canadian truckers using Canadian highways and Canadian roads are paying their fair share toward the upkeep of those through the fuel taxes they owe us here in Canada?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I believe the question is: What is the government doing to make sure that Canadian truckers pay their fair share—

Mr. Boudria: American!

Mr. Lewis: Yes, read the "blues".

—their fair share of taxes in Canada?

I am sure that the Canadian truckers are doing that.

When my friend examines the "blues" he will find out that is what he said.

Mr. Crawford: That was not the question.

LABOUR

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Labour.

Today marks the fifth day of protest by older workers in the Cape Breton construction industry. These workers took extreme measures to make their plights known.

The Program for Older Worker Adjustment currently in place does not provide assistance for these people, even though they are in desperate need of this assistance.

I want to ask the minister whether he will agree to meet with their representative and whether he is prepared to call for a review of the current OWA Program?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour) and (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member knows that the Program for Older Worker Adjustment was the result of lengthy and extensive negotiations with federal and provincial representatives. It was designed to help long-service older workers who have no prospects for re-employment following major, permanent lay-offs.

All industries, including construction sector employees, are eligible provided they meet the criteria that were established by this federal-provincial committee.

As for the last part of his question, I would like to inform him that the people in Cape Breton have arranged for a meeting with the provincial labour minister on June 27, and I have agreed to meet them here in Ottawa on July 5.

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I thank the minister for his response.

However, he says that they have to meet the criteria in order to qualify for the program and then said, as reported in an article, that these construction workers are liable to be recalled to work. I would be interested in his response to the fact that these workers' benefits are now running out.

He is claiming that this is an industry that is on recall constantly, that construction workers are recalled all the time, and that they are able to go back to work.

How do you explain the fact that these workers are now running out of benefits, but they cannot apply for the Older Worker Adjustment Program?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour) and (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the hon. member again that this program was designed to help older workers to adjust in cases where they are the victims of a major, permanent lay-off and have no prospects for re-employment. This is what the program was designed to do. It was negotiated with federal and provincial authorities. It is the program that applies at the present time.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of the Environment.

The federal program called "Partners in the Environment" aims at establishing lasting partnerships to benefit the environment.

The Conservative government intends to give subsidies to local groups to enable them to protect, preserve, improve and restore the environment at the community level.

My question is this: I know you are a man of action; are you ready to announce today subsidies to community groups in Canada?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): Mr. Speaker, as my colleague certainly knows, the federal government has set aside $50 million over five years for the "Partners in the Environment" program.

So far, 164 projects have already been approved and $6.8 million in federal funds have led to some $37 million in projected expenditures by all partners.

LABOUR

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Minister of Labour. I want to thank the minister for agreeing to meet with the Cape Breton construction workers on July 5, 1990.

• (1500)

The minister will know that the Program for Older Worker Adjustment is a joint agreement between the Government of Canada and the Government of Nova Scotia. The Government of Nova Scotia said in a letter to the minister on April 24, 1990, the following:

> —if they are indeed not covered by the current POWA agreement, may I ask if the Government of Canada would be prepared, at this time, to either amend the existing agreement or consider separate documents to accommodate the traditional construction worker in the POWA-like program—

In view of the fact that the Government of Nova Scotia has now changed its mind and wishes to have these workers included in the existing agreement, will the minister not now give an undertaking to that government to amend that agreement in order to include the Cape Breton construction workers?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour) and (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind my hon. colleague that this program, as I mentioned before, was the result of extensive negotiations among all provinces and the federal government. If there are to be amendments to the present program, we will have to reconvene the discussions among all provincial ministers responsible for labour and look at the possibility of amending this program.

However, I have not seen any intention by the ministers from the provinces to modify this program at the present time.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister. The minister will know that the unemployment rate of construction workers in Cape Breton is 75 per cent. Those who are unemployed will continue to be unemployed for an indefinite period of time. The possibilities of getting work are very, very remote.

In view of that crucial fact, would the minister not give serious consideration to this request which was made years ago by the construction workers in Cape Breton in order to include them in a Program for Older Worker Adjustment? Would he give that kind of undertaking to those workers?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour) and (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I have already indicated that these workers will meet with the minister responsible for labour in the area on June 27 and I will be meeting with them on July 5. We will take their representation under consideration.

Mr. Speaker: That concludes Question Period.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Madam Speaker, I do not wish to leave the impression that I misled the House in my question in Question Period. It was my intention to say "U.S." not "Canada". I thought I said U.S. and I would like Hansard to show that.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-52, an act to amend the Income Tax Act and related acts, be read the third time and passed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: When the House rose at one o'clock the hon. member for Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt had just completed his speech. We will now proceed with questions and comments following that speech. The hon. member for Sudbury.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Madam Speaker, I listened very carefully to my colleague's speech and I must say that I do agree with many of his comments. Bill C-52 is certainly not a perfect piece of legislation. The complexity of the pension reform has made it very difficult for us to judge absolutely every aspect and to make sure that everything is as equitable as it should be.

As a result of that, we have insisted that there be a full and complete review of the legislation and of the pension system after three years of implementation of Bill C-52. We certainly hope that any problems that have come up during that time could be addressed, if not even prior to the three years.

On the other hand, my hon. colleague mentioned that his party believes that we should have a beefed-up Canada Pension Plan. I would like to remind the hon. member that we have also requested that a review of the Canada Pension Plan be done by the finance committee within the next year. I personally feel that there is a place for Canada Pension Plan but that there is also a place for Registered Retirement Savings Plans and that both can exist together and complement each other.

I do not know if the hon. member would like to comment on these two aspects of Bill C-52.

Mr. Whittaker: Madam Speaker, to take the last part of the comments of my colleague from Sudbury first, I do not disagree at all that the two programs can co-exist. In fact, I think they have done fairly well. What I am afraid of is a continuation of what I see as the thread of what has been happening since 1984 with the privatization of a number of programs. I fear that with the raising of the limits of the Registered Retirement Savings Plan and dropping the percentage of earned wages from 20 to 18 per cent, we are moving closer and closer to privatization of pension plans.

If the review is done with the idea of ensuring that all Canadians will ultimately benefit through an expansion of the Canada Pension Plan, Old Age Security, or the Guaranteed Income Supplement, that is fair enough. But what I fear is that the program as set out in Bill C-52 will ultimately erode the system that we have and we will depend more and more on privatization. In other words, people will be encouraged to invest in private pensions plans as opposed to plans such as the Canada Pension Plan which people like Mr. Knowles and Tommy Douglas have fought for in the past.

The review process, in the absence of any real amendments, is an excellent idea as long as it takes into consideration all Canadians from all walks of life rather than, as we have seen in the past with the goods and services tax and the Unemployment Insurance Commission, a very limited number of people being able to give their ideas and impressions on the Registered Retirement Savings Plan. I want to have a system where people can actually be listened to and heard. I do not want a system under which we set deadlines and then leave out most of the people who want to speak as we did on the goods and services tax. On that legislation we heard less than 300 of well over 1,000 representations that requested to be heard.

So let us listen to all suggestions and use some of those suggestions in order to make the Canada Pension Plan system better for all of us.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to say a few words regarding Bill C-52, an act to amend the Income Tax Act relating to RRSPs. While I had intended to speak at some length I do not believe that is necessary. The member for Essex—Windsor and his colleague from Kootenay East worked very diligently in the committee examining Bill C-52. I want to commend them for the job they did in that committee. While there are still many problems associated with this legislation regarding RRSPs, as a result of their work and that of others in opposition it is tremendously improved. On behalf of us all I want to recognize the efforts that the opposition made in improving this legislation.

• (1510)

I also listened carefully to my hon. colleague and friend from Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt. He largely laid out the concerns the New Democratic Party has with the general thrust of this legislation.

The legislation starts, in my judgment, at the wrong point. It aims to allow everyone earning up to $86,000 a year to shelter from taxes the same percentage of income. Obviously that is going to benefit those in the upper income brackets.

On principle we have to ask ourselves whether it is the role of legislation to identity those who are the wealthiest and in relatively privileged positions in our society and arrange legislation such that they benefit much more than people from a low income bracket.

I believe that not only is that the wrong starting point, it also means that tax sheltering of our income becomes the major thrust of most pension-related savings as opposed to the approach which expands the Canada Pension Plan in order to provide satisfactory pension levels for everyone in the Canadian workforce.

Stanley Knowles and many others dedicated their entire lives to improving the Canada Pension Plan. Today, as opposed to improving the Canada Pension Plan so that all Canadians can benefit, we are tinkering around with tax legislation that enables certain people to avoid tax as they set aside money for their retirement years. We are seeing a departure from a trend over the years to improve the Canada Pension Plan. Now we are seeing a trend toward the privatization of our pension system.

It is important to recognize that only 20 per cent of all tax filers take advantage of RRSPs. Five per cent of Canadians earning under $15,000 contribute to RRSPs whereas nearly 60 per cent of Canadians earning over $50,000 contribute to RRSPs. We see with a glance at these simple statistics that the RRSP legislation is earmarked for those who are in the upper income brackets of our society.

The work of the committee has brought about positive changes including improvements to pension affordability, the provisions to allow for earlier retirement, changes in definition of designated plans and respect for existing contribution levels under collective agreements. I want to acknowledge and recognize these and other improvements, as well as saying that I and my colleagues depart from the major thrust of the legislation which is essentially pension reform through tax alteration, which is not the approach that we feel is most appropriate.

I would remiss if I did not note from the comments of previous speakers and the work of my colleagues on the committee the continuing complexity associated with this legislation. I read with interest the evidence of the professional actuaries who spoke to the committee and suggested that the incredible complexity of this legislation will make it essentially unworkable. In the minds of these experts, the legislation cannot work, it is simply too complex.

As a result of the efforts of my colleagues in opposition, a three-year review period has been introduced so that at least every three years we can revisit the changed legislation to see if in fact it is working and serving the purposes for which it was intended, even though we might question those purposes.

It has been suggested that these changes in Bill C-52 will cost employers an estimated $60 to $70 million in start-up costs and an annual reporting cost of between $10 and $15 million. With high interest rates, with the goods and services tax coming, with the changes to the unemployment insurance legislation that will expect more of employers, and now with Bill C-52, how much can a government abuse the small and medium sized business sector? There is a limit, and I suspect that we have nearly reached it now.

In conclusion, while we recognize that improvements have occurred in this legislation as a result of the excellent committee work and an acknowledgement by the government that changes to this legislation were desired, we will oppose the legislation on the grounds of principle and the fact that the actuaries say that this legislation in its present form will make the RRSP program unworkable.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Some Hon. Members: On division.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, there has been some discussion, and I think there would be unanimous consent to proceed with Private Members' Hour for the purpose of dealing with Bill S-16.

If the House gives its consent, we could move now to Private Members' Hour and deal with that bill.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, we have had adequate briefings on the legislation. It is a straightforward piece of legislation.

On behalf of my party I can say that we are anxious to act expeditiously on this bill.

Mrs. Sparrow: Madam Speaker, I would like to have the right to introduce Bill S-16.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

CANADIAN INSTITUTE OF MINING AND METALLURGY

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mrs. Barbara Sparrow (Calgary Southwest) moved that Bill S-16, an act to amend the act of incorporation of the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Milliken: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I think there would be unanimous consent that the motion read that it be referred to Committee of the Whole rather than to a legislative committee.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Mrs. Sparrow: Madam Speaker, it is with pleasure that I introduce and present this Private Member's Bill S-16 to the House today. The bill is based on a petition that was presented to Parliament by the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy to enact a name change for the institute to the Canadian Institute of Mining, Metallurgy and Petroleum.

The institute, which has its head office in Montreal, is a non-profit corporation that has been in existence since before the turn of the century. In fact, it is very interesting to all my colleagues to note that the Canadian Institute of Mining and Metallurgy was incorporated by Parliament under Chapter 96 of the Statutes of Canada in 1898.

The objectives of the institute are to promote the arts and sciences connected with the economical production of valuable minerals and metals by means of meetings for the reading and discussion of technical papers and the establishment of a central reference library; to take concerted action upon matters as affect the mining and metallurgical industries in Canada; and, of course, to encourage and promote these industries by lawful and honourable means.

• (1520)

The institute publishes a number of journals in which the most worthy of its technical papers are featured. These journals provide a forum for the exchange of technical information among approximately 11,000 people who are currently members of the institute.

In any given year, 10 to 15 technical meetings are organized and held in various parts of Canada. These meetings are attended by some 6,000 to 7,000 delegates who participate in as many as 1,300 technical information sessions that are held each and every year.

The members are grouped into eight technical divisions according to their professional disciplines and field of interest—coal, geology, industrial minerals, metallurgy, mineral processing, metal mining, maintenance engineering, and petroleum. There is also a geographical grouping made up of six districts integrating the 65 branches located in most cities with a mining or a petroleum background.

The petroleum society of the institute has been assuming a greater role of importance in the affairs of this organization for many years. It has about 2,500 members in its ranks and represents the fastest growing division within the institute.

A task force was appointed in December 1987 to study the consideration of a name change to include petroleum, and this change was proposed to the general membership which overwhelmingly favoured it. So the wheels were set in motion to petition Parliament to pass a bill to change the name of the institute to the Canadian Institute of Mining, Metallurgy and Petroleum, which truly reflects the interests of its membership.

This change of name is one of the purposes of Bill S-16 before us today. As you can see, Madam Speaker, the bill was passed through the Senate on June 5, 1990.

The bill also contains a few technical and incidental changes to the corporation's charter. One amendment would clarify the corporate powers and management of the institute and at the same time remove a restriction on the total value of real estate that may be held at any one time by the institute.

Another amendment is designed to provide the institute with general borrowing powers which it does not have today and which of course can restrict the operation. This establishment does not rely on government funding and therefore these particular changes are at no cost to the Government of Canada.

Madam Speaker, Bill S-16 is straight forward. I have reviewed the amendments with you and with my colleagues here in the House today. I would very much like it to go through all stages today so that we can report it back as carried.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Madam Speaker, we have absolutely no objections to this bill. We support it and we would like to see it go through all stages today.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, when Bill S-16 first came to our attention, the first question we had was to what extent the membership favoured this name change. Often that might be concern of the executive or a small group of people. The information that was provided—and I think it was excellent information—was that 11,285 ballots were mailed out to the membership of CIM, and of the 4,924 ballots returned 4,256 were enthusiastically in favour of this name change.

We concur that this and the other amendments the hon. member has brought to our attention are appropriate changes to the legislation.

With the purpose of the institute being to promote the arts and sciences connected with the economical production of valuable minerals and metals by means of meetings and for the reading and discussion of technical papers, how could anyone not enthusiastically support this legislation?

I am pleased to say that my party not only wants to pass this bill, but we will move it through all stages quickly today to get the good news to the people of the institute.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some Hon. Members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time, by unanimous consent considered in committee, reported, concurred in, read the third time and passed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Nanaimo—Cowichan—Fisheries; the hon. member for Surrey North—Housing; and the hon. member for Prince Albert—Churchill River—The Environment.

SITTING SUSPENDED

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest): Madam Speaker, at this moment it would be my intention to seek unanimous consent of the House to suspend the sitting, for a few minutes, to the call of the Chair, which we would anticipate being about four o'clock, for the purpose of Royal Assent.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The House has heard the suggestion made by the hon. member. Is there unanimous consent?

Some Hon. Members: Agreed.

The sitting of the House was suspended at 3.29 p.m.

VIOLENCE ON TELEVISION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, elementary and secondary school pupils spend roughly 1,000 hours per year in the classroom.

Recognizing the importance that the curricula plays in school and in education, parents, students themselves, teachers, public servants and the ministers of education for whom they work have been working extremely hard, and will continue to do so, to remove violence and negative and inappropriate stereotyping from curriculum found in schools.

It has also been noted that these same young people spend roughly the same amount of time watching television. What has been the minister's response to this concern about the impact that violence on television could have on these young people? Well, he has turned it over to the CRTC. That is not a bad first step but I would ask the minister to take a personal initiative here to address this important issue immediately and to bring forth guidelines.

[Translation]

Canadian parents expect the minister to do everything possible to remove violence from television and the media.

THE HON. CYRIL BEVERLY SHERWOOD

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, July 1 is Canada's birthday. It is also the birthday of one of New Brunswick's and, indeed, Canada's finest citizens.

On July 1 the hon. Cy Sherwood will turn 75. Senator Sherwood has served his country well. Cy was first elected to the New Brunswick legislature in 1952 and was subsequently re-elected in 1956, 1960, 1963, 1967 and 1970. Cy Sherwood served as New Brunswick's Minister of Agriculture from 1952 to 1960, and also served as the Leader of the Opposition and the Leader of the P.C. Party in New Brunswick, from 1960 to 1966.

Cy Sherwood retired, or at least thought he retired, from politics and chose not to run in the 1974 election. However, Cy was appointed to the Senate by the Rt. Hon. Joe Clark on October 3, 1979. Needless to say, Cy Sherwood continued to serve his province and his country with the same level of commitment and integrity that has been the hallmark of his life.

On July 1, 1990, Cy Beverly Sherwood will retire from the Senate of Canada. On behalf of all the members in this House, I wish Senator Sherwood and his wife Madilene a most happy retirement.

HIBERNIA

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, last night the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources destroyed one of the few remaining arguments in favour of the Hibernia megaproject—that it would increase Atlantic Canada's energy security. He agreed, during a meeting of the legislative committee on the Hibernia bill, that the government could not even guess what proportion of Hibernia oil would actually be refined in Newfoundland or anywhere else in Canada.

S. O. 31

In fact, there are indications that most of Hibernia's oil will flow south to the United States, straight off the Hibernia platform. More than $3.5 billion of Canadian taxpayers' money will be placed at risk, including a gift of over $1 billion, which could have gone to the people of Newfoundland and Labrador, but which will instead go to subsidize American energy consumers. This is on top of the inadequate and unsecured employment and industrial development benefits from the project, coupled with the project's negative environmental impacts. A more disgusting illustration of this government's contemptible energy policy is difficult to imagine.

WORLD FOLKLORE FESTIVAL IN DRUMMONDVILLE

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, "The world at your door" will be the theme for the Ninth World Folklore Festival in Drummondville, from July 6 to July 16.

Some thirty folk dance groups from five continents will bring you the magic of song, music, dance and folklore of various nations.

Fifteen hundred participants from Canada, the United States, France, Brazil and countries as far away as Israel, Cameroon and Russia, will amaze you with their performances of traditional dances, full of charm, beauty and feeling.

More than 1,800 volunteers are working very hard to make this cultural festival the best ever. Last year, we had 750,000 visitors, and the festival was proclaimed "tourism event of the year" in Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, I invite all my colleagues and all Canadians to attend this international festival.

The warmth, energy and enthusiasm of the people of Drummondville, together with the spectacular program offered during this ten-day festival, will make your visit unforgettable.

KOREAN WAR

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, June 25 marks the fortieth anniversary of the beginning of the Korean War.

Between June, 1950, and July, 1953, a total of 26,791 Canadians volunteered their services under the United Nations Charter. Five hundred and sixteen lost their lives and more than 1,000 were wounded. The United Nations intervention in Korea was a move of outstanding historical significance. For the first time, an international organization with a multinational force had intervened effectively to stem aggression.

To date, our Korean veterans have received two medals from the United Nations and the Commonwealth. Their service has yet to be officially recognized by the Canadian government.

It is time that the Canadian government gave recognition to the generosity of spirit that inspired young men and women to risk their lives in the name of peace, freedom and security.

The striking of a distinctive Canadian Volunteer Korean Service Medal would be applauded by all Korean War veterans.

Let us take a moment, on June 25, to remember their great contribution.

NATIONAL ACCESS AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. Ken James (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, this is National Access Awareness Week, a time to focus national attention on the contributions and concerns of Canadians with disabilities. The spirit engendered by this week is clearly intended to last all year round. Canadians across the country are invited to commit themselves ever more deeply to the full integration of people with disabilities in the life of our society.

This year we are privileged to have the generous sponsorship of nine corporate partners; Bell Canada, Cadillac Fairview Corporation, Canadian National, Esso Petroleum Canada, Ford Motor Company of Canada Ltd., IBM Canada, McDonald's Restaurants of Canada Ltd., Royal Bank and Sears Canada Inc. Each of these corporate sponsors is committed to promotion of employment equity, full and equal access to goods and services for all Canadians and the accurate portrayal of persons with disabilities in advertising and communications.

The active involvement of the private sector at the provincial and local level is fast becoming a tradition during National Access Awareness Week. It clearly reminds us that this week was indeed founded on the principle of partnership among Canadians from every sector of society.

Let us use this occasion to thank this year's corporate sponsors who are promoting the ideals of a barrier-free Canada in every practical way.

NATIONAL ACCESS AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in the House to pay tribute to the dedication of all Canadians who throughout the year help 3.5 million disabled persons in Canada to be participating members of our society.

Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to mention the continuing dedication of agencies and volunteers in my riding, such as the Association de la rose bleue, Les Amis de Repentigny, the Richelieu Club and the Lions Club, to name only a few.

This kind of commitment, which should be an inspiration to us all, receives special attention during National Access Awareness Week, from June 10 to June 16.

The purpose of National Access Awareness Week is to make significant changes in the daily lives of all people who have a disability and to assess the progress achieved during the past year.

And, above all, this week should be an opportunity for reflecting on what remains to be done.

CORPORATE TAXATION

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, the first nominee for the corporate welfare bum of the week is Trilon Financial. It received a tax credit of $17 million on profits of $218 million in 1988.

The second nominee is Steinberg. In a statement released yesterday the company bragged of how it managed to avoid paying hundreds of millions of dollars in capital gains tax. It used something called a "butterfly" transaction to float away with taxes from the federal treasury. It floats like a butterfly and stings Canadians like a bee.

The third nominee is the Great Lakes Group which paid only $1.9 million on profits of $96 million in 1988.

The envelope, please. And the winner is Trilon Financial. Like many other financial companies, Trilon has benefited from tax breaks that allow holding companies to avoid income taxes. For paper shuffling its way out of paying its fair share, Trilon Financial is the corporate welfare bum of this week.

ROMANIA

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to talk about the situation in Romania. We heard overnight news reports that the Romanian government has moved into University Square and cleared out the demonstrators.

When I and other members of this House had an opportunity to speak with these demonstrators we found they were not the vagabonds described by president-elect Ion Iliescu but Romanians concerned about their future and concerned about the democratic life they were trying to achieve.

We have just heard from the Secretary of State for External Affairs that he is prepared to allow the Candu project to continue despite the fact there are numerous human rights violations by the Romanian government. The verdict is still out on that government and we call upon the Canadian government to hold a public inquiry to investigate conditions in that country so that we do not end up being responsible for another Chernobyl.

ADVERTISEMENT IN MEDIA

Mr. Denis Pronovost (Saint-Maurice): Mr. Speaker, this morning on page 31, the Journal de Montréal published an ad, in very poor taste, in connection with the Saint-Jean holiday in Quebec.

In the ad, readers of the Journal de Montréal are offered a T-shirt which shows a Quebecer walking and tearing up the Canadian flag.

Like many other Quebecers, I cannot condone advertising a T-shirt intended to arouse feelings of hatred and contempt in our two founding peoples. The Canadian flag also belongs to Quebecers.

Mr. Speaker, millions of Quebecers felt humiliated when residents of Brockville, Ontario, trod on the Quebec flag on September 6, 1989.

I am sure that today, most Quebecers will join me and members of this House in condemning this advertisement and asking the Journal de Montréal to withdraw the ad immediately.

Quebec is capable of celebrating its national holiday and parading its flag with respect, dignity and pride.

A Happy Saint-Jean to all Quebecers!

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, after six years in power, the government is finally listening to Canadians on the environment.

The green paper for public discussion is simplistic and outdated, but it is not discouraging Canadians from participating constructively in large numbers. Their message to the government is this: Act now. The water, air, soil and natural resources need urgent attention. Since the economy is built on the environment, stop treating the two as being separate. Government will be able to protect the environment and promote sustainable development only when departments and agencies adopt such a responsibility.

Canadians have high expectations. Their patience is wearing thin. Their ideas are well ahead of those in government. They are encouraged by the participation of the part-time Minister of the Environment. But does he realize that time is of the essence?

We urge him to meet public expectations by acting expeditiously and by ensuring an environmentally sustainable future for Canadians and the global community.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

THE SENATE

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister in the absence of the Prime Minister.

Since Monday, when the Prime Minister announced the appointment to the Senate of Stan Waters who was elected by the people of Alberta to represent their province in the Senate, the Prime Minister has said that he does not want any more such elected senators for at least five more years.

The Prime Minister can hardly expect Canadians to take him seriously when one day he says he is in favour of an elected Senate, and the next day he says he does not want any more such elected senators for at least five years.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister this: Does the Prime Minister have a commitment from all the provinces on this and, if so, exactly what is it?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the difference between this government and the government of which the Leader of the Opposition was a member, prior to 1984, is that we are taking Senate reform seriously. That government talked a great line, but did nothing.

As all hon. members know, for the first time in the history of Canada we have laid out an arrangement for comprehensive Senate reform which is based upon the fact that the Senate should be elected. It should have effective powers while retaining and preserving the principle of responsibility of the government to the House of Commons. As well, it should preserve the principle that the Senate would be more equitable in terms of its distribution, so that the less populated areas would have greater participation in the decision-making process in Canada. There is a time-frame that is laid out for that.

I think the hon. Leader of the Opposition should applaud the Prime Minister for clearly demonstrating his commitment to the principle of Senate reform and his clear commitment to the principle of an elected Senate.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I will certainly applaud the Deputy Prime Minister for the way he skated around and failed to give any direct answer whatsoever to my question.

Yesterday, speaking in the Alberta Legislature about that province's procedure for electing senators, Premier Don Getty said:

> I talked to the Prime Minister about this: Alberta has the legislation and Alberta will use that legislation whenever it sees fit. There has been no commitment to do anything else.

Is the Deputy Prime Minister saying today that the Prime Minister will not accept any senators chosen democratically through election by the people of any province, including the province of Alberta, for the next five years? Can he give us a clear and direct answer?

• (1420)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, that is a pretty hypothetical proposition that the hon. Leader of the Opposition puts forth.

I have the same press report that he has and it points out that Mr. Getty said he would use the Senate selection proposals when he sees fit to do so.

We have here an agreement that has been signed by all First Ministers which outlines a process. Mr. Getty is an honourable man and I suspect that he will honour that process.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like the Deputy Prime Minister to give some explanation. He seems to be saying that he and the federal government consider that Premier Getty has given a commitment not to put forward the names of any Senators elected by the people of Alberta during the next five years. Yet, Premier Getty has said in his legislature that he has made no such commitment.

I would like him to explain that contradiction.

[Translation]

Furthermore, what justification does the Deputy Prime Minister have for the fact that representatives elected by the people of a province such as Alberta would not be able to sit in the Senate for the next five years?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there is absolutely no contradiction.

The Prime Minister and the Premier of Alberta are very major architects in terms of the constitutional reform process that has been ongoing and particularly with respect to the program outlined for Senate reform. It is clearly outlined and I can assure the hon. member, if there are any differences of interpretation. the Prime Minister and the Premier will clearly iron that out.

I should also advise him that today there have been ongoing discussions and there will continue to be ongoing discussions. For the information of the hon. Leader of the Opposition, the Prime Minister called the new senator-elect, Senator Waters, and invited him to the Chamber. We look forward to his participation.

I think that in itself is the clearest recognition and the clearest acknowledgement of Senate reform. Certainly, it is much more progress than was made in the time when the hon. Leader of the Opposition was in government.

ROUTE CANADA

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of National Revenue.

Further to the ongoing tragedy of this terrible sale by CN Route to Route Canada and Route Canada Enterprises, records show that tax deductions at source were not remitted to Revenue Canada for over a 12-month period. We all know that, if this happened with any other business in Canada, Revenue Canada would have been on its doorstep and confiscated its assets to protect the taxpayers of the country.

I want to know from the Minister, through you, Mr. Speaker, why this particular company was given such special favoured treatment in the payment of trust funds by the employees. Why?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, as I have said before in the House, no such provisions were given to this company by Revenue Canada. Every effort was taken to obtain the funds due to that department. I can assure the hon. member and the House that the majority of the funds owing to the government of Canada have been recovered.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I direct my supplementary question to the same minister.

Yesterday, we talked about trust funds. I have here a letter dated June 17, 1986, from the then transport minister, which agrees with the sale and advises the President of CN to consider all of the employee rights and to be particularly cautious about the assets to be transferred in the sale.

There was an alleged concern about this transaction prior to June, 1986. There was an obvious lack of concern about the employees after June, 1986.

Will the minister assure the House that the capital assets of the directors of the company who are personally responsible, Messrs Fingold, Cole, and Ruhland, be garnisheed or seized to protect the taxpayers and the employees?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that my hon. colleague raised the alleged letter. This gives me an opportunity to offer to table the letter and put it on the public record.

The first paragraph of the letter which was omitted from the sensationalist article in The Toronto Star says: "You may recall that while concurring with the decision of the CN Board of Directors to sell CN Route—". That is what is left out of the article, and that is what my hon. friend has not referred to. But it is clearly the case that it was CN that decided to sell Route Canada.

As to my hon. friend's question, he knows very well that it is the duty of the bankruptcy proceedings to follow through and decide if things were handled properly. Also as my hon. friend knows, there is an RCMP investigation going forward according to the media. Surely, that is the place for criminal proceedings to commence or for other charges or action to be taken by the Registrar in Bankruptcy through the bankruptcy court proceedings.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

So far, the government has not given a precise indication of what is intended to be put before the House as a result of the First Ministers' Conference last week. I want to remind the Deputy Prime Minister that this party cannot be expected to give its full support until we have seen such precise wording.

Can the Deputy Prime Minister confirm that there is still some problem about the wording of the companion constitutional amendment, and whether his government is committed and is prepared to say today that it will ensure that the companion constitutional amendments will come forward as outlined in a communiqué from the First Ministers?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Yes, Mr. Speaker, I can confirm that.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, that is a short answer. I take it as a commitment of the government, and we will be holding it accountable. Perhaps if we got more short answers which actually came to the point, we might get further in Question Period.

The agreement from last week's First Ministers' Conference states that, in the 1990 Constitutional Conference, the wording of the Canada clause will be considered.

Owing to the exclusion of aboriginal people last weekend from all the talks concerning the Constitution and again seeing aboriginal people standing on the outside, can the Deputy Prime Minister commit on behalf of his government that aboriginal people will be full participants at the table with a voice when the 1990 Constitutional Conference which is going to discuss the Canada clause is held?

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Madam Speaker, I am sure the hon. members of the House know that ministers of the government—the Minister of Justice, the minister responsible for intergovernmental affairs and the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development—have met regularly with aboriginal leadership over the past several months leading up to the important and historic discussions of last week.

There were regular consultations with the leadership of the aboriginal peoples involving government officials last week. I, myself, and other ministers will be meeting again tomorrow with the leadership of the four representative national groups in Ottawa.

I can assure the hon. member that these discussions will be ongoing. If the hon. member would refer to the wording of the actual agreement signed last Saturday evening, she would understand that First Ministers' constitutional conferences on aboriginal issues are to be held once every three years. The first is to be held within one year of proclamation, and the representatives of aboriginal people and the territorial governments are to be invited to participate in these conferences.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, the answer of the Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development begs to be like the answer from the Deputy Prime Minister which is short and to the point.

I am not talking about the constitutional conferences that are referred to in the agreement. I am very familiar with the agreement.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister commit on behalf of his government two things: first, that the federal government has a policy of supporting aboriginal people being designated a fundamental characteristic of Canada in the Canada clause and that that is the government' negotiating position; and second, that aboriginal people will be a participant and have a voice at the constitutional conference which discusses the Canada clause?

• (1430)

Hon. Thomas Siddon (Minister of Indian Affairs and Northern Development): Mr. Speaker, I think I am capable of answering the question.

The agreement reached last Saturday evening provides, under clause 4(2), for a process to define and develop language relating to constitutional recognitions. This process will focus on a recognition of the fundamental characteristics of Canada, beginning with the fundamental role of the aboriginal people in the establishment and foundation of our country, that of our two founding linguistic groups and our multicultural communities.

The hon. members of the NDP know that aboriginal people will be invited to appear before special hearings to be commenced July 16 by a special committee of the House of Commons in which they will participate. They will have a full and complete role in the development of this language on constitutional recognition.

ROUTE CANADA

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. We know that the government was actively involved in the transfer and sale of Route Canada and we know from the letter to which the minister referred that the government was to be kept fully apprised of developments.

Would the minister please advise whether the government was aware that Route Canada intended the real estate split?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to refer once again to the letter which was typed May 26 and dated June 17.

My hon. friend will know full well from the documents which were released through Access to Information that the agreement of purchase and sale was dated April 4, 1986. Any documentation thereafter was to expedite the sale.

The words that are used in the letter are "the consummation of the sale". Therefore, anything that the government did thereafter was at the request of CN and CN's lawyers in an effort to consummate the sale.

What my hon. friend refers to was not part of what was referred to the government for expedition.

Mr. George S. Rideout (Moncton): Mr. Speaker, my question was very simple. It was just whether the government was aware of the intended real estate split prior to the deal being concluded. Obviously, the government does not want to answer.

We know the government was actively involved in the transaction and tried to protect itself by putting in a useless good faith clause, purportedly trying to keep the company operating for three years. We know that there wasn't any good faith in the deal and that Ruhland stripped the company of its assets.

Why would the government not, at the very least, put in an iron clad guarantee for the workers?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this takes me back to a former Liberal cabinet minister who gave all sorts of iron clad guarantees that were not worth the paper they were written on. There is no way you could put in an iron clad guarantee. My hon. friend knows that. A best efforts undertaking is the normal undertaking used in legal transactions. The best efforts of CN were used.

With reference to the question of the real estate split, the government was not involved in the sale in that way. It was involved in any policy matters. Therefore, the answer is no.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister for International Trade, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. The president of Fruehauf Canada has now announced he is closing the Brantford, Ontario, trailer plant because of the free trade deal, high interest rates and deregulation in the trucking industry.

What plans does the minister have to save these 334 jobs, many of which are in my riding?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, first I would like to say that what my friend said about free trade is wrong. We still have tariffs of 12 per cent. They were at 15 and they are now still at 12 per cent. The problems at Fruehauf have nothing to do with the free trade agreement. There are many factors which are involved, particularly the fact that the competition is very strong in that sector and they have to compete with the United States and many other companies.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration and myself are working very closely with all the programs in her department to help those workers.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, maybe the minister should talk to the president of Fruehauf Canada who said yesterday that it was specifically related to the Canada–U.S. free trade deal.

Given the minister's unwillingness to do anything to save these jobs, will the minister at least keep his government's promise of the last election to bring in these special adjustment programs that are supposedly set up to help these workers?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I want to repeat again that with tariffs of 12 per cent this problem has nothing to do with the free trade agreement.

