HOUSE OF COMMONS

VACANCY IN THE POSITION OF DEPUTY SPEAKER

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received a communication notifying me that a vacancy has occurred in the position of Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons, namely, the hon. Marcel Danis, by resignation.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-301, an act to amend the Criminal Code (gun control).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the said bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to introduce legislation in relation to gun control. It has two principal elements to it. One is in relation to the difficulties rural Canadians have long faced in terms of obtaining farm acquisition certificates. I believe the suggestion that I have is one that members from rural Canada would well understand and very likely support.

The second element is in relation to the deletion of the search and seizure without warrant provisions which were provided for in the notorious gun control legislation of more than a decade ago. Even independent analyses of the existing legislation that have been done indicate that there have been serious abrogations of it. My legislation would intend to remedy that.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time, and ordered to be printed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the hon. member for Skeena again, I would hope he would do the Chair the courtesy of giving advance notice that he is going to present bills. Is the hon. member going to present his three bills today?

Mr. Fulton: Four bills.

CANADA SAFE DRINKING WATER ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): moved for leave to introduce Bill C-302, an act to protect and enhance the quality of drinking water in Canada.

• (1110)

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the said bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, as all members of the House are aware, the quality of drinking water in Canada is the greatest environmental issue Canadians want addressed. Some 40 per cent of the marine pollution, both salt and fresh water, in Canada is presently coming from the pulp and paper industry.

One of the things that my legislation does is to establish base lines upon which we can move toward the same concept of zero discharge and zero tolerance that one finds in relation to the recent annex to the Great Lakes Water Quality Agreement. The intention is to clean up and keep safe and potable all fresh water in Canada.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

Routine Proceedings

CANADIAN ENVIRONMENTAL PROTECTION ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-303, an act to amend the Canadian Environmental Protection Act, (application of fines).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, this amendment to the Canadian Environmental Protection Act is a fundamental one. It provides for is what is known as fines-splitting. Under this provision, private groups or private individuals, which either provide information to the Crown or proceed with private prosecutions, would be returned up to one-half of the fine following the completion of the legal and court process and a ruling by the courts.

This is a widely respected and known principle used in many countries to encourage people who are working in an industry, farmers who see things happen, or private individuals who see degrading matters going on that affect the environment, to bring these matters properly before the courts.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

FORESTRY DEVELOPMENT AND RESEARCH ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-304, an act to amend the Forestry Development and Research Act (modified trees).

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the said bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, as you know, the recently passed Department of Forestry Act has a provision for the taking of a national inventory, something I know the Minister of Forests is undertaking with great speed.

One of the amendments to the federal legislation that I think is urgently is required is in relation to what are known as culturally modified trees. They are found in all areas of Canada, including both the territories. In particular, one finds culturally modified trees in places like Meares Island, where aboriginal people centuries ago operated, on a sustainable basis, the large-scale harvesting of wood from the forests without even cutting the tree down. They simply stripped planks and other materials from the trees.

The intention of this amendment to federal legislation is to provide for protection of culturally modified trees where they have a particular scientific or cultural value.

Motion agreed to, bill read the first time and ordered to be printed.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour and duty, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present to the House yet another petition certified correct by the Clerk of Petitions. It contains the signatures of hundreds of Canadians who say that since September, 1984, the Conservative federal government has imposed on Canadian taxpayers at least 32 new taxes or tax increases. The Conservative government wants to impose on Canadians a new general 7 per cent tax on goods and services whereas the Liberals, on behalf of Canadians, strongly oppose this new goods and services tax, which is an unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians and will hit them not only with higher taxes but with higher inflation, higher interest rates and higher unemployment.

Therefore, the petitioners pray and call upon Parliament to reject the proposed goods and services tax.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I have the honour to present a petition certified correct as to form and content and signed by some 42 concerned constituents. It is with regard to recent amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act which deprive adoptive parents of proper assistance.

RIGHTS OF THE UNBORN

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I would also like to present a certified petition with 49 signatures calling on the House to legislate to protect the rights of the unborn.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): I have two other petitions, Mr. Speaker. One is signed by 70 people calling on the government to scrap its proposed goods and services tax.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): I have another petition, Mr. Speaker, signed by 46 constituents calling on the government to reconsider recent budget cuts affecting veterans' lodging.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to table a petition today dealing with the infamous tax concerning services and products which will be imposed by this government in January 1991.

This petition presents serious arguments against the imposition of this regressive tax. The petition says that it will be applied unjustly to Canadians, that it will complicate their lives, and will make small business very difficult to administer. As a matter of fact, it will be an onerous burden on small business.

These people strongly oppose this goods and services tax which is, in their view, an unprecedented tax grab from the pockets of Canadians and will hit them not only with higher taxes but with higher inflation, higher interests rates—and God knows we have them now—and higher unemployment which is still with us.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have the pleasure to present a petition signed by substantially over 100 residents of my riding of Kingston and the Islands, who indicate their support for the proposition that no tax be applied to books and magazines, to the printed word in Canada, a democratic country. They submit that culture and education in a literate and productive society would be affected by the imposition of a tax on the printed word.

They call on Parliament to reaffirm this basic tenet or principle of democracy and reject a tax as proposed by this government on the printed word as embodied in the legislation supporting the GST, Bill C-62. They call on Parliament to reject that bill and that tax.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise today pursuant to Standing Order 36 to present three petitions all related to the goods and services tax, all somewhat different in their focus. They are all wanting Parliament to scrap the tax. Today's news is that the inflationary pressures of tax increases by the government are in fact increasing the interest rates and endangering small business.

The petitioners want us to make it known that while there is a broad public consensus to scrap the manufacturers' sales tax, the government should not use it as an opportunity to impose a massive tax grab.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I too have the pleasure to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36. It is signed by quite a number of people from southeastern Ontario.

The petition says that the Minister of Finance's proposed goods and services tax is an unfair form of taxation because of its lack of regard for a taxpayer's ability to pay. The petitioners call on Parliament to reject the current proposal for a goods and services tax and to reform the taxation system so that there is an effective minimum tax on wealthy individuals and corporations. They also ask the government to cease with a proposal which will shift the tax burden on to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax instead of through real tax reform.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present, on behalf of hundreds of petitioners, a large number of petitions which have been certified correct pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The petitioners are concerned that the government has not addressed the unfair taxation system currently in place which permits wealthy Canadians and corporations to pay little or no federal tax, while forcing low and middle income taxpayers to bear more of the national tax burden. The government is now trying to tax piano lessons, haircuts, diapers, coffins and even consumer loans, which some Canadians must take out just to pay their taxes.

Therefore they call on all members of this House—and I know, Mr. Speaker, you will be at the front of the line to oppose the GST when it comes before the House—to reject the current proposals for a grief and suffering tax, the goods and services tax, the GST.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Danis: Mr. Speaker, I would like to advise the House that tomorrow will be an allotted day.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1990–91

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed from Monday, May 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-65, an act to provide borrowing authority, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to stand in my place and debate this borrowing bill, particularly since it gives me an opportunity to talk a little more about Canada's record with respect to interest rates.

I read some time ago that it was the practice in old China, for those who could afford it, to pay the medical practitioners when they were doing a good job; that is, when they kept them well. If they became ill, they cut off the payment to the medical practitioner until such time as they got well again. Obviously, if they became sick under that practitioner's treatment, he was not doing the right job. So they paid him to keep them well, paid him while they were well, but cut off the payment when the medical practitioner was ineffective in his work.

In Canada, we look at it differently. We have a person who is responsible for economic affairs, the Governor of the Bank of Canada, who admits that he has failed in his announced goal. It has been his goal to reduce inflation to zero. He keeps talking about zero inflation. Inflation keeps creeping up.

He admits that he is failing in his job. In the Bank of Canada report for 1989 he said: "The Bank of Canada actions did not result in any improvement in our inflation performance". There is no one better than he to say that he failed totally in his job.

Instead of punishing him in some way, exhibiting our displeasure at what he has or has not done, we give him a salary increase of 35 per cent over three years. This to the very man who is telling Canadians that they should exercise restraint. To him we give an increase of 35 per cent in a period of just three years.

I think the Chinese approach was better. Perhaps it worked better too. I do not have any details as to just how well it worked, but we all know that Mr. Crow's policies have failed Canada totally in every way, not only in his announced goal of getting inflation down to zero, which he still tells us is his goal, but in the fact that many parts of the country are experiencing a very severe recession. So he has failed us in every way and we should be taking another look at his medicine.

Let us go back to the medical analogy. If you have something wrong with you and you go to a doctor who puts you on some treatment plan and, instead of getting better you are getting worse, then surely you would question the treatment. If he prescribes a medicine which, instead of improving your situation makes you worse, would you not question whether there was something wrong with the medicine or that maybe he was giving you the wrong medicine? Surely, Mr. Speaker, it is appropriate to ask questions like that.

We do ask questions. Mr. Crow is asked questions and his response is always that we must try more of the same medicine, we must make it worse than it has been.

That reminds me, using a medical analogy again, of the days when they bled patients. The thinking was that if they were sick, let's make them worse, let's take some blood out of them so they cannot cope with their illness and then maybe they will get contrary enough to recover.

That would seem to be what Mr. Crow is trying to do to the Canadian economy. He is trying to make it worse in the hope that the punishment will make us achieve the target for which he is reaching.

He is trying to get inflation down to zero by increasing interest rates. He might just as well be trying to control a forest fire in British Columbia by pouring gasoline on it. There is no more effective way of increasing inflation than to increase interest rates. Interest rates immediately impact on the cost of everything in the country.

Take as an example businesses producing goods for sale in this country. Every one of those businesses, every one of the suppliers of those businesses, everybody in the whole production line is borrowing money somewhere along the way for capital construction, for inventory or even to finance their accounts receivable. Every time the cost of borrowing goes up they have to increase the cost of their product to recover that, or they do not pay any corporation tax and we lose out that way as well.

The impact of an increasing interest rate on business is to increase their costs. They pass those costs on to the pubic generally and that is one of the ways in which inflation is measured.

It increases the value of our dollar. Of course that is the real purpose, I believe, of increasing the interest rates but, nevertheless, it does increase the price of our dollar. Increasing the price of our dollar makes it more difficult for us to export, more difficult for us to compete with other countries. So it cuts down on our exports which again cuts back on employment and makes our economy just that much worse off.

It increases imports because, relatively, the cost of goods that are imported into Canada goes down as our dollar goes up relative to other currencies. It is easier then for us to buy from abroad so we import more and export less and that, again, hurts our total economy and makes for inflation. It does not bring inflation down to zero; it makes it worse.

It increases budget deficits, and we certainly know the history of that. Year after year the budget deficit is in the neighbourhood of $28 billion to $30 billion, all of it going for interest. Although you cannot allocate the dollars and say this dollar goes to interest and that dollar goes to something else, certainly we know the amount of the deficit is almost as much as we are paying on financing the current debt of Canada.

Of course if increases unemployment. All of these things have a detrimental effect on inflation and defeat the very purpose as announced by the Governor of the Bank of Canada.

It encourages higher taxes. Of course when the government starts running into trouble financing its deficit, financing its programs, when taxes fall off because of unemployment, because of cut-backs in business, the government is inclined to increase taxes in order to try to recover some of the lost revenue to meet the bills that it still has. Of course we all know that that is just as inflationary as anything else that can be done. Inflation is fuelled by increases in taxes.

It affects the balance of payments, increases interest rates, brings the dollar up to a higher value and cuts down on our exports. There is any number of industries from one end of this country to the other complaining about the effect of the increase in the dollar and how it has hurt their position in world markets.

We talked about free trade and the benefits we were supposed to get from that. Everyone will agree—and I do not think anyone would deny for one moment—that the increase in the value of the Canadian dollar has many times wiped out whatever advantages we might have had to date from the free trade deal with the United States. Any reduction in prices from the Americans has been more than taken into account by the increase in the value of the Canadian dollar.

When we affect the balance of payments negatively—that is when we reduce our exports and increase our imports—we have to increase our borrowing abroad. We did not have to do it before, but we do now. I have seen figures anywhere from $50 billion to $200 billion representing what we owe abroad right now. That is bad business. We should not be borrowing from abroad. We should be able to finance everything we are doing in Canada from our own resources. Otherwise we are simply borrowing trouble for the future.

I recall speaking in the B.C. legislature, criticizing the government of the day for borrowing from abroad and reminding them of a speech that the finance minister of British Columbia, the Hon. Herbert Anscombe, had made almost 50 years ago when he was cautioning the province of British Columbia and Canadian governments in general about borrowing abroad. Some day those loans have to be paid, not with Canadian dollars, but with Canadian goods. We have to some day export more than we are importing or we will never catch up. The foreign debt is bound to increase unless we start exporting more and importing less.

Increasing the value of the Canadian dollar, which is a direct result of increases in interest rates, means that we borrow more abroad, and we are doing that steadily these days. That, too, is borrowing trouble for the future.

I mentioned earlier that the Governor of the Bank of Canada, who by his own admission has failed in his attempt to get to zero inflation, was granted a 35 per cent increase in salary over a period of three years. And he is asking Canadians to hold the line.

The executives of CNR were given an average increase of 18.7 per cent in one year, and they are asking their employees to hold the line. As a matter of fact they used the power of Parliament to ensure that their employees would get an increase in one year of 4.5 per cent. That is good enough for the people who are doing the work, and the people looking and watching over them got 18.7 per cent in one year. And they have the nerve to ask people to hold the line and be careful.

The Minister of Finance said something to the effect that it was Canada's policies during the late 1970s and early 1980s that led us into the recession of 1982-83. I do not know where the minister was at that time, but it may be news for him that Canada was not the only country in the world that suffered a recession in that period. Every country in the western world at least suffered a severe recession in that period.

It was not Canada's policy to drag the rest of the western world into the mires of a recession. Certainly it was economic policies and every one of the countries was following similar economic policies, but we were not in trouble here because of something we did in Canada. We were in trouble in British Columbia because the Americans quit building houses and they were not buying our lumber. We were in trouble in Ontario because they were not building the automobiles they used to build and we were not selling them automobile parts. We were in trouble in the east because they were not buying our minerals and the lumber, the pulp, the newsprint, the paper. We live on our exports, and our exports were severely curtailed during that period because our customers were not buying. It had absolutely nothing to do with what we were doing here in Canada.

Certainly, we could have done better for ourselves in Canada than we did, but the severe recession that we had was brought on by the western world-wide recession. Now we are heading down the same road. The Governor of the Bank of Canada and the Minister of Finance seem to feel that that is the route for us to go. "Let's make things so bad that whatever happens people will think they are better off than they were yesterday."

The Minister of Finance estimated in his budget that the interest rate would be 11 per cent this year. I wonder if he remembers that these days. The last figure for the Bank of Canada as I recall was 13.77 per cent. It is understandable that inflation will result from the imposition of the GST which is scheduled to come on line January 1, 1991. The government wants to curtail as much as it can any attempts by workers to keep even with inflation.

In general, that has not been happening in recent years, except for the workers at the very top. They have been doing very well, but the workers on the production line have not been keeping up with inflation. Mr. Crow and the Minister of Finance want to keep them down further. That is not the way to prosperity in Canada. We should not increase unemployment.

I mentioned earlier where free trade comes into it. One of the reasons the New Democrats did so well in British Columbia, and especially on Vancouver Island, was that we talked about free trade. We said that one of the main reasons for going into the free trade deal, the Mulroney—Reagan deal, was to improve the U.S. trade balance.

The U.S. was in a tremendous deficit position with respect to Canada. It was importing far more from us than it was selling to us, and it did not like that. The U.S.

was having trouble, so it wanted to change it, turn it around. That is why we got into that deal.

One of the ways to achieve it was to increase the value of the Canadian dollar. The interest rates do not follow inflation. They follow the Canadian dollar. When the dollar dips, the interest rates go up. If it dips a bit more, they go up higher. If the dollar gets beyond a certain point then interest rates hold steady for a while. Mr. Crow said he made a mistake when he dropped the rate back in January, but it is the dollar that they are watching.

Canada has committed itself to the United States to do everything it can to improve the American balance of payments position with respect to our country. We are accomplishing it by getting the dollar up so high that it is creating unemployment, bad business opportunities for our enterprises in Canada, reducing corporation taxes we might be collecting from them, increasing our deficit, hurting our economy in every way conceivable but it is great for the Americans.

In part, while this borrowing bill says it is for public works and other purposes, it is there because we need the money to finance the ever increasing foreign debt that Canada is building. We need to have the money to pay it, but it is time we started sending a message to the practitioners who are supposed to be curing the Canadian economy. Your medicine is not working. Your treatment is not working. Change your medicine, change your treatment or get out of the way and make room for somebody who will take hold of the Canadian economy and make Canada a country in which we all want to live.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the member with interest. I congratulate him on his presentation.

I wonder if he would elaborate somewhat on the question of the value of the Canadian dollar when and if it is affected by lending abroad as opposed to lending money within Canada. Would he expand a bit on that?

Mr. Stupich: Mr. Speaker, when we borrow abroad, we have to pay the interest rates demanded of us. If our economy seems to be in bad shape or if there are some political problems—there are some questions now—then the foreign lenders want more money.

Foreign lenders have other opportunities. There are stories now as to what might happen in Germany with respect to their interest rates when the East German and West German marks become one. Japan may have to raise its interest rates. They are looking for opportunities to lend and they will lend to the best places for the best interest rates.

For Canada to get the money it needs to keep the lifestyle in which we have been living, importing more than we are exporting, means we have to pay more interest, which means we have to raise our taxes, and raise government revenues by selling products. We cannot print dollars, we have to export. That is the only way we can do it.

During the war, Canada had one million people in uniform. I was one of them and perhaps there are others here who were as well. We were producing everything we consumed. We were producing things to try to fill the Atlantic. Boat after boat was being sunk carrying goods produced in Canada. We did not fill the hole, but we did keep everyone working. It was great and the economy was booming. We did it without borrowing a single dollar abroad because no one had any money to lend us at that time. It can be done if we are prepared to do it ourselves in our own country. It is time we started tightening up in Canada.

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the speech of the last speaker. He says that Canada, sooner or later, will have to export more than it imports.

I remember quite well the debate on the free trade agreement. His party was dead against it. I wonder if he can explain why there are two policies in his party?

Mr. Stupich: Mr. Speaker, there are not two policies. We were dead against the free trade deal because it was a bad deal for Canada. We were in favour of trade. We are in favour of trade. We are in favour of international trade. We support GATT, because that is a trade agreement. The deal made between our Prime Minister and the then President of the United States was made in the United States for the United States. It was a deal that was contrary to the interests of Canada and, as such, we opposed it. That is not opposition to trade, it is opposition to a bad deal for Canada.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to speak at report stage of Bill C-65, an act to provide borrowing authority in the amount of $25.5 billion that this government needs to borrow in order to carry on the business of government. I question whether it is the business of government they are carrying on. It seems to me the government is slowly leading Canada into a way of life we have not known for a long time.

It gives me an opportunity as well to draw attention to the government's mismanagement of fiscal policy, mismanagement that it steadfastly has tried to avoid responsibility for ever since it came into power in 1984. The time has long past when members opposite could credibly blame the previous administration for its fiscal wrongs. Canadians are now measuring the government's performance against its own standards and promises, not those of former governments. They see Canadian standards being torn down; VIA, financing between the provinces and the federal government, they see Air Canada being sold and having losses, they see Canadian Airlines not doing well, the deregulation that the government brought forward in these areas is not really working to the benefit of Canada.

The Minister of Finance is again asking Parliament for the authority to borrow billions of dollars and increase the public debt as a testament to his own failures. The minister's lack of action on the deficit has left the financial cupboard bare and greatly reduced the ability of the government to come to the aid of Canadians who, through no fault of their own, are in a time of crisis: Atlantic fishermen and fish plant workers, prairie farmers, and laid-off workers in all industries that are moving to the United States because of the free trade agreement.

There is no money for these people because this government will only give them money if the provinces chip in.

It has made great promises that it will give money if the provinces come in to help the prairie farmers. It has money, supposedly: give them the interest at least to keep it going until it can make arrangements with the governments on the prairies to help the farmers. It gave a program to the Atlantic fisheries last week that is going to be conditional on whether the provinces and the companies put money in for the adjustment program and all work to use what little federal money was put in.

In September 1984 the Minister of Finance warned Canadians about the dire fiscal situation he had been left with by the previous government. I was a member in this House, and I do not think it was very dire considering the economic times we had just come through with the high interest rates and high inflation.

This is not what we have today. We have high interest rates and low inflation in comparison to that time. The minister called for a quick change in policy direction, a change that he promised would cut the yearly budget deficit in half by the end of the decade and vastly reduce the growing net public debt. He projected this debt would reach $400 billion if the legacy of the former government was not brought to a quick end. What did he replace it with? In 1990-91 we find that the net public debt is projected to be $379.9 billion, just slightly below what the Minister of Finance projected in 1984 and more than double what he inherited.

This is a government that had the best of economic times in the last six years. It did not reduce the deficit. It did not even cut back on government spending as it should have in good economic times. We have the largest cabinet that we have ever seen. We have so many ministers of state that people do not know where to go to get some action.

The yearly deficit for 1989-90 stood at $30.5 billion, a mere $4 billion below the $34 billion deficit the minister posted in 1985-86, the first full year of Tory rule.

More to the point, the small progress that he has made on deficit reduction has come about, not from expenditure reduction as he promised in 1984, but from massive tax increases. The average family of four in Canada is now paying an average of $3,000 more in taxes compared to 1984.

The question that remains is why is this happening. In the first place, despite the minister's well-known pride in his ability to forecast the direction of the economy, his department has consistently underestimated yearly growth rates. In 1984-85, for example, he predicted that growth would run at 4.2 per cent and 2.4 per cent respectively when in fact it ran at 6.3 per cent and 4.8 per cent. This first failure has in turn in my opinion played into the hands of the Governor of the Bank of Canada, whose fixation in achieving a zero rate of inflation has pushed the prime to 13.75 per cent. This rate is murderously high—and I will talk about that further in a moment—and highly discriminatory against the regions that have never really joined Toronto in the boom of the 1980s.

I say that because we now have the Governor of the Bank of Canada in an impossible position. If he reduces interest rates, inflation will go up. His prime objective is to get it down. Whatever he is going to do we are going to see high interest rates when the country cannot afford to see the rates we are seeing presently.

Each point the minister is off in his interest rate predictions adds another $1.7 billion to the deficit. This year's budget forecasts were finalized in January before the most recent escalation in rates. It is not likely now that they will fall from 12.2 per cent to 9.5 per cent in 1991 as predicted in his budget.

The government must be doing something wrong. It has to have another look at what it is doing to interest rates and to this country. Maybe we need a two interest rate policy in Canada. Maybe Toronto and Montreal in the golden belt and Vancouver need one interest rate. Maybe we should have an interest rate for the rural areas as long as the money is being kept there in the area and is not leaving.

I do not know what the minister needs for new ideas, but certainly his policy is not working in Canada today. He needs to look at a lot of other proposals that have come across rather than tax, tax, tax and not admit his own fiscal responsibility to Canadians.

The dismal figures I quoted today are not the responsibility of any previous administration. It is not the previous government that created a tax policy that tightened the screws on the individual while letting large corporations off the hook. In 1984, corporate taxes accounted for 13.2 per cent of revenues compared to 10.4 per cent in 1991. In 1991 alone, the government will collect some $2.4 billion less in corporate revenue than it had predicted last year.

When the GST comes on stream in 1991, the corporate sector stands to reap a $6 billion tax break even if the reduction in the existing manufacturers' sales tax is fully passed on to consumers; we will have to wait and see if it will be passed on. They could do it better than with the break that this government is giving them.

It is not the former government that followed the fiscal policy which has more than doubled the net public debt since 1984. It is not the previous government that promised to cut the deficit in half by the end of the 1980s. It is not the former government that followed an interest rate policy that binds our rates some five points above those of the United States, leaving our dollar artificially high and hurting our exporters. It is not the former government that was so strapped for money that it dreamed up the single largest tax grab in Canadian history, the GST, the most cynical and regressive cash cow ever designed.

No, it is this government, this Prime Minister and this Minister of Finance who must take credit for all of these dubious accomplishments. Canadians are still waiting impatiently for members opposite to deal with these facts, not the previous government. The Conservatives are in power. Why do they not come up with the programs that Canadians want?

I want to use some of my time to speak about the fishery and the effect this government's policy has had. Last week we had the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program from this government, but its financial cupboard is bare. We saw just one consequence of this bareness and lack of ability to come up with assistance in the fish aid package.

The crisis in the groundfishery on the east coast is a result of many factors mostly beyond the control of those affected: the fishermen, the plant workers and the communities. Europeans and Americans have refused to adopt conservation measures consistent with our own. As a result, they continue to fish our stocks at a murderous rate, while our own fishermen are forced to tie up their boats.

In the House last night I talked about the 45-footer that went out to fish silver hake on Brown's Bank, which is closed to our fishermen, because it is a spawning and preservation area. This refers to the million dollar fines that the minister wants to bring into the House against Canadians, yet there are foreigners on the spawning banks today taking the fish. The fisherman could not get silver hake in his nets; he got about a 185 per cent catch of pollock.

What are all the large foreign trawlers and freezer factory ships that are out there getting? They are getting the traditional fish, not just silver hake, and they are interrupting the spawning grounds of the local fishery.

The federal government's record of scientific analysis has been poor as we saw in northern cod. As a result stocks have been reduced leaving fishermen who have invested in expensive sophisticated equipment often with federal and provincial encouragement holding the bag. They have also lost markets due to the high interest rates and the artificially high Canadian dollar that has resulted, that is if they have a market.

The two counties I represent, Digby and Yarmouth, as well as Shelburne county represented by my colleague from South Shore had markets for many years but they do not have them today because they do not have fish. They do not have to worry about high interest rates or the dollar. They could sell fish. Their fish has always been known to be the best. The offshore has fish in the markets, but what they put into the markets sometimes leaves a lot to be desired. I am saying that if they even had fish they could be marketing and helping themselves.

Only about one-quarter of the government's total aid package, $120 million out of the $584 million over five years, will be devoted to finding new jobs for plant workers. In terms of new money in the aid package, there is very little: $426 million over five years, averaging out to $108 million per province over five years or $20 million per province per year. This is for an industry that has over 100,000 workers and generates $1 billion in business income annually.

More money has been made available for developing underutilized species and marketing in that fish aid package. I think the amount was $50 million to establish markets in underutilized species such as silver hake. Last week there were 20 Russian boats out there on Brown's Bank and in the silver hake box the 42 foreigners who were fishing up at the easterd. "Easterd" is a term to say that you are southeast of Halifax, probably in the same area as Brown's. There are still foreigners fishing there when our fishermen could not be there.

If we had more money to put into underutilized markets, we would find that our offshore would perhaps be given an incentive to go after the underutilized. Back when we had the northern cod, ironically as it sounds, and nobody wanted to fish it, the Liberal government of the day gave an incentive for the offshore to go and fish the northern cod. In fact it was a very healthy incentive. It was so much a pound to the boat. It was capped around $13,000 for the boat trip; $15,000 if you came from Nova Scotia and $13,000 in Newfoundland. However, they paid part of the insurance because it was supposed to be treacherous waters for those boats to go to the offshore for northern cod. As well, they put an observer on those boats.

We cannot have that type of program today because of the free trade agreement. Even the bail-out last week could not be given directly to the fish plants or to the boats. It had to be given to communities, if it is going to be given at all, and to laid off workers in the adjustment program. It could not be given directly to the fishery because of the free trade agreement and it being considered a subsidy to those offshore companies.

So you give a gift to National Sea. They get to keep the companies. They get to keep the boats. They can take the boats away from Lockeport, Canso, and North Sydney without blinking an eye. Our provincial government is allowing it. Our federal government is allowing it. Why? Because they are sitting there opposite allowing big business to take over what used to be a healthy inshore fishery.

I want to go back to the underutilized because I think that is the direction this government must go if it is going to save the fishery. If we send the offshore out to fish the underutilized, the foreigners would not need to come because we would be utilizing the fish within our 200-mile limit. It is so simple, but it seems to be hard for this government to understand that if we fish the underutilized here in Canada, the foreigners will not come and fish within our 200-mile limit. We will not have those big offshore foreign trawlers taking 400,000 pounds of fish a trip when our boats are limited to 2,000 pounds if they can even go out in the course of one week.

More money has been made available for developing underutilized species and marketing directed at maintaining the processing capacity at plants that would otherwise close. But it is not enough. The $90 million over five years, or $4 million per province per year, on average, to develop new markets or to go after the existing markets of the foreigners who fish here is not enough from this government. It has to put more money in. It has to forget the free trade agreement because most of the markets for the underutilized species are not in the U.S.

I could talk now about rebuilding the stocks. However, right now I want to bring to the attention of the House a crisis that has developed because of a lack of willingness on the part of officials in the Department of Fisheries to take more interest in the problem.

I understand that fishermen are sitting-in in the fisheries offices in Barrington, Pubnico, Meteghan and Digby. Barrington is in Shelburne County. Shelburne County is 100 per cent dependent on the inshore fishery. Those fishermen are protesting for one very basic reason. They put in a proposal in January or February. It was discussed. They put it in again over a week and a half ago and last week they were getting frustrated. They have not fished. They asked to meet to discuss their proposal on Georges Bank, where the Americans are fishing and taking all they want.

As a result of protests in front of the building in Yarmouth last Tuesday, they came back on Thursday and asked for a meeting in Meteghan yesterday with the department officials. Not one official came. Yet late Friday the department gave a counter proposal which did not relate at all to what the original proposal had been. These fishermen are upset. The department officials do not have any credibility, which is why they did not come to explain why they put forward those counter proposals.

I know my time is up. Perhaps some of my colleagues would like to hear more in the time provided for questions and answers.

I want to say that a very dangerous situation is in existence in the southern end of Nova Scotia today. It is because for over a year the fishermen have asked to meet with the ministers of fishery. I say "ministers" because there has been a change in ministers. They put in a proposal that was countered without any due consideration to all the discussions that had gone on before.

This government has got to start to act. It must listen to the provincial ministers who were there at the meeting yesterday to ask that this government realize the dangerous situation that is now in existence in our area.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member would like some questions or comments. The hon. member for Winnipeg North on a question or comment.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate my colleague for her dissertation on this proposed bill to borrow $25.5 billion during the current 1990–91 fiscal year to cover the government's budgetary deficit.

During the last part of her presentation on the fishing industry she spoke about how it has been damaged by this government in that part of our country. I would like the hon. member to continue. In a real sense what this government has done is continue to damage the have-not provinces of Canada. If she has some more data, I would appreciate hearing from her.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for the question and for giving me the opportunity to explain.

In the southern end of Nova Scotia we are dealing with an inshore fishery that has been there for a long time. These boats are very efficient. At one time about six years ago you might have 45-foot or 65-foot boats that could go out and easily catch 50,000 pounds to 100,000 pounds of fish.

Quotas have decreased. The last time they were allowed to fish was for a three week period. They were allowed to catch 20,000 pounds over three weeks.

You have to imagine, Mr. Speaker, that these boats have had an opportunity in the past to come in with up to 50,000 pounds of fish. Yet they were given a quota of 20,000 pounds over three weeks.

There was no mesh size, something that they had been asking for, which would allow the escapement of small fish. So they had to do selective catching. They took the big fish which will bring them money, something which the offshore fishermen and the foreigners do as well, which causes a lot of dumping of dead fish.

In effect you are saying to fishermen in a fleet: "You can only go out and fish x number of fish" when their capacity is great. They will tell you that maybe there are fewer fish out there. But all the studies they have been involved in with the department show that there is more fish there and that they should be allowed to fish. This was in the proposal which was submitted to the department over the last few months.

That proposal was for 25,000 pounds a week, per boat, regardless of using it or not if they did not go out, over 40 weeks. We are talking about 250 boats. We are not even talking maximums or an amount that the fishermen would have liked to have had. We are talking of a fishery in Georges that would allow them to go fish every week on Georges Bank where their American counterparts have been fishing all winter. They went one day last year to Georges, the area that has been so good to the fishery in the southern end of Nova Scotia.

I will tell hon. members the difficulty. A mesh size has been talked about. A mesh size allows the escapement of the little fish through the nets. I am sure that there have been at least five meetings a year for the last five years, if not more, where mesh size has been discussed with the department. The discussions started at a mesh size of 120 mm through to 140 mm. After many meetings a square mesh size of 130 mm was arrived at, a figure which the fishermen felt would allow them to start working with.

On Friday department officials said 140. They are never satisfied. They could not even meet the fishermen and tell them that face-to-face. They had to do it in a round-about way.

On Friday the department said to the fishermen: "You won't take a mixed bag". It is pretty hard to put the pollock over here, the cod over there and the haddock here and throw it back after it has been caught. That is a mixed bag. The department said: "You won't take a mixed bag. You'll take two-thirds of pollock and one-third of cod and haddock".

You tell me, Mr. Speaker, that when you are out fishing you can take two-thirds of this in your catch for the week, or whatever the allowance is? The department's attitude toward these people has become so incredible. Sure these people are sophisticated, but this is the only employment in the area. It is those fishermen who have kept the economy going.

We have had a year-round fishery in the past. There has been no sympathy from this government at all.

I would like to say one more thing about the proposal which came out on Friday. It was greeted with anger. The department was using the different sectors such as the longliners, the fish draggers and others to get at people. It came out clear yesterday that the department officials want to divide and see the offshore given total control of the area. They want to see the freezer factory ship given a licence in January 1991 again to come and fish within 20 miles where these people have traditionally fished.

The department is so numbed by having helped National Sea Products and Fishery Products International that it cannot see what it is doing to the inshore communities. It is very tragic when you think that these people have families and debts and yet they cannot go out and fish.

Over the last 11 months they have gone out seven weeks, and that includes the 20,000 pounds that they were allowed to catch over three weeks, which I talked about. It has become a tragedy.

The government will be responsible for what is going on there today. The fishermen are asking to go out and fish. The government should believe the fishermen when they say that there is more fish out there. They are not saying there is a lot of fish. The government should believe the fishermen and allow them to go out and fish. The government should allow them the dignity to earn their living in that area. This was the healthiest area in all of Nova Scotia. That should not be why it is being sacrificed.

I say to the government and my colleagues here in the House the tragedy that is happening down there today should not be happening. It is departmental officials who have closed the minds of the ministers involved in the east coast fishery. I do not think there is anyone there who would say that the fishermen have not tried to present a valid proposal on how they would fish for the rest of the year, as well as taking the caution on mesh size and other things into consideration.

With the news today that the northern cod stocks are even lower, there will be an increased effort by National Sea and the big guys to put more concentration in the Scotia-Fundy. You will see that it cannot be done. National Sea and Fishery Products have to be encouraged to go and get rid of the foreigners within the 200-mile limit. We have to encourage a good marketing system for the underutilized stocks that we have not been able to use and market up until now and which we have allowed the foreigners to come and fish.

I understand the minister will be in Halifax tonight. I do not know why he will be in Halifax tonight. I hope it is to meet with the fishermen who are sitting in at those offices in the areas that I mentioned. I do hope that he will go down and meet with them. It is long overdue.

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, I too rise to speak against this bill and to offer my views contrary to the request to borrow $25.5 billion to finance a budget that in my view is predicated on some fundamentally, radically different views and concepts on economic and fiscal management imperatives that the government has overlooked over the course of the last several years. It is now in the course of this budget, in the course of its economic plan for this coming fiscal year, imposing changes on the economic and social contract of this country that has until now existed between the federal government and Canadians everywhere.

It is important to keep in mind that when we are talking about borrowing that amount of money in order to carry out a plan it is a plan that should meet the needs of Canadians. Yet some of the principles that are being addressed by the government are in direct opposition to the interests and needs of all Canadians.

For example, some of those basic principles that the Tories have ignored over the course of the last several years in office—some would say it has been much too long, but that would be too partisan and I do not want to engage in that—is the concept of mobility of all Canadians from one area of the country to another while at the same time maintaining an accessibility to government services provided by the federal government wherever they be in Canada. I speak of the provision of an equality of opportunity for all Canadians no matter where they live.

The other principle is that all Canadians have the right to enjoy the benefits which accrue to them as citizens of this country, again regardless of the region from which they originate or the region in which they choose to live.

Finally—and definitely it is not the last point but it is the one that I want to concentrate on—is the fact that all Canadians have the right to have a government that recognizes under all the democratic principles which we hold dear that it be not only responsible but accountable for its actions.

What do we see instead? Through government policies over the course of the last six years we have seen a veritable onslaught—not a simple attack—on all those social programs which Canadians have fought so hard for and which they have become accustomed to accept as being part of the Canadian mainstream. I refer to the universality of social programs.

Many of my colleagues have documented the manner in which the government has attacked those programs that we have referred to as universal social programs. Over the course of the last two elections the governing party has identified these programs as being sacred trusts. Those programs have been eroded, I would say almost maliciously and viciously, by the budgets presented by the government.

For example, under these principles, workers, who by virtue of their contributions along with their employers' to the unemployment insurance fund, could expect to receive some sort of income maintenance in times of duress, not that they aspire to moments of duress. On the contrary, they see themselves as contributors and as those who play a role in the development of the economy and the future of the country. But there are occasions when there is a downturn in the market-place. In order for them to enjoy those five principles which I enumerated a few moments ago, they have the right to expect that their government, which was a third party to that unemployment insurance scheme, would also allow them to rely on a financial scheme that allows them to remain in their communities.

Fishermen, as my colleague pointed out, and farmers as well, have an equal right to remain in their communities with a guarantee of financial support from the federal government when times become tough. The alternative is much too unbearable. The alternative is that they take up their roots, leave, and a go someplace else. It continues that whole process of inexorable urbanization and deprives the country of the opportunity to exploit and capitalize on those resources with which nature has gifted all Canadians. I refer to land for farming, the enormous riches in the fishing industry, and, of course, our mineral and forestry resources.

If we do not leave a mechanism in place by which those Canadians can continue to employ their skills and their talents in these industries, then we are abandoning a fundamental character of the way that Canadians see the development of the economy of this nation.

Another principle that the government refuses to acknowledge and addresses in the most perverse fashion with this bill is that taxes not be regressive, that they apply equitably to all Canadians, and, above all, that they be fair.

I refer you, Mr. Speaker, to the debates over the course of the last several months with respect to one of the initiatives of the government. That one and only initiative, the GST, is going to reign its terror on all Canadians, unless of course the House and the other place can in some fashion cause the government to change its ways.

Finally, among some of those principles is also the one that is consistent and flows from the last one. It is that Canadians not be made to bear the burden of government fiscal and economic mismanagement. Those who are in a position to dictate the finances of this nation must also be accountable for their actions.

Yet, what do we have? With this bill, the government very callously, in a nonchalant, almost arrogant fashion, says: "Give us the $25.5 billion to meet the obligations which we incur as a government, as the representatives of the people." I want to stress the "representation of the people" component in that statement. If we consent to this bill—and I will not—we will become accomplices to the plan that the government is putting before Canadians in a most insidious fashion.

The government is violating those principles I have enumerated via its economic mismanagement. Through that economic mismanagement, it is drawing conclusions through its analyses that suggest that its way is the only way to correct all the faults and evils that visit us. In fact, what we have is a forum for incorrect analyses upon which to base decisions.

Let us take a look at the record. The government has tried over the course of this budget to rectify an enormous problem presented by it over the course of the last six years. After six years of total indifference to what has been developing in the country on an economic basis, the government is now advocating an economic policy of high interest rates, budget cuts, and increased taxation to the point that we have counted 31 different direct increases of taxation by the government since 1984.

Why are we doing this? Why would anyone on this side of the House agree to such a bill as the one proposed now? "In 1984," the government is very fond of saying, "the former government left a public debt of $170 billion." I say, with them, "Shame." A mere six years later that public debt is now $380 billion.

It took from Confederation until 1984 to raise the public debt to $170 billion. Yet, it took the people opposite a mere six years to increase that $170 billion to $380 billion. That is spelled with a "b" as in intolerable.

The same government, which through its finance minister says: "That is not our problem", is the one which, in 1985, said in the House in front of all Canadians: "Do you know what we are going to do? We are such great managers that we are going to rectify all the problems of the past. We are going to present a budget that is going to decrease the deficit that stood at intolerable levels in 1984. We are going to decrease it to $18 billion by 1990."

We are at 1990. Thank you, Mr. Finance Minister, your predictions have come true again. The deficit stands at $30.5 billion. This is a great sign of economic management, of fiscal management. As long as the only version of reality that we hear emanates from that side of the House, then we are faced with the prospect of simply saying: "No, no. Enough is enough."

On the basis of the presentations of reality by the Minister of Finance and the government, the minister says: "The only way that we are going to pull up our socks and make Canada more competitive, make workers more productive, and restore a sense of decency and proper fiscal management to our finances is through high interest rates."

The prime rate yesterday was 14.75 per cent. The finance minister does not see in the short term a diminution in that rate. In fact, yesterday, the C.D. Howe Institute stated that it takes at least two years for a tight money campaign to have a marked impact on inflation. It suggests that Canadians will be lucky to see any marked improvement before the end of 1990. What else is new? We have been seeing a steady climb in interest rates over the course of the last three years because the government says: "We have to protect the dollar. We have got to get the dollar at an extremely high rate. We have to attract foreign investment and we have got to develop growth and dynamics through foreign investment".

That money is not being attracted to the manufacturing industry. The high interest rates may be maintaining a flow of foreign capital, but it is not going into the manufacturing industries that suggest that foreign capital is confident that the Canadian economy and the dynamics of the Canadian market-place are such that we should have more and more investment, that the tools for growth are there and that they are developing and that the opportunities for expansion and for consumption are actually what the market-place would say is appropriate for our investment and our confidence.

The Minister of Finance says we have to maintain foreign confidence. I do not know how we do that. You will never guess that what he is talking about, Mr. Speaker, is simply that the high interest rates will allow his government to continue to attract foreign money to finance a debt that he has created and a deficit that he is incapable of reducing.

Thinking Canadians have a different version of the way the world is unfolding in Canada. They understand the need to maintain a low level of inflation. What they also understand is that the primary source of inflationary pressures are created, not by consumer spending, but by government action: taxes, high interest rates, postal increases, tuition increases, transit increases, communications increases, transportation increases, all of which are a direct result of government fiscal mismanagement and not as a result of consumer spending. If anything, what it does is decrease consumer spending. I think that the average Canadian is much more responsible than the Minister of Finance and his cabinet colleagues who have devised an economic plan for the country.

Most Canadians recognize that under those circumstances—and they do it in an almost suppliant fashion, because the Minister of Finance is one to beat his chest and say he is the only one who is right—a high interest rate policy is perhaps the wrong tool with which to fight inflation.

Some would suggest that perhaps the government should become more responsible in the ways in which it handles its expenditures and raises its revenues. Even the Treasurer of Ontario, Mr. Nixon, says that interest rates must come down in order to avoid an even deeper slowdown than the one that is occurring throughout all Canada. He makes reference to the fact that the rate of inflation today is not to be compared with the rate of inflation of 12 per cent or higher that we saw some eight years ago. A lower interest rate and a lower dollar will make the Canadian economy much, much more competitive.

If we are going to talk about what we should be doing with this particular bill, then we should be taking a look at the kind of economic policy and fiscal plan that the government could have in place that would attract Canadians to its side and to say: "Yes, we agree, we should expend money in order to carry out that plan".

The government is requesting $25.5 billion today. If we were to agree, then Canadians would be financing the Tory government's disregard for the right of Parliament and all Canadians to debate in a serious context all those important economic and fiscal policies that impact on the social programs and the economic agendas, the contracts, both explicit and implicit, that Canadians have with their federal government.

Our position is that we cannot possibly support this bill because, in so doing, we would be undermining the fundamental social principles of Canada.

I am sorry that my time is up. I will take a leaf out of my colleague's book and suggest that perhaps we might continue through the period for questions and comments.

Mr. Wilbee: Mr. Speaker, I sat here in amazement at times at what I was hearing. I wondered just where the hon. gentleman was sitting because of some of the statements that he made.

As I think back over the voting record of his party over the last year and a half, I really do not see any assistance that it has given to the Government of Canada in meeting the problems that he has outlined.

I think that I should also remind the hon. member that when the present government took over in 1984, we were spending $16 billion—that is with a "b" and not with an "m"—more than we were taking in in taxes and, as a result, the deficit was increasing by that rate. Of course that was being added to the debt. At the present time, we have a $9 billion surplus in that account, if we do not add on to the debt. The debt is one of the major problems that we are facing in Canada today. We need to point out that 80 per cent of that debt is as a result of interest on the debt that was left to us by the previous administration. Only 20 per cent of that amount is new debt.

With the opposition of the parties and also of the Liberal dominated other place to such things as the UI reform, our government is working very diligently under difficult circumstances. If this bill is not approved, it will cost the Canadian government another $1.75 billion annually.

When the member states that the government is doing nothing, I believe that it is doing a great many valuable things. We all recognize that we can reduce our deficit by increasing taxes and he accused us of doing this. I should also point out that many of these tax changes that we have had were advocated by some members of his party. In other words, we shut down many of the tax loopholes which the wealthy people were using to escape paying taxes. We have put some taxes on large corporations that previously were not paying taxes. Certainly, we have increased some taxes, but I believe that the tax system is much fairer than previously.

We have cut spending. I would ask the hon. member to give me one example of his support for any expenditure cuts which this government has made. I cannot think of any. We have made a lot of cuts in expenditures. It seems to me that the opposition has opposed every single cut that we have recommended.

The government has cut its spending. We have reduced the size of the Public Service. A third way we have reduced our deficit and our debt is by economic stimulation. Since this government has taken over, there have been 1.6 million new jobs created in Canada. This obviously means that is a great deal of expansion in Canadian industry. Many of these jobs are employing women.

I would like to hear the member give an example of the types of deficit reduction which our government has introduced which they are supporting. We have heard nothing but criticism and negative ideas, and I would like him to tell the House just what they would support in the way of deficit reduction?

Mr. Volpe: Mr. Speaker, I hope you will allow me extra time in order to satisfy the member from British Columbia. Since he has asked a comprehensive question, I do not want him to leave this House without getting all of the answers.

He has been listening diligently. I know that he wants to understand what the impact of some his government's initiatives are. I have already pointed to the increase in the public debt, which he has acknowledged. The member spoke about job creation. Seventy per cent of the jobs that this government is taking credit for are low paying service sector type jobs.

I do not think he wants to suggest that many of those jobs go to women. We are fighting for pay equity and for improving the lot of all people in Canada, including that of women, who are capable of doing a lot more than some of those low paying service sector type jobs that he would foist upon them.

I have pointed out in the House—and the hon. member was here to listen—that the Canadian economy has lost, not gained, nearly 200,000 jobs over the last year. Both the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister have admitted this. That is under its major initiative of free trade. Those are not my statistics. They come from the hon. member's caucus colleagues, the Prime Minister and his Minister of Finance. Show up at caucus and you will get that information.

What is worse, under the initiatives of this government, over the course of the last two years the Canadian economy has lost 180,000 jobs in the manufacturing sector. Those were permanent jobs that paid well over $10 an hour. By providing that kind of employment to Canadians, it gave this government an opportunity to raise revenues from people who were productive.

I do not know whether this member reads what is going on in his country or whether in caucus they discuss the realities of this world. In Toronto, which is supposed to be the mecca for industrial expansion and growth, 35,000 construction workers with an average salary of somewhere between $25 and $30 per hour are now unemployed. They were not low paid service sector type jobs that the member takes great pride in saying that his government created. They were products of a highly trained, highly educated system in southern Ontario which realized that, in order to meet the needs of a new economy, we have to produce these kinds of people.

Can you imagine the amount of revenue the Canadian government would garner from taxing those people who have salaries of $25 to $30 an hour, but who are now unemployed, thanks to your economic policy and fiscal mismanagement. The are unemployed and the member wants to know what is going to happen to these people.

The member states that the government is going to change the unemployment insurance system. He is talking about taking $2.9 billion of government moneys from those people who have contributed right up to this point. He is talking about a 30 per cent increase in bankruptcies in Canada. This is the highest level since the recession eight years ago. He takes great pride in that. I do not understand it. When I said earlier that the government opposite had a distorted view of reality, I did not think it had permeated down to the back benches.

Complete industries are being wasted away. Over the course of the last several weeks, we have had example after example. The major furniture manufacturers of southern Ontario and southern Quebec are moving their plants to the United States. Textile industries are closing their doors one after the other. Yesterday, one of the oldest carpet manufacturers in southern Ontario was closing all of its operations and moving down south, causing jobs to be lost. All of that is as a result of the high interest rate policy, the FTA, and a high dollar which decreases the opportunity for Canadians to engage in a productive environment here in Canada.

If the member is suggesting that the government is saying that the best thing Canadians can do is to close down shop and move down south, and we are going to make sure that we provide the fiscal environment to cause that as an inducement, an encouragement, a push factor, then he is right. But I will have no part of that. That is not the Canadian way.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. On debate, the hon. member for Winnipeg Transcona.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, while we are talking about the deficit, I think members might be interested in being reminded that the real source of the deficit over the years has not been what the government spent and what the government collected in the form of taxes, but what the government did not collect in the form of tax expenditures, that is, those moneys which governments over the years could have collected, but which they forfeited in the form of a variety of tax shelters, loopholes, depreciation allowances, credits and various other schemes by which the government used the tax system to provide what it called incentives.

I recall when I was first elected to this place 11 years ago next week that the Conservative government of that time, under the leadership of the present Right Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs, lived up to a campaign promise that it had made and provided a tax expenditure account which previous Liberal governments had not been willing to do. It provided Parliament with an account of the money that was forfeited in the form of tax expenditures. If I remember correctly, in 1979 the deficit was $14 billion and the tax expenditure account was $32 billion. So in that year alone we see that the government did not collect an amount which was over twice what the deficit was.

It is this kind of policy which accumulated over the years a deficit and a tax expenditure account which was much greater than the deficit for that particular year. Of course, that particular Progressive Conservative government was defeated in the fall of 1979 and the Liberals thereafter reverted to their policy of not publishing a tax expenditure account. By 1984 the Conservatives had lost their fiscal idealism and they have not published a tax expenditure account since their re-election in 1984.

I want to talk a bit about interest rates which is one of the things that concerns me. By virtue of the high interest rate policy of the government, we are entering into a period of random cruelty brought on by what I would call a kind of chronological roulette. There are many families in Canada right now who are sitting at or near the end of a three-year or a five-year mortgage and who now have an interest rate that they have found a way to live with, even though it may have been onerous.

I heard from a constituent yesterday who said that he was coming to the end of a five-year mortgage. I believe he said that his interest rate was 10.5 per cent, which is still 4.5 per cent over the 6 per cent over 25 years which a previous generation had to pay for their houses. In any event, 10.5 per cent does not look so bad these days.

This person's five-year mortgage is coming to an end. He went through this in the early 1980s. He almost lost his house, and has spent the last several years recovering from the early 1980s and now faces once again the prospect of losing his home, only now of course losing it after another decade of investment which makes it all the more threatening.

This is happening all over the place. It is one of the reasons why I will never ever be a fan of the kind of economic system that we have in this country. Any economic system which by virtue of some macro-fiscal policy that a Minister of Finance applies from time to time because in his wisdom or lack of it he thinks will have an effect on inflation, any policy that can just like that throw people out of their homes because they are unable to meet the new payments demanded of them in a renegotiated mortgage situation, is to me on the face of it so morally unacceptable that I cannot understand or fathom why people would want to come to its defence. If the Minister of Finance does not wake up, this is what is going to happen to more and more families, particularly young families in Canada.

We often hear pro-family rhetoric from Conservative members. Indeed, we hear it from Liberal members who belonged to a government in the early 1980s that pursued exactly the same policy. It is these kinds of economic policies which are more destructive to the family than anything else that one can imagine. It forces mother, father and everyone who can possibly get a job to work in order to try and meet these new economic circumstances. This is the rat race gone wild for a lot of people.

It is about time that the Canadian people made it absolutely clear to the Minister of Finance that they do not want to have anything to do with the high interest rate policy and that they are willing to take their chances on a little bit of inflation, if that might be the result. I am not even sure that it would be, but that is the prevailing theory.

Another thing, of course, with respect to interest rates is that the reason offered for high interest rates is so Ontario-centric. We have high interest rates in order to cool down the economy in southern Ontario, and the rest of the country be damned. If that means that farmers in western Canada and other small business persons and families in the rest of the country have to go under in order to cool the Ontario economy down, well then so be it.

It is no wonder that we have regional alienation in this country when that is the case and when it is so clearly seen to be the case. When farmers at this critical point have heard that the price for their wheat is going to be low once again, at a time when they are facing drought, when they face continuing high costs for fertilizers and pesticides, and increased competition from the United States and the European Community, and when they see the whole agricultural system moving in a direction which would remove even those supports which they now have, on top of all this, they have to suffer the high cost of money that this government is inflicting on them through its high interest rate policy. Many of them are not going to be able to afford it. They are just simply going to go bust and walk away.

Every time a farmer leaves the land, every time a family has to move into town or particularly to a big city, a little bit of Canada dies, a little bit of the Canada that the Conservative party said for decades that it valued. Yet, this is the little bit of Canada which time and again the Conservative party is sacrificing to the values of the market-place. In so doing, it is betraying its own people, betraying its own tradition, and betraying the very soul of Canada.

The other thing that needs to be said, and I do not think has been said nearly often enough, is that the high interest rate policy is related to the free trade agreement.

I was on the External Affairs committee and travelled with that committee studying the elements of the deal in the fall of 1987. I recall a meeting here in Ottawa. The former minister of finance for a Liberal government, Mitchell Sharp, appeared before the committee. He said to the committee members, but particularly to the government members who were supporters of the FTA: "How long do you think you will be in a free trade agreement with the United States before you will have to accept, either directly or indirectly, some form of regulation of the value of the Canadian dollar? The United States is not forever going to allow Canadians to export without restriction into the United States, if that exporting is taking place in the context of Canadian exporters having the advantage of a much lower Canadian dollar".

I often remember those words when I see what is happening now. I ask myself why this mania, why this obsession on the part of the government to maintain high interest rates and in so doing maintaining a high dollar? Perhaps it is because the integrity of the deal depends on maintaining the dollar at least at a certain level.

So what are Canadian business people and Canadian exporters up against? They find that the free trade agreement is not everything it was cracked up to be. The Americans are still able to harass our exporters and make life difficult for them. They have lost and are continuing to lose the advantage of the lower dollar. On top of losing the advantage of the lower dollar, they are now subjected to the disadvantage of the high cost of money related to the high interest rate policy of this government. Therefore, they are in double, even triple jeopardy as a result of the agreement. The other dimension of the agreement is that it has made it so much easier for Americans to operate in Canada and has also created a situation, as we all know, in which many Canadian companies, rather than face this array of obstacles, have decided to move their operations south and be done with it all.

This is as a result of a free trade agreement that was supposed to be the best thing that ever happened to Canada. I think we will see over time that it was one of the worst things that ever happened to Canada, but that is something that only time will tell. I think the time that has passed so far has told us this, but only if one is willing to suspend the kind of uncritical belief in the agreement that government members still have.

What lies ahead, Mr. Speaker? Well, it appears that we are destined to have a free trade agreement with Mexico. The government stated that we do not have to harmonize with the United States, but we find that we are harmonizing with the United States. One of the first things that came along in this Parliament after the free trade agreement was signed was a bill in respect of unemployment insurance that, just by coincidence, made our unemployment insurance system a lot like the American system. Pure coincidence, of course, because the government maintained during the campaign, and this was its biggest lie during the campaign, that there would be no need to harmonize our social system with the Americans. Anybody who has studied economic integration, wherever it has taken place, will tell you that one of the end results of economic integration, wherever it takes place, is the harmonization of social systems, labour laws, et cetera.

It is happening in the European Community in preparation for the single market of 1992. Everyone there is working on what they call the social charter; they are working for what they call a social Europe. They are saying that if we are not going to have any barriers, if we are going to have a completely integrated and single market in Europe, then there has to be a basic agreement about the ground rules. There have to be some ground rules about social security, minimum wages, labour market conditions, and a socially just basis on which this competition can occur.

This is something that the government refused to admit when it was bargaining and negotiating Canada's way into the free trade agreement. Every time critics of the agreement said you are going to have to come to some kind of harmonization—and we Canadians stand to lose in that harmonization—or if you do not have harmonization in the short-run, our system is such that we will have to unilaterally give up certain elements of our social system in order to remain competitive in this new situation that we have entered through the free trade agreement.

I began this conversation about Europe at the point at which I mentioned the possibility of entering into a free trade agreement with Mexico. It would be bad enough if we had to harmonize our social policies and our labour market policies with the United States, which is already a more exploitive and less socially just country than our own, but it would be a nightmare if we had to arrive at that kind of harmonization, no matter how long it took, with Mexico. Then we would really be at a disadvantage with both the United States and Mexico calling on us to reduce our view of what a just economy was like.

This is what is at stake in the free trade agreement. With respect to Mexico, it may already be there in the form of the Maquiladora corridor, a free trade corridor which exists between the United States and Mexico and which we still have no assurances is not a place where Mexican goods, manufactured at Mexican labour prices, are finding their way into the United States and into Canada as American goods. This is another element of the free trade agreement which we found very scary at the time and still do.

I see that we are nearing one o'clock. I wish to make one final remark. One of the other things that we said about the consequences of the free trade agreement would be that over time it would erode our health care system. It is no coincidence that in the last little while we have started to have various ministers of health, most notably from Quebec, but also others, saying that we are going to have to go to user fees. We are going to have to go to more of a user-pay kind of health care system.

I do not think that this is a coincidence. It is related not only to the free trade agreement, but to the fact that this government is forcing the hand of provincial governments with respect to health care by its continued unilateral reduction in the federal commitment to health care.

As the NDP health critic at the time of the debate on the Canada Health Act in April 1984, I said that through cut-backs in federal commitments we would eventually arrive at a time when provincial governments would, for fiscal reasons, begin to dismantle health care systems in their provinces and this is beginning to happen. Unless we have a renewed debate about the future of health care in this country and the future of medicare, then piece by piece, province by province, user-fee by user-fee, privatization by privatization, we are going to lose our health care system and it will all fit perfectly into the long-term plan by which the American multinational health and hospital companies can find their way into the Canadian market-place.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I call it one o'clock, the hon. member will have 10 minutes for questions and comments once we begin debate again. He has used up his 20 minutes in debate.

It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

At 1 p.m. the House took recess.

The House resumed at 2 p.m.

CFB SUMMERSIDE

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, CFB Summerside is scheduled to close in 1992. Next spring the anchor squadron, 413, will be moved to Greenwood, Nova Scotia. This squadron should remain in Summerside.

A retired major who has been actively involved with the fight to save the base supports this suggestion. He states that lives will be placed at greater risk if the squadron moves.

This is a good idea for a number of worth-while reasons. The financial benefits are there, the medical benefits are well known, and it is the best location.

In fact, an entire paper entitled the Hopping-Naylor report covers every beneficial aspect of maintaining the squadron at the base in Summerside.

I whole-heartedly support maintaining the 413 search and rescue at Summerside. I urge the federal government to offer its endorsement of this excellent suggestion immediately.

TOURISM

Mr. Ross Stevenson (Durham): Mr. Speaker, this is National Tourism Week and an excellent occasion to advise the House of a spectacular new $100 million resort which is in the planning stages for the town of Newcastle, Ontario, in my constituency of Durham.

Called Newcastle-on-the-Lake, this resort will be situated on 100 acres along the northern shore of Lake Ontario. The resort is to have two 225-room hotels, 1,100 luxury condominiums, conference and recreational facilities, as well as a marina.

Newcastle-on-the-Lake promises to be a most imaginative project. It will provide a whole new dimension to the town of Newcastle, while also greatly enhancing the future of this area and the way the area is developed.

HOUSING

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are finding it increasingly difficult to locate affordable housing.

Yesterday, the mayor of Vancouver, councillors, representatives of labour, co-ops and social housing groups came to Ottawa to meet with the housing minister only to be told that there were no funds to deal with Vancouver's housing crisis.

RRAP funding which would rehabilitate downtown rental housing has been cancelled. Funding for social housing has been cut from 5,000 to 1,700 units with only 150 units last year for Vancouver.

In addition to reinstated federal funding for rental housing, co-ops and social housing, Vancouver needs a special fund for transition houses and affordable housing for new megaproject areas.

I call on the minister to develop a national housing strategy with adequate funding to counteract homelessness in our nation, to build native housing, and to develop affordable housing in the big cities of Canada.

A pre-election symposium in Vancouver will not build housing.

GRAIN TRANSPORTATION

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, the mayors of the Great Lakes and St. Lawrence Seaway ports will be meeting in Milwaukee, Wisconsin, this week to address problems of mutual concern.

Naturally the environment, zebra mussels, Great Lakes water quality, oil spills on the seaway, emissions from pulp and paper plants, and water levels in the Great Lakes will be thoroughly discussed and thoroughly aired.

However the key will be the economic future of the Great Lakes ports and the viability of the St. Lawrence Seaway. To this end we ask this government to change the Western Grain Transportation Act which unfairly distorts the distribution of grain in Canada. This inequitable distribution is hurting shippers and the entire seaway system.

I ask this government to listen to the provinces including British Columbia, Alberta and northern Ontario, the shippers, the unions in this country, and the farmers. They all come to the conclusion that the Western Grain Transportation Act must be changed now. The future of all Great Lakes ports, of all shippers, and the true viability of this seaway will be harmed unless it is changed.

FREE TRADE AGREEMENT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, a study by the Department of External Affairs and International Trade has revealed that less than a year and a half after it came into effect, the free trade agreement has already generated investment worth $3 billion in Quebec, creating over 1,000 jobs.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): It has been disruptive! That is what free trade has done!

Mr. Saint-Julien: According to Normand Villeneuve, who heads the department's branch responsible for liaison with the provinces and the private sector, these figures show that Americans have invested more in Canada than we have in the United States. The score is: $7 billion for the Americans to $6 billion for Canadians.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Talk to the workers at Stone-Consolidated about what is happening in the pulp and paper sector!

Mr. Saint-Julien: Mr. Villeneuve mentions the following companies that invested in Quebec as an example: Alumax aluminum refinery, $1 billion; Abbott Laboratories, $12 billion; Nikon Canada, $4 million. However, Mr. Villeneuve feels that so far, Canadian companies have been slow to react.

Mr. Speaker, thanks to the free trade agreement, Canada is a winner, but no thanks to the Liberals opposite.

PETRO-CANADA

Mr. Scott Thorkelson (Edmonton—Strathcona): Mr. Speaker, the Petro-Canada International Assistance Corporation has withdrawn its scholarship support for the University of Alberta Summer Petroleum Program.

Petro-Canada arrogantly withdrew its support without notifying the University of Alberta, forcing the cancellation of the program. The Summer Petroleum Program has trained over 300 people from developing countries in the last seven years.

It has trained people who have come back to Alberta to buy petroleum equipment and technology.

Meanwhile, Petro-Canada is providing $10 million over five years to an institution in central Canada, quadruple the support that the University of Alberta has received and to an institution over 2,500 miles from the oil patch.

I condemn the arrogant, smug, self-satisfied bureaucrats in the Petro-Canada International Assistance Corporation, centralist bureaucrats who did not even have the common decency to notify the University of Alberta.

Western Canadians deserve better than a slap in the face.

SCOTIA SYNFUELS PROJECT

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, Cape Breton is a region that has experienced more than its share of economic uncertainty. The Scotia Synfuels project could mean a revitalization of the island's economy. This project promises to create at least 2,000 permanent jobs for industrial Cape Breton and the north eastern mainland of Nova Scotia.

This is a project that is environmentally sensitive as it will utilize the most environmentally advanced fuel system for power plants. Private investors are assuming the major risk here and not the taxpayer. This project will provide more than $800 million in corporation taxes.

The Scotia Synfuels project will build on the strength of the people of Cape Breton and on the strength of its natural resources, namely, coal.

On April 18, 1990 the Nova Scotia legislature passed an all-party resolution in support of this project. Likewise, yesterday, the mayors and wardens of all of Cape Breton lent their unqualified support to this project.

This project, however, needs the approval of the federal government for the Cape Breton investment tax credit and the incentives of the Atlantic Canada Opportunities Agency.

I call upon the Government of Canada to recommend this valuable project as this is a project that will bring economic growth to the area and give Cape Bretoners hope for a future.

ONTARIO PROGRESSIVE CONSERVATIVE PARTY

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, as the winds of democratic reform continue to blow throughout the world, it is refreshing to see Canadians right here in Ontario initiating innovative improvements to our own democracy.

The Ontario Progressive Conservative Party deserves heartiest congratulations for allowing all of its members a direct vote in electing Michael Harris, MPP for Nipissing, leader of that great party.

Congratulations are also in order for Dianne Cunningham, MPP for London North, for waging a tough, classy campaign. All members on this side of the House, I am sure, join with me in wishing Mike Harris well as he begins his important role as leader of the Ontario Progressive Conservative Party.

This Progressive Conservative initiative serves as an excellent example of democracy in action, not only for this House but all legislatures across the country.

Freedom seeking people everywhere can learn an important lesson from this exercise, that once attained, democracy must evolve in order to flourish. In Ontario, democracy is flourishing.

ACCESS TO INFORMATION

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I want to say a few words about a terrible addiction plaguing our society today: the government's addiction to secrecy.

As the Prime Minister put it in 1984:

> The more the government can have of it, the more it wants of it.

In fact the government wants secrecy so bad that the Minister of Justice wants to change the fee structure for access to information, implementing some new charges and increasing existing ones.

Why? The deficit made them do it. At least that is what they say.

I have a suggestion for the minister. Why does she not put meters in the limos she and her cabinet colleagues constantly use and have waiting around the front door for them, instead of putting meters on Canadians trying to get access to government held information.?

As the Prime Minister said again in 1984:

> Secrecy and stonewalling have become a habit with the government. We will never break the habit until we change the government.

He was right then. Do you know what? He is right now.

GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURE

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, over the past few weeks I have made a number of statements calling for more leadership in our restraint of government spending. Such restraint will take some of the pressure off monetary policy in fighting inflation and create greater potential for lower interest rates.

On this very theme I recently read with considerable interest a speech by one of our deputy ministers. I could not help but notice a reference to Public Service 2000, which is to be the first real overhaul of the Public Service in more than 20 years.

As part of this review were all members aware that if PS 2000 can streamline the process and improve public sector productivity by even 10 per cent, we will save something like $1.7 billion per year just on the wage bill?

I encourage all members of this House to get behind this important initiative and call upon this government to undertake further measures to ensure the best value for Canadians' tax dollars.

FISHERIES

Mr. Fred J. Mifflin (Bonavista—Trinity—Conception): Mr. Speaker, as you know, the Atlantic fishery is in a crisis. We discovered yesterday that the stocks were not as good as we thought they were. Our entire region faces a devastating long-term deterioration of the fishery based economy. It is affecting hundreds of communities and tens of thousands of citizens.

I would like to remind the House that the fishery sector in Atlantic Canada is equivalent in economic terms to the auto industry in central Canada and to the grain sector on the prairies.

One aspect of this situation requires the Prime Minister's immediate personal intervention. I refer now to the discussion with the European community plus Europeans in other countries concerning their violations of internationally established quotas and their consequent destructive overfishing practices on the nose and tail of Canada's continental shelf. This issue must be resolved quickly.

Only the international stature of the Prime Minister's office will give it the priority and the high level attention necessary for such a resolution. We urge the Prime Minister to take a personal interest and to participate now in these negotiations.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I would like to take this opportunity to call on the Soviet Union to recognize that the demands which President Gorbachev is making of the three Baltic republics are unrealistic. It is unrealistic to expect that the Baltic republics should be treated in a way similar to other republics, that is to say that they can only secede through the law which has been set up for secession.

I think it would be in the interests of everyone, both East and West, and in the interests of Mr. Gorbachev's reputation as a democrat and a reformer, to recognize that the Baltic republics are different and to deal with them accordingly.

In the same respect, the Baltic leadership should be prepared to deal reasonably with the Soviet Union in order to deal with its economic, military and other security needs.

In the meantime this senselessness of the blockade should stop, particularly the blockade with respect to medical supplies. The situation in Lithuania is worsening. There is a shortage of insulin, syringes and other important medical supplies. The first thing the Soviet Union should do in addition to sitting down at the table with the Baltic leadership is to stop the blockade, particularly the blockade of medical supplies. The international community should do what it can to come to the aid of Lithuania with respect to medical supplies as well.

FISHERIES

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, the Atlantic Fisheries Adjustment Program represents an important first step in the government's response to the current difficulties in the Atlantic fishery.

Funds allocated for additional research and more effective management will benefit all regions of coastal Atlantic Canada. The $147 million in diversification funds will provide incentives to reduce our dependency on traditional fisheries. The programs and community development funds targeted for communities specifically impacted by the northern cod decline will obviously benefit those communities.

I trust, however, that the government does not consider that with these announcements its job is done. Communities which have suffered plant closures for causes other than the decline of northern cod do not understand why their specific needs were not addressed in the adjustment component of the aid package.

I urge the government to get on with establishing community development funding for these communities as well, in particular, for the communities of southern and western Nova Scotia such as Port Mouton, Clarks Harbour, Shag Harbour and Woods Harbour.

FISHERIES

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. I understand that the Prime Minister will meet today with the head of the Spanish government, President Felipe Gonzales.

Experts have identified overfishing by the Spanish and Portuguese fleets as an important cause of declining fish stocks off Atlantic Canada.

Will the Prime Minister discuss this important issue with the President of Spain today? Will he obtain the assurance of the president that Spain will accept lower fish quotas and not continue its overfishing which is causing serious and possibly permanent damage to Canadian fish stocks?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I had meetings with the President of the Government of Spain last night and again today dealing with the important question of the fishery. We will be meeting a little later on this afternoon and again tonight.

I have expressed very clearly the point of view of the people of Canada and the government of Canada and have found in President Gonzales a very constructive interlocutor who recognizes full well that important conservation measures must begin if there is to be the preservation of that vital resource.

I am happy to advise the House that the conversations that I have had with the Spanish President in this important area have been what I think my hon. friend would qualify as thoughtful, very constructive and, I am sure, beneficial for those who work in the fishing industry in Canada.

[Translation]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister why, in the course of his talks, he did not receive the assurance that Spain would immediately stop overfishing and start working together with Canada and other countries to ensure the long-term survival of our fisheries. Why did he not receive any assurances in those terms?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): I just want to inform the Leader of the opposition of the constructive attitude taken by the President of the Government of Spain. The same approach was taken by Vice-Chairman Marin of the European Economic Community last week, all of which will be helpful in initiating a realistic process to protect a resource that is so important to Canada.

I think the hon. member knows perfectly well this is not a problem that can be solved overnight. However, the attitude taken by Mr. Gonzalez will be a very positive contribution to the ultimate settlement of a problem that has gone on far too long in this country.

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister should know there is a crisis in Atlantic Canada and that crisis is in the fishery. Entire towns are being shut down, fishermen and plant workers are losing their jobs and still this government lets foreign fleets continue to deplete our fish stocks.

It is not always clear that these countries realize the extent of the damage their fishermen are causing to our economy.

• (1420)

Will the Prime Minister, at the very least, press for continuing direct discussions with Spain on an ongoing basis to seek an early resolution to the problem of overfishing by foreign fleets? He said this matter has been going on too long. Why does he not do something right now when the President of Spain is visiting our country?

Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, what would the Leader of the Opposition want me to do, arrest him?

Some hon. members: Talk to him.

Mr. Mulroney: He says talk to him. That is exactly what we have been doing. We have been talking directly, bluntly and effectively, as opposed to suggesting, as we heard in this House in the past, that the Canadian government dispatch instruments of war to clear people out of the gulf.

This fishing has been taking place outside of the 200-mile limit. The Government of Canada is pursuing the question of conservation outside of the 200-mile limit very vigorously. We have made the case very carefully to all members of the European Community, to the commission itself and to the President of Spain that obviously the European Community must accept the NAFO regime. It is the only way that conservation can proceed so there is fish left there for all involved and particularly for Canadian fishermen.

Surely the Leader of the Opposition knows full well that this has to be resolved in precisely the manner that we are resolving it now and not by gunboat diplomacy suggested by a party that really has neither guns nor boats.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Finance. The private sector and Canadian consumers are very much aware of the problems connected with the GST. My question is as follows: Will the government finally admit that if the GST is introduced as proposed, it will be an administrative nightmare? Is the Minister of Finance now prepared to admit in this House that he is changing the rules for collecting the GST?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I reject the expression that is used by the hon. member. We have said, though, on a number of occasions that we are looking at various ways of continually simplifying the process, particularly for small business.

We have two means of streamlined accounting in place. We have means by which small business can pay over a less frequent time period than larger businesses. We have put in place ways that small business can reduce the cost of point of sale equipment like cash registers. We have a one-page form for the GST. We have a number of other things we are working on with the provinces to reduce the complexity and the compliance burden of the GST.

I have always said that if there are ways that we can add to those means by which we can simplify the process we are quite prepared to look at them and consider them in a positive way.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the government is spending millions of dollars in propaganda that is disguised as straightforward answers regarding questions concerning the goods and services tax.

Will the government, in an honest and straightforward way, discuss in this place the changes that it is suggesting to people in private will take place to make the goods and services tax more palatable? If the government is going to distribute information such as this, why not discuss the changes it wants to make right here in this House and make sure we all know about it?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me just make a few points on that. The finance committee of the House of Commons in the last Parliament recommended that we use a wide means of advising people what the GST is all about, how it affects them and how it affects the cost of living. That is what we are proceeding to do because a finance committee of the House of Commons asked us to do that.

The hon. member wonders why we provide this information. Just yesterday we had 6,300 phone calls from people asking for information about the goods and services tax.

The hon. member asks why we don't discuss it here in this House. We have had committee hearings, we have had the legislative process, we have had debate in this House. We have made a number of changes as a result of good, solid recommendations from the finance committee.

Unfortunately, my hon. friend did not participate in any of those positive recommendations. All that he said was to scrap the whole thing. He had no positive idea or understanding of what the process was all about. He was totally negative. This is the sort of thing that makes no contribution to the positive development of legislation.

ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister who is aware that three weeks ago Dr. Schindler, a professor at the University of Alberta, reported to the federal government that the proposed pulp industry regulations do not take account of the fact that dioxin is a known carcinogen and that those regulations do not reflect the expert evidence of the federal government's own scientists.

Since Dr. Schindler concludes that allowing discharges of chlorinated organic substances from new pulp industries should be prevented because of the risks to human health, will the Deputy Prime Minister assure this House that the government will redraft the regulations, taking account of the fact that dioxin is a known cancer-causing agent?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend knows that it is the intention to add over time to the regulations that were recently published limiting the pulp mills to certain harmful agents that are being discharged into the waters and air.

My hon. friend will be pleased when the full story is told. Yes, we are very sensitive to the potential of harm to human health as a result of some of these agents in the environment.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister. We are told we have to wait for The Green Plan, we have to wait on carbon dioxide emissions, we have to wait in relation to the greenhouse effect.

Three weeks ago Dr. Schindler advised the federal government that tens of thousands of Canadians are at risk now from dioxins, furans and chlorinated organic compounds. Dr. Schindler has warned that the regulations, as posed, will present a risk of increased heart disease and increased deaths from cancer to Canadians if they are implemented.

Canadians should not have to wait. Will the Prime Minister show some backbone on just one environmental issue? Will he bring forward regulations which recognize that dioxins are a cancer-causing agent and their release should not be allowed into the river systems and lakes of this country by the pulp industry? Just once, stand up.

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, the pulp and paper industry has, over the last five years, invested $1 billion a year in making improvements to their plants.

Under the new regulations the industry will be required over the next three years to invest another $5 billion to $7 billion, the result of which will be a complete elimination of the emission of dioxins into the river systems.

My hon. friend should read the regulations that have been published and consult with people other than those whom he calls friends who give him a single vision of the reality of the situation.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, in his April 24 paper, Mr. Schindler writes:

> In brief, hundreds of thousands of people in northern Canada could be exposed to high levels of dioxins, furans and other toxic chlorinated organic compounds in Canada—

There are currently no regulations governing dioxin emissions from pulp and paper mills. Lack of effective government action is almost guaranteeing tragedy.

My question to the Prime Minister, to the Minister of Forestry, to any minister is, when will the government implement dioxin emission standards for pulp mills to eliminate this widespread public health threat?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, my answer to this hon. member is the same as to his predecessor. To shout louder and to repeat untruths does not make a truth.

The fact is that action has been taken and the results will be evident. If the hon. member bothers to see what has happened and what will happen as a result of the new regulation, he will perhaps refrain from causing unjustified fear and perhaps destroying an industry that is the mainstay of the Canadian economy.

FISHERIES

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans and, in his absence, to the Acting Minister of Fisheries and Oceans.

The fishermen's proposals for groundfish allocations in 4X and 5 have been before the minister's department since last February. Last week the fishermen invited local politicians and officials from the minister's department to meet in Meteghan yesterday. There were over 500 concerned fishermen and plant workers and not one Department of Fisheries official.

Could the Acting Minister tell us why that insult was given to the people who have not fished in the last few months and who are looking for some type of proposal? Why was there not one department official? Surely, the government spends enough money on those people that one of them could have been there.

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, if I might be permitted to answer this question on behalf of my colleague.

I understand there has been extensive dialogue between the department and the fishermen who are understandably concerned about the situation in South West Nova. I can also tell my colleague that arrangements are being made that will result in a meeting next week between the minister and appropriate officials so that these matters can be fully discussed and the fishermen's demands and aspirations can be heard and dealt with.

Mrs. Coline Campbell (South West Nova): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the Prime Minister. There exists today a very dangerous situation in the southern end of Nova Scotia. Yesterday, provincial ministers and I, and others, met with the fishermen. There were no officials there. The fishermen would like to meet with the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans. The present minister of fisheries is attending a Seafood 2000 dinner tonight. I can assure you there will not be a fisherman from that end of the province invited to the dinner. I know the government is paying for some of it.

Would the Prime Minister instruct his Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, in light of the dangerous situation at all those DFO offices right now, not to leave Nova Scotia without meeting with some of the representatives of those fishermen?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think most members of the House of Commons would acknowledge that since his swearing in as Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, the minister has spend an enormous amount of time meeting with fishermen in all parts of Atlantic Canada. I personally had the occasion to—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker, I am trying to respond to my hon. friend. I personally had the occasion to be—

Ms. Campbell (South West Nova): It is very dangerous.

An hon. member: Come on, motor-mouth.

Ms. Campbell (South West Nova): He is spending government money to get there. Let him meet them.

An hon. member: A large-mouth bass.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I know the minister views his meetings with Atlantic coast fishermen as probably the most important matter on his agenda. Although he is travelling and exceptionally busy, I will, of course, ask him to see if he can make time on this particular trip to meet with the group mentioned by my hon. friend. And, if he has a little more time, I will ask him to have dinner with the hon. member as well.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister and concerns the speech delivered by the Minister of the Environment this morning in Norway at an international environment conference.

The minister said that we must act now and that we must make real commitments. He then talks about next November, and last week in Parliament he talked about 1992 in Brazil.

It is evident that last week's leaked telex from Washington was right. Canada is siding with the Americans and against the countries that want to set real targets and timetables for reducing carbon dioxide emissions.

I ask the Prime Minister, before this conference ends, will Canada take a stand with those nations that want to take action now on the environment?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know why my hon. friend sees conspiracies behind every little headline.

The role of Canada and its independence on the environment has been lauded by people ranging from Prime Minister Brundtland to Foreign Minister Shevardnadze of the Soviet Union. That is a broad range of compliments.

It is strange that the Liberal opposition cannot once acknowledge the very significant leadership that Canada is providing in the environment, even though it escapes the attention of my hon. friend. I can assure her that she need not bother her head as there is no conspiracy going on. Canada is going to conduct itself with the degree of independence that has brought so much pride to the government of the people of Canada over so many years.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased the Prime Minister had the opportunity to re-read his old press clippings.

This is this morning's speech by our Minister of the Environment. It shows very clearly that this government prefers a wishy-washy consensus with the Americans to tough action on global warming.

An hon. member: Shame.

Mrs. Catterall: Why is Canada caving in? Why will the government not stand up with the seven countries who are showing leadership? Why will it not agree to set targets and timetables on carbon dioxide emissions?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, why the repetition of these silly questions that presume that the Government of Canada is not going to do exactly what the minister has very clearly set out? The minister has clearly established the intentions of the government to proceed with timetables and to proceed in a very deliberate and helpful manner.

The Government of Canada is trying to undo about a decade of inaction in the environment by my hon. friend's Party. Nothing was done, from acid rain to global warming. Your record was a big zero.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Agriculture.

Yesterday the parliamentary secretary to the minister reported to the House that the Minister of Agriculture, the Minister of Grains and Oilseeds and the prairie agriculture ministers met in Winnipeg "to formalize and, hopefully, to finalize an agreement with those provinces".

Everyone attending all these endless meetings for the last six weeks has presumably still been getting their pay cheques and hard-pressed farmers have yet to see a dollar. I would like to ask the minister, was an agreement was reached and, if one was, what was it?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I can tell the hon. member and members of the House that the meeting was held and it was a very productive meeting. I think it is fair to say that progress was made.

The provinces acknowledged the fact that there would have to be some cost sharing with respect to this particular program. I think there was also an acknowledgement of the unique situation that Saskatchewan finds itself in because of the huge decrease of income in that province. There was certainly acknowledgement made and we are trying to find a way to deal with that. As well, we had a very productive discussion with respect to the safety-net and long-term stabilization program which is something that the government is actively considering.

All these things are being worked on during the course of this week. We will have a further meeting in Toronto where all the ministers of agriculture will be meeting on Friday. Hopefully, we will be able to advance these proposals at that time.

Mr. Ray Funk (Prince Albert—Churchill River): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is directed to the same minister. I appreciate the fact that he reports that progress has been made, but we certainly have had reports of progress something like 10 or 11 times.

I would like to remind the minister that up to 45 per cent of the crop is in in some areas; 20 per cent over-all. Much of this crop has gone in with inadequate preparation for fertilizer and other inputs, and acreages are being reduced. This is starting to look like a crop reduction program rather than a seeding assistance program.

When can farmers expect finally to have some money in their hands?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, despite what the hon. member says, I think he will find that statistics will reveal that there is an increase in plantings projected for this year and I think that is a very positive sign.

I recognize the difficulty and the hon. member knows that. That is why the federal government announced its intention to put $500 million on the table on March 30. We have asked the provinces to come on board, to help us to design the program, to help us deliver the program, and to help us pay for that program because it was in everyone's interest to get as much money into the hands of the farmers as quickly as we possibly could.

HOUSING

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Housing. Yesterday, my colleague from LaSalle—Émard and I presented the Liberal party's recommendation on housing affordability to the Canadian Housing Renewal Association. I might add it was very well received.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Fontana: I would also like to tell the minister that all the speakers, the 500 participants, municipal leaders, and all other people involved in housing, have labelled this government a do-nothing government for housing.

I want to ask this minister and his government will he today in this House, or tomorrow when he meets with CHRA, commit his government to the reinstatement of rental RRAP? Will he show support for the homeless? Will he show support for the people on the waiting list for affordable housing? Will he support and recommit himself to co-operative housing? And, will he support the workers and builders—

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member has put his question.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, I, too, had meetings with a number of people involved with housing at the municipal level yesterday, including mayors of big cities across the country, and I must say the government and its programs were very well received there as well.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Redway: I am looking forward to the meetings tomorrow with the Canadian Housing Renewal Association because I will have an opportunity to tell them that, under our programs, as opposed to Liberal government programs, 60 per cent more of the housing funds federally are being devoted to social housing than before.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Peterson: Balderdash!

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, the minister knows that that is a bunch of bunk. He knows it and his government knows it. The municipal leaders were the same ones who said that the government does absolutely nothing.

Let me ask this further question, but I wish he would answer my first question. The housing ministers will meet with the minister next week. They want some solutions to the housing crisis in the country. Will the Minister in fact be part of the solution and not part of the problem?

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, I can assure the hon. member that I will be part of the solution and not part of the problem. I also want to assure the hon. member that, if he carefully followed what was going on next week, he would know that the meeting with housing ministers is to discuss the allocation of the existing federal housing funds among the provinces. Hopefully, we can arrive at a formula on which all will agree, as they did in the past under the Regina Accord, something that did not happen under the former Liberal government.

Mr. Marchi: That's bunk! Minister of bunk.

An hon. member: Exactly!

FORESTRY

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Forestry. Yesterday, an environmental group called Canada's Future Forest Alliance, which represents over one million Canadians, stated that our forests were facing a national disaster comparable to the destruction of the Amazon forests.

Since the present government policies and programs result in a net loss of 200 hectares of Canadian forests annually, what new programs will the government implement to remedy the depletion of Canada's forests?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, we very much intend to continue the programs that we have initiated over the last five years and which, as the hon. member might readily concede, are showing very impressive results. In fact, one should anticipate that there should not be any more additions to any so-called backlog of NSR lands as we move into the new generation of federal-provincial agreements, and as the new Department of Forestry which the Prime Minister has established begins to function fully.

[Translation]

Mr. Guy H. Arseneault (Restigouche—Chaleur): My question is directed to the same minister. Because of the government's failure to create a national data bank, there is a lack of information on the state of Canada's forests. As a result, contradictory statements are being made by representatives of industry, governments and environmental groups.

When will the minister take his responsibility seriously? When will we have a national forestry data bank?

[English]

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Mr. Speaker, I agree with my hon. friend that the lack of factual and reliable data has been a major problem in the development of the kind of forestry practices that will take us into the next century and that will be required in the modern context. Despite that, my hon. friend knows that this year we will be planting 1.2 billion new seedlings in our country, which is at least double what we are harvesting, so we are on the right track. Improvements will be necessary as we go along and if we begin to incorporate the principle of sustainable development and integrated management into our management structures, my hon. friend will see a major improvement in all these areas.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport, but in his absence I will address it to the parliamentary secretary.

It has been over a year since the Exxon Valdez and the Nestucca oil spills occurred. In the wake of these disasters, serious concerns were raised about the transport of oil through coastal waters. Report after report has stressed the lack of regulations with respect to oil barges, yet the government has failed to take action. Within a week, a barge carrying three million gallons of bunker oil is expected to travel through the Gulf Islands and into the waters of Saanich Inlet, an area proposed as a federal marine reserve park.

Given the regulatory vacuum with respect to oil barges, what assurances can the government give that this particular barge will not be permitted in these sensitive waters without the strictest supervision and with adequate provisions, in the event of an oil spill?

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I want to assure the hon. member opposite that the Coast Guard is well aware that the proposed transportation has been designated to go forward and will be keeping everything under its direct surveillance. I might remind the hon. member that the Coast Guard has been very active in dealing with this, in conjunction with the provincial authorities as well. I want to assure the hon. member that her concerns are being addressed.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the minister. The interim report of the Brander–Smith inquiry released in September of 1989 stated that early action on the unregulated aspects of tanker barge construction and operation is required. That same report condemned the government's lack of readiness in the event of oil spills. When can we expect the government to enact regulations that would minimize the danger to the environment from fuel barging operations?

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, this is being actively looked at and the reports of the various committees which have reported are being dealt with, on a day-to-day basis.

BILL C-21

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Bill C-21 is now back in the other place and we hope that, in the interests of Canadians, it will accept the message sent to it by this elected House. I know, for my part, in the legislative committee hearings on Bill C-21, that most negative witnesses were from union affiliated groups. These are the same groups that Liberal senators chose to hear, and the same groups they now lean on for support. I would like to ask the minister if she could inform the House if the views of these groups truly represent what the Canadian public feels about Bill C-21?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, certainly I would never deny a committee of this House or of the other place its right to hear witnesses of its choosing.

I must admit I was surprised by some of the messages that were heard by the committee, given that we had conducted a poll, the results of which I released today, which showed that 66 per cent of Canadians in all regions of Canada support our efforts under Bill C-21 to spend more money on training under UI. That support is spread right across Canada.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Finance.

The government has said that workers must not negotiate wage increases in anticipation of an inflationary GST. On the other hand, the Canadian Labour Congress does not trust the assurances of the Minister of Finance that his tax will not hurt ordinary Canadians. Workers are determined to offset damage caused by such a regressive tax.

Why is this government continually threatening workers for trying to seek their necessary protection?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, we are not threatening anybody, we are just stating what we believe are the basic facts.

Let me quote from some fairly well-known people. The Economic Council of Canada said: "The reality of the world marketplace will force business people to pass through the great bulk of the tax." The Canadian Construction Association said: "The selling price for all kinds of construction in our analysis is found to be lower under the GST than under the current tax system." John Crispo says: "Very few manufacturers of significance are going to be able to pocket the reduction in the MST. Competition is going to force them to pass it on to us."

We do not believe the concerns that have been expressed by some people in the labour movement and in other places will be found in actual reality as we move into the world of GST. We think it would be wrong and very unhealthy for the economy for people to go after excessive wage demands in anticipation of the GST, which will not produce an increase in the cost of living.

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister.

The government's policies that we have seen over the last number of years have been clearly anti-labour. The legislative policies have battered Canadians for the past six years.

With such a track record, how can the workers believe this minister when he promises them that they will not suffer from the GST? Can he make that promise here today?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the hon. member saying that the policies of this government are anti-labour.

What could be more pro-labour than the 1.6 million jobs that have been created since 1984? If the hon. member is looking for more specific policies, all he has to do is look at the support we have provided to the labour venture capital funds that have been requested by labour and to which this government has responded positively.

These are the things that labour can look to from this government as ways in which we are supporting the growth of labour in this country.

COURT CHALLENGES PROGRAM

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State, but in his absence I will direct it to the Minister of Justice.

The Court Challenges Program provides legal and funding assistance to disadvantaged groups or individuals to clarify charter equality and language rights. Last week, the Secretary of State announced an extension of this program for five years, but failed to announce the agency that would be administering the program.

Can the minister rectify the neglect today and inform us to whom the court challenges staff is now responsible, thus allowing the program to continue efficiently?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I believe my colleague, the Secretary of State is reviewing the administration of the Court Challenges Program and will make an announcement when he has made a decision.

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, it is very difficult for the program to carry on efficiently in the absence of an agency. Citing the current economic situation, the Secretary of State refused to consider important recommendations to the Court Challenges Program from the Human Rights Committee. Equality rights, language rights, women's rights, native rights, among others, are denied de facto justice if disadvantaged groups are not even aware of the program.

Can the minister tell us how the government plans to inform Canadians about the existence of this important program?

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I find the hon. member's question very interesting because when we seek to inform Canadians about something as important as tax reform, her party gets very incensed about it. Is the hon. member saying that she approves of expenditures by the Government of Canada to advertise its programs?

Ms. Clancy: That's what she asked.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for the Older Worker Adjustment Program. Members will recall that many Canadian workers lost their jobs as a result of the privatization of CN Route and then the dismantling of the private company that resulted from that privatization.

In Winnipeg, 94 people lost their jobs as a result of the closing down of Transport Route Canada. None of these workers are eligible for the Older Worker Adjustment Program because the limit set for the application of that program in Winnipeg is for companies of 100 workers or over. By falling six short of this 100-person limit many people who have lost their jobs through the privatization of Route Canada are not eligible for the older worker adjustment.

Is it not possible that the government could find a way to be flexible in this instance and make it possible for these older workers who lost their jobs as a result of that government initiated sequence of events to qualify for that program?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour) and (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I would like to tell the hon. member that all the components of the program to help older workers were negotiated by the federal government with each province. We have established a criteria that must be respected across the country, but certainly we are willing to look at anything that could be helpful to these people.

I think the member will understand that in large cities all across the country we have to set a minimum under which we have to make exclusions. Nevertheless, our program has been very effective so far, because a very large number of older people have been helped by this program.

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, the fact remains that people who lost their jobs from the same company, because they live in a different province, for example, New Brunswick, have become eligible for that older worker adjustment, whereas workers in Winnipeg, because of this 100 worker limit, have been deprived of the same benefits even though they worked for the same company. Is there not a way of taking into account, when people lose their jobs as a result of a national company going under, to make sure that everyone who worked for that company gets the same benefits no matter where they live in Canada?

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour) and (Minister of State (Transport)): Mr. Speaker, I hope that the hon. member will understand that a lay-off of ten people in a small community is, at times, much more important than a lay-off of 50 people in a much larger community.

Mr. Lapierre: Try it yourself. You'll see.

Mr. Corbeil: We would not be treating the older workers fairly if we did not have a different criteria, depending on the location, because the possibility of finding new jobs after being laid off in a large city is much higher than finding a new job in a much smaller community.

AIRPORTS

Mr. Stan Keyes (Hamilton West): Mr. Speaker, since his appointment the Minister of Transport has visited a number of Canadian airports and has witnessed firsthand the air traffic problem in southern Ontario.

Given the minister's statement that, "Hamilton Airport is a proven facility" and that "the expansion of Hamilton Airport as a solution to Pearson International" is a priority. He also knows that a comprehensive study released by his department earlier this year concluded that Hamilton airport is the best alternative to Pearson International.

Therefore, in the absence of the Minister of Transport I would ask the Minister of State for Transport if he can explain what concrete measures the Ministry of Transport has in mind for Hamilton airport vis-à-vis Pearson International?

• (1500)

Mr. Ross Belsher (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, yes, it is true that the minister has been to the Hamilton airport. He has also been to Pearson International Airport. Pearson is the busiest airport in the country.

The member must be reminded that the airline companies are not clamouring for facilities to land at Hamilton. There has to be a demand from the companies to fly into Hamilton. It is not a case of ordering the airline companies to go where we demand they go. The member must also bear that in mind.

Mr. Speaker: I would like to advise the House that during Question Period I received notice of a question of privilege from the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands. I am wondering if the hon. member and the House would agree that I hear the Prime Minister on a short matter and then return to the hon. member.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

APPOINTMENT OF DEPUTY SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE AND CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES OF THE WHOLE HOUSE

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, it is with great pleasure that I move:

> That the Hon. Andrée Champagne, member for the electoral district of Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot, be appointed Deputy Speaker of the House and Chairman of Committees of the Whole House.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, as Parliamentary House Leader of the Liberal caucus, I take great pleasure in supporting the appointment of the hon. member for Saint-Hyacinthe—Bagot as Chairman of Committees of the Whole House and Deputy Speaker of the House.

I would also like to take this opportunity to say a word of thanks to my friend and colleague, the hon. member for Verchères. I hope the House will bear with me, because there are a few things I would like to say about my friend Marcel. For six years he has been a member and Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons. He has chaired a number of important committees of this House. He was president of the Canadian branch of the AIPLF, the Association internationale des parlementaires de langue française. To us, he was someone who managed to be impartial in practically every circumstance, at the same time displaying a unique ability for comradeship with his fellow members. He has made friends on all sides of the House.

To Marcel Danis, the hon. member for Verchères, I want to say thank you for the impressive services rendered to the Canadian people.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

[English]

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, I too wish to rise on behalf of my caucus to indicate our support of the motion.

I also want to say thank you to the outgoing Deputy Speaker whom I got to know in the last year or so in the special committee that I have been working on as well as prior to that in the House in the chair. He has done a remarkable job. We wish him well in his new endeavours.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt this motion?

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I had great hopes for the career of Marcel Danis, but after listening to the member for Ottawa—Vanier and his eulogistic references, I will have to think this over again.

I just want to tell my hon. friend and the member from the NDP that I share their high regard. On behalf of all government members, I thank them for their fine display of parliamentary leadership. I think it is very much appreciated by all.

PRIVILEGE

RELEASE OF RESULTS OF POLLS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I received in my mail that I was sorting through during Question Period the material that I referred to in the notice to Your Honour. In fact it was referred to subsequently in an answer given by the Minister of Employment and Immigration in this House.

To say that I was shocked to receive this material is to put it mildly because it was a press release issued by the Minister of Employment and Immigration in which she releases statistics prepared by Decima Research, apparently in response to a government contract for a series of questions put to Canadians concerning, effectively, the government's policies as adumbrated in Bill C-21.

It is a well known fact that when we in the opposition put questions to the government and Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers on the Order Paper requesting studies and statistical data prepared in the form of polls by the government, this information is regularly refused to us. We are told that the polling is private and is done, admittedly with public funds, but for the purpose of enabling the government to make decisions or receive the views of Canadians, or whatever the answer may be. The information is denied to us here in Parliament.

Yet here, today, we have a situation in which the Minister of Employment and Immigration has released this bundle of statistics, this poll, that she has had commissioned, apparently at public expense, because the results of the poll clearly are ones that she thinks are favourable to the cause that she is proposing in Bill C-21. It is an attempt to influence the Senate of Canada by making this—

Mr. Cooper: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Milliken: I am on a question of privilege and a question of privilege takes precedence over a point of order. I wish the hon. member for Peace River would pay some attention to the rules.

Mr. Speaker: I will hear the hon. member for Peace River in a moment. Perhaps the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands could get to where the privilege is in this.

Mr. Milliken: I am almost there.

The point is that this information is denied to members of Parliament on a regular and consistent basis. Now, all of a sudden, when it suits the government's purpose, it dumps it out on the floor of the House in answer to questions and in press releases across the country.

If it is going to be made public today in this way, it should be made public on every occasion that it is asked for. The denial of making it public and the secrecy that surrounds these polls in the usual way constitutes a breach of the privileges of this House, if the government is going to release the polls when it suits its fancy to do so. That is what is going on here. I object and ask, Mr. Speaker, that you rule this is unparliamentary and a breach of our privileges.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has a complaint. It is not a new complaint. The complaint has been raised on a number of occasions going back through the long history of this place.

The hon. member has made his complaint clear, but I do not think the Chair can intervene if the government wishes, as it has in this case, to release all the material, and as it has refused to do in other cases. I have to say the complaint falls short of privilege.

Point of Order

The hon. member has put the complaint forward with vigour. Perhaps following this complaint some conversations might take place between hon. members on both sides of the House.

COMMENT DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I rise now on a point of order. The point I want to make has nothing to do with the previous one.

It is a point of order that arose during Question Period. I do not want to appear to be objecting on behalf of any member, but in the course of Question Period during a question being put by the hon. member for Edmonton East I heard some members on the government side, and I cannot identify them so I do not think it is a question of privilege, refer to the hon. member who had the floor as a "windbag".

I have been called that before in this House. I have checked the precedents. I have looked at Beauchesne, Sixth Edition, citation 488 which states:

> It has been ruled unparliamentary to refer to a member as:
> (c) a bag of wind.

It cites a precedent of February 15, 1878, which I have here and would be pleased to provide Your Honour.

In my submission a "bag of wind" and a "windbag" are one and the same. I suggest that the term is unparliamentary. I ask that Your Honour consider the matter and if it is unparliamentary and so rule, then I will object the next time it is used. I am not objecting for myself in this particular case, although I have been called that. I could identify the hon. member who has used that unparliamentary expression in reference to some of my perhaps longer speeches in this House. I will not say long-winded speeches, but certainly perhaps longer speeches.

I would ask Your Honour to consider the matter and if windbag is in fact unparliamentary, perhaps its use could be discontinued in the Chamber. I know all hon. members would not want to use unparliamentary terms.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has raised a crucial point in the long history of parliamentary or unparliamentary language.

The hon. member advises the Chair, and I have no reason to disbelieve him, that when another hon. member was up some other hon. member, unidentified, referred to him as a windbag. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands has pointed out that "bag of wind" has been referred to as unparliamentary and that it ought to be equated with windbag.

"Bag of wind" has also been used as a synonym for the Scottish pipes. Of course I would have to say that if it was used in that context, given my own ancestry, it would be completely and utterly parliamentary.

However, I must incline to the view that under the circumstances in which it was apparently given today, I think it certainly does border on the unparliamentary. It might be that some discussion could take place in the appropriate lobby. If it can be found who uttered this affront, perhaps he or she could be persuaded to come in front of the House and eventually withdraw it.

There is no question in my mind that we are bound by precedent under certain circumstances. The hon. member for Kingston and the Islands whose sharp ears picked up this exchange has given considerable assistance to the Chair.

I hope that all hon. members would refrain from referring to other hon. members as either a bag of wind or a windbag, especially because we would not want confusion with Scottish pipes.

I thank all hon. members.

[Translation]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I merely want to take this opportunity to use the other official language and inform you that Beauchesne's, Fifth Edition, makes an important point, because many Canadians listening today probably don't understand what is meant by a "bag of wind" or a "windbag". I may refer them to Beauchesne's, citation 320, which says in the French edition that the following list is a more or less complete collection of various expressions that have been ruled unparliamentary in the House since over a century ago. Used in English, they do not always take the same form or have the same undesirable impact in their official translation.

Citation 320 goes on to say that we should remember that in this respect, the original, not the translation, creates the precedent.

In French, we are too polite to call anyone a windbag or a bag of wind. We would simply say "une outre pleine de vent".

Mr. Speaker: I want to thank the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier for his comments. His polite comments are always appreciated.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

BORROWING AUTHORITY ACT, 1990-91

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-65, an act to provide borrowing authority, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, when I looked at the motion before the House today, which runs under the title: "Resuming debate on the motion of the Minister of Finance for the third reading of Bill C-65, an act to provide borrowing authority", I thought it was rather innocuous and did not tell us too much until I checked on how much the government was wanting to borrow and I realized it was in the area of some $25.5 billion.

If I compare that $25.5 billion that the government wishes to borrow with the 1987 figures for those corporations whose untaxed profits almost doubled to $27 billion from $15 billion in 1984, I can well imagine what this government could do to reduce this country's deficit if it were to do something proper about income tax reform.

I will come back to those corporate figures in a second, but I want to deal first with what this government has done to the income tax system and the tax systems since it came to power in 1984.

In November 1984 when the Minister of Finance introduced his first economic statement to the House, Canadians discovered that due to increases in oil and gas prices it would cost the average Canadian family about an additional $100 per year.

If that were not enough, the increased UI premiums up to different levels cost the average Canadian family another $102 per year. Combining that with increased sales taxes by $150 per year, plus many user fees on parks and harbours for services, et cetera, the total in that 1984 economic statement caused Canadian families in one blow to pay an additional $352 per year in taxes.

Shortly thereafter, on May 23, 1985 when the Minister of Finance actually brought in a budget, through the elimination of federal tax reductions it cost Canadian families another $100 per year. Modification to indexing of various programs cost Canadians another $115. Cuts in family allowance payments cost families $22.50. Cigarette and alcohol tax increases cost another $75. The sales tax was broadened, which cost another $150. Increases in gasoline taxes cost another $50.

At the same time, Mr. Speaker, you will recall, the Minister of Finance proposed that pensions for senior citizens be deindexed. That of course was later reversed. However, in that budget it cost the average Canadian taxpayer another $512.50 per year.

On June 27, 1985 the minister came along and reversed his decision to deindex old age pensions, but to compensate he decided to impose a one cent per litre increase on gasoline to pay for the lack of revenue that he would miss through the now cancelled deindexing program. That one cent a litre cost Canadian taxpayers another $50 per year.

All of that reduced the ability of Canadians to pay for other items. These three initiatives alone amount to well over $1,000 a year, money which was removed from the disposable incomes of Canadians.

In his budget of February 26, 1986 the Minister of Finance introduced a 3 per cent surtax to the tune of another $170 a year on the salaries of average Canadian. There was another sales tax increase of $150 a year. Cigarette and alcohol taxes were increased accounting for another $20.

On February 18, 1987, the Minister of Finance introduced another budget. In this one there were gas tax increases amounting to another $50 a year for ordinary Canadians paying taxes. The sales tax base was broadened, which amounted to another $15 a year. Cigarette, and this time airline ticket taxes, caused an increase of $35 in taxes.

On June 18, 1987, under tax reform this time for a change the average Canadian was paying $310 a year less than after the previous budget.

However the Minister of Finance went on to correct that. On February 10, 1988, additional gas tax increases of one cent per litre were introduced, which cost Canadians another $50 a year in disposable income.

I could go on and on about what this government has done in the taxation sector for ordinary Canadians. This year I had more complaints from constituents about the amount of taxes they are paying today over what they paid in 1984. I would have said previously that this government is slowly nickeling and diming Canadians to death, but it is more than that. Average Canadian families are now paying a couple of thousand dollars more a year in taxation than they were in 1984.

If we compare that to what this government has done for the corporate sector, we find a situation contrary to what the Minister of Finance set out in a speech in February 1987. He said: "This government's fundamental strategy in reviewing the corporate income tax is to ensure that profitable corporations pay their fair share to preserve respect for the tax system. We must further reduce the source of the problem by cutting back special corporate tax write-offs. This is the direction that I set out in May 1985 and acted on last February".

Despite the finance minister's rhetoric, in every year the Conservatives have been in power more and more profits have gone untaxed. By 1987 those untaxed profits had almost doubled to $27 billion from $15 billion in 1984.

It has been suggested by Department of Finance officials and members of the government that it is mostly farmers and small businesses that do not pay tax. To say the least, that is a distortion of the facts and it does a disservice to both farmers and the small business sector. If we look at the most recent Statistics Canada data, it should be clear even to finance officials that the farming, fishing and forestry sectors together make up less than 1 per cent of all untaxed profits.

The Minister of Finance has called the data outdated since, as he said, that was the year before tax reform. Yet, some tax reform measures were implemented in the middle of 1987 and should therefore have been reflected even somewhat in the 1987 data.

Further, if one looks at more recent industrial corporation statistics, one finds that total deferred taxes for Canada's largest corporations are continuing to grow in 1988 and into 1989. By the end of 1989 cumulative deferred taxes for wealthy industrial corporations reached $38.5 billion. In fact deferred taxes grew by $6.1 billion between 1987 and 1989—and that was after tax reform—compared to $3.7 billion worth of growth between 1985 and 1987.

The government's tax reform has done little so far to slow down deferred taxes for the corporate sector, particularly for large corporations.

If you take a look at what this government considers to be fair tax reform, Mr. Speaker, you will discover that there are still some 480 Canadians with incomes over $100,000 a year who have not paid one cent in income tax. There are some 2,920 individuals with incomes over $50,000 a year who do not pay a red cent in income tax. So much for fairly sharing the tax burden.

Mr. Speaker, I know you will be interested in the following figures. In 1988 the corporate tax rate was reduced from 36 per cent to 28 per cent. More than 60,000 corporations paid no taxes at all. These corporations include Algoma Steel at profits of $80 million. It paid no taxes. Interestingly it made donations of some $8,750 to the Conservative Party of Canada.

Bramalea had profits of $33 million and paid no taxes. Its contribution to the Conservative Party was $12,625.08.

Brascade had profits of $64 million and paid no taxes. Its contribution to the Conservative Party was $24,319.

Confederation Life had profits of $62 million and paid no taxes on it. It contributed $11,186.52 to the Conservative Party.

Brascan Corporation's profits were $263 million. It paid no taxes. Its contribution to the Conservative Party was $50,362.92.

Edper Enterprises made $52 million in profits and no taxes paid. The amount of money it contributed to the Conservative Party is not available.

Fletcher Challenge Finance had a $24 million profit and paid no taxes. Yet it managed to pay $30,000 to the Conservative Party.

North Canadian Oils had $30 million in profit. It paid no income taxes either but managed to come up with $5,000 for the Conservative Party.

Ocelot Industries made $432 million in profits and paid not a red cent in income tax.

PWA's profit was $30 million, and it paid not a cent in income tax.

Standard Trustco made $30 million in profit and paid no income taxes.

Tridel, which is an interesting one, had $72 million in profits and paid not a cent in income tax. It managed to cough up $29,441.06 to the Conservative Party.

Xerox Canada had $74 million in profits. It paid not a red cent paid in income tax. Its little contribution to the Conservative Party was $11,558.

I will just go down the list because some of the other ones are really quite interesting.

Central Guaranty Trustco made $75 million in profits. They managed to come up with $2.86 million in a tax credit and paid no taxes.

• (1530)

Goodyear Canada made an $11 million profit. Then they got a hand-out from the government of $1.4 million and paid no taxes. Hemlo Gold Mines, $43 million profit. They got a hand-out of $2.73 million and did not pay a cent in income taxes.

Magna International is a dandy example, with $19 million profit, $8.2 million tax credits and not a cent in income tax.

MICC Investments, $72 million profit, $29.97 million in tax credits and not a cent in income tax.

Power Corporation, the big daddy, had a $214 million profit, $2.2 million in tax credits and no taxes paid. They managed to cough up $72,000 for the Conservative party.

Ranger Oil, $15 million profits, $4.07 million in tax credits and no taxes paid. They managed to come up with $36,000 for the Conservative Party.

That is hardly equitable tax reform. There is an increasing number of Canadians who are beginning to understand that when this government talks about deficit reduction it is playing the old shell game. It is asking Canadians to tighten their purse strings and tighten their belts while initiating programs to cut back on health care services and on programs for the disabled under the Canada Assistance Plan. It is cancelling programs for improving child care services. It is instituting clawbacks of family allowance benefits and old age pensions. The government is slashing funding for Via Rail and CBC, structures that hold this country together.

This government is playing the old shell game. It is telling Canadians that they have to cut back on their expectations from government in order to reduce the deficit, while at the same time it is handing out billions of dollars to the corporate sector in reduced taxes, deferred taxes and through all kinds of legal loopholes that it would close if it seriously wanted to do something about reducing the deficit and bringing in fair tax reform in this country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On debate, the hon. member for Etobicoke North.

Hon. Roy MacLaren (Etobicoke North): Mr. Speaker, the bill before us, Bill C-65, an act to provide borrowing authority of some $25.5 billion is, to a substantial degree, an admission of failure on the part of this government to manage the economy.

The government has sought in a variety of ways to reduce inflation, stimulate employment, promote growth in our economy, but in each of those self-proclaimed goals, it has failed to provide for any reduction in the levels of deficit spending or any reduction in interest rates.

Bill C-65 once again draws attention to this government's policy of borrowing to cover its deficits rather than reducing its own expenditures and the interest rates that it pays on its accumulated debt.

It is obvious to anyone who follows the question that more borrowing, the level of borrowing that we see before us today, will only add fuel to the real engine that is driving the increase in public deficits in our country, our current high interest rates.

Every percentage increase in interest rates adds a further $1.7 billion to the government's debt servicing costs. The recent policy of borrowing short term has only further exacerbated what is already a major problem, the huge cost of servicing our debt.

The government's projection in its last budget of a deficit of $28 billion, which is no major change from the deficit that it insisted it was going to reduce during its term of office, hinges on an interest rate forecast of an average of 11.1 per cent. Yet since January alone, interest rates in Canada have continued to rise from 12.4 per cent to 13.8 per cent, an increase of an astonishing 133 basis points. And there is no sign today that interest rates will decline. International rates, on the contrary, continue to rise, driven both by the spectre of inflation in Japan and in Europe and by the competition for capital in world money markets.

Moreover, the Canadian inflation rate remains at about 5.5 per cent, prompting the Bank of Canada to use that one blunt instrument available to it, interest rates, to attempt to achieve its self-proclaimed goal of zero inflation.

It is now predicted with some confidence that if current interest rates trend upward, debt service charges will absorb all the spending cuts from February's budget, leaving the government's deficit closer to $31 billion or $32 billion rather than the $28 billion it projected in its budget. Of course, an increase of that magnitude will necessitate further spending cuts, further taxation and further government borrowing simply to finance the growing public debt.

Interest rates are clearly driving the government's fiscal agenda. The government's fiscal agenda is not controlling interest rates in Canada, but rather is a victim of interest rates.

It is time we asked whether interest rates are serving the purpose for which they were intended. According to monetary theory, inflation is caused by too much money chasing too few goods. Thus, in its pursuit of zero inflation, the Bank of Canada has consistently raised interest rates in an effort to shrink the money supply and to induce an deflationary period in the Canadian economy.

Yet the fact is that the consumer spending is remarkably resilient to the Bank of Canada's harsh monetary medicine. Since interest rates began to escalate in 1988 after five years of relative stability, inflation has also risen from around 4 per cent to today's 5.5 per cent.

What fundamentally undermines the bank's efforts to curb inflation is the national debt. Every time the bank increases interest rates, the government has to spend more merely to service the debt and to raise taxes to finance its own spending. It seems clear that persistent increases in excise taxes are one of the major causes, if not the major cause, of our rising inflation in Canada. In short, monetary policy and fiscal policy have become inseparable. This government has placed itself in a vicious circle from which it seems unable to extricate itself.

I refer to a report by the C.D. Howe Institute which well summarizes the box in which the government has placed itself. The institute notes that as the national debt grows, a vicious circle develops. At present, the size and the short average term to maturity of the federal government's debt are magnifying the Bank of Canada's difficulty in controlling inflation since a 1 per cent rise in short-term interest rates over a year tends to increase federal expenditures by more than $1.7 billion, adding further to the pressure of demand. The bank's task of controlling inflation would be considerably easier if fiscal policy were more restrictive.

Not only do we need to ask if interest rates are working to curb inflation, we must also ask whether it is worthwhile to risk recession in pursuit of what is called zero inflation.

Surely the purpose of tackling inflation is to help ensure price stability. Surely price stability is the goal of any government, not zero inflation as such. Price stability can enhance the long-term health of the Canadian economy, but can the current government's reliance on monetary policy alone serve that end? Is it achieving price stability as it pursues its single-minded goal of zero inflation?

Inflation is largely limited to central Canada. Atlantic Canada and parts of western Canada have barely extricated themselves from the last recession. Those regions can hardly be considered overheated or inflationary. Yet interest rates fail to discriminate among these differing levels of growth across our country, differing levels of inflation across our country, with the result that beyond southern Ontario the regions are being driven farther into recession.

It is not merely in regions of Canada that the indiscriminate impact of high interest rates is felt. It is felt unevenly in the various sectors of the Canadian economy. The impact on the manufacturing sector, the impact on the resources sector can be especially severe, vulnerable as they are to borrowings and high levels of interest on those borrowings. On the other hand, the service sector may largely escape from the impact of higher interest rates, so that both a regional and a sectoral impact is felt as the government pursues its single-minded policy of high interest rates to achieve what it calls zero inflation.

Is a 5.5 per cent inflation rate really such a threat to price stability and economic growth? The Bank of Canada praises the goal of zero inflation, but in an increasingly interdependent world economy it is impossible to see how Canada can reach zero inflation when its trading partners, particularly the United States, have inflation rates well above that level.

Above all, we must realize what an anti-inflationary monetary policy entails. What is euphemistically described as slowing the economy or taking the steam out of the economy really translates into recession.

The goal here is twofold: The government sets out, first, through the Bank of Canada, to reduce demand by increasing the cost of money; and, second, to reduce wage demands by increasing unemployment, thereby restricting labour's bargaining power. Both these goals, by definition, entail recession and a decline in living standards for the average Canadian.

To achieve zero inflation, which is the stated goal of the Bank of Canada with the full support of the government, a government would have to forgo inflationary tax increases like the goods and services tax. Average wage increases would have to decline to the point where they would be roughly equal to the average increase in real output per member of the labour force. That would mean about a 2.8 per cent increase in 1988, 1.1 per cent increase in 1989, and probably less than that in 1990 as productivity declines due to recessionary pressures. Does anyone really believe that wage increases of such a low level will be achieved through interest rate policy? I doubt it very much.

A tight monetary policy alone is not achieving the goals for which it was intended. It does not appear to be limiting even the moderate inflation and is certainly not leading to zero inflation. The high interest rate policy of the government is undermining the very thing that it was intended to protect, the living standards of Canadians. It is not working because the government's fiscal policy is working at cross-purposes with its monetary policy.

High levels of government spending have both fuelled inflationary pressure in the economy and have incurred an unprecedented national debt. Countering those inflationary pressures with higher interest rates has forced the government to raise taxes which further fuels the economy by paying greater interest on its debt. This inflationary pressure in turn leads the Bank of Canada to raise interest rates. Here, again, we are in the vicious circle which is familiar to all those who have followed the economic policies of the government.

What has complicated this dilemma even further is the fact that the government increasingly has been forced to go off-shore for its capital, meaning that Canada is now tied more closely to rising international interest rates than it has been in a very long time. Canada's off-shore debt, both public and private, is now about $200 billion and growing. Each year Canada now looks to foreign lenders for almost $60 billion, unprecedented levels in Canadian experience and placing real restrictions on our ability to participate in the rapidly evolving international economy.

The policy of high interest rates in Canada has had a major adverse impact on our exports. High interest rates typically drive up the value of a currency. We have seen the value of the Canadian currency increase rapidly from the 70 cent level up to more than 85 cents today. The adverse impact on Canadian exports is substantial. It is not surprising that Canada has demonstrated a deteriorating trade position. Canada's merchandise trade surplus fell below $5 billion in 1989, half the level reported a year earlier, and about one-quarter of the peak Canada achieved in 1984.

The decline in currency toward 80 cents, which could follow from a lower interest rate policy, would help exports. Of course, they might continue to be hindered by any softness in the U.S. market given the degree to which we have tied ourselves to that particular market.

The fact remains that the government has placed Canada in a position where the government's financial requirements have continued to absorb a large share of our domestic savings pool, putting upward pressure on interest rates and forcing other, mainly private, borrowers offshore. Unprecedently large international capital flows have been needed to supplement the domestic savings shortfall, placing Canada in greater debt to foreign countries than we have seen for a very long time.

If the government is truly interested in price stability, if that is their goal—not zero inflation as such, but rather price stability and a strong Canadian economy—it must now turn to solutions other than monetary policy alone.

First, the cost of servicing Canada's national debt must be reduced, if the government is going to extricate itself from the vicious circle that I have described.

Second, if the government's goal is indeed price stability, it must investigate, as a matter of urgency, other means of dampening demand and curbing wage increases.

Third, the government should attempt to encourage domestic savings and investment as a means of reducing our reliance on foreign capital. The most obvious route here is to reduce its debt, thus reducing the government's demand for indigenous savings which then can be utilized by private borrowers.

Finally, the government must not lose sight of the fact that low or zero inflation is not a goal in itself, but only one step toward achieving economic stability and growth.

If, in pursuing an anti-inflationary policy, these goals are not furthered, then surely the policy itself is seriously flawed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On questions or comments, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Etobicoke North made an excellent speech. I know that his knowledge of financial matters is profound. He, of course, speaks with authority as our past critic on financial matters and is particularly knowledgeable, in my submission, as a former minister.

He is aware of the way government policy is formulated. Is he of the view that the government has responsibility for interest rates in the country? Can the government dictate policy to the Governor of the Bank of Canada in respect of interest rates, and should we really be regarding the Minister of Finance as the person responsible for the high interest rates that we are now suffering from in Canada?

Mr. MacLaren: Mr. Speaker, the answer to the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands is, clearly, yes. The government is responsible for interest rate policy, as well as monetary policy and fiscal policy, in the country.

The Governor of the Bank of Canada is, by his own definition, the agent of the government. The hon. member may recall that some decades ago a Governor of the Bank of Canada pursued policies which were contrary to those sought by the government of the day. In the aftermath of that disagreement between the governor and the government, the policy was clearly established that the government is responsible for monetary policy. The ultimate responsibility resides with the Minister of Finance. If there is disagreement between them, there is a procedure provided whereby the government informs the Governor of the Bank of Canada of its dissatisfaction with the policies he is pursuing and the Governor has the choice to conform with the policy outlines of the government or to resign.

In the case of today, we see a government that clearly is in full step with the Governor of the Bank of Canada. Let us not fool ourselves for one moment that the Governor of the Bank of Canada is acting in some independent fashion, pursuing his own monetary policies. Failure of the government to pursue a monetary policy which is integrated with a fiscal policy, which is essentially the problem we are facing today in Canada, is the fault of the government, not the Governor of the Bank of Canada. The Governor of the Bank of Canada is essentially the agent of the government.

The real problem that the government has demonstrated since it came to office in 1984 is a basic one, that it has not taken advantage of the prosperity which the country enjoyed since 1982. We have heard a lot from the other side of the House, from time time time we are still told, that the high interest rate policy today, the high deficit today, and the high debt today are all the result of some nefarious policies pursued by Liberal governments in the late 1970s and the early 1980s.

Those who advance that line of argument should recall that the impact of international oil price increases and of international interest rate increases at that time, not only drove the Canadian economy into a recession, but created recessionary circumstances across the western world. In accordance with standard economic policy, the government of the day used its spending to ensure that there would be employment to ensure a minimal standard of living for Canadians during a time of severe international recession.

The other half of that coin is that when prosperity returns, as it did partly as a result of the very policies pursued by the Liberal government of the day, then a government should withdraw some degree of its spending from the economy so that the economy does not become overheated. But this government has failed to do so, despite its repeated proclamations that was what it intended to do. Its financial plan of 1984 set forth a fiscal commitment to reduce its spending, to constrain its spending at a time when Canada was enjoying increasing prosperity. The government says that it still wants to pursue that policy, but it has left that policy so late in the business cycle that I, myself, fear that cutting government spending substantially, which it should have done consistently over the past six years, will now in fact contribute to the recessionary circumstances which are feared across our country.

The government has failed to do what it said it wanted to do. It has left Canadians in a situation of high interest rates, increasing inflation, and a fiscal policy that has not been used to create the circumstance of growth and employment which we all seek in this country.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Before I recognize the hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James, it is my duty, pursuant to Standing Order 38, to inform the House that the questions to be raised tonight at the time of adjournment are as follows: the hon. member for Halifax—Child Care; the hon. member for Haldimand—Norfolk—Trade; the hon. member for London—Middlesex—Science and Technology.

On debate, the Hon. Member for Winnipeg—St. James.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg—St. James): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to speak on this borrowing bill because it affords me the opportunity to express a number of concerns of my constituents of Winnipeg—St. James.

In Canada today, there is a crisis in confidence.

This crisis in confidence manifests itself on many fronts. There is more to it than just the apparent ever-present constitutional crisis which reflects poor leadership on the part of the Prime Minister. The ease that I feel in this country and that is expressed to me goes well beyond Meech Lake.

There is a crisis in confidence in the handling of the economy. Clearly, Canada's economy is in a state of deterioration. The indicators are pointing the wrong way. The country is adrift, and people are asking over and over again: "Who is in charge in Ottawa?" What is going on in the nation's capital? Does the government know what it is doing? Where is the leadership?" Those are some of the feelings the people of Canada are expressing.

The finance minister says: "Everything is okay. Believe me, trust me. Everything is going to be all right." The trouble is that nobody believes him any more. The man's credibility is completely shot. He has been singing this tune ever since he became the finance minister in the fall of 1984. Nobody believes him any more. In 1984, six years ago, the minister announced a five-year deficit reduction plan which has been an unqualified failure despite a spell of record economic growth.

At home and among our major trading partners, our deficit has come down a paltry, insignificant $4 billion. Most of this reduction is the result of tax increases and not expenditure reduction. The minister's big talk is just that, big talk. In a period of unprecedented growth when our economic house should be in order, what has he done about the debt? He has doubled it. What has he done about taxes? He has raised them about 31 times.

That does not even include the goods and services tax which is yet to come.

That monster will be foisted upon us if everything goes according to Hoyle or at least the way the government wants it on January 1. There is little wonder that there is a crisis in confidence.

My hon. colleague from Etobicoke who spoke before me talked about the insane, high interest rate policy of this government. It is reasonable to ask these questions. Has the government gone mad? Has John Crow gone mad? Has the Minister of Finance gone mad? Have the officials in his department gone mad? Have all the people who are responsible for the government gone mad?

The editorial writers of The Globe and Mail support this kind of madness. We have come to know The Globe and Mail as a Tory apologist, have we not?

The interest rates in Canada today are more than five points higher than those in the United States. Think about it. It is unprecedented. Never before has it happened. The American inflation rate is virtually the same as that of Canada. We have an interest rate five points higher than the Americans. What does it do? It is quite apparent what the disparity between interests here and across the border do. It makes life very difficult for the Canadian companies to compete in the American market and to sell products across the line. That high interest rate policy kills jobs. It makes houses much more expensive. It makes cars more expensive. Everything that Canadians buy with the help of loans becomes much more expensive.

Earlier I spoke of indicators showing that the economy is going the wrong way. I can tell you there is a slump—and this is one of the indicators—in housing in this country. There is a slump in the retail industry. The economy is slumping. The economy is sinking. For the first time since 1982 the economy has declined for two consecutive months, all of it a very disturbing picture. Canadians are saying: "Enough is enough. We have had enough of this nonsense". They are loudly and clearly telling the Minister of Finance that it is time that he abandoned his insane high interest rate policy, his over-reliance on monetary policy. But is the Minister of Finance listening? Does he ever listen, Mr. Speaker? Sadly I must say that the answer to that question is no. This government never seems to listen to Canadians.

Canadians do not like the GST. Does the government listen? Canadians do not like the free trade agreement. Does it listen? Canadians do not like cuts to VIA Rail. Does it listen? Canadians do not like the clawback. Does the government listen? Canadians do not like transferring federal debt to the provinces. Does it listen? Canadians do not like cuts to native programs, to women's programs. Does it listen? They do not like the government's abandonment of the unemployment insurance scheme. Does it listen? Not on your life.

Little wonder that there is a crisis in confidence in Canada. Canadians feel, and it is a growing feeling, that this government is totally out of control and totally out of touch with reality. This government does not have the moral authority to govern. It is down at 15 per cent in the polls which is unprecedented. The government exists only because it gained more seats in the 1988 election, an election that was largely bought, purchased, by big corporate money.

I said that the government is out of control and out of touch with reality. Let me explain further. It says it is concerned about the deficit. Man, alive; that is all we have heard since the election of 1988. But I ask, what is contributing more than anything else to the deficit? It is the government's own high interest rate policy. The high interest rates make it much more costly for the government to do business. The government this year will pay, and I emphasize this figure, $41 billion in interest charges on the public debt. That is more than what the government pays in federal salaries. Little wonder there is a crisis in confidence.

But there are other things too that shake our confidence. Take for example the revelation the other day about increases in pay and salaries for executives of CN Rail. Those top five executives got an average boost in pay of 18.7 per cent. The CN president got an increase of 10.9 per cent, boosting his salary to $416,000 a year. The CN group vice-president did much better on a percentage basis; he got a boost of almost 40 per cent. He now earns a paltry $295,000. Nice work if you can get it. And guess what? They got those increases for what? Can you guess? Performance.

CN profits dropped last year 27 per cent. Can you imagine the kind of increases they would have received if their profits had gone up? I do not know. But my imagination is stirred. What did the workers get, Mr. Speaker? Four and a half per cent. These guys at the top who are so concerned about inflation did not content themselves with 4.5 per cent. Not on your life.

Yes, there is a crisis in confidence in this country. Let us not forget while we are on this theme that these people who are so concerned about inflation, about Canadians not overspending and tightening our belts. What about the Governor of the Bank of Canada, the biggest creature of them all? What did he get in the last one or two years? Did he get a 5 per cent, or 10 per cent or 15 per cent increase? Not on your life. According to information, it was more like 20 or 25 per cent. It is very sad and it hurts. I think that Canadians deserve a lot better.

Let me touch on some other things. This is something that is not addressed in this House very often. It is the Canadian pension plan. We all contribute to it and it dates back more than 20 years. It is a great idea that all Canadians contribute into a general pot, as it were, providing a nest egg for all of us at our retirement. It sounds good in theory and it is good in theory. It is also very good in practice if it is run and operated properly.

What kind of a situation are we in with respect to the Canada Pension Plan? I will tell you the kind of situation we are in. According to documents, four years back in 1986, Canada's chief actuary said that the CPP fund was underfunded by $230 billion. That is a lot of money. What is it today? We do not know, Mr. Speaker, but we can tell you that when it comes to the Canada Pension Plan things are getting worse, not better. The reason is we are not paying the full cost of CPP. According to the actuarial tables, Canadians should be paying about 8 per cent of their salaries or their income into the Canadian pension plan. The fact of the matter is, they are paying 4.2 per cent. Plainly the plan is underfunded and we are heading for serious trouble.

In fact, I was listening to the president of the Canadian Chartered Accountants Association on CBC Radio not too long ago. He should know what he is talking about, particularly when it comes to CPP. What did he say? I do not know how old he is or exactly when he is going to retire, but he said he was not counting on the Canadian pension plan. In other words, he believes, as a lot of Canadians believe, that the Canadian pension plan is heading for bankruptcy and that the crunch will come probably around the turn of the century.

We have to ask ourselves, when it comes to CPP, if we should count on a retirement income that we have not paid for. It is more than just a fiscal or a pension question, it is really a moral question. If we have not paid or properly supported that fund should we expect the kind of moneys that are outlined when our retirement comes? I do not think so. Also, I do not think it is fair to future generations. What will happen is that somewhere down the line there will be a hard choice. Either taxes or premiums will have to be raised sharply if we want to continue the plan, or we could let the plan go asunder. I do not think many Canadians would want that.

I know in a discussion of this kind the parameters are very wide. I have learned that little bit of knowledge since coming to the House.

Let me touch on something else. You may not think it has anything to do with the borrowing bill, and you could make that argument, but I go forward anyway. It has to do with the David Milgaard case. This man has been in the penitentiary for 21 years. It is a long time. He is perhaps Canada's longest serving inmate. He claims, as a lot of criminals claim, that he is in the penitentiary for a crime he never committed. There is more than just his word. There is his action and some evidence as well.

His action is that he refuses to admit to the crime because he says he did not murder the girl in Saskatoon in 1969. He has paid a high price for that. The price is that he is denied parole. One of the basic tenets of parole in this country is that before you get parole you must admit to your crime. David Milgaard refuses to do that. He has never been paroled in 21 years. I think he has had a few day passes, but that is all.

There is more to it than that. A couple of years ago a leading forensic expert on the west coast, Dr. Ferris, said after studying the case that with the availability of new forensic technology and knowledge, it was impossible for David Milgaard to have committed the murder. That is pretty significant evidence.

Just a few weeks ago we learned that at the behest of the Department of Justice, the RCMP are investigating and have interviewed a suspect in the case. Canadians wonder just what is going on with our justice system and our judicial system.

One of the reasons I am concerned is that despite an application by the counsel for Mr. Milgaard before the Department of Justice to reopen the case, an application that went to the Justice department 15 or 16 months ago, the file on this case has not yet reached the minister's desk.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I believe the hon. member's time has expired.

I would like to say to the hon. member that he has gone a little further astray as far as the borrowing bill is concerned. There is another place for him to bring that up. That is either at committee or other places he may find here, particularly when the Minister of Justice is in the House, and he could perhaps get some information.

I will give him another minute to wind up and then go to the next speaker.

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, I mention this only because I think it fits in with what I said at the beginning of my remarks and that is that there is a crisis in confidence in this country. It applies not just to the economy, but it has to do with the GST.

The government says the GST is good for Canada and good for the economy. It will be good for us. We will be happy to pay it. If it is so good for us and so good for the economy, why is the government spending—and this is what it has set aside—$14 million to advertise the GST? Some advertising kitty.

Canadians deserve better, Canadians want something better, they want a government that is in charge, they want action from this government on so many fronts that scream out for attention, and they want some leadership.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member has gone over his time, but I will allow a short question or a comment from the hon. member for Dartmouth.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the fine remarks from my colleague. Could he further elaborate on how this government's misguided economic policies, since we are now on the borrowing authority bill, have led to a further feeling of alienation in western Canada, particularly in the farming sector which feels that this government's economic policies have clearly abandoned the responsibility that a federal government should have for a primary resource industry such as agriculture, and to find out whether or not this government's economic policies have led to a widening gap between western Canada and the rest of the nation?

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, first of all, I congratulate my colleague on his perspicacity. His astute question fits a concern of mine that has been raised in this House for a number of weeks.

In western Canada agriculture is still king. As agriculture goes, so goes the west. We know that forests are important, oil is important, potash is important and tourism is important, but agriculture is still, in my opinion, king. Let me just mention a couple of things. Agriculture is going through a revolution, through uncertain and difficult times. Some people believe it is on the precipice and that things are beginning to fall apart.

If there was ever a time when agriculture in western Canada needed the most extreme attention from Ottawa, it is now, not yesterday or the day before, but now.

One of the things we get from this government in Ottawa, besides a lot of talk and so-called public relations, is a cut-back in all kinds of support programs. I have mentioned these support programs before and will not enumerate them now.

The cuts in support programs amount to something like $400 million. Agriculture Canada has pointed out that the expected reduction in farm income this year will be as a result of cut-backs in farm support programs. In fact, if my memory serves me correctly, the cut-backs in support will account for 57 per cent of the reduction in farm income this year. That is one point I wanted to make.

The other point has to do with immediate farm aid. Farmers are sowing the grain in the ground. The government came up with this wonderful farm aid program. What the Minister of Agriculture has said is that the federal government is prepared to come up with $500 million if the provinces, in return, will match those federal dollars, dollar for dollar. In other words, if the federal government will come up with $500 million, provinces should come up with $500 million for a total package of $1 billion.

That sounds all right, does it not? Except the provinces are strapped; they are absolutely strapped. They cannot accede to this; they have not got the cash. The strange part is that the federal government has the money. Yet, for some unknown reason, whether it is intransigence or stubbornness, the government will not release the money. The government has been beseeched, begged and implored to release the money without strings attached. It will not do it.

The Minister of Agriculture has said over and over again: "It is time for the provinces to stop playing politics and to get serious". It is time for the federal government to get serious about this matter because farmers are in a desperate situation. They need the money now. If you cannot get the seed in the ground, you can hardly harvest in August and September.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, I agree entirely with what my hon. friend said about the farmers. We used to say that to the Liberals many years ago.

However, after listening and watching him I did take exception when he said something about the Canada Pension Plan going bankrupt. That is the line the insurance companies peddled since 1966 and every year since.

Every year they increase contributions by all Canadians to the Canada Pension Plan which keeps it actuarially sound. It provides a pool of capital for the provinces and the federal government to borrow from on which they pay interest. In fact it is the interest the provinces pay that keeps the damn thing actuarially sound.

Could the hon. gentleman provide us with any kind of statistical and actuarial evidence? In my opinion, the Canada Pension Plan is one of the best deals an employee can get. Can he provide any evidence about the doomsday scenario we have had since 1966 when it first came in? I have made my full contribution every year, and so has my employer—and there were several of them. The predictions in 1960 were that by the year 1990, and now it has somehow or other changed to the year 2000, it would be bankrupt. Where the hell does he get this? Why does he keep undermining and peddling the line of the insurance industry which would like to have that business?

Ms. Mitchell: Right on.

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, I will try to keep my remarks short because I know we are running out of time.

First of all I would like to say to my good friend from the Regina area that I am not attacking the Canada Pension Plan in principle. I am a supporter of the Canada Pension Plan. It is not only New Democrats and socialists with their high moral values who support something like a pension plan. I happen to support it as well, strongly, and I can tell you that I do not want to see the Canada Pension Plan die. I do not want to see the Canada Pension Plan go bankrupt.

But, by golly, I am not going to bury my head in the sand like my good friend from Regina who just wants to sit there and believe that it is a good idea and that it will somehow swim on its own. It really does not matter what you contribute to it or what kind of enhancement benefits there are. It does not matter how many workers there are, or how many retirees there are. It is just simply a good idea, and if it is a good idea it will work. Typical NDP thinking.

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, I rise today in the House of Commons to debate Bill C-65, but more important I will take this opportunity to bring Canadians up to date and, more specifically, the 200,000 people who reside in the riding of York North up to date with the government's economic record.

I will illustrate how it has managed, or should I say mismanaged, the finances of this nation. Everywhere I go in the federal riding of York North I meet people—at barber shops, local grocery stores, supermarkets, community centres, and senior citizen homes. During my school speaking tour I spoke to close to 7,000 students in elementary and high schools.

People of all ages are very disappointed in the performance of this government, and rightly so. Under the leadership of the Conservative government the public debt has doubled in five years from $170 billion to $351 billion. The government failed to reduce the public debt at a time when national and international economic growth was at its peak. In five years this government has accumulated as much debt as have all the other governments from Confederation until 1984.

That requires unbelievable skill. A public debt of $351 billion is equivalent to a persona! debt of $25,000 for each Canadian taxpayer. When the Conservatives took over in 1984 the debt was $18,000 per individual. The doubling of the public debt under this government means that each Canadian taxpayer must now pay over $2,500 in taxes each year just to pay the interest on the federal government debt.

The people from my federal riding of York North, whether they live in Aurora, Richmond Hill, Thornhill, Woodbridge, King City, Maple, Kleinburg, or Nobelton, tell me that they have lost total confidence in this government, especially in the way it has handled its financial affairs.

On May 23, 1985, during his budget speech the Minister of Finance stated: "Our actions will directly reduce the annual deficit at the end of the decade to $20 billion." Well the decade has ended, we are into another one, and the deficit has not been reduced. The deficit has risen from $28.1 billion in 1987–88, to $28.7 billion in 1988–89 and to $30.5 billion in 1989–90. That to me is not an impressive record. That is unacceptable, and that is what the people of York North are telling me everywhere I go.

What make matters worse is that this government has raised taxes on Canadians over 30 separate times since 1984, and still the deficit is not under control. On March 6, 1984 the present Minister of Finance stated: "We would cut spending. We would not raise taxes. Tax levels in Canada are already too high".

For the record, federal tax revenues have increased by $50 billion since the Conservatives came to power in 1984. In 1984–85 the federal government collected $71 billion in taxes. In 1990–91 it will collect $121 billion. Canadians have had more than their share of tax increases to help reduce the deficit, but this government has failed drastically to bring down the deficit.

To the residents of the federal riding of York North and to all Canadians the words "Conservative government" are synonymous with taxes, taxes and more taxes. They are getting tired of paying while they watch a completely incompetent team of economic managers work very hard at producing economic failure for this nation.

Not only is this government taxing Canadians in an unprecedented fashion, but it has coupled that with a high interest rate policy. This high interest rate policy is choking off consumer spending. It is raising mortgage rates and denying young people the right to home ownership. It is stifling investment in this nation, making Canadian exports more expensive in foreign markets and making it more difficult for small Canadian businesses to compete. High interest rates will lead to more business bankruptcies, more families losing their homes, more plant closings, higher unemployment and fewer jobs for Canadians.

The economic policy of this government also includes the goods and services tax. After having studied the proposal by the government, which started at 9 per cent and went to 7 per cent, Liberal members concluded that the goods and services tax should be scrapped. We felt that the implementation of the goods and services tax would cause serious economic damage to Canada. The GST is certainly not revenue neutral. It would be a nightmare for small business and would introduce unprecedented complexities into the tax system.

We also realized that the GST proposal is regressive and would hurt low income families and persons living on fixed incomes including, obviously, seniors and welfare recipients. We also learned that the GST would not be visible and that the government has failed to consider the long-term economic and social impact of the goods and services tax. We also believe that the goods and services tax would put further pressure on the budgets of provincial governments forcing them to either raise taxes, cut services, or run larger deficits. We came to the conclusion that the goods and services tax proposal would damage several key sectors of the Canadian economy and society.

Obviously we had to also look at at least the parameters of what tax reform we would be introducing. We believe that it should be based on some fundamental principles, the first being fairness. The tax system should be based on the ability to pay. It should be based on simplicity. Tax reform should make the tax system easier for Canadians to understand and thus ensure compliance. We also believe that it should be integrated. Over-all tax reform must encompass all forms of taxation and the needs and practices of other levels of government.

We as a party believe that the issue of visibility is also important, that tax reform should be designed to help Canadians understand exactly how much tax they are paying and to which level of government they are paying it.

Also as Liberals, being the progressive people that we are, we believe that tax reform should be revenue neutral. Tax reform should be undertaken for the goal of improving the tax system, not of raising raise taxes.

When the people who reside in the federal riding of North York received my special GST report they responded quite favourably. They also participated in signing petitions which were eventually forwarded to the House. They felt betrayed by the Conservative government, a government that made many election promises but is certainly not following through with action. The many signatures on petitions from residents of York North were a manifestation of frustrations that they felt about this government.

They began to realize that as the Conservative agenda unfolds they are more and more left out of the system. They began looking, for example, at the erosion of the social safety net of our country. They looked at the clawback of seniors' old age pension and family allowances. They looked at the withdrawal of government from unemployment insurance. They looked at the cuts in Established Programs Financing that are putting great financial strain on our provinces.

Essentially what I am very concerned about in this particular issue is that it touches the very essence of what government should be doing. Government should be taking care of the people. Nothing is more important than the issues of health care and education. Anything that we do to hurt post-secondary education will block the major artery to Canada's future.

In many of the meetings I have when I return to my riding to listen to the concerns of the constituents of York North on Fridays or Saturdays, they tell me that they are also concerned about what this government is doing in relation to dismantling the national infrastructures of this nation. We have heard a lot about VIA Rail in this House. The residents are very much concerned about not only the symbolism, but the importance in economic terms of linking east and west together.

Although the closure of military bases might not affect the people of North York personally, it does affect the very essence of being Canadian. They are concerned about the refusal of this government to aid municipalities on the issue of infrastructure decay. They are concerned about the CBC and post office cuts. I could go on and on.

Also the people of York North are telling me—and I am sure that in the next election they will tell this government—that they are concerned about the creation of two Canadas: the increasing gap between the rich and the poor. I speak not only about individuals but also about the regions of this nation.

Poverty is increasing in Canada, especially among women and children. To make matters worse, the tax system of this nation affects low income wage earners.

We are also beginning to realize, as we see the Conservative government agenda unfold, that this government has a very narrow, almost tunnel vision of what the future of the nation should be. Nothing symbolizes that more than the cuts to areas such as research and development, EPF and VIA Rail. These examples that are given to us by the government tell me that indeed this nation is going through some serious problems.

Today's debate is not merely a debate about borrowing, it is a debate about the future direction of the nation. Do we accept the concept that we live solely in a market-driven economy where profits come first and people last, or should we be looking at other ways to make sure that within the economic agenda the government includes a humane and compassionate dimension to its policies?

I believe I reflect the feelings of the people whom I represent in the riding of York North when I say that unless this government is interested in self-destruction it should seriously re-examine the direction that it is taking and bring about the type of progressive changes that this nation deeply desires.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I certainly commend my colleague from North York for his concluding remarks that the government must re-examine its policies to provide for the future of our country. I cannot help but reiterate that quite strongly for we know that today's decisions will shape our future.

Bill C-65 would give the government the authority to borrow up to $25.5 billion during the 1990-91 fiscal year to cover its budgetary deficit. Certainly this is a political confession of failure of its fiscal and monetary policies.

I would like to draw to your attention, Mr. Speaker, that since the 1988 election the Minister of Finance has relentlessly pursued a brutal and discriminatory high interest rate policy which has resulted in a decrease in housing sales and a decrease in the affordability of homes. It kills businesses and leads to lay-offs and to a decrease in consumer spending. More important, the high interest rate policy will increase the deficit even more. Under the guise of cutting the deficit this government has shown insensitivity to programs for Canadians.

Can we trust the finance minister when he asks us to support his bill on borrowing authority? Of course, we cannot trust this government and the answer has to be a resounding no.

Western Canada's First Ministers have warned the finance minister and the Governor of the Bank of Canada of the ridiculousness with which they try to pursue the high interest rate policy, the real villain today. The Governor of the Bank of Canada remains committed to his policy. We must challenge government to change that policy. It must assume responsibility. The constituents of Winnipeg North demand just that.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): In my opinion the yeas have it.

And more than five members having risen:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Call in the members.

The House divided on the motion which was agreed to on the following division:

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BUSINESS—BILLS

[English]

CANADIAN INSTITUTE OF CHARTERED ACCOUNTANTS

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mr. Murray W. Dorin (Edmonton Northwest) moved that Bill S-10, an act respecting the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Private Members' Business

He said: Mr. Speaker, today I am pleased to have the opportunity to introduce this bill into the House. This bill has come from the Senate and involves an amendment to the act with regard to the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants.

There are three chartered accountants in the House of Commons. They are myself, the Minister of Transport and the member for Nanaimo—Cowichan. I must say at the outset that I was quite surprised to find that someone could be both a chartered accountant and a member of the New Democratic Party. I thought that there must be something in that which would violate the Charter. However, perhaps given this opportunity we could consider making an amendment to do something about that, if the hon. member is in agreement.

This bill, first introduced in the Senate, modernizes the statement of objects and powers exercised by the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, a professional body of which I am proud to be a member.

[Translation]

The Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants was established almost 90 years ago by representatives of existing local and provincial associations of chartered accountants. The purpose of its founders was to establish a national organization that would promote the status of the profession in Canada.

[English]

Its incorporating statute, the Dominion Institute of Chartered Accountants Act, 1902, codified the powers and objects of the institute. That statute governs its affairs to this day. The only significant amendment to the act took place in 1951 when the institute adopted its current name, the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants. Despite the change in name, however, the institute's powers and objects remained the same as those first adopted in 1902. The objects and powers set forth in the 1902 act have served the profession well for nearly a century but the time has come to recognize the reality of the institute's current role.

Since the passage of the 1902 Act the profession has grown from less than 50 to nearly 48,500 members. Yet, while the sheer growth of the profession has been impressive, numbers alone do not convey how vital the role of CAs has become in every area of Canadian business and commercial activity. The knowledge and expertise which a chartered accountant brings to a commercial transaction have become indispensable tools in our modern business world.

The CICA has worked since 1946 at codifying best accounting practice. The result of this long and vigorous commitment has been that the CICA handbook is today regarded as the central reference source of accounting and auditing standards for chartered accountants. As well, governments and financial authorities have recognized the handbook as the primary source of generally accepted accounting principles, for example, by referring to the handbook in statutes such as its incorporation by reference in the Canada Business Corporations Act Regulations.

[Translation]

Canada, a country whose trade activities are complex and which enjoys the benefits of a market economy, plays a major role in promoting harmonisation and co-ordination, at the international level, of accounting and auditing standards. The international business community appreciates the unique achievements of CICA in developing and improving Canadian accounting standards and the presentation of financial and audit information.

[English]

Accounting and auditing standards are not static. In this world of rapid change the CICA must monitor, shape and codify the constantly evolving set of generally accepted accounting principles and generally accepted auditing standards. In order to accomplish that goal the CICA relies on a number of committees composed completely of volunteers. The committee's task is to oversee the rigorous due process and extensive public consultations which are essential to the standard setting process. In fact, when those who act as advisors and sounding boards for these communities are included, there are over 600 volunteers who contribute well over 5,000 person days annually to this process.

The CICA's Accounting Standards Committee develops the accounting standards eventually published in the handbook. While most of the volunteers on the committee are chartered accountants, it also includes representatives of the Financial Executives Institute of Canada, the Society of Management Accountants of Canada and the Canadian Council of Financial Analysts.

The Auditing Standards Committee develops and publishes in the handbook recommended standards and practical guidance on auditing matters in the best interests of the CA profession and the public as a whole.

In 1981, the CICA established the Public Sector Accounting and Auditing Committee to recommend standards to improve and harmonize financial reporting, accounting and auditing in the public sector in the best interest of the public, including users, preparers and auditors of financial information. The committee consists of senior public sector officials from the federal, provincial and municipal levels of government as well as public accountants and academics. The Auditor General, in his last report, praised the committee's work and encouraged the government to act upon its recommendations.

Both the business world and the profession are evolving rapidly and becoming much more sophisticated. The resulting complexities have created a need to examine new and potentially controversial accounting practices to meet the public's expectations of standard practice. The CICA is meeting this challenge. It has established an Emerging Issues Committee to review emerging and potentially controversial accounting issues and to reach a consensus on appropriate accounting treatments. It has also published a major independent review, conducted by the Macdonald commission, of the public's expectations of audits which recommended ways to narrow the gap between current practice and those expectations.

The bill cannot, however, be said to give to the CICA the exclusive right to set accounting and auditing standards in Canada. As all members are aware, a private bill, such as this one, cannot affect the rights of any person other than the members of the organization which is the subject of the bill. The Interpretation Act is quite clear on this point.

In many ways the bill which is being introduced today simply recognizes the scope and importance of current CA activities and explicitly provides the profession with the powers and objects which reflect that reality. It also sets out in broad terms the mandate which the institute enjoys with respect to such matters as member services, strategic planning, the development of post qualification education and the promotion of the international harmonization and co-ordination of accounting and auditing standards.

This bill is the result of lengthy consultation, co-operation and careful review. The bill has been approved by the Canadian Institute's board of governors on which sit representatives of all provincial institutes. It incorporates the CICA's mission statement and its statement of objectives and powers, and reflects fully the agreed division of responsibilities between the provincial institutes of chartered accountants and the CICA. The process of reform which brings this bill before the House was endorsed by the CICA's annual general meeting held in St. John's, Newfoundland, in August 1988.

This bill establishes a clear and modern set of powers and objectives which will help to lead the chartered accountancy profession into the next century. By recognizing the scope and importance of the activities carried on by the institute, and by CA's generally, we believe the proposed amendments are worthy of the support of this House.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in the debate on second reading of Bill S-10, an Act respecting the Canadian Institute of Chartered Accountants, a bill that is to be referred to a legislative committee.

First of all, I speak also as an accountant by profession, although not a member of CICA but of the Certified General Accountants Association of Canada, one of three professional accountants' organizations incorporated under an Act of Parliament. The hon. member tended to sing the praises of his association. As a CGA, Mr. Speaker, I shall, if I may, without taking to much of your time, say there are three accounting organizations in Canada whose members are either certified general accountants, certified management accountants or chartered accountants. These three groups have the same status with respect to the international standardization process. I may add that there are about 40,000 CGAs, including both members and students, in this country. Mr. Speaker, I must say I agree with the hon. member that we should pass the bill on second reading and then consider the legislation in a legislative committee, to give representatives of the other associations, the CGAs and the CMAs, a chance to make some major submissions.

Mr. Speaker, the CAs are trying to update their statutes and regulations. However, when we read those sections, it becomes clear—this is nothing new, and I am thinking of the situation in the province of Quebec—that the CICA is trying to have a monopoly on the profession in Canada.

This is quite obvious, Mr. Speaker, when we read in section 2.:

> (1) The purpose of the Institute is to promote by all lawful means the practice of accountancy within Canada.
> (2) In carrying out its purpose, the Institute has all the powers necessary—

This is followed, Mr. Speaker, by a list of the powers it needs to carry out its purpose. In most cases—I am not going to read the whole thing because it would take too long—the section refers to the membership and how they should conduct themselves. I will give an example:

> (b) to assist and encourage provincial, territorial and affiliated institutes in promoting and developing appropriate and uniform standards of qualification for admission to membership therein

Paragraph (c) reads and I quote:

> (c) to create and improve standards of financial accounting, reporting and auditing;

It does not refer to the membership. So when we are talking about the profession, the CICA speaks for the whole country, and when we are talking about internal standards, the CICA refers to its membership. I think it is clear from this bill that the CICA is trying to get a monopoly on the accounting and auditing profession in Canada.

I am sure that the other two organizations, the CGAS and the CMAs, will be anxious to appear before the legislative committee to make their representations. We really must correct those— It seems the president of the CICA said he was not seeking a monopoly position for the Institute. If he is not, this should be made clear in the Act, because the present legislation, Mr. Speaker—

[English]

There is a monopoly perception. It is very clear in the legislation where it says:

Section 2 of the said Act is repealed and the following substituted therefor:

2. (1) The purpose of the Institute is to promote by all lawful means the practice of accountancy within Canada.

This is for its members within Canada. What about the CGA? What about the CMA? There are three accounting organizations in Canada recognized by this Parliament. Therefore, with the pretext of improving or updating its constitution, the Canadian Charter Accountants Institute should not acquire a monopoly in the accounting and auditing profession.

With that, I agree that we should pass this bill at second reading and go to the legislative committee so that we can invite the audit organization to present its briefs in order that we can correct this piece of legislation.

Mr. David D. Stupich (Nanaimo—Cowichan): Mr. Speaker, we cannot really invite associations that are controlled by other legislation to make changes to this bill. They might want to bring in changes for their own at some later date, but that is up to them.

I will comment only briefly on the remarks of the member for Edmonton Northwest. Not only am I a CA of some long standing, I am also an FCA. He, at least, will know what that means.

We are pleased to support this bill at second reading and pleased to support it going to committee where any interested party will have an opportunity to make representations.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The time provided for the consideration of Private Members' Business has now expired. Pursuant to Standing Order 96(1), the order is dropped from the Order Paper.

SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I rise on this occasion to comment further on my question to the Minister for Science with regard to the scholarship program.

I am quite alarmed, as I am sure are many Canadians, that although they applaud the initiative of the government with its scholarship program which involves 900 scholarships for scientists and engineers badly needed in Canada, the facts are worrisome.

The fact is that the number of engineers and trained scientists in this country does not seem to be going up from the 20 per cent that it has been. Scientific illiteracy is rampant in this country. Two-thirds of our adult population cannot correctly identify the source of acid rain. More than half believe that the earliest humans may have lived side by side with the dinosaurs. At stake is the very future of Canada in the global economy.

A recent University of Calgary study suggests that only 14 per cent of adult Canadians have a clear understanding of DNA, and only 37 per cent understand the nature and cause of acid rain.

Two-thirds of Canadians cannot even name a single Canadian scientist. Clearly we have got a problem. If we are going to take advantage of this scholarship program and produce more trained scientists and engineers, then government action is necessary.

I was pleased with the initiative of the Department of Science and Technology, which two years ago developed a federal program to launch public awareness to nurture what is badly needed in this country—a science culture. Some $10 million was aimed at 14 to 15 year olds in order to do this. We now see signs on buses which urge young Canadians to partake of a science education and to become scientifically literate, looking to these areas for a future job in Canada.

Clearly what some of the experts have been telling us is that teacher education in science and mathematics is lacking. Professor Paul Park, Dean of Education at Queen's University, believes that students would be more science oriented if their elementary teachers were more comfortable themselves with science.

Alberta is already addressing this issue through a teacher's research experience program. Other universities have identified it as one of the main weaknesses.

Dr. William Fyfe, Dean of the Faculty of Science at the University of Western Ontario, says that Canada faces an acute shortage of scientists in the near future. He states further:

> The gap between the informed and those not is increasing. Scientific illiteracy is increasing. The root cause is the training of teachers and I think the universities have failed. We're trying to improve this with a new program for science teachers, and a very practical field program for kids of all ages, using the environment to teach basic science. We've made a start, but it needs lots of work.

Clearly we must work with teachers. We have to put in some energy. We have to call not just on the government and the ministers such as the minister responsible for science and technology, but the private sector to help.

During summer months science teachers of all levels are encouraged to take part in projects at the Alberta Research Council, for example. Those who oversee the programs say there is an amazing level of enthusiasm the teachers take back to the classroom. This is proving to be a very effective way of making science and technology a more attractive career choice for children.

I might add that a former colleague of ours, Mr. Elzinga, who is now the Minister of Trade for the province of Alberta, has joined in this debate fully. He wants his ministry and Alberta to respond to young Albertans and children to say that they have a future.

The University of Calgary has reaffirmed that women tend to score lower in science literacy and interest than men. The result, most agree, has to do with early conditioning.

But what is happening? I am happy to say that the B.C. government had funded a science camp for girls.

Recently, in London, Ontario, I noticed an advertisement stating that some trained female scientists are opening a camp for young Canadians. I think these are good steps.

[Translation]

The college dropout level is 30 per cent. This means 100,000 young people who are trying to enter the labour market without a college degree.

Canada ranks tenth among eighteen industrialized countries when we compare levels of college enrolment of seventeen-year-olds.

• (1750)

[English]

We have to stop this drop-out rate. We have to increase the opportunities for young people.

The minister has clearly shown some direction and his ministry is on side, but more effort is going to be required from all of us.

Canada needs trained scientists and mathematicians so that we can move ahead in research and development from being one of the worst nations in the world in terms of contributions to R and D in terms of our Gross National Product. I think we are about seventh in terms of our contributions. We should move up the ladder from the 1.3 per cent into the 2 per cent range. To do that we need the government and the private sector to work together so that there is the stimulus for young people to respond and to move into these fields as a career.

We need young people who can see when they are very young that they can work toward it with more enlightened and informed teachers. We can then start to see a Canada that is going to be competitive in the 1990s as we roll toward big competition from Europe, the Pacific Rim and indeed our partner the United States.

We can grow together. Young people will have the opportunity. They will not have to go away to learn science and become scientifically literate. Indeed, they will be able to make it part of their lifestyle in the future.

I urge the minister concerned to work with his colleagues and the Prime Minister to make it a priority with the Canadian government. The private sector will join in, and the young people of Canada will congratulate him.

Mrs. Suzanne Duplessis (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of State (Science and Technology)): Mr. Speaker, the Canada Scholarships Program was announced by the Prime Minister in 1988 with the aim of recognizing and rewarding the best and brightest students entering undergraduate programs in naturral sciences and engineering across Canada. The focus on excellence in the program underpins the scholarships award process and the criteria for renewal of the scholarships. The program, through its encouragement to outstanding students to pursue studies in these fields, will contribute in an important way to Canada's future industrial competitiveness. With excellent people, our industry will be able to produce excellent products and foster excellence in processes. Standards of excellence in industry are necessary to ensure that canadians continue to have the standards of living we currently enjoy.

The first class standing renewal requirement for the program is not easy to meet, especially in first year when students are making major life-style adjustments. When it became apparent last year that significant numbers of our 1988-89 Canada scholars were not going to make this requirement, we conducted a thorough review of the renewal criterion and consulted with a number of universities. A decision was made at that time to maintain the standards that has been established for the program in recongnition that, unless excellence was the basis for holding the scholarship throughout a scholar's tenure, the program's focus on excellence would be compromised.

The renewal requirements are stringent. Nonetheless, 55 per cent of the 2,500 1988-89 Canada scholars met the grade and were awarded the scholarship for a second year. Although I would like to see better renewal results, they are gratifying given the general performance of first year undergraduates in natural sciences and engineering. Of the students who enter university with first class standing in these disciplines, only 25 percent on average can be expected to maintain first class standing in their first year.

To counteract the loss of scholars in the 1988-89 program resulting from non-renewal, 900 additional first year scholarships were awarded in 1989-90. We currently have close to 4,800 top science and engineering students in the program, studying at over 80 universities and colleges across Canada. These young people are tremendous role models for their generation. I am pleased that the government of Canada can support them in that role and excited about their prospects to make a difference in the science and technology scene in Canada.

I would like to see higher rates of renewal for Canada scholars in the future.

My officials will be undertaking further analysis when data for 1989-90 scholars become available to attempt to isolate the factors which contribute most to renewal and to come up with measures which will encourage higher retention rates.

It is evident from the 1988-89 data that the most significant factor affecting retention of the scholarship is gender. Whereas 64 percent of males renewed their sholarships last year, only 46 percent of females renewed.

This differential is clearly unacceptable. Studies are being undertaken this year to increase our understanding of these results. In the meantime, a pilot project to establish mentor clubs in an attempt to improve the prospects for renewal has been initiated.

The Science Minister has asked me to give the hon. member who raised the question regarding standards for the Canada Scholarships Program the assurance that he will be on guard to maintain standards of excellence in the program.

CHILD CARE

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to raise again a question I asked of the Prime Minister over a year ago. It is a question that I have asked subsequently of various and sundry other ministers, including the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Minister of Justice, and the Minister of Finance.

The question is this. Given the problems facing Canadian parents and children, given the problems facing Canadian women in the workforce, given the fact that there are one million latch-key children in this country, why has the government cancelled the National Child Care Program?

The answer, not that I ever received one particularly, seems to be—if one can surmise and read between the lines—that in this country money is more important than children and child care, and that reducing the deficit, which is certainly an important thing to do and which has not been done to date by this government but it is an important theory, is more important than the care of children.

We all believe in fiscal responsibility, but we also know that we have to have certain priorities.

What a noble government we have that snatches valuable and needed programs away from Canadian children, all in the name of saving money. The wealthy are the ones who benefit, and the weak and the poor are the ones who are chosen to be targeted.

It is not just children who are targeted. We have seen a clawback of old age pensions. We have seen a clawback of family allowances from parents, from mothers in particular. It makes one wonder as to just where the priorities of the government are when it decides that these are the people who should be made to suffer and bear the burden of the cuts that the government has inflicted over the past five years.

We have seen seniors targeted. We have seen mothers and children targeted. We have seen the sick targeted. Veterans were targeted this year, as well. Going after Canadian veterans was not a popular move. Indeed, it was a move even less popular than going after seniors' pensions some time ago. In the end it appears that the best target in the spectrum is Canadian children.

Right across the country we know the problems facing parents who must work to achieve a decent standard of living. It is extremely rare today that, for the "average" family of four, one income is enough to provide the necessities of life, let alone a few of the comforts that make life more bearable. It is a fact of life today that both parents in a two-parent family will have to work. Consequently, child care is needed for those families.

The other fact of life is the increasing number of single-parent families, the vast majority of whom are headed by women. Again, there is no question that if these women do not have gainful employment their choice is the welfare system. They do not want to make that choice—they want to work.

Over and over again we hear about people who do not really understand the average Canadian out there and who say that there is unemployment in Atlantic Canada, or unemployment among single parents, or unemployment in the north because "those people do not want to work". Those of us who sit in this House know that is not true. We know that Canadians want to work. They want to be productive workers, want to contribute to this society, want to raise their families and want to partake in all of the good things that should be the legacy of all Canadian citizens. If we do not provide an adequate social service system for all Canadians, then we are all the poorer.

I spent five years on the board of the largest child care centre in Atlantic Canada. This centre has more than 12 units, or locations, across the city of Halifax. It deals with pre-school children and with children who need after-school and lunch-time programs. It deals with disabled children in that it has one of the very few units for disabled children, whether physically disabled or otherwise disabled. It has a French immersion program and it has enriched programs with specific dance and music programs, et cetera.

Lucky are the parents who can take advantage of this kind of program. If parents live in rural areas, they will probably not even have the access to the barest minimum standard child care program. It is just not good enough.

My hon. friend across the way from Etobicoke—Lakeshore, who I suspect is going to respond to me, will probably try to blame this matter on the Senate of Canada because it did not pass the bill before the election was called a long time ago. I merely state that it was a long time ago. We are into a new mandate. The children of Canada are waiting. I know that the member for Etobicoke—Lakeshore has a heart. I would like to hear him say that this government has a heart and that this problem is one that is not going to be addressed in some airy-fairy future but now.

Mr. Patrick Boyer (Parliamentary Secretary to Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I rise to accept the invitation and I say without hesitation that the government has a heart and I would like to show how that is in fact the case. As she stated, the hon. member for Halifax has repeatedly raised in the House the question of the federal government's involvement with child care programs, national standards and so on. I think she quite rightly keeps this issue high on the public agenda.

In a preliminary way, I want to say that I think that this is not entirely a matter for the federal government. The closer that one is to the home, the community, I think of provincial governments, I think of unions, I think of companies, families, churches, many other organizations that are much closer to the children and the families as being more appropriately involved in this. Yet, of course, as we seek to have national standards, there is clearly an important role for the federal government.

In December, 1987 the federal government announced a three-part policy to deal with child care, carrying into effect a commitment that had been made by the Prime Minister. Two of the three parts have been carried forward.

Let me point out the first aspect of that. Families have been given an enhanced tax assistance for pre-school aged children as a result of changes to the child care expense deduction and the introduction of a supplement to the child tax credit. This became effective in the tax year 1988 and the expense deduction was doubled from $2,000 to $4,000 per child for children six years of age and under and, also very important, for children with special needs.

As well, again showing that the government has heart, a new $200 supplement was added to the basic child tax credit. This supplement is particularly aimed at younger children, specifically children in lower and middle-income families. Taken together these tax measures, which were key components of the government's 1987 child care policy, have provided additional financial assistance for about 1.4 million families in our country.

Also part of the national strategy was the Child Care Initiatives Fund. This was established in 1988 to support whatever innovative approaches were coming from the community. I hope the member would agree that community involvement is what we need. This fund provides funding to projects that develop or demonstrate quality child care services for Canadian families. So far, more than $33 million in funding has been provided under this fund.

The hon. member said that money seems more important than children to this government. These facts totally contradict her allegations.

In fact, the third part of the strategy had to do with the legislation that was passed in the House of Commons. The hon. member for Halifax is quite right, it was held up in the other place dominated by members of her party. So there is some accounting to be made there.

As a result of having missed that window of opportunity, the Minister of Finance indicated in his 1989 budget that the funds were not there to proceed with that. However, there have been subsequent announcements by the government that this will be done within this mandate. It shows that actions speak louder than words when it comes to proving who has a heart.

HOUSING

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to urge the government to act on the disastrous housing shortage in the greater Metro Toronto region.

With high interest rates, the GST, increasing job losses, and an inadequate infrastructure, we are condemning our youth to lives of poverty and fear.

Some politicians in the Toronto area recognize this tremendous need and, in fact, are using the Olympic Games as a lever to gain 5,000 badly-needed houses.

There are other prospects such as the Queensville development where almost 50 per cent of the total 10,000 homes are in the $150,000 range. Yet, construction cannot begin because the government is lacking the political will to pressure the province to move forward on shelter that is affordable.

THE GREAT HOSPITAL BED RACE OF THE FONDATION DE L'HÔPITAL CHRIST-ROI

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, I would like to draw the attention of the House to an unusual event organized by members of the Fondation de l'hôpital Christ-Roi, a hospital in my riding.

On May 27, residents will either watch or take part in a big hospital bed race through the streets of Quebec City and Ville Vanier, to raise money to upgrade the hospital's medical equipment.

This is a very important and also very unusual race. The method has been tried before, with great success, in New York, Boston, London and Vancouver.

I would like to emphasize the generosity of our sponsors who have already made a commitment, and the enthusiasm of all racers who are already in training, and finally, on behalf of present and future patients of the Christ-Roi Hospital, I wish to thank the organizers of this "great race".

CABLE TELEVISION

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, Canadians have been paying a lot of money for cable television. The viewers who watch the House know that.

The cable industry has been making lots and lots of money. The rate of return on fixed assets is between 24 per cent and 30 per cent—twice as much as the phone companies which are regulated. The cable people are not regulated.

The CRTC, the body that makes the decisions on rates and other matters, yesterday, finally had some good news for consumers. Instead of giving the cable companies a Rolls-Royce this time it just gave them a Buick or a Toyota, and it capped the increases for consumers.

We, in the NDP, believe there is an alternative way. The government in the House of Commons should pass legislation so that the rate of return of cable companies is regulated as are the telephone companies. Cable fees would go down, not up.

NATIONAL TOURISM AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, this week is National Tourism Awareness Week in Canada. Knowing how important tourism is to every single riding in the country, I am sure all members will want to join me in congratulating 630,000 Canadians who work in this vital, $24 billion a year industry.

The government recognizes the vital importance of tourism which is why we released, on Monday, an important research study into the travel intentions of our most important tourists, our friends from south of the border. The valuable information gained from this study will enable us to continue to attract increasing numbers of U.S. and foreign visitors.

In addition, the government announced yesterday that foreign tourists will be able to collect cash GST refunds at duty-free shops when leaving the country. This extremely efficient and simple process will encourage more tourists to visit Canada and will also be a major boost to business at Canada's duty-free shops.

Canada grows with tourism, courtesy of your Progressive Conservative government.

POSTAL SERVICE

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I rise to confirm what everyone knows already. First-class mail does not mean anything under the Tory government.

Just recently a Canada Post manager confirmed that first-class mail had been held back an extra day in Vancouver so that advertising flyers could be delivered in its place. What was the feeble excuse given for such unmitigated gall? Simply that first-class mail could be delivered the next day and still be within the accepted, so-called, delivery standard.

Canada Post should be renamed "Ad Mail Canada", or better yet "Canada Junk Mail".

HEALTH SERVICES

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East): Mr. Speaker, this past weekend I had the pleasure of celebrating Canada Health Day with the people of Mountain View Home in Yarrow, B.C.

Mountain View Home is a psychiatric facility that enables people to live in close proximity to their community. Pat and Kathy Newby and their staff at Mountain View are committed professionals who work with residents, enabling them to lead active, dignified and therapeutic lives.

No longer are people shut up in massive impersonal institutions far from their homes. Now people with psychiatric disabilities are living their lives as part of the community.

The theme of Canada Health Day this year was Health Services: Our Community Resources. With facilities like Mountain View Home assisting people and helping them to be all that they can be, there can be no doubt that in the Fraser Valley health services are, indeed, a very valuable community resource.

MINING EXPLORATION

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, a research bulletin from the Association des prospecteurs du Québec has again pointed out that mining exploration, financed under the flow-through shares system, is a profitable investment for governments.

Mining exploration financed under this system from 1986 to 1989 will produce tax revenues of over $700 million for both levels of government, Canada and Quebec.

The results of the past ten years of exploration have started to come into focus. The 90s should be a time for developing this potential further, provided the political will and the human and financial resources required to fully develop this potential will be forthcoming.

Furthermore, these new mining entrepreneurs may play a leading role in developing the industry in Quebec.

Mr. Speaker, the present financing mechanism has proved its worth. Maintaining that system would make it possible to reassess this mechanism with a view to making it part of an integrated system, ranging from support for individual prospectors to the ultimate production stage, a system that would be adapted to the new context of the 90s. Today, the federal government supports flow-through shares 100 per cent.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, ACCESS Education is a made-in-Manitoba program for particular groups that are not well represented. It is funded jointly by the federal and provincial governments.

This program has produced doctors, nurses, teachers, and lawyers. It has been a great success, particularly for women's groups and our aboriginal people. Our first aboriginal doctor in Manitoba came from this program.

It has been a model not only for Manitoba, but for other provinces and for the territories. In fact, other countries have also looked at this model because it has been so successful.

It is now being threatened by the federal government because of its refusal to sign the Northern Development Agreement and, therefore, it risks being lost. It is not just another blow to Manitoba, but another blow to education. We all know that there have been many, many such blows.

I urge the minister to make a commitment today and to renew that agreement now.

CHALLENGE '90

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure today to rise so that I may inform our colleagues in the House about an exciting new partnership venture between the police and youth of our country.

The Minister of State for Multiculturalism and Citizenship and the Minister of State for Youth jointly announced this co-operative community initiative yesterday. During the coming summer, 90 young Canadians from visible minority and aboriginal communities will be offered a unique opportunity to work with 16 police forces across Canada.

Entitled "Challenge '90", this summer employment project will give these young men and women a chance to become more familiar with law enforcement work. They will also have the opportunity to decide if the police force might be their own calling.

This $326,000 initiative is an expansion of a pilot project initiated through the Canadian Association of Chiefs of Police with the Vancouver Police, which was sponsored last year by Multiculturalism and Citizenship Canada.

Several students have since expressed a keen interest in law enforcement, and we can again look forward to much success this year with these minority youth/police employment programs.

NICARAGUA

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, recent events in Nicaragua are cause for concern that the United States is not satisfied with democracy having been achieved in that country.

Dissatisfaction remains in Washington with the fact that the Sandinistas are still a major political force and that Violeta Chamorro has had the intelligence and judgment to treat them with the respect that they are due.

Elements within the Contras and within UNO, the anti-Sandinista coalition, seem bent on totally destroying the Sandinistas and their achievements in social and agrarian reform. To this end, it seems they may have succeeded in moving President Chamorro from her original wise and conciliatory approach toward a situation in which, by presidential decrees, she is provoking a kind of unrest that can be used by some to justify further anti-Sandinista strategies and perhaps even American intervention.

In the meantime, promised American aid for Nicaragua is still on hold. There is lots of money for the military in El Salvador, but none for democracy in Nicaragua.

Mrs. Chamorro has committed the real sin of Central American politics. She has had the audacity to have a mind of her own and to put Nicaragua first.

TRADE

Mr. Ken Monteith (Elgin): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to bring to the attention of the House the fact that the United States has decided to drop duties levied on Canadian red raspberries. Our raspberry exporters had challenged the imposition of U.S. duties as allowed under Chapter 19 of the Canada–U.S. Free Trade Agreement.

Mr. Speaker, this case demonstrates the value of the dispute settlement mechanism. It provides for fair application of trade laws on either side of the border.

We can be assured that other cases under review will also be given fair and equitable hearings under this binational dispute resolution process.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance.

Small business has rightly complained that the goods and services tax would be an administrative nightmare.

Bruce Flexman, the senior GST expert at the national accounting firm of Peat, Marwick, Thorne, recently told a Senate committee that the government has been looking into allowing small business to pay an annual tax on revenues instead of collecting the 7 per cent GST.

Is the government planning to do this? If so, how will it live up to its commitment to consumers that the tax would be visible and not apply to basic groceries?

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the objective of this—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Jelinek: Do you want an answer or not?

The objective of this government is to try to make the system as simple as possible, which of course is something that the Liberals do not understand. That is why we have been working very hard to come up with simplified methods.

Whether it is what was announced yesterday for the tourist rebate centres to be utilized by duty free shops, or the streamlined accounting system that is already in place in the technical papers, we are constantly consulting and communicating with the business community, particularly the small business community, in an effort to work with them to bring in a system that will build on the streamlined accounting procedures already in place. This will make the system even simpler and fairer, not only for small businesses but for all Canadians.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Revenue has not stated categorically that the government is not considering moving from the GST to a revenue-based tax. The move to a revenue-based tax would be a major change from the GST as presented to this House.

Can the minister assure the House that any changes to the GST or the way it is collected will be brought before this House and Canadians for full and open consideration, and not imposed in secret by Order in Council, by regulation?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, from time to time we have brought before this House changes that we have proposed to the GST. Every time we have had discussions on this, the Liberal party is strangely silent, having absolutely no alternatives, no ideas, nothing that it is proposing as to how to deal with the various considerations on the GST.

As my colleague has said, we are continually looking at ways in which we can simplify the system to make it more effective to meet the needs of Canadians, whether they are small business or consumers, and we will continue to do that.

However, I would call on members of the Liberal Party of Canada to get off their fannies for once and take part in this debate because it is good for Canadians if they do take part in that debate.

[Translation]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, Canadians have already said no to the government's GST.

My question to the Minister of Finance is: When will the government really consider the opinion of small businesses and the great majority of Canadians? When will the government give up its proposed GST and proceed with a real tax reform that is fair and comprehensive?

• (1420)

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what could be more reformist than moving from one system of taxation which simply is not working to a new system of taxation which by all accounts is going to be a far better system than what we have today.

I remind my hon. friend that there have been five—count them—five different Royal commissions or committees that were appointed in 1940, 1956, 1963, 1976 and 1983. These five commissions have all said: "Change from the existing tax. Reform it and bring in a new type of sales tax".

It is not fundamental reform because there are 48 other countries that have this type of tax. Forty-eight other countries have proven that this type of tax works.

It is certainly reform in removing the bad tax that we have had for the last 65 years and moving to a good tax, the goods and services tax.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, this week the government launched a series of radio advertisements on the GST.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mrs. Marleau: One of the ads which I listened to states that the GST is not an additional tax.

I ask the Minister of Finance this. Will the GST not be an additional tax on all services previously untaxed? Will it not be an additional tax on home heating fuels and hydro? Will it not be an additional tax on clothing, especially children's clothing? Yes or no?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me respond to the hon. member's question.

We are eliminating a tax that raises some $18 billion. We are replacing it with a new tax which will also raise about $18 billion. So there will be no additional tax burden to Canadians as a result of the reform from the federal sales tax today to the goods and services tax after January 1, 1991.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is on the same matter and is addressed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs. It concerns the same misleading and untruthful radio ads on the proposed goods and services tax.

If commercial or private businesses were doing the same thing as this government is now doing, they would have their ads yanked off the aid today. Will the minister immediately instruct his officials to investigate this very serious matter? Or has he also chosen to support this deceitful attempt to mislead Canadians and to use taxpayers' money to do so? Which is it?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am not quite sure to what the hon. member is referring. If he has a specific reason for saying that the advertising is incorrect, then let him say so. I would like him to be more specific.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Revenue. Yesterday, the national director of the accounting firm Peat Marwick Thorne, who was appearing before the Senate committee, informed us that the government was changing the GST by lowering the rate for small business.

If this information is correct, will small businesses pay less tax or is the government just giving them the impression that they will pay less?

[English]

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): No, Mr. Speaker.

First, we are not in the process of modifying or changing the GST as proposed.

Second, what is being discussed in the other place and what the leader of the New Democratic Party is talking about is strictly speculation.

The facts are that we are working with the small business community. We are working to try to enhance and improve, wherever possible, the simplified accounting procedures for all Canadians, but particularly for small businesses.

This should not come as news to anyone. We have said that in this House on many occasions. I said in front of the finance committee on a number of occasions that we are working on simplified procedures. Because we have worked with the business community we have been able to develop a simple, one page registration form and businesses are now registering.

I can let the House know that because of the simplicity factors that this government is committed to that over 200,000 businesses have already registered in the last couple of weeks. The registrations are pouring in with no complaints.

Therefore I can only conclude that since there are no alternatives and no suggestions coming from the other side of the House, at least we can depend on the business community to help us simplify the system the best we can.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Minister of Finance.

Yesterday in the House the Minister of Finance admitted that he is making changes to the GST in private, without consulting either the members of the House or those who will be directly affected.

The Minister of National Revenue has just said that the Minister of Finance and he are consulting. It took an unelected Senate hearing to make public what the government is considering.

The Canadian Federation of Independent Business confirmed this morning that the government refused to show them its proposed changes. What kind of consultation is this? Why does the government not consult with those who will be directly affected? Why will it not listen to the 80 per cent of Canadians who say scrap this tax?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I cannot think of a more open process of tax reform that any government in the history of Canada has ever conducted.

Let me take my hon. friend back. We first started talking about sales tax reform in 1986. I have the document here that refers to it. I have the white paper of June, 1987. I have the technical paper of August, 1989.

Mr. Gauthier: Order.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): It is a document of the House of Commons. Surely, I can hold that up, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Gauthier: You are demonstrating.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): We had draft legislation in early October of 1989. We had the committee hearings of the House of Commons that went all last fall. We brought in the final legislation in February of this year, after we had made a number of changes that related to the consultation process following the report of the finance committee.

We have had continuing consultations, as my colleague and I have both referred to today, simply to listen to Canadians to get their ideas. Once we have a specific proposal, then we will put that proposal on the table.

As my colleague has said, we are still consulting and we are still listening before we make a final decision.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, clearly the Canadian Federation of Independent Business is concerned that the kind of proposals this government is trying to shove down the throats of Canadians on the GST is what it is going to get.

Last year the Minister of Finance said that the GST would improve the over–all fairness of the tax, and that the GST would be visible. Now the Minister of Revenue has floated an idea that in fact basically changes the premise of what was presented in this House, as the Leader of the Opposition has said.

As early as this morning the CFIB said that the changes that it understands might be forthcoming would be: "No panacea. It does not solve the problem".

When will the minister realize that no amount of changes can change this tax?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I guess my hon. friend is saying: "Let's go back to the old tax". The old tax is a hidden tax. It is totally invisible as far as the consumer is concerned.

Is my hon. friend saying that the GST is not visible? It is 7 per cent. People will see it on cash register slips. They will see it on signs in the stores. They will hear it in advertising. How can she possibly say that it is not visible?

She then went on to say that my colleague floated an idea. My colleague did not float the idea. It was discussed in a Senate committee hearing, the Senate committee that my hon. friend is supporting. This is the Senate that members of the NDP have said that they have absolutely no use for. Yet she turns turtle on this and says: "We like the Senate now".

Where is the NDP on this? What sort of policies do the NDP have? Where are the principles of the New Democratic Party?

TOURISM

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of State for Tourism who is just going to hop in his seat.

In the 1989 federal budget the government announced that it would not be renewing the ERDA subagreements for tourism development. Yet, recent newspaper reports out of Newfoundland say the province will be getting a new tourism subagreement with the federal government.

Will the minister finally tell the House what the government's position is with respect to the ERDA subagreements. If one province gets one, will the same courtesy be extended to every province?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I would ask my hon. friend to follow a little more carefully the developments in Ontario.

We have through the FedNor program in northern Ontario, which is his part of the world, brought forward a very important new program which we hope will be co-ordinated with the provinces to some degree. Also, we have just announced a new tourism component of FedNor of $14 million which is going to help Ontario enormously, so I do not know what the hon. member is complaining about.

Mr. Bob Wood (Nipissing): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary is to the same minister.

The minister this week said and I quote: "We gain much more than just economic activity and monetary benefits from tourism." In light of the fact that Canada's share of the world travel market has been cut in half over the last decade and the Tourism Industry Association of Canada has called for a promotion budget of at least $50 million, why has this government slashed the tourism promotion budget from $35 million to $20 million?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, here are the facts. From the middle 1970s to 1985—

Mr. Hockin: The hon. member should hear this. Part of it he will find interesting and some might disappoint him. From 1975 to 1985 Canada's market share of world and American tourism dropped to half. In 1985 we decided to ask the American market first what was wrong? The Americans told us: "You have no image. We know about your moose, we know about your mountains, we know about your Mounties but after that, we don't know enough about you."

For the last four years Tourism Canada has promoted the image of Canada as an interesting and exciting country with good value for the dollar. We revealed a study last week from Longwoods International which indicates that Americans now believe that Canada is a more interesting and exciting country and better value for the dollar.

FISHERIES

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Prime Minister, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Yesterday the Prime Minister met with the President of Spain and received vague promises to study fish stocks which have been heavily overstudied and heavily overfished.

I would like to know why the Government of Canada is satisfied with promises of study from Spain and why it is afraid to take tough and effective action against a nation that is overfishing important fish stocks off the Atlantic coast. Why is that?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman could cite any firm decisive and tough action that was taken in the years prior to 1984, we would be delighted to hear it.

All he did was give 9,500 tonnes of good northern cod within the 200-mile limit to the European community. We have stopped that. We did not renew that.

With respect to yesterday's meeting, The Toronto Star says: "The PM fails to secure a pledge from Spain to stop overfishing."

The Ottawa Citizen says: "Spanish PM agrees overfishing must end."

The Globe and Mail says: "Fish stocks needs studies, Spain says."

No wonder the hon. gentleman is confused. What in fact happened was that the President of Spain agreed that conservation must be the central principle governing fishing in the northwest Atlantic. They would like to have joint scientific studies and co-operation so that they can have confidence in our figures just as we have confidence in them.

We are making solid progress with the Commissioner of Fisheries of the European Community. We are undertaking some joint studies and, before the year is out, we hope to see substantial progress.

Hon. William Rompkey (Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Minister of International Trade.

We could make substantial progress if the government would do something about what is in its own hands. Why is it that the Government of Canada refuses to act unilaterally to extend Canadian jurisdiction over the nose and tail of the Grand Banks, as has been recommended in every credible study that has come before it? Why does it refuse to do that?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, previous governments of Canada never acted unilaterally in these matters.

Previous governments never acted unilaterally when the fish stocks of the northwest Atlantic disappeared. They worked in international circles and in the UN for a number of years before finally, after 10 or 12 years, the Law of the Sea Convention was agreed upon.

We cannot breach international law by unilaterally extending the 200-mile limit, which no other country of the world will observe.

The hon. gentleman may not mind making a fool of himself, but we do not want to join him in that position.

COMMUNICATIONS

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of Communications.

UNITEL announced today that it is going to apply to compete with the phone companies in the long distance telephone system. If this bid is successful, it will mean higher phone rates for 90 per cent of Canadians. Traditionally, long distance in this country has subsidized local rates.

Given that government policy has consistently favoured the business agenda in this area as in other areas, will the minister give a commitment to ordinary Canadians that for once he will stick up for the average consumer and ordinary Canadian against these big interests?

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, I am surprised at the hon. member's question because he himself said in the preamble that a telecommunications company has applied to the CRTC for a hearing. He would have me intervene instead of the CRTC. I think that would be breaking the laws passed by this House.

An application was made to the CRTC; the CRTC will hear proposals and counter-proposals and render a decision in due course, without any partisan demagogy such as we just heard. Canadians will then know the position of the CRTC, which is the official agency that is independent of the government in these matters, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Ian Waddell (Port Moody—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, pardon me if I am a little suspicious of the government.

Ted Rogers, one of the principals behind UNITEL, gave more money to Conservative cabinet ministers in the last election than I could possibly count.

The country is moving toward one unitary fibre optic network which will be to the 21st century what railways were to the 19th century. I want a commitment from this government that it will not only make telephones but fibre optics and communications in this country available and affordable to average Canadians, not just to its friends in big business.

[Translation]

Hon. Marcel Masse (Minister of Communications): Mr. Speaker, with all his eloquence, the hon. member could go to the CRTC and express his point of view.

EMPLOYMENT

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister responsible for job losses in Montreal, the Minister of Labour.

There have been more job losses in Montreal! The closing of the Gattuso plant in Saint-Laurent will have a disastrous effect on the employees. Why does the government continue with its policy that results in the total or partial shutdown of factories, like Gattuso, VIA Rail, Domtar, Gillette, Vickers and Kraft, to name only these?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member should know that the government does not make this kind of decision in the place of private enterprise.

However, Catelli has acquired the Campbell Company in the area mentioned by my colleague and as part of the streamlining process—and the pasta market in particular is undergoing a streamlining right now—the company, like other companies, decided to streamline and to make itself competitive in the market, nationally and internationally.

I understand that this concept was not so popular when the hon. member's party was in power, but we are in the situation we find ourselves today because of that, Mr. Speaker.

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): Mr. Speaker, that answer is not going to help 9,000 employees—or their families for that matter—at more than 80 plants in Montreal, who lost their jobs during the past year. When will the government finally act to help thousands of Quebecers who have lost their jobs as a result of this government's disastrous policies?

Hon. Benoît Bouchard (Minister of Industry, Science and Technology): Mr. Speaker, I must say I am surprised. Although I trust the hon. member, I certainly do not trust the figures she is providing. She should also mention the $250 million contract Canadair obtained today.

An hon. member: In her own riding!

Mr. Bouchard (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, she should mention the amounts we invested in Southwest and East Montreal. Mr. Speaker, I told the hon. member's colleague from Notre-Dame-de-Grâce last week that thanks to the Conservative government's policies, the Montreal region is now recovering from a situation created by the gang of Liberal ministers from Montreal, when they were in power.

An hon. member: The Liberals wanted to close Canadair!

SCOTIA SYNFUELS PROJECT

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the minister responsible for ACOA. It concerns the Scotia Synfuels coal liquefaction project in Cape Breton. The project, as the minister knows, will generate up to 2,000 permanent jobs and ensure an environmentally sound future for Cape Breton coal. It has the strong support of the Premier of Nova Scotia and the mayors and wardens in the area. The only delay in proceeding with this vital project is approval by the federal government of a Cape Breton tax credit application and the incentives provided in the Atlantic Enterprise Program.

My question to the minister is this. When will his government give its long awaited approval to this application?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I recently attended a meeting of some wardens and municipal leaders in Cape Breton, as the hon. member knows. He is correct. There is a very strong unanimous feeling that this project should be studied closely. I am not in a position to give him a commitment today, but the matter is under consideration. When I or my colleagues have something to announce, we will make that announcement in due course.

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary to the same minister.

The minister will know that the downsizing of the coal and steel industries, coupled with the fact that our fisheries in Atlantic Canada are in terrible shape, leaves the Cape Breton economy in a very serious and somewhat precarious situation. The minister also knows that on April 18, 1990, a unanimous resolution was passed by the Nova Scotia House of Assembly approving of this particular project.

Can the minister explain to members of this House, and in particular to the people of Cape Breton, the delay in approving the investment tax credit which has been on the minister's books and those of his government colleagues for quite some time? Would he explain to the people of Cape Breton the delay in approving this investment tax credit, thereby denying Canadians in that region of the country meaningful employment?

Hon. Elmer M. MacKay (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, if delay is indeed the deadliest form of denial, no one practised that more effectively than the gentleman opposite when the Liberals were in power.

As the hon. member knows, our government has provided extraordinary means of assistance to Atlantic Canada, and to Cape Breton in particular, with the Cape Breton investment tax credit, topping up and other arrangements. It is nothing to be complacent about, but it is something we have done with a great deal of deliberation. This particular project is one which is under study. It is a good project. If there is an announcement to be made, we will make it in due course.

INTEREST RATES

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Finance, if I can attract him back to his seat. He seems to be a travelling salesman today.

An hon. member: Every day.

Mr. Langdon: Every day, perhaps.

An hon. member: And a damn good one!

Mr. Langdon: I am not quite so sure I would agree with that.

An hon. member: Is that a traveller or a salesman?

Mr. Langdon: Mr. Speaker, high interest rates have forced the government to finally raise the rate of return for Canada Savings Bonds to 11.5 per cent. This, once and for all, shoots down the credibility of the government's own budget, because it was based on interest rates of 11.1 per cent.

I want to ask the minister if he will admit his high interest rate policy has torpedoed his own budget? I want to ask him, too, if he will agree that as economic managers his government now looks like the Three Stooges?

An hon. member: Whatever you say, Moe.

Mr. Fontana: Which one are you, Mike?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, that uncharacteristically colourful language of the hon. member does not take away from the fact that the record this government has demonstrated over the five and a half years we have been in office that we worked very hard and hold very close to the projections we have set out.

The hon. member has referred to one element of a broad budget projection. I should say to the hon. member that with the higher levels of inflation we are experiencing now, personal income taxes are higher. While interest rates are putting some upward pressure on the deficit, higher personal income taxes have resulted in lower pressures on the deficit.

We are only one and a half months into the fiscal year, so let's not jump to conclusions too quickly.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary to the minister. In fact, this decision which affects Canada Savings Bonds goes right to November. So, we are not talking about just the start of the fiscal year.

I ask the minister—

My question for the minister is as follows. The government's Budget is a dead duck as a result of rising interest rates. Will the minister change his economic policy and reduce interest rates, not just for the sake of his own Budget but for the sake of thousands of small businesses across Canada that are feeling the impact of this Budget and high interest rates?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, let me set the hon. member's mind at ease. The change in the CSB rate of one percentage point has the effect of increasing our interest costs by about $120 million. There are offsets, as I have indicated, in higher personal income tax revenues which fully offset that amount of money as it relates to Canada Savings Bonds.

The hon. member is asking if we are going to change our economic policy. No, Mr. Speaker, our economic policy has served us very well since September 4, 1984, and we will continue to follow that policy because it has produced a healthy economic environment in this country.

The hon. member wants us to snap our fingers and drop interest rates. I, too, would like to see interest rates down. But I know there are underlying pressures in the economy. I will give the hon. member one example. Unit labour costs at the end of last year were rising at the rate of 7 per cent. That increase in unit labour costs is the best example I can give the hon. member of a loss of competitive position. As we lose competitive position, we lose business; as we lose business, we lose jobs. Surely, the hon. member can understand the importance—

Mr. Crawford: Whoa, Mike!

TOURISM

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Small Businesses and Tourism. The tourist industry has been telling me that they see themselves as a potential loser under free trade. A report that just came from the Conference Board of Canada states, in fact, that the GST will lead to growth in the tourist industry. I suspect the minister agrees with the latter rather than the former. I would ask him if he would explain how the GST will lead to growth in the tourist industry in Canada.

• (1450)

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank my hon. colleague for not asking an unfriendly question about the GST.

The reason why the Conference Board, not the government, says that tourism is going to be helped by the GST is, as I think my hon. friend understands, that the economy of Canada will be greatly increased during the first year at $9 billion extra productivity, which leads to more tourists.

Second, we have input tax credits. We give back the GST to business travellers, which is great news for the tourist industry. Third, the low income credits will help low income Canadians travel as well.

ENERGY EFFICIENCY

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

Last August, the minister said that Canada should lead by example in an international effort to cut carbon dioxide emissions. In March, the minister shifted gears and said we should go slowly. Now the environment minister has also changed his tune and is saying: "Go slow," to the European countries that want to set CO2 limits.

Why are the minister and his colleague changing their minds, and why is this government not leading world opinion on energy and the environment?

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, I find the hon. member's comments interesting.

I can refer to comments similar to what my colleague, the Minister for International Trade said today. Here is one headline from the Toronto Star that says: "Canada Attacked for Blocking Gas Limits". If you look at the Ottawa Citizen, a paper very loyal to this government, it says: "Canada–U.S. Split on Warming".

Mr. Speaker, you will find that it was exactly that split on which Canada was taking the very lead that the Minister of the Environment said Canada would take. There has not been a shift at all. In fact, there has been reaffirmation of leadership.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, this is a government that has cut the budget on energy efficiency and diversity by 90 per cent.

It will take a major announcement before Canadians believe that the government is sincere about cutting energy waste in CO2 emissions. I want to ask the minister to make a commitment today that the new spending that he promised for this fall will restore the 90 per cent of energy efficiency and diversity spending the government cut since 1984.

Hon. Jake Epp (Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member will know from the debate we had in committee that I said part of the package, as we look to The Green Plan which the Minister of the Environment will be unveiling later this year, will be energy efficiency. In terms of that package, the hon. member will have to wait.

I say also to the hon. member I will not restore the type of programs the former government had which were funded out of the National Energy Program, over $50 billion which it took out of Alberta and Saskatchewan, and redistributed it through the the CHIP program, for example. It was money that was lost.

Mr. Rompkey: Hibernia.

Mr. Epp: It was not Hibernia, my friend. We'll help you with Newfoundland another way.

Another example is having civil servants in different provinces in CREO offices telling people in the public what the industry already had in place.

What we will do instead is R and D. We will do replacement of energy, for instance alternative energies. Those are the kinds of things we will do. We will not replicate. We will not duplicate.

TRADE

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister for International Trade.

Since this government came to power, U.S. Steel has doubled its share of the Canadian market. We learned today that the same U.S. steel has been subsidized by some $35 billion over the last 10 years. So I ask the minister how his government could stand idly by while the Americans were forcing Canadian producers to restrain their exports into the American market, while at the same time they were flooding the Canadian market with subsidized steel.

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I assume that the hon. member is referring to a study just released by the Canadian Steel Producers Association which outlines all types of U.S. government assistance, federal, state and local, addressed to the steel sector during the 1980s.

Now I do not need to remind the hon. gentleman that in the early part of the 1980s we had the dubious misfortune of having the hon. gentleman's party in power. In any event, this is a study of the assistance that was given to the steel sector during the 1980s. To be fair, I want to point out to him that it outlines programs that may be deemed to be subsidies within the meaning of U.S. and Canadian legislation. But it also examined a whole broad list of generally available programs which under trade law would not be considered to be subsidies but general assistance to an industry.

Certainly, Mr. Speaker, this is a most valuable study and we will be using it when we start to negotiate with the United States on the question of subsidies and countervail, which we intend to do under the FTA at the end of the year. This is a valuable and informative survey and we will certainly be using it in our negotiations with the United States.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Be nice to the United States.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, the minister sold out the steel industry when he signed the free trade agreement.

My supplementary is for the same minister. This government has spent the last year unilaterally disarming itself of subsidies and putting Canadian workers and farmers in unemployment lines and bankruptcy proceedings.

Will the minister tell his U.S. counterpart when they meet this week that Canada considers the U.S. subsidies an unfair trading practice and will he make a commitment to this House today to stop unilaterally disarming Canada of these subsidies?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I will be meeting with Mrs. Hills on Friday at a meeting of the Canada–U.S. Trade Commission. As a matter of fact I am going to present her with a copy of this study that has been done by our steel producers. I am glad to see them take the initiative and I hope that other Canadian groups will do the same. We have our own research under way as well.

With respect to the free trade agreement, everywhere I look I see evidence of progress under the agreement. "Dupont unit sees rise in exports". "Canadian firms see global opportunities", executive survey says. I listen today and Ford is going to invest a billion dollars—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of the Environment or the Minister of Forestry, I have today a question, I suppose for the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

An hon. member: He comes prepared!

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Why, Mr. Speaker, the pipes, the pipes are blowing!

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, yesterday in the House of Commons the Minister of Forestry said and I quote: "Under the new regulations the industry will be required over the next three years to invest another $5 billion to $7 billion, the result of which will be a complete elimination of the emission of dioxins into the river systems". A complete elimination, Mr. Speaker.

Can the Minister of National Health and Welfare confirm that it is the government's intention and belief that at the end of the next three years a situation will exist whereby there has been complete elimination of the emission of dioxins into Canada's river systems.

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would say to the hon. member I get the sense he is blowing more than his pipes.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: I did not know what I had started yesterday. Perhaps the minister could answer the question.

• (1500)

Mr. Beatty: Mr. Speaker, it is our intention to do everything we can to reduce the levels of these chemicals. Our goal is obviously to have zero amounts of these chemicals in waters.

I will take the question as notice for my colleague, the Minister of the Environment, however, and he will be able to respond more fully.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, if the minister cannot confirm—as obviously he cannot—that the goal and the anticipation is a complete elimination, and if he is thus refuting the words of his colleague, the Minister of Forestry, uttered in the House yesterday, how can any Canadian have any faith in anything any of those ministers say about the environment?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member continues. I have already indicated that I would take the question as notice for my colleague, the Minister of the Environment. He will be pleased to give a full explanation to the hon. gentleman.

ELECTORAL BOUNDARIES READJUSTMENT ACT

MEASURE TO CHANGE THE NAME OF AN ELECTORAL DISTRICT

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester) moved for leave to introduce Bill C-305, an Act to change the name of the electoral district of Gloucester.

Mr. Speaker: Shall the hon. member have leave to introduce the bill?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I will be brief. I think it is clear that the name of an electoral district should reflect the people, communities and geography of that district.

[English]

The county of Gloucester has had a very long and colourful history as a federal riding. It has been known as a municipality, but much has changed since it was originally named. I propose in this bill, and I hope that it will have the support of the House, that we change the name of the electoral district of Gloucester to the name—

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MARKETING OF CANOLA UNDER THE JURISDICTION OF THE CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Question No. 231—Mr. Hovdebo:

1. In the period January 1, 1989 to February 8, 1990, has any department or agency of the government received requests for a plebiscite to be held among canola producers in western Canada to determine if they want canola marketing placed under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board?

2. Has the government or the Canadian Wheat Board undertaken any study or review of (a) the impact on canola prices to farmers which would result if canola marketing were under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board (b) the possible outcome of any plebiscite to determine if producers want canola marketing placed under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board?

Hon. Charles James Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): 1. Agriculture Canada has noted infrequent requests mainly from individual producers, to hold a plebiscite among producers to determine their position on the inclusion of canola under the jurisdiction of the Canadian Wheat Board. Simultaneously, requests have been received from producers and farm or commodity organizations which call for a continuation of the open marketing system.

2. (a) and (b) No.

A Task Force has been created to examine a range of factors affecting the canadian canola industry, including canola marketing. This group, which is small but representative of the industry has been mandated to make recommendations to the Minister of Grains and Oilseeds by November 1990.

TABLING OF PUBLIC SERVICE COMMISSION ANNUAL REPORT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make an inquiry on a point of order.

The Public Service Commission's annual report was to be tabled today in the House. Sometimes, it is the habit to have what is called back-door tabling. I wonder if the Clerk could tell you, Mr. Speaker, if the report has been tabled. The member for Ottawa West would like to pose a question to the government.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Yes, the report has been tabled at the back door.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, could I inquire if this report is automatically referred to a standing committee of the House, or if there is some process by which I can ensure that it is so referred?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It is referred to the standing committee.

Mrs. Catterall: Which one?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It goes to Government Operations.

BUSINESS OF SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S. O. 81—AGRICULTURAL ECONOMY

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre) moved:

That this House recognize that Canadian farmers face dire financial circumstances from successive years of drought, low 1990-91 initial prices, escalating interest rates and the international grain trade war's price depressing effects, and call on the government to endeavour to strengthen the economic position of Canadian producers with a cash injection, with or without provincial participation.

He said: Mr. Speaker, rural Canada today is in a severe state of crisis, a crisis that has been developing for some time now. It is something that we in western Canada are extremely concerned about.

In western Canada, family farms are disappearing. Small businesses in rural communities are closing up. In fact, whole communities are disappearing.

To outline its seriousness, I would like to highlight Saskatchewan as an example and put forth a few facts. Every year approximately 1,000 farm families leave the land in Saskatchewan alone. There are approximately 60,000 farms, so every year we are losing 1,000 out of the 60,000 that presently exist.

Over the last three years, the annual number of business bankruptcies has increased more rapidly in Saskatchewan than in any other Canadian province, and other western provinces are not far behind. Today, over 16 per cent of Saskatchewan families live below the poverty-line and over 64,000 Saskatchewan children are growing up in poverty. That is the reality. That is what is happening.

Since 1985, more than 60,000 people have left Saskatchewan. That is a net loss in a province that now has a population of less than one million. Of the communities, 70 per cent have had a population decline since 1986. These are staggering figures. These are shocking figures. These are represented throughout the prairies in western Canada.

As the fishery is to the Maritimes, agriculture is the economic base for the prairie provinces. Commodity prices are down. In fact, they are at 80 per cent of what farmers were receiving back in 1981. One of the main reasons for this is the trade war that is going on between the Americans and the Europeans which is having a devastating effect on Canadians. At least the Europeans have a goal of maintaining their family farms. In fact, that is their underlying objective. Unlike the Americans, they have said that their underlying goal is to maintain family farms in Europe.

There was a recent announcement by the president that the Export Enhancement Program was going to be increased by several hundred million dollars. What has been the government's response to all this? It has been very disappointing. In fact, it has been embarrassingly disappointing.

• (1510)

Under the Export Enhancement Program, Section 701.4 of the free trade agreement allows the government to file a complaint pursuant to that act when the United States is dealing with a third party that affects our traditional trading districts. Certainly, the have with respect to grain and the Export Enhancement Program. Russia is one of the key examples. The government is subsidizing grain sales to it and that has affected our sales to that nation.

The removal of oats from the Canadian Wheat Board has simply removed one more tool and one more marketing ability for that institution that is in place for farmers.

Producers have suffered high input costs. Statistics Canada has stated that costs for fertilizer, chemicals, and fuel are up approximately one-and-a-half times since 1980. That is why farm income has dropped by some 20 per cent.

Interest rates are volatile. What has been the government's response to interest rates? The Farm Credit Corporation, the farmer's bank, in 1990 alone has increased its rates four times. In fact, to get a shared-risk mortgage, a farmer has to pay 14.78 per cent interest. That is some sharing of the risk. It is a risk that is shared almost entirely by the producer.

As farmers suffer and as farms disappear, rural communities suffer. Businesses in rural communities have no money. They are suffering through high interest rates. In fact, there is a loss of businesses through low inventory and businesses unable to maintain their level of inventory. It is a problem that perpetuates itself. When a farmer goes into a business to buy some goods, if those goods are not available, he will go to a larger centre. When he is in that larger centre, he, she, or the family often buy other goods they require. Therefore, when one business suffers, the whole community suffers. It is an ongoing effect that is multiplying and eating away at the whole heart of rural Canada.

As far as small business in rural communities is concerned, the government's response has been very disappointing as well. Last year, the New Democratic Party introduced a motion for the Federal Business Development Bank to aid small business. It was passed through the House, one of the few opposition motions that actually went through. However, the government has done nothing with respect to small business.

I was in my own riding yesterday talking with businessmen. Business people are concerned. They say they would like to have lower interest rates.

Mr. Bjornson: And higher inflation!

Mr. Laporte: They would like to have lower interest rates for inventory, for example, or for capital expansion. If they could increase their inventory, then people would stay in those communities instead of driving to a bigger centre.

Mr. Bjornson: Ask the businessman who paid 20 per cent back in 1982 what he thinks of this.

Mr. Laporte: These interest rates are killing small business and the government has done nothing, despite a motion passed by this very House. That was a direction from Parliament for government to act. It has done nothing.

The other item they have been blessed with by this government is the goods and services tax. I wish to quote the Canadian Federation of Independent Business, a quote which I think is very appropriate. It talks about the GST and its effects. As reported in The Financial Post of May 14, 1990, it states:

> Our view is that the timing of the GST could not be worse. A lot of analysts tend to treat the GST as if it fulfills the criteria of a theoretically well-constructed, broad-based visible and equitable consumption tax. The truth is, that the GST fulfills none of the above.
> Clearly, the implementation of this tax will be horrific, and the bulk of the responsibility falls on us. And if you look at nuts and bolts of the GST, it is too complex from a small business point of view. The government has said it will streamline the accounting process, but if they had a simple tax, we wouldn't need streamlined accounting.

If they did not have the GST, they would not need the streamlined accounting.

Mr. Bjornson: All businesses need accounting.

Mr. Laporte: Business is concerned about implementing the GST. It is one more load that they have to bear, one more expense that small business has to carry and which the government has blessed small business in the country with. Small business in rural Canada simply cannot afford it.

Of course, the other option is to leave the land. Producers cannot even leave the land. They are tied to it because of the policies of this government. According to the Farm Credit Corporation, the prices of farm land between 1984 and 1988 dropped almost 40 per cent in Saskatchewan, 29 per cent in Alberta, some 25 per cent in Manitoba, and 30 per cent in all of Canada. Therefore, farmers have a huge debt load, their equity does not meet their debt, and they are stuck in this position, not knowing where to turn.

This spring has really topped things off. There have been three or four years of bad weather and drought in western Canada. This year looks like there may be some good moisture for a change. If things stay as they are, this year we are going to have a decent crop. Yet we have producers unable to put seed in the ground because they cannot get a loan.

This government recognized that by making an announcement that it was putting up $500 million. It said that it knew farmers needed this money, but it was not going to give it to them. The government is holding out a carrot and saying: "We know you need this, but you try and grab it". The government has recognized that, at the very least, it is only half of what the producers need this year. But instead it is playing political games with the provinces and other Tory governments in the west. The loser is the producer. The producer is the one who suffers the loss in this whole thing. It is a sad commentary on this government's lack of compassion. It does not have a caring attitude toward's rural Canada.

The money is needed now. In fact, it was needed last week. There is a desperate need for those funds, but they will only help in the short term. The money that was needed last week is simply the beginning. It is a short-term measure that the government has proposed for only this spring. It has to bring forward a long-range program. Since 1985, it has been saying that it is going to be putting in a federal agricultural policy. It still has not done it yet. It has all kinds of studies, reports and green papers, but there is still nothing for producers.

We in the federal New Democratic Party have an alternative. We have had it for some time now. We have suggested to the government, and do so again right now, that the government should make an honest commitment to save farming families and rural Canada. That is what the commitment should be. It should not be to agri-business, but to the farming family, to the small community, to the small business people in those communities and to the people who want to live and retire in those communities.

The government should follow that commitment with some policies that have some teeth in them. First of all, through the Farm Credit Corporation, they should be providing loans at lower interest rates.

We are not asking for this commitment for all farms. As I and other members of the party have said, taking western Canada as an example, if you want to farm 10 sections, 15 sections or 50 sections of land, go ahead and farm it, but do not expect the government to assist you. However, we would like to see some assistance provided up to the level of a viable family farm. There should be lower interest rates for that. It should be universal up to a maximum amount.

Taking into account the high input costs that farmers suffer, there should be a commitment to lower costs. There has to be alternatives to chemicals. Biotechnology is very important and there should be money for research and development, which is a whole other speech on what this government has and has not committed to.

While the government is putting money into research and development for biotechnology, there should be a lower price for chemicals. The patent that these chemical companies have on chemicals is really outrageous. It is a licence to print money. There is no need for that type of legislation. It certainly hurts the farmer when he or she is putting in the crops.

We have also said that there should be a minimum price on grain. Not open-ended, but to a maximum. We said in 1988, 8,000 bushels. That would be approximately what it should be, 8,000 to 10,000 bushels, a maximum perhaps geared on the U.S. target price. For spring wheat, I believe that would be something in the area of $5 a bushel. There should also be an option for the producer to buy an insurance policy to ensure a further 8,000 or 10,000 bushels.

Then the producer could sit down in the spring, make a budget and know what he or she is going to grow and what he or she is going to receive for that crop. If they grow that number of bushels, they are going to receive the price for that grain.

I have talked to farmers in the area who have said: "I know I need another granary. I need another facility here. But I do not dare buy it because I do not know what is going to happen with any of the support programs. Those things come out helter-skelter at odd times so I have no way of planning". I have been told that by a number of farmers.

This is a logical approach which would help the family farm maintain itself.

There should also be a commitment to the Canadian Wheat Board. This government is slowly chipping away its mandate. Oats were removed, despite what the government said. There was no consultation with those producers who really counted. A poll came out and while I forget the exact figures, close to 70 or 80 per cent of the producers in western Canada said they would like to see oats remain under the Wheat Board. All the producers were asking to have a vote on the matter. The Canadian Wheat Board is a body that functions on behalf of the producers, by the producers for the producers. The least this government could have done was give the producers that option. The government talks about consultation. Well, it should have consulted with the very people who use the Canadian Wheat Board. There have been those kinds of votes in the past.

It is the same thing with canola. Canola is now a rising product. I know the Minister of Grains and Oilseeds has appointed a committee to look into that area and will be reporting back. But one of the things that should be suggested is the possibility of putting canola under the Wheat Board. If the Wheat Board had control of the sale of canola, it would open up markets, because it can garner large amounts of canola, if it is under the board's jurisdiction, to sell to corporations in the States that are looking for a guaranteed supply and right now they cannot find it. In fact, it is a very good opportunity for the Canadian Wheat Board. It is a very good opportunity for the western producer.

These are some of the things that this government can do. What we need is a short-term solution and a long-term commitment. The short-term solution is to provide the $500 million, and put it out where it can do some good. Instead of sitting on it, the government should be utilizing it.

The argument that the Minister of Agriculture has made many times is that he cannot give the money out because he has to negotiate with the provinces and they are not going to come across. Well, the time for negotiation is over. He can simply put the money out and say: "We have done our part. Here it is. This is not enough, but it is something". To hang on to that money is showing a callous disregard for the lives and the welfare of families living in rural Canada. That is simply what it is doing. There are families who are suffering in western Canada. They are suffering economically and this government is sitting on $500 million while that is happening.

In Saskatchewan, 16 per cent of the people are living below the poverty line and the government is sitting on $500 million. There are 60,000 people who are leaving the province because they cannot find work and the government sitting on $500 million. People do not understand that because it does not make any sense.

The motion is very simple and straightforward. Let us put the money out where it will do some good, and at the same time let the government make a commitment. We do not need rhetoric. We know that it has put billions of dollars out into the agriculture economy. That is not denied, but it has been misappropriated. It has not done the good that it could have done. It has been basically thrown around during election times to get votes and it had some effect there.

Make that commitment to the people. Make that commitment to rural Canada. Make that commitment to the people in Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Alberta, British Columbia and right across the country, as far as that goes. It is needed and it is needed now because we have a rural Canada whose infrastructure is disappearing, it is collapsing, and it is going to be gone. If we do not do something and do it very quickly a whole way of life is going to disappear. The government can say that the bottom line is important. In fact, that is what this government does say: "We have to look at the bottom line on this issue".

Mr. Speaker, we are talking about people's lives. There is more to life than simply the bottom line. That may be the Conservative attitude, but this is a different Tory government sitting here than the Tory government of John Diefenbaker. It is a new type of Tory. This is a neo-conservative government, that is what that is. It is a bottom line government that is paying no attention to the lives of Canadians.

The Minister of Finance can stand in the House, or in other forums and state: "We have come through economic times and now is time to tighten your belt". I would like him to go out to Saskatchewan or to rural Manitoba and tell some of those people that it is time for them to tighten their belts. They have tightened their belts and there are no notches left. In fact, it is so tight they are leaving for other areas.

I would suggest to the minister that when they talk about the bottom line there is another line there too. As the rural infrastructure collapses, instead of having a viable economy where there are many people working and many people living, we are going to have a barren rural area, with people crowding into urban centres competing with other people who do not have jobs themselves.

There is a fundamental problem with the policy that this government is following. The problem is that the government is not committing itself to the future of a way of life that is important to us all.

I would simply like to close by calling upon this government to make an announcement today concerning its $500 million. The money is needed right now. The government must make the commitment that not only will it spend the $500 million, but that it will make a long-term commitment to rural Canada.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, I would like to compliment the member on a fabulous speech and a great motion. When I heard the cynicism from the government side when they were heckling during his speech I re-read his motion and I could not understand why he was—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On a point of order, the Minister of Grains and Oilseeds.

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is accusing the government of heckling. I want the record to show that nobody on this side heckled the member when he was speaking.

Mr. Mills: Excuse me, Mr. Speaker, there was heckling on the other side and there were other people who heard it.

Mr. Friesen: Hansard will show you are wrong.

• (1530)

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, the point that I am trying to make is that the member's motion is something that we on all sides of the House should get behind. I do not see why the government cannot support this motion.

We are all concerned about the family farm and we all know that the government is playing poker with the provinces in terms of the releasing of this money. I would like to ask the member a question about possible diversification.

In my riding right now we are selling a product from the member's home province. It is an environmental product; briquettes made from distressed cereal grains. It is an attempt by a corporation in that province to get on to another mode of production and generating income.

The member is obviously very conversant with his community. Are there are other opportunities for industrial growth there, not unlike the selling of these distressed cereal grains that have been made into briquettes which are much more efficient and environmentally friendly? Do other such opportunities exist there?

Mr. Laporte: Yes, Mr. Speaker, diversification in rural Canada is a very important issue. One of the problems that we have in rural Canada is that farming has become such a specialized area that grain farmers are having difficulty. There is a need for secondary industry. There is a need to provide opportunities in order that family farms can maintain themselves. There is also a need for diversification for rural communities because in the west we have such a dependence on agriculture that when it is suffering, the communities suffer. In those areas where there is secondary industry, the communities are in a much better position.

Yes, there are opportunities. There is a need, though, to provide an environment. In fact, one of the things the government could be doing quite easily is providing some incentives for the smaller businesses to locate in other areas by providing some tax breaks and other opportunities. If the government would provide the milieu for that, they could survive. There are lots of opportunities and that would be well received.

I have talked to many people in my riding who were making suggestions with respect to various opportunities but who say that they cannot get funding and that it is just not viable to locate in some of these small communities. There are many opportunities and if the government would provide the milieu it would do an awful lot of good for rural Canada.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I have a short question for the hon. member from Saskatchewan. It relates to the Canadian Wheat Board, an institution to which farmers are emotionally attached. I shudder to think where farmers would be today without the Canadian Wheat Board. We know that in the past year the government took oats away from the Wheat Board and there are concerns about the future of the Wheat Board. Would the member from Saskatchewan like to comment on what he thinks is the immediate future of the Wheat Board?

Mr. Laporte: Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. colleague for that question. The Canadian Wheat Board is under a lot of stress. With the removal of oats, the Wheat Board is now relegated simply to wheat and barley. The prognosis for the Wheat Board is not very good. One of the main problems facing the Wheat Board is as a result of the free trade agreement. In the free trade agreement there is a clause that says that if at any time the subsidies on wheat, or barley, which affects the Wheat Board, are equal to or higher than those in the United States, American grain can start coming across the border. That almost happened this year. We came within a few fractions of a percentage point of that happening with respect to wheat.

If that happens, American grain will start coming across the Canadian border and there will be pressure from the Canadian side. Farmers will say: "Look, Americans are bringing grain across. Why can't we take grain across to the American side?" Then the government will say that it has consulted with people, that farmers want this to happen and that it is going to allow Canadian grain to go across the American border. That is a scenario that has been put forth a number of times.

I do not know why the hon. member is looking perplexed, but it exists. When that happens it will mean the end of the Canadian Wheat Board because people near the American border will be hauling their grain to the American side when the prices are high there. When they are low, they will be hauling it to elevators in Canada which will mean that the Canadian Wheat Board will not have the ability to market its grain in the world market and will be relegated to the lower selling price of grain.

When that happens, farmers who live 200 or 300 miles from the American border who cannot haul their grain across are going to complain that they are not getting the pooling price they were getting before because some Canadian farmers who are close to the border are hauling grain across the border. There is then going to be a call to remove the whole Wheat Board.

That is a viable and possible scenario. The free trade agreement would have allowed that to happen this year and it came very close to happening this year. It is going to happen in the future. That is in keeping with the government's lack of commitment to orderly marketing in this country. This is a real scenario.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to ask the member if he is against Canadian grain farmers exporting their grain to the United States. Do you want to pick and choose and markets you ship to?

I notice that the motion says: "That this House recognize that Canadian farmers face dire financial circumstances" for a number of different reasons. It seems to pretend that nothing has happened since this government came to office, that there has been no attention paid to farmers.

I would like to point out to the member that between the years 1985 and 1988 this government paid out about $3 billion in western grain stabilization payments. In 1987 it paid $1 billion in special grains; in 1988 it paid $1.1 billion; and in 1989 it paid $850 million in drought assistance, which is one of the things to which he is asking us to pay attention. In five years the government has paid out about $6 billion to the grain farmers in western Canada, not counting all the other farmers.

Would it not have been a slight measure of honesty to have put something on the record or in the motion recognizing that this government has, over the past five years, recognized some of the problems that western farmers have faced and given credit for the $6 billion that it has already invested in western farmers?

Mr. Laporte: Mr. Speaker, that was two questions. With respect to the question of marketing grain in the United States, the New Democratic Party is not opposed to farmers selling grain to the United States, but we would like to see it go through the Canadian Wheat Board. When it goes through the Wheat Board, through the pooling system, we believe that the farmer, over all, gets a better price for his or her grain. When the farmer sells it independently, the large American grain companies are able to pick them off. That is pure and simple.

We want to see a strong, viable Canadian Wheat Board marketing grain in the United States and throughout the world. The poll that was done last year indicates that so do about 80 per cent of the producers in western Canada.

With respect to the payments made by the Tory government of the last few years, what the member said is true. If the member had been listening to my comments, he would know that I did make note of that. I did say that this government has put billions of dollars into the agricultural economy, but it has been misappropriated; it has been misdirected.

That money could have been used much more wisely and much more efficiently if this government would have been committed to maintaining the family farm instead of throwing money out at election time, which it does. In fact, the $850 million came out 10 days before the last election. Ten days before the election the government was scrambling around for an announcement on grain. It knew it was going to lose seats in the west, and it did lose quite a few, but it came out with a $850 million announcement of a drought aid program. It did not have a clue where the money was going to go, it just knew it had $850 million, $45 an acre.

The point is that the government has put money into agriculture, yes, but it could have done it more wisely and more efficiently if it had the commitment of maintaining family farms and maintaining a viable rural economy and a viable rural infrastructure.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Questions and comments are now terminated. On a point of order, the hon. member for Sault Ste. Marie.

Mr. Butland: Mr. Speaker, I think we should point out that the hon. member who asked the question of my colleague did not stick around to hear the answer to the question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I do not think that is necessary. The hon. member is probably answering a phone call or watching it on television.

Mr. McDermid: Do you want us to stand up and say there isn't a farmer in the NDP here?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): On debate, the hon. Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds.

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, it is interesting to hear what goes on across the way. I noticed that the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood got up. I think it is fair to say that the only thing he knows about agriculture is the fact that he has something green in the name of his riding. When I hear him talking to the hon. member from—

Ms. Mitchell: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. As a member from an urban riding, I would like to object very strongly to the opening comments of the minister. All of us who represent urban ridings care very much about farmers in this land.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): That is not a point of order, it is a point of debate.

Mr. Mills: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would never, ever want to claim that I knew as much about agriculture as the minister, but I must tell the minister that I have been actively farming for close to 26 years on a full-time basis. I resent his shots. I think they are really cheap and I think that his attitude is such—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Order. That again is not a point of order. It is a point of debate. All hon. members will have an opportunity to ask questions and make comments.

Mr. McDermid: What nonsense. You bought the farm for an investment.

Mr. Mills: You're so smug, John, you don't see what's going on.

Mr. Harvard: So now the Tories are against investment. What a bunch of hypocrites.

Mr. McDermid: Who woke you up?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I was just saying that all hon. members will have an opportunity to question or comment on the minister's speech if we can get to it.

The hon. Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds.

Mr. Mayer: Thank you very much again, Mr. Speaker. I do not want to impugn anybody in terms of their attitude toward agriculture. What I was merely doing, when I referred to the hon. member for Broadview—Greenwood, was commenting on the observations he makes about agriculture. All I can do is judge people by the way they comment in the House. On the basis of those comments I have to assume, and unfortunately conclude, that he does not know very much about agriculture. When I hear him saying that the member from Moose Jaw gave a fabulous speech, it reminds me of the old saying that what we don't understand we explain to each other. That seems to be what was going on between these two.

The hon. member from Moose Jaw talks about the Canadian Wheat Board losing sales to the Soviet Union. Let me put the hon. member's mind at rest on that. That is not the case. We are in the fourth year of a five-year long-term grain sales agreement with the Soviet Union that calls for a minimum purchase of 25 million tonnes. The hon. member would like to know, I hope, that before the conclusion of the fourth year we will have sold over 20 million tonnes, so we are not losing sales to the Soviet Union as a result of EHP. That is not to say that we are not losing prices, which we are, but we are not losing sales.

The member talks about the Canadian Wheat Board being relegated to selling only barley and wheat. Let me tell you what that means. The hon. member should know that of the three grains that the board handled a year ago—wheat, oats and barley—oats made up one-quarter of 1 per cent of all sales. By volume it is less than one-quarter of one per cent.

In addition, as a result of us removing oats from the Canadian Wheat Board, there has been a considerable amount of investment in western Canada and some jobs have been created. In Portage la Prairie, Manitoba, there is an oat facility going up which is going to process about 100,000 tonnes of oats a year. They are going to spend $17 million. There are three reasons they are building in Portage. First, it is a good location, close to the U.S. The second reason is free trade, better access to the U.S. market. This is a $17 million investment. They are going to process 100,000 tonnes of oats, close to a quarter of Manitoba's annual production, in one facility. The third reason they are building there is because they no longer have to go to the board to buy oats.

There are similar investments going on in Alberta presently and there are also similar investments being contemplated in Saskatchewan. So when you talk about the Canadian Wheat Board and oats, there is another side to it, Mr. Speaker.

The hon. member referred to a survey which he said found that 70 per cent, and then as he got on in his speech he said 80 per cent, of the producers wanted the board to handle oats. That is true. But in that same survey the producers were asked who they thought would get them the most money, the board or private trade. A majority, I think about 60 per cent, said that the non-board selling of oats is going to get them more money. So, while a lot of people wanted the board to handle oats, a majority said that other than the board would get them more money for their product.

Let me talk a little bit here about the problem in this motion. The motion refers to drought, low initial prices, interest rates, and the international grain trade war. It suggests that we can solve all those things by putting $500 million into the farm economy. By the way, they are not low initial prices, they are low initial payments, if you want to really get technical about it. If the member is a farmer he should know that.

I grew up in the area which the member represents. I lived in Township 28, Range 5, west of the third, so I know a little bit about the member's riding.

Five hundred million dollars is not a lot of money to solve those problems. The hon. member says that we should pay out the money regardless of whether we are going to get the provinces to contribute. That is a little bit of a contradiction. If he worried about getting money to farmers, he should be worried about getting additional money from the provinces. You would think he would have included in his motion the ability to lever, if you will, additional cash from the provinces to give to the farmers. If we are going to put up the money which we have had on the table since the end of March and we are going to be able to get the provinces to contribute some additional cash, you would think that would help the farmers.

Edmund Burke defined a conservative as somebody who believes that nothing should ever be done for the first time and I have to think that that is the hon. member and his party and his policies. They do not want us to try to gain access to a rich market in the U.S. with better rules. They do not want us to go to GATT and negotiate to get better rules. They do not want to be part of the review process. We live in a changing world. The Minister of Agriculture has a major review under way with about 200 people in the industry involved from coast to coast. The hon. member and his party do not want any of those things. They are against all of those things. They are against the GST. The GST is going to benefit farmers to the tune of about $250 million.

Mr. Crawford: You've been off the farm too long, fellow.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mayer: I got their attention, Mr. Speaker. The crows were back on the prairies and they just arrived in the House.

How can somebody, in all good conscience, stand up and ask that the federal government give farmers $500 million, when he should know, if he does his homework, that because food is exempted farmers are not going to be paying the manufacturer's sales tax or the GST, when it is replaced, on agricultural products. They are not going to pay it on bearings, belts, pulleys, sprockets or antifreeze, on any of the agricultural parts that they now pay it on. They are not going to pay it on half-ton trucks.

Mr. Crawford: Is that a promise?

Mr. Mayer: They don't want to hear, Mr. Speaker. With due respect to the hon. member from Vancouver who made the point that she resents being talked about, there is not a farmer over there so they do not know what they are talking about.

The point is that with the removal of the manufacturer's sales tax and the application of the GST, food items—

Mr. Crawford: Repeat that: "Farmers will not pay GST."

Mr. Mayer: If the hon. member wants to get up on debate, we would be more than happy to hear him rather then have him yelling from his seat like he is. If he does not like what I am saying—

Mr. Crawford: I'm not going to have you stand up there and misquote.

Mr. Mayer: At the end of the day there is going to be no GST paid by farmers. It is going to save them $250 million. Why is the hon. member not supporting us in that? I do not understand this. What they are doing is totally political. We know what the NDP did in Saskatchewan, Mr. Speaker. It put in a land bank and proceeded to buy 1.3 million acres of land when it was in power in Saskatchewan. We know that record. We know what the Liberals did. They had their Prime Minister come out to western Canada to give us the finger and tell us to sell our own wheat. We know what their record is. What is the record of this government?

He talks about the over-all problem—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The member for Kamloops on a point of order.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I listened to my hon. friend, the Minister responsible for Grains and Oilseeds, referring to the situation out in the west. I wonder if he could confirm that the most recent projections are that 10,000 farmers in Saskatchewan alone will likely lose their farms this year?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member will have an opportunity on questions and comments to ask the minister a question.

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Speaker, I have with me projections done by Ag-Decision for the United Grain Growers which have just been released today which show seeding intentions. That might be a little more interesting. The hon. member in whose name the motion stands says that farmers are not going to get a chance to put their crop in the ground because of lack of credit or lack of finances. He might be interested in these figures.

In Manitoba over-all seeding intentions for wheat are up 8 per cent. They are up 3 per cent in Saskatchewan for wheat and up 6 per cent in Alberta. Over-all seeding intentions on the Prairies are up by 2 per cent. In other words, farmers are going to seed 2 per cent more land this year than they did last year.

To say it another way, summer fallow is going to be down. When you summer fallow you do not seed crop. Summer fallow is down 2 per cent and over-all seeding intentions are up. That does not sound to me like an industry that is going out of business.

Admittedly there are problems, there is no question there are problems. But also bear in mind that the motion only refers to grains and oilseeds and a little less than half of the industry is based on grains and oilseeds. It is roughly a $20 billion industry in Canada and a little over half of it is livestock products and other special crops. So we are talking about half of the industry.

I will give you some more interesting figures, Mr. Speaker. The member spoke about the FCC. There is no doubt we are concerned about interest rates. These are loans approved by region to the end of March this year. They are up this year over last year and I will give you the numbers for Saskatchewan. The number of loans is up from 558 last year to 751 this year. In other words, farmers are borrowing money to buy land, to increase their operations.

In Manitoba the number of loans a year ago was 156, this year it is 315. So over-all seeding intentions are up. Moisture conditions are a little better, and moisture conditions are a big part of it, there is no question about that. They are much better, although not universally. There is an area in the southwest corner of Manitoba and the southeast corner of Saskatchewan that still has problems with the weather. But over-all the industry is starting to turn around.

Second, there is no mention at all in the motion about what is going on at GATT. The grains and oilseeds industry is largely dependent on exports. We have to deal with what is happening at GATT. I happen to think that we have reasonable prospects for reaching an agreement at the GATT, for a couple of reasons.

First, this is the first time ever that agriculture has been on the main agenda as far as the GATT is concerned. That is a significant event in itself. These over-all discussions have been going on now for about four years.

Second, we saw a year and a half ago that if we could not get a proper deal in agriculture it was likely to jeopardize the whole round. Those, to me, are two reasons why there is room for optimism that we are going to settle some of these things at the GATT. If we can do that, we will know probably before the end of the year at which time the GATT negotiation period runs out, that is going to be a positive signal as far as the over-all industry is concerned.

So while there are concerns, which there is no question about, to signal that the whole industry is in dire straits, as this motion does, belies the over-all situation of agriculture.

What concerns me as much about the motion as anything is that there really is no over-all indication of what the hon. member and his party would do. We know they would spend more money. I do not know where they would get it. They would, I assume, print or borrow it, but they would spend more money. We have already pointed out that if that is their sole purpose they should be encouraging us to deal with the provinces to get additional money rather than simply saying that we should spend the money federally and hope that the provinces will kick in later.

The reason we should be concerned about this is that in his own province in the last four years, of every $100 of assistance that has been provided to a Saskatchewan farmer $87.75 has come from the federal government. That is not a particularly good record. In Manitoba, my own province, it is even worse. The number is $88.08 according to Agriculture Canada numbers.

If the hon. member is suggesting that we should simply send the money to the provinces and they will to kick in and give additional money to farmers, the past record does not indicate that is likely to happen. That is why if he was really concerned about getting money to farmers he should have indicated in his motion that we should be dealing with the provinces to get them to kick in additional money for farmers.

If the hon. is interested in interest rates I have some more interesting numbers here for him. These are FCC figues and he will know that a big part of the business done in Saskatchewan is with the FCC. Out of 64,000 accounts, 60,000 have interest rates of 13 per cent or less and 52,000 have interest rates of 12 per cent or less, the point being that there are a lot of locked-in interest rates. So as soon as interest rates go up there is not automatically an increase in the interest rate that everybody pays on all of the money they have borrowed.

I will tell you what operating credit amounts to. It is going to be pretty tough for a person to spend much more than $50 an acre this spring. I can go through how much will be spent for nitrogen, for phosphorous, for seed, for chemical for weed control, and for fuel. I think that $50 an acre would catch most farmers. It is certainly a ballpark figure. Knock that down by 10 per cent. Ten per cent on $50 an acre is $5 a year. For six months that is about $2.50 an acre.

I should also point out that fertilizer prices are down a little bit this spring. On my own farm we are buying nitrogen cheaper than I bought it for four or five years, and I think the same is true for phosphorous. So there are some things that are a little cheaper this year than they were.

So there are some thing that have changed in terms of operating costs. In talking about the immediate effect of what is going on with the interest rates you have to take those numbers into consideration. We are talking about lines of credit for immediate cash cost to put a crop in. In a six-month period, which is how most of that is rolled over, we are talking in the area of $2 to $3 an acre. That is a certain amount of money but not enough to put everybody in dire straits.

Let me conclude by laying out what this government has tried to do in terms of agriculture. It is really, if you will, a three-pronged attack. We live in a changing world. We produce some very high quality products in this country. We are taking advantage of those.

They want to talk about the Canadian Wheat Board being threatened. I have never heard such a bunch of nonsense in all my life. This was the government that stood behind the Canadian Wheat Board when three years ago it ran over a $200 million deficit in the pool accounts, contrary to what the previous Liberal government did in the early 1970s when it instituted the Lift program and took our farmers right out of the international market.

With the high-quality products and the changing markets that we have, we are looking to use some of our strong points to continue to sell. The member talked about selling to the United States. Just ponder this for a moment. The U.S. is the largest exporter of wheat in the world. It exports somewhere around 40 million tonnes per year. It has been down to 30 million tonnes and up to 45 or 47 million tonnes, but just take 40 million tonnes as an average. Forty-two million tonnes per year, that is what they export.

• (1600)

Canada used to be the second largest exporter. The Europeans have overtaken us now for subsidy reasons that I will get into in a minute, because that is my second point. We are probably now going to be third. We export somewhere close to half that, a little less than 20 million tonnes. We do not buy any wheat from the U.S. A little bit comes into southern Ontario, but very little.

Why would the U.S. buy from us if it is the biggest? The U.S. was our fifth largest customer last year. If oilseeds are included, it is fourth largest customer. That says something about the quality of the product we produce. It does not buy from us because it likes us or because we happen to be neighbours. It buys from us because it likes quality of product and the way we perform on contracts and deliver.

For someone to suggest that the Canadian Wheat Board is under threat because of the free trade agreement does not make any sense based on past performance. I would argue that the other way around. It will be more difficult for the Americans to use Section 22 of their ag adjustment legislation, which lets them shut the border literally on 24 hours' notice, with the free trade agreement, than it was previously. It gives the Wheat Board a better chance to sell into a high-priced market.

Second, we are doing our very best to deal with what is going on internationally. In my view, the Europeans amount to international bandits when it comes to agricultural products. They have stolen our markets with subsidies.

Everyone talks about the Americans. The hon. member talked about the U.S. and the president increasing their Export Enhancement Program. I said the Americans are the largest exporters. They export between 80 and 90 million tonnes of all grains per year. They are likely to spend less than $500 million this year, and perhaps considerably less. They have more appropriated, but they may not spend it all. They have $500 million of export subsidy to export over 80 million tonnes.

The Europeans will export about 30 million tonnes and they will spend about $3.5 billion. We have every right to be angry with the Americans. We send them notes to let them know we are unhappy every time they do those things. But, if one is angry with the Americans on what they do with their Export Enhancement Program, we should be 15 times as angry with the Europeans because that is how much worse the Europeans are. That is why we have to get a resolution to this at the GATT process. That is why we are putting so much emphasis on what is going on internationally.

Our Prime Minister has not given western farmers and Canadian farmers the finger and told them to sell their own wheat. He has been leading the charge at discussions to get some of these things resolved internationally. That is a measure of leadership: to take one's responsibilities seriously and to do something about it. When one thinks about how high some of these subsidies are and how reliant we are on exports for markets, the international market is very, very important to us. For example, in the hon. member's province, producers have to export over 80 per cent of the wheat they grow. So, the second thing we are doing is negotiating as toughly as we can internationally.

Third, we have been supporting our farmers through this difficult time. The hon. member mentioned the money we have spent. They can say it was spent wisely. It is not an easy task to distribute 200,000 cheques and we admit the program was not perfect. But, by and large, it was a well-run program. We got a lot of money to producers when they needed it. We have been doing that.

Another thing that is going on is an over-all review of agricultural policy in the country. It is interesting to note how we are doing it. The Minister of Agriculture is not doing it himself, or with the bureaucrats of the department. The producers and the industry itself are involved. We have seven task forces in place involving approximately 200 people: producers, processors, university professors, people who have been involved in the industry and have a stake in the industry. They are the ones who are doing the review. The part of the review that is the furthest advanced is the one on safety-nets. That is what we want to get at as quickly as we can.

Our record on agriculture is a good one, and I say that as a farmer. We are taking advantage of our strong points as far as selling to keep our markets. We are negotiating to have fairer and more even access to international markets because we do not believe that might is right when it comes to international trade in agriculture.

We have increased the amount of direct support to our producers by approximately 600 per cent in the last six years as a measure of confidence in the industry. We believe there are better days ahead if we can solve some of these problems and I believe that we will.

Mr. Dennis Mills (Broadview—Greenwood): Mr. Speaker, first, I would like to correct the minister. The former Prime Minister—and he mentioned this three times during the course of his speech—never, ever gave his finger to the farmers of western Canada. He was on a private holiday with his three boys and he was heckled and harassed—

An hon. member: Salmon Arm, B.C.

Mr. Mills: That is right, it was in Salmon Arm, B.C. His former presence here seems to really rattle members opposite at times.

At any rate, I always thought the purpose of this national government was to lead and to take over when disadvantaged regions or problems could not be met by the provinces. The way the minister talks, it seems as if there is absolutely no problem with the farming community in the country. Agriculture Canada is predicting 39 per cent decreases in agricultural income. He almost comes across as if everything is okay.

At what point does the national government move to help these farmers, regardless of whether of not the province comes in? By the way Premier Devine is acting and speaking on national television, it looks as if he is not about to put his cheque on the table. As a national politician, not a provincial one—and I know that the minister tends to put things off onto the provinces—at what point in time does he act, or does he just let the whole thing go?

Mr. Mayer: I have a couple of comments, Mr. Speaker. Our record has been pretty impressive when it comes to dealing with the provinces of western Canada in support of agriculture. I just gave the hon. member the numbers.

Our responsibility for agriculture is a shared jurisdiction under the BNA Act and our Constitution. I do not have the section in my head, but it is in the same section that refers to fisheries. It is a shared responsibility between the provinces and the federal government. In the last four years, the over-all average for the Prairies has been slightly over 80 per cent direct support from the federal government. It would seem to me that that would indicate our record is pretty good and that would be what we could expect.

We are trying to get as much money as we possibly can into the hands of farmers. If we can get a little extra money from the provinces to distribute, that is going to help the farmers. Our responsibility is there, our money is on the table, and we are going to have to act eventually. In the meantime, we want to get the provinces to own up to some of the responsibilities that they have for agriculture which is a shared jurisdiction.

I did not in any way suggest that it is all rosy in agriculture. What I try to do is put some balance on it, and there is some balance. The cattle markets are not that bad. Hog prices are up a little bit, especially in the last two weeks. If one follows what is going on in North America, it does not look that bad for the livestock industry. A big part of our industry is supply managed. They are not doing too badly. It is a $20 billion industry. About $9 billion of it comes from agriculture and about $11 billion comes from the other parts of it. That other part, by and large, is not that bad.

There are sections in the grain and oilseeds industry that are not that bad. I was trying to put it into perspective. Seeding intentions are up. Farm Credit Corporation loans are up, not significantly but that is better than having them down. I was just trying to put some balance on it. Things are not good in a big part of the grain and oilseed area, but there is a part of it that is doing reasonably well.

We will come good on our responsibility. Our money is there. Again, if through some negotiations with the province we can get a little extra money to the farmers, which is what this motion is about, it would seem to me that the opposition and the NDP should be supporting us in our negotiations with the provinces to get a bigger financial package to present to farmers.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I want to say that, in anticipation of the motion today, I made a point of dropping into a number of cattlemen's operations in my constituency over the weekend. In talking to them and, today, talking to relatives of mine from Saskatchewan who are farmers, they acknowledged that there are various programs they find helpful from time to time, but they said it all pales when one considers what the government is doing in terms of interest rates.

Looking at the facts, one finds that the Farm Credit Corporation has had to increase its interest rates four times this year. My hon. friend is a farmer. He will know that at the present interest rates it is impossible to maintain a farm for any length of time. It is absolutely impossible.

I want to ask my hon. friend if he could comment on what efforts he is making on behalf of the farmers of Canada to convince the Minister of Finance and the Governor of the Bank of Canada to get those interest rates down. If they continue as they have been doing for a number of weeks or months, he knows, as I tried to ask earlier, that literally thousands of farms will go by the board. Thousands of farm families will have to leave the land.

Farm families in my constituency are leaving the land primarily because of interest rates and through no fault of their own. They are hard working and committed. They have the expertise, but they have no control over interest rates. They say they cannot meet their interest rate obligations at these very high levels. Could my hon. friend comment on what efforts he is making to try to convince the Minister of Finance to do the right thing and to move those rates down before we drive everybody off the land?

Mr. Mayer: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member raises a point that the NDP contradicts every day in Question Period.

One of the best ways to get interest rates down is to reduce government spending. The motion calls for us to spend money. I suspect that it would not be bashful about asking us to spend more. The federal government cannot spend more money when it has to go and borrow it. At the same time, the hon. member stands up and says: "Get interest rates down." If he wants interest rates down, he should tell us not to spend the $500 million. The hon. member should make up his mind. He cannot have both.

I know what is going on as far as interest rates are concerned. I farm. I have farmed all my life, and I know what interest rates do to us. I also know that, if we do not deal with inflation, there is a good chance we will go through the same experience of the early 1980s when the hon. member and I were both in opposition. We saw interest rates go up over 20 per cent. If he thinks they are bad now, they are going to get worse if we do not deal with this properly. He will be up again to criticize the government for letting the rates get out of hand.

Dealing with the problems of getting inflation down and our deficit is the best medicine I know in terms of getting interest rates down on an over-all basis. Just to say it again, interest rates are high. Everybody wants them lower. Most of all the Minister of Finance wants them lower because he has to pay the interest on the national debt. That is an incentive for him to keep them down. There are no magic solutions, but bear in mind what I said.

If one is buying livestock, it is a different story. It will be bought on a short-term basis. I follow the feeder market. The feeder market for light cattle in our country is up $1.15 or $1.20 a pound. Prices are not that bad. If cattlemen were scared by high interest rates, they would be backing off on the prices. They factor that into their decision-making process; the more they pay on interest, the less they can pay for cattle. But the price of light feeder cattle is not that bad right now. I sold cattle about two weeks ago for more money per pound than I think I have ever sold cattle in my life.

Second, I make the point that with FCC loans, 60,000 out of 64,000 accounts have interest rates below 13 per cent. The hon. members says the rate should be even lower. Nobody will get locked into higher interest rates simply because they are up for three, four or five months. If the rates go up and stay up for a period of a year or two years, it is a different story. Hopefully, what the Minister of Finance is doing will cause the rates to come down and we will be in a position in which they can come down and stay down, contrary to the experience we went through in 1981-82 when we saw them get close to 25 per cent.

Mr. Rex Crawford (Kent): Mr. Speaker, I have a question of clarification to the hon. minister.

The hon. minister has stated that farmers will not be paying the GST. Am I right? Will farmers not be paying GST?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is that the hon. member's question?

Mr. Crawford: There is more.

He also was elated that the Farm Credit Corporation is lending out more money. In my riding, this would worry me because that is the last resort for a farmer who cannot get money from the bank. It would tell me farmers were in trouble. Instead of going to the bank or mortgage company, they are going to FCC to get their mortgage money.

Also, regarding high interest rates, the hon. minister is quoting $50 an acre netting out at $2 to $3 an acre. In our farming in southwestern Ontario, we are talking about hundreds of dollars an acre. We cannot afford 2 per cent or 3 per cent higher interest rates. They are killing the farmers in my riding. The three questions are these. In the future, will farmers pay GST. Why do you feel that more farmers are borrowing from the Farm Credit Corporation instead of the banks. Last, would he break down the interest rate on farming so that I can understand it because an increase of 3 per cent in my operation would put me under. The average gross for farmers in our riding in Ontario is $120,000, with a net of $4,400. How do you live on $4,400?

Mr. Mayer: In regard to the GST, I said at the end of the day that farmers will not be paying GST on all their inputs that they pay taxes on now. That includes bearings, belts, lumber, hardware, paint, all of those things. They will pay it and they will get a refund. At the end of the day they will not be paying it. I did say there was going to be some exemptions and I think that list is close to being public. You are not eligible now for a refund of manufacturers' sales tax on all the things you buy when you go to a hardware store.

You can smile if you want but a lot of farmers would think that that is not a bad deal. For instances, when you buy a new half-ton truck, you pay the manufacturers' sales tax on it. I do not know what that would amount to but I would expect $1,500 or $2,000. If you use that new half-ton truck in your business, or on a farm, you are going to get the GST back.

I said at the end of the day there will not be any GST paid. This means on some items you will pay it up front and you will apply for a refund. For some of the big ticket items you will be exempted at the start.

The second question the hon. member asked was about FCC. I acknowledge that it is not a great item, that it is not something to be elated about. But I guarantee that if FCC loans were down, members opposite would be standing up criticizing the fact that FCC is not lending money.

Farmers are making a business decision. If they do not like the interest rate at the FCC, and FCC does not think it is a good business plan they are not going to lend money. But it is a little bit of a positive signal at least that arrears are down for FCC and some of their loans are up. I have the numbers here and can share them with the hon. member after.

The third item he talks about is interest. He is absolutely right. I was referring to $50 an acre on the prairies which would be an average variable or input cost for putting a crop in. You go to southern Ontario and I suspect the numbers may be closer to $200 an acre with potatoes and some of those specialty crops. But again if you are talking $200 an acre, let us say you took off 10 per cent of that, which is $20 an acre. For half a year it is $10 an acre. On a crop like potatoes where you may gross $600 or $700 an acre, $10 an acre is no more in terms of a percentage, a factor to you, than $2 or $3 an acre is if you are going to gross $120 or $130 an acre.

But the point is that because interest rates go up immediately farmers do not pay those increased interest rates on all of the money they borrow. It affects livestock producers when they have to buy every time they turn over their cattle. It affects farmers immediately when they go with a line of credit to put their crop in in the spring. But by and large that is not the majority amount of money that is borrowed by farmers. So there is a delayed effect there.

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the minister with great interest and noted that he said that he tried to give a balanced presentation, that he tried to put some of the farm issues in context. I appreciate that effort, although I think that he failed miserably at some stages.

I felt as I listened to the minister that there was a touch of unreality to some of his remarks. When he celebrates—and I choose the word carefully—celebrates the taking out of more loans by farmers, whether it is from FCC or from the banks, it is an absurdity with a touch of unreality. I do not think farmers are ever happy to go to the bank or the FCC to borrow money. I am astonished that the minister would use loan figures and put them in a positive light as if it were something to celebrate. I am astonished.

He also told us about the use of less summer fallow. I was born and raised on a farm. In fact, I lived the first 19 years of my life not too far from the hon. minister's farm. I lived in exactly the same riding that he has represented for a number of years. I think I know a little bit about farming.

When farmers plant more and rely less on summer fallow does not suggest that there is confidence in the air and that farmers are exuberant and enthusiastic about the future. I will tell you what it is. Farmers are human beings, they have a human nature. When they feel the crunch and the pressure is building they will resort to almost anything to increase their revenue. That means planting more and taking more land out of summer fallow. That is exactly what they will do.

There really is a touch of unreality about some of the minister's remarks. He pooh-poohed the remarks of the member from Saskatchewan when that member expressed concern about the future of the Canadian Wheat Board. There is a concern in western Canada about the future of the Canadian Wheat Board. The minister was sort of suggesting that we should not worry, it is not going to be taken over by private interests or it won't be abolished or anything. I have a quote here from the Commissioner of the Wheat Board, Mr. Jarvis. He said recently that an "open border", that is, open between Canada and the United States, "could happen as early as next year, partly because of the 1988 drought. Subsidies are currently $40 and $50 a tonne above Canada's, that the drought of 1988 sharply reduced Canadian crop reduction increasing Canada's per unit subsidies on wheat and barley in the process".

Mr. Speaker, you do not have to take the word of the member from Saskatchewan or my word. Take it from the chief commissioner of the Wheat Board. Things could dramatically change in the very near future.

The other thing, and again I think it has this air of unreality, the minister says with some vehemence and great emotion is that farmers will not pay the GST. I appreciate the fact that they may get GST back that they have paid on inputs but at the same time, farmers are consumers. If the GST is on haircuts, farmers have haircuts and they will have to pay the GST. If the GST is on a pair of trousers, I will bet you dollars to doughnuts that farmers will have to pay the GST on trousers. Somehow the minister is implying that farmers are not consumers, they never buy anything outside of trucks and tractors and cultivators. That is what I mean when I talk about the minister's remarks having a touch of unreality.

I would like to point out a few other things because I am mindful of the fact it is May 16. Here in the capital and back in my home city of Winnipeg, we notice that the sun is getting stronger, the temperatures are getting higher, the landscape is getting greener, kids are thinking about final examinations and getting out of school and having a fun time during July and August. Families and parents are thinking about their vacation plans as well. But what about down on the farm at this particular time, on May 16, 1990? I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the farmers are in a frantic period. Farmers are in a scramble because this is seeding time. The deadlines for farmers are very tight. They do not have the luxury of planting any old time they want. Of course, the weather can always be a problem. When the farmers have that moment to put the grain in the ground, they do exactly that. We appreciate what farmers are going through at this time, but that is a normal thing. It happens every spring and it goes with the trade, if I can use those words.

It is hardly normal on the farm these days because farmers are being hounded on so many fronts from so many directions. In this debate earlier this afternoon, we heard about the high interest rates, low commodity prices, low initial prices and about the subsidy war between the United States of America and European countries. Canadian farmers on the prairies are still feeling the effects of the 1988 drought, and the 1990 year is still in doubt. We do not know how it is going to be. Is it going to be another dry year, or is there going to be adequate precipitation?

While I am talking about farmers being assaulted on a number of fronts, another assault is on their support programs. I will touch on that if I can in a few moments.

A combination of these factors spells disaster for farmers. Mr. Speaker, you have heard the figures before, but I think they are worth repeating. Farm income will plummet this year. These figures do not come from opposition members or from someone off the street. They come from Agriculture Canada.

In Saskatchewan, the province that is going to be the hardest hit, it is expected that farm income will drop 87 per cent. In my home province of Manitoba, farm income is expected to drop 57 per cent. In Alberta, the figure is around 46 per cent.

What is the main reason for this expected diminution in farm income? It is the reduction of the farm support programs of the federal government. In fact, the reduction in farm support programs, which is in the neighbourhood of $400 million—a lot of money—accounts for 57 per cent, more than half of the expected drop in farm income this year. That is devastating.

Of course, there is this big hassle that has been going on for weeks about the federal government's so-called $500 million farm aid program. I want to talk about it a little bit more.

I mentioned earlier some of the problems facing farmers including high interest rates. I want to touch on that, because I think you and I know, Mr. Speaker, that the interest rates are skyrocketing. The latest announcement from FCC indicates that some of the rates are now over 14 per cent. That is an enormous burden on farmers who are already in a very difficult situation.

Let me allude to some figures from the province of Saskatchewan. The provincial land security board in that wheat province received 246 notices involving 204 farms in March alone, while the federal Farm Debt Review Board received 193 applications in February. Both of these boards have dealt with more than 7,000 farmers since 1985, and the trend is expected to continue. That is one figure from the province of Saskatchewan which is very disturbing.

How costly and how burdensome are these high interest rates? According to calculations of experts, every 1 per cent of interest cost takes over $200 million in annual debt servicing costs out of the pockets of Canadians farmers. Every time the interest rate goes up one digit, it is tantamount to taking $200 million out of the Canadian farmers' pockets. They just cannot afford it.

The Manitoba Debt Review Board recently reported that it has dealt with farmers facing $300 to $400, or even $600 a day in interest charges alone. Can you imagine up to $600 a day in interest charges, Mr. Speaker?

Since 1985, the Farm Credit Corporation has entered into 2,900 recovery actions, and has captured a total of 2,719 farms.

In 93 per cent of its recovery actions, the FCC has settled by taking the land from the farmer. I find that extremely disturbing.

I know that the minister might accuse us of distorting the issue and putting it in darker terms than warranted. But we have to tell this side of the story because we know we are always going to get the rosy picture from a minister of that government. We have a responsibility to give this side of the story. If we do not, we are going to let a lot of farmers down. They want Canadians to know that they are suffering, and of the vicissitudes that they face in every day life.

I spoke about low commodity prices. The Wheat Board announced this spring a reduction of about 12 per cent to 15 per cent. I wanted to mention something about putting some of these commodity prices in context.

There was an interesting piece written by a gentleman by the name of Murray Fulton, an Associate Professor of Agriculture Economics at the University of Saskatchewan in Saskatoon. Speaking of putting things in context, this is what he said about low commodity prices that farmers have to live with. I will read only one paragraph from his piece which appeared in the May 7, 1990, edition of the Financial Times of Canada.

> To set the record straight, the problem is very severe indeed. Grain prices, when adjusted for inflation, are the lowest they have ever been—even lower than during the 1930s. Poor crop quality and yields in recent years have made the problem worse. Agriculture Canada forecasts that this year, Saskatchewan farm income would be one-seventh the average over the last five years.

That gives us some idea of what farmers are facing.

When farmers heard about the lower prices this spring, they were of course shocked. While I am in the mood of quoting people, I would like to pass along a quote from a farmer in my province of Manitoba, upon hearing about the lower wheat prices. He said: "What terrible news for farmers. It's a deeper cut than I expected". Those are the words of the president of the United Grain Growers.

I would like to say just a few words about this unmerciful subsidy war that is going on between European countries and the United States. It is helping to kill agriculture in Canada because the farmers, beyond their own control, are caught in what you might call a cross-fire. They are almost pawns in a deadly game.

Unlike their counterparts in the U.S. and European countries, Canadian farmers, I must remind you, Mr. Speaker, are not guaranteed a support price. The best they have is a floor price, which is usually well below world prices.

There are programs such as the Western Grain Stabilization Program. Of course that kind of a program helps, but it is far from perfect. The level of support is not known in advance. Worse still, there can be no payments in any given year. This year is an example. That is because payments are based on a moving five-year average. So there can be no payments even after several years of bad crops.

What about the cuts in farm support programs? I mentioned earlier these reductions amounting to about $400 million. Just to enumerate them, they are these. Crop insurance was slashed by $200 million. The grain and flour program was cut by $60 million. The Rail Branchline Rehabilitation Program was reduced by $48 million. Grain and crop advance payments were cut by $54 million, while the dairy export program was cut by $12 million. Commodity based loans were reduced by $15 million, and the Canadian Dairy Commission by $10 million. That amounts to a total of $399 million.

Now I come to the most recent controversy having to do with the federal government's offer of a $500 million farm aid program, a program I suppose designed to get money into farmers' pockets right now. I wish it was happening right now. But all we find is confrontation from the federal government, a bid by the federal government to somehow divide and conquer over the provinces, to break down an understandable common front, particularly put together by the prairie governments.

It has been said over and over again that farmers need the money right now, although somehow or another I think the federal government is not listening. I think it is unwarranted and unfair—it is brutal—that the federal government would say: "Here is the $500 million on the table, but we have all kinds of strings attached. Unless the provincial governments come through, you ain't going to get the money. You're just not going to get it".

I do not think farmers deserve that kind of treatment. If the federal government is really sincere, if it wants to help farmers this way, and it is just one way of helping—it is not the whole ball of wax, and we know that—it would forget about these strings, sever them and release the money because the money is needed now.

Again, Mr. Speaker, you do not have to take my word or the word of the member for Moose Jaw—Lake Centre. Perhaps you would like to listen to the prairie premiers. They do not agree with the federal government.

The prairie premiers, you will note, Mr Speaker, belong to the same political party as does the hon. minister. They are all Progressive Conservatives.

What did they say just a few days ago about this offer? Let me quote what was said because I think it is notable what they said. It is notable because it supports what we have been saying on this side of the House for a long time. This is what the prairie premiers stated in their press release:

> Premiers demanded that the federal government's offer of $450 million of assistance to Canadian grain and oilseed producers and $50 million of assistance to other agricultural producers should be paid immediately and without any strings attached.

The western premiers also stated in their news release:

> The Western premiers noted that the 1990 income deficiency is a direct result of international trade subsidy wars and, as such, must be addressed by the federal government. Provincial treasuries are simply not equipped to take on the treasuries of the United States or the European community.

It is also notable what members of the legislature in the Province of Saskatchewan did. They are totally dissatisfied with the federal government's arguments with respect to withholding the moneys until the provinces come through.

• (1640)

What did this motion that was passed 41 to 0 in the Saskatchewan legislature state? I guess there is a preponderance of Conservatives in that House.

The motion states:

> —this assembly condemns the Government of Canada for failing to provide adequate assistance to Saskatchewan farmers at a time when a sharp drop in the initial price will mean a loss of $500 million to $600 million to Saskatchewan farmers. And, further that this assembly calls on the Government of Canada to provide an immediate direct federal cash payment of $500 million to Saskatchewan farmers, as advocated again by the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool on May 2, 1990, and to implement a sound long term farm income stabilization plan.

In conclusion, the time now is for action and not for rhetoric. That is what the farmers are demanding. It is the least that they deserve.

Hon. Charles Mayer (Minister of Western Economic Diversification and Minister of State (Grains and Oilseeds)): Mr. Speaker, there are many things I could take issue with, but I will pick just three.

Farmers are people. To the extent that that means they are consumers, they are going to pay the GST. When I was talking—and I hope no one misunderstood me—I was talking about farmers as businessmen. That is what I meant when I said that a farmer is a businessman and at the end of the day is not going to be paying the GST. I assumed that that would have been obvious, but apparently it was not.

Second, I would like to give some figures with respect to what has been happening with FCC, and they will give more of a picture. Of all the land that FCC owns, it has leased back about 55 per cent of it, and about 95 per cent of that land has been leased back to the original borrower. If we put it in that kind of a context, over half the people who have had financial difficulties with FCC have ended up, through the Farm Debt Review Board system, leasing that same land back. So all those people are not put off the land.

If we look at the number of hearings that have been held, hearings of the Farm Debt Review Board where FCC has been involved, we see that there have been 6,000 hearings. Some 73 per cent of the farmers in all those cases have continued farming. So there is a little bit of a success story there. Again, I am not painting it as all being rosy, but to get up and say that the FCC owns all this land and by implication the people who did own it no longer farm is not the case.

The last point I would make has to do with the hon. member saying that the decrease in summer fallow is not a good sign. In this business if you do not sow, you do not reap. That is what it is all about. Summer fallow means just that. You fallow it for the summer; you do not seed. I do not see how anybody with some common sense can take a decrease in summer fallow acres as anything but a positive sign. It costs less to look after an acre of summer fallow for a year than it does to crop. It means that farmers are exhibiting a little bit of confidence in the industry because they are seeding more this year than they did last year.

I could go on. There is pretty good evidence around that in some areas summer fallow adds to salinity as far as farm land is concerned. There has been some pretty good work done at the University of Saskatchewan on this subject. It is an indication to me as a farmer, and someone with some common sense, that when summer fallow acreage goes down that is a positive sign for the industry. As I said, if you do not sow in this business you do not reap. What it is all about is producing something so that you can harvest it.

Mr. Harvard: Mr. Speaker, I really think there are more important matters to be talking about than summer fallow acreage.

Let me just try this once again because I think the hon. minister did not hear me very well, or that he misunderstood me.

First, he was the one who mentioned this figure of a 2 per cent reduction in summer fallow acreage. I think it would be reasonable to suggest that 2 per cent is probably within a margin of error. Two per cent is not a lot. I find it astonishing for him to suggest that by taking a small figure of 2 per cent it implies confidence in the agricultural community. At best, it may say nothing at all.

I would also suggest, and this by way of repetition, that my experience on a farm suggests that when farmers feel under pressure they will sometimes take land out of fallow that they perhaps originally did not intend to. They do it because they are going to use every available piece of soil to make a buck, even when in their ideal moments they would like to take a plot of land, a field and put it in fallow for a year and give it a rest.

For the minister to take this 2 per cent figure having to do with summer fallow acreage and turn it into a confidence factor is absurd. It fits in with my comments related to his. His remarks, in my opinion, have an air of unreality about them.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his speech. I want to make a comment and ask a question of the hon. member.

The minister spoke in his speech in glowing terms of how much this Conservative government—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I suggest that the hon. member concentrate on the speech made by the hon. member for Winnipeg—St. James since it is his speech that he is commenting on.

Mr. Laporte: In the past members of the government have made many comments—and this was referred in the hon. member's speech—to the effect that the government has made a major contribution to agriculture in this country and in fact that it has supported agriculture and that agriculture is doing very well. I would just like to throw in a couple of figures here, if I could, and I will focus on Saskatchewan.

From the time that this Conservative government came into power in 1984 the level of farm debt in Saskatchewan rose from about $4 billion to almost $6 billion. Today, the level of farm debt in Saskatchewan is over $6 billion. One-third of the farmers carry 70 per cent of that debt.

As well, since 1984, since this government took power, foreclosures have tripled in Saskatchewan. This year farmers are faced with something like 10,000 foreclosures in Saskatchewan.

Contrary to what the government is saying and contrary to what has been said today, I do not see where the farmers of Saskatchewan are doing so well. I would just like to ask the hon. member if he knows of anywhere in the province of Manitoba, or anywhere else in this country, where the farmers are doing well and where rural Canada is doing well.

Surely, based on what the minister is saying, there has to be some areas in this country where farming is doing very well. I would like to know where that is. Does the hon. member have any idea of where that might be?

Mr. Harvard: I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, that an uncle of my wife who lives in the Humboldt, Saskatchewan area feels—

Mr. Friesen: That's heavy research.

Mr. Harvard: That is heavy research. I do not want the hon. member from British Columbia to trivialize my remarks because farmers know what they are talking about. There is an old expression from where I came that goes this way: You didn't come down the river on a bale of hay. I know a lot of farmers and most farmers did not come down the river on a bale of hay. They know their business and they know it well.

What I was going to say about my wife's uncle who lives near Humbolt, Saskatchewan, is that he feels that he is one of the lucky ones. He is a man probably near 70 years of age. He is up there with some other people in this hallowed Chamber. He is lucky because he has been on the farm a long time and is not heavily in debt. In fact, I suspect that he does not have any debt at all. He is in the sunset years of his farming experience.

But what about the young people? What about the young men and women who would like to take up a life on the farm and they are in their early twenties? What do they face?

I do not think I have to tell my good friend from Moose Jaw—Lake Centre the proposition that they face. It is almost impossible, what with the cost of land, the cost of machinery, the cost of loans and these low commodity prices. As I said earlier, when you take inflation into account, these prices are lower than those that prevailed in the 1930s.

It is true that you can find happy stories. You can find successful stories. They are here and they are there. I am happy for that. I am delighted. I wish every Canadian farmer would show a profit. I wish every Canadian farmer could take a vacation two or three weeks every year and feel that he could afford it. But those farmers are few and far between.

The reason I say that is because all we have to do is look at the indicators, look at the statistics. The information is absolutely overwhelming. The farm story is a disturbing one—farmers are in a terrible dilemma. The future, if anything, is perhaps even worse than what they face right now.

I go back to what I said earlier, that is, farmers deserve something better. Haggling, bargaining and confrontation has been going on between the federal government and the provinces. The farmers deserve better than that.

I do not think there is any doubt about it, but that the federal government has to take almost all the blame. As far as we know it has the money. It says that it is prepared to give it. It says it is on the table, but it will not release it despite the need of the farmers. It will not release it unless the provinces meet certain conditions. That is unfair.

Mr. Simon de Jong (Regina—Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, it is indeed a privilege for me to join the debate today and to have this opportunity to express to the House the plight of many of my constituents in my constituency of Regina—Qu'Appelle.

Over 50 per cent of the voters in my riding live outside the urban area of Regina. Many of them are farmers or living in smaller communities that are very dependant upon the farm economy. Most of them are dry-land farmers. There is some mixed farming and some cattle operation in my district, but most are grain farmers.

As I have travelled around my riding and gone through the coffee shops and talked to farm people in the garages, the town halls and up and down Main Street in the many small communities that make up part of Regina—Qu'Appelle, I have never seen such a depressed mood as I have found this year. There is a sense of hopelessness and of helplessness. There is a sense that nobody is listening to them. They see the value of their lands decreasing year after year. They see the value of what they are so proud to produce, some of the best grain in the world, decreasing. They are some of the most efficient producers in the world. Yet when they sit back and add up the costs of production and what they will get for the produce, it just does not make sense.

When you look at the statistics, Mr. Speaker, particularly for the farm economy in Saskatchewan, you begin to see the dimension of the problem. Saskatchewan has the fastest growing rate of poverty in the country, second only to Newfoundland.

A total of 303 communities in the province have lost population since 1986. A thousand farm families leave the land every year in Saskatchewan and are not replaced.

In 1989, Saskatchewan recorded the highest level of bankruptcies in the history of the province.

Since 1984, more than 60,000 people have left Saskatchewan.

Between September, 1988, and September, 1989, Farm Credit Corporation foreclosures in Saskatchewan on farm families increased by 60 per cent.

Over 10,000 notices of intent to foreclose on land or seize machinery, crops or livestock have been served on Saskatchewan farmers by lending institutions.

Today, agricultural lenders hold over 850,000 acres of Saskatchewan farm land, compared to 121,000 acres in 1987.

Realized net farm income in Saskatchewan is expected to be down some 87 per cent from last year, down $109 million from $910 million in 1989.

The value of farm land in Saskatchewan has fallen dramatically—30 per cent in the last five years.

The depressing statistics go on. People have seen their life savings diminish. The value of the land which was their pension and security in old age has totally dropped. Now, many of these older farmers who want to retire, cannot. Many of their sons, and in an increasing number of cases, daughters, who want to take over the farm operation, cannot, because of high interest rates, the low prices they will get for their commodities and the general insecurity that exists.

The farmers in my district do not want government hand-outs. They want an opportunity to fairly compete with the producers in Argentina, Europe and the United States. The farmers in my district figure they can compete with these countries, that they can produce some of the best wheat in the world. But they cannot compete against the treasuries of the United States and Europe. That is like banging your head against the wall. They cannot win that fight.

They need help. They need a commitment from the Canadian government that it will stand behind them so that Canadian agriculture, particularly agriculture in our western provinces, will not be destroyed and be victims of the European and American trade wars in agriculture.

This government has failed them. Many of my constituents voted for the Conservative Party in 1984. They ended up voting for me in 1988. In fact I got over 50 per cent of the vote outside of the city of Regina in the last election.

Many of them had some hope and expectation that finally we would get, with a Conservative government, a government in Ottawa that would listen to the needs of western farmers. They had that expectation. Instead what they have received are ad hoc programs that are more motivated by political timetables than they are by securing the western farm economy.

I was talking to a farmer earlier this morning from around Edenwold. He remembered that the Minister of Agriculture announced a program in the fall of 1988 just before the federal election. The promise was that the money would be in the hands of the farmers by that Christmas. Indeed, the money was in the hands of the farmers by Christmas, but it was Christmas a year later.

He reports, as well, that there is some optimism at home because of the weather conditions. We are having a good, soggy, wet spring. Even with the drought that has gripped western Canada for the last number of years, at least by the indications of the spring, there is some hope. There is some possibility of getting a good crop this year. He is telling me that farmers are out there, trying to seed but, of course, they cannot afford the fertilizers and the other input costs because they do not have the cash flow.

We have seen this government and the government of Saskatchewan play political football with each other, trying to get some political mileage without spending a red cent. They are trying to tell the farmers back home that, yes, they will support them in getting some money to them to enable them to put a crop in this year. As the associate minister of agriculture and the minister in charge of the Wheat Board said earlier in the House, one cannot reap unless one sows. There are many farmers back home who would like to sow, but they do not have the cash to buy the seeds, the fertilizers, and the fuel in order to put the crop in. They are asking this government for help.

The Minister of Agriculture has said: "We are studying this. We are working on it. We are having meetings." Indeed, they have meetings. The Premier of Saskatchewan, in the Speech from the Throne opening the Saskatchewan legislature, stated that he had an agreement with the federal government. Some agreement! Farmers are still waiting today. They need that money. They cannot afford the political games that are being played between Regina and Ottawa. They have to know now what they can expect so that they can plan. Good agriculture and good farming practices mean planning. One needs this information. The farmers are not getting the information; they will still have to wait.

The minister announced, the other day, in answer to my colleague, that perhaps next week, on Friday when the Ministers of Agriculture will meet again, they will have something to announce. Perhaps, Mr. Speaker, and then, perhaps not. Perhaps the date of some announcement will not be determined by the cycle of the crop, it will be more determined by the cycle of the political career of the Tory government in Saskatchewan.

We have heard a lot from the Tories about what a tremendous job they have done for western agriculture. Yet, as I said earlier in my remarks, the farmers back home feel betrayed because this Conservative government failed to produce a permanent program, a program that has been thought through, and a program that they can depend on that would be like a foundation to western agriculture. They have not received that from this government and that is what they need.

In the 1988 election, we proposed a well thought-through program. It was a program that begins to establish some income stability, at a certain level, to ensure that the family farm size of operation will have a guarantee and that they will be protected from the vagaries of international prices. We proposed, in our program, that we would strengthen institutions like the marketing boards and the Wheat Board and that we would institute programs that would help in the intergenerational transfer of farm lands so that this burden would be taken off the shoulders of every generation. What great stupidity it is that every generation has to pay off the banks in interest payments. This is a burden that we must lift off the shoulders of our farm community, so that we can have the intergenerational transfer of land, without all the interest charges. Those were the programs and the policies we announced in the 1988 election.

What we have finally seen from this Tory government is a conference earlier this year. Now, finally, we hear from the Minister of Agriculture that he wants some permanent programs. He is tired of these ad hoc programs. It has been in power now for almost six years, and it is too long. Why did it not introduce such a program in 1984 or 1985? Where has it been?

When we hear the indications, and we see the signs of where this Tory government is going and where it is leading western agriculture, it scares me even further. When it talks about a permanent program, it means a permanent program where the market has a total determining force. It wants to do away with orderly marketing. It wants to do away with the Wheat Board. We saw this during the free trade debate.

We know where the Tories are headed and what their farm program is. They would strip western agriculture of all those institutions that we have built up over the years, those programs that the pioneers in Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta have fought for. These are the programs that the predecessors of my party, the Co-operative Commonwealth Federation, with the co-op movement and the pools have built together. These are what former Tory and Liberal governments, and people such as John Diefenbaker and Jimmy Gardner have made in their days to develop institutions which would provide some protection to our western farmers. The agenda of this government is to strip western Canada and our western Canadian farmers of those institutions that were developed to protect them.

The government says, of course, that it has given all these nice grants. It has given all these nice billions of dollars of bail-out. However, it also fails to mention the increased charges that it has levied on the farm community or the cut-backs to existing programs.

For example, in the province of Saskatchewan this year, farm policy by this government will cost Saskatchewan farmers some $825 million. The drop in initial prices alone accounts for $550 million. The FCC interest rate increases account for $35 million. The loss of two-price wheat accounts for $127 million. The crop insurance premiums account for $55 million. The reduction in federal farm-fuel rebates is $25 million. The increase in grain freight rates is $19 million. The elimination of the interest-free cash advance is $14 million. These add up to a figure of $825 million that will be taken out of the farmers' pockets because of the policies of this government this year.

Do not tell me what a great friend of the farmers these Tories are. They might put some of the change back in one pocket, but, my gosh, they have got the hands in other pocket and they are taking it out of the farmers' pockets at the same time as they are taking it out of the taxpayers' pockets all over.

My colleagues have mentioned the goods and services tax. The minister says that in the end the farmer will get it all back. Let us hope that is true. Is it not ironic that the government is now asking the farmers to collect its taxes? Of course, when they collect its taxes and pay for it, they are not getting any interest on that. In fact, the farmers are giving the government an interest-free cash advance while the government has taken the interest-free cash advance away from the farmers. Is it not ironic that the great friends of the farmers, the people who understand the farmers, are now taking the cash advance out of the farm community through the goods and services tax?

We need a government that is willing to make a commitment and that will stand up for western agriculture. We need a government that will indeed recognize that its policies, whether on international trade or interest rate policies, are having an adverse affect.

I heard the minister responsible for the Wheat Board talk about interest rates and how we need to bring our inflation down. Let me tell him, we do not have much inflation in Regina. We do not have much inflation in Indian Head, Strasbourg or Ituna. Houses there cost next to nothing. The value of real estate in Regina and all those communities has continually decreased.

There is no inflation when it comes to the value of farmland. There might be some inflation in Toronto and Vancouver, but we want a government that also knows the needs of prairie farmers and will devise policies that will help them and that will not stop inflation in Toronto at the expense of prairie farmers. That is what western Canadian farmers want. That is what they were expecting in 1984. They knew they were not going to get it, and that is why many did not vote for this Tory bunch in 1988. I would suspect that in the next federal election there will hardly be a Tory in western Canada left.

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I am certainly interested in the debate, representing farmers in southwestern Ontario. Indeed, the member for Regina—Qu'Appelle has visited London—Middlesex in his flights from Saskatchewan.

Is the hon. member in favour of the $500 million being spent by the federal government right away? He seems to be in favour of it. I cannot understand why he is not in favour of the GST, particularly in his province. It will save Canadian farmers $250 million. His own province is a major exporter of agriculture with 70 per cent of its product being exported. There is an expected gain with the GST of 2 per cent in the economy of Saskatchewan. I do not understand where he is coming from.

If the hon. member wants the $500 million, why does he not want the farmers of Canada to benefit directly from the $250 million?

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, I have some difficulty connecting the $500 million, that has been promised and that we are still waiting for as an interim measure needed to allow the farmers to put the crop in this spring, and the goods and services tax.

The hon. member claims that the farmers are going to save some $200 million. Certainly, I would like to see those figures. Much of what the farmer now buys is exempt from the federal sales tax. If he assumed that the farmers were paying tax and they are going to get a rebate, those are new sets of figures. That does not jibe.

The farmer does not pay all that much in actual sales tax on farm input costs, other than the tax on gasoline for which he used to to get a rebate. The government now is cutting back on the rebates. When the goods and services tax comes in, the farmer will get the full rebate back. That is playing political games.

The government has increased the tax. Two years later it will give it back and say: "Aren't we nice fellows?" That will not wash back home. Farmers are not that dumb. They will see through that number quickly. What the farmers want are commitments right now.

The government knew that western agriculture was in trouble in terms of the cash flow to pay for the input costs necessary to put the seed in the ground. It knew about that last fall. Certainly at Christmas, the figures were out. The projections were out. The government should have sat down and spent January and February with the premiers of Saskatchewan, Alberta and Manitoba devising a program, having it out, and playing the political games. By the beginning of March, they should have announced a program.

Instead, we have seen the government waiting until the crisis hit. Now it is busy working and trying to find a solution. By the time it finds a solution, spring seeding time is over. All we have had is sound and fury from the Tories in Regina and Ottawa. There is nothing substantial in the hands of the farmers that would allow them to put their crops in this year.

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I listened to the emotional rhetoric of the hon. member for Regina—Qu'Appelle, dealing with the very serious matter before us, namely, the cash flow problem that currently faces Canadian agriculture.

I heard the hon. member mention the word "betrayed". He said that he felt Saskatchewan farmers were betrayed. If I quote from a document which was prepared by AgDecision in May 1990, which is the United Grain Growers prairie crop report, it shows that as of May 7, which is early in the wheat planting year, in Saskatchewan wheat plantings are estimated to be up some 3 per cent.

I ask myself the question that if farmers feel betrayed, why are they investing more in the system? I question that comment as being nothing more than just emotional rhetoric and lacking in substance.

The hon. member went on to say that the NDP would have programs that would strengthen and help farmers. Mr. Speaker, for your information, the NDP did have a program that removed the burden of debt from the shoulders of Saskatchewan farmers. It was a very effective one. It learned from a political philosophy from across the Atlantic Ocean, which meant that it incorporated a land banking system in the province of Saskatchewan.

At the last provincial election, hon. members will recall that agriculture Saskatchewan spoke rather heavily and forthrightly and it told the NDP and the government in the province of Saskatchewan that it wanted to have nothing to do with socialized agriculture. As a result, the NDP were turfed out along with the land bank policies.

There is no question that agriculture is facing tough times in Saskatchewan, but I hardly think that developing a land bank system and having big brother in charge of agriculture is the way to resolve it. Given the experience of the NDP government in Saskatchewan, does the hon. member still think a land bank policy is the policy to follow? If so, why is that not the course that eastern Europe is following?

Mr. de Jong: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague for Regina—Wascana for his questions.

First, when it comes to the matter of more acreage being put into production, that can be expected given the spring conditions. There is some optimism and hope because of the growing conditions. Many farmers are recognizing that they have to put every bit of soil and land that they own into production in order to meet their cash and credit demands.

I am sure if the hon. member for Regina—Wascana would take some time to visit some of the farmers in his riding, he will discover that they are not going to be using the fertilizers they normally would because they cannot afford them. For this government to say that it is a sign of confidence that the farmers are planting more acreage, I think it is fooling itself.

In fact, I would even prescribe a motive to that, but I will not. This government knows that the farmers are not going to be using the fertilizers that would enhance and enable them to get a much richer crop out of the land. Yes, they are going to try to press every piece of land that they have into production, but they are not going to be able to invest in fertilizers and so forth, that would ensure a bumper crop.

My hon. friend also talks about the land bank. There were some problems with the land bank. I now talk to farmers who tell me: "I wish the land bank was back." We could have changed some of the administration. Personally, I would like to have seen a dozen or two dozen municipalities forming a larger regional unit and having that unit administer a land bank, rather than perhaps the government doing it from Regina.

One thing I will not fault the previous New Democratic Party government of Allan Blakeney in Saskatchewan for is recognizing a problem. It tried to do something about it. I give it credit for the guts and courage. In 1982, we had the Tories come in and they did away with the land bank. Guess who owns the land in Saskatchewan now? Today, agricultural lenders hold over 850,000 acres of Saskatchewan farm land. The Farm Credit Corporation, the Royal Bank of Canada, the Bank of Nova Scotia—the banks are the largest land holders in Saskatchewan. That is Tory land banking. And that is something we will not accept, nor will the people of Saskatchewan. Just wait until the next provincial election.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Larry Schneider (Regina—Wascana): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased that after one and a half years the opposition has finally taken this time to highlight the plight of agriculture in Canada. It is certainly overdue from their perspective.

It is not the sort of thing that this government has taken lightly. We have attempted to develop some programs in consultation with the agriculture sector which were deemed to be meaningful. However, in terms of a broader agricultural long-term program, I believe that the final resolve to the plight of agriculture still eludes not only this government, but any government. In fact I would suggest that it has a tendency to elude agriculture as well.

There is certainly no question at all that some of our farmers are experiencing great financial difficulties. Their problems are the result of successive years of weather-related disasters, lingering debt and uncertain prices caused, as my colleagues on both sides of the House mentioned earlier, by international subsidy wars.

In 1990, this government has responded to these difficult times by committing $500 million in special assistance. The commitment was made in March along with several other initiatives. This assistance was contingent on provincial participation and as we all know, negotiations with the provinces are ongoing.

I would like to take this opportunity to comment on the Saskatchewan situation. Our Premier, Grant Devine, faced with a debt burden caused during a disastrous decline in world prices for oil, potash, uranium and agricultural products certainly has a tough role to fulfil as is his commitment to the Saskatchewan farmer.

I believe our conditions for a cost-sharing program caused his job to be most challenging. Saskatchewan agriculture will stand to gain more agricultural dollars than any other province in Canada, but at what cost?

That is the difficult question that remains to be answered. However, given Grant Devine's proven ability and the fact that he certainly is no quitter, I am confident that whatever deal he makes with us will be sound and meaningful.

No one is comfortable with the time that this matter has taken to resolve, hence one should appreciate how difficult this problem really is.

By seeking matching funding from the provinces, this government hopes to put even more money in farmers' hands. If the provinces choose to match our $500 million, a total of $1 billion will be available to Canadian farmers in this crop year. This would bring farm income in 1990-1991 in line with the five-year average. Clearly the federal government is willing to do its part to ease the financial problems facing Canadian farmers.

But as we come to grips with the problems now facing our farmers, we cannot lose sight of the long-term picture. That is one of the reasons why our Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Agriculture is leading our agri-food industry through a major policy review. It is the most extensive review of agri-food policy ever undertaken in this country and it involves all the facets of this vital and dynamic industry.

Several government industry groups are at work to ensure our agri-food industry is well positioned to respond to an increasingly competitive world marketplace and can keep pace with rapidly changing consumer demands and technological developments. At the same time we want to maintain our record for safe nutritious food and meet the challenges of increasing environmental awareness.

We also want our producers to have the farm support programs they need. We want to establish programs that are more predictable and permanent. We want to establish an agricultural framework that does not require the ad hoc programs that now need to be designed to respond to the crises and difficulties that we experience in agriculture.

Already, for example, we have improved the crop insurance program. Those improvements are in place for this crop year and are the result of extensive consultation with producers and our provincial counterparts.

Both producers and governments need to be operating in a more predictable environment. Canadian producers need security in making their business plans, and governments need security in setting their budgets.

Through the policy review, the grains safety net committee has been working on policy options for a national safety net program for grains and oilseeds. That program has been discussed with federal and provincial agriculture ministers and is being designed to be compatible with a long-term, comprehensive, safety net plan for all commodities and producers.

A federal provincial group is looking at long term safety nets. Its work will be discussed at a meeting of federal and provincial agriculture ministers in Moncton in August this year. The ministers will also be discussing the work of the other policy review working groups. Those groups are putting various policy areas under the microscope. These policy areas include supply management, transportation, competitiveness, sustainable agriculture, food safety, farm finance and management, pesticide registration, research and technology and interprovincial trade barriers.

These groups will be coming up with new policy options which will be weighed against the vision the federal and provincial governments share for the future of Canadian agriculture. That vision rests on four pillars; policy that recognizes regional diversity, increased environmental sustainability, greater self-reliance and more market responsiveness.

These new policy options will take into account regional strengths and advantages. Each region will be encouraged to produce what it can produce and market most efficiently. They will also ensure our food production practices are compatible with the need to protect the environment and conserve our natural resources.

We are also looking at policies that will ensure farmers' production decisions are driven, not by government programs but by market signals. This does not mean that farmers have to live without support against sudden changes in markets or weather. Indeed, we need effective support programs to act as cushions against the unexpected and the unpredictable.

Our policies will also ensure that farmers continue to have the right to market their products in a collective fashion. Through the policy review, we want to ensure that the benefits of supply management continue. At the same time, we want to ensure our agri-food industry is responsive to what the market wants and needs. We want all facets of the industry working together to ensure market opportunities are not lost or ignored.

As my colleague, the Deputy Prime Minister and Minister of Agriculture has said many times, "We are taking this review right from the farmers' gate to the consumers' plate".

This government recognizes that all segments have a role to play in ensuring our agri-food industry grows and expands to its true potential. Certainly, this government's commitment to the industry cannot be questioned. We have always been there in times of need and, through the policy review, we are taking steps to ensure the agri-food industry remains vital and strong. That is a goal I am sure everyone in this House shares and supports.

When I review the motion currently before us, it seemingly comes at us from a non-partisan point of view. It was with that thought in mind that I initially looked at this motion, but after having heard the speeches I began to have my doubts.

The motion in a very honest and sincere way calls upon the Government of Canada to endeavour to strengthen the economic position of Canadian producers with an immediate cash injection, with or without provincial participation.

While I understand where the author of the motion is coming from, it leaves a whole roomful of questions to be answered. The questions and answers do not seem to go together. For instance, if this money is to be made available, to whom will it be available? Will it be made available on a cultivated basis, a crop basis, will it include pasture land, will it consider special crops grown, or will a program, in whatever form it might take, be designed to compensate those that have run through a particularly bad period of years in relationship to those that have run through a period of fairly successful years? Is there any provision at all in such a program, whatever it might be, that deals with the capability of the particular acre of land being considered?

While on the surface it seems like a very easy motion to address, we have found in experience that in order to be fair and equitable to all those concerned, the answer to the very elusive question of how best to resolve the cash flow problems in agriculture remains elusive. It remains elusive, not only from those of us in the House of Commons that have permit books—and I think there are more of us on the government side than on the opposition side—it continues to remain a problem for government as well.

The opposition is long on rhetoric, long on desire, but short on suggestions.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to take part in this debate today.

• (1730)

I commend my colleague from Winnipeg—St. James for the very eloquent and understanding speech he made in this debate. His well researched presentation was certainly a credit to one from western Canada who, while he is not an agriculturalist, he certainly understands the problems of those producers in Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. My colleague has outlined that very eloquently. I want to go a little step further and deviate from the problem in western Canada, although it is very serious. My heart goes out to those producers, particularly in Saskatchewan and Manitoba, who are losing their farms and their lifetime savings. Because many of these people are in their late fifties and early sixties, a life of retirement that is free of worry and want is not available to them.

I want to deviate for a moment or two and draw the attention of the government to the fact that we also have problems in Ontario at this point. We have been waiting anxiously for the announcement of the initial payments for Ontario winter wheat. The beginning of harvest for this crop is less than eight weeks away. These farmers have to make a very important decision, a decision caused partly by weather. Fifteen per cent of the winter wheat crop did not come through the winter in very good condition; 15 per cent of it is a wipeout. These producers have to make a decision over the next three or four days as to whether they rip that up and plant an alternative crop, or whether they leave it in hopes of getting some returns, although meagre, from that wheat that was killed over the winter months.

Is the minister to look at this to see if he can speed up the process? Hopefully, he will do that this week. Those producers have to make a decision whether they are going to rip it up in the next few days and plant soybeans, white beans, or one of the other edible bean crops. It has to be a crop that will accept a late planting.

In a letter dated May 16, the Prime Minister has been called upon by the Ontario Wheat Producers Marketing Board to act immediately to make this known. While we realize that the initial payments announced last week apply to western Canadian wheat and the Canadian Wheat Board, this one is administered by the Agricultural Co-operatives Marketing Act. I think it is only fair that the government announce, as soon as possible, what that initial payment is going to be so that farmers can produce their cash flow projections, make their planting intentions immediately and put in those alternative crops.

I also think that the government should be looking a little harder at what it has done and maybe eat a little humble pie and return to looking at the two-price wheat system because the Ontario producers offered to accept a cap on the amount of wheat they would produce that goes into the domestic market. If that cap was accepted by the Ontario producers and they took the export market price for the rest of it, this alone would be a benefit to the farmers of Saskatchewan, Manitoba and Alberta, and Lord knows they need all the help the can get at this time.

I am very disappointed and frustrated about this. I think I should remind the minister of a speech made in this House, when he said: "Whereas the economic problems facing Canadian farmers today are largely the result of government inaction and neglect", and I am sure we all agree with that, "this House condemns the government for its failure to recognize the importance of this agriculture sector and its contribution to the economic growth in Canada, and urges the government to move quickly to expedite to reduce the farm fuel tax", I say that it should be removed altogether, "reduce the red meat stabilization uncertainties, but to introduce the red meat plan and expedite the passage of legislation respecting advance payments and resist the erosion of initial payments to western grain".

That is an interesting statement and I wholeheartedly concur with it today in this House. It was made on May 13, 1984, by none other than the Minister of State for Grains and Oilseeds. If he thought conditions were bad then, they have deteriorated far more.

A few days ago, the Farm Debt Review Board was in front of the agriculture committee of the House of Commons. One of the provincial chairmen pointed out to us that the equity in the farm sector across Canada has seen a continual erosion over the last five years.

I have no idea of the political persuasion of that hon. gentleman, but I know that he was absolutely right when he pointed that out. He is a very astute Canadian. The government should pay attention to the erosion of equity. That is why we are seeing all the foreclosures in western Canada at the present time and why we are seeing the financial institutions as the largest landholders in the province of Saskatchewan, landholders of land that was once owned and operated by the family farmers, their wives and their children. It is a terrible legacy to leave those people, a terrible legacy to leave to all Canadians.

I also want to point out that this afternoon we met with the Dairy Farmers of Canada and the Ontario Milk Marketing Board in the agriculture committee. There is a level of uncertainty there about what is going to happen to that industry over the next few years. One of the statements in committee was that they feel very apprehensive about the fact that they may be being traded off against other interests in Canada, interests that are closely tied to the export markets. These are markets that do not have the level of stability that the dairy industry or the poultry industry has here in Canada. The producers who belong to those industries certainly have a right to some stability and assurances that those industries will continue to prosper the way that they were intended when those plans were set up by the Government of Canada under Liberal administrations. I would like to extend that to include the Canadian Wheat Board which was established many years ago under the Conservative government. It has done a good job over the years.

Those institutions should be strengthened and enhanced, rather than have the foundations chipped away a little bit at a time. They should be held up as an example to the rest of the world as to how we can produce ample quantities of clean quality Canadian food for the consumers of this country and other members of society.

Having been a farmer for a good many years, this is a time of anticipation. I always make a point of getting out in the fields for a few hours on the weekends. It is a time when life springs up all around us, whether it is the grass that is growing or the wildflowers and the bushes, the birds nesting, or the arrival of new calves. It should be a time of optimism and hope, not a time of despair, apprehension and neglect by governments.

I ask this government to make that initial payment known immediately for the Ontario wheat producers. Let them know that their cash flow projections can be based on the wheat they have left after the winter kill to allow them to go ahead and make alternative planning arrangements.

I ask this government to pay special attention to this major resource industry of Canada whose spin-off effects impact across our total economy.

• (1740)

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure to stand in this House today and speak on this motion that calls upon the government to endeavour to strengthen the economic position of Canadian producers with a cash injection, with or without provincial participation.

As I have said in this House before, I feel very strongly that as goes agriculture so goes the economy of a country. There are four creators of wealth in the world: fishing, mining, forestry, and farming. The policies of this government do not seem to recognize the importance of those four. The policies of this government have put in jeopardy the future of those involved in those four industries.

I know that there have been ad hoc policies and ad hoc programs in the past few years but like many people, I feel that they are not the answer. They are a short-term bandaid but that is not what we need. We need recognition by the government, we need recognition by everyone, of the importance of agriculture to any country.

I do not have to remind people in this House, but I remind those who are watching of the importance of the agri-food business. It does over $45 billion worth of business a year. It is responsible for 10 per cent of Canada's domestic product. It provides over 1.5 million jobs, which is over 15 per cent of the jobs in Canada. Fifty per cent of our agricultural production in Canada is exported and that accounts for over 7 per cent of our Canadian exports. The production of much of that export, a big percentage, is grain production. Many sectors of the farm community are suffering right now, but those who are particularly hurting are our western grain producers.

I wonder when this government is going to realize the importance of that industry and stop cutting the feet out from underneath the industry with the removal of such programs that have been management tools by the industry over the years such as the Advance Payments for Crops Act, the at and east grain and flour transportation assistance, the removal of the fuel excise rebates and other moves that have been made. Sure, they put an ad hoc program in, but now we have an ad hoc program put in place that was asked for, and it was needed, not as big as needed but it is better than nothing, I will admit that, and the government claims it is on the table. Well, that is exactly where it is, on the table.

It is not doing the producers any good when it is on the table. This was requested last fall. The need was outlined many months ago by ministers of agriculture in the west and by premiers in the west, so it was put on the table, but it was not put on the table until it was so late that the producers could not get their hands on it. The supposed purpose was to assist the producers in their seeding expenses this spring, but here we are in the third week in May when the seeding decisions have been made, when the cash flows at the bank have had to be established, when the credit has had to be established and no one knows whether they are going to benefit from this program of $500 million that has been offered to the provinces with the words: "If you match it, you can have it".

The buck has been passed from the federal government to the provincial governments. The provincial governments have to decide what program it is, and the provincial governments in conjunction with the federal government have to get all of that information out to the producers. The long and the short of it is that the banking and the lending institutions have lost faith because of the way similar programs have been handled in the past with uncertainty and the producer thinking he was going to get a certain amount of money and then finding out later that he did not get that much or it was not coming. The lending institutions are saying: "Show me, then I will assist you in your financial arrangements for another crop year". But the producers cannot say, and they cannot show them, because all they say is that it is on the table. They want to know how they are going to get it in their hands, and they cannot. It is a very frustrating position.

The government is being told, and I wonder if it is listening, that by far the majority of Canadians recognize the importance of agriculture. By coincidence, today in my office I received a letter from a lady in my riding who I believe was born on a farm but who has not lived on the farm in many years. This is from a lady in Prince Edward—Hastings riding, a long way from the Prairies, but I would like to read it:

> I do not make it a practice to write to members of parliament, but I feel very strongly that I should do so. I am quite concerned about our western farmers, feeling that they need more help that our government seems willing to give them. The price of wheat is very low and should be subsidized so that farmers will get a fair price. I am sure that they had expected a fair price and were dependent on that to keep going. The farming industry is one of Canada's most important industries, if not the most important! I would hate to see any more farmers having to leave the land because they cannot make a go of it!

We should listen to that. I hope the government listens to that.

We have seen a high interest rate policy and a weak negotiating ability at the negotiating table, as far as agriculture is concerned. It is very nice to be a nice guy, but I can tell you from experience in negotiating that the nice guy does not always win. I do not mean to say that one has to be belligerent or nasty when negotiating, but the friendly approach does not always succeed. It is all well and good to come away from the negotiating table saying that we were nice and we showed the way, but when the other people at that table walk away saying that they got Canada again, it starts to concern me.

Grave concern has been expressed at the meetings in my riding in the last month over our negotiating ability and whether Canada is being firm enough in its negotiations. That inability to negotiate firmly and the low prices and the low yields as a result of weather conditions in parts of our country, including parts of the western provinces particularly with the shortage of rain and the drought, has placed the economic stability and sustainability of thousands of Canadian farmers in jeopardy.

We keep talking of sustainability in agriculture and sustainability in the environment and I feel that they go hand in hand. I do not think there is a group of people in Canada that understands the importance of the environment any greater than our farm community. They know what has to be done. They know what should be done and they know how to do it. However, with the prices and the returns to farmers at the present time that they cannot afford to do it.

We are all going to suffer and we had better soon wake up and realize that if we are going to have a sustainable environment, we will need sustainable agriculture, which in turn requires a sustainable economy. They go hand in hand.

I urge the government to put the policies in place that are necessary for that to happen. We have a great natural resource. We have a great food producing capacity, but I do not think we are paying enough attention to it. I do not think that we are marketing it properly. I do not think we are explaining to Canadians the importance of agriculture. I do not think the assistance that is given to farmers is adequate. First the government should explain how the way it is dealing with this particular industry is for the betterment and for the good of all Canadians.

There is no comprehensive agricultural or food producing policy in this country. There is work being done on it. I encourage the government to develop that policy quickly so that producers and farmers and therefore Canadian consumers know that we have a food security and an agricultural security program in this country.

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to be asked to speak on behalf of the government on this particular issue.

Before I get into my remarks, I would like to say that yesterday I had the opportunity to be down in southern Manitoba in around the Emerson and Selkirk areas. The farmers are really working down there. They are in the fields, doing their best. There are tractors all over the place, cultivators are going and everybody is moving quite well.

They had dry conditions yesterday but it is completely opposite today. It is raining. Farmers refer to a million dollar rain, but in the Brandon–Souris area in southern Manitoba, I think we can hopefully call it a billion dollar rain.

There have been a number of comments made today in debate. Some I agree with and some I do not. I think it is important that I remind everybody that the government has been responsive to the various needs of the agricultural community.

Back in 1986–87, we put $2 billion into the agricultural industry via the Special Canadian Grains Program. Also in 1988, we went into the Canadian Drought Assistance Program which was good for $850 million.

Mr. Crawford: A real screw–up!

Mr. Bjornson: At least we tried. It was an effort. Not everything is perfect. You know the agricultural industry. You will know the magnitude of the farmers that requested aid. I think the minister did a fine job of putting this program together as best as he could in the timeframe that was involved. It was not for lack of trying. Any criticism like that is unacceptable on this side of the House.

Right now we have $500 million on the table that we want to put into the agricultural industry. The government is doing the best it can, and $450 million of that is directed towards the grains and oilseeds. It is important that everybody understand that we do want to participate.

Throughout the debate so far today, there has been a lot of comments made about international trade. I would like to address my comments to the fact that Canadian agriculture, the grain industry in particular, is very much influenced by international trade.

Canadian farmers have been forced to watch the giants of the international grain trade, the United States and the European Community, beat each other with their wallets, driving down world prices and seriously eroding traditional grain markets.

At the same time, the huge subsidies paid by the European Community continues to encourage overproduction by the farmers. To protect the European grain industry, the community leaders have thrown up tariffs which effectively shut out our opportunity to get into their markets. We have a significant problem over there. The United States and the European Community have bigger wallets than we have.

We are doing our darndest to support the farmers. We have been doing this by working in GATT. There has been an obvious effort. Probably one of the most obvious efforts was put forward by the Minister for International Trade when he said that we should stop dealing with the past and look to the future. We are trying to deal with the problems of the future.

Once again, it is unfortunate that the Americans in particular said: "No, no we might have to fight with you fellows". Because of their influence, the size of their markets and their wallet, they have said they will stop. So we are back in there and we are trying to be optimistic by dealing with the future and not with the past. The past is done. We are still paying for the past and we are going to do what we can, but we want to make sure that we have a futuristic plan. We have to give the Minister for International Trade credit for some very strong efforts.

There is a lot of inequity caused by the subsidy practice of the Europeans. These examples that I am going to give are based on prices in April, and are in Canadian dollars. At that time, EC producers received $243 a tonne for wheat, while the Canadian farmers received $145 a tonne. Look at the difference. EC farmers received $353 a tonne for their Durum, while the Canadian farmers only received $130. In the case of barley, the EC farmer received $232 a tonne, while Canadians were only getting $97. That is a significant problem.

The Europeans and the Americans eventually have to come to their senses. It is not the agricultural community. The agricultural community in the European countries and in the American states well understand that their survival right now depends on those fat wallets. But what about the consumers, the taxpayers of those countries? When are they going to change? We have to work towards educating those people.

Recently, I had the opportunity to sit beside an Australian and he informed me that the Australian government does not have subsidies. They are playing hardball with their farmers and their farmers are in a difficult situation. They have taken the effort to go into the European countries and try to educate them to the fact that these people are actually paying too much for their goods.

I do not know what we can do to convince the marketplace, the European market in particular, that it is time that they grow up and get into this. I would imagine that it is a mindset. If history serves me right, that mindset goes back to after World War II, when they decided that they no longer wanted to be dependent upon somebody else to provide their food. It is time that the whole world community understand that situations like that are quite unlikely to happen. Maybe it is possible that when we have the opportunity to lower these prices and talk about the level playing field, we could possibly be providing food to Third World countries at a cost acceptable to them.

Mr. Crawford: We would go under.

Mr. Bjornson: Only by hard work and good common-sense farming we will not go under. We can put the crop into the ground and collect it and put it into the marketplace on a level playing field and compete with anybody in the world. We just have to have the opportunity to do it. You are in the industry. Would you not like to have that opportunity?

Mr. Crawford: Certainly.

Mr. Bjornson: Right. I think that is what we are doing. We are going to be open-minded. We are trying to create that. We want the GATT to go forward. That is one of the policies of this government and I think we are reflecting it very well. We are not stepping backward. We are trying to step forward.

We should look at the subsidies for the European countries just 10 years ago in 1979-1980. The EEC was a net importer of 12 million tonnes of wheat and coarse grains. Next year, it is expected that they are going to be a net exporter of 27 million tonnes of wheat and coarse grains, which is a turnaround of 39 million tonnes. In order to maintain their agricultural sector in the European countries, they are providing more money. As they provide more money, the farmers grow more crop, so all of a sudden they are getting into our markets. It is only because of the subsidies that are doing that. If they had to put their crops in the ground, pay their taxes and do everything that our farmers have to do, I am sure there would be a completely different attitude. They would not be rushing out and doing all that.

I do not know what the answer is to resolve that problem. I am hoping that sometime in the near future the European Community will take a look at that. Maybe when Europe '92 comes into play they will sit down and take a long, hard look at how this is going to come together. Maybe that is the time it will happen.

It is most important, as we are working together with this government and the policies we are putting forward, that we are ready to react. We want to anticipate what is going to happen and when that time comes we will react. We cannot be sitting back worrying about 1990 and 1992 and finding out that we are left behind the pack again.

Once again, the attitudes put forward by the Minister of Trade, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister for Grains and Oilseeds are the proper attitudes. Maybe there is going to be some tough slugging. Right now it is tough slugging. There is a billion dollar rain in western Canada right now and I understand it is coming into Ontario.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being 6 o'clock p.m., it is my duty to inform the House that pursuant to Standing Order 81(17), proceedings on the motion have expired.

Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 11 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6.00 p.m.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I am aware that this morning you were given notice of a question of privilege. In the interest of getting Routine Proceedings out of the way, and especially the tabling of the important report of the Meech committee and putting it before the people of Canada, it would be agreeable if we have Routine Proceedings first and then proceed with the question of privilege.

Mr. Speaker: Is it agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

ROUTINE PROCEEDINGS

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 25 petitions.

[Editor's Note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

COMMITTEES OF THE HOUSE

STRIKING COMMITTEE—TABLING OF FORTY-FIRST REPORT OF STANDING COMMITTEE

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table the forty-first report of the Striking Committee.

COMMITTEE TO STUDY A PROPOSED COMPANION RESOLUTION TO THE MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Hon. Jean J. Charest (Sherbrooke): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the report of the Special Committee to study a Proposed Companion Resolution to the Meech Lake Accord.

[English]

It is the belief of the committee members that the conclusions and recommendations, and there are more than 20 of them, reached after hearing 160 witnesses and receiving more than 800 written submissions, may form the basis for resolving the current constitutional impasse by the June 23 deadline.

Mr. Speaker, your committee concludes that a companion resolution process that formally adds to the provisions of the Meech Lake Accord, without subtracting from it, has the best prospect of solving the current constitutional impasse. I wish to point out that such a companion resolution can only be negotiated by First Ministers.

• (1110)

Committee members agree, Mr. Speaker, that negotiations must maintain the perspective of the statement made at the meeting of provincial Premiers in the summer of 1986, to the effect that the constitutional talks should be aimed at bringing Quebec back as an active participant in the Canadian Constitution.

Furthermore, this process—and this was stressed by witnesses who appeared before the committee—must also include recognition of the five proposals made by Quebec.

[English]

On a personal note, Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the members of the committee who participated in this very difficult task. It is my information that we are probably the parliamentary committee that has travelled the most, heard the most witnesses, and received the most written submissions in the shortest period of time ever. Also, it was a first for the House of Commons to have one of its committees' activities and hearings televised as it travelled all through Canada.

If there is one thing out of this experience that all members of the committee feel very strongly, it is that it was an opportunity for us to learn from each other and to learn from other Canadians.

I also want to thank the staff who supported us in this work and who went well beyond the call of duty in helping this committee and the Parliament of Canada to accomplish its work.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Mr. Charest: Finally, Mr. Speaker, the report is unanimous.

[Editor's note: See today's Votes and Proceedings.]

[English]

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I understand that there is unanimous consent to permit a representative from each of the opposition parties to make a statement matching the statement made by the chairman.

Mr. Speaker: Is there consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to have been able to work on this committee and, like the chairman, I am happy that we were able to produce an unanimous report.

We were rushed by our timetable and our fellow Canadians did not have as much of an opportunity to prepare themselves or to appear in front of us as they deserved. On the other hand, I want to acknowledge that we heard a wide cross-section of views covering the waterfront, that no views were excluded, and that we were honoured to have appear before us a number of premiers of the provinces of Canada.

The strongest message that we got in our travels across the country is that the Canadian people want their political leaders to take them through this impasse. The unanimous report is motivated by that strong message.

Why were we called into existence? In the opinion of the opposition, we were called into existence as a committee because of a tactic imposed three years ago by the Prime Minister, against the wishes of the opposition, which prevented real public discussion and input until now.

Some people want to say that what has happened over the past three years can be interpreted—

Mr. Speaker: I know there is consent for a response to the hon. member for Sherbrooke. I am just wondering where this response is taking us. I am concerned about it turning into a debate on matters extraneous to the immediate filing of the unanimous committee report.

I would ask the hon. member to keep that in mind. I would hope that we would not meet with points of order at this point at such a moment in our country. I would ask the hon. member to try to confine his remarks to the committee and to the report that the committee has filed. I do not think it is appropriate to get into a long debate about things that may or may not have happened many months ago.

Mr. Kaplan: Mr. Speaker, I would prefer not to make a statement at this time if I will be denied the opportunity to make a statement equal in length to that of the chairman, giving the views of the official opposition on this occasion.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead on a point of order.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérin: Mr. Speaker, I would like some clarification. I understand that today, members have a chance to comment briefly on the tabling of the report. This was agreed to earlier by the House. Am I right? My point is, Mr. Speaker, that if a member other than the hon. member for Sherbrooke (Mr. Charest) is allowed to state his views, be it ever so briefly, on the report or the tabling of the report in the House, this automatically gives other members of the House the same right. It is all or nothing.

Mr. Speaker: I think the situation is clear. With consent of the House, the government, the Official Opposition and the New Democratic Party apparently agreed there would be a statement by the hon. member for Sherbrooke, by the hon. member for York Centre and by another member for the New Democratic Party, but that's all. According to the Standing Orders, statements are not appropriate, except by the member tabling the committee report, unless there is consent. There is no consent for debate, only for a statement by the three parties in the House.

[English]

Very reluctantly, I have had to suggest that the commentary in response to the hon. member for Sherbrooke should be confined to the committee report and its contents and the activities of the committee.

I felt that it was not appropriate on this occasion. I have some sense that there may not be even consent for a wide-ranging debate that goes back into matters that led up to the matter.

The hon. member for York Centre has said that he wishes to defer his statements to another time because he feels he has a position to put forward. I think that that is where we should leave it.

The hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead wants an opportunity to comment on the report. That opportunity is available by taking steps to put a motion for concurrence on the Order Paper and within 48 hours that matter can be called in the House. If the hon. member wishes to do that, he would be able to start off by having a full 20-minute debate, and other members, of course, could join in. So there is the opportunity to make representations, if the hon. member wishes to avail himself of those procedures.

[Translation]

Mr. Gérin: Mr. Speaker, thank you for this clarification. You will realize that I refuse to give unanimous consent. I refuse to consent to a debate, even by representatives of the three parties. And if as I see it, the consent of members of this House must be unanimous, it should be obvious to the Chair that consent has not been given.

[English]

Mr. Speaker: I think the difficulty is that consent was obtained. I have taken it upon myself to limit the tone of the debate and received co-operation. I will now hear the hon. member for Yorkton—Melville.

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, I join with pride the chairman of our committee and the representative of the Liberal party, and on behalf of the member for Burnaby—Kingsway, by saying that today is an historic day in this country.

What we have done with our report is to set the table for what is the constitutional accommodation that will bring Quebec into the constitutional family of Canada, which is extremely important. At the same time I believe that we have addressed the concerns and the suggestions of other people to make one united Canada, which is the most important thing.

• (1120)

Mr. Speaker, I believe and I hope that we have found national accommodation for national reconciliation. We have respected the conditions set by the Province of Quebec, and we have also considered the concerns of other Canadians across this country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, it is up to the Prime Minister of Canada and the provincial Premiers to act. It is time to act now, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to present a petition today, signed by numerous residents of Sarnia, Ontario and some from Vancouver as well, who are opposed to the goods and services tax.

These petitioners indicate that the government has imposed something like 31 tax increases since it took office in 1984. They object to the imposition of further taxes in the form of the goods and services tax and they call upon Parliament to reject this tax.

Privilege

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I too am pleased to join my colleague from Kingston and the Islands, in presenting a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, regarding the government's intention to proceed with the goods and services tax.

These petitioners from Merritt and Kamloops, British Columbia point out the very detrimental effect this tax will have on their lives and ask the Parliament of Canada to do what it can to encourage the government to back off from this tax.

VIA RAIL

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, on another matter, the petitioners again from Kamloops, British Columbia, point out that they feel the government's decision to cut back on passenger rail service in Canada was a very regrettable step. They are suggesting that the government consider modernizing VIA Rail services so that the second largest country in the world, Canada, can have a more rapid, economical, safe, convenient, environmentally sound and energy efficient alternative to other means of transportation by maintaining our passenger rail service at an advanced level in the country.

CANADA LABOUR CODE—PROTECTION OF WOMEN'S RIGHTS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to table a petition which concerns the preventive withdrawal of pregnant women from the workplace.

The Canada Labour Code must observe the principle set forth in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, and is thus supposed to protect the rights of women.

The regulations on compensation for pregnant women do not consider all the demands of the workplace.

The option of preventive withdrawal from the workplace for pregnant women is one that is both desirable and necessary for women working outside the home.

Mr. Speaker, I myself signed this petition, with residents of Senneterre and Val d'Or who humbly pray and call upon Parliament to give serious consideration to the shortcomings of the legislation when the Canada Labour Code is reviewed and recognize the need for including provisions in the Code concerning the preventive withdrawal of pregnant women from the workplace.

[English]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I wish to present petitions from residents of southwestern Ontario who continue to call upon this government to withdraw its 7 per cent goods and services tax as it will be inflationary and make us less competitive in the world.

I call upon this government to respect the wishes of the Canadian people and withdraw this tax.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall all questions be allowed to stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

PRIVILEGE

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING

Mr. Speaker: I would like to advise the House that I have received notice of a question of privilege, first in point of time from the hon. member for Dartmouth, and a second question of privilege from the hon. member for Sudbury.

In reading the notices which both the hon. members have filed with me, it is not completely clear but I suspect that the issue is the same.

I am wondering if the hon. members could clarify that for me because if it is the same issue, I will hear it as one application. Is that agreed?

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Yes.

Ms. Marleau: Yes.

Mr. Andre: I will not delay the proceedings, Mr. Speaker. Unfortunately I have an appointment in my office shortly and I will have to depart before I can hear all the comments. I would like to have the opportunity to respond prior to a decision, if you feel it is appropriate to hear a response before making your decision. If you should find that there is no prima facie evidence, I would not want to delay that decision. However, if you feel it is necessary to hear arguments on the other side of the question, I would appreciate an opportunity to give them.

Mr. Speaker: If I feel it necessary to call on counsel, I will make the appropriate arrangements. The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

Mr. Gauthier: Always, Mr. Speaker, without prejudice to establishing a precedent here, but if it is the minister's intention to establish that kind of a precedent, then I would certainly like to have that in our rules, but the Speaker has to decide that more than us, so I leave it to the Speaker to decide.

Mr. Speaker: So hon. members and the public understand, there could be a little bit of a difficulty here. When a notice of privilege is given to the Speaker, it is incumbent upon the Speaker to treat that notice of privilege with absolute confidence. In other words, the Speaker cannot tell other members that there is a motion coming on a question of privilege.

The reason for the confidentiality is that until a member rises on a question of privilege or indicates to the Speaker that he or she is going to rise, the member has the right to stay quiet in his or her seat and at that point the application dies.

The hon. House leader for the government does not have notice, and has heard nothing about this until I rose a few minutes ago. He may not be able to stay here for the full argument, but he wants the opportunity to come back, if necessary, and address the Chair. I do not treat that as a precedent. I treat it as the discretion of the Chair in handling an argument.

On the other hand, the Chair is always in the hands of hon. members. If it suited hon. members to put off the argument of this application to a time when all members on both sides of the issue could be in the Chamber, that is easily arranged and I would be quite prepared to do so. The hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Riis: Mr. Speaker, I know that we are anxious to get on with dealing with the health of animals and the plant protection act. Knowing that some people have other commitments, I wonder if there would be unanimous consent to revisit this at three o'clock when there will be an opportunity to have all parties here and able to make representations, if they wish.

Mr. Speaker: I am in the hands of members. It might suit the government side to do that. The hon. member for Dartmouth.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I would like to proceed with this matter this morning. I rise today on a point of privilege to bring to the attention of members and Your Honour the issue of untrue and misleading advertising by the Department of Finance which is being broadcast on radio stations from coast to coast.

According to Standing Order 48(2), I bring this matter to the attention of the Speaker in the House at the earliest possible opportunity. I offer transcripts of the ads for the table and the Clerk, and they may, if they choose, read the text of these into the record.

This is not the first time that this issue was before this House, Mr. Speaker. You will recall the representations made by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra on September 25, 1989, concerning the placement of advertisements in newspapers. On October 10, you delivered a very important and historic ruling. I would like to quote from a section of your ruling found in Hansard, of October 10 at page 4461.

> However, I want the House to understand very clearly that if your Speaker ever has to consider a situation like this again, the Chair will not be as generous. This is a case, which, in my opinion, should never recur. I expect the Department of Finance and other departments to study this ruling carefully and remind everyone within the Public Service that we are a parliamentary democracy, not a so-called executive democracy, nor a so-called administrative democracy.

The misleading ads have returned, and the sequel as I will argue is worse than the first series. First, we are dealing with a different medium. As we all know, an ad in the newspaper is a matter of the written word which can be read and reread at the discretion of the individual reader. For instance, a reader can seek—

Mr. Speaker: I think I have the general gist of the hon. member's complaint, and I thank him for giving me a copy of the radio advertisement. In assisting me, I would ask him to direct his argument to where there has been a breach of privilege.

It may have been by way of radio, television or signboard. That may be of some interest if it turns on the question of privilege, which has been breached as the hon. member argues.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, if the House would allow me a very few moments to unfurl my argument, you will find that I am stating a case of privilege. This is a very important matter. Therefore, I believe it is important to lay the groundwork. I will continue.

For instance, a reader can seek clarification by referring to a specific text. In the case of radio ads, the listener has no such recourse. Therefore, in my view it is a medium which is more easily manipulated because the information is very selective. It is disseminated in a matter of mere seconds, and the first impression is usually a lasting one.

In light of these facts, it is incumbent upon those who use this medium to be responsible and provide an accurate message which should not be deceptive or misleading. I submit the Department of Finance has failed once again to honour this important obligation.

I would like to read into the record the text of an ad which was broadcast to my constituents and other listeners.

An hon. member: Come on.

Mr. Speaker: The ad is short, and there is no reason why it should not be read into the record. Having got it into the record, I want to hear where the breach of privilege is.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I will.

The ad mentions a number of things which are inconsistent. I think they are a false reporting of the papers of this place. The ad states: "Number one, this is not an additional tax since it replaces the current federal sales tax." This is simply not true. "We know from records that have been placed on the table that the GST will apply to many services that are now untaxed."

The ad also says—

Mr. Speaker: The difficulty the Chair is having is that this is getting into a continuation of the debate that takes place in the House day after day after day on this.

The government has one version of the facts and others dispute that. They have a different version. That in itself does not create a question of privilege. An application for privilege should be confined to what way this ad has breached an hon. member's privilege or in what way this ad amounts to a contempt of the House. That is what I would have to decide.

I do not think it is appropriate for the Chair to allow this to get into a general, long, broad-ranging debate on different views of what the particular tax does. I give as an example, and I am reading what the hon. member has kindly given me: "It is not an additional tax since it replaces the current federal sales tax." That statement in could invite a great deal of comment one way or the other. I do not think it is appropriate that we get into a debate on that here.

If there is a clear statement here which is so inappropriate that it affects the rights and duties of a member in carrying on those rights and duties in the Chamber, then we have to consider whether that is privilege. If it is so outrageous that it is a contempt of Parliament then that, of course, is what I have to consider.

I would ask the hon. member to remember that this is not a place to get into a general wide ranging debate on the whole question of whether the proposed tax is or is not a replacement of another tax or to the degree that it replaces or does not replace it. I would ask hon. members to keep that in mind.

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, as you are aware, this is the first time I have raised a point of privilege in the House. I have done my best to keep with the record of what is appropriate for points of privilege.

I will shorten my argument considerably. If anyone reads that ad, it is quite clear in my view that the spirit of the Speaker's ruling of October 10 has been violated. At the very beginning of the one-minute ad, the word "proposed" is there. No where else in the ad does it mention that this is a proposed tax that has not passed all the legislative process.

In addition, when dealing with the actual wording, which I think is very important, and I think the Speaker would agree, in situations such as this it does not say that the proposed GST "would", it says that the GST "will". That is quite an important word.

I read through the submission by the hon. member for Vancouver Quadra and I carefully read the ruling of the Speaker. We seem to be in a position where the record of this place is being misrepresented. It may only be by a word, but it is something that must be stopped.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that a careful reading of your ruling of October 10 and a careful reading of what the government is now putting forward will show that it is a legitimate complaint by myself and other members, that this is a misrepresentation of what has taken place in this House, and I believe it is in contempt of your ruling of October 10.

I would submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that it is incumbent upon this place to rule on this type of behaviour. If any other private individual or company did such a thing, there are rules and laws which we pass here, enforced by the CRTC and the misleading advertising section of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

Governments do not come under those particular regulations. I think it is incumbent upon members of this place and the Speaker to ensure that representations of what takes place in this place are true and correct, and do not even lead to the impression of falseness.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, I would like to support the arguments of my colleague as we have both been very distressed by these ads.

I would like to remind you, Mr. Speaker, of comments made in this House in 1980 with regard to misleading advertising by the hon. member for Wellington—Dufferin—Simcoe. On October 22, 1980, he asked this question in the House.

"May I ask the minister", whichever minister it was, "how he can justify his double standard of exempting the government from provisions regarding false and misleading advertising where false and misleading advertising by the private sector would result in criminal charges being laid by the government?"

An hon. member: Isn't he a minister now?

Mrs. Marleau: Yes, he is. Mr. Speaker, I understand that at present there is no body that rules over misleading advertising broadcast by the government. The government could at least be reminded to apply the same standards as apply to the public in the promotion of a service or a product. There is no body to rule on this matter, Mr. Speaker, except yourself.

The integrity of the House of Commons is at stake and the reputation of all of its members. We must protect Canadian citizens. Mr. Speaker, I ask you to rule on this point.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I want to read from page 196 of Parliamentary Privilege in Canada regarding contempt of the House. It states:

> Contempt is whatever the House finds as contempt—

I think that is the case we are actually making at the moment.

> —any act—which obstructs or impedes—any member—of the House in the discharge of his "parliamentary" duty,—

It goes on to elaborate on that point. To support the point made by the hon. member for Dartmouth, this morning I was listening to one of the country and western stations and heard the ad which said that the proposed goods and services tax is not an additional tax.

• (1140)

The minute I heard that I realized that my constituents, recalling what I have been telling them for the past year, may wonder if I have been telling the truth because I have been saying that on hair cuts, movie tickets and laundry bills they will have to pay a tax, items on which they have never paid a tax before. This is a brand new, first-time tax. The ad says this is not an additional tax, not a new tax. That is a misrepresentation of what this House has actually passed.

I support the point made by my hon. friend from Dartmouth that this tax is not through Parliament. Mr. Speaker, as your ruling indicated, we are in a parliamentary democracy and this legislation is only half-way through the process. I am assuming that the Liberal senators will stop this bill so this will become an irrelevant tax.

However, I want to say I believe there has been a contempt of the House when a finance department advertisement broadcast on radio this morning indicated that this was not a new tax. I, and I am sure my colleagues here from all sides of the House, have been telling their constituents that this is a new tax. We have never seen this tax. I am sure my hon. friend, the parliamentary secretary from Alberta, knows that certainly in that province it will be a new tax. Alberta does not have any kind of sales tax at this point, particularly on service.

I am afraid there is definitely a contempt of the House and I would like to lend my support to the words of my hon. friend from Dartmouth.

Mr. Speaker: I understand the point and I have the transcript. I understand the argument that has been put to me and I will consider the matter and report back to the House as soon as I can. The hon. minister.

Hon. Otto Jelinek (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to comment in response to the House leader of the New Democratic Party. He talked about the fact that there is no tax in this country, that the GST is a new tax. He specifically mentioned Alberta. The hon. member should know, an Albertan should know, that in fact they pay $2 billion a year in tax and—

Mr. Speaker: I must ask the co-operation of the House and ask hon. members to remember that what I have to determine is whether there is a prima facie case of breach of privilege or contempt of the House. That is the sole issue. I have heard enough argument to be able to make that decision one way or the other and I have indicated that there is no need for further argument on this. I would ask members to co-operate with me. I will report back to the House on this matter as soon as I can.

The hon. parliamentary secretary on a point of order.

Mr. Cooper: I do not wish to enter into the argument. I just wish to draw the attention of the Speaker to citation 62 of Beauchesne's Sixth Edition.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. parliamentary secretary.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

HEALTH OF ANIMALS ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved that Bill C-66, an act respecting diseases and toxic substances that may affect animals or that may be transmitted by animals to persons, and respecting the protection of animals, be read the second time and referred to a legislative committee.

Mr. Milliken: In respect of this bill, C-66, and the next bill, C-67, I believe there is unanimous disposition on the part of the House that the two be referred to the same legislative committee.

While the motion may not have to be changed on this particular bill, I wonder if on the next one it could be made clear, and perhaps the Table could assist on this, that when the question is put it is by unanimous consent that after the bill receives second reading, it is referred to the same legislative committee to which Bill C-66 is referred.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I would just like to indicate that indeed we agree with this sensible proposal and would support it. I think it is a good idea.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I too want to suggest that there have been discussions. We felt that this was a way to deal most expeditiously with these two related bills. I support the suggestion made by my hon. friend, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank all hon. members. We will make sure that when we do present the next bill whatever needs to be done will be done.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to present to the House for second reading legislation amending the Animal Disease and Protection Act.

The current act has provided a sound base on which Agriculture Canada implemented its national animal health program, but it is showing the afflictions of age and time has exposed some weaknesses. Technological advances and public demands for the highest standards in agricultural products, increased competition in the world market-place, and the introduction of the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms have produced a new urgency for legislation that will guide us into the 1990s.

The amendments before the House will revitalize our animal health legislation. They reflect national demands for a continued high level of animal health, consumer demands for top quality products, and international demands for world-class agricultural products.

The current Animal Disease and Protection Act, originally passed in 1869 and last amended 14 years ago, has been revised to meet the demands of the next decade. The act has been substantially improved to control animal diseases that may be passed to people and to ensure toxic substances do not contaminate domestic livestock. More than ever producers and consumers are concerned about the dangers to people from tainted animals and animal products. Many animal diseases such as salmonellosis in poultry, trichinosis in pork, and rabies can cause serious human illness. The act has been amended to prevent, control, and eliminate animal diseases that can harm the public.

A second substantial change in the act prevents the introduction and spread of toxic substances. Increasing consumer concerns about residues in food prompted this revision. The authority to deal with animals in relation to pesticides, hormones, and antibiotics is currently embodied in a separate piece of legislation: the Meat Hygiene Act.

The Meat Hygiene Act applies only to animals after they arrive at a registered slaughterhouse. Provisions in the Animal Disease and Protection Act that deal with the importation, movement, disposal, and control of diseased animals will also refer to animals and animal products contaminated with toxins.

One of the provisions of this new act will provide for cost recovery mechanisms by Agriculture Canada. The cost of conducting inspections, taking samples, issuing permits to those who import animals, isolating animals at quarantine stations, and providing other services under the Health of Animals Act will be eligible for recovery.

Industries are demanding more assistance from the department and, where appropriate, these costs will be borne by the industry and importers who seek the department's services or those who, by their negligence, jeopardize the health of people or livestock. The public purse will not be obligated to pay for facilities to inspect for animal disease. New provisions will provide the minister with the authority to require operators of air, road, rail, and sea terminals to allocate at no cost to the Crown space and facilities for the administration of the act.

The revisions I have mentioned so far address urgent matters, but the bill before the House also addresses other important areas. The cumbersome system that now compensates producers when diseased animals are destroyed has been replaced by a more flexible and equitable system. Cost to producers will be recovered in cases where the government decides that affected animals should be treated rather than destroyed.

In addition to the new compensation system, the Health of Animals Act will make it easier for producers to comply with quarantines and other orders issued by Agriculture Canada. These modifications remove the obligation of an inspector to declare any premises "infected" where the inspector finds or suspects disease. This obligation causes hardships for producers who must comply with the strict requirements imposed on infected places.

Clarification of the compensation system is another improvement. Under the previous act appeal procedures for compensating producers when the department orders their animals or animal products destroyed were vague or referred to in other legislation. The Pesticide Residue Compensation Act and procedures to appeal compensation claims are now provided in the new act.

A new section in the act authorizes the department to provide financial and technical expertise to foreign countries. The current acts force the government to bide its time, waiting for the problem to reach Canadian shores. This new provision, however, will allow Canada to assist another country to eradicate serious animal diseases before they arrive and jeopardize the health of our domestic animal populations.

Under the current mandate inspectors cannot stop and search vehicles on the highway, even when they have reason to suspect that they carry animals that may be diseased or otherwise pose health problems. The lack of authority is rectified in the revised act, and there are other amendments specific to the act.

The department's powers to seize or detain animals and animal products have been extended to close loopholes. Currently inspectors may only order the return of animals or products if they are removed from an infected place. They may not, however, seize and detain animals and/or their products.

This legal gap seriously hampers the inspectors' efforts to control disease, and a new section will authorize officials to seize anything that contravenes the act or its regulations. Another amendment establishes a new national identification system for animals. This system will identify an animal's most recent owner and location. When a diseased animal is found it can be quickly traced back to a specific farm, helping the department to ensure that other animals at the farm do not spread the disease. The department will be given the authority to conduct surveys to help determine if a disease is present and the extent of economic loss that results from an outbreak. Statistics on animals will be readily available.

The new act also recognizes that disease and pests can enter Canada indirectly. Garbage generated on international ships entering Canadian waters or on aircraft landing on Canadian soil presents a serious risk of introducing animal diseases. The new legislation will continue to ensure that garbage is properly handled and disposed of when it is discharged on our shores. The department has new powers to control animal disease vectors: insects or other animals that can carry disease from one organism to another.

One new section in the Health of Animals Act specifically empowers the department to dispose of vectors. Another section provides for regulations to control importing and exporting vectors and also specifies the method of treating, destroying and separating them from healthy animals.

One of the weaknesses of the current act is that necessary controls are assumed or are simply not clear. Now the obligations and duties of anyone handling animals and their products, including diseased cultures, are written in more detail and in a style that is readily understandable.

Amendments also update and simplify legal requirements. The penalties for contravening the act have been updated. The new penalties include ticketing for minor offences. This procedure is similar to that of a police officer handing out tickets for traffic violations and avoids the current procedure of having the accused appear before a judge, even if the accused is pleading guilty.

The revised act protects the rights of individual citizens as guaranteed in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. An inspector may not enter a dwelling place without the occupant's consent or without a warrant issued by a magistrate. The powers of the Governor in Council, the minister and inspectors have also been recast to ensure they are compatible with the charter.

The new act is the culmination of experience. All public and private groups directly affected by this legislation have been consulted. Provincial governments, the departments of the environment, revenue, and health and welfare, the trade negotiations office, industry, and interested members of the public had input into the contents of this bill. All agree that amendments are necessary, and all continue to support the principles of this bill.

The Health of Animals Act has several benefits. Agriculture Canada will be better able to control animal diseases. The department will be sensitive to changes in technological and trade practices and thus react reasonable to them.

The department will be able to enforce the act and its regulations, ensuring that there are few infractions. It will be possible to recover costs for certain services and programs. The department will be ensuring the rights of individual citizens as required by the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Amendments to this legislation reaffirm the government's commitment to safe and healthy livestock. The act has been revised to clarify responsibilities, reinforce controls, and take into account modern technology. This bill ensures that our animal industries, so vital to this nation's well-being, will be successful in the competitive world markets for animals and their product.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Madam Speaker, I rise today to speak on Bill C-66 which is an upgrading of the Health of Animals Act. However, I have some concerns that I want to make very clear at this time.

First, once again the government is pulling away some of the support systems to the Canadian agricultural industry. It is bringing in a user-pay concept in terms of inspections that cannot be added to the costs of the animals when sold. Individuals who reside within a five-kilometre area of a herd being placed under quarantine may have to go through a series of blood testing or other tests to examine whether or not their herd is infected with tuberculosis or any other diseases that are prevalent in livestock, particularly in cattle: tuberculosis, brucellosis, or even a recent outbreak in Britain that has created panic throughout the livestock industry. They estimate that millions of cattle will have to be slaughtered because of a very serious epidemic of what they call the mad cow disease or, in the official terminology, they call it bovine spongiform enephalopathy.

Having been a farmer for longer than I care to think about we have gone through the blood testing procedure with livestock on many occasions in our own operations. There is a huge expense connected with it, even in terms of the producers, let alone the services of the veterinary involved or the veterinarians for Agriculture Canada.

Agriculture Canada has some excellent veterinarians, not only out in the field in the various counties or areas they serve but also here in Agriculture Canada in Ottawa. I certainly give them my full measure of support for the excellent work they are carrying on.

When I look at this piece of legislation that will impose another cost on producers at a time when the profit margins are very low, or in many cases do not exist, I think the Government of Canada has an obligation to provide those services to protect the health of animals, particularly those that may be subjected to diseases which come into this country with animals from Europe or other nations where there may be diseases such as the one I just mentioned from Great Britain: the mad cow disease.

In spite of the fact that we have high health standards in Canada, I remind the parliamentary secretary and the ministers who are in the House that last year we had an outbreak of brucellosis. Carriers of brucellosis were identified as coming out of one of the prairie provinces where there was a dispersal sale of an infected herd. The animals from that dispersal sale were sold across North America and, in fact, some of them came into Ontario and created havoc among producers here who had what we thought were clean herds.

When such an animal comes into an area and a quarantine is placed on a five-square-kilometre surrounding area, is that cost to be borne by the people within that area whose herds are clean but have to be tested to reaffirm that status? Or is that cost borne by the person who imported the animal that was infected?

I think we have to make that very clear. Clause 60 (2) says:

> The fees, charges and costs are recoverable jointly and severally from the owner or occupier of the place or the owner of the animal or thing and from the person having the possession, care or control of it immediately before its inspection, treatment, segregation, detention, forfeiture, quarantine, testing analysis, identification, storage, removal—

Based on what the bill states, if someone brings into an area an exotic pet or another exotic animal that could be a carrier, it looks as though all the people in that five-square-kilometre area would be responsible to pick up the cost of testing if an outbreak did occur.

I recall that, in 1952, we had an outbreak in Canada of foot and mouth disease. While the outbreak was arrested, the loss was enormous. Thousands of cattle which could not be replaced were quarantined and slaughtered. Even though there was compensation paid to those producers under this legislation, a lot of those animals simply could not be compensated for because of the genetic strain and the breed lines they represented. The losses were borne by the producers, as well as the Government of Canada. To add on additional cost at this time is not appropriate.

We have heard a lot of comment about the bison herd in Wood Buffalo National Park. A lot of people think that it should be wiped out. Last September the hon. member for Kent and myself flew over that park. People do not know what they are talking about when they say they are going to eliminate that herd. They are not familiar with the terrain of the area where that herd grazes.

I suggest that there are outside influences putting pressure on the government to eliminate that herd, because there are grazing grounds there that may look very enticing to other interests. There may be people with ambitions to set up buffalo burger outlets featuring the carcasses of these animals. They say that 33 per cent of them are infected.

Having had experience in blood testing animals for brucellosis or tuberculosis, I know that one has to take a blood sample. I suggest to the House that those blood samples have been taken from infected animals and, consequently, the results show a higher percentage infected than if a cross-section of the whole herd had been taken.

My rationale for making this statement is that if one is going to take a blood sample, does one take it from some rambunctious, 2,600-pound bull that measures seven feet at the shoulder and that is liable to chase one up the nearest tree, or from a sick, dozy animal that cannot keep up with the rest of the herd and is not going to put up much a fight? Madam Speaker, I suggest to you that I know from which those blood samples will be taken. It would take a lot of fortitude to tackle one of those 2,600-pound bulls that is liable to chase you up the nearest tree and then shove over the tree to get to you.

There are a lot of things we have to look at in terms of infectious diseases in the country. While I support most of the provisions in this bill, I do not believe in imposing additional costs on producers who could be innocent victims of an imported animal spreading disease or an outbreak that could be carried by migrating water-fowl stopping over. It could occur as a result of bringing in some birds or animals from another continent.

In the 1960s and early 1970s, we had an outbreak of a contagious poultry disease in southwestern Ontario. I believe it was Newcastle disease. It was learned that a particular hatching operation had imported baby chicks, supposedly from Ireland, because Ireland was listed as a clean vicinity. They had been trans-shipped from another country to Ireland and then on to Canada.

The outbreak did not occur in the area immediately surrounding the area where these birds were reared, but rather some 50 miles away in the constituency of my colleague, the hon. member for Kent. It occurred there because the same feed truck that serviced farms in that area serviced the hatchery these birds came from. Consequently, two breeding flocks of turkeys in my own neighbourhood were wiped out because of this supposedly innocent act of importing from Europe by way of Ireland baby chicks that were carriers of this disease.

The farmers were not paid ample compensation for these two breeding flocks under this particular legislation because it did not provide for compensation other than for the sale of the birds for meat purposes. Those losses were very heavy and I would like to see something done to compensate for that.

My main concern about this bill is that the government is trying to proceed on a cost recovery basis. The government has a responsibility to make sure that the consumers of Canada have high quality, clean food available to them that is not infected by these diseases from other nations. But it also has an obligation to make sure that, if the owners of the livestock are willing to test to maintain that high quality, clean food, and they volunteer to test, then they should not have to bear the costs of the veterinarians who do that. They have their own costs of round-up, handling, and equipment and, of course, always at risk of injury.

As I said, this bill has some very important provisions that we think are good, but that is one aspect that I want to make sure the government is very much aware of and prepared to deal with in committee.

There is another concern that I think I should raise here on the floor of the House today because of this outbreak in England. The United States, the EEC, and the Soviet Union are among those that are banning imports of beef from this area. I hope the government will act immediately to do the same thing. When we ban those imports, we must be very careful to catch all the shipments and not allow some that may be trans-shipped to another country to end up in Canada, the country of origin undivulged to the consumers.

While it does not appear that this particular disease can infect humans, it is suspected of infecting a cat. The autopsy was performed at the University of Bristol. It seems to be a comparable disease to that found in cattle. This disease had been identified only in sheep, but it is obvious that the infected cattle originally contracted it by eating a protein supplement partially composed of meat scraps and meat meal that came from some infected sheep.

I hope that the government will act very quickly to make sure that shipments of beef into the country are curtailed immediately until this outbreak is cleaned up.

The British Government is funding a $30 million research program, but scientists say it could be several years before they understand how the disease is passed on and they perfect a fool-proof test. In the meantime, this dread disease will continue to spread throughout British cattle herds. As a result, many British consumers have simply stopped buying the product.

It would be a disaster in the industry in Canada if we ever had an outbreak here. I think we have to impose the most stringent regulations possible on imported meats coming into the country until this risk is removed.

We, on this side of the House in the Official Opposition, do support most of the provisions in this particular bill. However, I again want to place on record that, in terms of cost recovery in the areas I have outlined, we do want the government to re-evaluate the position it has taken. I say that in view of the low returns to producers and in view of the fact that innocent farmers within a quarantine area could be forced to make huge expenditures as a result of a disease that came into that area through no negligence on their part but through occurrences beyond their control.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to have an opportunity to make a few remarks at this time for two reasons. The first is to welcome you to your new position. We have appreciated the work you have done in your position over the last number of months and look forward to working co-operatively with you in the future to ensure that the House of Commons works as it ought to work, in terms of a balanced approach to legislation and an opportunity for all members to be heard. We offer our co-operation always with the Chair.

I am also pleased to have this opportunity to speak to the provisions of Bill C-66 regarding animal diseases. I have waited some time for this. I must say at the outset that my hon. colleague from Moose Jaw—Lake Centre was also hoping to participate in the debate today, but at the moment he is held up in committee work. So, I have an opportunity, in his stead, to make some remarks about Bill C-66.

I want to begin by suggesting that one of the items that concern members of the New Democratic Party is the extra charges that will be attached to the livestock industry as a result of this legislation. I do not have to remind members of the House of Commons that these days the livestock industry is being challenged on virtually every front. Costs are continuing to increase while prices—although they are holding in some parts of the country at this moment—are not increasing in the same way. There is a financial crunch being felt by the livestock industry, to say nothing of what high interest rates do to the industry.

The legislation before us clearly points out that the user-pay concept, the extra charges, and the cost recovery that will be involved will mean added cost to livestock producers. When it is perceived that there is disease in your herd, there is a lot of cost involved in the round-up and assembly of the animals and, in some cases, the transportation of animals. In addition to those costs, the livestock producer will have the cost of service charges attached to the attempt to eliminate, eradicate or check out the disease. I want to flag that as an item that we will be raising in committee.

I should say at the outset that we support this bill. It is a housekeeping bill in a lot of ways. That is not to say that there are not concerns and shortcomings that we will want to raise in committee. We believe that modification to the legislation would make it better, both for the Government of Canada and for the livestock industry.

I believe that the fines involved for a summary conviction are appropriate. The ticketing proposal is a good one. It will allow a streamlining in dealing with infractions. Prior to this bill, Agriculture Canada had to rely on the Criminal Code for any punishment for offenders. Now it has its own authority through the issuance of tickets, much the same as for a speeding offence. If you admit you are guilty, you do not have to go to court and go through a long process. I think this streamlining is in the best interests of the Department of Agriculture and the industry itself.

The purpose of the bill before us is to control diseases and toxic substances in animals and products. It also strengthens Canada's ability to prevent the entry of diseases in animals which have serious economic impacts attached to them, and also to control or to eradicate outbreaks of a variety of diseases. The act broadens the mandate under the scope of diseases. Prior to this Agriculture Canada could destroy an animal if it had tuberculosis, rabies or brucellosis, for example, because the disease was affecting the animals. Now it can destroy an animal if whatever it has is also transmittable to humans. To accomplish this, the inspectors will have greater powers and the department can control movement by blocking roads and ordering the disinfection of certain vehicles.

Regarding compensation, the act will allow Agriculture Canada to set a maximum for compensation across the board for all species and all programs. We have some concerns with this because, for example, the current maximum fine for brucellosis is $1,500 which, of course, does not cover the cost of replacing valuable purebred animals.

I suppose cattlemen could always take out additional insurance to cover the differential costs, but Lloyds of London is the only insurer which will cover an animal for government slaughter. It is expensive, about 1 per cent or 2 per cent of the value of the animal, and likely the insurance would have to be taken out in conjunction with mortality insurance which is about 5 per cent of the value. Therefore, it is obvious that a producer would be looking at a yearly premium of 6 per cent to 6.5 per cent. Needless to say, this could cause serious problems with certain producers.

The act will allow Agriculture Canada to pay for treatment instead of slaughter. This would be appropriate for anaplasmosis in horses. It makes a good deal of sense that the government has been flexible in dealing with the situation and is prepared to support a treatment.

It would be helpful to go through some of the points raised in the legislation. I think this legislation was last amended in 1974. Of course a lot has changed since then in terms of the way animals are transported and dealt with which makes it, in some cases, easier for diseases to be brought into the country and, once into the country, to expand.

The legislation will confirm the authority to control, eradicate and prevent the entry into Canada of diseases of animals which constitute a threat to human health. This has to be seen as a major step forward.

The legislation also gives authority to control animals and their products exposed to or contaminated by toxic materials in order to prevent their entry into the animal or human food chain. With the continual entry of toxic substances into our environment this has become a problem which hitherto had not existed to the same degree. But I think we would all recognize that the ability to control animals exposed to contaminated toxic materials is becoming increasingly a problem that we have to address.

The bill also allows the Governor in Council to regulate the movement of people, animals and vehicles in respect of places or areas infected with serious animal disease. Perhaps this would be an appropriate point to take a moment or two to point out that the Canadian Federation of Humane Societies has made a number of recommendations to Agriculture Canada in terms of the transportation of livestock. As the second largest country in the world geographically, with a livestock industry in virtually all areas, transportation is a critical feature in the industry.

The Canadian Federation of Humane Societies has flagged a number of issues that I think warrant mention at this point. It suggests, for example, that all weigh stations close to provincial borders should be manned by individuals who are authorized to enforce the Animal Disease and Protection Act and that they should be encouraged to inspect vehicles and enforce the transportation provisions. That is an excellent recommendation.

The Canadian Federation of Humane Societies says that Agriculture Canada should make an immediate commitment to get back into the day-to-day monitoring of livestock transportation and enforcement of its transportation regulations. Consideration might be given, they suggest, to expanding the role of existing staff such as the meat hygiene staff. In an effort to curtail expenses we made reductions in inspection which have been raised from time to time in this House and elsewhere and are causing sectors of Agriculture Canada serious concerns.

It is also recommended that Agriculture Canada should join with provincial departments of agriculture and animal welfare groups across the country in a multi-disciplinary committee based on the British Columbian model to utilize all available resources in addressing the transportation issue. Animal welfare groups, particularly farm animal welfare groups, are now becoming more vocal in the matter of livestock transportation. The multi-disciplinary approach that has been experimented with in British Columbia is certainly worth considering on a national scale and also would encourage those provinces that are not participating in this type of approach to do so.

The Canadian Federation of Humane Societies also suggests that veterinary inspectors from the federal government should be available at all major U.S. border crossings during the day or at times that coincide with inspectio]n hours in the United States. It suggests that stations without regular inspection should have a veterinary inspector readily available on an appointment basis.

If that cannot be accomplished, Agriculture Canada should consider establishing designated animal importation stations fully manned by Agriculture Canada inspection staff. These stations should be established at points which currently handle most of the animal traffic into the country.

I think this goes without saying. I know that my hon. friend, the Minister of National Revenue, is concerned about improving the flow of traffic across our borders. He has indicated a number of potential improvements and this would be one that ought to be considered with that because we do not want to have diseased animals entering the country.

There is a whole set of other recommendations. I think I have made the point that when it comes to transportation of livestock across our provincial or international borders there are obvious improvements that ought to be made.

The legislation is receiving our support because it provides authority for a national identification system for animals for the purpose of determining the presence of and controlling or eradicating of animal diseases. That is fundamental and it is for that reason we want to see this bill proceed expeditiously.

It also establishes an authority to provide assistance to other countries in order to control or eradicate animal diseases. We have already heard today concerns about the importation of diseased animals from other countries using the indirect routing of livestock. While we might prohibit animals coming in from a certain country, if they are detoured via another port, it is sometimes impossible to regulate that. We are concerned about that for obvious reasons.

The legislation will allow recovery for the cost of inspection, treatment and other services previously provided free. I think we have to revisit this whole concept. Obviously, the government is trying to introduce a user-pay process. That certainly has merit and at first glance people will say it makes sense. However, if we are going to expect people to co-operate fully in attempting to eradicate livestock diseases, we do not want to place roadblocks in their way. We want to encourage them to come forward and participate in these eradication programs. We have to determine whether assigning extra charges or fees would discourage people from taking this matter as seriously as they should.

There are a number of other items in the legislation that are equally significant. I think I have said enough in terms of the major portions of the legislation and the reasons we want to support it.

I want to conclude by saying that this legislation does allow for greater flexibility in terms of controls when it comes to transportation of animals. We have been approached by a number of animal welfare groups which are concerned about the cutbacks in inspectors to enforce the transportation provisions of the act. They are concerned about abuses with regard to the length of time animals spend in transit and about the lack of removal of cattle that have deceased enroute. When this bill gets to committee we will have an opportunity to raise these critical issues to representatives of the government.

This is major housekeeping, long overdue. It addresses some of the major issues with which we have been concerned. We have some concerns, but they can be dealt with appropriately once the legislation goes to committee.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Madam Speaker, this is not a topic of which I know very much. I will make that admission.

The lack of inspectors at border crossings is a concern of mine as well. At the steel mill in Sault Ste. Marie, as a result of the lack of inspectors to address the problem, we are assured, even by Revenue Canada, that Third World and European seamless tube is coming into the country. There is a problem in steel and I notice that there is a problem in this area as well. Is this a common problem along many lines where there is just not enough personpower to address situations like this?

Madam Deputy Speaker: As the hon. member knows, I did make a mistake. Normally at second reading the first three speakers do not benefit from the period for question and comments. However, I think we may allow the hon. member to answer his colleague's question.

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, I am pleased to respond to my hon. colleague. Obviously, we are all well aware of the problems with seamless tube which he has raised once again. It is a matter that has been raised many times both indirectly and directly in the House. The seamless tube issue is one that has caught our attention in the past as a result of problems at border crossings.

When it comes to meat or livestock inspections at the border, there are also problems. The fact is that Agriculture Canada is recommending that steps be taken, and I think I mentioned some of those specifics steps, to ensure that appropriate inspectors are available, at least on an on-call basis.

I think it is fair to say that we should be designating certain border crossings as those crossings where livestock crossing take place with appropriate and adequate inspection services available at all times. I think the international transportation of livestock products and live animals is sufficiently problematic that this is a safety precaution that we ought to consider. This will be one of the points that will be raised when the matter gets to committee.

[Translation]

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): First of all, Madam Speaker, I would like to take a few moments to congratulate you and wish you good luck in your new duties as Chairman of the Committees of the Whole House and Deputy Speaker of the House of Commons.

[English]

I am pleased to have this opportunity to speak today on Bill C-66, the Health of Animals Act.

I know that Canadians, and especially our agricultural producers, are proud of the fact that Canada has one of the best animal health records in the world. Our country has managed to avoid experiencing some of the very serious outbreaks of animal diseases to the extent sometimes witnessed in other nations. This success is due in large part to the commitment over the years of Agriculture Canada, national and provincial organizations and individual producers to be ever vigilant in the fight against animal diseases.

The establishment of preventive measures and detection procedures have played a major role in maintaining our animal health record. However, as the case of the so-called mad cow disease currently being encountered in England proves, we must continue to do all we can to avoid such a devastating outbreak of animal disease.

A large outbreak of disease would not only have an impact on farmers, but could also be a potentially serious health hazard to the public. In addition, a large outbreak may affect the high reputation of quality that our agricultural exports enjoy abroad. Therefore, it is necessary to create the most prudent and efficient measures we can to protect human health in this vital industry.

Madam Speaker, Bill C-66 proposes to improve upon Canada's ability to detect and control diseases and toxic substances which may affect animals or be transmitted by animals or animal products to humans. The bill also provides for the strengthening of Canada's ability to prevent the importation of animal disease, while at the same time preventing, controlling and eradicating any outbreak of disease which may indeed pose serious health risks to Canadians or create economic difficulties which result from them.

The objectives of Bill C-66 are certainly worthy of support, both by members in this House and throughout the Canadian agriculture community.

There have been cases where animal diseases have surfaced both in terms of the disease being brought into Canada or it being domestic in origin. In some of the more severe cases a number of animals had to be destroyed. Only the quick action taken by farmers and agriculture officials prevented the spread of these diseases.

In terms of disease threatening our exports, everything must be done to ensure that Canada does not sell infected animals abroad. Certainly, for us to transport a disease to a country or, even worse, to a country that does not have a history of that particular disease, the damage would be considerable in both financial and product reputation terms. The only policy is to be as sure as possible that our exports are disease free.

Bill C-66 provides a number of measures that would be helpful in efforts to combat domestic and foreign animal diseases. In Canada, the bill enables the Ministry of Agriculture to designate qualified animal inspectors and to provide them with appropriate powers to execute their duties effectively.

The bill would enable an inspector to declare any property within five kilometres of an infected area to be deemed temporarily infected. This would assist in preventing the spread of a disease or toxic substance.

If an inspector believes that a larger quarantine area is necessary, the ministry could permit an even larger control area to be declared for a longer period until the situation is resolved.

Bill C-66 also strengthens important rules such as prohibiting individuals to possess or dispose of an imported animal or item known to be in contravention of the act. To accomplish this, the animal inspectors can examine or detain any animal or animal thing which may be diseased or contaminated until a thorough inspection has been conducted.

If the inspector has reason to believe that the animal or thing is contravening the act or could be infected, the inspector may require it to be removed from Canada or forfeited and properly disposed of.

In terms of exportation regulations, Bill C-66 requires all exports of animals, animal products or associated things to specifically meet the certification standards of the importing state. This measure would be effective in enabling Canada from unintentionally exporting a disease or toxic substance which would have damaging repercussions to our international reputation in animal health safety and also cause concern over maintaining our external markets.

This bill does, however, possess an aspect which is worthy of further deliberation in committee. This relates to the issue of cost recovery. Bill C-66 would permit the government, through the animal inspectors, to recover the costs of inspections, treatments or any other necessary services which have previously been provided free of charge.

I believe this matter deserves closer examination so far as this additional cost may have a significant financial impact on some farmers, especially during periods of depressed market prices. I hope that this matter will be discussed in detail during committee stage.

Inspectors able to charge service fees for inspections and treatments reflects a policy similar in nature to privatization. It must be ensured that the quality of these services remain consistent throughout the country.

This additional concern should be given further thought with regard to bird stocks. This bill would allow the Governor in Council to make regulations to maintain or improve the quality of poultry and control or eliminate diseases or toxic substances among birds. I believe that such authority, if exercised properly, would be most beneficial to Canadian poultry producers.

It is also a positive step for this bill to permit the Minister of Agriculture to provide assistance to individuals or governments outside of Canada to aid them in controlling or eliminating a disease or toxic substance which either affects or could affect people or animals within Canada. This measure would indeed be of value in preventing any future cases of disease or toxins from entering Canada.

While the capability to diagnose and control animal diseases and toxins have improved considerably, there is still cause for concern in cases involving foreign animals. Therefore, this foreign assistance is certainly justifiable.

In terms of penalties provided by this bill, the proposed legislation would increase the amount by which individuals are fined for violating the act. It has been determined that existing penalties are not sufficient enough in deterring individuals from repeating an offence.

Bill C-66 allows the Minister of Agriculture to enact regulations permitting the issuance of tickets for minor infractions of the act and regulations. This ticket system gives inspectors the power to issue a ticket, thereby avoiding the often long and expensive court proceedings which are currently required.

The ticket system is, however, worthy of further consideration. Such a system should operate under specific guidelines. The system should be closely examined to ensure that the new enforcement powers assigned to inspectors do not have an unduly negative impact on farmers, particularly small-scale producers. If the ticket system proceeds, then tickets should be issued for reasonable cause and not be too expensive for minor infractions.

With regard to the issue of compensation for farmers who suffer losses of animals due to disease or toxic substances, Bill C-66 provides for the establishment of a new system of compensation. The type of compensation permitted is to be based upon the species and maturity of the average Canadian animal. The maximum compensation available, however, would be set at an amount which would not bankrupt the animal health program. There may of course be cases where the maximum compensation permitted would not be enough to cover the animal or animals in question. Thus owners would have to carry adequate insurance coverage. This, unfortunately, may add to the additional input costs of farmers.

It is important that consideration be given in committee with regard to the amount of compensation the farmer would receive should a disease inflicted animal be destroyed. The bill should provide farmers sufficient compensation to replace their high valued animals.

In general, Bill C-66 attempts to provide measures that encompass a wider variety of animal diseases and harmful toxins. It endeavours to strengthen import inspection to keep out foreign diseases. It also provides for more effective legal control over diseases and adds to the ability to enforce legislation.

Aside from the benefits the bill has for the protection of animals and this sector of our agricultural industry, it plays an important role in protecting the health of farmers who come into contact with animals and the Canadians who eat meat, eat eggs or drink milk.

This legislation assists in the eradication of diseases which can be harmful to humans, such as in the case of salmonella. The bill also provides the powers to detect chemical residue contamination such as in the serious case of PCB contamination, by broadening the scope of disease definition.

For all these reasons, I believe the bill is worthy of support. I would hope that some of the aspects of this bill are given further study in committee and that these matters which I have referred to are given due consideration when the committee examines this bill in greater detail.

PLANT PROTECTION ACT

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved that Bill C-67, an act to prevent the importation, exportation and spread of pests injurious to plants and to provide for their control and eradication and for the certification of plants and other things, be read the second time and, by unanimous consent, referred to the legislative committee considering Bill C-66.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I want to indicate at the outset that we have agreed to have this bill, as well as Bill C-66, dealt with by the same committee because the two pieces of legislation are very similar in many ways.

The title of this revised act is the Plant Protection Act. The more appropriate name reflects the new and more vigorous action this government is taking to protect Canadian plant-based industries from the economically disastrous effects of plant pests, which include both insects and diseases.

Since the first formal pest control act was passed 80 years ago, Agriculture Canada has accepted responsibility for safeguarding the health of our agricultural plants and our forests. The government revised this mandate when new technology, advances in research and changes in the world market for plants, plant products and other things demanded better legislative controls.

In 1952, for example, Canada responded to growing international concerns over the spreading of pests by signing the International Plant Protection Convention. Signatories to this convention agreed to certify that their plants, plant products, and other things destined for the shores of member countries were free of plant pests. The legislative mandate of Agriculture Canada was subsequently extended to reflect this international commitment.

Since 1968 when the Plant Quarantine Act was introduced many changes in Canadian law and in the world market-place have started to erode its power. Many sections are no longer productive.

Seven years ago Agriculture Canada vigorously reviewed its plant protection programs. Experts from the department, with the help of those from provincial governments, industry and the public, assessed the impact on our programs of the new technology, changes in the market-place, and the recurring problems that have resulted from applying the current legislation.

This bill results in part from those amendments. It ensures that Canada's superior standards of plant protection are preserved. We are removing those facets that inhibit the department from doing its best to prevent the spread of pests. We have reworked sections to make them more productive. We have taken steps to ensure that Canadian plant based industries will continue to prosper in the world market.

The revised legislation deals with three major areas. First, it incorporates several provisions found previously only in the regulations. These provisions grant Agriculture Canada authority to issue permits to persons importing plants, to designate where and under what conditions products will be inspected, and to move, place in quarantine or dispose of plants, plant products or other things that are infested. Moving these provisions from the regulations to the act leaves them less open to challenge.

Second, the onus is no longer solely on the department to prove that individuals deliberately spread pests. The current act states that no person shall knowingly introduce or admit into Canada any pest, plant or plant product, or anything else that is infested or likely to be infested with a plant pest. This clause has been a legal hindrance to the government's efforts to keep plant pests from entering or spreading within the country.

Steps to prevent plant pests from entering Canada or spreading have bogged when individuals challenge the department to prove that they deliberately spread the pests.

The purpose of this legislation is to control and eradicate plant pests, not punish people. The bill therefore separates the control and eradication of pests from commission of the offence.

The third major provision of the bill will ensure that technological progress does not outstrip legislative controls. The controls in place today cannot keep pace with the expected rapid change in methods of transporting plants, products or other things, and in methods of controlling or eradicating plant pests.

The department needs some mechanism to ensure that it can keep up with the new technology. Currently, authority to revise control provisions rest with the Governor in Council. The revised act allows the Minister of Agriculture or officials to deal with matters of a technical nature, such as the packaging and transportation of material that is likely to be infected with plant pests.

The act is also being amended to provide for cost recovery for some services. In fact costs can now be recovered for services like conducting inspections, issuing permits to those who import plants, and for providing other services under the Plant Protection Act.

These costs will be borne, where appropriate, by the people who seek the department's services or by those whose negligence threatens the health of plants.

The costs for facilities to inspect and test for plant pests will also not be shouldered by the public. Two new sections of the act provide the Minister of Agriculture with the authority to require operators of land, air, rail and sea terminals to allocate, if required, at no cost to the Crown, space and facilities for the services provided for in the act.

As well as providing these major benefits, the amendments also clean up other problems associated with the previous act. For example, they clarify obligations and eliminate unnecessary hardships on people. They also confer new powers on the department to perform its work more efficiently. They ensure that the new act respects the rights of citizens as guaranteed in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

The scope and intent of many sections have been crystallized in the new act. The duties and obligations of the people are now entrenched. Where the Plant Quarantine Act left responsibilities unclear, new sections will clarify the obligations of people.

Procedures and responsibilities of the department have also been clarified. The process of declaring places to be infested and the powers of the minister and inspectors in this action have been spelled out. The process and authority to prohibit or regulate the introduction or movement of plants, plant products or other things are also clearly laid out.

• (1250)

For example, this bill allows for the designation of an infested place by an inspector. The designation by an inspector of an infested place ends after 90 days. Under this designation people must adhere to rigorous movement or propagation controls. A period longer than 90 days might severely hamper a person's efforts to meet financial obligations. Therefore, if 90 days is insufficient time to control the infestation, only the minister may extend it.

Clarification of the compensation system is another improvement which will help Canadians. When it came to setting out the procedures for compensating people when the department ordered their plants or other things disposed of, the previous act was vague or referred to other legislation. The new act specifies under what conditions the department will pay compensation and sets out how people can appeal compensation claims.

In some situations our safeguards were inadequate because legal controls were lacking. Under the current legislation, inspectors cannot stop vehicles on the highway, even when they have reason to inspect the vehicles may carry plants, plant products and other things that are likely to be infested with a plant pest.

When departmental officials have the legal mandate to inspect things, it often happens that inspectors are forced to conduct their investigations under poor physical conditions. A dimly lit warehouse, for example, can seriously undermine the official's best effort to detect plant pest infestations. The lack of authority in these matters is rectified in the Plant Protection Act.

The act also extends the period that material coming into Canada may be detained. The current 90-day limit rules out using sophisticated testing techniques that can take as long as a year or more to complete. The new legislation increases the period to 180 days or longer. With this extension the department will be confident that it has the time to discover the presence of certain viruses or other plant pests that are not easily detected.

There are two new safeguards in the revised act to prevent infested material destined for Canada from leaving the shores of the foreign supplier. Many plants, plant products or other things come from countries where plant pest infestations are widespread. If the department has reasonable grounds to believe that the goods are infested, it can inspect them at the origin before they are shipped to Canada.

Another new section authorizes the department to provide financial and technical expertise to foreign countries. The current act forces Agriculture Canada to bide its time, waiting for infested materials to reach Canadian shores before it acts. The Plant Protection Act, however, will help eradicate foreign plant pests before they arrive and jeopardize the health of agriculture and forestry industries.

Other amendments update and simplify legal requirements. The penalties for contravening the act have been restructured to make them more effective. The new penalties include ticketing for minor offences. This provision will eliminate the need to go through lengthy and costly courtroom proceedings to prosecute those who plead guilty to minor infractions.

The revised act also protects the rights of individual citizens as guaranteed in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. The inspectors may not enter a private dwelling without the occupant's consent or without a warrant issued by a magistrate. The powers of the Governor in Council, the minister, and inspectors have also been updated to ensure they comply with the charter.

The Plant Protection Act is the culmination of much labour and learning from the lessons of past experience. We have consulted all public and private groups directly affected by this bill. Provincial governments, appropriate federal departments, industry and other interested groups have studied and responded to the proposed changes. All agree that the amendments are necessary and all support the principles of this bill.

The Plant Protection Act will add needed substance to our plant based industries. All sections of the previous acts have been amended to clarify responsibilities, reinforce controls, and take into account the urgent needs of modern technology.

This new legislation will ensure that agriculture and forestry, two of Canada's most important economic sectors, will be able to compete in what is a very competitive world market-place.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure to rise today to make a few comments on Bill C-67 respecting the Plant Protection Act. As the parliamentary secretary has said, this is a bill respecting the updating of the previous act known as the Plant Quarantine Act that has been in place since 1967. I agree that it is long overdue and that an updating of that bill is taking place now.

Basically this is good bill. I look forward to seeing the bill in committee where we can have further discussions on some of the particular aspects of it.

However, this bill will assist Canada's plant industry to avoid the economically disastrous effects of insect pests and diseases while maintaining Canada's foreign markets by preventing the spread of plant pests into foreign countries and from them coming into Canada from foreign countries.

If there is any hope of prevention or control of plant pests, the first essential is to be able to detect these pests at the early stage and deal with the problem in a responsible and expeditious manner. The amendments that this bill provides should enable the Department of Agriculture to react more quickly and efficiently to any emergencies in plant pest outbreaks that take place.

The proposed legislation as well, as the parliamentary secretary has stated, would help any person or government to establish a pest control network in order to control or eradicate pests outside Canada.

If there was an outbreak of a plant pest or disease in another country in the past, we in Canada, unless we did it through a project sponsored by an organization such as CIDA which could take some time, were not able to jump in quickly and help solve the problem. I can think of one situation in which we had a lot of transplants purchased from the southern United States come into Canada. This allows us, if necessary, to go in there and assist in order to provide better and safer plant material coming here for our producers.

The bill should also improve the compensation provisions since compensation would be paid not only for destruction of a plant or a thing, not only for prohibition of sale or restriction of use of the property, but also for any treatment to a place, to a storage area or to a crop. That availability has not been there before for compensation by Agriculture Canada or by the government. I am sure such a provision will be welcomed by the agriculture industry.

However I have a few concerns as well. This legislation also gives the the ability to the Governor in Council to make regulations which would provide an inspector with the power to issue tickets for minor infractions of the act. I feel that should be and must be carefully reviewed so that the inspectors new enforcement powers are not overly extensive.

The ticketing mechanism this bill puts in place is not all bad. It allows inspections at border crossings or on site within the boundaries of Canada to take place and a ticketing process so that even though one is guilty one does not have to go before a judge. They are ticketed, they are fined, and they pay the fine.

However we must be very careful that process is not trivialized so that someone who is an offender does not say: "Well, that is fine. I will pay my ticket and I will go on". I think we must spend some time in the legislative committee to make sure that the regulations are written so that we take that into account. It is a useful tool that can be put in place, but we must be careful that it is used properly.

Another point that I feel should be questioned is the power provided to inspectors regarding the size of areas which they can declare as being infested. The area capable of being declared infested has a limit of time. It can be done for 90 days and, if it is to be extended, it has to be extended by the direction of the minister. However the size of the area is not dictated. That will be done depending on the situation which might arise.

I feel we have to be very careful. It could be the corner of a shed. It could be a farm. It could be a facility where plant material is being grown, being handled or passing through. The minister can revoke any inspector's declaration of infestation, in which case the place would cease to be infested. However we must ensure that standardized levels of service are provided across Canada so that Canada does not lose uniformity in the inspection process.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member will be recognized right after Question Period to complete his remarks.

NATIONAL TOURISM AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Mr. Speaker, May 14 to 20 marks Canada's fourth National Tourism Awareness Week.

Tourism is the most rapidly evolving and exciting industry in Canada today. In fact, tourism in Canada is a $24 billion industry, employing over 630,000 Canadians. Tourism is Canada's second largest earner of foreign revenue at about $7 billion. Last year, 15 million tourists visited Canada.

A large portion of tourism revenues goes toward municipal, provincial, and federal governments in the form of taxes. This builds roads, schools, and arenas and supports social programs—all the services that we have come to expect from our governments.

I salute the one million people involved in Canada's tourism industry and invite all Canadians to celebrate National Tourism Awareness Week. In Alberta we say: "Smile, you are a tourist attraction."

NATIONAL CAPITAL COMMISSION

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, in 1987, the National Capital Commission announced the winning design and developers of the Daly Building on Rideau Street. Appraised for $50 million in 1984 and vacant for 15 years, work was to begin that summer. One of the developers went bankrupt and the project was put on hold.

After numerous technical problems, we learned in September the project was to commence again, that the architect had been fired, and that the general contractor had not begun work because the developer was unable to post a bond that would satisfy the contractors.

Finally, this past December, work did begin on the interior of the building. Incredulously, last week at the Consumer and Corporate Affairs Committee, the Chairman of the NCC told me that the building was still on schedule and she made no mention of the latest snag.

The developers now want to demolish the Rideau Street portion of the building and replace it with a replica.

The National Capital Commission must settle the problems with the Daly Building and begin to take steps to ensure that these problems never arise again. Time is money and, again, the NCC has wasted a lot of both.

ZEBRA MUSSEL INFESTATION

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Mr. Speaker, the U.S. government has taken concrete action to address the infestation of zebra mussels in the Great Lakes. American congressmen say that the U.S. should spend $47 million to fight the mussel nuisance before it causes billions of dollars in damage to water intake systems and to sport fishing. Senators Glenn and Heinz have introduced Bill 4214 in the House of Representatives which deals with such aquatic nuisances.

This is a common problem for states and provinces and begs various aspects of co-operation between the two federal governments. I am reminded of the successful binational control agreement for lamprey eel in the Great Lakes. This is a similar problem and demands similar binational action.

The Ontario government and the Canadian Coast Guard suggest that a soft-line voluntary compliance with controlling ballast water is sufficient to control the proliferation of this nuisance. Guidelines are not enough. I urge the government to introduce immediate discussion with the U.S. government to initiate a binational co-operative agreement to address the problem of the zebra mussel before the Great Lakes are mussel-bound.

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce has urged the members of the Special Senate Committee on Bill C-21 to recommend forthwith that Bill C-21 be passed.

The Canadian Chamber of Commerce supports the bill, which it considers a step in the right direction. Unemployment insurance coverage should be provided for employees who are suddenly and temporarily out of work, said Tim Reid, President of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce.

Mr. Reid also said that the uncertainty caused by the present deadlock among employees and employers and the damaging effect on the lives of average Canadians have become intolerable.

Mr. Speaker, it is high time the Senate passed Bill C-21.

HEALTH

Mr. Joseph Volpe (Eglinton—Lawrence): Mr. Speaker, an estimated 30,000 Canadians are sufferers of myalgic encephalomyelitis, more commonly known as chronic fatigue syndrome. As a health and economic threat, it is second only to AIDS.

It is a total body disease with significant acquired functional and circulatory brain injury causing major cognitive, intellectual, and physical impairment.

The majority of patients incapacitated are highly educated, high functioning, productive professionals and their immediate families, people involved in jobs of high contact with a potentially ill public or a public recently vaccinated or immunized.

The majority of cases start with clear evidence of infectious illness which develops as a severe, chronic disabling disease.

Yet, except for Australia, no government is funding research and treatment of the serious and debilitating viral-immunological illness.

A symposium on myalgic encephalomyelitis, sponsored last weekend in my riding by sufferers and their families, called on the Government of Canada to devote resources to research and treatment of ME. I urge the Minister of National Health and Welfare to heed that call.

STATUS OF WOMEN

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Mr. Speaker, any doubts I had about how the Conservative government's agenda is affecting Canadian women were resolved this past month.

I have heard from hundreds of women in my riding and the message is clear. Free trade, the GST, cutbacks, and broken promises add up to bad news for the women of Canada.

Here are some of the things they asked me to tell the Prime Minister: Affordable, accessible child care is a must. Restore educational funding; women need education or face poverty. End restrictions on social assistance funding. Tax big business, not the poor. Stop violence against women. No new abortion law; make it a health care item with equal access for all. Naming a few high profile women to patronage posts is not enough; we need equality in the workplace and in decision-making now. Equal pay for equal work.

And, finally, the message that to me sums it up, we need a new Prime Minister and a democratic country.

NATIONAL TOURISM AWARENESS WEEK

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, May 14 through 20 is National Tourism Awareness Week.

Tourism is the fastest growing industry in this country. In 1988, it generated $24 billion in revenues, of which $17 billion was spent by Canadians visiting their own country and $7 billion by visitors from other countries.

With 631,000 employees and 577,000 Canadians who depend on tourism for part of their income, the industry is also the fastest generator of new jobs in this country.

S. O. 31

Mr. Speaker, the riding of Drummond has many activities and tourist attractions, including the World Folklore Festival which last year attracted more than 750,000 visitors and was proclaimed the tourism event of the year in Quebec. There are many historic sites to delight the visitor, such as the Village québécois d'antan, the Parc des Voltigeurs, the Domaine and the Manoir Trent, the Moulin Blanchette and many more.

I therefore want to take this opportunity to invite Canadians to my beautiful part of the country.

CORPORATE TAXATION

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, today the corporate welfare bum of the week honours friends in high places. Our three nominees each gave handsome donations to the Liberal and Conservative parties in 1988.

Our first nominee is the Bank of Nova Scotia which gave $80,000 to both the Liberals and the Conservatives.

Our second nominee is the Bank of Montreal which gave $80,000 to the Conservatives and $80,510 to the Liberals. Who says there is no competition among the banks?

Our third nominee is Wood Gundy which gave $67,000 to the Conservatives and $25,000 to the Liberals.

The envelope, please!

The winner is Wood Gundy. Wood Gundy remembered its friends in the Conservative government in 1988 after it made $31 million for underwriting the sale of Air Canada in 1987. For keeping its friends in high places, Wood Gundy is the corporate welfare bum of the week.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, increasingly, politicians are expected to act in the face of scientific uncertainty. This is why the precautionary principle is increasingly being accepted in political circles.

The reasoning goes like this: To do the right thing in the environment, we must anticipate and prevent. We must attack the causes of environmental degradation at the source, and before the problems become too big to handle. In addition, where there are threats of serious or irreversible damage, lack of complete scientific certainty should not be used as a reason for postponing measures to prevent environmental degradation.

There is also recognition of the fact that many measures urged on behalf of the environment make good economic sense as well. To achieve sustainable development, policies must be based on the precautionary principle which was widely endorsed at the just concluded Bergen Conference on Sustainable Development.

We urge the Government of Canada to put this principle into practice.

ALLERGY AWARENESS MONTH

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, allergies to natural substances and to chemical compounds can be a severe irritant to some people and life-threatening to others. In fact, more and more people seem to be affected by allergies in our modern and fast-paced way of life.

Awareness and understanding of allergies and their causes, a knowledge of ingredients of everyday products, such as food, clothing, and household cleansers, as well as the preservation of our environment are all keys to living safely with allergies.

The month of May marks Allergy Awareness Month and I wish to take this opportunity to salute the Allergy Information Association. For over 25 years, the Allergy Information Association has alerted Canadians to the hidden dangers of living with allergies by promoting awareness, lobbying for accurate food and textile labelling, and providing authoritative advice to Canadians who may suffer from allergies.

On behalf of the Minister of National Health and Welfare, I express our gratitude to the many dedicated volunteers of the Allergy Information Association.

DISABLED AND THE HANDICAPPED

Mr. Maurizio Bevilacqua (York North): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my warmest and sincerest congratulations to The Disability Network, the winner of the first ACTRA "into the mainstream" award, in recognition of its positive portrayal of visible, audible, and disabled minorities in Canadian movies, TV and radio.

Produced by the CBC and the Toronto Centre for Independent Living, The Disability Network airs Saturday afternoons as a news and information magazine for the disabled and other minorities.

While we celebrate this impressive achievement, we all must be reminded that there are many barriers confronting disabled Canadians. The Disability Network brings to light the fact that many of the issues raised in government reports or reports made by local organizations, such as the Community Services Council of York Region's "From Gaps to Option" report, remain unanswered.

I believe that we must practise the principle of inclusion, rather than exclusion. I urge the government to take all necessary steps to bring about full economic, social, and cultural integration of disabled Canadians.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, recently I have made a number of statements calling for our government to continue leadership and stewardship in the restraint of government spending.

On this same theme, I recently read some interesting facts prepared by one of our deputy ministers. How many members of this House are aware that each month Supply and Services Canada sends out something like 8.5 million cheques for old age security, guaranteed income supplements, Canada Pension Plan, and family allowance?

If one assumes that the public cost of each of these cheques was 39 cents, this translates into roughly $40 million a year. I ask then, should we as a government not consider other means through which cheques could be delivered? In this day and age of technological advances, there must be alternatives which could be more efficient, not as capital intensive, and in the end less expensive. The idea of direct-depositing is one that comes to mind.

On the surface, this appears to me as one avenue through which we could further reduce our spending and improve our over-all efficiency.

HOUSING

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, under this government, affordable housing has become an increasingly unobtainable goal. Forty per cent of all single parents in Canada are raising their children in unacceptable housing conditions.

With interest rates climbing to over 14 per cent, there are only 270,000 potential buyers of the average home, compared to 475,000 buyers two years ago when interest rates were only 10 per cent.

The government's response has been to ignore the housing crisis and exacerbate it by introducing the GST, cutting out RRAP, and cutting a total of $175 million from the social housing budget.

The Liberal Task Force on Housing released its report Monday with 25 recommendations for federal action. The key to this report is federal action, leadership, and co-operation with other levels of government and housing groups.

A national vision requires national direction. It is necessary for the federal government to co-ordinate a national housing strategy now by providing much needed funding and setting new directions for housing policy.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Mr. Speaker, in meetings in my constituency this past weekend and in several weekend meetings over the past few months, a question that keeps recurring is: Will manufacturers pass on to the consumers savings that occur as a result of the removal of the 13.5 per cent manufacturers' sales tax?

I asked the same question of witnesses during finance committee hearings in every province in Canada. Here are some of the answers.

Professor John Crispo stated: "Very few manufacturers of significance are going to be able to pocket the reduction in the MST. Competition is going to force them to pass it on to us".

The Economic Council of Canada stated: "The reality of the world market-place will force business people to pass through the great bulk of the tax".

The Canadian Construction Association stated: "The selling price for all kinds of construction, in our analysis, is found to be lower under GST than under the current tax system".

This week in the consumer affairs committee the same question was asked and the same answer comes. The Consumers Association of Canada said: "Consumers should benefit from the elimination of the MST. GST does a better job of collecting revenue than the old tax it replaces".

From hundreds of witnesses across Canada we are getting the same answers; consumers will benefit from the savings, manufacturers will pass on the savings when the 13.5 per cent manufacturers' sales tax is removed.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Deputy Prime Minister.

The special committee studying the proposed companion resolution presented its report earlier today. I want to commend members of the committee for their efforts.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Gray (Windsor West): The unanimous report which they have presented may well provide a basis for resolving the present constitutional impasse.

Therefore, can the Deputy Prime Minister tell the House if the Prime Minister invited all the provincial premiers to a conference for discussions for which the report tabled today will provide a basis? If so, can he tell this House and Canadians exactly when this conference will take place?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, of course, I and my party want to associate ourselves with the words of the Leader of the Opposition in complimenting all members of the committee on the very important work they have done and the manner in which they carried it out.

The members of the committee had a very challenging task. They demonstrated the highest level of co-operation, dedication and commitment. Indeed, all Canadians and all members of this House will be eternally grateful for the excellent work that they have carried out.

As the hon. Leader of the Opposition knows, the report has just been tabled today. The Prime Minister and the minister responsible for intergovernmental affairs will be discussing this with all the premiers. It is hoped that the report will provide the mechanism for those who have found it not appropriate to support the Meech Lake process to do so as a result of the recommendations made by the committee.

As soon as there is some indication that progress can be made in that regard, I am sure that the Prime Minister will take the necessary appropriate action.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in the context of the present constitutional impasse—some have even called it a crisis—the committee in its unanimous report found that the June 23 date is a political reality. Canadians have said that they want their political leaders to roll up their sleeves, get to work and lead the country out of the present constitutional impasse. Surely this is the message of the committee's unanimous report.

I ask the Deputy Prime Minister, why is the Prime Minister losing precious time? Why is he insisting on having some type of advance agreement before calling a First Ministers' Conference? Why will he not announce an early First Ministers' Conference today?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, the Leader of the Opposition knows that the report has just been tabled. The necessary and appropriate work will be done toward ensuring that all the players within this very important exercise will, in fact, be contacted so that the next steps can be agreed upon on a multilateral basis.

But let me remind him and the House that in a speech last night that the Prime Minister delivered to the Canadian Advance Technology Association and the Canadian Information Processing Society, he stated:

> As Prime Minister, I intend to spare no effort to develop a consensus and break the deadlock, if at all possible. I have begun to speak to each Premier personally and in the next few days, Senator Murray will again visit provincial capitals at my request.
> It is clear that a First Ministers' Conference will eventually be necessary to achieve an agreement. But I will only convene such a conference if there are reasonable prospects of success. The deadlock can only be broken by the exercise of Canadians' proven talent for reasonable accommodation, for working things out together.

All members should applaud the efforts of the Prime Minister in bringing this very important issue to this stage at this time. Of course, we very much want to commend the work of everyone, particularly the members of the special committee.

• (1420)

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in quoting the Prime Minister's speech, the Deputy Prime Minister seems to be saying that there may not be a First Ministers' Conference before June 23. If that is the case, I say to the Deputy Prime Minister, Canadians will be very disappointed. They will feel that the Prime Minister and the government have let them down.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, the report tabled today provides a good starting point for helping us out of the present constitutional impasse. Again, I want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister why the Prime Minister, at this point, doesn't think it would be useful to call a First Ministers conference as soon as possible, even without first consulting with the provincial Premiers. Why?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish the Leader of the Opposition would not try to twist words. The Prime Minister has never indicated that he would not call a First Ministers' Conference. Obviously, there has to be preparatory work done, and he has said that when it is appropriate, a First Ministers' Conference will be held.

Let us get the work done that needs to be done leading up to the First Ministers' Conference. If and when it is appropriate, I am sure that one will be called. I hope it will have the support of the hon. Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Deputy Prime Minister. Yesterday, another environmental disaster occurred at Saint-Amable where nearly four million tires burst into flames, spreading a toxic cloud as far as 20 or 30 kilometres and spilling toxic oils that may contaminate the water supply.

Since this is the third fire at a tire dumpsite in Canada in less than three months, what does the federal government intend to do to prevent another ecological disaster?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): My colleague, the Minister of State responsible for Fitness and Amateur Sport, whose riding includes the town of Saint-Amable, just spoke to me about 15 minutes ago, and he is watching the situation very closely.

The Government of Quebec is responsible for coordinating emergency measures. Yesterday afternoon, Quebec asked us for technical assistance. Environment Canada immediately went to the site to do air quality analyses and provide meteorological data. All this was done to ensure public safety.

Mr. Alfonso Gagliano (Saint-Léonard): Mr. Speaker, since there are tire dumpsites across this country and this has become a national problem, will the government implement a national tire storage policy to prevent environmental disasters like the ones at Hagersville, Sainte-Anne-des-Plaines, and now at Saint-Amable, from happening again? It's all very well to say the government was on the spot, but it must find a way to prevent these things from happening!

Mr. Blais: This is provincial jurisdiction.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): At their meeting on March 20, 1990, the Canadian ministers of Environment set up a task force to identify and examine possibile solutions. Since then, they have started to collect as much information as possible. I may add that Environment Canada has already started its work, and at the next meeting to be held in July, we will be able to continue the process.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mme Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Yesterday, the Special Committee on the proposed companion resolution to the Meech Lake Accord tabled its report and I would like to congratulate the members of this committee for it. This report was unanimous and I believe that it is the necessary first step to break the constitutional deadlock. It is now up to the first ministers to prepare an acceptable companion resolution.

My question for the Deputy Prime Minister is this: Can he report to us on the consultations which the Prime Minister has had with the provincial premiers and can he tell us what he specifically intends to do to get out of the impasse?

[English]

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I can only confirm to the leader of the New Democratic Party that this process is ongoing. He is engaged in discussions directly with the premiers.

As well, the minister responsible for intergovernmental affairs will be contacting the premiers and the other government members who are involved to get a firsthand assessment of the report. It is hoped that the dissident provinces will find it necessary to come on side and support the major recommendations of the committee and, in so doing, lay the groundwork for the next step, which will probably be the holding of a First Ministers' Conference.

As I indicated to the Leader of the Opposition, this preparatory work is necessary in order to set the stage. Hopefully, as a result of the consultations, we will be able to proceed with the calling of a First Ministers' Conference.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I agree that the holding of a First Ministers' Conference is very important. I hope that the Prime Minister is not waiting for a guarantee of success. Obviously a guarantee of success is just a photo op. I hope that the Prime Minister is prepared to take the leadership to call that First Ministers' meeting to ensure that we can begin the dialogue for which this committee's report has provided the basis.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Ms. McLaughlin: It has been said about the report that the committee has set the table for a First Ministers' Conference. I want to point out to the Deputy Prime Minister that one of the items on that table has been the rights of the women of Canada which have been outlined as being important so that the women of Canada can be assured that their rights are protected.

Will the Deputy Prime Minister commit today, on behalf of the women of Canada, and on behalf of his government, that he and his government will ensure that this time women's rights are guaranteed.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I simply remind the Leader of the New Democratic Party that the Meech Lake Accord was signed by the Prime Minister and 10 provincial premiers. They, in their wisdom, believed that it was an appropriate document.

However, since that time there have been other developments. Three provinces have stated some reservations, which has resulted in the recommendations of a parallel accord and the work of this committee. Of course, much of the success will depend upon the position or the response that Manitoba, Newfoundland and New Brunswick make towards advancing the process.

What is necessary now is to ascertain the positions and the responses of the dissident provinces. Hopefully they will find sufficient latitude within the recommendations for them to come on board and support the process, at which time a First Ministers' Conference could be held and we could get this problem resolved once and for all.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I will assume that the Deputy Prime Minister is not referring to the women of Canada as dissidents simply because they are putting forward their point of view and wanting to protect their rights.

I also want to ask the Deputy Prime Minister if he knows that Manitoba is required by its constitution to hold public hearings before any constitutional amendments can be signed. The premier of the province has said publicly that the province will hold 10 days of hearings and 10 days of debate. I would suggest, as Mr. McKenna has in his proposal, that all Canadians should have the opportunity to examine the companion resolution.

I would ask the Deputy Prime Minister if his government is prepared to ensure that all Canadians have the opportunity to have information on this companion resolution, using the same amount of time and effort it has put into ensuring that every Canadian household has something on the GST. I think the Constitution is important to the country. I ask the government today to say that it will put the same amount of effort into explaining this companion resolution to Canadians.

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I wish that the Leader of the New Democratic Party would not attempt to distort what I said. I did not refer to women as being dissidents; I referred to the three provinces that chose to take another course of action.

With regard to the other point in the question, I heard comments at the press conference today, and indeed in the House, that this was probably one of the most thorough committee processes we have gone through in this country for a long time. I think there were 160 witnesses who appeared. It has been a broad-based public hearing on the issue. What is at issue today is the responses of those provinces which have chosen not to support the Meech Lake Accord in its original form.

I am not in any position to dictate to the province of Manitoba, the province of New Brunswick or the province of Newfoundland what process they may want to set up in terms of how they want to deal with this. I would hope that the hon. member was not suggesting that in the context of her question.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and concerns the document the government has sent out entitled: "Some straightforward answers about the goods and services tax and what it means to you".

This flyer tells consumers and I quote: "Once this new system is in place the price of many manufactured items will drop".

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. MacLellan: This is very interesting because the Department of Finance has already said that 76 per cent of consumer and commodity categories will actually show an average increase in price once the GST is in place.

I want to ask the government, and the minister, how they can possibly justify sending out this misleading propaganda at the taxpayers' expense.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) and Minister of State (Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I am a little bit surprised because the hon. member sits on the Standing Committee on Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Government Operations.

Last week and this week witnesses from Sears, Ford and GM appeared before the committee and said that they are going to pass the reduction in tax from 13.5 per cent to 7 per cent on to Canadians. Even the president of the Consumers' Association of Canada, Mr. Murray, said that he is satisfied with the way the government managed the situation.

We should ensure that Canadians are well informed on the situation and have the facts. They will then be able to make their own decisions. We are sure they will benefit from the changes in the tax which we will have at the beginning of January.

Mr. Russell MacLellan (Cape Breton—The Sydneys): Mr. Speaker, the government is informing Canadians all right, but it is giving them the wrong information.

Yesterday in this House the Minister of Finance said there will be no additional tax burden on Canadians from the GST and that the tax would be revenue neutral.

A recent government radio ad states:: "The GST, the new tax will provide a more reliable source of revenue which will help to reduce the national deficit."

I would like to ask the minister: Which is it? Is it revenue neutral or is it a tax grab?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I will explain once more, as I have in this House quite a few times, what is meant by revenue neutral.

At the present time, we have a tax which is hidden. It is a disaster for our economy. We want to remove it. The present federal sales tax has an additional weakness. It is easy for companies to avoid it. It is a tax which is porous and tends to disappear as we raise the rate. By replacing it with a tax that is more modern and more efficient, we will have more guaranteed income to pay for the programs that Canadians want.

The tax will be neutral, but it will be a better system. As we go on, fewer companies will be able to avoid it.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, my question is to the Minister of State for Finance. It deals with his government's latest attempt by radio ads to mislead Canadians about the impact of the goods and services tax.

The text in one ad says: "The GST is not an additional tax." How can the minister possibly justify that statement when in fact his own documents show that thousands of goods and services never before taxed by the FST are now included in this goods and services tax? Why does he not come clean with Canadians, stop this misleading propaganda and—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has put her question.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I must admit that I do not have any great confidence in the capacity of the Liberal opposition to add or subtract in view of the debt they left this country in a few years ago.

I would like to explain to the hon. member that one minus one is not two. We are removing one tax. We are replacing it with another one. It is not an additional tax.

Mrs. Diane Marleau (Sudbury): Mr. Speaker, perhaps the minister should ask every householder who is going to pay 7 per cent on his or her heating bills next winter how they feel about it.

This same radio ad, which is aimed at consumers, implies that the GST will actually lower prices to consumers. Mr. Speaker, can you believe this kind of statement? His own documents clearly indicate that the GST will raise the Consumer Price Index by 1.25 per cent. The documents say it.

Will the minister withdraw these untruthful ads and apologize to Canadian taxpayers for this latest attempt to buy this—

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member has put the question.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, once again it is obvious that the hon. member has not understood or does not want to understand what this reform is all about. There are many aspects to it.

The hon. member will look at the CPI, but she fails to read the part in the technical document which states that this reform will increase the economy by $9 billion, bringing additional jobs and additional prosperity. This is what is meant by the increase in our economy. She should look at that. By removing from our exporters the additional weight they have to carry now, we will allow them to improve their performance and the performance of the Canadian economy.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister and concerns what is happening in Saint-Amable, which is 15 kilometres from my riding. Between 10 and 20 million tires are burning there. I give you this figure from statements made by the owner of the Saint-Amable tire dump; he himself has admitted it.

It is so serious that today I ask, Mr. Speaker, when the federal government will meet its responsibilities—

Mr. Blais: It is a provincial matter.

Mr. Edmonston: —when the federal government will stop abandoning responsibility for its jurisdiction by saying that it is still up to the provincial government. It is a matter of joint jurisdiction, Mr. Speaker, which is obvious from the fire control regulations. When will we see real leadership from this government, Mr. Speaker?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, we responded immediately when the Government of Quebec, which is responsible for coordinating emergency measures, called us. We responded immediately.

As I said, we are on the scene, we are coordinating federal activities and I can assure you that we have implemented measures to coordinate all federal activity involving Health and Welfare, Agriculture Canada, Emergency Preparedness Canada and National Defence forces that are already there.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, Quebecers and Canadians would rather see prevention and leadership on the part of the federal government, something it has not shown so far. It dawdles and talks endlessly instead of showing leadership, and we are sick of it. My question is this, and I want a straightforward answer: When will we see some leadership? What are you going to do to prevent this problem? Not only in my riding, in the city of Saint-Amable, but throughout Canada, because there are hundreds of places like this, including Hagersville, and you know it.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, I clearly said that a task force was set up by the Council of Canadian Environment Ministers on March 20, 1990. This task force is collecting all the information and will have the opportunity to analyze it at the beginning of July. At the moment, ensuring public safety is paramount and that is what we are doing.

EMPLOYMENT

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister. On March 4, 1987, the Prime Minister said: "We must make our manufacturing sector more competitive." Mr. Speaker, this year, because of this government's policies, we have lost 71,000 manufacturing jobs.

An hon. member: Shame!

Mr. Peterson: Today, the Minister of Finance increased once again our prime rate which is now 5.6 points higher than the American rate.

An hon. member: Shame!

Mr. Peterson: How can we compete with the Americans when we are at such a disadvantage? When will this government stop listening to its Minister of Finance and start listening to Canadian manufacturers?

[English]

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, as recently as last week, or two weeks ago, the International Monetary Fund complimented Canada on its economic policies. This was following compliments by the OECD, following compliments by the World Economic Forum and following evidence over the last five years of a growth rate in Canada unequalled in the rest of the world.

The hon. member is worried about our competitiveness figures. I have the latest statement of Canadian international trade for the month of March showing that exports, for example, of automotive products registered the largest growth in March, increasing by more than $600 million compared to February. Over all, Canada's trade balance in March posted a $471 million surplus and was up $418 million in February. We are not doing that badly, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Mr. Speaker, if we are doing so well, why have we lost 71,000 vital, key manufacturing jobs in four months?

We have seen the collapse today of another Canadian firm, one of Canada's largest real estate firms, with a loss of 300 jobs. Chartland's owner said and I quote: "The government is killing us." Just how many more homeowners, farmers, workers and businesses is this government going to sacrifice on the altar of high interest?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, there has been a net increase in new jobs so far this year in the order of 100,000.

I just refer to a random selection: Bell Northern Research is starting construction of a $100 million extension to its main research complex this summer in Nepean.

"Quebec's export sales rise 3.2 per cent, Caccia attributes growth to high-tech companies".

"GM gives Quebec plant new lease on life": the new assembly plant for General Motors at Ste. Therese, a billion dollar investment.

A billion dollar investment by Ford in Oakville.

"Thrifty Canadian firms are fighting fit: StatsCan". It says:

> Canadian businesses enter the 1990s saving and investing more than almost any other competitors in the industrialized world, a new report by Statistics Canada says.

FISHERIES

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Deputy Prime Minister.

Considering that the long-awaited fisheries aid package does absolutely nothing for the lobster fishermen, could the minister explain what short-term measures he will take to aid the lobster fishermen in Atlantic Canada so they will survive these low prices?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, I believe I answered a similar question yesterday on behalf of the minister of fisheries.

There is a greater supply of lobsters than there is demand. That is the problem with the lobster situation in the world today. We are making special efforts to market lobsters in countries that don't yet appreciate the value, the taste, the texture, and the deliciousness generally of the Canadian north Atlantic lobster.

The government has entered into a $2.5 million promotion program with two of the far-seeing provinces to help and assist in the marketing of lobster. Those are the steps that have been taken with reference to lobster so far.

The minister of fisheries will continue to watch the situation carefully to see if there is anything that we can or should do further to help in this situation. It is a market situation and of course all parties in this House, except the NDP, believe in the market.

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Mr. Speaker, I would like to remind the minister that we are aware they are delicious, but they are also way too cheap. My supplementary question is for the same minister.

Will the minister announce immediately a price support package for lobster fishermen so that they will be able to cover their cost of production and remain in the lobster industry?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is making a representation. I know that he is concerned about lobster fishermen, just as I am. I represent lobster fishermen as well. I will pass that representation on to the minister of fisheries. I had better not say any more than that, but I will certainly pass it on to the minister of fisheries.

HEALTH

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the minister of health.

Last week the federal government sent a representative to join the worshippers at the church of privatization in Saskatoon. Among other recommendations at the conference on privatization, we heard about the glories of private health care from American experts. Among the many advantages of the American private system is that 37 million people do not have any health insurance and that it is the most expensive and inefficient health care system in the world.

Will the minister confirm that his government is opposed to privatization of health care and will he end the widespread speculation across the country that this government is committed to return to profit medicine in Canada?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the only people who are spreading that sort of concern is the NDP. I can't recall anybody on this side making that sort of comment.

I have had the opportunity to read the report in today's Regina Leader-Post about the shenanigans of the provincial NDP at the conference in Saskatoon. Obviously what it was attempting to do was to create unjustified fear on the part of residents of Saskatchewan.

• (1450)

These fears are unjustified and it is unfortunate the hon. gentleman should foster those himself.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Mr. Speaker, if indeed they are unjustified, perhaps the minister could stand in the House today and tell us that while he is the Minister of National Health and Welfare there will not be a return to user fees in this country, there will not be a return to extra billing in this country. Can he stand in his place today, if he is so convinced that he is not in favour of privatization of health care, and make that commitment to Canadians?

Hon. Perrin Beatty (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who is health critic for his party should be aware of the provisions of the Canada Health Act, which are quite explicit on this matter.

This is exactly the same party that went around Canada during the last election campaign trying to scare the sick, the elderly, and the poor by telling them they were going to lose their benefits. It was false then and it is false now.

DAIRY INDUSTRY

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Agriculture and concerns dairy producers in my riding who disagree with the Canadian Dairy Commission's recommendation to keep the target price of milk at its present level. They claim that this conclusion was reached by the Commission because of a change in methodology.

Could the minister give the House and the producers the assurance that uniform and compatible methods and procedures for data collection will be used, so as to reach a decision that is fair to all concerned?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for his interest in the matter. My colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, and I asked the task force to look into the whole dairy question. Mr. Speaker, our long-term dairy policy expires next year, and we are making sure it will be renewed and will be fair to dairy producers across Canada. With respect to the specific point raised by the hon. member, it is clear there is some difference of opinion about calculation methods.

That being said, my colleague, the Minister of Agriculture, and I have asked an independent agency, an independent audit firm to look at these figures. They are to report on the matter around the middle of June. At that time we will consider the report and see what transpires. However, I can give the hon. member the assurance that we will continue to co-operate very closely with dairy producers in order to get the best possible deal for them, Mr. Speaker.

TRADE

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade.

In the last four years this government has allowed subsidized U.S. steel to more than double its share of the Canadian market from 4.5 per cent to 10 per cent, while at the same time the Canadian share of the U.S. market has hovered around its traditional 3 per cent.

We all know that the U.S. has created an informal trade barrier by applying countervail every time our exports in the U.S. climb above three percentage points.

How can the minister honestly say that we have free trade in steel when these practices are still occurring?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, we have not allowed U.S. steel companies to do anything. It is up to U.S. steel companies to do whatever they can to sell their product in any part of the world that has a free market, such as we do, or are members of the GATT system.

They are quite entitled to sell in Canada, just as we are entitled to sell into the United States. If any private Canadian firm has a complaint against a U.S. steel company alleging that it is receiving trade distorting subsidies or whatever, the company can go to the appropriate tribunal here and lay a complaint. It can lay a charge of anti-dumping and proceed just as firms in the United States can do the same vis-à-vis us.

So grow up and live in the real world and don't ask silly questions such as are we allowing—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Haldimand—Norfolk.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, they sure could not apply for that because they knew you didn't have the guts to stand up for them.

We all know that the Canadian steel industry is far more efficient than its U.S. counterpart and that we could easily compete if there was truly a level playing field.

Why does the government not act now, stop this unfair trading practice and allow our Canadian steel companies that same open access to the U.S. market?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, our steel companies have free access to the U.S. steel market.

As a matter of fact, the fairness of the way our steel companies operated was recognized by the United States when it did not try to require Canada to become subject to a voluntary restraint agreement such as many other countries had to enter into.

With respect to my guts, usually the complaint is that they are too large.

EDUCATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Finance.

Since the minister and his government refused to cancel the goods and services tax as it applies to education and refused to restore the transfer payments to education, will the minister change student aid to ensure that Canadians are not denied an appropriate education and to ensure that the student debt is not increased?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, I believe the hon. gentleman is getting carried away.

Our transfers to the provinces this year will increase. We are going to transfer more money this year than last year. Where we are capping in Canada Assistance Program, for example, we are doing it only in the provinces that do not receive equalization payments.

Not only do we provide many billions to the provinces to apply to their own priorities—it is not for us to decide how they should spend their money—we also provide them with equalization payments which they again can apply to their own priorities. We do not choose their programs for them.

[Translation]

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. Since neither the minister nor his government wants to do anything about the GST as it affects education or to cancel the huge cuts in education funding or to improve financial assistance for students, is he prepared to restore the number of summer jobs for students to the same level as in previous years?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I do not accept the member's statements claiming that we are cutting and decreasing. We are reducing the growth. We are doing so in order that this government and this country can maintain their ability to help those in need. If we did not take this action, as we did in the budget, paying special attention to the disadvantaged and the poorer provinces, we could quickly let this country drift into an intolerable financial situation, as you did when you formed the government, which would prevent us from giving our support. We will continue to support the provinces massively for all the programs of which you spoke.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of National Defence who recently attended a NATO meeting in Kananaskis.

Many Canadians were disappointed with that meeting and that the minister of defence, on behalf of the government, did not show any Canadian leadership on the issue of the modernization of nuclear weapons.

Why is the government not listening to its former ambassador for disarmament who has called for Canada to oppose the modernization of nuclear weapons?

Why is the Canadian government not taking a stand against all forms of modernization, not just the elimination of ground based missiles but air launched and sea launched cruise missiles?

Why does the minister think it is a good idea to keep pointing these weapons at the populations of East Germany, Czechoslovakia, Hungary, and all the other countries that have become democracies and are struggling to become part of the international community? Why does he think that is still a good idea?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I am amazed that my colleague did not pay closer attention to the meeting that was held in Kananaskis.

We, along with the other allies, welcomed the decision that was made by President Bush to no longer modernize the Lance and to no longer modernize nuclear artillery.

The hon. member join with the allies in supporting the initiative that has been taken by the President of the United States, along with his commitment that he would be prepared to enter into negotiations when the CFB talks are concluded and signed.

I am sure the hon. member understands, although he does not seem to from the way his question was phrased, that we will not be able to disinvent nuclear technology. As a mix of deterrents in the defensive alliance, NATO, we have to maintain the mix that has been successful in keeping peace in Europe for 45 years.

• (1500)

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, I think the minister's answer says it all. Canadian consciousness with respect to this is either welcoming or approving, or some other response, to decisions made elsewhere, in this case in Washington.

When are there going to be Canadian decisions? Why is it not possible for Canada to take a decision to not participate in certain forms of nuclear weapons testing, particularly the short-range nuclear weapons which continue to be pointed at eastern Europe? Why is there this insistence on maintaining a mix of weapons against a people who are no longer our enemies, if they ever were?

Why does he refuse to consult the Canadian people? When are the Canadian people going to be consulted about this review of defence policy that is going on? Why does he not take the Canadian people into his confidence for once? Maybe they will tell him to show some leadership and not just listen to President Bush.

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I know there is division within the New Democratic Party as to whether or not it would continue to belong to the NATO alliance. Canada happens to believe, and so do the Canadian people, in the opportunities that are provided to a non-nuclear nation such as Canada, which has not made the decision that we will impose our views upon allies. By belonging to NATO, we have, as have other non-nuclear countries, an opportunity to be involved in the decision making.

I do not suggest that it is deliberate, but the hon. member is misleading in suggesting that Canada has been taking part in nuclear weapons testing.

Mr. Blaikie: What about the cruise missile?

Mr. McKnight: The hon. member obviously does not know what the cruise missile is. It is testing of a guidance system—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. McKnight: No, no. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is suggesting that Canada has been testing nuclear missiles. Canada has not been and the New Democratic Party should become honest with the Canadian people.

PRIVILEGE

GOVERNMENT ADVERTISING—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: Earlier today the hon. member for Dartmouth and the hon. member for Sudbury rose on a question of privilege to complain about a radio advertisement relating to the goods and services tax legislation now before the Senate.

The hon. member for Dartmouth very kindly provided for the Chair the transcript of that radio ad, both in French and in English.

For the record, I will read that and it will go into the judgement. The radio ad said:

> The proposed goods and services tax will be a tax on the sale of most goods and services in Canada. It is not an additional tax, since it replaces the current federal sales tax.
> The GST has three objectives: First, to improve the overall fairness of Canada's tax system. Second, to lower costs so that our products will be more competitive in international markets, and here in Canada. That means more jobs. And finally, to provide a more reliable source of revenue, which will help to reduce the national deficit.
> The GST is an important change for Canada. If you'd like more information on how the GST will affect you, call toll-free—

That is the advertisement complained about.

The essence of the argument put forward by the hon. member for Dartmouth and the hon. member for Sudbury is that they do not agree that the advertisement I have just read is correct, and both of them indicated that they felt strongly on that issue.

The difficulty the Chair has is that it may very well be that an advertisement, statement, or publication might draw different views from different members, depending on where they sit in this Chamber, or even from the public. It may be that an advertisement may seem to be very accurate from one person's point of view and less than accurate from somebody else's point of view. But that is, by and large, a question of debate.

I point out that in this particular case the ad does start off with the comment that it is the "proposed goods and services tax". The hon. member for Dartmouth asked me to consider whether the next words, that is, "will be a tax" in any way denigrate from the opening words, "the proposed goods and services tax". While one might argue the semantics of it, I am inclined to think that it does not in any way take away from the clear intention of the words, "the proposed goods and services tax".

In connection with the substance of the ad—or perhaps I should say the content of the ad, because the substance of it is very much a matter of dispute in this chamber—I find that while there may be disagreement as to the ad, I do not think it is possible for the Chair to find that this ad in any way infringes on the capacity of an hon. member to do his or her duty as a member of Parliament. That is the test, of course, which the Chair has to apply in determining whether or not there is a question of privilege.

The hon. member for Kamloops eloquently supported the argument of the hon. member for Dartmouth and the hon. member for Sudbury. The Minister of National Revenue rose and indicated that he was not in entire agreement with some of the arguments that had been put forward with respect to the facts of the general situation surrounding the proposed goods and services tax. At that point, I asked hon. members to let the Chair consider the matter because, clearly, we were in danger of getting into a debate which went beyond the procedural argument.

As I say, I have heard the arguments. I have reviewed carefully the transcript of the advertisement and brought it to the attention of the House and the public, but my ruling must be that I can find no basis upon which the Chair could make the prima facie link with parliamentary privilege or contempt. Hon. members may wish to dispute the facts or pursue the matter through further debate, as indeed was done today in Question Period, but I cannot, on the evidence submitted, give this complaint consideration as a matter of privilege.

I appreciate the fact that I was well informed in advance and I appreciate also the courtesy and co-operation of all hon. members throughout the debate.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, on Thursdays it is the custom for the opposition House leader to ask the government House leader what legislation the House will be called upon to study for the next few days. Would the minister give us chapter and verse of the legislation that we will be looking at tomorrow, Tuesday, and, possibly, next Wednesday?

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow it would be my intention to call Bill C-34, dealing with the establishment of a management centre, and Bill C-57, dealing with copyright protection for integrated circuits. Hopefully, both bills can proceed through report and third reading stages tomorrow. I understand there has been discussion among the parties and some agreement in that regard.

Monday will be a holiday.

Tuesday and Wednesday of next week will be report stage on Bill C–43, the abortion bill, for which there is a House Order providing that we will have extended sittings on both days until 9 p.m. to give an opportunity for all members who desire to speak to speak, with votes on report stage on Wednesday at nine o'clock.

Thursday, we will continue with third reading of the abortion bill, again under the House Order on Bill C–43. The vote on that will be postponed until the following Tuesday.

I expect to call Friday of next week an allotted day. That will take care of next week.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, on a minor but nevertheless important detail, we have not, as of now, had all the amendments to Bill C–34. I do not think that either the government House leader or myself could make the undertaking that we would pass the bill at report stage and third reading tomorrow. I have not seen what the members of the House are going to bring in terms of amendments to the bill tomorrow. I think we should reserve on that one. If there are no unusual amendments, then I can give the undertaking.

• (1510)

Mr. Andre: I was not expecting a firm commitment in that regard, but I understood that there may be a minor typographical error. Where the word should have been "officers", it is "affairs". That is the extent of the amendment. Discussions will be undertaken among parties and, if no agreement is possible, so be it. Hopefully, an agreement will be possible.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, just to make sure that everybody understands, we have until six o'clock tonight to table amendments to that bill. I do not know if members have additional amendments. I just want to make sure that everybody's right to table amendments is protected and that members do not think that we are going to pass the bill come rain or high water.

Mr. Andre: Certainly, Mr. Speaker.

PRIVILEGE

HOUSE OF COMMONS STATIONERY—SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: On Monday, April 23, 1990, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell rose on a question of privilege to draw our attention to a letter circulating in the United States which had been the subject of at least one news article in this country.

The letter in question was written by a former hon. member of this place and bore his signature. The text clearly indicates that the writer is no longer a member of Parliament. The opening sentence, directed to an American audience, reads:

> I bid you greetings from Canada where, for eight years, I served that nation as a Member of Parliament until 1984.

This is followed by the declaration: "I chose to give up my seat in Parliament as a protest". Finally, the signature block refers to the writer as: "Member of Parliament (ret)".

[Translation]

Beyond noting those indications in the text that bear on the fact that the former hon. member was not misrepresenting his current status, I do not think the Chair should comment at all upon the content of the letter.

[English]

When the issue was first raised in the House, the Chair said: "The question is whether or not it is appropriate to send (the letter) out—under the guise of House of Commons stationery", and "The point I have to decide is whether whoever put this out has done something which breaches the privileges of the House".

The writer of the letter who is, as I have said, a former hon. member of this place, has, in a letter addressed to your Speaker, the House leader and several other hon. members, categorically denied sending this letter out on House of Commons stationery. This denial is supported by the statement of the president of the group which claims responsibility for the mailing at issue. According to that statement, the group took the writer's draft, which was on plain white paper, transferred it to a composite made up of two or three samples of parliamentary letterhead, and mailed it in a similar composite envelope.

Speaker's Ruling

In our discussions on April 23 last, it was, I think, made clear that our former colleague not only bore no responsibility for the misuse of House of Commons letterhead, but that he took considerable pains to explain his position in this matter to this House at the earliest opportunity. Furthermore, it was, I believe, conceded that this House was in no way misled as to the status of the former member.

[Translation]

That being so, I must confine my considerations to the question, is this unsanctioned use of House of Commons letterhead by an American group a serious enough matter to warrant setting aside the regular business of this House?

In this connection, I would remind all hon. members of the limited function ascribed to the Speaker in ruling on a claim of breach of privilege by citation 84(2) of Beauchesne's Rules and Forms of the House of Commons, Fifth Edition. I want also to repeat what I have said so often in the past, that the Speaker does not rule on whether a breach of privilege or a contempt has in fact been committed. The Speaker only determines whether an application based on a claim of contempt or breach of privilege is, on first impression, of sufficient importance to set aside the regular business of the House and go forward for a decision of the House.

[English]

The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, in his remarks, referred me to a decision of May 6, 1985, wherein a former member of Parliament was identified as a member in a newspaper advertisement. In that case, the Speaker stated in finding it was a prima facie case of privilege, "anything tending to cause confusion as to a Member's identity, creates the possibility of an impediment to the fulfilment of that Member's function".

The Chair also indicated in that case that the only tangible evidence was that provided by the hon. member who raised the question of privilege. That case is certainly not on all fours with this one, as in this case it was established that there was no confusion as to the identity of the former member and, further, the former member established by documentary evidence at the first opportunity that he was not responsible for the misuse of House of Commons stationary.

The hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell stated:

> The point is that that material, in several thousands of copies, has been distributed to individuals, misleading them to believe that in some way the House, or a representative of the House, was associated with it. In that way—the privileges of the House collectively have been affected.

The hon. Minister of State, the government House Leader, felt that it was obviously unacceptable for anyone to use House of Commons stationary in a fraudulent manner and assert a claim of official status for it. While he asserted that the person responsible for the mailing most certainly had abused the privileges of the House, he queried whether we could enforce those privileges beyond our borders.

The hon. member for Kamloops, who had also filed notice of his intention to raise this matter, noted that the hon. "government House Leader said that yes, indeed, he agrees the privileges of the House had been breached".

The hon. member for Kamloops referred to Maingot's work Parliamentary Privilege in Canada which, at page 195 in the English edition, describes one class of contempt as being "the interference with the corporate rights of the House".

"Surely", the hon. member for Kamloops continued, "the House of Commons shares the same corporate rights as other corporate bodies, including the important right to claim sole use of our Coat of Arms, stationary, and freedom from the misrepresentation of our views by others".

[Translation]

I listened intently to the views of all hon. members who spoke on this matter and I have reviewed the facts with a great deal of care. There would appear to be a unanimous sense of outrage directed at the perpetration of this affront. There also appears to be agreement, on all sides of the House, that the privileges of the House, in the broadest sense of that term, have been breached.

[English]

The Chair, however, must still determine which of the specific privileges of the House have been breached. I must admit that the action complained of does not fit neatly under any of the headings under which the rights and immunities of individual members or the rights and powers of the House as a collectivity are categorized.

The difficulty in categorizing the purported breach of privilege led the Chair to consider whether perhaps the action at issue was not a breach at all but rather a contempt; broadly speaking, an offence against the authority or the dignity of the House of Commons.

The Chair has found that no breach of privilege exists but that it is at least arguable that there is a contempt at issue. The finding is of little practical significance however, because the next question which the Chair must address, in either case, is the same. That is, is this matter of sufficient importance to be afforded privilege treatment. In other words, should it be put to the House immediately?

Were I to respond to that question in the affirmative the hon. member who raised the question of privilege would be invited to propose to the House a motion referring the matter to the Privileges and Elections Committee. The motion could then be debated, amended and voted upon. Depending on the outcome of that process, the matter might then be considered by a committee and reappear before the House if and when the committee reported.

It is with a full appreciation of the whole complex process entailed in according privilege treatment to any matter that the Chair must decide whether or not to find a matter is prima facie a question of privilege or contempt.

The case at hand involves a misuse of a facsimile of House of Commons stationary in a pathetic attempt, presumably, to lend some sort of official status to the perpetrator's cause. Furthermore, the offence has occurred in the United States where neither the House nor its committees could exercise any authority. The Chair is most reluctant to accord to a case of this nature the importance that would undoubtedly attach to it were I to find a prima facie case of contempt and accordingly I refuse to do so.

[Translation]

In concluding my remarks on this matter, the Chair wishes to express its appreciation to the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, the hon. member for Kamloops and the Government House Leader for the calibre of their contributions to this discussion. All three performed in the best traditions of the place in focusing on the procedural question involved and in avoiding argument on the content of the letter at issue.

[English]

The Chair is most conscious of the restraint exercised in this regard. There is a danger always that under the guise of defending our privilege we would provide a platform for those who espouse opinions repugnant to our own. That danger has been neatly averted in this instance and the Chair is grateful for the co-operation of all hon. members in this respect.

EDITORIAL—THE MIRROR

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry that I have not had time to give you notice, but some five minutes ago a member of my caucus handed me an editorial from The Mirror of Morinville of Tuesday, April 10, 1990. Morinville is a town in Alberta and The Mirror is, I believe, a weekly newspaper. The editorial is entitled: "MP Grey decries "goon tactics" to pass GST". It is not the headline I am concerned about.

In the last five minutes I have had an opportunity to talk to the member for Beaver River just briefly and to show her this editorial. I would like to read into the record one particular paragraph of the editorial because I think it brings the House into contempt and certainly this member into contempt. I understand from the member for Beaver River that this is not the kind of remarks she made, although the editorial writer seems to attribute them to her. The word "she" in the article refers to the hon. member for Beaver River. It reads:

> She also pointed out the damages made to democracy when members of Parliament are "bribed" to vote for the GST or lose lucrative life-time pensions. Ms. Grey noted the government whip, Jim Hawkes, dangled an extra $7000 tax-free allowance for them if they vote for the government rather than their constituents.

I want to take this opportunity to assure the House and the people of Canada that I have dangled no such offer in front of anybody in an attempt to get them to vote for the GST. I find it abhorrent that any editorial writer in this country would consider that members of Parliament are bribable in any way, shape or fashion in terms of the public interest. I do not think that is true. It is a crime, according to the Parliament of Canada Act. This editorial accuses me of having committed that kind of a crime.

I bring this to your attention. The member for Beaver River is in the Chamber and I think she can assure the House that the editorialist is not quoting her. I believe that these kinds of assertions in a weekly newspaper do constitute a contempt of this member, for sure, and a contempt of this Parliament. They are simply not true.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member who has raised this question of privilege has made no comment about being prepared to move the usual motion. I wonder if that was an oversight.

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, with my 11 years in the Chamber, I should not have forgotten that. If you were to find a prima facie case, I would certainly be prepared to move the appropriate motion.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Beaver River.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to say that in conducting my spring tour in my riding in the week of the final GST vote I was consulting with several people in many areas in my riding. Of course, it was a huge area of concern for Albertans in general that two of the members of the Tory caucus were removed from their caucus because of their vote on the GST.

When I talk about bribery I know that money is involved. Generally, it was the timing of this particular per diem expense coming out of committee that was, perhaps, made reference to. As far as I can remember, I clearly did not say that the party whip was bribing them with money. Those were two concurrent situations that just happened to take place at the same time.

I did make reference publicly in Alberta and across Canada in the media to comments made by the member for Edmonton Southeast vis-a-vis some of the things that were going on in the Tory caucus. I think it is quite clear to this Chamber that Canada realizes that I certainly am not privy to what goes on in the Tory caucus. I made general comments about that and people were voicing their concerns.

I certainly am prepared and happy to immediately retract that statement, if such was made. But I can say with clear conscience that I may have used the idea of pressuring, but certainly not the idea of bribery. I will be happy to retract that if, in fact, it was said.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I have just heard both the issue raised by our colleague across the way, the hon. whip for the government, and also the clarification given to us by the hon. member for Beaver River. Notwithstanding any retraction, if a retraction is necessary, it should still be remembered that the article in question is still out there and so long as it is in the public domain, and the newspaper story in question remains unretracted, I suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the privileges of our colleague across the way have been offended individually. We are all wearing the same uniform in here. When such accusations are made, to a degree the privileges of the House as well are similarly offended in my view.

To that extent, Mr. Speaker, I hope that the issue would be investigated further, perhaps by means of reference to the parliamentary committee in question, so that the House itself can obtain redress from the serious accusation that was made, regardless of who made the accusation. Notwithstanding any withdrawal by one individual, if such a withdrawal is warranted, the other withdrawal must occur as well in order for this House to obtain redress, in my opinion.

Miss Grey: Mr. Speaker, my staff has just researched this for me and I see that on April 5, 1990, I was quoted as saying how damaging it is to MPs that they are bribed to vote for face losing when the government dangles these tax-free allowances.

Mr. Speaker, I will admit that I did say that, having now seen it in print, and I will retract that. To be fair to The Mirror of Morinville, that was my quote and I do stand corrected in the House of Commons. I was certainly trying to take it deeper than that. I was not referring particularly to the hon. member but was making comment about the particular system. I do stand corrected. I retract that and I will certainly bear no ill will to The Mirror of Morinville. I will take the advice of the Chair.

Mr. Jack Shields (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, on this very important point of privilege I would just like to add that this has not just appeared in The Mirror of Morinville. My riding of Athabasca neighbours that of my friend from across the way. This same quote has been carried in a number of weekly newspapers in my riding. I would suspect it was pretty generally quoted throughout Alberta. I do not know what your decision will be but I do believe that a reference to the proper committee is in order by way of clearing all members of Parliament of this accusation.

Mr. Speaker: First of all, I thank the hon. member for raising the matter and I thank the hon. member for Beaver River for her frankness which is in the best tradition of this place. I want to consider carefully the comments of the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. The editorial, I think, has to be looked at from two points of view; one, what an hon. member in this place may or may not have said and, second, the content of the editorial itself, unless of course the hon. member for Calgary West wants to remove that aspect of it from his presentation.

However, I took it that his presentation and his claim of breach of privilege extended to the content of the editorial and not merely to an hon. member who may or may not have been quoted correctly. Am I correct in that?

Mr. Hawkes: Mr. Speaker, since I rose some five minutes ago the situation has broadened with the comments of the member for Athabasca. I had no idea that those kinds of comments were out and about. I thought this was an isolated case.

• (1530)

We might be well advised to take the matter under advisement for a day or two to give the member for Beaver River, and other members who have weekly newspapers in their ridings, a chance to look into it, to get a better sense of the degree to which that quote was used or abused, depending on the interpretation. Perhaps the House would be best served by leaving it at that stage for a few days, and then bringing it back to the floor of the House with some further information and evidence that might be of assistance to Your Honour in reaching a judgment.

Obviously I would like to stop the spread of the damage caused by the incorrect assertions. I am not quite sure what the best method to do that might be. That would give the member for Beaver River a better chance to search all the files. She seems to have a very good staff, judging by what they have produced for her in such a hurry. We might be best served with a little delay.

Mr. Speaker: Given the tenor of this, I do not want to leave it hanging too long. I wonder if the House would indulge me a moment. I would like to see the editorial. Would the hon. member for Calgary West have a Page bring it up to the Chair?

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: Given the circumstances and the frankness of the hon. member for Beaver River, I am going to rule now.

I do not know what has been published in other newspapers, but this is the one that is presently in front of me.

This is far more an article purporting to report what the hon. member for Beaver River said than it is an editorial. It is a column in The Mirror, of Tuesday, April 10, 1990, on page 21. I am indebted to the hon. member for Calgary West for sending it to me so quickly so that I could look at it.

The position we are in is one in which we should apply our traditional balance in this place. The hon. member has come in front of her peers in this House and said: "Well, I seem to have said it. I completely and utterly withdraw and retract it". I really think that that is where the matter ought to end.

I have properly made similar rulings, I think, on other occasions when there is an unequivocal withdrawal by an hon. member. That is my ruling.

With that ruling, the matter is closed.

The hon. member for Beaver River seems to be seeking the floor. It will not necessary for her to address this matter any further, unless she has something she wants to say to members on a point of order. The ruling is now made.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

PLANT PROTECTION ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-67, an act to prevent the importation, exportation and spread of pests injurious to plants and to provide for their control and eradication and for the certification of plants and other things, be read a second time and, by unanimous consent, referred to the legislative committee considering Bill C-66.

Madam Deputy Speaker: When the House rose for lunch the hon. member for Prince Edward—Hastings had the floor.

Mr. Lyle Vanclief (Prince Edward—Hastings): Madam Speaker, when we recessed for lunch I was in the midst of some comments on Bill C-67, an act entitled the Plant Protection Act. I would like to take a few minutes to continue those comments.

I was in the midst of discussing the powers of inspectors and their ability to establish the quarantine areas that will be allowed under this bill, if it is passed by the Parliament of Canada.

The bill improves the effectiveness of control measures that could very well be necessary in controlling pests, diseases, et cetera, involving plants. In the past, a quarantine area could be established. However, there were not effective measures to allow the restriction of the movement of vehicles and people in and out of the quarantine area. This bill will allow such restrictions to be enforced and put in place.

I explained to the House, and I stress this, that we must be very careful in doing this. When we establish a quarantine area the other thing that this bill does is it enables an inspector to make, if necessary, a fairly large quarantine area. We have to remember that many, if not all, the products produced by the agriculture industry are perishable, and some are more perishable than others, but they are all perishable.

When a quarantine area is established that means product cannot move in or out of that area. If it is a very perishable crop being talked about at the farm level, then a very serious economic effect can take place as far as that farmer's livelihood is concerned, or the livelihood of a business if it happens to be a business, for example, a greenhouse business or something like that.

We must be very careful to realize that there is no provision in this bill to allow for the compensation of revenues that might be lost by someone else within a quarantine area. That can only be done by an ad hoc program that can be put in place by a minister. If a plant or crop has to be destroyed, or if a program has to be put in place to correct the damage that has been done, there is provision for compensation to allow for that.

We must keep in mind that there could very well some detrimental affects to others within a quarantine area who are victims of a circumstance beyond their control. It could, as I say, be very costly to those people.

Another point that I feel we must look at very carefully in this legislation is the government's cost recovery proposal. It would permit the government to recover from any person or any business any of the costs, charges or fees incurred by the government in fulfilment of this bill.

I bring to the attention of the House that this is enabling legislation that gives the minister and the Department of Agriculture carte blanche, a blank cheque, to set fees for services performed and to recover those fees. We must keep in mind what such a provision could do. It is not impossible, and I hope it would not happen, that an over-zealous inspector could move in a case where there was a disease or a pest—and there is a good new definition of pest in the bill—on to a site, a farm or business premise and carry out a number of inspections, a number of activities and then later have the opportunity because of this bill to send that person or business a bill.

That is all well and good, if it is an isolated situation where someone has brought something into their business from across the border into our country, for example, plant material that is carrying a disease or a pest that needs to be looked after. I will give a couple of examples on that point.

There are a tremendous number of tomato transplants that are brought into Ontario from the southern United States each year. In 1988, after they started to arrive, even though they had been inspected in the southern states at their place of origin and place of growth, and even though they had been inspected upon their arrival here in Canada, it became known a few weeks later that there was a problem with a bacterial canker in those plants. Federal inspectors did have to go on to farm sites and into fields to inspect to see what damage was there. The job they did had to be done. My concern is that with the fee recoverability in this legislation, the fees for carrying out those tasks could be sent to the grower. I agree that the task that they were doing had to be done. It was a job that they were doing for the total industry and therefore for the good of the agricultural industry in general.

My concern is this. Let us make sure in the regulations that someone is not unjustly charged because they happen to have control of the site where something happened and would therefore have to bear the whole cost.

Again, in 1989, in the tomato processing industry in Ontario a tomato spotted wilt virus was detected a few weeks after some plants came into Canada. They were planted and were growing in the field. Inspectors had to go into the fields and check them.

What I am saying is who bears the cost? I do not feel it is fair that the individual farmer should have to bear the cost of such inspections. There are some things being done in similar cases, whether it is food inspection or something else, that the Government of Canada and the taxpayer want done. Because it is for their benefit I feel that they should contribute toward the payment of those costs.

I remind the House that primary producers in particular in the agricultural field are price takers. They are not price setters. They do not have the ability to pass those costs, if they are given to them, to the buyers of their product. They produce a perishable product that must be marketed when it is ready to go to market. They have to take the price that is established by someone else.

The other concern that I feel we should take a good look at when this bill goes to committee is the allowance in it for the government to hire private individuals or private firms to carry out some of the duties that are provided for in this bill, whether it be with respect to inspections or laboratory tests that need to be done. I am afraid this may very well be a move by the government to further privatize some of the work done presently by inspectors and by the staff of Agriculture Canada. There is a danger that these people may not always be properly trained. We may also very well lose some of the uniformity of inspection and enforcement of regulations that in the past have been done so well. I look forward as well to discussions on that when we get to the legislative committee.

In closing, I would like to state that we must, as we have in the past in the updating of Bill C-67 and Bill C-66, be very strict. We must watch what is happening here. We must watch what is going out of our country as far as plant products are concerned and what is coming into our country in terms of plant products so that we do not allow insects, pests or diseases to come in which can be detrimental not only to the agri-food industry but to all Canadians in general. We must be careful and take a very good look at the regulations.

Therefore I strongly suggest that when this bill goes to the legislative committee that if at all possible we have a copy of the regulations, at least in rough draft, so that we can review them at that time to see that they are going to be handled and written in a manner that is beneficial and which will give all the necessary safeguards to all sectors of the industry.

With that, I look forward to further discussion of Bill C-67 at the legislative committee for further clarification at that time.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I am privileged to have a chance to speak on Bill C-67 which, in a sense, is companion legislation to Bill C-66 which deals with concerns regarding diseases with animals.

We are now considering the matter of plant protection legislation to ensure that plant life in the agricultural sector, as well as in the forestry sector, will be protected from incoming pests, meaning insects or diseases. This means that we also control plant material leaving Canada in terms of ensuring that we are not infecting other parts of the world with pests or diseases that may have originated here.

Basically, we are trying to control or eliminate plant pests of one kind or another in the country. It is time that we deal with this issue. This is updated legislation. It replaces the Plant Quarantine Act that has been in obvious need of change for decades. This is an opportunity to do that.

I want to say at the outset that we in the New Democratic Party support this legislation. We feel that it is a good initiative. It will assist the agricultural community, as well as the forest industry, in making Canada more insect and disease free when it comes to the infestation of our plant life.

Since we are dealing with this in principle there are, however, two or three points I want to mention as we move this bill into committee. Once the legislative committee examines Bills C-67 and C-66, there are a number of areas we need to look at.

One of these areas concerns the incredible powers that are given to the Minister of Agriculture as well as agriculture officials. When you read the bill, Madam Speaker, you will notice that the Minister of Agriculture almost becomes a czar and is able to move in and deal quickly with an area that has been infected by insects, pests or diseases of one kind or another. It is good to have a disease SWAT team, a disease commando unit, to move in quickly to deal with a problem as early as possible. The earlier these issues are dealt with, the more chance there is to successfully eliminate them or deal with them.

However, we also realize that an over-zealous minister or an over-zealous official could cause problems. As my hon. friend who just spoke indicated, it would be appropriate and absolutely necessary to have at least draft regulations for the committee to consider at the same time that we are dealing with this legislation. Those regulations will lay out the parameters in terms of how the minister and agriculture officials will respond.

I also want to give some indication of a concern regarding the fees, charges and costs associated with the inspection, containment, quarantine initiatives and so on that will be taken. The bill indicates that in a sense we are attempting to introduce a cost-recovery initiative where the cost of a particular initiative, looking into a diseased plant area, would be borne largely by the producer.

I want to ask if that is reasonable. Is it not in all our interests as a society to ensure that our crops and our forest lands are disease free? At times, this would require an initiative on behalf of the producer to recognize that there appears to be a problem and we ought to deal with it. It may cost the producer his crop, or a portion of it.

If the entire cost of this analysis is being borne by the producer, there may at times be less than an immediate response to deal with this. We have seen and we are aware of instances in the past where producers have simply overlooked what was a problem, something which became a serious problem later. If we are going to encourage people to volunteer to deal with this, I think we should do so with some recognition that society as a whole will benefit and perhaps society as a whole should carry some of the costs.

I also want to say that I am pleased to see that the act grants authority to issue tickets, similar to traffic tickets, to violators of the act and the regulations that will be attached to it. This is a progressive step. Again, we can deal effectively and efficiently with those people who from time to time may violate sections of the Plant Protection Act.

I also want to suggest that what appears to be an effort here to privatize the inspection service raises some concerns with us. We recognize that we must have a more comprehensive inspection team with more of an ability to provide the necessary on-site inspections, but whether or not the seeking of private firms to carry out this inspection process is necessarily the right way to go is something I question.

I question that because Canadians expect protection. They expect a high level and a high degree of protection. They assume that the appropriate inspection processes are always being carried out. We know, unfortunately, that is not always the case.

When it comes to a country as susceptible as we are from time time to plant diseases coming in, it is important that we have a very high degree of inspection. That has been done extremely well by Agriculture Canada in the past. I would like to think that we will continue on with that tradition and not see this as an opportunity to simply privatize a number of first-class government services that we have known in the past. This is a question that we will obviously be pursuing at the committee stage.

On balance, we support the legislation. We are pleased that the government has brought it forward now. We look forward to dealing with it in committee and raising some of the appropriate concerns there. We again appeal to have as much of the regulations in place as possible for consideration when this bill gets to the committee stage.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Madam Speaker, we are all well aware of the devastation that can occur when animals are introduced into an environment where there are no natural enemies to control their population. A world famous example of this is the introduction of the rabbit into Australia. That country has spent millions of dollars, if not billions of dollars, over the years to try to control an animal which had no natural predators to control its population.

The same thing has happened and will happen again if strict means are not taken in the national interest to control accidental importation of pests and diseases not native to Canada. Dutch Elm disease in Ontario and in my home province of Prince Edward Island is one example. There are many more.

It is in the national interest that strict inspections take place, not only in Canada but in the place of origin, the place of importation, in order to control the importation and the export of plant pests and diseases to other countries.

Therefore all parties agree, I believe, to having a good enforceable act so Canada can protect its farmers and citizens from the huge costs that can result from a weak act. This bill is certainly one which strengthens the existing act.

We are labouring under a certain handicap here today in that we have no knowledge of the regulations which are going to be available or passed which will govern the different aspects of this bill. For example, we do not know to what extent farmers can or will be compensated for a pest or a disease which is introduced to their farm through no fault of their own. We do not know the extent of the arbitrary powers that the inspectors will have when they are inspecting the premises and discovering contraventions of the act.

We do not know to what extent an over-zealous inspector, as was mentioned before, can really cause a lot of irreparable damage to a farmer's financial position by issuing tickets on an ad hoc basis. The farmer must have a way to appeal these ticketing violations in order that he might be able to state a case of his own.

We also do not know the extent or the cost of the privatization of the inspection service. We do not know if there are private people available in Canada who are trained well enough to do inspections. We do not know if we will have enough civil servants or what the government's intentions are in regard to Agriculture Canada officials. Are they going to be reduced and the number of private citizens increased to do these inspections? Of course we do not know how many of these civilians are available to Agriculture Canada, what training they have and what authority they will actually have in the inspection of plants coming into or leaving our country.

We do not really know from this bill where the national interest begins and where the local responsibility leaves off. We will have to determine that point because many people could be left in dire financial straits if through no fault of their own a disease or a pest happened to be introduced to their farm. Hopefully, at the committee stage we will be able to get the answers so that we can improve this very important bill.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House proceeded to consideration of the report stage of Bill C-51, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act, as reported (without amendments) from a legislative committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Madam Deputy Speaker: For the report stage of Bill C-51, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act, the Notice Paper indicates only one motion to amend, in the name of the hon. member for Essex—Windsor. This motion is in order. The House will now proceed to consideration of motion numbered 1.

[English]

MEASURE TO AMEND

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor) moved:

Motion No. 1

That Bill C-51 be amended in Clause 1

(a) by striking out line 39 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

"November 6, 1989 by the Minister of"

He said: Madam Speaker, this bill which is in front of us is of course a fairly straightforward bill which simply attempts to tighten up the wording of the Income Tax Act so as to make it clear that the federal government has the right to take action in the case of a bankrupt firm, or in other circumstances, to recover deductions made by that firm from its employees' wages for income tax, unemployment insurance, the Canada Pension Plan and so forth.

There is no question that we support the thrust of this bill. We voted for it at second reading. However there is a serious problem with the bill as it presently stands and that is the problem I am trying to correct with this amendment. The reason the bill was brought in by the government was a legal decision in the Alberta Court of Appeal which said that the original wording of the amendment put through in December 1987 was not sufficiently clear to establish the priority of the federal government to take action vis-à-vis other creditors of a bankrupt firm.

When that court ruling took place the federal government decided eventually to appeal it. It attempted to take its appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada and in December 1989 the Supreme Court of Canada said that the federal government did not have a case which could be taken to appeal. In other words, it upheld the decision of the Court of Appeal in Alberta.

This legislation attempts not just to correct the wording of the government's original mistake in 1987 with this piece of legislation which was put into effect with a Ways and Means motion in November 1989. It attempts to say that this improvement in the wording shall apply retroactively from December 1987 to November 1989, despite the fact that the Alberta Court of Appeal had decided that the original wording in force during that period was considered to be unsatisfactory.

On principle we find this kind of attempt to rewrite history, to apply a new piece of legislation backward to cover up a mistake which has been made, to be unacceptable and completely abhorrent in a democratic society.

Just as seriously, we had testimony before the legislative committee which looked at this bill from the Desjardins movement in Quebec. It indicated that this was not simply a philosophical issue about which we should be upset for reasons of principle, but that this was something which would cost various caisses populaires in the province of Quebec significant sums of money.

The committee heard testimony from the Desjardins movement which indicated, for example, that the Caisse Populaire St. Charles Borromée would experience a loss of at least $260,000 if this retroactive application of this change in wording were allowed to go through. In fact the person who was before our committee representing that particular caisse populaire indicated that when lawyer's fees and other payments were taken into account the loss might be as high as $400,000 for that particular caisse populaire.

[Translation]

Need I say, Madam Speaker, that credit unions are small financial institutions which, because of their size, cannot absorb such losses without considerable difficulty. I therefore believe that as members of Parliament we have a duty to listen to the representatives of these credit unions and to say that it is just not possible to implement this retroactive application. That is why we have proposed this amendment. It is very straightforward, like most amendments to money bills. This legislation should not be retroactive. If this principle is rejected, I think it does not abode well for the future.

[English]

If we look at the testimony of representatives of the Canadian Insolvency Association that deals with these questions of bankruptcy, they made precisely the same case in the legislative committee. They stressed that, as they put it, it did not seem fair somehow to deprive those claimants who waited for their day in court. At the very least, if this bill is to be enacted, it should be enacted at a date to be proclaimed and not retroactively.

I raised these questions with finance department officials in the legislative committee. Those officials were not able to respond to these concerns satisfactorily. They were not able to point out any way in which this bill was not retroactive in its application. It is for that reason that I very strongly urge the House to accept this simple amendment which will see to it that a good piece of legislation does not contain a principle which runs counter to the democratic traditions of this House and of this country.

Mr. Gaby Larrivée (Joliette): Madam Speaker, Bill C-51 contains two corrective measures regarding unremitted source deductions.

As my colleague just pointed out, the mistake in the bill passed in 1987 allowed a 1989 Alberta court ruling regarding an institution which has since deprived the government of $100 million to $200 million in revenues.

I am quite in favour of the point my colleague was making about the Caisses Populaires, but this mistake affects not only the Caisses Populaires but the whole country. My colleague stated that the Caisses Populaires are small institutions, but I must tell him that they form a very big movement in Quebec. Together, all these small enterprises make up a very big institution.

It is true, as my colleague has said, that representations were made by a Caisse Populaire about a money-losing case. It is obvious that any financial institution that lends money runs the risk of losing some.

However, when the bill was passed in 1987, we were in a position to know there was a risk since the law was in place. The ruling came much later in Alberta. In the case of the Caisses Populaires, the Desjardins Movement in Quebec, the law in place was clear and enabled them to assess the risks. Unfortunately, financial institutions sometimes make bad loans.

Today, Madam Speaker, our colleague wants the bill to be retroactive. It is one way of looking at things but I think there is another way. However, we cannot pass the bill today and say it will apply retroactively as of last year or two years ago. The law was there and financial institutions knew how things worked. They continued making loans and probably took the measures required to protect themselves.

Today my colleague is telling us the government would penalize the Caisses Populaires by applying the law as it should have been applied in 1987.

As far as I am concerned, Madam Speaker, by correcting this mistake, if we failed to implement the law as it should have been implemented in 1987, we would be penalizing Canadians since we are talking about money in trust so to speak, about source deductions, about money belonging to the government and, therefore, to all Canadians and which should be returned to them.

For this reason of equity, Madam Speaker, I think my colleague's amendment is unacceptable.

[English]

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, there is one point here that I think should be further considered. This bill is a necessary bill and, with my colleague, I do not oppose the sense of the bill.

This bill is necessary to correct what the courts found was a flaw in the previous law. The question is, how far back will this bill be effective? The government has asked that it be effective from the date on which the bill was first introduced as a ways and means bill.

At the time it was introduced, it was not law. It was, perhaps, a notice to the public that a law might be passed. In the meanwhile, in the practical sense the public, which includes small institutions that may extend credit and lawyers who are not members of this House, understands that the law had been stated by the court, in this case, the Supreme Court of Alberta, and that the Supreme Court of Canada had declined even to consider overruling it.

In the opinion of the courts of the land, the law that had been passed earlier in Parliament was flawed, it was not a clearly written law and, therefore, the decision of that court was that the government could not claim the money under that law.

Our colleague across the way has said that it was imprudent for the caisse populaire to lend money on the basis of court decisions, or with the court decision in mind. That means, if at any time a bill is entered into Parliament, it should be regarded as law, which would be quite absurd. We have had a ruling by the Speaker on that point.

Certain advertisements were taken in the newspapers of this land purporting to say that a certain tax is law when, in fact, that tax was proposed to become law. It was understood that it was inconsistent with the privileges of the House that a bill, which is before the House, should be regarded during that time as law.

Therefore, Madam Speaker, I think it was reasonable and just to consider that those who acted on the decision of the court, namely that the government did not have the right to recover this money, notwithstanding that the government had indicated that it was going to change the law if Parliament agreed. Nevertheless, the law had not been changed.

Parliament no doubt will agree to the law in a general sense, but it is not law yet. It may be law very soon, but it is not law. It is a proposed law and, therefore, I believe it would be undermining the country's respect for our courts if the government took the stand that the decision of the court was null and void.

I think the government has a perfect right to say it does not like the decision of the court and that it will now institute a law which will give a different result from the court's decision in future cases. This is not to say that the court did not make the decision, or had no right to make the decision that the Supreme Court of Canada upheld implicitly by declining to hear an appeal against it.

When I was a boy growing up in my father's family and he argued civil cases in the courts of Winnipeg, we sometimes had disputes at the supper table over the difference between what is legal and just. As far as I can remember, my father always won the arguments. He said: "The court has to try to do what is just. It has to make a decision within the facts that it has." Therefore, one could say that the court's decision is approximate justice, even if it is not perfect justice. It is not possible to get perfect justice in practical situations. We can only get closer to perfect justice.

The decision of the Supreme Court of Alberta was an attempt to get justice, because as the law stood it was unclear. That does not contribute to justice. A decision was made, and no doubt that decision prompted the action of the government in undertaking to change the law. That is all well and good. It is a reasonable thing to do, and we support it.

But to say that the court had no right to make its decision, that it was wrong to make its decision when it was upheld by the highest court in the land implicitly, or that the court's decision should be ignored and that caisse populaire and any other lenders should have ignored the court's decision and not acted on it in the proper conduct of their business, seems to say that any court decision of the land could be found worthless, not by the decision of a higher court but by a later, retroactive piece of legislation. Certainly, it would undermine the respect we hope people will have for the courts of this land and the respect they should have for the decision of a court when it is upheld at the highest level. People should act according to the decision, rather than waiting to see if some day some government will pass a law that will wipe out that decision retroactively.

If the government is not able to collect the money in this retroactive way, I would ask all my hon. colleagues across to consider that the loss of revenue to the government and to taxpayers is much less serious than the loss of the public's respect for the courts. It would be more serious in the long run for the public to lose confidence in a court's decision being the law of the land to the extent of the power of that court.

It would be much better to adopt the amendment my hon. friend has introduced. Then, the law will be an improvement on its predecessor.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, before I begin my comments on this issue, I want to extend my congratulations to you in your appointment as Deputy Speaker.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. Hunter: Sometimes we have an opportunity in the House to consider and speak on a relatively obscure bill or on an amendment thereto. This is such an occasion.

The principle behind the amendment of the hon. member for Essex—Windsor is very important. As a mother, I try to tell my children that they have to be responsible for the actions they take. The same could be said about the government. The government has to be responsible for the actions it has taken.

If the government made a mistake in drafting the legislation in 1987, it should not be possible to go back to rewrite history, wiping away that mistake. Just as my children are learning the lesson that one cannot erase behaviour, so the government should not have the ability to erase its mistakes. Although this is a relatively obscure bill in the big picture of debates giving ferment across the country, it is an important principle that the rewriting of history should not take place here.

The House of Commons has a lot of power and, when that power is used disproportionately, it becomes an abuse of power. Such an incident is about to take place if the government does not agree to support the amendment of the hon. member for Essex—Windsor. We cannot go back and rewrite history. We cannot do it in our own personal lives, and we should not be doing it in the life of our country.

Government members say this is the government's money, it should be accruing to the government and it is all the taxpayers' money. That is true but, as each of us know, we have to be responsible for our own money. If we misspend it or if we make a mistake with it, we cannot go back and rewrite history. I cannot go to my bank and say: "Oh, excuse me, I did not mean to withdraw that $200 two years ago. Could you please put it back?" The government should not be able to do that either.

This is an important principle. The government is trying to rewrite history to make it retroactive, and it will have an impact on those caisses populaires in Quebec and across Canada. Those caisses populaires are membership-owned. If $260,000 to $400,000 is lost per small caisse populaire, it is a significant amount of money. Where does it come from? It comes out the pockets of those people who invest in those institutions. Members of those institutions should not be responsible for cleaning up the government's mistakes.

Our party is often accused of not being good fiscal managers. It is one of those myths is that social democrats cannot quite manage financially. This is an opportunity for me to say that the hon. member for Essex—Windsor has brought a very good point. He is not prepared to support this bill, neither are we in this party prepared to support this bill, if the government thinks that it can rewrite history.

The government has made a mistake in the drafting of the bill and it should be responsible for it. We are prepared to support the bill if the government supports the amendment.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, I, too, am privileged to have an opportunity to make some comments on Bill C-51.

On balance, Bill C-51 is a very good bill. Certainly, its principle has been discussed already and we are now having a chance to discuss it further as a result of the amendment put forward by the hon. member for Essex—Windsor. We believe in the general thrust of the bill.

It gives clearance for the federal government to have the right to take action, in cases of bankrupt firms, to recover deductions made from employees' wages to pay income tax, unemployment insurance, Canada Pension, et cetera. In such action, the federal government will have priority over all other creditors, since the money in question was not an asset of the firm but held in deemed trust on behalf of the workers involved.

Therefore, in a bankruptcy proceeding where the creditors have to divide up the assets in an effort to reclaim their losses, I think it is fair to say that monies that were held by the company involved on behalf of its employees for unemployment insurance or for Canada Pension and the like are not assets of the company and ought to be passed along to the federal government. That is the point of this legislation. For years and years, that has been the approach in dealing with bankrupt firms.

There is something almost sinister in this bill, because the government is saying that not only is it going to make these changes today, which we support, but it is going to reach back into the past and apply them retroactively.

I remember when the members of the government were in opposition. At that time, the Liberal government decided to move on some aspects of the National Energy Program with policies that were somewhat retroactive. The members of the opposition, the Conservative Party in those days, said that this was unreasonable and unacceptable. History cannot be rewritten simply by passing legislation.

I remember a number of my hon. colleagues almost being unable to express themselves with indignation and outrage at this incredible grab by the federal government to impose retroactive legislation, which is certainly not fair. They said it was like changing the rules of the game, moving the goal post half way through the game.

Now the government is doing just that. I have not heard a clear response yet from the government that it supports retroactive legislation, not going back to 1989 or 1988, but in fact right back to 1987. You will recall, Madam Speaker, that the government was taken to court by the Alberta Court of Appeal saying that the government did not have the right to have priority when it came time to divide up the assets of a firm during bankruptcy proceedings. I think it was Lloyds Bank that made the case and won the case, saying that indeed the wording was insufficient to give the federal government that priority. It was unfortunate. This legislation will now do that, and that is why we support it. However, I cannot support legislation that attempts to rewrite history, that attempts to impose retroactive regulation.

What signal does this send to the business world? The government is essentially saying to a business, if it went bankrupt two years ago, that it now wants to go in and upset the proceedings to ensure, if the business had taken employees' moneys that were being held in trust for pensions and unemployment insurance premiums and the like, that it would get its fair share. Well, you cannot do that.

The most astounding testimony came from the Insolvency Association of Canada that opposed this very strongly when it heard that the government was going to impose this in a retroactive fashion. You can imagine where this leads us, if we were to say that we support this notion.

I might say that the caisse populaire from Quebec made a compelling argument in committee. It stated that this was not only a philosophic case or a case of principle on which it was arguing, but that it would cost members of the small caisse populaires hundreds of thousands of dollars, if this particular retroactivity was introduced and allowed to go ahead.

I can only say that when they stated that they could lose up to $300,000 as a result of this retroactive application of the law, I assumed they were telling the truth and that is what it is going to cost. That is a lot of money to a struggling caisse populaire.

I have yet to hear any argument in favour of retroactivity. I read the committee minutes carefully. I read the reports from the various witnesses. Even those in the Department of Finance could not offer what I would consider a satisfactory explanation for the use of retroactivity in this bill. I think we are on pretty shaky ground here.

If we say to the government that it can impose retroactive legislation today, what will it do tomorrow? Tomorrow will it decide to change taxes, and rather than having a personal tax rate of 26 per cent, maybe it should be 40 per cent and we will make that retroactive seven or eight years. Where does this end?

We are in very dangerous territory when the Parliament of Canada changes regulations and changes laws retroactively.

There is enough fuss in the country when on budget day the government states that it is going to change a number of tax measures and that they are effective immediately and then the legislation takes place six months or two or three years later. People ask if the government has the right to impose tax changes or the imposition of other levies without legislation. Yes, Madam Speaker, that is a custom and a tradition that we have developed in this country. But we have not developed a tradition where legislation can be imposed retroactively. That does not exist.

We are now breaking into some very questionable areas when we allow this to occur. That is why my hon. friend from Essex—Windsor has done the most honourable thing and has said to the House of Commons that we want to support this in the future, because in a bankrupt firm, of course, the funds held on behalf of employees are not to be considered part of the company's assets.

When I consider the number of bankrupt firms that we are experiencing these days, I begin to shudder. Bankruptcies are up again and the policies of the Conservative government are adding to that number. Every month they go up. We are now into thousands and thousands of bankruptcies. It is a very serious situation. We really need this legislation, but let us not do it retroactively. I do not think it is an appropriate step at all. For that reason, we should support the motion put forward by my hon. colleague from Essex—Windsor.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Madam Speaker, I was not going to speak, but my hon. colleague from Kamloops inspired and motivated me to proceed to speak to the bill.

I will speak only to the principle of the bill, because that is the concern that I have. This bill may seem to be innocuous and inconsequential to the hundreds of thousands of Canadians out there who are listening, because they probably have no idea what we are talking about. Nevertheless, if they knew the details they would be concerned.

I suggest that this is government by ad hoc legislation. It is back to the future, in reverse. I am reminded very much of Bill C-28, where the government introduced 125 amendments to a bill that were all ruled out of order. I guess this points to the inefficiency of the government itself.

The very thought of retroactivity applicable to any law is totally unacceptable. I think of all of the bills that come before this House. If there were any suggestion, even a hint that we were going to go back to 1987, as in this case, why not go back to the 1960s or the 1940s? We could rewrite history.

It would not be bad, if we were able to rewrite the last five years of history with this government, but that is the kind of precedent that this government is setting.

I notice that you are a little restless, Madam Speaker, and I have strayed a little bit from the topic here, but I sold a house in 1975 for $60,000. It is now worth $500,000. I would like to go back and get my lawyers to say what a mistake I made. I want it back now. It is a retroactive concept that I thought up. It is not a bad idea, and I guess that is what the government is saying, that this is a good idea. The long arm of the government will reach back into history and pick some money out of your pocket.

My hon. friend from Windsor—Essex has a legitimate and sensible amendment that members across should be actively supporting, because the principle of this idea of retroactivity is totally unacceptable and I am sure Canadians who are listening would agree with the New Democratic Party.

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Madam Speaker, I would like to join in supporting this amendment, as I did during the debate in committee.

Before the legislative committee on Bill C-51, we had a witness from the caisse populaire de Désjardins in Quebec, in particular, from one of the caisse populaires on the south shore of Montreal. These witnesses indicated to us that they stand to lose some $260,000, if this bill is passed in a retroactive fashion. They were opposed to this legislation.

This bill was presented to us in somewhat of an innocuous fashion. We were told that this bill would simply allow the government to get moneys that were rightfully owing to the government, namely, deductions at source for unemployment insurance, premiums under the Canada Pension Plan, or income tax deductions. In other words, money that was deducted from employees and would be payable to and property of the government.

However, we learned in the debate in committee that the matter is not that straightforward. We were given the example by the caisse populaire of a company which is owed an account receivable, let us say by Hydro Quebec, and this account receivable may be payable in six months' time. The company, on the basis of the accounts receivable, could go to a financial institution, a caisse populaire, and borrow money for its operations.

At the time that this loan is contracted, the company is in good financial health and totally up to date in its payments of deducted premiums to Revenue Canada. It could even be that the financial institution verifies with Revenue Canada to ensure that indeed that the company is up to date in its payments. On that basis, a loan is made to the company and the financial institution, the caisse populaire receives an assignment of this particular account receivable.

What this particular section of the Income Tax Act allows Revenue Canada to do is to step into the shoes of the financial institution to seize that payment, a payment that is to a secured creditor. In the words of the Income Tax Act: "to a secured creditor who has a right to receive the payment". This is acknowledged under the act.

So the monies that we have been told are monies that were deducted from employees and are owing to the government, are not at all the monies that Revenue Canada is putting its hand on. It is putting its hand on an account receivable that is owing, in essence, to a third party. In the case of the witness who appeared before our committee, the third party was the caisse populaire. It will lose some $260,000 if this bill is passed in a retroactive fashion, and ultimately the members of the caisse populaire who are workers, perhaps heads of families, ordinary people, will ultimately have to make up this loss.

I want to support this amendment, which at least would overcome one of the more reprehensible aspects of this legislation, which is intended to overrule a decision of the courts. Canadians have the right to rely on the courts. When they go to the courts to seek a decision in a matter like this, and when the courts say that the government does not have the power to do what it claimed it had, it is not right for Parliament to pass legislation retroactively, overruling a court decision and depriving people of the recourse that they are entitled to have.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Madam Deputy Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Madam Deputy Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

Motion No. 1 negatived.

Hon. Shirley Martin (for the Minister of Finance) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: On division.

Motion agreed to.

Madam Deputy Speaker: When shall the bill be read a third time? By unanimous consent, now?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

An hon. member: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there not consent for third reading? The Chair would like to be sure that there is consent from the New Democratic Party. The hon. member for Essex—Windsor.

Mr. Langdon: Madam Speaker, clearly some discussion has taken place among the various parties on this issue, and for this reason there is consent. Nevertheless, it is unfortunate that a piece of legislation with a very poor principle within it is going to go quite so quickly through this House.

Madam Deputy Speaker: There is unanimous consent at this time?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)) moved that Bill C–51 be read for the third time and passed.

Mr. Gaby Larrivée (Joliette): Madam Speaker, Bill C–51 is not an elaborate piece of legislation, but it nonetheless has its importance in the general frame of things to increase the effectiveness and efficiency of our tax system. I therefore welcome its impending approval.

The bill contains corrective measures regarding two problems with respect to unremitted source deductions.

The first one was raised following a June 1989 ruling from the Alberta Court of Appeal in a case involving the Lloyds Bank of Canada and the International Warranty Company Limited. The court ruling gave rise to concerns about the enhanced garnishmee procedures used by Revenue Canada. Bill C–51 dispels those uncertainties.

These procedures were implemented in 1987. They apply solely to the collection of source deductions. Since they have been in force, they are the main mecasnism enabling Revenue Canada to collect unremitted source deductions.

I should of course indicate that, through garnishment, Revenue Canada can intercept payments which, while being payable to a tax debtor, are made instead to the creditor of the tax debtor under a guarantee agreement such as the assignment of receivables.

In the case of a person who failed to remit the required source deductions, after the enhanced garnishmee letter has been served, the amount seized has to be paid to Revenue Canada instead of the secured creditor.

The financial implications of the Alberta Court of Appeal were substantial. The unremitted source deductions have reached 100 to 200 billion dollars a year in the past few years. Therefore, we decided to pass legislation to dispel uncertainties.