Second, there is a bill on the other side of my friend's wall that has been stalled by the Senate for many, many months. If the member wants to do something to help his people he should ask the senators to pass the bill, please.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to members' attention the presence in the gallery of Mme Adriana Munoz, member of the Chilean Parliament and Leader of the Chilean Socialist Party.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister, responding on behalf of the Prime Minister. It is a follow-up to a question asked by my leader a few minutes ago on the Canada clause.

As we all know in this House, under the agreement in the communiqué issued last Saturday there will be participation of aboriginal people during the aboriginal round at the table of the FMC, but can the Deputy Prime Minister give a commitment today that aboriginal people will be participating at the table at the First Ministers' Conference in Vancouver later on this fall when the First Ministers are discussing the Canada clause as it pertains to the aboriginal people in Canada? That is the commitment we want from the Prime Minister.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows that there is a clear process outlined with respect to bringing about a better consensus and understanding with respect to the so-called Canada clause.

As is indicated in the preamble, the Prime Minister and premiers reviewed various drafts which were submitted by the federal government, the Manitoba government, the Saskatchewan government, the Ontario government and the British Columbia government, and it was undertaken that all of these drafts would be submitted to the committee for further consideration.

The hon. member raises an interesting point but it would seem to me that his suggestion might be somewhat premature having regard for the fact that this work will probably be ongoing at that particular time. We will certainly take that suggestion into consideration and obviously I will convey his interest in that regard to the Prime Minister.

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, on a supplementary question. Surely the Deputy Prime Minister recognizes that it is up to the Prime Minister to show leadership at this very critical time when aboriginal peoples are feeling a sense of exclusion as a result of the last process that took place.

Does the Deputy Prime Minister not recognize that in view of the fact that an essential component of the Canada clause is the recognition of aboriginal peoples as distinct societies with distinct cultures and languages in this country, it is fundamentally unacceptable for First Ministers to sit around the table and discuss that issue without the participation of aboriginal peoples? Will he not include aboriginal peoples at the table at the First Ministers' Conference in December?

• (1440)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to undermine the good intentions of the hon. member, but I think that what he is proposing here is a short-circuiting of the process that has been laid out.

He talks about leadership. There never has been more outstanding leadership in this regard than that which has been displayed by the Prime Minister.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mazankowski: The hon. member should know as well that there has been agreement reached as to a process which I think he should allow to take its normal course of action. Why would he want to interfere with that and subvert a process which has been agreed to by all First Ministers?

GUN CONTROL

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice. When the minister visited the Montreal Ecole Polytechnique in April, the students presented her with 25 boxes of petitions with over 500,000 signatures requesting more effective gun controls. On that occasion the minister promised to table a bill in this House before the end of May.

It is now June 13, with only four more days before the summer recess, and there is still no such bill.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

An hon. member: That's not what J.R. told us.

Mr. Allmand: Five days, six days.

Mr. McKnight: Warren for House Leader.

Mr. Allmand: Mr. Speaker, when will the minister present this bill? Will she keep her promise and do so before the summer recess?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for his question and I thank him for giving me an opportunity to point out that as a result of my visit with the students at Ecole Polytechnique I was able to bring back, from their report, other issues which I have asked the Department of Justice to review and which will be included in the package which I want to present to the House.

I never made a commitment to have something in the House before the end of May. I may have said that I would hope to have it by the end of May. The commitment that I made was to have it in the House before the end of this session. I hope the hon. member will not suggest that anything precipitous be done in order to prematurely foreshorten the session and make it difficult for me to meet my commitment.

Hon. Warren Allmand (Notre-Dame-de-Grâce): Mr. Speaker, the students understood the minister's promise to be to present a bill before the summer recess, whenever that will be.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Allmand: Let's stick to the principal issue. On June 5, the Canadian Federation of Municipalities endorsed a plea by the city of Montreal to ban all semi-automatic combat weapons. The minister knows that the Ruger semi-automatic used to to kill the 14 young women at the University of Montreal could fire up to 50 rounds of ammunition and is in fact used by several police SWAT teams.

Will the minister respond to this serious and reasonable request and make a commitment to ban that type of weapon? Will she put that in the legislation that she tables?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. member is in fact misquoting the resolution by the Federation of Canadian Municipalities which I think was directed to military and paramilitary type weapons. But those issues will be addressed in the package that I am bringing before the House.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The minister's monetary policy is having a disastrous impact on the economy of Quebec, which is on the verge of a recession, according to François Dupuis, of the Mouvement Desjardins. When will the Minister of Finance revise his monetary policy and reduce interest rates?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we review the monetary policy on an ongoing basis. I had a meeting with the Deputy Governor of the Bank of Canada on Monday. I had a meeting with the Governor the previous week. This is something we do on an ongoing basis.

I have made very clear in this House the basis on which we are following monetary policy. We are concerned about the inflationary pressures which are undermining the competitive position of our economy. If we do not get these inflationary pressures under control, companies are going to lose business which will cause a loss of jobs on an ongoing basis. It is this that is driving the monetary policy of the Government of Canada.

As soon as we can see some pressure subsidizing, yes, we will see interest rates decline. Until that time, we must continue to follow the policy that we have been following.

[Translation]

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the same minister. In the past twelve months, 51,000 manufacturing jobs were lost in Quebec because of the disastrous policies of the Minister of Finance. When will the minister finally start listening to the Premier of Quebec, the Conseil du patronat, the Quebec Minister of Finance and all economic partners in Quebec who are asking the minister to reduce interest rates before it is too late for Quebec's economy?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the Liberal Party of Canada, the New Democratic Party of Canada, and the premiers have been calling upon us to reduce interest rates for almost two years now, but consider what would have happened had we taken that advice in the summer of 1988 or even the summer of 1989. We would have had a rip-roaring inflation problem today that would be doing lasting damage to the competitive position of our economy.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I hear some disagreement from the members opposite. Let me ask the members opposite to consider the fact that the unit labour costs of Canada at the start of 1989 were increasing at a rate of 4.9 per cent. At the end of 1989 they were increasing at a rate of 6.9 per cent. At the same time unit labour costs in the United States were increasing at 4.9 per cent throughout the year.

That is the measure of the loss of competitive position. That is the measure of the loss of jobs that we will encounter if we do not get these inflationary pressures under control.

ROUTE CANADA

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

The government has consistently been attempting to place itself at arm's length from the decision to sell off CN Route to the private sector. In fact on June 4 the Minister of Transport said: "It was sold on an arm's length transaction with advice coming to the government from CN as to the best offer".

The sentence in the letter which the minister quoted from earlier today, which he did not complete, goes on to say: "The ministerial task force on privatization asked for some additional information on severance provisions and other employment and service considerations and on the value of land to be transferred to the purchaser by virtue of the sale."

If this was only a one-way situation, that CN was only providing advice, why was the Government of Canada, the Minister of Transport of the day, asking for specific information if it was not for the purposes of modifying the sale agreement which although agreed to had not been finalized at that point in time?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I indicated earlier, the sale agreement was executed on April 4, 1986 and the sale was consummated on December 6, 1986. Between those times it was necessary for the government, in order to complete the sale, to go through certain matters and certain Orders in Council as requested by CN.

I refer my friend back to the letter which says: "while concurring with the decision of the CN board of directors to sell CN Route".

I refer him also to the letter from Canadian National to The Toronto Star dated June 7, 1990, which has been tabled. It says: "CN and no one else decided to sell its subsidiary."

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): I have a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

I think it is obvious to everyone that the Government of Canada has a policy of privatization. Whether it is a particular Crown corporation or the government itself that initiates the process is irrelevant.

It is clear from the minister's answers that this government had the opportunity to ensure full protection of the employees and full protection for the taxpayers of Canada, and it failed to meet its obligation.

Will the Minister of Transport now table in this House the actual sale agreement so we can see once and for all what was in there, what protection if any the government demanded and got for the taxpayers and for the workers?

• (1450)

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would quote once again from the letter from CN to The Toronto Star: "Our alternative to the sale was to close down CN Route and lay off all staff in 1985."

Obviously this was a better deal for the employees than closing down and closing the door. The government left the sale in the hands of CN because it was a subsidiary of CN. For that reason it was the decision of the board of directors of CN to sell the company, not of the government.

RAIL TRANSPORT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. In 1987, CN unlawfully closed the Franquet-Chapais branch line in Abitibi to railway traffic, thus contravening the decision of the Canadian Transport Commission which obliged CN to keep the line in service. On January 31, the National Transportation Agency ordered CN to maintain service on the branch line and to put the line back into service by July 31.

Mr. Speaker, will the minister ask CN management to observe the NTA's decision so that there will be regular service by July 31? If they do not, I think CN management in Montreal should be thrown in jail for civil disobedience, to get them off our backs!

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, CN has given me the assurance that the line will be opened on time, in accordance with the NTA order.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans who will be aware that inshore fishermen and plant workers in Newfoundland are in need of quite immediate financial help.

The minister is aware that the winter fishery of the south west coast of Newfoundland was a disaster. He will know that the inshore fishery in Fortune Bay, in Placentia Bay, and off the Port au Port Peninsula is a complete failure. He must know that he must act on a separate aid package for those people.

Will he agree to act quite soon to help end some of the pain, suffering, and frustration these people are going through these days?

Hon. Bernard Valcourt (Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, it is quite significant that the members of the Liberal Party who were in government for so long in this country prior to 1984 were never able to put in place measures in Atlantic Canada to address the needs that people of Newfoundland and Labrador are experiencing right now.

We have put in place this fisheries adjustment package. Part of this package is a plant workers' adjustment program for plant workers and trawlermen. We have also indicated that through consultation and inviting the unions, the fishermen, the workers, the provinces, the companies, and the inshore sector to work together we will design a program to take care of the future. Unfortunately I cannot rewrite the past. Right now we have programs in place.

My colleague, the Minister of Employment and Immigration, has a host of programs which she is trying to deliver in Newfoundland in order to come to grips with the problems it is experiencing. We have to do more than just take care of tomorrow. We have to look at the future, and that is what we intend to do.

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, I agree that the minister does a fairly clumsy job of rewriting the past. The problem we are facing now is due to the French, Spanish and Portuguese overfishing which was not going on when this side was in power. There was no overfishing until 1985, none.

I ask the minister to stop playing politics with the issue and to recognize that those people are hurting. They are hurting now and they are looking to him to deliver on the promises he made soon after he became minister.

Will he be a man of his word and give those inshore fishermen and plant workers something to buy their groceries with, not some more rhetoric and cheap talk?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, we have worked very hard on this long-term package that is going to be very beneficial to all areas of Newfoundland.

I should point out as well that we are aware there is a very specific problem in the area that the member is discussing. Within the program and within the context of Bill C-21, there are some things that we can do that will be of great assistance to the people in that area. I would urge the member to assist us in getting those things ready so we can do it.

TRADE

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister for International Trade, I will direct my question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs who said a couple of days ago in this House that the Minister for International Trade gave notice to the Americans that he wanted to renegotiate the memorandum of understanding concerning the surtax on softwood lumber.

The next meeting is scheduled for October. The sawmill industry cannot wait that long. Will the minister undertake here and now to issue the cancellation notice to terminate this unfair surtax which is crippling the softwood lumber industry?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member understands that the situation is a little more complex than a unilateral order issued by one level of government in Canada on a matter that has both international and interprovincial implications.

I indicated that we have served notice of our intention to the Government of the United States. I also indicated the other day that we are in discussion with the relevant provinces and with the industry to try to set this situation right as quickly as we can.

Mr. Réginald Bélair (Cochrane—Superior): Mr. Speaker, since July of last year the Minister of Forestry has indicated that the government was gathering evidence in order to cancel the memorandum. There is a stipulation in that memo that if there are many changes it will be renegotiated. The changes have occurred: high interest rates, high Canadian dollar, and exports are down to nil.

When will the government finally do something for the industry?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member, with a little more time in the House, will recognize that overstating a case does not make up for not having one.

DIEFENBAKER CENTRE

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Yesterday the University of Saskatchewan sent out layoff notices to employees of the Diefenbaker Centre and announced that the centre's doors would be closed on June 30.

The people of Saskatchewan are angry and dismayed that this government would force this kind of action because last week in this House the Minister of Communications told my colleague from Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing that the funding would be in place.

Is the Deputy Prime Minister in a position now to announce firm funding for the Diefenbaker Centre, or is it the government's intention to close down the centre deliberately?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I can advise the hon. member that there are still some details that are being worked out with the Government of Saskatchewan with respect to the establishment of a foundation.

I can assure the hon. member that the centre will not close. We will be able to provide the University of Saskatchewan with the necessary comfort to keep the Diefenbaker Centre open. I am sure that will be welcome news to the hon. member and all hon. members in the House.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, we have been hearing that answer for the last four months. The uncertainty in funding is an indication of the kind of incompetence that this government is showing across the country. It is disrupting the business operation of the University of Saskatchewan.

Why is the government insisting on this crisis orientation as far as funding of the Diefenbaker Centre is concerned? The same thing happened four years ago.

Does the government intend the centre to be well used by the scholars, the universities, and the people of Saskatchewan? Or, is it intending to make it a marginal operation at the University of Saskatchewan?

• (1500)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know, if he is not aware, that this is a unique request inasmuch as the university owns the assets of the Diefenbaker estate rather than the government.

I can tell the hon. member that has made the issue somewhat more complex. We have been able to work these details out and the final details are still being refined. As I indicated to the hon. member, I can assure him that the institution will remain open and we will provide the necessary comfort to the University of Saskatchewan for that purpose.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. Yesterday, the minister said that the so–called consumer information office for the GST would provide information on the GST according to product type or industry, while the new director of the office, Mr. Murray, said the exact opposite, stating that he would provide information on individual products and companies. Who is telling the truth?

Speaker's Ruling

[English]

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, allow me to respond.

There is no contradictory position on the part of the minister or Mr. Murray, the head of the Consumers' Association of Canada who, by the way, consumers right across Canada should be delighted to have as the individual heading this very important agency for the protection of the consumer.

I can assure the hon. member and this House that every step will be taken by the unit to make certain that all consumers in Canada will benefit not only from the market forces which will automatically, in general terms, allow the passage of the reduction of the cost to the consumer, but through the provision of information to the consumer as well.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, why does the government insist on making consumers believe that the new GST consumer information office will be able to monitor the implementation of the GST when last month, Mr. Murray, the new chairman of the office, questioned the value of such a monitoring agency because the information would be too general to identify abuses. Why does the minister not admit that this new consumer information office is just a PR job for the GST?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, that is the normal type of negative nonsense that comes from that side of the House.

Obviously, if Mr. Murray did not support the initiative of this government he would not have accepted the job as head of this agency. Can that hon. member not get it through his thick head that this is for the benefit of consumers and had we gone the route of the Liberals or the NDP the consumer would suffer as a result?

The steps taken by this government were to look at the options available to us; either sticking with the status quo or going the route that the Liberals probably would favour, which is to create a great big bureaucracy for a six-month period and initiate something like wage and price controls, which we oppose by the way. We have gone the moderate route to allow the market system to operate, along with the information office.

POINT OF ORDER

TABLING OF DOCUMENT

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in keeping with the undertaking I made during Question Period, I wish to table herewith a letter from the Hon. Don Mazankowski to Doctor J. Maurice LeClair, Chairman and Chief Executive, Canadian National Railway. The letter was typed May 23, 1986 and dispatched June 17, 1986.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. I am pleased the minister has tabled that letter. Would he now table the sale agreement?

PRIVILEGE

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Speaker: On Thursday, March 8, 1990, the hon. member for Skeena rose on a question of privilege to bring to our attention certain actions by the Department of National Defence which in the hon. member's opinion breached his rights and those of all members of the House.

In order to place this matter before the House, the hon. member referred to and quoted extensively from several confidential documents of a sensitive nature. He agreed to provide copies of the documents in reference to the Chair, to the hon. government House leader and to the House leader of the Official Opposition. The recipients of these documents agreed to respect their confidentiality and the Chair undertook to review the documents, to be in contact with the three parties and to return to the House on this matter at an appropriate time. On March 27, 1990, the hon. member for Skeena wrote to the Chair to provide further relevant information. On May 3, 1990, in response to the hon. member for Skeena's inquiry, I reported that discussions on this matter were proceeding.

[Translation]

The Chair is placed in a rather awkward position in a situation such as this. Serious allegations have been made publicly on the floor of the House respecting breaches of members' privileges, yet the documents on which the allegations are based cannot be made public.

The Chair had hoped to reach a negotiated solution to these difficulties and to inform the House of the terms of that solution, but that was not possible. Accordingly, the Chair will attempt to deal with the matter in the customary fashion, bearing in mind, however, the constraints imposed on this case by confidentiality and the sensitive nature of the material under consideration.

[English]

It is part of the public record that the hon. member's claim relates to the investigation of a Department of National Defence scientist by the name of Dr. Mendoza, and that the Human Rights Commission of Canada is seized with those aspects of the matter pertaining to the human rights of Dr. Mendoza.

The hon. member for Skeena set out his claim in three points. He indicated first, that the matter involved his rights as an individual member of Parliament because the investigation extended to telephone calls to his office and his Prince Rupert constituency office. In the second and third instances, the hon. member maintained that the rights of all members of the House were affected because documents pertaining to the investigation suggested:

> —that Canadian law be violated—by the Minister of National Defence during Question Period—

And:

> —revealed a view by the Department of National Defence that "the House" should not be advised of the specifics of these investigations.

I should like to deal with these latter two points immediately.

In support of these points, the hon. member for Skeena read into the record, and I refer to Hansard, page 8965, parts of what he termed, "the key document, Department of National Defence file number PSIF 438 558 462, Record of Conversation".

There are four minutes in that particular document and two attachments to it. As the hon. member has already read three of the minutes and one of the attachments into the record, I think it important to record the fourth and final item. It reads as follows:

> 4. In the end I suggested to—

At this point, the name of whoever it was the author is suggesting "to" is blanked out. It goes on:

> —that we at least wait for the question. The draft responses (not used) are attached.

One of these draft responses was that which was read into the record by the hon. member for Skeena as recorded at page 8966 of Hansard.

In his intervention in the discussion of this question of privilege on March 8 last, the hon. government House leader stated in relation to the "key document" the hon. member for Skeena referred to:

> —he seems to have a document which describes potential strategy being worked out by some officials that might be deployed by the Minister of National Defence in terms of dealing with a particular political issue. But as I heard the Hon. Member, as they devise strategy they seem to be saying that unfortunately this strategy would involve violating the law. You are able to conclude from that, if you choose, that they went ahead anyway. If there is evidence to support that I would like to hear it. Or, you can conclude that they have sat down, worked out a strategy and found that unfortunately they could not proceed with it because it violates the law—

Having had the opportunity to thoroughly review and discuss all the documents presented to the Chair, and having reviewed in its entirety "the key document", on which the hon. member for Skeena placed so much reliance in developing his second and third points, the Chair cannot find that a prima facie case of privilege has been made out in this respect and accordingly I must, with respect, dismiss the second and third points of the hon. member's claim.

• (1510)

I should like now to turn to the first point the hon. member for Skeena set out in his claim, that is, that his privilege as an individual member had been breached because the investigation extended to, in his words, "accessing of calls made to my offices". In the evidence that the hon. member put on the record on March 8, 1990, it was clear that:

1) the Special Investigations Unit of National Defence attempted and apparently succeeded in obtaining the hon. member's phone numbers, both in Ottawa and in his constituency; and,

2) a search warrant was issued by Judge Leven in Calgary Provincial Court to search Alberta government telephone offices at Calgary for records of long distance phone calls charged to Dr. Mendoza's residence phone. The warrant was executed.

[Translation]

I think the Chair might be permitted to take judicial notice of the fact that the hon. member's telephone numbers are not closely held. In fact, he lists nine telephone numbers, plus two fax numbers and two Zenith numbers on his official letterhead. That being the case, it could hardly be seriously contended that ascertaining the hon. member's telephone numbers involved any type of clandestine operation or any breach of confidentiality or privilege.

[English]

As to the search warrant, it would not appear that the execution of the warrant involved any intrusion into, or interference with, the office or records of the hon. member. It would appear that the investigators simply obtained the telephone numbers of the hon. member which are public knowledge and attempted to match these with the legally obtained record of long distance calls made from Dr. Mendoza's residence. The only information which could be thus obtained was whether or not a call had been placed to the hon. member's office.

As the Chair understands the matter, neither the identity of the parties to any calls, nor the nature or content of any calls would be thus revealed. In these circumstances, the Chair cannot conclude that the hon. member's privileges have been interfered with and accordingly, cannot conclude that a prima facie case of privilege has been made out.

It may be that the hon. member wishes to challenge the information upon which the search warrant was based. In that case, there is a mechanism in the court system for do doing. The Judiciary and Parliament are carefully segregated under our constitution and this House and, in particular, the Chair, cannot sit in review or appeal of the decisions of any court in the land.

In concluding his remarks on this issue on March 8, the hon. member for Skeena said: "When one takes the time to look at the documents that I now have, in sum, one can see that there is something going on that is violating the rights of the members of this House".

[Translation]

The Chair wants to assure the hon. member that the Chair takes this matter very seriously indeed. The Chair has listened with great care to the hon. member, has exhaustively reviewed the documents presented by the hon. member and held discussions with representatives of all parties on this issue prior to deciding that no prima facie case of privilege has been made out in this instance.

[English]

It may be that the hon. member could, by the presentation of a cogent argument supported by evidence of true probative value, establish a prima facie case of privilege based on the pattern of events at issue here. The Chair does not preclude that possibility. In deciding as I have, the Chair only signals that such a case has not been successfully made and accordingly, the matter cannot be afforded privileged treatment. In referring to the hon. member's comments of the case, in sum, I repeat, the Chair has taken very serious consideration of the entire situation.

I thank all hon. members for their co–operation and patience in respect of this important matter.

ORDER IN COUNCIL APPOINTMENTS

TABLING OF APPOINTMENTS AND REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEES

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table, in both official languages, a number of Order in Council appointments which were made by the government.

Pursuant to the provisions of Standing Order 110(1), these are deemed referred to the appropriate standing committees, a list of which is attached.

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

BILL C-44—REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Bob Corbett (Fundy—Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-44, an act respecting the Hibernia Development Project and to amend certain acts in relation thereto, with amendments.

[Translation]

JUSTICE AND SOLICITOR GENERAL—TABLING OF SECOND REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table the second report of the Standing Committee on Justice and Solicitor General, in both official languages.

[English]

ENVIRONMENT—THIRD REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. David MacDonald (Rosedale): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the third report of the Standing Committee on the Environment, the first part of our Changing Atmosphere series.

I want to emphasize that this report comes at a very key time with respect to the meetings in London shortly, which will be renegotiating the Montreal protocol on the ozone layer.

In our view, we must act urgently to deal with the CFC problem. If all the CFCs presently in existence were to be released into the ozone layer, it would likely be so badly damaged that it would be destroyed. We must take action now. This report is an attempt to set out a framework and a way in which we can find suitable substitutes and act together. Without an international action with respect to the threat to the ozone layer and to the atmosphere of our planet, we are indeed in great jeopardy.

BILL C-37—REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Fernand Jourdenais (La Prairie): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-37, an act to establish the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute, with amendment and in both official languages.

FINANCE—NINTH REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. René Soetens (Ontario): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the ninth report of the Standing Committee on Finance.

During the hearings on the goods and services tax, the finance committee received many submissions that the government ought to review its expenditures. The finance committee struck a subcommittee to allow those who had that opinion to further elaborate. This report deals with that subcommittee.

I might add that I find that, as members of Parliament, we have some responsibility to further educate our constituents as to how we, the Government of Canada, spend their taxes.

BILL C-55—REPORT OF LEGISLATIVE COMMITTEE

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present, in both official languages, the report of the legislative committee on Bill C-55, an act to amend the Customs Act, without amendment.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to present a petition signed by a number of Canadians from Newfoundland. The petition was received by the hon. member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception.

These Canadians object to the government's proposed GST which they consider unfair, and your petitioners call upon this Parliament to reject the tax.

[English]

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHT TRAINING

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and pleasure to present a petition from some 2,484 persons living in many different parts of Canada who are concerned about the government's policy of low-level flight training in Labrador.

The petitioners ask Parliament to join with the Assembly of First Nations, the Innu of Labrador, and other aboriginal peoples of northern Canada, in opposing the use of their lands for NATO-NORAD attack training.

They ask Parliament to oppose establishment of NATO operations in Canada and to demand that the Canadian government end all NATO-NORAD low-level flight training in Canada and to redirect Canada's NATO-NORAD funding toward enabling Canada's aboriginal peoples to regain control of their lands and livelihood toward promoting sustainable development for all Canadians.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition signed by 1,145 people from many parts of Canada who are concerned with the government's policy against VIA Rail.

The petitioners ask Parliament to reject any proposed reduction and elimination of VIA Rail service, to modernize existing equipment so that VIA Rail can provide a world-class service to Canadians, and to build a high speed passenger train between Montreal and Windsor.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition signed by some 3,590 Canadians from all parts of the country who are concerned with one particular aspect of the government's goods and services tax.

The petitioners point out that since Confederation, and without hiatus, it has been the policy to apply zero rate of tax to magazines, books, and newspapers, but now the government proposes to include them in the goods and services tax. Because they believe that uninhibited dissemination of the printed word, as a corner-stone of democracy, culture, education and a literate, productive society, would be negatively affected by this application of the GST, they therefore call upon Parliament to reaffirm the historic principles embodied in the tax-free status of the printed word by retaining the zero rate in the GST legislation and regulations.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I, too, have the honour to present a petition that describes the proposed goods and services tax of the finance minister as an unfair form of taxation because of its lack of regard for a taxpayer's ability to pay.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax, to reform the taxation system so there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations, and to ensure that, if and when there is a broad public consensus on a sales tax measure to replace the manufacturers' sales tax, this reform will not be an opportunity for the government to impose a massive tax grab.

Mr. Stan J. Hovdebo (Saskatoon—Humboldt): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and duty to present, on behalf of a number of citizens of Nova Scotia and Ontario, petitions which point out that the government's taxation system is unfair, that changes to it in the form of goods and services tax just exacerbate the unfairness, and that the government should reject that proposal and go back to the reform of the tax system from the basic principles.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to present a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, signed by many constituents from my riding of Victoria who oppose the goods and services tax, call on the Parliament of Canada to reject it, and call for a proper reform of the tax system so that it is fair.

I have the honour of presenting this petition on behalf of my constituents.

VICTORIA HARBOUR

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I also present a petition opposing vigorously the visits of nuclear vessels to the harbour of Victoria.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition which has been signed by approximately 500 residents of my constituency of Essex—Windsor, and adjoining constituencies, calling upon Parliament to address the goods and services tax in a different approach than that which has been taken.

The petitioners suggest that the government has not addressed the unfair tax system that is currently in place which permits wealthy individuals and corporations to pay little or no federal tax while forcing low and middle-income taxpayers to bear more of the national tax burden.

The petitioners are also very concerned about the attempt to tax reading, haircuts, diapers, coffins, and home heating fuels, and they suggest very strongly that the goods and services tax should be withdrawn by the government.

INCOME TAX ACT

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I have a petition on a totally different topic. It is a petition organized by two Yorkton mechanics, Allan Pilon and Randy Moore, regarding some of the changes that mechanics would like to see in the income tax legislation.

Their petition was signed by approximately 7,000 Canadians and it calls upon the following: "Wherefore the undersigned, your petitioners, humbly pray and call upon the Parliament of Canada to establish a one-time deduction from taxable income of the value of existing tools and equipment owned by registered journeymen and apprentice technicians. The said tools and equipment are essential in order to earn a living and to support our families. Therefore, we humbly request a full tax credit for all tools and equipment purchased annually in order to earn a living to ensure that the tax burden is fairly spread among all taxpayers."

I think they have a very valid point for having this exemption from income tax for the tools that they buy to carry on their livelihood, to carry on their work to support themselves and their families. I hope the government will take heed of their request and implement very soon into legislation the appropriate amendment to the Income Tax Act.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise pursuant to Standing Order 36 and present another petition against the goods and services tax.

The people of Canada, regardless of whether they are on the west coast, the east coast, or in central Canada are speaking out with unanimity and stating that they do not like the particular tax that this government has put before them with the goods and services tax and they are asking, they are pleading with the government to come to its senses, stop the goods and services tax and bring in a tax that is fair to all Canadians.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure today under Standing Order 36 to present two petitions to the House. The first is signed by Canadians from a host of communities, Toronto, Winnipeg and others all across the country calling on the Government of Canada to bring in legislation that would ensure essentially that we end up with a modern and efficient VIA Rail passenger rail system.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): The second petition is regarding the grief and suffering tax, as it has come to be known. This petition is signed almost completely by the residents of 150 Mile House in the central interior of British Columbia. The petitioners call upon the government to withdraw the goods and services tax and bring in fair tax legislation. They share my concern that the Liberal Senate has already given second reading to the GST bill and they express their shame and outrage at that.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour and privilege to rise to present a petition to this House signed by approximately 200 people from the Kapuskasing area in northern Ontario.

The petitioners, like millions of other Canadians, oppose strenuously the government's goods and services tax. They see it as making an unfair tax system even more unfair and placing higher income Canadians in a better position vis-à-vis lower income Canadians. They call on Parliament, and I presume they mean those parliamentarians in the other place who can still act on this measure, to act to withdraw this tax now and kill the tax.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to present a petition from a number of constituents from Kamloops, British Columbia, which brings the total now in excess of 20,000 constituents who have registered by petition their opposition to the goods and services tax.

Mr. Cooper: What about the other 80,000?

Mr. Riis: The question that they raise is, why would we want to tax reading material? For that reason alone they are opposed. I am pleased the Minister of Finance is present. That would make Canada the only country in the world that would tax reading. It is not the kind of thing that you do, Mr. Speaker, when you are concerned about high illiteracy rates—

Mr. Boyer: Are you presenting a petition or are you on debate?

Mr. Riis: I am just saying that they do not understand why the government would want to tax reading material. Actually there are other items as well. They cannot understand why the government would want to put a special tax on coffins, funerals, home heating fuels and whole sets of other things.

Mr. Cardiff: It will be less.

Mr. Riis: Well, on funerals there are no taxes, to be fair.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would hope the hon. member would stick to his petition and get it over with.

Mr. Riis: Not get it over with, Mr. Speaker. I was being provoked here by my colleagues.

To wrap it up, the petitioners are in opposition to the goods and services tax and they too call upon the Liberals in the Senate to do the honourable thing and defeat this tax.

CHILDREN'S BILL OF RIGHTS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): On another topic, Mr. Speaker, the petitioners again from Kamloops, British Columbia are pointing out the increasing number of children in Canada who are living in poverty and are calling on the government to introduce a comprehensive bill of rights for children in an effort to reduce the number and eliminate any child in Canada having to live in poverty in a country as rich as ours.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Lastly, Mr. Speaker, the petitioners who are all employees of CN Rail out of Kamloops, British Columbia, are asking the government to reconsider its decision to curtail support for a first-class passenger rail service in Canada and do the thing that every large geographic country is doing, which is to invest in passenger rail service in the country, and the petitioners are calling upon the Government of Canada to come to its senses and do just that.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I have the duty and honour this afternoon to present a petition from several dozen Canadian citizens who are calling upon the government to abandon its plan with regard to the goods and services tax.

You know, Mr. Speaker, that this tax is opposed by 69 per cent of all Canadians. So far the government is continuing to press forward, in spite of this opposition to the goods and services tax, which will have an unfair disadvantage to low income Canadians, to people living in the regions of the country and to small business people who will be unfairly penalized by it.

I would hope that the government would respond in a positive way to these humble Canadians petitioning for justice and fairness in the tax system.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTIONS FOR PRODUCTION OF PAPERS

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all notices of motions for the production of papers be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall all notices of motions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On a point of order, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, it appears that this may be the last Wednesday we will be sitting for some period of time, possibly until September, from the rumours that are circulating around this House.

On October 25, I placed a Notice of Motion for the Production of Papers on the Order Paper. I have been on my feet at least four times asking for assistance. I have pleaded with the deputy House leader. I have pleaded with the parliamentary secretary. I may even have gone on bended knee to the House leader himself. I do not recall who all I have raised this with.

However, here we are on June 13. We are not coming back probably until September, possibly October, and that will be a year that this motion has been sitting here waiting for an answer.

The conduct of the government in this case has been nothing short of disgraceful. I ask the parliamentary secretary to stand up and let us pass the order today. He can table the documents later, but at least let us get it adopted as an order of this House. Surely he can agree to that so we can get somewhere with this. It is simply ridiculous what the government is doing to this House.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I once again want to apologize to the hon. member. I have heard his pleas. I have seen him on bended knee. I have done everything in my power to assist the hon. gentleman because we know he is a most distinguished member of this House. He is the kind of individual we all look up to and we want to, if at all possible, do everything in our power to respond to his needs no matter how trivial or how urgent they may be.

In this case, I once again must apologize. I cannot fulfil this wish and I really do offer the hon. member my very deep personal regrets.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, as we are drawing toward the summer recess, I was wondering if the parliamentary secretary could give some indication as to the government's plans with respect to my Motion P–24 which concerns the presence in Canada of one Francisco Nota Moises.

I have been requesting a comprehensive review of Mr. Moises' status in Canada since early in 1989. I have conducted correspondence with the Minister of Employment and Immigration, the Secretary of State for External Affairs and the Solicitor General. So far, my efforts to establish a clear picture of the events leading to the decision to admit Mr. Moises to Canada and the reasons for his continued presence in Canada have been thwarted.

By moving a motion for the Production of Papers, I am hopeful that the position of the Government of Canada on this matter will be made clear.

Citizens in the Victoria area are particularly anxious to learn on what grounds Mr. Moises was ever admitted and to learn the results of investigations into his activities with Renamo.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I think that is sufficient for the parliamentary secretary to give a reply.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I did check into the hon. member's motion in the hopes that we could table it this morning. I understand that motion is in the minister's office for a decision now and hopefully we will have it in the very near future.

• (1540)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I believe you will find consent for the following motion:

That,

on Monday, June 18, 1990, Mr. Nelson Mandela, Deputy President of the African National Congress, address members of House of Commons and Senate, in the Commons Chamber, at 11 o'clock a.m., and

That Mr. Mandela's address and customary related remarks by the Prime Minister and Speakers of both Houses be printed as an appendix to the House of Commons debates of that day, and form part of the records of this House, and be televised according to the House guidelines.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

PLANT PROTECTION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-67, an act to prevent the importation, exportation and spread of pests injurious to plants and to provide for their control and eradication and for the certification of plants and other things, as reported (with an amendment) from a legislative committee.

Hon. Michael Wilson (for the Minister of Agriculture): moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved that the Bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it appeared as though the House was going to accept Bill C-67. If we are going to have debate on it, I would want to put the government's position on the record at some time. If the hon. member would prefer to speak first, I would agree to that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I am sorry, I did not see the hon. member rising, therefore, I will recognize the hon. Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Agriculture on debate.

Mr. Cardiff: Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of presenting Bill C-67, the plant protection act, which proposes amendments to the Plant Quarantine Act.

It has been 80 years since the first formal pest control and eradication act was passed in Canada. Over time, a number of adjustments have been made to deal with emerging issues affecting our plant-based industries.

In 1952, for example, Canada responded to growing international concern over the spreading of pests by signing the International Plant Protection Convention.

In 1968, the Plant Quarantine Act was introduced. Over time, however, it became apparent that this legislation required amending because of changes in the world market-place.

In 1982, Agriculture Canada set out to assess the effects of market-place changes, new technology and current legislation on our programs. This has been a time consuming and demanding process and I am pleased to confirm that the results of this review have been well worth the effort. In fact, the legislation before the House today represents a major step in ensuring the continued viability and strength of Canada's plant-based industries.

We anticipate benefits from this legislation in three areas.

First, the act will serve as a demonstration of Canada's commitment to prevent the spread of plant pests that have economic importance to our global trading partners. The net result will be improved opportunities for marketing Canadian plants and plant products and other things internationally.

Second, the new legislation provides for recovery of the costs of program delivery from those who directly benefit from some activities administered under the act. For example, we will be able to recover costs for conducting inspections and issuing permits and other documents to those who import or export plants and plant products. Fumigation, treatment and quarantine of such items will also be cost-recoverable.

A third important thrust of this legislation is to reduce the threat of introducing or spreading a plant pest within Canada. The value of our Canadian plant-based industries is simply too great to risk the significant loss and damage that can be caused by pest infestations.

Having outlined the main objectives behind the new Plant Protection Act, I would like to focus on some of the specific provisions.

A particularly important aspect of this bill is the increased authority it grants to Agriculture Canada inspectors to do their job more effectively. For example, these provisions grant authority to the department to issue permits to persons importing material; to designate where and under what conditions an imported item or an item for export will be inspected; to order the removal, treatment, quarantine, or disposition of items found to be in contravention of the act; and to stop or enter vehicles, ships, rail cars, and other conveyances for the purposes of enforcing the act.

In addition, the responsibility to prove that individuals deliberately spread plant pests will no longer rest solely with the department. In the past individuals have challenged the department to prove such deliberate intent. This has proved to be a serious hindrance to the government's efforts to keep plant pests from entering or spreading within Canada.

The new act has sufficient flexibility to allow for the control or eradication of plant pests without creating undue interference to the transportation and marketing of agricultural and forestry products.

Other amendments update and simplify legal requirements. The penalties for contravening the act have been restructured to make them more effective. New penalties include ticketing for minor offences. This provision will eliminate the need to go through lengthy and expensive courtroom proceedings to prosecute those who plead guilty to such infractions.

Yet another important area addressed in this legislation concerns compensation. Bill C-67 clarifies the conditions when the department will pay compensation and how people can appeal compensation claims.

While we have focused on finding ways to control or eradicate plant pests in Canada, we have also made provisions to keep plant pests from ever reaching our shores in the first place.

Two sections of the act touch on this problem. First, in those cases where the department has reasonable grounds to believe that goods destined for Canada may be infested, officials will be authorized to carry out inspection at the place of origin prior to shipment.

Second, we are interested in working with other companies to help them improve their plant pest control and eradication systems. This act authorizes the department to provide financial aid and technical expertise to foreign countries.

In view of safeguarding our industries, the act also allows material to be detained for longer than the current 90 days. This will be increased to 180 days or longer.

Two new sections of the act provide the Minister of Agriculture with the authority to require operators of land, air, rail and sea terminals to allocate, if required, at no cost to the Crown, space and facilities for the services provided for the proper administration of the act.

Procedures and responsibilities of the department have also been clarified. The process of declaring places to be infested and the powers of the minister and inspectors in this action have been carefully spelled out. The process and authority to prohibit or regulate the introduction or movement of plants, plant products or other things, are also more clearly explained.

We have made every effort to take into account the legitimate and practical concerns of those people who are affected by the decisions taken by inspectors.

Provincial governments, appropriate federal departments, industry, and other interested groups have all had a chance to study and respond to this proposed legislation.

I am very pleased to note that all of those whose efforts contributed to the new act agree that the amendments are necessary and support the principles of the bill.

Our plant based industries rely heavily on our plant protection programs. Their future depends on the improvements and changes found in Bill C-67. For them it will mean improved protection against the spread of plant pests, greater confidence on the part of domestic consumers, and more opportunities for access to foreign markets.

I trust that all members of this House will consider these benefits and give strong support to this legislation.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I want to say only a couple of words on the third reading stage of Bill C-67.

This is a highly technical bill, one which perhaps does not catch much notice of members in the House of Commons. However it is very important to our agricultural industry because it has to do with the control of plant diseases and protection from pests. This is very important in a day and age when we have large cargo and passenger planes carrying hundreds of passengers into and out of airports in this country and ships plying the oceans.

• (1550)

This bill expands the existing legislation from about 8 pages of legalise to some 25 pages. I do not say that that it is necessarily good to increase the amount of verbiage in a bill or in an act, but in this case I believe it is.

As we might expect it provides for cost recovery. This government has a penchant for demanding more and more fees from Canadians, as the Minister of Finance has done in every budget since he has become the Minister of Finance on September 19, 1984.

We have tried to get specific details from the government at report stage and in committee, but we have not received a great deal of specifics with regard to the cost recovery. We do believe that certain types of economic activity by groups and individuals where they incur costs for their own benefit are justifiable, whereas where plant diseases inadvertently occur we believe the government has the full responsibility to pay for those costs.

This bill puts an onus on highly technically trained people and researchers to notify the government when they become aware of important diseases from other countries that would have an adverse impact on our agricultural industry. I am not sure the existing legislation puts that onus on people who have the skills to identify foreign pests which could have an adverse economic impact on our country, but this bill provides for that.

It gives more authority for inspectors to take samples and to identify them for legal activity and prosecutions. That is necessary in this realm of protection of plants in this country.

It provides more flexibility for hiring specialists on a part-time or casual basis who are fully qualified to act as agents of the Crown. That is wise, because in a day and age when we are concerned about costs to the government it is probably better to hire a highly skilled and trained person rather than have to move people all over the country for specific problems that occur.

It provides for compensation to owners of crops that are damaged by pests and infectious agents where it is in the best interests of the nation to pay compensation.

It also provides for the location of inspection stations abroad, for instance, where we are importing plants which could be harbingers or vectors for infectious agents. The example given in the committee hearings was bulbs which are brought into Canada from Holland. It is to ensure that those plant products are investigated and inspected abroad so that we do not run the danger of introducing infectious agents into the country.

There are new offences provisions in the act for higher fines and for ticketing. All of us are familiar with the experience of signing a customs declaration where we state that we have brought no plant or plant product into the country. This will provide for a ticketing system where someone illegally imports plants which may be carrying infectious diseases or pests that could endanger our livestock or our plant industries.

The fact that a ticket can be provided rather than a conviction or charges being laid may be beneficial in making people realize just how important and serious the dangers are to our industry from bringing in plants which are not properly inspected or authorized.

In summary, this is quite a technical piece of legislation. It brings the act up to date. It provides for the changing world in which we live where there is greater transportation, a greater flow of people, products and materials between countries, not only between Canada and the United States but other countries around the world. It generally provides for the protection of the Canadian agricultural industry which is so important to the economy of the country.

We support this bill at third reading and want to see it ultimately implemented by the Government of Canada.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak briefly on Bill C-67 to amend the Plant Quarantine Act so as to protect plant life in the agricultural and forestry sectors of the Canadian economy. This is a revision of old acts in an attempt to bring procedures up to date.

There are few questions that some observers may have about the bill. For instance, it grants the authority to operate an import permit system which is absolutely necessary if our country is to control the importation of pests with plants or with parts of plants, including diseases and fungi that might come in with seed.

Something that we will have to wait for and watch is whether this import permit system operated by Agriculture Canada will become noticeable. If and when we ever get to an import basis on American wheat under the Canada—U.S. Free Trade Agreement, External Affairs will take over the issuing of those permits for the granting of import licences.

However, we presume that Agriculture Canada will still be required to make certain that those imported seeds and grains are free of disease so that international trade does not override the need for the maintenance of a healthy lifestyle on both sides of the border of the trading countries. This will also keep available Canada's reputation as a country, which is relatively free of plant diseases and plant pests, to utilize in international trade for our own grain trade.

The changes to the act spell out some of the powers that the Department of Agriculture will have. It will be able to stop and enter conveyances whether vehicles, ships, or rail cars for purposes of enforcing the act and to make the inspections that are required to determine whether there are plant products on board and whether those plant products contain diseases or pests. It clarifies that the importer of all items governed by the act is responsible for presenting those items for inspection. It sets out that there must be rooms and space made available for those inspections to take place.

It is quite a flexible act in that it covers a wide variety of plant material. Changes down the road can be reacted to, it is spelled out in the bill, by changes in regulations at that time. This is basically permissive legislation.

• (1600)

Understanding fully how the new rules will apply is virtually impossible until we see the regulations. Because this type of act has been in place in this country for close to a century we in the opposition parties are prepared to take the department's assurances at face value that these regulations will continue to carry out the functions that the Department of Agriculture has carried out in the past, that it will continue to act responsibly in the future and that regulations will in fact protect producers, consumers and the general health of the population as far as domestic use is concerned, and for the continuation of our good reputation in trading relations.

I am prepared to let the bill have speedy passage and will close my remarks so that that can happen.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Do I have unanimous consent to proceed with Bill C-66?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

HEALTH OF ANIMALS ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to consideration of Bill C-66, an act respecting diseases and toxic substances that may affect animals or that may be transmitted by animals to persons, and respecting the protection of animals, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): There is one motion set down on the Order Paper for the report stage of Bill C-66, an act respecting diseases and toxic substances that may affect animals or that may be transmitted by animals to persons, and respecting the protection of animals. That motion is in order.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C-66 be amended in Clause 64 by striking out line 3 at page 29 and substituting the following therefor:

"(i) requiring animals to be treated in such a manner as to avoid or minimize the infliction of pain, suffering or injury on or to animals".

He said: Mr. Speaker, I will be quite brief. During the course of the committee hearings on this piece of legislation we heard from quite a broad range of people who are involved in the animal industry in this country as producers, consumers, handlers and processors.

One of the suggestions that came from the Canadian Federation of Humane Societies was that while it had no particular criticism of the bill it would feel better if there were a better description of humane treatment of animals. It suggested a definition something like this which we have translated into parliamentary language which would lay the ground work and the rules for all future regulations concerning the treatment of animals.

As you read, Mr. Speaker, it simply states that it would require animals to be treated in such a manner as to avoid or minimize the infliction of pain, suffering or injury on or to animals. I think this permits Parliament to put in place the ground rules for the humane treatment of animals. I presume that we would have no great discussion on this, that it seems to be reasonable and acceptable and therefore could be passed forthwith.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to point out two or three items.

The present wording of the legislation covers the governing, care, handling and disposition of animals. These words have been chosen because they are used in the title of the recommended codes of practice for the care and handling of animals.

The department has provided funds for the development and publishing of the codes. The codes have been developed for poultry, swine, ranched mink and foxes, veal calves, dairy cattle, and so on.

The development of the codes is co-ordinated by the Canadian Federation of Humane Societies. Representatives from industry groups such as producers, truckers and slaughter plants all have input into those codes.

Professional organizations such as the Canadian Veterinary Medical Association, the Canadian Society of Animal Science and the American Society of Agricultural Engineers provide the expertise in the development of the codes.

The wording of the paragraph proposed by the member for Mackenzie, while interesting, would appear to limit the section to areas where pain, suffering or injury could be inflicted on animals.

I believe that the current wording gives the clause a broader mandate, without the necessity of proving the possibility of pain, suffering or injury.

In addition, the concept of minimizing pain, suffering or injury could be difficult to interpret and might limit the regulations that could be made under this enabling clause.

I would also like to point out that words such as those proposed by the member can be put in the regulations that are prepared under this act. For instance, the current regulations which are made under the Animal Disease and Protection Act use the words "likely to cause injury or undue suffering" to tell people what standards must be met in transporting animals.

These words are more appropriate because they have been tried and tested in prosecutions under the current act and are therefore understood by the industry and Agriculture Canada inspectors.

By putting such words in the regulations rather than in the act each area can be addressed using appropriate words for the specific concern.

We do not believe that the amendment would help the present legislation and could cause us some problems in some ways.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, during the course of the debate in the legislative committee on Bill C-66 we had a number of groups, such as the dairy and hog producers, who outlined to us their code of practice for the maintenance of various livestock groups.

As I understand the plan in this regard, it is that this legislation, the health of animals bill, is to provide a legal background for those codes of practice for these various species of domestic animals. The regulations may not actually be written under this measure for some time because so far the whole code of practice seems to be working quite well. However, at some stage it may not work well enough and there may be obvious needs for strengthening those codes and for legal powers to be put in place.

As I understand the plan by the department and the various livestock groups, it is that this clause concerning the humane treatment of animals really provides a legal back-up to those code arrangements. It seems to me that there is a danger in going into the kind of specific requirement provided for in the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Mackenzie because it gets into the whole question of infliction of pain, suffering and injury to animals. Those items are well provided for in the Criminal Code.

In this legislation we are looking at providing legal back-up to the code of practice by the various livestock groups concerning arrangements for husbandry and production of poultry, eggs, veal calves, hogs and various groups.

• (1610)

Section 446 of the Criminal Code says:

> Causing unnecessary suffering—Punishment—Failure to exercise reasonable care as evidence—Presence at baiting as evidence—Order of prohibition—Breach of order.

Section 446(1) states:

> Every one commits an offence who
> (a) wilfully causes or, being the owner, wilfully permits to be caused unnecessary pain, suffering or injury to an animal or a bird—

There are other sections, but that is the effective one. It seems to me that the actual detail of a criminal charge is better left under the Criminal Code itself. Here we are providing regulations which may become necessary if the code of practice for the various livestock groups which already exist require legal back-up.

I think there is a reasonable case for maintaining the more general provisions which presently exist in the legislation, rather than moving toward a more specific, detailed explanation of humane treatment or humane care which is provided for under the existing Criminal Code of Canada.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I would like to advise the House that the House will adjourn at five o'clock so that members may attend the hon. Speaker at the farm.

Members have heard the terms of the motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

Motion (Mr. Althouse) negatived.

Hon. Charles Mayer (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Mayer (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to present to the House for third reading Bill C-66, the health of animals bill which proposes changes to the Animal Protection Act. The reputation of Canadian animal products is second to none in the world market-place.

You will probably find that Bills C-66 and C-67 are very similar, with many similar clauses. Therefore, some of my remarks might be very close to those made earlier.

The reputation of our animal products in the world market-place has been earned over the years and we are not willing to compromise it in any way.

Bill C-66 represents the corner-stone of the determination of the government and the agri-food industry to keep our standards high in animal health. Legislation covering this area was first passed in 1869 and was last amended in 1974 as the Animal Disease and Protection Act.

In preparing this legislation Agriculture Canada has consulted more than 40 groups including representatives from all the agriculture sectors, provincial departments of agriculture, regulated areas such as semen production, embryo transfer, exporters and importers, and the animal welfare movement.

There must be consensus among all the players if the agriculture industry is to continue to compete and survive in today's complex market-place while adequately addressing the present environmental and food safety concerns.

Bill C-66 confirms the government's authority to prevent animal diseases that threaten animal and human health from getting into Canada.

The legislation will strengthen programs that work toward the prevention of food-producing animals becoming contaminated with diseases that can affect human health. Salmonella is an example of such a disease.

The bill authorizes the government to control animals and animal products that have been exposed to or contaminated by toxic materials and prevent their entry into the animal and human food chains.

The legislation would permit the Governor in Council to regulate the movement of people, animals and vehicles where an area was affected by a serious animal disease.

A national identification system for animals will enable identification of animals suspected of harbouring disease-causing agents. This is essential in controlling and eradicating diseases.

The bill will also empower the government to assist other countries in their efforts to control or eradicate animal diseases. This new authority would allow Agriculture Canada to provide financial and technical help to foreign countries to reduce the risk of those diseases spreading to Canada.

The legislation we are discussing provides for cost recovery or designation of responsibility for costs of some of the services provided by the government. The bill will allow qualified people, other than public servants, to carry out the duties and functions of inspectors on behalf of the government. This will allow for privatization of such things as laboratory services, inspection and testing for animal diseases.

The legislation enables Agriculture Canada to obtain facilities needed to administer the act. At international ports of entry such as airports, harbours, bridges, tunnels, roads and so on, the minister may require that space for inspection and enforcement be provided.

Control of genetic diseases of animals is also addressed in the health of animals bill. The new definition of "disease" includes genetic diseases, as well as diseases of humans that can be transmitted by animals. Many insects, so-called vectors, spread disease from one animal to another. The department will be able to control imports to prevent their release into the environment.

In addition, the authority for the department to collect information and statistics on animal diseases will be enhanced. This information is crucial to our success in negotiating conditions for the export of animals and animal products.

Many Canadians are concerned about the welfare of animals—how animals are reared under intensive modern farming conditions. The legislation provides new powers to regulate the way animals are kept to ensure that they are treated humanely.

In addition, the power to control what is fed to animals has been expanded to include all animals. The power to prohibit feeding of materials that might be suspected of spreading disease or toxic substances has been added.

I have outlined the major changes found in the health of animals bill. Now I would like to highlight some of the provisions that will continue to be in force under this new legislation.

Agriculture Canada's powers to control an outbreak of a severe disease or a toxic substance spill remain intact. Compensation will continue to be paid for any animal ordered destroyed under the health of animals bill or for one that is injured in the course of being tested by an inspector and must be destroyed.

The amount of compensation paid to a producer will continue to be the market value of the animal, minus the value received for its carcass. Maximum values may be set for all types of animals under the program. Producers will also have their costs covered in cases where the government decides that affected animals should be treated rather than destroyed.

The legislation continues to allow for control of places where animals are assembled or sold. Control of artificial insemination and embryo transfer units will continue. The existing act's powers to regulate animal dead yards and rendering plants are maintained.

Provisions dealing with hatcheries and the improvement of poultry have been incorporated into this bill as well. These are not just based on the control of disease but also on the quality and genetic improvement of poultry. Penalties for contravening the provisions of this bill have been updated to reflect present economic realities. Fines for summary conviction offences can run up to $50,000. Where an indictable offence is involved, penalties can go as high as $200,000 and/or up to two years in jail.

The new provisions will permit agriculture inspectors to issue tickets in less serious cases and this will avoid the expense of long court proceedings for those who wish to plead guilty to minor infractions.

In summary, the health of animals bill represents an important tool to keep our animals healthy, productive and competitive and to safeguard the human population against the spread of disease or toxic materials from animals.

• (1620)

A number of industry representatives appeared as witnesses before the legislative committee on Bill C-66. While all were generally supportive, minor amendments were made to the bill at committee stage in response to their concerns. We believe that these changes will help to strengthen further the legislation for the agri-food industry and Canadians as a whole.

I am confident that this bill will receive their full support.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I just have a couple of words to say on third reading of Bill C-66. The bill received fairly extensive study in the committee.

It is an important piece of legislation that has not been amended since 1974. Of course, just as we saw with the plant products protection bill, many things have changed since that time in terms of international travel and the movement of animals around the world.

This bill provides for greater protection for animals. It is designed to control, eradicate or prevent entry into Canada of diseases of animals which is an important move both in terms of human health and economic impact for our livestock industry.

It really broadens the scope of the Department of Agriculture in regard to animal diseases. The old legislation was primarily directed toward infectious diseases such as Newcastle's disease in poultry, rabies in animals, and hoof and mouth disease in livestock, diseases of that nature, whereas this legislation moves beyond that to cover all livestock diseases, especially the contamination of livestock with toxic substances such as PCBs. These are problems which have been with us virtually forever. But over the last five or ten years we have come up with the diagnostic techniques to test for contamination by toxic substances in milk, meat, eggs or poultry products. Thus we really require this additional scope.

Diseases such as salmonella which are not necessarily that harmful to poultry can be extremely harmful to human beings and cause all kinds of illnesses. This bill extends the mandate of the Department of Agriculture to a much broader scope of diseases affecting human health as well as animal health.

This legislation gives the government a great deal more power to enforce control zones. If we had a major industrial accident, as has occurred in other parts of the world, it seems that this legislation would give the Governor in Council and the Minister of Agriculture great powers to control the movement of animals and people into an area which had become contaminated or infected. We hope that that will never occur. The outbreak of foot and mouth disease which occurred in 1951 cost the Canadian livestock industry something in the order of $1 billion. This bill gives the minister and the government greater powers to deal with that kind of a national emergency.

It puts in place a regime for a national identification system. Technology has moved to the point where, with electronic scanners, animals can be easily identified on a permanent basis. It is valuable in the long-term control of diseases to be able to identify the farm where infected animals are raised, as well as to identify where the meat product or other product was produced.

It also provides authority for the government to go into other countries where our veterinarians are needed to assist in the control of diseases which might spread to Canada. It gives them legal authority to do that. The instance was cited when, a few years ago, it would have been beneficial for Canada to be able to assist one of the Caribbean islands in the control of African swine fever. That kind of authority is provided for in this legislation even if the funding for it might come from CIDA or some other international development agency. That kind of international assistance would not only assist the host country but would be beneficial as well to the protection of the health of our livestock industry.

As with Bill C–67 there is a provision for cost recovery. Obviously the Minister of Finance had great responsibility in the writing of this bill to ensure that the government gets its pound of flesh. We think that that is counterproductive. When it involves the general health and control of disease in the country where specialized services are being provided for the industry for export purposes, we have no problem with such cost recovery arrangements.

This bill provides as well for part–time inspectors to assist the full–time employees of the Department of Agriculture in carrying out the mandate of this legislation. I think that is a step forward.

Casual veterinarians have worked for years with major diseases such as brucellosis and tuberculosis. Those diseases have largely been overcome in this country. Thus there is not the need for those people to control those particular diseases, but the arrangement of integrating full–time Government of Canada veterinarian inspectors with the private practitioner was a useful arrangement. This bill provides for that.

It also provides for a data collection system for national immunological studies, something which was strongly supported by all sectors of the livestock industry. It is supported by those of us in the opposition.

It also makes provision for the control and regulation of diagnostic laboratories and research facilities.

All in all, we in the Official Opposition find the legislation to be a definite step forward. We did make a couple of amendments to it in committee to ensure that where animals were being inspected for health or disease it would be a veterinary inspector who would carry out that inspection and not a lay person.

We made an amendment as well to the French version short title to call it an act for the health of animals rather than the prevention of disease in animals. That was suggested by the Canadian Veterinary Medical Association because it thought it would cause less conflict with the name that is used in similar legislation in the province of Quebec. I think it was a useful suggestion.

Those are many of the provisions of the bill. We think we have had a pretty good review of the provisions of it in committee. It should be useful in moving our whole livestock industry into the 21st century, with the new technologies that have become available for surveillance and development of the livestock industry. We support it and want to see it ultimately implemented.

• (1630)

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, we are dealing with companion bills.

This one deals with controlling the spread of infectious diseases and the control of diseases among animals. There are only a few things that I would like to say about it.

This is an important bill to the public at large. It covers not only diseases that Agriculture Canada with its Veterinary Services and its Health of Animal Branches monitors. There are those that create economic harm to farmers and the food production chain, such as hoof and mouth disease, blue tongue, Newcastle's disease in poultry or swine cholera. That is just a very short list. We could make it into an extremely long one.

Those economic diseases are extremely important to consumers in that, without their control, we would find it somewhat difficult to get the cheap food that we are used to at the meat counter. I know some consumers bristle at that phrase, but it is cheap food. Relative to the rest of the world, Canadians are buying extremely cheap food at the retail counter.

In addition, there are the diseases that are shared by animals, whether human or of another species. These are the ones with which Health of Animals and Agriculture Canada are very much involved. Rabies can be contracted by humans just as easily as our little mammal friends. Tuberculosis and brucellosis, which is sometimes called Bang's disease and which shows itself in humans as undulant fever, are a couple of the categories of disease.

As a result, the department has been conducting vaccination inoculation programs at one time or another. That continues with rabies. It was abandoned with brucellosis because of some detection problems that the vaccination program created. We have moved to an eradication of the disease type of program for TB and brucellosis.

These programs often appear to be controversial. The public, sometimes including the farming public, does not fully understand the need for the rather radical methods that are used to achieve control and eradication of these very important diseases to the human population as well as animal population. Sometimes it stirs up controversy when a whole herd is disposed of when brucellosis and tuberculosis are found.

This act permits some procedures which have been tried and which would assist the department to contain the disease without always going to those methods. Generally speaking, eradication is still the best method. I raise this in the House now even though there is not a great deal of public attention on it. We have a herd of hybrid bison in northern Alberta close to the territorial border which is infected with these two diseases.

As far as veterinary medical science is aware, there is no other way to get rid of that disease but to use the eradication program.

Unfortunately, a lot of well-meaning environmentalists think that that is too strong a response to disease control but, as a person who raises animals domestically I realize, and I have seen it happen very close to me, that the only way to obtain that kind of control for the health of humans and for the other animals in the area, in this case it affects humans just as readily as the other livestock in the area, is eradication. It is the only route to pursue and it does work.

This bill permits the control by those methods. For the herds that are wiped out, they always consider the compensation package to be inadequate because it is a big disruption. Often production is disrupted for two full years, and that kind of compensation is never provided. Sometimes, for particular individual animals that are purebred and have particular genetic qualities, the farmer sells them, provided he gets the kind of price that he has invested. However, this is the way the system works. There has been a move in this act to try to permit larger payments, but it still will not give full compensation for some of the very valuable animals that have to be disposed of, should they become infected one way or another.

That is why we are trying to keep inspections at the borders more secure. Our inspection system has always been very good, but we are hopeful that this bill will permit even more flexibility and permit the borders to become even more secure.

That also raises some of the issues that are proposed in this legislation that some of us have a few doubts about. We permit the passages that allow the Minister of Agriculture to achieve a certain amount of cost recovery because, in some instances, it does make some sense. The service that is being provided by the department is of direct economic benefit to the user.

For instance, if I were to import breeding stock from another country, I would feel quite comfortable about paying the costs of leaving that animal in quarantine for the required amount of time. I am expecting to gain something from the importation of that animal, and this is a part of a cost of my doing business, introducing this new genetic stock to the country.

As well, laboratory testing for genetic abnormalities is an industry advantage. It is an advantage to the person submitting the genetic material for test. I do not think anyone in the industry has a great deal of problem with paying for those kinds of tests that are done by Agriculture Canada laboratories. When we get into disease testing which is for the public good, I think that those costs should continue to be borne by the public and be paid for out of departmental funds. I think most Canadian consumers would agree because it is their assurance that those tests will be done on their behalf, if they are done by officials of the Government of Canada.

As well, if we are exporters or importers, the buyer has assurance that the imported product or the exported product has been properly tested and monitored for disease control. The transmission of pests and any that might act as vectors which would carry any disease would be carefully monitored. We heard in testimony that a great many importing countries look with a jaundiced eye at imports from countries where the private sector is permitted to do this type of testing and provide a stamp or signature on the export papers.

The United States uses a system like that. We are told that there have been too many instances of inadequate testing where the foreign buyer ended up getting a product that was not disease-free as the papers indicated. The importing countries are generally much more secure and confident of the system we have developed in this country where those tests are done by public officials.

I hope that this Minister of Agriculture and all future ministers will keep that in mind when considering the utilization of this particular section of the act which does permit the transfer of some of the costs out of the department and on to the public.

The approval of this bill is made with the understanding that this particular section should be dealt with with great care, and that in the interests of our consumers and our commercial relations with other countries we take great care in maintaining and utilizing our public inspectors who do the veterinary work now on imports and exports, and that the government continues to allow the Department of Agriculture to finance and keep control of that.

With that, Mr. Speaker, I have no more to say. We have done a fairly adequate job of hearing from most of the sectors involved in the animal industry in committee. In a very short time we managed to hear from most of the sectors. I think that this fairly modern update of the act which permits the control of diseases in animals and the monitoring of these diseases will continue for at least another decade. I think that after today Parliament will have set it up in a manner that will permit the department to continue to function as efficiently as it has in the past.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to present a petition on behalf of numerous residents of the province of Newfoundland who, at the request of the very distinguished member for Bonavista—Trinity—Conception, have signed a petition opposing the goods and services tax introduced by the mean-spirited government opposite.

These petitioners complain about the fact that they have already been taxed to the hilt by this government. They are opposed to this tax. They feel it will create an onerous burden on small business in particular, will result in manifest unfairness to the taxpayers of Canada and to the businesses that are obliged to pay the collection costs of this iniquitous tax, and they call upon Parliament to reject the goods and services tax.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I too have a petition to present to the House dealing with this terrible imposition upon Canadians of the goods and services tax starting in January, 1991.

The petitioners would like to impress upon the House their strong objections to the imposition of a new tax that will increase the cost of living for all Canadians. It will be inflationary, cause unemployment, and probably higher interest rates. I understand the Tories all know that, and if they know it, they should not be doing it.

The words of these petitioners are telling these great Tory members, who know all about the dire effects of this tax, not to proceed with this tax at this time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. David Walker (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present a petition on behalf of Mr. Yih-Sheh Leo, a Canadian citizen and taxpayer who has been put in prison in Taiwan.

Mr. Leo was arrested unlawfully and sentenced to 10 months imprisonment for exercising his right to return to his native land and is currently under indictment on sedition charges facing a minimum term of 10 years in prison.

There are over 200 petitioners from across Canada who call upon the Canadian government to take immediate and effective measures to secure Mr. Leo's release including, but not limited to, the following: issue a public statement expressing Canada's concern over a Canadian citizen's rights being violated; instruct the Canadian Embassy in Japan, or the High Commissioner's Office in Hong Kong, to send a representative to Taiwan; appoint a lawyer to handle the case; and request Canada's allies which have representatives in Taiwan to assist with this case.

This is a very serious case and the petitioners deserve to be heard by the government.

THE PROGRAM FOR OLDER WORKER ADJUSTMENT

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, in accordance with Standing Order 36, it is my pleasure to introduce a petition bearing 2,657 signatures, and asking the Government to alter the regulations governing the Program for Older Worker Adjustment. As you know, in the metropolitan area, people employed by companies with less than 100 employees are not covered by this program. This is discrimination considering that in Canada, 98 percent of companies are small businesses with less than 100 employees.

Therefore, I dare believe that the Government will listen to them. This is the second petition I am introducing in this regard, but we already have more than 5,000 signatures of persons who are asking that this regulation be amended immediately, Mr. Speaker.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour, under Standing Order 36, to present a petition on the goods and services tax.

These petitioners, primarily from communities in the province of Nova Scotia, are petitioning the House to call on the government to reject the goods and services tax. I know that they will start petitioning the Senate as well, given that the Liberals in the Senate have already given second reading to the goods and services tax.

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to rise under the provisions of Standing Order 36 to present a number of petitions against the government's regressive and Draconian goods and services tax measure.

Previously, I have submitted almost 15,000 signatures of residents in my riding opposed to the tax measure. These signatures, however, come from residents throughout Canada, virtually from Victoria to St. John's. There are about 13 petitions here with approximately 500 additional names for the government to consider in terms of Canadians who are opposed to this very regressive tax measure.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present a number of petitions, some in both official languages, calling upon the government to abandon its idea of the GST.

The petitioners point out that this is an unfair tax that will hurt the average Canadian and they call upon the government to abandon it.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, I also have the honour of representing the sensible views of citizens of Windsor who have affixed their names to several petitions in the total number of 300. These 300 signatures constitute only a small part of the some 25,000 or 30,000 people in the Windsor—Essex County area who have voiced their protest about the introduction of the GST.

Since they ask for Parliament to defeat the GST, it is therefore at this stage a specific request of the Liberals in the Senate to do their job and defeat the GST.

AIR-INDIA FLIGHT 182 CRASH

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, five years ago this month, 329 innocent civilians, mostly Canadians, lost their lives as the result of a terrorist bomb explosion aboard Air India flight 182 from Montreal to London.

I have the honour today of presenting a petition which has been signed by over 400 British Columbia residents, including Mrs. Perviz Madon whose husband, Sam Madon, was killed in that crash.

The petitioners point out that extensive media research, prominently broadcast on television and radio, has shown that this crime was preventable, that there were many warnings, including a test explosion, and that Canadians have been clamouring for a public enquiry to ascertain the facts related to this disaster and to come up with recommendations that would prevent similar disasters.

Therefore, they call upon Parliament to give Canadians a commitment to hold a royal commission of inquiry into all facts surrounding the Air India disaster of 1985. We must ensure that justice is done in this case.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, I have a second petition which has been signed by hundreds of residents of a number of communities of British Columbia, including my own constituency of Burnaby—Kingsway. It is also signed by residents of a number of other parts of Canada, including St. John's East and other communities, who want to voice their anger and their outrage at the imposition of the federal Conservative goods and services tax.

They call upon Parliament to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax and to ensure that there is real tax reform. They urge Parliament to cause the government to stop this proposal which will shift the tax burden on to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax instead of through real tax reform.

Presumably, in this call to Parliament, they are calling upon the Liberals in the Senate to do their job and defeat this heinous tax.

• (1120)

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to present a petition signed by residents of my constituency of Mission—Coquitlam, and residents of Mission, Pitt Meadows, Maple Ridge, Port Coquitlam, Coquitlam, and other areas of the province who, even though the goods and services tax has passed this House, know it is not too late and are calling upon the government to see the light and withdraw this negative tax. In fact, they are petitioning that the government do that.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): In addition, Mr. Speaker, I have another petition from residents of Maple Ridge, Pitt Meadows, Port Coquitlam, and Mission who are seriously concerned about Canada's war veterans and their right to a secure and dignified retirement.

The petitioners are calling on the government to maintain the current level of services provided to veterans through the Veterans Independence Program and to ensure that there is no increase in charges to veterans for board and lodging in institutions for long-term care. It is my privilege to table this petition on their behalf.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Well, the beat goes on, Mr. Speaker, and I have the duty and honour today to table a petition signed by 881 wise and far-sighted Edmontonians, some of whom, by the way, Mr. Speaker, reside in your riding, and all of whom are calling upon Parliament—Parliament, mind, Mr. Speaker—to reject the goods and services tax.

It is a simply message, one I commend to the government, and one I most strongly commend to the Liberal majority in the Senate which has it within its their power to kill the goods and services tax.

FOREIGN OVERFISHING

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member for Burin—St. George's.

Mr. Simmons: I think the excitement is because the NDP have found a reason to embrace the Senate all of a sudden.