I want to point out an important aspect of this amendment. This bill simply confirms the initial purpose of those procedures. It does not give Revenue Canada new powers and really changes nothing in that some courts have recognized the initial intent of the bill. However, the amendments to the bill will prevent unecessary litigation.

The second situation which Bill C-51 remedies is the result of a mistake which was made when Bill C-139, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act, was adopted during the last session of Parliament. When the time came to amend the sub-sections to Section 227, a correlative amendment was inadvertently left out. Therefore, the rules preventing Revenue Canada from taking recovery action in connection with an unpaid income tax amount within 90 days after the day on which the notice was mailed to the taxpayer or until such time a tribunal has ruled on all issue surrounding the responsibility concerning payment of these taxes, became applicable to the unpaid income tax collected at source.

That was not intentional. It had been expressly stated that these rules, when they came initially into force, would not apply to such amounts. This bill, therefore, re-establishes the rule whereby Revenue Canada is prevented from taking recovery action in connection with the amounts in controversy, do not apply in the case of unpaid income tax deducted at source.

Before I conclude, Madam Speaker, I should like to comment on two issues which the Committee has addressed.

When the Committee considered Bill C-51, the clause concerning the coming into force of the proposed amendments to the extended measures for garnishment was hotly debated.

The proposed amendments will apply after December 17, 1987, in the case of moneys Revenue Canada seeks to recover after mailing a notice of garnishment after that date, except if the legal recovery procedure were instituted following that date and before the Government indicated its intention to make amendments, specifically on November 6, 1989.

This provision is adequate because the amendments only confirm the intention that the legislator wanted to give it initially. It is to be noted that in respect of the Courts, the amendments do not apply to matters pending before the November 7, 1989 announcement. The clause governing the coming into force in this bill should discourage any useless lawsuit.

It should be noted that the enactment provision does not penalize employers who willingly paid the deductions at source in accordance with their understanding of the law or of the intention of the legislator.

Quite obviously they had no intention of appealing the validity of garnishment procedures, as evidenced by the fact that they did not take legal action between the time the Alberta Court of Appeal rendered its decision in June 1989 and November 7, 1989 when the ways and means motion was tabled.

Another issue raised in committee had to do with the impact of the legislation on the granting of credit. In this respect I ought to point out that the bill only confirms the original intention of the legislator. These are not new provisions. In any case, since the provisions came into force in December 1987, there is no indication that enhanced garnishment has had a negative impact on the granting of credit.

[English]

Mr. Jerry Pickard (Essex—Kent): Madam Speaker, I rise today to state my concerns with regard to Bill C-51. Basically, it is a very good piece of legislation. It re-establishes the garnishment authority that our government had before the ruling of the Alberta Court of Appeal.

The bill reinstates the ability of our government to be able to collect UIC premiums, Canada Pension Plan premiums and income tax owing by corporations that are going into bankruptcy, but which have not been passed on to the Canadian government.

When we realize that many of these payments have been made by employees in good faith to the employer, and as a result of a bankruptcy or another problem incurred within the business, that employer has used some of those funds in order to keep the business going, then I believe that funding should definitely go back to the Canadian government. This bill allows the Canadian government to receive those payments which it could not receive before because of technicalities within the ruling of the Alberta Court of Appeal.

Garnishment authority had been given to the Canadian government under Section 224.2 of the Income Tax Act in 1987. In June, 1989, the Alberta Court of Appeal ruled against the authority of the federal government to receive that money. Therefore, between June and today, approximately $100 million has been lost by the Canadian government. On an annual basis, the government is projecting that cost to be in the neighbourhood of $240 million.

When we stop and consider it, if those taxes are not collected, they must be made up from another source. The only source is the average Canadian taxpayer. As a result, if a piece of legislation is not put in place whereby the Canadian government may regain its ability to collect those garnisheed amounts, it will, in fact, lose $240 million, which will have to be made up by tax increases or spending cuts. I feel the person who suffers if this legislation is not passed is the taxpayer, the average Canadian citizen.

The government is not asking for new abilities to tax under the Income Tax Act and under Bill C-51. It is asking to regain the ability it had previously. In that case, it is re-asking for the taxpayer in Canada a $240 million loss to go back into the Canadian government.

Liberals in many cases have differing viewpoints and those viewpoints have been stated on certain issues. I could not support a situation where I felt that a major problem may occur to small businesses. I think within the bill there is room to make a caution and I think that caution should be brought forward.

I expect that within this piece of legislation the government would not take actions to bring a great deal of pressure on small business, or businesses in general, which may not be solvent, and would not apply extra pressure to force them into a bankruptcy situation.

There have been concerns voiced in that area. I would hope the government would use its discretion in a very sophisticated way in order to make certain that a small business or someone in the country is not pushed over the brink into bankruptcy.

Through the revision of legislation the concerns of all Canadians need to be protected. In part this legislation does that. The average Canadian should not have to pay for debts that were not passed on to the Canadian government through a bankruptcy act and those extra taxes should not be forced upon each individual.

The bill ensures the garnisheement letter from Revenue Canada would transfer to Revenue Canada claims or priorities over secured creditors in the case of bankruptcy.

The bill states that legal actions to collect unpaid source deductions cannot begin until 90 days after Revenue Canada rules on the taxpayers' appeal of their assessment, if an appeal is made. If a taxpayer launches a court appeal of their assessment, no action can be taken by the government until the court appeal has made its final decision.

By giving Revenue Canada the enhanced collection powers proposed in Bill C-51, we are attempting to ensure that businesses with severe cash flow problems and which face possible bankruptcies do not use the unpaid deductions as a source of emergency funding which may not be collected by the Canadian government in future times.

The principle of the bill is supported strongly by many members of our caucus. It guarantees that the Canadian taxpayer is protected from doubly paying these issues. The only further situation I think we should bring forward is the fact that we do have some problems within our bankruptcy legislation now.

The Department of Finance has suggested that its officials will present to the House within the year amendments to the bankruptcy legislation that will clear up the entire problem of bankruptcies and take a 1990s view of what is happening within the Bankruptcy Act. We need to upgrade that legislation, bring it forward, and handle it in a more global sense than just with what is presented within this bill. I encourage the government very strongly not to stop at Bill C-51, but to move forward and bring these amendments to the House as early as possible so that we can deal with the global sense of bankruptcy.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, if I could make up for my oversight at report stage in this more formal setting, I wish you all the success and congratulate you very warmly on behalf of my party and myself on your selection as Deputy Speaker. I think it is a very wise and much-deserved appointment.

I would like to turn to the subject matter of this legislation we supported at second reading because we saw it as important and useful. It would see to it that money deducted from working people was forwarded to the government, as it should be, to cover unemployment insurance, Canada Pension Plan and income tax. It seemed a very clear, straightforward and sensible principle.

We said at report stage that there is within the details of this bill a contradiction of democratic process and a contradiction of the rule of law. It is not possible for our party to support this legislation as it finally stands in front of this House.

We support its principles, but its detailed implementation has within it such a glaring error that we can simply not accept it. That glaring error is to take this sensible legislation which was brought to the House of Commons on November 6, 1989, and to say that despite the fact that it was brought before us in late 1989, we are going to make it apply from December 1987.

I see various Conservatives who are lawyers. As lawyers, I wonder what they think of the application after the fact, the backward application of laws. I wonder what the Minister for International Trade would think if the United States were to pass a law which said that their countervail laws in the future were to take a certain form which would be detrimental to Canada and was were going to apply those laws backward for two years. With the principles of this government in standing up for us against the United States, it is possible that the Minister of International Trade might support such legislation. I hope that he and his government will see that such an attempt to rewrite the legal regime which affects us as a country retroactively is simply not acceptable. Yet, that is precisely what is happening with this legislation.

• (1710)

I guess it is now the junior Minister of Employment, is it? I wonder how the former junior Minister of Transport, I think that is right, as she sits and thinks about this question and the legislation in front of us, would react if the Government of Ontario were to put into effect legislation which attempted to apply to trucking companies in the province of Ontario not just a tax on tires from the day the tax is brought in but a tax on tires back two years previously. I am sure she would be outraged.

[Translation]

I look at the Quebec members who are in the House. I look at them and I wonder what can be said about Quebec members who do not listen to the Desjardins movement, who did not listen to the caisses populaires—

Mr. Larrivée: How about the Royal Bank?

Mr. Ricard: We listen. But we are in favour of justice.

Mr. Langdon: —who did not listen to the Quebec caisses populaires management when they said to the legislative committee that it would not be possible to have such retroactive action.

Mr. Ricard: I agree with that.

Mr. Langdon: The hon. member says he agrees with that. For his sake I hope he is prepared to vote against the bill under consideration.

[English]

I must say that I was especially interested to hear the Liberal spokesperson who just put the Liberal position, which I took to be a position which supported this legislation. I guess I was especially amazed to hear the Liberal position because in committee, the Liberal position was against this bill.

I know that the Liberal party has many times attempted to straddle the fence, but this is the first time that I can remember where it has taken one position in committee, voting against this bill, and taken the contrary position in the House on third reading, suggesting that it was in favour of the bill. This takes inconsistency. It takes contradictory positions to a new depth. I must say that straddling the fence like that is very dangerous; it is dangerous for anybody but it is especially dangerous for a political party. It is likely to lead to sterility, and sterility in a political party is perhaps the worst of all possible fates. Perhaps it is something that we can look forward to in the future for this Liberal party that sits here in opposition, because it is a Liberal party which, on this important point of principle, this question of whether it is possible to apply laws retroactively, really does not care.

I have to admit that in my youth, misguided as it was, I actually was sympathetic to the Liberal party. I actually at one point went—

Mr. Milliken: I thought you were a member.

Mr. Langdon: No, I never went that far. Somebody suggested I was once a member of the Liberal party. My sins, I am sure, have been great but they have never sunk to those depths. However I did once attend a Liberal party convention. In fact I have to confess I even took part in a demonstration for a Liberal party leadership candidate in the province of Ontario.

Mr. Milliken: You should go to Calgary.

Mr. Speller: Repent.

Mr. Langdon: Fortunately that candidate—it was Joe Greene, by the way, a former member of this House—did not win and so problems with potential schizophrenia in my life were avoided.

At the very heart of the Liberal party of Lester Pearson, the very heart of the Liberal party of those days, the very heart I thought of the Liberal party led by the member for Vancouver—Quadra, was a commitment to small l liberalism. At the heart of small l liberalism is a belief in the rule of law, a belief that we cannot through Parliament, a place where we believe in democracy, rewrite law for the past. We cannot pass legislation which will apply two years before that legislation even saw the light of day in the House of Commons. Yet, that is what this piece of legislation does.

Frankly I cannot understand my colleague from Essex—Kent, who comes from an adjoining constituency, presenting such positive comments with respect to this legislation. I can only hope that another member of the Liberal party will get up and say I was mistaken and say that in fact the Liberal party is still a party that does have at least some principles which it holds dear. One such principle is the principle which the hon. member shared with me in committee, the principle that one cannot rewrite legislation two years into the past.

I look forward very much to hearing the member from Montreal. I hope he will be speaking next on behalf of the Liberal party and will make quite clear that the strong words he spoke against retroactivity in the legislative committee were in fact on behalf of his party and that his party will be voting against this retroactive piece of legislation just as our party will be, just as the member for Laval indicates he will be voting against it.

Mr. Ricard: I didn't say that.

Mr. Langdon: Oh, I am sorry. I must have misinterpreted the member. He said that he too was against the retroactivity within this bill.

Mr. Ricard: I did not. I said I was for it.

Mr. Langdon: But he is still prepared to vote for the bill.

Mr. Ricard: Probably yes.

Mr. Langdon: Probably yes. Oh, dear.

• (1720)

It is very difficult for those Quebec members, they simply cannot take position and vote for important principles, for small caisses populaires in the Province of Quebec.

M. Ricard: That is not what I said. I said there was existing legislation.

[English]

Mr. Langdon: Seriously, this is an important point of principle which we are going to vote against in this party. It is a point of principle which leads us to vote against this legislation, because we do not feel that it is right to rewrite history.

I had a discussion with the hon. member for Trinity—Spadina who was talking about the importance of not rewriting history. If we look at some of the problems that affected the Soviet Union—

Mr. Crosbie: History is rewritten all the time. What tripe.

Mr. Langdon: The Minister for International Trade has finally been brought back to life. Above all, he is someone who would like to rewrite history. He would like the world to forget that he used to be a Liberal.

Mr. Milliken: He used to be on the straight and narrow.

Mr. McGuire: He was divided.

Mr. Crosbie: I was a socialist when I was eight or ten.

Mr. Langdon: If one reads the rumours correctly, it is possible that when he deserts that party he will want people in the future to forget that he was at one time a Conservative.

It is important not to rewrite history, either historically or in terms of law.

Mr. McGuire: What an inflammatory speech.

Mr. Langdon: I can see that the flames of rebellion are starting to burn at the very roots at the Liberal party. I can hear the concern. I can see the sense of outrage at its spokesperson's position.

When the hon. member from Montreal stands up, he will take a position against the retroactivity within this bill. I hope that position will be a strong one because we are trying—and I have dealt lightly with it at times—to get across to members of this House just how important the point of principle is in front of us. We are trying to get them to break through reading their briefs, to break through signing their letters, and to recognize that the point before us is one that cannot simply be casually passed through the House of Commons without a thought. Instead, this bill is at the very heart of our democracy and the rule of law, that is, the question of not passing legislation in this House that applies to the past. Who can tell?

There might be legislation when we have a New Democratic Party government, in the very near future I expect, which will indicate that the free trade bill was never even passed in the House of Commons, that it was not abrogated on six months' notice. A piece of legislation will be brought before this House by the New Democratic Party finance critic, trade critic, or Prime Minister which says that in 1988 we did not pass a free trade bill, that in 1990 we did not pass a goods and services tax, that this was something that never happened in the House of Commons. If that is really the principle we want to see applied, let me say that it will not be a principle put in front of the House by a New Democratic Party government, because we will not rewrite history. I urge the House not to rewrite the past, not to put a retroactive piece of legislation into effect.

[Translation]

I should hope so for the sake of the caisses populaires of the Province of Quebec.

[English]

For the sake of our principles across the country we will reject this bill and tell the Department of Finance to go back and rewrite it as it should have been written: as something to take effect at the time of a Ways and Means motion just like every other piece of financial legislation that comes before this House.

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I listened to the hon. member's homily with great interest. He appears to have taken the usual very righteous tone that members of the New Democratic Party take when they are about to shift gears and change their principles.

We have heard quite a lot of that in their support for the Senate, which of course I am delighted to see. Nevertheless that party urged for so long the abolition of the Senate, but its leader stood this week and said that she wanted the Senate, that undemocratic, unelected institution against which she and her predecessors used to rant, rail and rave and say how awful it was. As stated in The Globe and Mail this morning, "some of the former leaders must be rolling over in their graves at the words of the leader of the New Democratic Party". The sudden shift of principle, we are told, is not a shift of principle, but it was uttered in those same pious tones that we hear today from the hon. member for Essex—Windsor, which indicates to me that there has been a very substantial change in principle here.

The hon. member pointed out that perhaps our party had changed its view on this bill from the time in committee. I will go back to April 11, 1990, as reported at page 10502 of Hansard, when this bill came up for second reading. The question was put on that day without further debate and the motion was carried, not even on division. No one from the New Democratic Party objected to the bill. It is evident from Hansard that NDP members were in the House but apparently none of them objected to second reading of this bill.

To anyone who is listening and does not know, second reading means approval in principle. For all the ranting and raving we heard today in the speech of the hon. member for Essex—Windsor about their great opposition to this bill and how determined they have been in fighting this legislation tooth and nail from day one, where were they on April 11? Why was he not here to object to the bill when it carried and it was not on division? This is the bill they have been fighting tooth and nail and they were not here to say that it went on division.

It is absolute rubbish that we have been listening to from the hon. member. It is one of those homilies that perhaps would be better preached in a church than here. I suggest that all his pious utterances about the Liberal Party changing its position is just so much nonsense. Certainly we opposed the bill in committee. Certainly we had concerns with the clauses in this bill. There is hardly a bill that this government introduces in the House that we do not criticize, as I am sure is the same with the New Democratic Party.

We recognize that some bills on balance are reasonable, so sometimes we will go along with them as reasonable, not perfect, far from it, especially the bills that are drafted by hon. gentlemen opposite. We know they are fraught with difficulty from the day they are brought in. The ministers who are here know that. I suspect they realize they are not perfect, but they do not like to admit it.

We do not claim perfection. We are not a party that shifts principles right, left and centre. We accept that things are less than perfect in the world and recognize that fact. We have matured. I urge the hon. member for Essex—Windsor, before he starts hurling stones at the Liberal party for having allegedly changed its position, to look at Hansard of April 11. People living in glass houses ought not to be throwing stones. The New Democratic Party is in a green house and is at great peril on this one.

Mr. Langdon: Madam Speaker, I have to say that I prefer piety, if that is what it was, to clichés.

If the member for Kingston and the Islands had been here for my speech in its entirety, as he suggests he was, he would have heard, as other members in the House can attest, that I indicated very clearly that we supported this bill in principle at second reading because we thought that its basic thrust was useful and important. But I also indicated that after our attempts to change this very serious problem of retroactivity, which his colleague from Montreal and myself both fought against in committee, and which I moved an amendment on few minutes ago in the House, certainly our view is that the failure of the government to accept a straightforward, consistent and absolutely clear amendment meant that we could not support it as the bill now stands.

The member also made some interesting comments with respect to our position on the Senate. I have to assure the member that our deep and abiding faith in the Senate of Canada remains as abysmally non-existent as ever. We challenge the Senate to put up or shut up because we know perfectly well that the Senate and the Liberal majority within the Senate will not listen to the majority of people in this country, will not defeat the GST as it should and will not see to it that democracy holds in this country. I challenge all of the Liberals who are here to make as much use as they can of their contacts with their fellow Liberals in the Senate to try to prove me wrong.

If I am proved wrong, despite my piety I shall be ever so pleased to get up in the House and apologize to the Liberal Party in the Senate for ever having distrusted their lack of will. But let me put it clearly at this point. I think that will does not exist and I think time will prove us correct in that.

Mr. Guy Ricard (Laval): Madam Speaker, first I congratulate you on your new appointment. I did not have the opportunity to do so publicly and I think that the tradition in the House is to congratulate you and wish you every success.

I should like to direct a question to the hon. member for Essex—Windsor (Mr. Langdon). In his remarks he indicated that the member for Laval would support the bill but finds such a retroactive motion unacceptable. I agree with him to some extent because a piece of legislation adopted today should not apply retroactively two or three years before. The one thing he did forget to mention in his speech is that there was already a law in the statute books and bankers knew that. I wonder why he did not raise that point in his remarks and why today, as we are about to passe this legislation, he is against it. Nobody is supposed to ignore the law. I would like him to tell me why he failed to point out that the legislation was in force and that nobody supported the legislation when the allegations were made.

Mr. Steven Langdon (Essex—Windsor): It is a very important question Madam Speaker. The Alberta Provincial Court declared in its ruling that the existing act was unacceptable. Small and medium sized financial institutions based their decisions on that ruling. They decided to grant loans to companies. After such a court ruling, we cannot give a two year retroactive effect to the act. I submit that such a retroactive measure is unacceptable in a democracy like ours.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The time allowed for questions and comments is now over. On Debate. The hon. member for Saint-Henri—Westmount (M. Berger) has the floor.

[English]

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): First of all, Madam Speaker, I cannot intervene in this debate without replying, at least very briefly, to the comments made by the member for Essex—Windsor. He referred to the positions taken by members of my party in this debate at report stage and at third reading and said that it takes inconsistency to new depths. He said this leads to sterility.

I would like to assure him that there is no problem of sterility on our party. On the contrary, I think that perhaps the different viewpoints that he has heard expressed here today indicate vigour and that there is some thinking going on in our party. It indicates that there are some of us who are willing to ask questions. It indicates a certain restlessness. It indicates that policy matters are not always straightforward.

I would say that, on the contrary, what we see from his party is more likely to indicate sterility. It is, generally speaking, a viewpoint which is unequivocal, which does not allow for any shades or differing viewpoints and is, as I say, an indication of sterility.

I would like to point out to the member for Essex—Windsor that the position that he himself took in committee and in the House today indicates such sterility. His comments were directed simply to the retroactive aspects of this legislation which, yes, we oppose, and which I spoke against earlier. When the vote was put on division my colleagues in the House indicated that we could not support the retroactive aspect of this legislation. So on that point he is quite mistaken.

I would like to draw to your attention that the objections of the member for Essex Windsor were only focused on the question of retroactivity. On the overall principle and overall design of this law he had no questions to ask.

I would like to suggest to him and to the members opposite in the government party that this bill is not just a matter of motherhood and apple pie. It is not as straightforward as we have been led to believe.

I would like to refer to the speech of the parliamentary secretary to the Minister of Finance on April 5, at page 10243 of Hansard when he said this bill applies only to recovery of payroll deductions and was designed to overcome a recent court ruling which thwarts the effectiveness of the improved garnishment provisions which came into force in 1987 and which he said applies only to the recovery of payroll deductions. In the very next sentence, the parliamentary secretary said:

> The enhanced garnishment enables Revenue Canada to intercept the moneys owing to a tax debtor but paid to one of his creditors pursuant to a security agreement such as an assignment of accounts receivable.

• (1740)

Right there, in the words of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Minister of Finance, we see that we are not talking simply about the recovery of payroll deductions. No, we are talking about allowing Revenue Canada to intercept moneys or an account receivable that has been assigned to a lending institution, a financial institution, in a security agreement.

I understand that the member for Essex—Windsor does not have a lot of sympathy for the banks. We had a witness who came before our committee from the Caisse Populaire Desjardins. The Caisse Populaire Desjardins, as we know, is not a bank. It is a financial institution, though, that is affected by the legislation that we are debating here today.

We were told what the effect of this kind of legislation is on such financial institutions. I want to read from the testimony of the representatives of the caisse populaire before the legislative committee. They brought to the attention of committee members what the stakes would be for members of the caisse populaire. I quote:

[Translation]

> For several of our caisses, such a loss can make the difference between a surplus that can be distributed among members and a deficit that forces us to draw from our reserve. Incidentally, we have with us today Mr. Pierre-Paul Couture, general manager of the Caisse populaire Saint-Charles-Borromée in the Montreal area, one caisse that will be severely affected if the bill is adopted. The Caisse approved a credit line of $1,7 million for a business which later became insolvent. If Revenue Canada doesn't benefit from a super-priority, the caisse will lose about $690,000 but it stands to lose about $950,000 if such a priority is granted retroactively, a difference of $262,000.

That is not all, Madam Speaker, because we had been told in committee that that loss could go up to some $350,000 since there also some $70,000 in legal fees involved in this case.

We were told that Mr. Couture could provide us with more details. But what must be stressed is that the Caisse had no effective means to protect itself against such a loss. Because of this provision, it will have to use up its entire reserve that it took years to build up and to call on Confédération Desjardins's Corporation de fonds de sécurité, a financial support institution financed trough the contributions of every caisse in the province. So, the 4,500,000 members of les Caisses Desjardins will have to make up for that loss which will be shouldered, for the most part, by members of the Caise populaire Saint-Charles-Borromée.

As you can see, Madam Speaker, this bill, if passed, will not only affect the banks, the big financial institutions of this country, but also the 4 500 000 members of the Caisses Desjardins.

[English]

But if that itself was not enough to concern the member for Essex—Windsor or the members of the government party, they could have referred to a decision of a British Columbia court in the case of Concord International Travel.

In this particular case Revenue Canada argued that its priority, the priority which we are debating here today, should take precedence over a claim for unpaid wages of employees. In his judgement Mr. Justice Sheppard of the British Columbia County Court, I believe it was, pointed out that a travel agency in Vancouver had experienced financial difficulties resulting in a debt to its employees of $12,025.38 in unpaid wages. Revenue Canada came along several months after the fact and claimed that its claim should take precedence over the unpaid wages that had been claimed by the Director of Employment Standards under the British Columbia legislation.

If members took a moment to consider this particular decision, they would realize that it is not just a matter of the Government of Canada, acting on behalf of all Canadians and all Canadian taxpayers, trying to get monies which are rightfully owed the Crown and, therefore, which benefit all Canadian taxpayers and which will take precedence over big financial institutions. It is not as simple as that because we see here that there is a decision which said that Revenue Canada, under the legislation the way it was drafted, should not be able to assert a claim which would take precedence over the actual wages, some $12,000 that were owed to employees of a travel agency that had gone out of business.

As a result of the testimony we had before the committee I was able to come to the conclusion that we have here a very complex situation which should not be resolved in the manner the government is proposing here today. On this point I want to stress and repeat the remarks that were made by my colleague, the member for Essex—Kent, earlier today, that only a reform of the bankruptcy legislation will probably be able to sort these questions out and see that justice is ultimately done. We are obviously talking of a situation where, in the event of insolvency or bankruptcy, there are not enough dollars to go around, there are not enough assets to go around.

The government has recognized in recent years in a number of reports, that the Crown priority should not always take precedence. There has been talk of abolishing the Crown priority in the reform of bankruptcy legislation. I think there is a recognition there that the Crown, the public at large, the taxpayers of Canada, are perhaps better able to support certain financial losses than ordinary individuals, wage earners, workers, even in some cases, financial institutions. I guess it is because there are more people backing the Crown. All the Canadian taxpayers, the whole country, is backing the Crown, which puts it in a better position in many circumstances to absorb losses.

We have to understand that the effect of this legislation will be to contradict one of the other stated objectives of this government, which is to ensure that credit is readily available to businesses that wish to expand, invest in our economy and create jobs.

• (1750)

We were told by witnesses before the legislative committee that if financial institutions, including caisse populaire, cannot count on the assignment of an account receivable under a security agreement as collateral for the loan that they have extended, then they will have to require other guarantees. They are going to have to go to the small business operators and tell them that an account receivable of $200,000 or $500,000 or whatever it is, is not sufficient because the government can come in and grab that if they get into some kind of financial difficulty.

Therefore, they will require other kinds of guarantees. They will require personal guarantees. They will require other assets extended as collateral which the small business operator may not have and which, therefore, will limit credit, stop businesses from expanding and will defeat one of the stated purposes of this government which is to see that the economy expands and that jobs are created.

So, Madam Speaker, on the basis of the testimony that we had before the legislative committee and on the basis of reading some of some of the decisions of the courts of Canada on this case I can only support those witnesses that appeared before our committee and say that I am opposed to this legislation. I believe that it is a blunt instrument and that the government has to come in with much more sophisticated measures to enable it to recover what is owed to it in terms of unpaid source deductions.

I also want to reiterate that the retroactive aspect of this legislation is particularly reprehensible. The government presented flawed legislation to this House in 1987. I think the people of Canada had a right to rely on a court decision. Canadian taxpayers do not like retroactivity. Canadian voters, Canadian citizens, do not like retroactivity. They do not like it when the Government of Canada uses its majority to overrule a court judgement which people, I believe, are entitled to rely upon.

When I was sitting in that legislative committee it was ironic to see the Conservative members who were elected in 1984 and again in 1988 on a platform of going to fight big government, of getting the heavy hand of government out of the affairs of the people of Canada, of standing up for the little guy, of protecting the interests of ordinary Canadians. Here we had the Conservative members of the committee ramming through this piece of legislation in the face of the unanimous testimony of the witnesses who appeared before us who were opposed to it and indicated to us what the deleterious effect of this legislation would be on businesses and the Canadian economy.

For the record I would like to point out that we had representatives before the committee from the Canadian Insolvency Association. We had, of course, representatives of the Federation caisse populaire Desjardins. There were also other communications sent to committee members on behalf of witnesses who could not make it to the committee and perhaps realized that it was hopeless because the Conservative majority was in no mood to listen. They sent written submissions to the committee, which I—

And I would bet anything that government members did not even bother to read it.

[English]

Again, I find it very ironic that the government members, who I am sure go to their constituents every weekend and tell them how they are there to fight for their interests and to protect the little guy, the ordinary taxpayers of Canada, could support legislation of this nature which, on the basis of the evidence before us, is clearly flawed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments? The hon. member for Essex—Windsor.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, first I would like very much to congratulate my colleague from Saint Henri—Westmount for a good speech and for an excellent fight within the legislative committee. I have not talked about that in our discussions here in the House. There is no question that the member for Saint Henri—Westmount was extremely active in putting forward his concerns on this piece of legislation. He made it quite clear to Conservatives on the legislative committee that there were major flaws within the legislation. I congratulate him on his speech today and on the position which he has taken in the House.

I still would like to clarify exactly what this means with respect to the Liberal Party's position on third reading of this legislation. My colleague from the legislative committee talks about his position of standing up for the taxpayers in the country and therefore that he has many concerns with this piece of legislation. My friend from Essex—Kent talked about how he was in favour of the legislation on behalf of the taxpayers of this country.

I have to ask for an unequivocal answer from the member for Saint Henri—Westmount. Would he be prepared to tell this House whether he is in favour of this legislation as it now stands or against it? Will he vote for it on third reading, yes or no?

Mr. Berger: Madam Speaker, I think it should be fairly evident from my comments and even from the comments of my colleague from Essex—Kent that we have serious reservations about many aspects of this legislation. I chose to emphasize certain aspects in my speech and my colleague from Essex—Kent pointed out some of the problems that he has with the bill in his speech. I am sure that our position on third reading will be the same as his party's. I believe that there is a—

— a feeling for passing this bill on division, of course, and I suppose the opposition parties are against it. I believe our party is against the passage of this bill as it is before us now.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. Langdon: I have another question, Madam Speaker.

Madam Deputy Speaker: As it is six o'clock, I am prepared to put the question if the House was ready. Obviously, the House is not ready if the hon. member for Essex—Windsor is rising again on questions and comments. I will have to go to the adjournment motion. The hon. parliamentary secretary.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I have had conversations with the two parties on the other side as well as my own party and it was my understanding that we had come to an agreement to complete this bill this afternoon. If the hon. member just wants a minute or two to pose another question, could we agree not to see the clock? Certainly, we on this side have no problem with the member posing his question and the hon. member responding. We could then have the question put and complete our business for the day.

Mr. Langdon: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. My House leader and myself have had discussions about this. It is our understanding that there was absolutely no such agreement that this legislation would come to a vote this afternoon. We certainly did not intend to permit it to come to a vote. We think it deserves important consideration.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. member for the clarification.

PROCEEDINGS ON ADJOURNMENT MOTION

[English]

A motion to adjourn the House under Standing Order 38 deemed to have been moved.

CHILD CARE

Mr. Dave Dingwall (Cape Breton—East Richmond): Madam Speaker, on October 18, 1989, I posed a question to the Minister of Employment and Immigration. It was concerning the subject matter of child care and particularly it had to do with the conditions which child care givers find themselves in across this country.

At that time I alluded to the fact that child care workers in this country earn 30 per cent less than the average industrial wage, 50 per cent less than a teacher at the elementary school level and 30 per cent less than animal care workers on government farms.

I raised this issue in the broad context of a national child care program. For quite some time the Government of Canada has been alluding to its profound concerns for those individuals who are seeking new child care spaces as well as for those who are care givers.

In 1984 the government promised an action program with regard to child care. That promise was reiterated in throne speeches in 1985 and 1986. It was promised again during the 1988 federal campaign and shortly thereafter it was reiterated in the throne speech that followed.

At every opportunity which the Government of Canada has had to do something with regard to child care, it has elected in good faith, in good conscience, to do absolutely nothing.

I know that members opposite will stand in their places and come up with the phoney excuse that they are studying the matter. They state that they are not certain which way they should go in providing the necessary services for which Canadians from coast to coast have been asking. They talk about tax credits. But members opposite know that they are not the most effective measures to be used in creating new child care spaces.

They know that these various tax measures do not provide each and every Canadian who has children and who wishes to avail themselves of that particular tax credit that they cannot do so.

It does very little for the poor Canadian who cannot provide or does not earn sufficient income in order to take advantage of the tax provisions as indicated by the Government of Canada.

Of course the other argument that they use is this. "We can provide child care through the auspices of the Canada Assistance Plan". What a wonderful neo-Conservative way of addressing the situation.

• (1805)

A province like Newfoundland would have to come up with 50 cents on the dollar for the creation of a child care space. I suggest, with respect, that it, as well as my own province of Nova Scotia, not to mention New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and, indeed, other provinces do not have the financial wherewithal to create the necessary spaces for child care.

The argument that there are numerous opportunities under the provisions of the Canada Assistance Plan just does not hold water, in my view, nor does it give a real opportunity for us to create new child care spaces.

I know the parliamentary secretary agrees with that. I hope that when she stands in her place she will tell us in more detail to what the government at least hopes to do before the next federal election, other than make hollow promises to Canadians who are in desperate need.

I want to conclude with some remarks and observations which are key and germane to any national child care program, namely, quality child care. If we want to have high quality child care in this country, yes, one has to create spaces, that is very true. But one must also have care givers who are equipped with knowledge, know-how and skills and who are compensated accordingly for providing that child care. In my view, we do not need new buildings on a grandiose scale to provide necessary child care. But we need new spaces, new accommodations, alternate accommodations and we need people as care givers receiving good compensation.

I believe the Government of Canada has fallen down in that regard by not providing leadership and by not providing programs, whether it is under the basis of Community Futures or a whole host of programs which are available to the Government of Canada.

I hope that the parliamentary secretary will stand in her place today and provide some real and meaningful hope to those thousands of Canadians who are care givers and wish to continue to give care to young children, as well as to parents who are absolutely beside themselves at the lack of action by the government in regard to initiating any new child care programs.

[Translation]

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, the national child care strategy which had been unveiled in 1987 stemmed from a commitment to establish a genuine national child care program.

It is rather ironic in any event— When the hon. member for Cape Breton—East Richmond takes the floor to speak to this issue he gives me yet another opportunity to remind him that two major pieces of government legislation were stalled in the Senate, the first being the national child care strategy. We would not be talking about it now because the national strategy would have been implemented, but the elections did intervene and then the government was faced with a serious deficit problem.

To this day still the same Senate—friends of our distinguished colleague on the other side of the House—is sitting on an outstanding piece of legislation for women, Bill C-21 which extends maternity leave precisely to help women care for their children before sending them to day care centres.

I do not understand the hon. member. He must have been reluctant to rise because he knew full well I would refer to these two issues. Well, it does provide me with an opportunity to remind him that the government to which I am honoured to belong is proud of the achievements that have highlighted the last five years with respect to equity for women: our legislation on employment equity; our initiatives concerning family violence and child sex abuse; the famous Bill C-21 which I just mentioned and which extends maternity leave; measures to enforce maintenance and support orders; and legislation to improve women's access to training programs.

Moreover, we have put in place programs to encourage business women, we have taken initiatives to support women farmers and we have opened to women virtually all positions and occupations in the Canadian Armed Forces.

Madam Speaker, I will tell the hon. member for Cape Breton—Richmond-East that our prime minister and our governement have indicated clearly their intention to fulfill their commitments towards child care before the end of this mandate and this time, hopefully, the hon. member will tell his collegues in the other place that he will not tolerate again either that the Senate opposes such an important bill for Canadian women.

TRADE

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Madam Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to return the attention of the House to the matter I raised last October.

I pointed out at that time that trade statistics pointed to the fact that there was a great imbalance between the trade balance of the U.S. and the trade balance of Canada. The figures released that month showed that our trade surplus was in sharp decline. Our exports to the U.S. had increased by some 3.4 per cent, while our imports from the U.S. had doubled to almost 7.5 per cent.

I wish I could say that things had changed for the better since that time but, quite frankly, they have not.

There was another decline in the real merchandise trade trade balance in the fourth quarter of 1989. In fact, Canada posted a deficit of some $1.9 billion in its real merchandise balance of trade. It was the first such deficit since the end of 1956.

At the time I asked my question, the Minister of Finance responded with his usual response that our falling trade balance was caused by our increased imports of machinery and equipment from the United States. The minister's response failed to tell the whole story and failed to give adequate consideration to the concerns that Canadians voice when they see these types of figures.

Canadian imports from the U.S. are up, while our exports to the U.S. are down. In February of this year Canadian exports to the U.S fell by $12 million, while imports from the U.S. rose by some $353 million. That same month our monthly trade balance with the U.S. worsened by some $365 million. While Canada's trade balance deteriorates, the U.S. monthly trade balance has improved to its best level since 1983.

What is happening to the Canadian economy is troublesome. But what is happening to the Canadian worker is just unfair. We are posting declines in our trade surpluses and, in some cases, outright trade deficits, the likes of which have never been seen since 1982 and, in some other cases, not since 1956.

These figures have a lot more to do with the free trade agreement than the government would like to admit. There was a recent article on the free trade agreement in the U.S. News and World Report which put it like this: "On the trade front, America appears to have won the first round".

In the first round, hundreds of Canadians have lost their jobs. In the first round, Canada has become a nation of take-overs, mergers and acquisitions. In the first half of 1989 alone take-overs soared by some 31 per cent.

In the first round, hundreds of farmers have lost their jobs.

In my own riding of Haldimand—Norfolk, the local economies are really starting to feel the pinch. Tomato farmers in my riding were told in December that after 25 years of having contracts with the Campbell Soup Company, they no longer need their tomatoes. Why? They do not need them because they can go to the United States and, because of the free trade deal, get paste from the United States instead of buying local tomatoes grown in my area.

There are stories like this all across our country. Company after company is closing down and returning to the United States. U.S. parent companies are closing up Canadian shop, while Canadian companies are bringing financial booms to American cities like Buffalo, where they can find low wage rates, low taxes and much cheaper land than they can in the Niagara Peninsula.

For other companies, the threat of closing shop in Canada is enough. Workers at Borden Company Limited in Montreal have been forced to accept wage cuts and reduced benefits because the U.S. parent company had threatened to close the plant unless workers took concessions to make the plant as efficient as its U.S. plants.

• (1815)

So this is round one. Workers lose their jobs or are forced into wage cuts while their government raises taxes and cuts vital programs and reneges on election promises to bring in the world's best adjustment programs.

We are not seeing these programs. They are nowhere to be seen. Canadians are afraid to imagine what sellouts and devastation round two will bring.

Even before the subsidy negotiations have begun, the government has trimmed, cut and chainsawed its way through Canadian programs. This government is unilaterally disarming itself of programs aimed at protecting and helping Canada's unemployed, workers and farmers. The list goes on.

As I questioned the Minister for International Trade in the House yesterday and today, he gave no assurances to the steelworkers in my riding, and those of Hamilton, Sudbury and Cape Breton—indeed, the steelworkers all across this country—that he would protect their jobs when he meets Carla Hills, his American counterpart tomorrow. He gave no assurances to this House that he had any programs that could be directed toward helping our Canadian steelworkers.

Let us take a quick look at the list of programs the Canadian government identified as agricultural support programs in Schedule 2, Chapter 7 of the FTA. The list reads like an obituary column: Western Stabilization Act, payments through the Special Canadian Grains Program, expenditures of the Canadian Grain Commission, advance payments and crop insurance.

What programs have the Americans cut? That is right, Madam Speaker, they have cut no programs.

The government sold out this country during the free trade agreement. It said it would give Canada access to the U.S. market and guard Canadians from U.S. protectionism.

Now we have Peter Murphy, a former U.S. negotiator for the FTA, saying that Canadian businesses had better make their presence known in the U.S. because the FTA is no guarantee that we will not be subject to U.S. protectionism.

In closing, in October I asked the government the following question. I asked: "Will the government admit that free trade is not working for Canadians and that the FTA has cost Canadians more than they have gained?". Canadians are still waiting for that answer.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, I will say outright to the hon. member that he should rely more in the capacity of Canadians not to fall behind, since the preliminary report on foreign trade for February 1990 which Statistics Canada released on April 18, indicates that for the first two months in 1990, Canada had a surplus of over $900 million.

During the first two months of the year, Canada maintained a major trade surplus of $12.1 million with the United States while in 1989 Canada had a trade surplus with the United States of $10.4 billion.

Madam Speaker, the Free Trade Accord makes it possible for Canadian corporations to have a secure access to the most important market in the world, and Canadian corporations are responding well. They increased their investments in machinery and equipment. Their capital costs in 1989 increased by 10.7 per cent. Imports are responsible to a great extent for outlays in machinery and equipment, which explains why we could have an unfavorable trade balance over the short-term.

However, a shor-term decrease in Canada's trade balance is not a bad omen. In fact, both our productivity and competitivity are improving.

Madam Speaker, the Free Trade Accord does not rule out the possibility that the United States could apply countervailing or antidumping duties against Canadian exports. Canada is now seeking changes to the countervailing and antidumping duties within the framework of the Uruguay Round multilateral negotiations which are being held under GATT.

Finally, it would be wrong to suggest that the Free Trade Accord is not working. As a matter of fact, there is currently a leadership convention and not many of the leading candidates are talking it nowadays. The hon. member should check this, because not one of them has ever suggested he would scrap the Free Trade Accord. Trade with the United States is significant. Our industry is sound. Our automobile industry is thriving. Our available capital is stable and we have a secure access to the most important market in the world. I hope the hon. member will agree with that, Madam Speaker.

IMMIGRATION

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, on May 7 and May 8 I questioned the Minister of Employment and Immigration about the practice of the Department of Immigration administering drugs to deportees without their consent. I am happy now to have an opportunity to clear this matter up further.

On May 7 the minister implied by her answer that the practice of this government is to allow the drugging of deportees without their consent. She did not say it in so many words. My question was:

> Will the minister confirm that it is the government's policy to administer drugs without consent to make deportation easier?

She replied, in part:

> From time to time, a medical attendant is required when people are being deported. It is a practice that has to do with the safety of the person involved and the safety of other passengers.

Everybody in the House and everybody listening understood instantly that by avoiding the answer no she was conveying yes.

When I questioned her the following day she then attempted to be more evasive. To my question she answered:

> If someone who is to be deported and in the eyes of an immigration official requires medical treatment of any sort whether it is because they are diabetic or have a heart condition, they then call in a medical examiner.

In other words, she tried to suggest that it is only a matter of the deportee's health and handled of course exclusively by a doctor.

In fact she really tried to pass the blame for the decision on to the doctor or, as she said more vaguely, "medical attendants" rather than her department that has employed them.

When I questioned her again and asked her if she would put a halt to the practice of compelling deportees to be drugged, she said:

> Whatever treatment is to be administered is determined by a medical examiner, a doctor. It is not determined by myself. It is between the doctor and the person being examined.

She also ignored my request that she place before the House the guidelines which her department uses to govern its conduct in these cases.

There is no possibility of the minister and the department escaping the public understanding of the fact that deportees are being drugged with sedative or tranquillizers against their will in certain cases and contrary to both ethical and legal standards.

The Interchurch Committee for Refugees, a well-known Canadian organization, reports that the action of the immigration officials and the doctors are in direct contravention of the United Nations Principles of Medical Ethics, the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the United Nations Code of Conduct for Law Enforcement Officials, and the United Nations Standard Minimum Rules for the Treatment of Prisoners.

But a little closer to the point, Dr. Cluga of the Canadian Medical Association, its director of ethical practices, adds that not only the physician would be responsible but that "the authority who ordered a physician to undertake or even contemplate such an action would also be acting unethically. The fact that someone follows an unethical order or request does not exonerate the person who gave that order".

• (1825)

So the minister and her officials are not excused from the unethical action of a doctor in administering those drugs. There is nowhere that the air carrier security regulations provides that drugs are to be acceptable as a means of transporting prisoners or detainees. They allow restraints, but not drugs.

I have checked the Ontario Mental Health Act. It too asserts that it is illegal to give someone drugs without that person's prior consent. The only exception is if the person is mentally incompetent.

In the case that were considering of Mr. Said, he had been found mentally competent by Dr. Philip Berger who examined him and said that his response to a situation was the response of a sane man.

I am very sorry that the minister still declines to give us the guidelines that were issued and were used by her department as early as last August, as has been admitted by certain officials.

I have to conclude that the government does not wish us to know the truth about the practice of administering sedative or tranquillizer drugs to people it wishes to deport who are sane, who are not mentally incompetent, but who perhaps are difficult to deport.

Prisoners are transported in this country without the use of drugs, since to use drugs in the transportation of convicted criminals when it is necessary in public aircraft or public vehicles would be contrary to the Ontario Mental Health Act, at least as far as Ontario is concerned.

I am asking again that the minister, if she believes she is in a clear position, table those guidelines that govern the action of her officials in these connections and not hide behind excuses about maybe somebody had diabetes or maybe somebody had a heart condition.

The matter has to be cleared up and brought out into the open so that the laws of this country and the laws of the medical association of this country are honoured by the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Madam Speaker, it is important that the government's position on this issue be clearly understood.

Whenever a person is in immigration custody, immigration officials are responsible for that person's well-being. Immigration officials also have an obligation to effect removals from Canada in a manner which protects the safety of the person concerned, as well as the safety of the travelling public and any immigration or medical personnel involved.

They are very few cases, where a medical attendant must accompany a person who is being removed from Canada. The decision that a medical attendant is required, and what, if any, treatment is necessary, is made by a physician according to the laws of the province in which the case occurs.

This is not a procedure that we established recently. In fact, the use of medical escorts, although rare, has been part of the removal process for many years.

Immigration officials do not administer drugs to persons who are being removed from Caanda, nor does this government have a policy concerning the sedation of persons being removed. Such decisions can only be made by qualified medical practitioners and rightly so.

It is clear however that there are legitimate concerns about the administration of any drug during a deportation. The minister of employment and immigration (Mrs. McDougall) recognized the seriousness of these concerns.

For this reason, Madam speaker, immigration officials have been instructed that all medical removals are to be reviewed by senior officials at immigration national headquarters before the person concerned is removed from Canada.

I believe, Madam Speaker, that in the circumstances the hon. member from Trinity—Spadina will be satisfied with the answer I just gave to that important question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The motion to adjourn the House is deemed to have been adopted at this time. Accordingly, the House stands adjourned until tomorrow at 10 a.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

CANADIAN CENTRE FOR MANAGEMENT DEVELOPMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

The House proceeded to the consideration of Bill C–34, an act to establish the Canadian Centre for Management Development and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from a legislative committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING—MOTIONS IN AMENDMENT

Madam Deputy Speaker: There are six report stage motions set down in the Notice Paper in amendment to Bill C–34, an act to establish the Canadian Centre for Management Development and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof.

Motions Nos. 1 and 2, standing in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa West, will not be selected for debate. These motions were moved, debated, and, by unanimous consent, withdrawn in committee.

[Translation]

Motion No. 3 standing in the name of the Parliamentary Secretary to the Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Queen's Privy Council for Canada and Minister of Agriculture is in order. It will be debated and voted on separately.

[English]

Motion No. 4, also standing in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa West was moved, debated and, by unanimous consent, withdrawn in committee.

The hon. member is moving the same motion at the report stage, but adds the following words: "by giving effect to the principle that employment equity means more than treating persons in the same way, but also requires special measures in the accommodation of their differences".

[Translation]

The Chair has examined the new words carefully and is of the opinion that they merely qualify what is stated in the earlier part of the motion and this does not constitute sufficient ground to allow the motion to be put to the House.

[English]

I wish to bring to the hon. members' attention the note on page 41 of the Standing Orders. It relates to Standing Orders 75 and 76, which deal with report stage, and read as follows:

> The Speaker will not normally select for consideration by the House any motion previously ruled out of order in committee and will normally only select motions which were not or could not be presented in committee.

Members should be aware that this note was incorporated in the Standing Orders by order of the House. Consequently, it is with regret that I must inform the hon. member that her Motion No. 4 will not be selected.

• (1010)

Motion No. 5, standing in the name of the hon. President of the Privy Council, seeks to correct a technical error in the English version of the legislative committee's report which was tabled in the House on Friday, May 11, 1990, and is in order. It will be debated and voted on separately.

Motion No. 6, standing in the name of the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier is in order. It will be debated and voted on separately.

[English]

To recapitulate, Motion Nos. 1, 2 and 4 were dealt with in committee and will not be selected. Motion Nos. 3, 5, and 6 are acceptable and each will be debated and voted on separately.

[Translation]

I will now put motion No. 3 to the House.

[English]

MEASURE TO ENACT

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West): Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I thank you for your ruling and compliment you on your first day fully in charge of the Chair at the head of the House.

I would like to put forward an argument that Motion No. 4, dealing with employment equity, be allowed by the Speaker on the basis of the note contained in the Standing Order. I will quote from that:

> A motion, previously defeated in committee, will only be selected if the Speaker judges it to be of such exceptional significance as to warrant a further consideration at the report stage.

I would like to put forward the argument very briefly on the significance of this motion. It relates to the functions of the Canadian Centre for Management Development, its programs, operations, staffing, and those who are included in its courses and in the composition of its board. In all those functions, the consideration of equality of opportunity and employment equity should be front and centre.

If given the opportunity, I would refer the House to the submission to the legislative committee of the Human Rights Commissioner. He is responsible for safeguarding human rights for all Canadians. I am quite prepared to quote from his statement to the committee which made it extremely clear that a comprehensive inclusion in this bill was necessary to safeguard the protection of human rights and equitable opportunities in the Public Service of Canada.

If there is further need, as the Standing Order says, to demonstrate the exceptional significance of this motion, it is certainly in the task force report on barriers to women in the Public Service that was tabled in the House very recently. It made clear that employment equity is an idea that the Public Service and the government subscribe to. Still, a great deal needs to be done to change our management practices, the culture, and values on which the Public Service operates at the most senior levels, if employment equity is to become a reality rather than an ideal.

I would make the argument that employment equity is a fundamental principle and that in the training and development of the skills of our managers, it must be a central consideration that is integrated throughout.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, I too, would like to add my congratulations to those of the hon. member to you, on your first full day in the Chair. I know it will be a worthwhile experience for all concerned.

I would like to say on behalf of my colleague that we would support the submission of the hon. member that, if at all possible, this matter be reconsidered and Motion No. 4 be allowed. We believe it to be of significant importance that the House be given the opportunity to decide whether or not that organization which, after all, will be the organization that fosters the head of the Public Service—its brains and its direction—will reflect the society that that Public Service is intended to serve. We consider that to be a key principle and one eminently worthy of consideration by this House, regardless of whether or not it was dealt with in committee.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I thank the hon. for Ottawa West and the hon. member for Edmonton East.

After listening to arguments from the hon. member for Ottawa West and her colleague, I may say that this amendment can be considered of very exceptional significance and warrants further consideration at report stage. I will accept this motion.

We will start with Motion No. 3.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture) moved:

Motion No. 3

> That Bill C-34 be amended in Clause 5 in the English version by striking out line 16 at page 3 and substituting the following therefor:
> "(c) cooperate with other persons and bodies engaged in man-".

He said: Madam Speaker, this amendment as originally formulated in committee, mentioned co-operation with others. Our legislative advisers have indicated that the wording could be interpreted as limiting the scope of the co-operation rather than broadening it, which was the original intention of the amendment. They have suggested that "persons" and "bodies" would convey the intention more adequately. I would ask the House to consider that, please.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West) moved:

Motion No. 4

That Bill C-34 be amended in Clause 9 by striking out lines 28 to 30 at page 4 and substituting the following therefor:

"Chair, there are

(a) equal numbers of persons who are employed in the public service and persons who are not so employed;

(b) of the governors employed in the public service, equal numbers of persons who are managers and persons who are not managers;

(c) persons who reflect the diversity of Canadian society."

She said: Madam Speaker, let me thank you for allowing the motion on the basis of its exceptional significance.

I thank my colleagues on the committee who took the time to listen to a number of witnesses, many of whom were focusing particularly on this issue. They were invited to speak to the committee on the issue of employment equity and the important role the centre will play in the future management of the Public Service and in the advancement of some significant public policy objectives. Employment equity is one. Though only one, it certainly is one of them.

A few amendments were accepted by the committee. I am grateful for the patience and understanding of my colleagues who served on the committee, in adopting some of those amendments put forward, both by myself and my colleague the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

I want to make it quite clear that the wording in the motion, is taken exactly from the Employment Equity Act which applies to all employers federally regulated in Canada. It has applied now for a number of years so that private employers as well as Crown corporations and other federally regulated agencies must live by the principles established in this motion. It is of such significance that it is placed at the very beginning of the Employment Equity Act before even the titles or the definition in the bill.

The motion ensures that in all of its operations, the Canadian Centre for Management Development conveys to all employees at all levels the fundamental principle that the Public Service of Canada recognizes people for their merit. This applies to selection for training, what the training incorporates, and staffing and is the message to be communicated by all levels of managers who have undergone training and skill development.

We appoint, hire and promote people based on what they can do, their talents and abilities, and nothing else. Superficial consideration such as gender, colour, disability, or whether one is or is not an aboriginal Canadian, will not be a factor in the management and the progress of people who work for the Public Service of Canada.

I cannot stress how important I feel the attitudes of managers are, and this is a centre we are setting up specifically to train managers. This centre will, in the words of the legislation brought forward by the government, foster the values and traditions of the Public Service.

What has become evident through a number of things that have become public, most strikingly and most particularly the report of the task force on barriers to women in the Public Service, is that people do suffer a disadvantage because of characteristics which have absolutely nothing to do with their ability to do a job, that in fact women are not represented in the management category in proportion to their representation in the public service. They are drastically under—represented, as aboriginal Canadians are. People of colour do not have the same opportunities to be hired or promoted, and people with disabilities certainly do not.

That is not the vision we have of our nation, but the values that many of us carry with us are that only certain kinds of people are really capable and able to do certain things. It is going to take a long time to get rid of those attitudes and values. We have seen from the statistics on employment, on hiring and firing, and on promotion that in reality we are a long way from achieving those values.

The centre has a budget this year of $11.5 million to develop our managers. That is three times what the budget for executive training was just a few years ago, in fact just a year ago. It is vital that if one is talking about values and traditions, respect for the individual, regardless of their superficial characteristics, be fundamental to that training. The Commissioner for Canadian Human Rights said when he appeared before the committee that this is integral to everything the centre does.

As the task force on barriers to women also said this is a management problem because there is a large pool of people from whom to choose for various positions for promotions to management. If one only looks at a portion of that pool, generally the non-female, non-native Canadian, non-coloured and non-disabled population, one is overlooking good talent. One is failing to promote and to use the best that our quarter of a million public service employees have to offer.

The committee, in its deliberations, heard from a number of organizations. We heard from three members of the task force on barriers to women in the Public Service, the Employment Equity Network, native Canadians, the National Action Committee on the Status of Women, and the Commissioner of the Canadian Human Rights Commission.

I would like to refer to some comments of the commissioner of human rights before the committee, which he was kind enough to provide us in writing. He said if the Canadian Centre for Management Development is to be effective in promoting excellence in the Public Service, it must incorporate full recognition of all these changes—and we have been talking about human rights and the importance we give to human rights—into its operations, every bit as much as it tries to incorporate the latest management theory or economic model. Human rights principles must be an integral part of a manager's approach to problem solving, not an add-on to be trotted out for inspection on appropriate occasions.

He goes on to say that employment equity has been government policy for some years. Successive governments' commitments to the ideas of employment equity and multiculturalism has never wavered and now appears stronger than ever. At the same time, despite commitment to these ideas, progress in their implementation has been discouraging.

Further, he says that the over-all result is not satisfactory. He goes on to quote figures as to why the performance in the Public Service is not satisfactory.

How can the Canadian Centre for Management Development play a part in dealing with this situation. Again, I am quoting from the commissioner of human rights. "I submit that employment equity can be incorporated into the operation of the centre in several ways: as one of the objects of the centre in the composition of the board, in the staffing of the centre itself, in the research program and course offering for the centre and, finally, in the rules which govern access to the training offered by the CCMD."

The motion before the House today is based exactly on that statement from the Canadian human rights commissioner. It incorporates the fundamental principles of employment equity as only one of the objects of the centre as it relates specifically to all the areas mentioned by the human rights commissioner in his statement to the committee and reaffirmed in our discussions with him. He goes on to say that the centre must therefore orient managers toward an appreciation of the importance of employment equity and must reinforce the idea of service to a diverse population. I would like to close by saying that about five years ago the Government of Canada decided that employment equity was a valid thing that should be imposed by legislation on private sector employers. I think this morning is the time to recognize that in the training of our managers, the Public Service of Canada is prepared to impose the same standards on itself.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I want to compliment the member opposite for her concern about the principles inherent in the motion.

It is my understanding that in committee the motion was originally withdrawn in favour of other motions which were unanimously agreed to by committee members.

I have in my possession the minutes of the committee for May 3 where the whip of the Official Opposition said, "and I can vouch to you we will not reintroduce motions that have been withdrawn in this committee". So, alluding to the fact that we have another debate in the House, once the motion is withdrawn, it is withdrawn. I do not want to hold anybody to that statement although generally those kinds of things are held to in the House. I think the debate may have been useful, the chance to express a point of view, but government members intend to vote nay on this motion because we think it has been handled in other ways and we think there was unanimous agreement in the committee to handle it in other ways. Therefore, I would encourage government members to vote no on this motion.

Mr. Ross Harvey (Edmonton East): Madam Speaker, let me begin by congratulating you on your earlier ruling. I think it was a most auspicious beginning to your first day in the chair and I commend you for it.

To respond briefly to what the government House Leader just said: I am sorry, I was not at that committee meeting. I did not read the transcript of the committee meeting. I had no knowledge of what proceeded in the committee. However, I am delighted that, regardless of the agency, this amendment is now before this House because I think it is an important and valuable one, one certainly worthy of the attention of this House. If its coming here distresses some members who feel that that is in some fashion improper, that is indeed regrettable. I think nonetheless that it is a good thing that this amendment be here because it addresses in some senses what will lie at the heart of this Canadian Centre for Management Development.

If I may, Madam Speaker, I would like just briefly to note the nature of the clause that the amendment seeks to amend. It reads:

> Appointments under section 8—

That is the section that allows the governor to appoint people to the board of the centre.

> —shall be made so that, of the governors other than the Chair, there are equal numbers of persons who are employed in the Public Service and persons who are not so employed.

That is the sole restriction set out in clause 9, the clause of the bill that the amendment seeks to amend.

The amendment would have the effect of adding certain other criteria, those criteria being, and I am quoting from the amendment now, that there would be: "equal numbers of persons who are employed in the public sector and persons who are not so employed". That remains. Then it goes on: "of the governors employed in the Public Service", in other words of that half employed in the Public Service, "equal numbers of persons who are managers and persons who are not managers", and third and finally, and in some senses most important, "persons who reflect the diversity of Canadian society".

As the subclause now stands, it would be in no wise inconsistent with the bill to have the board of governors composed entirely of management personnel, half of them drawn from the Public Service and half of them drawn from the private sector, perhaps at the suggestion of the Business Council on National Issues. In fact, it would be utterly consistent with the bill to have a board composed entirely of middle-aged, white, male managers from the Public Service and middle-aged, white, male managers from the private sector. That would in no way conflict with the bil, except when we read in clause 4 of the bill the objects and powers of the centre.

I would like to recall a couple of those objects to the attention of the House here. They are:

> 4(b) to help ensure that managers in the Public Service have the analytical, creative, advisory, administrative and other managerial skills and knowledge necessary to develop and implement policy, respond to change, including changes in the social, cultural, racial and linguistic character of Canadian society, and manage government programs, services and personnel efficiently, effectively and equitably;

Clause 4(d) reads:

> (d) to develop within the Public Service and to attract to the Public Service, through the Centre's programs and studies, persons who are of high calibre and who reflect the diversity of Canadian society,

These are tasks with which this Parliament proposes to charge this Canadian Centre for Management Development. Yet, in the board that this bill will establish to oversee the operations of the centre, there are no substantially similar criteria.

I am not saying, Madam Speaker, that the board will be unable to meet these objects if it is not required more adequately to reflect the diversity of Canadian society, indeed to reflect the diversity of those groups that require and rely upon an efficiently functioning Canadian Public Service, well and effectively managed by well-trained, well-developed managers who are familiar with the needs, the aspirations, the desires and the capabilities of all the diverse elements of Canadian society.

It is possible that the board could still function comprising entirely white, male, middle-class managers in the Public Service and white, male, middle-class managers from the private sector. But it is my contention, and it is certainly the point of this amendment as I understand it, that the meeting of those objects will be rendered greatly the more likely if the board itself reflects to some substantial degree that diversity which the bill proposes to foster.

I must say, Madam Speaker, that I am rather distressed at the remarks of the previous speaker, the government member who appears to reject this commendable amendment solely because, in his opinion at least, it violates some previously struck procedural deal. I would counsel him and his colleagues on the government benches to set aside those questions, however reasonable they may be, however warranted his concern in that regard, and concentrate instead on the merit of the amendment itself, which I commend to the House.

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Madam Speaker, I wonder if you would be kind enough to inform the House whether we are debating the amendment now.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Yes, we are.

Mr. Domm: I would like, in that case, to point out that there was an agreement in the committee. I was acting as chairman of that legislative committee and there was an agreement in the committee that the amendments that were withdrawn in committee would not be brought forward and debated in this House.

I think the member will acknowledge that fact. I also think that the opposition House leader would want to acknowledge it since it was his statement that we would not go through this procedure twice. It was agreed that if there was unanimous consent to withdraw, and the member proposing this amendment did give her consent to that withdrawal, that amendment would not be brought forward at the report stage in this House of Commons.

I call upon the House leader of the Official Opposition to stand up and confirm that in order that we can move along to new business, new debate, which was the understanding of not only the House leader but the member who is proposing this amendment. It was pointed out at the committee that this would be a complete waste of time. It was agreed to by the Official Opposition and the government in committee that we would not do this.

I would hope that we could move along in a more orderly fashion in getting this bill out of the way. I bring you that information as chairman of that legislative committee in order that we can get on with more productive work in this House of Commons.

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. members: No.

Madam Deputy Speaker: We will proceed with Motion No. 5.

Hon. Robert de Cotret (for the President of the Privy Council) moved:

Motion No. 5

That Bill C-34 be amended in Clause 12 in the English version by striking out line 13 at page 5 and substituting the following therefor:

"duct and management of the affairs of the".

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, very briefly, this is strictly a technical point to bring back the wording as originally formulated. It was the intention of the committee to put forward an amendment to have the board of governors responsible for the conduct and management of the affairs of the centre and not the officers of the centre.

Members will note that the French version reads correctly. It was just a technical error that needed to be corrected.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier) moved:

Motion No. 6.

That Bill C-34 be amended in Clause 15 by striking out lines 8 to 27 at page 6.

He said: Madam Speaker, this amendment concerns clause 15 of Bill C-34 on the government's plan which, I may add, is supported by the opposition. We think it is an excellent idea, and we will certainly support the establishment of this centre.

My amendment is almost one of a technical nature. I will not take use the time of the House to give all the reasons why I think it is time we were consistent and logical when formulating policies on hiring public servants.

Madam Speaker, my amendment stems from the fact that I see a big difference between giving a contract to a person and hiring that person, according to the merit principle, as a public servant, in a federal institution like this one.

In my view, clause 15 creates three classes of public servants. There are those who will be hired under clause 15(1) of Bill C-34, which refers to public servants who are subject to the Public Service Employment Act. The second category is those who will be hired under clause 15(2) and 15(3) of Bill C-34, and who will enjoy the same benefits as federal public servants hired under clause 15(1), because they are subject to the same legislation, the same pension benefits, fringe benefits, insurance plans, and so forth.

Those who are hired under clause 15(2) will have a different status. They will not be subject to the same strict selection system as most public servants are. There will be no competition, no evaluation and no selection according to the merit principle. The decision will be up to the director of the Centre, and Madam Speaker, this bothers me. It means that people hired under clause 15(2) will have rights and privileges but not the responsibilities and not the usual screening that takes place when public servants are hired.

However, those hired under clause 16, which is not before the House but which nevertheless has a considerable impact on this legislation, and I am referring to those hired on contract, will not have the same benefits as public servants. A real contract does not include the same social or fringe benefits a public servant usually receives when he is hired under the Public Service Employment Act and subject to the Public Service Staff Relations Act.

I asked our top public servant, Mr. Tellier, who is responsible for the Public Service in the Privy Council, to explain the difference and why, in Bill C-34, a distinction is made between a person hired without going through the usual procedure and what is provided under clause 15(2). Mr. Tellier's explanation was that apparently the policy would allow people to work at the Centre who were reluctant to enter the Public Service as such. That is the argument he made. In other words, a professor who does not wish to become a full-time member of the Public Service of Canada could have a contract with the Centre that would give him special status, as it were, because he is then entitled to the same benefits he would have as a public servant, but without being subject to the same hiring conditions. I find this double standard somewhat difficult to accept. If someone wants to enjoy the benefits of working for an organization, he should be willing to go through the usual screening process and meet the customary hiring conditions.

I have therefore suggested that this provision be deleted.

[English]

I move that the motion delete that double standard allowing certain people to work for the centre and be in receipt of the same conditions of employment as regular public servants. I do not think that it is proper.

I make a distinction, a fine one but an important one, between a contract for services and a contract of services. The operative words here are contract for services. That is a contract given to somebody for specific services in research, possibly, or in other fields. Somebody who has the expertise and knowledge can ask an employer for a sum of money to do work, that is, the services of that person are taken and, in exchange for sums of money, a report or a study is given.

The contract of services is altogether different. A contract of services is a contract for a specific person's abilities, knowledge, and expertise, and she or he has with the employer an employee–employer relationship. I have a long–standing concern that the Public Service of Canada has a contract of services with people for their knowledge, their expertise, and they are selected according to the best way that I know, that is, on the merit principle as to whether or not they can better accomplish the functions required of them.

The contract for services is a concept completely different from the contract of services. That is the gist of my amendment. I am trying to make it understood that if there are certain processes that have to be accepted before employment, then that goes for everybody. In my book you hire public servants on merit and you give contracts for services to people who can better do that but do not want to have an employee–employer relationship and therefore will give you the benefit of their knowledge.

That is essentially the gist of subclause 15(2). I am trying to make that understood. I am not trying to do anything other than make sure that the concept of contractual obligations works that way in the Public Service. It is fine to hire yourself out for work on an employee–employer relationship, but then you accept also that you have to go through a certain screening process including selections and competitions.

On the other hand, for a contract for services it is different. I think I have made my point, and I will rest my case on that.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Hawkes: Negatived on division.

Motion negatived.

Hon. Robert de Cotret (for President of the Privy Council) moved that the bill, as amended, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. de Cotret (for President of the Privy Council) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Murray Cardiff (Parliamentary Secretary to Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to introduce Bill C–34, establishing this Canadian Centre for Management Development, at third reading stage.

The creation of the centre was announced by the Prime Minister on April 14, 1988 as an institution dedicated to excellence in teaching and research into public sector management. More specifically, the centre's mission is to strengthen the management capacity of the public sector, particularly the senior levels, with a view to improving the quality of government and to enhancing service to the people of Canada.

I consider this bill to be of great importance in today's context where a competent, highly motivated Public Service is essential to cope adequately with the growing complexity of a world–wide competitive economy and of a fast changing society in a time of limited resources. The creation of the centre is also an important part of the revitalization of the Public Service which the Prime Minister announced recently and which is being pursued in the Public Service 2000 project.

Let me briefly summarize the chronology of events that led us to the third reading of Bill C–34. Its predecessor, Bill C–148, was tabled in Parliament on August 15, 1988. It received unanimous approval in the House of Commons and was under review by the Senate Standing Committee on National Finance when it died on the Order Paper at dissolution of Parliament in the fall of 1988.

The bill now before us, Bill C–34, was introduced in the House of Commons on June 27, 1989. This bill incorporates revisions made as a result of questions raised during the Senate review on the independence and accountability of the centre and its principal. More specifically, the status of the centre has been changed from a department under the direction of a minister to a departmental corporation in which the board of governors composed of chief executive officers from the private sector, senior members of the academic community, and deputy heads of federal government departments has the responsibility for the management and conduct of the affairs of the centre. The bill also designates the principal as the chief executive officer of the centre and makes him or her accountable to the board of governors.

Upon completion of the second reading of the bill on February 16 of this year, a legislative committee was established to examine Bill C–34. Between March 6 and March 10 the committee held 11 meetings and heard 12 witnesses or groups representing the viewpoints of employment equity target groups, academics, and officials of the Public Service. In the course of this review the witnesses all expressed strong support for the concept described in the bill and confirmed the need for an organization devoted to management development in the public sector.

Witnesses also formulated recommendations to incorporate into the bill measures to have the centre explicitly recognize the social, cultural, racial and linguistic diversity of the Canadian society in its structures and programs and to highlight the responsibility of the Public Service senior managers toward the creation and maintenance of co–operative and equitable relationships with their staff members.

As a result of the clause by clause review the following amendments were incorporated in this bill. In addition to the mission already outlined in the previous version of the bill, the objects of the act, clause 4, now reflect that the centre's activities aim at helping managers in the Public Service establish a co–operative relationship with staff members and ensure that managers develop the skills to respond to changes in the social, racial, cultural and linguistic character of Canadian society and manage personnel as well as programs and services efficiently, effectively and equitably, and that the centre will attract persons of high calibre and reflective of the diversity of the Canadian society.

In order to avoid duplication of efforts and resources, clause 5 dealing with the powers of the centre specifies that the centre will co–operate with other bodies and persons engaged in management and personnel development.

Under clause 12 the mandate of the board of governors will include its responsibility for the management and conduct of the affairs of the centre.

In the context of the centre's activities, a specific mention in clause 13 now indicates that the principal shall take into consideration the policies of the Government of Canada as well as its management training needs and priorities.

A review and report clause has also been incorporated whereby every five years the board of governors shall cause a review and report to be prepared on the activities and organizations of the centre. That report will be tabled in Parliament within the first 30 days that the House is sitting.

Finally, the references to chairman and le president have been changed to chair and la presidence throughout the act, with the exception of the chairman of the Public Service Commission which will presumably by modified when the Public Service Employment Act is revised.

Madam Speaker, I firmly believe that as a result of these amendments Bill C–34 is an even better instrument to guide the Public Service in what constitutes one of its most challenging functions: the professional development of its management cadre.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, first of all, I take the opportunity to congratulate you on your appointment as Deputy Speaker of the House and Chairman of Committees of the Whole. I must say that the government chose well; it chose someone good, someone distinguished, someone who makes everyone on both sides of the House feel at ease, who has the right approach and often helps members during the debates. Please accept my congratulations.

[English]

Bill C–34 is legislation to establish a Canadian Centre for Management Development and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof.

[Translation]

This bill establishes the Canadian Centre for Management Development and amends some Acts accordingly. I must first remind the House that the originator of this idea is none other than the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier, who a few years ago thought it would be good to have a management development centre for public servants. I must congratulate the government for naming Mr. Manion the first principal of this institution. Mr. Manion has an incomparable reputation.

S. O. 31

[English]

Thank you, Madam Speaker, for giving me the opportunity to speak on Bill C–34, an act to establish a Canadian Centre for Management Development. Today, however, I would like to stress the importance of employment equity in the Public Service. Mr. Maxwell Yalden, chief Commissioner for the Canadian Human Rights Commission, appeared before the committee on April 26 and said:

> Service to the public through an impartial professional Public Service continues to be our goal. But in the changing Canadian context we need to make special efforts to achieve it.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Girve Fretz (Erie): Madam Speaker, I spoke few weeks ago to this issue, the subject of zebra mussels.

While I appreciate that the Ministry of Transport has issued new guidelines with respect to the dumping of ballast prior to ships entering the Great Lakes system, it is imperative that action be taken to control and destroy the infestation of the zebra mussels in the Great Lakes.

In 1990, it will cost Niagara regional taxpayers about $700,000 to control the zebra mussel infestation of intake pipes at the region's water treatment plants. Ontario Hydrdo expects to spend $10 million this year to protect intake pipes used for cooling at power stations. The damage that this pest can create in dollar terms is proportional to its ability to multiply. An adult female can produce more than 30,000 eggs annually. There is every likelihood that this pest will continue to spread into our inland waterways and lakes in a very short time.

Therefore, I call on the federal, provincial, and American authorities to take action very quickly on this problem.

FISHERIES

Mr. Lawrence MacAulay (Cardigan): Madam Speaker, I would like to address an issue faced in my district of Cardigan, and in Prince Edward Island in general.

Groundfish in Prince Edward Island belong to the same biomass as those fish in Newfoundland and Nova Scotia. This means that P.E.I. is also experiencing a serious stock depletion.

I would also like to express the concern of the Island groundfish fishermen that the recently announced fisheries aid package was aimed at the needs of other provinces, with little mention of in–shore fishermen in these areas or in Prince Edward Island.

I urge the government, while undertaking its consultations with the regions to determine how this package is to be spent, that it also include the groundfish fishermen of Prince Edward Island.

TOURISM

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Niagara Falls): Madam Speaker, this has been National Tourism Awareness Week. There is no more important industry to my riding of Niagara Falls than tourism. It puts millions of dollars into the economy of Niagara Falls and Niagara–on–the–Lake. That is why, this week, I was pleased to have the Minister of State for Tourism in my riding.

Among other things, he met with the members of the Niagara Falls Visitor and Convention Bureau. He discussed the topic of the GST and indicated his intention to make rebates for foreign tourists as simple and expeditious as possible. Tour operators will be able to apply for rebates on behalf of their non–resident clients, and I was especially pleased to have the minister announce that instant cash rebates will now be available through duty free shops.

These are steps in the right direction. Tourism will continue to grow in 1991 and beyond. This was confirmed by the Research Institute of the Conference Board of Canada. There will be 71,000 jobs created in 1991. By 1992–93, growth will be faster than forecast without the GST.

Let me repeat for members of the Opposition who are trying to talk the tourist industry into a recession, we are talking about growth next year and beyond—not recession—growth.

MISSING CHILDREN'S DAY

Mrs. Shirley Maheu (Saint-Laurent—Cartierville): I rise in the House today to commemorate Missing Children's Day, to be observed on Friday, May 25. It is a problem of family violence which is misunderstood and does not receive the attention it deserves. The Missing Children's Network is the best-known organization in Quebec that is working hard to reunite families with their children.

[English]

I also rise to honour the fact that the Missing Children's Network is joining with various other organizations in Paris, London and Brussels to form the first international coalition dedicated to the recovery of missing children.

I urge all members to join me in remembering those children who are often forgotten in our society, but children who are never forgotten by their families. I urge members of this House to join me also in congratulating the network, at this time, for the dedication it has shown to this just and noble cause.

ANTISEMITISM

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Madam Speaker, vandals have again desecrated Jewish graves in Canada, this time in Sainte-Foy. About twenty tombstones in the small cemetery were smeared with swastikas. As the president of this Jewish community said, "It is not only an act against Jews, it is an act against all humanity". That is true.

We who joined the Canadian army to fight the Nazis in the Second World War know that the terror against the Jews began before the war. Then it was the communists, socialists, trade unionists, Christians and finally all those whom Hitler did not like.

Whether it occurs in Germany, the Soviet Union or Canada, an attack against the Jews is an attack against us all. Canadians must show their indignation—not only those directly concerned, but all Canadians. They must say that they will not tolerate such acts, in Sainte-Foy, Montreal, Toronto or anywhere else. It must not happen again, for the good of Jews and of humanity.

ARTISTS' STATUS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, the arts community gave an enthusiastic reception to the announcement by the Minister of Communications, the hon. member for Frontenac, that a bill recognizing the special status of the artist will be tabled next fall.

The President of the Union des artists, Mr. Serge Turgeon, called the federal decision an historic one.

The legislation will recognize the right of artists to associate and to negotiate minimum working conditions. The federal government will also amend the Income Tax Act to allow for the particular working conditions of artists.

Madam Speaker, many thanks to our Minister of Communications who kept his promise and, by improving the situation of a large number of artists in Canada, is helping to promote the arts in this country.

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Madam Speaker, the Minister of the Environment has made a commitment to freeze Canada's carbon dioxide emissions at 1988 levels by the year 2000.

This is an important first step on the road to combating global climate change. There is fear that this announcement may compromise the independence of the public consultations on The Green Plan but hopefully participants will reinforce the minister's decision and suggest how to go further.

Unfortunately, the minister of energy, a key figure in the Canadian response to global climate change, has repeatedly stated that in his view even freezing carbon dioxide emissions is moving too far too fast.

Does the minister of energy now agree with the statement by the Minister of the Environment? The environment minister is, so far, alone in his conviction and his announcement does not mean much until cabinet supports him. Time is of the essence.

ANTISEMITISM

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to express before the House the indignation felt by all of us today after the desecration of the Jewish community's cemetery yesterday in Sainte-Foy, near Quebec City.

I am sure I express the general feeling in this country, Madam Speaker, when most strenuously I condemn these outrageous and inhuman acts. Those responsible have violated values that are fundamental to this country, and I am referring to respect for human rights and tolerance.

The fact that these racist acts were committed in Quebec certainly does not mean, Madam Speaker, that the Jewish community is not held in high esteem.

This is, without a doubt, an isolated incident that all Quebecers and Canadians unanimously condemn.

In concluding, Madam Speaker, I propose that all members of this House express their solidarity with the people affected by this incident as well as their sympathy with the entire Jewish community in Quebec and Canada.

HEALTH

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, a report released yesterday by the Canadian Advisory Council on the Status of Women stated that too much money is spent on expensive technological fixes for infertility, while not enough is spent on basic reproductive health promotion.

Instead of tackling the problems that cause infertility, such as sexually-transmitted diseases, the federal government has poured funds into research on new reproductive technologies. In 1988, $3.5 million went into such research, while a mere $400,000 was spent on public health and research activities related to reproductive disorders.

• (1110)

The success rate of procedures such as in vitro fertilization is very low. Moreover, such procedures carry an unacceptably high emotional and physical risk to women who undergo them. The desperation these women feel is understandable. The government's failure to address the causes of infertility is not.

The report released yesterday points out that there are relatively inexpensive and simple methods to help prevent infertility. Surely, it is in the best interests of women for the government to promote prevention rather than to submit them to experimental procedures of dubious value.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Madam Speaker, a serious drop in real estate sales has traditionally been the most reliable and the most consistent indication that this country is moving into a recession. The continuing high interest rate policy, coupled with the effects that the proposed goods and services tax is going to have on the economy, is starting to be felt in the real estate industry in our various communities.

When is the government going to realize its high interest rates and high tax policies are not working, and announce a new approach to our economy with which ordinary Canadians can live?

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Madam Speaker, let us hope that the Minister of the Environment is not being too optimistic by promising, as he did in Norway this week, to freeze carbon dioxide emissions at present levels to the end of the decade. Canadians eagerly await the details of how this commitment would be kept.

Reducing carbon dioxide emissions will not be easy. Canadians are growing more conscious of their energy consumption and of alternate forms of energy.

Earlier this week, Alberta took a large step in that direction when Energy Minister Rick Orman announced the creation of the Alberta Office of Renewable Energy Technology. This new office will play a key role in promoting province-wide support for renewable energy technologies that can protect the environment, create new industries and lead to further diversification of Alberta's economy.

Albertans applauded this move which will provide an important focus for encouraging the development and use of renewable energy sources that are safe, economic and environmentally acceptable.

REPUBLIC OF ZAIRE

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Madam Speaker, recently in my constituency constituency office, I met representatives of the Zairian community in Canada and more specifically representatives of the Union for Democracy and Social Progress.

All these people told me that the most serious opponents of President Mobutu were all systematically arrested, jailed or persecuted. They think that the most basic human rights in that country are being continually violated.

Ebua Marcel Lihau, president of the UDSP (Union for Democracy and Social Progress), who met with Canadian officials yesterday, told us that he cannot go back to Zaire unless minimum conditions for his security are assured.

I therefore call on the Canadian government to ask the Zairian authorities, especially President Mobutu, to respect their citizens' rights to freedom, since Zaire will host the next Francophone Summit.

I think that Canada should not attend this summit without assurances from the President of Zaire that he will respect the rights of Zairian citizens.

ANTI-SEMITISM

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Madam Speaker, I too want to join others and speak out against the desecration of the Jewish cemetery yesterday at St. Foy.

It is difficult for decent Canadians anywhere to understand vandalism of any kind. When it is desecration of a cemetery it is particularly revolting, and when that desecration is pointed at any particular ethnic community it strikes fear in the hearts of all Canadians.

The Jewish community has been singled out. We have to understand and believe it is not just a cemetery that has been desecrated. It is also pointed at the living community. The Jewish people have suffered enough humiliation, fear, persecution and death in their lifetime.

It is time for us to build bridges of kindness and understanding. It is time for us to realize that when this is directed at the Jewish community, it is also directed at other minority groups.

I call upon all Canadians to build bridges of understanding and caring for all people and, in this case, particularly for the Jewish community.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Madam Speaker, the Conservative government has sunk to a new low in its disregard for the Canadian democratic process. Once again the Tories are enforcing legislation which has not passed into law.

Yesterday, before the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment, and Immigration, the Minister of Employment admitted that Revenue Canada has urged employers to deduct the higher premium rate contained in Bill C-21. The higher premiums are voluntary, but the minister admitted that many workers and employers are not aware of this fact. Further, she cautioned the government would go after any premiums that are still owing since the higher rate would be retroactive to January 1, 1990.

It is interesting to note that, while the collection of premiums is retroactive, benefits such as parental leave are not. New parents who have paid these higher premiums will not be entitled to 10 weeks of parental leave if their child arrives prior to the passage of the legislation.

Canadians are tired of paying for a government which enforces legislation not passed and governs to suit its own warped agenda at the expense of the fundamental principles of democracy.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

Yesterday, after the report of the special committee on the companion resolution was made public, the media showed a favourable reaction by provincial premiers to the idea that a First Minister's Conference on the constitution would be useful at this time.

In view of this reaction, will the Prime Minister call a First Ministers' Conference on the constitution and, if so, will he tell us what its date will be?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have spoken with the premiers, yesterday and last evening, about this possibility. All of them are interested in the prospect of a First Ministers' Conference. Some are concerned about the timing, and some have concerns about some of the substance of the report. I have decided, as I have indicated, to send Senator Murray urgently to visit with all the premiers. He should be through those visits within a matter of days. As soon as that is done, I will be in touch with the premiers in respect of a first ministers' meeting.

I have always said that I would be happy to hold it if I were of the view that there was a prospect of resolving a very serious constitutional impasse. I will wait for Senator Murray's report within the next few days and make that decision.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, at least when it comes to the reports of the media, both in the press and on television, no premier has said that he is unfavourable to the idea of an early constitutional conference.

Do I take it from what the Prime Minister has said that in spite of this reaction, the public reaction at least by the provincial premiers, it is possible that the Prime Minister will not call a First Ministers' Conference before June 23? If so, does he think this is a constructive approach to this matter, in view of the fact that the special committee of the House on the companion resolution found unanimously that the date of June 23 is an important date and as the committee put it, a political reality?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Yes, indeed, Mr. Speaker, I think that all members of the House would want to congratulate members of that committee from all political parties for the very constructive work they did in bringing forward a report of this nature in quite record time. I join in congratulating all members of the committee who took part.

The committee did not recommend that a first minister's conference be held at any given time. The reason for that presumably was, given their knowledge of the country, that they thought this was a value judgment that should be made by the Prime Minister at an appropriate time, given certain circumstances, which is precisely what I propose to do.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, others who have read this report have taken a somewhat different interpretation of the conclusions of the committee. Surely, the point of the report was that the ideas in it should, could, and must be addressed by first ministers. Surely, that is the point of the report.

Madam Speaker, I want to ask the Prime Minister why he no longer thinks that calling a First Ministers' Conference as soon as possible would be the best way to get out of the constitutional impasse? Why is the Prime Minister wasting precious time when the future of our country is at stake?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, sometimes I find the comments made by the Leader of the Opposition a little confusing.

Hurriedly calling a conference of First Ministers at this time, which would hardly produce a satisfactory solution, might be the worst thing a prime minister of Canada could do.

That is why I intend to make a very careful assessment of the statements of the Premiers and the results of Senator Murray's interventions. If the Premiers are called to discuss this all— important national question, at this crucial moment in our history, the conference must succeed. That is what I want. I want a conference that will succeed. I don't want to call a First Ministers Conference for the pleasure of their company, although I am always glad to meet them.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister.

Yesterday, the Conference Board of Canada announced that the government's high interest rate policy and the inflationary impact of the goods and services tax have, and I quote, "created a major risk of recession".

Since a large portion of the inflationary increases are a direct result of government tax increases, when is the government going to stop punishing Canadian consumers, businesses, and workers for its own economic mismanagement?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I suppose that the doom and gloom that we get from the honourable gentleman is nothing new.

Mr. Milliken: Not much doom and gloom there. Simple facts.

Mr. Loiselle: I suppose he will probably be disappointed to discover today that the inflation rate, the CPI, has gone down from 5.4 per cent to 5 per cent.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Loiselle: If the hon. member looks at the Canadian performance on trade, he will also understand that there are some good sides to our economy. We recognize that the economy is slowing down. It is doing so particularly in the manufacturing sector and less so in the service sector. But there are still very high inflationary pressures which indicate that we must continue on our course and make sure we defeat inflation.

Mr. Jim Peterson (Willowdale): Madam Speaker, that is exactly the point. Our interest rates are going up at the same time as our inflation is coming down. Look at the United States.

Mr. Mulroney: That's what is supposed to happen. First inflation comes down, and then interest rates come down.

Mr. Peterson: Let us look at the facts. Inflation in the United States is 4.7 per cent, which is about the same level as in Canada. The interest rates in the United States are 40 per cent lower than ours.

Whose interest rate policies are misguided or misdirected? The Americans' or ours?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, the hon. gentleman would like to win on both sides.

High interest rates cause money to be more expensive. Therefore, people buy less, the pressures come down, and inflation comes down. This is a first indication that our policy is giving results. These signs have to be there for a period of time before we can see interest rates come down and stay down.

Surely, we would not want high interest rates to remain with us forever or reach the levels they reached when the Liberal party was in power. We want them to come down and stay down. We are working with the monetary policy and with the fiscal policy in a responsible manner to make sure that this country heads for another five years of good economic progress.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. Since the beginning of the debate on the Meech Lake Accord, there has been a problem of communication with the general public. However, when the government wants, it is quite capable of putting together an information campaign, as it did for free trade and as it is now doing for the GST.

Can the Prime Minister tell us what he intends to do to ensure that this time the public will be informed of what the companion resolution contains and will also be kept abreast of developments in the negotiations on Meech Lake and the resolution?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as for—

Some hon. members: Madam!

Mr. Mulroney: Excuse me, Madam. Congratulations on your election as Deputy Speaker.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: The House has such a high opinion of you, Madam, that you were elected while you were away, and I congratulate you.

To Madam the Leader of the New Democratic Party, I just say that the Committee made a quite laudable effort by visiting almost all regions of the country, including the Yukon and the Territories, to solicit Canadians' opinions. With the publicity surrounding the information sessions of the Charest Committee, it is harder and harder to imagine Canadians who are not aware of what Parliament or the First Ministers are trying to do. You just have to turn on the television; that is all they talk about, day and night. So I think that everyone is making a reasonable effort to inform all Canadians, but we can always do more. And if the New Democrats' Leader has specific ideas about it, I would pleased to hear them.

[English]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): I have a supplementary question, Madam Speaker.

Clearly, my question to the Prime Minister was simply that Canadians need to know what is happening in the constitutional process. Certainly, the polls have indicated that people are not aware of what Meech Lake was all about. We cannot allow that to happen again.

I am simply suggesting to the Prime Minister that he, as leader of the country, has a responsibility to ensure that the public has the information to make its own decisions and conclusions.

On another matter, I want to ask the Prime Minister this. I am assuming that at some point there will be a First Ministers' meeting. I hope that there will be, if we are to have this issue really move along.

• (1130)

Will the Prime Minister ensure that the committee's recommendations on aboriginal rights, which have been of such grave concern and which were highlighted in the report, will in fact be reflected in a companion resolution?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I cannot predict what the results of these various consultations with the First Ministers will be.

As I understand the committee's report, it contains a number of important elements. It appears to me that should the First Ministers decide to get together it will be the equivalent of a legislative menu whereby they will decide among themselves how to propose to deal with these legitimate concerns.

First, the report recommends that the conditions of the Meech Lake Accord be accepted as they are, with the companion resolution. The companion resolution appears to contain some issues of clarification, as well as some issues of substance. I think that this is what the committee sought to have us discuss when the First Ministers get together.

With respect to the very important question of aboriginal rights raised by my hon. friend, I had the privilege under the previous constitutional provisions to chair two meetings of First Ministers in respect of seeking a constitutional amendment for justice for native peoples.

It is my view that had the province of Quebec been a signatory to the Constitution, and had the province of Quebec therefore been present at those constitutional negotiations, then given its very favourable disposition to aboriginal issues we would have achieved a constitutional settlement for aboriginal peoples. We came very close to doing that. Had Quebec been there we would have achieved it.

That is why it is so indispensable not only for Quebec and the rest of the nation but for our first peoples to have this matter resolved. Only with all the provinces around the table can the native peoples achieve the justice that they so richly deserve.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Madam Speaker, I realize that the Prime Minister cannot speak for the premiers of the provinces. I am not asking him to do that.

I remind the Prime Minister that he has a special responsibility for aboriginal people. He also has a special responsibility for the northern territories, the Yukon and the Northwest Territories.

I am asking about the Prime Minister's commitment to aboriginal issues, to ensure that they are addressed in a companion resolution that may come out of a First Ministers' meeting.

I am asking for the Prime Minister's commitment that the recommendation on new provincehood for the Yukon and the Territories, in other words the pre-1982 arrangement, will be part of the companion resolution.

Will the Prime Minister invite the leaders of the government of the Northwest Territories and the premier of the Yukon to this First Ministers' Conference?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, may I say with respect that it is precisely this kind of attitude, these kinds of questions, that have given rise to some of the difficulties that the Meech Lake Accord and the process have sustained over the past number of years. We have to presume some good faith on behalf of the other.

The hon. member asks about my attitude and the attitude of my government in respect to aboriginal questions.

Ms. McLaughlin: Your commitment, not your attitude.

Mr. Mulroney: She asks for a commitment. Had she been in the House in 1984 and 1985 I think the member would have been pleased with the manner in which the federal government chaired that aboriginal conference with a view to seeking justice for aboriginal peoples.

If she needs a more recent indication of my commitment and the commitment of my government to that kind of justice, she has only to look at the land claim settlements that we have made in the Northwest Territories, which are the most important and the most generous in the history of Canada in favour of our aboriginal peoples.

SOCIAL PROGRAMS

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister in the absence of the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

Catherine Graham, editor of the Carleton University report entitled How Ottawa Spends, writes that despite the Prime Minister's commitments to the contrary, universal child benefits have effectively disappeared without public debate and that the economically disadvantaged in the country are in tough times. She states that it is a case of the have-nots continuing to do without for the sake of the haves.

Will the Prime Minister come clean with this House and admit that the Tory answer to fiscal responsibility is to target existing social programs?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, I have not had a chance to read the report to which my hon. friend refers. If she is characterizing it fairly, then it is pretty silly stuff.

The fact of the matter is that since this government was sworn in in 1984, 757,000 Canadians have been removed from the poverty rolls. That includes 229,000 women and 259,000 children.

Apart from that, the best, most important social policy statement in many cases is a job. This government has proceeded with the creation of 1.6 million new jobs in five and a half years, 85 per cent of them full-time and 60 per cent of them going to women.

Ms. Albina Guarnieri (Mississauga East): Madam Speaker, the Prime Minister does himself a disservice with that answer.

Perhaps I should remind the Prime Minister that according to Statistics Canada there are over 3.3 million Canadians living below the poverty line.

In these days of high interest rates and a declining economy, how can the Prime Minister justify his policies of ending universality of social programs and introducing unemployment insurance legislation that hits directly at the disadvantaged? What is he going to say to these 3.3 million Canadians?

Mr. Peterson: Let them eat cake.

Mr. Dick: That's the Liberal way.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Madam Speaker, after striking out, the impoverished member from Willowdale returns for a discussion on poverty.

I agree with my hon. friend, obviously, that any degree of poverty in an industrialized country is too much.

The object of the exercise of all government policy should be to remove people from the situation of poverty and to give them the opportunity to work their way into greater prosperity, which is why changes are proposed for $800 million more for training under the Unemployment Insurance Act. If my hon. friend wanted to be helpful, she could prevail upon her Liberal friends in the Senate to pass that piece of legislation as quickly as possible. That would help people get out of poverty.

I indicated that while not perfect, under this government 757,000 fewer people are in poverty than in 1984. I did not out of politeness point out that under her government 734,000 people between 1980 and 1984 fell into poverty.

TRANSPORT

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Acting Minister of Finance.

In its insatiable appetite for imposing yet new taxes, it is now reported that this government wants to impose, of all things, tolls on highways to squeeze out another $13 billion from Canadian taxpayers.

Can the minister stand in his place here and now, put and end to this and tell us that there will not be such a thing as highway tolls in Canada?

Hon. Bill McKnight (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member knows full well that the majority of the responsibility for highway financing rests in the hands of the provincial governments.

• (1140)

The hon. member should also be fully aware that just last week the federal government removed the last federal toll on the Champlain Bridge in Montreal.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. McKnight: Anyone who is suggesting that the federal government would either have the ability or the desire to impose tolls is not recognizing reality.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, I do not think the minister should be saying that about the Assistant Deputy Minister in charge of transport.

My supplementary is for the minister who answers on behalf of the Minister of Transport or the President of the Treasury Board.

Last December, in announcing these cuts, the President of the Treasury Board said that the government would disclose in the future other ways of collecting revenues and charging fees.

Will the Minister tell us now if what we are seeing today is just another way of digging into the pockets of Canadian taxpayers?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): No, Madam Speaker. I must say to my hon. colleague that, as the Minister of National Defence mentioned, we recently decided to remove the tollbooth on the Champlain Bridge.

I did not read the article that my friend from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell (Mr. Boudria) is referring to—I will do it later—but I can tell him we have no such plan.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Madam Speaker, 90 per cent of American toxic waste is imported to Canada. CBC television has informed us that the Prime Minister's ambassador to the United States has actively lobbied against an American control bill on toxic waste, essentially to loosen the standards so that we in Canada can get as much toxic waste from the United States as possible.

When we are fighting acid rain emissions coming into Canada, and we have fought somewhat successfully, how can the Prime Minister's government reject the charge that it is not the utmost in hypocrisy to be asking at the same time for as much toxic waste from the United States as we can get?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, there has been over time a flow of waste materials, including toxic waste, both ways across the Canada-U.S. border.

New regulations have virtually eliminated such movement of waste. In fact my hon. friend would know, particularly in the province of Quebec, that new regulations were put in place back in 1989, if I recall correctly.

The new standards which were imposed then to deal with the cleaning up of hazardous waste sites had a commitment of $100 million of federal money. There were three components, one being the cleaning up of orphan sites which were to be cleaned up in a co-operative effort between the provinces and the federal government.

To get to the hon. member's question, the flow of hazardous materials across the border has been virtually stopped.

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Madam Speaker, I am talking about 150,000 tonnes of toxic waste that come in to Canada annually. We are not talking about a small amount of toxic waste. We are talking about 90 per cent of toxic waste produced by the Americans.

How can we say that we wish to protect the Canadian public when at the same time the ambassador, on the Prime Minister's orders, is lobbying to weaken U.S. legislation so that we can get as much toxic waste here as possible?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, of course I question the numbers that have been cited by my hon. friend.

The arrangements that have been entered into with our friends in the United States state that there should be no movement of toxic waste across our borders.

It does not help the situation for my friend to cite numbers that he simply cannot substantiate.

Mr. Fulton: What's the real number, Frank?

Mr. Oberle: It is perhaps true that over time we will have to rely on materials from the United States for recycling in our pulp mills since with the new regulations concerning recycled paper being legislated on the print industry in the United States, it will be very difficult for our industry to gain access to enough waste materials to meet those new guidelines. Thus there will always be a flow of waste materials. But toxic materials are no longer allowed into our country.

THE SENATE

Mr. Bob Horner (Mississauga West): Madam Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Finance.

My constituents, and I think they are fairly representative of all Canadians, are fairly frustrated and angered that every bill that is passed by this democratically elected House that goes to the Senate is held up and delayed.

Will the Minister of State for Finance tell me, and by so doing inform all members of this House, what will be the consequences of the Senate's attempts to amend rather than pass the income tax changes arising from the April 1989 budget, which are contained in Bill C-28?

Hon. Gilles Loiselle (Minister of State (Finance)): Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for his very good question. It is a very, very important question.

The government's position with respect to money bills was made very clear when we discussed Bill C-21, which concerns UI reform. I believe that everyone will agree that the government was elected to manage the fiscal affairs of the country, among other things.

By blocking, as it is doing, numerous bills and government legislation the Senate is threatening to rip a huge hole in our fiscal framework.

In the case of Bill C-28 for example, the deficit will be $200 million higher in 1989-90 than it would have been if the bill had been passed expeditiously.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. minister has answered the question.

The hon. member for Gatineau—La Lièvre.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): My question is for the Minister of the Environment. Because of the fire in Saint-Amable, the whole area's underground water system could be contaminated. Will the minister of the Environment ensure that everything possible is done to prevent the toxic oil from the burning tires from contaminating the underground water in the area, taking into account the fact that the present methods used to soak up the oil are clearly insufficient?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House): Madam Speaker, I would like my hon. colleague from Gatineau—La Lièvre to know that I have been on the site since the outset of this unfortunate incident until 6:30 this morning. The federal government has cooperated fully with the Quebec government. Officials from Environment Canada were on site on Wednesday, as well as officials from Health and Welfare Canada, Agriculture Canada and the Department of National Defence. We have answered favourably to all of the requests made by the Quebec government.

Mr. Paradis tells us is keeping us informed regarding the pumping of the oil, and the hon. member will know that we are dealing with a provincial jurisdiction here. The Quebec government is therefore trying its best to contain the oil within the limits of the area where the tires are. But, if it were to ask us for further help, we would be there on behalf of the federal government.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Surely the minister will agree that the government's tire recycling research assistance program falls short of the mark. We now have proof. Will the minister set up a real program to boost research into and development of new used tire recycling technologies?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House): Madam Speaker, I should like to take this opportunity offered by the hon. member to thank the volunteer firemen who have now been working non-stop for three days at Saint-Amable.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Danis: Madam Speaker, I also noticed a rare occurrence—several firewomen battling the blaze.

An hon. member: Hear, hear.

Mr. Danis: In answer to my colleague's question, Environment Canada officials will meet with their provincial counterparts to draft a policy. Even though the matter falls within provincial purview, I suggest that in the interest of Canadians everybody should get involved, and the Minister of the Environment is doing his best to solve the problem. He has done an excellent job until now and I am sure he will maintain his performance.

• (1150)

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, my question is to the Prime Minister.

The Minister of the Environment has now made a commitment that Canada will stabilize its carbon dioxide emissions at 1988 levels by the year 2000. The Minister of Energy, however, has said that it is premature to set these levels.

Which minister speaks for the government?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, as we know, the Minister of the Environment attended a very important international conference in Bergen, Norway. He made some very important contributions to that conference in statements and commitments on behalf of Canada which establish targets with regard to the control and elimination of carbon dioxide emissions into the atmosphere.

It is the Minister of the Environment who spoke for the government at the conference. These are federal commitments.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Prime Minister since I did not get an answer to my first question.

Will the Prime Minister please tell Canadians his government's position? Is it to stabilize carbon dioxide emissions at 1988 levels by the year 2000, as stated by the Minister of the Environment, or is it to go slow, as stated by the Minister of Energy?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, certainly the initial steps will require the industry and others that emit carbon dioxide into the atmosphere to develop new systems, techniques and processes in manufacturing and other areas to arrest the growth and expansion of the emission of such gases, and then to operate and work collectively with the rest of the world to establish targets for the elimination of harmful gases.

That will include the planting of trees, the reforestation of vast areas around the planet, which are necessary to absorb harmful greenhouse gases. That cannot happen in two weeks or a month. There needs to be long-term plans and strategies of the kind that were discussed in Bergen, Norway.

TRADE

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Yet another Windsor company, Stanley Home Automation, has decided to shift its manufacturing operations to the United States. The president has announced that free trade is a factor because tariffs are being cut to zero in this product category.

This means another 68 jobs to be added to the jobs lost in Kelsey Hayes, SKD, Sheller-Globe, Bondy Cartage and Wayne Bus. Plant after plant has seen shifts to the United States.

Is the Prime Minister now prepared to suspend the operation of the free trade deal to safeguard manufacturing jobs in this country in an industry which has seen 48,000 jobs disappear in the last month?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member mentioned some closures. Of course the government is concerned about any closures, whether they involve 68 employees or whatever.

I have to remind the hon. member that an aerospace company moved from Detroit to Windsor in the last two months, creating over 100 jobs.

Last week, I enjoyed being at the opening of a joint GM-Suzuki operation where 3,000 new jobs have been created.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hockin: Since it is so close to the hon. member's riding, I would like to mention that Freightliner opened in St. Thomas with 1,200 jobs.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Hockin: When we ask about the free trade agreement, we have to ask of course what the effect is on our trade surplus. I saw in The Toronto Star this morning that the jump in the trade surplus shows that the economy is very, very perky.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, let us look at the whole picture for a change. Unlike what the minister has done, I have given a complete picture of what is taking place in my community.

Let us look at the most recent statistics released this week concerning the labour force. Just last month there was a decrease of 45,000 manufacturing jobs throughout this country.

Is his government aiming to destroy the manufacturing heart of our economy? Does it not recognize that the manufacturing base of any economy is crucial to build exports for the future? Does it not recognize that the high tech future for this country depends on that manufacturing base?

Is this government not going to do something to get back those manufacturing jobs?

Madam Deputy Speaker: I think the hon. member has put his question. The hon. minister.

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member speaks about the manufacturing base of the Canadian economy. The biggest impediment to the manufacturing base of the Canadian economy is the manufacturers' sales tax.

What we are doing is removing that tremendously unfair burden that for over 66 years the Canadian manufacturing sector has had to participate in. We are removing the manufacturers' sales tax, which is especially good news for Windsor and for Canada.

I know the hon. member is an economist. He and I have talked about the big picture, as he puts it. He will be interested to know that a mutual friend of ours, Richard Caves, a professor of economics at Harvard, said the following: "My findings suggest that the Canadian manufacturers should respond well to increased competition under the free trade agreement". He predicts a very good future for that sector.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

House of Commons

UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, my question is for the Minister of State for Finance.

Early this month Croydon Furniture Systems announced the closure of its plant in Smiths Falls, Ontario, leaving 130 people out of work as of June 29. The rise in the value of the Canadian dollar and the removal of tariffs as a result of the free trade deal have eliminated the company's traditional profit margins, and this in a riding represented in this Parliament by the Minister of Supply and Services who supported these very policies.

Does the minister not think it is time to scrap the high interest rate policy and the free trade agreement and help those Canadians who are losing their jobs?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, the hon. member speaks out of a framework of thinking which is right out of the 1950s and 1960s. He should realize that tariffs set at a high level can produce huge profits for companies when they are sheltered behind those huge tariff walls, but that in the long run those companies will disappear.

What we must do is put in place a framework through lower tariffs which will make a more competitive manufacturing sector. Removing the manufacturers' sales tax will also help.

That is the answer for the future of Canada, not hiding behind a big wall of protection.

Madam Deputy Speaker: A very short supplemental.

• (1200)

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, it may be that that kind of answer is good for some parts of Canada, but for the area of Smiths Falls and Lanark County it must be a bit of a disaster.

The president of the company said, and I quote him: "A substantial capital investment is needed to make our plants competitive in the new environment. Given the way the economic future looks in Canada, we cannot afford to make that kind of commitment".

Does the minister not realize that it is his government's disastrous policies that have created the economic mess described by this president and that have resulted in these people and hundreds of others in eastern Ontario losing their jobs?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Madam Speaker, I was in Smiths Falls just two days ago and I spoke to a number of industrial representatives. They are very bullish on the Smiths Falls economy. I do not know why the hon. member is so obsessed with one particular example.

The more general point he raises is more fundamental, and that is that the shape of the Canadian economy has been hobbled and circumscribed by a manufacturers' sales tax. By removing that we are going to unleash in the first year alone of the GST a $9 billion strong economy. That will be good for Smiths Falls and for Canada.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SPEAKER'S ACKNOWLEDGEMENTS

Madam Deputy Speaker: Now that Question Period is over, I would like to ask the House to bear with me while I make the following comments.

During the past two days, representatives of all parties have been addressing words of praise and congratulations to your humble servant. I would like to take this opportunity to thank each and everyone of my colleagues and also to express the disappointment and embarrassment I felt on Tuesday afternoon, when I realized it would be physically impossible for me to be present in the House when the Prime Minister was to move for concurrence in the motion conferring on me the honour of becoming the Deputy Speaker of this House and urging me to meet the challenges of my new responsibilities.

[English]

May I assure each and every member of the House of my complete co-operation. With the Speaker's support and with the knowledge and experience so kindly shared by the Clerk and our table officers and with your help and understanding, I hope to walk successfully in the footsteps of my friend and predecessor and fully deserve the respect and friendship that you are demonstrating today.

Some hon. members: Bravo, bravo.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have received notice of two questions of privilege. I will recognize them in the order in which I have received them. First of all the hon. member for Calgary West.

PRIVILEGE

COMMENTS OF MEMBER FOR BEAVER RIVER

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Madam Speaker, I would like first of all to make available to the Chair a press release issued by the member for Beaver River on May 17, yesterday afternoon after a discussion in this Chamber and a previous press release which was not available yesterday, dated April 5, 1990, from the same member. I would like to make those available to the Chair.

On April 5 in this Chamber, which is something I did not realize yesterday, the member for Beaver River spoke. Her comments on page 11564 of Hansard—

Mr. Riis: Madam Speaker, on a point of order—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am listening to a question of privilege now. I will recognize the hon. member for Kamloops as soon as I have heard the hon. member.

Mr. Hawkes: In those April 5 comments the member for Beaver River stated:

> We know that other members are being bribed to vote for the GST or risk losing precious lifetime pensions.

I would like to bring to the attention of the House the Criminal Code of Canada. Under Corruption and Disobedience in that code, Section 119.(1) says:

> Every one who
> (a) being the holder of a judicial office, or being a member of Parliament or of the legislature of a province, corruptly
> (i) accepts or obtains,
> (ii) agrees to accept, or
> (iii) attempts to obtain,
> any money, valuable consideration, office, place or employment for himself or another person in respect of anything done or omitted or to be done or omitted by him in his official capacity, or
> (b) gives or offers, corruptly, to a person mentioned in paragraph (a) any money, valuable consideration, office, place or employment in respect of anything done or omitted or to be done or omitted by him in his official capacity for himself or another person, > is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding fourteen years.

Madam Deputy Speaker: If I may, I have been made aware of the press release issued by the hon. member for Beaver River yesterday, and I am quite aware of why the hon. member for Calgary West is now rising in the House.

I would think at this point that it would be wise for the House to adjourn this debate and wait until the hon. member for Beaver River is present so that she can respond, as she did yesterday, to the hon. member.

I think it would be unfair and unwise to pursue the debate at this point, but of course the hon. member will have the possibility of raising it again when his colleague is present.

Is there anything else from the hon. member for Calgary West?

Mr. Hawkes: Yes, Madam Speaker. In sending the letter to the Chair this morning, I did phone also the member's office and indicated to that member's office that I would be quite happy to wait until the member was back.

I also communicated to officials at the table that I would have no difficulty in waiting. I thought that when you called the question of privilege you had decided you wanted me to proceed. I would be quite happy to wait until the member returns. I would think the member will probably be here next week.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have received another notice from an hon. member who wishes to raise a question of privilege. I will now recognize the hon. member for Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead (Mr. Gérin).

CHANGE OF PARTY AFFILIATION BY MEMBER FOR MÉGANTIC—COMPTON—STANSTEAD

Mr. François Gérin (Mégantic—Compton—Stanstead): Madam Speaker, I wish to join all members in congratulating you on your appointment as Deputy Speaker of this House.

I also wish to inform you of my intention to sit from now on as an independent member.

Despite present and past problems, the Prime Minister and the government have made some outstanding achievements. These are memories I will cherish. In fact, it was the Prime Minister who gave me a chance to serve Quebec and Canada, and I am thankful for that opportunity.

I deeply regret leaving the Quebec caucus at this time, a caucus profoundly divided and disturbed by the constitutional question. In 1984 and 1988, I was elected under the flag of the Progressive Conservative Party. I regret that I must leave, especially in these difficult times. It is not because of the problems that the polls are now starting to recognize. I do not have that kind of temperament. I also believe in the party system. I believe it is much easier to serve as a member of a political party than as an independent member. The problem is realizing when all this becomes irreconcilable. At what point is it no longer possible to keep working within a political party?

If the dissent of a member, and mine in particular, on a matter as fundamental as the constitutional question cannot be freely expressed within a party and outside, that is a situation I can no longer accept. I cannot accept being asked to remain silent on an issue that is so fundamentally important to Quebec and Canada. I have expressed my dissent in the past. In some instances, my dissent started in isolation and later managed to rally almost everyone shortly before the election, as evidenced by grass-roots financing. I could go on as usual. But not on this issue.

The constitutional question is far too important. The Meech Lake Accord was an extraordinary attempt at national reconciliation. It is not just a legal formality. It is a symbol for Quebecers who expected Canada, the other provinces, to say an unconditional yes to Quebec.

As the Prime Minister said in Sept-Îles in 1984, "With honour, dignity and enthusiasm". Today and for the past few weeks I have seen in my government and the Prime Minister quite a sharp turn in position as compared to the nationalistic stand the Prime Minister had taken in a speech he delivered in Sept-îles shortly before the 1984 election. Quebec has been negotiating the constitutional issue for over 25 years. Today, the Meech Lake accord is dead, if not technically, at least in the hearts of most Quebecers. Moroever, the Progressive Conservative Party is no longer offering Quebecers the guarantee they need to achieve their fundamental goals. The Meech Lake Accord may not be dead here in this House for those who are willing to accept it at any cost, but Quebec men and women deserve and demand more. Above all, they insist on a straightforward position.

The role of a Quebec member here in Ottawa is being challenged. Personally I am first and foremost a Quebecer and I am here to serve my fellow Quebecers. That is what I have learned. That is what I have been taught over the past six years. Today, I am told differently. I just do not think that I could speak from both sides of my mouth at the same time. As a great many Quebecers, I now believe basically, in my heart of hearts, as well as with my guts and brain, that the future of Quebec and Canada lies in the sovereignty of Quebec and a new association with its Canadian partners or the partners of other Canadian regions.

Since 1984, I have looked after a number of major issues, public financing has been one of them, since 1986. There were elements of ethics and democracy involved, as well as the openness of party and a government. I had wished that tool we could provide this decentralization and framework necessary for participation, especially this call and these overtures to our young people both in Quebec and the rest of Canada. Unfortunately, I must recognize that it did not work out, just as in the case of my concern for a deficit reduction and a balanced budget.

Yesterday I completed my basic assignment on the Special Committee on the Parliament of Canada Act. I am proud of this job which lasted for over six months and was not easy and I hope my colleagues will be able to complete it.

As to my future, Madam Speaker, I must say that my political career will be determined by my constituents. For a long time I have been telling them that I take orders from no one, except from them. They insist that I must follow the dictates of my conscience, that I must tell them the truth and act on their behalf. It is therefore with honour, dignity and enthusiasm, the very words the Prime Minister used in 1984, that I am asking to be given a new seat from which I will be able to stand up exclusively for Quebecers and a sovereignty association deal for Quebec.

Madam Speaker, long live Quebec and its people!

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): I believe, Madam Speaker, that sometimes in our political life we can not let moves like this one be made without a single comment being made, a nice one that is. I mean that the hon. gentleman making such a decision at this time came as quite a surprise. It is not for us to discuss the merit of such a decision. I nevertheless want to let him know that, as a Quebecer, I am sorry. I think that, under the circumstances, there was still room for negotiation. The hon. gentleman has engaged upon that road today. I would have preferred that he wait. In any case, as a parliamentarian and a personal friend, I had to take the first opportunity to tell him that, while respecting his decision, I regret it.

I hope time will tell that he was wrong to make such a decision, but we shall see. I believe it was appropriate for a parliamentarian to make a friendly gesture for a friend who has made a very difficult decision. It is clear for a parliamentarian as fond of the Parliament as I am that it must have been very difficult indeed.

I will now, without further comment, analyze his statement word for word. All the same, I wanted him to know that I truly regret his decision.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I want to thank the hon. member for having given us notice of his intention to raise a question of privilege.

As is the procedure, the Chair will see to finding him another seat in this House.

PETITIONS

TAX BENEFITS FOR NORTHERN AND ISOLATED AREAS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I am today tabling four petitions from Chibougamau, in the riding of Roberval, further to the recommendations of the Task Force on Tax Benefits for Northern and Isolated Areas.

Madam Speaker, the signers of three petittions of these petitions reject the conclusions of the Task Force on Tax Benefits for Northern and Isolated Areas and ask that Chibougamau be recognized as an isolated area under the present tax benefits plan.

[English]

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 and certified correct by the Clerk of Petitions. The petitioners come from Kamloops, Chase and Logan Lake, British Columbia, and are concerned that the government's goods and services tax is going to cause them considerable financial pain. They point out that a tax on home heating fuels, transportation, on virtually everything, is going to increase the amount of money that they pay in taxation and reduce their purchasing power. They are asking the Government of Canada to rethink proceeding with this tax.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I am pleased to rise today to present a petition signed by numerous residents of Kingston, Gananoque, Harrowsmith, Sydenham, Battersea, Napanee, Verona and Joyceville, Ontario among others. These persons have signed this petition to indicate their opposition to the changes the government has announced in its budget, whereby it reduces services for housekeeping purposes for veterans and increases the cost of long-term care for Canada's veterans.

The petitioners call upon Parliament to reject those measures contained in the government's unfair and nasty budget.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I suggest that all remaining questions stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall the remaining questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

[English]

Madam Deputy Speaker: On a point of order, the hon. member for Calgary West.

• (1220)

Mr. Hawkes: I understand that one of my colleagues was to present the legislative committee report on Bill C-69, but was inadvertently absent from the Chamber at the moment that item was called.

If there is unanimous consent, it might serve the House best to revert to that item to allow the presentation of the committee report.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to revert to Reports from Committees?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

CANADIAN CENTRE FOR MANAGEMENT DEVELOPMENT ACT

MEASURE TO ESTABLISH

The House resumed consideration of motion of Mr. Mazankowski that Bill C-34, an act to establish the Canadian Centre for Management Development and to amend certain acts in consequence thereof, be read the third time and passed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: When we proceeded to Statements by members, the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester had the floor.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Thank you, Madam Speaker. It is too bad that my speech was interrupted by Question Period. But I suppose that we must follow the procedure and that it probably was much more interesting to listen to Question Period.

Therefore I continue the debate on Bill C-34, an Act to establish the Canadian Centre for Management Development. The Liberal Party approves of this bill, which, as I said, concerns the Canadian Centre for Management Development that was the idea, really, of the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier. It is a centre to develop management skills and abilities, for better management in the Public Service, an institution that would develop management techniques in Public Service managers. Of course the Liberal Party agrees with establishing such a centre. As I just said, I congratulate Mr. Manion, the first principal of this institution.

I was just referring to Maxwell Yalden, the Chief Commissioner for the Canadian Human Rights Commission, who appeared before the Legislative Committee on Bill C-34.

[English]

I agree with Mr. Yalden that the Canadian Centre for Management Development should reflect a Canadian reality. Therefore, it should be flexible and open to the changes of our society. The Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms, as well as the Employment Equity Act and the Multiculturalism Act, should be present at all times in the minds of the future managers.

The Charter and the acts should be part of every single activity in which the managers participate, and should not only be used when there is a complaint.

Though human rights, employment equity and multiculturalism have been endorsed by government policy for quite some time, it seems it is only recently that these notions become more accepted and especially needed.

As Mr. Yalden pointed out:

—progress in their implementation has been discouraging.

> One need only consult the government's latest report on its own employment equity situation for the four designated groups—women, aboriginal peoples, members of visible minorities, and persons with disabilities. This report indicates that while the government's policy looks good on paper, and while some positive efforts are being made, the overall result is not satisfactory.

The Canadian Centre for Management Development should and must orient managers toward an appreciation of the importance of employment equity and train them in its daily application as part of their job. To ensure employment equity is totally respected by the Canadian Centre for Management Development so that it can effectively represent the federal Public Service and the diversity of the Canadian population who should receive the services it needs.

I believe the Liberal amendment presented in committee was absolutely necessary. This specification should have been the object of the centre. I am disappointed that the government turned down that most important amendment. Unless human rights and employment equity commitments are specifically included in this bill, I doubt they will be an integrated part of the over-all commitment of the centre.

I hope the government will respect the centre's objectives found in clause 4, especially 4(a), (b) and (d).

[Translation]

I would like to outline, Madam Speaker, the Centre's objects and powers as defined in the bill.

> 4. The objects of the Centre are
> (a) to encourage pride and excellence in the management of the Public Service and to foster among Public Service managers a sense of the purposes, values and traditions of the Public Service;
> (b) to help ensure that managers in the Public Service have the analytical, creative, advisory, administrative and other managerial skills and knowledge necessary to develop and implement policy, respond to change, including changes in the social, cultural, racial and linguistic character of Canadian society, and manage government programs, services and personnel efficiently, effectively and equitably;
> (d) to develop within the Public service and to attract to the Public Service, through the Centre's programs and studies, persons who are of high calibre and who reflect the diversity of Canadian society, and to support their growth and development as public sector managers committed to the service of Canada;

[English]

I can assure the government that the opposition feels it is its responsibility that the Canadian Centre for Management Development clearly respect its objectives. It is only in attracting qualified people to the Public Service and making the Public Service a highly respected place of work that the public and the Public Service will fully benefit from top quality service.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Madam Speaker, it is a privilege to rise to speak to Bill C-34, an act to establish the Canadian Centre for Management Development.

This centre has four specific objectives: developing the knowledge and skills of managers, developing the service ethic, originate research into practical solutions to the problems faced by public administrators, and advancing the commitment to public sector management excellence. These are worth-while objectives and, as such, we in the New Democratic Party are proud to support this bill.

At the outset I would like to say that this centre is an idea whose time has come and that, in the proper context, it can help those who run the Public Service deal with the fast pace of change in today's world. It will help them cope with fast-breaking issues and new technologies. It will serve to keep the Public Service on the cutting edge of change rather than following in its wake trying to catch up.

The Canadian Centre for Management Development is a response to a world-wide change in management practices. Today's managers must be able to question the status quo. Where once unthinking obedience to hierarchy was required of managers, today they must be able to think, to analyse and to conceptualize. Today's managers must focus on people rather than bureaucracy. These are changes that I applaud.

I worry that this centre is also a response to other less beneficial changes in our country; namely, the effects of six years of the Tory agenda.

• (1230)

Mr. Jack Manion, the principal of the centre, has often linked the centre to the government's right-wing agenda for the Public Service. In his words, that agenda is to "decentralize, deregulate, deburden and debureaucratize". This means that the centre will be geared to getting its managers to squeeze out more performance with fewer people and less money.

On a similar note, the centre is frequently connected with Public Service 2000, a shadowy effort also intended to strengthen the hand of upper management under the mantra of letting managers manage, even at the expense of collective bargaining rights.

Given the centre's $11.5 million budget, money obviously is not a problem for upper management. One-third of the permanent staff earn of average of $86,000 a year and the centre is not required to recover costs through tuition fees. That this occurs at a time of fiscal restraint illustrates one of the key problems with the Public Service. Top-level managers invariably choose to make cuts at the bottom of the totem-pole, leaving the fat at the top intact. The totem-pole is tottering. It is top-heavy with managers who have been securing their own jobs while cutting those underneath them. Those managers have been increasing their own salaries while letting salaries in general fall behind the cost of living. If the government is committed to reducing bureaucracy, it should start at the top and work down, rather than cutting the services that directly affect the lives of Canadians everywhere.

I share the concern that this centre is to some extent a reflection of that philosophy, and that it will further isolate mandarins in an ivory tower of their own, safe from the storm clouds emerging as a result of the cutbacks they are being trained to administer. Unless those workers on the front lines have a say in how the Public Service is managed, then no amount of academia will serve. It is the customs officials, the NRC scientists and CEIC receptionists who know what Canadians want and expect from the Public Service, and their voices should echo through the halls of power.

I would caution the government that our support for C-34 is not an endorsement of privatization, contracting out, and downsizing—activities that have cut close to 10,000 jobs from the Public Service in the last five years. No amount of managerial training can heal the wounds this has caused. There is widespread demoralization throughout the Public Service caused by stalled careers and staffs cut to the bone. Pretending that poor performance is a management problem rather than a budget problem is a little like not giving a sea captain a rudder, but all the training needed to go down with the ship.

The real problem is not management, but the ability of the government to hack and slash without regard to the effects on the Public Service to carry out the important roles expected of it, including the protection of health and safety of the average person. The Treasury Board, the Privy Council, and the Public Service Commission control 10 per cent of national expenditures and a workforce of a quarter of a million. Yet, no committee of the House routinely studies the cumulative social costs of all of this budget cutting.

I worry that this centre will accelerate this tendency to see costs-benefits analysis in purely economic rather than social terms. Mr. Manion, for example, has been actively soliciting the influence of corporations, putting the CEOs and chairmen of major corporations on the centre's board of governors. Will the up-and-coming managers of tomorrow be required to think of government as just another bottom-line business, rather than as the defender of those who have fallen through the cracks of our profit-oriented society? This is especially critical in that Mr. Manion envisions his centre as an influential voice in the shaping of over-all government policy and procedures.

When reports such as Beneath the Veneer reveal the extent of the obstacles faced by women in the Public Service, it is important that such an influential centre be more than just a training school for Ottawa's mandarins. We cannot allow the centre to become another old boys' network, perpetuating the same elites from the same families, from the same parts of the country. Those same people all too often end up at the top. Room must be made for those who have traditionally been frozen out of the power structure: visible minorities, women, aboriginal people, and the disabled.

Mr. Manion has said that "to give priority to access over good management could be detrimental to the fundamental objective of the centre, which is to produce quality management". I find statements such as that worrying, especially since the bill also aims to "foster among Public Service managers a sense of the purpose, values and traditions of the Public Service". We in the House are aware, I am sure, that these purposes, values and traditions are largely white and male, set in a context dominated by white men. I am sure that Mr. Manion would agree that talent knows no racial or gender boundaries and we can have fair participation of all minority groups without jeopardizing quality.

When only 12 per cent of senior management is female, 0.8 per cent aboriginal, 1.5 per cent disabled and 1.8 per cent members of visible minorities, one can only wonder how many talented people are out there whose skills could be helping to build this country, but whose talents are instead untapped because of the blindness of our prejudices.

We hope that the centre will serve to change the attitudes of the influential decision-makers it trains. This can be done by exposing what is essentially a homogeneous population to people of differing races and cultures. It will be only by working alongside the disabled, women, aboriginals, and visible minorities, that we can overcome our biases toward them. I hope the centre will make good on its promises to include target groups on its board, in its classrooms, and teaching at its podiums.

We in the NDP are happy to see that the centre has taken steps to provide this kind of access and, that it is willing to be a vehicle through which we can sensitize managers to the country's tremendous racial and cultural diversity, as well as to the sorts of unconscious prejudices we all have. Unless the people at the top understand the needs of those who have been kept at the bottom, we can never have a society in which anyone with talent and skill can make her or his mark in the world.

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre): Madam Speaker, I am very pleased to join in the debate today on third reading of Bill C-34, an act to establish the Canadian Centre for Management Development.

I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier who first raised this idea in 1974. I am sure he will share our pleasure that the government has reintroduced this bill. It is a tribute to my colleague and members on this side of the House that the government has adopted this Liberal initiative. I would like to congratulate the government on introducing this bill.

This bill is before us again because there is a very real need for a centre for management development in the country. The world today is an increasingly competitive place. Success, in a lot of ways, depends upon the ability of a nation to manage its internal and external activities and resources with efficiency and creativity.

The centre, of course, will provide that ideal forum for fostering awareness and advocating excellence within the Public Service. It can also set an example for its counterpart in the private sector to follow.

Canada's Public Service is currently facing many challenges with difficulties in areas such as downsizing. We have close to about 13,000 employees and their families who have been affected since 1985. Any hiring done today is for term positions with less security and fewer benefits for the employee.

• (1240)

Another problem is the issue of aging. The average age of public servants is increasing, with the majority in the 30 to 54 years age bracket.

Yet another problem is plateauing. There are fewer opportunities for career advancement due to cut-backs and the large number of public servants with seniority.

But more than anything else, there is a major problem within the Public Service with respect to equal opportunity. My colleague from Ottawa West has put forward some resolutions to the House on the question of equal opportunity. I was informed that these recommendations were not adopted. It is quite unfortunate they were not.

Women are still mainly at a disadvantage, especially when we talk about administrative support positions. Women make up 83 per cent of the employees at this level, but they also hold 60 per cent of the term positions within the Public Service. Women are under-represented in every other occupation within the Public Service.

Perhaps most seriously, while women represent more than 42 per cent of the Public Service workforce, they represent only 12.3 per cent at the management level.

While visible minority groups also make up almost 5 per cent of the Canadian labour force, they represent only 1.7 per cent of the Public Service.

Workers who are disabled make up 6 per cent of the national labour force, but represent only 1.9 of the Public Service.

I was informed that, to date, attempts to achieve employment equity have not been very successful. Aboriginal peoples, disabled persons, members of visible minority groups, and women are still under-represented in the Public Service.

It is little wonder that morale is a serious problem in the Public Service sector. Employees must cope with the real possibility that their jobs may not exist tomorrow, and that, even if they hang on to their job, there is very little opportunity for advancement.

These concerns can and, indeed, must be addressed by the new Canadian Centre for Management Development. The centre will provide the ideal forum for fostering awareness and advocating change within the Public Service.

When serious issues such as employment equity and efficiency need to be addressed, there is no better place to start than at the top. Obviously, a management development centre will provide a forum in which values and priorities such as equity and excellence can be promoted.

When Max Yalden, the Chairman of the Canadian Human Rights Commission, addressed the legislative committee studying this bill, he said, and I quote:

> If the Canadian Centre for Management Development is to be effective in promoting excellence in the Public Service—human rights principles must be an integral part of a manager's approach to problem solving, not an add-on to be trotted out for inspection on appropriate occasions.

I could not agree more.

This centre must help put into action the values and priorities which the Employment Equity Act and the Canadian Multiculturalism Act are built on, but which to date have failed to be put into practice.

There is another serious issue that the Centre for Management Development must address. In this time of fiscal restraint and increasing competition, the Public Service, like those in the private sector, must focus on maximum productivity and effective use of resources, both human and financial.

Government initiatives such as downsizing, combined with very real changes in the national and international arena, have resulted in a greater need than ever before for organizational and operational excellence within our Public Service.

Managers must address the serious dilemmas facing their employees. Better communication and understanding between all levels within the Public Service will enable the various departments to function more smoothly and, obviously, more effectively.

The days are long gone when this country could afford to waste human resources. Canada is well known for its natural resources, but let me suggest that it is our people which are the most valuable of all our assets.

Yet, lack of motivation and low morale can affect the efficiency and quality of work of those employed in the Public Service. The problems of restraint, and the bleak prospects for advancement could be steering good people away from the Public Service.

The Centre for Management Development is the place to start if we are going to address this very real and serious problem. The public policy demands of the future will require intelligent and creative solutions. It is up to us today to ensure that we have prepared our public service for the challenges ahead.

It is my hope that the problems currently facing the Public Service and the increasingly urgent need for efficient and productive management skills will be addressed by the creation of this Canadian Centre for Management Development.

I am certain we will all agree that Canada has an excellent Public Service, perhaps one of the finest in the world, made up of employees committed to maintaining a high level of competency and excellence in the service area. However, we cannot take our public servants for granted.

The steps we take today will determine the quality and nature of our Public Service of tomorrow. The establishment of the centre will ensure that Canada heads into the 21st century with a highly skilled and adaptable Public Service at the helm.

Madam Speaker, I would like to thank you for this opportunity to speak on this bill, and once again I would like to thank my colleagues from Ottawa—Vanier and Ottawa West for helping to make this discussion a productive one.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Before putting the question to the House I would like to make the following comment. There was a typographical error in the ruling I made earlier today on Bill C–54. The remarks made about Motion No. 4 should have been made in connection with Motion No. 2. Motion No. 2, if the House agrees, will be deemed to have been debated and negatived on division, and not Motion No. 4.

From the debate it was obvious that the hon. member for Ottawa West was addressing Motion No. 2 and not Motion No. 4. It was simply a typographical error. If the House agrees we will make the changes accordingly.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mrs. Marlene Catterall (Ottawa West) moved:

Motion No. 2

That Bill C–34 be amended in Clause 4 by adding immediately after line 5 at page 3 the following:

"(h) To foster, through its staffing, programs and research, access to its programs and through the composition of the Board, the achievement of equality in the federal workplace and in the management of the public service so that no person shall be denied employment opportunities or benefits for reasons unrelated to ability and, in fulfilment of that goal, to correct the conditions of disadvantage in employment experienced by women, aboriginal peoples, persons with disabilities and persons who are, because of their race or colour, in a visible minority in Canada by giving effect to the principle that employment equity means more than treating persons in the same way but also requires special measures and the accommodation of differences."

Motion negatived on division.

Hon. Robert de Cotret (for the President of the Privy Council) moved that the bill be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. de Cotret (for the President of the Privy Council) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the third time and passed.

INTEGRATED CIRCUIT TOPOGRAPHY ACT

MEASURE TO ENACT

Hon. Gerry Weiner (for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) moved that Bill C–57, an Act to provide for the protection of integrated circuit topographies and to amend certain Acts in consequence thereof, as reported (with amendments) from a Legislative Committee, be concurred in.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Gerry Weiner (for the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs) moved that the bill be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Blaine A. Thacker (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs): Madam Speaker, I am honoured to speak at third reading of Bill C–57.

As hon. members know, this bill gives a unique type of intellectual property protection for designers of microchip topographies. It is a reflection of the new and modern society that we live in where these microchips play an ever–increasing role in all the manufacturing equipment and tools that we use daily.

Madam Speaker, you will know that the bill was introduced on December 18, 1989. It was debated at second reading and referred to a legislative committee on March 9. The legislative committee was struck on March 14, witnesses were heard and the committee reported back to this House, with amendments, on April 11, 1990. Those amendments reflect the evidence that the committee heard, and the good work performed by the members of that committee.

There was broad public support from the Patent and Trademark Institute of Canada, the Information Technology Association of Canada as well as the Canadian Bar Association. In this country, we have some 25 Canadian firms that design these types of microchips.

I would like to extend thanks on behalf of the committee to the officials; Mr. David Watters as Director General, Johanne Daniel, the Policy Analyst and Allan Troicuk, the Senior Legal Analyst. These officials were vital to us, because most of the members do not appreciate yet the significance of this new technology. Indeed, we hardly know the vocabulary. They were most helpful to us.

I would also like to extend thanks to the legislative chairman, the distinguished member for Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold, and members of the committee, such as the hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester who had some valuable input. He caused an analysis of the bill to be made.

In short, this is good public policy for the country for the future. Parliament has acted well in a matter of four or five months. I think it speaks well for the future and how this Parliament should act on bills that are good public policy.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, first of all, I would like to point out that people in my municipality have done some research on how to pronounce the word "Gloucester"—I am not commenting on the way you said it, but it is often mispronounced, even by English-speaking people. It is not "Glou-ces-ter" nor "Glovester" but "Gloss-ter". We should perhaps practice with the words "Worcestershire Sauce". It would give us an idea of the right way to pronounce the English word "Gloucester" in both in English and French.

Madam Deputy Speaker: If I may, I fully appreciate the hon. member's comment. I will indeed indulge in some practice, but then perhaps we might try to convince our English-speaking colleagues to find a new way of pronouncing "Saint-Hyacinthe". That is not an easy one either, I can assure you!

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Your kindness is unsurpassed, Madam Speaker!

[English]

The Liberal party is pleased to support Bill C-57. The hon. member for Lethbridge made a wonderful presentation today and did an excellent job at the legislative committee level. I commend him. I found him to be very attentive and co-operative most of the time.

I have to admit that he is a good listener. Whether he reacts positively to everyone's request is another subject.

[Translation]

As far as integrated circuits go, for some time now we have been noticing that if we examine the innards of our refrigerators, our washing machines, our dishwashers, our cars and every electronic device we find, that they all have integrated circuits. We are now into the 90s and we are bound to see ever more industrial and electronic circuitry development. Most of these products come from the United States. In Canada we have about 25 firms which specialize in this field. I believe that close to $1 billion is spent on such circuits. Canadian and foreign companies involved in the design and production of integrated circuits need some kind of protection. It would be a shame if our country failed to protect designers and inventors in these various fields.

This is such a new field of endeavour that it may have been neglected over the past five years. I was told that the government has spent at least that much time getting ready to introduce this legislation. Well, now we have it, and the Liberals agree that we need this kind of measure. I sat on the legislative committee and I am aware that it raises a few problems, in the sense that we need a statute which will command respect on the part of the Americans if only because they happen to be our major trade partners. I know that five or six years ago the United States did legislate to protect the designers and owners of integrated circuits.

We all know that Europe 92 will soon be reality and that Europeans are involved in integrated circuitry development. This is true as well of such Far East countries as Japan, Taiwan, and Korea. All nations should get together on some kind of international agreement. As I understand it, the legislative committee studied a proposition for an international agreement according to which, countries would respect each others legislation concerning integrated circuits. That is necessary. Unfortunately, there is a disagreement between the Americans and the proponents of an international legislation or agreement.

Our measure seems based on the American law. I can live with that since the Americans are our main trading partners. But, while listening to the speeches in legislative committee, I could not help but ask myself questions about the American law since we often confuse the American and Canadian ways of doing things because we watch so much American television.

[English]

This is not Canadian law. Many times Canadians watching TV take for granted that this is the way law in North America is established. We know well that our laws are different in Canada. Originally they came from Great Britain.

[Translation]

And we also have the Napoleonic Code.

[English]

There are laws that are pertinent to the country; they are federal laws. There are laws that are pertinent to the provinces, and each province has a set of laws. We see this in property legislation, for example. If you want to purchase some land or a house, the laws that are applicable are those of the provinces.

• (1300)

That interests me a great deal. I did appreciate the discussions and dialogue that we had. Five or six members from the integrated circuit community explained to us what a topography of a circuit was. They gave a very interesting explanation of integrated circuit topography. They drew a cross-section of a cityscape where you could see many buildings of different sizes and different heights. If you slice it in two, as a jolly giant would, you get an idea what it would look like from the other extremity, the viewpoint of a small bug. You could see what a chip looks like from a side view.

That was really interesting and we all learned a great deal. We even all learned to pronounce the words correctly. It was quite an enjoyable and educational activity.

As a former high school teacher and school administrator, and being on this legislative committee for the very first time as a new member of Parliament, I became more and more curious about science and technology. I asked that certain witnesses appear before us. I appreciated the committee accepting a witness from the National Research Council of Canada.

We did have a presentation from the in-house lawyer-scientist from the National Research Council. At the very least, he was most provocative. He certainly made the member for Lethbridge listen very attentively on quite a few occasions, as he did all of us.

He was obviously challenged because he was not flowing in the same vein as the government side. He did not have the chance to prepare at length. The NRC did not have a chance to verify thoroughly his presentation, so his presentation was really one of an in-house lawyer-scientist house who made a personal presentation with the authority of the NRC authorities. However, they did not have time, or did not want to take the time, to verify his presentation.

I find it deplorable that the president of the NRC wrote a letter to the committee chairman stating that this gentleman was not representing the NRC's official position. He was a witness called by Parliament to give his impressions. He was not someone we picked off the street. He was someone accorded permission to come and speak to us.

On the final day of the hearings I presented a request to have another witness come in. I had my assistant call every faculty of law in Canada to find out who would be willing to give an opinion on this presentation by the person from the NRC. We found two such persons. One was David Vaver, Professor of Law from the most reputable institution, Osgoode Law School. This is his particular domain.

He wrote to me at great length. I did present the letter to the committee chairman and I gave copies to all the members of the committee. I was astounded that my request to hear this gentleman, who is a national expert in constitutional law and in this field that we are discussing today, was turned down.

This is no reflection on the member for Lethbridge who was present at all times and made terrific contributions. The staff from the Consumer and Corporate Affairs ministry made a beautiful presentation. They were very erudite and explained at length everything that they were doing. I commend them for their work. I commend them for their presentation. I commend them for the proposed law. However, I was dismayed that when I proposed that this final witness come in, all of a sudden a whole group of Conservative members came in and sat down, some of whom could not even pronounce half of the words in the text, and decided that no more witnesses would appear. I was quite displeased with this.

Therefore, knowing that I have all the time I need to make a response to the member for Lethbridge, I would like to have inserted in the record that there was a report presented to the legislative committee on this bill by Mr. Alan T. Blackwell, the intellectual property advisor of the National Research Council of Canada. He is both a lawyer and a scientist.

I would like to submit to the House the letter in response—and I believe it would be called an opinion—from Professor David Vaver of the University of York, Osgoode Hall Law School.

The ministry did deal with the opinion from Professor David Vaver and made a response that was sent through the mail to different members. Of course, in my mind, it was oriented to the government's view. My experience in municipal politics is that whenever you bring in experts, whether engineers or contractors, or experts in public accounts, accounting or law, if you bring in two of them to make a presentation, you will have contradicting views. If you bring in five of them, you could possibly have five contradicting views. The trick is to choose the one that is going to be closest to your philosophy or to the response you would like to hear.

Perhaps that is the reason why the courts are overly busy. That is perhaps the reason we see so many wealthy lawyers today and law firms with as many as 400 or 500 members. That is in Canada. I understand that in the United States there are firms with thousands of members.

I can well understand and I can appreciate the work of judges, especially since I spent the whole evening and all night, with just a couple of hours of sleep, comparing the text of the NRC lawyer with the text of the opinion of the professor from Osgoode Law School and the response from the Ministry of Justice to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

I will attempt to give an of overview of what they said because I really think this should be on the books.

• (1310)

The creators should be protected. They need to be protected, and this party is going to support this law. These people are going to be protected for 10 years. Also, this law is going to be on the books for at least five years. At the end of five years the minister will be able to call for a review, which could take another year. That is six years. It could well be another 10 years before we see any revision of this law. I find that extremely unfortunate. I find it unfortunate that after dragging its feet for five years now, all of a sudden the government wants to pass this law within hours.

I am also aware that the American government has been supporting the Canadian creators, inventors and owners of these integrated circuits for six-month periods. It has been repeating that for two or three years. Our six-month period is coming up, possibly at the end of the year, and that could have been renewed again. So the urgency of it makes me wonder why we are so much in a hurry.

I would like to quote from the reports I have read and the material I have gathered together. I would like to quote Alan T. Blackwell, the gentleman from the NRC. He begins by raising a constitutional question. He says:

> Bill C-57 attempts to deal partly with the problem of ownership in s.7, but it exceeds Parliament's constitutional power. s.7(1) says:
>
> "A topography, whether registered or unregistered, is transferable, either as to the whole interest therein or to any undivided portion thereof."
> The first problem is logical: s.7 says that the topography is transferable, but what is important is that certain rights concerning a topography be transferable. The topography is just a design, and is obviously transferable.
> The second problem is conceptual: s.7 assumes the very doubtful underlying idea that some kind of ownership of the design exists in the first place. Saying something is transferable does not say what it is, and does not necessarily prove that it exists.
> The third problem is constitutional: even if there is some kind of ownership of a design, it is probably not within the power of the federal government to legislate with respect to that ownership. The federal government cannot create common law, nor new species of property. The federal government does not have power over property and civil rights in the provinces. It has power in the area of patents and copyright, but that is because those areas are enumerated in s.91 of the Constitution Act, 1867.
> Topographies are not part of the law of patents. They could be part of the law of copyright, but that is explicitly excluded by this Bill.
> s.7 might be constitutionally acceptable if it said that the rights granted by the Act are transferable. That is different from saying that topographies, including unregistered ones, are transferable.
> s.7 might also be constitutionally justified if the topographies affected were involved in interprovincial commerce. However, as written, s.7 would apply with equal force to commerce entirely within a province. It also applies to topographies not seeking the benefit of the Bill, and to topographies not in in any way involving the federal Crown. One could argue that in the normal course of events topographies move interprovincially, but basing legislation on such a shaky argument is unwise, especially when workable alternatives exist.

Professor Vaver from Osgoode Hall states:

Mr. Blackwell raises the fundamental question of Parliament's competence to enact Bill C–57. In his view, Bill C–57 cannot rest on Parliament's power over "patents of invention and discovery", and reliance on Parliament's power to regulate trade and commerce would be unduly constrictive.

He is referring there to pages 8 and 9 of Mr. Blackwell's brief. Professor Vaver goes on to state:

I agree with Mr. Blackwell that Parliament cannot say who owns the actual chip that includes a topography, any more than it can say that I don't own the book I buy from a bookstore. This is a question of provincial law. But, if Parliament can create a copyright in a topography, it can create in respect of topography rights that can exist with or without registration. It has done precisely that in the Copyright Act, including in 1988 for computer programs.

Although Mr. Blackwell draws some inapposite conclusions from cl. 33(1), I agree with him that the drafting of the subsection can be improved. I think the major difficulty stems from the fact that the definitions of "design" differ under the Copyright Act and under Bill C–57.

I do not like Mr. Blackwell's suggestion (Brief, p.9) to change clause 33(1) to read: "Copyright shall not subsist in any topography." That indeed would undermine the copyright foundation for Bill C–57! I prefer his wording at the bottom of the page, with the underlined addition:

"This Act does not apply to topographies capable of being registered under the Integrated Circuit Topography Act, and shall be deemed never to have applied to topographies that, had the Integrated Circuit Topography Act been in force when the topography was created, would have then been capable of being so registered."

This is a little wordy, I admit. It has the advantage of using language already in the Copyright Act (as Mr. Blackwell points out). Moreover, that language has already been definitively interpreted: Bayliner Marine Corp. v. Doral Boats Ltd. (1986) 9 C.I.P.R. 311 (Fed. C.A.), followed in Interlego A.G. v. Tyco Industries Inc. (1988)—My underlined addition resolves, as Mr. Blackwell's language does not, the status of pre–Bill C–57 topographies: they never gained protection under the Copyright Act.

Mr. Vaver continues:

Mr. Blackwell says a design is "nothing more than information" (Brief, p 3). This is strictly true. It flows from the definition of topography in cl. 2(1): "design, however expressed". This suggests that a design need not be expressed in some fixed form but can be conveyed orally, although I don't think the Bill would be interpreted to mean that "expressed" includes merely "expressed in the creator's mind". A court would probably interpret "however expressed" as meaning "however expressed in some material form". Perhaps the definition could be usefully amended by including these clarifying words.

• (1320)

Mr. Vaver's fourth point is:

Mr. Blackwell finds the issue of ownership of a topography confusing—So do I (although his reading is largely coloured by his, I believe wrong, views on the constitutional issue, which lead to his view that Bill C–57 does not create a "copyright" in topography but instead depends on the civil law relating to ownership of ideas). For example, rights are granted only in respect of a registered topography and yet the Bill grants "the creator" the right to register; but nowhere is the "creator" made the "owner" of the design. (Brief, p.7)

The important point is that whoever authors the design should be able to convey the right to register it, by assignment, licence or contract. This requires careful drafting because, under comparable provisions in the Industrial Design Act, only the author of a design or someone (such as an employer) for whom the author has made the design for good consideration can register an industrial design. A design right, or a right to register a design, cannot be assigned. Only the design, once registered, can be assigned or licensed: Melnor Mfg. Ltd. Limited v Lido Industrial Products Ltd. (1970)—This situation must be avoided in Bill C–57, and clarifying the concept of ownership will help.

My diagnosis of the problem and its solution, however, differs from Mr. Blackwell's. In my view, the difficulty arises because the Bill defines "creator" in a quite inapposite manner. It confuses the person who actually makes the design with the person who owns (or should own) it. The two concepts are fundamentally separate and it is their intermingling that is the source of the whole later confusion.

I notice that the drafters of the detailed comments to Bill C–57, "Summary and Highlights" dated February 8, 1990, seem to be similarly confused on p. 18 of that document when they claim to have borrowed "the legal fiction of deemed creatorship—from the Copyright Act". The Copyright Act has no such deemed fiction at all. By s. 14(1) of that Act, the "author" is the "first owner of copyright", and by s. 14(3), a person with whom an "author" is employed is "the first owner of the copyright". In all Canadian intellectual property legislation hitherto, a clear distinction is made between the individual who does the intellectual work and the person, which may be his/her corporate employer or (in the Industrial Design Act) a commissioning entity who owns the right in the copyright, patent or industrial design. The Patent Act does not deem the employer of an inventor itself to be an inventor; nor does the Industrial Design Act deem the employer of the designer to be an author.

I think the other intellectual property statutes manifest a correct policy on this point and that Bill C–57 does not. They give the "flesh–and–blood" maker of an intellectual product at least the psychological satisfaction of being recognized as an inventor or author. In this, they also accord with customary usage and social convention. Legal ownership in the patent, design, or copyright may be in the employer; but as for recognition as the intellectual maker, to mangle an old song, "they can't take that away from me". I think it is an abuse of language to say that, if the National Research Council contracts with someone to make a topography (as Mr. Blackwell envisages on pp. 1–2 of his brief) the Council should be called the topography "creator", even though it just specified the end product in terms of result but left it to the contractor how to create that result.

The Copyright Act provides an appropriate model. The drafters of Bill C-57 claim to have, but have not, followed it. Had they followed the model, then:

—the author of a topography would be the person who created it;

—he or she would be the "creator" and first owner;

—if the author was employed or commissioned, the commissioner or employer would be first owner;

—the owner of the topography would be entitled to assign his, her or its rights in the design and a simple assignment could, by the Bill, be deemed to entitle the assignee to register the topography.

The difficulty Mr. Blackwell sees about the entitlement of a Canadian importer to register a newly created Korean topography—would then be cured by adding "or owner" to cl. 4(1)(c) after the opening words "the creator".

Something like the foregoing seems to be the U.S. model, and I cannot see why Canada would want to depart from it, in a way that is moreover contrary to Canada's own intellectual property traditions. Semiconductor companies may object to their not being called "creators", but I think that, in the context of intellectual property statutes, this is a usurpation of status. The onus should be on them to show why the fundamental basis of intellectual property law should be perverted in this way, and why the model provided by the U.S.—the "creator" of this sort of protection and the country whose nationals are likely to resort most to Bill C-57—should not be followed here. I see no difficulty that would be caused in the application to register, and I note that the Registrar is not entitled to question the information contained in an application anyway. (Bill, cl. 18(2)).

I therefore agree with the spirit of Mr. Blackwell's proposals on pages 11-13 of his brief, but not with their wordings insofar as they merely change the concept of a "creator" into a "registered creator". This is replacing one confusion with a new one.

Obviously the topic is a difficult one, and the legal aspects or the legal approach is difficult at best. It is extremely difficult to go through papers worded in legalese and to sit as a lay judge and decide who is right, who is wrong, and what exactly legislators should be doing for the Canadian companies.

We must protect Canadians. And as I was saying earlier, we have provincial laws and Canadian laws. Should our Canadian law be a mirror of what others countries do? Perhaps, if that does not contravene our laws and if that does not disturb us in our interpretations.

In conclusion, Madam Speaker, the Liberal Party supports the principle of this legislation. And today, with our vote, we will support the legislation as proposed. However, Madam Speaker, I wanted to insist on the rapidity with which the government seemed to push this legislation through the legislative committee without really listening to the Canadian experts on this matter.

I hope it is a good legislation. I hope that tomorrow, or five years down the road, we will not regret it. I hope that Canadian companies and creators, as well as owners of integrated circuits, will not have horror stories to tell and will not spend hundreds of thousands of dollars in court to defend their position on the interpretation of this legislation.

[English]

Mr. Cid Samson (Timmins—Chapleau): Madam Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to rise today to speak on Bill C-57.

First, I would like to commend the committee for its work, as it was properly described by my friend from Carleton—Gloucester. It is difficult when we are challenging witnesses and trying to arrive at a perfect answer. It is not always easy but I think in this case Bill C-57 has come out of the committee with unanimous support. Protection is long overdue for Canadian manufacturers and Canadian technology and Bill C-57 endeavours to do that. Rather than prolong the passing of this bill with a lengthy debate I would terminate at this point by simply saying that the NDP unanimously supports this bill for passage at this time.

INCOME TAX ACT

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Thursday, May 17, consideration of the motion of Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre) that Bill C-51, an Act to amend the Income Tax Act, be read the third time and passed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is the House ready for the question?

Some hon. members: Question.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. Hawkes: Madam Speaker, the House is aware that there is no Private Members' Hour slated for today. It being 1.30 in the afternoon I think we might collectively call it three o'clock and members could get on with their weekend.

An hon. member: It is three o'clock in Newfoundland.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Is there unanimous consent to call it three o'clock?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Madam Deputy Speaker: It being three o'clock p.m. the House stands adjourned until Tuesday, next, at 11 a.m., according to Standing Order 24(1).

PRIVILEGE

CHANGE OF AFFILIATION—MEMBER FOR VERDUN—ST. PAUL

Mr. Gilbert Chartrand (Verdun—St. Paul): Mr. Speaker, this morning is a very momentous and trying occasion for me, worse than a divorce.