I have much pleasure in presenting a petition on behalf of many Canadians, largely in the Toronto, Hamilton, Mississauga, Downsview, and Burlington areas of Ontario, almost all of whom were born in Newfoundland and have since moved away, as they make clear in the petition.

The prayer of that petition is that the government would get after the foreigners who are raping our fish stocks. The prayer of the petition specifically is that the petitioners call upon Parliament to stop and correct the international economic injustice that the people of Atlantic Canada are forced to endure.

I have two petitions here which reflect that prayer. I have a number of others with similar wording which say the same thing. The petitions are signed by literally thousands of people in the southern Ontario area. I call upon the government to heed the prayer of those petitions and to do something to stop the overfishing while there is still time.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, the fight does go on.

It is my pleasure to rise, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present a petition sent in from my riding, fresh off the press, against the goods and services tax. The petitioners have not given up hope that the government will rescind and back off from the goods and services tax and look at a tax system that is fairer to all Canadians.

I add my voice to those voices of the people in Penticton, Cawston, Keremeos, Princeton, and all throughout my riding and other points of British Columbia, who are massively and madly against this tax.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to table a petition in the House signed by hundreds of people who are protesting the fact that reading materials will be taxed under the GST.

The petitioners humbly pray and call upon the Parliament of Canada to reaffirm the historic principles embodied in the tax-free status for the printed word by retaining the zero rate in the GST legislation and regulations.

I think, Mr. Speaker, you would agree that it is a very important issue and, with your permission, I want to table that petition on their behalf.

CHILDREN'S BILL OF RIGHTS

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, from a number of people from British Columbia who are concerned about the level of child poverty in Canada.

The petitioners point out that the number of children living in poverty has actually increased over the last number of years and are calling upon the Government of Canada to introduce a comprehensive bill of rights for children as a first step to eliminating child poverty in our country.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on another matter, it is my pleasure to present a petition on behalf of a number of employees of CP Rail from Kamloops who are asking the government to reconsider its regressive, backward, and silly decision to curtail VIA Rail service in the country.

The petitioners are asking the government, not only to restore the service, but actually to improve the service that we knew when we had the full VIA compliment. They are asking for new investment in a first rate passenger rail service in the country, such as any country the size of Canada ought to expect.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, lastly, I have the pleasure to present a petition on another topic, the goods and services tax, on behalf of petitioners from Kamloops. This brings the number almost to 21,000 people who have spoken out against the goods and services tax. The petitioners are simply asking the government to come to its senses and listen to the 80 per cent of Canadians who oppose this tax.

If this is a democracy, the government should pull the tax, or if my friends in the Liberal party were also listening in terms of democratic procedure, they would ask their colleagues in the Senate to stop it.

Government Orders

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

IMMIGRATION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Kim Campbell (for the Minister of Employment and Immigration) moved that Bill C–77, an act to amend the Immigration Act, be now read a second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, the amendment to the Immigration Act before the House today has a clear and definite purpose. It is designed to improve our ability to help those refugees and immigrants who require our assistance to settle here.

I would like to emphasize that refugees selected oversees are the main users of our transportation assistance and admissibility loan program.

These refugees are selected overseas in accordance with the government's annual refugee plan, or based on the sponsorship of private groups or family members in Canada. These are, understandably, the people most in need of our services.

Since it was first established in 1951, hundreds of thousands of people have used this fund to finance their medical examinations and transportation to Canada. Without this fund, many of them would never have been able to settle here and Canada would have been much poorer for losing their talents and genius.

The Transportation Loan Program has served us well in helping us meet our overall immigration objectives. It has improved our capacity to reunify families, helped us provide a safe haven for refugees, and eased the admission of people with the occupational and professional skills we need for Canada to prosper and grow.

We want to keep this program in place. We want it operating at peak efficiency. That is why we propose to amend Section 119(3) of the Immigration Act. Over the years, the maximum limit of funds allocated to finance this program has risen from an original $3 million, through $30 million, $60 million and finally in 1986 to $90 million. Few can deny that this money is well invested. Indeed, all past parliamentary reviews of this program have seen the wisdom of granting our request to continue its operation.

• (1130)

The Transportation Loan Program has never been a point of contention in the House. The beauty of this program is that, unlike many others, we get our money back. This is a loan program. The people who tap into the funds pay us back over a period of time and the repayment record is excellent. In recent days, however, so many people have turned to the program for assistance that the fund has been depleted. I would like to reiterate that the money is coming back to us, but the repayment rate, though consistent, is slow. The funds in the program are therefore not being replenished fast enough to meet the escalating demands. As of April 15, 1990 $88.9 million in loans were outstanding. This has left us with only $1.1 million before we reach our statutory limit.

The program's financial situation is such that we have had to curtail the loans being made through implementing a temporary priority approval system. Simply stated, the fact that the current limit is fixed by statute inhibits our ability to respond appropriately and rapidly to the needs of the people we serve. That is why we are asking that the limit be removed from the act and that it be set by regulation in the future. Doing so would enable the government to respond to increased demand for loans more quickly but just as openly.

I must emphasize that the Minister of Employment and Immigration will still have to report annually to the House on the number of loans made under the program and the amount of money remaining in the fund. Moreover, proposed changes to the limit would still be subject to the normal open regulatory process. In other words, while maintaining public review of proposed changes to the funding limit, the amendments would give the government the necessary flexibility to quickly address the fluctuations in demand caused by the shifting ebb and flow of refugees and immigrants. We would not have to seek a legislative amendment each time there is a work load increase because of events such as those now taking place in eastern Europe.

As opposition critics and others will be aware, there are many approaching demands on these same funds. Canada agreed at a Geneva Convention in 1989 to help ease the refugee crisis in Southeast Asia by admitting 16,000 refugees over a three year period. Furthermore, the government is committed to sponsoring 13,000 convention refugees and designated class members in 1990. We have also indicated that there will be unlimited opportunities for private sponsorship of refugees selected abroad. We continue to encourage the private sponsorship of refugees and dependants and want to ensure through this program that such sponsorships are facilitated as quickly as possible.

The Transportation Loan Program has played a major role in helping refugees pay the cost of their medical examinations and travel to Canada. Without this program it is doubtful that Canada could have earned its enviable international reputation for the care and treatment of refugees.

It is also doubtful whether without this program Canada could meet its current international refugee commitments. If we are to live up to our commitments to the resettlement of refugees and the reunification of families, we need to ensure that Canada can respond quickly and effectively to the fluctuating international demands. That is what Bill C-77 is all about.

In conclusion, I commend it to the House and hope that speedy approval will allow us to get on with serving those people who most need our help.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to be responding today to the bill tabled in the House, Bill C-77, on behalf of my colleagues of the national Liberal caucus.

First, the travel loans are a positive part of the over-all immigration program. In essence, those loans are available to landed immigrants, convention refugees and Canadian citizens who wish to help their family members travel to Canada, and subsequently to their points of destination.

The positive element is that this legislation assists those who Canada has accepted, has allowed to come to Canada and has facilitated their reunification with family members coming from various parts of the globe. It helps those who perhaps do not have the financial means. By accepting a convention refugee, it helps the person who might be coming to this country with very little in his or her pocket.

Through the availability of these funds, a individual can obtain a loan from the Government of Canada to bring in his or her family and then repay the loan to the government's treasury. You have a win and win situation. There is the new landed immigrant having the ability to live his or her life with the family and therefore probably become and be a more successfully producing Canadian citizen. That is where the country wins. As well, the loans are ensured.

In 1986—some facts for Canadians watching this debate—after passage of the Immigration Act regarding the transportation loans, the funding was set and capped at $90 million. It has remained at that figure ever since. By September 1989, some 56,000 outstanding loans amounted to some $78 million. For the fiscal year 1988-89, 12,000 loans were made totalling $23 million.

In this bill—I concur with the general parameters of the bill—the loans would move from $90 million as stated in section 119(3) to $150 million, which is obviously a recognition of increased immigration and the demand for these kinds of loans.

The other aspect of this bill is that the minister would have greater flexibility to increase the levels, depending on the demand and without seeking amendments through Parliament. It would have the force of giving the ability to act to be set in regulations, rather than in amendments to the legislation.

I have another point I would like to make. I am hoping, because of greater flexibility through regulations and having a desire to increase the loans, the government will improve those programs. I am hoping that this kind of mindset will be applied to other programs and activities within the immigration program. We have seen cut-backs in the budget recently affecting many aspects of government life.

One hopes and one takes as positive that, if the government is willing to increase these loans, it might prove to be a signal that other services and programs within immigration, such as immigration settlement and integration programs will also see some additions in financial resources. Other services that could benefit are the adoption services, language training and skills training.

One matter which concerns me that I wish to discuss in the House today is that there is no stated minimum, that is, there is no minimum below which these loans will go. I suppose it may be difficult to put a low cap on them, but since the minister has the power to go through the regulations, maybe we would see the current level of funding maintained, if not increased, as opposed to going below a certain threshold. That would put difficulty on them.

• (1140)

The reason I raise this concern is because there was an article on May 11 in The Toronto Star where a spokesperson for the immigration department, speaking on behalf of the government I would assume, suggested that the government might have to restrict interest free transportation loans to refugees. He also stated that the government had decided to cut off loans to refugees sponsored by private organizations when in fact those government sponsors would not be affected. The spokesperson was a gentleman by the name of Mr. Gerry Maffree.

I am hoping that the concerns of May 11, 1990 gave rise to increasing the loans but that they would not indicate a desire that once the regulations are in the hands of the minister and her officials, that the loans are going to be refused and therefore make it more difficult for those individuals to be reunited with their families.

The second element that concerns me, and I think the parliamentary secretary alluded to it in part, is the fact that we are removing from Parliament or the legislation stream or from amendments of our legislation, and putting into the hands of the minister through regulations, the fact that she can determine what those loans will be. I believe there should be some accountability to Parliament, even though we are putting it into the regulations. There should be some pipeline for debate and discussion between the minister, her officials and members of Parliament.

Therefore, I have given notice to both the parliamentary secretary and the opposition critic for the New Democratic Party and the Clerk, that I will be moving an amendment at Committee of the Whole, that the minister and her officials will have to keep the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration advised so that the committee would be able to review the situation.

I suggest that we need this amendment. I know the parliamentary secretary suggested that the minister must make an annual report anyway, and I agree with that fact, but the annual report, with all respect, is a booklet that documents the activities of the last year and is tabled in the House of Commons. What I would be looking for, since we are now moving the program into regulations, is the ability to go beyond what happened in the last year to an update of what is happening and more importantly, what are the needs of the coming year, in terms of the demands on the system.

I would also be looking for the direction of the thinking of the bureaucrats and the minister, so that the standing committee, made up of members of Parliament from all sides of the House, could offer some regular advice. That will not be happening because of what an annual report does. We want to know what may be occurring in the next 12 months. I think that is a very important distinction between ensuring that this comes to the standing committee, as opposed to simply the traditional annual report, which is contained in a very nice booklet and tabled in the House of Commons.

I will be moving that amendment and I would seek the approval of my colleagues on the other side and my colleagues in the New Democratic Party. I also indicated to the minister yesterday that I would be moving that amendment. At first blush she suggested she would able to consider that, hopefully with success, and I look forward to hearing from the parliamentary secretary.

The final point that I would like to address in this debate is the situation as it pertains to potential refugees and family-class members and applicants. We are talking about transportation loans that, at the end of the day, are there to allow families to re-unify. That is the raison d'être of the transportation loans. What I would like to draw to the attention of the government is that while we may be increasing the transportation loans, we should also be looking at the other side of the problem, namely, that decisions being made on refugee applicants or landed immigrants or family-class immigrants, are not being made quickly enough. We have a refugee backlog of some 125,000 people. We have a new determination system for refugees that is also experiencing a new backlog of some 20,000 to 30,000 people.

As well, what we are suggesting is this. It is fine and welcomed that we are increasing the loans to meet the demand, but there are people who have been waiting four, five and six years who have yet to be determined on their cases, let alone request a loan to have their families join them. That is the real essence of the problem. We have a refugee backlog that has to be cleaned up.

We, as Liberals, on this side of the House suggested an administrative review that would give the benefit of the doubt to those individuals who have met certain immigration criteria, such as having family in Canada, having a job in Canada, having one of the two official languages, having children born in this country who are indeed Canadians by birth, and showing that they have integrated into Canadian society.

Barring any security or health risks, we have advocated for years that the government accept those people into this country as a way of trying to give the new system an opportunity to survive. This way the system would not be crushed by the weight of this huge refugee backlog, which is the real core of the problem.

In terms of family reunification, these individuals are not getting a decision. They are not getting a determination, and therefore their families are abroad. Not only are they not united, but when we talk about refugee cases, the families abroad are in danger. Why? If you are a legitimate refugee in Canada and have been making statements on the record against a regime or against a particular group in another part of the world, obviously that is a source of embarrassment for that regime or for that government.

If it is a source of embarrassment, that government can, has and will put pressure, torture or use some other means that are not palatable, at least to our society, on those family members. Therefore, it is not only a case of not being reunited. It is a case that those families may be in real danger.

Today, while we are thinking about and moving in the positive direction of increasing our transportation loans, let us also stop to think that we should be increasing the speed and velocity of the decisions that have been in purgatory for four, five or six years in some cases.

Therefore, if we can take the spirit of these transportation loans which is in essence family reunification, if there are no security or health problems with these individuals and if they are clearly not flagrantly abusing our laws, what is the problem in accepting them and having them begin a life of normalcy, the same that you and I, Mr. Speaker, and my colleagues enjoy seven days a week, 52 weeks of the year in this beautiful country?

Because it is also available to those who wish to join families, not as refugees but as family class members, there is a great deal of frustration. We see it in our constituency offices where members cannot either successfully or quickly enough sponsor relatives from abroad.

There is a situation in India, for instance. We have a one consular operation in New Delhi. How long does it take for a constituent who is a Canadian to have an uncle, a nephew, or a niece from that part of the world come to join him or her? A year? Two years? Maybe three years or longer? We have had those cases.

As well, what I am suggesting is that on the family class basis, there is a frustration because, over-all, the percentage of family class immigration has gone down in recent years compared to being roughly 50 per cent of immigration. Therefore, if it is in the low thirties, that 20 per cent buffer is causing that frustration. Compounded on that is the time that is required for those individuals, particularly where we have not shifted resources quickly enough. One knows that there is a great deal of anguish and pain.

The message should also be very evident to the government of the day. We need to speed up those decisions; we need to give Canadians greater satisfaction, but not automatic satisfaction. I am not saying you simply have an absolute open door where there are no checks and balances. That is not what Canadians are asking for. That is not what any country should do.

We must have integrity in the system. We must protect our borders and our flanks. There is a legitimate need for continued immigration in this country. We have a dwindling birth rate and aging population. There are 70,000 people who leave our country every single year and do not return. Our economy in certain sectors still needs individuals that our schools are not producing. We still go to England to get our tool and die makers because we are not producing them in Canada. If you look at the relatively small population base for the size of our country, by the year 2000, unless we step things up or unless the birth rate goes up, we are going to be going backward in terms of population. That will have detrimental effects on the life and society as we know it.

Therefore, if those are facts of nation-building consequences—and they are—and if we know them today, then let us not deny our future by being complacent in the present. Let us be honest about our future challenges. Let us discuss with Canadians the needs of a positive immigration program. Let us begin to destroy the myths that embrace immigration. We know what those myths are. Let us be up front. If we do, there will be Canadians who will have greater understanding and awareness of our needs. There will be greater understanding and tolerance of new Canadians, and greater strength will be given to Canadians who have family with them in this great country.

At the time we are discussing these loans I suggest that the essence of it is to have families reunited. If we are supporting the unification of families, whether they be refugees or family class members, then we almost support a speedier determination for our refugee applicants, a speedier, more successful, more fair system for determination in sponsoring our applicants from abroad.

I take that signal from the government. I am indicating today that we will be supporting Bill C-77. We are hopeful that the government will support the amendment I will move at Committee of the Whole. We look forward to passage of this bill in this sitting on this day so that the minister can have an increased travel loans budget and have the flexibility to augment family reunification where it is required.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support this bill in principle and to indicate that our party will be voting for the adoption of the bill and also to support the amendment that has been moved by the hon. member for York West.

While the bill is essentially what is needed and there is some urgency about it, there are certain unsatisfactory aspects to it, some of which have been pointed out by the hon. member for York West.

This is a bill to amend the Immigration Act from 1978 which has been amended several times already on this point in the section that provides for loans to immigrants, to help immigrants pay their transportation or to help them pay for their medical examination. It has been especially important for refugees. The normal case with most immigrants is that they are able to pay their way, and they prefer to, as most of us would, rather than to borrow. But many other people who are refugees and living in refugee camps do not have the means. Therefore, this provision has become very important during the past decade for making Canada's refugee acceptance policies workable. It does this by amending the present law in two ways.

First, it removes from Parliament the power to set a limit on the loan. Second, it delegates that power to the minister and the cabinet. It does this by amending Section 114, subsection (1) so it would now read:

> "(u.1) prescribing the maximum amount of outstanding advances to the Minister under subsection 119(1);"

In other words, instead of setting the limit as it previously did in the act, it refers this to the minister. It further amends Section 119(3) to read:

> "(3) The total amount of outstanding advances to the Minister under subsection (1) shall not at any time exceed the amount prescribed under paragraph 114(1)(u.1)".

The effect of that is to leave the matter with the cabinet. As has been pointed out by my colleague from York West, while we understand the rationale put forward by the government—and there is an element of truth in it—there is also more than the truth in that rationale. Therefore, we are somewhat dissatisfied with it.

The bill is very necessary, particularly for refugees who often do not have the means to pay their way. These are not the refugees who have found their way to Canada and claim, after they arrived in Canada, that they are refugees, and are handled by our new refugee determination system under the refugee board chaired by Mr. Fairweather. These are the ones who are selected overseas by our immigration officers. When they are selected they are then, if necessary, and most of them do need it, offered the chance to borrow the money from this fund to pay for the medical examination and travel. After they come to Canada they are expected to repay the loan.

In the case of refugees, and any other immigrants to whom the loans have been made, the record has been startlingly good. There has been 98 per cent repayment of the loans at whatever interest the minister may have required with authorization of the cabinet. It is a very necessary humanitarian provision, otherwise many of these refugees after they have been selected simply could not come here. What is unsatisfactory about the manner in which this has been handled is that it was prompted by a crisis which the government allowed to run for half a year or more.

The government was aware that these loans were being taken up more quickly than before, as the member for Burlington said, because of events in eastern Europe. These events were not secret. They were published almost daily in The Globe and Mail. The minister and her staff were surely aware of them, and that the take up of the loans would for a while be faster than the rate of repayment, even though there is no dissatisfaction with the efforts of the refugees, or immigrants already here, in repaying their loans.

It seems it was a matter of some indifference to the minister and the cabinet during the first of these months, even though a year ago last June the government promised to take $5 million from this loan, according to what the member for Burlington has told us, to help in the special emergency in Southeast Asia, which was a good thing to do. But the government knew what it had done; at least I hope that the left hand knows what the right hand is doing. It knew that the loan fund was running low, but it waited until April of this year before taking any effective action.

In April of this year it notified all the sponsoring organizations of private sponsorships in Canada that as of the date of notification there would be no more loans until further notice.

Many national churches in Canada have master agreements by which many of their parishioners or congregations have sponsored refugees. The national organization has worked out the basic arrangements with the minister and the department so that a congregation which may not lack much experience in immigration and refugee procedures can undertake to sponsor one person or one family. This has happened in hundreds or thousands of cases across the country.

The agreement in these master agreements was that the government would provide the loan to bring the refugee or refugee family here. The sponsoring organization, the churches, and others would undertake full responsibility for the person's financial and other welfare for the first year after the refugee or the family arrived.

The churches and the other sponsoring organizations have kept their part of the arrangement, relying on the government to provide the funding for bringing the refugees here. The churches have committed their budgets to ensuring that the work will be done in Canada by local congregations. Members of congregation have committed their budgets to the same purpose, to the maintenance of the refugees after their arrival in Canada. Suddenly they are told that there are no more loans to bring in the refugees.

I am advised by the Interchurch Committee for Refugees that the agreement included under a clause of notice that either party may give notice of the discontinuation of this arrangement. Knowing at least since June of last year when it gave $5 million for the emergency in Southeast Asia, knowing that the people from eastern Europe were coming in faster and taking up the loans faster at the end of last year, and knowing that they were coming in still faster at the beginning of this year, the government gave no notice to the private sponsoring organizations, the churches, and others.

The government violated its obligation to give one-month's notice. If the churches had violated their obligation, we would be hearing loud complaints from certain people in the government. Certainly we would be hearing loud complaints from the member for Surrey—White Rock who, during the debate on Bill C-55, took every opportunity he could find to taunt the churches with not bringing in as many refugees as the government brought in. If the churches are so interested in refugees, he asked in committee and in this House, why do they not sponsor more of them?

When the churches had a chance to answer him—and usually he said it where they did not have a chance to answer—they pointed out that a church group might undertake to sponsor 500 refugees in one year but through government red tape only got perhaps 250. It was not the churches' fault that the other 250 did not come; it was government red tape.

The government red tape is such that when the churches agree to sponsor a refugee, say from Africa, who has been declared by the United Nations High Commission for Refugees to be a genuine refugee, the churches say: "Yes, bring that man" or "bring that family". The government does not trust the United Nations High Commission for Refugees enough to take its word.

The Canadian government funds the UNHCR, and I must say that it funds it generously compared to some other countries. In that respect the Government of Canada is doing a good job. It is providing the money that is absolutely essential for maintaining the life and the future of 15 million refugees in the world, mostly countries located in Africa and Asia. For some strange reason, after funding the UNHCR and after having a member appointed by this government sitting regularly on the executive of the United Nations High Commission for Refugees, the government will not take its word that Mr. So-and-So or Mrs. So-and-So and their children are refugees. The government will delay, sometimes for months or even for years, a decision as to whether the sponsoring group in Canada should be permitted to bring that designated refugee to Canada.

We do not know very much of what goes on in the refugee camps when the Canadian consular officers visit the camps to select refugees. There are strong indications that in fact refugees from those camps are selected first for their supposed economic benefit to Canada. Are they tool and die makers? Are they nuclear physicists? Do they have some specialties that we think Canada might want?

Only secondly are they selected for their need, either because they are in danger of damage to their health by a long stay there or because there is some other danger. In some of the camps there is danger from marauding armies. Either the country they live in or the country next door have occasionally invaded those camps and kidnapped refugees. So the delay is a danger to the refugee or the refugee family.

While our overseas officers are going through the camp to find out who would be the most useful people as immigrants to Canada and only secondarily looking at their refugee qualifications, the ones whom the United Nations High Commission has designated as the refugees most in need of being resettled are often told to wait and wait and wait and wait.

There is an extremely rigid medical standard used. The Mennonite Central Committee wrote to me several years ago concerning a very tragic case of a refugee family in the camp in Thailand. The family, after a wait, was finally selected and approved to come to Canada. The day they were to board the airplane the officials said: "No, this adult son cannot go with the rest because a recent x-ray shows he has a spot on his lung," apparently a touch of tuberculosis. The whole family stayed back. They would not go without him. The next year, when their turn came up again, this young man killed himself by hanging rather than run the risk of again presenting a barrier for the rest of his family coming as refugees.

If that had been an American refugee program, so I am advised by the Mennonite Central Committee, they would not have hesitated to bring him. They would have brought him to the United States and in a few months treated him for whatever tuberculosis infection he had. He and his family would then have been settled into the United States, but Canada has a much more fussy medical standard which has caused grief to many genuine and needy refugees.

There seems to be that attitude of neglect. We pride ourselves on being very favourable to refugees, but there are certain ways in which we are not. It is within that attitude of neglect that the government neglected for months and months to do anything about raising the loan limit to meet what the government knew well last year was the rising number of people coming from eastern Europe and using the loan arrangement. In order to meet the crisis at the end it said: "All the private sponsored refugees are cut off from loan possibilities".

I had a telex concerning two families in the Sudan being sponsored. There were three brothers: one was in Toronto, a Canadian citizen, and the other two were in the Sudan with their families. Eighteen people arrived at the airport ready to go to Canada. They were told: "Come to the airport and board the plane". They got to the airport and were told: "No, your tickets have not been paid for". What a way to treat people.

If the government had given the one-month notice, those people would not have been brought to the airport and then told just to stay there. What would they do for a month? Camp at the airport? Go back to the refugee camp? They had made all their arrangements to come. That is the kind of thing that this government did in a fully unfeeling way so far as I can see.

Although it was the government that had created the crisis by failing to take action before today for increasing the loan limit, the government put the burden of the crisis on the families who were sponsored by the private organizations. After urging private organizations beginning with former Minister MacDonald at the time of the boat people when Canada invented—I think the first country in the world—private sponsorship of refugees, the government urged people to organize more sponsors. Throughout the 1980s the churches had been promoting sponsorships. There are staff people hired in Toronto by the United and Anglican churches with the sole obligation of helping congregations and other sponsoring groups to sponsor refugees under these government programs.

When the former Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Employment and Immigration, the member for Surrey—White Rock, taunted the churches with not bringing in enough refugees, the churches kept on not only sponsoring but increasing their efforts. The reward for that to the churches is to be told now: "Your refugees cannot have the loan because the government has goofed".

It is a very, very unfeeling and insensitive program. The government likes to be proud of its achievement, but it does not like to see what its administrative actions are doing to the people concerned.

This brings me to another matter which is going to collide with this program if it is not attended to. We know that there are 15 million refugees in the world, mostly in what we call the Third World countries. They are third because they are less important than the first world, which is western Europe and North America, and less important than the second world, which is eastern Europe and the Soviet Union. For this purpose Australia and New Zealand are grouped with of course western Europe and North America. All the rest, all the non-white people, are considered to be Third World. This is where most of the refugees are now because of, primarily, civil wars and international wars fuelled by guns from the northern countries, not from those southern countries.

These people are congregated by the millions into the refugee camps of Latin America, Africa and Asia. This is where our officials go to select the refugees. They select the cream of the crop.

After the long delays that I have described and the added delay caused by the government's mishandling of the limit on the loan fund, refugees get to Canada and, in the public perception, are lumped together with those who came to make their claim in Canada.

I want to go back to the matter of the crisis of the loan fund. It is that crisis that the government has used to put the pressure on to say: "Look, we have only got a couple of more days or so of Parliament. We want to make sure that this crisis does not happen again, so leave it all to the minister". As my colleague from York West pointed out, this means that the minister can raise the loan limit, as well as reduce the loan limit. She could reduce it to zero if she so desired. I hope she will not.

There is very little way to become aware of this, unless a person becomes a hobby reader of The Canada Gazette and watches like a hawk everything that is published in it. I hope the minister would in fact report a major decision like this to the committee which deals with the matter, the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration.

Therefore I support the member's amendment which is:

> That Bill C-77 be amended in Clause 2 by adding immediately after line 18 at page 1 the following:
> "(3.1) The operation of subsections (1), (2) and (3) and any report made pursuant to subsection (4) shall be reviewed on a permanent basis by the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration of the House of Commons".

That will not necessarily cure all the problems, but it will somewhat widen the area of responsibility.

Finally, I want to acknowledge that the minister was kind enough to send a draft of the regulation which she intends, and I understand Cabinet has agreed, to enact once this bill which is passed today gives her the authority.

I have here the copy of an amendment which is that Section 45 of the immigration regulations, 1978, be amended by adding thereto immediately after subsection (3) thereof the following subsection: "(4). For the purpose of Section 119 of the Act the total amount of outstanding advances out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund to the minister shall not at any time exceed $150 million".

That is a very substantial increase on $90 million. I believe it is warranted in the circumstances. I am very glad that the minister has given us a copy of that regulation as some assurance that the action put into effect will be taken immediately with the authority given by this bill.

However, I want to deal, as I said, with the problem that is colliding with the matter of the refugees we bring from overseas. That is to say the government's persistent delay in dealing with those who have come to Canada to claim refugee status.

It is not because the government is letting anybody and everybody come easily into Canada and claim refugee status. The government has been very firm about placing visa requirements on any country from which many people have come claiming refugee status.

It has been very firm about laying the burden on the airlines, that the airline officials and ticket agents must examine a person's papers and determine whether the person has valid papers and a valid visa for coming to Canada. Otherwise, the airline is subject to a financial penalty.

The officials of the department remarked with great satisfaction last year after the program started that there was a reduction in the number of people coming to Canada claiming refugee status. These methods that the government has used, some of them enacted three years ago in Bill C-55, have had some effect.

It is not easy for a genuine refugee to get to Canada to claim refugee status. If he has to pay $5,000, $10,000 or $15,000 for a false visa—and apparently there is quite a trade in that—he has to find $5,000, $10,000 or $15,000 which is not easy.

If he is found to be a true refugee, then under international law his use of a false visa is not to be held against him. That is part of the United Nations convention on the status of refugees. The United Nations convention does not find him the $5,000, $10,000 or $15,000 to buy the false visa.

We have delays built into both the new system for refugee determination and the old system for dealing with the backlog. Most of the groups in Canada who sponsor refugees and who are concerned about the status of refugees in Canada belong to an umbrella group known as the Canadian Council for Refugees.

• (1220)

The Canadian Council for Refugees passed a resolution at its semi-annual conference which ended on June 2 of this year. I want to acquaint members of the House with this resolution. It is a resolution regarding the backlog clearance process. It states:

> Whereas:
> (1) In December 1989, the Standing Committee of the House of Commons on Labour, Employment and Immigration issued a Report on the Backlog Clearance Process which found the process to be seriously flawed and predicted that, without major changes, it would take four to six years to clear the Backlog;
> (2) In May 1990, the Minister of Employment and Immigration delivered the Government's response to the Standing Committee's Report, a response which side-stepped all major issues raised in the report;

There are certainly some of us on the committee who agree heartily with the Canadian Council for Refugees that the minister's response did side-step the major issues we raised. She did not really convince us that her program will be finished in two years, as she has always insisted, even though she changed the date of starting.

The resolution further states:

> (3) By mid-April 1990, only 26,711 of over 85,000 Backlog cases were in process, and less than half of those had received a final answer on their eligibility to remain in Canada;
> (4) The artificially imposed temporary status of persons in the Backlog results in tremendous and undeserved anxiety and suffering due to lack of certainty about the future and prolonged separation from family, and is cruel and unusual treatment and a gross violation of fundamental human rights;

There are families being broken, marriages broken because the husband is here and the wife and, perhaps, children are over there. After a year, two, three or maybe four years they begin to lose faith that the husband is really trying to bring them here. He writes and tells them: "I am trying. I am waiting and waiting to get my landed status. I cannot do anything until I get my landed status". Sometimes they do not believe him. They think he has found a better arrangement here. So a family is broken up and children are perhaps left without their father because of the delays in this program.

To continue with the resolution. It states:

> (5) The Minister of Employment and Immigration's resolve to undertake this deliberate and calculated action against asylum seekers has exposed all asylum seekers in the Backlog to grievous harm; and
> (6) Allowing the unresolved situation of those in the Backlog to continue constitutes an abuse of human rights and is just cause for due concern regarding equitable treatment of asylum seekers under the laws of Canada;

I would add "under the laws of the United Nations".

The resolution is this. It is not a new idea, but one that is gaining support in Canada.

> Be it resolved that the Executive of the Canadian Council for Refugees and its member agencies:
> (1) Express to the Minister of Employment and Immigration our disappointment in her flagrant disregard of the serious concerns raised in the Report of the House of Commons Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration which, if addressed, could have made a significant, positive impact on the processing of the Backlog.

Again, the minister took the full five months to respond to our report. I can understand why she did it, because I think she did not have a very good answer to give us. She gave us, perhaps, the best she thought she could, but certainly not the sort of answer we were looking for, let alone the answer the public is looking for.

> (2) Remind the Minister of Employment and Immigration of the Canadian Council for Refugees' previous calls for special measures to deal with the Backlog which would allow those in the Backlog to proceed immediately to landing, subject to admissibility criteria, and once again urgently request her to do the same in accordance with her discretionary powers and in accordance with Canada's domestic and international obligations with regard to human rights; and
> (3) Include in the aforementioned those asylum seekers who were in the country before May, 1986, but were not granted permission to stay in Canada under the Administrative Review Program, (ADR).

We can understand the sentiment the minister expresses. She has objected that it would not be right and it would not be wise to admit as landed immigrants to Canada people such as there are some in the backlog who had falsely claimed refugee status, perhaps even knowing it was false.

Therefore there is this long, dragged out process for sorting out which one stays, which one goes, this one stays, that one goes and so on. It is causing this hardship to the refugee claimants in the backlog. The CCR is mainly concerned in its resolution about sorting out who had a justifiable case and who did not. It is taking too long by the system the minister enacted a year and a half ago in her regulations.

There is a further problem. It is that the staff which is used to do that sorting out is badly needed somewhere else. There are 50 members of the Immigration and Refugee Board trained to examine the cases of refugee claimants who are being used not to examine the new refugee claimants who have come since January 1, 1989, but to examine cases in the old backlog. They do not do it alone; they do it in company with an adjudicator. An adjudicator is one of the most highly trained and most highly paid members of the immigration staff. There are other staff members used, such as case presenting officers, refugee officers, translators, clerks and so on.

It costs a lot to cause that much delay. The worst cost is that those adjudicators and those refugee board members are not available to work on the new system.

Of the 21,000 people who came to Canada last year, 1989, to claim refugee status and who were to be processed under the new system, less than half—about one-third—have had a decision. As of January, 1990, there were about 13,000 people who had come to Canada the year before to claim refugee status and who had not yet been told yes or no.

That was supposed to be the fast system. When the present minister and her predecessors argued for Bill C-55, the number one argument for it was that we must act quickly. There were two reasons given. They were two good reasons for acting quickly. One was that a genuine refugee claimant deserves justice quickly, deserves to be landed quickly, as the law would provide. The other is that Canada deserves to get rid of the phoneys quickly, as the law provides.

If, as the minister of the day predicted, those decisions were made within two or three months of a person's arrival in Canada, then there would be no refugee scams. There would be none of the racketeers telling people in Portugal, Brazil, Trinidad, India or anywhere else: "Give me $5,000 and I will get you into Canada. All you have to to do is say the word refugee. Even if they finally kick you out it will be in about three, four or five years and you will have earned a lot of money to take back home, after you have paid me". That is the kind of scam that developed once there was a long waiting period in the mid-1980s to get refugee status determined. Yet the government said that the most important thing we have to do with the new law is to make it fast.

The government has failed to do what it said was most important in the new law. Some 13,000 people who came to Canada in 1989 did not at year end have a decision. Some may have come the day before, some may have come many months before. The government itself predicted in the Estimates that by the end of 1990 the delay time would be about nine months. Presumably that was a cautious prediction. Presumably it could be more than nine months. But the government itself knows that the new system is not working the way the government intended it to work.

There is one reason above all others that accounts for it not working. The government is doing its work twice. The government has a system of double examination. First it examines the refugee claimant for what it calls a credible basis. Does he have any evidence upon which a refugee claim might be determined? If so, he goes to the full hearing of the refugee board; if not, he goes out. Ninety-six per cent of those who have come in and have got as far as that first hearing—some have not got there yet, after months—were judged to have that credible basis and were sent on to the refugee board.

• (1230)

The refugee board then has to do the same work all over again, with even more high priced staff, two refugee board members, each getting about $100,000 a year. The work is done twice. There is all the in-between work of scheduling, notifying the claimant, making sure that an interpreter, the presenting officer, and the board members are there, and so on. They also have to make sure that there is a room that they can use.

All that scheduling is part of the slowdown. It could be cleared with one stroke if the government would abolish that first step, the inquiry, at which sometimes several days are spent debating whether the person has any shred of evidence on which the board might find him a refugee.

They are supposed to find only that there is that possibility, but very often they go into detailed arguments. They try to find out the date the refugee left his home. If he said half a year ago and the date was two days earlier, they say he may not be telling the truth. They play judge and jury examining the details without remembering that their job is primarily to find if there seems to be a case that might be found valid. They try to do the board's work at the earliest stage.

The Canadian Council for Refugees has asked the government to close out that first stage, to use that staff and that money to speed up the process at the second stage, and also to meet Canada's international obligation for justice by having a review of the negative cases after the board hearing to make sure that the board may not have made, in some cases, a fatal mistake. They would not be reviewing 96 per cent of the cases because the board finds 75 per cent of the cases to be refugees. Of the remaining 25 per cent, some might have to be reviewed, but that would cost much less than doing 96 per cent of them twice.

Therefore, I am hoping that the minister will carefully consider what the Canadian Council for Refugees has said. Otherwise, the breakdown of the present refugee program will make this loan fund inoperative. It simply is not going to work if the whole refugee system gets bogged down by the government's insistence on trying to make an unworkable determination system work.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Speaker, I think you will find that there is unanimous consent that we refer the bill to a Committee of the Whole at this time.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and, by unanimous consent, the House went into committee thereon, Mr. Paproski in the Chair.

The Deputy Chairman: Order. House in Committee of the Whole on Bill C-77, an act to amend the Immigration Act.

Shall Clause 1 carry?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Clause 1 agreed to.

The Deputy Chairman: Shall Clause 2 carry?

On Clause 2—Limitation

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Chairman, on Clause 2 I would like to move, on behalf of the Liberal caucus, an amendment of which I gave notice to you and my colleagues earlier.

The purpose of the amendment that I will be moving is to try to have accountability through the Standing Committee of Labour, Employment and Immigration. Since we are moving the authority from legislation to regulations, I believe it is important for members, at least through the officials of the department or the minister, to have the ability to have discourse, be updated, review, and question.

The government may suggest that this amendment would be redundant because it would be covered in the Standing Orders. I suggest that this would give the principle of accountability maximum protection. Our Standing Orders can be changed or altered by a simple motion in the House, whereas if we attach this to the bill, any changes will have to be made through the normal legislative process of any bill.

It endorses the idea of some accountability and discussion with members of Parliament, rather than removing it completely. It protects it from any changes to the Standing Orders of the House through a simple motion. I think it is an honourable price to pay for the political green light and assurance that the opposition parties have given to the government today on this bill.

Therefore, I move:

That Bill C-77 be amended in Clause 2 by adding immediately after line 18 at page 1 the following:

"(a) The Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration of the House of Commons shall be empowered to examine the use of advances made pursuant to this Act."

The Deputy Chairman: On debate, the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina.

Mr. Heap: Mr. Chairman, on behalf of the New Democratic Party I would support and, if it is appropriate, second the motion of Mr. Marchi.

I believe that during the eighties, and particularly during the tenure of this government since 1984, there has been progress toward recognizing the need for a wider exercise of responsibility in the standing and special committees of Parliament. This has been reflected in the McGrath reforms. Because of this, for example, the present Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration did a study of the backlog program to help focus attention on and get some clear definition of some of the problems that existed then, most of which still exist.

• (1240)

It would be very useful if the act made quite clear that the committee is also empowered to review and examine the use made of these moneys advanced and to ask from time to time that the minister and the officials report to the committee on those matters. It is not enough to wait until the Estimates at the end of each year. Too much water can go under the bridge, as has already been shown by the government in this very matter. We should have had a report last fall, or at least at the beginning of this year. Placing this into the act would remind the minister, the officials, and the committee that we have a duty to make sure that this loan fund is working the way the minister, the officials, and Parliament as a whole intended that it should.

Therefore, I would hope that no difficulty would be found with it by the government side.

Mr. Kempling: Mr. Chairman, we do not find too much fault with the thrust of the amendment that the hon. member has put forward.

The reality is that this is, first, covered by our Standing Orders and, second, covered by section 119(4) of the act. It would appear to be redundant. We do not find it an offensive amendment. It is a matter of having the same thing three times—in the act, the Standing Orders, and through an amendment. I just question whether it is wise to proceed in this manner when it is already taken care of in the statute.

Would the hon. member like to comment on that?

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Chairman, I was listening to the parliamentary secretary and I was also trying to listen to the parliamentary secretary to the government House Leader. They are suggesting that perhaps there is some redundancy here. A very quick reading the portion of the act that was indicated to me I thought suggested a review of the previous moneys expended.

The purpose of my amendment was to have a somewhat more elaborate process so that, either through an annual report or a report to the committee of the previous month's expenditures, we have a somewhat more elaborate assurance that the committee may, in fact, engage the minister and/or her officials in a discussion as to where things sit for the coming months and the coming fiscal year so that we can see where the demands are coming from. In that way, we will not simply have a review mirroring the reading of the situation because we are removing it from the legislative stream of things.

Therefore, the purpose of my amendment was to ensure that in the future the committee and its members have some degree of knowledge and say with the minister as to how these moneys will be changed or spent. Before, when there was need for an amendment, at least one had in advance the reasons for the amendment. One would know that they would want to increase from 150 to 200 because that is the number of people who had requested it. These are the numbers of applicants. There was a rationale behind it.

I believe that the existing portions of the act which I read very quickly would provide for more of an updating as to what has happened as opposed to what will happen or could happen in a given situation. At this stage I would still like to pursue the relevancy of the amendment I offered.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Chairman, I am looking at the section of the act as well as the amendment that has been proposed by the hon. member. I think I have a sense of what he is trying to accomplish. I am just not sure that his amendment would not, in fact, undermine a little bit of what he is trying to accomplish.

I want to read the specific section of the act. Section 119(4) reads:

> The Minister shall, within six months following the commencement of each fiscal year or, if Parliament is not then sitting, within the first fifteen days next thereafter that either House of Parliament is sitting, cause to be laid before Parliament a report setting out the total number and amount of loans made under subsection (1) during the preceding fiscal year.

Subsection 1, of course, describes exactly what we are after here.

There are a couple of key phrases in the subsection. The first is that this automatically happens on an annual basis. Every year this particular report is tabled in the House. As our Standing Orders provide, any report that is tabled in the House is then automatically referred to the specific standing committee.

That deals with several things. First, every year it is done. Second, it is automatically referred to the committee. Third, it has some specifics in terms of the details, which I believe are what the hon. member wants.

The hon. member's amendment reads as follows:

The Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration of the House of Commons—

He specifies the specific committee but, of course, that is provided for by our Standing Orders.

—shall be empowered to examine—

They are automatically empowered to examine right now without any changes to the act.

—advances made pursuant to this act.

That is only more general wording which accomplishes exactly what I believe is taken care of by the act itself. The beauty of the wording in the act is that it is a little more specific and, therefore, if we were to end up with some kind of a court challenge or court intervention, of which we as legislators know we have to be so careful, the more specific wording would, I believe, have a better chance of surviving. This general wording may well leave us in a situation that is very much open to interpretation and problems.

Therefore, the principle of the hon. member's amendment is well understood, but I think he is in fact putting some redundancy into the act, and I think we should be very careful of doing that.

Mr. Heap: Mr. Chairman, I thank the hon. member for drawing to my attention, and perhaps to the hon. member for York West's attention, the section of the act to which he has been speaking.

There are two matters not provided for there. First, the report must be made within six months following the commencement of each fiscal year or, if Parliament is not then sitting, within the first 15 days next thereafter. In other words, in 1990 that report will not be made until after the summer, six months after the beginning of the fiscal year. That does not do us any good for the present crisis.

Second, the report, as defined here, is only intended to deal with what is passed. Here are the number of loans, the number of dollars, the number of people and so on, without any projection toward the future. What we are concerned with and what I thought might be included in the general wording of the motion of the member for York West, is that the minister would report at whatever time of the year either the minister thought appropriate or the committee requested and would include, especially if requested, a projection.

For example, she might have reported in December of 1989 that there is a rise in the take-up of the loans and that it is going to approach the limit, or perhaps in February or March she might have reported that. That would have been very helpful in encouraging whatever action is needed by Parliament or the cabinet. It would at least support their action. It would also give notice to those in the public who have been materially concerned, those who are providing for refugees when they get here, those who are working at the selection of refugees overseas and who rely on the loan system as part of the support arrangements. Although the report, as provided for in the act, should be of some value, it does not catch an emergency like the one which occasioned Bill C-77.

I do not know whether it is possible to make any changes in the wording of the amendment now. I am not sure if there is any procedure by which we could do that. It seems to me that we and the minister's representatives are very close on this matter. We agree in principle. The problem, if any, would be in the actual wording. Certainly I do not want to cause a lawsuit. However, the present section does not provide for either recognizing an emergency that has begun or forecasting an emergency that there is good reason to foresee.

Some arrangement for flagging that would be very useful to prevent this kind of problem from happening again. I was told by the minister's office that it took six months to get this amendment through cabinet and it would only take three months to get a regulation through cabinet. That may be, but even three months can run us into an emergency the way things are happening in eastern Europe and in other parts of the world.

I would hope that the act could be amended to provide a closer liaison between the minister and the standing committee.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, I do not want to prolong this debate unnecessarily. I have just two quick comments.

First, the section of the act which exists at the moment does not restrict the minister from filing a report at any time. It does specify that at a minimum she would have to respond within six months following the commencement of each fiscal year. That is the minimum. If we were to specify that any other way, as I think the member is trying to do, we would probably end up limiting possibilities rather than increasing them.

Second, under the present Standing Orders, a committee has a right to examine any number of issues when the ministers are before it on the Estimates or whatever other issue. Therefore, I sincerely believe that this section of the act is the best way to accomplish what the hon. members are after. It does meet all of those goals.

As much as I would like to accommodate them by accepting this amendment, I think that we would be building redundancy into the act by putting in another clause that says the same thing. I believe that the existing wording is probably the better wording for all of our concerns.

Mr. Marchi: Mr. Chairman, I do not have any wish to prolong this either. Perhaps these will be my final comments.

With respect to the Standing Orders giving powers to committee, I repeat that those Standing Orders can be wiped out by a motion, whereas this has greater legislative protection.

Second, with respect to section 119(4) of the Immigration Act, the key operative words, in my humble opinion, are that the report will only be on the preceding fiscal year. The operative words in my amendment would provide for the examination of the use of advances made pursuant to this act, which has a present, a past and a future application.

That is what we wish to strengthen. I do not simply wish to have a report from Parliament or a committee telling me what has happened. I am more concerned in having a debate in the committee with the minister about what is going to happen given the demands, the fiscal arrangements and the program.

I believe there is a difference between what I am proposing in the amendment and what is in the act. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that at the end of the day we will still want to advance this amendment.

The Deputy Chairman: Members have heard the terms of the amendment. Is it the pleasure of the committee to adopt the amendment?

Some hon. members: On division.

Mr. Cooper: Negatived on division.

Amendment (Mr. Marchi) negatived.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Title agreed to.

Bill reported.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (for the Minister of Employment and Immigration) moved that the bill be concurred in.

The Deputy Chairman: When shall the bill be read the third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Loiselle (for the Minister of Employment and Immigration) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

NATIONAL ACCESS AWARENESS WEEK

Ms. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, since this is National Access Awareness Week, I would like to invite hon. members to urge all Canadians who are responsible for organizing special activities in their ridings to use a progress report.

A progress report helps communities to monitor change. By using the report, organizers will remember the purpose of National Access Awareness Week which is to enhance the economic and social integration of the disabled.

Mr. Speaker, I am sure this special week will be very successful in bringing the government closer to its goal of building a better and more just society for all Canadians.

WESTERN DIVERSIFICATION

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, yesterday Impact Packaging broke sod for its $25 million wastepaper molding plant in Swift Current. The plant will use recycled paper to produce grocery trays which are biodegradable and fully recyclable.

Western Economic Diversification has made a $5,055,000 million repayable contribution to this project which will initially provide 85 new jobs. These are permanent jobs based on the leading edge of environmentally sound technology. Most important of all, these jobs are totally unrelated to agriculture and represent genuine diversification in an area so dependent on export wheat.

I join all residents of Swift Current and southwestern Saskatchewan in congratulating Impact Packaging and the three levels of government on this important initiative. New product, new market, new technology, new jobs in rural western Canada; that's what western diversification is all about.

NATIONAL LIBERAL TASK FORCE ON MUNICIPAL INFRASTRUCTURE

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Mr. Speaker, after several months of touring towns and cities across Canada, the member for Nepean and myself, as co-chair of the National Liberal Task Force on Municipal Infrastructure, released a report yesterday, on behalf of the Liberal Party of Canada.

The facts are astonishing. Right now, 90 per cent of the raw sewage east of Ontario is being released into our rivers and waterways without proper treatment. In Newfoundland, over 80 per cent of the population do not have properly treated drinking water. We now learn that 10.3 per cent of carbon dioxide emissions come from automobile travel. We also know that travelling on roads which are in poor condition uses even more fuel and does more damage to our environment.

We call on the government to re-assume its responsibility for these environmental dangers and work with the municipalities and provinces to establish national criteria for infrastructure. Setting national criteria guidelines will ensure environmental protection and will provide uniform levels of service for all Canadians. This is a vital first step if we are going to halt further damage to our environment.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, yesterday we learned that 334 more Canadian workers have lost their jobs because of this government's bungling of the economy.

Fruehauf Canada is closing its Brantford trailer plant in the face of intense competition from U.S. trucking firms; competition that Fruehauf's president says is rigged against us by our high dollar policy, our high interest policy, our high tax policy and other policies too despicably low to mention here.

Meanwhile, Canadian truckers, the natural market for Canadian-made trucks, are reeling from the deadly one-two punch of free trade and deregulation, unable to get even their most basic grievances addressed unless they blockade a bridge in the process.

To what extremes will these and other Canadian workers have to resort to next before this government acts to save their jobs and their futures.

BALTIC STATES

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, today, June 14, 1990, Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania are commemorating the forty-ninth anniversary of the deportation of their peoples to Siberia and the fiftieth anniversary of the illegal Soviet annexation of the Baltic States by flying their national flags at half mast.

On a more positive note, however, the three Baltic States met with Mr. Gorbachev yesterday in a promising move which clearly indicates a new dedication on behalf of all parties to reach a satisfactory settlement on the question of Baltic independence.

At the same time, the announcement that Moscow has agreed to partially lift the economic sanctions against Lithuania is to be applauded.

However, the Soviets have yet to act on the promise and it is our hope that their intentions lead to a complete lifting of the blockade. Even so, Soviet border authorities continue to prevent the delivery of medical supplies that are so urgently needed.

With this in mind, I call on the Secretary of State for External Affairs to appeal to the Soviet authorities to allow the shipments of medical goods and to offer support for the negotiations for full independence of the Baltic States.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, as a member for Metropolitan Toronto, I want to say that I cannot think of anything I voted for in this Parliament that has been popular in Toronto.

Toronto residents feel grossly overtaxed, unappreciated, and increasingly abandoned by senior governments as they face massive social and environmental problems.

But I support programs, to help other people and to help the regions, that are not popular in Toronto, because I believe they are in the national interest. Under the British parliamentary system, we are elected not simply to represent our constituents but rather to deliberate and participate in formulating decisions that are in the long-term national interest.

I therefore urge all members of the provincial legislatures in New Brunswick, Newfoundland, and Manitoba to show confidence in Quebec and Canada by approving the Meech Lake Accord in the national interest.

Say "welcome" to Quebec and "yes" to Canada. Then let us all sit down and deal with other constitutional issues such as additional rights for aboriginal people, women, and minorities and of course Senate reform.

BALTIC STATES

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, today marks the fiftieth anniversary of the terror brought down by Stalin upon Estonia, Latvia, and Lithuania. On this day the Soviet Union invaded, seized, and illegally incorporated all three Baltic States.

Hundreds of thousands of men, women, and children were deported to the desolate regions of the U.S.S.R. Many died on the way to the Gulag. Once there, they were subjected to inhumane living conditions, suffering under forced labour and daily hunger. In the end, as a result of these policies, fully one-third of the Baltic population perished.

The Baltic States and the restoration of their independence is one of the last crimes of World War II yet to be resolved. On this day I urge all members not only to remember this tragedy, but to actively participate in finding ways to correct this injustice.

With recent developments in Moscow there seems to be a glimmer of hope that a solution is on the way. I would join today with the Baltic peoples in Canada and across the world in their day of great sorrow and would also hope that we can proclaim it the Baltic Freedom Day.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Pat Sobeski (Cambridge): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Veterans Affairs had good news for veterans and their dependants when he spoke to the Dominion Convention of the Royal Canadian Legion on Monday.

Veterans were told of the improvements to government plans once the appropriate legislation and regulations are in place. Here is a sample of the improvements they can look forward to: regulations will be changed so that spouses of deceased veterans will be provided with certain services under the Veterans Independence Program for a period of up to a year following the veteran's death.

Also, regulations will be changed to increase as of April 1, 1991, income protection for spouses of veterans who are under long-term care.

Legislation will also be introduced to pay interest on veterans' trust funds administered by Veterans Affairs.

Legislation will be introduced to set up a special trust fund for the benefit of needy veterans and their dependants using money left unclaimed on the death of a veteran.

The necessary regulations will be pre-gazetted in the next two weeks and I am sure members of all parties will co-operate as usual in seeing that the upcoming legislation favouring veterans gets speedy and sympathetic consideration.

NATIONAL ACCESS AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, today is the fifth day of Canada's third annual National Access Awareness Week.

It is a week of opportunity to celebrate the accomplishments of disabled Canadians, to assess the availability of services and facilities for them, and to plan improvements for the future.

It is also a week of opportunity for us to reaffirm our belief that they should have equal access to transportation, housing, employment, recreation, and education. It is a time for the private and public sectors to rededicate themselves to the continuing integration in society of all people with disabilities.

• (1410)

My wife and I were therefore extremely delighted when, earlier this week, we again visited the Shalom Residence for disabled people in my constituency to witness firsthand how the residents live integrated with the rest of the community.

Disabled people have aspirations as noble as those of the able bodied. Equal access to basic needs for the disabled is both an aspiration and a basic right.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Science)): Mr. Speaker, last week, when the country was on the verge of breaking apart, we could watch what was happening live, on CBC Newsworld, the English news channel.

The difference between Francophones and Anglophones was more obvious than ever before, since the CBC French network only showed us tapes and only during scheduled news programs.

On behalf of all French Canadians in this country, I ask the CBC and the CRTC to be fair and to set up a French news network, and I ask the Minister of Communications to ensure this is done.

It is a matter of equity: there should not be two classes of Canadians.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Right on!

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

MOUVEMENT LES RETROUVAILLES

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity to offer special congratulations to the Mouvement les retrouvailles in Quebec.

This agency acts with warmth and compassion to help those who are looking for their parents. For the very first time I attended a ceremony in Gatineau yesterday evening, where a son was reunited with his mother, one of several cases that had a happy ending.

I would like to draw your attention to the work being done by Mr. and Mrs. de Repentigny and their committee who approach this important task with love and compassion. I want them to know that their work is appreciated and deserves our recognition.

Mr. Speaker, these are some of the unsung heroes of our society.

ABORTION

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, this week a 20-year old Toronto woman bled to death from a self-induced abortion, using a coat hanger. Apparently, this was the first death from abortion in 20 years.

Also, a 16-year old girl in the Kitchener—Waterloo area recently had a back street abortion. Access to safe, medical abortions has already been diminished since Bill C-43 was passed in this House.

Some doctors have stopped performing abortions because of this government's bill. Women are afraid they will not be able to obtain safe, medical abortions. I did not ask a question on this issue today because it is not a matter of gaining political Brownie points and saying to this government: "I told you so."

This issue is serious and it is preventable. I call on the Prime Minister and his cabinet to have the sense and compassion not to proclaim the bill. Please, we cannot afford another tragedy like this one. It is not too late to save other women from this horrible and unnecessary death.

NATIONAL ACCESS AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, the week of June 10 to 16 has been declared National Access Awareness Week.

This is a special opportunity for individuals, voluteer organizations, businesses large and small and governments to promote the integration of Canada's 3.5 million disabled people.

Integration is much more than eliminating physical obstacles; it means changing attitudes and ways of doing things to enable everyone who has a handicap, whether visible or not, to participate in the life of their community.

Mr. Speaker, I am very aware of this issue because for many years, my mother has had to move about in a wheelchair.

I take this opportunity to point out the dedication of many volunteers and organizations in my riding such as the Office des personnes handicapées du Québec, headquartered in Drummondville, the Drummondville Disabled Persons' Association and the Regional Handicapped Recreation Association of Central Quebec which will hold sports and games for disabled people in Drummondville October 5 to 8. Eight hundred participants from the province of Quebec are expected at this event, including champions Douglas Lyons and André Viger.

Mr. Speaker, let us help Canadians have access to equality.

BROCKVILLE

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, for the past several months the city of Brockville has been depicted as the place in Canada where the nightly pastime is to burn Quebec flags. This was alluded to again in this House as recently as yesterday.

For those interested in the truth, the incident which gained national attention was a one-time, isolated, very regrettable one, carried out in Brockville only because the city was hosting the Ontario government caucus last September and therefore providing a natural forum for a few people unknown to most Brockville residents, a forum for these strangers to assemble briefly and express themselves in a very unacceptable way.

In the hope that we could finally put the event to rest once and for all, let me tell all hon. members that Brockville is a city of immense goodwill. If they need further convincing, they should come to our annual goodwill festival known as Riverfest which runs from June 22 to July 1. They can come and draw their own conclusions as to the goodwill and sincerity of the people of Brockville and area.

CANADIAN AIR

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, 340 workers from Canadian Air in Richmond work in the Canadian reservations office. That office handles all calls from B.C. and also handles calls from the continental U.S.A. Those U.S. originating calls constitute 30 per cent of the workload in the reservations office, which amounts to about 90,000 calls a month.

On May 8, 1990, Canadian Air announced its intention to open an office in Tampa, Florida and to hire 130 people to do the job in Tampa. The employer claims no one will be laid off. The workers do not believe it.

Is this movement of Canadian jobs to Tampa by Canadian Air the result of deregulation? Is it the result of free trade? Or, is it the result of a Canadian company chasing a buck at the expense of its workers?

Whatever the reason, the workers at Canadian Air believe those jobs should stay in Canada. They have mounted a campaign which my colleagues and I support that says to Canadian Air: "Don't Tampa with my job".

TRADE

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister.

It has been reported today that the Minister for International Trade had a meeting in Montreal last Tuesday with the Mexican Minister of Trade. I ask the Deputy Prime Minister: Why did the Minister for International Trade have this meeting behind closed doors and exactly what was the purpose of this meeting?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition himself was for a long time a minister of the Crown. He knows it is not extraordinary for ministers to hold meetings behind closed doors—

An hon. member: Just a normal secret meeting.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Not for any government, if I may say so to the member for Vancouver Quadra.

There is a suggestion that this was a secret meeting. It was not secret at all. It was a normal meeting, suggested by the Mexicans who wanted to bring Canada up to date about their views on discussions they are having with the United States in regard to the possibility of a trade agreement between the United States and Mexico.

We were pleased that during the discussion the Mexicans undertook to keep Canada fully advised and fully briefed on developments in those discussions between Mexico and the U.S. which may be of interest to Canada.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that the meeting in question, which he admits was a secret meeting, was for the purpose of the Mexican Minister for International Trade informing our Minister for International Trade about the progress of talks between the United States and Mexico. I am sure the President of Mexico would be intrigued by this answer because yesterday in Mexico City he said that these talks were "to create the conditions for greater dialogue with the objective of establishing a free trade agreement with Canada".

• (1420)

I ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs or the Deputy Prime Minister: Is the government now involved in discussions with the objective of establishing a free trade agreement between Canada and Mexico? If so, why is the government doing this without first having wide consultations with Canadians on whether this should be done at all?

Should the government not first have open public hearings through the external affairs and trade committee of this House, bearing in mind the serious possible adverse impact of such an agreement on jobs and industry in this country?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, the answer to the question is a categoric no. There are no discussions under way between Canada and Mexico with an eye to concluding a free trade agreement between Canada and Mexico, none.

What is happening is that there has been an agreement by the President of Mexico and the President of the United States to have their senior officials consider whether it is sensible for those two countries to enter into a trade agreement. Naturally an agreement of that kind may affect Canada's interests. Naturally Canada wants to know whether our interests are affected. When we have that kind of information we will come to a decision in Canada as to what we want to do with those developments.

The Leader of the Opposition asks me if there will be consultation with Parliament, the provinces, and industry. Yes, there will be. As I have said in the House on several occasions—

Mr. Peterson: When?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): I am asked by a Liberal member when. I think he was here the other day when I said that my colleague the Minister for International Trade would be appearing before the standing committee before the end of this month. He looks forward to the opportunity to discuss this matter with the committee.

[Translation]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, could the Secretary of State for External Affairs clear up the contradiction between his explanation of the purpose of thse dicussions between the Minister for International Trade and his Mexican counterpart and the statement of the Mexican President who said the discussions are aimed at defining the conditions of a free trade agreement between Canada and Mexico. Why this contradiction?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Of course, Mr. Speaker, I cannot speak for the President of Mexico, but I can certainly speak for Canada and for my colleague the Minister for International Trade. Canada is not discussing with either the Americans or the Mexicans concerning a free trade agreement involving the three countries, nor have we begun bilateral talks on a Canada–Mexico free trade deal. We are simply gathering information about the objectives of both Americans and Mexicans with respect to their own views on a potential treaty between the two countries.

Should such a treaty become reality it might have implications for Canada. Canada wants to be kept informed as to what these implications might be for this country. Then, in light of that information, Canada will make its own decisions after public consultations with Parliament, the provinces, and whatever Canadian industry might be involved.

ROUTE CANADA

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport.

In the agreement of purchase and sale when the government gave away Route Canada, the government insisted that CN include a clause that would require the new owners to use their best efforts to carry on business for at least three years. That is because the government did not want the company to come tumbling down before the 1988 election, and the government considered a large number of lay–offs to be politically embarrassing.

Why does the government not admit that it was never concerned about the workers of Route Canada? It only considered these workers who were losing their jobs and political futures as nothing more than an embarrassment.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I and everyone who understands anything about business reject completely out of hand the premise of my hon. friend's question.

I want to read from the letter from Canadian National to The Toronto Star. The only accurate way to get this on the record is to read it: "Our alternative"—this is CN—"to the sale was to close down CN Route and lay off all staff in 1985."

That is the alternative. It was losing $40 million to $50 million a year. That is the Liberal way of doing things. It could have continued to lose $40 million to $50 million. It could not get a Maislin–type loan, which was the Liberal–type way of doing things. The alternative was to sell it to Route Canada and give it an opportunity to try to make a go of it.

We acted in the best interests of the employees in all cases, in all the things we did subsequent to the agreement of purchase and sale being sold. I would think that in view of today's economy in the Atlantic provinces my hon. friend might have other things to ask about rather than something that is this old.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport is saying that the best deal the government could get was to sell the company to three people who did not use any of their own money. They used the money from a mortgage on valuable properties which the government gave them. One of the three could not even get a credit card.

The hon. member is trying to tell us that no one in Canada could come up with a better deal than giving away that company to those three people. The government's treatment of the workers of Route Canada is intolerable.

When is the government going to compensate these workers and their families for the financial hardship which the government caused as a result of its negligence and callous disregard?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, neither repetition nor shouting at the top of one's lungs gives any strength to allegations that do not have any foundation. My hon. friend knows that.

I will read from the letter again: "In the process, we negotiated special arrangements to help ease the impact on employees not required to operate the new company profitably. We have met every one of our commitments to employees, pensioners, customers and communities, including the payment of $23 million for separation and related costs of former CN Route employees".

I submit that no matter how many times my hon. friend repeats the allegations and no matter how loud he does it, he knows that CN did the best it could for the employees and for the people of Canada.

TRADE

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday afternoon of this past week the Minister for International Trade said that no decision had been taken on further involvement in the U.S.—Mexico free trade talks. However, by Tuesday evening we discovered that the minister met with Mexico's trade minister.

The President of Mexico says that this was because he was seeking a free trade deal with Canada too. I have to ask the government why it was pretending that it had not decided on closer involvement with these talks when the Prime Minister discussed them with President Salinas earlier this year, when President Bush phoned the Prime Minister this week, and now when the trade minister of Mexico came to this country.

Why do we have this incredible game of hide-and-go-seek that is trying to cover this up for the Canadian people?

• (1430)

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am absolutely certain it is not the intention of the hon. member, but there is no doubt that statements like his mislead the people of Canada. I know that that is not his intention, but there is no doubt at all that statements like this would mislead people to think that Canada is discussing with the United States or with Mexico the entry by Canada into a free trade agreement with those two countries. We are not.

The statements that were made by the Minister for International Trade, by myself, and by the Prime Minister, have been consistent on this question. I repeat them again to the hon. member and I call upon him to exercise his judgement as a member of Parliament not to try to create false fears in the country.

There has been a decision taken by the presidents of two other countries, Mexico and the United States, to determine whether it is in their interest to proceed with negotiation of a trade agreement. If they decide to do that, there may well be some implication on the interests of Canada. We, naturally, are keeping in touch with the Mexicans, we are keeping in touch with the Americans to see what it is they are discussing, whether it might have some implication for Canada, and if it does, we will then take decisions as to what Canada should do.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I simply note the facts as they have come out. If the facts suggest that the government is wrong, that is not my fault; that is the government's fault.

On Tuesday, yet another manufacturer, Fruehauf, said it was shutting its Brantford plant, cutting 334 jobs. As the company said, "Very simply, the playing field is not level".

Does the government not realize that Mexico's low wages, poor social benefits, slack environmental laws would tilt that playing field even more firmly against Canada's interest? Will this government today commit itself against any free trade deal with Mexico?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there are two things I want to say. The first is that we are not discussing a free trade arrangement with Mexico or a tripartite free trade arrangement in North America. We are not doing that. We are trying to gather information about discussions that might be going on and we will then come to a judgement.

As I have said in the House on several occasions, there will be an opportunity to discuss that in standing committee. There will be consultations with the provinces, with industry, and with labour unions, if the member thinks that would be productive, about any decisions that we might take.

The other point, Sir, that is very important to make is that the New Democratic Party prides itself on being a party that takes a broad world view of events. It encourages us to be active in developing the Third World. Yet the hon. member now is pandering to anti-Mexico feelings here in the House of Commons. I think that is shameful.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Deputy Prime Minister regarding the free trade agreement. He will remember that during the discussions there was much concern about the intention of selling massive amounts of Canadian water to the United States.

Just a few shorts months ago, the Minister for International Trade said in Montreal that all the free trade agreement provides, for the record, is the elimination of tariffs on the export of bottled water, and he went on for quite some time to talk about Perrier and sparkling water, and so on.

The Deputy Prime Minister will know from reading the press today that three Canadian firms are offering to sell massive amounts of Canadian water to Santa Barbara, California.

Is the Deputy Prime Minister concerned, in the absence of a national water policy for which we have been waiting for many months, that this will not set a precedent? Does the Government of Canada support the selling of massive amounts of Canadian water to the United States?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I am a little surprised at the hon. member's currency because it is not that this story was in the papers today. The story was in the papers three or four days ago. He is remarkably late, given his usual source of the newspapers as his basis for comment in the House.

But on the substance of the matter, the hon. member knows that any proposal to export water must be consistent with the clear federal water policy that was established in 1987. That policy clearly states the government's opposition to large scale water exports by interbasin transfer.

FINANCE

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

The bank rate in Canada went up again today. Last week, the Minister of Finance told Canadians that if the Meech Lake impasse was not resolved, interest rates would remain very high. This week, the Governor of the Bank of Canada tells us that even if Meech Lake is ratified, there will be no drop in interest rates.

I would like to ask the Minister of Finance this: Can we take the minister at his word, since he testified before the Standing Committee on Finance that if Meech Lake is passed, Canadians will finally see interest rates go down in this country?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Gloucester for his question. This is a very important issue. Our monetary policy is aimed at creating the best possible environment for allowing interest rates to go down and stay down.

Obviously, in a market where capital can move freely, any element of instability makes investors stop and think, although we should not exaggerate the importance of certain factors either. However, at the present time, the main reason why interest rates remain high is because inflationary pressures continue to exist.

I can inform the hon. member for Gloucester, however, that we have some indication that inflation is starting to slow down. The pressure is starting to ease, and I am confident—indeed I hope for the sake of all Canadians—that we will soon be able to announce that our policy has been successful and will see interest rates go down on a more permanent basis.

[English]

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, since the Minister of State for Finance wants to make some announcements, perhaps the minister would be kind enough to explain to the House, in light of questions put now by the Chamber of Commerce, by the Trust Companies Association of Canada, by the Canadian Bankers Association, by the insurance industry, if the long-awaited financial institution reform legislation will be brought before this House in the very near future? Can he give us a date on that today?

[Translation]

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is to be commended for his interest in a sector that is indeed very important.

As a member of the Standing Committee on Finance, he is of course aware that my department, the Department of Finance, has tabled a rather impressive number of budget bills, so that we have taken up a considerable amount of the time of the House.

These bills involve changes that are extremely important and, in some cases, will update legislation that has been left untouched for 70 years. We are determined to table these bills as soon as possible, as soon as we can get them on the agenda of the House.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs in regard to the appointment of Mr. Nickolas Murray, the present head of the Consumers Association of Canada, as chairman of the new GST monitoring agency.

Members and former presidents of the Consumers Association have denounced this appointment. How can Mr. Murray serve two masters? On the one hand, he serves as head of an independent consumer advocacy group, and on the other hand, he will preside over the GST information office, a powerless gimmick which will make him a lap-dog rather than a watch-dog.

What is the government trying to do, pacify the public, muzzle the Consumers Association, or both?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, that question is as nonsensical today as it was yesterday. The hon. member knows that the new consumer information office is an independent body, arm's length to the minister and to the government.