For the past several days, Quebeckers have been awaiting a response from the member for Verdun—St. Paul and I feel I must deal in an open, honest and forthright manner with my colleagues from the Conservative Party, with my colleagues in Opposition and, above all, with the House of Commons.

Therefore, I have asked to rise on a question of privilege to read a brief statement which will reveal to all my reasons for embarking on a new course.

For more than five years, I have had the honour of representing the riding of Verdun—St. Paul as a member of this government. It has been a pleasure and a true honour for me to serve my fellow citizens. It was also a great pleasure for me to work with the Prime Minister of Canada, the Right Hon. Brian Mulroney. However, my personal principles and convictions compel me to take a stronger stand and to differ with some of the major issues of the day, notably the Meech Lake Accord.

Henceforth, I intend to participate fully in the debate surrounding this Accord since Quebec's future is involved. I cannot remain silent on this important issue since I would be unable to face my children if they approached me in several years' time and said: "Father, you were there; you said nothing, you did nothing". It is not by muzzling the members of the governing party that we will find an adequate solution to the problem.

The recently tabled Charest report proposes, in my opinion, other amendments to the Meech Lake Accord. As a Quebecker, I find these amendments unacceptable and I continue to believe and to maintain that the original Accord must be observed and upheld.

Mr. Speaker, it is clear that Quebec constitutes a distinct society and this has been the case since the early days of confederation. Moreover, I still do not understand why this committee was set up. I contend that we must uphold the agreement as it was originally drafted by the First Ministers at Meech Lake.

• (1110)

Therefore, out of respect for the party that I represent here in the House, and because I disagree with its policy prohibiting members from commenting on the current situation, I consider it my moral obligation to resign from this government, and to continue fulfillment the mandate the voters of Verdun—Saint-Paul have given me. Therefore, as of today, I will sit as an independent member.

I would also like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that I still consider the Prime Minister to be a trustworthy, honest person since he has made every possible effort to ensure that the integral nature of the Meech Lake Accord is upheld.

I want to assure my constituents from Verdun—Saint-Paul that I will continue to represent them and to serve them to the best of my knowledge and ability. The 1,200 members of our local association know that I have always favoured the Quebec option.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak the words that have been playing at the back of my mind for months now: Mr. Lévesque, you were right after all. Thank you.

Mr. Speaker: I would like to mention to the hon. members that we have heard a question of privilege which is entirely personal. Another statement would not be appropriate at this time. According to the Standing Orders, there is perhaps another place and another time for such discussions. However, now is surely not the time.

1990–91 SUPPLEMENTARY ESTIMATES (A)

REFERRAL TO STANDING COMMITTEES

L'hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board): A message from His Excellency the Governor General transmitting Supplementary Estimates (A) of the sums required for the service of Canada for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1991, and in accordance with the provisions of section 54 of the Constitution Act, 1867, was presented by Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board) and read by Mr. Speaker to the House.

Mr. de Cotret: Mr. Speaker, pursuant to the provisions of Standing Orders 81(5) and 81(6), I move:

That the Supplementary Estimates (A) for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1991, laid upon the Table earlier this day, be referred to the Several Standing Committees of the House as follows:

To the Standing Committee on Aboriginal Affairs

Indian and Northern Affairs, Item 6a.

To the Standing Committee on Agriculture

Agriculture, Items 5a and 15a

To the Standing Committee on Labour, Employment and Immigration

Employment and Immigration, Items 10a and 16a

And that a message be sent to the Senate advising the hon. senators of these motions.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the motion of the Hon. President of the Treasury Board. Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Does it please the House to adopt the said motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion is agreed to.

PETITIONS

GOVERNMENT RESPONSE

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36(8), I have the honour to table, in both official languages, the government's response to 66 petitions.

ANTI-SEMITISM

VANDALISM IN CEMETERIES

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, there have been discussions among the parties. Although I know it is irregular for a member of the Opposition to rise on motions and propose a motion, I think you would find unanimous consent for me to put this motion to the House. It deals with these rather sad events that have happened in Canada recently, in Montreal and Ottawa, dealing with Jewish cemeteries. I would like to put this motion, with the support of the government. I think the hon. House leader will support this. The House leader for the NDP, the hon. member for Kamloops, would like to second this motion, Mr. Speaker. I would like to put the motion once the consent has been given.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the proposition of the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier. The hon. member for Kamloops.

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I want to confirm that there have been consultations. This is a very important initiative and I would be honoured, on behalf of my party, to second the motion.

[Translation]

Mr. Marcel Danis (Verchères): Speaking on behalf of the government, Mr. Speaker, I would say that there has indeed been consultation and that we fully agree with the proposal made by the hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier.

[English]

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, I move:

That this House condemn and deplore acts of racism and intolerance in Canadian society that have been manifested by vandalism in cemeteries and call on all Canadians to reject such destructive and violent incidents.

Mr. Speaker: The House has heard the terms of the motion. Is there agreement?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Motion agreed to.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour to present a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36 which has been certified correct by the Clerk of Petitions from citizens of Kamloops, British Columbia. This now brings the total to nearly 20,000 people from that constituency who have signed petitions in opposition to the goods and services tax. They are asking the government to reconsider proceeding with this tax, to go back to the drawing board and to come back to the House of Commons with serious, meaningful and fair tax reform.

[Translation]

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I have the honour of submitting a series of petitions signed by people from across the country—Quebec, Manitoba, Nova Scotia—requesting that the government, and especially Parliament, defeat the goods and services tax. More particularly, Mr. Speaker, these people are asking the government to recognize that the economic survival of the country demands that the GST be cancelled, and they ask the Senate to take all possible steps to obstruct this pernicious bill.

[English]

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I also rise under Standing Order 36 to present petitions from small business operators in my constituency of New Westminster—Burnaby in British Columbia.

These small business people say that the goods and services tax forces small business operators to carry a disproportionate share of the tax burden in Canada. They call upon this government to reject the goods and services tax and, in future, to consult with business, labour and consumer groups in order to reach a broad consensus on how taxation should be handled in a fair and equitable manner for all its citizens.

TAX BENEFITS FOR NORTHERN AND ISOLATED AREAS

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, I wish to submit, in accordance with Standing Order 36, two petitions from Chibougamau, in the electoral riding of Roberval, concerning the recommendations made by the Task Force on Tax Benefits for Northern and Isolated Areas. Those who signed the petitions reject the conclusions of the Task Force on Tax Benefits for Northern and Isolated Areas and request that Chibougamau be recognized as an isolated community under the existing tax benefit scheme.

[English]

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, under the same standing order, I have a petition signed by approximately 100 people from Edmonton with respect to Mr. Yi-Shih Leo, a Canadian citizen who is imprisoned in Taiwan. They have asked that the government make every effort to have this Canadian citizen released as quickly as possible.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Mr. Speaker: Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

MOTION TO ADJOURN UNDER S. O. 52

ANTI-SEMITISM

Mr. David Kilgour (Edmonton Southeast): Mr. Speaker, I rise under Standing Order 52 with respect to an emergency debate on the subject that was a few moments ago made the subject of a unanimous all-party agreement. I am referring to the recent desecration of Jewish cemeteries and to other acts that are completely unknown, unacceptable and improper in Canadian society.

My motion was to ask for the House to have a debate, although this is a busy day, perhaps at eight or nine o'clock tonight. I am told that other members would be interested in engaging in such a debate tonight.

Under the terms of reference on such motions, Sir, the Government of Canada can do a number of things. It can use all federal resources, for example CSIS, the RCMP and External Affairs, to try to find out what seems to be at the root of this. We could set up a commission, for example, to find out whether the schools have curricula that are encouraging mutual respect.

I appreciate, Sir, that we have just passed a motion with all-party support, but I would like to put this motion on the record for your consideration.

SPEAKER'S RULING

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Edmonton Southeast has applied under the appropriate order for an emergency debate on a matter which I think creates a great deal of anguish for all members of the House and the vast majority of Canadians.

However, I think the hon. member has anticipated my ruling in this case. The hon. member for Ottawa—Vanier proposed a motion, with unanimous consent, which was seconded by the hon. member for Kamloops and supported by the government condemning these acts of desecration.

Under the circumstances, I do not think it would be appropriate to adjourn the other business of the House for a debate today. I thank the hon. member for his courtesy.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENTS OF MEMBER FOR BEAVER RIVER

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, I am rising in response to a point of privilege raised by the member for Calgary West on Friday, May 18.

I would like to make several short points in order to respond to the hon. member for Calgary West. I do appreciate that the hon. member followed proper procedure on Friday by informing my office shortly after 9 a.m. before raising the question after 12 noon. Of course, last Thursday he raised a similar question and, although he did not give the Speaker the required one-hour notice and he had to be reminded by the Speaker to put the appropriate motion, I was willing to respond immediately to the experienced member's concern.

Although my state of mind, my mens rea, I believe is the legal term, did not intend to cast aspersions on the hon. member, I saw, on reflection, how my remarks could be incorrectly interpreted so I immediately rectified the situation.

Now, some seven weeks after that original comment in the House, the hon. member says there is a question of privilege.

On page 8430 of Hansard the hon. Transport minister, then Justice Minister and government House leader, said about me:

> I guess I have to say that a lot of hours go into this job from everybody. Being a member of Parliament means that you are on top of what is going on in this House while the House is open and sitting. If you cannot be there yourself then you have party people who keep you advised of what is happening and what your responsibilities are. If you do not want to go through your party official you can always ask the Table.

Mr. Speaker, that statement was made with regard to me and I think the hon. House leader's sage remarks are read and certainly understood.

I am the only member of my party in the House and my staff and I try to keep track of everything that goes on in the House. If the hon. member cannot rely on his party officials' competence or ability to keep him informed, then it is up to him, certainly, to read Hansard himself or have his staff review it for him. If the hon. member feels overworked perhaps he ought to lighten his workload so that he is able to keep up with what is going on in the House as well.

This brings me to citation 82 in Beauchesne's Fifth Edition at page 25 which reads:

> A question of privilege must be brought to the attention of the House at the first possible opportunity. Even a gap of a few days may invalidate the claim for precedence in the House.

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that the awareness of a single member, many weeks after the original statement, does not meet the time requirement for a question of privilege in this House.

Also, I do note that there were several other members of the member's own party in the House at the time of my statement on April 5. Had they believed there to be a question of privilege it would have surely been brought up immediately at the time.

The Merriam Webster Dictionary says of the words bribe, bribed or bribery: "to corrupt or influence (one in a position of trust) by favours or gifts, something offered or given in bribe". As a teacher by profession, Mr. Speaker, I tend to rely on dictionary definitions, unlike lawyers who use the Criminal Code.

As no member rose to raise a question of privilege before now, I believe the majority of members took my words and meaning at the dictionary value and did not take it that I meant any legal definition to my words. I was using my statement to reflect an aspect of Parliament perceived by Canadians and which, I believe, is in need of reform.

As this House knows, I was elected as a member of the Reform Party of Canada. The Reform Party believes in, stands for and speaks about constitutional reform and parliamentary reform. We believe in the message of reform and in fundamental reform to Parliament, this institution, to make the elected representatives more responsive to the wishes of their constituents, and we do not believe this institution functions perfectly.

I do not believe this is contempt of Parliament but rather a necessary expression of the views of many Canadians in a democracy and a fundamental, absolute privilege granted all members of Parliament to function effectively in a democratic society. I will not be stifled or intimidated into criticizing practices which I, and many other Canadians, view as morally reprehensible.

I must stand on the meaning which I intended to deliver which was that there are presently in the parliamentary system rules, practices, customs and laws which are designed to serve the political parties for which MPs are elected and the Monarch's Governor General's Privy Council rather than serving the constituents who elected them, unfortunately.

I meant to say that if promises of rewards are used to garner support from wavering MPs, such as favours or patronage appointments and positions, while not constitutionally or statutorily illegal, certainly looked upon badly by the public. I meant to draw attention that day to the need for parliamentary reform and the need to make this House a place where constituents' views are expressed, not just party views.

I am not in contempt of Parliament, Mr. Speaker, I am only a messenger of public contempt of practices of patronage that undermine trust in our democratic institutions. It is not time to condemn me as a messenger. It is time to set up a royal commission empowered to examine all parliamentary practices.

Mr. Speaker: I hesitate to interrupt the hon. member, but I have made reference to the proceedings on Friday. The complaint raised by the hon. member for Calgary West was that the hon. member had said in this Chamber: "We know that other members are being bribed to vote for the GST or risk losing precious lifetime pensions".

• (1130)

Those are the words complained of. The hon. member has very strong views concisely expressed about other aspects of this place and politics in the country. Those are the words complained of, and it is those words I have to look at ultimately to determine this question.

I would ask the hon. member to deal with that particular statement and confine her closing remarks to it because that is the statement which, as I understand it, is complained of.

Miss Grey: Mr. Speaker, when this was originally raised on Thursday afternoon, you will recall that you made a ruling on it immediately after seeing the particular editorial. You ruled that because I had stood up and retracted my comment you considered the case closed. I immediately put out a press release retracting that, and I assumed in all good faith that the whole thing was closed.

When I was out in my riding on Friday I discovered that it had apparently come up again. I just wanted to make sure that I was on the record here to say that I believed you when you said the issue was closed. For my part it is closed, and certainly I trust for the hon. member for Calgary West the issue is closed as well.

Mr. Jim Hawkes (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, when I rose last Thursday it was on the basis of an editorial. I agree with the member that the issue at that point in terms of that editorial was closed. I subsequently discovered that the comments had been made in the House. The motivation that I had last Thursday was to rise because of what the editorial said about my personal behaviour.

On reading Hansard of April 5 and the phrase "we know that other members are being bribed to vote for the GST or risk losing precious lifetime pensions" it is obvious, I think to anyone who is a student of the Criminal Code of Canada, Section 119, that an accusation of bribery is a very serious offence.

In terms of Section 41 of the Parliament of Canada Act, a member is prohibited from receiving any compensation whether "directly or indirectly, for services rendered or to be rendered" in relation to any "matter before the Senate or the House of Commons or a committee of either House". A member who contravenes this section is liable to a fine of $500 to $2,000 and for five years after conviction of that offence is "disqualified from being a member of the House of Commons and from holding any office in the Public Service of Canada".

I rise on the question of privilege on behalf of all members because there is an opportunity in this Chamber. All a member who feels that any member of this place has behaved inappropriately, has indeed been bribed and has succumbed to that bribe has to do is rise in his or her place and name the member and ask for the matter to be referred to the Standing Committee on Privileges and Elections.

Otherwise, we are all tarred with the brush of unspecified members. If the member believes that any member of this Chamber has been bribed, he or she should simply rise and make the charge. I did that in relation to the behaviour of two of my colleagues voting twice in the Chamber some weeks ago.

An hon. member puts his own reputation on the line by naming members, but one cannot leave all members of this Chamber accused of being bribed and succumbing to the bribe. It is simply inappropriate. Mr. Speaker, if you find that there is a question of privilege, I would be happy to move the usual motion.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Beaver River made it absolutely clear that when she spoke the words she was not suggesting that any member of Parliament was in breach of the Criminal Code of Canada.

As she indicated, whenever words are spoken, quite often lawyers in this place tend to rush immediately to the law library and pull out the Criminal Code of Canada. She indicated that she was using the word "bribe " or "bribery" in the dictionary sense, not in the Criminal Code sense, and she did retract.

For the member to keep persisting in suggesting that the member was referring to the Criminal Code of Canada is irresponsible in my view. Mr. Speaker, I think you have made it absolutely clear that there is not a point of privilege. For the hon. member to press the point simply indicates to Canadians that perhaps there is a lot more to what the hon. member for Beaver River had to say.

Canadians generally agree that a lot of arm twisting goes on in this place in order for government members to fall into line. Canadians from coast to coast read about the pressure tactics that were being used in order to ensure that government members were supporting the goods and services tax.

Mr. Speaker: I thank the hon. member for York South—Weston for his intervention. I am going to look carefully at the reference that has been referred to, and I will look carefully at what the hon. member for Beaver River said not only today but several days ago.

I note in passing that the comment complained about by the hon. member for Calgary West was made on April 5, which is quite a long time ago. As hon. members know, if a point is to be made it should be raised at the earliest opportunity. I have mentioned that in passing.

I also want to make it clear that in the words complained of "we know that other members are being bribed to vote for the GST or risk losing precious lifetime pensions", I think the House should know that the Speaker is fully aware that pensions are something that go with the amount of time spent in the House and are not related in any way, shape or form to the particular party of the member, unless the allegation was suggestive of a cabinet position.

However I will look carefully at what has been said and return to the House as soon as I can.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Friday, April 27, consideration of Bill C–43, an act respecting abortion, as reported (without amendment) from a legislative committee.

SPEAKER'S RULING

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Pursuant to Order made Thursday, May 10, 1990, the House will now consider seriatim the select report stage motions as listed on today's Order Paper and Notice Paper with each member in whose name it stands speaking for up to 10 minutes immediately after his or her motion is moved.

Following those proceedings, any member may speak once for up to 10 minutes and may refer to any of the motions that have been moved.

MEASURE TO AMEND

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The first motion is Motion No. 3. Ms. Black, seconded by Mr. Riis, moves:

That Bill C–43 be amended in Clause 1 by striking out line 8 at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:

"an abortion on a female person without her consent is guilty".

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I do not want to move Motion No. 3. I originally submitted it along with Motion No. 9 and, without Motion No. 9, it really does not make any sense, so I would ask that it be stricken from the record. I will not be moving it.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I declare the motion withdrawn.

Motion No. 3 withdrawn

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell) moved:

Motion No. 4

That Bill C–43 be amended in Clause 1 by striking out line 10 at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:

"imprisonment for a term not exceeding twenty".

He said: Mr. Speaker, this is the beginning of a debate that will last for two days. It is not a partisan debate perhaps, but a debate involving members of Parliament of various stripes who are dealing with a very profound issue, an issue involving life itself.

That being said, I move this motion to change the sentencing provisions from two years to 20 years to reflect on the severity of the crime involved. What we are talking about here in this amendment is to amend the bill which right now has a term not exceeding two years—and I read from the bill—as the sentencing for contravening the new proposed Section 287 of the Criminal Code.

This bill is a bill to outlaw abortion. It has a number of exceptions included in it, but the stated purpose of the bill is the following, and I read from the first lines of Section 287: "Every person who induces an abortion on a female person is guilty of an indictable offence".

That being said, if we are talking about an individual is guilty of an indictable offence and then serves two years imprisonment for contravening that indictable offence, the message we are sending out is that this is a Criminal Code provision, but a Criminal Code provision which is not necessarily very serious.

Mr. Speaker, if you wonder why I make that charge, why I say that a two-year sentence is inappropriate for contravening the abortion law, I want to compare the sentence to other sentences applied in various situations. I will read from the Criminal Code of Canada and I will provide examples to the Chair of various other sentences and the punishment imposed in various cases.

Section 233(1) of the Criminal Code is entitled "Dangerous Operation of Motor Vehicles, Vessels, and Aircraft". That has a penalty of imprisonment for a term not exceeding five years. "Dangerous Operation Causing Bodily Harm", this has a penalty of a term not exceeding 10 years.

Often in the Criminal Code we see the expression used "punishable upon summary conviction". That means, according to my colleagues who are learned in the law, that the sentences could be as much as two years less a day; in other words, virtually the same thing as the government's proposed abortion bill.

I give an example of bills that have as a punishment a summary conviction. Section 234(1) of the Criminal Code: "Failure To Keep Watch On Person Towed". If someone is being towed behind a boat, the penalty for failing to watch that person is summary conviction; in other words, potentially two years less a day. The "Towing of Person After Dark" section reads:

> (2) Every one who operates a vessel while towing a person on any water skis, surf board, water sled or other object during the period from one hour after sunset to sunrise is guilty of an offence punishable on summary conviction.

Towing someone on water skis after dark has virtually the same penalty attached to it as contravening the abortion law, the taking of a human life.

The Law Reform Commission of Canada prepared a report entitled Crimes Against the Foetus some time ago. While I do not agree with everything in the report, I do support to a degree the comments made by Mr. Joseph Maingot, Q.C., former Law Clerk of Parliament, who said about laws generally the following:

> The law does not exist for the sole or primary purpose of punishing illicit acts. It exists, as an expression, in a broad sense, of the kind of people we are. It does not merely regulate our behaviour, it articulates and symbolizes our values and beliefs.

If that law symbolizes our values and beliefs, would it not also be true that the penalty attached to it would reflect the value we place on human life? When the penalty for committing an offence related to that law is two years, the same as towing someone on water skis by boat in the dark, then I submit we are not serious in adopting a law if we do not increase the penalty provisions that go along with it. For this law to have teeth, not only in terms of its enforcement but in terms of what it symbolizes, surely the sentencing should be 20 years, not two years. The penalty would then fit the crime of the destruction of a human life.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell) moves:

Motion No. 22

That Bill C-43 be amended in Clause 1 by striking out line 16 at page 2 and substituting the following:

"twenty years".

Mr. Speaker, I shall be very brief with regard to this amendment. As a matter of fact, this amendment is similar to the first one inasmuch as the penalty in the first motion is the same as in the second: obviously if contravening section 287 of the Criminal Code makes one liable to imprisonment for 20 years, it seems to me that the penalty for an infraction of the proposed section 288 of the Criminal Code should be the same.

Perhaps I should point out for your benefit, Mr. Speaker, and for that of all Canadians, that section 288 would punish everyone, and I quote the bill:

> — who unlawfully supplies or procures a drug or other noxious thing or an instrument or thing, knowing that it is intended to be used or employed to induce an abortion on a female person.

Section 288, Mr. Speaker, refers to what our ancestors called a pessary. Therefore, if it is wrong to induce an abortion in a mechanical manner, if you will, using a medical means in the case of section 287, and if such action is to make a person liable to a maximum sentence of 20 years, it seems to me that the same penalty should apply for providing a pessary or a drug to a woman in order to induce an abortion and therefore, obviously, to end the life of the unborn child.

This having been said, Mr. Speaker, I would ask you and all my colleagues in this House to support the two amendments I have just moved.

[English]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell) moves:

Motion No. 5:

That Bill C-43 be amended in Clause 1 by striking out lines 11 and 12 at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:

"years, unless the abortion is induced by a medical practitioner".

He said: Mr. Speaker, I wish that the procedure were somewhat different this morning because I end up making my speeches one after the other and do not have the opportunity to hear comments from my colleagues. I invite those comments. I know we will have a full debate later but, nevertheless, debates in the House are always far more productive when a large number of members participate. That being said, I do not fault the process because it is better than what could have happened in a situation whereby we could have started for instance debating the first amendment and virtually spoken of nothing else for two days. We could have eventually voted on amendments that had not been discussed in this House.

• (1150)

The process may not be perfect but it is better than the alternative could have been so I do not want to be critical of those who have proposed the form that we have before us.

Dealing with the amendment in question, regardless of what side of the abortion issue one is on, surely one would recognize that this is a serious issue. It is so serious that in those rare cases where I believe that an abortion should be available surely then it should not be performed by anyone else but a medical doctor.

This motion was seconded by my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North who we all know is a medical doctor and a professor of medicine. I think it is particularly symbolic that this professor of medicine, my colleague from Winnnipeg North, agrees with this particular motion.

I think other members should note as well that whether one agrees with me that human life begins at conception, or at some other time prior to birth, the taking of that life involves just that, the taking of human life. If there is a situation that warrants the taking of that life, which I submit is the very rare occassion when the life of the mother is at risk, and I submit that it should be very rare, then surely only a medical practitioner should perform the abortion and not, as the bill proposes, a medical practitioner or someone under the direction of a medical practitioner.

[Translation]

Abortion, Mr. Speaker, is such a serious matter that we would certainly not want anyone but a physician to carry out such a procedure.

I maintain that abortions should be nearly non-existent but, in those rare instances where an abortion is required, surely it should not be performed merely by someone under the direction of a physician but actually by the doctor himself, or herself, as the case may be.

Therefore, I trust that my colleagues, whatever their views on the issue of abortion, whether they agree with me generally or not, will in all conscience agree that abortion is such a serious matter that it should definitely not be performed by anyone but a physician.

[English]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell) moved:

Motion No. 10

That Bill C-43 be amended in Clause 1 by striking out line 14 at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:

"were not induced, the life of the".

He said: Mr. Speaker, I suppose this is the amendment of all amendments. It is the one that transforms this bill into a pro-life bill. We are two members who proposed similar amendments and I would want to state that publicly because it does not show on the record. My colleague across the way, the hon. member for Bruce—Grey, moved exactly the same amendment. I understand mine was on the Order Paper first and it was selected.

I want to indicate to the House that in fact two members representing two political parties have proposed exactly the same amendment. By far, this is the most serious amendment. If all other amendments fail, this is the one on which we should concentrate. At the conclusion of this debate, if this amendment does not pass, I do not intend to vote for the bill at third reading.

However if the amendment does pass, then I would like to wholeheartedly support the legislation.

The issue of abortion is not a new one, certainly. It is not something that we have to wrestle with as a modern society because it has never been dealt with before. It is a debate that has gone on for several millenniums. It is every bit as serious today as it ever was. I know those who disagree with me will invoke so-called "choice", as they have the right. However, I want all colleagues to remember that the choice of one should not be done at the expense of the life of another.

I was reminiscing this weekend. I was reading up on issues involving choice, freedom and liberty, and I was reminded of the United States civil war wherein the Confederates of the south were fighting the north. Young men were giving their lives for liberty, or so they claim. The liberty that they were seeking to preserve was that liberty which enabled them to subjugate someone else's liberty.

Similarly, when we invoke choice, we should remember that what we are saying is that the choice that we are allowed to make, according to those who advocate that point of view, is the choice not to bear a child even if it means the destruction of the unborn child. I cannot agree with that proposition.

As I indicated before in another speech in this House, I do not know where life begins. I think it begins at conception, but I am not sure. I do know that when a child is born there was a child at some point before birth; otherwise, a child would not have been born. It would have been something else. If a child is born, then a child was in the womb. When a pregnant woman loses her life in an automobile accident, we never hear the comment that a woman and her foetus died. It is always: "the woman and her unborn child." The point I am making is that this woman obviously wanted that child. When her life and that of her unborn child are lost, we consider it two lives lost. When someone does not want to bear a child the destruction of it is not seen as the destruction of human life.

The degree to which we want that life seems to make us, as a society, able to make a decision whether life exists or not. Life does not exist because we want it or do not want it to be a life. Life exists because it is there. If that life is there, it is there whether it is wanted or unwanted, or whether parents are wanting or unwanting. It is there regardless of that consideration.

I would submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is probably the most important amendment with which we will be dealing in this debate. Granted, it changes the bill radically, but more important, it gives an opportunity to speak positively on the value and dignity of human life.

• (1200)

Mr. Ross Belsher (Fraser Valley East) moved:

Motion No. 12

That Bill C-43 be amended in Clause 1 by striking out line 16 at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:

"seriously threatened."

He said: Mr. Speaker, as we come down to the final hours of debate on Bill C-43, and we will be debating various amendments today and tomorrow, I do not think it comes as any surprise to members on either side of the House as to where the member for Fraser Valley East stands on this issue. It is an issue that crosses all party lines. It is an issue that is a family matter, an issue that each of us in the House must take very, very seriously.

On December 17, 1986, I rose in the House to make a statement. At that time I said:

> —British Columbia still has the highest abortion rate in the country, 26 abortions for every 100 live births.

In other words, over 20 per cent of the children conceived in British Columbia are killed by abortion. That is a tragedy.

We are dealing with putting a law back on the books because the law that was on the books has been struck down. This morning I was looking through a book published by the Canadian Automobile Association in conjunction with Reader's Digest. It is entitled: You and the Law. It states in part:

> The law under which we live was molded by men who wanted a wide range of individual freedom. But they knew that there must be rules indicating where the freedom of the individual ends and the freedom of others begins. For everybody to be free to use the highway, there must be rules of the road that everybody obeys; without them, the highway becomes a graveyard. The same considerations apply with equal force in many other avenues of life. Seen in this light, law is an instrument of liberation. It is not a series of booby traps cunningly concealed. It is, in large measure, a guide through the maze of human relationships that surround us, many of them strange until we have explored them.
> You would not think of taking a journey through a strange country without a map and a guidebook. No one should expect to get through life without trouble unless he has some awareness of what the law permits and requires, and of the ways to conduct himself in the presence of the law.

What the House is endeavouring to do is to set the guidelines as to what we should have on the books with regard to abortion.

I have written to many of my constituents in terms of Bill C-43. In explaining it to them I have said that the bill attempts to address the void in the law that exists as a result of the 1988 Morgentaler decision of the Supreme Court of Canada which found the then law to be in conflict with the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. Since 1988, Canada has not had a law pertaining to abortion. This situation, I find, is intolerable. As a consequence, we have before us today Bill C-43.

In this bill the government is sending a message to our culture. It is saying to Canadian society, clearly and in no uncertain terms, that the taking of the life of an unborn is unacceptable.

This is an objective standard stipulated in the bill. It puts into place a benchmark, an established and acceptable norm. It lets Canadians, specifically the scientific and the the medical communities within Canada, know that this is the standard to which they must adhere.

To ensure that this bill addresses the issue in a realistic and workable manner the bill amends the Criminal Code. This ensures federal jurisdiction throughout all of Canada. The bill incorporates criminal sanctions in the case of violations of Criminal Code provisions.

Finally, the bill protects the life of the unborn from the moment of conception on.

What is often viewed as a major flaw in this bill is the health provision for exceptions to the Criminal Code provision. It is to this end that I am proposing the amendment that stands in my name, to achieve a stricter wording for the health provision.

Bill C-43 places the making of this medical decision in the hands of a woman and her physician. Without the doctor's recommendation an abortion cannot, by law, take place. Medical doctors are the only ones who can actually make the decision. They are the only ones capable of determining whether an exception to this law is valid and necessary.

A few weeks ago a publication was sent to all members of the House by the Citizens for Public Justice. The title of that publication was A Plea for Life and Justice for All. It was dated April 5.

On page 13, it asks the question: "What do doctors really think the abortion law should say?" The answer is taken from an August, 1989 survey done by the Canadian Physicians for Life which sponsored a survey of over 50,000 physicians in Canada. The survey group included all the 43,000 members of the CMA. The response rate of over 20 per cent, or 10,000, is quite large for a single mail-out survey to doctors, especially in the middle of the summer. The number of responses is over six times larger than that from the most recent 1982 CMA survey.

Some of the key responses were:

> 2/3 of physicians support some form of legal restraint on abortion.
> 2/3 of physicians find the broad definition of health as an indication for abortion unacceptable.
> 2/3 of physicians see the CMA policy as representing abortion on request, yet only a minority share this position on abortion.

We know that with the tremendous number of abortions—and I have cited what they are in British Columbia—we certainly do need something on our books with regard to abortion. It is not my proposal to deal with this in isolation from other members of the House.

When I was growing up, we heard medical reports concerning people who were in hospital. The major hospitals were not near my home. I lived in a very small community where there was no hospital. The reports would always state that "so and so was on the critical list", "so and so was deemed serious", or "so and so was doing well" and so on. You could get a sense of what was happening.

That is what I am trying to do here. I am trying to send a signal to the medical community for when it deals with the life or the health of a person being threatened and whether the word "seriously" is used in its terminology.

I also want to say that the next motion that will be before us is presented by the member for Kitchener. It states in part:

> —the medical practitioner has concluded that there is no other medically acceptable treatment to alleviate the health risk.

When it comes to the definition of health and the use of the words "physical, mental, and psychological", I am pleased that the amendment of the member for Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffille would delete the word "psychological". It states that the definition of "health" includes, for greater certainty, "physical and mental health".

I suggest to all members of the House when looking at these amendments these three be taken as a package. There are other amendments which each of us will have to consider seriously as to whether or not we should support them and whether the House can support them as a whole.

I would like to quote from another paragraph that was in the report of the Citizens for Public Justice. On page 14, it states:

> We live in a broken world. All of us suffer, in one way or another, from distortions and injustices due to our failure to do justice, show mercy and walk humbly with God. But all of us still have both the opportunity and the responsibility to be of healing service in our wounded world.

CPJ seeks to do justice to the Supreme Court's conclusion that the right to life of the human foetus may be protected by Parliament. We want also to ensure that alternatives to abortion are available. Women have a right to full information about the alternatives available to them in dealing with pregnancy.

I cannot put it more succinctly than that.

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener) moved:

Motion No. 13

That Bill C-43 be amended in Clause 1 by striking out line 16 at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:

"threatened and the medical practitioner has concluded that there is no other medically acceptable treatment to alleviate the health risk."

He said: Mr. Speaker, before beginning my comments with regard to this motion, I would like to commend the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell on his comments in regard to the amendment that he put forward, Motion No. 10. I would like to say to him I strongly endorse and agree with his amendment. I will be supporting it when we come to it.

I would like to begin my remarks on my amendment by saying that my amendment should not be taken in isolation from two other amendments put forward by my colleagues the members for Fraser Valley East and Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville.

The three amendments taken together would, first, add the word "seriously" before the word "threatened" on line 16 at page 1.

Second, my amendment would add the words: "and the medical practitioner has concluded that there is no other medically acceptable treatment to alleviate the health risk".

The third amendment would specifically exclude the word "psychological" and, thereby, socioeconomic considerations, from the definition of health on page 1.

Taken together, all three amendments would greatly strengthen Bill C-43. Their total impact would be to make this bill, which is now pro-life in form but pro-choice in substance, into a bill which would be pro-life in both form and substance. The bill, so amended, would then truly balance the right of the mother to the security of the person in Section 7 of the Charter and society's interest in the protection of all human life from conception.

The Supreme Court, in its Morgentaler decision of January, 1988, spoke specifically only to the rights of the mother and not to her unborn child. However, the court clearly invited Parliament to consider the rights of the unborn, as Chief Justice Dickson stated:

Like Beetz and Wilson, I agree that the protection of the foetal interests by Parliament is also a valid government objective. It follows that balancing these interests with the lives and health of women is a major factor and clearly an important government objective.

These three amendments taken together would achieve that objective. The word "seriously" states the obvious. No abortion should be done frivolously or for non-medical considerations. But we all know that many are.

Dr. Morgentaler simply requires the signing of a consent form. This form was filed with the legislative committee on Bill C-43. All it requires is that the patient understand the risks of the operation and that she clearly wants the abortion. Dr. Morgentaler does not ascertain whether that abortion is therapeutically required to save the life or because of severe physical or mental risk to the mother. One just asks, signs a form to show one wants it and understands it, and then gets the abortion.

Second, by specifically excluding the word "psychological" from the definition of health, we are eliminating between 82 per cent and 96 per cent of all abortions. The Canadian Medical Association, when it appeared before the legislative committee, said the following:

It is recognized that 85 per cent to 95 per cent of induced abortions are done for psychiatric reasons, but there are very few absolute psychiatric reasons that are a threat to life, such as severe depression with suicidal risk. Most of these psychiatric reasons are for psychological and social reasons, or humanitarian reasons.

Another group which appeared before the committee was the Canadian Physicians for Life. According to the Canadian Physicians for Life, 96 per cent of abortions are performed for non-medical reasons.

The Badgley report of 1977 indicated that 82 per cent of Canadian physicians surveyed for conditions under which they would support a request for an abortion, could be accounted for by social and economic factors.

U.S. Planned Parenthood states that in 1988, in its experience, 96 per cent of abortions were performed for non-medical reasons.

The National Action Committee on the Status of Women, when it appeared before the legislative committee on Bill C-43 stated:

> Women have abortions for many reasons. Most of them are social and economic in origin.

Third, specifically to my amendment, I would like to say the following. The CMA, Physicians for Life and several other witnesses who appeared before the legislative committee told us that abortion is a medical act. In fact, according to Dr. Lamont of the CMA, abortion is a serious medical act which could even, although rarely, result in death.

From my experience as a hospital board member and the first chairman of the Kitchener-Waterloo Hospital's Risk Management and Quality Assurance Committee, I know that every operation in every hospital involves a tissue analysis or pathological review and is subject to audit procedures to ensure that the medical act performed achieved the minimal risk concerning infections and was truly medically necessary. Yet there is no tissue analysis committee for the aborted child. There is no pathological review. There is no audit as to whether the medical act of abortion was truly necessary. Abortion is a privileged operation done, in the vast majority of cases, for non-therapeutic, non-medical reasons.

Therefore, although my amendment, if proper medical evaluations and procedures were followed would not be necessary, is unfortunately absolutely essential to ensure that they are.

The amendment would require doctors, in forming their opinion as to the necessity for the abortion, to do what they do for every other medical act, that is, determine whether there is any other medically acceptable treatment to alleviate the health risk.

This bill, weak though it is, does not provide for the medical act of abortion for cosmetic surgical reasons. In my opinion it is fundamentally wrong and surely unacceptable medically to use medical intervention to solve or deal with what are essentially, although sometimes difficult, social problems. Nor should a doctor take out one's tonsils or appendix, or whatever, if there are other means to treat that health risk. Abortion should always and only be performed when there are no other medically acceptable means to treat or alleviate the health risk.

This is the practice in Salvation Army Hospitals, and no one could ever accuse the Salvation Army of a lack of compassion for those carrying an unwanted child. Their position statement given to the abortion committee contains in practice the essence of my amendment. It reads as follows:

> The Salvation Army supports efforts to protect and promote the welfare of the weak and defenceless, including the unborn. It takes seriously the rights and needs of both the foetus and the mother. Termination of a pregnancy may be justified in those rare instances where, in the judgment of competent medical and allied staff, the pregnancy poses a serious threat to the life of the mother or could result in serious physical injury to the mother.

Witnesses who supported and recommended the amendment I have put forward are Citizens for Public Justice, the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops and the Evangelical Fellowship of Canada, to name just three.

The Canadian Council of Catholic Bishops in speaking to such an amendment stated:

> We are convinced that this amendment is critical to ensure that all therapeutic alternatives are explored and that abortion is not used to remedy other problems or the stress and anxiety that may ordinarily accompany unexpected or undesired pregnancy.

• (1220)

In seeking legal constitutional advice on the constitutionality of the three amendments taken together, I have found that although no one can foretell future decisions of the court with certainty, these three amendments should be constitutionally acceptable. In fact they might even enhance the constitutionality of Bill C-43 by providing greater clarity and certainty as to its definitions and intent.

Therefore, in conclusion, I urge members of this House to support each of these three amendments as well as Motion No. 10 put forward by the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

[Translation]

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell) moved:

That Bill C-43 be amended in clause 1 by striking out lines 18 to 20 at page 1.

Mr. Speaker, as you know, Motion Number 10, which was moved earlier, was intended to withdraw the element of health from criteria which would mean, in fact, that abortion would only be allowed when the life of the mother would likely be endangered.

Thus, since health would no longer be a criterion according to Motion no. 10, it goes without saying that Motion no. 14 would simply eliminate the definition of the word "health" included in the bill.

As we all know, the definition of "health" can be misused. My colleague, the member for Kitchener, was making precisely this type of comments earlier. According to him, the definition of "health" should be restricted. As far as I am concerned, it should simply be taken out, as long, of course, as there is agreement on the order relating to Motion no. 10.

To give you an idea of the definition, Mr. Speaker, according to the dictionary, the word "health" has various meanings, but in the bill it includes certain elements.

Let me read to you the definition of "health" given in the bill:

"santé" S'entend notamment de la santé physique, mentale et psychologique.

At least that is what the French version says. It is a bit equivocal. If you refer to the English text, it says:

[English]

"health" includes, for greater certainty, physical, mental and psychological health;

[Translation]

Therefore, the French text gives a very specific definition of health; but in the English text and, as we all know, both versions have force of law, of course and the word "health" includes the bill and lists everything and does not exclude anything.

[English]

"Health" can mean physical, mental and psychological, but does not exclude any other definition of health as well. It leads me to believe that health means absolutely anything you want it to mean.

[Translation]

According to the dictionary's definition—and I refer you to the one given by Le petit Robert—Mr. Speaker, «santé» is defined as "a good psychological state, a good physiological state, the regular and harmonious functioning of the human body during a long period—"

Presumably, anything that is not exactly similar to the "regular and harmonious functioning of the human body during a long period" could therefore justify putting an end to the pregnancy.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, if we can use just about any definition of the word "health", in other words, any reason to terminate a pregnancy, I do not think it is quite honest to introduce a bill such as this one. If, on the one hand, the bill's aim is to prohibit abortion but, on the other hand it contains loopholes large enough to allow abortions in just about any situation, then that is saying one thing and doing the opposite. The bill is therefore less than honest if we, collectively, adopt the bill as it is currently worded, especially if we do not amend the definition of the word "health", we would in fact be maintaining the status quo and it would be the same as having no law at all. Indeed, it is perhaps worse; if we have a law that pretends to do something concrete when in fact it does absolutely nothing of the sort, some might assume that we have a real law to protect the life of the unborn child. Of course, we would end up with the opposite, that is, we would have a law that does not protect the child's life at all. Therefore, if we want a real law, let's make one. If we do not want a law and, of course, this House may so decide, then surely we should not pretend that we do.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I most sincerely ask my colleagues to amend the section in the bill which deals with health. More specifically, I think we should do away totally with the definition of "health" as I said earlier and, in fact, we should strike the word "health" from the preceding section, so that abortions would only be allowed in situations where this procedure is necessary to save the pregnant woman's life.

[English]

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North) moved:

Motion No. 16

That Bill C-43 be amended in Clause 1 by striking out line 19 at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:

"considerations of physical and mental factors as they cause a serious threat to life and".

He said: Mr. Speaker, before I speak to my proposed amendment I would like to indicate to the hon. members for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, Fraser Valley East and Kitchener that, in essence, the substance of my motion complements theirs. I will be supporting their proposed amendments.

One of the most serious problems evident in Bill C-43 is the vagueness with which "health" is defined. The Supreme Court of Canada in deciding the Morgentaler case indicated that health must be defined clearly.

If you do not define and require at least that the gravity of health must be considered, then it is really vague. Even before that, to include the word "psychological" would in fact allow for such vagueness to be legalized.

The former Minister of Justice stated that "psychological health" included behaviour, emotions and problems of adjustment to the environment. He further stated that the word "psychological" is broad enough to utilize the word "socioeconomic".

• (1230)

Under his interpretation of this bill, and as he stated when he was asked at committee, poverty itself may be a basis for abortion. That will not be acceptable.

Because the word psychological is broad and nebulous, it will give occasion for abuse and would permit abortion for any form of distress.

Moreover, without the amendment that I have proposed, physicians would not have the clear guidance that they ought to have from this piece of legislation. Some physicians may interpret it as allowing abortions if the woman is merely unhappy with or inconvenienced by an unwanted pregnancy.

The bill itself even advances the erroneous idea that abortion can aid a woman's psychological health, for which there is no evidence, medically speaking. As a consequence, there could be a serious adverse effect on the relationship between physician and patient. A woman who desires an abortion, for no medical reasons, could be led not to tell the whole truth about her ailment, about the conditions that truly affect her medically. When that happens, the relationship between patient and physician becomes threatened. How can a doctor issue a proper diagnosis when the medical history is not full and thorough? How can a physician make a diagnosis when the information that the physician is receiving is clouded?

With such a loose definition of health, the foetus, the unborn is not protected at all. In fact, we may ask the question, why Bill C-43? The reason we are proposing a bill against abortion is precisely because we would like to protect another life, or there is no basis for this medical procedure to be in the Criminal Code. To me, the only indication why this medical procedure ought to be in the Criminal Code, in contrast to other medical and surgical procedures, is because this is the only procedure for which, when done unnecessarily, the life of the unborn is truly compromised.

Therefore, if we allow this bill without the amendment that I have proposed, it will result in abortion on demand and the protection of the unborn would be an illusory situation.

Before 1940, almost all indications for abortion were truly medically therapeutic. By 1950, many so-called psychiatric reasons accounted for more than 50 per cent of all abortions. Currently, 90 per cent of all abortions are performed on the basis of so-called psychiatric disorders. But the degree with which these disorders are assessed, whether they truly threaten the life or the health of the mother, is certainly subject to question.

In summary, I have proposed the amendment that we consider physical and mental factors, and in a sense deleting the word "psychological", because that will be included in "mental", but with the understanding on the part of the medical profession that the degree of mental disturbance ought to be severe and that this severity of disturbance would seriously threaten the life and health of the patient.

That is the essence of my proposed amendment.

I wish to quote the first two principles from the 1990 edition of the Code of Ethics of the Canadian Medical Association. First, consider the well-being of the patient. As I have indicated, when a physician approaches a pregnant woman as a patient, that physician automatically has two patients, the woman herself and the unborn she is carrying. The second principle is, honour your profession and its traditions. It has been the tradition of medicine that the physician protects all his patients in this instance, both the pregnant woman and the unborn child in her womb.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso) moved:

Motion No. 17A

That Bill C-43 be amended in Clause 1 by striking out line 19 at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:

"physical and mental".

He said: Mr. Speaker, before addressing my own amendment to Bill C-43, I would like to compliment my friend and colleague, the member for Winnipeg North, for his diligent work on the legislative committee studying Bill C-43. As a medical doctor, he has added an important element to the committee's deliberations. I also want to compliment him on the eloquent and persuasive manner in which he spoke in support of his amendment, Motion No. 16. I want to say at the outset that I fully support his amendment even though its passage will make a vote on my own unnecessary.

I would also like to associate myself with the amendments proposed by my colleagues, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, as well as the member for Kitchener, and the member for Fraser Valley East who spoke earlier.

Motion No. 17A, a motion which I have proposed, seeks to limit and strengthen the definition of "health" in Clause 2 of Bill C-43 by removing "psychological" as a relevant category of health that would make abortion legal under this legislation. I have proposed this restriction for three main reasons.

First, in my view, the inclusion of psychological health as a relevant consideration for procuring an abortion, in particular as the term has been used in the explanatory notes to the legislation, and in the words of the former Minister of Justice, virtually sanctions abortion on demand.

In fact, I submit that it would be worse than abortion on demand. If no reasonable medical grounds can be found to justify the procedure—which, if we are honest with ourselves, is the case in all but the rarest of circumstances—women would then have to describe the psychological trauma, real or imagined, that carrying the baby to term might produce.

In the naturally stressful situation of an unwanted pregnancy, for whatever reason, the law would provide no support for passing through the early anxieties to what may be a far different frame of mind, if the option to carry the pregnancy to term was chosen.

The law would allow the psychological consideration to justify an easy way out.

This is not to deny that real socioeconomic or health factors may be at the root of these concerns. The woman may be facing the prospect of single parenthood on a low income. She may be a teenager. The new arrival may provoke a confronting and bewildering adjustment to her lifestyle and to that of her family. These are real situations. They deserve the support and compassion of society. They call for programs and policies that get at the root of these situations, not for the panacea of abortion, of snuffing out the life of an unborn child.

A second reason for proposing this amendment relates to cases where foetuses are found to be physically deformed, underdeveloped, or mentally handicapped. Modern methods of ultrasound technology now make it possible to identify these cases at early stages of pregnancy. Naturally, a woman who faces the prospect of giving birth to a handicapped or deformed child would be anxious to have this cup pass her by.

Physically and mentally disadvantaged children, whether arising from birth or accident, impose new costs on society. Yet, in a deeper sense, they add an important richness to our society, to the humanity which we all share, as those who have worked with or been privileged to be associated with celebrated cases of persons suffering from these handicaps will only too readily testify. This richness is in peril if we permit, as the psychological reference in Bill C-43 would permit, abortions for so-called eugenic considerations.

• (1240)

A childhood friend, Mary MacLennan, who was born with no arms, with the support of her family and community has gone on to become a successful lawyer, said this before the committee on Bill C-43: "If this is the way that those who are making the laws are thinking and this is what is being used to influence people, then I think those with a disability, whether you are born with one or whether you acquire one when you walk out that door and try to cross the street, I think you have to be very concerned about creating a mentality like that".

Finally, I reject the claim made in defence of the psychological provision that the Supreme Court decision in the Morgentaler case makes this a necessary part of any abortion legislation. The government's background notes to Bill C–43 state on page 6 that "based on the majority reasons for judgment in the Morgentaler case, permitting an abortion if the psychological health of the woman is threatened, is constitutionally required".

I believe that this statement is a serious misreading of the words of the Supreme Court decision.

The Chief Justice in the Morgentaler decision blames the delays caused by abortion committees and the lack of a definition of health for the psychological threat to a woman's security of person. He states: "The psychological injury caused by delay in obtaining abortions, much of which must be attributed to the procedures set out in Section 251, constitutes an additional infringement of the right of the security of the person".

Further, he adds: "There is increased psychological stress imposed upon women who are forced to wait for abortions, and that this stress is compounded by the uncertainty of whether or not a therapeutic abortion committee will actually grant approval".

Nowhere does the decision state that the absence of a psychological health consideration is a breach of security of person.

Bill C–43, amended by Motion No. 17A, sufficiently eliminates these delays. There are no procedural delays and there is a more precise definition of health. In fact, by providing a more precise definition of health, by saying up front what will and will not be accepted as grounds for abortions, and by grounding these conditions in an honest and rigorous application of medical science, abortion legislation is enhancing the security of the person, of the unborn child and of the expectant mother. It will foster a responsible attitude in both women and men toward their sexual behaviour.

The wishy-washy inclusion of psychological health in this loose clause of Bill C–43 plays to the weakness in us all. It invites us to invent reasons to use to extricate ourselves from difficulties which, had the easy options not been so readily available, we may have chosen to avoid.

For these reasons, the health definition is one of the most glaring weaknesses of this legislation which would need to be strengthened before Bill C–43 could enjoy my support. My motion is an attempt to do that.

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville) moved:

Motion No 17B

That Bill C–43 be amended in Clause 1 by striking out line 19 at page 1 and substituting the following therefor:

"physical and mental health, and does not include psychological".

He said: Mr. Speaker, as a pro–life person, I am disappointed in Bill C–43 as it now stands. It is not restrictive enough. Therefore, I wish to put forth an amendment which would delete the word "psychological" from the definition of health.

In its brief to the committee the Canadian Medical Association stated: "It is recognized that 85 per cent to 95 per cent of induced abortions are done for psychiatric reasons, but there are very few absolute psychiatric reasons that are a threat to life such as severe depression with suicidal risk. Most of these psychiatric reasons are for psychological and social reasons or humanitarian reasons".

I want to make the point that my amendment is part of a group of three pro–life amendments put forth by my colleagues from Fraser Valley East, British Columbia and Kitchener, Ontario. I would also like to associate myself with Motion No. 10 standing in the name of the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

The Right Hon. Prime Minister of Canada, when speaking in opposition to the capital punishment debate on June 22, 1987, made the following statement:

> All of us share in the tragedy and sorrow of the taking of a human life, whether criminally inspired or from anger or passion—It is wrong to take life, and I can think of no circumstance excepting self–defence to justify it.

The act of abortion is clearly the taking of a life. The abortion issue is the most important issue this thirty–fourth Parliament will deal with. While many people contend that Bill C–43 accommodates all views, it certainly does not satisfy my pro–life position. Virtually all pro–life people I have spoken with believe that the bill is weak and flawed. That is why this package of amendments is needed in order to protect the unborn human foetus. Canada has been without abortion legislation now for over two years. I believe legislation is urgently required in order to protect the unborn.

In their brief the Citizens for Public Justice make this statement in the introduction: "The abortion issue probes the values of our nation. It is messy, complicated, and explosive. Most people wish it would just go away. But this issue cannot go away. What we decide to do with it will tell us something fundamental about who we are and what we value. Therefore, evading the abortion issue is as much a decision as any action we may take".

Then they go on to state: "Our national response to this challenge will show what kind of people we are, what kind of future we seek both for our children and our grandchildren, and for Canadian women who must make agonizing decisions".

My wife Sandy and I have shared two personal experiences in our lives which profoundly affect our views on abortion: that abortion only be performed when the mother's life is at risk or in certain circumstances involving rape or incest.

I believe the choice of adoption should be considered by any woman who is considering an abortion. Many couples would love the opportunity to raise a little boy or girl. Sandy and I decided to adopt a baby boy in 1968. We had a family of one son, Howard, and two daughters, Pamela and Leslie, at the time. We believed we could provide a new young son with a warm family life.

So in the summer of 1968 we adopted John Fraser Attewell who was 11 months old at the time. His natural mother had one other baby and was unable financially to raise another child. Fraser will be 22 years old this August. He is married and he and his wife Robin have a young son, William Cody Attewell.

Sandy and I have often thought that if an abortion had been easy to obtain 20 years ago, we may not have had Fraser as a son.

There are thousands of parents in Canada who hope and pray for the loving opportunity to adopt a son or daughter.

As members of Parliament, it is up to us to provide legislation which will protect the unborn. It is up to us to fight for their lives. Thank God we had doctors and nurses who fought for the life of our granddaughter, Heather Attewell.

A little over two years ago, our son Howard and his wife Linda were excitedly awaiting the birth of their first child. Unfortunately complications developed. Heather was born two months premature and weighed only two and one-half pounds. It was then discovered that Heather could not swallow because her oesophagus was not connected to her stomach. Heather spent the first six months of her life in Sick Children's Hospital under the loving care of many professionals. Heather is now two years old. Most of her food is still fed to her through a tube in her stomach, but she is learning to swallow. She is beginning to talk now and she has a baby brother, Derek Attewell.

Hundreds of people were praying for Heather's survival when she was first born. Our prayers were answered. Heather had many people praying and fighting for her life. The doctors and nurses and other assistants were splendid in their professional and caring treatment. We were fighting for Heather's life.

• (1250)

I do not know how many members here have held a two and one-half pound baby. I have, and you see how vulnerable and dependent they are. But let us think of an unborn child, how totally vulnerable and totally dependent they are on us. We as parliamentarians have a grave responsibility to fight for the lives of all unborn children. We can help do this by passing appropriate legislation.

In their brief Citizens for Public Justice recognizes the fact that abortion is the tragic result of a society which does not sufficiently support women, children and families. Therefore, while life protecting legislation is needed, such legislation is not enough. I quote from the brief: "Social policy needs to address many of the factors which lead women to seek abortions".

The brief continues: "CPJ calls upon the federal government to extend its co-operation with the provincial governments to implement an even more comprehensive social policy that addresses factors which lead women to seek abortions, such as prevention of unintended pregnancies, better access to counselling, provision of a full range of adoption options, housing initiatives, and so on. The above list is intended only to introduce areas of concern".

In closing, I sincerely hope and pray that the proposed pro-life amendments will be passed in order to strengthen more adequately Bill C-43 in order to protect the lives of the unborn.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North) moved:

Motion No. 19

That Bill C-43 be amended in Clause 1 by striking out line 3 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

"medical profession, developed from a solid body of scientific knowledge."

He said: Mr. Speaker, again before I proceed to speak to this proposed amendment, I would like to add my voice of support for the amendments advanced by the member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso who spoke so eloquently on his proposed amendment and the member for Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville.

My proposed amendment in essence emphasizes the need to ensure that the medical opinion shall be based only on a solid body of scientific knowledge and not on a popular opinion obtained by survey polls. The medical standards ought not to be variable, not varying from province to province, not based on fad and fashion, but in fact based on scientific knowledge.

It is necessary to emphasize this point because when diagnosing a woman who is seeking an abortion, a physician may be more preoccupied with the transient, immediate distress of the woman and less with the long-term health of that particular woman. When a physician is guided by popular opinion and not by true scientific knowledge, a physician may do more harm than good to his or her patient.

When physicians allow themselves to be swayed by popular fashion in making critical medical judgments instead of adhering to scientific standards they may not provide the proper medical care. The bottom line is that the physician's decision must be guided by the science of good medicine. Otherwise he or she becomes less of a doctor, only providing a service for a fee, and that is not in the highest standard and tradition of the medical profession.

What some of those who advocate abortion on demand overlook, I submit, is that if pregnancy is to be cosidered as a disease, which it is not, then abortion certainly is not the therapy either, because we know that after the duration of nine months of pregnancy the whole condition will solve itself.

There are no controlled studies which indicate that abortion is a treatment for normal pregnancy, although the pregnancy may be associated with some emotional and psychological distress.

It is in the tradition of medicine that when a patient sees a physician, first the physician obtains a medical history from the patient, a thorough history of all information relevant to the chief complaint. In this given case, what we would like to be clear is that the physician will continue to adopt the strict science of medicine and ascertain why a woman is asking for an abortion. We know that there can be many reasons including: "I do not like this pregnancy because I cannot afford to support this child after birth", "I do not like this pregnancy because I will not be able to pursue my own professional career", "I do not like this pregnancy because I just do not like it".

The answer to these questions and concerns is not abortion. The answer is counselling, giving the woman true options on how we can help that pregnant woman truly asking for our help go about solving the reasons why she has asked for an abortion.

Next, following the receipt of all the medical information, the physician makes a diagnosis and thereafter considers whether a given treatment approach is indicated or not. It is never the case in medicine that the patient decides "give me this treatment" and the physician follows hook, line and sinker without first getting the medical history, without forming his diagnosis or diagnoses, and without in fact discussing with the patient the alternatives to treatment and management.

When a physician reaches the point of making the treatment plan for his or her patient, then he or she considers whether the treatment approach ought to be medical or surgical. In considering those treatment modalities, the physician also considers the options of treatment—the first, second and third option—and considers the side effects that may emanate from any treatment. This is what I feel this law must enshrine. When a physician forms his or her medical opinion, the physician must be guided and guided only by the science of medicine, by a body of scientific knowledge, and not by popularity, not by fashion, not by fad, and not by a vote during a convention.

In this instance I am really saddened that the Canadian Medical Association, of which I am a member, took a vote in one medical convention and then asked how many were in favour of this particular position, without basis whatsoever of scientific knowledge sustaining that. Yet the President of the Canadian Medical Association, before the legislative committee that examined this bill, admitted that medical opinion must be based on scientific knowledge.

Therefore, it is only proper that this House supports my proposed amendments so that we can clarify and enshrine good medical practice. In so doing we will truly ensure the value of this bill and protect the unborn for which this bill has been created.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. Prior to moving to the next item and prior to the adjournment for lunch, I want to indicate to the House that I will not be moving Motion No. 20 standing in my name.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Motion No. 20 will be dropped.

Motion No. 20 withdrawn

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being one o'clock, I do now leave the chair until two o'clock this day.

POSTHUMOUS TRIBUTE TO DR. ROMUALD PAQUET

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, on behalf of all who knew him, I wish to pay special tribute today to an outstanding man from Val-d'Or, Dr. Romuald Paquet, who died on May 11, 1990.

The messages of sympathy from his colleagues attest to Dr. Paquet's brilliant career, his contribution and his remarkable devotion to medicine. The staff of the operating room do not hesitate to say that Dr. Paquet's career will go down in the history of Val-d'Or's Saint-Sauveur Hospital and they add:

"It is part of the life of most of us. As a doctor, obstetrician, anesthetist and labour relations man, he knew all the affection we had for him. He was a kind man. His patients esteemed him because he cared about their security and well-being. Because of all the years we worked with him, because of all the happy or difficult times we shared, because of everything that makes a team, he will always be with us in a way. To him, we say thanks and farewell".

Mr. Speaker, I would like to offer his family my sincere condolences and my deepest sympathy.

ANTI-SEMITISM

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, the desecration of Jewish cemeteries in Canada and France is a horrible act reopening a chapter in the history of humanity which we thought, and hoped, had been closed once and for all. President Mitterand spoke for us all when he said last week "Respect for the living depends on respect for the dead".

The all-party motion passed by the House this morning expresses very well the sentiments of all Canadian parliamentarians. Having registered our collective indignation, our task now is to take this message to our respective communities and urge other elected officials to reinforce the climate of mutual tolerance, the respect and human bonds which make up this great country of ours, Canada.

SASKATCHEWAN ECONOMY

Mr. Ron Fisher (Saskatoon—Dundurn): Mr. Speaker, a recent article in the Wall Street Journal depicting Saskatchewan as a depressed province which votes socialist is a fine example of journalistic bias. It is true that Saskatchewan is a depressed area. The implication that this is because of a socialist government is totally unfounded.

For the last eight years the province has been governed by a Conservative government. When Grant Devine's government came to power the Treasury had a balance of $139 million and a per capita debt of $1,300. In 1990, after eight years of Tory mismanagement, the per capita debt is $13,000.

A have province under the NDP Allan Blakeney's government, Saskatchewan has become a have-not province with the fastest growing poverty rate in the country. Three hundred communities have had notable population loss since 1986. In 1989 Saskatchewan recorded the highest level of bankruptcies in its history. Since 1985 more than 60,000 people have left Saskatchewan.

Whatever The Wall Street Journal implies, the fact remains that Saskatchewan is a victim of continuing Conservative mismanagement.

ANTI-SEMITISM

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, when I rose in this House on May 11 condemning the desecration of a Jewish cemetery in France, little did I expect that isolated incident to become a terrible pattern of racism and anti-Semitism through ghoulish acts recently in Ottawa and Quebec City. Further stories about the desecration of Catholic and other cemeteries across Canada have also come to light.

Something is changing in Canada when sick minds feel they must express their political or religious views by defacing tombstones, disturbing graves, violating consecrated ground. Imagine the heartache, horror, and fear being rekindled by these acts, especially among Holocaust survivors whose aim was preventing future generations from inheriting the past as their future.

People of all religions, at all levels of government, do not accept these sick, depraved acts of bigotry just as they reject similar acts of violence reflecting deep-seated, unfounded and unprovoked expressions of racism, anti-Semitism, or anti-feminism. Speaking out is essential.

While we must find the perpetrators of these crimes, the proper solutions must also be found to reinforce civility, acceptable community behaviour and our belief in tolerance, decency and mutual respect for basic human rights as the Canadian hallmark.

CN BRIDGE TO CAPE BRETON

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, in 1940 Canadian National made an agreement with the communities of Colchester County and Truro, Nova Scotia, to provide a highway bridge over the main rail line to Cape Breton in return for the communities giving up and closing off two streets.

For the last several years the residents of the area have seen the bridge disintegrate so much that the weight capacity has been reduced first from 10 tons to seven tons and now from seven tons to five tons. The fact is, the bridge should be condemned.

After years of stalling and delays CN finally agreed in writing on January 18, 1990, to build a new bridge with construction starting in the middle of May. It has not started. The residents of the area need this bridge replaced, with no more excuses, and they are demanding that CN keep with its original obligation made in 1940 and its written commitment made on January 18, 1990, to replace this bridge now.

ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, Canada's environment is at risk due to uncertain political leadership. Today our environment slips on the cabinet agenda into a vacuum.

It has been my experience while Lucien Bouchard has been Minister of the Environment that an honest, decent, caring person was in office. His largest obstacle was the majority in cabinet who believe that Earth is flat.

On global warming, despite the consensus of the 1988 Toronto conference that a 20 per cent reduction in CO2 emissions is needed and is achievable, this received no cabinet support. Despite the DPA report that Canada could save $150 billion in energy over the next decade while reducing CO2 emissions by two-thirds, it was attacked by the Minister of Energy, Mines and Resources.

The minister's own federal policy as of last week that Canada's emissions of CO2 will be no higher in the year 2000 than they are now even came under attack from his own parliamentary secretary.

What now will become of the Environmental Assessment and Review legislation? How watered down will it be? What of completing the national parks system this decade? What will be done? What of toughened legislation on marine pollution from pulp mills? Will they be weakened? What about eliminating CFCs or the review of James Bay, or the Oldman or the Rafferty–Alameda dams, or The Green Plan consultations?

Mr. Speaker, the creative loss of Minister Bouchard is substantial. He was adapting to the rigours and necessity of swimming against the tide of uninformed opinion. Environment lost an ally today.

TRIBUTE TO PIERRE ASSELIN AND NATHALIE VÉZINA

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec–Est): Mr. Speaker, on May 14, two young students from my riding who were studying for a bachelor's degree in history and political science at York University in Toronto, left Canada to pursue a course of studies at the University of Hanoi.

This rather unusual destination was chosen following an intensive course in Vietnamese at the South east Asian Studies Summer Institute of the University of Hawaii, during the summer of 1989.

The person who taught the course at the time was so impressed by these young Canadians that he offered to be their tutor in Hanoi.

Pierre Asselin and Nathalie Vézina are the first Quebecers and, in fact, the first Canadians to study in Vietnam.

Mr. Speaker, I invite hon. members to join me in wishing them every success in this adventurous and also quite difficult undertaking.

BILL C–21

Mr. Ken James (Sarnia—Lambton): Mr. Speaker, a Decima research study recently released by the Minister of Employment and Immigration reveals that 66 per cent of Canadians support this government's plan to shift resources from UI benefits to effective job training.

• (1410)

The labour force development strategy is an important and valuable initiative of our government to develop a well trained and diversified workforce that can readily adapt to the challenges of tomorrow. Canadians are aware that without such training programs, Canada will fall behind other competitors in terms of a skilled workforce. This is a realization based on both common sense and economic reality.

Given the evident public support for Bill C–21 and Canada's urgent need to up–grade and enhance training opportunities, it is imperative that the Liberal members of the Senate listen to the Canadian public and pass this bill. It is only at that time that this government can proceed with the implementation of the labour force development strategy which will benefit all Canadians.

ANTI–SEMITISM

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are shocked and disturbed at the news of the desecration of Jewish cemeteries in Quebec and Ontario, the last being in the city of Gloucester. The knocking over of tombstones is cowardly. The painting of Nazi symbols and anti–Semitic slogans is a disgraceful and dastardly act.

[Translation]

Canadians from both official language communities in this country, of different cultures and religions, wish to declare their solidarity with their brothers and sisters in the Jewish community and express their indignation in respect to these racist acts.

[English]

I ask the Prime Minister to assure Canadians that he will take positive action to promote unity and create an environment of harmony, tolerance and peace throughout the country.

Canadians should reflect on these events and ensure that never again such racist actions will never again occur. Never again.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Hon. John Bosley (Don Valley West): Mr. Speaker, Canadians do not hear, each morning just before the doors are opened, your prayer and that felicitous phrase "pour fructifier nos deliberations" and for Canada herself.

Never has that prayer been more apropos. My country has never been so threatened, and I do not know what to do. Where I can, I make speeches. I am shocked to find how many of our citizens either are not worried about what will happen if Meech fails or hope Quebec will leave.

My Canada is so special and so unique precisely because of its regional diversity. We cannot seriously want some Canadians to face an impossible choice.

Of course Quebec is a distinct society. Let us celebrate that and get on with the other constitutional changes we need to make government relevant in this country.

We are much more than the words on a document or the sum of our parts. Mr. Speaker, for what it is worth, I pray with you each day, whether I am here or somewhere else, pour fructifier les deliberations de nos leaders and for Canada. I hope we all will.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

ANTI-SEMITISM

Mr. John Manley (Ottawa South): Mr. Speaker, I wish to express my feelings of outrage and deep dismay at the desecration of the Ottawa Jewish Community Cemetery in my constituency of Ottawa South last week.

The vandals who perpetrated this crime must be brought to justice under the law. They have brought violence to our community, causing many innocent families both grief and fear, and in the end every one of us has been victimized.

What is equally worrisome is the increase in incidents of hatred and intolerance against Jewish people worldwide. In this century, the world learned a terrible lesson about what can happen when hatred is permitted to overflow into the streets. We cannot indulge in passive acquiescence when this kind of directed racism occurs in our communities or elsewhere.

While we cannot make laws to change what is in people's minds and hearts, we can, as leaders and citizens, denounce in the strongest possible language such acts as those that occurred last week.

To the families that have been terrorized through the violation of the resting place of their loved ones, I wish to extend my deepest sympathy. I also affirm that I share their sense of having been violated and their determination to put an end to these senseless and hateful acts.

ICELANDIC STUDIES PROGRAM

Mr. David Bjornson (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, last Friday I had the honour and privilege of announcing a $300,000 grant in support of the chair of Icelandic language and literature at the University of Manitoba.

Financial support for the only Icelandic studies program in North America was approved by the hon. Minister of State for Multiculturalism and Citizenship.

This grant will go toward establishing a Canadian Icelandic studies program in conjunction with the university's existing chair in Icelandic language and literature.

The expansion of this chair demonstrates our commitment to make our cultural and linguistic diversity part of the academic life of this country.

I applaud the University of Manitoba for its efforts, and I congratulate my fellow Canadians of Icelandic heritage for their unselfish work in preserving our Icelandic language and culture.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, recent events in the occupied territories, and in Israel itself, must make it obvious to all but a shrinking core of hard-liners that an Israeli government must soon come into existence that is prepared to talk peace now with the PLO to bring an end to a situation which breeds unending violence and death and which can only lead to the spiritual destruction of Israel and all the good things it has been, and can continue to be if the Palestinian question could be dealt with.

The policy established to deal with the intifada has failed. Closed universities and plastic bullets are not the answer.

Israel has to be willing to negotiate with the PLO, but other Arab countries have to do their share. Israel cannot be expected to negotiate with confidence in an atmosphere of hatred and an expanding arms race in the Middle East.

The Arab countries that got the Palestinians into the camps in the first place have a role to play. Unfortunately, they are not playing it. But like it or not, it is now Israeli troops in the West Bank and Gaza that are the oppressors, and oppression is antithetical to the genesis of Israel. The sooner we have an Israeli government which sees this and acts on it, the better off the whole world will be.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister.

In light of what is said in the letter of resignation of the Minister of the Environment, I want to ask the Prime Minister if he continues to agree that the report of the special committee on the companion resolution provides a basis for a fair and reasonable solution to the current constitutional impasse?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think it provides the basis for what the members of the committee sought to give it, the basis for a reasonable discussion that might have the possibility of bringing the provinces to the constitutional table to see if the Meech Lake Accord might not then be fully accepted by all.

Senator Murray met with nine provincial premiers over the weekend. He will be meeting with Premier Bourassa this evening, after which he will make recommendations to me and to the government, which I will, no doubt, share at the earliest moment with all members of the House.

[Translation]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, as the Prime Minister just said, the Minister of State (Federal– Provincial Relations) has now met most of our provincial premiers to find out whether it is feasible to call a First ministers' conference. I want to ask the Prime Minister whether he could now inform the House of the results of the conversations Senator Murray has had so far and tell us whether all the conditions are there for calling this conference very shortly?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I believe the senator said publicly that he would make his recommendations following the meeting he will have with the Quebec premier this evening.

Considering the important reference the Leader of the Opposition made, I may point out that as Prime Minister of Canada, I negotiated the Meech Lake Accord because I absolutely wanted to bring Quebec back into the Canadian family. The Accord does that. I will never agree—I have said so on many occasions, and it has been said by other members on both sides of the House, especially by members from Quebec—I will never agree to let the terms of the Accord be diluted or its objective questioned. We want to ratify the Accord so that Quebec and Quebecers will truly feel they belong to Canada. We have never reneged on our support for the Accord, and we have no intention of repudiating our signature to the Accord. We have always found the Accord acceptable in its present, unamended form, and that position has not changed.

The Charest report proposes a basis for resumption of discussions by the governments to ensure that the Meech Lake Accord is ratified. The report provides the basis. It does not guarantee the results. I have always thought that all members of this House, by unanimously supporting the Charest committee, were telling the parties: We have now found a basis for negotiations. Go ahead and see if you can conclude an agreement, but not at the cost of weakening the Meech Lake Accord. Everyone has said Meech Lake must pass unchanged. That was my position, and I think it is the position of all members of this House.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1420)

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the constitutional situation is obviously very serious.

[English]

Would the Prime Minister not agree, therefore, that the time has come for him to be in direct contact with the provincial premiers to develop a basis for an early First Ministers' Conference which would bring about a satisfactory resolution of the current constitutional impasse?

In other words, certainly the work of Senator Murray is intended to be useful. But does the situation today not require the direct intervention of the Prime Minister on behalf of the House and the people of Canada in contact with the provincial premiers if we want to bring about an early resolution of the current constitutional impasse?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have been in touch with all provincial premiers; some of them twice, some of them three and four times over the last number of days and throughout the weekend.

These various communications have been actively complemented by a personal visit from Senator Murray who has sought to ascertain the extent to which, pursuant to the committee recommendations, it might be possible for the partners to sit down and to reach an agreement which would resolve the constitutional impasse.

My hon. friend will remember that three years ago, when we signed the Meech Lake Accord, it was not a complicated proposition. All parties in the House agreed and twice voted in favour of a document that was a simple, dignified and straightforward welcome to Quebec back into the Canadian family. That is what we passed, that is what I signed, and that is what I want to have respected.

That having been said, in a three-year time frame, governments changed and the situations changed. What was a simple, straightforward invitation to Quebec to rejoin the family, found itself burdened down with add-ons and some such matters which we were ready to discuss, provided they did not vitiate, in any way, the fundamental provisions of the Meech Lake Accord. I think that was the general view of all members of the committee.

I continue to believe, notwithstanding the difficulties in which we find ourselves, that it is possible for reasonable Canadians to understand quickly and urgently, the magnificence of the country that we have come to enjoy and love and to make sure that constructive compromises come forward to make sure we keep this nation strong and prosperous forever.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister, who I assume is aware that Mr. Bourassa's cabinet is to meet later today to discuss a common position.

Has the Prime Minister of Canada been in touch with Premier Bourassa to give him the assurance that all three federal political parties in this House are unanimous in their desire to find a solution to the constitutional impasse? And more specifically, will he recall that the members of the Charest committee unanimously reaffirmed their acceptance of Quebec's five demands?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer to my hon. friend is yes. I have been in touch fairly regularly with the Quebec premier, the last time being, I believe, yesterday evening. I have always stressed the point that was made and quite properly raised by my hon. friend from Papineau—Saint-Michel. I have told him that the purpose of Meech Lake is to make Quebec a full-fledged partner of our federation, an active partner who would participate fully in the evolution of Canadian federalism. And that is because the Accord will make it possible for Quebecers to feel they are truly part of Canada and want to build their future on that basis.

Yesterday, I noticed one particular comment by Premier Bourassa, which is important in the context mentioned by the hon. member. On the weekend he said, in referring to Canada: "We are one of the most privileged countries in the world. That is why the majority of Quebecers would like to stay and prosper in this country and work together with the country's other groups and other communities".

This statement by the Quebec premier reflects his respect, admiration and deep affection for a united Canada. That is why we negotiated Meech Lake, and that is why we will have to make the following message unanimous: Quebec said yes to Canada, and now it is time for Canada to say yes to Quebec.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. Does the Prime Minister realize that it is important for him at this time to play a considerable leadership role in explaining, and not just leave it to the chairman of the parliamentary committee, Mr. Charest, to explain the avenues which this committee explored? Is the Prime Minister himself ready to explain clearly that this report, which was accepted in good faith by opposition members, with the agreement of government members, only explores ways to solve the constitutional impasse and at no time did any of the members of this parliamentary committee want to require 23 concessions from Quebec, that the recommendations and suggestions contained in it are not to be taken as a whole but as a series of recommendations and suggestions to get Canada out of its constitutional impasse and that it is completely wrong to claim that they are 23 amendments, several of which change the essential conditions of the Meech Lake Accord? Is the Prime Minister prepared to defend the thesis that it is part of a compromise and that these suggestions would in no way lead Quebec to amend its five initial demands?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my friend raises an important question. The answer, I think, is that the Charest report proposes a basis for resuming discussions among the governments to see if it is possible to ratify the Meech Lake Accord. I think that the New Democrats, Liberals and Conservatives all said that it was a sort of menu to get the first ministers to sit down at the table in order to see whether, among all these recommendations, a suitable way could be found to solve a most serious problem. I accept it as a noble and interesting statement of a common position taken by all the members of this House who participated actively in this very important parliamentary undertaking.

I can tell my friend that it is true that only the first ministers negotiated the Meech Lake Accord, and I represented the interests of the Canadian government there. I negotiated the provisions of the Meech Lake Accord on behalf of the Government of Canada. I had no "nationalist" adviser to help me in that. I did it because I sincerely believed that it was in the interest of national unity and would allow Quebec to find an honourable place in the Canadian Constitution. That is why all parties here in the House subsequently endorsed§ it on two occasions. Obviously, since I negotiated the Meech Lake Accord myself, there is no question of you or me participating, for any consideration whatever, in a scheme to dilute the scope of its provisions. There was never any question of doing that and it will never be done, because Quebec was isolated once and that is once too often!

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

• (1430)

[English]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. I certainly agree with the Prime Minister's comments. I think he is saying that all of us in this House have a responsibility for the future of Canada and we take that responsibility seriously.

There is a serious situation in this country and I know that some people are despairing of the situation. But our role is to bring the country together. While we are all concerned about the events of the last few days, we cannot lose sight of the objective, which is to break the constitutional impasse.

I know that the Prime Minister has had Senator Murray speaking to the premiers of the provinces. Can the Prime Minister share with this House what the progress is to date and what specific plans this government has to ensure that we really can break the constitutional impasse?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I must tell you that I am advised that the progress has not been substantial. Unfortunately there are some people—and I say this uncritically—who fail to understand the objective of the Meech Lake Accord.

The Meech Lake Accord was brought about by an agreement in 1986 of the premiers gathered in Edmonton who said that we cannot go on with Quebec not being a willing part of the Constitution and therefore we call upon the federal government to begin negotiations to seek a formula which will allow Quebec to become part of the constitutional deal, willingly, after which we will move to a second round.

There began a process which resulted in Meech Lake. The objective of Meech Lake at the time was not that anyone was seeking to exclude anyone's considerations. The specifically stated objective was that Quebec be brought back into the Canadian family first and that any other matters be dealt with in a second round.

That was a very clear-cut and I think a very noble purpose. We achieved that. That Meech Lake Accord was honourable and, as Jack Pickersgill said, on terms so reasonable they will never come again in our lifetime. That Meech Lake Accord was endorsed twice by the House of Commons.

There were subsequently some add-ons which, in the minds of many Quebecers, have diminished the value of the Accord, and have changed it from its fundamental, noble objective. That is why there is growing frustration in the province of Quebec. They were willing to come on side and to say that by signing the Meech Lake Accord we willingly bind ourselves to Canada, to make Canada whole again, one Canada; we are proud to be Canadians; we sign with enthusiasm the Meech Lake Accord because it binds the nation together.

That is what the Meech Lake Accord is all about. It is now being diverted from that original, very noble purpose. We have to get it back on track so that Canadians understand what it is about. It is about the future of Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the Prime Minister. Certainly no one denies what the purpose of the Meech Lake Accord was, and we certainly agree with that purpose. However, I would suggest that, owing to the lack of public consultation and public input, it has gone far beyond that, and this is why the Prime Minister called together a special committee to study a companion resolution.

[Translation]

The unanimous report tabled last week stressed again the importance of upholding Quebec's five principles.

In a few hours Senator Murray will have met with Canada's 10 provincial premiers.

Can the Prime Minister commit himself as early as tomorrow to share with the House and the whole country the contents of the propositions his minister made to all provincial Premiers?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, Senator Murray has been seeking common grounds following the recommendations of the Charest report. He wants to know whether it is possible to clear the air so that the provinces and the first ministers might begin negotiations likely to lead to an honourable solution for Canada while maintaining the integrity of the Meech Lake Accord, without any changes.

That is his mission as he is crisscrossing the country.

[English]

My hon. friend prefaced her question by referring to a lack of consultation. May I submit to her that perhaps that was not the reason. I do not think that anybody fully understood the implications of the new constitutional provisions in 1982 that provide a three-year period for constitutional amendments to be reviewed.

People knew, of course, that governments will change in a three-year period, but nobody in that room anticipated that subsequent governments would repudiate the signatures of their predecessors. Nobody anticipated that premiers would refuse to honour the signatures. I am not quarrelling with the process, I am just saying this was one of the new elements of the 1982 Constitution.

As I say, it was a very clear-cut undertaking by all Canadians which promoted joy across the country. I and many people thought that within a matter of months after the signing on June 3, 1987, all of the provinces would have ratified it and it would have passed the House of Commons.

The statement that French Canadians were making was that we want to be part of Canada. You have been asking us for 25 years what Quebec wants, we have just told you. We have acknowledged it, we have a document that is honourable for Canada. It is decent for our citizenship. It is a source of pride for us all. Let us sign it, let us pass it and let us get on with the job of building a better Canada.

That is what we thought would happen. Nobody anticipated that governments would change, signatures would be repudiated, and all of a sudden a very simple, straightforward document of unity would become a catch-all for everybody else's wish list as governments changed across the country.

That was not the intention of Meech Lake. That should not be the intention today. We should proceed with the objective of bringing Quebec solidly back into Canada so we will have one powerful country and then go on with these other questions.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, there is certainly no one in this party, and I am sure no one in this House, who does not share the objective and the importance of having Quebec in the Constitution. However, whatever happened over the last three years, whatever misunderstandings or miscalculations there were, we have to deal with what is happening now.

• (1440)

We know that Senator Murray has been consulting with the premiers, that he will do so with Mr. Bourassa tonight and that he has shared some kind of text with them. Every day that that is left unclear, the anxiety over the future of this country increases.

Following Senator Murray's meeting with Premier Bourassa this evening, will the Prime Minister make a commitment to share with this House and with Canadians the exact state of the negotiations, including the contents of the wording? Can he make a commitment to share that with this House and Canadians tomorrow after the negotiations have concluded?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will be happy to share with my hon. friend and the members of the House any information that is given to me by Senator Murray which I feel could be constructively imparted.

As well, I do have an obligation to consult with very strong and, if I may say, very loyal and courageous supporters of Meech Lake, from the Premier of Nova Scotia to the Premier of Ontario and the Premier of Alberta, people of all political persuasions who have done so much. I plan to keep all people informed including, of course, members of the House of Commons.

I would just observe, in terms of the realities, that what happened really was that a separatist government arrived in 1981 with a shopping list of requests for the federal government which were clearly unacceptable. Most people know that. A federalist government was elected in the province of Quebec in 1985 with a list of five requests, not one of which broke new ground, not one of which had not been heard of before or debated for years in Canada. I can remember these debates taking place at Laval University 30 years ago on each and every one of those topics. There is nothing new under the sun.

Mr. Bourassa, a Canadian federalist, came forward with a list of five specific requests. They were debated for almost a year and a half. They were negotiated and we had an arrangement. As I say, it had the advantage of responding directly to a challenge of Canadian unity. It was clear cut and it did not close the door to the other matters that were raised legitimately for a second round. It was clearly stated in the Meech Lake Accord that there will be a second round and that the first item on the second round will be Senate reform. It was devised with this in mind.

That was the statement by Quebecers and this should never be forgotten. I began hanging around the National Assembly in 1960 and I have watched every Premier of Quebec very, very carefully. On June 3, 1987 Premier Bourassa went to the Conference Centre and I want to tell you that it had been a long time since I had heard a premier of the province of Quebec say: "This is a statement of love in Canada. I am proud to be a Canadian. This is a great day for Canada".

That was three years ago and we still have not concluded the deal today. It is time for Canada to say yes to these reasonable conditions of the province of Quebec.

TRANSPORT

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. This morning, Quebec truckers are blocking roads around Montreal to react to the disastrous impact of deregulation and free trade deals arranged by this government.

Already half a dozen Ontario trucking firms have moved to the United States. A Manitoba survey indicates that only 12 of the 84 provincial trucking companies will still be in business in four or five years. Being responsible for this major crisis, what measures does the Minister of Transport intend to take to protect this essential Canadian industry?

[English]

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would not be so quick to blame this on free trade. My hon. friend might, but I would not.

I think he will find that the dispute is between the various provinces and states along the border. That is where the dispute is. In fact, I had already taken the initiative to ask for a meeting with the Canadian Trucking Association some two or three weeks ago. The meeting will be this week. I intend to explore avenues wherein we can try to assist the trucking business in its efforts.

Hon. Lloyd Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): Mr. Speaker, the minister says this has nothing to do with free trade but, as the president of the Ontario Trucking Association has said, the level playing field is tilted 20 per cent toward the United States on taxes, on wage costs, on capital investment and on a whole series of measures that give them a substantial advantage, and this government is doing nothing to respond.

What will this government do to respond to the thousands of jobs that are being lost in the trucking industry and the movement of hundreds of trucking firms to the United States in order to protect a fundamental building-block in this country, our transportation system? This government has a responsibility. These are the government's policies. It must do something about it. When are we going to get the government's policy reaction?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, broad as the free trade agreement was, it did not contain anything about taxes and labour costs, and I think my hon. friend knows that.

We have a very solid transportation system in this country. From time to time there are adjustments that have to be made. I dismiss out of hand my hon. friend's suggestion that there are thousands and thousands of jobs being lost. That is simply not the case and he knows it.

Oral Questions

ANTI-SEMITISM

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Solicitor General. Over the past several days there have been three distinct acts of desecration and vandalism to cemeteries of Canadians of the Jewish faith. Over the same period other similar acts of desecration have occurred in Europe. These acts are an affront to all Canadians and manifest an intolerance and a hate that is unacceptable in our society.

Will the Solicitor General tell the House what steps he will take to assist local law enforcement to respond to these shameful acts?

Hon. Gerry Weiner (Secretary of State of Canada and Minister of State (Multiculturalism and Citizenship)): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister and all members of this House have condemned this abhorrent and cowardly act. It regretfully reminds all of us that racism and intolerance are just beneath the surface of our society. It is an outrage that offends and wounds all of us and I call on all Canadians to combat racism and bigotry wherever it is found.

We have very actively been moving our program into the race relations and cross-cultural understanding area. We have been bringing forward hundreds of initiatives to build partnerships so that every aspect of Canadian society can fully respond to our diversity and, once and for all, provide all our citizens with the equal opportunity, access and understanding that our citizenship demands.

Mr. Derek Lee (Scarborough—Rouge River): Mr. Speaker, Canadians are seeking to know more about the ignorance that lies behind these acts. The RCMP and the Solicitor General have access to police intelligence data which may be of assistance, both in apprehending those who committed the acts of desecration and in exposing any common links that may exist between these crimes.

Will the Solicitor General undertake to ensure the co-ordination and delivery of relevant federal police intelligence information to the local police forces involved?

Hon. Pierre H. Cadieux (Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, obviously the RCMP has communicated with the appropriate police authorities where these events occurred. Of course, we will continue to monitor and give whatever help and assistance we can.

TRADE

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade. In January, Canadian officials were asked about free trade with Mexico and said: "Mexico's level of development is so different from that of their northern neighbours that it is not realistic".

Now the minister is quoted as telling reporters that he is considering joining the U.S.-Mexico trade talks. Is the minister in fact considering such a step? If that is the case, could he tell us just one single benefit that there would be to Canada from such a stupid, ridiculous act?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the two countries involved, United States and Mexico, have not yet decided whether they are going to discuss this subject and the hon. gentleman has gone crazy that they even deign to discuss with one another whether they want to see if there should be a free trade arrangement.

Nor, Mr. Speaker, have we made any decision to join the non-existent talks, because you cannot join something that is non-existent.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, with his usual skill the minister has avoided answering the question. The fact is that these talks are being very actively taken forward by the United States and Mexico. The question is not whether we support those talks, it is whether we become part of that three-way process.

In the face of the 45,000 manufacturing jobs that we lost just last month, is the minister prepared to put more jobs at risk in Canada by putting us into low wage competition with the people of Mexico without discussion in this country?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, if the United States and Mexico choose to have discussions on a freer trade arrangement between Mexico and the United States, Canada will have a direct interest in such discussions.

Since over 70 per cent of all Canadian exports go to the United States market and something in the order of 65 per cent of all Mexican exports go to the United States market, we will have to make a decision, if there are such discussions, as to whether we want to be involved with the discussions so that we will know exactly what is being discussed and what the possibilities are because obviously the results will be important to Canada. That is a decision that the government has not yet made.

I can tell the House, as our Prime Minister did when he heard of the possibility of these discussions, that we very much admire the way the Mexican government is tackling the problems of Mexico. It is opening up Mexico to competition and imports, improving its exports and has joined the GATT. It has taken these steps in recent years to assist the 85 million Mexicans.

Why anybody in this House should be so against Mexicans trying to improve their lot by joining the world trading system and by improving their trade and prospects with Canada and the United States is beyond us. We want free trade everywhere in the world. We believe that Mexico should be encouraged on the course it is now on.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs. We are now in the second year of Canada's two-year term on the Security Council, yet this government has failed to introduce any specific initiatives to further the peace process in the Middle East.

With the current two-day session of the Security Council, what direction has the minister given to the ambassador to the United Nations to help break the impasse in the peace negotiations and encourage movement toward an international peace conference to resolve this serious conflict?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I have encouraged our ambassador and representative to the United Nations in this case, as in others, to use every means available to us to explore whether there is a useful role the Security Council might play in dealing with circumstances that become every day more dangerous.

Those discussions are going on. If there is a useful initiative which the Security Council can take, the Government of Canada will encourage that it be taken.

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, we all heard the reports of a dramatic increase in violence in the Middle East, particularly the occupied territories. What representations has the minister made on behalf of the Government of Canada to the Government of Israel on these recent events? Second, is the current situation in the Middle East on the agenda for the respective visits of the President of the Soviet Union and the Secretary General of the United Nations?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, at my instruction the Canadian Ambassador to Israel spoke today to Israeli government authorities to express Canada's shock and great concern at the increasing violence in the Middle East and to urge the Government of Israel to take appropriate steps to try to restrain the sources and incidents of that violence.

Mr. Prud'homme: Incidents?

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, I am not sure who speaks for the Liberal Party on questions relating to the Middle East. I am answering a question that has been put to me by the spokesman. If there is to be some freelancing done by the hon. member, let him stand up in his place and do it. Let him not pose questions from his seat.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the right hon. minister could conclude his answer.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Mr. Speaker, with regard to the second part of the question, yes, those matters will be discussed with Mr. Gorbachev and with the Secretary General of the United Nations during their respective visits to Canada.

FISHERIES

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister for International Trade. East coast lobster fishermen are facing a disastrous season this year, in part because of the uncertainty caused by U.S. legislation restricting the importation of Canadian lobsters.

Last fall the minister promised an early resolution of this uncertainty through the free trade panel, yet this panel report, which was due on May 15, was delayed until today, and now we learn it has been delayed once again.

Can the minister tell this House why the report of the panel has been delayed for a second time?

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the purpose, of course, of these procedures under the free trade agreement is to try to reach a settlement of any disputes that might arise. The panel report has been delayed until Friday at the request of Mrs. Hills and myself because we want to give the industry in both countries a chance to consider some arrangement that they might both find acceptable and that might deal with the problem. That is why the panel report is delayed until this coming Friday.

The process itself has, however, been remarkably quick. Under the GATT it probably would have been another year before we had a result such as the panel report will give us at the end of the week.

Point of Order

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the same minister. On December 14, he told this House that he considered the U.S. lobster legislation to be a trade distorting measure and promised to pursue this vigorously through the free trade panel. He said he thought we had a very strong case. Yet earlier this month we learned that the preliminary report seemed to be accepting the premises of the U.S. law.

In light of his meeting with the U.S. trade representative, Carla Hills, can the minister assure this House that the report of the panel will confirm this view and lead to the withdrawal of this trade distorting legislation, or are the lobster fishermen on the east coast now about to be abandoned just like the fish plant workers on the west coast were abandoned last fall?

• (1500)

Hon. John C. Crosbie (Minister for International Trade): Mr. Speaker, the rhetoric of the hon. gentleman's question is vastly exaggerated. Nobody has been abandoned.

Obviously this is something which could involve several different answers to the question, or the matter would not have gone to a panel for dispute resolution.

Were I the sole panellist there is no doubt what the decision would have been. However there were five panellists. The majority of them has reached a certain conclusion, as we will see next Friday and as the interim report indicated.

I can only say that no matter what conclusion the majority reached, we are hoping that the industries in both countries will agree on a settlement that they can both live with and which will be in the interests of both our countries as well as the lobster fishermen in both our countries. That is what we are trying to achieve.

Mr. Speaker: That concludes Question Period.

I will recognize the hon. member for Saint-Denis on a question of privilege and then the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean.

PRIVILEGE

THE MIDDLE EAST

Mr. Marcel Prud'homme (Saint-Denis): Mr. Speaker, the Right Hon. Secretary of State for External Affairs from time to time seems to forget that he is an ex-Prime Minister and my Secretary of State for External Affairs. He likes to play politics.

All I can say to him in response to his provocation is that I would be more than delighted to debate the question of the Middle East with him any time, at any hour, anywhere he wants.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Before I call on the hon. member for Lac-Saint-Jean, the hon. member for Skeena has a very quick point of order to correct the record.

POINT OF ORDER

CORRECTION OF COMMENTS MADE IN QUESTION PERIOD

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I erred in referring to the hon. member for Brandon—Souris earlier during Question Period. In fact I meant to refer to the hon. member for Calgary Southeast as can be confirmed by looking at page 11604 of Hansard.

PRIVILEGE

CHANGE OF PARTY AFFILIATION BY MEMBER FOR LAC-SAINT-JEAN

Hon. Lucien Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): Mr. Speaker, I entered politics late in life, under trying circumstances, but with the best of intentions. Two reasons prompted me to go into the lion's den. The first is the attraction of the beau risque, the worthy risk of co-operating with Mr. Mulroney. The second, Mr. Mulroney himself. In Sept-Îles, on a warm day in August 1984, he made the solemn commitment to bring this country together. I knew as well that he had met this commitment by having all provincial premiers sign the 1987 Accord which would enable Quebec to endorse formally the 1982 patriation.

The objective was clear: join the government team to help the Prime Minister obtain the ratification on which the implementation of the Accord was dependent.

It was with some hesitancy that I finally accepted the accord. Indeed, as early as 1982, I thought that some day English Canada would pay dearly to repair the breach of faith of 1982 and the historical harm done to its own reputation. When I first read the accord I had the impression that Quebec had made light of the fact that it had been humiliated and that it was justifiably indignant. Still, convinced that nothing better could be achieved, I finally concluded that we had to pull ourselves out of the ghetto and prostration where Pierre Trudeau's arrogant deception had confined us. I said to myself that we had to take that opportunity to turn the page on the bitterness of the recent past and, with Brian Mulroney, begin to write a glorious chapter highlighted by acts of faith, tolerant gestures and open dialogues.

Mr. Speaker, there are those who would say that these were mere words and that words do not mean much in politics. But it so happens that I come from a family, a background and a region where words are heart-felt. It is not mere chance if, for instance, the Prime Minister so often uses the word generosity. It is because, basically, he is a generous man.

I also thought that, if anything, the signature of the provincial premiers was sacred. Therefore, I had no reason to suspect that the Meech Lake Accord, bearing the signatures of the Premiers of New Brunswick, Manitoba and Newfoundland, would be dishonoured. There is something deeply shocking in the idea that the very people who chose not to honour the signatures of their predecessors are now trying to make Quebec bear the onus of their own guilt. The sharpest of the three, Mr. McKenna, even reminds me of the wolf that calls out for help to protect the sheepfold it has just ransacked.

Mr. Robichaud: Now, now, he is not here to defend himself.

Mr. Bouchard (Lac-Saint-Jean): All these gentlemen know full well that the negotiations did take place, that the compromises have been made and that Quebec came out of it bloodless after setting the extreme limit of its concessions precisely where proudness loses its meaning.

This is why any request for more concessions is an insult to its sense of honour. The report of the parliamentary committee advocates belittling the distinctiveness of Quebec's society by enshrining, in the same provision, the equality of New Brunswick's English- and French-speaking communities. I also have in mind the still greater dilution of the Accord as a result of the suggestion that the Charter of Rights and Freedoms be jointly applied. And I am concerned about the recommendation aimed at eliminating the unanimity rule to implement Senate reform, and about all the dangers which the ambiguous formula of a "regional approval" mechanism entails for Quebec's veto.

Above all, I consider as altogether unacceptable the recommendation to give Parliament and the federal government the role of promoting and not just preserving the linguistic duality, as stated in the Meech Lake Accord.

That is why I must speak out about the government's strategy to make this report the basis for discussions to call a First Ministers' Conference. I do not doubt Mr. Mulroney's intentions but by conferring this status on the report, the government is, in fact, forming an alliance with the very parties that would impose humiliating terms on Quebec. This report accredits practically every attempt by enemies of Meech Lake to dilute the Accord and deal a fatal blow to Quebec. The report should never have existed. I disapprove of it utterly, and I see no alternative but to leave this government—be it with feelings of pain and anguish—as well as the Conservative caucus, to sit as an independent member.

I implore the Premier of Quebec to avoid falling into the trap that has now been set. I ask him here and now to spare Quebecers one more insult, one more blow to their pride, one more ostracism. I can honestly say that for two years I have constantly supported Mr. Bourassa in his efforts to protect the integrity of the Accord. Today, I say to him that if he refuses to attend a conference where this committee's report will be on the agenda, he will have not only my support but that of all Quebecers, from Montmagny to Rouyn, from Quebec City to Montreal, from Roberval to Baie-Comeau.

I urge Mr. Bourassa to accept as a framework for discussion only the resolution that was passed by the National Assembly in a great move towards unity, a prelude to the new surge of energy that will put Quebec in charge of its own destiny. Let clever politicians, those arsonists disguised as firemen, those sorcerer's apprentices, come and tell us here in Ottawa, before the people, before past, present and future generations, whether or not they repudiate signatures that were freely given, at that time of grace in the national life of this country, at sunrise on June 3, 1987.

Mr. Speaker, enough of this hypocrisy! Let the real culprits take off their masks, or if they cannot stand the light of day or fear the judgment that history will pass on them, let them be inspired by Macdonald and Cartier and look to the future, our children's future, and then reach out to the fraternal hand Quebec still offers, perhaps for the last time.

• (1510)

Mr. Speaker, with your leave, in concluding I would like to say to all my colleagues, to the Conservative ministers and members, that it was an honour to serve with them. Ties of solidarity and friendship were forged. I told the Prime Minister in my letter and at our meeting yesterday how much I appreciated him. I wish them all good luck and assure them of my support for the policies I had the privilege of developing with them.

Mr. Speaker: Of course, I well understand that some hon. members would like to speak on the statement made by our hon. colleague, but the Standing Orders do not provide for it. Therefore, we shall resume debate on the order of the day.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-43, an act respecting abortion, as reported (without amendment) from a legislative committee.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): We will now move to Motion No. 24.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): moved:

Motion No. 24

That Bill C-43 be amended in Clause 1 by striking out lines 5 to 24 at page 1 and lines 1 to 16 at page 2 and substituting the following therefor:

"code are repealed."

She said: Mr. Speaker, my amendment would turn Bill C-43 into a simple housekeeping bill rather than an act to recriminalize abortion.

Criminalization of abortion is wrong. It does not prevent unwanted pregnancies, which is why women and girls seek abortion. It does not ensure access to abortion services.

This bill is somewhat like making food illegal and then saying that the government will ensure that everyone has access to a grocery store. It makes no sense.

It does not stop legal cases or strike down provincial abortion laws. It seems to create another legal tool to base legal cases on. Provincial laws will not just disappear as a result of this bill, as some would have us believe. As both the Minister of Justice and the Minister of National Health and Welfare are so fond of saying, health is under provincial jurisdiction. The provinces can enact laws regulating medical services at any time they want. These constitutional powers are in no way affected by the presence or absence of a federal criminal law, as constitutional lawyers across this country have told us.

Criminalization does not fill a regulatory vacuum. The Canadian Medical Association and provincial colleges of physicians and surgeons already have guidelines concerning abortion. It is illegal to practise medicine in Canada without a licence.

We have been without a law now since 1988. For more than two years there has been no criminal law on abortion. Criminalization will not make this issue go away. We know that. We have listened to the people on both sides of this issue. It is not an issue in society that is simply going to disappear quietly because there is new criminal law passed.

There will be court challenges. There will be court challenges within a year if this measure passes. All it takes is someone like Barbara Dodd who changed her mind. She could lay an information saying that she knew, and that her doctor knew, that she was not coming in and asking for an abortion because of health reasons.

Some pro-choice Tories in this House have turned a blind eye to the ramifications of this bill. They think that hardly anyone is going to be charged, or they have said that it is unlikely that people will be charged, doctors or women.

We do not have criminal laws so that no one will be charged. A criminal law is a serious matter in this country. Henry Morgentaler spent time in jail for breaking the last abortion law. We have heard already from doctors who say that they will openly disobey this law because it is an insulting and a hypocritical law. They say that they will perform abortions because the woman wants one for her own reasons, not for reasons acceptable only to the state.

It is surprising to me to see pro-choice Tories turn a blind eye and to support state control of women's bodies and women's private decisions. The Tories are the ones that go on ad nauseam in this House about privacy, about deregulation, and about as little government control as possible. Yet this is the very same government that wants to dictate to women on their reproductive health.

This bill is wrong. Why do members on the other side feel that they must compromise their values and their principles on this bill?

This is supposed to be, we are told, a free vote. Members did not seem to compromise when it came to the issue of capital punishment.

There is no reason for this bill. The country has operated fine for the last two years without a criminal law on abortion.

The amendment I propose will wipe out the bill leaving only one sentence stating: "Section 287 and 288 of the Criminal Code are repealed". This will have the effect of getting rid of the sections of the Criminal Code that were invalidated by the 1988 criminal court decision in Morgentaler, formerly sections 251 and 252.

If my amendment passes, that will be the whole bill. There will be no recriminalization of abortion.

Anyone in this House who calls themself pro-choice must vote for this amendment. This is the only pro-choice amendment proposed to this House. It does not escape notice that all the amendments proposed this morning were proposed by men, and that all of those amendments would make the legislation even more regressive, even more restrictive to women, than the present bill.

The Liberals and the Tories have proposed only amendments that would make this bill far more restrictive. I know these amendments have come from a minority of Liberals and a minority of Tories.

Thus I appeal to the pro-choice Conservatives and to the pro-choice Liberals in this House to vote for this amendment. Do not let those severe anti-choice amendments stand as your parties' position on reproductive choice.

The amendment I propose is for all pro-choice members in the House of Commons. It is for people in this House who value the integrity of Canadian women and who respect the decisions of Canadian women.

I appeal to all members to put aside whatever party pressures there may be, and vote for this amendment, Motion No. 24. There is a chance for pro-choice members to speak out and show all Canadians that they do have integrity, that they do care about women, that they will vote for their conscience.

I would like to see the Minister of Justice, the Minister responsible for the Status of Women and the Minister of Employment and Immigration vote for this amendment. It is the only pro-choice position. Just because they are being coerced by the Prime Minister and by their paramount commitment to their own political careers to vote against their consciences on the bill, does not mean that they should vote against the amendment.

This is a way out. If this amendment passes, the House will have spoken. The House will have voted against the ineffective approach to the abortion issue for an effective and a compassionate approach.

In this situation criminal legislation is not the answer. Social policy is the answer. Family planning education, research into safe and effective contraception, support for pregnant women and their families are the truly effective approaches to this question.

It is too late now to change peoples' minds about their own philosophical position. It is going to be impossible for me to convince the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell to vote for my amendment.

I appeal to all of you who share my philosophical point of view, who do care about women, who do believe in reproductive freedom, to vote, for the only pro-choice amendment before the House of Commons and cast your ballot for choice. Cast your ballot for the integrity of Canadian women.

• (1520)

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, I will address some of the points that have been made by the last speaker in the third reading debate.

I rise today in response to the motions put forward for debate at the report stage of Bill C-43, an act respecting abortion.

[Translation]

You already know, Mr. Speaker, that the provisions contained in Bill C-43 are the result of a very long process, of a careful examination of the question, of many consultations and months of study and deliberation to answer this difficult question in the most just and moderate way.

[English]

This bill has been carefully drafted to achieve a delicate balance between the conflicting views on the abortion issue.

It complies with the ruling of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Morgentaler case with respect to a woman's constitutional right to security of the person guaranteed in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and to reflect the societal interest in the protection of the foetus.

Clearly, abortion is one of the most divisive issues facing Canadians today.

I am strongly of the opinion that Bill C-43 reflects a balance of the views of the Canadian people in a way that will be acceptable to the majority of Canadians.

It is our role as parliamentarians to bring forward legislation that reasonably reflects the various views and interests of Canadian society in a manner acceptable to that majority of Canadians, and that respects constitutional guarantees.

It is not our role as parliamentarians simply to continue to articulate a particular side of the debate. We must act in the interests of all Canadians.

[Translation]

The highest court in the land recognized this responsibility by stating in the Morgentaler affair that its role was to examine the laws to determine whether the legislative balance of particular interests complies with constitutional guarantees but that it is first and foremost Parliament's task to achieve this balance.

Mr. Speaker, we have taken time and effort to reach an acceptable solution on abortion, in the best interest of Canadians, while respecting and reflecting the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

For many people, it was necessary to seek an accommodation and to recognize that in order to find a basis of agreement on this difficult question, and I emphasize, a basis of agreement that respects differing opinions and constitutional guarantees, we must set aside our personal opinions and act in the interest of Canadians whom we represent.

[English]

The legislative committee which examined Bill C-43 and has now presented its report to this House clearly accepted this challenge.

Following months of hearings, including testimony from many individuals and groups expressing strong views at either end of the spectrum of opinion on abortion, the committee recognized its duty to attempt to strike a fair balance between the rights and interests of women and society's concern that the foetus be protected.

The legislative committee has approved Bill C-43 without amendment, and I commend its members for the thoughtful considerations they have given to their examination of the proposed legislation.

As parliamentarians we must assume our responsibilities to bridge the gap created by the divergent views which we and our fellow Canadians hold with respect to the matter of abortion.

Bill C-43 is our best effort at bringing forward a law that will withstand a constitutional challenge. It is a balance that addresses the protection of a woman's security of the person, as identified in the Morgentaler judgment, while providing recognition to society's interest in the protection of the foetus.

[Translation]

If we change the bill by accepting any of the proposed amendments in the motions presented, I am quite afraid that the fragile balance we reached in the bill will be broken and that we will pass an unconstitutional law or even go against the objective sought.

[English]

The motions to amend Bill C–43 which are before the House reflect the strong divergent views held by the partisans on either side of the abortion debate. Obviously, this law will not satisfy these members. Only absolute positions would do that.

It would be my hope that these members not condemn this bill for not reflecting their own personal positions, but recognize its ability to respond to the concerns of their fellow Canadians in a manner that is understandable, workable and fair.

[Translation]

Without going into the details of each motion before you, I wish to make the following general remarks on the effect of the various proposals to be debated.

[English]

You have several motions before you, Mr. Speaker, which, if adopted, would serve to remove or restrict the definition of health or the standard of health required by the proposed legislation, or require exceptional medical circumstances in order for an abortion to be induced.

The imposition of a "serious threat to health" or that a requirement that a woman be in a life-threatening situation in order for an abortion to be performed at any stage in a woman's pregnancy, would be contrary to the reasoning of the Supreme Court of Canada in Morgentaler, and thereby jeopardize the constitutional validity of Bill C–43.

In addition, the definition of "health" in this bill explicitly refers to psychological health in order to comply with the ruling in Morgentaler.

Removal of this ground would, therefore, increase the risk that there would be a successful challenge under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Increasing the severity of punishment for inducing an abortion outside the exemptions permitted by law from two to 20 years would have an adverse effect on the constitutionality of the bill, as would attempting to regulate the pre-implantation stage by abortion legislation.

[Translation]

In Bill C–43, we are trying to respect both the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Morgentaler case and society's interest in protecting the foetus.

Any amendment to the bill that could be perceived as unfairly favouring the state's interest in protecting the foetus to the detriment of the woman's constitutional right to security of the person could endanger the legislation's constitutional validity.

[English]

I have policy concerns as well with the motions that would remove the legal protection afforded nurses or other medical staff who assist a doctor in the performance of an abortion or would suggest that a doctor's opinion based on the generally accepted standards of the medical profession would not normally be based on scientific knowledge.

Two of the motions proposed would serve to defeat completely the purpose of Bill C–43—first, by allowing abortions to be induced by any person provided the woman consents; and, second, by repealing the current abortion provisions in the Criminal Code without enacting any replacement.

To suggest that the bill be withdrawn in its entirety does not recognize our responsibility as members of Parliament to bring forward a law that is constitutionally valid and addresses the protection of a woman's security of the person, while providing recognition to society's interest in the protection of the foetus.

I have stated repeatedly that it is our duty to attempt to strike a balance of interests that reflects the various views and interests of our constitutents and respects constitutional guarantees.

[Translation]

I have tremendous respect for the process by which Bill C–43 was drawn up.

Because of the fragile balance achieved in the bill, people of opposing opinions support it.

I believe that it is extremely important to continue to respect the balance that Bill C–43 reflects.

That is why I am afraid that if any of the motions before the House pass, Bill C–43 may not be adopted on third reading.

[English]

Any of the proposed amendments, if adopted, would likely upset the political balance sufficiently to alienate support for Bill C–43 from those holding opposing views.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I believe that the abortion issue must be settled by Parliament and not just by the courts.

It is up to us to deal with this issue.

That is why Bill C–43 was presented and why hon. members must support it.

[English]

I therefore strongly recommend that we support Bill C–43 by voting against all of the amendments proposed in the motions before this House. In this manner, we will ensure the successful passing of this bill into law.

We will thereby fulfil our responsibilities as parliamentarians in having introduced an abortion law which provides safeguards for Canadian women and reflects society's interest in the protection of the foetus, while at the same time respecting the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

[Translation]

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I apologize for not being in the House. Actually I should have spoken before the minister, but I am glad I had a chance to listen to her speech. I would like to say first of all that the Official Opposition has recognized the right of its members to a free vote on this difficult and fundamental issue.

• (1530)

Some very strong views are held on this side as well, and I would also like to take a few minutes, at the report stage of this bill, to explain my own.

Despite the respect just shown by the minister for the process used before the committee that considered this bill, I think we should point out that the committee ignored, and the government ignored and refused to consider, the tenor of the testimony brought before this committee.

I believe the government decided from the outset that it would refuse to accept any amendments and would reject all testimony to the effect that this is a bill that contains many problems. There are problems with the principle and with the moral perspective. This is not a bill that takes an honest approach to the position it reflects. That is basically what should be said.

I said I have my own position, and it is that the Supreme Court of Canada was right to suggest that first of all, we should respect the right of women to chose freely to have or want to have an abortion.

In this respect, the government's bill does not work because in the framework of this bill, there is no provision for having access to the services of a doctor to have an abortion in the first stages of pregnancy. Before the woman has access to medical services, she must first have the permission of those services. To me, this goes against the judgment of the Supreme Court of Canada.

I have asked the government to make a referral to the Supreme Court of Canada to find out whether the legislation is constitutional. I have my doubts, and practically all the witnesses we heard said the same.

Mr. Speaker, the problem I have with the situation in which we are in now is that pretty soon we will have a ruling by the Supreme Court of Canada on whether or not the bill is legal. Unfortunately, this will happen when we have a pregnant woman who has problems, as in the case of Chantal Daigle and in so many other cases in this country. That is how we are going to determine whether or not this bill is constitutional.

I am very sorry that the government, possibly because of male chauvinist leanings, decided to ignore legal advice and go ahead with some very questionable legislation. In my opinion, in line with the views of the Supreme Court of Canada, in the later stages of pregnancy there are interests respecting the foetus that must be recognized and which we were asked to recognize. Some of the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada expected our committee would hear witnesses that would expound their ideas on the development of a human being that, during pregnancy, becomes a being worthy of legal recognition. And then, in the context of the testimony received, the committee would be able to establish a system that would strike a balance between the very important and legitimate interests of the woman and the emerging interests of the foetus.

This the government refused to do, and the Speaker felt that my amendment to establish this system was out of order. I accept that decision.

As I said, I accept that it was out of order but I regret very much that on the principle, the government did not decide to listen to the witnesses and to create a system recognizing the rights of women, even though some of those witnesses did not want to admit that at a certain point in the pregnancy, other interests come into play but for me—I insist—and for the Supreme Court of Canada, the interests of the foetus deserve to be recognized and protected as much as those of the mother.

Mr. Speaker, we know, as the minister just suggested, that all the amendments before us must be rejected. I deplore it. I will vote against this legislation which neither respects the right to life nor recognizes the rights of women.

Consequently, I personnally think that it is an hypocritical piece of legislation that does not deserve to be adopted by the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec–Est): Mr. Speaker, this is for me both a duty and a pleasure to debate today in this House this abortion bill. This is a very emotional issue for all hon. members and it forms an integral part of the legal and moral approach of all Canadian men and women in general and my Quebec–Est constituents in particular.

As you know, Mr. Speaker, a great many things were said, a great many opinions were expressed both individually and collectively, and sometimes emotion wins over reason; that is why I felt further thought needed to be given to the matter. Finally, I have come to the realization that, fortunately or not the greater the information gathered from all sources, the harder it became for me to make up my mind.

Yet, Mr. Speaker, I feel I must share with you all the result of this reflection which, in my humble opinion, can only serve to enhance the various sentiments expressed to date. Here are some ideas:

According to Ronald D. Elving, "abortion is now and will remain for many years a politician's nightmare". There is nobody in the House, I believe, who disagrees with this opinion, and it could be said also that this is a societal concern.

Unanimity exists only on two points, namely, that first the abortion issue is highly charged with emotion and second that opinions are highly polarized.

Mr. Speaker, can we reasonably hope to achieve soon a consensus which could make the legislation acceptable to the majority?

I would rather hope so. As Paul Valéry wrote: "There always comes a day when a clever man can define in three words the essential of a doctrine which all until then had deemed absolutely incomprehensible".

Of course, I do not think I am such a man, but anybody can seek to hasten the coming of this liberator. The three key elements are perhaps the distinctions on which we should insist.

The first is the basic distinction between the legal and the moral aspects of the matter.

Mr. Speaker, it is always difficult for a layman to view an issue the way the legislator does. Why?

Because when considering an issue, the legislator must keep in mind the good of society, the need to preserve law and order in a society while seeking the common good which dissensions can only jeopardize.

A legislator who is against abortion could vote in favour of a legislation which makes it possible, while not authorizing it, if he felt that it were necessary for the good of society.

A second basic distinction is that between objective and subjective morality.

Objective morality considers things in the abstract dealing with their principles and not their application. It looks at abortion from a general viewpoint without considering the individual case which a real human being confronted with the realities of life has to deal with.

The way a person deals with the abortion issue as such depends on how he or she sees the foetus. There is not much of a consensus on this.

• (1540)

For some people the foetus is a part of the mother's body, for others it is just a group of cells, for some it acquires value over time, for others still it is a human being from the moment of conception.

The moral judgment on abortion varies. For some it is as simple as having a tooth pulled, for others it is murder.

Under the strictest moral, meaning Catholic moral, the foetus is a human being from the moment of conception, it has the strict right to live and the state must uphold that right. Therefore it may never be killed directly even to save the mother's life. Under this moral the end never justifies the means. Abortion therefore can never be a means to the best of ends.

We seem to be in an impasse, Mr. Speaker, but when certain Catholic theologians want to apply the official thought to real life, complex as it is in most instances, they do make exceptions by introducing very significant nuances, for these people make a distinction between "doctrinal" and "pastoral" speech. It is not unlike the well-known distinction made by legal experts between principles and their application.

Some of these theologians accept even direct abortion in certain cases, say to save the mother's life, in cases of rape, and others. Others find situations where abortion is the least of two evils. Still others make distinctions: do not allow, but do not penalize; do not allow, but make it possible, and so on.

Even more than moralists, legislators will have to take these compromises into consideration. Above all they will have to take into account the personal conscience that each individual looks upon as the rule which guides one's conduct. Keep in mind that the moral which says one is never allowed to kill a foetus also says one is never allowed to act against one's own conscience. Pro-lifers have no use whatsoever for the subjective moral and the key role which conscience must play in human life.

When legislators are on the verge of passing legislation on abortion they ought not to forget subjective morality. The more numerous the various opinions on this issue, the greater the role of personal conscience. They ought not to forget that there are Canadians who are not at all convinced that the foetus is a human being or even a living being from the moment of conception, and that destroying it is always a murder.

Mr. Speaker, a major question which my fellow citizens of Québec-Est often put to me is this: Should the government legislate in this matter? If it did not, the abortion issue would be like so many others which are not covered by law. These problems relate to morals and personal conscience.

Would abortion be more frequent if there were no law? That is a moot point. Apparently the number of murders did not go up after the death penalty was abolished. An abortion is not the kind of operation which a woman is happy to undergo. As the doctors have pointed out in their brief, the procedure is hard on everyone involved. The best protection for the foetus' right to life is built in the human heart by moral values and not by a law, however wise and strict it may be.

So, if Bill C-43 does not pass, it should not be seen as a tragedy.

On what criteria then should the drafting of a law be based in order to be wise will you ask me, Mr. Speaker? I will answer that the wise legislator must remember that he is not a moralist, in spite of his moral convictions. He must not try to impose his personal convictions on everybody through a law. It is hard, however, not to forbid others what one forbids oneself.

The wise legislator must take into account the society for whom he is legislating and the era we live in. In a hundred years from now, things might be different. Our ways may have changed and some of our existing laws may then seem quite inhuman.

The wise legislator must also take into account subjective moral values as well as individual conscience, especially considering we are dealing with a field in which there is no unanimity within a given set of values.

We all know, Mr. Speaker, that not so long ago, the Supreme Court required two conditions to be met for fear of being brought back before the courts and having to go through the whole process all over again.

The first constraint was that it considered section 251 of the Criminal Code to be unconstitutional because women had to go through the too time-consuming process of the therapeutic abortion committee comprised of three doctors who had to give their "consent".

And as for the second constraint, the Chief Justice said that it was unacceptable to force a woman under threat of criminal penalty to carry a foetus to term.

I have heard some people tell me that abortion is nothing more nor less than a medical procedure. But, Mr. Speaker, considering abortion as a medical procedure does not mean that it is not at the same time and more fundamentally a moral act, as is every action taken deliberately or voluntarily and freely. If abortion is a medical procedure, Bill C-43 makes it a crime for anyone but a physician to perform an abortion. That is as it should be.

However, when the Canadian Medical Association maintains that abortion must be considered in the same way as other medical procedures, some nuances should be added.

From the strictly medical point of view, it is a medical procedure like others. But from a moral point of view, it is a very different kind of medical procedure. Indeed, as the Hon. Jake Epp said, "it is the only medical procedure that involves taking the life of an unborn child as a way to improve the quality of life for someone else, namely, the pregnant woman."

Mr. Speaker, Bill C-43 takes account of the Supreme Court judgement that, in ruling section 251 invalid, wanted the procedure to be less cumbersome.

Instead of three physicians, there will be only one. This reduction would be acceptable if the decision were made "after objective analysis of all other possible solutions", as the CMA's brief to the legislative committee says. But we must ensure that this analysis has been done properly. At one in his trials, Dr. Morgentaler admitted that he did nothing of the kind. In short, he performed abortion on demand, which is unacceptable; no surgical operation is performed on demand.

If Parliament decided to have a sort of committee do this analysis, this committee would have to be very flexible. First of all, the ultimate goal of such a committee should be to have as many women as possible who want to interrupt their pregnancy carry it to term by helping them to make an enlightened and responsible decision. Otherwise, the number of abortions will not go down and the fine statements in favour of respect for life will come to naught.

However, this committee would not have to grant approval: it would simply confirm that the analysis the CMA mentioned had been done.

The woman involved would then make her decision by herself, thus respecting the moral aspect of this medical procedure since the conscience regulates morality: "Those who act according to their conscience, even when misguided, as long as they show goodwill, also obey the laws of God since they follow the first and only true principle of listening to their conscience". This is Saint Thomas Aquinas's moral philosophy. An act in keeping with the person's conscience is subjectively good even if it is a crime in itself.

In a sphere where there is no unanimity, even among supporters of the Catholic moral code, we must compensate for the often denounced vagueness of reasons for abortion by putting more faith into the sense of morality of the people involved. While the Catholic religion does not allow abortions under any circumstances, it makes them possible by invoking the first precept of the Catholic ethic: "Obey your conscience".

As for the second constraint imposed by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court, no sanctions should be taken against the people involved, such as doctors and nurses, as long as they follow the procedure outlined in the legislation.

Bernard Haring wrote: "Almost everywhere abortions performed by a physician for vital or simply therapeutic purposes are left unpunished". In terms of morality, not allowing is one thing but not punishing is another.

Finally, the bill extends the notion of health to mental and psychological health.

A legislator tormented by his conscience could include the "particularly painful cases" Haring was talking about.

Julien Harvey seemed to reassure them when he wrote: "The mother's distress and not only her physical health can justify, in conscience and in law, an abortion as a lesser evil in the first quarter of pregnancy, a restriction that a long religious tradition in the West allows us to contemplate". This can be found in the September issue of Relations, at page 196.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, an abortion law would not come into conflict with the principles of Catholic morality, the most rigid of moral doctrines, as long as it contained the four following provisions: making abortion a crime when it is performed by a person other than a physician and providing for appropriate penalties; outlining a way of doing the "objective analysis of all the alternatives" the CMA was referring to; making the pregnant woman responsible for her own decision; not imposing penalties when this procedure has been followed.

This, Mr. Speaker, is only a very small part of my reflections. We could talk about it for hours but I would like to close by saying I will give the government my total support when we vote on this bill which of course is not perfect but, under the circumstances, tries to conciliate the various positions.

[English]

Mr. George Proud (Hillsborough): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on Motion No. 10 to Bill C–43, as proposed by my hon. colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. This amendment, if adopted, would allow abortions to be performed only if the mother's life was threatened by the continuation of the pregnancy.

• (1550)

Since Bill C–43 first came before this House, various groups have presented their views to the legislative committee on an act respecting abortions. Thousands of Canadians have written to their members of Parliament, and several members of this House have proposed amendments to the bill.

The conviction of the people in the riding of Hillsborough, who I represent, has not wavered. The majority of my constituents and I believe that human life begins at conception, and it must be protected by law at all stages. With such a conviction, I cannot support Bill C–43 unless it is amended. The life of the unborn child must be protected by law and I could only support a bill which provides such protection.

I did vote for Bill C–43 at second reading, but I supported it so that the bill would go to a legislative committee where amendments could be proposed that would fully protect the life of the unborn child.

Even as I voted for it at second reading, I knew that the only exception to the full protection of the foetus which I could ultimately support, would provide that an abortion could be performed to save the mother's life. That is what the motion I am discussing proposes to do. If it is not adopted, then I cannot possibly support the bill.

If Bill C–43 were to pass as is, an abortion would be legal when performed for health reasons, whether for mental, physical or psychological factors. This is a flimsy disguise for abortion on demand, and Canadians will not condone such hypocrisy. Pro–abortion advocates would have us believe that if we deny women access to abortion on demand, we are denying them basic health care. I have several problems with that argument, but the most fundamental one is that we are dealing with two human lives here, not one.

I am horrified that anyone could say that a procedure which kills one human being for the convenience of another is a medical procedure. Abortion is the killing of a human being, and a helpless one at that. If we do not ensure that abortions are performed only to save the mother's life, then our society will be condoning abortion on demand.

We hear a great deal about freedom of choice. The rallying cry of the pro–abortion forces is that every woman must have the freedom to choose whether or not to bear children. I wholeheartedly agree that everyone must have the freedom to choose, but I say that the time for this choice is before conception takes place.

The choice to be made is whether to take the risk of conception occurring at all. Once a choice has been made and a human being has been created, the woman and her family have different choices to make. It is not true that after a pregnancy has begun there are no other options. The pro–abortion groups would have us believe it is a black and white situation, but that is not true.

Thousands of Canadian couples are infertile and long for a child of their own. Waiting lists at adoption agencies are years long. The so–called black market in babies exists, and the emergence of surrogate motherhood is evidence of the desperate longing of infertile couples to have children.

There are loving, stable homes for babies born to women whose families cannot support them. In view of this, abortion on demand is an act of pure selfishness. I am not pretending that unwanted pregnancies are trivial or that they are easy experiences for people to live through. No one would deny that women with unwanted pregnancies, and their families, deserve all the support that we can give them during a very difficult time.

Support is the key, not denial. A healthy, humane, caring society must address the situation of unwanted pregnancies and not pretend that they do not happen. Abortion is a denial of the problem of unwanted pregnancy, and it is a denial of responsibility. Above all, it is a fundamental denial of the value of human life.

Bill C–43 completely fails to address the painful issue that is troubling this country's conscience. It fails to provide leadership on this fundamental, social and moral issue, which are the factors that drive women to seek abortions.

Abortion is not an answer to poverty, rape, sexual abuse, family violence or teenage pregnancy. It must not be allowed to become an escape from responsibility, either for the individual or for our society as a whole. I stated that I believe in the sanctity of human life, and that life begins at conception. Like all humans, unborn children deserve the full protection of the law. How can any civilized society which professes to care for the rights of the individual, which professes to be a world leader in human rights, deny these rights to one group simply because they are at a different stage of life. It is not a less valuable stage, not a less human stage, just a different stage, a totally vulnerable stage.

Our society has many problems to solve, such as the problem which led us to this dreadful situation in which thousands of abortions were performed every year. However, Bill C–43 as it stands is not an answer because abortion is not an answer. Bill C–43 must be amended to fully protect human life from conception onward. Only when the mother's life is threatened can abortion be considered an option, and with the advances in medical technology being made every day, I believe that this scenario has become an extremely rare one.

Mr. Speaker, if the motion of my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell is not adopted and if we do not change this bill so that the rights of the unborn child are fully protected by law, then I must vote against this bill.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate most sincerely the opportunity to say a few words at report stage of Bill C–43, which as you are well aware, deals with the sensitive and very controversial issue of abortion.

My own views with respect to this matter of abortion are well known. I have spoken out in my own riding over the years, I have spoken out in other parts of Canada and I have spoken out in this House on numerous occasions, the last time being on November 23 of last year in the debate on second reading. In each case I made it quite clear where I stood, that I stand clearly and firmly on the pro–life side of the scale.

The bill before us at report stage has certain elements. As I pointed out in my remarks in this House on November 23 of last year, these elements support the pro–life position, in particular, the bill provides that abortion is an offence under the Criminal Code. It also rejects, and rejects quite clearly, the gestational approach to abortion and therefore it recognizes implicitly, if not explicitly, that life does begin at conception.

Having said that in my remarks at second reading, the bill as it now stands at report stage, is an extremely disappointing one for me. It is a bill which has many exemptions and a bill that is far wider than the sort of legislation that I would like to see before this House.

I had hoped that we would see some substantial amendments to this bill after it passed second reading and went to a legislative committee where the committee had an opportunity to examine it clause by clause to hear witnesses and to make amendments. I have been a member of numerous legislative committees in the past where very substantial amendments were made to legislation. Certainly I had hoped most fervently that we would see those kinds of amendments come from the legislative committee and that the bill at report stage would be an entirely different one from the one we see before us today.

Clearly, that did not happen and it has left me with a deep, extreme and profound sense of disappointment about what has happened to this bill. At the same time that presents me with a supreme dilemma, a dilemma of whether I am now in a position to support Bill C–43 in an unamended stage or not.

• (1600)

I do not like this bill. The Prime Minister has indicated that it is a free vote for other members of this House, but it is not a free vote for members of cabinet. That is a position that has left me deeply troubled. It has left me struggling with my conscience. It has left me with many sleepless nights. It has left me doing a great deal of praying as I am, quite frankly, right at this very moment.

I have come to the conclusion that this particular bill, no matter whether it passes this House or whether it does not pass this House, will not be the end of the great struggle for the pro-life side of the argument, for the pro-life movement on this issue. If this particular bill is defeated in this House, the pro-life struggle is going to continue. If this particular bill passes this House, the pro-life struggle is still going to continue.

Bearing in mind that no matter what happens to this particular legislation the struggle is going to go on, I have to face in my heart whether it is going to further the pro-life cause and further my own pro-life convictions to have one less voice in cabinet in support of the pro-life position and, in all likelihood, to have one more pro-choice voice in cabinet contrary to the pro-life position.

As I say, I have struggled long and I have struggled hard and I still continue to struggle with this. I suspect that after the votes are cast, I will continue to search my soul and my heart on this particular issue.

However, I have come to the conclusion that, because this is not the end of the struggle and because the pro-life position is going to go on whether this bill passes or is defeated, rightly or wrongly, I am going to support this bill.

If I am wrong in that decision, then without a doubt it is the absolute duty of those who believe I am wrong to work their hardest and do their utmost to ensure my defeat at the next election.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak on the amendments to Bill C-43, and in particular to support Motion No. 24.

I do this because I believe that a compassionate society and a Parliament elected to represent society's needs and society's wishes does not need to return to a time when women were criminals for exercising the most fundamental of human rights, that right being the personal care and control of one's body. Reproductive choice is a basic and fundamental right.

I rise also to argue that the role of Parliament is not to imprison women forced to make difficult decisions, but rather to provide the leadership, the process and the money for better prevention of unplanned pregnancies, and to ensure that every child born in this nation and every woman who chooses to be a mother has the opportunity to live a full and rich life, a life free of poverty, ignorance, violence and abuse.

We are not the first, nor will we be the last society to debate abortion. This has been an issue of conflict throughout history. If there is one thing that we have learned from history, it is that no matter what the law, or how tough the sanctions, abortion will happen. Abortions, if they are not performed legally in medical facilities under the direction of a physician, will happen in much less favourable circumstances. As ugly as it may seem, women must not be forced to return to those ugly circumstances of using coat hangers, vacuum cleaners, or putting themselves in the hands of quacks. It is an ugly reality, but it is a reality. Women die as a result of these kinds of processes. Young women are sterilized as a result of these kinds of procedures. The reality is that any amendment that puts abortion back in the Criminal Code will sentence some women somewhere in Canada to sterility or to death. That is not supporting life.

The bill before us and the amendments being debated today in many ways define the fundamental value and inherent dignity of each human being and the worth of each human life.

[Translation]

This debate cannot be used to convince people. That is impossible, and if we, as legislators, keep trying to do so, we would be losing our time and we would not be serving our constituents. What we ought to do is define the common goals we should strive to attain, which are to glorify life, to respect life and to reduce the number of abortions.

On one side, there are those who believe that to legislate criminal sanctions is the only way to reach our goals. On the other, there are those, like myself, who believe that the only way to reach our end is to develop social and economic policies which would ensure that every child, every woman, and even every family is respected and even glorified.

[English]

We have made this realization in other areas. It was not that long ago that attempting suicide was a criminal offence which appeared in the Criminal Code. Statistically, suicide attempts are most prevalent among young men and teenage boys. So do we threaten today to fill the prisons with young men attempting suicide? Do we believe that criminal sanctions will actually reduce the number of attempts? Of course not. We know that it is an emotional issue. It is an issue that needs to be dealt with in other ways.

We responded by removing attempted suicide from the Criminal Code and putting the emphasis where it belongs, on prevention and support. That was the right thing to do, just as ensuring that abortion remains decriminalized is the right thing to do.

There has been much said during this debate about respect for human life, about how our society and our nation is based on this respect. I say to the members of this Chamber and to Canadians everywhere, words are not enough. It is much easier for us to stand here and to legislate than to bend down and offer a helping hand to a child who has been abused, a woman who is tormented, or an unemployed father who is wondering how he is going to feed his family. The answer is clearly that this must be, and regardless of the law we pass here will continue to be, the choice of women.

I would like to draw this House's attention to what I think is a very good statement. This statement was made on July 27, 1988, in this House by the present Minister of Employment and Immigration who stated:

> And make no mistake, women make the right choice, a far better choice than you or I or all the pageantry of institutions that have been invented by human beings from the beginning of time.

I agree with that statement made by the Minister of Employment and Immigration. I believe she was reflecting that women are adults, that women can make the right choices, and whatever any institution decides to do, we will not be able to control the decisions of women. It must be the choice of all women. We know that women of wealth and power have options, and part of what we are debating today is whether or not that freedom will be extended to all women.

• (1610)

All women, not just the wealthy, must be free to decide the number and the spacing of their children. All children have the right to be raised in a family capable of providing housing and food and proper nurturing. All children have the right to be raised in a family free of violence and abuse.

If anyone believes that they can lay claim to a respect for life because they legislated against abortion, while voting for cuts to child care, cuts to shelters for abused women, cuts to job creation, cuts to prenatal health and prevention, then they are fooling themselves. They are not fooling the electorate, they are fooling themselves.

I am not going to debate which side of the question has a monopoly on the respect for life. I am pro-choice and I will put my commitment and my record of action up against anyone's when it comes to a respect for human life.

[Translation]

If we go beyond the legal, medical, and philosophical questions raised by this debate, we see that the real issue is, in fact, very simple. Who is to decide whether a pregnancy shoud be interrupted? Judges and lawyers? The Church? Or maybe politicians and legislators? Or should not the women, given their unique capability to conceive, look deep into their hearts and souls and make that decision?

I think those decisions should be the responsibilities of the women. They have heard every argument. They know that some families are eager to adopt children. And they know that every child has the right to live a good life. So what gives us the impression that we are in a better position to make that decision? Ten years of legal or medical training do not give anyone the right to impose his or her views.

[English]

There are things a woman considers in deciding whether or not to terminate a pregnancy, and no matter what her decision, there are no moral or ethical grounds for putting her in prison.

Bill C-43 must be amended to read simply: "Sections 287 and 288 of the Criminal Code are repealed". To do anything else is a disservice to Canadian women and families.

I will vote for this amendment and I will vote against Bill C–43 because Bill C–43 limits the right to a woman's choice and to a woman's control over her own life.

Mr. Gus Mitges (Bruce—Grey): Mr. Speaker, I am indeed pleased once again to have this opportunity to express my strong opposition to Bill C–43, the so–called abortion bill.

There is no question in my mind that the fundamental purpose of Bill C–43 is to provide ready access to abortion. Therefore, the defeat of this bill is absolutely essential because it does not offer any protection to unborn children. The government made it emphatically clear that it will not entertain any amendments. It wants the bill passed as it is. So what we have is a bill that provides abortion on demand, protected by the law of the land.

Bill C–43 will not only increase the number of abortions, which number some 1.5 million since 1969 in Canada, but it is being treated as a compromise bill by some who should know better. Any compromise on abortion means legalizing the death of some unborn children.

The only law that is fair and just is a law that protects unborn children from the moment of conception.

Bill C–43 must be defeated so that the fight on behalf of all our unborn children, now and in the future, will not diminish but will continue in a very active way so that some day we will have instituted the protection of unborn children as a law of Canada.

When we think about abortion, we think about the aborted child who cannot speak for himself, who cannot defend himself from his executioners, and who is deprived of all his or her rights that we know are here today and are being taken for granted by those of us who are living.

Our fellow human beings who have already been aborted were never given a trial, there were no judges ever present, there was no jury and no appeal, and there has never been a stay of execution. In fact, as I mentioned, since 1969 some 1.5 million unborn Canadians were heartlessly and brutally murdered, with no chance of defending themselves or anyone interceding on their behalf in a legal way to stop the carnage and wholesale murder of our unborn babies.

If unborn babies could talk, I am sure what would be on their minds before being executed would be this thought: "If so soon I would be done for, why on earth was I begun for?" I would ask: Has the civilized nation of our society degenerated to such a low ebb that we have resorted to destroying the most defenceless of human beings, our unborn children?

Compassion indicates that we protect children in the womb, as well as providing real and substantial help to their mothers when needed. There are distressed pregnant women out there who need and deserve assistance to help them give birth and support to their children.

The unborn child is a human being and is entitled to the full protection of the law, as are all human beings. As I mentioned a moment ago, any compromise on abortion means legalizing the death of some unborn children.

No one would ever think of legalizing the rape of some women or legalizing the abuse of some children already born. The theft of money is not legal, nor is it legal to commit murder on humans already born. It is wrong, wrong, wrong to take the life of an unborn child.

From its beginning in the womb life is a continuation, not measured in weeks, inches or pounds; a human being exists and is alive from the moment of conception. Abortion at any time after conception kills an innocent, defenceless human being.

For abortion to be legalized in the Criminal Code indicates implicit acknowledgement that abortion is wrong. There is no logical way in which it can be acknowledged that both it is wrong and that it should be legal. Anyone who believes that abortion is wrong must discard the position that abortion should be legal. In fact a person who believes that abortion is wrong but also sanctions Bill C–43 must be prepared to say that it is civilized and appropriate for society to permit the killing of innocent and defenceless human beings, so long as the killing is done by a medical practitioner or someone authorized by him, with the consent of the victim's mother.

Bill C–43 is deceptively presented as balancing the constitutional rights of the woman and the right to life of another human being, namely her unborn child. The avoidance of any reference to the child who is awaiting birth raises questions about the sincerity of the claimed intent to protect.

One is also compelled to question the protection extended to the women in Bill C–43 as it legalizes abortions right up to the time of birth, even though a woman's life would be genuinely at risk when an abortion is performed during the later stages of pregnancy.

Moreover, the proposed legislation in Bill C–43 would not require the abortion to be performed by a physician, nor is it required that the abortion be performed in a credible hospital. To legitimize abortion should the woman's health or life likely be threatened is virtually to eliminate any restrictions on abortion. Even those who advocate a woman's right to abortion recognize that the language of this bill is such that it would permit abortion simply if the woman was unhappy about being pregnant. Being unhappy about being pregnant is often a temporary state of mind even for women who have planned their pregnancies.

Not only is there an attempt being made to fool Canadians into thinking that this law has the interest of the unborn at heart, Bill C–43 is an affront to our intelligence and an affront to our sense of justice in Canada.

Furthermore, it is irresponsible for Canadians to leave the decision of whether a baby is allowed to live or die in the hands of the medical profession whose track record on the interpretation of "health" for the purpose of abortion has been so questionable in the past.

• (1620)

To give substance to this claim, one only need note the fact that close to 80,000 women in hospitals and clinics submit to abortions annually for reasons of so–called health, when even abortionists themselves admit that 20th century medicine has virtually eliminated risks for even the very sick pregnant women.

In 1969 Canadian people were assured that the proposed legislation at that time would not result in an increased rate of abortions. Obviously the government of the day underestimated the teaching value of the law. It now appears that the present government is about to make the same mistake.

No one, except those who choose not to accept the truth, will deny that abortion kills a living human being. It is acknowledged that the commitment of an abortion is not new. What is new to Canadians is the state's sanctioning of this form of killing with flagrant disregard for the value of human life from its very beginnings. It behooves us at this time to recall what history has recorded when society sanctions the killing of the weak and defenceless.

I would just like to say a few words about the pro–abortion and pro–choice movement. It seems that the pro–choice movement puts up a lot of smoke–screens to support its position on abortion. One of its more confusing statements is the basic right to control our bodies.

In this day and age a woman who allows herself to get pregnant when she does not want a child certainly does not appear to be in control of her body. Women today are educated at an early stage about sexuality and birth control. There are free clinics all over the country that give out information or even help with birth control. With the resources available, why would a woman who gets an abortion feel more in control of her body when she was not in enough control before becoming pregnant to seek out the information needed?

It seems to me that a lot of the pro–choice movement is centered around that basic age old theme of having your cake and eating it too.

Another common argument of the pro–choice movement is that so many unwanted babies is a huge, financial burden to society. What about the cost of not letting these human beings grow up into productive adults? Think about all the potential doctors, teachers, nurses, priests, ministers, construction workers, lawyers, diplomats, presidents, et cetera, who will never contribute their talents to this desperate, floundering world because of the evil of abortion.

Because of allocation of time I will conclude my remarks by saying that Parliament not only has the right but the urgent duty to protect human life from the moment of conception and pass legislation to this effect.

To accept Bill C–43 would mean accepting wholesale abortion on demand. We would be accepting a law that is unacceptable and evil. That is why I will be voting against Bill C–43.

[Translation]

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to speak to Bill C–43, an Act respecting abortion, and to do so at the report stage, when amendments are presented.

I intend to vote against the bill in its present form, unless there are reasonable amendments. The most reasonable amendment I could find was Motion No. 10 submitted by one of my colleagues, in which he asks that Bill C–43 be amended in clause 1 by deleting the word "health". To me, Mr. Speaker, this is very important. To me, abortion is a matter of ethics and morality. Human life is very important. The unborn child, the viable foetus must be protected, and I see that this bill contains no protection for the viable foetus. I find that hard to understand.

I would find it very difficult to vote for a bill that does not respect life. As a legislator, I believe we should always consider legislation in the light of protecting life and the family.

The family is the most precious thing we have in our community. And what is more precious in a family than its members, starting with our babies? Another thing I do not like in this bill is that it introduces the criminal aspect, in other words, it criminalizes both the physician and the mother.

I do not think we should criminalize a mother who is desperately trying to get an abortion. I think society has a responsibility to give a young mother the support she needs. I imagine that, in most cases, when we are talking about abortion we are talking about young pregnant mothers, young pregnant women, future mothers.

What we need above all is social, medical and family support. This is very important in a person's life. People should not consider abortion as a solution, as a way to get rid of an incidental problem—the problem of being pregnant.

[English]

It is absolutely essential that we protect life and the family and the viable foetus. In my mind it is absolutely important that we develop a law that protects life, protects the family, and comes to the support of a young pregnant person who needs help and is desperate all of a sudden. Society, the communities, the social services in communities, and the immediate family—all of these groups—need to assist the pregnant woman.

On occasion we hear about the rights of persons, the rights of people, the rights of mothers, the rights of women to control their bodies. I am sure we all have rights to protect our bodies. We do not have the right to pour a can of gasoline on ourselves and just light up and say as an excuse that it is my right to control my body. This is obviously an extreme example of control of your body, but you cannot destroy your body. If you are pregnant and you want to destroy the foetus that is something similar in my mind. It is just as extraordinary. I think the idea is to try to save the baby.

In the history of art, architecture and sculpture, one would know that Leonardo Da Vinci was an unwanted child. What if Leonardo Da Vinci's mother had decided to have an abortion? I think the answer is very obvious. There are in my mind all sorts of people in the world who may not become a Leonardo Da Vinci but have a great deal to contribute to society. Some of them may even grow up to become doctors who would save the life of the same mother who had that thought earlier in life.

The idea of criminalization vis–à–vis the doctor is absolutely abhorrent and should not be thought of. If there is going to be any criminalization, I would suggest that it should be those people who operate clandestine operations, the coat hanger operations, or whatever abhorrent examples we hear of, not the doctors who make the decisions, not the young mother who is struck all of a sudden by having to make such a hard decision.

• (1630)

It has always been my contention that abortion is an option that should only be entertained when the life of the mother is in jeopardy, or in the very rare case of rape or incest, and that within the shortest possible period. I believe that in far too many cases, if this bill is passed as is, the use of the word "health" will be misused.

No one believes that any woman who makes the decision to have an abortion is happy to have made the decision. However, there are other options open to these women. Rather than debating abortion, our society should be looking at ways in which we can better support women and children.

Continuing to allow the word "health" in the bill will only continue to allow abortion on demand. Too often the word "health" has been used in a very vague way, thereby allowing a decision to be made for termination of the pregnancy for frivolous reasons.

Under the previous legislation we saw that unwanted pregnancies were aborted because the mother convinced a panel that carrying the baby to term would affect her health psychologically. This opens up the whole issue of abuse. I have been and continue to be in favour of abortion when the life of the mother is at risk. I believe firmly in the ability of medical practitioners to make these decisions. By deleting the word "health" the emphasis will thereby be placed on the word "life", and all life-threatening situations will be covered by this bill.

I believe in the preservation of the family. Let us help mothers who find themselves in the difficult position of unfortunate pregnancy but, also, let us save them from making the decision to abort a foetus by voting down this amendment which ultimately will lead to abortion on demand. We must protect the life of the unborn child. We must protect the family.

Mr. Geoff Wilson (Swift Current—Maple Creek—Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, in January, 1988, the Supreme Court of Canada struck down the section of the Criminal Code dealing with this matter on the ground that the procedures therein deprive the pregnant woman of the right to security of her person under Section 7 of the charter. Since that time the unborn child has been without legal protection in Canada.

I spoke on this matter in July, 1988, and again last fall. I say again that there must be some law in this area. We hear, in this place of concern for wildlife, whales, seals and trees. We halt much needed projects over concern for waterfowl. Surely, it is not too much to ask for some legal guide posts in regard to human life, a statement as to how Canadians view life itself, when life begins, the value of the human being, and whether the exercise of a woman's individual freedom overrides the life of the unborn child within her.

We must have a law that reflects the beliefs of our society, hopefully a law that affirms that life has value regardless of its state of development, that recognizes that a human being is involved. It should be a federal law, one that is national in scope and one that applies to all Canadians. The division of legislative powers under our Constitution is such that the only way in which the federal government can enact such a law in this field is through the criminal law. The federal government cannot directly regulate abortion or the conduct of individuals in any other way.

It is for this reason that Bill C-43, an amendment to the Criminal Code, was introduced last fall in an attempt to find some middle ground between conflicting points of view that are by their very nature irreconcilable.

Bill C-43 attempts to provide some legal protection to the unborn child by making it a criminal offence to induce an abortion unless the procedure is done by, or under the direction of, a medical practitioner who is of the opinion that, if the abortion were not induced, the life or health of the female person would likely be threatened. Health includes physical, mental or psychological health.

A number of amendments have been made and we are now, at report stage, able to speak to these amendments which will be voted on tomorrow evening. I intend to support the amendments which will strengthen the bill and better protect the unborn human.

Those amendments are as follows: Motion 10 would delete health as a criterion thereby leaving threat to life of the female person as the only grounds for abortion. While the recent comments of the Supreme Court of Canada would seem to indicate that this position is very likely unconstitutional, I am nevertheless prepared in principle to support it.

Motion No. 12 adds the word "seriously", to read, "the health or life of the female person would likely be seriously threatened". If Motion No. 10 fails I will support this motion.

Motion No. 13 adds the further requirement that the medical practitioner conclude there is no other medically acceptable treatment to alleviate the health risk. If Motion No. 12 fails I will support Motion No. 13.

Motion No. 16 would alter the definition of health under Section 287(2) of the Criminal Code to say "considerations of physical and mental factors as they cause a serious threat to life and health". This would eliminate the psychological or socio-economic factor. I would support this motion.

Motion No. 17A would delete the word "psychological" from the health definition. If Motion No. 16 fails, I will support Motion No. 17A.

Motion No. 17B again involves the definition of health and reads "physical and mental health and does not include psychological health". If Motions Nos. 16 and 17A should both fail I will vote yes to Motion No. 17B.

Motion No. 19 would expand the definition of the word "opinion" under Section 287(2) of the Criminal Code to say, "standards of the medical profession, developed from a solid body of scientific knowledge". I would support that motion.

Having reviewed these various amendments one must consider the possibility, indeed the probability, that none of them will be approved. While I hope and pray that some additional protection for the unborn might come out of these amendments, I think it likely that at third and final reading this House will be considering Bill C–43 as it is, unamended.

Since I may not be able to speak again on the matter I would like to take the opportunity to examine the options available to me as a member who supports a pro–life position, who has consistently voted pro–life and must face the hard choice of either voting for Bill C–43 with all of its imperfections or of standing with the NDP and others who want no law at all, who advocate no legal protection for the unborn.

The suggestion has been made by pro–life organizations, and quite correctly, that Parliament could legislate on abortion in a manner much more favourable to the unborn than C–43. The operative word, of course, is "could", if a majority of members of Parliament so agreed it could. But that is simply not the case. The majority in this place does not want to make abortion any more restrictive than is stated in this bill. I do, others do, but the majority does not.

Perhaps a future Parliament will take a more restrictive view. That remains to be seen. But neither the previous Parliament in the 1988 debate nor this Parliament today contain sufficient members to pass genuinely restrictive legislation.

Let no one think for a moment that the defeat of this bill will lead to a better bill next week, next month, or next year. This thirty–fourth Parliament will have spoken on the issue and the matter will not be dealt with until after the next general election. The choice before us today is, I believe, Bill C–43 or nothing. Bill C–43 with its wide definition of health, including psychological health, falls far short of protecting the unborn.

On the other hand the bill does have positive aspects. It does recriminalize abortion. The inclusion under the Criminal Code sends the message that foetal life is worthy of respect, promotion and protection. The bill does reject the gestational approach. It does recognize that life springs from the moment of conception. It says that we as a society do not measure arbitrarily the value of life by its stages. The requirement that there be grounds is important because it affirms that abortion is more than a mere matter of choice. It does restore some protection by requiring the opinion of a medical practitioner who in turn is governed by a series of ethical and professional considerations.

Clearly Bill C–43 is a compromise. In regard to this matter of compromise I would like to make a couple of references. The first is to Tom Schuck, President of the Saskatchewan Pro–Life Association and its pro–life publication of April, 1990, which states in part:

> What if the reality is that we do not have enough pro–life parliamentarians to pass the ideal law to end all abortion? Do we support legislation that limits abortion to save as many lives as possible? Are those that support imperfect alternatives compromising the unborn? Or are those who compromise the unborn really those who oppose limiting legislation regardless of the consequences?"

• (1640)

The Permanent Council of the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops, in their presentation to the legislative committee on this bill, said at page 14:

> When it is the only available or feasible political option, support may be given to legislation which attempts, if only imperfectly, to restore protection.

Mr. Speaker, of course this bill is a compromise. Every bill put in this House is a compromise of some sort; a reconciliation of competing and diverse interests. While I am far from being satisfied, I am nevertheless going to vote for the bill because the alternative is not a better law. The alternative is no law at all, a continuing total lack of protection, and the longer we go without a law, the less likely we are ever to have one.

In my mind, Bill C–43 represents a foundation for the future. If C–43 passes, we will at least have some recognition of life from conception and some, albeit limited, protection for the unborn. Those who want more protection for the unborn will have the opportunity in future general elections to seek more representatives who are prepared to support their viewpoint.