The hon. member should know, and this is what I do not understand, that Mr. Murray has served and continues to serve the interests of all consumers, as the head of the Consumers Association of Canada. He will now continue to serve the consumers of Canada as the head of the new consumer information office.

I cannot, for the life of me, see any indication of a conflict of interest when a highly qualified individual, in the person of Nickolas Murray, who has the best interest of the consumers at heart, is asked to head an agency of this nature for the benefit of all consumers in Canada.

• (1440)

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the minister's reply is typical of the minister and his colleagues. My second question is directed to the same minister. Does he not believe that the only decent way out is to demand taht Mr. Murray resign, either from the consumers' association or from his position as head of the GST consumer information office, which in any case is just a public relations office for the governement?

[English]

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, if there was some potential benefit to Mr. Murray, or if there was some sort of a conflict of interest against the benefits of consumers in this country, then of course the appointment would not have taken place.

The fact is that the interests that Mr. Murray has in his heart, his soul, and in his mind are for the benefit of all consumers, whether in his capacity as head of the Consumers Association of Canada, or in his new capacity as the head of the consumer information office.

I do not understand where the hon. member is coming from when he should be rejoicing, as the consumers are, that the government had the will, the right and the decency to appoint somebody with such an interest in consumers as Mr. Nickolas Murray.

BRITISH COLUMBIA FLOODING—EMERGENCY RELIEF

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for Emergency Preparedness.

The interior of British Columbia, including areas from Prince George to Oliver, has received extensive flood damage as a result of sustained heavy rains. Nine people are now confirmed or believed dead from flood waters and mud slides. Helicopter evacuation of stranded residents has been initiated and flash flood alerts have been issued.

The Okanagan Lake system is now 20 centimetres above full pool and is expected to rise another 16 to possibly 30 centimetres, depending on the weather.

My question to the minister is whether the minister has responded to a B.C. government request for emergency relief that was issued today under the federal government's Disaster Assistance Program?

Second, will the minister agree to provide immediate assistance on this very urgent matter?

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I think the House sympathizes with the people of British Columbia who are experiencing a disastrous situation at the present time. The minister responsible for disaster assistance is the Minister of National Defence. He has received a request for financial assistance from British Columbia, and I can confirm today that he will provide the financial assistance requested—in line with a policy that was developed a few years ago—in order to help British Columbia cope with these disastrous conditions.

[English]

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Mr. Speaker, I thank the member for the answer to the question.

I would like to add that the mountain snow packs in the interior of British Columbia are presently exceeding normal levels. In fact, we are now returning to the possibility of warm seasonal weather which has set the stage for even further wide-spread damage.

Can the minister assure the residents of British Columbia that the full resources of the federal Government of Canada, including the possible use of National Defence personnel, will be made available should the melting snow packs or continued heavy rains create an even greater potential for damage?

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Guy Hudon (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the situation is being monitored very carefully through our National Defence information centre. I think that considering our present policy, the minister is always prepared to respond to any request to help people in need. Our response will depend on the findings of our information centre and, what is requested by the Government of British Columbia which will determine with residents the amount of assistance needed.

FISHERIES

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Acting Minister of Fisheries. The minister will know that the commercial salmon quota on the southern coast of Labrador has been reduced by 43 per cent this year. This comes at a time when there is a crisis in the groundfish industry and an ice blockade on the coast of Labrador.

My question is very simple. Why is it that the minister has reduced the salmon quota to Labrador fishermen, many of whom are members of the Labrador Métis Association, at this critical time? Will he now rescind this Draconian measure by his department and give back to Labrador fishermen their only means of earning a livelihood?

Mr. Ross Reid (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Fisheries and Oceans): Mr. Speaker, the simple answer to the question is that in the interest of conservation, the Minister of Fisheries, in consultation with user groups and the provincial government, each year puts in a management plan for a variety of fisheries. This year a quota was put in place for area 2, that my hon. friend talks about. I remind him that last year the allowance was 300 and the catch was 225. The quota for this year, respecting the need for conservation based both on catch results and scientific information, is 200. The difference between the catch and the quota is a little over 10 per cent.

Nobody would want to deny any fishermen fish if it were not in the long-term interest of those fishermen and particularly the people of Labrador.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, the parliamentary secretary will know that the user groups specifically asked for Labrador to be excluded from the conservation program. Indeed the government has made an allocation available to northern Labrador and not southern Labrador. The user groups are all for having an allocation for Labrador.

I want to ask the parliamentary secretary a supplementary question. If the government is not prepared to rescind this Draconian measure, will he now say that the government is prepared to make available to those fishermen an income support program during the ice blockade, as there is adequate precedent for by past governments? Is he prepared to say that the government is prepared to move on that question and at least allow the fishermen of Labrador some income support?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say to the hon. member who mentioned the ice blockade in Labrador that this is not a unique occurrence. I may remind him that in 1988, fishermen on the Labrador coast were unable to start fishing until the end of June. So this is not exactly unique, but we are monitoring the situation.

MEAT EXPORTS

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Agriculture.

According to industry sources, U.S. border inspection stations recently rejected 76 per cent of the meat from the province of Alberta slated that weekend for entering the United States, in spite of Canadian government quality approval.

The pork industry in Alberta claims that inspection harassment has increased significantly since the minister announced a pilot program with the U.S. on February 26 which he promised would eliminate this harassment.

When the minister met with the U.S. agriculture secretary on Monday, was he able to force the U.S. to back down on this import harassment which clearly contravenes both the free trade agreement and his own agreement with the U.S. Secretary of Agriculture?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, what is important is to remove the impediments and the harassment that has been going on. As a matter of fact, as a result of the arrangement that was made between the Secretary of Agriculture and the Government of Canada, that process is taking place.

Obviously, there is a requirement for a notification process to change the regulations required and that is occurring now. I was given the assurance that the U.S. administration is firm in removing those impediments to trade. My understanding is that the formal notice will be coming forth very shortly, after which time the formalized regulations will be able to come into place.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, on February 10, the minister informed a Toronto audience that he warned the U.S. Ambassador that, should the United States not stop harassing meat imports into the United States, Canada would be forced to take corresponding action.

In view of the fact that the U.S. has failed to comply with its earlier assurances, what is the minister going to do to retaliate?

• (1450)

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I find that question rather strange when the Secretary of Agriculture has agreed to rectify the process, but the problem is that—

An hon. member: It has gotten worse.

Mr. Mazankowski: It has not gotten worse. The Leader of the Opposition does not understand that.

What is taking place is that the regulatory process is being put in place. There has to be formal notice publicized in what is their equivalent of The Canada Gazette. That is being done. When that process is completed, we will be able to remove those impediments and certainly that will facilitate trade both ways. I am sure that is what the hon. member wants.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Right Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs and it concerns recent developments in the Middle East: the formation of a new hard-line government in Israel; Tuesday's tear gas attack by Israeli troops on a Swedish maternity clinic; and yesterday's statement by the new government in Israel that it would not negotiate with the PLO, thus making any real peace prospects almost impossible.

I wonder if the Secretary of State for External Affairs shares the view that what we have in the situation in the Middle East is a rapidly deteriorating situation, in a region of the world where nuclear and chemical warfare confrontations are not out of the question.

In that light, what action does the Government of Canada intend to take, either through its seat on the Security Council at the United Nations, or in other ways, to send the appropriate messages to Israel—and, for that matter, the United States—that there has to be movement instead of intransigence on the part of the Israeli government?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question, and I am sure all members of the House share his concern not simply about developments in the Middle East, but the evidence that there is no apparent break in the cycle of violence and all the implications that holds for the difficulty of moderates maintaining their position in that region.

There is a new government now formed in Israel. I will be in touch with their foreign minister directly. There had been a plan for a meeting between myself and his predecessor that was to have occurred this month. I hope that there can be a direct meeting between the new minister and myself as soon as possible.

With regard to the United States, I signed a letter yesterday to the U.S. Secretary of State urging him to persevere in discussions, including the maintenance of consultations between the Government of the United States and the PLO.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, one of the more immediate concerns that certainly the Palestinian community has is that ways be found to protect the Palestinians from the increasing level of violence being visited upon them by Israeli troops.

Has the minister considered, as I mentioned in my first question, using our position on the Security Council to influence the development of a UN peacekeeping force that would finally be acceptable to Israel to operate in the occupied territories to protect Palestinians? At the same time, would the Canadian government not consider enhancing its relations with the Palestine Liberation Organization as a way of indicating to the Israeli government that we feel these are the people who will finally have to be dealt with, whether the Israelis like it or not?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, there are two or three questions there. The hon. member was careful in suggesting that any action by the United Nations would have to be something that was acceptable to Israel. We would certainly be prepared, as we have in the past, to try to apply our influence to achieve that kind of result.

My understanding is that there has been, in fact, a willingness on the part of Israel to accept the visit of representatives of the Secretary General. We think that is an important step forward.

With regard to the question of the PLO and Canada's relations, the hon. member will know that the government has acted to increase the level of contact between Canada and the leadership of the PLO. We are trying to use that contact to encourage continued moderation by leadership of the PLO.

TRADE

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade, but in his absence, I will put it to the Minister of External Affairs.

In my riding, the U.S. government has shut down the Port of Bridgewater, a port that we export a great deal through and that is creating a great deal of hardship on exporters in New Brunswick. It appears to be in violation of Annex 406-D of the free trade agreement.

What measures has the government taken and will it take to ensure the long-term viability of our exporters in New Brunswick, considering the hardship that the U.S. government has unilaterally placed on our exporters in the province? Does the minister have an answer and a suggestion for us?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member, not only for that question, but also for raising the issue a while ago with my colleague, the Minister for International Trade.

We are concerned about the pattern that appears to be developing. We have been in touch with U.S. Customs. It is our understanding that any action that might be taken would not be taken before very early in July. We are seeking formal meetings to discuss details of this practice. We are also seeking help from businesses and associations involved as to details that may help us make effective representations to the United States that would protect Canadian interests.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Today in Montreal, the Green Coalition is boycotting government hearings on the so-called Green Plan. The coalition says that with time and money on their side, polluters and pals of the government control every discussion, and the government is trying to cover up its failure to act on environmental issues with high sounding words behind closed doors.

Could the Deputy Prime Minister tell the House whether the part-time Acting Minister of the Environment is prepared to open these hearings to the general public and let Canadians know what is going on?

[English]

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the Acting Minister of the Environment is in Montreal today participating in the consultations. The hon. member should appreciate that fact and should welcome it.

These consultations allow for a very broad public participation in the whole development of environmental legislation and policy in Canada. The degree of participation that has taken place across the country, with literally thousands of Canadians showing an interest to play a role in protecting their environment, is very heartening and something which encourages the Minister of the Environment. He certainly will be reporting to Canadians with regard to this.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is also addressed to the Deputy Prime Minister, rather than to the acting acting part-time Minister of the Environment.

Environmentalists told the government a year ago what was needed in the green print for Canada. The government has had its own Green Plan for months but it has been hiding it from Canadians. No wonder the coalition refuses to be part of thwarting the will of Canadians for action on the environment.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister tell us now what deals and trade-offs are being made behind closed doors?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, what we are seeing taking place is a process of consultation with Canadians. Between the time the Minister of Finance announced that consultations would take place and the present, we have had over 5,400 Canadians involved in consultations with the government with regard to the environment.

I take it from the hon. member that the Liberal Party of Canada opposes this sort of consultation with the people of Canada. For the government's part, it believes that Canadians have a right to be involved in determining policies relating to the very survival of this planet.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the two ministers of immigration, I direct my question to the Deputy Prime Minister.

Recent reports indicate that the government is very hesitant about initiating deportation hearings against some business immigrants who have not honoured their end of the economic commitment which was the basis for their admission into Canada. I would ask the Deputy Prime Minister how the government can refuse to investigate such individuals when thousands of refugee family class or independent class applicants are scrutinized religiously and refused for the smallest of flaws? Why, in other words, the double standard, one for the rich and one for the not so rich.

• (1500)

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of the Minister of Employment and Immigration I will take notice of the hon. member's question, to which a reply will be forthcoming.

[English]

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I thank the sports minister for answering on behalf of the immigration dossier.

I return again to the Deputy Prime Minister. Two years ago in the House in response to my question, the Minister of Immigration said, and I quote: "We apply the standards of the act to everyone and we will be especially enhancing the monitoring of the business immigrant program".

Thirty-two thousand business immigrants later, could the Deputy Prime Minister tell me if the government knows where these business immigrants are in Canada? Have they lived up to their economic commitment, and, precisely how many jobs have they created for our Canadian economy?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his question. I can assure him that the Minister of Employment and Immigration will give him——and I am sure the member will be happy with her answer.

[English]

GUN CONTROL

Mr. Svend J. Robinson (Burnaby—Kingsway): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Justice.

The minister knows that hundreds of thousands of Canadians have signed petitions calling for more effective gun control in Canada, particularly with respect to military and paramilitary combat weapons, and that the Federation of Canadian Municipalities this month unanimously urged a ban on these weapons in civilian hands.

In view of the fact that the minister promised on May 10 of this year before the justice committee to table gun control legislation before the summer adjournment, why is she now backing off on this promise? Why is she now caving in to the vocal minority in this country who do not believe in any effective gun control legislation at all?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, as I advised the hon. member for Notre-Dame-de-Grâce yesterday, I am not backing off from the commitment and I am not giving in to any vocal minority. I certainly hope to be able to honour my commitment in this House.

PRIVILEGE

STANDING COMMITTEE ON CONSUMER AND CORPORATE AFFAIRS AND GOVERNMENT OPERATIONS

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, I rise today on a point of privilege for which I have given you proper notice at the first possible moment.

As you are well aware, my point of privilege deals with the actions of the chair of the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs, the hon. member for Halton—Peel.

I would like to inform the House that the basis of my question arises from a letter that the chair of the Standing Committee wrote to Mr. Terrence Larock, the Chief of Committee Reporting Services.

The letter states that the chair has informed the console operators before each committee that the microphones of only those members who are recognized are to be turned on.

In addition, the letter states and I quote: "In the case where the words of a member, not recognized by the chair, are picked up by another microphone, these words are not to be included in the evidence and there should not be any editorial note explaining that the member was not recognized or that the microphone was ordered shut".

It should also be pointed out that the chair states quite clearly that these are his instructions and not those of the committee.

I am aware that the Speaker does not have the power to intervene in the affairs of committees, nor is it proper for the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections to interfere with another committee. However, I would submit, Mr. Speaker, that my point of privilege arises not from any particular proceeding within the committee but rather arises from a decision taken by the member for Halton—Peel.

I would direct you, Mr. Speaker, to a decision taken by Speaker Lamoureux on December 10, 1968. The member for St. John's East at the time rose on a question of privilege charging that the second report of the Standing Committee on Transport and Communications omitted a resolution that had been approved by the committee. The speaker ruled that the omission did constitute a prima facie case of privilege. Speaker Lamoureux felt there may have been difficulty in looking into the affairs of a committee. But he concluded, "But that question is not what we are seized with at this time."

Mr. Speaker, I would put to you that today we are not seized with the question of what went on with the affairs of the standing committee but with the fact that the chair of the committee has interfered with the privileges of the members of the committee.

My question of privilege arises from the fact that the speaker or chair of the committee does not have any editorial licence on what may or may not have been said in committee or in the House.

Mr. Speaker, if I can direct you to a ruling by Speaker Jerome on July 19, 1977 with respect to a complaint of something said by a member who did not have the floor and which was recorded in Hansard. Speaker Jerome said at that time:

> We do not permit hon. members to rise in their places the following day to say that the impression created by their words—is really not the impression they intended to create. We do not enjoy that right. The reporters must attempt to catch what they hear and report it in the way they see fit, and if an hon. member says that that somehow creates a mistaken impression, he is always given the courtesy, as the minister was, of being allowed to make an amplified explanation for the record. However, to attempt now to go back and rearrange the language as it was recorded is simply out of the question, whether it be attempted by way of order, a question of privilege, or anything else.

May I also direct you to a ruling by Speaker Francis on February 2, 1984 with respect to an exchange between the Leader of the Opposition and the Minister of National Health ands Welfare. Speaker Francis concluded that:

> The chair certainly does not want to rule on what Hon. Members mean when they use certain words or phrases in the course of debate. All Hon. Members will agree with me that the Chair has no editing function.

Mr. Speaker, I would argue that the chair of a standing committee does not have the power to decide what may or may not be included in the official record of the committee's proceedings. As in the case of the House, the committees' reporters must try to pick up and record whatever they can and that no one has the power to change what is on the record.

In fact, Mr. Speaker, if I were to put it in its basest terms, if for example the member for Halton—Peel had the floor and in the course of his debate I shouted: "The hon. member is a liar." I would never do that, but let us say I did. Mr. Speaker, the member cannot ask me to stand up and take it back because, in fact, it is not a part of the record. It is not recorded. I cannot take back what is not part of the record.

I am very concerned, Mr. Speaker, about actions of chairmen of committees. In this particular instance and in a previous instance with the chairman of the finance committee it seems to me that the chairmen of standing committees are going beyond what are even the powers of the Speakers of this House.

I cannot imagine that you, Mr. Speaker, would instruct the recording officers of this Chamber not to record those comments that come from members of this House when others have the floor.

Apart from the fact that Hansard will be so sanitized, it will be unexciting. Imagine Hansard bereft of "fuddle-duddle", or any of the more colourful asides that are included as part of the debates of the House.

Mr. Speaker, I think that the attempt by the member for Halton—Peel to direct the committees' reporters to censor the members of the committees constitutes a serious prima facie breach of privilege and I believe it should be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Mr. Garth Turner (Halton—Peel): Mr. Speaker, I have heard my friend's words. I understand his arguments, and I must rise to say that I think it is important that you, Sir, understand how this particular situation arose.

The member for Nickel Belt, a member of the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations is prone to some outbursts in committee. From to time the hon. member will make comments while another member has the floor.

The hon. member will sometimes question a witness during the time allotted to another member of the committee. Sometimes, in error, the console operator has opened the microphone of a member of the committee who does not have the floor and has not been recognized. Console operators, in general, do not do this but, from time to time, it does occur. We believe, in the committee, that the member who has the floor should be accorded the courtesy of retaining the floor and being the sole speaker.

It is similar to you maintaining order in this House. You have to do it through a certain set of rules. You recognize a member to have the floor and, while that member has the floor, you do not allow other members to have the floor at the same time. This is the same rule we apply in committee. As in the House, we do that by means of electronic control, that is, recording the member who has the floor and not opening the microphones for members who do not have the floor.

That is simply what this letter sought to clarify. The hon. member says that his privileges, as a member, have been infringed upon. I submit that he does not have the privilege of disrupting committee meetings, he does not have the privilege to question witnesses when he does not have the floor. He does not have the privilege to demand that his words be put on the record, when he has not been recognized. All members are recognized in turn and in order and he does not have that privilege. Therefore, I maintain, that because that privilege is not his, it has not been abrogated.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I want to make a few brief comments concerning the letter. I received a copy of it late this morning. The words that I find to be of particular interest to the Chair are the following: "It is to be considered as speaking off the record and the words are not to be recorded in the evidence".

As to whether or not someone's microphone should be turned on or off, I do have some sympathy perhaps with the proposition that those who are not recognized do not usually have a microphone available to them in order to get the electronic registering. That is, of course, a precedent established in this House.

However, I do not believe that Mr. Speaker has ever ruled that something that was said and duly recorded by the interjectionists or those other people who are charged here on the floor of the House to register those interjections, has ever not been recorded in the evidence, if it were deemed to be a part of what was stated in the House. From time to time, members will interject across the floor, and the interjection is not germane to the debate. In other words, they are not necessarily interjections pertinent to the remarks of the member who is speaking. In those instances, I believe that the staff does not always record them. Their judgment is utilized in order to record the interjections, when they are germane to the debate.

It has been stated earlier by my colleague, the hon. member for Nickel Belt, that the chair has no authority to editorialize or otherwise remove words that are said. Similarly, of course, the chair does not have any authority to make a decision that words, sentences or complete speeches of a member whose mike is not turned on cannot be recorded. That has to be decided again by the persons who are operating the console, recording the interjections, and so on, depending on where we are. I just want to draw your attention to Beauchesne's, Fifth Edition, citation 41, which reads:

> The control of the House over its publications is absolute. For a number of years after Confederation the House made a formal claim each session "that the Votes and Proceedings of this House be printed, being first perused by Mr. Speaker—

The important point here, Mr. Speaker, is that if control over the publications of the House rests with the House itself, surely control over committee publications rests with the committee itself and not with the chairman of the committee.

Citation 43 of Beauchesne, in reference to the Debates of the House, reads:

> Alterations in the Debates are traditionally limited to minor corrections of syntax and will often be made by the Member involved before printing.

That, of course, is generally what is done at the step which is referred to as the "blues". Citation 155 of Beauchesne's says:

> The debates of the House of Commons are reported verbatim, recording correctly what was said by each Member of the House. Slight verbal alterations are allowed to be made by a Member in order to make his meaning more precise and accurate; however, he may not, by the insertion of words or phrases, effect material changes in the meaning of what he actually said in the House.

That was decided by Mr. Speaker, on April 7, 1933, at page 3855 of Hansard.

Mr. Speaker, Citation 155 of Beauchesne's further says:

> (2) Corrections may be made to Hansard. If the correction is of a very important nature the Member shall rise in the House when Motions are called to explain his correction.

The implication is, again, that it is only the member himself or herself who can ask the House to make that correction. In other words, the Chair has no such authority himself or herself in the House. Given that, Citation 569 of Beauchesne's says:

> (1) Committees are regarded as creatures of the House and are governed for the most part in their proceedings by the same rules which prevail in the House—

Mr. Speaker, I then contend that if the Speaker of the House has no authority to make that kind of judgment, therefore, the chairman of the committee similarly has no such authority either.

One final point under Standing Order 108(2). Committees, of course, are masters of their own business and that is generally true. Of course, there is one point that should be remembered and I invite the Speaker to ponder on the following: even though committees do have that authority, the committee itself, in this case, never took such a decision. Therefore, if the committee never took that decision to except itself from the rules of the House, therefore the rules of the House prevail. The rules of the House, as I mentioned earlier, would not be such that it would allow a Speaker to make that kind of determination.

In closing, I do not think that the chairman of the committee had the authority to make that decision. At the very least, the letter should be withdrawn at the earliest opportunity and failing that, I would be inclined to support my colleague for Nickel Belt and his suggestion that the issue be referred to the Standing Committee on Procedure, Privilege and Private Members' Business.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, very briefly, I would like to make two points. One, it is quite clear that we are not dealing with a question of privilege and that the privileges of the member have not been infringed upon in any way.

What we are dealing with is a concern and a legitimate point of order about the procedure being employed in a committee. The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell pointed out quite accurately that, just as

Your Honour here in the Chamber has effective control over the console in which mikes are recognized and so on, and is an absolutely essential feature to maintenance of order, so, too, must the chairman and the committee, and it is impossible to do without. Otherwise, without such authority in the Chair, there would be privileges of members abused on a continuous basis.

Clearly, a member who shouts and refuses to recognize or allow the person who is recognized by the Chair to proceed with their interrogation or statement is clearly, by that interjection, interfering with the privileges of that member to pursue with the committee that which he or she is trying to pursue. It is indeed essential for the protection of the privileges of members at committee that the chairman have that kind of authority.

In terms of what is appropriate to the record of a committee and in terms of the Hansard equivalent and so on, I think that is a legitimate question of order. I think that is a legitimate question that should be asked. As the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell said, the committees are masters of their own rules and, indeed, it would be an appropriate item for discussion at that particular committee as to what a committee might decide is appropriate. If a committee decided that heckles, gestures, yells, screams and other distractions are somehow contributing to a more accurate written record of the proceedings of the committee, then so be it. But if they, in their wisdom, decide that those sorts of things do not contribute to a proper reflection of proceedings at committee, then that too should be the decision of the committee.

Finally, I will end where I started. It is quite clear that we are not dealing with a question of privilege, under any definition of privilege that I have been able to find, but rather an argument over procedures used in committee.

• (1520)

Mr. Speaker: I am going to interrupt the interventions because I have listened to this with some concern and have read the letter.

At this point I am going to ask the hon. member for Nickel Belt and others who are concerned about this to take it back to committee. Depending on what happens there, I may hear the matter further.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, this being Thursday, I would like to ask the government House leader if he has any idea what business we would be looking at in the next few days, starting with tomorrow?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, at this time on the parliamentary calendar it is frequently difficult to know what we will be doing half an hour from now, let alone for the next few days.

We will continue this afternoon with Bill C-58, dealing with young offenders.

It is my expectation that tomorrow we will have business arising out of a decision by the Senate. Apparently they have not taken the decision they were expected to take so we may have to come back on June 21 or June 22 to deal with that. We will discuss that later with members of the opposition.

If that should not come to pass for some reason which I cannot at this time contemplate, we might deal tomorrow with Bill C-72, the act to establish the Canadian Polar Commission and Bill C-68, the Yukon Quartz Mining Act.

On Monday, Mr. Nelson Mandela has been invited to address the House at 11 a.m. It would be my expectation to call for the commencement of debate on the main motion arising out of the constitutional discussions of last week. That will be subject to discussions we will have through the usual channels.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I will be seeking some further information this afternoon from the House leader. I think we should meet and discuss some of the issues before us. I know the Senate has S-17 dealing with the variable entrance requirements which the House may have to address tomorrow or Monday.

Bill C-28, which the minister alluded to, I am sure the Senate would see fit to report today if some of us asked, and we are asking right now for them to do so. We can get that for the House and settle the issue.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I have two questions for the government.

The government House leader indicated that we would continue with Bill C-58 this afternoon. In the event that that work is completed, could we have an indication from the government House leader as to whether we will proceed to other items of business or whether we will suspend?

Second, given the uncertainty of next week, do we now have an indication that it is possible the House will not adjourn in time for members of Her Majesty's Loyal Opposition to travel to their convention as per a prior agreement?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, I am sorry, I forgot to mention that after Bill C-58, it would be my intention to call Bill C-39, the offshore laws act, for which there is some urgency.

In terms of sittings next week, the last thing in the world that I would attempt to do is to deny members of the Loyal Opposition to go to that fine city of Calgary. It is the first time in my political experience in the House that I have seen Liberals willingly ready to spend money in my city, and I am not going to stand in the way of that happening.

However, we do have certain parliamentary responsibilities that we will be discussing in our usual manner. If satisfactory accommodations can be met, we can all enjoy whatever we choose to enjoy during that period.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, for clarification, the minister just said that he was going to call Bill C-39, which is an act to apply federal laws and provincial laws to off-shore areas commensurate with acts in consequence thereof. That act is at report stage with an amendment right now.

Did I hear the minister correctly that he intends to call this bill this afternoon after the Young Offenders Act?

Mr. Andre: Mr. Speaker, there appears to be some disagreement over my parliamentary secretary to whom I affectionately refer to as Henry Kissinger, the shuttle diplomat.

As one can understand as we go into the summer expiration season and so on, it would be useful that this act, in terms of enforcing Canadian environmental laws, be in place for proper regulation enforcement of commercial law in those sensitive areas.

Further to discussions we can have in a few moments, I am hopeful that we can get some agreement. That would facilitate us achieving the adjournment time that was alluded to by the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan.

Mr. Pat Nowlan (Annapolis Valley—Hants): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I just want to clarify.

I think I heard the House leader correctly. Is there some certainty—to use a word that was used here quite a bit last week—that there is going to be a debate in this House on the companion resolution and/or the constitutional questions that were discussed in this city with such heat, fervour and importance for seven days last week before we get out of here? In this discussion, there will be House leaders.

After all, this was a pretty fundamental thing last week. I find it peculiar strains that the House of Commons is at the moment still mute as far as having a Commons debate on something that is so fundamental to the nation.

Mr. Andre: As I indicated, Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to call the main resolution next Monday.

The question as to when the various steps that were agreed to during the constitutional discussions are completed is subject to further discussion. Clearly, it is our expectation that every resolution that was agreed to last week will be fully debated and and adjudicated on or divided on in this House at the proper time.

There is no attempt to deny normal parliamentary rules of debate and discussion with regard to these issues.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order arising out of Question Period, which I had hoped to raise earlier when the minister was still here.

In response to my questions with respect to Canada's involvement in trade talks with Mexico, the Secretary of State for External Affairs suggested that I was pandering to anti-Mexican feeling. As I look at some of the prohibitions that are indicated with respect to debate in Beauchesne, among other things, it suggests that one is not to impute motives different from those acknowledged to a member.

Mr. Speaker, I would ask if you could rule on whether the suggestion that I was pandering to anti-Mexican feeling—I must say that I take this personally as quite a strong insult, given my background and past involvement with Mexico—and on whether that is not imputing bad motives to another member.

• (1530)

Mr. Speaker: I am sure that the hon. member's intervention will be brought to the attention of the minister. I am not going to make any more comment until I know that the minister has heard the hon. member's intervention.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed Bill S-17, an act to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, to which the concurrence of this House is desired.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

YOUNG OFFENDERS ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Wednesday, May 30, consideration of the motion of Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre) that Bill C-58, an act to amend the Young Offenders Act and the Criminal Code, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on this measure to amend the Young Offenders Act. Prior to dealing with some of the proposals in detail, I want to go back and take a look at some of the history of young offenders legislation in Canada.

When I first started out working in the social service field, my first experiences were working in juvenile court and juvenile detention centres. At that time we were dealing with the Juvenile Delinquency Act.

I went back to university and I wrote my masters thesis on the juvenile court, which at that time was comparable to a star chamber kangaroo court in the way that it dealt with young people. It failed to protect their legal rights. It failed to protect their social rights. It had tremendous powers to disrupt family lives, to sentence youth for petty, inane and nuisance crimes to long periods of incarceration.

The history in Canada of our treatment of juvenile offenders is not one of which we can be proud. The Young Offenders Act was in legal form a vast improvement. My concern is that some of the potential that should have been realized through the Young Offenders Act has not been realized simply because of the behaviour of this government in reneging on its promises to provide services.

Because of this, the resources for programs and services to juveniles that the government has been providing have been lacking. The government is now reverting to an age-old practice which says that rather than provide the resources and services we need we will try to increase the penalties.

Before we agree that this should be done in a mandatory manner, we should take a look at who are the youth in this country who are still subject to the Young Offenders Act.

Recently in the city of Edmonton school principals and teachers who dealt with young offenders documented that 60 per cent to 80 per cent of all kids coming before the juvenile authorities under the Young Offenders Act had severe learning disabilities. These youth were in need of special assistance because of their learning problems.

Many youth come from families that borderline on poverty or are impoverished. Grade 1 teachers could tell us of most of the youth who come before juvenile court that these are children who were going to get into difficulty because of learning disabilities, anti-social behaviour, and family disruption.

Yet we are unwilling to provide the resources to ensure that these children have the opportunity to grow up and be productive and useful members of our society.

We do not provide the remedial resources for learning disabilities in the school. Without that the youth grow up being unable to read and write. In our society being functionally illiterate means being condemned to poverty.

We do not provide counselling resources to help families. We do not provide resources to deal with the anti-social behaviour of children who have been identified as anti-social earlier in school. We do not provide resources to boys and girls clubs, to recreational organizations, or to preventive child welfare programs that are necessary.

In fact this government has taken two actions to reduce the availability of dollars for resources to solve problems that juveniles face. One was taken a year ago when the government began to limit the amount of dollars that it would make available under the Young Offenders Act to assist provinces in providing post-adjudication services. I will come back to that later.

This year the government again limited expenditures in Ontario, Alberta, and B.C. under the Canada Assistance Plan. Those are moneys that are used for preventive services. Those are the moneys that are used to fund family service organizations which provide counselling to families. Those are resources that are used to bring people up from below the poverty line, to try to provide them with an adequate standard of living.

Yet this government said: "We are going to curtail the expenditures. We are not going to invest in prevention. We are not going to invest in remedial measures or rehabilitation. We are simply going to go back and take a punitive approach to corrections, particularly juvenile corrections".

Another major group in this country that comes under the Young Offenders Act is that of aboriginal peoples. It is no coincidence that today a native person is holding up the progress, if it can be called progress, that has been made in resolving the constitutional crisis.

I have a great deal of sympathy for the Manitoba aboriginal person who is refusing to allow the constitutional resolution to go forward because, again, it neglects to address adequately the concerns of native people.

In the juvenile correctional system native people have been treated atrociously. I can remember, when in the early 1980s I took over as a senior administrator in the downtown core of Vancouver, that some 80 per cent of all children under the care of the Superintendent of Child Welfare were native children. If we look at some of the submissions made by the National Association of Friendship Centres about its concerns with the Young Offenders Act, we see that it points out that in Manitoba 47 per cent of young men held on remand are native and 55 per cent of those held in secure custody are native men. It is even more shocking when we look at the treatment of native women—92 per cent of young women held on remand are native. In secure custody the figure is 87.5 per cent.

We have a system that discriminates against those who are socially disadvantaged, who are poor, who have learning disabilities, who are in need of services and not incarceration. They are in need of rehabilitation programs, not punishment.

If we look at the backgrounds of many people appearing before the young offenders court, we find that they are people society has betrayed the most. They are people who have been sexually abused. They are people who have been neglected. They are people who have been left in poverty by this very wealthy society. They are people who have been subject to all sorts of pressures and who have ended up becoming involved in drug abuse.

I hoped that when the government saw fit to amend the Young Offenders Act it would do so by saying: "We are really going to deal with the causes of juvenile delinquency, the causes of youth getting in trouble with the law; we are going to do it in a manner that is going to protect society in the best way we know how, not by incarcerating someone for three or five years because they are going to get out whether it is three years or five years".

We have got to bring in resources that prevent that child from becoming involved in illegal activity or to ensure that they are not going to. We have got to be able to provide them with services that deal with their learning disability and their lack of education and provides them with sufficient training so that they can go out and get a good paying job; not a $4 an hour job but a steady job that earns them a decent standard of living.

I have worked on the streets with juveniles. We are always shocked and amazed that particularly young girls are out prostituting themselves. I have sat down and talked to many of them. Many of them say: "I would like very much to be able to leave the street life. I would like to be able to leave the street life, but what skills do I have? I have a functional grade 2 education. I cannot read and write. I came from a home that was abusive, and I cannot go back there. I have tried to approach the child welfare authorities and they put me in a foster home that was not one bit better than the home I came from. The only way that I can earn any kind of a standard of living is in prostitution".

The problem is always of course that the pimps get involved, the hangers-on, and the girl does not even get the benefit of the money she earns.

We in Canada have to take a look at our growing problems around juveniles. Simply by saying that what we are going to do is make it easier for a judge to raise a youth from youth court to adult court is not going to solve the problem. It is not going to provide the preventive or rehabilitation services that are necessary.

The present legislation allows, where appropriate, for the youth to be raised to adult court. There is no need to make it easier. If it becomes easier, whenever a juvenile has committed a crime that becomes abhorrent in the eye of the public, as sure as anything there will be a push for that youth to be dealt with in adult court.

What we need instead is an increased range of resources within the juvenile court system. We need much better probation services. We need adequate counselling services for those youth who have been deemed to have committed an offence.

Kids who need psychiatric care are often held in secure custody simply because there is not adequate psychiatric care. Everyone thinks that by increasing the sentence the problem is solved. My experience with a fair number of penal institutions has been that for every year you put a person in a penal institution you are buying four or five more years of crime. The history of penal institutions in this country and every other country shows that that is the best way to make sure that you have a seasoned, hardened, life-long criminal.

Mr. Beatty: The question is how you got out.

Mr. Karpoff: You may think that is funny.

The whole system of corrections in Canada is designed to make hardened criminals. We start with the young offenders. It may be that the problems are not easy to solve, but I can assure this House that simply by making it easier to place the child before the adult court and incarcerate him for longer periods of time will solve the problem.

One of the things that surprises me most is how the federal government has unilaterally started to say: "We are no longer going to share financially in programs that provide services to people". It has done it by simply saying that it is not going to provide the services for young offenders once the person's case has been adjudicated. It is not going to provide the services under the Canada Assistance Plan. The government is hoping that the provinces will step in and provide these resources.

The provinces are saying that they do not have the ability. So who suffers? We all suffer because what is happening in this country is that services are not provided. When those services are not provided, instead of a troubled child we end up with an adult criminal.

I cannot support this type of approach. We need a rational approach, one that will protect society and the youth.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Mr. Speaker, I will not take a great deal of time. I only have a few words to add to what my friend from Surrey North has already put on the record.

I think that there is some concern in rural communities, at least, and some misunderstanding, perhaps, of the intent of the Young Offenders Act.

• (1550)

Some of my constituents may greet as a step forward the move in this bill to extend the maximum penalty to five years less a day. They do so from two points of view.

Some simply think that there have to be harsher penalties. Others have some concern that if there is not such a mediating set of time, there will be more public pressure to try young offenders in the age group between 14 and 17 in the adult court for some of the more heinous crimes. This permits judges to have a little less public pressure put on them, hopefully, to keep it within the youth court.

The government, however, is not resolving anything except a public relations problem with the amendments in this particular bill. It has not addressed the real problem, which is a problem of financing between federal and provincial jurisdictions, of the rehabilitation of young offenders. There is no mention or addressing of that very real problem. There are no amendments or changes in procedure which would permit a real evaluation of what the young offenders court is doing to our young people and why it is that the young offenders court seems to be so very much aimed at hitting young offenders who are native or Indian in ancestry.

A very high proportion of young offenders are of Indian ancestry. My friend from Surrey North has put the statistics on the record, particularly those concerning Manitoba, where 92.8 per cent of the young women held on remand are native—92.8 per cent. Forty-seven per cent of the young men are Indian.

When you get to the open custody unit, the units where they are supposed to be able to receive some assistance, we find that 87.5 per cent of the people in open custody are native girls and 55.5 per cent are native boys. When you get into the closed facilities you find that 100 per cent of the girls are native.

There is no excuse for that. As a population they make up less than 10 per cent of the population of Manitoba. I expect that if you did the same kind of study in Saskatchewan, my home province, you would find very similar results. Again, a population that makes up less than 10 per cent of the population populates the young offenders facilities on a far higher rate than can be explained away as normal.

I was quite disappointed that the government did not propose real amendments to the Young Offenders Act that would permit these kind of changes so that rehabilitation would be possible and so that young native offenders might have a better chance of being represented at their hearings.

It seems to me that the tendency is that more native youth are charged. They have a higher proportion of charges, but they also seem less likely to try to defend themselves in court. It is a system they do not understand. They do not have court workers, nor do they hire counsel to give them advice. They generally are not only native but poor as well. Our legal system discriminates against those two classifications. To be poor, you have a better chance of ending up in the system. If you are native and poor you have an extremely high chance of being in the system, as these statistics point out.

There are a number of background problems that the government is choosing to ignore. It is hoping that this legislation will gloss them over simply by changing some of the more-discussed-in-the-press aspects of the Young Offenders Act and by stretching the three-year maximum that has existed for young offenders between 12 and 17 to five years less a day. It will perhaps make it a little easier to shift young offenders into adult court, a situation which exists now but which this bill seems to make easier.

Having raised concerns about the way the government has attacked this particular problem, I will end my remarks. I regret that the government chose to respond to some public outcries on a couple of very public cases where young offenders did in fact conduct fairly heinous murders and received a three year sentence which is the maximum. I regret that that created a flurry of pressure to have the government introduce these kind of amendments.

I wish it had spent more time to provide amendments which would have had a better long-term effect on the rehabilitation of young offenders who are very special cases in our system. They are not juvenile or adult. The court has a certain amount of discretion to check out the maturity of these individuals. I am not sure that these amendments make that any better.

I regret that the government did not spend more time in introducing more comprehensive reforms, particularly the type of reforms which would have permitted the kind of rehabilitation programs that are desperately needed at the provincial level where the Young Offenders Act applies.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to be able to say a few words this afternoon on the bill to change certain clauses of the Young Offenders Act.

The reason I am interested in this particular bill is, before I became a member of Parliament, I was an acting Crown attorney for the district of Thunder Bay. In that position I had many occasions to attend in court and act for the Crown with respect to young offenders court.

That was coupled with the fact that the community was getting terribly alarmed, as is the case in most communities when young offenders who have committed crimes that went against the feelings of the community were found guilty of the offence—after a long and arduous trial before a court of competent jurisdiction—and then received a penalty that the public and the community felt was not commensurate with the degree and the severity of the crime.

As we say, justice should always not only be done but should always appear to be done. In some instances in the application of the Young Offenders Act it always appeared in the mind of the public that the courts after due process were too lenient in the way they handled them.

I should say in defence of those Crown attorneys and judges who made those decisions that because of the legislation of the day, which this bill would change, their hands were bound by statute. Although they may personally have felt different, they were bound by the statute and had to comply with it. As a result they followed the statute and bore the brunt of the wrath of the community, with the community not knowing that they were bound in essence by statute.

From that perspective I would like to make a few comments on the Young Offenders Act and the changes proposed to it. I would be remiss in my duties as a member of Parliament if I did not bring these feelings forward.

• (1600)

Under the leadership of the then senior judge of the District of Thunder Bay, Judge Roy Mitchell, every three or four months we would perform all the court services in the remote areas of the northern part of the province of Ontario. We would charter an aircraft and fly up with the social worker, the judge, and the court reporter. Winter and summer, we would land at these reserves and conduct court in whatever facilities were available to us at the time, whether it was 40 degrees below zero or 40 above. The people always welcomed us when we visited.

The unfortunate part of these visits is that they were not done with enough consistency. It was no one's fault and just the system itself, but I always felt that in bringing justice to the north, although we were trying to do what was procedurally correct, that we were not really fulfilling the substantive issues of the law that were so important. During these court sessions in the remote sections of the province, which is true grass roots justice, I got the feeling that we were not doing a proper job in the administration of justice, not only in the province I represented but in all the provinces. Did the people to whom we were administering these rules truly understand what was happening?

As an example, we would fly into a native settlement and walk a block or two, or a mile, to the courthouse. There were no vehicles to take us to the courthouses. We would proceed to go through the dockets of the day. We would first go through first Provincial Court Criminal Division and dispose of the docket, having availed those who were accused of crime of duty counsel who were with us that day. Through the great guidance of senior Judge Roy Mitchell, we gave the accused in remote areas every benefit available to them in law.

We would then adjourn the court and reconvene with the docket of Provincial Court Family Division and handle family matters with the same court set-up, but under a different jurisdiction. After we handled all the family matters, we would adjourn and most likely go into young offenders court and dispose of all of the offences that were before the court under the Young Offenders Act.

In one of my other roles in the community, I would be an acting judge of the Civil Division. We would travel to the remote areas of the province and handle all of the civil matters that came before us in the provincial jurisdictions. Although we were doing all this procedurally, I am still to this day not sure we were doing it substantively.

The legislation that is before us today is a step toward alleviating some of the concerns that the community has about the Young Offenders Act. I talked particularly about the presumption in the law that a judge in the Provincial Court Criminal Division could not send a case up to the ordinary court of the land unless there was some valid reason. I am not sure where this presumption arose, but the bench seemed to feel that they could not dispose of that case in that manner. If it was a charge under the Young Offenders Act and the person was under the proper age and so on, it had to be tried in that court.

This act sets the guidelines for a judge to make a determination based on certain criteria. The act goes some distance in setting out those criteria to allow the judge to make a determination as to whether a particular alleged crime can be heard in the young offenders court or, if it is of a serious enough nature, that it can transferred, under the criteria as set out in the statute, and tried in an adult court. On that basis, I think the legislation should be adopted.

Second, if the judge should decide that the alleged offence is one that should remain in the young offenders court, the penalty for that crime should be increased from three to five years. Only time will tell whether that is a satisfactory penalty, consistent with the degree or severity of the crime, that the community will accept.

I thought it was important, with my background, that I address those problems.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

CANADIAN LAWS OFFSHORE APPLICATION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C-39, an act to apply federal laws and provincial laws to offshore areas and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendment) from a legislative committee.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could obtain the unanimous consent of the House to allow me to put a very few amendments. Normally we would have had ample warning that the bill was coming forward today. We found out only when the business question was asked and we are still scrambling. In fact, I do not even have copies of the motions here to provide to the parliamentary secretary and the Liberal Party. Would there be unanimous consent to allow me to move the motions? I trust the House will make the appropriate decisions with regard to their value.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the motions either, but because of the rushed procedure by which we have reached this bill at this time, we ought to give unanimous consent to allow the motions to be put. However, that is not to be taken as approval of the motions by the opposition. We would like to see them. Unless we give our consent, we are not going to get the opportunity even to read them.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I have had discussions with the hon. member for Thunder Bay—Atikokan and it is acceptable to the government side that he put his motions.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Am I to understand that the hon. member will now put his motions? Does you have them?

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, I have a single copy. The Pages have taken out the originals to have copies made and we are just waiting for them. I should indicate as well that there is an understanding between the parliamentary secretary and myself—we have not had discussions with the Official Opposition—that we will more than likely wrap up report stage and third reading before five o'clock today. Could we just suspend for a minute or two until we get the copies so that members can have them in front of them, as well as there being copies at the table?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): While we are waiting for the motions, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Burin—St. Georges—Fisheries; the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina—Immigration; and the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands—New Horizon Program.

SITTING SUSPENDED

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I suggest that we suspend the House until 4.15 p.m.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed that the House stand suspended until 4.15 p.m.?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

The sitting of the House was suspended at 4.10 p.m.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 4:24 p.m.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, let me start by thanking my colleagues in the House, the Clerks at the table and yourself for assisting me in moving to put these amendments to the House for consideration.

I move:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C-39 be amended in Clause 2 by adding immediately after line 19 at page 3, the following:

"(3) The Governor in Council shall, in making regulations pursuant to paragraphs 2(c) and (d), take into account:

(a) the need to facilitate the creation of comprehensive and coherent management regimes for environment, wildlife and resource use in offshore areas;

(b) any land, environment, wildlife or resource management regimes provided for in a land claims agreement which may pertain to a particular offshore area, or any adjacent offshore or land area; and

(c) any use and occupancy of offshore areas by aboriginal peoples and any areas of overlapping use by several aboriginal peoples."

To provide a very brief explanation, this amendment and the third one which I will move if the second one passes, requires the federal government to take environmental and aboriginal interests and concerns into account before making regulations under their respective sections.

These are not great laws but they have important symbolic value. There is a principle of sustainability that policy at all levels in all areas must be considered in light of environmental needs.

We had excellent representations from the aboriginal peoples of northern Canada, the Grand Council of the Crees of Quebec and the Makivik Corporation, to name two, who are concerned that this law would inadvertently take away from them something that is of great concern and they ask for this kind of protection in the legislation.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, as we indicated earlier in discussion, this bill is being considered on very short, although legal, notice. The member of the Official Opposition, the member for Moncton, who has participated and has taken a great interest in this bill, happens not to be in Ottawa today and I am speaking on his behalf.

This is an amendment that we think should be supported. It is an amendment that emphasizes policy considerations relating to the environment and the doctrine of sustainable development.

On behalf of the opposition I agree with this amendment.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to repeat all the arguments I made at committee concerning this issue, but one of the points I made was that the term "take into account" is very vague. I am not quite sure what it is this motion would ask the Governor in Council to do.

I understand that it is important to recognize the environmental dimension whenever we are talking about our offshore, but I will indicate to the House what I indicated in committee. The Canadian Environmental Protection Act which was passed by this government is far more effective, has more teeth and I think would be more effective to accomplish what the hon. member wants to accomplish.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion No. 1 (Mr. Angus) negatived.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I move:

Motion No. 2

That Bill C-39 be amended in Clause 5 by adding immediately after line 44 at page 4, the following:

"(4) For greater certainty, the provisions of this section shall not be interpreted as limiting the application of the Canada Labour Code."

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to indicate, on behalf of the Official Opposition, that this is a clarification which we consider to be in the right direction and we are in favour of it.

Mr. Angus: Mr. Speaker, it is customary that the member moving the motion explain briefly what the purpose of the motion is. I think we got a bit ahead of ourselves there.

There is some concern that under the provisions of this act the federal cabinet would be able to make an agreement with a provincial government to have the provincial labour laws apply to an offshore oil rig or any other item covered under this act. We are concerned that that may be done in order to avoid the more onerous provisions of the Canada Labour Code that may in fact be in place at the provincial level.

We want to make certain that the federal code shall apply and that there is no way that the cabinet could transfer jurisdiction to the provinces in order to provide a lesser requirement to employers in these situations.

• (1630)

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I do not think this amendment is necessary. There is nothing in the bill now that would limit the application of the Canada Labour Code or any other federal legislation for that matter. As a result it is not necessary to have it in the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the nays have it.

An hon. member: On division.

Motion No. 2 (Mr. Angus) negatived.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan) moved:

Motion No. 3

That Bill C-39 be amended in Clause 12 by striking out line 16 at page 8 and substituting the following therefor:

"least one hundred and twenty days before the proposed effective"

He said: Mr. Speaker, this amendment is very simple. It doubles the notice and consultation period provided for under section 12 of the bill. Because of our belief in the potential for dramatic changes in the application of laws at the whim of cabinet, it is important to maximize the opportunity for people to find out and comment on regulations made under this act, particularly if the decision is to choose the lesser of onerous applications of either environmental laws or labour laws.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I do not share the fears of the hon. member. These regulations are not created, suggested, and implemented in a vacuum. Once they are proposed, we have a 60-day notice period in The Canada Gazette, which is the usual period of time. That would give anyone who may have an interest and was not informed up to that period of time adequate time to take into consideration the new regulations.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, not many Canadians read The Canada Gazette. It is of assistance to have these issues of policy and direction made part of the legislation, particularly legislation of such important symbolic value.

I urge government members to accept this amendment.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: On division.

Motion No. 3 (Mr. Angus) negatived.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (for the Minister of Justice) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): When shall the bill be read a third time? By leave, now?

Some hon. members: Now.

Mr. Beatty (for the Minister of Justice) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I will just make a few comments on this matter.

First I would like to thank members from all sides of the House who served on this committee. I would particularly like to point out the contributions of the hon. member for Red Deer.

The hon. member, as you will know, Mr. Speaker, coming from your home province, is not a lawyer but he has consistently taken an interest in bills in the justice area. He has made a very positive contribution because of his belief that we can change federal laws and make a positive contribution to people's lives in this country.

This is an example. I am very thankful to him, as I am to the hon. member for St. Catharines, the hon. member for Montmorency—Orleans, and all other hon. members.

There was some discussion at the committee level as to what effect this might have on aboriginal rights, treaties, and obligations of the federal and provincial governments. For the record, I would like to point out that clause 20 of the bill reads:

> Nothing in this act shall be construed so as to abrogate or derogate from any existing aboriginal or treaty rights of the aboriginal peoples of Canada under section 35 of the Constitution Act, 1982.

The responsibilities and rights of our aboriginal peoples are made very clear in the Constitution Act. I want to put that on the record to assure them that there is nothing in this bill which threatens their rights.

At second reading I was very pleased to set out and talk about many of the details of this bill. This is a positive step forward. It is consistent with international law, with the agreements that we as a nation have taken. It will clear up some of the ambiguities that exist in the offshore area of Canada and fill in some of the gaps. As a result, for all individuals who take an interest in and use Canada's offshore area, this piece of legislation will certainly be welcomed.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to be here for third reading on behalf of my colleagues who participated in the work of the legislative committee, the hon. member for Moncton and the hon. member from a vast part of the Northwest Territories whose constituents probably more directly than any other Canadians are affected by the provisions of this bill.

It appears to be a very technical piece of legislation. It is full of technicalities. The bottom line is clear. It is a gesture made toward the increasingly important part of our country, the part that lies to the north, the part that is offshore, the part that is becoming significant because of scientific and technological possibilities and because of the economic resources which are now close to being available to exploitation for the benefit of the people in the region and for the benefit of all Canada.

I could not help but stop, as I looked quickly through the bill, at clause 4 which provides:

> For greater certainty, it is hereby declared that
> (a) the internal waters and territorial sea (as defined in the act) form part of Canada;

It is a clear reminder to the international community that this territory and these waters are Canadian. They have been since the establishment of our country. We are prepared to exercise our responsibility and to assert a legislative regime as is being done in this legislation over that important part of our country.

I know that the bill has been brought forward before as Bill C-109 which because of prorogation never became law. I want to commend the Minister of Justice and the parliamentary secretary to the minister for the way in which the bill has been handled and for the fact that we are in the House today to give third reading to a very important piece of legislation.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I too want to start my comments by thanking my colleagues who assisted me in working on this bill in the legislative committee.

Because of conflicting committee work and because of conflicting riding responsibilities, I was not able to participate as fully as I had intended and would have liked. I thank my colleagues for supporting me in this regard. Once again I thank the parliamentary secretary, the justice critic for the Liberal Party, and the House for their facilitation in allowing me to move my amendments albeit unsuccessfully.

This is an important bill. There is no question. We will be supporting it on third reading because we believe it is important to do the things that we are doing in this legislation finally. We had hoped to see some additional improvements because as is our job we look for the holes, the gaps, and the questionable bits of wording that while not intended to allow certain things to occur could facilitate them. I hope I am wrong. I hope our fears about using this as a tool to transfer jurisdiction to a province or to undermine federal labour or environmental law do not come about. You can be assured that if it does we will be back in this House saying we told you so and calling for the kind of amendments I put forward today.

The same thing applies in terms of the aboriginal peoples. At committee those witnesses who came before us had the section of the act pointed out to them that the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Justice read into the record today. They did not feel that it went far enough. They felt it was still a question of whether or not they would be listened to in the event that there was a situation involving this act and lands to which they do not necessarily hold title, They do not necessarily have a specific land claim to which to point, but they are in the process of putting into legal framework their beliefs of traditional land use patterns, hunting patterns, and fishing patterns, et cetera.

I regret that the government did not choose to strengthen the bill. I do not think that we were trying to do anything that was not the government's intention, but we felt that it needed to be done in a slightly different way in order to provide that full protection for aboriginal peoples, the environment, and labour law.

Having said that, I will relinquish my place and proceed to taking the vote. As I say, we are voting in favour so there probably is no reason to do anything other than that.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Senate has passed Bill C-75, an act for granting Her Majesty certain sums of money for the Public Service of Canada for the financial year ending March 31, 1991.

SITTING SUSPENDED

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I believe what we will have to do is suspend until five o'clock, Private Members' Hour, because at this point the players in that show are not here. Perhaps we could suspend until five o'clock and reconvene then.

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, just to make clear what happens for the rest of the day once Private Members' Business is over, I would assume we would then move to the adjournment debate and upon completion of the adjournment debate the sitting would be suspended as we have done in the past.

Mr. Cooper: Mr. Speaker, that is agreed. In fact for those purposes I guess technically we would call it ten o'clock as soon as possible after the late show is finished.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I shall suspend the sitting until five o'clock.

The sitting of the House was suspended at 4.43 p.m.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 5 p.m.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being five o'clock, the House will now proceed to consideration of Private Members' Business, as indicated on today's Order Paper.

CHINESE IMMIGRATION ACT

REIMBURSEMENT OF HEAD TAX

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River) moved:

That, in the opinion of this House, the government should:

1) reimburse to all claimants who establish their entitlement as of November 21, 1988 the amount of the head tax imposed under the Chinese Immigration Act, 1885 (48-49 Victoria), as amended, together with an indemnity equal to six times the amount of the head tax paid;

2) where a person entitled to reimbursement and the indemnity is deceased, pay these amounts to the heirs and successors of that person who establish the entitlement of the deceased; and

3) acknowledge that the said statute was discriminatory against immigrants of Chinese origin and contrary to the principles now adopted and reflected in our Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

He said: Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to have an opportunity today to rise in the House to address a motion asking this government to redress the wrongs associated with a statute that has been called the Chinese Immigration Act, sometimes called the Chinese Head Tax, and sometimes called the Chinese Exclusion Act.

I am asking the government to redress these wrongs on behalf of all Canadians, not just some of them, on behalf of those who paid the tax as well, and all of those just happen to be of Chinese origin.

Specifically, my motion calls upon the government to reimburse all of the payers of the tax and to acknowledge that the requirement to pay the tax was wrong and that it was discriminatory.

In particular, my motion calls for reimbursement of those individual payers who were alive on election day, November, 1988. That is the day that I was elected to the House of Commons. It was the day that others who spoke publicly or who wrote publicly on that issue were elected to the House. It was an issue that was dealt with and treated during the election campaign.

However, I have to point out that the specifics of reimbursement framed in my resolution are not of chief importance. What is important is that the government consult, that it negotiate and that it respond.

Who are the politicians who spoke to the issue? Who were those in our community who wrote about it, spoke about it and in fact made commitments? Most of the politicians are actually on record. Two of them that I have noted are the Prime Minister, and the former Leader of the Opposition. But there are others, many others, who include individuals and groups from a broad cross-section of Canadian society.

They include the Canadian Council of Churches, Mr. Georges Erasmus of the Assembly of First Nations, the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops, the National President of Rail Canada Traffic Controllers, the President of the Canadian Auto Workers, United Steel Workers Local 6, and the President of the Quebec Human Rights Association.

What exactly was the law that levied the tax? The first Chinese came to Canada in about 1858. About 20 years later in 1880 thousands of Chinese came to Canada to build the railroad. We have plenty of pictures, books, documentaries. All of that is on record. These railroad builders were pioneers; they were our pioneers. Their national dream was our national dream; ours was theirs.

At one time their goals were characterized by the phrase the "Golden Mountain". I understand that is what they thought of Canada as being in those years before they got here, before they saw what Canada was really like. That is why they came. They came along with all of the other immigrants to Canada, my forefathers, to build the railroad and to build our country.

In about 1885 our railroad was completed and suddenly we did not need any more Chinese. We just did not need the Chinese labour, but we needed Europeans and Americans. I guess it was decided to levy a tax specifically on Chinese immigrants. Eventually, the amount of that tax reached $500 per person.

No other group or race was similarly taxed. In fact, history shows that we gave bonuses to immigrants from Europe and settlers from other places. The tax imposed on immigration was patently discriminatory and based on race.

In 1923 it appeared that the $500 per head tax just was not good enough. So the government, in its wisdom, decided to exclude all Chinese. In those days, the government did not seem to be able to distinguish between Chinese origin, Chinese language, Chinese race; it simply used the name "Chinese". The Chinese were excluded so much so that between 1923 and 1947 fewer than 50 "Chinese" were given papers for admission to Canada.

What was the impact of this law on the Chinese Canadian community, as it was then? In a nutshell, it was devastating in the end result.

In the initial instance, it took from the pocket of an immigrant an amount that would have been the equivalent of one or two year's wages, and I guess that was before there was income tax. That was a lot of money for an immigrant. It prevented an immigrant from purchasing land, setting up a business, building a home, creating a stake in his new country. Chinese Canadians of that era were basically prevented from settling into the economy because when they got here they had huge debts amounting to one or two year's wages. That is on the assumption that they did not have the $500 when they came.

• (1710)

It also occasioned a significant delay in reuniting a family, where that was possible.

But we know that in many, or even most cases, the family was never reunited. Individuals who came to Canada, virtually all male, if they wanted to visit their spouses over a 10 or 20 year period, had to leave and go back to China where they would stay for a short period and then come back to Canada. Many of those died alone in Canada.

It also prevented marriage of these Chinese immigrants. In those days, intermarriage was frowned upon and there simply were not enough females to permit the Chinese population here to marry in a circumstance that the society existing here would have permitted.

The result then is that hundreds, perhaps thousands of new Canadians were basically forced to spend the rest of their years alone in Canada. They lost contact with family, spouse, children. Those men came and built our country and when they had finished that we left them standing at the side of the road. I say thank God some of them lived long enough to collect the old age pension, but that is really not much of a consolation prize.

Why did we do it? I suppose I do not really know. I can only guess. I was not there. Maybe some of us are afraid to ask. I think we should ask, because that is how we can learn from history. But no matter what the reason, it was wrong, and we know it was wrong.

Some say that we should not waste time and the resources of the present to go back and redress the wrongs of the past. If we really believe that, I ask the House why we are still prosecuting war crimes that took place between 1939 and 1945? Those acts did not even involve Canadians, for the most part, they did not take place on Canadian soil, and please keep in mind that the Chinese Exclusion Act was not repealed until 1947. Why also are we still redressing treaty and non-treaty rights of aboriginal Canadians? There are grievances involving acts that we did and did not do, omission and commission, 100 and 150 years ago in relation to native Canadians. We admit our responsibility for all of that. We are still dealing with it, maybe not quickly enough, but we are dealing with it.

I can accept that we do not have to go back and redress grievances that emanated from the Franco-Prussian War, or from the quasi-genocides that occurred when the Europeans first arrived in the New World 300, 400 years ago. But I do not think that is what we are dealing with here now. I do not accept that a living Canadian who has been wronged does not have the right to seek redress, or that his country does not have an obligation to respond to him or her.

Today, in the House, we have one of those thousands who paid the head tax, Mr. James Ng from Montreal. I heard him speak eloquently about the impact of that tax on his family and him. His father paid the tax, $500, and spent years repaying it. Some years before his father had gone back to China, fathered Mr. Ng, and came back to Canada. Ten years later, Mr. Ng set out, at 10 years of age, and came to Canada alone. He spent two weeks in a rather cold detention centre where his family was forced to pay another fifty bucks to get him released. He calls that "under the table" money.

Yet, Mr. Ng expresses a pride in his country. He feels badly about the misfortunes of the Chinese immigrants of the time, and Lord knows there have been many immigrants from many countries who had terrible times and suffering. But Mr. Ng is proud of Canada. He believes, nonetheless, that Canada must respond to the wrong that that tax represented.

I want to add a note of caution. I do not believe that the government should let this issue drag on. I do not believe it should give time and opportunity to those who live with intolerance and manifest it, to manifest their intolerance again. I believe the government should act quickly to address the grievance and provide a redress. If it is the right thing to do, then we must do it now.

I urge all members in the House to support this motion.

Mrs. Pauline Browes (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to have an opportunity to participate in this very important debate today. I want to express to the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River, whose riding and my own are side by side, that we share many of the sentiments that have been expressed in terms of this motion today.

This motion refers to the head tax levied on immigrants from China at the turn of the century. This is indeed a very serious issue because it touches a number of important social questions that are of growing concern.

The member who introduced the motion and myself live in a community that is blessed with a strong and vibrant Chinese community. The city of Scarborough is quickly becoming a major social, commercial, and cultural centre for Chinese Canadians, and we are proud of it.

Canada has been blessed in many ways by the hard work of Chinese Canadians who literally built much of the country.

The historical treatment of Chinese immigrants is deplorable. That is why the Minister of State for Multiculturalism and Citizenship has met with representatives of the Chinese Canadian community to listen to their concerns. Their proposal for redress is being given careful and thorough consideration. I can assure the member and all members of the House that the minister is very conscious of the issue and that he has a personal commitment to issues that concern injustice and racial intolerance.

In just a few weeks we will join together in a celebration of Canada Day. July 1 is a time for all of us to celebrate our country and our shared national heritage. Canada is an international nation. We have built a strong and prosperous country on the foundation of freedom and independence.

The government is continuing to strengthen that foundation. Our record since 1984 is a testament to that commitment.

The Canadian Multiculturalism Act outlines in legislation a vision of Canada where justice, cultural diversity, equality, and national unity are interwoven into a social fabric. Multiculturalism will continue to thrive because the concept is enshrined in our Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

• (1720)

The employment equity legislation establishes strict objectives to enhance the participation of all communities, in the Public Service and companies that deal with the federal government.

We have dealt effectively with the redress issue for Japanese Canadians. I might add that the party of my colleague opposite who introduced this motion ignored that issue while it was in office. Out of that redress issue, we are in the process of establishing a Race Relations Foundation and the Canadian Heritage Languages Institute. We are creating a new department of multiculturalism and citizenship which I know my friend also supports. We created the first parliamentary Standing Committee on Multiculturalism.

These policies embrace all Canadians, whether of Chinese or any other heritage. Of course, shameful acts of the past, such as the Chinese head tax, were the result of ignorance and fear. Human nature is fearful of what is different. The way to combat ignorance is through education. The government's policies and programs are doing just that.

Through associations of educators, an understanding of multiculturalism and race relations is being integrated into school programs. As well, the government is working to improve the relations between police forces and the communities that they serve. There is cross-cultural awareness training for personnel and efforts to increase recruits from cultural minorities.

Eliminating racial discrimination requires sound research to develop effective responses. We must understand the causes of racism in order to eradicate it. To that end, as hon. members know, the government has tabled Bill C-63, the Race Relations Foundation Act, which will be established in metropolitan Toronto.

The foundation will serve as a major national resource to facilitate throughout Canada the development, the sharing, the application of knowledge, and the expertise that will help to eliminate racial discrimination. I want to report that today in committee we heard witnesses from the Japanese Canadians are this very issue.

As well, our Canadian Multiculturalism Act commits federal institutions to ensuring that government policies and programs respond to the needs of all Canadians. Federal institutions are building bridges to communities and delivering services in a manner that makes them accessible to everyone.

Along the same lines, the federal government is working with the provincial, territorial and municipal governments in a partnership to eliminate the blight of injustice and racial discrimination. Joint initiatives and cost-sharing activities are addressing racism and promoting institutional change.

It is clear that the government is making every effort to address the human rights issue and to correct wrongs that have been done. We are anxious to have past injustices rectified. We need to recognize that this is a complex issue that happened several decades ago. The matter must be examined very carefully so that a fair and just resolution is arrived at.

The government is doing just that, not only with regard to the head tax levied on the Chinese immigrants, but with respect to the treatment of all groups as well. I am pleased to have had the opportunity to speak to this, Madam Speaker, and I thank you for that.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to have an opportunity to comment again on the matter of the Chinese head tax, a question that my party has raised a number of times over the last six years. The question is very lively in the riding of Trinity—Spadina where some of the head taxpayers and many of their descendants lived.

First, I wish to commend the member for Scarborough—Rouge River for his action in placing this motion before us. The motion has a good thrust and his defence of the motion was excellent and well spoken.

My party and I do not agree entirely with some of the details of the motion. We would rather the motion was more in line with the request of the Chinese Canadian National Council. It requested:

> —that the government should acknowledge that the 1885 Act to restrict and regulate Chinese immigration into Canada which imposed a Chinese Head Tax and the 1923 Chinese Immigration Act which excluded Chinese immigration were discriminatory against immigrants of Chinese origin and contrary to the principles now adopted and reflected in our Charter of Rights and Freedoms and that the government meet with Chinese Canadian National Council to negotiate appropriate individual and community compensation.

If I may at the end of my remarks, Madam Speaker, I would offer that motion in amendment in substitution for all the words following the first line where it states "The government should".

The member for Scarborough—Rouge River asked: "Why did we do it?" He says he was not there when it happened. Even I was not there when it happened, although I have whiter hair than he has. We can get some idea why it was done if we look at some of the records. We find that there was open racism reflecting greed of employers and fear and competitive envy of workers.

For example, the following was said in the House of Commons—the House that was here before this one was built—on May 12, 1882, as reported in Hansard, Volume 12, page 1477, and I quote:

> In fact, there is such a want of white labour in British Columbia, that if you wish to have the railway finished within any reasonable time, there must be no step against Chinese labour—At present it is simply a question of alternatives—either you must have this labour or you cannot have the railway.

That was said by Sir John A. Macdonald, our first Prime Minister.

In the same speech he explained his view more generally, and I quote from the same page:

> I share very much the feeling of the people of the United States, and the Australian colonies, against a Mongolian or Chinese population in our country as permanent settlers. I believe they would not be a wholesome element for this country. I believe that it is an alien race in every sense, that would not and could not be expected to assimilate with our Arian population—

Obviously, this was written long before Hitler gave the word Arian a very ominous meaning in our lifetime. I continue:

> —and, therefore, if the temporary necessity had been overcome, and the railway constructed across the continent, with the means of sending the European settlers and labourers into British Columbia, then it would be quite right to join to a reasonable extent in preventing the permanent settlement in this country of Mongolian, Chinese or Japanese immigrants.

Then he makes the statement which I have already read:

> At present it is simply a question of alternatives—either you must have this labour or you cannot have the railway.

There are other things that should be said about what happened in those days. One final remark from Hansard in 1885, Volume 2, page 1582. Although I do not have the attribution of the Speaker, perhaps he can be generally identified by his words: "The Conservative party stands for a white Canada, the protection of white labour and the absolute exclusion of Asiatics".

• (1730)

As the previous speaker, the mover of the motion said, the condition of these workers was dreadful. They worked under very harsh conditions. They sometimes had to be suspended by a rope to drill holes in the rock face, and it was very difficult to find a European immigrant to do this job. Workers were given less than the rate of pay of Europeans. The company profited by about $5 million, which was a lot of money then, by using the Chinese workers rather than the British, American, German or French workers, whom they could not get.

I quote from a book called It is Only Fair! Redress for the Head Tax and Chinese Exclusion Act.

> Accidents were frequent. Many died of exhaustion from hard work, harsh weather, and extremely poor living conditions. Others perished in rock explosions, were buried in collapsed tunnels, drowned in rivers after falling from unfinished bridges or died from scurvy with little medical attention.
> —it is estimated that at least 600 Chinese died during this railroad construction. In 1891, the Chinese Consolidated Benevolent Association of Victoria arranged for the collection of more than three hundred unidentified corpses from the Fraser and Thompson canyons and these were returned to China for burial.

That was the origin of both the head tax of the 1880s and also the Chinese Immigration Act, sometimes called the Chinese exclusion act of 1923.