Mr. Speaker, it is obvious that more effort has to be directed to education, to counselling and to greater individual responsibility. Adoptive processes must be improved and assisted and ways must be found to assist the churches and other organizations which support women in difficult circumstances.

In closing, let me endorse a further quotation from the presentation made by the Catholic bishops at page 15:

> We shall renew our efforts to educate about positive life-giving solutions to unwanted pregnancies, and increase our support for those individuals and agencies who are providing much needed services.

Finally, I would like to thank the thousands of constituents who took time to respond to my various questionnaires, who wrote to me and phoned me and with whom I have met in person over this difficult issue, including members of the medical fraternity within my community and with many clergymen of various denominations. Their thoughtfulness, advice and input has been most helpful.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak to Bill C–43 at this stage.

As you know, I supported this bill at second reading not because I supported or agreed with the substance of the bill but because I felt it necessary that the bill proceed to committee to provide the opportunity for amendments to be put and carried in order to strengthen this particular piece of legislation. As you know, Mr. Speaker, this bill was not amended at committee and the committee, in effect, endorsed the bill as it is. I find that extremely regrettable.

This bill is a bad piece of legislation. It is a bad bill, a fraudulent piece of legislation in that it purports to be all things to all people. On the one hand it re-introduces the subject of abortion into the Criminal Code of Canada, in effect saying that abortion is illegal, a criminal act. On the other hand, it defines abortion in such a broad fashion as to be tantamount to abortion on demand. The operative clause in this bill, Bill C–43, reads as follows:

> Every person who induces an abortion on a female person is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, unless the abortion is induced by or under the direction of a medical practitioner who is of the opinion that, if the abortion were not induced, the health or life of the female person would be likely to be threatened.

"Health" is defined, as including:

> for greater certainty, physical, mental and psychological health.

In effect, this allows for abortion on demand or abortion on request.

I think it is important to ask the question why we are dealing with Bill C–43 in this Parliament. The Supreme Court of Canada, in its wisdom, decided that the previous Criminal Code provisions with respect to abortion were unconstitutional and declared the provisions null and void. That was over two years ago. For two years the government has dithered. The government has not had the backbone or the courage to bring forward legislation and to allow a true free vote here in the House of Commons.

On November 3, 1989, Bill C–43 was introduced for first reading. There is a recognition by the mere fact the government introduced the bill, that unborn children must be protected. That is the fundamental raison d'être or purpose for introducing into the Criminal Code of Canada the subject of abortion.

Human life begins at the moment of conception and, therefore, must be protected from the moment of conception until natural death. At present there is no recognition whatsoever of human life before the moment of birth. The moment a child is born, that child is afforded each and every protection of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. There is no distinction between human life before and after birth.

A number of years ago in the House of Commons, we abolished capital punishment. Under no circumstances, in Canada, can human life be taken after birth, regardless of how miserable or how criminal that life may be, or what criminal act that person may have committed.

At the moment before birth, there is absolutely no protection whatsoever for that human life. For anyone to suggest or argue that human life begins at birth, I believe, is a ludicrous and nonsensical. That is what those who argue no law at all are suggesting, that there is no need to protect life before birth, that life ought to be protected only from the moment of birth onward. Surely, any reasonable Canadian knows that there is life before birth. A minute before, an hour before, a day before, a month before, there is a child. There is human life in the womb of the mother.

If we respect life at all, if we attach any respect for human life, we must as Parliamentarians address the question of whether or not there ought to be protection for life before birth. If we are to be classed as a civilized, civil, and moral society, there must be recognition of life before birth.

Where the issue becomes difficult is where that life begins and at what point should that life be protected. There is only one logical place for life to begin—and I have struggled with this particular question. That is at the moment of conception. To argue that life begins at some other point from conception until birth would suggest that at some precise moment there is life after that precise moment and that before that precise moment there is not life. No medical or logical argument has been advanced to my satisfaction that would allow me to conclude that life begins at some point other than at conception.

Some suggest that viability ought to be the deciding factor and that we ought to use the trimester system to determine when life should be protected. I cannot accept that. I believe that life in whatever form must be protected. Surely, the moment life begins is the moment of conception.

• (1650)

I would like to state unequivocally that I intend to vote against Bill C-43, unless it is amended substantially. Regardless of what happens to the bill, the issues of abortion and the recognition and protection of human life before birth will always be issues to be faced by Parliament.

Regardless of where one stands on the issue and one's belief of when life begins, there is common ground that must be met and searched for in order to reduce the numbers of unwanted pregnancies in Canada. Today, we know that approximately 75,000 to 80,000 abortions take place annually. Surely, those on both sides of the issue can agree that more effort should be put into trying to reduce the numbers of unwanted pregnancies.

We are dealing with women who, for a number of different reasons, do not want to proceed with a pregnancy and want to terminate it. I believe sincerely that greater effort must be expended in order to turn some of those unwanted pregnancies into wanted pregnancies and reduce the numbers of abortions that take place. The national government, in co-operation with the provincial and municipal levels of government, must provide a significant increase in resources in order to provide the necessary education, counselling, and resources to try to convince couples and women who find themselves in situations of unwanted pregnancies to try to turn those pregnancies into wanted ones.

Statistics of recent years indicate a very steady increase in the number of abortions, as well as in the number of women having multiple abortions. In 1970, just after the abortion laws were changed, there were just over 11,000 legal abortions in Canada. In 1986, 16 years later, 63,508 legal abortions were performed, which is an increase of approximately 550 per cent. Examined from a different perspective, in 1970 there were three abortions per 100 live births. By 1986, that number had increased to 17 abortions per 100 live births.

If we look at the numbers regarding repeat abortions, the percentage of women with at least one previous induced abortion increased from 8.6 per cent in 1975 to 24.2 per cent in 1986. In 1974, the first year for which there are records, 2,850 women had a second abortion. By 1986, 12 years later, 12,300 had had two abortions, an increase of 400 per cent. These are alarming statistics.

I note my time is up. I look forward to speaking to the bill at third reading stage. Unless Motion No. 10, which would allow abortions only when the life of the mother is in danger, as proposed by the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell is approved by the House, I would like to indicate to the House that I have no intention of supporting Bill C-43.

Mr. Bill Domm (Peterborough): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to speak on a subject that is not new to the House.

In retrospect, I cannot help but think back to the years 1978 and 1979 at which time the albatross was around the necks of the Liberals. It was then that we went into the 1979 election. There were a lot of comments made and debate entered into over the abortion issue.

In 1979, I campaigned against the Liberal legislation because, even with the review committees set up in the hospitals as a second board of review, there was still the likelihood of availability of abortion on demand in most cases. I also campaigned against the legislation in 1980, 1984, and 1988. Here I am standing in the House today with the same conviction that I had in 1978. No legislation is of any interest to me whatsoever, unless it protects the life of the unborn child from the moment of conception until the moment of birth, when that child becomes a person under our Constitution.

I have supported amendments to our present constitutional laws advanced by the hon. member for Bruce—Grey that we need to deal with an amendment to the Constitution. We need to change the Charter of Rights. Sooner or later, we have to realize that, if we are going to protect the unborn children as persons, they must be listed as persons in the Charter of Rights.

The exercise of debate, argument and court challenges will go on for generations in the United States, in Canada and in other countries, until we clearly define the rights of unborn children. I do not very often agree with criminal lawyers in debates I have had with them over the years, but I agree with what the Criminal Lawyer Association states in a letter sent to me. It reads:

> We disagree with the Justice Minister. In our view doctors should be afraid, based not on fear of conviction, but on fear of being brought improperly into the criminal process. From our observations of prior use of the courts by those opposed to abortion, we believe that there will be frequent attempts at private prosecutions under this legislation. Under the old legislation, the existence of the Therapeutic Abortion Committee had the effect of insulating doctors from prosecution in abortion situations.

I agree with this 100 per cent. Even with therapeutic abortion committees there in 1979, when I first ran for a seat in Parliament, I would not support the bill. Why would I stand up in the House of Commons today, 11 years later, and suddenly support a bill advanced by my government that is far more liberal in the allowance of abortion than anything that I fought against in 1979?

We no longer have that opinion being offered by a second party. We no longer have the kinds of abortions on request that we had then. Now, all that is needed to have an abortion in Canada under our legislation is a pregnant woman, a Dr. Morgentaler and a free-standing clinic. One cannot think for one minute that I will ever be convinced that Dr. Morgentaler has the interests of the unborn children at heart through his clinics across Ontario and in other parts of the country, nor can one think free-standing clinics in Quebec have any interest in the protection of life. They are running a business.

What we are faced with now we will be faced with in the future, without even a second opinion. When the Government of Canada makes it perfectly clear that it does not intend to give serious consideration to any of the amendments, how can it expect a true pro-lifer to stand up in this House of Commons and say that he or she will support this bill because it is better than nothing?

• (1700)

The Catholic Bishops say that they do not like the bill, that it would not be their choice of legislation, but members of Parliament should support it because it is better than nothing. I call the Catholic Bishops the Pontius Pilates of today. They wash their hands of the issue. Yet who will be the first to go down in the next election? I maintain it will be those who support this bill, thanks to the Catholic Bishops and the like.

To substantiate that statement, I want to read to you from an editorial in The Catholic Register dated May 26, 1990.

> "If the bill remains as is, it cannot have our approval." So wrote the President of the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops—

> So, what we have in the bill is abortion on demand, protected by the law of the land.

Where have you heard that before? I heard that in the 1979 election campaign on the Liberal bill. I heard it in the 1980 election campaign and the others I have already mentioned.

This same The Catholic Register states:

> Bill C-43 is not pro-life. It is pro-death.

> What is the alternative? If the bill is defeated in the Commons, no other will be introduced by this government. But after the next general election, the MPs will know that they must deal with the issue, for there will be no law on the books.

Some Members of Parliament will be new then, elected by people of all Faiths who are determined to give pre-born babies the same opportunity to live and contribute to the community as they themselves were once given.

It is hardly fair that 10 minutes is all the time we have at report stage, dealing with this volume of amendments, and then only one 10-minute last recourse at third reading.

The Pentecostal Assemblies of Canada do not support the bill, as evidenced in their letter of November 17, 1989. The Carleton Roman Catholic School Board does not support it. Neither does The Calgary Pro-Life Association nor does the Lutheran Church-Canada, which has quite a large membership. The Canadian Catholic School Trustees Association, the Catholic Lay Association, the Ontario Separate School Trustees' Association and the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops do not support the bill, and yet they are telling us to vote for it, it is better than nothing.

I am warning all my colleagues for whom I have great esteem and who I wish will return to this House of Commons after the next election. Will the people support a member who supports a bill that is far more liberal than the bill we inherited from the Liberals when we took office in 1979?

If there is one amendment that I think has even the slightest chance of passing, I would vote for it and it alone and I would urge those who are really and truly pro-life to consider the same move. I would vote for Motion No. 10. Motion No. 10 would not satisfy Mother Teresa or Pope John Paul, but it would satisfy the majority of Canadian people if we were to support Motion No. 10.

However, the government has said today that it is not recommending any amendments, even the most minute amendment affecting very little of the functional ability of people to have abortions. The government is not interested in taking a serious look at any amendments.

So at report stage I would support one motion, Motion No. 10. At third reading I suspect we will not have Motion No. 10, or any other motion. For that reason at third reading I will vote the same way as I have voted for 12 years on this issue. I will take a pro-life stance. I will stand and defend it regardless of how many of my constituents tell me they will never vote for me again because I am pro-life. They told me that on capital punishment, on metric and on extradition. If everybody who said they would not vote for me again ever got together in my riding I would not get any votes, I would be in a negative position.

The truth of the matter is that constitutents today look for members of Parliament who will come to Ottawa and try to do what they say they want to see done. In Canada today we have a strange collection of members of Parliament who are faced with conscience issues, party positions, government positions and constituency positions. Remember, members of Parliament will never go down in flames if they are consistent.

I am proud to say that I am voting against this bill and any other bill like it as long as I am fortunate enough to be here in this House of Commons.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I had planned what I was going to say about the motions before I came into the House today, but when I listened to the motions that were presented, many things went through my mind. I felt some very strange emotions.

I had not felt these things when I had looked at the written words of the motions. One of the things that went through my mind was that each and every one of these anti-choice, more restrictive motions was being proposed by men in this House of Commons and that the only pro-choice motion was being proposed by a woman, and that was me.

I am the only mover of an amendment who has actually been pregnant, who knows what women go through when they are pregnant, who knows what they go through when they give birth to children, who knows what women go through when they contemplate the choices that are ahead of them when they find out they are pregnant.

I have three grown children. The complete ignorance and lack of real feeling of what women go through when they are pregnant, when they contemplate an abortion, when they contemplate adoption, or when they contemplate the future and keeping that child, was so evident by the statements made by the other movers of motions in this House today.

I was shocked to hear phrases such as "abortions are performed for cosmetic reasons, for frivolous reasons", and "abortion is an easy option for women". Someone said that women say to themselves that they just do not like this pregnancy so they terminate it. That is nonsense and is insulting to the women of Canada.

One mover made a bizarre analogy between the criminal penalties for abortion and the penalties for negligence when you are towing a water skier behind you on a boat. Pregnancy is a unique experience; it is not like water skiing, it is not like driving a boat, it is not like arson, it is not like anything else. It is a joyous and wondrous experience for those who have chosen to become mothers, but it can be a very painful and disastrous experience for those whose pregnancy is unwanted.

One mover of an anti-choice motion spoke of how his personal experience of raising a disabled child had shaped his opinion on the whole issue of abortion. My first child was born with a genetic mutation. It is a very serious and life-threatening mutation. He is handicapped and he is disfigured from the medical treatment that he had to undergo. This experience did not make me want to suppress women's choices. It did not make me want to decide for other women what their choices should be. It did not make me want to take away another woman's right to decide the number or the spacing of her children. I made personal decisions to carry out my pregnancies. My personal experiences do not entitle me to decide for other women what their choices should be.

The member spoke of how glad he was that his adopted child had been available for adoption. Well, I wonder about the women and the young girls who are pressured and sometimes even forced to give up their newborn infants for adoption. They might keep those children if they had the financial means. The answer to this situation is to support pregnant women and families, not to expect poor women to give away their children to better-off or well-off people.

Neither abortion, adoption nor keeping a child is an easy decision. The only people who can say that these are easy decisions are those who will never, ever have to face that kind of a decision. Women around the world have risked their lives, their health, their fertility, to obtain abortions in countries where they are illegal, where there is no access to abortions. Women die because they will always make that choice for themselves. They will not allow the state to dictate to them their own personal choices on this issue.

Making abortion illegal does not stop abortion. It simply makes it dangerous, unsafe and a potential killer of women.

Some of these motions, if passed, would amount to a death sentence for some Canadian women. One of these motions would have us throw our medical practitioners in jail for up to 20 years. Under the aiding and abetting section of the Criminal Code, women who have abortions would also be liable to a severe term of imprisonment.

This is the solution that some members of this House say is the answer to this very, very complex social issue; an answer that would put teenage girls into jail; one that would have the effect of jailing mothers who already may have young children, simply because they could not bring themselves to bear another child.

The mover of Motion No. 5 said in his statement, "when I think an abortion should be available". Well, Mr. Speaker, how arrogant, how patronizing to the women of Canada. How dare any member of this House set him or herself up as the sole judge of how many children other people should have, when they should have them and why they should have them. This is an abuse of our role as legislators. Our job is not to intrude into the private affairs of individuals and to make personal, very intimate and very painful decisions for them. The decision to have children or not is one of the most private, intimate and individual decisions there can be.

I am glad to see that the Liberal member who submitted a motion that would have made some forms of birth control illegal has withdrawn it. It would be fitting if some other movers of motions contemplated what their motions would really do to women's lives and health and withdraw theirs as well. It is so obvious that these movers of motions have never experienced an unwanted pregnancy and cannot even contemplate with any degree of realism what it means to be faced with these decisions.

Another thing that I noticed was that the movers all supported one another. There was great camaraderie among them. They congratulated each other for their motions. Well it is time that the women in this House of Commons supported one another.

I have received support from my caucus but I look forward to receiving what all the women in Canada need, the support of all members of this House who value the fundamental right of every person to control their own bodies and their own lives, the right to decide whether or not they will have children and when.

Most Canadians believe in family planning education and in support for pregnant women and families. This is the real solution. A November Environics poll found that 62 per cent of Canadians are opposed to this government's plan to recriminalize abortion.

This bill is no compromise, Mr. Speaker, it is a sell-out. These amendments before us seek to make a bad bill, a criminal bill, even worse.

I heard one of the Tories who moved an amendment talk about social policy in addition to a criminal law. Well, the most effective approach is social policy instead of a criminal law. It is ironic that while he spoke of social policy, the government which he supports is busy dismantling Canada's social support network, making it economically more difficult for people to raise their children. He is part of a government that scrapped the national child care program, deindexed family allowances and put a cap on the Canada Assistance Plan, which is the federal-provincial funding mechanism that currently provides child care spaces and shelters for battered and abused women.

I listened to the member for Peterborough who spoke before me. He indicates that he would even change the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in this country. He would change it to stop women having their full rights. It is shocking. I am horrified to hear some of the comments that have been made here.

I would like to address some of the comments that the Minister of Justice made when she spoke to the amendments. The minister said three times that society has an interest in protecting the foetus. Why is this government criminalizing abortion which provides no protection for the foetus? Many groups and individuals have told us that. That was the overwhelming input from Canadians who came to the legislative committee hearings.

If the government really wants to protect the foetus, why is it not concerned about reproductive health hazards in the workplace, the higher incidence of women and men becoming infertile in our community? Why is it not working toward those issues and toward the underlying issue that always exists when women choose abortion, that is, poverty?

I urge all members to vote against the amendments and to vote for Motion No. 24 which is the pro-choice amendment.

Mr. Doug Fee (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity to address the proposed amendments at report stage of Bill C-43. This is an issue that has touched every Canadian. It is an issue that I do not think anyone could have been elected to this House without addressing time and again in the various forums that led up to our election.

It is very obvious from the tone and tenor of the debate this afternoon on the amendments that everyone in the House recognizes how important this is. The debate is also being conducted in a manner in which I would like to see more of them conducted, with each member free to express his or her own point of view and to vote according to his or her own conscience or according to the wishes of his or her constituents.

Having said that, I do not know if very many of us are ready to handle the emotional weight that would be involved if we had to face many issues like this one.

The legislative committee that reviewed the bill deserves to be recognized and applauded for its work. It invested a tremendous amount of study and many hours in listening to witnesses and examining the same. It spent a lot of time in debate and in research. The members of the committee gave the issue much thought and did much soul-searching.

We all know that the bill was reported unamended. That does not mean that there was agreement, as we know. Far from it. This illustrates the problem that exists in trying to legislate a moral issue upon which there are greatly diverging views.

In my speech at second reading I said:

> To achieve political solutions to the complex and controversial problems that come before us it is often necessary to accept compromise. On this issue, however, views are held so strongly and opinions are so galvanized that many of the people we represent are, because of personal convictions, unwilling or unable to compromise their position or their beliefs.

I went on to say:

> Bill C–43 is by necessity a political answer to a moral question, and as a political answer represents a compromise and moral values are not subject to compromise.

My personal position is that life is sacred from the moment of conception until natural death. Many people who share that conviction with me have said that that they felt I compromised my views by supporting Bill C–43 at second reading. They asked how it was possible for me to accept a bill that was a compromise.

Politicians must face a reality that advocates outside of the legislative process do not have to face. We must sometimes accept a bill that is less than perfect when it is better than the alternative. At second reading the alternative was this bill or nothing. I supported it because it was better than the vacuum which existed, and which still exists. I supported it because it is still possible to strengthen it and provide more protection for the life of the unborn.

You cannot compromise moral values as an individual. It is not possible to compromise in your personal life and still retain those values. You are either right or you are wrong.

In the political process our values should be equally strong, but the reality is that to achieve political approval you need the support of half of the members of this House, and at this stage of the debate it is already becoming very apparent that it is going to be difficult to get that many members to support either extreme of the debate. We might well face the same question: not what is right or wrong; not what is the ideal; not what we would like; but what is best given the alternatives available.

The difficulty that the committee experienced illustrates just how difficult it is to achieve compromise in this moral issue, where strongly held opinions do not allow for it.

We are now engaged in debates on amendments at report stage, amendments that have the potential to either strengthen or weaken the bill and the protection it provides for the unborn.

In a brief presented to the legislative committee by the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops they said:

> You have the responsibility of drafting legislation which will profoundly affect future generations. Your recommendations will be a statement about the value Canadians place on human life. Yours is not an easy task, but we are confident that you have the ability, humanity and integrity to make a difference.

Time does not allow us to present detailed responses to each of the many amendments and motions before us today. These amendments could make a tremendous difference to the bill. It is my intention to support those amendments which offer more protection for the life of the unborn.

Bill C–43, as presented and reported, still makes an important statement about the importance of life. It recognizes that importance from the moment of conception. It states that it is a criminal act to abort that life unless the health or life of the mother, who carries that life, is threatened.

The weakness, from my perspective, is that the definition of "health" is too broad and not restrictive enough. No one at committee, or in debate, ever argued that abortion should be a form of birth control and we do not want it to be. I will be supporting those amendments that restrict abortion to those circumstances where, in the opinion of a medical practitioner, the life of the mother is threatened.

The committee, in preparing its report, heard numerous witnesses and much testimony. As did many other members of the House, I accepted the opportunity to sit in and participate in the committee when the opportunity allowed. It was an emotional and draining experience. Those who sat throughout all of the hearings have my admiration.

During one of my visits to the committee, a presentation was made by a group called Women for Social Justice. This group will not agree with my position in its entirety, but I would like to quote two statements from their brief to the legislative committee. They said, first: "It is a strength of Bill C–43 that it acknowledges that all society has an interest in unborn persons".

It is not enough in this issue just to talk of women's rights. We cannot perpetuate the myth that men have no responsibility. Indeed we have legislated rights, but all too often we have ignored the requirement that we have to accept responsibility for our actions. If this country is going to continue to reflect the values it was built on, we must understand and accept the fact that responsibility must precede rights.

One of the values our society has always respected is the value of life and I pray that we will strengthen our law to the extent of respecting the value of the life of the unborn as well.

In their presentation to the legislative committee, Women for Social Justice also said: "It is the function of the criminal law to symbolize our social ideals. Abortion is an issue about the most basic social value and therefore belongs in the central document of our law, codifying community commitment".

Another group representing Catholic Bishops stated, referring to the committee, but it would apply equally well to the House today as we consider these amendments, that our recommendations will be a statement about the values that Canadians place on human life.

Reflecting on this, I would suggest that no stronger statement could be made about the value that Canadians place on life and on the importance of the rights of the individual than guaranteeing the rights of those who are most vulnerable and protecting their right to life. Even with the proposed amendments we do not guarantee the right to life for the unborn, but we can make a strong statement about the value Canadians place on life and establish legal recognition of unborn persons. I would encourage all hon. members of this House to respect life and support those amendments that provide more protection for the unborn.

Hon. Ralph Ferguson (Lambton—Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I want to remind members, first, of what I said in this House when I spoke against Bill C–43 last November. I said that to those of us who are older, life itself takes on a new meaning. I, as a farmer, go out in the spring of the year to the fields and pastures and see life all about us. We see the birds, the animals, the new growth, the trees, the grass and the flowers, and there is a sense of nearness to one's Creator, the Creator of human life, of life itself.

This debate is about human life, the lives of unborn children. I ask the members of this House to consider the lives of these unborn children above all else.

You will note that the Scriptures never talk about the foetus, they always talk about the child in the mother's womb. An example is Isaiah 49.15: "Can a woman forget the infant at her breast, or a mother the child of her womb?"

I want to draw to the attention of this House that in the preamble to our Constitution it is stated that Canada was founded on principles recognizing the supremacy of God and the rule of the law. I accept those principles, but I further believe in the sanctity of human life and I will work and fight to protect the rights of the unborn. Bill C–43 does not offer any protection to those rights.

I commend my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell who brought in Motion No. 10. Motion No. 10 would delete the word "health" as a reason for abortion. This would mark a substantial change in the nature of Bill C–43. If amended by Motion No. 10, the passage of Bill C–43 would be a clear indication that Parliament does not want the lives of unborn children placed at risk or to have those lives snuffed out.

The passage of Motion No. 10 would be a step in the right direction. Without the passage of Motion No. 10, Bill C–43 would simply remain a formula for abortion on demand. We would regard a vote for Bill C–43 in these circumstances, regardless of any other amendments passed, as unacceptable.

I certainly commend my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell on his amendment to this bill and for his endeavours to give some protection to the lives of unborn children.

It is interesting to note that Nurses for Life recognize abortion as the taking of an innocent human life and advocate legislation to protect the youngest members of the human family. It is interesting that this group of nurses and many doctors feel very strongly about this issue.

I want to quote from a letter from a family practitioner in my riding. He says:

> I feel very strongly that this Bill C–43 is merely a method of fully legalising abortion on demand. In saying "—a medical practitioner who is of the opinion that—the health—of a female person would be likely to be threatened" and then that "—health includes—psychological health—" the act opens the way to any physician to perform any abortion on the pretext that continuing the pregnancy would endanger her psychologically.
> In Britain, about 20 years ago, a very similar bill was introduced with the additional factors of requiring two doctors and a gestational limit. This law immediately resulted in abortion on demand with no practical redress.

This approach totally ignores the right of the unborn human being to life. This is a God-given right which the state cannot morally take away.

As a physician of 25 years' qualification I should like to mention that I have never seen or heard of a case in which the mother's life was lost by continuing her pregnancy when in the natural place of within the uterus. Occasionally we do see ectopic or tubal pregnancies which are not in the natural site but usually these are only diagnosed after the baby has already been lost.

• (1730)

As I mentioned earlier, as we look at the events unfolding around us in the world today at this time of year, a season when we have the creation of life all around us, it is very ironic that we as the Parliament of Canada are debating a bill that would end life, particularly human life.

I want to quote from another letter. It says:

Before Bill C-43 has its third reading, I would like to express my concerns regarding this bill. Bill C-43 has been characterized as a compromise between the pro-abortion position and the pro-life position. In actual fact, however, it virtually opens a door to abortion on demand. For it is a known fact, that abortions can easily be obtained when they are allowed for so-called health reasons. Even the restrictions "physical, mental and psychological" will not prevent this, for they are too general and too vague.

It goes on to say:

I urge you to withdraw this bill and to give our country an abortion law that protects all of Canada's children from the moment of conception. Only when you do that can we expect God to look down upon our country in favour and grant us His blessing.

It is signed by Reverend Dick Moes of Strathroy, Ontario.

I have another letter that I want to read. It is from an RNA from Kitchener, Ontario. She says:

I am writing to you as an adoptee. When I was 3 months old, I was officially adopted, and have had 19 wonderful years with my adoptive parents. One thing really bothers me: when I was still in the womb, my biological mother could have aborted me, and although it was 1969, abortions were still available.

I think of how my life could have been ended in a few short minutes, before I'd seen my first sight. How then can we actually stand back and allow leniency in the laws for abortion, when millions of unborn children will never see the light of day.

I implore you to see how fragile and precious life is, and how innocent the foetus is, no matter what circumstances their conception comes from. Please—life is so important—say no to abortion. Sincerely,

How can we ignore this, particularly at this time of year when we have a bill like this one before us. Certainly my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell realized the implications or he would never have brought forward an amendment such as Motion No. 10. I believe it has to be included or we have to turn down this bill as practically no law at all or it would allow abortion on demand.

We have to look at the conscience of this nation and look to the preamble of our Constitution, when it was pointed out so very clearly that Canada was proud of those principles recognizing the supremacy of God and the rule of the land. My plea here today is to ask members of Parliament to make sure that those two principles are not in conflict: one is God's teaching which reflected the supremacy of God and the other is the rule of the land and the decision of this Parliament with regard to this bill that hits so close to the hearts of all of us here today.

Thank you, Mr. Speaker, for the opportunity to speak on this motion and to say again that I am opposed to this bill unless it is amended with Motion No. 10 which my colleague has put forward in this House.

Mr. Bill Attewell (Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville): Mr. Speaker, I rise again to speak further on this subject.

I put forth Motion No. 17B which dealt with the definition of health and read:

"physical and mental health, and does not include psychological".

My amendment was part of two others put forth by the member for Kitchener and the hon. member for Fraser Valley East. They were both as well pro-life amendments. I also support, as I said earlier in the day, Motion No. 10 put forth by the hon. member from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell.

In speaking on the amendments I want to make the point and share some thoughts on why I believe Bill C-43, even if it is not amended, is better than no legislation at all. If Bill C-43 is defeated, it will be years or decades before any government will have the political will to take the initiative and present proposed legislation to the House.

With the expected rapid developments in reproductive technologies, we may never again debate an abortion bill in this House. Amendments may be proposed and passed to existing legislation, but we cannot make amendments if no bill exists. If some of us like myself are not happy with Bill C–43, we could look forward in the future to some amendments.

Several pro–life supporters have told me that I would be breaking my word if I voted for Bill C–43. I want to say that those comments have disturbed and distressed me, but I have given the issue a great deal of thought. I have had many discussions and written correspondence with constituents. I have discussed the issue extensively in Ottawa with my pro–life colleagues and I have prayed about the issue. I believe for a number of reasons that it is better to have Bill C–43 than nothing at all.

I would like to quote from a book prepared by the Law Reform Commission entitled Rights of the Foetus in which it answers the question: Why the criminal law? It reads: "Through our criminal law we express the kind of society we believe in and the values we uphold. In our working paper 58 Commissioner Maingot, in his dissent, summarizes what criminal law means to us. 'The criminal law is our nation's fundamental statement of public policy— Ultimately, the criminal law is a mirror of what we are; it reflects our commitment, or lack of commitment, to human dignity and equality".

The book continues: "By using the criminal law power as the basis for a new law on abortion, we are enshrining a certain set of values, which in part describes the kind of society we are".

A second quote I would like to read into the record concerns another paragraph by the Law Reform Commission. It deals with the role of the Criminal Code in our society. It reads: "In truth, the criminal law is fundamentally a moral system. It may be crude, it may have faults, it may be rough and ready, but basically it is a system of applied morality and justice. It serves to underline those values necessary or else important to society. When acts occur that seriously transgress essential values like the sanctity of life, society must speak out and reaffirm those values. This is the true role of criminal law".

It should also be remembered that if we leave a legislative void some provinces will feel obliged to pass an abortion bill. In theory, we could have a patchwork quilt of provincial abortion laws. I find this possibility unacceptable. Whatever abortion legislation we have should be uniform across the country.

In conclusion, as a pro–lifer we have at least three prime conditions. First, we must have a law on this area and it must be in the Criminal Code. Second, there must be provision for criminal sanction against an unlawful abortion, and that is in Bill C–43. Third, we must have protection of new life from conception or implantation. While not totally acceptable, these three conditions are in Bill C–43, but it should be noted that no gestation period is mentioned. I urge all hon. members to support Motions Nos. 10, 12, 13, and 17B.

• (1740)

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, I am privileged to have the opportunity to place some of my thoughts on the record with respect to Bill C–43.

At the outset I want to say that I find the issue of abortion troublesome, complex, and intensely personal. I am very thankful to be in a position to cast a vote against Bill C–43 according to my conscience. I cannot afford the women of Canada anything less than to allow them to decide the issue according to their consciences.

I note that there are members opposite who normally support this government who have chosen to follow their consciences and vote against this government bill. They are doing so because they feel it is the right thing to do according to their consciences. For some reason they will not extend that same privilege or right to the women of Canada. I find that very difficult to understand.

What is this debate all about? I think it is really about who should decide the issue of abortion. It has nothing to do with one side having more respect for life than the other side. One side of this issue calls itself pro–life, while the other side calls itself pro–choice. In my long years of professional life I worked with hundreds of pro–choice women. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that they have just as much respect for life as those who call themselves pro–life.

It certainly has nothing to do with abortion on demand, a term that I find insulting, to tell the truth. I think it is an affront to women. I know of no woman who would equate the seeking or the contemplation of abortion with just another item on a shopping list. Yet, when people use that term, in effect they are saying that women would look upon seeking an abortion just like buying something at the store.

Who should decide the issue of abortion? When all the rhetoric and arguments are cut away, who is going to decide? Is it the woman or the state? I can say truthfully and with all candour that I come down on the side of the woman.

Abortion is intensely intimate, intensely personal, and intensely complex. I cannot think of anyone in a better position to decide the delicate, troublesome issue than the woman. She is in the best position.

How can we come down on the side of an intrusive state? Where is the state in this matter? If we give the state the right to decide on the issue of abortion, it would have to do it from the position of one act or one law. It would have to make the profound decision at a distance, remotely. I cannot believe for a moment that even if we consider the odds the state could anywhere match the judgment of a woman who has to live with this matter from the moment of conception. I will choose the woman in this matter.

A woman is not perfect. She is a human being like the rest of us. She is not perfect. If you cannot trust a woman, who can you trust? Women are our mothers. If we cannot trust women about something as sacred as life, when it comes to unborn babies, when it comes to foetuses, who can we trust? I cannot believe that there are those who would trust the state before trusting the women of this world.

It is normal for women to have babies. It is normal for women to want to carry their pregnancies to full term. When a woman contemplates abortion she is sending out a very disturbing signal. She is saying that despite the fact God has given her the capacity to bring life into the world, she feels she cannot cope. There is something there that prevents her from bringing life into the world. I have to respect that judgement. I have to honour women.

Let us not forget that this issue really is a part of history, part of a continuum. There was a time when we did not trust women with the vote. We did not trust women to work outside the home. We did not trust women to enter professional classes. We thought they were best at home looking after the children or playing the part of housewife and housekeeper. We did not want them in managerial positions. In fact, there are still not many women in managerial positions today. We certainly did not want women to control the purse strings in the home.

Women have been partly emancipated over the past number of years and what have been the results? Is the world poorer? Is our society poorer because women have gone out to enter professional ranks, managerial ranks and achieve equality with men in some areas? I do not think so.

I am opposed to this bill because it does not contribute in any way to the emancipation of women. Women have come a long way but they still have a great distance to go.

I had a mother who belonged to a generation of women who were very repressed. My mother was good enough to bring 14 children into the world. She helped raise 12. I suspect she pretty well raised them on her own. I was number 11. She was good enough to work around the clock, day and night, to raise these children. She was good and noble enough to serve as a wife. She was good and noble enough to serve as an unpaid servant of the family. She was perhaps the finest woman I ever knew and probably will ever know. What did she get in return? She got love from all of us. But, she could not participate in the major decisions of the family.

We were raised on a farm. Despite all the noble deeds, did she have a right to participate in the major decisions of running the farm? Not on your life. Did she have the right to participate in major spending decisions? Not on your life. While she would never have contemplated it, if she had ever thought for a moment about abortion or divorce or anything like that, her thoughts would not have been considered for a moment, because when it came to issues like that she was a second class citizen. I remember in those days how powerless my mother was and it was mainly because she was a woman. She was not entitled to participate in those major decisions.

• (1750)

I have heard a number of members today talk about the need to protect the foetus. I do not think anyone would disagree with that, whether they call themselves pro-choice, pro-life, or anything in between. We all want to protect the foetus, we all want to protect the unborn, we all want to protect life, we all want to respect life. I suggest that the best way to protect the unborn is to protect their mothers. One does not protect the foetus through the Criminal Code, through some coercive law. We protect them by protecting their mothers.

That is another reason why I am against C-43. It does nothing in the way of providing community support. There is nothing in it dealing with child care. There is nothing to indicate that society will help women; that the community will help a woman to have her baby by providing the assistance she needs.

If we as a society want to protect the unborn, as we should, then let us protect the women and let us protect the mothers of the unborn.

I simply want to say in conclusion that a decision about abortion is complex and personal and intimate. We must leave it to the women. We have to learn to respect women and to trust their judgment. If we do that we will do more to protect life and the unborn than the state ever could.

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Mr. Speaker, as Parliamentarians we have a responsibility to shape and enact a law that will respect human life from conception to natural death. I oppose abortion, the killing of the unborn. The so-called progressive-minded people who promote the concept of free abortion on demand are contravening the laws of nature and God.

I rise to support Motion No. 10 submitted by the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. With the removal of the word "health" the clause would read: "If the abortion were not induced the life of the female person would be likely to be threatened."

The inclusion of the word "health" in Bill C-43 opens the door to many abuses, as happened with the former abortion bill in 1969. Its interpretation is open to many flimsy excuses as a justification for termination. When the word "health" is present, there is a need to define what it means. The plain fact is that it is extremely rare for a pregnant woman's health to be seriously in jeopardy as a result of pregnancy.

There may be other factors causing a health problem. In those instances the medical profession is already aware that they have a responsibility to treat that health problem without making a direct intervention on the life of the child. In the 1969 legislation all kinds of interpretations of health came into play, resulting in abortions being performed for reasons that were not always valid.

In the last 20 years, the large majority of abortions performed in Canada have been for reasons of convenience only, having nothing to do with the real meaning of health. I refer to the Badgley report on the operation of the abortion bill. It states: "In the majority of cases, stating that pregnancy is a danger to the patient's physical health is nonsense as there is no real threat to the patient's health if the pregnancy goes on."

Let us stop playing games with words by hiding the true reason for the slaughter. It is not for reasons of health, but rather for convenience. We must speak out for the sanctity of life.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak to the amendments put forward on this bill.

Before I address specific amendments, I would like to outline again for the House my own philosophical position on the issue. I think it is very clear that the decision a woman makes about an abortion is very personal and intense. It is a difficult issue. It is not done frivolously as some people in this House have suggested, and it is not done without due consideration. It is an agonizing decision.

The decision to have an abortion is a private issue that should not be subject to public or legal scrutiny and certainly should not be subject to legal sanction of the woman or her doctor. I have some understanding for those who oppose abortion under any circumstances because of moral conviction, but I cannot agree with them. They are at least consistent in their belief that under no circumstances should there be an abortion.

This bill is based on a fundamental concept that we, in this House, are able to make a decision on when a woman should have an abortion and that we are in a better position to make a more rational, moral and correct decision than that woman. I cannot agree with that. The women of Canada are totally competent to make the decision as to when they should have an abortion.

We do not know all the circumstances that they are going to be facing. We do not know the circumstances of their health or economics, and we do not know the circumstances or the dynamics of their families. A woman must take all these things into consideration when she makes that decision. We think we can sit here and prejudge the circumstances under which a woman will be allowed or denied access to a medical abortion, perhaps forcing her to seek an abortion elsewhere.

Perhaps we should consider how we arrived at the position in which we now find ourselves. In 1988, the Supreme Court struck down the previous legislation. In doing so, Justice Wilson stated that the right to reproduce or not to reproduce, which is the issue in this case, is one such right, and is properly perceived as an integral part of a modern woman's struggle to assert her dignity and worth as a human being.

This legislation is not about allowing a woman to assert her worth and dignity as a human being. Chief Justice Dickson stated that by interfering with bodily integrity, forcing a woman by threat of criminal sanction to carry a foetus to term unless she meets criteria unrelated to her own priorities and aspirations is a profound interference with a woman's body and thus, is an infringement on the security of persons.

• (1800)

My philosophy is that it is a woman's right, and that she is the person best able to make that decision. Canadian women have the strength, intelligence, integrity, and, most of all, the right to decide when and under what circumstances they will bear children.

One of the reasons I think people oppose the position of pro-choice is that they think by putting in criminal sanctions it will deny women the right to have an abortion. That is not the history of Canada. It is not the history of any country that has had criminal legislation prohibiting abortion.

Prior to being elected, I worked in the social services field. I worked with poor women and street women. I worked with women who, because of various circumstances, found that they were not in a position either to wish or to be able to go through with a pregnancy. They were forced to seek abortions outside the law.

I have known women who have died from having abortions performed by unqualified practitioners. I can assure the House that, no matter what law is in place, women in urban centres, women with money, will always get abortions. They will get them from medical practitioners. They always have.

It is the poor women who must to seek non-medical abortions. It is women in isolated and rural areas. It is women who do not understand the law, social agencies, and organizations who will be forced to seek illegal abortions. The sophisticated woman, the woman with money, the woman in the urban centre, is not going to be deterred by any piece of legislation that the House passes.

If the government really wanted to have an impact on abortions, then instead of trying to criminalize abortions again it should look to trying to provide support for women. First, it should provide more support so that a woman has a choice as to whether or not she should become pregnant. She should have better information and better access to birth control.

Then, we must make it possible for the woman to make a choice in the true sense about whether she wishes to proceed with a pregnancy. We must provide her with child support, day care, and adequate wages. In this country, women are still paid only 66 per cent of the wages of men. We have to provide adequate housing so that she is able to say: "I am going to be in a position to raise this child in a secure environment".

But what has the government done? It has done everything it can to undermine the ability of women to make that choice. It has done away with the concept that it is going to bring in a universal child care program.

The government has made an absolute shambles of the housing program so that we now have an increasing number of Canadian families being forced into poverty because of inadequate housing. Housing is one of the main indicators of poverty in the country and we still have 1.2 million people living in poverty.

The government has put a cap on the Canada Assistance Plan, the social services network that can provide not only income support services to women but counselling services and such things as alternate home care for teenagers facing pregnancy. It has simply said that it is going to turn its back on the disadvantaged, the poor, and the person who is not socially and economically powerful. Then, at the same time, it wants to say: "We are also going to restrict your access to abortion".

I will close by saying that I will be opposing all of the amendments, except the amendment proposed by my colleague from New Westminster. Hers is the only amendment that will protect the dignity and worth of women in the country.

Mr. Maurice A. Dionne (Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I want to intervene just briefly in this debate since I have already spoken my piece at second reading. I will not belabour the issue for long.

I do want to make it clear that I will be voting against this legislation. I will be voting against it because I believe in the sanctity of human life, and I mean all human life, from the moment of conception until natural death.

It strikes me as rather odd that we go through such extensive routines in the case of criminal activity to make sure that there is no miscarriage of justice. Yet we have before us a bill that says a life can be snuffed out by the decision of one person. I believe that is wrong. I believe that that is virtually abortion on demand. I believe that life is more sacred than that and that it deserves more protection.

Once we open the door to abortion, we are opening a Pandora's box that will be very difficult to close. We insist that every perpetrator of a crime—and I am repeating this because I think it is very important— every perpetrator of a crime has every access to the law. Yet, the government is bringing in a law that gives absolutely no protection to the human foetus, which is a fully human being except that it is not yet able to sustain itself. It has all the characteristics and all the attributes of a human being from the moment of conception. Therefore, in my opinion, it deserves full protection of the law from that very moment of conception until its natural death.

We have heard a lot of argument here about how onerous pregnancy is for the woman and, indeed, in some cases it is. But, in this day and age, there are the methods and access to methods of limiting the size of families. It would seem to me that we should be putting the emphasis and the education on that aspect of limiting family size, rather than expending all our time and efforts trying to find a way to kill the unborn child legally. I do not believe there is a way. I will not vote for this bill.

Mr. Len Gustafson (Parliamentary Secretary to Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate this opportunity to address our government's proposed abortion legislation. It is a bill of some significance because the principle on which it is based reaches down and touches the very conscience of our nation. It makes a statement about the definition of life and lays out sanctions that symbolize our value of life.

During my years here, I have gone on record as one who believes that life begins at conception and at that miraculous point it acquires intrinsic worth and value. I am convinced therefore that from this point life should be protected and abortion allowed only when the life of the mother is threatened.

• (1810)

My position today remains unchanged. It is an extension of my desire to develop an anti-abortion consensus in our society.

I have no reason to believe that this consensus does not exist in the riding of Souris—Moose Mountain which I have the privilege to serve. Over the last months I have received 541 letters in favour of this position and two against.

This position is based on sound medical evidence. Those things which indicate life and determine who we are as individuals are present from conception. Clearly, we in this Chamber cannot ignore these facts. They are evidence which require a verdict in favour of truth and in favour of life.

Bill C-43 makes a statement about the truth of life. I am glad that it implicitly recognizes that life begins at conception by placing a criminal sanction against the taking of foetal life. In doing this, the law symbolizes our value and belief in the worth of life.

I might say at this point that I was pleased to see that the gestational approach is not in the bill, but that it does recognize the worth of life. The worth of life is not determined by its validity, its potential, whether it is wanted or not, or whether it will be productive to society or not. If these factors are allowed to determine the value of life before birth, how will we decide what protection life will be guaranteed after birth? We must acknowledge life as intimately valuable.

So, in giving the right to life to the unborn, we preserve life for all, honourable in what we give and what we preserve.

Having said that the bill is sound in principle, I am disappointed in its provision which lays out the conditions under which abortions would be permitted. The bill permits abortion not only for the legitimate reason of the life of the mother, but for health reasons broadly defined as physical, mental and psychological.

I am deeply concerned that this definition of health is wide open to abuse. I am unhappy that it might allow abortions for reasons of convenience.

However, Bill C–43 does indicate that the mother and the doctor must make a moral choice. For this reason I have searched my heart long and hard. I have come to the conclusion that, because it is sound in principle, I will support this bill with reservations and with the vital hope and desire that it can be improved upon if not now, then at some time in the future.

As a Canadian parliamentarian I have two goals. It is my strongest desire as a parliamentarian to protect the value of life in law. But as a Canadian I have a strong desire to see a reorientation of our society to a view where abortions would be unthinkable. In fact, the two goals go hand in hand. Restricting abortions is easy when it is based on the wider consensus about the value of life.

I would go further to suggest to our pro–life friends that, while we in Parliament do our jobs, their efforts must be more directed to the building of a consensus. This can only be done through compassion and law. Our churches, organizations and we as individuals need to show a new direction that upholds concern over confrontation and that is marked by compelling compassion. We need to be part of the solution by building social, spiritual and physical support networks to serve the needs of the family and the single parent.

We cannot let it be said that our love ends after we succeed in entrenching pro–life legislation. If, while we fight for pro–life law, we lose sight of the greater compassionate purpose, then the law would be worthless.

Therefore I am pleased to say that I do support the protection of the foetus. While I am not completely supportive of the legislation, I believe that at this time it is the best that can be achieved under the circumstances that exist. I believe that a law is important.

I say to those who agree with me that one day we will achieve pro–life legislation. I do not believe for a minute that it is going to come with one stroke of a pen. As we are educated to the great miracle of life and the great responsibility of protecting it, I believe one day we will have this legislation. I believe that the pro–life movement has to look forward in a positive way to directing its emphasis on how best this can be accomplished. It may be one step at a time, but that is my goal. I believe it should be the goal of all Canadians.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this very important debate on an issue of fundamental importance, not only to the people of my riding but to all Canadians.

I want to begin by saying that I will be voting for the pro–life motions that were introduced earlier today. In particular, I will be supporting the motion which would restrict abortion to situations in which the life of the mother is threatened.

Second, I will be supporting the body of motions which would strengthen the health definition contained in the bill in order that that particular definition may limit, as far as possible, the circumstances in which abortion would be permitted.

I will be voting for those motions and expecting a number of them to carry in order to consider voting for the bill at third reading. In my view it is the only philosophically consistent approach I can take. It is the only approach which is consistent with a rigorous examination of what it is to be human, what it is to be Christian, what it is to believe in the sanctity of life and to support life in our laws, in our social customs and in our institutions.

However, I want to say at the outset that I would not like to have this be a blind pro–life versus a pro–choice distinction which is governing my decision in this matter. I believe that the dichotomy between these two points of view is far too simplistic an approach to understanding what is a very complex issue.

• (1820)

In fairness, I do not believe that those who proclaim themselves to be pro–choice are actually in favour of abortion. Likewise, I do not believe that those who proclaim themselves to be pro–life are against any form of choice, against the responsibility of women, against women, or against their particular freedom because they advocate restrictive legislative bounds on abortion.

I believe that the way to understand the principle of legislation to restrict abortion is in terms of social responsibility. We can regard laws as a curtailment or a restriction on human freedom, just like we could regard this particular law as a restriction on the choice or on the freedom of women, but I would rather see the law be regarded as a support for responsible social behaviour.

Seen in that light, it is no different than seeing, for example, seat-belt laws as legislation which restricts our freedom but, at the same time, encourages people to responsible social behaviour, just like other laws which, for instance, have imposed severe sanctions on consumption of alcohol while driving a motor vehicle. Those laws which have been introduced over the past few years, including social proscriptions, have also been an inducement to responsible social behaviour. And I think there is a way of understanding a restriction on abortion in that respect.

We must see, as a society, legislation which will encourage not only women, but men as well, to view the consequences of their actions, and particularly, in this case, into the sexual sphere, before they get into situation. The law has to support responsible conduct in this regard, realizing, of course, that situations in life will always make it difficult and will pose challenges for us as human beings when confronted with standards which would be established by, for example, a restrictive abortion law.

That having been said, I would like now to comment on some of the proposed motions of other hon. members, particularly those about which I feel most strongly.

Motion No. 16, which has been grouped for debate with my own, adds that a health risk must be a serious one. I agree. Requiring that the health risk be a serious one eliminates as a reason for abortion many of the quite normal physical and mental discomforts which often accompany a pregnancy.

I must stress again that any abortion law must be accompanied by a range of programs which address difficulties like the ones that have been mentioned by other speakers. Counselling services and medical advice must be available and accessible to all Canadian women. We must adopt a broad policy to effectively reduce abortions in Canada. A law by itself is insufficient and I will speaking to that question at a later time, Mr. Speaker.

The last resort amendment, which is that abortions are only a last resort, must be accompanied by my own which narrows the health definition. What medically acceptable alternative treatment is there for psychological, socioeconomic factors such as being poor or being afraid to tell one's parents? Would treatment by a financial adviser or by a school counsellor constitute medically acceptable treatment to alleviate the health risk? This amendment is meaningless to me unless accompanied by a more restrictive definition of health.

Motion No. 13 interests me as well. It states that abortion be the treatment of last resort to alleviate the health risk to the mother.

The Canadian Medical Association has stated that abortion reflects a distasteful failure of the education and medical system. Abortion is a regrettable last resort treatment.

This last resort amendment must be accompanied by my own which limits the health definition to mental and physical. This amendment is meaningless to me unless a medically acceptable alternative treatment is found for psychological factors, such as being poor or afraid to tell one's parents.

Motion No. 19 expands the definition of opinion. The Canadian Medical Association has called Bill C-43's definition of "opinion" rather useless. Bill C-43 indicates that the medical communities practice acceptable standards deemed appropriate for formulating an opinion regarding abortion.

So why has the government bothered to insert it into the legislation? In my view, unless opinion is given additional and more defined meaning, insertion of its definition into Bill C-43 is useless.

In closing, Bill C-43 is in dire need of amendment. Motion No. 17A, which I have proposed, is only a minor change, but serves to clarify and strengthen the section of the bill which I feel is in need of repair. I cannot emphasize enough the urgent need of a broader policy on abortion in Canada, one which does not simply put a line into the Criminal Code but adds a program which will effectively reduce and hopefully eliminate the number of abortions in Canada.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am not pleased to be rising this evening to participate in this debate on the amendments to Bill C–43, an act regarding abortion.

I have listened with a growing sense of outrage to the statements by the men who are proposing, in total, 13 amendments. All of their amendments would make an already punitive bill even more so.

I try to insulate myself from that anger. I struggle to keep my temper in the face of these horrendous insults to women. I hope this evening to keep my temper sufficiently in order to speak clearly on this issue.

Earlier in today's debate the Minister of Justice told this House that the bill is a compromise, a fragile balance between a woman's right to control her own body and foetal rights. This is an outrageous statement coming from the woman given the honour of being the chief lawmaker in Canada.

Does the Minister of Justice not know that foetal rights have not been defined? The Supreme Court in the Daigle decision acknowledged that fact. The minister's statements this afternoon only served to exacerbate the confusion over this bill.

I will agree with the minister that Bill C–43 is a compromise, but the word compromise infers a solution. In this instance the so–called compromise is anything but a solution. It serves to mark a compromise of principle while moving us further from a solution.

If members of this Chamber were sincere in their wish for a real solution, they would be devoting much greater energy to the issues of equality for women, child poverty, reproductive health and education. They would be urging that greater resources be allocated for research into safe and effective means of birth control.

As a woman, I have had first–hand knowledge with that. When I was pregnant with my son, who is now 17 years old, I participated in a family planning clinic and took birthing classes. Of the 10 white, middle–class couples in that class, all well–educated people, six were there because of failed birth control. If this country really cared about stopping abortion, it would be putting more money into research into effective means of birth control.

I am ashamed of the ignorance that has been displayed in this Chamber on this issue. When I speak of ignorance I am giving those who speak the benefit of the doubt. If it is not ignorance, then it comes down to a conscious exercise of power, men utilizing their power over women. That is a very frightening and sinister prospect. Pregnancy is a wondrous process. It is wondrous for both women and men, but women are the only ones who can actually experience it. Some have argued that men are in awe, in fact resentful of that fact, that they have used their power to attempt to control the reproductive power of women. These men depict women as wanton creatures, morally deficient creatures, requiring threat of criminal sanction to keep them in line. It is this insulting assumption which is the basis of this law.

• (1830)

Some of the sanctimonious statements I have heard from men in the House today are trotted out as truisms, as items not considered by women facing an unwanted pregnancy. That is utter hogwash.

Ms. Black: Absolutely.

Ms. Hunter: Women facing an unwanted pregnancy do not need the advice of men in this House. I urge the members of this House, if they really truly respect women, to support the only amendment worthy of consideration, that is Motion No. 24 put forward by my honourable colleague—and I say that in the most sincere way—the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby.

Mr. Howard Crosby (Halifax West): Mr. Speaker, I want to begin my brief remarks on Bill C–43 relating to abortion by saying that for all members of the House of Commons, it is a difficult decision. I hope all members will make the decision bearing in mind the interests expressed across Canada against abortion and in favour of women's choice.

It is not a decision one can make lightly. I do not accept the political ideology that we have just heard in the House of Commons from that member of the NDP and other members who put it on a basis of no decision–making, the decision is made. That is not true. The decision has to be made by members of the House based upon their own view of life in Canada and the social values of Canadians in their own constituencies, across the regions and throughout the country. It is not a decision to be made lightly. I want you to know, Mr.

Speaker, I have put a great deal of thought into the process.

First, I want to make clear that the decision I made for myself is that there must be a law in Canada with respect to abortion. The existing situation where we have a void as a result of the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada is not acceptable to the great majority of Canadians. I say that with respect to the views of those who believe that Canada, and life in Canada, can continue without a law on abortion. I think that is a view people hold with real emotion but, at the same time, it is not a view that I personally can accept. I want to make it clear to all my colleagues in the House of Commons that I believe there must be a law on abortion.

The difficulty is in what should be the content of that law. I think members must realize the legal parameters set down by the Supreme Court of Canada with respect to a law on abortion. It is not possible, in my opinion, for the House of Commons to enact a law that precludes abortion in all circumstances. There must be circumstances in which abortion can be performed. Any law that says otherwise would not meet the tests and the dictates of the Supreme Court of Canada, which is the lawful determining authority under the Canadian Constitution and under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

Those who believe that there ought to be a law which totally voids abortion in all circumstances will have to seek an amendment to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. That can only be done under very special circumstances. What is at stake in relation to the Charter of Rights and Freedoms is the protection of the foetus not now recognized under the Constitution. In order to fully protect life as it exists in the foetus, there must be a constitutional amendment to the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms. We are dealing with a specific bill relating to abortion law in Canada which must meet the test imposed by the Supreme Court of Canada. It is in that context that we must examine Bill C–43. It is difficult to consider the nature of an abortion law without reviewing one's own feeling in addition to the feelings of the Canadian society as represented in constituencies such as Halifax West and provinces like Nova Scotia and across the country.

In order to respond to what one perceives to be the prevalent view, I think it is difficult to accept the law imposed by Bill C–43. As has been said by so many members, it virtually includes abortion in those circumstances. The only condition would be that a medical practitioner must direct the performance of the abortion and it must be based on health grounds of the broadest kind.

I am going to look very carefully at amendments proposed by colleagues in the House of Commons that would restrict the definition of health and would add restrictions to the law proposed by Bill C–43. If those amendments do not pass then I, as all members, will be faced with the decision of whether or not to support Bill C–43 or vote to defeat that legislative measure.

Again I repeat that I believe very strongly that we must have an abortion law in Canada. In the few moments available to me today I want to indicate why I would question the provisions of Bill C–43. May I say that I proposed an amendment to Bill C–43 in the House of Commons that would have defined medical facility as an approved hospital or medical clinic and would have required that the kind of abortion permitted under Bill C–43 be performed there.

I am very disappointed that the Chair did not see fit to permit that amendment to be included in the list of amendments relating to the abortion law because I think it is very important to Canadians, particularly in Nova Scotia and my area of Halifax. If abortions are to be performed, they must be performed under very careful circumstances. We have the requirement that a medical practitioner must be involved, but if abortion can be performed anywhere determined by the medical practitioner, that is going to create difficulties.

As is well known, Dr. Henry Morgentaler and perhaps others believed that they should be permitted to perform abortions in a clinic they have established. I am sure if that precedent is established as part of our law, many clinics will spring up across the country for the performance of abortion.

Those who believe in free choice will welcome that change. But for those who want to be extremely careful in determining the circumstances in which an abortion might be allowed, this will pose very grave difficulties. It will be unacceptable to those who oppose abortion, as well as to those who would only permit abortion under limited circumstances.

I find it very difficult to support the bill in the absence of a provision restricting the place in which abortions can be performed. In the province of Nova Scotia a law has been enacted to restrict the place in which abortions are performed. That law is now before the courts and there is great danger that if Parliament does not act to restrict the place in which abortions may be performed, provincial laws may be declared invalid once legislation such as Bill C–43 is passed.

This is a very technical legal point but it is one that is going to cause serious difficulty, not only in Halifax and Nova Scotia, but across Canada. I think if there is one thing I glean from conversations with my constituents and Canadians in other places, it is that there should be a law pertaining to abortion. That law must be carefully administered. It cannot be carefully administered unless the places at which abortions are performed are restricted.

• (1840)

In closing, I have the greatest sympathy for those who believe that it is a woman's right, in certain circumstances, to have an abortion. I cannot as an individual and as a member of Parliament accept that view. I do not want to increase the possibility of danger to women in the matter of child bearing. I realize that there should be other measures to avoid situations that result in unwanted pregnancies and I would support any of those measures. For the moment, my position is clear: There must be a law on abortion in Canada and that law has to be carefully crafted in order to ensure that abortions are restricted and that those restrictions are carefully monitored.

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I rise to oppose Bill C–43 and all amendments proposed thereto, with the exception of amendment No. 24, standing in the name of the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby.

I am not going to dwell on the legalities of the matter. It is not that they are unimportant but because I have only a few minutes. I am not going to argue about the rights of a woman versus the possible rights of the foetus, although undoubtedly that is a question that must be dealt with. I do not think the matter rests at the level of legalities. I want to deal with the underlying moral debate, the reason why some people say and sincerely believe that we must have a law in the Criminal Code prohibiting and punishing abortion.

The argument, as it is most usually presented, is that abortion is the killing of a person; a person yet unborn but a person. As we have laws to prevent the killing of a person who has been born, so we should have law to prevent the killing of a person who has not been born. It is also said on the basis of some very particular traditions that this is contrary to the teaching that we know as God's law. I take God and his law seriously, Mr. Speaker, although I think that there is far more to God than what we call His law, such as laws that have been written down in the Bible and in other books. There is God's creation, God's forgiveness and God's love. The law is really a smaller part than those, and I will come back to that later.

The reason I do not accept the very simple argument as it is put forward is that I do not think it works. Even if I were to accept the view that the unborn is a person and that abortion is there for the killing of a person, I oppose this bill. I oppose it because it will not work. It will not stop abortions no matter how it is amended. Therefore, it causes trouble to no good end. It causes useless trouble to women and doctors.

The reason why I say it will not work is that abortions have been done since the earliest time of our history even though people in those days, as in our days, had reverence for life. It is not reasonable to get hysterical about saying our civilization must not decide to kill the unborn. The shoe is on the other foot. The question is: Have we arrived at the point in our civilization where it is possible that no one will kill the unborn? That is the challenge but it is a very different one.

Abortions have not only been performed in the past, they are performed in our own time, in Christian countries such as Ireland that have ferocious laws penalizing abortionists. There is a high rate of abortion in Ireland as there is in some other countries that are not Christian. In other words, they appeal to what people say is God's law on the matter, but the backing up of that appeal by the threat of prison does not stop abortion. That is a matter of experience and a matter of fact.

When we had punitive laws in Canada they did not stop abortion. They drove it underground. Abortions were done secretly or abroad. When they were done secretly they were often badly done. They succeeded as abortions in killing the unborn but they also at times did great harm, even to the point of killing the mother.

I think a previous speaker summed it up very well when he said that the best way to protect the unborn was to protect the mother. This is assuming that the unborn is a person to which some hold and some disagree. Taken at the point of the strongest argument against abortion, namely the argument that it is a person there in the womb, the best way to protect what is in the womb, person or not, is to protect the woman carrying it.

As a practice to be legislated by us, it is simply not practically possible to protect the unborn against the will of the mother. The only way to do that would be to threaten violence on the mother, and that is bound to have a dangerous effect on the child. We can all imagine the ways in which that may happen. The threat of violence against the pregnant woman might affect the child in her womb, nevertheless the experience of threatened violence against her has not prevented the practice of abortion.

There are other things that can be done. I regret that so much attention is given by some parts of our society in Canada to the negative means, to the threat, to the use of violence either directly or as a threat. It has been pointed out many times in previous debates and again today that there are many women who choose abortion who would not choose it, who would choose to bear the child if they were given the support that would be fitting to the position of people who say we must reverence life.

I have had experience on the Toronto City Council where certain people, who spoke about reverence for life, condemned abortion and Planned Parenthood because they might sometimes give someone advice about how to procure an abortion. There was a five-hour debate about whether to give $500 to Planned Parenthood. Some members said they would not vote for it because they reverenced life.

Those same members of council despised life once it was born because they also voted against a by-law that would stop landlords from excluding tenants on the ground that they had children. So the unborn have rights but the born have no rights; that is ridiculous. If this House, including the government side, seriously wishes to protect the unborn, it can do far more than this law could ever do. It could provide for the economic and health maintenance of the pregnant woman be she married, unmarried, rich or poor. It could provide for decent medical treatment, which to some extent our country provides better than the United States does for its poor people. That is one reason why some of us want to keep our economy safe from the American takeover.

It could provide decent housing accommodation for the parent or parents and child. It could provide decent working conditions and could respect the work of women who still carry the huge majority of the work of raising children.

By the laws of our country there is a whole class of women expected to do the work of child raising and housekeeping who are paid rotten, low wages, who are kept in positions of semi-servitude, and who are forbidden even to try to organize a union on their behalf. We call them the immigrant domestic workers. We bring them to Canada because the pay for the work they do is so rotten and the conditions of abuse, sometimes physical or even sexual abuse, are so rotten where they work that Canadian women will not do that work. That shows how this government and this House despise the work of women, particularly the work of raising children.

Until we change that and give decent recognition to the work of raising children, we have no right to threaten violence against a pregnant woman who decides not to bear a child. Therefore, as I say, I would oppose all the amendments that are proposed today, except for Motion No. 24, standing in the name of the hon member for New Westminster—Burnaby. It would simply strike out all the sections that provide for violent penalties against the woman or doctor who take part in an abortion. It will do no good. It will do a great deal of harm. If we are serious as a House, we can do much better.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, earlier I spoke in support of my two amendments which in essence would safeguard the pregnant woman having the abortion based on genuine medical indications.

The member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell whose motion I seconded indicated that a medical procedure had only to be induced by a medical practitioner. It stands to reason that when the procedure to be done will effect the destruction of the unborn, it should be carried out wholly and solely by the physician so that he or she can assume the ultimate medical responsibility.

Were we to allow people other than physicians to perform the procedure for genuine, medical indications, first, the indications may not exist. Second, we may franchise abortion clinics across the country. Third, there can be an assembly line for doing abortions. When that happens truly the practice of medicine will be corrupted.

The amendment proposed by my colleague is an attempt to ensure that the physician truly does the procedure and does it according to medical standards.

For the last minute, I cannot help but comment on the information of the previous speaker. He indicated that we do not need this law because it will not work. That is not an argument against introducing a law. There is a law against murder, there is a law against death, and we have not eliminated those offences from this earth. Inability to eliminate offences completely is no excuse not to enact a good law.

The last speaker indicated that many women would not choose abortion if support was given to the pregnant woman so that she would be encouraged to proceed with that pregnancy to term. If that were the true answer to the problem, why then propose an answer that is no answer at all?

The Supreme Court of Canada, in saying that the state has a legitimate interest to protect the life of the unborn, is telling Canadians that it is part of our rule of law enshrined in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

I object to this bill being unamended because although it is difficult to compromise the two opposing views it does not really reconcile the two at all. We cannot equate the right to choose on the part of the women versus the right to live on the part of the unborn. Only two lives may be equated, and that is why there is a need to ensure that medical indications are safeguarded and that the one who will do the procedure is a medical practitioner.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): It being nine o'clock, pursuant to Order made Thursday, May 10, 1990, this House stands adjourned until tomorrow at two o'clock p.m., pursuant to Standing Order 24(1).

The House adjourned at 6.57 p.m.

TRANSPORT

Mr. Guy Saint-Julien (Abitibi): Mr. Speaker, the truckers' association has now set up four roadblocks in Abitibi—Témiscamingue.

These independent truckers are struggling to survive. They are protesting against the fact that truckers from neighbouring provinces and the United States have invaded Quebec and the Abitibi—Témiscamingue area and are competing unfairly against them.

They demand new rates and want better highway controls to be put in place immediately to ensure that truckers from neighbouring provinces and the United States who work in Quebec meet the standards and regulations of the Régie de l'assurance-automobile du Québec and the Quebec Department of Revenue.

Mr. Speaker, the Government of Quebec must consider the demands of truckers in Abitibi—Témiscamingue and throughout the province.

CULTURAL INDUSTRIES DEVELOPMENT OFFICE

Mr. John Harvard (Winnipeg St. James): Mr. Speaker, the federal government has pulled the rug from under Manitoba's culture industry. The budget of the Canada-Manitoba Cultural Industries Development Office, CIDO, has been slashed for 1990, but worse still come March 1991, the Conservative government will withdraw completely its support of CIDO. There will be nothing left.

The federal government has reneged on the commitment it made when the Canada-Manitoba CIDO was created. This is a major blow to Manitoba's cultural industry and economy. It will kill, for example, a young but successful film industry. Producers and technicians will leave the province in order to do their work elsewhere, resulting in the loss of nearly 200 direct jobs. Manitoba's economy will lose more than $7 million in related broad-based economic spin-offs.

CIDO was a success. Why tamper with success? Once again this government is showing its lack of interest in Manitoba and western Canada.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, the government has been trying to pass Meech, not by convincing Canadians, but by threatening them. These threats have not worked. Instead, they have only proven that Meech cannot be sold on its merits.

The threat is Quebec's separation. This is a real issue and may be dealt with eventually, but passing Meech will not make eventual separation any less likely. Defeating Meech will not make it any more likely.

I urge the province of Quebec to recognize that the rejection of Meech Lake is not a rejection of the people of Quebec, but a rejection of the flawed Prime Minister-Bourassa approach to constitution making.

I call upon the Prime Minister of Canada to accept responsibility for the constitutional chaos into which his Meech Lake initiative has led this country and to resign.

CATHOLIC CLERGY

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to offer my sincere congratulations to Father Claude Jobin and Father Jean-Pierre Boivin, respectively, pastor of Sainte-Monique les Saules parish and assistant in the same parish, in my riding.

On June 10, they will both celebrate their twenty-fifth anniversary in the priesthood. That evening, Father Jobin and Father Boivin, whose compassion and generosity towards those who seek their help are well-known, will receive a token of appreciation for their constant involvement in the community.

Thank you both and keep up your wonderful work in the community!

LOW-LEVEL FLIGHTS

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I wish to extend my congratulations to the Innu people of Labrador for successfully making their case against the proposed NATO base at Goose Gay.

Perhaps NATO recognized that 40,000 over-flights a year would be destructive to the Innu way of life. Perhaps NATO recognizes that changes in Europe and a reduction in international tensions made the test facility obsolete.

However, it is an unfortunate comment on leadership in Canada that under the Conservative government and in the face of east-west tensions, the Prime Minister himself could ignore the Innu and their land, and insist on proceeding with Canada's bid for the base.

The cancellation of the base does not mean an end to the 7,000 over-flights a year already conducted out of Goose Bay. Under agreement they will continue for another six years.

If Canada wants to create employment in the Happy Valley-Goose Bay area, it should embark on negotiations to settle aboriginal claims in the region. Those settlements result in economic independence for native communities, a repatriation of capital to the region, and more jobs for natives and non-natives alike.

If Canada could show sufficient respect for the Innu, it would abandon all low-level test flights in Labrador now.

THE MIDDLE EAST

Mr. Mark Assad (Gatineau—La Lièvre): Mr. Speaker, I had the honour and privilege of listening to Dr. Israel Shahak, who immigrated to Israel after surviving the siege of the Warsaw ghetto and a Nazi concentration camp. He is now a retired chemistry teacher from the University in Jerusalem.

He gave us his impressions of events in the occupied territories on the West Bank and in Gaza, and spoke with a great deal of concern.

Maybe Canada cannot force the Israeli government into peace negotiations with the Palestinians, but at least, as Canadians, we should realize that there are children and women who have suffered greatly in those occupied territories and who do not have the proper kind of health care.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of such gifted gentlemen who come and tell us what is actually happening, pleading on behalf of the Palestinian women and children, I would ask that the Canadian government at least call upon the Israeli authorities to make sure there is proper medical treatment available in those occupied territories.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, during the fall of 1986, 11 first ministers met in Edmonton and determined that the next logical step in the constitutional process was to conclude arrangements that would honourably permit Quebec to return to the Canadian family.

Such provisions were achieved several months later at Meech Lake under the inspired and persuasive leadership of our Prime Minister. For the only time in Canadian history 11 first ministers came together in historic agreement.

Prior to ratification of that agreement, elections brought new first ministers to three provinces. They were not a part of the process and concluded that their agendas were more important. But without the prior ratification of the Meech Lake Accord, with or without a companion resolution, there may be no future agendas.

Atlantic Canada can ill-afford the political and economic uncertainty that the loss of the Meech Lake Accord will bring. I urge Premiers Wells and McKenna to serve Atlantic Canada's interest, to ensure Canada remains strong by passing and putting Meech behind us in order that we can all look forward with optimism to future constitutional and economic agendas.

RACISM

Mr. David Berger (Saint-Henri—Westmount): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the House passed a resolution condemning and deploring racism and intolerance in Canadian society, as reflected in acts of vandalism in cemeteries.

The House has spoken, Mr. Speaker, but I wonder whether this gesture should not go further. A recent study by B'nai Brith points to a 57 per cent increase in racist incidents against Canada's racial minorities last year.

Yesterday, an article in The Gazette reported a series of racist and violent incidents in Quebec and Ontario which occured between May 12 and May 20. In one incident, five "skinheads" assaulted a black youth on Saint-Laurent Boulevard in Montreal. Are these incidents symptomatic of a deeper, underlying malaise? Why now? Why cemeteries? Who are these unknowns who perpetrate such terrible acts? Were these incidents orchestrated?

Mr. Speaker, our responsibility to the victims bids us to ask serious questions.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, will the GST be harmful to the Canadian economy?

Some hon. members: Yes.

Mr. Riis: Yes, it will. Do 80 per cent of Canadians oppose the GST?

Some hon. members: Yes.

Mr. Riis: Should the GST be stopped?

Some hon. members: Yes.

Mr. Riis: Can the GST be defeated?

Some hon. members: Yes.

Mr. Riis: The Liberals in the Senate know how Canadians feel about the GST. Canadians oppose it. The Liberals in the Senate have the constitutional authority to defeat the GST.

On behalf of the New Democratic caucus, I call on the Liberal Senators to do the right thing, the honourable thing, hear the cries of 80 per cent of Canadians and stop the GST. Vote in the Senate today and defeat the GST. You have the right. You have the responsibility. Do it, Liberal Senators.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Mr. Speaker, I was privileged to serve on the committee that studied the companion resolution to the Meech Lake Accord. It was an experience of politics at its best; three political parties working together for the good of Canada.

I would like to share a personal experience with the House of Commons. While in Vancouver, Mr. Glen Cowan gave testimony before the committee. He and I met later for a private discussion.

This fine, well-read and deeply committed Canadian told me that four decades ago, he and four of his friends voluntarily left for a theatre of war a wide ocean and a continent away.

They risked their lives in the name of Canada. Three of those five men never returned. They are, in the name of freedom and Canada, buried in foreign soil.

Mr. Cowan himself was twice seriously wounded. Every day that he did battle, he knew the great risk involved.

He then, with a burden that comes with painful knowledge, said to me: "If we young people were willing to lay down our lives for Canada, then surely these hold-out provinces can make a political sacrifice in the name of nation-building."

Sir, I concur. The torch is ours to hold high. The most magnificent nation on earth must not fail.

FISHERIES

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Mr. Speaker, yesterday 38 trawlermen travelled by bus from Canso to Ottawa to speak out on the crisis facing their community. They had three messages for this government, and in particular for the Minister of Fisheries.

First, the central problem of the Atlantic fisheries is not too many fishermen chasing too few fish. It is too many powerful fishing boats destroying too many fish at sea. This scandalous practice is occurring at the same time that fish plants in our coastal communities are closing for want of fish to process. This practice has got to stop.

Second, the people of Canso are not responsible for the crisis in which they now find themselves. Canso is a victim of the murky scheme to use declining quotas in the northern cod stock as a pretext for rationalizing this community out of existence.

Third, the solution to the Canso problem is simple. Give back to its fishermen their rightful share of the quota taken from them by National Sea's departure and ensure that the trawlers continue to fish from the Canso port.

This is within the power of the Minister of Fisheries to achieve. It is what the people of Canso have asked for from the beginning. They and I will accept nothing less.

NATIONAL UNITY

Mrs. Edna Anderson (Simcoe Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to express my heartfelt sadness at the anger, fear and intolerance I am seeing and hearing in my country, Canada.

Goodness knows our history is not without blemish. I believe we have tried to learn from our past, and we have tried to build a better Canada for our future generations. I wonder if we have suddenly stopped caring and trusting each other. Why are we responding to perceived fears and threats to our national unity rather than reaching out and embracing the one vehicle that will unite us, the Meech Lake Accord?

By accepting Meech Lake, we do not lose any of the provisions that exist in the Constitution Act, 1982. Instead, we gain by including Quebec in the Canadian family where she belongs.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Prime Minister. Canadians are concerned about our constitutional situation. They are concerned about the future of our country. They want assurance that action is being taken to confirm that future.

I understand that Senator Murray has completed his consultations with the provinces and has reported today to the Prime Minister. I ask the Prime Minister exactly what proposals Senator Murray took to the provincial premiers. What recommendations has he made to the Prime Minister today? Is the Prime Minister now ready to announce an early First Ministers' Conference to develop a fair and reasonable solution to our current constitutional impasse?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have just finished meeting with Senator Murray who provided me with a very extensive debriefing on the 10 very complete meetings he held with provincial premiers across the country over the last three or four days.

It is his judgment that at this time it would be premature to call a meeting of First Ministers. It is his judgment that some of the individuals involved in the process clearly have not seized the magnitude of the problem that is upon us, and that a First Ministers' Conference at this time would be premature. He did, however, a few moments ago leave with me some suggestions that I will reflect upon very carefully because they deal with some interesting ways whereby we may be able to narrow some of the differences and begin the process of bringing some of the parties more closely together.

Obviously, Mr. Speaker, my objective is the same as all members of the House. It deals exclusively and principally with maintaining the unity of Canada and finding therein a proper and an honourable place for all of its important component parts and, at this particular juncture, principally the province of Quebec. We are searching for an honourable and thoughtful way to do precisely that. As all members of the House would want, I will continue the search right up to the very end to see if we can find a formula that will allow us to make sure that the unity of Canada is firm and irrevocable.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

[Translation]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, my second question is for the Prime Minister. Canadians will certainly be surprised and disappointed by the Prime Minister's answer to the question on calling a meeting of first ministers.

Mr. Speaker, the provincial premiers, in particular those of Quebec and Newfoundland, said that they are ready to take part in a conference. For example, the Premier of Quebec, Robert Bourassa, even said yesterday that dialogue is always a good policy. He added, "I do not see how I would serve Quebec's interests by saying that I refuse dialogue with my partners."

So, Mr. Speaker, I ask the Prime Minister why he refuses to call a conference when the provincial premiers agree to participate in one. Certainly, Mr. Speaker, the time has come to call such a conference, in light of the public statements of the provincial premiers themselves.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think that my friend misinterprets Premier Bourassa's statement.

Mr. Bourassa did say that he was not refusing to talk with his partners; it is also true that Mr. Bourassa said that he would not necessarily refuse to participate in a first ministers' conference. But I think he is of the opinion that it would be premature to call such a conference immediately.

Some other premiers have said that of course they would like to have a first ministers' conference, but they think that, under the present circumstances, it might be premature in the next few days.

So I will analyse Senator Murray's proposals to find a formula that could bring the parties together, so that we can have everything in our favour as much as possible. If there is a conference, I want it to succeed. I want the conference to succeed as much as possible and not to fail.

We had a failure in 1981 when Quebec was excluded; we do not want that to happen again. We are for the unity of Canada!

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1420)

[English]

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the Prime Minister said that Quebec at the time put forward 23 proposals that were unacceptable to the rest of Canada. He offered that as an explanation for Quebec not yet being a signatory to the Constitution. I hope he will remember the words he used yesterday.

I would like to ask the Prime Minister a specific question. If he is not going to call an early First Ministers' Conference, exactly what is he going to do between now and June 23? Is he telling Canadians he is going to sit and do nothing? If that is the case, certainly Canadians expect more from the Prime Minister to ensure the unity and future of this country.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as a politician myself, I am not offended by the remarks of my hon. friend, but I find it strange that in these circumstances he has failed to resist the temptation to politicize what is a very important national issue.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Mulroney: I just mentioned to my hon. friend that contrary to the implications of his prefatory remarks, it is my intention to meet with Senator Murray later this afternoon to review some quite interesting suggestions that he made that might facilitate the bringing together of the parties in order to narrow the terrain. That process might indeed lead to a fruitful First Ministers' Conference. I think this is clearly what all members of the House are suggesting, not a conference simply for the pleasure of getting everybody together but one that hopefully, not necessarily, but hopefully will wind up with some success.

My friend asks me to remember that I mentioned yesterday the 23 or 24 proposals by a separatist premier of Quebec. Indeed, I remember it well. I ask my friend to remember that I immediately followed that up with a reference to five proposals brought forward by a federalist premier of Quebec, Premier Bourassa, resulting in the Meech Lake Accord, which was a statement of affection and respect and unity for Canada. That is why we signed the Meech Lake Accord and that is why, in the interests of a united Canada, I hope that that will be ratified by all provinces.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, my question is also directed to the Prime Minister. Since the Environment Minister has resigned, and since public meetings will begin tomorrow in Winnipeg on the Green Plan for the protection of the environment and the implementation of sustainable development, could the Prime Minister inform the House today who will be Minister of the Environment tomorrow, in Winnipeg?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Yes, of course, Mr. Speaker. Right after Oral Question Period, I intend to make a public statement to announce who will be responsible for the Department of the Environment. The Canadian government will be well represented at the opening of these meetings.

[English]

Hon. Chas. L. Caccia (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the Prime Minister on his decision. I ask him to confirm to this House and to the public that the decision made in Bergen by the former Minister of the Environment of stabilizing CO2 pollution by the end of the century will be the policy of his government as well as the successor to the Minister of the Environment.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend would understand why I would want to examine with great care all communications from Europe by the previous Minister of the Environment—

Some hon. members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Mulroney:—including anything in the absence of a final report. My information is that Mr. Lucien Bouchard, as Minister of the Environment, along with his officials, did an exemplary job, as usual, at that conference in Norway. The government of Canada and the Prime Minister were very pleased with his efforts and we look forward to building on those. Obviously I would want to examine the specific wording of any documents that emanated from that conference with care.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Prime Minister. This government is caught in a crisis mentality. Crises often have a negative impact. People tend to panic. We must not lose sight of our objective which is to resolve the constitutional impasse. This must not be done in secret, if we want to end this panic situation.

My question for the Prime Minister is as follows: Could the Prime Minister inform the House of the contents of the text proposed by Senator Murray?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, first of all, I would like to inform my hon. friend that there is no panic situation in Canada. We have experienced some human problems. The New Democrats think that is funny. We have had a number of problems, a number of challenges of that nature. This happens in a government, but of course the New Democrats have had no experience of the responsibility of running a government. From time to time, prime ministers or governments must— Mr. Speaker, I vigourously deny any suggestion that there is a problem, a panic situation in this country. We have human problems and we have political problems. We are faced with a major challenge at the constitutional level. There has been a long debate on the question.

I said it yesterday and I repeat it today: Three years ago, the Government of Quebec signed a document, with all the other provinces and the federal government, to make it part of Canada, and of the Canadian Constitution, a participation to which all parties freely consented, which would make our country united, something we have all wanted since 1981. Finally, we had a document on the basis of which we could all say that we had a strong, united Canada. All Canadians could believe that since the premiers of all the provinces and the Prime Minister of Canada signed that document, Quebecers and Canadians could expect to see this document ratified.

That has not been the case. Since then, three provinces have repudiated the signatures of their premiers who had previously given their consent, which creates a serious problem for Canada. We, the government and the opposition parties, are trying to find a formula that will make it possible for Quebec to again become part of the Canadian family, on terms and conditions that are honourable. I have received no recommendations in writing from Senator Murray. I have received suggestions that will help us maintain the dialogue, continue the dialogue, in order to try to break this constitutional impasse, because I think that all Canadians want to see Quebec become part of our Canadian family again, once and for all.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

• (1430)

[English]

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question is for the Prime Minister.

I suggest to the Prime Minister that the country does not need a history lesson from him but some leadership.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Ms. McLaughlin: If he wants to refer to history, then I say to him that surely we have learned something from the process which has taken place.

We are now at the point, as some people have said, of being at five minutes to midnight. We do not want to see what happened the last time when something came out at the last minute and when everyone was asked to agree or disagree with it without there being adequate time.

Surely Senator Murray has taken something to the provinces. There are at least 10 premiers who know something of what Senator Murray has taken to them.

Could the Prime Minister share with this House, at least in general terms if not specifically, what Senator Murray has taken to each of the provinces?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for her question in regard to the specific nature of the problem. I thought that I had answered it before. If I have not, I apologize. I tried to indicate to members of the House that in a meeting a few minutes ago with Senator Murray he gave me a full debriefing on the meetings that he held with all provincial premiers.

He indicated that as a result of these series of meetings he did not feel that a First Ministers' Conference at this time could be called in circumstances that would be beneficial and would advance the cause of Canadian unity.

He did however leave with me at the end of our meeting some views as to how I might, in communication with the premiers later on this afternoon, begin the process of seeking anew to limit the areas of disagreement in some of the regions of Canada, for example. I propose to do that after Question Period, to continue our work.

As soon as I have something more specific, and I hope more helpful, to report to my friend, the leader of the NDP, I will be happy to do precisely that.

I also hope she would agree that these remain delicate and difficult negotiations and that they must take place among first ministers. I propose to do that and to try to keep her and all members of the House fully informed.

Ms. Audrey McLaughlin (Yukon): Mr. Speaker, despite the fact that the Premier of Manitoba has said "a conference is the only way to save the accord", that the Premier of Newfoundland has said "the first ministers must meet immediately", and that the Premier of Quebec has said "let's work together", I say to the Prime Minister, who seems to be indicating that first ministers meeting together will not advance Canadian unity, what will advance Canadian unity? Surely there has to be a basis of discussion.

Is Senator Murray not basing his recommendations on the Charest report? What is the Prime Minister's next plan? Why will he not call a First Ministers' Conference now?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I tried to answer that question. I am in no way opposed to calling a First Ministers' Conference. I would just like to call a First Ministers' Conference in circumstances that would advance the cause of unity.

I think most people would agree that we should try to put as many chances on the side of success before a First Ministers' Conference is called. What Senator Murray has been doing is looking for a basis of accommodation.

The hon. member mentioned a few premiers. Some of the views of those specific premiers in regard to specific important items are antithetical one to the other, province to province, not the federal government. It is very, very important in regard to this list that the work that Senator Murray has been doing be continued to eliminate, to the extent humanly possible, the differences that exist even between premiers—mostly between premiers—before they come together to see if we can eliminate those differences that would prevent a resolution of the matter in favour of Canada.

Surely my friend will understand that what we are trying to do is to get rid of as many differences as possible, trying to put as many chances on the side of success that will guarantee a conference that will ensure the unity of Canada.

TRANSPORT

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport.

What we saw yesterday in Montreal and Toronto and what we are seeing today in Windsor, Sarnia and other points in Canada is a complete and total frustration by Canadian truckers with not being able to compete with their friends, the American truckers, and they cannot compete right here in Canada.

Canadian truckers cannot compete because of high insurance costs, high diesel fuel costs, high interest rates, maintenance, and the very cost of the rigs themselves.

The minister can do something constructive about this unfair competition. What is he going to do with this unfair competition? When is he going to do it? When is he going to get Canadian truckers rolling again?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate my hon. friend's question. I understand the frustrations of those in the Canadian trucking business. I had been aware of this for some time. I had arranged for a meeting with the Canadian Trucking Association. That is to take place in my office tomorrow.

I understand at the same time that the Minister of Transport for the Province of Ontario is meeting with the truckers this afternoon. He has a call into my office. I intend to confer with him afterwards to see if there is some action that can be taken at federal government level to alleviate this situation.

I think that my hon. friend will agree that most of the problems being met are state to state and province to state. Those are the difficulties they are under. We will take whatever action we can to assist them.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate that reply. It just so happens that the Minister of Transport for the Province of Ontario is from Windsor. I am told by the most recent report that the automobile industry in Windsor may come to a grinding halt unless we do something about this problem immediately.

What we are saying is that we have to stop this unfair competition. The minister can take constructive action in stopping this unfair competition. He has got to do something about the cabotage that is affecting Canadian truckers.

The simple question is: When will he be prepared to do it? He can do it.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we are now down to something we can deal with. I am sure my hon. friend agrees that high insurance rates and high fuel taxes are something that are not completely within our jurisdiction.

When it comes to the question of cabotage, I agree with my friend. He has a point. I will take that matter up with the executive of the Canadian Trucking Association tomorrow afternoon when I see him.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister. He is not unaware that the budget tabled on February 20 projected an average interest rate of 11.1 per cent for the year. We are now in May and I would like to ask him whether his government intends to table a new budget as soon as possible to reflect Canadian economic reality.

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

[English]

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the difficulty facing the Canadian economy has been set out now by the Chamber of Commerce, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, and the Canadian Labour Congress.

In view of the fact that an 11.1 per cent interest rate was an absolutely basic premise, and we are now at nearly 14 per cent, does the Prime Minister not understand that we have to make sure that the economy is seen as being strong and well managed, that many influential people who understand the problem are calling for a new budget, that it is urgent that it be introduced as soon as possible, and that it reflect what is really going on in the Canadian economy?

• (1440)

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am sure my hon. friend, the finance critic for the opposition, was pleased, as were all members of the House, to see the inflationary pressures in Canada dropping quite impressively in the figures released last Friday. That is good news for Canada. That is what is required before interest rates begin the process of coming down.

My hon. friend is clearly seeking what we all seek, that is, economic growth in a non-inflationary climate.

The fact that we have had some serious signs of decreasing inflation is important good news for Canada, consistent, if I may say, with policies that we have been pursuing with the encouragement of the IMF and the OECD, both respected international organizations which have said that by and large the policies pursued by the Government of Canada are appropriate for the circumstances and will ensure ongoing prosperity and sustained economic growth in a non-inflationary climate.

TRANSPORT

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport.

As I speak, thousands of truckers are blocking major border crossings into southern Ontario. They are protesting, as they said to me on Sunday, the unfair competition which federal deregulation has thrown them into with United States firms, deregulation which is now costing them thousands of jobs.

Will the minister now agree, as I requested over a month ago in a letter to him, to sit down and negotiate with representatives of these truckers so as to save the trucking industry in this country?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate my hon. friend's interest in this matter. Contrary to his opinion, rather than ignore his letter and the concerns of the trucking industry, I set about and asked for the meeting myself. That meeting has been arranged for tomorrow.

As I have said, we have received the brief of the Canadian Trucking Association. Certainly what I want to do is find a way if there is one at the federal level, and I specify federal level, to assist the trucking industry.

I would also tell my friend that I do not think the trucking industry wants a great deal of regulation. It wants the freedom to compete, something which is antipathic to the hon. member's party.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, the freedom to compete, as the minister puts it, meant that last year 64 per cent of cross-border traffic was handled by Canadians while this year 42 per cent of cross-border traffic is Canadian run. That is not what truckers across this country want.

Is the minister prepared to expand that meeting which he has set up with the truckers' association to include the people who are blocking border crossings, those people who are in various trade unions, those independent owner-operators, those people who are actually facing the fight out on the highways to keep a job for themselves and for their families? Is he prepared to talk with them and start real negotiation on this critical issue?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, in approaching this issue we naturally looked for the organization which claims to represent the Canadian trucking industry. I make no comment about independent operators. I think they have a place in the scheme of things.

However we have to start with an organization. We have started with the Canadian Trucking Association. I would like to see what progress we make as a result of that meeting and go on from there.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Agriculture.

Last fall the Saskatchewan Wheat Pool requested the federal government to provide some $500 million in special farm financial assistance because of low world prices for grain, high interest rates and so on.

Last week we understand that the federal government agreed to provide something less than half of this amount. I want to ask the minister if he will clarify the situation.

Is it to be paid, as has been reported in the press, on a $5 per seeded acre basis? Will it be paid directly by the federal government, as was done for the Special Canadian Grains Program, or is there going to be a continuation of long negotiations for several more weeks on this matter?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, obviously, the hon. member has not been listening to my answers in the House.

First, I have indicated that this is a multifaceted problem that has to be dealt with in such a way so as to ensure that the assistance is properly targeted in all the regions of the provinces that are affected.

We engaged in negotiations with the provinces to try to design the most effective program to ensure that those areas that are affected by drought will be given some assistance, and that those areas affected by excessive moisture will be given assistance while recognizing depressed prices.

It is to that end that the federal government put $500 million on the table to negotiate with the provinces. I am pleased to tell the hon. member that at the meeting of ministers of agriculture on Friday we reached an agreement as to the allocation of those funds to the respective provinces, along with some general understanding as to what programs would be eligible for matching contributions to be considered as part of this over-all plan.

Those negotiations are continuing. I can advise the hon. member that as soon as they are completed on a bilateral basis the money will flow to the provinces and the provinces will design the program as they see fit. We think that that is the most effective way of proceeding.

Mr. Maurice Foster (Algoma): Mr. Speaker, I want to point out to the minister that even though eight weeks have elapsed farmers still do not know what the criteria for this program will be. In other words, even though they are well into seeding in many areas of the country, they do not know if they are going to be eligible for this assistance or not.

How soon will the federal criteria be available to farmers so that they will know if they are eligible for assistance? How soon can they expect the actual cheques and payments to be made, especially in the province of Saskatchewan which has been affected worse than any other part of the country?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, to a great extent that will depend upon the provinces which will be trying to design the program that is most effective for their particular province.

In the case of Saskatchewan my understanding is that the province is considering an acreage payment that will be more or less across the board.

I understand that in Manitoba greater emphasis will be placed on the drought areas of that province.

In Alberta we have had excessive moisture in the northern part of the province and excessive drought in the southern part of the province.

Obviously, what we are trying to do here, with the co-operation of the provinces, is design the most effective program so that the farmers who are in the greatest need will get the most amount of money.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, my question is also for the Minister of Agriculture. It concerns the tragic financial situation facing apple growers across Canada, particularly in Norfolk County.

These growers are forced to compete with subsidized apples from across the border, while at the same time they are facing a government that is unilaterally disarming itself of all subsidies.

How does the government plan to help our apple farmers compete against these unfair trading practices?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, first and foremost, if there is evidence of dumping of apples from our competitors, there are provisions and redress procedures in place. In the case of the United States there is the snap-back provision which was used recently in the case of asparagus.

I should say as well that as a part of the $500 million program some $50 million is being allocated for other crops. Obviously, the horticultural industry would be included in that sector.

Mr. Bob Speller (Haldimand—Norfolk): Mr. Speaker, the apple growers in Norfolk County would like to know that they will still be around by the time a marketing agency comes into force.

The last drought assistance program failed to address the real loss apple producers faced, a loss of quality, not quantity, and a subsequent loss of market price.

• (1450)

What assurances can the government give apple producers in Norfolk County and across Canada that programs will be made specifically to meet the needs of the apple producers to help them deal with this tragic situation?

Hon. Don Mazankowski (Deputy Prime Minister, President of the Privy Council and Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, in response to the hon. member for Algoma I said precisely that the objective of the federal government was to try to design the programs with the co-operation of the provinces to ensure that assistance will be targeted to those producers and those sectors which are in the most need, and to ensure that they get the most amount of money as soon as possible.

INDUSTRY, SCIENCE AND TECHNOLOGY

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to whomever speaks for the Department of Industry, Science and Technology.

Statistics Canada has released figures which show that foreign ownership of Canadian manufacturing is rapidly approaching 50 per cent. This week's sale of Polysar Rubber to Bayer of Germany worsens the trend, in spite of 1985 legislation that the government promised would preserve by a wide margin Canadian control of this major corporation.

Does that promise still hold, or will Investment Canada once more bear its toothless grin while one more Canadian R and D intensive firm falls into the hands of foreign ownership?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, I say to my hon. friend that the Nova transaction is going to be examined by Investment Canada. Of course it has to be proved that it will be of net benefit to Canada before it is permitted.

On the larger question of R and D and of technology transfers, it is interesting to note that 11 of the largest investors in research and development in Canada are in fact foreign controlled companies. They have done a tremendous job.

We have found from 1984 to 1988 that $23 billion of reinvestment in the Canadian economy has come from foreign controlled companies. We have had a higher level of job creation from that sector than we have from the Canadian controlled sector.

What we have is a situation of a tremendously dynamic economy that is enticing foreign investment. It is good for Canada. Investment Canada has its role to review that all acquisitions are of net benefit to Canada.

Mr. Howard McCurdy (Windsor—St. Clair): Mr. Speaker, as a matter of fact the National Advisory Board on Science and Technology has cited foreign ownership of Canadian industries, which StatsCan has said is increasing, as largely responsible for Canada's poor research and development performance.

Will the government act according to its 1985 CDC legislation to stop this trend by enforcing the 10 per cent limit on foreign ownership of Polysar, or will this company, once cited as one of Canada's 10 greatest engineering achievements of the century and whose picture once appeared on the $10 bill, appear on the Deutschmark instead?

Hon. Tom Hockin (Minister of State (Small Businesses and Tourism)): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is really speaking generically of the manufacturing sector. Of course what this government is doing is removing the biggest impediment of all on the manufacturing sector in Canada which we have had for over 66 years—the manufacturers' sales tax. That is the first thing we are doing.

If we take a look at the evidence of foreign controlled companies in Canada, we see a slight pick-up of control of assets in Canada by foreign controlled companies in 1987. Guess why that is, Mr. Speaker. It is because we had a deregulation of a sector of our economy which the opposition has been calling for for 20 years. It wanted more competition against the banks. We brought in financial deregulation. That contributed to more competition in the Canadian economy.

TRANSPORT

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Minister of Transport.

After years of delays and stalls to replace a deteriorated Salmon River bridge near Truro, Nova Scotia, the National Transportation Agency has instructed CN to replace the bridge and CN has agreed in writing to begin construction.

Will the minister confirm that CN will comply with its original obligation, the National Transportation Agency's order and its own commitment made in January and replace this dilapidated bridge right away?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, my understanding is that CN is prepared to design the structure and go ahead with the construction. The problem is that there is a 75-25 split on the cost of the structure and the upgrading that the province wants. The province, being on the 75 per cent end of the split, is concerned about that. At the present time we are trying to see if there is a way to meet its concerns and get the bridge constructed.

ITALIAN CANADIANS

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Prime Minister.

Following the federal redress to Japanese Canadians for their internment during World War II, the government invited other Canadians to submit their concerns in the hopes of reaching a fair solution to this tragic time of our history.

Given that the government has had a brief from the National Congress of Italian Canadians since January on the internment of Canadians of Italian origin, without an answer, can the Prime Minister please update the House with a response to the request, what the government is prepared to do about it, and when?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. friend for the question. He reminds us all of what I think was quite a glorious moment in the history of the House of Commons when, pursuant to a resolution that I had the honour of bringing forward, after 45 years of neglect, the Japanese Canadians whose rights were trampled upon in the war saw that justice was finally done on behalf of the government of Canada and the people of Canada. I think that was a good moment in Parliament.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: I was also offended by the notion that Italian Canadians who had for decades made similar pleas to Ottawa had their pleas go unanswered.

In point of fact, contrary to what my hon. friend says, I responded publicly to the concerns of the Italian Canadian community in Toronto a few months ago when I indicated that the Government of Canada viewed what had taken place to Italian Canadians as most unacceptable, that it was something that should have been dealt with a long time ago and that the Government of Canada was seized of the matter and that we would deal with it, I hoped urgently and efficiently, so as to acknowledge what has been an unfair stain placed upon the Italian community which this House must expunge.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the House joins the Prime Minister in clearly recognizing that that day in the last Parliament when we recognized those injustices in a very profound way was truly a parliamentary success story. The fact is that we should repeat success stories. Therefore I return to the basic premise of my question.

Mr. Prime Minister, one of the difficulties with the Japanese Canadian redress was the lack of clarity in terms of a process and structure. Given that the Prime Minister is favourably disposed to correcting and righting the wrongs with respect to Italian Canadians interned during World War II, can he ensure that there will be a very clear and well-defined process and structure for talks between the government and the community? Will he also provide us with a possible timetable by which these talks may in fact bear fruit that will do us proud as a country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is quite right. One of the problems that I had as a new Prime Minister in 1984 when I sought to deal with the problem of the Japanese Canadians and their plight was that it had been ignored for 40 years. It is true that it took us a little while longer than I would have liked to bring about a policy of communication with the Japanese community and to initiate a proper process of redress.

I am sure that the actions taken during the war by the Government of Canada against the Italian community of Canada which has worked so hard to bring so much honour to Canada is, as I say, something that we cannot let stand unchallenged. I am saddened and appalled, as are all members of the House, that Governments of Canada have not acted before. I take my honourable friend's excellent views as representations.

• (1500)

We are initiating conversations and meetings with the Italian community. Hopefully, we will be able to bring about a dimension to convey the appropriate apology and redress to the Italian-Canadian community so that we can put this shame behind us and do honour to the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. Jean-Marc Robitaille (Terrebonne): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 34(1), I have the honour to table in the House, in both official languages, the thirteenth report of the Canadian group of the Interparliamentary Union. This is the report of the official delegation that represented Canada at the eighty-third interparliamentary conference held in Nicosia, Cyprus, from April 2 to 7, 1990.

PETITIONS

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Nelson A. Riis (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, it is an honour to present a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, on behalf of a number of my constituents who are concerned about the government's intentions regarding the imposition of a cruel goods and services tax.

The petitioners point out that this is going to be a tax on reading. They believe ours will be the only country in the world that will tax reading material. They also have a whole other set of reasons why they oppose this tax.

They call upon the government to reconsider the imposition of this tax, to go back to the drawing-board and to introduce, instead, real tax reform.

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, it is my honour today to present a couple of petitions.

First, there are about 100 petitioners from the riding of Moose Jaw—Lake Centre who are opposed to the goods and services tax. They point out to the government that it has not addressed the unfair taxation system currently in place which permits wealthy individuals and corporations to pay little or no federal tax, while forcing lower and middle-income taxpayers to bear more of the national tax burden. They call upon the government to introduce immediate, fair tax reforms.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD

Mr. Rod Laporte (Moose Jaw—Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I also have another petition signed by a number of Saskatchewan farmers who call upon the government to reinstate oats under the Canadian Wheat Board.

The petitioners call upon the government to place both oats and barley under the Canadian Wheat Board and give them the same protection that wheat now has under the Canadian Wheat Board. Then, there could be no changes to oats and barley unless Parliament itself makes that decision.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, I have a very interesting petition coming in from the Tax Busters which is addressed to hon. House of Commons of Canada, in which the petitioners say the following:

> "We're fed up with government waste eating up our tax dollars. Why are we so severely taxed on every dollar we work so hard to earn, and again taxed on whatever we can afford to buy with what's left of our earnings? Federal tax—provincial tax—sales tax—manufacturers tax—property tax—land transfer tax—excise tax—and now the GST!!! Will it ever end?
> "If our tax dollars were spent wisely, instead of being foolishly wasted, we wouldn't have to be taxed to death. The Canadian government does not need more money from the taxpayers—it needs conscientious, responsible representatives to diligently manage the public purse.

"Whereas the undersigned, your Petitioners, humbly pray and call upon Parliament to stop wasting our tax dollars, and to reject the proposed goods and services tax."

ENERGY

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, it is my pleasure today, pursuant to Standing Order 36, to present two petitions.

The first petition asks that the current moratorium on offshore oil exploration continue on all hydrocarbon exploration and development activities in the coastal waters off British Columbia and that the Canadian government indicate to industry that this moratorium will not be lifted in the future.

The petitioners further ask that money currently being spent by the federal government subsidizing offshore oil drilling on the pacific coast be used instead to promote energy conservation and the development and use of alternative, sustainable, environmentally benign sources of energy.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Jack Whittaker(Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Mr. Speaker, I also have the honour and privilege to present a petition, pursuant to Standing Order 36, against the goods and services tax.

I have just travelled through my riding of Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt, in towns like Princeton, Oliver, Keremeos, Cawston, Osoyoos and Grand Forks. People in all these towns are asking me to tell the House of Commons and the government that they are unalterably opposed to this goods and services tax. This is reflected in this petition of some 213 additional names.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. Bob Kaplan (York Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise to submit a petition on behalf of dozens of Canadians who are concerned about the fate of Mr. Yi-Shih Leo, a Canadian citizen originally from Taiwan, who has been arrested and unlawfully sentenced to 10 months imprisonment in Taiwan.

They urge the Canadian government to issue a public statement expressing Canada's concern over the violation of his rights, instruct the Canadian Embassy in Japan or our High Commission in Hong Kong to send a representative to Taiwan, to appoint a lawyer to handle the case, and to request all allies of our country that have representatives in Taiwan to assist with the case.

GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I also have a petition signed by quite a number of Canadians who say that the goods and services tax proposed by the federal Minister of Finance is an unfair form of taxation because of its lack of regard for the taxpayers' ability to pay.

The government has not addressed the unfair taxation system currently in place which permits wealthy individuals and corporations to pay little or no federal tax, while forcing lower and middle-income taxpayers to pay more of the national tax burden. The government is now trying to tax reading, hair cuts, diapers, coffins, and home heating fuels.

The petitioners call on the government to withdraw this tax and bring in a fair taxation policy.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 36, I would like to table a petition signed by several dozen Canadians from the great constituency of Hamilton Mountain who are so well represented in the House by my colleague.

These petitioners call upon Parliament to reject the GST, the grief and suffering tax, proposed by the Conservative government across the way. They ask that Parliament urge the government to eliminate this tax immediately before further damage is done to our country.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to rise and present a petition signed by numerous residents of the riding of Kingston and the Islands and the neighbouring riding of Hastings—Frontenac—Lennox and Addington.

These people have signed a petition objecting to the cutbacks the government has announced in its budget to the veterans affairs portfolio, particularly long-term care for veterans and the reduction in housekeeping services to veterans. They call upon Parliament to reject these budget measures.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth), Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House): Mr. Speaker, I ask that all Notices of Motions for the Production of Papers be allowed to stand.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): Is it agreed?

[English]

Mr. Milliken: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I have had a Notice of Motion on the Order Paper since October 25, 1989. I have made pleas on at least three occasions over a period of many weeks to the Parliamentary Secretary to the Government House Leader trying to get him to use his good offices to help me out.

Now I see the Deputy Government House Leader here in the House today. As a member of the cabinet and a new one—as they say a new broom sweeps clean—I know that he would be delighted to take this matter up with his colleague, whichever minister it is who is responsible. It appears to be the Minister of National Defence. I know he is a hard-working minister. I know that the Deputy House Leader is a hard-working minister. I am sure that if he took five minutes and placed a call to his colleague, this information could be made available immediately in the House.

October 25, last year, Mr. Speaker. This is an inexcusable delay. Every week these matters are stood because the government cannot make up its mind. It is dithering. It is time that the public had this information. The Deputy House Leader, who is new to his job, could move with gusto and take firm steps to get his colleagues to pay some attention to the reasonable requests for information made by members of the opposition in the House on behalf of the people of Canada.

Mr. Danis: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands is a very hard-working member. However, the record of this government in answering notices of motions or petitions is the best of any government in Canadian history and will continue in that way.

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed from Monday, May 22, consideration of Bill C-43, an act respecting abortion, as reported (without amendment) from a legislative committee, and on Motions Nos. 4, 5, 10, 12, 13, 14, 16, 17A, 17B, 19, 22 and 24.

Mr. Al Johnson (Calgary North): Mr. Speaker, Bill C-43, an act respecting abortion is one which deals with a subject that divides members of this House and the people of Canada.

Some people want strong legislation, others have said that the government should not even legislate in this area. I do not agree with the contention that we should not make laws on abortion. To me, it is essential that we legislate on the very definition of life and being, as well as on the rights associated with our being. Nothing could be more fundamental.

As it is presented, Bill C-43 is not acceptable. Unless it is substantially amended, I cannot support it. When the bill was first introduced, I spoke at length on my concerns relating to this issue. These concerns involve my belief that we cannot discuss abortion until we define life as beginning at conception, my desire for better support systems for women with crisis pregnancies, the need for preventive counselling and support, and my belief that there should be a major reorganization of our basic philosophies towards the supporting and nurturing of families.

I do not want to repeat these arguments today, but I do want to speak briefly on the proposed amendments. I think it is important that I set out the reasons for the decisions I will be making when these amendments are brought to a vote.

I would like to deal with the proposed amendments in the order that they will be presented for voting. First, let me say that I will reject Motion No. 3 out of hand. In my view, this amendment attempts to change one of the most fundamental aspects of Bill C-43. It would allow abortion on demand and limit the application of this law.

Ms. Black: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. The member on the opposite side is speaking to an amendment that was never moved. It has been withdrawn. He is speaking to Motion No. 3 and I would suggest that is out of order.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The hon. member is on debate so he can speak on any motion. I am sure he is going to get to one of the other motions. If he wants to speak to Motion No. 3 he can. It is debate. The hon. member for Calgary North.

Mr. Johnson: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate very much my hon. colleague's comments. I was not aware of that, and I would be pleased to discuss other motions that have been proposed.

Motions Nos. 4 and 22 attempt to increase dramatically the punishments that would be incurred by those who would illegally commit abortions. I have grave concerns over this type of amendment. To approve it would be to signal that our interests are in punishment and revenge. This is not and should not be the case.

As I have said before, the key issue is the definition of the beginning of life and the careful, compassionate balancing of rights from that point onwards. Emphasis on extreme punishment is a vindictive approach that fails to consider the enormous emotional and psychological stresses that are involved. It is inconsistent with a caring society and also inconsistent with other parts of the Criminal Code. Therefore, I cannot support these amendments.

Motion No. 5 would limit the performance of abortions to medical practitioners. It would not allow the procedure to be performed by nurses or assistants under the supervision of a doctor. Although I believe that the amendment would have little actual effect on the number of abortions performed, I would like to support it. Doctors have a choice whether or not to participate in abortions. Their employees do not, nor do the employees of hospitals. Although this amendment tries to relieve nurses from having to actually perform abortions, they would still be forced to assist. The distinction is too fine and would not be upheld in the courts. I will not support this amendment, although I support its intent.

• (1520)

Motion No. 10 attempts to remove the health of the mother from consideration and leave the life of the mother as the only criterion for determining whether or not an abortion should proceed. I sympathize with the intent of this motion but I do not believe it is always possible for a doctor to determine exactly whether life or just health is at stake. I also do not believe that this amendment is constitutionally valid.

For these reasons, I will vote against Motion No. 10 in the hope that other motions, specifically Motions Nos. 12 and 13 will carry.

Motion No. 12 clarifies for me that there must be a serious threat to life and health for an abortion to be considered. Although I am not certain that Motion No. 12 would be of much use without Motion No. 13, I will support it.

It is important to point out that I consider Motion No. 13 to be the key to amending Bill C-43 successfully. This amendment limits the procedure of abortion to those cases in which no other medically acceptable treatment is available to alleviate the risk. It clarifies the issue that rights must be balanced. The test is the availability of medical procedures for the protection of the life and health of the mother. This amendment will receive my support.

Motion No. 14 would remove the definition of health from the bill. I do not consider this appropriate as I believe physicians may not always be able to distinguish between serious health and life risks. Although I believe the definition must be left in, I also believe it should be strengthened. Therefore, I will vote against Motion No. 14 and for Motion No. 16, which I believe places clear and acceptable limitations on the definition of health. If Motion No. 16 fails, I will support Motion No. 17B rather than 17A, as I believe that Motion 17B leaves less room for interpretation of the word "health".

Motion No. 19 attempts to introduce the concept of a solid body of scientific knowledge into the definition of the medical practitioner's opinion. I have real concern for the ability of the courts to interpret such a clause. It would, in my opinion, invite numerous court challenges. I will therefore vote against this motion.

Motion No. 20 causes me a great deal of concern. The intent of the motion is to include in the definition of abortion, methods of birth control which work after initial conception but before implantation. I will not support this motion as I believe that deleting this clause will result in enormous confusion and uncertainty in matters relating to birth control. I strongly support birth control as the most effective method of reducing the perceived need for abortion.

The last amendment before us is Motion No. 24, which proposes to gut Bill C–43 so that there is, in fact, no law on abortion. Although I may disagree with the bill as amended, or not amended at this point, I will not support this motion.

I consider it essential that we define life in our laws. I believe that Bill C–43 does this by recognizing that abortion is fundamentally wrong. Although the definitions are not what I might like, I must reaffirm the duty of Parliament to legislate on matters of morality. I will therefore vote against this amendment.

Finally, I wish to say to my colleagues, to the Prime Minister, and to the Minister of Justice, how much I respect and appreciate the way in which the process of debate on this bill has been handled. I am well aware of the deep divisions that exist and of the enormous compromises already made on this issue in order to bring a bill, any bill, before this House.

In the final analysis, should I find that I have to vote against this bill, I will do so with great reluctance and not in any sense to criticize or condemn those who have come to a different conclusion. It is my sincere hope that amendments will be made that will enable me to support this bill.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to the comments of the member on the opposite side because I think he hit the nail on the head when he stated that this bill and the amendments fail to discuss the true issue. We as Canadians and as parliamentarians have to face it. When does life begin and when do we, as a society, propose to protect it?

We are talking about amendments to Bill C–43. The amendment is designed to improve the bill in some way. I would like to talk about my views on the amendments, whether they achieve what they set out to achieve, and second, on the circumstances surrounding the amendment process of Bill C–43. In order to determine whether an amendment aids or improves a particular bill, we have to look at the bill. At the beginning, I want to say that in my analysis, Bill C–43 is fatally flawed and totally unconstitutional, regardless of which side of the issue you are on, or whether you even have a side.

I say this simply because the Supreme Court of Canada the past summer in the Chantal Daigle case set out quite clearly what is the responsibility of parliamentarians. It made a statement that the foetus has absolutely no protection under Canadian law at the present time. It went further and said that the people of Canada and those who represent them in the House of Commons can, if they so decide, protect the foetus. If they wish to do so, it is fundamental that the protection be explicitly spelled out in legislation, not implicitly.

Otherwise, the bill will be unconstitutional. We did not follow that advice in Bill C–43 because there is no statement as to why abortion is being re–criminalized. There is no indication in the bill why we are putting abortion back into the Criminal Code. The first thing I look for in an amendment is to see if this fundamental flaw in the legislation is dealt with. Unfortunately, as I see the 12 amendments, the flaw is not addressed.

There is no amendment dealing with a definition of life. There is no amendment stating why the procedure of abortion is contrary to the accepted norms of society in the views of the proposers of the bill. How then can those amendments improve the bill as it now stands in its unconstitutional form, as I see it?

That brings me to the second point about the amendment process, that is, the circumstances surrounding the amendment. We were told that we would have a free vote, that we would be able to exercise our consciences on this very emotional and divisive issue which has torn the country apart and has set families one against the other. That is what we were told by our Prime Minister. He indicated in the 1988 general election that he would allow a free vote.

Instead, he has committed a fraud on the Canadian people by insisting not on allowing a free vote but that his cabinet ministers abandon conscience in favour of loyalty; then further, to send the message quite clearly that absolutely no amendments whatsoever were to be considered with respect to this bill. Regardless of what the amendment might be, regardless of whether it improved or made constitutional or changed in any way the intent of the bill, there were no amendments to be considered. The message is clear and totally contrary to the promises made by the Prime Minister that members of this House would be able to view this legislation on the basis of conscience and vote in accordance with their conscience.

Cabinet ministers are struggling in this House and indicating their dilemma, indicating that they feel that they are in effect coerced into voting in favour of Bill C-43, in fact voting against all of the amendments. This is a free vote? How can we have amendments which benefit the legislation in the face of coercion? I say that we cannot do so. It is simply impossible.

The amendments have made efforts to improve the bill in the eyes of the mover. I do not propose to go through each and every amendment. I simply wish to state that in the absence of a grappling by this country and by this Parliament of the fundamental issue, which is "Does an abortion kill a human being?", and then depending on the answer, struggle with what we do to prevent that or to allow it, and in the absence of struggling with whether or not life begins at conception or some time subsequent, we cannot deal with this bill. Therefore, I see no amendments which can save this bill constitutionally or make it logically flow to answer that question.

Having said that, it seems to me that Motion No. 10 makes an attempt to indicate the revulsion that society has for the procedure of abortion, except when it is necessary to save a human life. It does not deal with, nor does the bill deal with, why we have this revulsion, why an abortion brings on different feelings than a tonsillectomy or an appendectomy, but at least it attempts to define and limit when we are going to have the procedure of abortion.

Unfortunately, in my view, even the amendment is broadly worded. If we look at the amendment as proposed it reads, and I will only read that portion which is being amended: "If the abortion were not induced, the life of the female person would be likely to be threatened."

It seems to me that the intent of the bill is that if the life of the female person is threatened, the procedure should be performed. For what purpose? To save the life. Not to destroy a life, but to save a life. However, to leave the phrase "likely to be threatened", I believe totally removes any proposed protection that Motion No. 10 would wish to bring to the bill.

Accordingly, I sympathize with the intent, as I see it, of Motion No. 10. Because I sympathize with the intent of Motion No. 10 and because I feel that Bill C-43, whether or not it is amended is, based on these amendments and based on its present structure, unconstitutional, I cannot support the bill or any of the amendments.

However, I want to make it clear that when I do vote for Motion No. 10, it will be to show that I am in favour of the spirit behind the motion which was the protection of life, the protection of the life in the womb and the protection of the life of the female person whose life would be threatened if the procedure were not performed.

All of the other amendments do not deal with the fundamental issue, which is the question of life. Therefore, I will not be supporting any of those amendments, with the exception of Motion No. 10.

Mr. Stan Wilbee (Delta): Mr. Speaker, it is a privilege to speak again on this important subject. Although my position in the House has changed, my position on this particular item has not changed.

I would like to reiterate that I appreciate very much the method by which this bill was arrived at. The consultation among the caucus and the discussions with many people in the committee was a good way of formulating legislation. However, I have a problem with the legislation in that I believe that it has failed in that it does not protect the unborn.

If we read the legislation, there is absolutely nothing that protects the unborn foetus which, of course, is helpless. I believe that as a Parliament we need to recognize the relative rights of the mother and those of the foetus.

There has been some question about whether any amendments to this bill will be constitutionally correct. I suggest that if our Constitution does not protect the helpless in our society, perhaps we should take a look at that Constitution.

It was clear from the Supreme Court decisions the two previous speakers mentioned, where the Supreme Court cast down the previous abortion law, that there should be some protection somewhere for the foetus.

I would like to quote from the Legal Aspects of Abortion from the research branch of the Library of Parliament which states: "Apart from the obvious fact that there is no longer an enforceable federal prohibition against abortions in Canada, the full import of the court's ruling in the Morgentaler case is as yet unknown." The majority of the court did not rule that women had an unconditional right to abortion under the Charter. On the contrary, it merely concluded that the existing provisions on abortions were set so as to impair irretrievably a pregnant woman's Section 7 rights.

All five justices comprising the majority acknowledged the interest of the foetus was deserving of constitutional recognition under Section 1. Three expressly stated that the law restricting abortions might yet be consistent with the Charter where at some point during the pregnancy the state's interests in protecting the foetus might be sufficiently compelling to override the rights that women otherwise might have under the Charter.

Although the justices did not indicate when this compelling state interest might crystallize, Madam Justice Wilson, who wrote the strongest judgment against the existing abortion law, made the following comments: 'The precise point in the development of the foetus at which the state's interest in its protection becomes compelling, I leave to the informed judgment of the legislature which is in a position to receive guidance on the subject from all relevant disciplines. It seems to me however that it might fall somewhere in the second trimester".

We could go on with that, but it does show that the Supreme Court indicated that there should be some type of protection for that foetus.

A lot of the debate and the discussions throughout the country centre around the idea of when does life actually begin. Does it begin at conception? Does it begin at the age of viability when the baby or the foetus can live outside the womb? As we read the literature, examine precedents in court, and even medical opinions, it is very difficult to come to a conclusion as to when this actually does occur.

A lot of it really depends on our own attitude toward the unborn. I remember in particular a case of mine in the past where a woman went into labour at 24 weeks, just at the borderline of so-called viability. In the case room there were three doctors, two nurses and an anaesthetist. The baby was born weighing under two pounds and was taken to the Vancouver General Hospital. The baby went through six months of intensive care. Today this baby is a very beautiful teenager. At the same time that the struggle was going on to maintain the life of this baby, an abortion was being performed in the operating room of this same hospital.

• (1540)

There was an instance last summer where a foetus of the same age was aborted that could have been saved. It could have been a life that carried on.

Our attitudes are very important in determining our judgment and the positions that we take.

I believe that our society must defend the defenceless. I cannot think of anything more defenceless than an unborn baby.

I was very impressed during deliberations of the legislative committee by a submission from the Families and Friends of the Handicapped on Bill C-43. I would like to quote from the submission that they made to the committee.

These people represented a number of types of handicapped children. There were also parents who had adopted handicapped children and adults with handicaps. In their brief they stated: "If society takes the position that a disability is a sufficient reason to deny treatment to a child or is grounds for ending that child's life before birth through abortion, society is making a profound and dangerous statement about all human life. Society is saying that the lives of the unborn are second-class and not worth defending, that the life of a disabled person is not really worth living".

They further stated: "Are we expected to believe that a society which sanctions death before birth is a society which will recognize and respect the rights, the aspirations and the human dignities of persons with a disability? It is not just eugenic abortions which represent a threat to the disabled. Any abortion law which sanctions the killing of children poses an equal threat. Such a law establishes the principle that the value of a human life is to be determined by its value to other persons" and I think that that is a very significant statement. "A permissive abortion law embraces the principle that one group of human beings can be declared to be of secondary value and to be disposable. If the unborn can be so designated, so can the disabled".

Because this submission was from a group of disabled people, many of their comments are in that vein.

"Bill C-43 represents an attack upon the efforts of the disabled to obtain equality in society and win the dignity and respect to which they are entitled. The bill would allow abortion for the widest possible reasons. It would enshrine in law a principle that the lives of some may be destroyed for the convenience of others".

There are many points in their brief. I would like to make one last quotation: "We have also reached a crucial moment because of our frequently expressed belief in the equality of everyone is now put to the test. If we say that some people are more equal than others, that the lives of some can be destroyed for the sake of others, then we have abandoned our cherished principles of equality".

Although that is a particular point of view, we need to take note of it and see where this law could possibly lead in the future.

There are some other problems with the law as it stands. I would bring forth the brief from the Canadian Medical Association which opposes Bill C-43. It is particularly concerned about the first amendments we are dealing with, Motions Nos. 4 and 22.

The CMA brief points out that "the bill singles out abortion as the only specified medical act to attract Criminal Code sanctions", and I think we need to ask why that should be. The CMA believes that such treatment is inappropriate and abortion should be treated and controlled under the same statutes that apply to other medical acts.

The CMA further comments: "The inclusion of abortion in the Criminal Code threatens the nature of the physician—patient relationship. The ultimate effect of this bill would be to confer legal entitlement to abortion, but at the expense of access to the service. The bill creates a conceptual nightmare and the bill is vague in its intent".

There are various problems with the bill. It does not protect the innocent or the unborn. It puts the medical fraternity at a distinct disadvantage. They are the only people under this bill that in any way are at risk for carrying out their duties, and of course they are concerned about future access.

Mr. Joe Fontana (London East): Mr. Speaker, to say that this is a complex and difficult issue would be a fantastic understatement. Every individual Canadian has wrestled with it and has had to come to grips with this very personal and difficult moral issue. Some say you cannot legislate morality, but I believe that we must try.

This issue challenges the basic question of what we believe in as individuals and as a society. This issue speaks to rights, freedoms, choices, responsibilities, and obligations of the individual and of society.

Throughout the 1980s Canadians have watched a difference of opinion grow and fester into a raging debate that has deeply divided many Canadians. It has created countless front page headlines on dragged out court battles, demonstrations involving thousands of Canadians, and repeated arrests.

The debate on abortion is really a debate on values, rights, and obligations. It is a debate that has grown into a conflict where both sides have confronted each other frequently in the courtroom. The repeated legal battles saw the conflict mount and result in the Supreme Court of Canada striking down the law governing abortion.

Now this painful and divisive issue has been put by the Supreme Court into the hands of Parliament to be resolved. As members of Parliament we are elected by Canadians to make political decisions, decisions that will benefit society as a whole while respecting the rights of the individual. Parliament must attempt to resolve this conflict in Canadian society.

As we have been debating Bill C–43 in the House of Commons, my hon. colleagues have risen to give their thoughtful opinions on the abortion issue. While I may not agree with all of them, I do respect their differing opinions.

This conflict in Canadian society is created by deeply divided views on abortion. Each side is demanding that the law governing abortion protect differing rights. One group demands that the rights of the unborn be recognized and protected under the law. Another group demands just as strongly that the rights of women be upheld and protected. The people of Canada wait for leadership from Parliament to resolve this conflict.

Bill C–43 has been characterized by the government as a compromise, but how can the government claim to have covered the middle ground when it has done nothing to address the fundamental problems at the root of the conflict? The government has done nothing to address the rights of the unborn, the key issue at the core of the debate.

It is the duty and responsibility of the government to draft a bill that is good for Canadian society by trying to bring an end to the conflict surrounding the debate. I believe this bill has failed the test and will fail again.

The committee that sought to hear the opinions of Canadians and groups met for a number of weeks and heard expert witnesses. I think it is fair to say that most of those groups representing a number of viewpoints have all said that this bill has failed the test and should be rejected. Nowhere in the bill does it speak about life. It speaks about protecting the life and health of a woman, and I am fully supportive of that. However the bill is frighteningly silent about life and the meaning of life, especially the life and the rights of the unborn.

• (1550)

Deep in our hearts we all know that life begins at conception, that a living cell is nurtured within the womb of a mother until such time as it can sustain itself outside the protective life sustaining system of the mother.

Advances in medical technology now make it possible for that living human being to be sustained outside the protective womb as early as 19 weeks, and who knows where we go from there. I am proud to have in my riding a world renowned hospital, St. Joseph's Hospital, dedicated to this end.

My point is that as a society and as individuals we all rejoice at the miracle of birth and life. As a society, once a person is born, we devote our total attention and resources to protecting that life. We expend millions of dollars and would expend anything it takes to protect and enhance life. As a society, we do that from birth to death. Therefore, it is implausible to me that if we believe in life after birth, that we would not do everything possible to ensure that the rights of yet to be born human beings should also be protected and enhanced.

If this bill with certain amendments were to be passed, especially those that seek to speak to life and the rights of the unborn, we will be saying that we believe in something. For, if we do not believe in life, what do we believe in?

Therefore I will be supportive of those amendments that seek to restrict abortions and take into consideration the life and the serious health implications of the mother.

Life should be the rule and abortion should be the exception, and not the other way around. Society should understand and know not only what a law says, but what it means. It must have a value system built in.

The exceptions where an abortion should be permissible should only be when the life of the woman is in danger and the medical risks are substantial and serious.

It must be clear to those seeking an abortion and to those medical practitioners called upon to perform an abortion that it should be the exception and not the rule.

Having said that, it is also imperative that as a society and as a government that supportive community resources be encouraged and supported and that other governmental policies and programs are in place to reinforce our commitment that we intend to encourage, support, and assist women, specifically, who have to make this heart–rending, excruciating and personal decision.

The community and government must play a very positive, substantial and supportive role up front, and not as an after the fact matter.

In addition, I have some grave reservations as to the criminal implications of this bill. I voted against Bill C–43 at second reading because I felt that this bill was seriously flawed from a number of standpoints and, if certain amendments were not passed to ensure a proper balance of competing rights, that I could not and would not support this bill at third reading.

I have listened to Canadians and my constituents for almost 16 months on this fundamental issue. I do not believe their views are respected and reflected in Bill C–43 as written. This bill has failed to achieve the delicate balance sought by this government and has failed to meet the challenge laid out by the Supreme Court to Parliament to recognize the rights of the unborn.

Ms. Barbara Greene (Don Valley North): Mr. Speaker, I volunteered to sit on the legislative committee on abortion, although I was quite aware it would be a very difficult and onerous committee, because I felt it was important that our caucus have female representation. Although I feel this issue is important to men, it directly affects women. As a woman representative in this Parliament, I felt I had a special interest in representing women on it.

Second, it is important that we in our particular caucus have representation from the centre, from the people who do not have extreme views of those who think that abortion should only be permitted in very rare instances affecting life and those who have the view that it should be entirely the decision of the woman. I feel that I am in the middle.

I come to this debate with a great deal of experience. I have been elected at large across 560,000 people five times and have sat on the Metropolitan Toronto Council for 11 years. In that forum we had to debate this issue on a number of occasions. The area which I debated it that was the most sensitive was as the metro appointee to the Catholic Children's Aid Society. Therefore I have a very personal experience with some of the most heart-rending situations involving abortion that anyone could possibly have experienced.

I have a deep concern that the rights of women are respected on this issue. Yet, we as a society should be doing everything possible to prevent abortions. The act of abortion represents a failure and a tragedy.

I therefore have no problem with legislation in this field. It is important for Parliament to state its position, particularly when the rights of individuals can be so terribly affected.

There has been a very definite need for legislation since 1988. Things have not been fine. We have had two very newsworthy court cases with third party interventions. We have had the B.C. government attempt to legislate in this area, and there are several provinces that have attempted to restrict access. The opposition member's contention that everything has been just great since 1988 is simply not so.

If one looks at the statistics on abortions since 1988, the number of abortions has not risen. This statistic has been used to say that women have been acting responsibly. I think it also means that when there was a law they were also acting responsibly and there was no difficulty for women who wanted an abortion to get one in Canada, except for the problems of access in remote areas with which we have to deal in any event, law or no law.

Legislation in this area is not something that is negative. I do not think we are recriminalizing abortion. Abortion was not criminal before. Abortions that were outside the law were criminalized. Similarly this legislation makes abortions that are not in accordance with the law again criminalized.

The old law was not much of a problem. It was in for 17 years. The Morgentaler decision was around the issue of the abortion committee, which doctors also complained about. It was simply something that did provide a delaying effect, that when it was operating properly, as it was in most urban centres and major hospitals, there was really no real problem.

I do not think what we are talking about today is law. What we are talking about is whether or not there will be more court actions. I do not think that the law we are passing will affect the number of abortions in Canada. I do not think women have abortions for frivolous reasons. The fact that there has been no law and that there has been no change in the statistics indicates that.

What I am hoping will be prevented are court cases and the humiliation particular individuals suffered, as we saw so clearly last year. With this new law, if the medical association meets the challenge implicit in it, because the law makes the doctors really responsible for enforcing the ethics of their profession, and if the CMA responds by establishing procedures for doctors to follow and a standard consent form such as the one that Dr. Morgentaler uses which ensures that women are aware of alternatives to abortions, it will operate in an efficient and reasonable fashion.

The question of access is also improved by this law, because it establishes the right of a women to have an abortion in consultation with a doctor.

• (1600)

In addition, the medical innovations that are now occurring mean that in the future abortions will not be performed in hospitals. There is the new pill that has been approved in France and doctors are now talking about medical procedures in the abortion field being performed in their offices. This will mean that access will not be an issue in the future.

Let us turn to the rights of the foetus. According to this legislation, the foetus is entitled to consideration in balance with the rights of the woman to security of person. I do not think that the foetus has been ignored because doctors have been given that responsibility in accordance with their profession.

The Canadian Medical Association, according to their ethics, does not believe that it is professionally reasonable for a doctor to perform an abortion on a viable foetus, a viable foetus being one that weighs over 500 grams or is past 20 weeks of gestation. The CMA says that abortion should not be used as an alternative to contraception. Similarly, counselling services, family planning services and information on contraception must be readily available to all Canadians. It says that the patient should be provided with the option of full and immediate counselling services in the event of unwanted pregnancy. It talks about options for women.

This law makes it clearly the responsibility of doctors in the medical profession, in conjunction with women, to provide that kind of counselling and that kind of assurance to society that women who receive abortions are fully counselled as to their options and that prevention is also considered.

Those who would deny a woman the right to an abortion except if it threatens the life of the woman, her physical health in some dramatic way, do not, I think, appreciate the rights of women in this society. The Minister of Justice has already stated that she believes it would be unconstitutional to support those amendments.

I think those people also underestimate the seriousness of the psychological reasons that women have for abortions. In a pluralistic and democratic society such as ours, such a law would simply not be obeyed. One cannot force a law on society which affects people so individually or personally.

At the committee I asked the question how people could possibly think that such a law could be enforced in Canada if Ceausescu in Romania could not enforce such a law in the most severe dictatorship in the world.

Our society respects and cares about the rights of individuals. We have to deal with people with compassion. I think this law will ensure that, with the help and co-operation of the medical profession, that will be done.

[Translation]

Mr. Phillip Edmonston (Chambly): Mr. Speaker, today I would like to talk about the amendments contained in Bill C-43, and especially in support of amendment no. 24 moved by one of my colleagues.

I feel somewhat uneasy reading this bill because I wonder if 85 per cent of the members of this House were women, would we vote for such a bill? I shall give you an example. As you know, Mr. Speaker, about 12 to 15 per cent of the members are now women. On examining this bill, I am struck by the lack of logic and plain common sense.

This bill came about as a result of the Morgentaler decision, as I am sure you recall, Mr. Speaker. After several Quebec courts had rendered decisions, a Quebec jury decided that Mr. Morgentaler had the right to perform therapeutic abortions. The people spoke. They said it was not a criminal matter. The decision to have an abortion is already hard enough; the public did not want to make it a crime. In the end, Dr. Morgentaler was found not guilty. It went to the Supreme Court, which confirmed and ratified the decisions of the other courts. Good! It is done.

But what happened is that two years ago, the federal government—that is us, Mr. Speaker, we are responsible—but especially the Conservative government said, "we will not leave that alone. No! We members of Parliament, we men know better. We will prepare a bill that will make everyone unhappy"—well, not everyone, but about 62 per cent of Canadians. And I understand that some Canadians are unhappy with the bill because they think it is against the unborn. There are others, especially in my party, who think this is not a step forward, a step toward a better understanding of the problem but a step backward. When the government says it wants to defend the interests of Quebec men and women—I trust the women of Quebec are included—I find it hard to understand how it can claim to protect those rights when we have before the House a bill that is so illogical in design and so unfair in its application, I would even go so far as to say, Mr. Speaker, a bill that is cruel and anti-women. How can I prove that? Easy. It means forcing a woman who has been raped to bear the child of the person who raped her! A young girl of 13 or 14 who was raped by her father would have to bear his child. Why? My colleagues will say, because they are convinced, which I do not doubt: because life is important. I ask you Mr. Speaker: whose life? The life—and one can debate whether life is there or not—of the foetus or the life of a young girl of 13 or 14? That is the problem.

I know we can talk about this for a long time. When does life start? At what point does the foetus become a human being?

The consequences of this legislation are disastrous. They are very negative for Canadian women. We have already seen it in Nova Scotia—in fact, that is why the Supreme Court dismissed the existing legislation—where women have lacked the same access as women in Ontario, British Columbia or elsewhere. In fact, this was pure discrimination.

The Canadian Medical Association has said, and these are experts, that if the bill is passed, doctors—the CMA speaks for the doctors—will limit access to abortion because they will be afraid of being put in jail.

I do not blame them. I realize that some hon. members here really want to do the right thing, and I understand that, but by supporting this bill, they are doing the exact opposite.

Before I finish, Mr. Speaker, I just want to say that I am uncomfortable with this bill. I am comfortable with the fact that I am opposed to this legislation, but I am uncomfortable about the fact that a government has the arrogance to believe it has a monopoly on truth and to promote this kind of legislation which I think is unnecessary and, in the final instance, does not protect the interests of Quebecers and especially not the interest of the women of Quebec. That is why I am ashamed when I see this government which claims to defend the rights of men and women by proposing this kind of legislation.

[English]

Mr. Rob Nicholson (Niagara Falls): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased once again to make a few comments on this very difficult and troubling subject for members of Parliament.

When this issue was before the House the last time I voted against the bill. Parliament at that time was being asked to give approval in principle to the bill and I said to Parliament at that time that I could not in good conscience give approval to something that I have always fought against in my life. I have fought for the protection of unborn children and I fought against the abortion law that was in place in Canada for many years.

Since I was being asked to give approval in principle, I said I could not do that. I decided at that time, having made the point, that I would consider the whole issue again. I listened very carefully to the arguments of individuals who said that this law was better than no law, that there were positive aspects to this law from both points of view, the pro-choice and the pro-life.

I looked at it not only for that reason but because of the profound respect that I have for other individuals in Parliament who are also struggling with this. One of the things that I have learned is that as difficult and important as these moral questions are, it is very difficult to come up with absolutes. Other members looking at the same set of circumstances can come to different conclusions as to what they should be doing and how they should be acting in this.

Having considered very carefully all the different sides of this issue, I have come to the conclusion that I will not be supporting the bill at report stage or third reading stage because it goes against a principle that I have fought for all my life, that is, my belief in the sacredness of human life. After having discussions with my colleagues, I realize there are good points in this, that it does recognize the value of human life, but I could not overcome my concerns with respect to the over-all implications of this bill.

I think there is a role for individuals who state their position very clearly and not move from that. Society itself, indeed the Supreme Court, recognizes, in cases of unborn children, the legitimate interest of society in the foetus. That is as it should be because it has always been my belief that the less articulate a particular interest is, the more likely it is that their interests will be compromised or not taken into consideration. I think there is a role for individuals such as myself, who believe as I do, to state very clearly their position.

I do not minimize the difficulties. I know the difficulties of the constitutional considerations in this area. As well, I do not know what words Parliament could come up with. I have no idea what could be put down on a piece of paper that would be acceptable to both sides of this issue. I do not know what those words would be. I give full credit to my colleagues and the leadership of my political party for putting together what I would not call a compromise but an accommodation of both sides. That is why in many ways it was very tempting for me to say that I could accept that, because I do not know what else could pass in Parliament.

However, I have other fears. I have fears about the removal of this issue from the public agenda. I have fears about how this bill will operate in practice. I could go on with those criticisms. I am sure that the criticisms of this bill have been very well articulated by members inside and outside of the House. It would be unfair for me to get into that when I know how difficult this has been.

For myself the way is clear, but that does not make it any less difficult for me. I will not be supporting the bill. I will also not be supporting, with the exception of one, the amendments. The so-called pro-life amendments do not turn this into a pro-life bill. It would be hypocritical for me to get up this evening and support any one of 10 or 15 of these amendments and then ultimately find that the bill is unacceptable to me. It would be hypocritical to do that. I will not do that this evening and, with the exception of one, I will be voting against those amendments presently before the House.

One of the things I have learned about this is that there are no absolutes, and there is no way of coming to a conclusion about absolutes. People on all sides of this issue are sincere. I heard some speeches yesterday that I was somewhat disappointed to hear. People on either side of this issue were ascribing insincerity to the other side. I do not believe that. I believe that people on both sides of this issue are just as sincere about wanting to do the right thing.

As well, I heard at least one comment suggesting that the Prime Minister may be forcing government members to do something. I can say that those members do not know the Prime Minister of Canada. They are absolutely wrong in that conclusion. That is not the case. Members of this party are free to vote according to their conscience, which is one among many reasons why I am so proud to be a part of this government and this political party.

Mr. Joe McGuire (Egmont): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to participate in this debate and to express my views on a most sensitive human issue. It is a human issue. It affects all of us. To discuss the issue solely in the context of how it affects women is to ignore the fact that abortion affects men and children and, obviously, it affects the unborn.

I voted against the bill at second reading in the hope that it would be amended at committee stage. While a number of amendments were moved, the government has indicated that it is not willing to accept any of them. Therefore, I must make my position clear from the outset.

I believe that, since life begins at conception, life must be legally protected from the moment of conception. On that basis, I cannot support the bill in its present form because it does not effectively prohibit abortion and it does not protect the unborn. I am opposed to Bill C-43 in principle. I am opposed because this bill does nothing to solve the real dilemma of abortion.

I realize, however, that it is unproductive merely to criticize the government's proposals without making some alternative suggestions or general recommendations. That is why I would like also to address the need for a holistic approach to the abortion issue.

The main problem with this bill is that it fails to address fundamental issues. There is no mention of the rights of the foetus or the rights of women. Nowhere does it say that an unborn has a right to life and that this life should take precedence over a woman's expressed desire to "control her body". Nowhere in Bill C-43 is there an explicit recognition of the fact that a foetus is a human life. In fact, there is not even any mention of the foetus. How can a law on abortion make no mention of the existence of the foetus?

It seems clear to me that this bill is avoiding the fundamental issues. It dumps the problems onto the provinces, the doctors, and the courts.

What is the meaning of the term "health" in this bill? When Section 251 of the Criminal Code was struck down by the Supreme Court in the Morgentaler case of January, 1988, Chief Justice Dickson expressed concern that the term "health" was too vague. Bill C-43 does not rectify this problem. While there is attempt to respond to Chief Justice Dickson's concerns, I maintain that the qualifiers of "physical, mental and psychological" in Bill C-43 simply leave too many doors open. In fact, C-43 does not limit interpretation of "health" in any way. The definition could be extended to include anything and everything. One doctor can arrive at a conclusion that would make an abortion legal.

I support Motion No. 10 by which the word "health" would be eliminated. The bill in its present form will be susceptible to arbitrary limitations on application. It will be vulnerable to constitutional review on the basis of ambiguity. In fact, it seems clear that the issue may simply end up being passed on to the courts.

According to Professor Allan Hutchinson of Osgoode Hall Law School:

> Anyone who thought the introduction of new legislation would end the abortion debate will be disappointed. One chapter may be closing but another is just beginning. Once the dramatic action in Parliament ends, it will move down the hill to the more refined but no less heated setting of the Supreme Court.

The courts, however, will not be alone in facing the abortion issue. With Bill C-43 the federal government is passing on an additional burden to the provinces. The federal government is responsible for criminal law and for guaranteeing that all Canadians receive the same level of insured medical services. However, if Bill C-43 is passed, the government will be abdicating these responsibilities because it will be the provinces which will ultimately have to decide such issues as whether abortions will be performed in their hospitals, whether abortion clinics will be licensed, and whether provincial health plans will cover the cost of abortions.

Finally, I would like to add that doctors will also be burdened by a great deal of decision-making concerning abortion. The responsibilities and the problems associated with these responsibilities will now be in the hands of the courts, the provinces, and the doctors. What an abdication of responsibility.

Effective solutions assume a good understanding of the problems. However, I firmly believe that in the case of abortion the real underlying problems have not been sufficiently dealt with or, in fact, understood. How can we provide solutions when we have not even properly identified the fundamental problem?

This is the crux of the matter. The fundamental problem is not the pregnancies themselves. It is the fact that they are unwanted. From this we must infer that the solution is not abortion on demand. Rather, the solution is to deal with the various forces that underlie the decision to have an abortion. We must examine why women have abortions. We must identify the pressures that push women to opt for abortions, and then it is our duty to do everything humanly possible to remove these pressures.

I would like to mention at this point that, contrary to the beliefs of many pro-choice advocates, being pro-life does not imply being anti-women. In fact, it is quite the contrary. We must encourage the development of support and counselling programs for women. We must recognize that many women, faced with the problem of an unwanted pregnancy, are lonely, afraid, deserted, usually poor and, perhaps worst of all, stigmatized by society. We must help these women. We must have programs that deal with the enormous social, economic, and psychological forces that push women to believe that the only way out of a difficult situation is to abort their own children.

Abortion is a violent act. It is a violent act against unborn children and against women. It is time to understand why this violence occurs. It is time to stop this violence.

Bill C-43 does nothing to address the reasons why women abort. There is a desperate need for counselling and support programs. We must make facilities equally accessible to all women across the country. We must facilitate the adoption alternative. We must provide more child care facilities. We must provide child care bursaries for women with children who want to complete their education. After all, people are our most precious resource and we should invest in that resource.

There is no quick fix to the abortion problem. There is no easy solution. Bill C-43 is an attempt to have it both ways. It pays lip service to the pro-life movement by putting Bill C-43 in the Criminal Code. However, the content and the intent of the bill basically amount to abortion on demand. It will be a criminal offence to perform abortions unless any one doctor is prepared to say that the life or health of the mother is threatened. In essence, abortion is left to the discretion of the woman and her doctor.

I reiterate that I will not support this bill. I simply cannot support a bill that discriminates against the weakest and most defenceless members of our society.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I have spoken many times on this issue. I am speaking now, of course, at report stage of Bill C-43 and against the motions nos. 4 to 19 which are very tough, restrictive and punitive amendments which would increase the criminal sanctions of Bill C-43. If the complete criminal prohibition of abortion fails, there are several amendments which would limit the definition of "health" as another tactic to try to restrict the choice of women.

It is significant that these extremely restrictive amendments are presented by anti-choice advocates. I am sorry to say this, but all members who presented these motions, and most of the members speaking to them, are men. The total impact of the abortion question concerns women primarily and should be a private choice and decision of each woman.

I regret that some women members, who I know in their hearts prefer women to have a choice on the question of abortion, also will vote for Bill C-43. I can respect some of their feelings about this, but I note that there are none today who are speaking for the extremely restrictive and paternalistic Motions Nos. 4 to 19.

I would particularly like to commend the member from Toronto who spoke a few minutes ago for stressing prevention and the points she raised about the lack of reality of these motions in even achieving the goals that their movers sought in presenting them.

I would like to take a moment to pay tribute to the many men, and particularly our male colleagues in this caucus, who have supported the policy that abortion is not a criminal matter to be controlled by the state with severe criminal sanctions and limitations in criminal law. They recognize, as do the majority of Canadians, that this is an extremely personal matter that involves a very difficult personal decision for a woman who is faced with an unwanted, unplanned pregnancy. As such, it must be treated as a health matter with the decision to be made by the woman and her doctor.

We do not feel that criminal laws have any place in the question of reproductive and family planning matters. Experience over the past two years, since the Supreme Court decision was made in the Morgentaler case which rescinded the previous criminal laws, has shown that we do not need a new federal law. Abortions have not increased as a result of having open choice on this matter. Women have been treated with the respect and dignity they deserve, recognizing their right to decide themselves whether or not they are ready to have a child.

The present situation, where we have no abortion law, is much more respectful of doctors and medical associations generally. Doctors and medical associations have established regulations and health standards that are the only kinds of controls needed.

If a woman decides not to continue a pregnancy, whether it is because she is alone without support, is in an abusive relationship, is a young girl with no means of support to raise a family, or wants to wait and plan a family later, whatever the reason—and there are many, many complex reasons—this is a safe medical procedure performed by a physician who does not feel intimidated or subject to criminal sanctions. There is no criminal law imposed on the woman or the doctor. That is one of the reasons we object to the bill. The major problem for women today is the lack of access, particularly in the Atlantic region and rural and remote areas. That is where we should focus our action.

The series of amendments, numbered 4 to 19, being debated this afternoon are restrictive, cruel and undemocratic, based on outdated, patriarchal views of women, the fact that women must be controlled by the state—and the state is usually a patriarchal institution—they cannot be trusted and must be controlled and punished with tough criminal sanctions. That is what these particular amendments are saying to Canadian women and to Canadians generally.

It is sickening to know that there are people in Canada, and members in this House, who support these resolutions, who want to impose the kind of inhumane policies that we saw in Romania where women were forced to have babies and these babies were neglected and abused. A whole generation is almost destroyed and disturbed and society as a whole has suffered greatly.

Do we really want this kind of authoritative dictatorship in Canada? Most Canadians do not. I can tell you, Mr. Speaker, and members of the House, that that is what these amendments mean to many women. These amendments and their movers show that they have no empathy for the condition of women who face very difficult decisions and no respect for the rights of women to make their own choices as to whether or not now is the time to have a family.

I would like to refer to the main motions to which I object. First, Motions Nos. 4 and 22, if passed, would increase the criminal penalty from two to 20 years, a 20-year imprisonment for doctors who perform abortions. Doctors perform abortions now because they see it as a health measure and a necessity in individual cases. This is not only completely intolerable for doctors but would also increase criminal penalties for women.

Motion No. 5 states that abortions will be performed only by a medical practitioner. The medical associations have objected to this and have agreed that in certain situations there could be medical procedures under the direction of a medical practitioner. We know that this is directed to women who would have self-induced abortions. I wonder what some of the proponents of these amendments would do about morning-after pills which is a form of abortion. What are they going to do about monitoring that, I wonder. There are no beneficial effects to any of these amendments, only negative ones.

For example, Motion No. 10 proposes that the only abortions that would be legal would be those performed in order to save the life of a woman. Other abortions performed for the woman's health would be illegal. Surely, that does not make sense. It certainly does not make sense to me.

Another amendment would force a woman by threat of criminal sanction to carry a foetus to term unless she meets certain criteria. This is a profound interference with a woman's body and thus, an infringement on the security of the person. This is what Chief Justice Dickson said about the old law and would certainly say the same about this amendment.

Motion No. 13 makes a bad bill worse. Health is not the issue. Unwanted pregnancy is the issue. Motion No. 14 is another one that would strike out the definition of health.

Motions Nos. 16, 17A and 17B are ones I am very interested in because we have had at least two doctors in this House who have spoken about the question of health. They seem to disregard completely the UN definition of health, and also, what I understand to be psychosomatic medicine which relates to the psychological and physical aspects of health. It is very difficult, if you have a whole approach to medicine, to separate these.

Certainly, I wonder if a woman under extreme stress and anxiety is a healthy woman. I do not think so, and I do not think she would really be in a position to be a healthy mother. The rationale about health as a reason is particularly offensive.

Motion No. 19 refers to scientific knowledge. I would think that, surely, physicians have access to scientific knowledge now. This seems to be an insult to the medical profession.

In summary, there are many reasons why I and my party object to these resolutions and will vote against them. They criminalize abortion in the extreme and are not a deterrent, because women will still seek out back street abortions or self-induced abortions. They will be victims of quacks and butchers as the women in Romania were. It was the experience in Italy when abortion was very restricted.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): I regret that the hon. member's time has expired. The hon. member for Edmonton Northwest.

Mr. Jim Edwards (Edmonton Southwest): With the greatest respect, Mr. Speaker, Southwest. Come back for a visit some time and we will reorient you.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Paproski): The Whip had you down for Edmonton Northwest. I knew it was Southwest, I thought maybe you had changed your constituency.

Mr. Edwards: Mr. Speaker, far be it from me to quarrel with you or the Whip.

I am going to be very brief today, because my position on this issue was dealt with at some length in the 1988 debate on the motions that were before the House at that time. The philosophical approach that I had was outlined at that time but I would like to make a few comments on the process, the amendments and on the bill itself, to illustrate the tremendous dichotomy of views that one encounters in dealing with this issue.

First, with reference to process, I am pleased that I am afforded the opportunity as a member of Parliament on the government side to have a free vote in this instance. In many ways, parliamentary secretaries are members of the government and are regarded as such within our system. I appreciate having the opportunity to vote according to my conscience on what I think is a very fundamental issue.

I listened with great interest to the hon. member for Vancouver East and her comments about the amendments. I believe it is her position that her party is for choice, but her party does not seem to have a choice available to its individual members on this issue.

With reference to the amendments themselves, I believe that all those who were involved with the process of putting forward amendments and considering the possibility of amendments while the bill was in committee and those who have put them on the Order Paper for consideration here today have borne in mind a number of criteria. The first is to do that which is proper and right. The second is to do that which is politically achievable and the third is to do that which will meet the test of the Supreme Court of Canada.

It is my considered opinion that a number of the amendments before us—I refer to Motions Nos. 12, 13, and 17B, in particular, but not excluding the others—will stand a court test. I concede that there is opinion on both sides of the issue, but I have seen opinions I respect from three very substantial and distinguished sources that these amendments would stand a court test.

I want to relate what happened one Friday afternoon in February when I was seeing constituents, as we all do, in my riding office. I had had a rather testy exchange of correspondence with a constituent who represented a significant interest group, not only within the constituency but also nationally.

This constituent had written to me taking me to task for what she perceived to be, with some accuracy, my position on this issue. She suggested that "no one group", as she put it, "had the right to impose its view on others within a pluralistic society".

I met with this woman, had lunch with her and tried to come to grips with this and other issues which she had raised in her correspondence with me. I stressed to her my belief that if there is not an ethical and moral basis for our law, then we are steering by the bow, rather than by the tiller. In this issue we tend to fall into the whirlpool of losing respect for life itself.

I listened with care to the member for Vancouver East, and I know it will sound patronizing to her ears and to the ears of a number of my colleagues in this House, but I do not think the issue is controlling women when we address this bill. The issue is respect for life. That is why I see a series of amendments on the Order Paper.

On that same day, I returned to my constituency office and met with an obstetrician who I thought was of the Catholic faith, because of his well-known position on the abortion issue. He was, of course, opposed to abortion but I learned that he was a Muslim. I had not known that, prior to meeting with him. He gave me his view and, as he left my office, a young woman came in to see me. Neither the man who was leaving nor the young woman who was coming in, knew that the other would be there. They were father and daughter.

The daughter had organized a pro-life group on the campus of the University of Alberta. She said it was uphill because it was not the most popular cause on a campus, but she had recruited 75 members for that group and was hoping to have a national meeting of like-minded groups from campuses across the country.

I asked her what message she conveyed to young women in particular, but also to young men who joined her group as well. I asked what she advocated they do in our society and what kind of code of behaviour she advocated. She said: "fun within the framework of chastity". Those words may seem absurd in today's society and in fact the woman with whom I had lunch said: "Let's face it. The fact of the matter is that the vast bulk of teenagers and young people today are having sex and so we have to face that reality."

The point I am making is that there is an issue of responsibility here, not just responsibility for women but also for men to endeavour to control their activity and, if they are not able to do so, to take reasonable precautions to minimize the consequences.

Now we come to the obvious, the amendments themselves. We face the possibility of none of the amendments succeeding tonight, and which way do we go on the bill itself when the vote comes up next Tuesday, May 29.

There are many people who know my position on the issue who are urging me to vote against the bill. They are saying that it is better to have no bill than to have a flawed bill. Frankly, I do not know how I am going to vote if the amendments do not succeed. I hope some of the amendments do succeed.

If the goal is as I have suggested, to respect life and to spare lives, which is the lesser evil: to have no bill, or to have the bill that is before us? When one deals with the issue of lesser evil—a much abused term, by the way, Mr. Speaker—one must clearly identify that there are no alternatives before one. Clearly in this case there are not if the amendments do not succeed. One must also analyze whether the options have components of evil or lack of good in them. Both clearly do.

If, on the other hand, the goal is to find a bridgehead on which the principle of respect for life can be nurtured and encouraged, to await the day when through education and a change of heart this country will come to a different attitude on the issue of abortion without in one slightest way demeaning the rights of women and in fact enhancing the rights of women, and can define a parallel right of the foetus or the unborn individual, then that is a goal to be pursued.

I will be listening with great care to the debate not only today but tomorrow. I have consulted with my constituents. I have written all those who have been in correspondence with me on the issue and I have said, among other things:

> —if the Bill emerges from Report Stage unamended, is it better to vote for it, imperfect as it is, or against it, which would leave us with no abortion law whatsoever for the foreseeable future?
> My judgement at this point is that the Bill would discourage some doctors who perform some abortions from continuing to do so. I am not at all sure that it would save substantial numbers of unborn lives. But it would make a statement that performing abortions is a breach of the Criminal Code (except in certain very broad circumstances).

That is the issue before us, an issue from my point of view of deciding between lesser evils. I will be praying for guidance, but I will also be listening to my colleagues for guidance because there is a good body of wisdom in this House.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, first of all, if men were able to become pregnant, would we be debating this bill? I rather think not. That is a question I would like to put because I, as a man, do not have a clue what it is like to be pregnant. I think we, as men, should admit that we are rather unqualified to judge the issue of what to do about pregnancy.

• (1650)

I do not condone abortion as birth control. I doubt that very many people do, regardless of whether they are pro-life, anti-abortion or pro-choice. I make the mistake of saying pro-life because I think that is the name given to people who call themselves pro-lifers. It is a misnomer, a mistaken label, because I do not think anyone has a monopoly on caring about life. I care about life just as much as anyone else. I do not think that is debatable. If you are pro-choice it does not mean that you do not care about life.

I would like to state something that should be understood by some people here in the House. I think there is some hypocrisy in attitudes of non-aboriginal people. In the Inuit culture there is no such thing as an unwanted child. We have a custom called custom adoption. I am adopted. I have five adopted children. That is not because these children were not wanted, but because I had talked to whoever had the children and we decided we could take care of the child better than the mother, or maybe because we did not have children of our own.

I would like to elaborate on this. When I say some of us are pro-choice, I talk about people in general. When I talk about Inuit, you will find that most Inuit are anti-abortion but unlike some people down here who are anti-abortion, Inuit do not just pay lip service to the issue of abortion or anti-abortion. They practise what they preach. If they are against abortion, it is because they are prepared to take care of the children whether they be of single mothers or relatives. They are prepared to adopt and again, there is no stigma in adoption. When I was adopted I knew exactly who my natural parents were as well as my adopted parents, and so do my five adopted children. They know exactly who their natural parents are or who their natural parent is, in some cases. When I say they practise what they preach, that is exactly what it is.

In the Eastern Arctic there are no receiving homes for unwanted children. That is because all children are adopted. I would like to ask—and again, I do not condone abortion as birth control—those people who want to either restrict or even tighten the bill, how many are taking care of unwanted children that they got because they cared enough, and did not condone abortion. I am sure there are some, as the hon. member across just raised his hand, but I think the question is how many of those people who demonstrate in the streets against abortion, whether it be here, in Toronto or Vancouver, have children that they took because they cared enough about homeless children. I think that many of them would be hard pressed to admit that they have any.

I think that when women are pro-choice, it does not mean that they take abortion lightly. I think when women decide to have an abortion, it is not just one day deciding: "Well, I am going to get pregnant and I am going to have an abortion." I do not think it is that simple. I think when women make the decision to have an abortion, it is an agonizing and very painful decision. I find it very difficult to believe that those decisions are made lightly. How can you inflict punishment on a person who, after very agonizing, painful thinking, has decided to have an abortion? How can you inflict criminal charges against that person?

If we were in an ideal world, we would not have abortion. However, the fact remains that there are women who are going to continue to have abortions and, frankly, that is probably the way life is at this point.

I would like to state that I am going to be voting against this bill because it criminalizes women when the decision to have an abortion is a very, very personal one.

• (1700)

Mr. Lyle Kristiansen (Kootenay West—Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak at report stage of Bill C-43, I want to make it very clear at the outset that I will be voting against Bill C-43 on third reading. At report stage I will oppose all of the proposed amendments except for Motion No. 24, which stands in the name of the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby.

In an issue which touches personal conscience such as this one does, I have the greatest of respect for the feelings and opinions of all members which they hold very deeply.

Abortion has been an issue that has been very difficult for some people more than others. I suspect particularly some of them on the government side feel themselves torn by conflicting loyalties. All of us have those at times, but I think it probably bears more so on some members of the cabinet. As an individual who shares accommodation with some of those members, I must say that I appreciate the agony I am sure that they are going through.

In the contemporary lexicon of the abortion debate, I am unequivocally pro-choice and make no apology for it. I hold this view not because it is the position of my party. In fact I have argued on numerous occasions that it is in my opinion not the sort of issue which should be enshrined as a party issue or policy, because like religion or creed it is more properly a matter of individual conscience, personal philosophy and individual choice.

This has caused some difficulty for some members of my party, not here in the House of Commons but in the constituency and elsewhere, who during election campaigns have been active members of Pentecostal assemblies and do not hold a pro-choice point of view. Regardless of that, because we agree on a multitude of issues we have actively campaigned for our party and for myself when I have unequivocally taken a pro-choice point of view. I feel the discomfort that I know that they have felt on occasion.

Intolerance is not something that is exclusive to any particular political philosophy or creed. We all have our problems at times. It is difficult in the heat of debate to accord to all others the rights and full respect that we demand for ourselves.

I am pro-choice because I believe firmly that only the individual most closely affected, the woman, the potential mother, has the right ultimately to determine whether or not a pregnancy should be brought to term. In the final analysis she and she alone has the right to determine whether she will bear a child and when: not me, not us, not the police, not the courts, and not the criminal law.

Nothing could be more abhorrent or inappropriate than for the state to impose values on people regarding such an intensively personal issue as whether or not someone shall bear children. That is a woman's right. Women have shown throughout history, often at great cost to themselves, that they will exercise the right to choose regardless of risk or law, whether the law is religious, civil or criminal.

Rights exist not because we grant them, not because the law grants rights or society grants rights. Rights exist not because we grant them, not because the law grants rights, or society grants rights. Rights exist because people claim them and exercise them, often at great cost to themselves. When a large number of individuals have consistently shown that in order to exercise what they believe to be their fundamental rights they have to place themselves at risk, it does not behove us to impose our values by using the state or the law to try to force them to do otherwise.

That is bad law. It is bad law in this case. It is bad law in labour relations. It is bad law in a whole host of other areas. All that kind of action means—and regardless of our point of view on this issue we all know it—is that women who claim this fundamental right to choose will continue to do so regardless of the penalties and regardless of the risk to themselves. If we pass such a law, it will simply bring the law and the institutions which pass and enforce those laws into contempt. We do not need any more of that than we already have in this day and age.

Do we really want to force women or large numbers of women to risk their lives as they have done before or be branded as criminals or sent to jail for exercising what they understandably regard as their right to choose whether or not to give birth? I do not want that, and I will not be a party to imposing my values on them.

With regard to values I said earlier that I have always resisted those people—whether they are on the right, on the left, or in the centre, no party is excluded—who from time to time want to use the law to impose their personal values or their moral judgments upon others or upon society. That is not my role, and I do not believe it should be our role.

I would like to make a few personal comments on the matter of language. A lot of very charged language has been used in this debate back and forth across the country. We have heard the phrase unborn children or unborn babies being used instead of the term fertilized eggs or foetuses or whatever.

I am not a religious person in the classical sense, but I value life every bit as much as someone who believes that all life has been created by a divine being. I believe that all life exists as a result of an infinitesimal number of accidents of fate over an infinitesimal number of years, trillions of years, beyond reckoning. I think that perhaps I regard it even more preciously because I do not believe that that combination of circumstances could ever likely occur again. I am not one who believes that there is a creator that is going to give us a second chance some day if we do not manage right now. I do not question the importance that others put on life, but I put just as much importance on it.

The whole debate of when life begins is a very moot point. I have no great certainty as to that point. I cannot accept the view of others who say: "Bang, this is when it starts." Life is an ongoing process. Life exists in a tree. It exists in an ant. It exists in the foetus. It exists in an individual human being who acts independently. I also believe in social order, and I know we sometimes have to reach compromises on that.

In conclusion I want to say as a personal note that my wife and I have three children and have been married almost 30 years. I have a daughter. If as a teenager she were to have come to me and asked my counsel—this would have been a few years ago—because through an act of neglect or passion she found herself to be pregnant, probably in those circumstances I would have suggested that her life might be better and that she would have a better chance to have a happy life and a happy family in the future if she did have an abortion. There is no way that I would impose that on her. I would be one of the sources of counsel that she would seek, but it would be her decision. I would also tell her that regardless of what decision she took I would stand by her. As a society we need to provide nurturing, to provide the means for people to be capable of making that independent judgment, and not to impose our values or criminal sanctions on them for doing what comes naturally, that is to decide for themselves whether or not they shall bear children.

• (1710)

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to participate in the debate this afternoon. This is actually the last opportunity that I will have to speak prior to the very crucial votes that will take place later today.

Initially, after proposing the amendments that I had to offer, I had not intended on speaking again prior to the vote that will take place tonight. I listened attentively yesterday and today to the remarks of my colleagues on both sides of the House, members of parliament, some who agree with me and some who profoundly disagree. Of course I believe all of them feel very strongly about their particular point of view and most—and I say "most"—are respectful of the point of view of others.

It is with sadness that I use the word "most" rather than the word "all" for the following reasons: a few members have seen fit during this debate to state that I was unqualified to speak on this issue because I am a man. If I were to say that the members in question who made those remarks cannot speak of building bridges because they are women, I would be condemned and rightfully so. Of course I never have, nor do I intend to. All members representing constituents in this House are equal and worthy regardless of sex, age, gender, colour or otherwise. It is unfortunate that some people saw fit to utilize that argument. I suppose it only weakens the other strong arguments that they may have had.

However, that sadness having been stated, perhaps we should speak of the issue at hand rather than allow myself to stoop to the level that they have chosen to utilize to make their respective points in the House of Commons. Instead I would like to take this last opportunity to urge colleagues to vote for a number of the amendments offered to us.

The last colleague who spoke did raise a number of interesting points. I do not agree with his point of view, but I do think he expressed it quite well. He said, I believe, that he did not know whether life started at conception. I suppose I agree with his proposition there too. I do not know either. Unless someone proves otherwise, what else am I to conclude? If we know that human life is there at birth, it must have been achieved some time before birth. If no one indicates to me at which time before birth it occurs, then I am to assume that it was there from the beginning unless proven otherwise. That, I believe, is the only reasonable conclusion to arrive at. I am still awaiting anyone who challenges that proposition to indicate specifically at what time it is they feel my proposition is wrong. Mr. Speaker, whenever we are collectively and individually as a society afraid of an issue, I suppose we resort to words that tend to hide the facts that we are afraid of. A child born is obviously a child; a child unborn is a foetus—which means a young one in Latin—so my colleagues who are medical doctors tell me. Why do we use Latin, versus English or French, other than to specifically avoid using words that are uncomfortable to us? But we seem to use these words quite comfortably when they suit our individual purposes.

I have here a cover from a package of cigarettes which was given to me by another colleague, because I do not smoke. On this cover of the package of cigarettes, it says: "Smoking during pregnancy can harm the baby". It does not harm the "foetus"; it does not harm the "embryo"; it does not harm anything else. But it harms the "baby" during pregnancy.

Other colleagues have gone to great pains to tell us that it is not a baby, it is a foetus. I suppose those colleagues will want to make the cigarette manufacturers aware of the fact that they have this horrible mistake, according to them, on the jacket of this cigarette box.

I have an article here from the Canadian Press which refers to an incident which happened in Kingston, Ontario. A woman had been prescribed the wrong medicine which could result in her unborn child dying prior to birth. In other words, it could have resulted in an abortion. I quote from the article:

> "At night I have dreams about what might happen to my child," said Mrs. Debney, 23. "We still have another five months to go before we know what happens to the baby."

As I said in my speech yesterday, what we have is a situation where if we seem to want the child to be born, there is no hesitation in calling the child a baby. If we do not want the child, then it becomes the foetus. As I indicated yesterday, the child is not a child by virtue of the fact that we want it or not; the child is a child because that is what the child is, and that is the end of it.

To that extent I invite colleagues to reflect upon that when they are called upon later today to vote on the various amendments, particularly Motion No. 10, because it is that amendment which would change the bill in such a way as to give value to human life. I suppose other amendments will do so, but I believe to a lesser degree.

In conclusion, I just want to inform the House of how I intend to vote later today.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, I intend to support Motions Nos. 4, 5, 10, 12, 13, 14, 16, 17A and B,—although in the case of 17A, this Motion may have very little impact—Motion No. 19 and Motion No. 22. I intend to vote against Motion No. 24. Of course, I repeat what I said several days ago: If Motion No. 10 is not passed, I will have to vote against this bill on third reading.

Once again, Mr. Speaker, I urge all hon. members to examine their consciences thoroughly, whether they agree with me or not, and to vote according to their conscience. I know that will be the case with our hon. members across the way, because there is no discipline in their caucus, any more than there is in mine. Members are free to vote any way they want.

I hope all members will have that choice. And since we are talking about free choice, I think we should all have the free choice to vote for protecting human life.

[English]

Mr. Jim Karygiannis (Scarborough—Agincourt): Mr. Speaker, I welcome the opportunity to speak today to Bill C–43, an act respecting abortion.

When the Prime Minister indicated that his government would bring forward a bill on abortion during this session of Parliament, there was a collective sigh of relief across the country. That relief, however, was quickly shattered with the introduction of this bill. Bill C–43 completely fails to address the painful issue that is troubling this country's conscience.

I realize this is not a decision to be made lightly. I intend to vote against the bill in its present form. I believe this bill is a bad piece of legislation. Many of my constituents from the riding of Scarborough—Agincourt believe as I do, that human life begins at conception and must be protected by law at all stages of development.

Once we come to the unavoidable conclusion that the foetus is a human being, we must then come to the conclusion that this person must be given full protection of the law as would be given to any child in Canada today.

It is absolutely deplorable that anyone can say that a procedure which kills one human being for the convenience of another is a medical procedure. In simple terms, abortion is the killing of a human being and cannot be accepted. If we do not believe in life, then what can we believe in? Where is the value system? If we do not ensure that abortions are performed only to save the mother's life, then our society will be condoning abortion on demand.

I did not vote for Bill C–43 on second reading. Though I was disappointed that the bill reached committee stage, I hoped we would see some substantial amendments after the legislative committee had an opportunity to thoroughly examine the bill clause by clause. This was obviously not the case. I had hoped for an entirely different bill from the one we see before us today.

The abortion issue has not been rectified. The bill still does not recognize the fundamental value and dignity of each human being and the worth of each human life. I ask members of the House to consider the lives of unborn children above all else.

The only amendment that I can in conscience support is the one put forward by my colleague from Glengarry—Prescott—Russell which removes the word "health" from the bill. This would end any dubious claims of mental, emotional, fiscal or other reasons of so-called health which could be encompassed by such a broad definition.

This bill was flawed from the outset, and I dare say would not stand up constitutionally in a court of law. Therefore, it should not be before us at this time. It is obvious that the government, in choosing to put forward this bill at this particular time, decided it does not wish to deal with the real matter at hand, which is that of foetal rights.

The passage of this bill will lay open the door to medical experimentation upon the pre-born and would also leave open the question of usage of foetal tissue for dubious medical purposes.

I would also like to express my disappointment in the government's decision not to allow the free vote on this bill as was promised and expected.

I read in the paper today that some of my colleagues on the other side, members of cabinet, who are pro-life supporters will vote in favour of the bill. That saddens me. The constraints placed upon cabinet ministers to support this abortion bill is unconscionable.

I call upon all my colleagues in the House to give thought to why we are not addressing the real issues here today and to defeat this bill so that a comprehensive bill that looks at all the issues of foetal rights could be brought forward, or failing that, the rights of the unborn be placed where they rightfully belong, in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms of Canada.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, this is not a compromise bill. It is a bill to recriminalize abortion. These are not compromise amendments. In fact, most of them are extreme, punitive and repugnant to women.

The Minister of Justice claims that the federal government must occupy the field on abortion. The field has not been occupied for two years, yet the numbers of abortions in Canada have not increased and the field does not appear to need to be occupied.

The minister says that this bill provides a delicate balance between both sides of the issue. I think not. This bill has failed on both sides of the question and there is no real balance at all. The women of Canada do not believe that this bill is giving us balance on both sides of the question.

The minister says that this bill respects constitutional guarantees. The women of Canada do not believe this bill respects constitutional guarantees, and most of the amendments fly in the face of constitutional guarantees. This bill is not an accommodation of common ground, as the minister says, that respects individual rights and freedoms. The women of Canada do not believe that it is the accommodation of common ground.

As a woman, I have been offended by many of the speeches in this House on the amendments to this bill, and indeed, by many of the amendments that have been put forward. The amendments to this bill suggest that women cannot be trusted. If men could be trusted to take their share of responsibility for birth control, we would not be having the debate on these amendments in this House today.

Let me deal specifically with the amendments. Motions Nos. 4 and 22 are amendments that, if passed, would increase the criminal penalty for doctors who perform abortions from two to 20 years. These amendments also have the side effect of increasing criminal penalties for women who have abortions. Obviously, these are not amendments that most Canadians, men or women, can subscribe to.

Motion No. 5 proposes that a legal abortion can only be performed by a medical practitioner. Essentially, this amendment imposes the threat of a two-year jail term and criminal record for a woman who induces her own abortion. If a woman is desperate enough to self-induce an abortion, she needs medical help and access to safe, affordable medical services. She does not need to be thrown in jail. Women self-induce an abortion only when they cannot get safe medical abortions or if the procedure is too costly.

Having a criminal penalty hanging over women's heads is not a deterrent, as we can see from the numbers of self-induced abortions that occurred when abortion was completely illegal. It is still illegal in some countries.

Motion No. 10, the motion that the member who just spoke said that he would support particularly, if passed, would mean that the only legal abortions would be those performed in order to save the life of the woman. Even abortions performed for the woman's health would be illegal. This is the most severe and cruel of all of the amendments associated with high maternal mortality rates. It is also the most controlling of women's bodies. Essentially, it is the former Romanian abortion law. There are only a few countries in the world left that still have this type of law.

While I am on the subject of the speech by that hon. member, I would like to point that he took exception to the fact that somebody in the debate disqualified him because he was a man. He tried to use the analogy of building a bridge. The ability to bear children and the consequences of that ability are quite different from the ability to build a bridge. Unfortunately, it is that kind of analogy that I think would disqualify him from speaking with any kind of authority on the question of abortion.

• (1730)

Motion No. 12 adds that in order for an abortion to be legal, a woman's life or health must be seriously endangered. This is an unconstitutional amendment. It contradicts the opinion expressed by Chief Justice Brian Dickson of the Supreme Court of Canada. In the Morgentaler case that struck down the old abortion law, he said that forcing a women by threat of criminal sanction to carry a foetus to term unless she meets certain criteria unrelated to her own priorities and aspirations is a profound interference with a woman's body and thus an infringement of the security of the person.

Motion No. 13 would change the bill to state that an abortion should be legal only if there is no other medical treatment available to alleviate the health risk to the woman. This amendment plays upon the government's own wording that the only legal abortions are those performed for the woman's health. It takes the government's bad bill and makes it worse. Health is not the issue—unwanted pregnancy is.

Motion No. 14 would strike out the definition of health in the bill which states:

> "health" includes, for greater certainty, physical, mental and psychological health;

Medical professionals who appeared before the legislative committee complained that the health criteria in the bill were already too vaguely defined. This motion only exacerbates that.

Motions Nos. 16, 17A and 17B all change the definition of health in the bill to exclude psychological health considerations.

Motion No. 19 is a bizarre amendment. It would change the bill by clarifying medical opinions of whether or not to grant abortions should be developed, not only according to generally accepted medical standards as expressed in the bill, but also by considering the solid body of scientific knowledge.

Motion No. 20 would make the IUD and the morning-after pill illegal. I do not think that this amendment even requires further debate.

Motion No. 24, which would strike out the entire bill, would leave only one sentence which would state that Sections 287 and 288 of the Criminal Code are repealed. This motion in fact is the motion that addresses the inequities of the government's bill. This is the motion that most of my colleagues, and most people who want to reflect the needs of Canadian women, will support when we vote tonight.

In closing, I say that it is very sad that what the government has said about a woman's rights—her right to be a full participant in Canadian society—tells Canadian women where they stand with the government. It is this: "You are free and you can fully participate, as long as you understand that we do not trust your ability to make correct choices".

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, I feel very privileged and honoured to be able to participate in debate a second time on Bill C-43, this time at report stage.

In my previous vocation as an educator I taught students, and I taught teachers to teach students, certain values in life. Some of those values were based on the three Rs. Those three Rs were not reading, 'ritin' and arithmetic. The three Rs were respect, respect, and respect—respect for authority, respect for property, and respect for others.

If all Canadians today had a greater respect for the authority of the federal government, then maybe we would not be in the mess we are in. If all Canadians had a greater respect for property, then maybe our environment would not be in such jeopardy. If all Canadians had respect for others, then maybe we would not have this heated debate over whether we should allow a foetus to live or not.

I have carried these values into politics. Because I have this deep respect for others, which means respect for life, I cannot support Bill C-43 as it stands. To me, life begins at conception. Unless someone proves otherwise, I have to go on that belief.

I want to congratulate all those speakers who have debated this bill at second reading and report stage for the seriousness with which they have dealt with this problem. I want to congratulate those who promoted the pro-choice ideology, and the ones who promoted the pro-life ideology. I am convinced that both sides spoke very sincerely. They believe in what they told us. They are going to vote according to what they believe in. I am pleased that at least the two major parties are allowing us to vote according to our conscience.

I am a little disappointed in the New Democratic Party because I thought that it was the party which respects individual thoughts and ideas. I appeal to its members that on this issue they make an exception. Rather than vote as a party, let the members vote according to their conscience. In speaking to some members of the New Democratic Party, I know that their feelings are pro-life feelings also. That is an appeal to the New Democratic Party.

I also appeal to the people who believe in the pro-choice ideology. We have heard the statements: "It's my body. I will decide what I want to do with it", et cetera. That argument breaks down because, in that free choice, two lives are at stake. If the choice was made just for one life, okay, I could maybe accept it, but the decision made affects two human beings. As a result of that, I cannot accept it.

Judgments of jurisprudence have been made to recognize clearly that the foetus is a human being. If a woman who is pregnant gets killed in a car accident, courts have ruled that two people are killed. The case is treated with greater seriousness and gravity. Also, if a human being who was a foetus during the course of an accident survives, then he or she can sue the person causing the accident. Legislators and judges in the past must have recognized that the foetus is a human being.

The member for Vancouver East called the amendments that we brought in punitive and paternalistic. I would ask her to look at the amendments brought in by the members for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell and Winnipeg North, as well as the amendment of the member for Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville. These amendments would strengthen Bill C-43 to protect the lives of the unborn. If these amendments were accepted, then I might be able to vote in favour of the bill.

I took a very extensive poll in my riding of Parkdale—High Park. People supporting both ideologies, the pro-life ideology and the pro-choice ideology, have urged me to vote against this bill. At this point I do not think we know the outcome of Bill C-43. In talking to members individually, they are also going to look at which amendments will be accepted and which ones will not.

But whichever way the vote goes, I would like to recommend through you, Mr. Speaker, that the government introduce a national education program on this issue. The government can call it the national education program on life, or whatever title it wants, but there should be a national program funded by the federal government, supervised by the Department of National Health and Welfare.

The curriculum for this program would have to be written with input from the provinces, since the provinces have jurisdiction over education; from people who are supporting the pro-life ideology; from the pro-choice people; from the medical profession; and from religious groups. By having a curriculum taught in all schools across the country, hopefully fewer young teenagers would get pregnant and have to make that very serious decision. In many cases, whichever decision is made, there are very deep-rooted emotional problems that follow.

In closing, I again appeal to the government to bring in a national education program on this issue, whichever way the vote goes.

Miss Deborah Grey (Beaver River): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to voice my concerns regarding Bill C-43 as the member of Parliament for Beaver River, but I also want to voice the concerns of my constituents. Certainly, I have a personal feeling about this issue, but I am responsible for my constituents.

I want to speak today obviously as a woman, but I believe firmly that this is not just a woman's issue. It certainly is a family issue and an issue that faces all of us as a society.

My party calls for a candidate to let constituents know how he or she feels about the abortion issue. Then, if there is a consensus in the riding, the member of Parliament must vote according to the collective wishes of the constituents as determined by a referendum, such as a questionnaire, or at public meetings that determine whether or not there is a clear consensus. If there is no clear consensus, then the member of Parliament must vote according to his or her conscience and, of course, they have let that be publicly known while campaigning.

This approach certainly is somewhat different than we have traditionally seen from many members of Parliament. History shows that MPs often have gone directly against the wishes of the majority of their constituent's wishes and said that they want to go for their conscience alone and vote on behalf of that. Unfortunately, we know that it is not just a member's conscience that got them elected. They had only one vote to cast on election day. They were voted in by many electors to whom they are responsible. A member of Parliament gets only one vote in the House of Commons and that is not a personal vote, necessarily, but one vote on behalf of their entire riding.

I want to make it publicly known, and I have told my constituents in Beaver River, that I am pro-life. I am not ashamed of those views. In fact, it makes me proud to be able to say that I believe in the sanctity of life from the moment of conception. Those who deny that life begins at conception, deny the fundamental issue of life itself. A life cannot begin just at birth. If there had not been union nine months before, obviously there would be no live birth.

If we try to determine at what point life occurred, or whether or not an embryo a foetus is a life, then we miss the point of life itself. A human life begins at the moment of conception, not before and not after. Whether we like it or not, science dictates, not semantics.

I conducted the closest thing that I could to a referendum in my riding. The results were very interesting. The totals were 60 per cent to 40 per cent pro-life, with people in those categories saying that they could make exceptions. Exceptions could be made in cases of rape, incest, and when the life of the woman is in danger.

I will be voting that way at third reading, unless Motion No. 10 specifically goes through tonight at report stage.

Regardless of the fact that everyone has different views, whether pro-life or pro-choice, it seemed to me that the people in my riding felt very serious frustration and misgivings about this particular bill.

In fact, Bill C-43 unfortunately satisfies neither end of the spectrum. Those at the pro-life end of the spectrum say that this bill does nothing more than give abortion on demand, and they are very, very concerned about the idea of psychological health as is stated in Bill C-43. Those at the pro-choice end of the spectrum are upset about Bill C-43 because, first, it goes back into the Criminal Code and they do not want that and, second, there is no access for healthy women to have abortions. No matter at what end of the spectrum people are, they are concerned about this bill.

I do believe that although I am pro-life and am not ashamed to admit that, as I said earlier, people say: "We are pro-choice and that is the way it is". I do believe that there is room for pro-choice. That choice rests with the individual about whether to become pregnant or not. That choice is for teenagers, whom I taught in high school, to become sexually active or not to be sexually active.

If a person does make the choice to be sexually active and they do become pregnant, then they have further choices open to them. Certainly, there is the adoption option, whether to keep the child or whether to have an abortion, but the choice is not just one choice, whether to have an abortion or not.

I will be voting for the amendments which strengthen this bill in favour of protection for the unborn and against the idea of psychological health, because it is so nebulous. I will be voting in favour of Motions Nos. 4, 22, 5, 10, 12, 13, 14, 16, and, if 16 is defeated, then 17A as well as 19.

I know that many people are wishing to speak on this debate. I certainly admire the calibre of debate that has taken place in this chamber. In my year and a half here as a member, this is the bill to which the most respect has been paid. I appreciate that.

I would like to close off with a verse of scripture because we in Canada call ourselves a Christian nation, one that was founded on Christian principles. I believe that this sums it up when we are worried about the semantics of where life really begins. I think it is fairly clear when the psalmist David wrote in Psalm 139, verses 13 through 16:

> Thou hast covered me in my mother's womb—I will praise thee, for I am fearfully and wonderfully made. My substance was not hid from thee when I was made in secret—Thine eyes did see my substance, yet being unperfect; and in thy book all my members were written, which in continuance were fashioned, when as yet there was none of them.

I think it is very clear from that that life does begin at conception. I am pro-choice. I choose life.

Mr. Neil Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity to say a few words on Bill C-43 today.

I want to say at the outset, and make my position absolutely clear, that I support a woman's right to make a decision on whether or not she should terminate a pregnancy, and that that decision should be made between her and a doctor.

It is not a question that should be subject to legislation. In fact, if it should be a subject of any legislation, then I would make the argument that it should fall under the Canada Health Act. Once a woman has made that conscious decision to terminate a pregnancy, and once it has been agreed upon by her personal doctor, between both of them, then she should have access to proper medical treatment.

I am proud to take that position. I did not arrive at that conclusion today. I arrived at it many years ago and made my position absolutely clear in numerous election campaigns in my constituency of Beaches—Woodbine. Any time I was asked at all-candidates meetings or elsewhere I made it absolutely clear that that was my position.

• (1750)

I do not want to deal with the legalities. I think there has been far too much debate about the legalities involved. It is a basic question of human rights and especially the rights of women.

If this government were serious about trying to minimize the number of abortions in this country, it would do things other than cut back on programs which actually encourage abortions to take place.

Starting with the previous government and since this government came to power, there have been reductions to family allowance programs and the clawback of benefits. There have been reductions in funding for women's programs. There have been drastic reductions in family planning and family counselling programs. All of those programs have been cut, as well as the child care program for which this government promised to increase funding but has never come through on.

I do not doubt the sincerity of people who hold a position opposite to mine. I respect such a point of view, even though I do not share it, because this is a deeply moral issue for many people. I accept that. I do not necessarily agree with them, but I at least accept it.

There is an argument which is continually being made, mainly by men, but I have heard it made by women, that if a woman chooses to become pregnant, she has to carry that child through conception to birth because she allowed herself to get pregnant. It has been a long time since a woman got herself pregnant. It seems to me that there are two people responsible for that pregnancy.

I could make an equally strong argument that the weight of responsibility lies with the man, not with the woman. When I hear members like the member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell suggest that the penalty for anyone contravening this legislation should be increased from two years in prison to 20 years in prison based on specious arguments that compare a pregnant woman to someone in a speedboat hauling someone along on a pair of water skis, it is simply not acceptable to me. There is no comparison. I am trying to keep the rhetoric low, but I think it is a stupid argument and it displays something about the approach that some people bring to this debate. I think it lowers the level of debate.

The question before this House and before the country in 1990 should be whether or not a woman is a piece of property. This bill continues the argument that women are property.

Mr. Fontana: Give me a break.

Mr. Young (Beaches—Woodbine): The hon. member asks me to give him a break. I am trying to give him a break. I am trying to keep the debate on a level of some truth. If the hon. member wants to get up and dispute what I am saying, let him do it, but to sit there and heckle me for making a statement is not acceptable to me. Get on your feet and tell us what you think.

Mr. Fontana: I did.

Mr. Young (Beaches—Woodbine): Well, get up again. You will have another opportunity, and then I will respond to you, my friend.

The question is whether in 1990 a woman is viewed as being a person responsible enough to make a decision on her own. I think she is. This bill, by placing abortion back in the Criminal Code, is going to be making criminals out of an awful lot of women and an awful lot of people in the medical profession. I would put money on it that in a few years from now we will be faced with a larger problem than we are today without this bill.

I will be voting against the amendments before the House today except for Motion No. 24. I do not agree that any of the amendments which have been put forward will help women who find themselves with an unwanted pregnancy. I think probably Motion No. 24 would do that. If we have to live with this bill—which I certainly hope we will not have to—then I would adopt Motion No. 24 to get rid of it because that is what Motion No. 24 will do.

When that amendment comes before the House this evening I urge members to vote in favour of Motion No. 24, and defeat the rest of them.

Mrs. Sheila Finestone (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, this is a very difficult and thorny issue that pleases no one. It is difficult to resolve, whichever side of the issue you find yourself on. The minister said that a delicate balance was what was required.

I originally voiced my opinion on this bill when it was first tabled. I said that there were very serious flaws in it. However, in the democratic process in which we are fortunate enough to live, I voted that the bill go to a legislative committee for serious study and evaluation. At that time groups which were particularly concerned, including women, medical practitioners and families could be heard so that we would be able to bring forward amendments that would improve the bill. We could then decide if the minister's view, that putting this in the Criminal Code would be the only way to ensure access and to ensure fair payment with respect to a medical procedure, that a woman would have the right to choose, if she so desired.

At that time I considered that the bill was flawed. However, I thought that we had the obligation to send it to a legislative committee. It was sent to a legislative committee. The government has indicated that it is not interested in any kind of amendments. It is resisting all amendments saying that they would unbalance the very delicate compromise that has been found in this bill. It is not prepared to consider any kind of amendment.

A woman's right to choice, her right to consult a doctor, which I consider to be very important, not for his permission but for his advice and guidance so that she could make an enlightened decision was what was important when this bill was studied in the legislative committee. I do not believe that what was heard is faithfully reflected in the kind of amendments that we have before us. The majority of these amendments are very one-sided.

I am concerned about the constitutionality of this bill. I recall for you, Mr. Speaker, the opinion that was expressed by Chief Justice Brian Dickson of the Supreme Court on the Morgentaler case, which struck down the old abortion law. He said that forcing a woman by threat of criminal sanction to carry a foetus to term unless she meets certain criteria unrelated to her own priorities and aspirations is a profound interference with a woman's body and thus an infringement on security of the person.

I do not believe that this bill would meet a test of constitutionality. I also believe that where the foetus needs some protection—and that was also indicated in the decision of the court—that protection is not to be found in this bill.

A woman's right to choice, not permission, a woman's right to make decisions on her own reproductive obligations has been a conflict which has been present throughout history. It indicates that abortions will happen. If you close the door to any kind of option, you can be sure that we will be back into some very serious medical health problems. We have been without an abortion bill, or without any constraints on access to the right to terminate a pregnancy if a woman wishes, and we have not seen an increase in any abortions. Ninety-nine per cent of those abortions take place before 12 weeks.

• (1800)

I think that we are going to have to trust women. I think women deserve to be trusted. They will make the right choice. I would say to you, Mr. Speaker, that the number and spacing of children in a society that is free of violence, free of abuse, free from hunger, free from poverty, free from rape and incest are all factors that families take into consideration, but the final decision must be that of a woman in consultation with her doctor. She makes the final decision.

Unfortunately, Mr. Speaker, I do not see anything in this bill that would ensure, either through the Canada Health Act or the Criminal Code, the kinds of things that I feel are necessary to enable a woman to enjoy and rejoice in the pregnancy and in the anticipation of a child being added to her life. This is not found in this bill.

I would suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the threat of legal action, which could persuade many doctors to stop performing abortions and many women to fear ending up as criminals within our criminal justice system, does not answer the needs of this society.

The delicate balance has not been found. We have not found the proper kind of accommodation. Respect for constitutional guarantees has not been tested or found in this bill. Respect for individual rights and freedom of personal decision is not found in this bill. Because these issues have not been addressed, I would choose to vote against all amendments at this time and I will certainly vote against the bill at third reading.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, I rise today to say that I too will vote against this bill on third reading, as I did on second reading, and as I did on first reading.

The only possible amendment I can see myself supporting is that amendment of my colleague in the New Democratic Party for New Westminster—Burnaby.

I stand here, Mr. Speaker, feeling sad about what we are doing. I am unhappy about the way the government is treating Canadian women. Perhaps I should not be surprised, but I was one of those members who considered Bill C-43 in the legislative committee. We listened to women from every province and territory in this country. We listened to cries from the heart from these women. We heard stories of horror about conditions that women and children are forced to live in. We heard stories that would have been laughable were they not so sad, about the lack of access to medical care, the lack of access to proper contraception, the lack of access to proper education, the lack of access to a social service support network.

What was painted for us in that committee was a Canada that is not friendly to women and particularly not friendly to the children that we have within our care today.

I recall very clearly the presentation to the committee of Shirley Carr of the Canadian Labour Congress. She said to us: "I was here 25 years ago making the same plea. I cannot believe that we have progressed so little that I am back again 25 years later saying the same things".

This bill is an insult to both sides. On one hand, it says that abortion is illegal. On the other hand, it says that here is an exception so large that anyone who is prepared to make a few concessions here and there about what is actually going on will be able to slide through. Canadian women do not want to concoct stories. They do not want to have to worry that someone, a neighbour, a disgruntled ex-husband, a disgruntled boyfriend will lay a charge over something as personal and as personally agonizing as the question of whether or not to terminate a pregnancy.

Another thing I think women on the legislative committee had in common was the idea that if one is in favour of a woman's right to control her own body, to self-determination, that one is pro-abortion. Let that phrase be thrown out now and forever. The majority of Canadians who support the option for choice are not pro-abortion. We all know that, as an option, abortion is a last resort. It is one with which no one is happy. It is one with which no one is comfortable. It is one that Canadian women wish they did not have to choose.

If this country were all it could be, abortion is an option that Canadian women would rarely, if ever, choose.

The polarization that this debate has created leaves women and children as victims. We expend time and energy arguing the question of abortion and choice and arguing legislation brought forward, and we spend time and money on committees et cetera. These are energies of people who must come forward to speak to committies which would be far better spent in solving the social problems that create the need for abortion. Nobody in this chamber is going to be prepared to say that poverty or child and wife abuse do not exist in this country. We know they do. All too frequently we see incidents of this. Violence in the family against women and children is something that is a norm in Canadian life.

I do not think anyone in this Chamber would have the temerity to rise and suggest that as a society we properly educate our children or our citizenry in general on sexuality, on responsibility or on what it is to maintain adult relationships, giving them the proper intellectual wherewithal to choose when to begin them.

Nobody, after sitting in the legislative committee and listening to the lack of access to proper medical care across the country suffered by so many women, could possibly say that women can make a choice freely in our society as it exists today.

Contraception is not adequate for vast numbers of Canadian women. Education in sexuality has left many women and children short of the mark in knowing what it is they must do. The lack of facilities has left them, in many regions of the country, with an inability to get the facilities and the contraception they need.

With those situations existing, the option of abortion for many is the only option. I heard the expression from one of the witnesses that if you make your bed, then you must lie in it and this was said with sort of a sneer. It is absolutely unbelievable to me in 1990 that we still treat women and children in the manner in which we do, and that we still look at situations of human misery as ones where punishment must be inflicted. Canadian women know what they need and what is necessary to ensure that our society is fair and just. They know that they do not have it.

Whatever happens with this law, it will not change one thing. While social problems exist, such as violence against women and children, and a lack of care in our society for those who need it, then abortion will exist.

The only question to be answered by individual members of the House when they vote is whether abortion will be performed in a safe medical facility or whether it will exist outside these safeguards, because no legislation will stop abortion while society condones the treatment of women and children that we see before us today. Violence against women has been part of our history and that, sadly, will be part of our future. The only question we have to ask is, do you want abortion performed in a safe situation or do you want it performed in an unsafe situation?

I suggest that these amendments do nothing to improve the situation for women and children in this country. These amendments, if passed, will do nothing to improve a bill which is a flawed and unacceptable piece of legislation.

I suggest that the Government of Canada leave these decisions to the women of Canada, but that the Government of Canada take the necessary steps to create a climate wherein the women of Canada can make these choices freely, with the proper knowledge, the proper equipment and in a proper atmosphere which gives dignity and value to human life. If we do not treat the lives we have on this earth and in this country with dignity, then there is no reason to suppose that women who give life will want to do so.

Mr. Les Benjamin (Regina—Lumsden): Mr. Speaker, after 22 years in the House, this is the third time I have spoken on this issue. One wonders when society in general and successive governments in particular will take action that will substantially reduce, if not eliminate, the demand or the perceived need for an abortion.

I do not support abortion on demand totally, and I have said so frequently. I oppose it as a method of birth control or as an irresponsible solution for misbehaviour. That is a choice which I have made myself and one that each of us has to make individually.

I say to my pro-life colleagues that I respect their views and deeply held convictions. But, to merely sit still and wring your hands and tinker with legal machinery is not opposition. That is blind adherence to a dogma. Making abortions legal or illegal does nothing toward solving the problem—and witness prohibition outlawing liquor which did not stop people from drinking.

Canada's social structure is presently so poorly balanced that it invites violence of which abortion can be seen as one form. It is in redressing this inequality that I and my colleagues are engaged. Ultimately, a just society will have fewer invitations to this kind of violence. I have constantly fought and worked for, as my colleagues have, legislation to support troubled families and unduly burdened women so that the real or perceived need to resort to abortion will become obsolete.

It seems to me that women do not resort to abortion just because they suddenly do not love babies. It is because they find themselves caught in a frightening and terrifying squeeze: no housing, no job, no husband, no help, no acceptance, no love, no support.

I hope with the work of all of us in the House of Commons that we can restructure society to make it hospitable to life so that any child brought into this world would not go wanting or be so disadvantaged that no one would want to undertake that child's sustenance. To decry abortion without the restructuring of society is to beat the air. We must have wide-sweeping reforms favouring social security for single parent families and other poor families. Do not talk to me about immorality. When government shows—this one and the preceding ones—the immorality of refusing to implement legislation on child care, it is an immorality that invites abortions.

We must have more affordable and accessible child care centres so that parents continue both their work and their education. We must have a legal requirement for every employer in Canada to provide for a minimum of two years' leave of absence for an employee who is becoming a new parent, with a real guarantee that that employee can return to the same or a better position with that employer.

Chartered banks must be directed to use a significant part of their funds to lower mortgage loans so that housing costs will no longer cripple young families struggling to make ends meet. Medicare of which we in Saskatchewan are so proud must be strengthened and must become a norm for society all over Canada and the world. Federal funding must be available to the provinces to educate about all forms of birth control, starting in the schools, to encourage responsibility and decrease the ignorance that exists on the subject. Then each person may be informed and intelligently adopt a method of birth control that best meets one's own religious beliefs, economic situation, and family needs. There are, in short, many massive social changes that have to be made before we will see the day that the recourse to abortion is no longer the evident way out. There is much to be done. My colleagues and I invite all my colleagues in the government and the Official Opposition to join in redressing our social ills. The New Democratic Party is not interested in defending the wealthy. They have always been able to find an abortion somewhere, and I have had experience with that. We, on the contrary, are very concerned with helping those whom society has so shortchanged or ignores such that all other hope seems to have expired.

The statement of April 1973 by the Canadian Catholic Conference of Bishops has been of great help to me, and I want to quote it:

> To be involved in the task of making this society hospitable to life is a foremost requirement of social justice. That is why we must take most seriously the rebuke that those who oppose abortion care too little about the special problems of mothers and the burdens of rearing children once they are born.
>
> If respect for life seems to end with birth, our perceptions and values are truncated and incomplete. The call of Christ, that we should bear one another's burdens, demands that we reach out in practical ways to share all the burdens of parenthood. The indicated aid and support will include working to change economic and social realities in the direction of justice and respect for life. From doing this, we must not flinch.

• (1820)

Whatever law we have—and I would prefer we have none—must be equally enforced. Hospitals which are funded by taxpayers' dollars should provide the services the law allows.

When society demands and all levels of government implement the measures I have illustrated—and there are many others—then I believe we will see a dramatic reduction in the number of abortions; not a reduction because women will go somewhere else to have an abortion, but because thousands of Canadian women will no longer need to resort to abortion as the best or only avenue left open to them. They will have a real choice, and though I am pro-choice, what kind of a choice do they have?

I ask my pro-life colleagues what a retarded 16 year old girl from a poor family made pregnant by a 19 year old brother is supposed to do? She has no help. What about a 15 year old girl made pregnant by a drunken father? What is she supposed to do? What is a woman made pregnant after a beating and a rape by a husband or other attacker, I ask my pro-life friends, supposed to do? Don't say adoption, because I can take you to a home in Regina to see a woman who should be a saint. She is looking after six children, two of whom are vegetables, no one will adopt. When I challenged the pro-life groups in my city that came to see me in my office on numerous occasions—and I always showed them the courtesy of hearing them out and meeting with them—to go to that home with me and adopt them, they said: "We will find some way to have them looked after". That is hypocrisy of the worst kind.

May I say in closing that while hundreds of thousands of kids in this country are homeless or hungry, we have no business passing legislation such as this. I will vote against all the amendments except Motion No. 24, and I will vote against the bill.

Mr. Bruce Halliday (Oxford): Mr. Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to say a few words on Bill C-43. As you know, it is not my custom to be talkative in the chamber, although I participate a lot in committee work. This is one bill before the House on which I think most members want to say something on this occasion.

I want to explain my position a little by indicating that I am neither from the classical pro-choice side nor the classical pro-life side. My position on abortion is somewhere in between. I listened to my colleague from Regina—Lumsden and I agreed with a number of points he made, although I do not think we see eye to eye on the subject.

As a nation and a government we should try to prevent the need for abortion by trying to give parents the education and the opportunity to take steps that preclude anyone wishing to have an abortion. This is the ideal way, obviously. I think that governments over the years have failed to implement policies to the extent that they might to move in that direction.

Having said what is my position, as a physician I have been acquainted with the issue of abortions in a practical way having been involved with them from time to time. I must say that over the years, the longer I spend in the House, the more closely I come to the pro-life side, to the extent that I feel we should do all we can to discourage abortions when possible.

I was interested enough in this whole issue that when there was difficulty coming to a conclusion as to what kind of law we should have in this country and what kind of bills that come before the House, I was pleased to participate with other colleagues on the government side in a unique committee which came up with the bill that is before the House now, Bill C-43.

In spite of the fact that I would like to see abortions discouraged to the extent that is humanly possible, I would like to indicate my support for Bill C-43 for several reasons. I happen to believe that it is probably preferable to have some law in this nation that does indicate some concern and protection for the foetus. As I understand the interpretations given by the Supreme Court, I think the message we got from it too was that there was reason this Parliament might want to see some protection for the foetus. I can see that possibly that may well be coming down the road.

I had a lot of soul-searching to do with this bill. It is somewhat like the bills on capital punishment. I was involved in those two debates as well back in 1975 or 1976 and again more recently. Although those were bills that called for a free vote, as it were, they were slightly different. One could vote either for or against capital punishment, but here we are not voting for or against abortion. There are many situations in between. I see that the majority of Canadians, by the pollings that were done, are certainly in between this issue. The majority prefer not to be in the pure classic pro-life position or in the pure pro-choice position.

I was very impressed by what was done by the committee that was put together to bring forward a consensus on the bill before the House. It was co-chaired by two people. In terms of their own personal convictions, one was strongly pro-life and the other was strongly pro-choice. To see those co-chairpersons and representatives from various parts of the spectrum between the pro-life and pro-choice sides come together as a group and come up with Bill C-43 was very impressive.

I have actually had a number of representations from constituents. I have had many sincere letters, telephone calls and petitions from those who represent the pro-life side of this issue. I respect their position very deeply. I know how sincere they are about it. I know from whence they come and the source of their strong convictions based on religious background, training and scruples which I respect.

I am convinced that the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada was such that if we came up with a bill that would represent what it wanted us to do, we would probably find that law to be ruled unconstitutional when it was challenged and brought to the Supreme Court of Canada.

What impressed me the most was something I read recently in one of the journals that comes into our house. It is called Contact and is put out by people who have a very strong Christian conviction. The heading of an article on the front page of a recent edition read: "Christians urged to support pro-life abortion law amendments." The staff of the Calvanistic Contact wrote this article, but they quote extensively from Mr. Gerald Vandezande who is the public affairs director for Citizens for Public Justice, CPJ. They have been quoted here in the House previously during this debate.

I happen to know a bit of the background of Mr. Gerald Vandezande because he comes out of my constituency. I know his parents and I know the strong convictions that he and his family and others who belong to the same church as he belongs to in my area adhere to. I respect him very deeply. In fact, my wife comes out of that same tradition as well and I have a strong conviction for their position.

I want to read part of this article which impressed me. As I indicated, Mr. Vandezande is the public affairs director for Citizens for Public Justice and knowing him to be a committed pro-life person, he shows some insight which I think supports my position in favour of this bill. I want to quote from this article because I think it has some bearing on this issue. I am quoting now from the article, not from what he said, although he is being paraphrased by the staff writer of this particular article:

> At issue is whether Canada will have a law governing abortions or not. If Bill C-43 is defeated, with or without some of the proposed amendments, Parliament is likely to give up trying to bring forward an abortion bill.

I believe that to be true, Mr. Speaker. The article further states:

> Christians may need to decide, says Vandezande, whether the bill now before Parliament is better than no abortion law at all.

This is something I have raised with many of my pro-life people, whether or not we should have no bill at all. When I am challenged to vote against this bill, I say that we may then have no bill at all. I happen to agree with what Mr. Vandezande is saying here, namely, that we have to decide whether the bill now before Parliament is better than no abortion law at all.

The article goes on for another sentence or two and states:

> CPJ is urging all Christians to phone or write their MP—to vote for the most life-affirming legislation and social policy measures possible today.

I want to emphasize those last two words. He is calling upon us as Christians, calling upon Christians in Canada, to phone and write to us as MPs asking us "to vote for the most life-affirming legislation and social policy measures possible today".

It is my conviction, after sitting on the committee that came up with this bill, that this is the only bill that is going to gain the support of this House.

If the bill is amended either way, either on the pro-choice side or the pro-life side, it is going to be defeated and we will then have no bill at all.

I feel very strongly and I feel very much encouraged that somebody who comes from a very strong pro-life position has the courage and has the insight, I would have to say, to recognize the predicament that we as parliamentarians are in, and if we want to have any bill at all, and I think some bill is better than no bill, it is essential that we vote for Bill C-43.

Based on that, it is my intention this evening when the vote is called to vote against all the amendments, and come third reading of the bill, I will want to support it because I feel it is the one bill that will possibly and hopefully sustain the support of this House.

Mr. Ray Skelly (North Island—Powell River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few comments on listening to the hon. member's presentation, a person over the years in whom I have had a great deal of confidence in his judgement and opinion. I do take exception to the statements made in the House concerning the legislation before us on the abortion issue.

I do not believe that this is a consensus bill at all, nor does anyone in the party that I represent. I think many of the members of the government are very upset with this particular piece of legislation. It is not a compromise. It is probably the worst choice that could have been made.

I am absolutely astounded that a bill could come before this House and generate the antipathy of both sides, that a bill could be presented in this House and be absolutely opposed by both the anti-choice and the pro-choice forces in this country. I would point out to the member that this bill is not better than not having a bill. This is a bad bill. The people who drafted it, presented it to this House, forced it on the government members and the Cabinet and are attempting to sell it as, a compromise, are doing a great disservice to this House.

We have missed the mark as legislators. The price we will pay is that in the next federal election we will be torn to pieces on the platform, as both sides of the issue, who will be completely dissatisfied with this, will carry this issue on. This Parliament is not finished with this issue because it is a bad bill.

All but one of the amendments are bad amendments. Virtually all of my colleagues have stood in this House to oppose the amendments that basically curtail the choice of women on an absolutely fundamental issue. It is wrong. I will vote against every single one of the amendments except the one proposed by my colleague from New Westminster—Burnaby. In the end I will vote against this bill.

It is my hope that other colleagues on all sides of this House will join myself and other members who believe this legislation is very detrimental to the work of Parliament and, indeed, to women in Canada and that they will also vote against this bill.

SITTING SUSPENDED

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): Pursuant to order adopted on Thursday, May 10, the sitting is suspended until 9 p.m.

Sitting suspended at 6.36 p.m.

SITTING RESUMED

The House resumed at 9 p.m.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of Bill C-43, An Act respecting abortion, as reported (without amendment) from a legislative committee, and on Motions Nos. 4, 5, 10, 12, 13, 14, 16, 17A, 17B, 19, 22 and 24.

Mr. Speaker: In order to assist hon. members, it is very important to pay attention, because the Chair must notify all hon. members.

[English]

It being nine o'clock, p.m. pursuant to Order made Thursday, May 10, 1990, it is my duty to put forthwith every question necessary to dispose of the report stage of Bill C-43, an act respecting abortion.

[Translation]

I will take a few minutes so that all hon. members can be present.

[English]

May I have your attention for a moment, please? I would ask hon. ministers and members on both sides of the House to take their seats.

If all hon. members would give me their attention for a moment, I can give some guidance which will help us all this evening. Strictly speaking, of course, I was required to announce that, it being nine o'clock, we would commence with these motions. In full realization that some members were in the lobby, I have delayed that. I hope that all members are here now.

I am going to proceed very slowly because these votes could become complicated and we do not want in any way to affect the democratic process by making an error.

It is important that you listen carefully to this. We are going to go through each of the motions, one after another, and there will be a voice vote only. We are going through each of the motions in the first round and there will be a voice vote only. If the voice vote is clear with respect to an affirmative or a negative, I will say so. If five members rise, the vote will be deferred. When we have gone through all the motions with a voice vote, we will then come back to those motions that are remaining and there will be a formal vote.

What we are doing now is going through all the motions on a voice vote first. I want everybody to understand that, if all the Speaker hears is "yeas", then the Speaker will declare the motion passed with a voice vote. If all the Speaker hears are "nays", the Speaker will declare the motion negatived with a voice vote. If hon. members have doubt, five members standing will ensure that the vote is deferred so that there is a full vote of every member in the Chamber.

[Translation]

It is very important to understand the process and the procedure exactly. Every member must also pay attention.

[English]

The first question is on Motion No. 4, standing in the name of Mr. Boudria. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: No.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

An hon. member: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred. The recorded division will also apply to Motion No. 22.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

The next question is on Motion No. 13, standing in the name of Mr. Reimer. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

The next question is on Motion No. 14 standing in the name of Mr. Boudria.

Is is the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred. Consideration of Motions No. 17A and 17B is also deferred.

• (2130)

Perhaps I can give an explanation to hon. members. Subsequent to deferring Motion No. 16 I declared as follows: "Consideration of Motions Nos. 17A and 17B is also deferred". Those matters are still in front of the House, and I do not want hon. members worrying that those motions have disappeared. They have not.

Are the hon. members satisfied that they understand the situation?

Some hon. members: Yes.

Mr. Speaker: The next question is on Motion No. 19 standing in the name of Mr. Pagtakhan.

Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Some hon. members: No.

Mr. Speaker: All those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: All those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it.

And more than five members having risen:

Mr. Speaker: Pursuant to Standing Order 76(8), the recorded division on the motion stands deferred.

I want to make something clear to hon. members. Because of the nature of Motion No. 24, procedurally it is not possible to proceed with it at this time. Having said that and depending on what happens in the recorded votes on all the other motions, Motion No. 24 may well be back in front of the House. I do not think I need to go into a lengthy explanation.

The House will now proceed to the taking of the deferred divisions at the report stage of the bill now before the House. Call in the members.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I think you will find unanimous consent to dispense with the ringing of the bells at this time and proceed with the vote immediately.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: The first question is on Motion No. 4, standing in the name of Mr. Boudria. A vote on this motion also applies to Motion No. 22, standing in the name of Mr. Boudria.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost. Therefore, I declare Motion No. 22 lost.

• (2150)

I want to bring to the attention of the House information which has just come to me. There was an error in my presentation of the motion, not one that is serious, but I know that Mr. Pagtakhan did not second the motion. The motion was seconded by Mr. Rocheleau.

The next question is on Motion No. 5 standing in the name of Mr. Boudria.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

We will now proceed to the next question which is on Motion No. 14.

Mr. Boudria: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Motion No. 14 deals directly with Motion No. 10. Since Motion No. 10 was defeated, I would submit that there is probably little need to take the second vote on Motion No. 14.

I would suggest to the House that we could perhaps apply the vote on Motion No. 10 to Motion No. 14.

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Speaker: Agreed, and so ordered.

The House divided on Motion No. 14, standing in the name of Mr. Boudria, which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the motion lost.

• (2300)

[English]

Mr. Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order. Since we have the sense of the House on the previous motions, perhaps we could apply the previous vote to Motion No. 17B and move on to the next motions which are of a different context.

Mr. Attewell: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, I appreciate what the hon. member said but Motion No. 17B is quite different. It is more explicit and I would like to vote on it.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Hamilton—Wentworth has suggested a mode of proceeding, but that requires unanimous consent and the hon. member for Markham—Whitchurch—Stouffville has not given his consent.

The next question is on Motion No. 17B standing in the name of Mr. Attewell.

The House divided on the motion, which was negatived on the following division:

COMMONWEALTH COMMITTEE OF FOREIGN MINISTERS

MEETING IN ABUJA, NIGERIA—TABLING OF LETTERS

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, pursuant to Standing Order 32, I would like to lay upon the table three documents emanating from the recent meeting of the Commonwealth Committee of Foreign Ministers dealing with southern Africa which met in Abuja, Nigeria, on May 16 and 17.

I would like to table the concluding statement of that meeting, a copy of the Abuja commitment that was signed at that meeting and the text of a letter sent to the foreign ministers of the European Community and the foreign ministers of the G-7 signed by the nine ministers who are members of the Commonwealth committee on events in southern Africa.

With the indulgence of the House, I might perhaps ask members to pay particular heed to the letter, a quite extraordinary document, signed by nine ministers sent to members of the European Community and the G-7 setting forth our view on the appropriateness of maintaining sanctions now in place with respect to South Africa.

PETITIONS

THE GOODS AND SERVICES TAX

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Madam Speaker, I have the honour to lay upon the table a petition signed by numerous electors of Sarnia and other places in Ontario. This petition is being submitted pursuant to Standing Order 36.

The signers of this petition object to the GST because they consider it unfair and regressive, and they call upon Parliament to reject it.

Mr. Boudria: Let us do it now!

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, I have here a petition signed by numerous residents of the electoral riding of Ottawa—Vanier; this petition was circulated in the riding by way of circulars, and it is meant to express strong disagreement with the government's proposed goods and services tax.

These Canadians fear that the proposed tax will have an inflationary impact and will decrease our ability as Canadians, to maintain our standard of living. They therefore humbly submit a proposal to the effect that this House, and this Parliament in particular, reject the proposal to impose on Canadians a 7 per cent goods and services tax beginning in January 1991.

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, it is also my honour and privilege to submit a petition pursuant to Standing Order 36. This petition is signed by a number of residents of the riding of Kingston and the Islands, who, since the last election, have been so well represented in this House by my distinguished and erudite colleague.

I would like to voice my support for this petition which the electors of Kingston and the Islands have signed to ask the Conservative Government to withdraw its proposed goods and services tax forthwith.

I am convinced, Madam Speaker, that we could all make up our minds immediately and withdraw this tax which is so regressive. Let us do it now!

[English]

Mr. Jack Whittaker (Okanagan—Similkameen—Merritt): Madam Speaker, it is my pleasure today to present, pursuant to Standing Order 36, a further petition signed by people in my riding from such places as Osoyoos, Penticton, Summerland, as well as other places in the province of British Columbia such as Hope and Kelowna.

These are a further 163 names that I am adding to the thousands of names on petitions which I have already placed before the House from people within British Columbia asking this government to reject the current proposal for the goods and services tax. This petition asks the government to cease with its proposal that would shift the tax burden on to ordinary Canadians through a regressive consumption tax instead of through real tax reform.

QUESTIONS ON THE ORDER PAPER

Mr. Albert Cooper (Parliamentary Secretary to Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Madam Speaker, I ask that all questions be allowed to stand.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Shall all questions stand?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

Hon. Kim Campbell (Minister of Justice and Attorney General of Canada) moved that Bill C–43, an act respecting abortion, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I know that there is a special order which has been adopted by the House concerning the debate on third reading of Bill C–43. If one reads it attentively, a Whip can stand in his place and propose to the House that his party would like to split the allocated 20 minutes speeches, plus the 10–minute questions and comments allowed after each of our rounds.

I would like to give notice to the Chair that as Whip of the Liberal party we would like to split our time into two 10–minute periods, each period followed by a 5–minute question and comment period.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, I just wish to advise the House that the speakers for the New Democratic Party will take their full 20 minutes as individual speakers.

If we have a decision later on to split our time between two members, we will advise the House at the beginning of that speech where we will split into two periods of 10 and 5.

We assume that the normal rotation will be adhered to.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, may I make one further comment. In the interest of all members knowing what is going on, since the debate will probably last until late tonight and could collapse some time tomorrow morning, by 9.59 a.m. at the latest, I wonder if we could have notice from the other parties as to when they intend to go to 10–minute speeches, plus 5 minutes for questions and comments, so that we can organize our people around that arrangement.

Mr. Angus: Madam Speaker, I think the suggestion by the House leader of the Official Opposition is most appropriate.

We have already started to try to get a sense of the length of time that the House will be functioning today, tonight, and perhaps tomorrow morning so that we do have an indication of when the debate may end rather than have some accidents occur, which has happened from time to time.

Mr. Cooper: Madam Speaker, I can just indicate from our side that at the moment we have about 13 speakers who wish to participate in the debate. We do not have an indication yet as to whether or not any of those members are willing to split their time. However, we will do all in our power to inform the House and the other members in order to help them in their planning.

While I am on my feet, may I suggest that perhaps all three parties would agree to sit through the lunch hour to make sure that we have a little more time for people to speak and to give more opportunities to members.

Mr. Gauthier: Madam Speaker, on the proposal that we sit through lunch hour I really do not have any objections. Members understand that there will be no supper break. Once we start at three o'clock after Question Period we will proceed continuously until the debate collapses.

Thus, if we do sit through the lunch hour, it would mean that our assistants in the House, the clerks, messengers and others, would be well advised to plan their lunches appropriately because we will not get any.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Mrs. Campbell (Vancouver Centre), seconded by Mr. Cooper, moved that Bill C–43, an act respecting abortion, be now read the third time and pass. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. Gauthier: I rise on a point of order, Madam Speaker. In the interest of keeping things in order, I do not think a parliamentary secretary can second a motion. If so, may we have a ruling from the Chair as to whether it is in order for a parliamentary secretary to second a motion.

Mr. Milliken: There are 38 of them. Surely to goodness more than one of them can be here.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. parliamentary secretary can properly second a motion, so the motion is seconded by Mr. Cooper.

Mr. Milliken: He is so competent he should be a minister.

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the commentary from the other side of the House on the competence of our members who should all be ministers.

I rise today to address you, Madam Speaker, on the issue of abortion, one of the most controversial and divisive issues in society today, an issue about which we all have very different views.

As colleagues and parliamentarians, our roles have been challenged as never before on the subject of abortion.

We have been challenged by the strongly held views of our constituents and by the debates which have occurred over every element of the physical, intellectual, moral and spiritual aspects of abortion.

• (1120)

[Translation]

The members who sat on the legislative committee on abortion heard arguments from individuals and groups representing all sides of the debate.

The arguments advanced by the proponents of free choice as well as by the representatives of the pro life movements were founded on principles and were convincing.

As individuals, our views on abortion are no less strong than those of the voters whom we represent or of the lobby groups defending a particular position.

In fact, certain ministers and members have publicly expressed their personal views on this matter, and rightly so.

[English]

As parliamentarians, we are all aware of our duty to act not in our own interests, but in the interests of those we represent.

Given the diversity of beliefs held, there are those who might question whether it is possible to find some common ground to meet the expectations of Canadians in our role as representatives of the Canadian people.

The Supreme Court of Canada stated in the Morgentaler case that while the function of the Supreme Court is to review legislation in order to determine if a particular legislative balance of interests was consistent with constitutional guarantees, it is up to parliament, first, to strike that balance.

Two years have passed since the Supreme Court declared the former abortion law unconstitutional. All three majority judgments of the court concurred that Section 251 of the Criminal Code, which had been the law for 19 years, was a violation of the security of the person and the principles of fundamental justice as guaranteed under the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms.

In so stating, the highest court in the land has recognized that there is a balance to be made in society between what they describe as the state's interest in the foetus and the rights of a woman.

It is our job to strike that balance.

[Translation]

Despite the problems this represents, it is possible for us, as parliamentarians, to find a common ground on which to meet the expectations of Canadians.

If we hope to find this common ground, it is very important for us to understand that the legislation will necessarily reflect more than one viewpoint.

When we speak of common ground, we are not necessarily speaking of a compromise, but rather of coming to some sort of arrangement. An accommodation on such a thorny issue as abortion is extremely difficult for those who were involved in the drafting of the proposed legislation.

Nevertheless, Bill C–43 is the end result of a marvelous exercise in parliementary responsibility, in that it reflects the different viewpoints and interests of society, while upholding constitutional guarantees.

[English]

I have enormous respect for the process by which this bill was created and for what it represents in terms of common ground.

Very often, as I said in my speech at second reading, we have shared common ground, but for very different reasons.

Bill C–43, in my view, is a remarkable creation and a tribute to those who put it together.

We have been elected to provide leadership in dealing with the situation we now face.

As the Prime Minister said in his speech before you in November of 1989, "we must achieve a solution that is philosophically sound, constitutionally correct, politically acceptable and administratively practicable; that is, a solution which can be understood and implemented".

Bill C–43 exemplifies such a solution.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare, who has been a committed supporter of the pro–life position over the years, supports Bill C–43.

In the debate on second reading I explained why I, committed to pro–choice, was able to support the bill before the House.

I remain confident that Bill C–43 reflects a balance of the views of the Canadian people and protects their vital interests in a way that will be acceptable to the majority of Canadians.

I would now like to present a brief overview of Bill C–43.

The government has proceeded by using the criminal law power because this bill is primarily related to the protection of fundamental values, reflecting our commitment to the protection of life, health, human dignity, equality, and social order.

Criminal law embodies deeply held social values and attempts to balance them with the rights of individuals. It is therefore appropriate that we deal with the abortion issue within a legal framework which is based on these considerations.

All of the judges of the majority, in the Morgentaler case, recognized the usual purpose of the Criminal Code provisions relating to abortion, that is, the protection of the life and health of the woman, and the protection of the foetus.

[Translation]

The justices also acknowledged the validity of the legislative objective aimed at offering this protection. Mr. Justice Beetz stated that it was a valid objective in Canadian criminal law.

The Supreme Court of Canada showed that it was mindful of the role of the legislative branch. We realize that the legislative balance we are seeking will be examined by the courts to ensure that it is consistent with the Charter. However, we must first begin by assuming our responsibilities in the democratic process and seeking out this balance.

However imperfect it may be, the legislative process is still the best way to achieve a consensus. We cannot refuse to do our duty, which is to resolve this matter. Nor can we force the courts to do our job for us.

[English]

I wish to emphasize that provinces cannot stiffen the criminal law, nor can they weaken it. The criminal legislation should enable us to establish a uniform standard for all of Canada, something that does not exist at the present time in the area of abortion.

Abortion has been put into the Criminal Code in order to balance and protect throughout the pregnancy the rights of the woman who seeks an abortion and the societal interest in the protection of the foetus.

It is thoughtless and misleading to say that Bill C–43 is making criminals out of women and doctors. This bill prohibits a number of specific activities: abortions performed by non–medical practitioners who may carry out abortions under unsanitary and unsafe conditions, abortions performed without forming an opinion as to the health grounds, the unlawful sale of unauthorized abortifacients, toxic devices or equipment used to induce abortions, and self–induced abortions.

To understand the effects of Bill C–43 on access to abortion, it is necessary to appreciate its implications for clarifying and helping to establish a national standard of entitlement to abortion.

The provision of abortion services as a health care issue falls under the jurisdiction of the provinces. Thus, it is the responsibility of each province and territory to deal with access to abortion services.

The federal government does not have the jurisdiction to regulate health practices in Canada.

Nevertheless, this bill does assist in providing access.

Not only does it lack a number of legal impediments that existed under the old law, such as therapeutic abortion committees, restrictions on which doctors could perform abortions, and hospital requirements, but it also improves upon the current situation.

Bill C–43 will give the provinces the guidance they have asked for on the legal framework and national approach to entitlement to abortion.

[Translation]

From a constitutional perspective, I would like to point out that the provision of health care services is not regulated under the Canada Health Act. Rather, this act is a financial statute adopted pursuant to the federal government's spending power.

To suggest that it would be possible to incorporate in the Canada Health Act a provision ensuring access to abortion services is wrong. This reflects a poor understanding of Canada's constitutional reality.

The federal government does not have the power to regulate the provision of health care services. The definition of "health", which includes physical, mental and psychological health, is consistent with the Supreme Court ruling in the Morgentaler case according to which the provisions of Section 7 of the Charter respecting the security of the person include physical and psychological security.

It is important to look at health as it relates to the human being as a whole. The circumstances which compel a woman to seek an abortion will most certainly be taken into account by the medical practitioner when he or she arrives at a decision and determines whether not performing an abortion is likely to threaten the physical, mental or psychological health of the woman.

This decision by the medical practitioner is not an abstract one. Rather, it takes into consideration the personal situation of the woman.

This approach allows the medical practitioner to examine all the repercussions, should he or she decide not to perform the abortion, and not only to consider the effects that continuing the pregnancy would have.

• (1130)

[English]

The foetus is protected throughout the pregnancy because of the non–gestational approach of the bill. Those who oppose abortion do not wish to see gestational limits in the legislation because such limits suggest a varying value of human life at different times of pregnancy. Those who favour a woman's choice view gestational limits as unnecessary and based on the myth that women seek abortions late in pregnancy when, in actual fact, 89 per cent of abortions are performed in the first 12 weeks of pregnancy.

The bill achieves protection for the foetus in the Criminal Code which generally protects fundamental social values. The bill does not allow for abortion on demand since specific health grounds must be met. Only therapeutic abortions are permitted based on health grounds and a doctor's opinion.

The generally accepted standards of the medical profession apply to any opinion formed by a doctor. The decision a doctor makes is an opinion formed in good faith as required by the canon of medical ethics of the Royal College of Physicians and Surgeons of Canada.

The Canadian Medical Association has expressed a concern that the doctors of Canada will be under a fear of prosecution if this bill becomes law. Doctors should not be afraid. I would suggest that what this bill describes as legal behaviour is nothing more than good medical practice. It must be remembered that the responsibilities of doctors under the terms of Bill C–43 are similar to their responsibilities under the former legislation.

The very real difference from the old law is that no extraneous administrative procedures or outside opinions are required. Under the new bill the doctor will apply accepted medical standards in order to decide whether or not to induce an abortion, how and where to do so, and whether or not to seek outside opinions.

[Translation]

Given all the benefits of the bill that I have outlined for you, I believe that Bill C–43 is the best legislative formula and that it can stand up to any legal challenge based on the Charter.

It achieves a balance reflecting the concerns raised by the Supreme Court.

The bill provides that the decision to have an abortion or not is based on health reasons.

A person desiring an abortion must consult a physician, as for any other medical procedure.

The definition of "health" is broad and allows taking into consideration all factors essential to the protection of the woman's right to security of her person.

[English]

But the Supreme Court did not speak only of a woman's rights under the Charter. There were a number of references to the importance of the protection of the foetus by all.

Madam Justice Bertha Wilson who wrote one of the reasons for judgment said in the Morgentaler case: "The situation respecting a woman's right to control her own person becomes more complex when she becomes pregnant and some statutory control may be appropriate."

In introducing Bill C–43 we have made a very careful effort to comply with constitutional requirements and we believe that the proposed bill would be a workable law within constitutional parameters.

The federal government cannot prevent people from attempting civil actions since civil actions are governed by provincial law. However, in the Daigle decision the Supreme Court of Canada gave a strong indication against the availability of civil actions to prevent women from exercising their rights.

[Translation]

Private prosecutions are extremely rare in this field.

Anyone can lay charges under a provision of the Criminal Code.

However, the attorney general in each province has the power to suspend proceedings in a case where the private prosecution is undertaken for frivolous or malicious motives or is not in the public interest.

In light of past experience and the requirements for evidence for charges laid under this provision, an unfounded lawsuit is very unlikely.

[English]

As the Minister of National Health and Welfare has made clear, there is no intention that this bill be used to harass Canadian women or doctors. Aside from the factors I have just mentioned which make such harassment highly improbable, attempts to abuse the criminal process themselves incur severe legal penalties.

[Translation]

Many Canadians did not hesitate to express their various interests, which occasionally reflected contrary opinions.

We respect their opinions.

Nevertheless, we must assert our responsibilities and fill the void created by such divergent views.

If we are unable to achieve this balance, we are not meeting our responsibilities as representatives of the people.

[English]

Earlier I spoke of leadership in our roles as parliamentarians. Leadership means having the courage to bring forward an abortion bill which seeks to answer the concerns of Canadians. Parliament is not perfect but each of us comes here as a representative of Canadian people with particular outlooks. If we take our responsibilities seriously, we will not simply be advocates of one particular position but we will recognize that the most important issues in our society are not always black and white.

[Translation]

Our work as elected members requires us to try to "square the circle" and seek common ground.

This bill is remarkable evidence of the finest parliamentary tradition and we have the required expertise to find the common ground on which Parliament can pass a law on this most controversial issue.

[English]

We may not be imbued with all wisdom and knowledge in this endeavour, but there can be no doubt that we have given every ounce of our energy to arriving at a suitable solution and we have fulfilled our duty in addressing the issue of abortion in the best interests of Canadians.

My colleagues and I are convinced that this bill comes closer than any practical alternative in a moderate, practicable and balanced solution. It is philosophically sound, constitutionally valid and workable. I would ask that you support Bill C–43 and vote in favour of its successful passing into law.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I listened very carefully to the Minister of Justice and her rationale for the government proceeding with this bill.

She said that the bill is in the interests of those whom we, as members of this House of Commons, represent. I would like to comment that by reducing access for women who are seeking abortion by throwing this issue back into the courts of this country, which is sure to happen as women have already said, and by agonizing doctors and women in this country, I do not believe is in the interests of those we represent.

She talked about a balance of views. Whose views, Madam Speaker? Sixty–two per cent of Canadians in an Environics poll in November said they did not want criminal legislation on abortion. The majority of Canadians are opposed to it. She said we cannot refuse to perform our duties as legislators. I would say to the Minister of Justice that we do have a duty. Those of us, particularly those of us who are women and have articulated a position in favour of the integrity of Canadian women, have also a duty to those women. The minister has articulated that position in the past and she is now reversing that position.

Our role should be to do something effective about this issue, to do something that is truly effective and compassionate about unwanted pregnancies. Of course, that would be to support families and research into family planning, to support research into safe and effective methods of contraception, to support women and children and not to throw this bill into the Criminal Code.

She said it was misleading to say that Bill C–43 criminalizes women and doctors but it is not. That is what this bill does. She talked about national entitlement. The constitutional experts and the lawyers in the universities across this country have written to her and said that this is legal nonsense. They have said that she is relying on jurisprudence that is 20 years out of date as far as federal paramountcy goes.

My final comment is that the minister said she was committed to the pro–choice position in this country. I would like to ask her, in view of supporting this legislation and in view of standing in this House last night and voting in opposition to the only pro–choice amendment that was before this House, how can she stand here and tell Canadian women and the people of this country that she is committed to pro–choice?

• (1140)

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, I am quite pleased to say that I am committed to the pro–choice position and have been. The point that I have made is that I think this bill is consistent with the pro–choice position. The hon. member has made a number of comments which I would like to address but I realize that there is limited time.

One thing that I would like to point out though is that she makes reference to lawyers' opinions which have challenged my view on the relationship of this bill to other legislation. First of all, those opinions which were commissioned have never been provided to me. People have felt free to call into question my competence and integrity without providing to me the opinions on which those were based. I have succeeded in getting some of them, not all of them, and I understand that the group which commissioned the opinion is not circulating the opinion which happens to agree with me.

I would refer the hon. member to the footnote of Mr. Bruce Ryder's opinion which in fact makes the point. All I have said with respect to the relationship between this bill and provincial legislation is that I believe that this bill will make it more difficult for provinces to use their jurisdiction in ways that will reduce access to abortion. I believe the effect of actually having a federal law on the books is a positive one and will be taken into account by the courts.

One of the opinions that was solicited, and I refer the hon. member to it, in fact makes that point. I suggest most of the opinions are worthless because they address things that I have never said. By parodying my views, of course you can solicit whatever opinion you want.

Mr. Ryder makes the point in footnote 14 or 16 of his views, quoting Professor Peter Hogg, who is one of the great authorities on Canadian constitutional law, in a line of authority that culminated in the Westendorp case, which is still good law in Canada. It is a Supreme Court of Canada decision of 1983. He says perhaps in theory the courts should not take into account the existence or absence of a federal law in determining the validity of provincial law, but in practice the case law shows that the presence of a federal law does, in fact, influence the courts in determining the validity of provincial law.

That is the point that I have made. It is a point well founded in the law of Canada, in the 1983 decision of the Supreme Court of Canada, which has not been departed from by the Supreme Court of Canada. I am quite content to allow the courts to vindicate me in that view because it is a well-founded view. I assign no value whatever to legal opinions which attempt to challenge views that are a parody of what I have said, as opposed to a realistic representation of what I have said.

The hon. member says that 62 per cent of Canadians have said they do not want criminal law in this area. Most Canadians do not understand the division of powers in this country and the limited authority that the federal government has because, in fact, a majority of Canadians have said they would prefer to see some legal framework.

The only constitutional power that we can use to do that is the criminal law power and the criminal law power is a very important power of this Parliament. It enables this Parliament to do some very important things and there are many every-day activities in Canadian society that for some purposes come under the purview of the criminal law power. To caricature that power and to use the term "criminalization" in emotive terms that have nothing to do with the way the law functions, I think is not very helpful in helping Canadians to understand the role of parliamentarians and the effect of legislation.

Of course, we should be doing things that are effective for women and children, but those are not answers to the problem that is before us.

This law attempts to recognize the fact that abortion is characterized in two fundamentally different ways in Canadian society. For people on my side of the issue, a view the hon. member shares, it is fundamentally an equality rights issue, but for other Canadians it is basically a moral issue. It is very difficult to reconcile these two points of view.

This bill attempts to reconcile these two points of view. It is a conciliatory gesture. It says to those great many Canadians, for whom abortion will never be just another issue, that it is an issue we take seriously as a society. At the same time it is a bill that is deeply respectful of the relationship between a woman and her doctor. It is deeply respectful of the professional ethics of the medical profession in Canada. It does not seek to intrude into that relationship or look behind opinions formed by doctors, opinions which they must form to practise ethical medicine under the canons of their own college. It does not seek to look behind those opinions but to recognize them and to provide in those opinions and in a standard of good medical practice, a protection for doctors from any kind of legal sanction.

Ms. Black: Madam Speaker, the Minister of Justice indicated some question of morality here and that this was a moral position of her government. For two years in this country, we have had no criminal law on abortion. Has she seen any indication that Canadian women have not behaved with integrity or have not taken this issue very seriously themselves? Does she truly believe that the state knows better than Canadian women, on their own, when they agonize to make this decision themselves? Does she not respect the morality of Canadian women?

Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre): Madam Speaker, I think that is a foolish question and typical of the way the hon. member tries to characterize questions which bear no relation to what I have actually said.

Many Canadians regard this as a moral issue. It is an issue that is troubling to them. In making a moral balance between the question of ending a pregnancy and the right of a woman to make that choice, I come down very strongly on the right of a woman to make that choice. I recognize that there is a moral balance and a moral dilemma. It is an appropriate function for Parliament to recognize that this is an issue unlike any other in Canadian society.

Women make this decision best. The determination of the health and well being of a women, in the context of medical practice, is one in which the woman's own aspirations play a very significant role. Doctors do not ask their patients to be quiet while figuring out what their situation is. The patient is a fundamental participant in the determination of what is in the best interest of the patient. It is precisely that relationship which is respected in this bill. It is precisely the formation of that opinion which a doctor must form to practise ethical medicine which is not intruded into or looked behind in this bill.

I think it is very sad that the hon. member cannot recognize that this is a troubling issue for many Canadians. It is appropriate in the House to come up with some kind of legislative structure that will pay homage to the concerns of a great many Canadians who send people to the House of Commons and who also have a right to be represented. I believe this bill does so, but not at the expense of the security of the person of Canadian women. That is a value which we have to respect. The Supreme Court of Canada has told us that. We have done that in this bill.

I believe this bill is an honourable accommodation between two fundamentally different ways of characterizing one of the most divisive issues in Canadian society. I am sorry that the hon. member does not see, within her role as a parliamentarian, the obligation to find that common ground. If her party has aspirations ever to be government, she will find that the positions it takes on many issues do not translate well into public policy which will command the support of all Canadians. All Canadians are represented in the House, and require some acknowledgement of their position.

Mr. Friesen: Madam Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I do not mean to interrupt, but I just want to announce that there is agreement among the parties that the debate will continue on through the lunch hour.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Madam Speaker, the motions to amend the bill, which we all know failed last night, were largely an attempt to improve the bill in the interest of protecting the most defenceless, smallest, and weakest members of our society, the preborn.

Abortion kills a human being. This bill, if passed, is a licence to kill human beings. It does not matter that the human being is in its early stages of development. What matters is that this bill, if passed, will permit open season on defenceless human beings.

The dispute lies in whether it is right or wrong to kill defenceless human beings. In attempting to explain their position on the abortion issue, civil leaders frequently speak of not wanting to impose their morality on others. Let me remind them that all civil law involves the imposition of someone's moral principles on someone else, including those who do not agree with them and on those who believe they should be exempt from those rules.

• (1150)

The Criminal Code prohibits rape, theft, arson, and many other things. Obviously the rapist, the thief, and the arsonist do not subscribe to the Criminal Code's principles. However, no sensible person would suggest that these offences should be removed from the Criminal Code because they impose someone else's morality.

The civilization of a society can be judged best by how it treats its most defenceless members. Compassion dictates that we protect children in the womb and, just as importantly, provide real and substantial help to their mothers. That is what a civilized society would do. Distressed pregnant women need and deserve and have a right to the assistance required to help them give life and support to their children, as much before as after birth. This is an obligation which society must address.

Compromise on abortion means legalizing the deaths of some unborn children. We would not legalize the rape of some women or the abuse of some children. Neither is the murder of some victims acceptable.

The true test of an advanced civilization, which we purport to be, is how society treats those in the dawn of life, the margins of life, and the twilight of life. There is no place in our society for select living and select dying.

In general, should Bill C–43 become law, access to abortion will be even easier and quicker than under the 1969 law which permitted the killing of over a million and a half preborn children in the country. This bill will remove the few restrictions that the 1969 law had imposed and, regardless of how one looks at it, Bill C–43 is nothing more than abortion on demand. Anyone who thinks otherwise either has not read the bill or refuses to believe what history has taught us.

Instead of approval from a therapeutic abortion committee, the opinion of only one doctor will suffice and an abortion may be performed by anyone under his or her supervision. Instead of being restricted to hospitals, abortions may be carried out anywhere: doctors' offices, clinics, homes.

Even the pretence of needing a reason or an indication, as was previously required in requesting an abortion, has now been removed by permitting abortion for physical, mental, and psychological reasons, which may even include economic and social factors.

Bill C–43 is the worst gestational law possible in that it places absolutely no time limit on when an abortion can be performed.

Let me quote the last sentence from the 1974 book, Morality and Law in Canadian Politics:

> For a society to have many illegal abortions is no doubt a very serious situation. It will be very difficult to stop them. But to legalize abortions is to corrupt the law and, thereby, ultimately to corrupt society. It will prove far more difficult to stop that corruption than it will be to stop illegal abortions.

A child on the verge of being born is developmentally indistinguishable from a newborn infant. The mere fact that the unborn child is inside someone else's body does not imply that it is not a person. If it is not a person at this stage, presumably the reason is that it is still physically dependent on the mother. But if personhood is diminished in this way, the matter of dependence being the determinant, then the personhood of seriously ill people on life-support systems would come into serious question, as would the personhood of other seriously dependent or handicapped persons.

Surely, a woman's right to have control over her own body should not be extended to the level at which it gives the mother the right to terminate the life of someone else.

We get upset and very disturbed when we read about or watch on TV the terrible atrocities that go on almost daily in our society. The mass killings of a group of students recently in Montreal is an example, as are the needless slayings of innocent people, young and old in our society. These things prompt us to ask what is wrong in our society. Why is there this lack of respect for life in our society? Are we growing immune and becoming more accepting to these indignities that we cause one another? The answer is yes. If Bill C–43, which will allow abortion on demand, becomes law, it will be a major setback for our society which is attempting to present itself as a highly civilized nation.

In closing, what I am asking for is a new approach to something that is very old. If we take away life as a basic right, then all other rights that we would extend to the foetus are meaningless. Why not reject this proposed law in favour of a family policy that is positive? That policy would see the family elevated above every other social unit or organization as being the ultimate unit, the one of prime importance if we are going to advance as a society on the world scene.

Canada has an opportunity to show leadership. Forget about Party differences. What I am proposing is developing an attitude that will respect the family and will transcend all petty things such as party lines and differences. I think if we permit ourselves we could elevate our purposes and, for once, do something because it is right, although it may not be popular in all quarters.

Our obligation as human beings is to protect the lives of others who are in no position to protect themselves. The inconvenience that one life may cause to another is not a justifiable reason for the dominant one to discontinue the life of the innocent one.

I ask hon. members from all sides, if they are not sure what position to take, if they have not thought it through, or if for one reason or another they cannot make up their minds, to vote for life. Come down on the side of human dignity. Be a promoter of life. Defeat this bill and ask the government to come up with a new bill with its soul purpose being to protect life. To vote in favour of this bill as it is now is so final. All we are saying is give life a chance.

Mr. Chris Axworthy (Saskatoon—Clark's Crossing): Madam Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the hon. member how he thinks criminalizing abortion, making women and/or doctors criminals, will possibly deal with abortions taking place?

He will remember, prior to any criminal provisions with regard to abortion, that abortions were generally unsafe, back-street operations, essentially for poor women, and that rich women could always find appropriate doctors to perform abortions, here or elsewhere.

• (1200)

Perhaps the hon. member could deal with that one point. If the point is that we should try to reduce the number of abortions, how does he feel that criminalizing the matter would achieve that, bearing in mind that past practice and history would not substantiate any suggestion that that would happen?

Would there not be a greater likelihood of success in reducing the number of abortions if we addressed concerns such as child care, effective education and effective contraception, and essentially give women an opportunity to see their way clear to raising children in other than poverty? He knows as well as we do that one in four Canadian children is raised in poverty.

The main point is, how does he feel criminalizing women and criminalizing doctors could possibly deal with the question of abortion?

Mr. Jordan: Well, it is not a question of criminalizing women and doctors. Members of his party seem to be presenting themselves as the social conscience of the world and not seeing that the basic need is to create conditions in this country—we are a rich country—in which those conditions would not exist that require abortions.

If it is through poverty, let us correct that. If it is through poor housing, let us correct that. If it is through lack of education, let us correct that. But if we are going to start with the assumption that this is going to go on and we have no intention of trying to jar society into elevating its sights at all, how are we ever going to address the problem?

I know abortions have gone on and probably will continue to go on. But I do not think that should be the base from which to start to improve conditions under which abortions go on. Let us correct the social conditions that create the need for women to have abortions in this country.

Mr. Vic Althouse (Mackenzie): Madam Speaker, I am sure no one in the House would disagree with the sentiment presented by the hon. member for Leeds—Grenville that society should be doing more for families and for children.

I remind him that in the last 20 or 30 years we have had deindexing of family allowances, a reduction in the proportion of family income that is free from income tax for raising children, and an inadequacy of social services for the increasing number of single-parent families, most of them headed by women. Society has failed miserably. Governments all across the country, federal and provincial, and the two main parties that have been in power federally have not addressed that. In fact, they have exacerbated the problem.

Can he perhaps explain why there has not been emphasis on correcting those problems, rather than attempting to portray the difficulty, so-called, as one of being a moral issue when there are social and economic factors to it? Among those economic and social factors, the experiment that has existed for the last year and a half or two years where women and doctors were free to make these decisions does seem to indicate that they were conducting themselves appropriately.

I wonder if he could tie those two factors together and explain why?

Madam Deputy Speaker: A very short comment from the hon. member. The time has expired.

Mr. Jordan: If you are asking me to defend the record of previous governments, regardless of politics, I would not be prepared to do that. There have been some horrible examples, perhaps with good intentions, of trying to create the social climate that I am proposing should be created, so that women are not put in a position where their only alternative, seemingly, is to have an abortion. I think that indicates a preposterous kind of economy. We have a great economy in this country, if we wanted to direct it in the right fashion. There seems to be a tendency to have all kinds of money for certain programs but the one that is most basic, the protection of human life, seems to be the one that gives way whenever there is any kind of a crunch.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. The time for questions and comments has now expired. Resuming debate with the hon. member for York West.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, as everyone knows, the question of abortion is a very emotional and complex one, one that is so fundamental that it continues to occupy this House and this country.

It is complex and fundamental because it incorporates a number of different overtones, whether they be moral, religious, social, or philosophical. It also incorporates a debate between individual rights, in this case of women, versus collective rights of a family, of a society. Finally, important among those elements are the rights of the unborn.

This is the third occasion I have participated in a debate on the matter of abortion. I spoke in the second reading debate of Bill C–43 a few months ago. In the last Parliament, I also participated in the debate on the number of various options offered to the House of Commons. At that time, I certainly was in favour of the pro–life option.

I wish to say again today that there are three exceptions that I feel very strongly about that were not incorporated in the official pro–life option; where an abortion was performed if the life of the mother was seriously endangered, where the pregnancy was the result of a rape, and where the pregnancy was the result of incest.

I realize that in some of those cases the numbers are few, but nonetheless we have to legislate for all possible and potential possibilities. Therefore, in my judgment, those exceptions are certainly real and must be addressed. I feel very passionately about them.

I also voted against second reading of Bill C–43, mainly because the legislation as drafted is essentially abortion on demand. The law would make it very easy and very open–ended for most women in this country to obtain an abortion; open–ended for any health reason, which is loosely defined; open–ended for any medical practitioner to approve the abortion; open–ended for ending a pregnancy at any stage. The fundamental question that I asked myself during second reading and I continue to ask myself now at third reading is, what is the difference between this piece of legislation, and abortion on demand, or no legislation at all?

There was no attempt to define the rights of the unborn, the rights of the foetus, which is a very central dilemma that we as a Parliament in 1990 are supposed to resolve. Previous Supreme Court decisions challenged Parliament to come to grips with the question of the rights of the unborn, and at what point in the pregnancy do we have the right as a society and as legislators to protect that life.

• (1210)

It seems to me that this piece of legislation skated away completely from that challenge, from toiling with that dilemma so that we can somehow as legislators and as a country come to grips with that very moral question.

What alternative or encouragement through legislation or programs did this Parliament and government provide or offer those women in Canada who may have wanted to stop their pregnancy through abortion?

Are we to accept that an unwanted pregnancy must equal an unwanted child? I am not prepared to accept that. Must we accept that somehow an unwanted pregnancy must hurt a woman or stop her career or penalize her because there are no structural elements or programs to allow for that option? I do not buy that.

Are we to say that we should not be encouraging the gift of adoption for those who unfortunately cannot have children and who would love to know the feeling of parenthood but who have to go through red tape abroad in order to bring in an adopted child because there are not enough children in this country to adopt. I am not prepared to accept that.

Those were some of the challenges for me that were inherent in the abortion debate. People are looking to this Chamber and this government to resolve these dilemmas. We chose to exclude the most difficult variables and deal with those which are perhaps easier to deal with at this particular junction.

I voted against the bill at second reading because in my opinion and in the opinion of many constituents of York West, whom I have the honour to represent, the legislation was bad legislation. I thought that it was so seriously flawed that it had to be sent to committee so that it could be amended to make it a better bill.

I voted against this bill because the government signalled very early in the debate that it would not permit any amendments, that not one comma would be changed. Therefore, I was not prepared to put my feelings aside in the hope that a committee would come up with amendments that would somehow correct the flaws and right the wrongs.

There were many individuals who wanted the pro–life option who were prepared to vote in favour at second reading in the hope that some amendments would see the light of day. We found out that the committee experience was a different story. We also found out last night about that story when all amendments were defeated, that the so–called free vote of my friends and colleagues on the opposite side was a three–line whip to ensure that all members on the government side supported the piece of legislation unchanged.

In my judgment, the defeat of those amendments was the defeat of any possibility that we would have legislation in this country that would try, on the one hand, to protect the unborn and, on the other hand, encourage alternatives to the abortion option and facilitate this option by supporting women in Canada with mechanisms that would enable them to continue with the pregnancy without any cost to their personal being.

Therefore, I return to the principle of my debate at second reading. What is the difference between this piece of legislation and abortion on demand? What is the message that we are transmitting through this bill to a society at large, above and beyond the elements surrounding the question of abortion?

I believe that this bill has failed the country badly. I believe that this piece of legislation is morally bankrupt and does not speak to or embrace any set of values that a civilized society with concern for the multifaceted elements of this debate should have had and obtained. That is the first message it sends out.

Second, I believe that this debate has failed in addressing the inherent variables that were at play in the question of abortion. We chose to exclude many variables that are pressing and that we think have gone away or have been resolved, because we chose to ignore them.

Third, this debate and this legislation have failed to come to grips with the rights of the unborn. For me, this bill was not worth supporting at second reading. It is not worth supporting at third reading. Instead of participating in a debate over a piece of legislation that has very little substance and is more of charade than anything else, I believe that parliament should have come to grips with a piece of legislation that should have had the courage and the integrity to address all the elements in the abortion debate; not some, but all of them.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Madam Speaker, yesterday I spoke against the very restrictive and punitive criminal measures that were presented in this House by men who in my view wanted to punish severely women and doctors who have performed abortions.

As I listened to the debate I became more and more upset. It was very difficult to try and be sensitive to why members were feeling this way and to respect their different views, which are very different from my own. I became very upset and very angry, because it seemed to me that the principles and the policies that were advocated in these extreme amendments were akin to the dreadful situation that has existed for some time in Romania, which we learned about recently, where women have been treated as handmaidens of the state and forced to become baby factories. That is not a nice term, but that is in fact what was happening. Unwanted children, as a result, were neglected and abused. We remember those frightening and sickening pictures on TV of children in institutions where they were left to die or vegetate.

I am sure that many women who would not go through with pregnancies, as the state required, died or were permanently damaged from illegal or self-induced abortions. It was really sickening.

I was extremely disappointed in many of the Liberal MPs, particularly, for supporting these amendments. I expected more to come from the other party. The majority of people who stood up time after time to support those amendments were from the Liberal caucus. I was sickened that they and Canadians who support this position would support such punitive measures in the name of life. I will not pursue this point, because I am sure we have different views on it, but that is the way it seemed to me and it was very sickening and depressing. Fortunately all these amendments were voted down by members from all parties.

I was particularly moved by the remarks of the member from the eastern Arctic. He was telling us about the culture and the caring of the Inuit communities where children belong to the whole community, where pregnant women are treated with great care and the children can be adopted in a very positive way by other people and still share relationships with their natural parents. This was a very moving statement and an example of the kind of caring community I wish we could somehow recreate in our southern urban communities. We have much to learn.

Today I want to try to be more positive in speaking on this final third reading of Bill C-43. Last November 22, I outlined my objections to the bill in considerable detail and tried to present positive alternatives we in this party see which would allow personal reproductive choice, would help to prevent unwanted pregnancies, and would provide support for parents and children in a caring society.

I want to summarize once again at third reading why we in the New Democratic Party oppose Bill C-43 and why I personally will be voting against it.

First, there is no need for a bill that will recriminalize abortion. It just is not needed, and the last two years have shown this. We know that this bill attempts to be a compromise. Some would like it to have tougher sanctions, but the sanctions under the Criminal Code affect both women and doctors, and this really is not necessary.

If we look at what has happened since the Supreme Court decision in the Morgentaler case over two years ago which struck down the previous abortion law, women and doctors have been left to make their own private decisions concerning abortion. I think this has worked well. There is no evidence that this has been abused or irresponsible.

The main concern that continues is that access is limited across the country, particularly in the Atlantic region and in rural and remote areas. This bill will not extend that access. In fact it will further restrict access, and I will come back to this point later.

The rate of abortions has not risen over the last two years. The kind of openness and the privacy of this access to abortion mean that a whole range of services has been offered in clinics such as Every Woman's Clinic in Vancouver, which has offered a first-rate service despite the protests that continue outside its doors. Hospitals also have been able to proceed without those cumbersome and delaying committees that formerly were a legal necessity.

Second, as we have said over and over again women can be trusted. As we have said over and over again—and the women of Canada have said it— this is insulting to women. It says that the state will tell a woman what she should do about plans for her own reproductive choice and if and when she should have a family despite what her conditions and her situation are.

Abortion is not used as a method of birth control. I have not personally met anyone who is in favour of abortion. I must say that I really wish, when referring to those who support the so-called choice position, people would not interpret this as a pro-abortion position. It certainly is not.

If a woman has to make a very difficult decision on the question of abortion she should be able to speak with counsellors, as she does now under the present situation, and consult with her doctor, but only she can and should have the right to make the final decision. After all, she is the one who has to care for the child, often without the support of a partner, and only she knows the real situation in her case.

No law can make this decision for her. This is what this bill is doing. It is saying that the state will interfere, that the state will impose the kind of situation, and that the state will also have criminal sanctions against women and doctors.

As the minister herself said this morning, women and doctors are responsible. Eighty-nine per cent of abortions are in the first 12 weeks of pregnancy. Both women and doctors know, if the difficult decision of having an abortion is what they conclude is right for them, that this must be done long before a foetus is viable.

I should not have to say this, but I want to stress that women do have rights in this country. We are not in Romania. We no longer are chattels of men or chattels of the state. Surely everyone in the House appreciates this fact.

Women do not have to be told what to do. They can make their own decisions, particularly on this all-important decision of child birth and pregnancy.

Our rights have been spelled out in the Charter of Rights and Freedoms. This was recognized by the Supreme Court when it declared that the former abortion law was unconstitutional. As the minister said this morning, it was judged to be "a violation of the security of the person and of fundamental justice". The courts in the Daigle case also recognized a woman's right to make her own independent decision about abortion and denied the injunction of a boyfriend who tried to prevent this for very questionable reasons.

An abortion should be treated as a private medical procedure, as it is now, performed by qualified persons under medical regulations in safe conditions. Access will be restricted by this bill. We know that anxious, desperate women who may fear that they will not qualify for an abortion under the restrictions imposed, or who sense that their doctors are reluctant to get into any legal complications under Bill C-43, will find another way of having an abortion. It is not going to stop abortions.

History shows repeatedly that legal prohibitions and criminal sanctions do not stop unwanted pregnancies or abortions that result. The experience in Italy showed that when it had the toughest possible law, there was the highest incidence of abortions and deaths. Since there has been a more liberal policy, this rate has gone down.

Undoubtedly this bill will result in an increase in self-induced abortions and illegal back street abortions which are so dangerous, as well as being illegal.

Doctors also can be trusted. Physicians do not need to have punitive criminal laws to overrule their medical judgments. They operate under professional ethics and under provincial regulations. Good doctors will take cognizance of the total person: her needs and desires as well as health factors, her family, and her economic situation. He or she will respect the right of a woman patient to make her own decision as to whether or not to terminate a pregnancy.

This bill imposes a whole new situation. I am sure it will intimidate doctors. We already had an indication of this point. The Canadian Medical Association is very much opposed to recriminalizing abortion. It has stated the following:

> Our figures indicate that approximately 800 of the 45,000 physicians in the CMA perform abortions. Approximately 325 perform the majority of abortions. We understand that a significant majority of physicians providing abortion services would seriously re-evaluate their position.

• (1230)

That is, if this law is imposed. It is quite easy to understand why. As I said, the bill will intimidate doctors. It limits legal abortions to only situations where the continuation of a pregnancy would threaten a woman's physical, psychological or mental health.

There were some medical doctors who said in the House yesterday that they want to have "health" interpreted very, very narrowly rather than having the UN definition of it. I am sure that if they are faced with a possible legal challenge they are not going to be willing to take a risk. It is going to be very difficult for clinics to hire physicians if they are going to be threatened with two years in prison and costly legal charges.

This means that access for women will be seriously limited. The CMA has pointed this out. It is also grossly unfair and insulting to doctors who can make their own judgment on this matter. Doctors prefer to work under medical rather than criminal legislation and regulations.

I would now like to talk about alternatives to Bill C-43. As I have said many times, we must lessen the need for abortions. I know of no one who favours abortion. It is far preferable to prevent unwanted pregnancies. Why has the federal government then not addressed this question as its priority? Why have we had to spend so much time on this negative, punitive bill and all the public furore it has created when the need for abortions could be done away with if the government would only put an emphasis on finding that solution?

It is extremely important, first, that men take a much greater responsibility for birth control and family planning. We have to change our culture in this respect. We must promote male contraceptives. Men have to see and accept that it is their responsibility. They contribute to the need for abortions and they must prevent unwanted pregnancies. They cannot just leave it to women, which seems to have been the old way of thinking in so much of our culture.

Young people, from childhood, must learn healthy sexuality. As adolescents they must have open discussions of sexual relations, pregnancies and contraception, and it should be done in schools openly. We need youth clinics and peer group discussions. We do not want contraception to be associated only with the prevention of AIDS, although this is very important. It should also be taught as part of a positive family planning and family life education program.

This is why the government must provide increased funding for school programs, for public education, and particularly for public media such as TV. It must especially reinstate and increase funding for planned parenthood associations. They have expertise in all of these areas. They are not just going to go out and promote abortions as one alternative.

Abortion is a symptom of our societal inadequacies. It is really a sign of our failure. This bill is the extreme negative way of dealing with this failure. We need prevention, but we also need many more supports for both fathers and mothers and for their children. Children and parents need programs to ensure their economic and emotional security. They must have this kind of security to plan for, bear and raise children. This is not always easy in the very competitive, costly society in which we live.

We must end child poverty and offer many more supports and opportunities for single mothers or fathers. This should be a government priority for funding and a first priority in our social policy.

It is deplorable and unconscionable that this government continues to ignore the urgent need for quality, affordable child care despite two task forces, constant presentations from witnesses across this country and repeated promises to introduce a national child care program. This is unconscionable.

We also need to extend parental leave and encourage family benefits for working parents. Employers should contribute to this and the government could start as a federal employer, another thing it is neglecting.

Immigrant parents must have language instruction and support programs to encourage their easy settlement into a new country, particularly women who often do not get the same opportunities because they are rearing children. They need opportunities for their children, including child care, as well as employment for themselves.

There are many things that we need to do to achieve a caring society, a society where people are valued and respected, where there is opportunity for people—women, men, young people and children—to develop their full potential, where they are allowed to determine their own future and make their own choices, not on only this question of reproductive choice but on all matters that affect them. We particularly want a society where children are wanted and loved, where they are nourished by parents or by alternate parents, by extended families and by a caring community.

I am pessimistic but I hope that there will be support to defeat this bill and I hope that the government and all of us in this House and across the country will work for these goals.

Mr. Sergio Marchi (York West): Madam Speaker, the member and I share the wish that the bill be defeated, although for very opposite and polarized views. I respect the member's full right to explain her views.

In a previous Supreme Court ruling one of the female judges on the bench wrote, in her own personal decision, that Parliament should be debating and challenging itself to come to grips with the rights of the unborn. She said in her decision that she felt that at some point in the pregnancy the right of the foetus becomes paramount.

I know that the hon. member has spoken at great length about the paramountcy of trying to cope with the woman in this debate of pregnancy and abortion, as we should. However, could she perhaps cast her mind on that decision written by a woman on our Supreme Court bench and explain to Parliament her opinion of the right of the foetus, at some stage in the pregnancy, becoming paramount over some other factors.

Ms. Mitchell: Madam Speaker, I think that is a very important question. Of course, the member is referring to the comments of Justice Bertha Wilson. If he read the full judgment he would know that it was this judge who spoke so strongly on the question of the rights of women and the need for them to not be controlled by the state.

I do not recall that Bertha Wilson used the term "should". If I recall correctly, she raised the question in a very thoughtful and important way on the rights of women, and she certainly gave that paramountcy in the early stages of pregnancy, and also raised the question of rights of the foetus. She talked about the possibility of time limits.

Let us not forget that that was two years ago. I would be very interested in what her position might be today having consideration for what has happened over the last two years. She did not direct Parliament at all, she offered that as one question for Parliament to struggle with.

• (1240)

I would point out to the member that the minister said this morning, and our figures would certainly substantiate this, that 89 per cent of abortions are done in the first 12 weeks of pregnancy. That is certainly the period when Bertha Wilson herself said that the woman's rights should be predominant. And although you cannot put an exact timing on it, it could perhaps go up to 20 weeks.

I would think that those cases where the abortion is done a little later would predominantly be cases of teenagers, adolescents. I have known young children, actually, in their early teens, who were not aware that they were pregnant until later. That is another very deep concern that we have.

I cannot speak for Bertha Wilson, but I do not think she suggested that Bill C–43 was the answer to the balance of rights.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, I listened to and have read the comments the member for Vancouver East made yesterday on the report stage of the bill. I have to say that I am a little disturbed at what I believe to be the unnecessary, overt partisanship that she exhibited in her remarks today. Members on this side of the House have been freed to vote as they see fit on this legislation. I have carefully followed the debate in the House through all stages and have found that there has been a marked absence of partisanship on this issue. It is a fundamental issue and many members feel very differently on it. I think the NDP caucus is voting as a party on this and that is fine, as long as those members want to do that.

Members on our side have varying views on this very fundamental issue. Yet the member started her remarks today by taking a wide partisan swipe at some people who voted for amendments, saying that she was absolutely sickened by that. I am on a particular side of this debate, but I would hope the hon. member would read my comments on second reading of the bill, because I tried my very best, as I think most people did, to be conscious and respectful of points of view other than the ones that we individually hold. I have listened to her position, which she has articulated very carefully and very well.

I am concerned with some of the comments that she made today and, in particular, comments that she made yesterday about those members of the House who were supporting or putting forward some of the amendments which were debated yesterday. She said:

> It is sickening to know that there are people in Canada, and members in this House, who support these resolutions, who want to impose the kind of inhumane policies that we saw in Romania where women were forced to have babies and these babies were neglected and abused.

That is a very strong comment which perhaps is unwarranted, knowing the spirit and the complexity of the debate that is at hand. I would certainly hope that no one who holds a point of view contrary to hers would be so loose in condemnation of her point of view.

I would like the hon. member to comment on that. I would hope that she did not mean to put that particular light on all members who have a different point of view than her on the resolutions that we voted on last night.

Ms. Mitchell: Madam Speaker, the member raises two points. First, he says that I am partisan. I think that is probably true for a reason, although I hope I am expressing this as a person who cares very deeply for the women of Canada and the whole question of abortion.

The reason I mentioned that I was surprised that so many Liberals took what I consider to be an anti-choice stance—I do not like to use those terms but I guess everybody is using them—is that the member's party is aspiring to be the next government. So are we, of course. I think it is very important that the women and men of Canada know what the Liberal Party position is on abortion, and I take it that there is no position. There is a chance, God forbid, that the Liberals will be in government in the not-too-distant future. If this happens, what is going to be the policy then? What kind of criminal sanctions are we going to have at that time? Can women expect that the new government will be more progressive than the present government and will rescind this recriminalization of abortion that is represented in this bill? I do not think so. I think it is very important that people in Canada know what they are in for.

I do apologize to my colleagues if I personally insulted them yesterday. I was feeling very, very upset, to tell the truth. I do not like to criticize people personally because they have the right to their views, even though I get very upset at what those views are.

I would like to pay tribute to a number of the Conservative members, women in particular. In the debate on this issue a year or two ago, some of them spoke so movingly. Several of them said they were Catholics and they would never have an abortion, as many of us would not. But they felt so strongly for women who were in very desperate situations and had no alternatives. They respected their decision and their right to make that decision. I wanted to mention that because I know there are some very caring people on all sides of the House, but I was very disappointed that there were not more of them in the Liberal caucus.

I do respect peoples' right to have a different opinion, even though I do not respect those opinions that are, in my view, anti-women. I would urge members to listen again to what the member from the eastern Arctic said yesterday. To paraphrase it, he said: "If men were able to bear children, I do not think we would have this bill".

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sorry, I must interrupt the hon. member. The time for question and comments has now expired. Resuming debate, the hon. member for Surrey—White Rock.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Surrey—White Rock): Madam Speaker, I have been participating in debate on this issue for about 15 years.

I want to begin by thanking the Prime Minister for exercising leadership on this issue last summer when the country was torn by what we saw on television. He determined then that the government would introduce legislation and that Parliament would make a decision. I want to thank him personally for taking that leadership and exercising that initiative.

In these past 15 years there has been an emotional tug of war in our land between what is right and what is wrong. As that emotional tug of war developed, the confusion increased as to what is right and what is wrong. It brings to mind the famous lines by that great Irish poet, W.B. Yates, who said, about 55 years ago:

> Turning and turning in the widening gyre
> The falcon cannot hear the falconer;
> Things fall apart; the centre cannot hold;
> Mere anarchy is loosed upon the world,
> The blood-dimmed tide is loosed, and everywhere
> The ceremony of innocence is drowned;
> The best lack all conviction, while the worst
> Are full of passionate intensity.

• (1250)

Yates was being very prophetic about the days in which we are living, particularly on this issue.

We are living in a period of a redefinition of norms. All through civilization there has been an aspiration for freedom which has been the norm. But that freedom was always integrated with our relationship with our fellow human beings. It was never seen as individual islands of freedom, but rather communities of freedom. Today we are facing a redefinition of that term and it is becoming increasingly individualistic, narcissistic, and egocentric, as though the rights of the other person do not matter as long as my own freedom is preserved.

There has always been a norm about the sanctity of life. Strangely enough now, with the increasing knowledge that science has given us, there are other views regarding the sanctity of life. Is it not strange that the planet and all of life on the planet now is sacred and we are doing everything we can to preserve the planet, but we want to take the opposite view when it comes to the life of the unborn? It is strangely ironic.

In Vancouver last winter there was a bizarre theatre. A young man was going to drop a stone or brick on a rat and there was public outrage about that demonstration in the name of art, as there should have been. But at the same time, bystanders were asked if they were pro-life and they said no. You would almost believe, as one writer put it, that society was pro-rat but not pro-life. We are destroying that norm.

We are seeing also the disintegration of the moral leadership of institutional influence. In the midst of the redefinition and a growing moral confusion about what is right, we need a reference point. Since the institutions are not fulfilling their functions in instructing us on what is right and wrong, as they did at one time, we do need moral reference points and that has seemingly been left to the law.

We need the law. Without that, society cannot function in a coherent way. For this coherence we must have dependable responses to one another. We must be able to depend on our responses to each other.

I would say that the first universal principle accepted around the world is the preservation of life. That is a universal principle accepted in all societies. There is a dependable group response to that principle everywhere. Societies have as their first goal the preservation of life, but this is now clashing with personal agendas.

We heard in committee that 95 per cent of abortions are performed for socioeconomic reasons. Regardless of how that is defined, it comes down to personal agendas clashing with the right of the unborn and the defenceless to life. To preserve self-will we want to dispose of a defenceless life. But to do that and still preserve our conscience, we have to rewrite the definitions.

Rather than talk of the unborn child, we want to talk about a foetus. That becomes a little less personal and easier to deal with. We can destroy the norm that way. We do not want to talk about an abortion. We want to talk about terminating a pregnancy, or evacuating the womb. That becomes less personal, less offensive, easier to handle.

The whole focus and goal is to disintegrate the norms that have governed our society throughout the centuries. It is the self-will and the personal agendas that we have established that are doing this. Yet, we still want to cling to the notion that there is respect for life at any stage.

The second erosion is the institutional influence on moral issues. There is a confusion of positions in spite of empirical evidence regarding all this. Science is telling us so much about life.

We had before the committee a world renowned geneticist who said the following:

> Using Jeffrey's method, we can determine the bar code for each human being. It has been shown that there is a unique code for each human being. One person cannot be mistaken for another. From the moment of fertilization, every human being has his or her unique bar code. Using another method, the in-vitro polymerization of DNA, we can study the bar code in a single cell.
>
> We thus have an experiment that proves that each human being is unique and therefore irreplaceable, from the moment of fertilization on. The only difference between the genetic bar code which defines each of us and the bar codes we find in the supermarket is that when we run the item over the optical character reader in the supermarket, the bar code tells the computer how much the item costs. The genetic bar code does not show the price of a human being. Science tells us that each human being is priceless.

That is what science tells us.

But then we heard from a woman from one of the leading churches in our society in Canada, with one of the largest denominations, who said:

> I did not miscarry a person, I miscarried something that looked rather like a mass of liver. That sounds crude, but it was not a person physically, and all women know in their hearts that this is so.

On the one hand, science gives us the empirical evidence that every person is unique and priceless. On the other hand, a woman from the church says it looks rather like a mass of liver.

The geneticist went on to say:

> I know that the embryo, before becoming a foetus, was already that same being, and I know that you and I too were once 2.5-cm beings in our mothers' wombs.
> In other words, what we have learned from genetics and embryology, is that the Tom Thumb story, the story of the man who is no taller than a thumb, is not an old wives' tale. It is the truth. It is a very factual story—it is biologically absurd to imagine that you can measure human dignity by the size of the body. I have never measured the dignity of a human being in kilograms or centimetres. Only one parameter can be used for measurement: is it a member of our species—and then it deserves respect whatever its colour, size or state of health—or is it a member of another species? I do not hold the same respect for a mouse foetus as for a human foetus.

That is what science tells us.

But the Canadian Medical Association, which ought to be protecting our values, stated that "the CMA is in fact in the process of preparing a position paper on the status of the human foetus".

The institutions that ought to be protecting and educating our values are no longer the guidance mechanisms we need to make moral decisions. When we cannot trust the institutions, then there has to be a law that gives us some guidance as to the ultimate—the furthest we can go in our behaviour. We do not have to go that far, but there has to be a guidance mechanism.

Bill C–43 is an attempt to provide that. Basically, Bill C–43 says that life is important, it is sacred from the beginning, and it deserves protection. The Supreme Court has said that there are justifiable limits of choice and that society has a legitimate interest in the welfare of the defenceless or the foetus.

But there are exceptions, and here is where the avenue of freedom lies in the bill. I want to say this with some caution. This is important. The ability to choose is important in our society if we want to be unique beings. It is our ability to choose that defines our uniqueness. The freedom of choice determines moral growth or moral deterioration. If we remove the freedom, we begin to deteriorate. Choice must be an integral part of our society.

The exceptions and the definitions of "health" introduce an incredible risk in this legislation because they introduce the freedom to choose, to do right or to do wrong. The fact is people do make wrong choices. I am appalled at the wrong choices we are able to make. When we do make wrong choices, we must know that we are making wrong choices. Unless there is a law, we have no way of measuring whether we are right or wrong. This is the moral morass in which society will be if we have no law. The ten commandments were given to prevent people from doing wrong, to let them know when they were in danger of doing wrong.

The failure of the so-called pro-choice concept is not in the freedom to choose—and we respect the freedom to choose—but it is their desire to choose in the absence of any reference points of what is right or wrong. There is nothing to guide them, they want no law, so people will never know if they are doing right or wrong.

We are not talking about the arrangement of potted plants, or how to arrange the books on a shelf, or whether to get rid of a used car or not, we are talking about human life. We have to know beyond a shadow of a doubt, are we right or are we wrong? In the absence of moral guidance systems, which have deteriorated over the years, we need a law. It is not good enough to say, "If this law is not perfect then there should be no law". We need a law. That law has to define the value of human life.

There will be some patients who will exaggerate their health problems in order to get an abortion. There will be some doctors who will exaggerate the diagnosis in order to provide an abortion. I think that that is a fact of life. We cannot have the freedom to do right without the opportunity to do wrong. That is the risk in our society. The alternative is a state sponsored morality. You cannot have the option to do right without the opportunity of doing wrong.

Bill C–43 sets the standard around which people must make conscious decisions and deliberate choices about what is right and wrong. What the bill does is establish the value of human life from the very beginning. Abortion, it says, is wrong. It is a criminal offence to provide an abortion because human life is important from the beginning. That is what Bill C–43 does.

At the same time, we cannot stop there because the law is not enough to give us a moral guidance system. We have to rebuild the laws of institutions that once gave us that guidance. I think churches have to re-examine their instructional system to teach people how to come to grips with right and wrong. The Canadian Medical Association and all other institutions, such as universities, must have a code of ethics consistent with the universal norms that say life is sacred in all forms and at all times. We have to get these institutions to rebuild a moral framework which will help people to make individual choices that will enhance their own personal morality.

The law sets the limits of morality that should control our behaviour. It should control that behaviour long before we reach those limits. Therefore, we must rebuild a moral support system superior to the law that will help us all to be more complete human beings capable of making moral decisions.

Bill C–43 is a balance, which establishes the right of the human being to exist from the moment of conception, and tries to introduce and reintroduce the notion that we all have a right to be. People must make a choice about their own integrity and morality based upon a code of ethics that has a universal norm built into it. Then we can go on to be the kind of people we ought to be.

We have lived in the kind of a world that W. B. Years prophesized would come, that there would be anarchy and,

> The blood–dimmed tide is loosed, and everywhere
> The ceremony of innocence is drowned;
> The best lack all conviction, while the worst
> Are full of passionate intensity.

It is not acceptable that Canadians should tolerate 80,000 abortions a year. It is not acceptable that we should have such disdain for human life. It is not acceptable that we should reduce human sexuality to a mere biological coupling without any coherent relationship between the two parties. It is not acceptable to live that way.

This bill is the threshold of what we can do as a society in order to build the kind of moral framework that will help our people to decide the moral issues that influence their lives in a way that is acceptable to all and preserves the right of freedom.

[Translation]

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): Mr. Speaker. I want to take this opportunity to congratulate you on your appointment as Assistant Deputy Chairman of Committees of the Whole, and I hope you will be able to perform these duties for several years or at least several months.

The bill on abortion before the House today is not an easy subject to discuss, and it is with some trepidation that I rise in the House to take part in this debate.

[English]

Mr. Speaker, the options in this debate have been made clear over many months. The bill we are discussing in this debate has been before the House for some time and many of us, as members of Parliament, have had the opportunity to express our views on this issue over an extended period.

In June, 1988, shortly after my nomination as a candidate in the election for this House, I was asked for my views on this very important subject. I gave those views forthrightly, openly and honestly whenever I was asked, notwithstanding my knowledge that the views would be unpopular in some quarters throughout my riding and indeed throughout the country where they were promulgated. Nevertheless, I felt it was my duty as a candidate to inform the electorate of Kingston and the Islands in particular, as to what I thought on this issue and I did so.

Bill C–43, now before the House, comes close to what I said would be my preferred legislation. It is not the same, it is not identical, and in a way it is a disappointment, but nevertheless the bill is close to what I thought was a reasonable attempt to deal with an issue that is extremely difficult.

I indicated to the press in my riding shortly after the bill was introduced last November that I would support this legislation through all stages, assuming that no amendments could be made. I indicated I would seek amendments to the bill. These amendments have been considered and rejected by the House and, somewhat as expected, this bill has come through this debate at third reading without any amendments. The choice that we face today as members of Parliament is to accept or reject this particular bill that is now before us and no other.

I have indicated in discussing my views on this subject—I have indicated this freely in my riding when asked—that my opinions are shaped by my experience as a lawyer. They are shaped by my training in legal matters and in jurisprudence. I want to say at the outset that while that training has shaped my views on the subject, it is not the sole criterion by which I weigh the issue of abortion and on which I made my decision to support this particular legislation.

• (1310)

The bill is a balancing of rights. That is really what this debate on abortion is all about. We are balancing on the one hand the rights of a woman and on the other hand the rights of an unborn child or a foetus.

I want to state at the outset that I firmly believe in the rights of the woman. I think that the question of her right to make a decision or a conscious choice is paramount and must remain paramount.

I know there is disagreement on this view with some of my colleagues and the public, but the woman who is living and breathing deserves all the protection the law can afford. I believe this bill does exactly that. I believe the Supreme Court cases, Morgentaler and others, have reflected this, but the foetus also has rights. Those rights are undefined in our law. The bill does not define those rights but does give some protection.

The rights of the foetus must increase as the birth date gets closer. I believe the bill recognizes that, perhaps not to the extent that many would prefer, and perhaps not to the extent that I would prefer, but it does recognize it in that it requires a doctor's consent for an abortion. The limited value of that consent in the early stages of pregnancy is well recognized.

Members of this House who have spoken eloquently on the pro-life side said that this bill gives away everything. In the early stages, it may. The pro-choice groups on the other hand argue that it does not. Perhaps it does not. We will have to wait to see how judicial interpretation treats it. My thinking on this is influenced by the fact that under the old law, which contained similar words to this bill, there was not a single successful prosecution of a medical doctor for performing abortions under the law.

Given that, and given the extended definition contained in Bill C-43, it is very unlikely that a physician would be convicted of an offence under this act without having carried on in a way that is grossly outrageous and in apparent violation of the idea of sanctity of human life, both of the mother and of the unborn child or foetus.

The bill has been before the House since November last year. It was considered at second reading and debated extensively. It was considered in committee with many amendments put forward and defeated. I am sorry that our rules prevented some of those amendments from being voted on last night when we voted on the other amendments debated at that time.

Last evening there were eleven separate votes on different amendments before this House. Every single one of the amendments was defeated. Those amendments presented a range. They were strong pro-life amendments, for the most part, and one was a very strong pro-choice amendment from the other side. Every one of them was defeated by a substantial margin.

As a result of those votes last evening and the activities of the committee, no other bill could pass this House of Commons except Bill C-43. I do not believe it is possible for a majority of members of this place to pass any other bill. If that is so, what is our responsibility as members of the House of Commons? In my view, we are elected as members to represent the views of our constituents, yes; to represent our country, yes; and to make decisions on issues such as this one. Parliament must speak on this issue. We cannot leave this matter of abortion, and the great debate that rages in our country on this issue, to the courts. As members of a legislature, we have an obligation to speak on this issue.

Parliament does not speak just through speeches. Each of us can be here and make our own speech and say we are representing or making our views known in Parliament, whatever they may be. Parliament speaks through legislation, through pieces of legislation or resolutions that are adopted in this House.

We have before us a bill which in my view represents the collective will of the majority of the members of this place. This is the way we deal with the public and this is the way we speak for the public: by enacting legislation and by dealing with resolutions. This bill, as it does in representing that majority view, is the way in which we as a Parliament ought to address the Canadian pubic on this issue.

In my view Bill C-43 does that. It says to the Canadian public that we regard abortion as something very important. We feel that there should be some protection afforded to both women who may be pregnant and to unborn children. Therefore we will put a law in place that will require that a woman who wishes to have an abortion will obtain the consent of a physician before obtaining that abortion. That is all that is required in this law. It allows the physician to grant the abortion whenever he feels the physical, mental, or emotional health of the woman is threatened. That is included and any other health matter will also be included. It says: "when the health or life of the mother is threatened".

In other words, it is a very wide discretion given to physicians in Canada to make those decisions in consultation with the woman who comes to them for an abortion. I believe that is a reasonable and fair compromise, given the very significantly different views held on this issue by members of the House.

This may not be the first choice for any member of the House. It may be a second choice for most of us, but I say that as members of Parliament we have an obligation. Sure, we have difficulty. Sure, our constituents have very widely held views and very sincerely held views on this issue. I expect that very few members have been written to, demonstrated against or heard from so many constituents by telephone or otherwise as I have on this issue.

I recognize there is a divergence of view, but surely as legislators, as members of Parliament, we have to act together and make a decision. Having voted down all other options and having come up with a bill which in its evident simplicity is and which is very short, I think we have an obligation now to say: "All right, we cannot do anything else. The only thing we can do is adopt this bill".

I say to hon. members that although it may not be their first choice—and it is not mine—we have to look at it and ask: "Is there anything else we can do? Is this not a reasonable thing to do, to balance the rights that we all wish to protect in Canada and to give some recognition to the competing interests reflected in this great debate that has gone on for so many years in Canada?" It is time to bring the debate to an end, to pass this legislation, and to see how the courts interpret it.

[Translation]

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry I did not arrive sooner to hear the speech by the hon. member for Kingston and the Islands who, I feel, has shown considerable leadership today by recognizing the fact that the abortion issue is controversial, complex and divisive, and that pro-choice and pro-life supporters are miles apart on this issue, so much so, that—and the hon. member is absolutely right—it is incumbent upon Parliament to take a serious look at this question, because Canadians expect us to produce a bill that seeks to reconcile these two views.

I want to ask the hon. member, who was elected for the first time in 1988, whether he thinks this issue is so important it could mean losing one's seat in the next election. Will his constituents hold it against him—There are members who say: I have no choice, because otherwise I would lose my seat on this issue. Does he believe that the abortion issue can have this kind of impact on the electoral process?

• (1320)

Mr. Peter Milliken (Kingston and the Islands): I will be quite frank with the hon. member who asked the question, and I want to thank her, if I may, for her compliment.

I don't know the answer to this question because I don't know how many people in my riding consider this policy, this bill to be very important. I don't know how many.

I believe that if this bill is passed by Parliament, by this legislation, the court decisions on this bill will be very important. I think they will show Canadians, especially those who are pro choice, that the bill is not a disaster at all. It is a good bill for everyone.

I imagine people who are pro life will not be very pleased with this bill. However, if the Supreme Court or other courts decide that the rights granted women under this legislation are more restrictive than they are without the bill, then we will have a problem.

I am almost certain that this bill gives women the rights they desire, and despite speeches by hon. members in the New Democratic Party and others, I think we will have fewer problems with this bill than the gentlemen of the NDP have suggested.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): The time for questions and comments has expired. The hon. member for Dartmouth on debate.

[English]

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I am participating in this debate for the second time. The last time I participated was at second reading. I said then, and I repeat, that this is perhaps one of the most difficult debates members from all sides of the House would probably face in their period of time in the House of Commons.

I say this for a couple of reasons. With all due respect to my colleagues in the NDP, one reason is that this issue does not lends itself easily to strict party discipline or ideology. It is an issue with which each and every member of Parliament has had to grapple and to find a rationale to determine how we as legislators at this particular time and how Parliament, given the importance of this debate, fit in.

During debate there has been frequent mention of the rights of women and the rights of the foetus. It seems that the debate has centred on those very rights. Indeed, if we go back to the Supreme Court ruling, it seemed the ruling that struck down the current legislation was primarily concerned with the rights of women. I quote from the ruling of the Supreme Court of last January 28 when Chief Justice Dickson wrote:

> The precise point in the development of the foetus at which the state's interest in its protection become "compelling" should be left to the informed judgment of the legislature.
> Like Beetz and Wilson, I agree that the protection of foetal interests by Parliament is also a valid governmental objective. It follows that balancing these interests with the lives and health of women as a major factor is clearly an important governmental objective.

He has clearly outlined the complexity and the nub of the current debate in trying to balance rights.

In the initial debate in the House I said that the labels have done nothing to assist in finding common ground. The level of debate in this place has been refreshingly calm, well reasoned, and well put. Only a few times has it got down to the partisanship to which we are all used and in which we participate in most nearly every debate that takes place in this House.

I said during second reading that I would support the bill at that time to get it into committee. I wanted to see if it could be improved upon in committee.

As much as I dislike labels, I have been labelled as someone who leans more toward the protection of the rights of the foetus and are therefore pro-life. I do not like labels because I have been criticized by people on both sides of the debate. That is the nature of politics and human nature.

During the debate and committee hearings I hoped there would be a better definition of some of the key elements of this legislation. I hoped some amendments would come forward which would better define health and at risk. I hoped that through those amendments there would be recognition of the balance between foetal rights and the rights of women.

I want to quote from page 11666 of Hansard for May 22 when at report stage the Minister of Justice said:

> This bill has been carefully drafted to achieve a delicate balance between the conflicting views on the abortion issue.
> It complies with the ruling of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Morgentaler case with respect to a woman's constitutional right to security of the person guaranteed in the Canadian Charter of Rights and Freedoms and to reflect the societal interest in the protection of the foetus.

I submit at this point at third reading that this bill has failed, even though the minister opposite holds the point of view that it has not. Nothing has been changed since introduction of the bill in Parliament. There has been necessary debate in Parliament, by parliamentarians in committee, and by Canadians on this issue. I regret to say that I still cannot see that the bill has been altered in any way, shape or form to strike, in my view, the balance between the rights of women and the rights of the foetus.

The bill still leaves the decision as to whether an abortion is warranted to medical practitioners who, with all their medical training and professional experience, will subjectively make the decision as to whether or not an abortion is warranted, as to whether or not the physical, mental, or psychological health of the woman is at risk as broadly defined in the bill. We saw amendments defeated last night after thorough and proper debate, as was the will of members present in the House of Commons. I can no longer look with any hope at this bill being refined to the point where I—and I have been labelled by others to be on the pro-life side of the debate—can support it.

I want to tell the House that I did not come here so wildly zealous that I did not want to see or could not understand other points of view in the debate. I have listened carefully to people on the other side of the issue, people whose judgments I truly trust. They seem to me from past experience to be logical and fair in their comments in opposition to particular points of view. I have heard the debate of other people who are perhaps closer to pro-life, and the quandary in which I found myself when this issue was first raised in the House has not been lessened.

When the vote is taken at third reading I will have no choice but to vote against this bill. I know some will criticize me for my position, as members on the other side have been criticized for their position. I am not here to talk about taking rights away from women. That is not my intent.

People who characterize the debate as my way or the doorway or harshly criticize anyone in this debate do a great disservice to the issue. I have listened to some members in the Commons during this debate who got perhaps a little too entrenched in their own position and maybe did not listen to what some of the other people were going through.

• (1330)

This is not one of those bills where you come in and say: "Okay, what is the party line? How do we deal with this? What are the zingers? What are the things that we do to try to make the government or whoever proposed the legislation look bad?" It is not one of those debates.

This is a unique debate that is taking place in the House. Some people still claim this is a compromise piece of legislation. I cannot accept it as such. I might be able to change my position if I thought this bill could somehow would progress so that glaring omissions, such as the social net that should be in place so that women never again have to look at abortion as an option because of economics, could be added.

If I had seen a willingness or undertaking by the government to address that particular economic problem, if I had seen a consensus developing and a program and timetable put into place whereby education was the basis for progress, perhaps I would have been a little more able to move my position. This has been such a divisive debate and I have heard members on all sides of the House say they will be thankful when it is gone. They say, "It will be out of the House and we will not have to deal with it again, to answer those letters that we don't like to answer from people who just cannot stand our point of view, whatever it is".

I do not believe that when this bill is passed, imperfect as it is, it will voluntarily ever be revisited in this place. So when people say that it is a start, I say it is a start and a stop because, if passed, this law will grant almost unrestricted abortion on demand. I do not think that that bodes well for the Supreme Court ruling, nor do I think that it protects those who have no voice, the foetuses. I will be voting against this at third reading.

Ms. Margaret Mitchell (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I would like my hon. friend to comment on what he feels is the male responsibility in the whole question of preventing unwanted pregnancy.

He talked about wanting to see social programs, or something to that effect, in the bill. This seems to be after the fact and directed again to women having the sole responsibility.

What is the primary responsibility of men in reproductive planning, family planning, and prevention of unwanted pregnancies? What does he think can be done so that there would be greater responsibility on the part of men so we would not have this need for abortions?

Mr. MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I am going to start off by saying to my hon. colleague that I read her remarks of yesterday and I have already commented on them earlier. I find it distressing that she has intimated, at least in her remarks yesterday, that perhaps men do not have a right to participate in this debate, or to vote.

Now that is what I read in yesterday's Hansard. It shows the entrenchment of some positions. Some people who believe as the member does will still quote men who support their particular point of view.

The whole area of prevention is not solely a woman's nor a man's responsibility. It is a joint responsibility because it does not take only one gender to procreate and create new live. It takes both.

There has to be a determined, well-directed approach to prevention of unwanted pregnancies. It is true that perhaps at this time many in our society believe that the woman is solely responsible for not getting pregnant. Maybe that is the way it was when I grew up as well. But I think it is incumbent upon society and its legislators, such as ourselves, to ensure that we embark on a national program of education so that we do not have unwanted pregnancies. If that means making contraceptive technology more easily and readily available in the schools and across the counter, so that nobody ever has an economic reason for pregnancy because they cannot afford contraception, then so be it.

The whole area of preventing unwanted pregnancies is something that, as a society, we often decided to ignore. Many times parents will not sit down at an early enough age and discuss these real problems with their children. Inevitably, we end up dealing with the consequences of our own insecurity in dealing with the sexuality of our own children. The consequences of not being able to deal with the sexuality of our own children through education, through prevention and through dialogue is unwanted pregnancies; it is the new scourge of the eighties and nineties and perhaps the next century in communicable diseases such as AIDS.

What I am saying, in response, is that it is equally the male and the female responsibility. It is the responsibility of families, legislators and educators. It is a societal responsibility to ensure that we deal with these very major issues so that we are not forced to deal with the consequences. Many women, and men because they also play a part in this debate, have to deal with the consequences of being ill-informed about sexuality and such things as unwanted pregnancies, abortion legislation and the crippling and deadly illness called AIDS.

In conclusion, I think that governments have to play a role and I would like to see governments play a much more pro-active role in that direction.

[Translation]

Mrs. Lise Bourgault (Parliamentary Secretary to Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, this being the first time I have the floor while you are in the chair, I should like to extend to you my sincere congratulations and best wishes in the performance of your duties. I am sure you will prove to be an outstanding Assistant Deputy Chairman of Committees of the Whole.

Mr. Speaker, of all the debates in which I spoke the one on abortion has to be the debate to which I devoted most time and consideration, first as a woman, second as a politician. I am sure that being a woman member of government faced with the decision involved in a vote on a measure such as Bill C-43 does not have the same implications as for our male colleagues—like yourself, Mr. Speaker—if only because nature did not intend them to carry a foetus.

In 1978 I had a miscarriage after three and a half months of pregnancy. Quite sincerely, I had yet to feel the presence of a child in my womb. It was not unwanted and the only bad memory I have is the fact that a small army of medical students kept parading through my room over the weekend. Mr. Speaker, when that topic is being debated I feel as if my intimacy as a woman has been invaded.

I am deeply shocked when I hear pro-lifers say that women are immoral and child killers. Given the various comments I heard in this debate, I was outraged when a physician told the legislative committee members that the best thing that could happen to a 12-year-old girl impregnanted by her father was to bear his child. This is undue imposition of one's personal views on the entire life of a poor child victim of incest. Conversely it would be just as outrageous to hear a woman say she is seeking an abortion for purely esthetic reasons.

That being said, here we are again debating Bill C-43. Never have I witnessed such antagonism as I did when people appeared before the legislative committee to give evidence on Bill C-43.

• (1340)

With a few exceptions—two, I think—all those who took part opposed the bill, but for opposite reasons: for some, C-43 was pro-choice; for others, it was pro-life.

Every day, from coast to coast, we had almost equal numbers of witnesses with diametrically opposite opinions appear before us. It was very hard, Mr. Speaker, because as legislators, we must weigh the pros and cons to be in touch with all the people, who expect their government to make decisions. This led me to think further on the real significance of Bill C-43—access to abortion.

I do not at all share the viewpoint of the Canadian Medical Association that physicians, for fear of prosecution, will no longer perform abortions. Come on! Physicians are constantly liable to prosecution for any medical act they perform. Why should abortion, which is a medical procedure, be subject to different standards?

Neither, Mr. Speaker, do I share the opinion of those who say that the doctor, rather than the woman, will make the decision to have an abortion. Come on, Mr. Speaker, with or without a law, a woman must talk to her doctor in any case! She does not sit in front of him speechless. She must explain her situation; the doctor must examine her, whether there is a law or not. The doctor will tell her that the pregnancy has reached a certain stage and that according to his standards, he may or may not—We know that even Mr. Morgentaler, who is the most open on this issue, does not perform abortions after 18 weeks, or at least he thinks it over seriously.

Actually, Mr. Speaker, Bill C–43 is a formal acknowledgment of what is now current practice. I listened to hon. members talking about their draft amendments, and once again I noticed that in many cases—I am not saying all, but in many cases—there is a tendency to ignore the fact that women are quite able to make such important decisions, which are never made lightly. People seem to think that women like having abortions. When a woman has to decide, who are we, who are you to judge or decide on her behalf?

In other words, Mr. Speaker, it is none of our business. To say that women who are faced with unwanted pregnancies should carry those pregnancies to term and then put these children up for adoption is narrow-minded and shows contempt for women.

I would remind those who feel insulted by what I just said of the case of a young single woman in Vancouver. In 1948, after being denied an abortion by Dr. William McCallum, who is still living with this on his conscience, she committed suicide. You may say that she committed suicide for other reasons, but in any case, she gave that particular reason, and that was one too many.

There are also thousands of women who are victims of family violence in their relationships with spouses or boyfriends. What about young women in blended families who experience situations that are extremely complex? For instance, one of my constituents came to see me, Mr. Speaker, and told me her mother's boyfriend had made her pregnant and that her mother was pregnant as well. Lovely family!

Where are all those members who are against abortion, when these women need your compassion and your understanding so that they can live like human beings? Why do you lavish all your attention on the foetus, instead of giving these women the moral support they have a right to expect? What kind of logic is this, that a foetus has as many rights as a living human being who needs help?

Over the past three years, Mr. Speaker, I have often put this question to pro-life men with whom I had lengthy discussions: You who are so adamantly pro-life, as I too am pro-life— People who believe that pro-choice advocates are against life are completely off the track. We are all pro-life. I would ask such a man if his beliefs were strong enough that he would readily tell his legitimate wife that his mistress is pregnant and that henceforth the family would have to make sacrifices in order to support that woman and her child. This may sound funny, but such is reality. That sort of thing is a common occurrence, Mr. Speaker. You are aware of that, take a look in your own backyard. I was given a very simple answer: Of course not, its up to society to look after that. Some people profess to be pro-life because it seems to be the thing to do, but it is a different ball game when concrete gestures are called for.

I know I will be called everything under the sun, but I have had enough being branded as irresponsible for accepting baby killings. The day before yesterday the hon. member for Hillsborough told the House, and I quote:

> I am horrified that anyone could say that a procedure which kills one human being for the convenience of another is a medical procedure.

A few statistics might enlighten the House. In 1985 only 3 per cent of abortions were performed at 17 weeks, and 89 per cent at 13 weeks. As you can appreciate, Mr. Speaker, this is a far cry from what pro-life advocates would have us believe, a far cry indeed. Women do not kill babies.

Pro-life radicals tell me that no matter how conception took place—abuse, violence, incest, you name it—the foetus has the right to live. We are not thinking about the woman who will have to bear this child conceived in extraordinarily violent conditions. It is like being forced to bear children. I wonder what these people would do to enforce an anti-abortion law. We can talk and make long speeches all we want but, in the end, we must think about the consequences. What are they going to do? Build more prisons for women? Issue an injunction against my belly? Nobody in Canadian society has a right to do that to me.

We should perhaps listen to reason and realize that women have rights, as the Supreme Court recognized in the Morgentaler case as well as in the famous Dodd and Chantal Daigle cases. It is easy to spout out great moral principles. Of course, Mr. Speaker, we all wish no woman had to go through an abortion. If that were the case, it would mean that women's economic and emotional situation is perfect. There would not be a problem.

But that is not the reality. As you know, most single mothers live below the poverty line. They are destitute. In the name of morality, some people want to— The women having abortions will only be judged after they die and come face to face with God like everyone else. It is not up to us human beings to decide for them.

Mr. Speaker, I do not know how much time I have left but I hope the bill is passed by the House. At last, after all these years of wrenching debates, I am sure it will be challenged before the courts, as the Committee was told. Has there ever been an act of Parliament that has not been challenged before the courts? They all are. In the final instance, the Supreme Court will decide.

Mr. Speaker, the Supreme Court will decide that Parliament has made its decision, and I think that after royal assent, people will say: This bill isn't so bad after all. Of course, personally, I would have preferred no legislation at all. However, I was elected and I have a seat in the House, on the government side. Decisions must be made. If I were on the other side, it would be easy. I would say no, no legislation, and I would object to any legislation at all. That is how things work in this country. That is how democracy works in our political parties. I am on this side of the House, however, and I am faced with Bill C–43. What I want is for the House to finish this debate, because I want to go on to something else. I want to make the public aware and demand public attention for the worst crisis in society today, and I am referring to the sexual abuse of children. It is a tragedy, and a national disgrace, and we must come out and say so. We have to rescue these children and give them love and affection. We have to get them out of the horrible environment in which they live. We cannot let this go on.

• (1350)

Mr. Speaker, we have seen what is happening in the case of Judge Andrée Ruffo in Quebec City, a woman who has my unqualified admiration and who is fighting the bureaucracy because she believes in children. We all believe in children. I was so pleased when the former leader of the New Democratic Party decided, in his last debate in the House, to talk about child poverty. That is another disgrace we must talk about. Instead of having these futile discussions, instead of trying to make women do certain things and prevent them from doing others, we should sit down and talk about what we can do to deal, once and for all, with child poverty. What can we do to deal with the tragic financial circumstances of Canadian women? In my riding there are women who have trouble making both ends meet, who are poor, sick, and the rest. They have to cope with just about everything, and their husband, the father of their children, has left. Sometimes they don't even know where he is. He is in love with some other woman. Great! That is reality. Those are the sordid facts. Mr. Speaker, in concluding, I hope that all members will realize we are going to pass Bill C–43. It isn't perfect. Nothing is ever perfect. However, I was closely involved in preparing this legislation, and it was a long, complex and difficult process.

I would like to take this opportunity to thank all my colleagues on the government side who worked with me, in the Conservative caucus and on the legislative committee, so that finally we were able to produce a bill that in the circumstances, I believe, provides the best possible compromise Canadian society can expect from a government that has shown leadership.

[English]

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member feels very strongly about what she has just said. Her emotions came across the House very strongly, but she mentioned one thing that bothered me a bit.

This is a free vote in the House of Commons on the abortion issue. The hon. member said that, because she is sitting on the government side of the House, she must make a decision, and that it is harder for her because she is on the government side of the House than if she were sitting on the other side. I want to state very clearly that, in a free vote in the House of Commons, it is up to every individual, no matter where he or she sits in the House, to make that personal decision on his or her own.

Is the hon. member telling us that she has been pressured by the government into voting for this bill or is she, indeed, voting in accordance with her conscience? I am sure I am speaking for people in every corner of the House when I tell her that, on this issues, all members have to stand and be counted. Whether they belong to one party or another does not matter. They are still accountable to their constituents and a free vote in the House must be precisely that, no matter where we sit.

Mrs. Bourgault: Mr. Speaker, I have not received any pressure, none whatsoever, from anybody on this side of the House regarding this bill. I just say, because the debate has been going on for 10 years or more, since the first legislation came into force under the Trudeau government, that I hope we can deal with this bill now and then go on to more important questions.

I am sure that Hansard tomorrow will show that I said that, as the government, we have the obligation to present legislation. The Prime Minister has said that because of the various views on this question there is going to be a free vote. No one on this side of the House, certainly not myself, has been pushed to vote for this bill. I think the hon. member is as sick and tired of the debate as we are. I would hope that he would vote for the bill so that we can carry on to other important matters. That is what I was trying to say to him, and that is what I hope he is going to do next Tuesday.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Mr. Speaker, I, too, would like to congratulate the hon. member on a very passionate, forceful speech, although I disagree with most of what she said.

Through the process of committee hearings in which she claims to have participated, did the hon. member have any remorse at all at the fact that the bill has a wide-open gestational period? There is no limit as to when a woman could ask for and receive an abortion. The child could be hours, days, or weeks from delivery and there would be no problem at all if the doctor agrees an abortion should be performed, for whatever reasons. Did that cause any qualms in the hon. member's mind at all?

Mrs. Bourgault: Mr. Speaker, the facts speak for themselves. In the 1985 Statistics Canada report, it is very clear that no abortion was performed after 20 weeks unless for a very, very important reason. Only 0.3 per cent of abortions are performed after 20 weeks, and I suppose then only for very dramatic and important reasons. The facts speak for themselves. Doctors in the country do not perform abortions after a certain period.

The Chantal Daigle affair was a different matter because it is one case among thousands and thousands of cases. Are we going to legislate regarding this one case? No, because the facts are there and I will urge the member to read the 1985 report.

Of course, I totally disagree with a woman having an abortion after 20 weeks, unless it is for very dramatic and important health reasons.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

Mr. Gilbert Parent (Welland—St. Catharines—Thorold): Mr. Speaker, more than 5,000 aging Canadian veterans residing in long-term care hospitals were dealt a blow in the government's harsh cutting measures contained in the Wilson budget.

They will have to pay more than $3,000 each for their lodging in an effort by the government to save $18 million. In addition, as a result of the government attack on the Veterans Independence Program, 16,000 veterans who are living at home will lose some of the help provided for their heavy house cleaning because of an $18 million cut from this key program to aging veterans to which the government refers to as streamlining.

This saving of $35 million against of a deficit of $30 billion, on the backs of the veterans, is a poor way to show our appreciation of their valiant deeds on behalf of all Canadians during the war. It is especially so as these veterans' sources are severely limited.

This shameful and disgraceful way to go about finding means to reduce the deficit will not be taken lying down. That message is coming in more clearly every day. We hope that the Prime Minister and his government will listen to the plea to rescind these cuts and allow our veterans to retain their well-earned dignity.

TEXTILE INDUSTRY

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, Dominion Textile recently won an award of excellence in the Quebec business community's most prestigious competition for the growth of its business outside the country. Dominion Textile won the Mercure prize for international development. This competition was started by the Quebec Chamber of Commerce 10 years ago to celebrate the outstanding achievements of business people.

As a result of their acquisitions and expansion of their operations, Dominion Textile has become the world's largest denim producer and a leader in many other products as well. The corporation went ahead with major investments in technology for several plants, including a $35-million modernization program now under way in Drummondville and Saint-Timothée—all this without subsidies.

Dominion Textile, which began business in 1905, is the largest supplier of textiles and related products in Canada. Its international network of offices, factories, subsidiaries and associated companies now extends to nearly 50 countries.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to offer the management and workers of Dominion Textile my warmest congratulations.

THE LATE VELMA ORLIKOW

Mr. Bill Blaikie (Winnipeg Transcona): Mr. Speaker, my NDP colleagues and I were saddened today to learn of the death of Val Orlikow, wife of our former colleague David Orlikow and the former member for Winnipeg North, who served this House and his constituents with distinction for over 26 years. I am sure all members would want to join with me in expressing sincere condolences to David at this very difficult time.