Some of the people who have paid that tax are still with us. One of them, Mr. Mak Kue Lep, who was first to ask for reimbursement, came to his member of Parliament, the member for Vancouver East, and asked her to raise the question. That was six years ago. He died last year, so he will not ever collect the money that he paid, which he said—I think and we think—was unjustly required of him for entering Canada. He did not ask for interest. He asked only for the money back.

Times have changed. On August 16, 1984 the Progressive Conservative Party said that it supported the introduction of an all-party parliamentary resolution which would recognize the injustice and discrimination of the head tax and the Chinese immigration exclusion act.

The Leader of the Liberal Party said the same on October 20, as did the Leader of the New Democratic Party on October 31 of that year. This year, when speaking on March 19 in Toronto, the Minister of State (Housing) said that it is long overdue that the Chinese recognize redress for the Chinese head tax:

> "I want to pledge to you tonight—that this government will go forward with a redress policy for all Canadians and that redress for the head tax will be part of the policy."

As the member for Scarborough—Rouge River has told us, we have the endorsement of not dozens, but hundreds of Canadians for this very just action.

The question is, what is this government waiting for? Is the government waiting to do this on the eve of the next election? It is an urgent matter. The President of the Chinese Canadian National Council told me today that his grandfather died last fall. His grandfather was another one who paid the head tax.

The people who paid the head tax are dying off. There may be only 1,000 of them left, and if this government does not act promptly, they will all be dead. That will be a second disgrace, equal almost to the first one, because now we cannot say that we do not know any better. Therefore, I move:

> That the motion be amended by deleting all the words after "should" and substituting therefor the following:
> —acknowledge that the 1885 Act to Restrict and Regulate Chinese Immigration into Canada which imposed a Chinese Head Tax and the 1923 Chinese Immigration Act which excluded Chinese immigration were discriminatory against immigrants of Chinese origin and contrary to the principles now adopted and reflected in our Charter of Rights and Freedoms and that the government meet with the Chinese Canadian National Council to negotiate appropriate individual and community compensation.

I have the motion here, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: As soon as the motion put by the hon. member and seconded by Mr. McCurdy reaches me, I will study it and come back to the House. It will take a minute. We will reserve on the admissibility of the amendment for the time being.

[Translation]

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I also welcome the opportunity to take part in the debate on the motion of the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River.

To illustrate the context of this debate, I would like to provide a short summary of the history of Canadians of Chinese origin, including the discriminatory measures that caused so much suffering. I would like to give my colleagues a better understanding of the head tax and the Chinese Immigration Act, and of the impact they had on the Chinese community.

Madam Speaker, this particular part of our history is not something I am proud to bring to the attention of my colleagues and Canadians. Nevertheless, we must look at the facts, otherwise we would be remiss in our duty to Chinese Canadians, their ancestors and all Canadians.

Chinese immigrants first arrived in Canada from San Francisco in 1858, to take part in the Fraser River gold rush. The first Chinese community was founded in Barkerville, British Columbia. The Canadian Pacific Railway could not have been built without Chinese immigrants, who laboured under appalling conditions.

As soon as they arrived in Canada, the Chinese were subject to measures that had the effect of restricting their rights. For instance, in 1875 they lost the right to vote in British Columbia. Widespread anti-Chinese agitation led to the head tax, adopted by the Government of Canada in 1885.

The initial tax was $50 but anti-Chinese pressure became so great that the tax was raised twice, rising to $500 in 1903, the equivalent of about two years' wages for the average Chinese worker.

Madam Speaker, quite frankly, the purpose of the tax was to stop Chinese immigration. The result was that in 1923, Chinese immigration had ceased, for all practical purposes, except for a few rare exceptions. July 1, 1923, became known as "Humiliation Day".

The impact of these measures on the lives and prosperity of the Chinese-Canadians was disastrous. This was a society bereft of women and children, a society of solitude and social and economic misery as a result of the problems experienced by Chinese workers when they tried to bring their wives and children to this country. According to the Canadian Encyclopaedia, in 1931, out of a total Chinese population of 46,519, only 3,648 were women.

Canadians of Chinese origin paid more than $23 million in head taxes between 1885 and 1923. Perhaps I may give some idea of what this meant. According to Peter S. Li, who studied the history of Chinese-Canadians between 1905 and 1914, in 1911 the government collected $13,800,000 in head taxes, the equivalent of 14 per cent of the defence budget at the time. An impressive amount indeed!

Madam Speaker, today, despite the difficulties in the past, there are nearly 400,000 Chinese Canadians in this country. Through their participation in various trades, their voluntary and community associations, their businesses, their famous Chinese restaurants—Madam Speaker, I have a few in my riding as you do, and we go there every week—their neighbourhoods and their immense culture, Chinese Canadians contribute to the rich mosaic of the Canadian family.

• (1740)

To be a Canadian means to belong to a multicultural family, and we have made this diversity a matter of pride and a matter of sharing. To ensure that racism does not take root as a result of these differences, this diversity is recognized as a fundamental characteristic of our society and a major consideration in the decision-making process of the federal government and its intitutions.

As a government, our position is clear. The very existence of racism and racial discrimination is the antithesis of our laws and our ideals. Furthermore, such attitudes are incompatible with the kind of country Canadians want to build for themselves, and must be rooted out for good.

Madam Speaker, the government is giving special consideration to representations made by groups of Chinese Canadians. The situation was not generally known to Canadians until recent years. Nevertheless, we should not be rushed into hasty decisions that might have unforeseen consequences. We must put the situation of Chinese Canadians into the general context of our cultural groups in Canada, a number of which have suffered the cruel ravages of racism.

Madam Speaker, today Canada has become a model as far as human rights are concerned. Unfortunately, some of our ancestors did not have the same social conscience that is now common among Canadian men and women. Some of our ancestors had exaggerated fears about immigrants, and we recognize the fact that these fears produced some very unhealthy situations for Chinese Canadians.

It is up to today's generation to determine how to recognize the wrongs done to victims of past racism, in a spirit of sympathy and consultation.

Despite all our good will, we cannot rewrite history. However, the government will continue to examine this question, determine the facts and pursue its consultations with Chinese Canadians.

The government will never again allow policies of the kind that made Chinese Canadians suffer be adopted in this country.

That is this government's firm commitment to Canadians, a commitment that forms the basis for our considerations on this very important question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Before recognizing the next speaker, I would like to rule on the amendment that was presented by the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina.

Unfortunately, I will have to rule it out of order. The hon. member may want to look at citation 437 of Beauchesne's fifth edition. I can understand the good intentions of the proposition, but it does raise a new question. It could be considered a distinct motion after proper notice. It is not acceptable as an amendment to the motion now before the House.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, first I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Scarborough—Rouge River on the leadership role he has taken on this issue in the House.

I raised the issue some time ago, right after the 1988 election with the minister of multiculturalism and citizenship. At that time, he told me that discussions would start taking place with the representatives of the Chinese community. It is approximately two years since he said that, and discussions still have not taken place as they should.

There is communication back and forth between the office of the minister and representatives of the Chinese community, but we have yet to see some sort of action plan put in place.

I am very discouraged by what I heard this afternoon from a member of the Canadian-Chinese community who happens to be one of the people who arrived in Canada in 1923. Among other things he indicated that besides paying $500 to enter Canada, he had to pay $50 in order to get quicker entry, even though after paying the $50 he was held for approximately two weeks eating plain bread with sugar at noon, having two actual meals throughout the day, and sleeping on beds without proper mattresses. It is quite discouraging.

When a reporter asked him about his feeling for Canada, he was almost in tears and was saying: "I love Canada, I love Canada. All I want before I die is to see some sort of recognition of the fact that what had happened in the 1900s and thereafter was wrong. The government should admit that".

I have in my hand copies of articles which are quite encouraging. There is a statement made on behalf of the Prime Minister or by the Prime Minister himself wherein he said that his government was considering extending the principle of compensating victims of government heavy-handedness during World War II—Italian, Ukrainian Canadians, and others—as it compensated Japanese Canadians who were held in internment camps. That is very encouraging. I congratulate government members because they are talking about dealing with the issue.

Around the same time the Minister of State for Housing clearly indicated in Toronto to members of the Chinese community that he too would like to see the federal government move fairly quickly on the issue.

Here we have two members of the government saying that we have to move fairly quickly. I think personally that it is time we acted on it. Members of the Conservative Party, the Liberal Party and the NDP have already called on the government for action. It is time for the government to set up an all-party committee in order to address the issue, not only the issue of the Chinese community but also the issue of the Italian community, the Ukrainian community, and all those who feel that they were subjected to some mishap during World War II, thereafter or before.

It is fairly urgent when it comes to the Chinese Canadian community because many of its people who were hit personally by the head tax are dying. We cannot wait any longer for some kind of action.

Again I congratulate the hon. member.

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Madam Speaker, I also congratulate the member for Scarborough—Rouge River on this motion and would like to speak in favour of it.

I realize that time is important and is passing. Perhaps I may do what an author is not supposed to do and quote from my own book on the subject. I would like to quote from Western Canadians in Confederation. In part it indicates that Western Canada in 1986 had approximately 170,000 persons of solely Chinese origin and about 22,000 more of partly Chinese descent. Seven in ten single origin Chinese western Canadians live in British Columbia, and fully 100,000 of these reside in the Vancouver area. A little less than half of all Canadians of single Chinese origin live in the four western provinces, Yukon, and Northwest Territories. The book continues:

> Chinese Canadians born outside Canada have come from many countries. The 1981 census shows that in this group 24 per cent were born in Taiwan; 23 per cent in China; 9 per cent in Vietnam; 4 per cent in Malaysia or Singapore; and 34 per cent elsewhere, primarily Hong Kong. Eighty-seven per cent of those born outside Canada entered Canada during the 1965-81 period and in recent years approximately 13,000 have entered Canada, many from Hong Kong, as entrepreneurs. The unemployment rate for both Chinese men and women was at the time of the 1981 census less than that for Canadian men and women as a whole. Considerably more Chinese Canadians (28 per cent) than all Canadians (16 per cent) have some university education.
> Western Canadians of Chinese origin are part of the huge Diaspora of more than eight million "overseas Chinese" who have prospered from South Asia to the Caribbean. As late as the sixteenth century, China had the highest standard of living on earth. During the eighteenth century, its population more than doubled, reaching 430 million by 1850. When Europeans forcibly opened China's markets in the 19th century, its cottage cloth industry was all but destroyed by machine-made foreign cloth. A migration of young men became necessary to help feed their closely-knit families who were left at home.
> The first of these men from China came to British Columbia in 1858, lured by the Fraser River gold rush, and by 1860 approximately 4,000 of them lived in the lower mainland of the colony. Some mined, others sold vegetables or wood, or operated restaurants and laundries.
> The legal equality in the workplace of those who stayed after the gold rush was removed by the B.C. provincial legislature in 1878 when it unanimously resolved that persons of origin in China could no longer be hired on provincial public works—a rule which astonishingly remained in effect until after World War II. The franchise was denied them in 1872.
> Nonetheless, as many as 17,000 Chinese came to B.C. between 1881 and 1884 to assume a Herculean part in the completion of the Canadian Pacific rail line between the Fraser Canyon and Vancouver. As the project neared completion, the B.C. provincial government encouraged them to leave the region through such measures as a $10 head tax on all Chinese, banning the removal of dead bodies back to China, denying Chinese the right to buy provincial Crown land, and prohibiting further immigration from China. Prime Minister Macdonald's government in Ottawa played its part by imposing $50 head tax on all Chinese entering Canada after 1886.

• (1750)

That was to its shame. The book continues:

> In 1900, Prime Minister Laurier raised the head tax to $100, and in 1904 to $500. In 1923, the government of Mackenzie King barred all Chinese immigration, and it did not begin again until the legislation was finally repealed in 1947.
> The combination of legislated and other discrimination against the Chinese in British Columbia and better opportunities to establish small businesses elsewhere in Canada, by 1921 had caused an estimated 40 per cent of the 40,000 Chinese then resident in Canada to move eastward, some as far as Newfoundland. Virtually every prairie town soon had a Chinese restaurant and laundry.

Sadly, Madam Speaker, the books continues:

> The three prairie legislatures proved not immune to anti-Chinese propaganda seeping over the mountains. The Saskatchewan assembly disenfranchised Chinese as early as 1908, which meant in practice that they could not vote in federal elections either or join professions whose associations required members to be registered voters. The prairie fever—

I could call it a plague:

> —here reached a sufficiently high temperature that the Saskatchewan and Manitoba governments, even before British Columbia's, barred Chinese restaurants from hiring white women out of a preposterous fear that they would be introduced to opium and sold into white slavery.
> Between 1924 and 1946, only eight Chinese immigrants entered Canada because of Mackenzie King's Chinese exclusion law of 1923. Many of the Chinese men already resident in Canada thus aged without families in Canada.

A minute ago we heard Mr. Yee's family story, the president of CCNC. There are all kinds of tragic stories of this type. It continues:

> Ironically, events of World War II helped the Canadian Chinese cause because white Canadian sympathy for China grew markedly as a result of the Japanese aggression there. As the historians Jin Tan and Patricia Roy point out, "(During the war,) racial prejudice became unfashionable." The Vancouver Parks Board, for example, repealed its rule that Chinese persons could swim at a public pool only during a specified two-hour period once weekly. The legislature of Saskatchewan restored the franchise in 1944 and in 1945 British Columbia enfranchised everyone who had served in either World War, including the Chinese but not the Japanese. The public on the coast generally welcomed the repeal of Ottawa's Chinese Immigration Act in 1947.

I could go on, but I think I should point out in support of this matter that a large number of western Canadians of Chinese origin are entrepreneurs and professionals. A majority of them work in sales, services, and other white collar work. Most of them think of themselves as Canadians first and Chinese second. But—and this is important—alone among all cultural groups in Canada they know that their families were forced to pay an entry fee and were effectively barred from immigration from 1923 to 1947. It goes on:

> Attitudes have finally changed throughout Canada and institutionalized racism is gone. No longer do whites expect them or anyone to be "assimilated." They can now preserve and celebrate their cultural identity and remain both Canadian and Chinese in whatever proportion they choose.

I hope it follows from what I have just said that this is a motion that deserves to be passed, not to be talked out today by government members.

I would point out to the parliamentary secretary who spoke a few minutes ago that the recent budget, I understand, gives either $12 million or $14 million to Canadian businessmen to learn Pacific Rim languages. The same budget cuts, I think it is $4 million, from heritage language programs across Canada, every penny of those programs.

In other words there is money for things that it wants, but there does not seem to be money from this government until the next election for causes which are just and have been a canker on the Canadian soul for many years.

I would hope that the government members will not get up one after another now and attempt to talk this excellent motion out.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bob Porter (Medicine Hat): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise in the House to respond to my hon. colleague's motion with respect to the head tax levied on immigrants from China from the period 1885 to 1923.

The head tax of 1885 and the subsequent Chinese Immigration Act of 1923 were, in their times, culminations of the prevalent fear of Chinese immigrants. The range of racist and discriminatory measures to which the Chinese historically were subjected in this country is astonishing to this generation.

We live in another era. My hon. colleagues have underscored the fact that the government measures encouraged the growth and development of a spirit of respect and equality. Canada was an original signator on the United Nations' Universal Declaration of Human Rights in 1948, of the United Nations international convention on the elimination of all forms of racial discrimination, as well as the enactment of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and its equality provisions.

Canadians of all cultural backgrounds benefit from a positive framework to combat racial discrimination. For example, we have the Canadian Multiculturalism Act and the employment equity legislation, including measures with respect to the representation of visible minorities in the Public Service.

My hon. colleagues have spoken of other programs and educational efforts that the government has undertaken to remove the stain of racism from all sectors of Canadian society; in education, the media, the workplace, business, health and social services, and public administration at all levels of government. The government's tabling of Bill C–63 which establishes the Canadian Race Relations Foundation demonstrates its commitment to the elimination of racism.

All these measures ensure a characteristic of our society that is so evident and of which we are so proud. Canada is a multicultural country and Canadians of Chinese origin or ancestry are an important part of this multicultural identity.

In 1947, the Chinese Immigration Act was finally repealed. By 1967, remaining vestiges of immigration discrimination against the Chinese were finally and completely removed. These landmarks did not occur by accident. They resulted from the struggle and determination of generations of Chinese Canadians and, eventually, from the majority of Canadians who could no longer condone such discrimination.

This struggle began almost from the very beginning of the Chinese community in Canada when Chinese Canadians, as was mentioned earlier, helped to build the national railway, under the most appalling conditions. Chinese Canadians were building the country during the early years of Confederation. They remain at the task today, joined with other Canadians in the process of building Canada.

My hon. colleagues have referred to the various forms of discrimination to which Chinese Canadians were subjected. Yet, these Canadians fought back. They fought for their rights and for the welcome they deserved in their new land. Their struggle was carried out with patience, dignity, and persistence.

In 1922, in British Columbia, the Chinese Benevolent Association, led a year-long school boycott to protest against the policies of white supremacists in the Victoria school board. It ended when the board finally re-admitted Chinese pupils into the public schools. This incident was similar to many other measures that Chinese Canadians undertook to defend themselves. For example, in 1881, Chinese railway workers protested when a labour contractor tried to take a higher commission from their wages.

In 1916, the Chinese Labour Association was formed in British Columbia. The organization was tested in 1919 when local shingle mill owners attempted to roll back wages. The workers formed the Shingle Workers Association, struck for 40 days, and preserved their wage levels. Even in this instance, organized labour in Canada, 70 years ago, was discriminatory. The Trades and Labour Congress of Canada regularly passed anti-Chinese resolutions up until the 1920s, but Chinese Canadian workers eventually improved their conditions.

A significant role was played in protecting Chinese Canadians from racism by the Chinese Benevolent Association, formed in 1884, after the completion of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Unfortunately I will have to interrupt the hon. member. The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired.

Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1) the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

I understand there were discussions earlier and there was unanimous consent to call it ten o'clock at this time. Is that still agreeable?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Madam Speaker, my general subject today will come as no surprise to you—it is fish, just as you thought. My particular subject has to do with the people in many parts of rural Newfoundland who are being pulverized because of the current situation in the fishery.

I gave notice some time ago that I was dissatisfied with an answer given to me by my friend from St. John's West, the Minister for International Trade, who was on that day speaking for the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans who was away from the House on government business.

As you will know, Madam Speaker, under our procedures if we are not satisfied with an answer we can rise at this particular time. I rise because I am very dissatisfied with the answer the minister from St. John's West gave me that day.

First, let us note what day it was he gave that answer. It was February 13, four months and one day ago. I was asking before that and I have asked since that, but with respect to today's proceeding, four full months ago in this Chamber I asked my fellow Newfoundlander from St. John's West if he would come to the aid of those people in those small communities who are trying to protect a way of life, to hold on, to cling onto a lifestyle. They are trying, in the more immediate, to find enough money to put groceries on the table. Their fisherfolk, both men and women, are going out in the boats from places on the Port au Port Peninsula along the southwest coast in Fortune Bay and Placentia Bay, from communities like Garnish, François, Harbour le Cou, Petites, McCallum and many others along that coast.

These people, over the years, have gone out fishing and come back with a full boatload, a bumper load, as we say. These same people have been going out these past few months and not catching enough fish to pay for the cost of preparing to go out—the cost of the bait, of operating the motor, of the gasoline; let alone finding enough profit in that undertaking to buy the groceries, let alone getting enough return on that day's work to pay for the loan on that boat from the Fisheries Loan Board or the local bank.

That is my subject, Madam Speaker. As you know, that has been my subject for some time in this House and I am sure it will come as no surprise to you that it will continue to be my subject until we get the attention of this government.

It is true, and I would be the first one to acknowledge this—indeed I thank the minister publicly—that after many months of preaching to the minister and his colleagues, the government did respond with a program which will somewhat help the people in the so-called offshore communities, the fishermen, the plant workers and the industrial base in communities such as Gaultois and Grand Bank.

At the time I asked that question four months ago and up until now the minister has not responded to the desperate plea of those people in those communities. That is a subject that I addressed earlier today in this House. I asked the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans a question on this subject only yesterday.

• (1805)

The question is simple, and the solution is very simple, too. The question is: What are you going to do to help those people who through no fault of their own have no income? Others have depleted the stocks. The foreign overfishing has depleted the stocks. The French fishing in 3PS have depleted the stocks.

Those people cannot catch the fish twice. They cannot catch the fish that has already been caught by someone else.

They are caught in that period. Should they abandon their communities, their way of life, their loved ones, their neighbours, their homes, their property and pack their suitcases and go to Fort McMurray or Cambridge, Ontario, or Toronto? No, that is not the solution.

The solution is right under our noses. The solution is to help these people bridge the gap financially from prosperous times, which they have known until a year or so ago, to more prosperous times. The government does tell us it is going to have the stocks rebuilt in three, four or five years' time. So let us keep those people there in a community where they can do what they know best, where their skills are related to the fishery.

In order to do that what we need, and what we do not yet have from this government, is a fisheries aid package to help the people in Piccadilly, Lourdes and the other places on the Port au Port Peninsula, on the southwest coast, in Fortune Bay, in Placentia Bay. These are people who are hurting today, whose pain and suffering could be eased if the minister with a stroke of a pen would exercise a bit of humanity instead of giving me those cheap partisan answers that he has been giving in the last day or two in particular. That is beneath him.

He would be equal to the task if tomorrow he rose in this House and said: "I recognize the plight of those people and I am prepared on behalf of the Government of Canada to do something about it". Let him be a man. Let him come to the aid of those people now while there is still time.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to expand upon the reply given the hon. member by the Minister for International Trade on behalf of the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

The government is fully aware of conditions throughout the Atlantic fishery. The 1989-90 winter fishery in NAFO division 3PS off the south coast of Newfoundland has experienced a catch failure. Landings data reveal that catches are only 50 per cent of the 1985-87 average for the area. Officials of the Departments of Fisheries and Oceans and Employment and Immigration are currently developing appropriate measures to assist the area plant workers in fisheries affected by the catch failures.

The federal government is deeply committed to the people of Atlantic Canada. The government is concerned both about the short term and long term conditions affecting the fishing industry. In most Atlantic fisheries, far more people depend on fishing activity than can earn a reasonable living from it. We recognize that there is a need to diversify local economies beyond the fishing industry and have evaluated other adjustment measures that will help produce excess capacity and improve fishery economic viability in existing communities.

Since January, the government has announced a $584 million assistance program to Atlantic fisheries. This is comprised of a short term adjustment package with a commitment to spend up to $130 million to assist employees in Nova Scotia and Newfoundland who are laid off because of a decline in the northern cod stocks, an additional $28 million to improve surveillance and a $426 million Fisheries Adjustment Program for Atlantic Canada that will implement a long term strategy for the fishing industry. That is the one that was announced on May 7.

These special programs will be in addition to the ongoing federal programs to assist in workforce adjustment, attracting other enterprises to Atlantic Canada in the pursuit of alternative employment opportunities.

In particular I would like to draw the member's attention to the Industrial Adjustment Service. This includes many programs to assist workforce adjustment in Atlantic fishing communities. Other measures include income support through unemployment insurance, training services, assistance in relocation, funding for community initiatives and assistance for workers 55 years of age or older.

The government has repeatedly demonstrated its concern with the fish stocks, industry conditions and the situation of individual fishermen and plant workers in Atlantic Canada.

• (1810)

Every year since 1985 the government has implemented special response measures specifically targeted to assist fishermen and plant workers affected by catch failures. The government has shown and continues to show compassion to individuals adversely affected by the conditions in the industry.

I might say, Madam Speaker, that if the hon. member could speak to his friends in the other place and have them pass Bill C-21 and put it into law that many of the complaints that he is making would be taken care of.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, on March 7, 1990, I asked the Minister of Employment and Immigration to take action to stop the backlog of refugee claimants from destroying the refugee determination system, that is, by eliminating the old backlog.

My question was as follows:

> I would ask the minister whether, in view of the hardship visited on people for some years now, including the members of her own immigration staff, and in view of this added delay for which she is responsible through that guideline, she will direct her staff to prepare a speedy system for landing all persons in that backlog according to the basic criteria of health and security.

The minister of course declined but without addressing the problem of delay which I had raised.

I want now to point out that we face a new sort of impasse. There is the old backlog which was 85,000 people. There is a new backlog in the new system. The old and new backlogs together total more than the original.

Of the old backlog by April, which is the latest figures available to me, there were still about 70,000 cases to be heard. Of the new backlog, in only 15 months since January 1, 1989, there were 18,000 cases waiting to be heard. In other words, the total new backlog is 88,000 cases—3,000 more than it was a year and a half ago.

One source of this trouble is the system of double hearings in the new refugee determination system. There is the hearing for a credible basis. That is to say when it is decided whether the claimant has some evidence upon which the board at a later hearing might find a legitimate claim. Then there is the full board hearing.

The very effective screening outside the country, of which the department staff are very proud, is preventing most would-be claimants from even getting to Canada to claim refugee status. We find that over 95 per cent of those who enter this credible basis test are found positively to have one and are sent on to the next stage.

At the next stage, 75 per cent are found to be refugees. So the great majority of the claimants who are dealt with are examined twice. I think that this was not the original intent of this law, but it is the effect of this law.

The delays are growing very seriously. In the estimates for this department, it was projected that the delay between the making of a claim and having a final decision by the end will be of this year nine months. This was the system which was put forward by the government primarily on the claim that it would be fast. It said it would be fast and fair. There are some arguments about the fairness, and I will come back to that, but there can be no argument that it is not fast, as the government first said it would be.

The fact is that most of those who have had decisions so far have been accepted. With that of course I do not quarrel, since in the cases that I have heard of they deserved it. But the delay that is caused by this double system is causing great harm to refugee claimants. Justice delayed is justice denied. It is causing the breakdown of families. The wife and children are often separated and do not know why they are not being brought to join the husband and father. It is also destroying the new system. The backlog is greater than it was a year and a half ago, even if it is now divided into two categories.

• (1815)

Therefore the Canadian Council for Refugees, at its meeting on June 2, proposed that the minister amend the law in order to deal with this problem. It proposed that the minister amend the Immigration Act to delete the requirement for an initial prescreening hearing for refugee claimants, that she amend the Immigration Act to incorporate a full appeal as a right, and that the resources for the initial prescreening hearing stage be immediately reallocated to the appeal and the full hearing stage.

In other words, instead of spending the money on some very high-priced help, as well as some middle-priced help, to do the job twice—once at the preliminary hearing where 95 per cent are sent forward and once at the full hearing where 75 per cent are found to be refugees—do it once. Cut out that first prescreening, that first inquiry and use the funds and the staff from that.

The board member could be used to speed up the work at the second stage. Since only one-quarter at the second stage are being refused, there would still be money left over to give a decent appeal in accordance with international legal practice and in accordance with general Canadian practice.

These refugee claimants are being discriminated against by being denied the right of an appeal in a life-threatening case which would be available even to a convicted murderer under Canadian legal practice.

Therefore, I urge the minister to consider seriously the proposal of the Canadian Council for Refugees.

Mr. Bill Kempling (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to expand upon the reply given by the Minister of Employment and Immigration to the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina on March 7, 1990.

The suggestion made by the hon. member to land all persons in the backlog according to the basic criteria of health and security is in fact a general amnesty. The hon. Minister of Employment and Immigration has said that "an amnesty—would be an especially inappropriate response to a court decision which addresses itself to the application of rule of law and the requirement of fairness. Declaring an amnesty would subvert the very notion of the rule of law, and be patently unfair to the thousands of refugees who legitimately need Canada's protection". Such action would also send a clear message to bogus refugee claimants that they can come to Canada illegally and sooner or later they will be granted permanent residence.

As the hon. member is aware, in its report on the backlog clearance which was tabled on December 19, 1989, the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration stated:

> The committee recognizes the purposes of the various aspects of the program announced by the minister. Case-by-case processing means that all individuals are treated in the same manner and dealt with fairly. Adopting the credible basis test sends a message that Canada will be generous to those who need our protection, yet firm with those who do not qualify. Humanitarian and compassionate criteria protect those who might otherwise be placed in danger. The committee accepts and supports these general goals.

The Minister of Employment and Immigration acted quickly and responded to Mr. Justice Jerome's decision by providing new guidelines for administering the humanitarian and compassionate reviews of refugee claimants. Procedures were developed to ensure that everyone in the backlog, including those who were refused prior to this court decision, has the opportunity for a full assessment of humanitarian and compassionate considerations.

Therefore, the problem has been resolved. The backlog clearance system is continuing to operate.

NEW HORIZONS PROGRAM

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am rising concerning the question of the New Horizons program, a program for seniors in Canada which has obtained a very significant recognition by seniors' groups as a worth-while and innovative program whereby funds are made available to seniors and seniors' organizations to fund newsletters, publications, facilities that are being constructed, and so on.

• (1820)

The comments I have received about this program for many years always have been positive. Certainly, since I became a member of Parliament and became even more aware of their existence, seniors' organizations in my riding and elsewhere in Canada have praised this as a very worth-while effort.

The budget for the program is modest. I believe the figure for this year is only $15 million. The Minister of State for Seniors is very fond of pointing out in her answers to questions on the subject that that program has been maintained. In fact, if you bear inflation in mind, it has been whittled down, but I will leave that aside. I congratulate the government for not having reduced the expenditure. It cut almost everything else, but it has not cut this one. I am delighted that that is so.

What it has done is in a way worse. Four million dollars out of the $15 million has been frozen at the present time while the government undertakes a review of the effectiveness of the program. Every seniors group says the program is great, but the government still feels that after a few years in service it has to be reviewed in case it is not effective. So it is holding back $4 million. I do not know whether the $4 million is to pay for the firm that is going to do the review for the government, whether the government is doing an internal review or what. I do not have any details on that. I do not understand why the $4 million has to be frozen.

So I asked about this on June 1. I put a question in the House during Question Period. The Minister of State for Housing was not here, neither was the Minister of National Health and Welfare or the President of the Treasury Board so, in the circumstances, I directed the question to the Acting Minister of Finance. However, he did not answer. I got an answer from the Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons.

This very distinguished and capable minister appeared not to have grasped the facts in relation to the seniors program. Given his youth, his enthusiasm for fitness and amateur sports and his heavy duties as deputy leader of the government in the House, I was not entirely surprised. He suggested that there had been no change and that the money was flowing the way it normally did.

Some of us knew otherwise. Certainly seniors groups have experienced other answers than that. I was a bit surprised at the answer so I returned to the issue on Wednesday, June 6. By that time the Minister of State for Seniors had reappeared. However, I got exceedingly vague answers from her on this. She would not admit that there was a freeze although in fact she had done so in committee. I quoted from the committee proceedings of a few weeks before. It was all pretty vague.

It appears that, in spite of my questions, I was not getting any answers as to what was being done with this $4 million. I asked on June 1 and I asked again today. I hope that the parliamentary secretary, who I know is sitting here anxiously with a prepared answer which is probably full of facts, figures and everything else, is going to tell me everything I want to know.

But the question I asked then was:

> Will the minister tell us when the review will be completed? When will the frozen funds be released? When will the review's findings be made public, or will they be made public?

They are all quite simple questions, but not one of them was answered by the minister on either June 1, when I first asked the question, or on June 6, when the Minister of State for Seniors as here.

On June 1, I got an answer that was incorrect. On June 6, I got an evasive, fumbling answer that simply said what a great program it was. I agree. I do not see a need for review. I do not know why the funds need to be frozen. The funds are frozen in different amounts in different provinces. In some provinces there is no freeze on their allocation. In other provinces there is a freeze on 25 per cent of the allocation and in others it is less than 25 per cent. There is no rhyme or reason to this. The money should be available to the groups which have applied for it and need it.

It is a sensible program. It has worked very well. I submit there is no need for review. I would like to know from the parliamentary secretary, since this is an opportunity for more detailed answers on his part, who is undertaking the review and, if it is done by a private consortium or company, at what cost to the taxpayer. How much of the $4 million is actually going to be expended in reviewing the program?

In addition, would the parliamentary secretary let us know when the review will be completed, when the report will be made public, if it is to be made public, and when the freeze will be lifted on the funds that are currently being held by the government in order to facilitate this review.

I again urge the minister, through the parliamentary secretary, of course, Madam Speaker, to move with despatch on this matter, provide us with answers and get this money out because it is such a worth-while program. The money is very well spent and it will be of considerable benefit and advantage to the groups which have applied for the funding.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada)): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his question. The only point in his remarks that disappointed me was when he stated that there was no need for a review.

Putting his fine legal mind to it, I am sure he can understand that after a program has been in existence for about 18 years and has never had a review, under normal circumstances a review would be in order, even though we might think everything is going well. I hate to disappoint the hon. member because I think he wants me to announce some kind of iniquitous and inequitable disparity in the programs, but I am not going to do that.

I would hope that what he wants are at least two criteria fulfilled: one, that these programs give us value for money; and two, that there be an equitable distribution. I think that is the point of the question that he raised. As I said, the program has not been reviewed for 18 years and it is time that that took place.

I want to assure him, as he has already indicated, that the $15 million allocated to the program is intact for the 1991 year. It is intact. It is the same as last year. We can quibble about the cost-of-living increase and so forth but that is there. The important thing is that thousands of senior citizens across Canada are benefiting from this program and we applaud it.

The fact is also that the applications for the program are filled out unevenly. They do not draw on the programs evenly across Canada. Let me give an example. There are two seniors programs, one is the New Horizons program and the other one is the Seniors Independence Program that was brought into effect in 1988 by this government.

In Quebec, the people under-utilize the Seniors Independence program but they subscribe and could easily over-subscribe to the New Horizons Program. Both of these programs are a benefit to the seniors in the province and I think the member would accept that. However, the fact is that the New Horizons Program has some attraction to their community needs and they like it.

The Quebec population is about 24.4 per cent of the population of Canada and of the two programs they will receive between 20 and 25 per cent of the total funds available. I think that the member might at least admit that this is equitable distribution of funds, and I see he nods his head that that is true. At the same time, if we can tailor the programs to meet their needs, that is fair, and I think he would accept that.

British Columbia, my province, has 11 to 12 per cent of the total population of Canada and 13 per cent of the seniors population. British Columbia will receive 13 per cent of the total funds available. It so happens that in my own community, the city of White Rock, the population is 35 per cent over age 65. I can tell the member that as popular as the New Horizons Program is, and as good as it is, and as many needs as it meets across Canada, there are a number of seniors in that community who disagree with the program and who feel that the tax dollars could be better spent in some other way.

I want to assure the member that there is no subtle scheme to whittle away at this program. As I said before, and he has agreed, the funds are intact. The government spends three times as much in the way of programs for seniors now than before the seniors initiative was announced.

The seniors initiative, announced in February, 1988 set in motion the Seniors Independence Program, an increase to the New Horizons program, and a number of other activities.

The member asked when will the review be done. I do not think that a date can be set on when the study will be done. However, I can tell the member that the seniors of this country are going to get full value for their dollar. The program is not going to be eroded and it will be equitably distributed across Canada.