Val Orlikow has a place in Canadian history independent of David. She has a place as one of the victims of CIA psychiatric experiments conducted in Canada at the Allan Institute in Montreal. One of her goals in life was to see justice done with respect to these experiments, and others like them, not just those done by the CIA. The case of Linda McDonald of British Columbia comes to mind.

Val Orlikow has died without the Canadian government ever admitting its own complicity in the CIA experiments that so damaged her life.

Out of court settlements in the United States are one thing, but having your own country own up to its part and promising never to do again what was done to her, was something worth waiting for, and wait she did.

For Mrs. Orlikow the wait is over. For the government, the shame continues.

THE BALTIC STATES

Mr. Gus Mitges (Bruce—Grey): Mr. Speaker, the Presidents of Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania met in Tallin, Estonia on May 12 to reinstate the 1934 treaty that established close political and economic ties between the Baltic republics when they were previously independent.

At this meeting they issued of the Joint Baltic Council statement requesting that the conference on security and co-operation of the European member countries arrange a hearing in Copenhagen in order to present a mutual declaration and statement requesting that Estonia, Latvia and Lithuania be admitted as members.

The 35-country membership currently includes such countries as Cyprus, Bulgaria, Czechoslovakia, both Germanys, Poland, Yugoslavia and Romania.

I believe it is only fitting that legitimate member states of the east European community be allowed access to address a plenary session at a human rights conference in Copenhagen.

I urge the Secretary of State for External Affairs to draw this issue to the attention of the Canadian delegation to Copenhagen, to develop a favourable stance and to report subsequently back to the House his suggested stance.

TRANSPORT

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Mr. Speaker, since deregulation came into effect two years ago, the trucking industry has suffered at the hands of the federal government. This government did not plan ahead for deregulation. It has refused to listen to the concerns of the industry.

This past week and until this morning we were faced with a crisis. The various blockades represent the anger and the frustration that truckers feel because the concerns of their industry have been continually ignored.

This situation demands attention. In my riding of Malpeque, one trucking organization had 150 trucks delayed on the highway between Prince Edward Island and Ottawa.

I urge this government to resolve immediately the concerns of the trucking industry. It is time to begin listening to the industry, and to ensure that concerns are attended to so that critical emergencies like the one we have experienced do not happen again.

CANADA'S FITWEEK

Mrs. Nicole Roy-Arcelin (Ahuntsic): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow, Friday, May 25, is Sneaker Day, when all Canadians, including members of Parliament, are invited to wear their sneakers in order to promote a healthy active lifestyle. Sneaker Day marks the beginning of Canada's Fitweek, a week of activities which runs from May 25 to June 3.

Mr. Speaker, I would like to add that Canada's Fitweek is the most important celebration of its kind in the world. All Canadians should be proud of this achievement. Last year, eight million people from coast to coast took part in over 14,000 events.

The Government of Canada, through Fitness Canada, is a major supporter of Canada's Fitweek, which is presented in co-operation with the provinces and territories, 17 national organizations and 12 sponsors. Canada's Fitweek is really a popular event.

Over the next 10 days, I call on all hon. members to join Canadians across the land by promoting and participating in the many activities planned for their ridings.

FORESTRY

Mr. Brian L. Gardiner (Prince George—Bulkley Valley): Mr. Speaker, the government's Green Plan is collapsing with the resignation of the minister and the appointment of a part-time Minister of the Environment.

One way the government can show its commitment to the environment and our forests would be for the Minister of Forestry to announce today, as forestry ministers in the west, especially British Columbia, are expecting him to do, that a new tree planting agreement will be signed today to help renew our forests.

The Minister of Forestry has not lived up to five previous commitments to sign a B.C. agreement. He should help himself, this government and our forests by moving immediately to have these agreements signed and implemented.

CANADA'S FITWEEK

Mr. John E. Cole (York—Simcoe): Mr. Speaker, I am very happy to announce the kick-off of Canada's 1990 Fitweek which starts tomorrow, May 25.

All Canadians are invited to join me and my House of Commons colleagues in donning their sneakers, no matter how flashy or conservative they happen to be—mine are pink—to partake in a physical activity such as running, rope jumping or a stroll in the park.

Canada's Fitweek, May 25 to June 3, is the largest annual celebration of physical activity in the world. Again this year over eight million participants will take part in every type of physical activity available.

It is truly an event where collaborative efforts between the public and private sectors promote a united message about the importance of an active lifestyle.

Sneaker Day is just one of 12 national projects. In addition, municipalities have organized activities in the spirit of friendly competition with other municipalities.

On this Sunday in my riding of York—Simcoe there is the Persechini Easter Seals Fitness Centre Walk-a-Thon to raise funds for crippled children.

In Ottawa, we have the run for retinitis-pigmentosa research.

Sneaker Day could be the mark of a new day in each of our lives, a day where physical activity, a healthier lifestyle becomes the national, the Canadian way of life.

We are all aware of the increased benefits of maintaining an active life. I invite all members to join Canadians in promoting and participating in the many events planned in their own constituencies as part of Canada's Fitweek.

WESTERN DIVERSIFICATION

Mr. Ronald J. Duhamel (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, western diversification was supposedly the answer to western Canada's economic woes. It was going to produce less dependence upon the agricultural sector.

Interestingly enough, eight months before the election there were expenditures that exceeded $400 million. In the fiscal year after the election, expenditures were only $136.8 million. What a coincidence!

This year's Estimates have no reference whatsoever to the Centre for Sustainable Development, no reference whatsoever to the renewal of infrastructure program that was promised for rural Manitoba, and mentioned by the Prime Minister in Portage la Prairie when he visited.

We note with much chagrin that Manitoba and Saskatchewan do not have their fair share. Sixty-three per cent of these projects are in urban areas, and only 37 per cent in rural communities.

Tory ministers and big business—and I do not say that, it is the Canadian Federation of Independent Business—are getting too much of these funds.

There is a large bureaucracy—over 300 people—which is consuming 20 per cent of the expenditures.

We can only diversify if we look at diversification in the total context of high interest rates, the reduction in expenditures for health, education, agriculture, and the shutting down of VIA Rail. We must take all of those into consideration.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Marcel R. Tremblay (Québec-Est): Mr. Speaker, I want to take this opportunity today to say a few words about the Meech Lake Accord because I think that what is happening to the Accord is unacceptable.

The Meech Lake Accord as signed on June 3, 1987 by all First Ministers has been criticized, debased and worse by people who are negative, suspicious, impatient and lacking in any kind of generosity towards each other.

Mr. Speaker, I think it is intolerable that negative feelings that have sush a destructive impact on the goal of national unity set by our government and its leader, Mr. Mulroney, should be allowed to prevail. We should all realize that the little guy from Baie-Comeau, as he has often said, this great Quebecer and this genuine Canadian, will never again let Quebec be insulted as it was under the Trudeau and Chrétien régime.

For him and for us, the elected Conservative representatives from Quebec, it is more than a question of honour, it is a matter of the heart.

I have confidence in our Prime Minister and his sensible attitude, and I hope I will never have to doubt the intelligence of some of our provincial First Ministers.

ARGENTINA

Mr. Jesse Flis (Parkdale—High Park): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow, Argentina commemorates its National Day. It will be the 180th anniversary of what has become in Argentinian history the most important event, an event that marks Argentina's true independence and its existence as a free country.

The Argentine revolution of May 1810 was the initial step of a long process in the region which culminated in the independence of various countries of Latin America.

In 1983 Argentina was one of the first countries to initiate a remarkable process of democratization that rebounded through every country in the whole region.

Just a few days ago we hosted a very important commercial mission from Argentina. That mission was headed by two governors, Dr. Eduardo Angeloz and Dr. Rodriguez Saa, both of whom happen to be representatives of two major political parties in Argentina, indicating that every co-operation is possible if there is enough will.

As former principal of Argentina School here in Canada and in my present role I would like to extend to Argentina my very best wishes and every success in all future endeavours as they commemorate Argentina National Day.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. J.W. Bud Bird (Fredericton—York—Sunbury): Mr. Speaker, within the text of the Special Meech Lake Committee Report—which I had the honour with other colleagues in this House to help prepare—are some passing observations about our hearings which may in fact be more powerful for current considerations than any of the other important messages it contains.

Witness after witness, even those most critical of the Meech Lake Accord, expressed support for Canadian unity and the need to make Canada's second most populous province, Quebec, a participating member in the Canadian constitutional family. There was also general agreement that Quebec's five proposals were reasonable for that purpose.

Surely by now most will realize that therein lies the very essence of the Meech Lake Accord, and it is attainable if only we have the resolve to take it within our grasp.

Let us all support and encourage our First Ministers throughout Canada to bear this over-powering single purpose above all other considerations as they reflect upon the future of our country in these critical days ahead.

CANADA POST

Mrs. Christine Stewart (Northumberland): Mr. Speaker, Canada Post continues to cut back on service to rural Canadians. It is contracting out its rural delivery in such a way as to make effective service impossible.

According to officials in Percy township in my riding, Canada Post's tender form for delivery in that area states all mail is to be delivered by three o'clock in the afternoon, seven hours after the local post office opens.

The route is 168 kilometres long with 480 delivery points. Sorting takes at least three hours. To drive from one end of the route to the other at the speed limit and without stopping takes over two hours. Even if driving up to each mailbox and inserting the mail were to take only a minute for each delivery point, this activity alone would take a total of eight hours. Simple calculations indicate that deliveries would only be finished at nine o'clock at night.

Canada Post not only needs outside help to deliver the mail, it seems to me it needs outside help to do its math.

I urge Canada Post to ensure it reduces the size of its new rural routes to ensure timely delivery. As the Liberal report on the post office specifies, the minister responsible should ensure Canada Post consults in a meaningful way with its best source of information, local citizens, before making major changes.

CORPORATE TAXATION

Mr. John R. Rodriguez (Nickel Belt): Mr. Speaker, the corporate welfare bum of the week salutes the wheeler-dealers of Canadian finance. The first nominee is Burns Fry Ltd. which gave $56,000 to the Conservative party in 1988 and $21,000 to the Liberals.

The second nominee is Merrill Lynch which gave $106,000 to the Conservative party in 1988 and only $43,000 to the Liberals.

The third nominee is RBC Dominion Securities which gave $50,000 to both the Conservative and the Liberal parties in 1988.

Now for the winner. The envelope, please.

The winner is Merrill Lynch. It bet on the Conservative party in a big way in 1988. For mastering the art of the deal, Merrill Lynch is the corporate welfare bum of the week.

MUSCULAR DYSTROPHY TELETHON

Mr. Harry Chadwick (Brampton—Malton): Mr. Speaker, I speak of an event which knows no political boundaries, no racial boundaries, no prejudice of any kind. It is an event which springs from compassion and the kind of caring of which humans at their best are capable.

The annual Muscular Dystrophy Telethon taking place May 26 to May 27 gives residents of Brampton—Malton and surrounding communities an opportunity to come together as one community and support this very special cause.

I would like to pay particular attention to the involvement of our Brampton fire-fighters in the telethon. Not only do these men and women protect our communities every day, without their support the fight against muscular dystrophy would surely be a much harder battle.

I urge everyone in the riding of Brampton—Malton to play their part, as usual, in the race against this debilitating disease and to prove once again that in Brampton—Malton muscular dystrophy faces a tough opponent.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I have questions for the Prime Minister about the constitutional situation, a matter of growing concern for Canadians.

Yesterday in the House the Prime Minister told us that he and Senator Murray were developing new proposals, that he would be speaking to the premiers about them and, further, that he would be reporting to the House on the results of these contacts.

Will the Prime Minister inform the House and therefore Canadians of the exact content of these proposals, of the reactions of the premiers to them, and the extent to which the recommendations of the special committee, the Charest committee, are being taken into account in these efforts to bring about a fair solution to the constitutional impasse?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I plan to begin a series of direct meetings with the premiers beginning tonight at six o'clock at 24 Sussex with Premier Don Getty of Alberta.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think this will be encouraging news for Canadians.

However, yesterday, the Premier of Ontario, Mr. Peterson, and Mr. Getty met in Toronto. Both of them called for an early meeting of all first ministers—the Prime Minister of Canada together with all the premiers of all the provinces.

Speaking of the present constitutional accord the Ontario Premier said:

> We don't have a lot of time. I think at best we have another week.

Premier Getty said:

> So how do we make progress without meeting?

I think he was talking about a meeting of the Prime Minister with all the premiers.

Even though the meeting the Prime Minister has spoken about I hope will be helpful, I ask the Prime Minister: in view of the views of Mr. Peterson and Mr. Getty, does he not now agree that the time has come to call an early meeting of all the first ministers on this constitutional situation?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think we are going about it in the proper way.

I have been in touch with the premiers. This is an effort to meet individually with all of them to attempt to narrow the differences and at the conclusion, hopefully, if it is at all possible, it will give rise to the reasonable possibility of calling a First Ministers' Conference that might be successful.

• (1420)

By way of illustration, I point out to my hon. friend who raised the question of Premier Peterson, that he neglected to mention that Premier Peterson yesterday made a very thoughtful and compelling call to the three premiers, who have either repudiated or failed to sign the Meech Lake Accord, to do so, and to consider doing so urgently, because of the importance of the constitutional family being made whole.

I think Premier Peterson was speaking on behalf of a growing number of Canadians when he called upon those three provincial governments to do everything they could to honour the signatures provided at Meech Lake by predecessor governments.

I can inform my friend that after I meet with Premier Getty this evening I will be meeting with Premier Peterson tomorrow at one o'clock at 24 Sussex.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, in my second question I made specific reference to the views of Premier Peterson because of the constructive approach he has been taking to the matter of nation building and his openness and understanding of the concerns not only of Quebec but of all the regions and provinces of our country.

[Translation]

Mr. Speaker, when people ask him to call a First Ministers' Conference to get us out of the constitutional impasse, the Prime Minister keeps answering that the chances of failure are too high. Doesn't the Prime Minister realize that the risk is far greater if we do not call a conference, if we do nothing, than if there is a conference?

[English]

Surely, I ask the Prime Minister, is it not better to meet and risk failure than to fail by not meeting at all? Why not have a Conference of all the First Ministers before June 23?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know that my hon. friend had questions prepared in advance, but I have been trying to convey to him that there is serious movement going on and there are very serious meetings that have been lined up. I begin this evening with the Premier of Alberta, who was the host of the premiers' conference in Edmonton in 1986 that gave rise to the unanimous call for the equivalent of a Quebec round to seek to bring Quebec into the Constitution following the failure of 1981–82 to do so.

Premier Getty has been a staunch and unfailing ally of Meech Lake ever since.

Premier Peterson, speaking on behalf of the province and the people of Ontario, provided very significant leadership at Meech Lake. He, too, has been unfailing in his support of the Meech Lake Accord as a great instrument of national unity.

It was in that spirit I think that Premier Peterson, well qualified to speak to this issue, called upon the three recalcitrant provinces, if I may put it that way, to sign the Meech Lake Accord as quickly as possible so that we could in a very constructive and thoughtful way get on with the process of building a greater Canada.

The meetings that we have called are designed to do precisely that. I think my hon. friend would agree that at this particular point some prudence in meeting with the premiers and trying to prepare an effective First Ministers' Conference is worth the time rather than calling a First Ministers' Conference simply for the sake of having called one that might result in failure. I want success for Canada. I want a Constitution that binds all Canadians together.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, the country is being plunged into an economic crisis by the government's monetary policy. Today there was an increase in the Bank of Canada rate by 25 basis points.

How far is the Minister of Finance prepared to let the Governor of the Bank of Canada go in his obsession with zero inflation? Is he prepared to ruin the manufacturing sector in this country? Or, will he come to his senses and direct the Bank of Canada Governor to reflect the reality of the Canadian economic condition?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend is correct when he says that there has been a 25 basis point increase in the bank rate today.

I would say that this is in good part due to some of the uncertainties surrounding the ongoing constitutional discussions. The sooner we can get these discussions behind us in a successful way, the sooner we can get behind this uncertainty.

My hon. friend refers to policies of the government. I think that the policies of the government are on track. We are consistently following a series of policies.

I might say to my hon. friend that the financial requirements that were evident for the year ending in March of this year indicate that the budget deficit is about $1 billion less than what we had previously projected.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): I think this indicates quite clearly the consistent and conscientious approach that we have been taking to economic policy.

This is the fourth consecutive year in which the budget deficit has come in less than the projections that we have made. The policies that we are following are paying off. They are producing effective results for this country.

Mr. Douglas Young (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, on February 20, the Minister of Finance projected an annual average of 11.1 per cent for interest rates in this country.

He talks about his revised deficit figures. Are the minister and his government going to continue with this high interest policy in the face of evidence from every sector of our economy that it is destroying the economy of this country?

The interest rate today of 14.05 per cent is the highest it has been in eight years. How high does it go before the government realizes it is on a track to destruction?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I do not think my hon. friend wants to lead with his chin and talk about the heights of interest rates, since I only need remind him that what we are trying to do is stop inflation from getting out of control so that we can avoid the very high interest rates that we had between 1980 and 1982 when inflation did get out of control.

My hon. friend refers to inflationary pressures. We started in 1989 with an increase in unit labour costs to 4.5 per cent. This is the best example of the broadest measure of how our industry and businesses are competing with the rest of the world.

They started the year at 4.5 per cent and ended at 6.9 per cent. That is the best measure that we can show of how our companies are gaining business.

That increase in inflationary pressures means lost business. Lost business means lost jobs.

We are trying to turn that 6.9 per cent number down so that we can get the pressures and the cost structures of Canadian business under control in order to save and build jobs as well as to have a much brighter future.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Right Hon. Prime Minister.

I want to say at the outset that I am pleased that the Prime Minister is going to begin meeting directly with the premiers of this country to discuss the serious situation that we are in.

I would also like to say to the Prime Minister that the objective is a united Canada. The winner in the end has to be Canada itself. I am glad there is now some movement in terms of meeting with the premiers.

In light of these discussions with the premiers and the Prime Minister's talk in the House yesterday about some new proposals now being discussed with them, is he now ready to elaborate a bit on what these new proposals might be?

I realize the sensitivity and delicacy of some of these issues. In light of that, is the Prime Minister in any position today to elaborate to some degree on the direction of these new proposals he is taking to the premiers of this country?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, first, in a personal way, but probably on behalf of all members of the House on this very important issue, I would like to convey congratulations to the member of the NDP for his role on the questions of national unity that has been unfailingly positive and constructive at all times.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Axworthy (Winnipeg South Centre): You just dropped 20 points in the polls, Lorne. There goes your re-election.

Mr. Marchi: The kiss of death.

• (1430)

Mr. Mulroney: Mr. Speaker, I did not mean to hurt the hon. member with that comment, but I think he knows exactly what I mean. This is a delicate subject which, as Premier Peterson pointed out yesterday, requires a great deal of statesmanship and a very constructive approach because the stakes are very high. What we are talking about is the future of Canada.

Yesterday, Premier Getty said "I was at Meech Lake, as were the other premiers. I put the signature of Don Getty and the signature of the Government of Alberta on a piece of paper which was designed in Alberta's interests, in the interests of western Canada, and most of all in the interests of a united Canada". He said "I propose to honour that because it is indispensable that we all do so in the interests of Canadian unity".

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: I will discuss some ideas we have with the premiers. I will ask for some of their thoughts. There have been a number of conversations ongoing among them and, hopefully, out of these intensive consultations will come a consensus reasonable enough to give rise to the view that we might hold a constructive first ministers' conference which will result in what every member of this House wants, a firm irrevocable statement of a united Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my supplementary question to the Prime Minister is in the same vein, about a national problem that we have. I wonder if the Prime Minister can account for the latest tremendous jump in interest rates in this country? We now have an increase of 25 basis points. It is the highest bank rate in the country since August, 1982. The inflation rate has dropped to 5 per cent. I wonder if the Prime Minister agrees with the Minister of Finance that the latest increase in the bank rate of this country is due to the constitutional impasse and, if so, does that not create more of a sense of urgency to try to resolve this question as quickly as possible?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I agree with both my honourable friend and the Minister of Finance that it is due in part to the political instability that has been engendered because of serious questions raised here and in money markets around the world about our ongoing discussions. It is precisely for this reason why it is so absolutely indispensable for every Canadian, particularly those first ministers whose predecessors had signed a constitutional document, to understand the importance of constructive and thoughtful compromise.

I thought Premier Getty, and I am paraphrasing, put it best of all when he said that to some extent constitutional discussion among Canadians is an act of faith. He said Alberta did this in the interests of national unity, believing that in subsequent discussions Alberta, which has been a chief proponent of Senate reform for many years, would be able to achieve that in ongoing and subsequent discussions.

Premier Getty is right. I believe that the faith he showed at Meech Lake will never be abused by any first minister or by any Canadian. Any first minister who would do that, I think would be doing a profound disservice to Canada and to Canadian unity. Premier Getty, Premier Peterson, and others, are entirely right. Some degree of good faith, of course, is required from Canadians among one another so that the document, having been signed, can give rise to Quebec coming back home into the constitutional family and will allow us to move on finally to second and third, and no doubt fourth rounds, into the future, as one strong, united Canada.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Lorne Nystrom (Yorkton—Melville): Mr. Speaker, my final supplementary is directed to the Minister of Finance. I suggest that the interest rate policy itself is creating instability in this country. I wonder whether the Minister of Finance is ready to send a clear signal across the country and around the world that this country is indeed strong by insisting that the Bank of Canada, and the Governor of the Bank of Canada, drop interest rates immediately in this country?

Is he willing now to stand up and say to John Crow that enough is enough? High interest rates in this country are hurting ordinary Canadians from coast to coast, our bank rate is now 5 per cent higher than the American bank rate, our inflation rate is dropping in the country, and because of these factors, because of the situation in the country, let us send out a strong signal to say that we are a strong country. Let us drop those interest rates so we can appropriately become more productive as an economy in this country.

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have no hesitation in saying that this is a strong country and that we do have a strong economy. That is precisely why the budget deficit has come in $1 billion less than we had projected.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The policies we have been following, whether they be monetary policy, interest rate policy or budgetary policy, or policy to improve the efficiency of the economy, all of these are broadly supported by the major international economic organizations, such as the International Monetary Fund or the Organization for Economic Co–Operation and Development in Paris. These organizations state that our policies are the right policies we should be following. The facts are there themselves.

Canada has been second only behind Japan over the last five years in economic growth. We are number one of the major industrialized countries in the creation of new jobs. Ten years ago we were number ten of the trading countries in our trade performance. In the latest figures, we are number seven in ranking. We are improving our ranking in many, many ways. That says a good deal about the strength of our economy. It also says a good deal about the wisdom of the policies we have been following.

PRESENCE IN GALLERY

Mr. Speaker: I wish to draw to the attention of hon. members the presence in the gallery of a delegation from British Columbia to the Government of Canada headed by the Honourable Stan Hagen, Minister of Regional and Economic Development and the Honourable Bruce Strachen, Minister of Advanced Education, Training and Technology of British Columbia, and two distinguished scientists, Nobel prize recipient, Dr. Carlo Rubbia, Director of Cern in Geneva and Dr. Val Fitch, Dean of Phsyics of Princeton University and 1980 Nobel prize recipient.

TRANSPORT

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Transport. The trucking crisis in Canada is a direct result of this government's policy of deregulation.

Since last Monday, General Motors in Quebec sent home 3,000 workers; 15,000 workers were sent home in Oshawa; Chrysler's van plant in Windsor was shut down and Ford shut down three plants in St. Thomas and Oakville. Fresh produce needed by Canadians was left rotting at border crossing points.

Will the minister inform the House of the commitments he made to Canadian truckers today, and, in particular, the remedies that will go into effect to protect truckers against cabotage and the unfair pricing practices that American truckers have been imposing on Canadian truckers?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Interestingly enough, Mr. Speaker, the truckers did not mention deregulation as their problem at all.

I went to Windsor last night in order to meet with representatives of the independent truckers. We had very helpful discussions during which we agreed to examine further methods of eliminating cabotage in co–operation with the Minister of National Revenue and the Minister of Employment and Immigration.

Second, there was some concern with respect to unfair competition. I agreed that we would look into that matter. We went into some discussions as to whether the appropriate amount of fuel tax is being paid at all times by all carriers. We are prepared to look into methods to sort that out. I also would say that I had the assistance of the Minister of Transport for Ontario in this matter.

When the discussions were concluded, the representatives of the independent truckers were satisfied and undertook to see that the barricades would be lifted.

• (1440)

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question for the same minister. The big question remains: why must there always be a crisis before we get involved in settling the problem? Look at the air traffic control problem, the airport security and shipping problems and the unfair competition that was levied against the Canadian truckers. We warned the government about what deregulation would do to the Canadian trucking industry.

When will the minister deliver a new transportation policy for Canada and Canadian workers that will not only protect the Canadian trucker but will protect all Canadian workers in the transportation industry? This government has an obligation to do that.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps a discussion with my friend's colleague from Winnipeg might be a little helpful in informing him as to exactly when deregulation started. It was before the hon. member's time but deregulation started certainly in my hon. friend's time.

All of those problems occur from time to time. We have taken the necessary steps. We went down to Windsor to look at the problem and to come up with some answers. We have come up with some answers. The truckers said they would lift the barricade. I take them at their word.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the right hon. Prime Minister. Today the crucial consultation sessions on the government's Green Plan for the environment began the long-awaited legislation on the environmental assessment process is expected in the House of Commons shortly. Despite the importance and the fullness of the environmental agenda in Canada, the Prime Minister has appointed a minister who admits he can only be a part-time environment minister.

Does the Prime Minister believe protection of the environment is a part-time job?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, no. Indeed the protection of the environment is a full-time job. It is one of the highest importance which is why, I believe for the first time in Canadian history, under this government the environment minister was brought into the Priorities and Planning committee of the Cabinet of Canada, indicating the highest priority that this government attributes to the environment. I may be mistaken on that but I think it is right.

With regard to the question, my hon. friend knows that there was—how might I delicately put this—an unplanned vacancy in the department, as a result of which I have asked to act on an interim basis one of the most senior ministers of the government, the President of the Treasury Board. He is also a member of P and P, he has been a member of the ministerial committee preparing The Green Plan from its inception and was specifically charged by me, as Prime Minister, from the beginning with ensuring that full financing was there for The Green Plan. I can think of no one more qualified than him to do it.

Mr. Jack Iyerak Anawak (Nunatsiaq): Mr. Speaker, the fact remains that the minister in question did say in answers to some questions from the news media that he could only be a part-time environment minister.

A part-time environment minister is not acceptable to Canadians. Will the Prime Minister agree today, because of the very busy schedule of the President of the Treasury Board, to assign these important responsibilities to a full-time senior minister with the authority and mandate to provide the leadership necessary to meet today's environmental challenges?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, while I indicated in the release yesterday that this assignment of responsibilities is on an interim basis, all who know the President of the Treasury Board and know his work habits will know that he will work full and complete days at the environment ministry to make sure that that job is done exactly the way my hon. friend would want it to be done.

Speaking of which, because of his interest in the environment, I know my hon. friend would want to celebrate today the fact that, after some six years of hard slugging by this government and by many members of the House, yesterday the House of Representatives in the United States passed the Clean Air Act. We are now well on our way to an acid rain treaty with the United States.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, the government wants me to congratulate the government. I will wait until the acid rain legislation is through the United States process before I give any accolades to anyone.

My question is also directed to the right hon. Prime Minister and is about the environment. Canadians are deeply concerned about pollution, about drinking water quality, about global warming and about the inaction of the government.

By nature of the portfolio, the recent resignation of the former Minister of the Environment has meant the loss of two years time, hope, and energy put in by Canadians across the country in pursuit of policies on the environment. My question to the Prime Minister is also in relation to his appointment of a part-time minister. The Minister of the Environment is here but the hearings are being launched today in Winnipeg and the Minister of Energy is there. Would the Prime Minister at least assure Canadians who are participating in the consultations in Winnipeg that the part-time minister he has appointed will be the minister who carries through the consultations and carries through implementation of the Green Plan when it comes before the House?

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I think my hon. friend is needlessly churlish in regard to a situation that I have explained at great length. He implies that the resignation itself of the minister means that two years of effort and energy have been lost. If that were true, then the recent resignation of Ed Broadbent would mean that two years of energy and effort were lost by the NDP and that is clearly not true. You are as energetic and as brilliant as you have has always been and I congratulate you.

Mr. Jim Fulton (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, let me respond with great celerity, as the Prime Minister would always want to say, and ask a question of the new part-time Minister of the Environment, who himself described to me yesterday the job as being part-time. The most important cabinet portfolio in Canada today is a part-time one.

Another minister drafted the Green Plan over the past year. A minister who has continuously sent out mixed signals on the environment and is generally seen by Canadians as being anti-environment, the Minister of Energy, is at the launch of the Green Plan hearings today. Does the new Minister of the Environment plan to participate in the consultations fully and completely, and does he intend to stay for the implementation of what he learns from the consultations, or will some other minister take on that job?

Hon. Robert de Cotret (President of the Treasury Board and Minister of the Environment): Mr. Speaker, I would just like to tell my hon. colleague across the way that there are at least three things that have not changed at all.

The first one is the timetable that we are following on our environmental agenda. That timetable will be respected and I expect that we will be able to meet our targets as announced before.

The second thing is that our commitment has not changed. The environment is at the top of our agenda as a government and will remain there.

The third point which has not changed is that there is a full-time Minister of the Environment. I expect to be in Halifax on Monday morning, I expect to be at all the hearings and I expect to see the process through.

AGRICULTURE

Mr. Jean-Guy Guilbault (Drummond): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of State for Agriculture and concerns the Canadian Egg Producers Council which complains that importers of table eggs from the United States repack eggs imported in bulk in containers labeled "Product of Canada".

Can the minister reassure this House and the producers and tell them what he intends to do to stop this fradulent labeling practice?

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Mr. Speaker, we were informed of this matter in recent months.

Canada's position is very clear: table eggs must show the country of origin. The Canadian Egg Processors Council, unfortunately, does not support us in this position.

On several occasions, we have brought those concerned together and it is obviously in our interest, that this policy be respected by people here in Canada. I can assure my colleague that this matter has already been discussed and we will continue to work on it so that consumers who buy products on the market know the country of origin of these products.

I can assure you that we will take it into account.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, my question is for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

Mr. Speaker, we on this side of the House echo the remarks made by the minister last Tuesday when he expressed Canada's dismay concerning the unprecedented violent acts following the murder of seven Palestinians at Richon-Letion near Tel-Aviv.

We also believe that the current deadlock in the peace process contributes to create instability and violence.

This is why I want to ask the minister whether Canada is prepared to support the Americans who would send United Nations observers to the occupied territories, and what will our ambassador have to say at the Security Council sessions scheduled for tomorrow or Saturday?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): In fact, Mr. Speaker, neither the United States nor any other Security Council member have actively advocated dispatching such an observer team. However the American Secretary of State did say that the U.S. administration would certainly entertain this kind of proposition.

For our part we in Canada are also prepared to consider this proposition because our country has always been a strong supporter of peacekeeping activities and observer teams. Hon. members would know that Canada did lend strong support to the rather limited but no less important UNRWA mission concerning the Palestinians.

Canada's ambassador will indeed play a significant part in the Security Council discussions.

[English]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, will the minister and the Prime Minister raise the issue with UN Secretary General Perez de Cuellar and also with President Gorbachev during their respective visits next week in Ottawa? If so, what will he tell them regarding Canada's position?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, we certainly do intend to discuss the question of the Middle East and, particularly, the matters now before the Security Council with the Secretary General of the United Nations and with the leaders of the Soviet government when they are here next week.

We will indicate to them that Canada is prepared to support any constructive activity that might be taken by the United Nations, and we will certainly take the opportunity to reiterate the point that was made by the hon. member in the introduction to his question and that is that the situation now is creating circumstances of increasing instability. One cannot assume that the status quo is neutral in terms of the lives of people in the territory. It is becoming increasingly dangerous. Among other things, the capacity of moderate leadership on both sides to retain their efforts to exercise restraint is put under strain every day.

FITNESS AND AMATEUR SPORT

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, my question is directed to the Minister of Fitness and Amateur Sport.

The Sports Federation of Canada, in its brief to the finance committee, stated that "the application of the GST would have a devastating effect on the activities of amateur sport".

My question to the minister is this: In recognition of the importance of amateur sport here in Canada, will the minister increase the funding to these organizations to offset the negative impact of the GST?

An hon. member: I hope so.

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I have met with the Federation of Canadian Amateur Sport. I understand that prior to my becoming minister in that portfolio, it had met with the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Revenue. As a matter of fact, it was very happy with the solutions they proposed and what the Minister of Finance had done for sport in Canada.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Mr. Speaker, I would have liked to hear what benefits are being given to amateur sport.

Point of Order

I have here a copy of a 20-page report filed by the Nepean Minor Hockey Association which has concluded that the total adjusted impact of the GST will result in thousands of dollars in over-all price increases to the annual operating budget of the MHA.

Will the minister take steps to persuade the Minister of Finance to exempt amateur sport from the GST or, better yet, to scrap the tax?

Hon. Marcel Danis (Minister of State (Youth) and Minister of State (Fitness and Amateur Sport) and Deputy Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance, in the GST bill proposed to the House, has put in a number of special provisions to assist non-profit amateur sport organizations. I think he has done a tremendous job for amateur sport and should be congratulated.

TRANSPORT

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport. I am glad to see that he has returned alive from Windsor. It is something for which he deserves congratulations.

The Minister knows that the negotiations which he undertook with truckers in Windsor led to some kind of an agreement which he was finally required to promise to put in writing. Has he, in fact, sent those promises in writing to the truckers in Windsor? If he has done so, will he stand in the House and make a commitment to make them public, here and now, so that truckers all across Canada can see what the minister has decided to do?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to advise my hon. friend that those commitments were made public by myself and the Ontario Minister of Transport immediately after our discussions. They are already public.

I had offered to put commitments I made, with my word, in writing. We are in the process of formulating such a letter. The minute we have it formulated, then it will be in writing as well as on camera being made public by myself at about 10 o'clock this morning.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. I think it is important that those commitments be publicly put to truckers. If it does not happen, I can tell the minister, frankly, he will not see that demonstration end.

[Translation]

I have a supplementary question for the Minister. Quebec truckers have also decided to hold demonstrations on this issue. After this morning's discussions, will the Minister promise them that, in areas of federal jurisdiction, legal or police action will not be taken against the protesters?

• (1500)

[English]

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): As to the first part of my hon. friend's question, vis-à-vis Windsor, I am sorry, but I cannot think of anything more public and more on the record than a media conference with all of the reporters and the television cameras there. If there is something more public than that, I would like to know what it is and that will be done.

[Translation]

In the case of Montreal, I can assist the provincial Minister of Transport but any police intervention would fall under Quebec's jurisdiction.

Mr. Speaker: The Right Hon. Prime Minister on a point of order.

POINT OF ORDER

COMMENTS DURING QUESTION PERIOD

Right Hon. Brian Mulroney (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. During Question Period I referred to the fact that I believed that the Minister of the Environment, who had just resigned, was the first to serve on the Priorities and Planning Committee of Cabinet. This in fact is a serious error, because Your Honour himself was the Minister of the Environment and a member of P and P in the government of the distinguished member for Yellowknife.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Mulroney: Indeed, his tenure is widely remembered with great admiration by all environmentalists across Canada.

But I make the correction for two reasons. First of all, that it had to be made and, second, if I had not, my chances of speaking again in this Chamber will be greatly reduced.

Mr. Speaker: Under all the circumstances, I shall refrain from speaking.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

WEEKLY STATEMENT

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Mr. Speaker, it being Thursday, I would like to ask the Government House Leader to give us the legislative menu for the coming days.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow will be an allotted day, and I understand that the Liberal party will be leading off the debate. I would appreciate knowing what the subject is so that we might prepare.

On Monday, we will commence report stage consideration of Bill C-69, if there are report stage amendments. If not, we will proceed with third reading.

On Tuesday and Wednesday it is my intention now to call Bill C-58, the Young Offenders bill, followed by Bill C-63, establishing the Canadian Race Relations Foundation, and Bill C-65, technical amendments to Customs Tariffs.

Thursday, May 31, will also be designated an allotted day.

Mr. Gauthier: Mr. Speaker, since the minister has now designated the day, I guess we can name the subject matter. It will be on municipal infrastructure and how the federal government needs to get involved in that again.

Mr. Andre: I thank the hon. member. I hope that included in the debate will not only be how we should get involved, but how we should finance it.

Mr. Gauthier: No comment, Mr. Speaker. We will debate that tomorrow.

GOVERNMENT ORDERS

[English]

CRIMINAL CODE

MEASURE TO AMEND

The House resumed consideration of the motion of Ms. Campbell (Vancouver Centre) that Bill C-43, an act respecting abortion, be read the third time and passed.

Mr. Len Hopkins (Renfrew—Nipissing—Pembroke): Mr. Speaker, it is quite obvious from having heard many speeches in this House that the bill before us has brought from individuals many very deep-lying emotions. It has been a very strong debate. It has been a debate in depth, as far as the issue is concerned.

In order to understand the positions of some people, it is important to have an idea of what in their lives promotes the feelings in them that they are expressing on the floor of the House and then we will understand this debate very clearly. Obviously, those who have spoken very strongly fully understand that there is something in their background, in their thinking, and in their life's experiences with other people that has led them to feel the way that they do.

In a debate of this nature, Mr. Speaker, I am sure that you would agree it is very important that common sense and coolness rule the day.

I have some very important points that I want to make. I realize that this is a very crucial debate and the feelings that I will put on the record this afternoon are very sincere and they are certainly the way I feel about this issue personally. No matter how one looks at the abortion issue, I feel in all conscience that I have no right, and I do not think that any of us has any right to unnecessarily destroy life before or after birth.

God brings us into this world and he takes us out. Sometimes it is extremely difficult to accept the death of a loved one, but there is a purpose and there must be a faith. Therefore, we must talk about this debate today in good faith, because as we discuss it we must bear in mind that we are talking about the future of young people in this country, whether or not they are going to be born.

On the other hand, you can imagine the horrible thought, Mr. Speaker, that those loved ones that we have lost would have never been here if their father and mother had believed in abortion and you would have never known them. So this begs the question, how many potential friends, how many potentially great citizens, how many community leaders, how many leaders in general, how many internationally influential people, how many professional people, how many farmers and other people in various walks of life have never had the opportunity to play their roles in life because they were not allowed to be born? That is a serious question.

In this debate, it has been mentioned that the Liberal party has no policy on the abortion issue. I for one make absolutely no apology for that, because there are two types of debates in this House that by tradition and by practice have become free votes on the floor of this House. When a political party decides that it is going to have a strict policy that everybody must obey and then calls it a free vote, it is hypocrisy.

Mr. Nicholson: It's not true though, Len. They have not forced everybody.

Mr. Hopkins: The hon. member for Niagara Falls felt touchy when I said that, but I am not saying it in the sense that he is thinking about it and I want him to know that. I am saying it in the sense that no political party should be accused of not having a policy.

It is true that the government must bring forward a bill, but to say that it is the total policy and sincere belief of every member of a Cabinet is probably being inaccurate too. We know that the Minister of Justice who brought in this bill has some very strong views on it. That is her right and it is possible that the bill mirrors her feelings. Let us not argue that point. She is part of the government and has the right to bring in the bill. Every member of every party in this House has the right to vote on that bill as they see fit. We have the right to bring in amendments to it. If our amendment is accepted, that is fine. If it is not, we have to live with the parliamentary system. It is a fact of life.

So let us not get hung up on the idea that parties as a whole must have a very definite policy on these great emotional issues, that are personal and conscience issues to many members on both sides of this House. I feel very strongly about that.

The public at large also has its personal feelings and agendas. That is why we get representations from all sides of an issue such as this. That is why we have to rely, as I said at the beginning, on cool heads and common sense in an emotional debate such as this.

The old argument as to whether or not the foetus is a human life will go on ad infinitum. The foetus follows through to a human life. There is a right to be born, in my view, and there is a right to live. We have no right to destroy life before birth any more than we have a right to destroy life after birth. I emphasize that the health of the mother is indeed a crucial decision, and a must.

One can take a look at a happy teenager today and realize that that person would never be here if the parents had decided that they would have the abortion. I remember a great moment of silence one day when speaking to a group of students here on Parliament Hill. There was one student who asked a question on the abortion issue and argued very strongly, quoting the parents, until one of the other students said: "Do you realize that with what you are proposing today, you may not have had the opportunity of being here with us in this group if your parents had exercised the philosophy that you are espousing?". These questions put forward the seriousness of this issue.

Economics has been mentioned as a factor in this debate. I feel very strongly that family planning must become a far greater priority than the economic factor. Are we going to allow economics to control whether or not people are going to be born in this democracy, this western society of ours? Do we as human beings have the right to make that decision? Some of us in this House would never be here today, if it was not for our parents wanting to bring us into this world.

I think of my own mother and father raising a family in the depression years of the 1930s. If economics had come into consideration, I certainly would not be here today and neither would my brother or sister. We had that kind of respect in our family. My mother and father took their duties as parents seriously.

Let us be a nation of understanding. Let us be a nation of love in the sense of respect and of help to others at all times. Common sense goes a long way in solving difficult problems.

I was not born in a hospital. I was born in a farmhouse during the depression years. The next door neighbour was the midwife. If economic considerations had been brought to bear at that time, I would never have been born and would not be here today.

I was born into a family that had no money. We could hardly pay our taxes during those years. However, there was love, caring, and understanding. I look back to my childhood days and I think of my parents. I consider them to be martyrs for what they went through. With no money they raised a family. They put three square meals a day on the table. They tried to give us guidance, and they gave us direction and encouragement. I well recall that if we did not take that guidance willingly, there were other methods of encouragement that persuaded us to take that guidance, and I do not regret that either.

If there is any side of economics that we should be looking at here, it is on the tax policies for young families. They should be given greater tax allowances. There must be some consideration given for the costs of raising a family today more so than we are doing.

I can remember when family allowances first came in. I was going to high school at that time. What a great thing that was for the family. To get a cheque at the end of the month for either $6 or $7—and eventually it became $8—was a real gift. We had never witnessed that before. It relates back to the situation where the economics of a family are indeed very important. If we are not going to help them out in that route with family expenses, then we should be helping them out through the tax system at their level of income.

Love at a time when young people become pregnant is a must. Love to people who experience unwanted pregnancies is a must. It is a time for understanding. It is not a time for self-righteousness. We must give them encouragement and no hypocrisy.

I know cases where mothers and fathers of young people have taken the daughter and the child and looked after them every day until they were on their own. I have every respect for people like that, because it shows that they are willing to face up to reality, that they have a great sense of decency, and that they accept the full responsibilities of parenthood.

The earlier or later stages of pregnancy do not really have anything to do with the rights of the foetus because it is on its way to becoming a full-fledged individual from the day of conception onward. It does not matter at what stage you destroy that foetus, you are still destroying that child's right to be born and to live a fair life.

My feelings are very strong on this issue because of personal experiences. I would just like to outline some of those personal experiences. I suppose in a way, as I said earlier, I have certain prejudices.

Our first child was born on Mother's Day 1961. After a very serious and long period for my wife, the baby was stillborn. It was a very difficult situation for a mother going full term. It also turned out later that that baby and we as a family were one of the first victims of thalidomide. I do not know how many times I counted every square of concrete on the sidewalk that encircled that hospital during those many hours. It put real emphasis in my mind as to the protection of the mother when it comes to any legislation that we are discussing, whether it be this or any other legislation.

When our second child came along, perfectly healthy, it was a great joy. When the third one came along, it was another great joy. Quite frankly, my only regret is that we do not have five or six more like them.

The old law that the Supreme Court struck down on January 28, 1988 was brought in with good intent in 1969. I was also here for that debate. However, the good intent of that legislation was not always followed in spirit over the years.

I get conflicting messages on the adoption of the argument: is there a real desire to adopt babies today? Some say that the system is working, and some say it is not.

There is one thing I want to put on the record, and it is that no father should be allowed to leave mother and child economically unprotected after having brought that child into the world. That father should not be allowed, simply because he lives in another province or territory, to fail to provide for that child's keep. He has an obligation.

In that regard, there is a real economic argument for this point. Part of this whole debate should be that once parents bring a child into the world, both of them are responsible. Certainly the father should not be allowed to walk out and get off scot-free. I think that is what is building a lot of resentment in our society today.

In conclusion, I would like to see strong action taken at both the federal and provincial levels on that issue.

[Translation]

Mr. Peter L. McCreath (South Shore): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate on Bill C-43. I have been following this bill since the beginning.

[English]

I have been involved with this issue for several months, starting with the caucus committee where I was privileged to serve with the hon. members for Argenteuil—Papineau, Kitchener, Surrey—White Rock, and others. I was with the legislative committee studying Bill C-43 for many weeks and grappling with this issue. Now here we are finally before the House at third reading.

I believe that this very contentious, emotional, intellectual and human issue is one that challenges people in many ways and in many parts of our country. As is well known, it is one that divides Canadians in many ways. It is a many-sided issue. I believe that first and foremost the debate in this place is not about philosophy. It is not about morality. It is about governance. It is about law, legislation, and the administration of justice in Canada. It is with respect to those matters that I wish to address myself today.

This issue of abortion in Canada represents a challenge to Canadians, one of many challenges that we have had throughout our history. It is a challenge which charges us with the task of reaching consensus in a country of great diversity. Indeed, this week of all weeks, all members present and people from coast to coast are aware of the challenge to compromise that has been an inherent part of the history of this country since its origins: those days when people like John A. Macdonald, George Etienne Cartier, Charles Tupper, and others came together to try to find the compromise that would create this great and wonderful country of ours.

Here we are again, not undoubtedly for the last time, after several occasions in Parliament debating this very contentious, social, moral and philosophical issue. As I said, I wish to address this issue from the context of what I believe is our role and function here, not as a group of moralists but rather as a group of parliamentarians, as a group of people who have been selected by our fellow citizens to come here and seek the compromises that are the basis upon which Canada can work.

During the course of my remarks I wish to make reference to my own personal views on this matter. In so doing, I say to this House that many of the things that I would say if debate was not limited have already been said by my hon. friend, the hon. member for Surrey—White Rock, who gave what I thought was a very outstanding, inspiring address on the subject. I look forward to hearing from the hon. member for Kitchener. I expect that I will be as well able to associate myself with his remarks as I wish to associate myself with the remarks of my hon. friend for Surrey—White Rock.

I wish to focus on the legislative and political aspects of this issue because, after all, we are here to govern. We are here to seek a resolution to a contentious issue that has been with Canadians for generations but has once again been with parliamentarians for a little over two years since the previous bill relating to this subject was struck down by the Supreme Court of Canada.

As parliamentarians our job is to legislate for Canadians. In doing so, we have to put to ourselves a series of questions. We have to ask ourselves: What is in the best interest of Canada? We have to ask ourselves: What do Canadians want with respect to this issue? We have to take cognizance not only of the processes of Parliament and the dynamics of having things pass this place and indeed the one down the hall, but we have to take cognizance of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, other legislation, and the Constitution of Canada which, like it or lump it, does impose limitations on what we can or cannot usefully do in this place.

We can stand and say that we should pass a law that says this or that or something else. But, in the final analysis, if that law does not meet the tests that will be applied when it is taken to the Supreme Court of Canada, we have failed in our responsibility as the governors and parliamentarians of this country who have been sent here to act in a responsible manner.

Dealing with contentious issues is not an easy task. Indeed, this country is faced with many challenges and contentious issues today. It is my judgment that the country is fortunate to have leadership that does not shy away from challenges, be they the economic problems of the country, the challenges of our Constitution, or a contentious social issue like the question of abortion and how it should be handled within the legislative framework of Canada. We are fortunate, in my judgment, to have the inspired leadership of the Prime Minister we have today. It is primarily through his leadership and his willingness to take on challenges that we are in the process of concluding a debate on the contentious issue of abortion.

When we began last fall to try to develop legislation, our responsibility as parliamentarians was to develop a bill that could meet the test of this House and be able to pass through Parliament. Otherwise, it would not be a useful exercise. Second, it has to satisfy the Supreme Court of Canada and, ultimately, meet the test of Canadian public opinion. That is the next question we have to look at.

I believe that the bill before us today will pass. I will vote for it and I urge all members to vote for it regardless of their personal feelings on this very contentious subject. There are people in this House, in all caucuses, who are of diametrically different opinions. Our responsibility, as a collective group of parliamentarians, is to come together and find the reasonable balance, which I think is reflected in Bill C–43.

I believe it will pass the test of the Supreme Court. There is no doubt in my mind that it will be challenged, in court but I believe it will pass that test and, ultimately, I believe it will meet the test of the people of Canada.

As the member for South Shore I can ask what the people of the South Shore want with respect to this issue. But we as parliamentarians must ask what the people of Canada want. I believe that the people of the South Shore reflect very well the views of the people of Canada with respect to this issue. There are people in the South Shore who are absolutely, unequivocally, opposed to abortion. There are people who are absolutely, unequivocally of the opinion that abortion should be available on demand under any circumstances, at any time. There are people who have opinions that vary between those extremes.

I believe this bill represents a balance that will be acceptable to the overwhelming majority of Canadians. The people of the two extremes will not be satisfied and they have made that known fully, including those people, whom I admire, who stand out in front of this building every day as they have for months, fasting for life. I respect the courage, the commitment and the integrity of those people. But those people are not charged with governing Canada; we are. While I may share their sentiments, the fact of the matter is that a bill that reflects their position would be thrown out in a minute by the Supreme Court of Canada and we would have failed in carrying out our responsibilities.

I believe the overwhelming majority of Canadians want an end to the public chaos that has existed with respect to abortions in Canada. Last summer we in this country witnessed on television young people's lives in turmoil, young people going before the courts to fight out whether there should be or should not be an abortion in a particular circumstance. I think the Canadian public wants an end to that kind of thing. Canadians say that the role of government is to bring as much order as possible where there is chaos. That, I believe, is the challenge that the public has put to us. That, I believe, is what will be accomplished.

We will not satisfy everybody. We cannot satisfy everybody. Canadians are fundamentally reasonable people. That is why Canada has existed for 123 years. That is why Canadians met the challenge of the conscription crisis in 1944, the schools crisis in the 1890s, and indeed that is why I am confident Canadians will come together and resolve the constitutional crisis of 1990. That has been the essence of our history. Canadians are people who fundamentally understand the necessity of and indeed have the ability to cope with the need to compromise. That is what we have reflected in this bill before us here today.

I might take a moment or two to talk about my own feelings. When I became a candidate for public office early in the fall of 1988, I knew that I would have to think about the issue of abortion and ask myself how I will be counted when the time comes.

I have never hidden my views on that subject. I consider myself a pro-lifer. I am one of those who believes, as was so eloquently articulated by the hon. member for Surrey—White Rock earlier today, that life begins with conception. I believe that from the moment of conception, no matter what language is used, we are dealing with a life. I am one of those who believes that life should not be lightly taken away. I believe that one of the most basic human rights that exists in society is the right to life. Therefore, I essentially oppose abortions.

Frankly, there are circumstances under which abortions are appropriate. One has to look at abortion as an issue of conflict of interest, the interest and the rights of the mother on the one hand and the interests and the rights of the unborn child on the other.

If one is pushed to draw a line and is not constrained by things such as constitutions or charters or anything else, the appropriate line should be drawn where the self-interests of the one imposes upon the right to life of the other. If I were the draftsman or the technician, my line would recognize that where the health or life of the mother is threatened it may indeed be appropriate to have an abortion performed.

Inasmuch as you are dealing with that kind of conflict, in the final analysis I believe that abortion should not take place simply because somebody, as a matter of choice, does not wish to allow a baby to be born.

What is the best solution? There is no question that the way to deal with abortions is not through legislation. The best way to deal with abortions is to remove the need for them. It seems to me that a responsible government, in dealing with abortion, is not only going to address itself to defining a circumstance under which abortion can or cannot take place. Rather, it is going to ensure that education is in place so that unwanted pregnancies do not occur. It is going to ensure that appropriate birth control methods are readily available to those who have need of them. That is the way to deal with it.

We must ensure that the support systems exist in society so that if a young girl becomes pregnant she is not forced to give up that child because she is not in an economic circumstance where she can care for that child. Not only is she making a decision about that unborn child, she is making a decision that affects her. She may prefer to have that opportunity but if the support services are not in place she is unable to take it.

A very good friend of mine has often said to me that there is no such thing as an unwanted child; there is somebody who wants that child. There are people in this country today who would like to have babies but cannot have their own. We have to come to grips with that as well.

In conclusion, I believe Bill C-43 achieves a balance that is reasonable. I believe it will meet the test of this House and, indeed, of the other place. I believe it will meet the test of the Supreme Court of Canada. Most important of all, I believe it will meet the test of the Canadian people. It recognizes the fundamental principle of life and when it begins. It recognizes that abortion should take place for some medical reasons. Personally, I would have preferred to have this bill more definitive, with a greater incumbency to demonstrate a medical necessity as opposed to what is, frankly, a fairly wide-open piece of legislation.

Nevertheless, the bill we have before us is unequivocally a step in the right direction. It is a piece of legislation that will serve the interests of Canadians. It is a piece of legislation that will bring an end to the chaos that has existed in this country.

Consequently, I am prepared to support this bill. I commend it to my fellow members of this House and urge all members to support it for the benefit of all Canadians.

Ms. Lynn Hunter (Saanich—Gulf Islands): Mr. Speaker, I have a number of questions for the hon. member. The first relates to his analysis that this legislation is a matter of the "administration of justice". I put that last phrase in quotes because I think we have to talk about justice in a broader sense than just the legalistic term.

• (1540)

He also says that this a resolution of this contentious issue. I believe that he is fooling himself and fooling the rest of Canada with that analysis. There is not going to be a resolution of this contentious issue by recriminalizing abortion. The only means by which there is going to be a resolution of this contentious issue is to give adequate support, funding and understanding to enable women to exercise birth control and men to exercise responsibility in their relations with women. The Canadian government should also participate in that in a really meaningful way.

The member talked about the public chaos of last summer. Once again, I think his analysis is totally wrong. This legislation would in no way stop injunctions of men wanting to use the court system to take control of women. There is no way that recriminalizing abortion will do that. His logic is rather strained.

I want to ask the member a question about his analysis that women are acting out of self-interest should they seek abortions. This type of logic speaks of the utter contempt in which some men in this House hold women. It makes me exceedingly angry. Women who have gone through this process and this painful decision have not done so out of self-interest. Abortion is always a tragedy.

I would commend the previous speaker to please have a little understanding. He has never experienced an unwanted pregnancy. He knows not of what he speaks. I would ask him to please address his comments with respect to Canadian women.

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague opposite raises some very important points. I was taking notes to try to ensure that I address all of the points she raised. I will endeavour to do so.

Possibly she misunderstood my intent or I did not articulate my position adequately. I unequivocally recognize that an abortion is an option of the absolute last choice. I understood the hon. member to say that no woman has an abortion just for something to do, frivolously or otherwise. In no way whatsoever would I ever think that or suggest it.

I think, though, that it is incumbent on all people in Canada to act responsibly; men and women. As the member quite rightly points out, men are as much involved in the decision to create pregnancy as are women. However, the bottom line is that men cannot have abortions and I do not think it is a legitimate suggestion to therefore say that men have no interest in the subject whatsoever.

This is a subject that involves all Canadians because when we are talking about abortions we are not just talking about women. We are talking about an unborn child, about another human being. Where is the consultation process for that individual? Where is the choice for that individual? That is why, in my judgment, we cannot lightly give away or abrogate the right of that individual to have his or her interest considered in the decisions that are taken.

With respect to the member's comments on the need for adequate support and funding, I believe that I addressed that point in my remarks. I feel very strongly, as I said, that the best way to deal with abortions is to eliminate them by making them unnecessary. The overwhelming number of abortions which are taking place in this country today need not take place if there was adequate support of the type the member speaks of, if there was proper education of young people. We have come a long way, but we have a long way to go.

The subject of criminalization has been a contentious issue from the beginning. It is important to recognize two things. First, people look to the Government of Canada to deal with this issue. The Government of Canada can only do so within the context of the jurisdiction provided it in the Constitution of Canada. The access to the Government of Canada came to this issue through the criminal process.

I should remind my hon. friend opposite that what is criminalized, if that is what is going on, is not abortions, but abortions held outside the law. This law, among other things, seeks to create an environment in which, in reasonable circumstances as defined in the law, abortions can take place where they should take place, under the authority of properly qualified medical practitioners.

Finally, as to the resolution of the issue, my hon. friend opposite is absolutely right. This bill will not end the debate on the subject of abortion in Canada. I never suggested that it would. I do not recall having suggested that. I doubt that any member of the House would suggest that this bill, or for that matter any other bill, would end debate on the subject of abortion in the country.

I suggested that this bill represents a reasonable compromise between diametrically opposite positions. It is a reasonable compromise that will be acceptable to the overwhelming majority of Canadians who fundamentally are not on the extreme of any given issue but are people who learn to understand. One might say it is the Canadian way of understanding, the way of reasonable compromise. That is what this bill is. For those people, the vast majority of Canadians, this will mean a resolution to the issue, as I indicated.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, in a number of circumstances, the hon. member referred to the test of the Supreme Court and how, in his analysis of Bill C–43, it would meet the test of the Supreme Court.

Would the hon. member state for us what his view is of the test of the Supreme Court and how Bill C–43 will specifically meet that legal test?

Mr. McCreath: Mr. Speaker, I am not going to stand here and pretend to be an expert in jurisprudence. Nevertheless, I will not hesitate to comment on the subject.

The lines were essentially drawn by the decisions that have been brought down in the Morgentaler case, the Daigle case, and others. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that you do not want a 45–minute legal dissertation from me, which I would otherwise be delighted to present. But, essentially, those decisions stated, first, that Parliament should create a law. Second, they stated that, within that law, Parliament should make provision for women to have access to abortions in Canada and that the law should create an entitlement for women to have abortions in Canada. I prefer the word "entitlement" to "access". The access is something that is determined within the health services of the provinces.

At the same time, the decisions indicated that there is an incumbency on Parliament to take cognizance of the rights of the unborn. Therein it seems to me that the court has told this Parliament to find a middle road between the two positions. The courts have very clearly indicated that a choice on either of those extremes would not be acceptable to them. The courts have made it perfectly clear that we must find a middle road. That, I submit, is what we have attempted to do with Bill C–43.

Mr. David Barrett (Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to participate in this debate. At the outset I would like to state that I am opposed to this bill. I will persuade the rest of the House to take my position and I will give you the reasons why I will persuade them.

Even those who are opposed to abortion should understand that this bill is a political bill to deal with a social problem. It attempts to find a political solution to a problem that does not have a political solution.

• (1550)

If a member on either side of the House argues that in their opinion and moral conviction life begins at conception, then they cannot vote for this bill. It is sanctimonious cant to suggest that somehow this bill is a compromise and will allow them to abandon their principles and argument about the sanctity of life because the state somehow, with this piece of legislation, has defined when life is sanctified and when it is not. That is hypocrisy. It does not serve the debate that is necessary for the public to come to some acceptable resolution socially about this problem.

This government has set the debate back by using a political instrument to cover itself within the polls, rather than taking a responsible position as a government either for or against the right of a woman to make a choice as to whether or not she should have an abortion.

Those who hold to the argument—and I do not dispute their right to do it, I hold to a different argument—that life begins at conception cannot morally justify a vote for this legislation. It does a great deal of damage to those people who are sincere in holding their position—just as I am sincere in holding mine—that life begins at conception. It is a mockery of that argument to stand up in the Chamber and say they believe that and then allow themselves to vote for this bill.

Having said that, I want to outline why, after wrestling with my own conscience about this situation, I have decided to vote against the bill and why I am pro–choice.

There is indeed merit in the argument about when life begins. It is a human decision based upon the scientific and religious evidence in front of us. We have to make that decision in true conscience. I do not make my decision frivolously. It is based on true conscience because of an accumulated series of experiences I have had in my life through my chosen profession as a social worker.

I was 22 years old when I had my first caseload of children at the Children's Aid Society of Vancouver. In those days I was responsible for 78 children. This private agency hired me at the age of 22 to be, in a sense, a substitute parent for those 78 children. I had graduated from university and it was presumed, because I had four years of university education, that I was somehow qualified to be a surrogate parent for those 78 children.

Nothing could have been further from the truth. I was not prepared to deal with the real problems of those children. All the book learning I had relative to the needs of those children was absolutely invalid in terms of the practical situation with which I was faced.

Most of the children for whom I was responsible had an absence of love. They were unwanted children. They were not desired by their mothers. It was an accident of fate as a result of a situation that existed in the country at that time.

You could not even buy condoms in a drugstore when I was a teenager. The attitude of the state at that time was to bury its head in the sand. Condoms were not even discussed. The only reason we discuss birth control or access to information on birth control is the threat of AIDS. What logic and reason could not do to our society, AIDS has forced us to do.

Now that we have had an open discussion about the problems of sexually-transmitted diseases, we are talking about preventing sexually-transmitted diseases without even putting it in the context of human sexuality and human physiology.

Those 78 children for whom I was responsible were disadvantaged from day one. They had no opportuntiy parallel to any normal child out there. My colleague made the bland statement: "Well, don't worry, there is somebody out there who will love the child". Would that be true!

Today, caseloads are not 78 children. They are 250 or 300 children per social worker and they are just as inadequate in dealing with those as they were in my day.

How many trained social workers with a Masters degree are in the line carrying a caseload? Very few. How many are there in the age group of 45 to 55, when they have accumulated at least some life experience to make some sensible judgments about the tremendous problems that are in front of them? Very few. We still have denied the fact that we reject children in our society. We reject those unwanted children in archaic social systems that guarantee us a population in our prisons and in our mental institutions.

What chance does a child have if that child is unwanted and shuffled along to an agency with the hope that someone will adopt the child? In the argument of the previous two members I heard speak, economics has nothing to do with it. Like blazes, Mr. Speaker.

However, let us assume that economics had nothing to do with it and that wealthy people would be benevolent enough to embrace these children to their bosom and raise them. Money does not guarantee the raising of a good child. If there is an absence of love in a relationship between a man and a woman, it does not matter whether they live in a house with a dirt floor or in a mansion in one of the most expensive suburbs. That kid is headed for trouble.

Do we do any pre-marital counselling in the country? Not a whit. On a basis that the state says that we should—

Mr. Wappel: That's not true.

Mr. Nicholson: Only if the state pays for it?

Mr. Barrett: I am glad I have their attention. In the province of British Columbia, we asked the religious community to make itself available on a voluntary basis for pre-marital counselling of those couples who chose to take it. They responded positively and we initiated a program. Then I said that we should delay giving marriage licences for a six-week period. If the state is going to give permission to people to get married, then the state should have some evidence that they voluntarily had pre-marital counselling.

What do we do with people who drive cars? The state requires not only that they take lessons in driving a car but that they pass an examination before they get behind the wheel. The state even goes further and requires that they drive on the proper side of the road.

What an interference of freedom of choice. Why in the heck does the state have the right to examine whether or not you can drive a car? Why does the state have the right to tell you what side of the road to drive on? Why does the state do that? It does so because it is in the role of social order, to ensure that there is a sense of public safety and discipline in the state.

I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that if the state feels that secure about requiring a licence before you drive a car and telling you what side of the road to drive on, the state at least can make birth control information and pre-marital counselling available to make sure that we are not raising a generation of ignorant children who have no awareness of what human sexuality is all about.

When I grew up I was supposed to learn, as a male, about human sexuality by hanging around the street. When I was a teenager, every young man was supposed to be an expert in sexual matters and every girl was supposed to be a virgin. I never knew how, socially, we were to reach that desired goal in our male-female roles unless two people tangoed. There was a tacit admission in our society that sex did not exist. Yet, males were supposed to be experts and women were supposed to be virgins. The absurd hypocrisy of our society in dealing with human sexuality knows no limits and the progeny of that kind of ignorance fills up our institutions and mental hospitals.

I spent five years working in jails. In almost every single instance of young boys whom I worked with, there was an abysmal lack of information about human physiology and also an absence of love. They were bitter and hateful simply because they were not wanted. Now if the state says that you cannot have an abortion, then the state has a moral right to ensure—just as they do with drivers' licences or telling people what side of the road to drive on—that every child has the maximum opportunity to reach any potential level of success they can. We do not.

• (1600)

Look at our poverty rolls. Look at people on welfare. I have yet to hear a significant voice in the pro-life community demand a bill of rights for children in this country, and demand a guarantee of minimum services for those children. If they put the same amount of energy in their argument against abortion into the defence of those children who are already born, I would feel a little more comfortable.

The absence of child care in the institutions we provide, the scandals we see in the housing residences we have for young boys and girls, is shocking. In my own province, Willingdon School for Girls and Brandon Lake School for Boys guaranteed a succeeding class of occupants for Kingston penitentiary and the British Columbia penitentiary. At one time 60 per cent of the occupants of the women's penitentiary in Kingston were graduates of the same Willingdon School for Girls.

There is a lot of hypocrisy going on and I want to address myself partly to that. Where in the world are those screaming battalions of voices and placards out in front of this building, demanding that basic child services be guaranteed by law for every child in this country? Where are they? Where are those screaming-meemies who are determined to tell every woman what she must or must not do about her body, or her choice? Where are those screaming-meemies when it comes to the number of children in this country who are going to school ill-housed and ill-fed?

I hear this pious clap-trap about love and understanding and commitment. It is b.s., Mr. Speaker. And you know what b.s. is? That's the Blarney Stone, Mr. Speaker—I do not want anyone to misinterpret what I am saying.

I want to tell you, Mr. Speaker, there is an absence of commitment to children in this country.

Now I want to deal with the choice of some woman who finds herself with an unwanted pregnancy. Can you tell me what the hell the state has to do with the decision that she must make? Can you tell me what role this Chamber, a group of citizens representatives of all Canadians—and Lord help us, sometimes I think it is below the average of most Canadians—has got to do with telling that women, who is a victim of incest or rape, that she must carry the child to term? Fie on your head! Nonsense! Suggesting that any young woman, a victim of incest or rape, must carry a child to term is the most horrendous kind of scenario that one could possibly expect, and I think in this sense it is male-dominance visiting those attitudes on a woman in that situation.

I find it incredible that we are faced with this bill. I deeply respect those people in this House who say they are going to vote against it because of moral conviction and their belief that life starts at conception. I respect them deeply. And I hope that they, in turn, respect my point of view. But I do not respect the hypocrisy of those who are rationalizing that this bill somehow solves the problem.

Since you know my point of view and how I am going to vote and why, I make an appeal to this House. When this debate is over will we hear again about children in need in this country? When this debate is over will members get up and demand that the government set national standards for child care in this country? Will we hear a debate in this Chamber that no caseload of children in a child care agency, either private or public, goes over 30 or 40, just as we expect in classrooms? Will we hear a demand in this Chamber that never again will we set up community based and funded homes where children are placed in unsupervised situations and assaults on those children take place? Do you think this is new? It has gone on generation after generation after generation in this country and I dare say, unfortunately, it is probably still going on in some instances in this country.

We still jail children in this country, Mr. Speaker. Go and take a look at your own province's set-up for dealing with "juvenile delinquents". Check out what we do with children when they come into court. Find out what is going on day after day in a court system that denies children the same basic protection that any adult will get in any court situation in the country.

Hypocrisy reeks through this whole debate. Unless there is a guarantee that every child in this country is given some basic elementary human rights and protections from the law, the persuasion of my argument is going to fall on deaf ears. I have emptied the Chamber with my eloquence.

Having had the debate, it is incumbent on this Chamber, regardless of the side we take on this bill, to see that the government initiates legislation to deal with the companion problems of what is happening in our society. I appeal to members to understand that there are unwanted children in our society. Someone is responsible for them and that someone is us, the collectivity of the state that makes the laws. We are morally responsible to ensure that those children have a decent chance at life.

When this bill passes away, I would like to hear the sanctimonious voices that argue against it or for it, based on protecting their own political rear ends, focus on the leftover problem of the neglected children in our society who need our attention and care. I thank you for listening, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member speaks about sanctimony. He said: "Hypocrisy reeks through this whole debate". It is not often that I agree with the hon. member but, with respect to this particular statement, I agree.

Coming from a member of Parliament who belongs to a political party that speaks about choice and the freedom to choose, the member talks about choice. Yet, in his own political party—and you speak about hypocrisy and sanctimony—his colleagues do not have the choice to vote in this House according to their own conscience. The party says that if you are a member of the New Democratic Party, then you must vote in this particular way, regardless of what your own morality tells you, regardless of where you stand on the issue. Members of the New Democratic Party are not permitted to vote according to their own conscience.

The member speaks of hypocrisy, but he and others in his party participated in the capital punishment debate. I recall it well. The member was not in the House a few years ago when we debated that issue. I recall very vividly and specifically his colleagues standing up, one after another, talking about the sanctity of life, about how important it was to protect life and how morally wrong it is, for the Government of Canada to destroy human life through the process of capital punishment.

These same members—and you speak of hypocrisy—now argue a different point. Now they no longer argue how sacred and how much sanctity there is to human life, all of a sudden they approach it from a different perspective.

In view of the position of his party; first, can he explain why members of his party do not have the choice to vote according to their own consciences? Second, I would like to ask the hon. member to explain very clearly where he stands on the issue of when life begins? He took others to task for suggesting that life begins at the moment of conception. In his view, given his position—

Mr. Rodriguez: Let him answer.

Mr. Nunziata: You will have a moment to answer. The hon. member says prior to birth. There ought not be a law in Canada to recognize life before birth. Is the hon. member arguing and suggesting that human life begins at the moment of birth? If not, how can he reconcile his position on the issue of abortion with the fact that he must agree that life begins at some point before birth?

• (1610)

Mr. Barrett: It is very hard to follow my predecessor's logic. First of all, I will deal with his question about the votes in my party. I want to make this very clear, I would never belong to a party that does not allow everybody, in true conscience, to make their own decisions.

Mr. Nunziata: That's nonsense.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member says that that is nonsense. I do not question the integrity of the members of his party. I believe every member who comes to this Chamber votes in true conscience. No party tells anybody what to do because, on that basis, it would hardly be worth our being here in the first place. If you presume that our party tells people how to vote, come to a caucus meeting some time and enjoy the experience.

Having said that, the next question is about the beginning of life. I do not believe it happens at conception. I spent six years in Catholic universities; I studied with the Jesuits; it was an incredible experience. Their position and my position are different. They worked on me for six years, I worked on them for six years. It was a draw, Mr. Speaker.

My opinion is different from that hon. member's. If he suggests life begins at the moment of conception then I have to accept, on the basis of that argument, that all those sperm that are being wasted are killers. All those sperm that have not performed their duty must be corralled by law and fined or locked up for not completing their job. We cannot have loose sperm running around this country, without completing their job. If life begins at conception, all those sperm are acting immorally by not performing their task, as predesigned under that theory. Now, I do not want to be a sperm rounder-upper, Mr. Speaker, I do not want to be a sperm counter, but if you follow that argument logically, then we can go into menopause as well and say that every month there has been a natural abortion, and save me from that argument. That rigidity is so stupid that it defies—

Mr. Wappel: What is your position?

Mr. Barrett: I am not God, neither are you. You have to make your own decision and at what point you make that decision.

Mr. Nunziata: What is your view? Are you afraid to state your view?

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, if that member wants my view, rent me a hall, gather me a crowd, and I will tell him my view, how hypocritical it is to take the line of argument that member takes.

Mr. Nunziata: You're afraid to answer the question, Barrett. You're chicken.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, even the church had a different position 130 years ago. Read your own history, my friend. It is a man-made decision and man-altered decision. I do not tell you what to do, I do not play God and you do not play God either. That kind of sanctimonious camp, especially for women, telling them what they have to do, is frankly absurd.

I want to thank you, Mr. Speaker, for letting me participate in this debate and I want to thank my hon. friend who is so wrong but so sure of himself.

Mr. Benno Friesen (Parliamentary Secretary to Solicitor General of Canada): Mr. Speaker, the way the member was talking about sperm and knowing the opposition that the NDP have to banks, I am sure that they are opposed to sperm banks too.

I listened to the member's speech with attention, and he kept impeccably intact his long tradition of having a stirring speech on a subject that was totally or almost totally unrelated to the subject before us, unless he is suggesting that to deal with all the housing problems, we ought to have abortions freely available. And to deal with all of the other social issues in life, we ought to have abortions freely available. If that is his solution to all the social problems, then he certainly misled us in his speech. He centred on one particular subject that fascinated me, because I have wondered about this for many years. He said when he was premier he invited the community to have a test for marriages, I thought I heard him say that.

Mr. Barrett: Pre-counselling.

Mr. Friesen: Pre-counselling or some kind of test. I would like to ask him how the community responded to him. What happens if people flunk?

An hon. member: They take another course.

Mr. Friesen: I am fascinated by the suggestion. I have often been intrigued by the fact that people have to take a course to drive a car, which is a lot simpler than maintaining a solid marriage.

An hon. member: All the more reason for some instruction.

Mr. Friesen: Right. I would like him to answer that question.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): I think the hon. member should use the next 60 seconds very carefully.

Mr. Barrett: Mr. Speaker, I had difficulty in convincing my own colleagues in the House that legislation would be appropriate before issuing a marriage licence so I asked for voluntary participation. I asked the religious communities if they would participate, and they responded positively. We set up a family life council in the province of British Columbia that had the backing and the role of the religious community.

I am very sorry that my successor, the then minister of welfare, was the one who killed that program, the Hon. William Vander Zalm, the great spokesperson for family life. However, the program was reinitiated after public demand.

Referring to the consequence of it, it is not a question of asking people to write a test. It was a commitment from the religious community that I admire and respect on a non-sectarian basis to participate in encouraging and giving an opportunity to those people who had convictions or were seeking some guidance to discuss them with someone who was knowledgeable in that field. I was looking to cut down the number of divorces in our society. I am still looking for a way to solve that problem. I do not have the magic answer. However, I wanted to expand the options available to couples who were serious about their marriage vows to talk to somebody on a whole range of subjects before they went into marriage.

Furthermore, I would hope that such programs would be encouraged today. I conclude by making the same appeal. There are children out there who need basic services. Can we put the same emotion into an argument to ensure that those services are provided?

Mr. John Reimer (Kitchener): Mr. Speaker, I have struggled with how I should vote on this bill at third reading. As a legislator I accept my duty of legally protecting the most vulnerable of all human beings within our society: the unborn.

Today, as I stand in this House, I appeal to my colleagues to contemplate the historical importance of this moment. We are doing what we have been elected to do: to make law. We have had no law since January 1988. For the previous 19 years we had a law that did not adequately protect the unborn. I have been a part of this continuing struggle since my involvement as a hospital board member in Kitchener for nine years and as a member of Parliament from 1979 to 1980 and again since 1984. I have submitted private members' bills on this topic and have participated in every debate on abortion and most recently as a member of the legislative committee on Bill C-43.

Earlier today we heard two excellent presentations by two other members of that committee. We heard a moving and inspiring speech by the member for Surrey—White Rock. We also heard an excellent address from the hon. member for South Shore.

Since the Morgentaler decision of the Supreme Court in January 1988 our country has been without a law on abortion. For many, the debate on what should be done about abortion has been based on the assumption that the only law which would be constitutionally acceptable to fill this vacuum is one that is based on the gestational approach. This approach would in effect guarantee abortion on demand for up to 16 weeks or 20 weeks.

The present bill is not what I would like it to be. To develop a law on the assumption of gestation would violate my fundamental understanding of life and that of the world-renowned scientists such as Dr. Jerome Le-Jeune who appeared before our committee.

My colleagues and I have worked long and hard to change the kind of bill the government would introduce into the House from one that permits abortion on demand for up to 20 weeks to one that protects life from conception.

• (1620)

I am pleased that Bill C-43 has implicitly accepted that life affirming approach to law and has rejected the gestational approach. After an all-party legislative committee examined the proposed legislation and after this House last night turned down amendments which would have strengthened the legal protection of the unborn, we are now faced with the key question of saying yes or no to Bill C-43 unamended. Now I have come to this moment of declaring my position and my reasons for that position.

I will be supporting Bill C-43 as it stands at third reading. My reasons are as follows. First, if this bill passes it will signify an important shift in the debate since the Morgantaler decision of January 1988. The gestational approach, which even the Law Reform Commission in its 1989 study paper offered as the only way to reach a compromise, was rejected.

With the passage of this bill, arguments on the taking of the life of the unborn can no longer be based on the assumption that life before birth can be taken at will. Why? Because this bill has in effect rejected the pro-abortion ideology. If this bill is passed, future debates should focus on the reasons abortion should or should not be allowed.

Since January 1988 we have been forced to argue why the unborn should be protected. If this bill passes, the operative assumption is that life of the unborn is indeed deserving of some legal protection from conception. Now the burden lies with those who favour abortion to provide medically valid reasons it should be allowed. Therefore we have begun to build on the principle that life must be protected from conception.

Second, there is at least an attempt to deal with the very difficult challenge of protecting both the unborn child and the mother. While that attempt is incomplete the bill recognizes the existence of two lives. By so doing, the legislation recognizes a reality which cannot be and indeed must not be avoided.

The third reason I support this bill is that abortion is again in the Criminal Code and subject to a criminal sanction in the case of unlawful abortion. Let us not underestimate the value this communicates to the Canadian public. It makes a statement to our nation that abortion is no longer regarded by law makers as a simple or casual medical procedure. Abortion is again a criminal act unless it meets the requirements of the law and the standards of the medical profession. Law not only serves to contain unacceptable behaviour but also serves as a guide upholding values for all to see and to respect. As the Law Reform Commission stated:

> The criminal law is our nation's fundamental statement of public policy—ultimately the criminal law is a mirror of what we are; it reflects our commitment or lack of commitment, to human dignity and equality. The law does not exist for the sole or primary purpose of punishing illicit acts. It exists, as an expression, in a broad sense, of the kind of people we are. It does not merely regulate our behaviour, it articulates and symbolizes our values and beliefs.

Furthermore, the Supreme Court will be required to recognize the principles of justice reflected in this bill. As well, this bill calls on the medical profession to deal with the life of both the unborn child and the mother. Doctors are expected to exercise their professional responsibility to the best of their ability, recognizing that they must consider the human right to life of both patients.

Finally, this bill provides us with a foundation on which we can build in the future. By rejecting the assumption and approach of gestation and by implicitly recognizing the protection of life from conception, we now have a basis on which to build stronger protection for the unborn. We can then better balance the mother's right to the security of her person and the state's interest in the protection of the foetus. However, there is a very serious weakness in this bill. The definition of health is far too broad and far too inclusive. This major weakness created such difficulties for me, to the point of almost voting against the bill at third reading. However I have come to recognize that the bill at least points us in the right direction.

Many ask if this bill will save any lives. I believe it could. Cardinal Carter commented:

> If the medical profession takes its new responsibilities seriously, if the attorneys general of our provinces apply the law as it is written, if our law officers, particularly our judges, enforce the prescriptions, we may save some lives.

Surely, if doctors took their responsibilities seriously under this bill individually and collectively, they could ensure that good medical practice according to their own medical standards and professional ethics would not permit some of their colleagues to disregard all that they have been taught. Through peer pressure and the enforcement of professional ethics, doctors could stop the vast majority of abortions that have absolutely no medical validity because they are socio-economic in origin, as they themselves testified and admitted before the committee.

For me, this bill is not a denial of my principles. I am not for a moment forsaking the principles which have guided and will continue to guide me in my ongoing struggle to protect the unborn. I am engaged in a long and difficult struggle for justice for the unborn. To vote for this bill is therefore part of a long-term strategy to help bring about public respect for life at all stages of development.

In October 1989 my colleagues and I turned the Department of Justice and the cabinet from a gestational approach. Indeed, for me to vote against this bill now would be a compromise. It would be an admission of defeat, an opting for no law, and a cop-out. This would be an abdication of my responsibility as a law maker.

When Bill C-43 was debated at report stage my colleagues and I introduced amendments. Frankly, I am deeply disappointed that none of them passed. We pressed for at least three amendments.

The first one would have added the word "seriously" before the word "threatened".

The second one would have required the physician to first conclude that there is no other medically acceptable treatment to alleviate the health risk.

The third amendment would have stipulated that the definition of the word "health" specifically exclude psychological considerations which the Minister of Justice before the committee interpreted to include socio-economic factors.

If these three amendments had been accepted they would have changed this bill into one which would have adequately responded to the Supreme Court's invitation to Parliament to balance the mother's rights to security of her person and society's interest in the protection of the foetus.

We are still making progress. In advising pro-lifers Dr. J. C. Wilke, President of the American Right to Life Movement said:

> Their choice is either to be unrealistic and seek legislation they are sure to lose and then watch the holocaust continue, or realistically pass the best possible measure, stopping (some) of the killing now, and then come back another year and save some more lives—with the passing of years it has become painfully obvious that we are not going to stop abortion in one single step. All responsible pro-life leaders accept that it will have to be done step by step.

With this bill we are taking one small yet important step today for the unborn. My prayer is that many more steps will follow. To give up on the bill and to do nothing is to stand idly by as tens of thousands of lives per year are snuffed out. I personally do not see that stance as a form of higher Christian integrity. We must work to restrain evil and save as many lives as we can whenever we can.

Some would argue that no law is better than this law. I believe they are mistaken for the following two reasons. First, we would be missing an opportunity to use the fulcrum of law to shift the influence of law toward justice for the unborn.

Second, it will be years before another government will attempt to write a law on abortion. As a legislator today, I cannot say: "Let's kill this bill so that hopefully in the future we can do better". That is compromising my task today by hiding behind the skirts of an unknown future and that, to me, is not leadership.

Furthermore, Cardinal Carter stated: "We are pleased that we will have a law, even one so imperfect".

Archbishop Ambrosic, who recently succeeded Cardinal Carter, stated on April 14, 1990:

> Abortion is always wrong. We can never be at peace with a law that permits abortion. Having said this, I ought to add that in my opinion, some law is better than no law. As it stands, the proposed law at least criminalizes abortion although I would like to make it much more restrictive than it is.

Further, I agree with the Law Reform Commissions's testimony to the committee. I would like to quote from what Justice Linden said to us:

> Bill C-43 does not solve all the problems of unwanted pregnancy. It is not meant to. It is just meant to solve a legal problem, a small aspect of this general problem. For a long-term solution, we need better education, better reproductive counselling, and greater social and economic support for child care. We need more help for women who get pregnant as a result of failed contraception, or because of incest or rape. We need to ensure that pregnant women have a real choice about their future, so that abortion does not seem to them to be the only answer. We need as a nation to be more compassionate and supportive of families, of mothers and their children. So let us recognize that Bill C-43 is only one step, albeit an important one, in dealing with this complex problem.

William Wilberforce fought for 19 years as a member of Parliament in England to end the slave trade, and for another 26 years to end slavery itself within the British Empire. Throughout all those years he never compromised on his ultimate goal and principles. However, he did make concessions in timing and he did vote yes to incremental improvements. He even agreed to pay slave traders money out of the public purse to provide an extra six inches of sleeping space on their ships carrying the slaves. But he did not compromise on his ultimate goal and principles.

Therefore, I say to my pro-life friends, let us keep our eyes clearly on the goal of achieving a real balance which recognizes both the mother's right to the security of her person and society's interest in the true protection of the unborn. In the meantime, let us say yes to whatever moves us toward that goal, even if the steps may seem very small indeed. At least they are steps in the right direction.

Today, we on the pro-life side of this debate, do not have the numbers, but we are strong enough to defeat any gestational law. We are strong enough to produce a bill that includes abortion in the Criminal Code. We are strong enough to make sure that there are some criminal sanctions against unlawful abortion and that the principle within that bill implicitly protects human life from conception or, more technically, from implantation.

We are also strong enough to ensure that by passing this bill we are taking the first step toward a stronger and better law in the future. Further, we are teaching that abortion is a serious moral issue and that society at large, and doctors in particular, should start acting responsibly. Our laws and our lives should express our commitment to compassion and justice for the lives of the unborn and their parents. This is my commitment. That is what I will work for as long and as best I can.

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member and I happen to agree with respect to the issue itself and that life must be protected from the moment of conception. However, I have very serious difficulties in accepting the reasons why he and others who consider themselves pro-life are supporting this piece of legislation.

He speaks of incremental gain. He feels that it is better to have this bill than no bill at all. I suggest to the hon. member that if this bill carries, and it appears that in fact it will carry on Tuesday, then the likelihood of a new bill or changes to this bill being introduced in the foreseeable future are negligible in that the government today, and perhaps future governments, will not feel the pressure necessary to address again the issue of abortion.

As well, I would like to say to him in all sincerity that when we are talking about rights surely he would agree that rights are rights. If we agree that life begins at the moment of conception, how then can he and others who consider themselves pro-life support a bill, which in my view is a fraudulent piece of legislation, that would allow abortion on demand, a bill that differentiates between life after birth and life before birth, in that if a life after birth is taken there follows a specific penalty?

In my view there is absolutely no adequate protection for life in this particular bill. The penalty is different for the taking of a life before birth, whether it be an hour before birth, a month before birth or three months before birth.

How can he reconcile his views with a bill that will, for all intents and purposes, allow abortion on demand? If one truly and sincerely believes in life and the sanctity of life, then how can one support a bill that treats life before birth differently than life after birth?

Mr. Reimer: Mr. Speaker, I will be pleased to try and respond to the questions raised by the member for York South—Weston.

The comment he made about incremental gain is correct. I am saying that we are at least gaining something. We are gaining a law. In the first place it is in the Criminal Code. It has a criminal sanction. It implicitly recognizes that there is a need to protect the unborn child, from conception.

He said that the government may not feel the pressure now if we pass this bill, and therefore, we will not be able to do anything further. I know the member was listening to me. He will recall what I said about one example from the British Parliament concerning William Wilberforce who worked for 19 years to end the slave trade, then 26 years more to end slavery itself. That is a long, long time.

If someone had come to him after the first attempt and said: "You are not going to get it. Give up", or if someone had come to him and said: "You are making a slight concession here. You cannot do that. Go for all or nothing," would he have ended it? No. He had to keep his eye on the ultimate goal and keep working at every step possible to get something. That is what we have to do.

The member asked if the government was not going to feel the pressure. That never stopped him before the law was struck down, or since it was struck down by the court from bringing in his own private members' bills. It did not prevent me from bringing in private members' bills. It did not prevent any of us from speaking in support of those private members' bills. We will continue to do it. I hope that he does that. I intend to do that. We have to keep working at this.

The question now is whether or not we are really acting responsibly as lawmakers if we say that it is better to have no law with no restraints, meaning full abortion on demand for at least another four years, plus the two we have already just passed as a minimum. I say no.

However, if this was a gestational bill before us, then I would say its principles are wrong. At least the principles in this bill are implicitly going the right way. That is why I say build on the little bit of good that is there. Therefore we will have a law. Therefore we implicitly say something must be protected. Therefore we are teaching society, and there is value.

Let us start doing what we did in terms of smoking. For many years smoking was perfectly acceptable. It was legitimate. Then some of us started to learn in our health classes that it is not acceptable. As a health and physical education teacher I taught that. Then we worked hard. I worked hard as a hospital board member to get rid of it. Finally, everybody started to listen to the evidence. Then we finally started to see some change.

Let us bring in a law that says it is criminally wrong. Let us now use that to teach. Let us use all the information that people like Dr. Jerome LeJeune gave us. Let us keep reminding people that they are dealing with life from conception.

Just as we got society to turn around on smoking, maybe we will begin to get society to turn around on this issue and start doing what I know the hon. member wants, what I want as well.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, the member opposite made comments about a member of Parliament in the British Parliament who worked for years to ensure an end to slavery. It was a laudable goal, and he was eventually successful.

I want to say that women in Canada have struggled for 20 years to get abortion out of the Criminal Code of Canada. Women have struggled long and hard to get abortion out of the Criminal Code of Canada.

I want to ask him how he feels about the majority of Canadian women who see this kind of legislation, and who see the kinds of remarks that he has made in this House today, as really insulting to them. Women do not take this decision lightly. Women struggle. Women search within their own souls and their own consciences before they make a decision to have an abortion.

How can he justify this criminal legislation and his attitude of the state and he having the right to decide when and if a woman will have a child?

Mr. Reimer: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby mentions the fact that there are women in Canada who do not want to see abortion in the Criminal Code. That is correct. There are also some men who do not want to see it in the Criminal Code. But there are also many other women who do want to see it in the Criminal Code. She did not mention that.

I presented in this House a petition with the signatures of women only—over 220,000 signatures—from across this country who wanted a law that would protect the unborn. What about those 220,000 women?

What about the many other women in Canada who say that according to all the available medical evidence we are dealing with two lives when we talk about abortion? We are dealing with the life of the mother and the life of the child within the mother.

I always find it incredulous to say that we have to balance those interests as though the mother somehow or other has to balance the choice of whether or not her own child within her has a right to life. My goodness, that is a denial of everything a mother wants. It makes no sense.

We know that in the sense of where there is a case of real threat to the mother's life, then there is a need to ask: "Is there a time when we take one life to protect another life?" There is then a legitimate role to play. The Supreme Court invited us to play that role. In fact, it said to us that the precise point in the development of that foetus is up to Parliament to decide. We have. This bill, even in its weak form, states that it implicitly starts at conception. That is why I say, let us take at least the good in this bill and let us vote for it so that we can build on it and keep working in the future to improve it.

Mr. Tom Wappel (Scarborough West): Mr. Speaker, in the brief time that I have to discuss Bill C–43 tonight, I would like to divide my remarks into three distinct categories.

First, I would like to state my position with respect to this issue. Perhaps a better way of putting it is to say that I will restate my position on this particular issue.

Second, I would like to discuss Bill C–43 and the inherent flaws that I see in it.

Third, I would like to make some responsive remarks to the speeches made by some other members and some of the points raised by them. I will then, of course, draw a conclusion.

My position is fairly clear. There is no greater right than the right to live. It is upon this right that all other rights rest. In that context, we have to look at what we are talking about when we speak about Bill C–43. Of course, we are speaking about abortion.

What is an abortion? With the greatest of respect, that is the question so many members of the House refuse to come to grips with. Precisely what is an abortion? If we look in the dictionary we find that abortion is defined as the procuring of premature delivery for the purpose of destroying offspring. I emphasize those words, "for the purpose of destroying offspring". That is the point. For me, human life begins at conception. Of course, if you have a human life and you have an abortion—a medical procedure designed to destroy offspring—you are clearly destroying human life.

Because an abortion kills a human being, it is wrong. It must be prevented, just as we prevent the killing of all other human beings, including convicted criminals. The reason the House is in this turmoil with respect to this issue is the overwhelming revulsion of society about the topic of abortion.

If we were not talking about the killing of a human being, but about something equivalent to cutting your hair or nails, or to mowing the lawn, no one would be upset. That is not what we are talking about. We are talking about the destruction of human life. That is what gets people into the state in which they have to air their grievances and about which they feel that there is no position other than their own.

That is why we have to come to grips as a country and as a Parliament with the fundamental question. We have to admit to ourselves that an abortion destroys a human being.

Why would I say that there is a revulsion in society? Let us look at the medical profession. We know that the Canadian Medical Association has approximately 45,000 member doctors. Out of that membership of 45,000 we know that there are approximately 800 who will do abortions. That is 1.7 per cent of the doctors in the country.

We further know from the Canadian Medical Association that out of these 800 doctors only about 325 do the majority of abortions. That is 0.72 per cent of the doctors in the country.

I ask rhetorically: Why is it that an infinitesimal percentage of the medical doctors in the country will perform an abortion? I will provide an answer. It is because those doctors know scientifically, from medical school and biology class, that an abortion destroys a living entity.

• (1650)

I would like to move on to address the flaws, as I see them, of Bill C–43, and, in doing so, to speak directly to those members of Parliament who oppose the allowing of abortions and yet consider that it is appropriate to vote in favour of Bill C–43.

This morning the Minister of Justice declared that this bill protects the foetus. We heard the member for Kitchener say time and time again how this bill implicitly—and he emphasized the word "implicitly", not explicitly but implicitly—protects the foetus.

The Minister of Justice said that this bill protects the foetus. I would like to say two things in that regard. Why is it appropriate for our society to protect the foetus? It can only be because the foetus is a human being. If the foetus is not a human being, why protect it? Why should we be involved in this debate at all? Of course the foetus is a human being. It needs protection. The government recognizes that it needs protection. The Minister of Justice says that this bill protects the foetus.

With the greatest of respect, I say that this bill does not protect the foetus. It will not stand the scrutiny of the Supreme Court of Canada. That is why I asked the member for South Shore what was the test of the Supreme Court of Canada. I will tell you, Mr. Speaker, what the test of the Supreme Court of Canada is.

I have in my hand the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in the Daigle case. I refer specifically to a section in which the Supreme Court is dealing with the Quebec Charter of Rights and the argument that a foetus is protected thereunder, and I quote:

> In our view the Quebec Charter, considered as a whole, does not display any clear intention on the part of its framers to consider the status of a foetus. This is most evident in the fact that the Charter lacks any definition of "human being" or "person".

This bill lacks any definition of human being or person. Yet, because it is in the Criminal Code, the only definition of human being or person contained in the Criminal Code provides that one becomes a human being when one is born. That is the definition of a human being in which this bill is being incorporated. How that protects the foetus is beyond me.

In any event, note that the Supreme Court finds that there is no specific definition of human being or person. The decision continues:

> One can ask why the Quebec legislature, if it had intended to accord a foetus the right to life, would have left the protection of this right in such an uncertain state—If the legislature had wished to grant foetuses the right to life, then it seems unlikely that it would have left the protection of this right to such happenstance.

That is precisely the point. That is precisely, in my view, what the Supreme Court of Canada is going to say with regard to this bill.

There is a definition of health in the bill, a very comprehensive definition of health, but there is no definition of foetus, no definition of human being, and no definition of what it is that this bill is attempting to protect and why. That failure is a fatal flaw in this bill. In my view, it will not pass the scrutiny of the Supreme Court.

The Supreme Court has stated clearly in the passages that I have cited that if you want to protect the foetus, Parliament has the right to do so, but you must do it explicitly. That is why the member for Kitchener, at least four times in his speech, said "implicitly". The member recognizes that the test is to be explicit. This bill is not. In fact, as I said, there is no definition.

If this bill passes it will institutionalize abortion. It will, in fact, make the procedure of abortion legitimate. In my view, the respect for life which it pretends to try to engender, will be diminished.

The member for Kitchener was talking about step-by-step procedures. In the United Kingdom, there is an abortion law which allows an abortion up to 28 weeks. Simply dividing the four weeks that there are in a month into 28 weeks shows that we are talking about seven months. In England abortion is allowed up to seven months. That was passed on the basis of putting it into law, and then working backward. It has not happened. Not only has it not happened, but society has become desensitized to the respect for life.

The next step has already been played out. Because of the lack of respect for life, embryo experimentation has been authorized in the United Kingdom. The next step, of course, is foetal experimentation. Is that the kind of society that we can look forward to in Canada?

I will now quickly address a few of the points that have been raised up by other members. A statement has been made that a woman has the right to choose. The question must be, a right to choose what? The answer is, to terminate a pregnancy. Quite frankly, that is an antiseptic way of saying, the right to choose to destroy the living entity within the person. I submit that that is unacceptable in a civilized society.

Another statement which has been used is: "It's my body". The fact is that there are two bodies involved. There is the mother and there is the child within her. Both those bodies are entitled to respect. Both those bodies are entitled to protection.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): I will have to ask the hon. member to conclude, please.

Mr. Wappel: Mr. Speaker, in conclusion, I would like to quote Martin Luther King who said: "A law may not change the heart, but it will restrain the heartless."

What kind of law? The law must recognize explicitly civilized society's recognition of the right of the unborn to be alive. This bill does not do that. I urge members to defeat it for that reason. No law is better than a flawed law, because a flawed law will lend legislative legitimacy to the greatest violation of human rights in history—the denial of the fundamental right to exist.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, when the member was stating his views on Bill C–43, he indicated that only a small proportion of doctors perform abortions in this country. He said it was because they knew or had scientific knowledge that when they were performing an abortion it was destroying a human life.

The truth of the matter is that only a small number of doctors perform abortions because they are harassed and because it is not a well–funded service for doctors. They find it a difficult question, there is no doubt about that, just as many of us find it a difficult question. But it has nothing to do with scientific knowledge.

I have a letter from the Canadian Medical Association. In part, it states: "We believe that, if passed, Bill C–43 will place at risk both the confidentiality and trust so essential to the physician–patient relationship. Further, we are convinced that this law will effectively limit access to this medical procedure resulting in greater danger to the pregnant woman's physical or mental well–being as the process for seeking an abortion becomes lengthier, one of the reasons the old law was struck down".

I would like the member to comment on the position of the Canadian Medical Association. I sat on the legislative committee. We saw no scientific knowledge from any of the scientific community, from the Canadian mental health community, or from the Canadian Medical Association, that supported his thesis. There simply is none. There was none. He is wrong.

Mr. Wappel: Mr. Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for her question. I believe that the answer that I can give is that there are divisions in the medical community as there are in this House, as there are in society. No matter what anybody says, less than 1 per cent of the doctors in this country do abortions. It is not because we do not pay doctors enough to do the abortions, it is because they find them distasteful. They find them distasteful because they know precisely what they are doing.

Every obstetrician in this country knows that when he treats a pregnant woman, he is treating two patients, his pregnant patient and the child within her. Every single doctor who treats that pregnant woman is perfectly aware that there are two patients. We cannot deny simple biology. We cannot deny that there is a living entity within the womb that is growing. We cannot deny that biological fact.

To say that life begins at birth is to say that anything can be done before birth because there is no inherent human value to be protected. I do not accept that. I hope that our Canadian society does not accept that, but this is the forum to discuss those points. This is what we should be discussing, talking about when life begins, deciding those questions and not hiding from them and pretending that they do not exist. We have to come up with the facts and decide when human life begins. Once we decide that as a legislative body, then we will decide when, if ever, human life should be terminated.

Mr. Nicholson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I just wanted to let you know that the procedure on the government side of the House from now on will be that each member will divide the 20 minute time, so that each member will have 10 minutes, followed possibly by a five minute question period. From this point on, on the government side, that will be the procedure.

Mr. Joe Comuzzi (Thunder Bay—Nipigon): Mr. Speaker, first let me start off by offering to you my personal congratulations on the choice the Prime Minister announced in the House the other day. I think you and I have spent have spent time in this House together and at different committees, and I was absolutely thrilled with the announcement. I wish you the very best and look forward to working with you and being recognized as time goes on.

I am not going to enlarge on the substance of what I have said in this House on two other occasions on this very important subject, those dates having been October 30 and November 22. I have some hesitation in getting up again today to speak on this subject but I found I should get up and speak from a procedural aspect rather than from a substantive aspect of the abortion bill.

Let me quote from the comments I made on November 22, as reported at page 6016 of Hansard:

> —it is the duty of every member of this House, to address these very important issues. We have now come to the point where decisions should be made. The decisions that are before us are: When do we terminate a pregnancy, what rights do individuals have in our society, and what are the rights of the unborn child from the moment of conception?

These are awesome questions that sometimes we have difficulty in answering. The reason that I rise today to address, not the substance of that issue, but some procedural aspects is that, prior to this first debate and as we get on to the situation of voting on this issue tonight, there is a group in our society that is determined to put an end to all abortions.

Unfortunately, in their zeal to protect the rights of the unborn, they often contravene, infringe upon, and fail to respect the rights of the living. They fail to respect the most fundamental right of all Canadians under the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, the right to free speech. On a personal note, this has happened to me and, as a result, I have some hesitation in getting up and speaking about it, not about the substance or because of the substance—I cannot change from my original position—but from the procedural aspects and the type of tactics they use in order to get you to change your position.

They use letters and magazines. The one that I am going to refer to is Vitality, Volume 3, No. 8. It says that, despite the fact that I had issued no new statement and had made no public statement calling for full legal protection of the unborn, which is absolutely wrong. The article reads, "Joe Comuzzi won in this election, a man who has made no public commitment to work to protect the rights of the unborn". That again, is wrong. What they were looking for in that statement is for me to sign some document which I could not sign. I had given them the reasons why I could not sign that document. It was not acceptable, it did not fit their very tight philosophy and, as a result, they were trying to blackmail me into signing. I refused to do so and these were the tactics they used.

The other modes of trying to coerce people into adopting position are letters to the editor from people who are obviously in the pro-life movement. They try to embarrass you in your local community. I consider these types of procedures to be unacceptable and they are the reason for my rising today to make these statements.

Despite our personal beliefs, the subject we are discussing today must be approached with compassion, tolerance and understanding. Only through this reasonable dialogue between reasonable men and women can we attack and expect to resolve this very difficult societal issue that is before us today.

In my analysis of what we have heard and what we have seen, I particularly liked the speech that was given by the Governor of the State of New York, when he was addressing the convocation class in 1984 at Notre Dame University. I thought it would be interesting to quote from Governor Cuomo's speech where he said: "It would be tragic if we let the dialogue that we are involved with today become a prolonged and divisive argument that destroys or impairs our ability to practise and to love one another, to practise any part of our morality, to practise our sense of touching and healing our fellow human being, and to affirm that great life that surrounds all of us in this country".

In that quote I think is the compassion which I referred to earlier in my speech. I am afraid it is a compassion that has been missing in the procedural movement of those people who claim to be pro-life and use the tactics I referred to earlier to get people like myself to change our minds or be more adamant in our positions.

I think there was no more compelling meeting in this whole process than the meeting in my office in Thunder Bay, when I visited with the people of the pro-choice movement. They came into my office and for the first time I listened to them intently. They said that they are not on the other side of the fence. They are not against life because they oppose those principles and the philosophy that the other side chooses. That was the most sincere statement I heard in this whole process. I do not think anyone in this debate is against life. I compliment and thank the people who took the time out in the area I represent, Thunder Bay—Nipigon, and all those people throughout Canada who have taken an interest in this very important topic, people who came and expressed their views and helped us make our decisions as politicians, in a reasoned and compassionate way. As I said,

Mr. Speaker, it was the best lesson that I had heard, and the best lesson throughout this whole process.

• (1710)

At the outset I made my views known on this topic very clearly. I reconfirmed my position. I did not want to leave anyone uncertain as to where I stood. The result the pro-life movement has tried to accomplish is where I really stand on this issue. My position has not changed. Substantively, I am with those people who are against the termination of pregnancy and I am certainly against the procedural issues that the pro-life movement stands for and how they approach the problem. I reconfirmed that position in the House today. I intend to vote against the legislation.

Philosophically, I am on their side but, personally, I separate myself from any association with that group which fails to exhibit the compassion towards our fellow human beings which this sensitive subject demands. I think I have made my position clear. This group that represents the substantive issue that I represent fails to exhibit the compassion, it fails to listen to a reasoned approach, it fails to acknowledge that there can be another side to an issue, and it fails to respect the freedoms that all of us in Canada have come to enjoy.

There is a group which in their zeal attempts to protect the life and rights of the unborn but they fail to protect the rights of those of us already here.

Mr. Geoff Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I extend to you my sincere congratulations in assuming your very high position. I also thank you for recognizing me during this critical and emotional debate for so many Canadians.

I will be brief as I make my position clear one more time, as I have done debate after debate, vote after vote, election after election, and Parliament after Parliament.

I believe that life begins at the moment of conception, period, full stop. I believe that nothing should interrupt that life if we are truly trying to protect the rights of the unborn.

While I can modify my anti-abortion stand in a couple of ways, and I will refer to them in a moment, I must stand on my own personal beliefs, whether or not there is a consensus among the people I represent, whether or not I am adhering to the government line, as expressed by the Prime Minister and the Attorney General of Canada, both of whom know exactly where I stand.

On that point, I want to commend the Right Hon. Prime Minister, his House leader, and my friend from Calgary West, the chief government whip for allowing a free vote according to the individual conscience of members of Parliament. I exercised that opportunity to vote freely during a number of amendments to Bill C-43 and a motion of concurrence last evening.

Mr. Speaker, I cannot tell you, or anyone who is looking in, or listening to, or reading the transcripts of this debate, how agonizing, how emotionally difficult this matter of abortion is for any member of Parliament, regardless of the party that he or she represents. Here is what I said in my weekly, or in my semi-occasional weekly column to my constituents in the Flambouroulgh Review of July 20, 1988:

> Abortion is an extremely volatile issue. It is philosophical. It is emotional. It affects everybody, deeply and personally. I will therefore exercise my vote conscientiously and responsibly.

I said earlier that I could soften my pro-life stand in a couple of obviously difficult circumstances: first, in the case of rape or incest and, second, in the case of a medical emergency. This comes down to a fundamentally important point which some of our colleagues have touched upon, but I want to reinforce it. I am not equipped to play God. No politician is. Any politician who thinks she or he is equipped to play God had better not be in this business.

Only when there is a really true medical emergency which affects the life of the mother to be should the matter become a case between the woman and her doctor. In that case I can certainly support the medical side of this issue.

As an adjunct to that, I also soften a little in terms of the psychological aspects if there is severe mental distress or harm to the mother and/or to the foetus. Then I think that again it becomes a matter between a woman and the appropriate medical authority to make that decision, but that is where it stops in my view.

I have one very deep regret about some of the signals I have been sending on Bill C-43, and that is my profound respect for women, not only for my colleagues on all sides of the House but for the women's movement in general. I truly admire those women who have wrestled in physical, psychological and legal ways with this issue.

I do not want any of my female colleagues in this place to think for one moment that my very deep and proper conscience votes on the amendments have anything to do with my respect for the women colleagues in this place who vote the other way. Not in the slightest do I acquaint my affection for women with the direction that my votes take on the abortion issue.

We are talking about life itself. Male and female foetuses are at stake here. We respect life. We spare life. I see no way that I can support this bill next Tuesday, May 29, unless there is some recognition of the protection of the unborn. There may be some. I am willing to withhold my final decision in terms of how I vote. There may be some of that protection. Maybe some law is better than no law at all, but I ha'e me doubts.

I really feel that I cannot support the legislation, not because my constituents feel that I should do so, not because I have received countless letters from across the country in support of my stand to vote against this bill unless amendments are passed, and certainly not because anyone on this side has ordered me one way or the other how to vote on this issue. No, sir.

I do not respond favourably to write-in campaigns or orders from above anywhere. I am simply voting according to my conscience, as I have said, the Prime Minister has graciously allowed members of Parliament to do.

I sympathize with those who want to vote pro-life according to their consciences. I heard very clearly, as we all have if we have been listening to this debate, the opposite arguments so very eloquently stated by the hon. member for Surrey—White Rock and the hon. member for Esquimalt—Juan de Fuca, both distinguished representatives from British Columbia. I found their arguments fascinating, and in the case of the former premier of British Columbia, great theatre. It still does not change my mind. I owe it to my constituents and my fellow believers across the country to promote the sanctity of life and the protection of innocent unborn children.

• (1720)

Some will tell you, Mr. Speaker, that some compromise law is better than no law at all. As I said earlier, some do not want any law regarding abortion. As I said, I am not God and, certainly the former premier of British Columbia said the truest words that I have heard from him, neither is he.

This is a non-partisan debate. This bill in my view does not strike a balance between the rights of the woman and the rights of the foetus. I want a law which truly protects the rights of the unborn children who have no right or chance or opportunity to speak in this chamber as we do today. I will be keeping my own counsel about how to vote on Bill C-43 at third reading.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Mr. Speaker, I must say to the member for Hamilton—Wentworth that I think that was truly one of the better speeches I have heard in the House. It was one of the better speeches because it came straight from the heart. I said earlier today that many times we are engaged in rhetoric. This is one of those rare occasions in the House where the rhetoric has lessened and the emotion and humanness of the members of this place is shown to be at its best.

I do not know whether the hon. member heard my speech earlier, but I find myself in almost the same position of trying to grapple with that balance which in the Supreme Court decision said that parliamentarians had a right and should by right look at the societal interest and the rights of the foetus. I firmly believe, as a reasonable, rational individual such as my friend from Hamilton—Wentworth is, that the bill simply does not go far enough.

I guess I do this at some risk, and I hope I am not putting the member at some risk, but many times in my position of trying to find that balance with the societal rights of the foetus, people will say: "You are against women". Absolutely nothing could be further from the truth in my case, and I know in the case of the hon. member. The hon. member mentioned something that I have not heard in this debate before. It is that when we are dealing with the rights of the foetus, we are dealing with the rights of the foetus, male and female, so we are indeed dealing with the rights of women which must in my view be protected under any law. I want to commend him for striking a particular note with me on that remark. I would hope that others who find this debate to be divisive would see the compassion and the deep reflective thought the hon. member put into his remarks.

I want to ask a question. The hon. member mentioned that he had been looking in the bill for some better definition of what "at risk" means when an abortion would be permitted under law. I am wondering, not to put words in the hon. member's mouth, if he is as concerned as I am and as some members are that the definition of when an abortion would be permitted under this legislation is just a little too loose and a little too open to interpretation. In a legalistic sense when those things happen, sometimes we err on the side of leniency and expansion. That is a great concern that I have.

Could the member elaborate a little more about the type of amendment he would have liked to have seen which would have better defined "at risk" and "health"?

Mr. Scott (Hamilton—Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, I thank my friend across the way for his kind comments.

One of the problems that I and a number of us on this side have about the current legislation is that one could drive trucks through the legal definitions of what at risk is, what health is, whether health means physical health, mental health, psychological health, or whatever. That is one of the things that will ultimately have to be resolved once we in this House decide what to do about this legislation.

I am being persuaded that some law, some foot in the door, some restriction on the Morgantaler–type mentality on abortions, is better than no law at all. I am being persuaded that maybe we have a chance in this House of Commons to do something which some Parliaments down the road may never have a chance to do. We have got a pretty good consensus kind of legislation. As I say, one can drive trucks through some of the phrases and the points such as at risk, for example.

All I can say to my hon. friend is that it is something that all of us are wrestling with. When I talked about male and female foetuses I thought that maybe I should draw attention to that end of the spectrum, because male and female members of Parliament are debating this issue and yet this issue is perceived to be strictly a woman's issue. It is. It is very much a woman's issue. None of us men have to go through abortions, but I still think that because we are talking from one end of the spectrum to the other we are talking about the need for all members of society to take a very serious look at this question and at this bill.

Mr. Ken Atkinson (St. Catharines): Mr. Speaker, as my friends have previously outlined, this is obviously a matter that causes us a great deal of concern. All of us have wrestled with the various aspects of the matter. As was previously mentioned it is also a balancing of rights.

In looking at the evidence before the parliamentary committee, the balancing of rights was mentioned quite a bit in term of various rights such as the foetal rights and the rights of the mother. It was a thread that seemed to go through the evidence all the time. Obviously that is the result of the Morgentaler decision and the striking down of the previous Section 251 because it infringed upon Section 7 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms and affected a woman's security of her person.

In looking at what type of law can be drafted, we look at the decision and we see the remark that society has an interest in the foetus which has to be balanced with the rights of the mother.

How do we do that? Obviously it is very difficult. Bill C–43 is an attempt to reach that balance between the woman and the security of her person and society's interest in the protection of the foetus. When we are drafting the law we have to realize that we are within those parameters and have to deal with that particular aspect of the matter. Otherwise, if we have a law that is too restrictive, it will be struck down.

In looking at that, as well as looking at the woman's right to security of her person and also other matters under Section 2A of the charter, her equality rights under Section 15 and also her sexual equality rights under Section 28, we realize all those matters have to be taken into account in drafting the law.

It would not be easy to take a stand that would say no abortion ever, but if we decided to pass such a law we know that it would be struck down immediately. Are we being true to ourselves or am I being true to myself if we do that? I do not think I am. Where does that leave us?

I noticed in the evidence before the committee there was some indication that we could use Section 33 of the charter in order to make whatever law we produced valid for five years. I cannot accept that. I cannot accept that. We have a Charter of Rights and Freedoms and our country has evolved to the point where we feel confident enough that we can use that charter. Our laws should be within that charter. In that respect, I cannot see using Section 33 in order to validate any law that we put forward.

• (1730)

If we wanted to go even further, to say that life begins at conception, this would require a constitutional amendment, with the obvious difficulties we all know that entails. But that also introduces a legal regime for the foetus itself. We do not even know the implications of that legal regime.

After a decision regarding foetal rights in the United States, and I do not mean to be frivolous, an action was launched by individuals claiming that nine months should be added to everybody's age, showing how that would affect individuals. There is also the question of accidents, and what happens in that matter. It is something that has not been thought through and I cannot go in that direction and I would not like to see the country go in that direction. So I reject Section 33 and I reject any constitutional amendment.

That leaves us with a framework as set out in the Morgentaler and Daigle cases in order to try to balance the rights of the woman under the Charter of Rights and balance the rights of the foetus. It is obviously a difficult task, and we have heard people make comment here that it has not occurred in this legislation.

This is something that is obviously going to change over a period of time. It is not going to remain static. I think that we all realize that the matter is not going to end in this particular chamber once this bill is dealt with. If the bill is defeated, we are faced with the reality that there will be no law in place. Although the Daigle case speaks to it, we do not want to see the events of last summer repeated, with the degradation of people and their emotions and private lives being exposed on the televisions of the nation. We need some law that will give us stability in this area.

This legislation is the best attempt at finding a a balance of the rights of the woman and the rights of the foetus. Many of the aspects of the Morgentaler decision in terms of access have been removed. One doctor is involved in this particular law. We see a definition of health to deal with previous concerns about that definition. Those are a couple of matters that seem to deal with the objections in terms of access that were raised by two or three of the judges in the Morgentaler decision. The attempt is being made to try to deal with the defects that were found in the previous Section 251 in this particular law.

The gestational approach originally proposed by the Law Reform Commission as a way to balance the rights of the foetus and the rights of the woman has been rejected. I have to agree with that decision because that approach could raise many difficult questions.

The Daigle case indicated that rights begin at birth. Looking at that particular aspect of it, it seems the Supreme Court did not want deal extensively with the legal aspect of rights of the foetus. I have my own personal views on the subject matter, but I do not feel that I can force them on to any other individual.

As I say, I start with the premise that we have a Charter of Rights and we must have a law that fits within that. To be true to myself and to ensure the inclusion of such a law, while recognizing the woman's rights, I think the balance provided within Bill C–43 is the best that can be achieved at this time.

I did not vote in favour of any the amendments that were put forward last evening. If any of those amendments were passed, they would have made the bill too restrictive.

If this law is passed, we are going to have a determination on it, I am sure, and this matter will not end here. But for those reasons, I feel that this is the best that we can do at the present time, in balancing the rights of the woman and the rights of the foetus. That is why I will be supporting this bill on third reading.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I listened carefully to what the member on the government side of the House had to say. I think that he has tried very hard to be sensitive to many of the issues that people in the House and people from coast to coast in this country are struggling with on the whole issue.

I did, though, wonder when he said that part of his rationale for supporting Bill C–43 would be that he felt that this bill would prohibit or stop the kinds of horrific spectacles we saw last summer when the most personal and intimate details of the life of a young woman, Chantal Daigle, were displayed across the country.

The anti-choice people, the anti-choice zealots, have already indicated clearly that if Bill C-43 becomes law, they will take that law and use it as a new legal tool in order to harass doctors and women who are seeking abortions. They have made that very clear.

I want to ask the hon. member to reconsider the idea that Bill C-43 will stop that. It will not stop that. What has stopped those civil injunctions has been the Supreme Court of Canada. It has been very busily going about its work shutting down these legal avenues to estranged boyfriends and others who would use the legal avenues to harass women.

However, these same people have indicated that if this bill becomes law they will use it in order to harass women and doctors. I would like him to comment on that, please.

Mr. Atkinson: Mr. Speaker, I would submit that the harassment, if there is any, will not go on too long. I share her concern and I do not want to see that sort of thing start up again.

By the same token, society's interest in protecting the foetus has to be recognized, as well as the woman's right. It has to be done through the mechanism that is set out here, with a doctors' opinion which is arrived at using generally accepted standards of the medical profession. I am sure that no court is going to allow a frivolous application to come forward. You are going to have to deal with that particular matter. You are going to have to show that that has not been taken care of.

I see my friend shaking her head. We disagree on that particular point. It is set out and the definition is there and a frivolous matter, I know, will be quickly taken care of.

• (1740)

Mr. John Nunziata (York South—Weston): Mr. Speaker, as you know, last evening Parliament was called upon to decide on a series of amendment that were introduced. Each of the amendments were defeated and the bill itself was concurred in at report stage by a significant number of members of Parliament. I believe the number was 132. That would suggest that when the final vote is called on Bill C-43, the legislation will, in fact, become law. I find that extremely regrettable.

When this bill was introduced into the House of Commons and debated at second reading stage, I voted for Bill C-43, not because I agreed with the bill. I indicated at the time that I had very serious reservations about Bill C-43, but I supported the bill at second reading simply to allow the bill to proceed to committee in order to enable members of Parliament, including myself, to present amendments in order to more accurately reflect my particular point of view with respect to this subject matter.

In their wisdom, the members of the legislative committee who considered Bill C-43, did not accept any amendments to the bill in the form that it was presented to them and given first reading on November 3, 1989.

In spite of the fact that the Prime Minister indicated to the House and to the country that it was a free vote, that members of Parliament in his caucus, the Conservative caucus, would be permitted to vote according to their own conscience, we know that in reality it was not a free vote. Members of Parliament were not free to vote according to their own conscience. In fact, the Prime Minister said that members of his cabinet were not free to vote, that they would all have to toe the party line and endorse Bill C-43. The message went out very clearly to the Conservative back-benchers that they should support Bill C-43.

At this point, I would like to salute those Conservative members of Parliament who broke with their party and rejected to date Bill C-43. I have great respect for them, knowing the possible consequences that might follow as a result of them not supporting the Prime Minister and cabinet on this particular issue.

This bill will become law on Tuesday. As I indicated at second reading stage, and I have since indicated time and time again in speeches that I have given across the country, this bill is the most fraudulent and hypocritical piece of legislation that I have seen in the six years that I have been in Parliament.

Bill C-43 resulted from the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada over two years ago that declared Sections 287 and 288 of the Code unconstitutional.

For a long period of time the government dithered, delayed, procrastinated and hoped that somehow the issue would disappear. It waited for the Morgentaler follow-up decision on the Borowski case. It then wanted to test the will of Parliament by introducing a multiple choice type of resolution.

Then, finally, it introduced amendments to the Criminal Code in the form that we have before us, Bill C-43. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, that the government would not have introduced Bill C-43 had it not been for the so-called pro-life members of the Conservative caucus who decided to compromise on the issue and support the bill.

I am convinced that, if those members of Parliament had stood by their views and stood by their convictions and insisted on a piece of legislation that would accurately reflect how they felt about the issue, then the government would not have introduced this bill. It would not have perpetrated a fraud on the people of Canada by suggesting somehow that this bill was a compromise, a common ground, a bill that would try to bridge the gap between those who believe there ought to be no law at all and those who believe there should be a law protecting life from the moment of conception onward.

The only redeeming aspect of Bill C-43 is that it is legislation that would amend the Criminal Code of Canada. In effect, it would reintroduce the subject of abortion back into the Criminal Code of Canada. That is the only redeeming aspect of it.

Members of Parliament will know that the only jurisdiction that Parliament has to deal with this issue is the Criminal Code of Canada. The only place that a law could be dealt with is within the criminal law jurisdiction. The health jurisdiction is within the powers of provincial governments. So, if the government wanted to deal with this issue, it had to deal with it in the Criminal Code of Canada.

Why is this bill hypocritical and fraudulent? Prima facie at the outset, this bill states that, because they are introduced into the Criminal Code of Canada, abortions are illegal and contrary to the Criminal Code. That is what it says at the outset. The government thought that those who believed that the innocent unborn must be protected from the moment of conception onward would be happy and rejoice and say: "Thank you, Prime Minister. Thank you, Conservative government. You have recognized the sanctity of life."

The bill then defines the circumstances under which abortions could be obtained in such a broad fashion as to allow abortion on demand, abortion on request.

I would like to read the operative clause. It is a short bill, a page and half of text, two sections of the Criminal Code. The operative section would be 287(1) which states:

> Every person who induces an abortion on a female person is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, unless the abortion is induced by or under the direction of a medical practitioner who is of the opinion that, if the abortion were not induced, the health or life of the female person would be likely to be threatened.

What does all that mean? First, it means that the abortion does not have to be done by a doctor, a medical practitioner. It simply states that in order to be legal, the abortion has to be done by a doctor or under the direction of a medical practitioner. In other words, as long as the medical practitioner or the doctor directs the person, a nurse, a clerk—anybody—can conduct an abortion. The doctor does not have to be present. The doctor could be elsewhere in the office, elsewhere in the city, or elsewhere in the country. All the doctor has to do is form the opinion—and I will get to how he forms that opinion in a moment—and that opinion could be formed as a result of a telephone conversation with the woman. Once that opinion is formed, the doctor could direct a nurse, a clerk, or anyone in the office, to perform that abortion.

How does the doctor arrive at the opinion that the abortion ought to take place? The doctor has to form the opinion that, if the abortion were not induced, the health or life of the female person would be likely to be threatened. The latter part of that is clear and straightforward, "the life of the female person would be likely be threatened". That is specific. Although it uses the word "likely", we are talking about the life of the female person.

• (1750)

But where the bill becomes totally broad and open is with respect to the word "health". Health is defined in the bill itself in subsection (ii) as including physical, mental and psychological health. In effect, under every circumstance, the doctor could form the opinion. There is no restriction. Mental, physical and psychological health—that is the definition of health by which the doctor could form the opinion.

The likelihood of any doctor ever being prosecuted for an offence under Bill C-43 is extremely remote, to say the least. How could any doctor ever be successfully prosecuted? How could any prosecutor ever decide to prosecute under this particular section? It would be impossible and the government knew that. The bill is hypocritical in that it purports to be all things to all people.

Yesterday, I supported each of the amendments that were presented to the House that would make the bill a more restrictive bill. I regret that the motions did not carry, particularly Motion No. 10 which was introduced by my colleague and friend, the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell. That particular motion would have allowed abortions only in the circumstance in which the life of the mother was threatened.

The amendments were all defeated. It is my intention to vote against the bill and to encourage and urge other members of Parliament to vote against the bill, because I believe it is a bad piece of legislation.

I believe it is bad, not only because of its nature, in that it tries to be all things to all people, but because it does not address the central issue which somehow politicians in this place are afraid to deal with and which the government was afraid to deal with, and that is the issue of when life begins.

The Supreme Court of Canada in the Morgentaler decision did not have the courage and backbone to render a decision in terms of when life begins. How can the issue of abortion be dealt with, and all the consequent considerations of the issue of abortion, without deciding first when life begins?

I put a question to a member of the New Democratic Party earlier today. I asked him when life begins, in his view, and he refused to answer. He made a joke about the issue. That is where the argument of the so-called pro-choice element of this debate completely collapses.

According to the pro-choice—those who would have no abortion law at all—the logic of their position is that life begins at birth. They are saying that they want no law at all, absolutely, under no circumstances. In effect, they are saying that life begins at birth.

That position cannot be reasonably argued because any reasonable person must conclude that there is life before birth. We know that as a scientific fact that there is life before birth. When that life begins is the question. Some might ask, who am I to try to decide when life begins?

We are all mere mortals. We are all mere human beings. We are called upon as parliamentarians and as legislators to make difficult decisions and to make tough decisions. Yet, the government and members on the government side and on this side of the House refuse to deal with the question of when life begins.

We all agree, or at least the overwhelming majority of members of the House agree, that life is sacred, that life is sacrosanct. I participated in the capital punishment debate a few short years ago. I listened to members of the New Democratic Party, members of the Conservative Party, and my colleagues in the Liberal Party. Notwithstanding the views of the overwhelming majority of Canadians, the House said no to capital punishment. The House, in a very significant vote, said that life is sacred, life must be protected, and life cannot be taken by the state under any circumstances, regardless of how criminal that life may be. It was the right decision. It was a day to be remembered in the House of Commons.

Those arguments somehow are lost when we are dealing with life before birth. They are equally as applicable. We heard the arguments about the sanctity of life and how life must be protected, and surely that must be extended to life before birth. Yet, the argument or the debate has not centered around the issue of life before birth and when it begins.

The position that I have taken, as a member of Parliament and as an individual, is that life begins at conception. To my mind, there is no other logical place where life begins. How can it be reasonably argued that in the nine-month span that life begins at some point other than conception? I state, and I have stated before, that in my view life cannot begin after birth, that there is life before birth. What argument, what medical-legal logic can be applied to determine when life begins before birth, other than at conception?

If one concludes that life begins before birth, at any point before birth, or that it begins at conception, surely that life must be afforded every protection that we have as living, breathing, human beings. Who are we to distinguish between life?

As parliamentarians, we do not distinguish between a disabled person and an able-bodied person. We believe that all life is sacred after birth and must be protected. Who are we to say that that life before birth somehow is less deserving of the protection of law as life after birth? That is the central issue. It is not a question of choice and denying women the right to choose, or anything of the sort, in my view.

Yes, it is a difficult issue. No one likes to see the situations in which women find themselves with an unwanted pregnancy. We would all like to see that every pregnancy is a wanted pregnancy, but that is not reality.

Unless there is protection in law for life, from the moment of conception until natural death, I cannot support any legislation. I urge members of Parliament to defeat this bill and to encourage and force the government to bring in a more restrictive bill and allow the debate to carry on in a free and unfettered fashion in order to recognize the sanctity of life and the protection of the innocent unborn in our country.

Mr. Greg Thompson (Carleton—Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, this is the third time that I have spoken on abortion during the debate on Bill C-43.

I am probably one of the more fortunate members of Parliament because, from my arrival in the House a couple of years ago, there has been no question in my mind as to how I would vote on this matter. I made it known publicly two years ago or more now that I am a pro-life member of Parliament and that I intend to stay. Because of that, I do not have to put myself through the mental turmoil that many members of Parliament have to in grappling with this issue. I am pro-life and that I will remain.

• (1800)

Bill C-43 is simply not a pro-life bill, not at all. It is a compromise piece of legislation which compromises human life and because of that I cannot support it.

The last time I spoke on this bill, in the fall of 1989, I concluded by reiterating a conversation I had with my son. I want to continue with that conversation. My son Christian, who is eight years old, asked me one evening: "What is abortion?" To answer an eight year old child in a way which does not disturb the innocence of that child is very, very difficult. If all members of Parliament had to stand before a classroom of children, whether they be six year olds, seven year olds or ten year olds, and describe to them what abortion is, the reality of what we are talking about would come home to them.

In the course of conversation with my son I attempted to explain to him what abortion actually is. In that process I was attempting to disguise my words. I was trying to protect the innocence of a child without distorting human values. Immediately that child begins to ask questions: "What is abortion, Dad? What happens to that baby inside the mother, Dad? Does the baby actually die, Dad?" That is what we are talking about. That is coming to grips with what abortion really is. It is not an easy subject to talk about with a child or in front of a group of children because that is exactly what it is, it is the destruction of human life.

As the member who spoke just previously mentioned, if you are pro-life, if you are for human beings, you have to act on the premise that life begins at conception. If we believe that life begins at conception, and if we believe that a human being exists at the moment of conception, we have to believe that when that life is destroyed a human being is actually killed. The reality of abortion is simply that. It is the taking of a human life.

Bill C-43 does not address that reality. Every member of Parliament can ask him or herself this simple question: If Bill C-43 becomes law, will we be preserving human life? In other words, will there be less abortions after Bill C-43 is enacted? The answer is simply that there will not be. It will not make one bit of difference. We will still have abortions in this country and they will still be legal. We will not have done what we have to do as parliamentarians—protect the life and innocence of those unborn. We will not have dealt with the reality of the situation and this is masking that reality. We have to honestly ask ourselves whether we are protecting the lives of the unborn with Bill C-43. Obviously we are not because, again, we are attempting to compromise human life.

It is not a question of being holier than thou because, I am just a human being. I am not a constitutional lawyer or a doctor, but I am a human being. Those are the kinds of people whom I represent. Certainly there are doctors in my riding. There are doctors in this House. There are lawyers in my riding. We can get into the nitty-gritty of when life begins. We can have doctors debating doctors as to when that magic moment of life actually begins. We can have constitutional lawyers arguing whether Bill C-43 is constitutional or whether a solidly pro-life bill would be constitutional. Some argue that it would be, some argue that it would not be. Others argue that if we are going to bring in a pro-life bill we would have to change the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, in other words, change the Constitution so that it does protect the life of the unborn child.

Some lawyers argue that that would be an impossibility. Some parliamentarians argue it would be an impossibility to change the Charter of Rights and Freedoms in this country. Maybe it is an impossibility, but unless we strive for the ultimate, that is the protection of the human being, we have not fulfilled our roles as parliamentarians.

We are talking of the most defenceless of all human beings, the unborn child. That, in essence, is what this debate is all about, whether we as parliamentarians can come to grips with that reality. I say we are not doing that with Bill C–43. It is, in a sense, a classic Canadian compromise, but it is not doing what we set out to do as pro–lifers. It is not protecting the life of that unborn child.

From the first vote onwards I never supported Bill C–43. I attempted, through the amendment process, to make Bill C–43 a pro–life bill. That was not successful. We tried. I tried. Many of us have tried but we have not achieved that pro–life bill that we attempted to achieve since many days ago. We have failed.

With that, we are left with a bill that has not achieved the desired objective, that is to protect the life of the unborn. Because of that, I cannot support this bill. Again, I will only support abortion when the life of the mother is clearly endangered. I cannot support a bill that does not support the life of the unborn child. For that reason, I will not support Bill C–43. Human life cannot be compromised.

Mr. Jim Jordan (Leeds—Grenville): Madam Speaker, I would like to congratulate my colleague on a very passionate speech, with which I agree. I would like to get his reaction to something that I heard from one of the earlier speakers today who was also a strong pro–lifer. He said that with this bill we are making an incremental gain and therefore we should take this opportunity. He meant, I guess, that at some point down the road there would be some more gains made and eventually society would look upon this in the way it should be looked upon, as taking a life.

Would my colleague like to comment on the thought that if we miss this opportunity to make Bill C–43 law, we will miss the opportunity for incremental gain toward reaching the long–range goal of having total and complete respect for life in all stages?

Mr. Thompson: Madam Speaker, I think that we have already missed the opportunity to do what we should be doing. It is strictly hypothetical to look down the road to what might happen based on something which did not happen.

Again, this is the classic compromise. Maybe in some cases a compromise is good enough, but unless we strive for perfection, unless we strive for the ultimate, which is protection of the foetus, I think we have done ourselves an injustice.

I believe that the hon. member who posed this question believes the same thing. I think we will have done ourselves a disservice if we look down the road to what might have happened. The opportunity is now and we have to seize it now, not later.

Mr. Walter Van De Walle (St. Albert): Madam Speaker, many positions have been put forth in this debate on Bill C–43 showing the wide diversity of opinion that exists in Canada with regard to the matter of abortion and the degrees of respect for life. It is my privilege to join in this debate and to give a point of view which I believe is held by many Canadians.

Yesterday members of the House of Commons dealt with the amendments. I regret that some of the amendments that I thought were so vital and so important did not carry, in particular, Motion No. 10 which dealt with the life of the mother.

Let me make it clear from the outset that I have always had and continue to have the utmost respect for human life from conception to natural death. It is a matter of conscience that I must speak out in the strongest possible terms in favour of the preservation of the life of the unborn. One of the marks of a civilized society is the high regard in which it holds life and the right to life of all humans, especially those unable to defend themselves.

The more society advances in its civilization, the more the various countries realize that too many lives are being wasted by the permissiveness that has allowed so many human unborn babies to be sacrificed. In Great Britain, the leaders are striving to chip away at the present laws to cut down on the number of abortions. The President of the United States and his predecessor both made it clear that laws must be changed to stop the great number of unborn children being killed.

A recent survey showed that almost two-thirds of Canadians are not even aware that one million abortions have been approved in Canada since 1969. Half of those surveyed did not know that medicare paid for most of those abortions. That same survey showed that a majority of Canadians believe that abortion should be illegal unless the mother's life is in danger. Surely we in Canada are civilized enough, Christian enough and caring enough to take measures to stop the slaughter of so many innocent victims. As a man of conscience I cannot and I will not accept any legislation that does not protect the sanctity of human life. I urge my colleagues to take the same stand.

We are told that abortion is a very complex matter. There are some who feel that it is not that complicated at all. For example, Mother Teresa sees it as a very simple matter. Abortion is the taking of a human life, and it is wrong. That is all. Of course saints are very uncomplicated people, which makes it so difficult for journalists to interview them. There is no way they can twist her words or the meaning she puts across. When they say that some women do not want their baby, she replies: "Give it to me. I want the child". We know she means exactly that because she has taken so many unwanted children.

I believe that abortion is the destruction of an innocent child. I frankly do not think that anyone, no matter on which side of the argument he or she may be, wants to see the destruction of an innocent child. That is why I call upon my fellow parliamentarians in this House to make sure that their decision regarding abortion is an informed one.

When does life begin? Does abortion really solve social problems, or does it create them? These are the questions I would like to help answer.

When the United States Senate conducted an extensive hearing on this subject in 1981, over 50 international authorities testified. The official report reads as follows: "Physicians and scientists agree that conception marks the beginning of the life of a human being—a being that is alive and is a member of the human species. There is overwhelming agreement on this point in countless medical and scientific writings."

It is clear then that it is not the time of birth that represents the creation of a new human being. Actual birth is only a change in the place of residence of the already living, active person.

Abortion is the violent killing of an unborn. Others have described it in various ways. I do not want to go into a description of the grisly details with regard to abortion, because others have. Suffice it to say that whether we refer to abortion as killing or as an induced death, it is largely a question of semantics. The effect on the child is the same: it dies.

Dr. Bernard Nathanson, who once was the director of the world's largest abortion clinic and is now a staunch pro-life supporter, has stated that there is seldom any purely medical indications for abortion.

We can go on to raise questions with regard to the safety of legal abortions. Very often we do not hear very much said about that. In a book written by David Reardon, he points out that of the 252 women surveyed, approximately half of them complained of suffering from at least one type of physical complication following abortion. The facts are clear that the so-called health problems during pregnancy are not a real factor. Rather, the true health problems exist after the abortion. The post-abortion syndrome is a very well-known phenomenon which is becoming more and more known as follow-up is being recorded.

This fact was made abundantly clear to the committee when Ms. Beverly Hadland, executive director of the Abortion Crisis Centre in Toronto, appeared and shared with the committee her considerable experience.

• (1820)

The natural order, regardless of one's religious belief, is a law which must be respected by all. A person of religious convictions has an even greater reason to uphold the sanctity of human life. It is the law of God. These same principles have been enunciated over and over again by Pope John Paul II.

I want to conclude with a couple of other remarks about the role of society with regard to this matter because I believe there is a social issue that must be addressed.

We live in a society that is becoming more and more permissive, a laissez-faire society where moral values have been shoved aside. I believe that the school and the home have a very important role to play in the education of our children. Should a pregnancy occur, what then? Good counselling must be readily available. Too many of the so-called counselling centres only offer information on where to get an abortion. These pregnant women need love and understanding, comfort and care. The killing of a baby is not the answer.

Where needed, society should provide housing and day care assistance for these pregnant mothers so that they can make the choice of whether or not to have the child. At the time of the birth of the child the mother would decide whether to raise the child or to give it up for adoption.

Why is it that couples wishing to adopt a child have to wait years? There is a need to examine our adoption procedure with a view to speeding up the process.

I firmly believe that society as a whole has a role to play in providing more education, improved counselling, housing, and day care availability. I urge all Canadians to join together to resolve a social problem. I believe that as parliamentarians we have reached a point in time when we must make a choice and that choice is clear: whether we stand for life or stand by idly and surrender to a philosophy of death. I will be voting for life against the bill.

Mr. Robert E. Skelly (Comox—Alberni): Madam Speaker, I appreciate the opportunity at this late hour to be discussing Bill C-43, the abortion legislation, at third reading. I want the House to know that I also oppose Bill C-43 and will be voting against its passage at third reading, but perhaps not for the reasons that some of those who have just spoken have enunciated.

I believe that this bill goes some distance toward criminalizing abortion. As the member for Kitchener has outlined, it is part of a transition toward criminalization of abortion in Canada and a reversal of the procedure that has been happening in this country over the past several years.

Part of the problem with this legislation is that it is going to create an untenable situation for doctors and an untenable situation for mothers who have made the decision to have an abortion, in that they will have both disgruntled boyfriends and so-called pro-life agencies looking over their shoulders and questioning in the courts and otherwise whether this was done for the reasons permitted under Bill C-43.

This is going to create an absolutely untenable situation for those women and those doctors, and it is going to make it more and more difficult for people who seek abortions for legitimate reasons to obtain abortions.

That is not to say that I have not listened carefully to the arguments that have been made by members on all sides of the House. I think members have made those arguments in good conscience and good faith. I do not think we should question the integrity, the agony, or the study that has gone into the speeches that have been made in this House. Members speak out of strongly held beliefs. There are some who believe that life begins at conception and therefore that the extension of the law of this land to the foetus while in its mother's womb is a legitimate extension of the laws of this Parliament.

I reject that position. I think it is going to create a very difficult situation with respect to the balancing of rights. I believe that extending the law of this country into the womb of a mother makes that women a second-class citizen and undermines the rights she enjoys as an individual who is due all of the rights of a Canadian citizen. It is going to create some serious difficulties by imposing the rights of two individuals on the body of a single person. Again, that is untenable for women and this would be a very difficult piece of legislation to implement and uphold. It is going to be very difficult.

The argument about when life begins seems like a very abstract argument, very distant from the situation of a woman who finds herself with an unwanted pregnancy agonizing over whether to give birth to another mouth to feed or to give the child up for adoption. Those are decisions which many of the people who are making that argument, and certainly myself, have never been compelled to make. It is very easy to be abstract, theoretical, dry, and scientific on this issue and to discuss it as if it is nothing more than the usual dry debate we hear on legislation and scientific abstractions.

For many people faced with this decision, it is a very real and terrifying decision which the majority of us in this room are so remote from that we cannot possibly bring ourselves close enough to understand it, other than from an abstract point of view.

Over the years, having examined the subject and having had discussions with people who were presented with the decision of whether or not to abort, I have come to the conclusion that I support the pro-choice position. This piece of legislation is so antagonistic to that pro-choice position that I am compelled to vote against it.

I have had some experience with the issue of abortion. I used to work in the criminal justice system of the province of British Columbia. I worked in the prison system at a time when abortion was illegal under the Criminal Code. Consequently, on those occasions when an abortionist was captured and ended up under my control in the prison system, I was introduced to the people who carry out this process under a criminalized regime, how they act, and what type of people they are.

They are not the type of people you would want yourself, Madam Speaker, your daughter, your granddaughter or your nieces ever to come in contact with. The abortionists whom I met are looking at this legislation and rubbing their hands in glee because they have reason to believe that their profession is now going back to what it was before and that it will be as lucrative as it was before, with very minimal risks involved, because people who go to such abortionist do not go to the newspapers and tell tales about them. The only times it comes to the attention of the media is when these people fail and mutilate or kill their clients. That happens time after time.

It is a very lucrative profession. Those people whom I kept in jail under the previous regime saw prison as a holiday before they went back to their work, which earned them a great deal of money with very little risk at all. I can see them now, rubbing their hands together, as the Parliament of Canada is talking about supporting life and arguing abstractly about when life begins. For these people this is when their business begins and then they can get back to work in the back alleys of Toronto, Montreal, Vancouver and every city of any size in this country. This law is going to guarantee them customers.

I hear people talk about the concern they have for life, and I mentioned this in my previous speech on second reading. I recall reading a magazine about UNICEF, the United Nations Children's Emergency Fund, and the work that UNICEF does around the world. In our discussion we talked about the abstractness of when life begins, whether it begins at conception or at some other time, or at birth. There are children who are born in this world who do not live, who starve to death. I am told by UNICEF about the number of children who die every single week in the world because they have inadequate food, or because they have inadequate protection from disease, or because they have inadequate sewage and clean water supplies, or inadequate shelter. That number of children is a quarter million a week. They die before the age of five years.

When we are talking about life, somebody in this debate has to give some consideration to the quarter million children who die around this world because we in this Parliament, by the way we handle our foreign aid, have made sure that many of those children will die before the age of five. Those children die of humiliating diseases, like dysentery, things that could be easily cured with a very small expenditure of money, money that we have cut back in our foreign aid program in this country.

I talk about a quarter million people around the globe dying before the age of five. According to UNICEF statistics, every two days more people around this world die before the age of five than abortions are done in Canada in a year.

Really we are not talking here about respect for human life, because if we were talking about respect for human life, at the top end of the priority list would be that quarter million children around the world who are dying, having been born, and having lived to the age of five. Those children were the hopes of their parents, their aspirations for the future, children as loved as any other children in this country or anywhere else in the world. Yet they have to go through the agony of seeing those children die of terrible diseases prior to the age of five.

Here we are talking about when life begins. Does it begin at conception? Does it begin at birth? A quarter million people will die before this week is out and this legislation is passed.

I do not believe that the pro-life movement has given itself a name that it is justified to have. It is a movement around the world that has been seeking to outlaw abortion, to outlaw access to abortion. It has been successful in a number of countries. It has been successful in Ireland for example, and in Ireland I am told that the rights of a foetus are enshrined in the constitution of that country. Ireland is the country my ancestors come from.

In Ireland the rights of a foetus are enshrined in the constitution of that country, yet it has been demonstrated in WHO statistics that Ireland has the highest per capita abortion rate of any developed country. Some are wealthy enough to be able to go to England to obtain an abortion, or to the continent of Europe. Those who are not wealthy enough either go to back-room abortionists or else attempt to perform the operation on themselves. But Ireland, where the foetus is protected in the constitution, has the highest per capita rate of abortion in the world.

I would like to quote statistics from Brazil because I just came back from there a few days ago. In Brazil abortion is also frowned upon by both the church and the state. I am told that in Brazil there are abortion clinics where one can obtain an abortion for something like $100 to $1,000. Most women in Brazil cannot afford to pay that kind of money for an abortion and so they perform abortions on themselves. As a result, an estimated three to five million clandestine abortions take place every year in Brazil, a country with a total population of 145 million. This gives Brazil the leading share of the world's 65 million abortions, according to the World Health Organization. Research in Brazil estimates that 10,000 Brazilian women die each year from self-induced abortions. World-wide, 150,000 to 200,000 women die annually as a result of complications related to abortions.

Thirty to forty per cent of the half million pregnancy-related deaths that are estimated by the World Health Organization to take place each year, are the result of botched, clandestine abortions. The statistics indicate that another 200,000 Brazilian women are put into hospital each year because they have been mutilated by or suffered complications from abortions.

What I am suggesting to members of the House of Commons is that we should clearly think about what we are doing here today. Why are we passing this legislation? What we are doing to doctors is making sure that the public and the anti-abortion activist groups can look over their shoulders to determine whether they are making the right medical decisions. I am not sure that that is the right thing to do.

What we are doing is making sure that disgruntled boyfriends, spouses or organizations that have taken it upon themselves to protect foetuses are going to examine every single abortion operation that takes place in this country and perhaps drag it into court in order to prevent abortion, disqualify doctors or make abortion much more difficult.

I am against the number of abortions that are taking place in this country. I think at roughly 65,000, the number of abortions in Canada is far too high. But I think there are ways of dealing with that problem without going through the process of criminalizing abortions. As I said before, you do not do away with abortions by criminalizing them, you simply create a lucrative industry for a criminal element in this country that mutilates your wives, your mothers, you daughters, your nieces and your granddaughters; you do not do away with abortion by this kind of legislation.

The way to do away with abortions or reduce the number of abortions is to make it possible for children in this country to be wanted children and to make it possible for children to get information about birth control and contraception so that they can understand the nature of their own sexuality and how to prevent pregnancy when, at a certain age, they begin to experiment with their own sexuality.

I recall a statistic from the American Medical Association. Doctors who were members of the AMA were saying that the highest number of cases coming before them were girls in the age range of 15 years whose first question they asked of their doctors was about pregnancy. The second question they asked was about acne. This is a serious problem when girls of that age do not even understand the basic elements of their sexuality and end up in their doctors' offices wondering if they are pregnant or not.

Surely, this is a failure of our educational system. If this government wants to do something to stop unwanted pregnancies and therefore to stop abortions, what it should be doing is making the kind of education available to our young people and to adults that will assist them in understanding their sexuality, understanding the process of contraception and understanding what their options are.

The second thing the government should be doing is making it possible for families in this country to see all children as wanted children and having children as something exciting, expected and anticipated. I have two children, and my wife and I looked forward to having these children, to bring something into our lives which we did not have before. They were wanted children. There was no consideration on our part, ever, to see those pregnancies terminated because these were wanted and loved children, and they are to this very day.

Not all families look upon a new child that way. To some mothers a new child is an absolute terror. How is she going to feed this child? If she is married or partnered with a husband or boy–friend who is abusive, or is likely to sexually or physically assault this child, how can she feel good about bringing this child into the world?

There are 1.3 million Canadians in a country as rich as ours who live below the poverty line. How can families who find themselves living below the poverty line, through no fault of their own, have any hope and expectation? How can they want to bring a child into the world who is the result of an unwanted pregnancy?

What this government must do, and what this Parliament must do, is support families across this country, to make sure that children can be brought up in decent, happy and hopeful surroundings, free of poverty and abuse. That is the kind of thing that this government should commit itself to if it wants to reduce the number of abortions that are taking place in this country.

I think we can reduce the number of abortions in this country, but we cannot do it by recriminalizing abortion. The only way we can do it is by making it possible for Canadian families and Canadian people to bring up their families in healthy, happy, hopeful surroundings, free of poverty and abuse.

The reason I am voting against this legislation is because it does not do that and it does not provide any hope for that to happen. I would like to see members of the House defeat this legislation and defeat it overwhelmingly.

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, the abortion issue has two views that divide our population into opposing communities of thought. Unlike most difficult issues, this one is characterized by the unique fact that neither side has much, if any, capacity to understand or appreciate the views of the other.

What makes a political resolution most difficult is the fact that the pro and anti–abortion persons both hold to their views for moral reasons in an environment charged with emotion, while asserting that their views are logical. Unfortunately, on this issue, I am no different than anyone else. With my vote I will make roughly one–half of my constituents happy, the other may feel somewhat abandoned.

At the outset, I want to indicate that I do not believe that the issue of criminalization of abortion lends itself to the kinds of compromises that would allow for overwhelming public support in light of the range of public attitudes that exist.

Just as importantly, I want to extend my regrets to those whose views are different from mine and at least to allow that while we differ in our understanding of a deeply moral issue, I do not conclude that these are amoral persons, but rather, individuals who have, for whatever reason, come to understand the question of abortion from another perspective.

If there is a correct view, and I believe there is, then its resolution will not be found in law at this time. Likewise, the passage of Bill C–43 will not conclude the national debate. Society will continue to change, and one day a law will likely exist that reflects a significant majority position. In the interim, it is incumbent on those to whom this issue matters most to do what they can to influence society.

My views are pro–life. Therefore, it is only natural that I would, in a perfect world, seek to restrict and limit abortion.

As an ethic, I believe that every human being is duty bound to uphold the sanctity of life. If life is to be precious then it must be precious in all stages. By contrast, if one stage of life can be deliberately diminished, can any other stage be reasonably assured?

At the root of this debate on abortion is the fundamental question of when does life begin. There are those who argue that an embryonic foetus is not yet human. I have asked such persons on frequent occasions: "Is it wrong to abort a nine-month old foetus just prior to natural partition?" The answer is a universal yes. Therefore, if it is wrong to abort a child just prior to birth, how can we back up through the gestational period, one second at a time, and find the moment when this developing person is not human?

Mr. Speaker, are not you and I persons who are still developing today? Is not aging a stage of development?

Some have argued that a foetus is not human until after the cerebral cortex is fully developed. They claim that this development is what distinguishes mankind from animals. However, if this to be an accepted standard, then what is to become of those persons who develop Alzheimer's disease?

Those who base their human evaluation of a foetus on the mere question of reasoning power also bring into question the value of those less privileged adult persons whose reasoning powers are, unfortunately, sub-standard. A caring and loving society embraces all persons, with all of their failings and at all stages.

With respect to human value, when any one person is allowed to be restricted from reaching their potential, we are all, in turn, diminished. Our challenge is to seek an ideal world and such a world is one in which each and every human has the opportunity to achieve fulfilment by maximizing their potential.

Now, we come to the matter of the bill that is before us. I believe the bill is an important improvement over the 1968 legislation.

First, it proclaims that abortion is wrong and can only be obtained with the support of a trained medical opinion. Moreover, the bill defines abortion to be wrong to the extent that a breach of condition is considered to be a criminal act and defined as such in the Criminal Code. Finally, the notion of an arbitrary gestational time period in which abortions are allowed is abandoned in favour of a definition that proclaims it to be wrong to have an abortion at any time except for medical cause.

For all these reasons, I agree with the bill. My single concern is that the medical requirements for the protection of health are too loosely defined. There is a part of my analysis that encourages me to vote against the bill on principle. Abortions will still be allowed, and from my perspective that is wrong. Therefore, a negative vote might be justified.

The counter balancing analysis is, however, more compelling. We must recall the process by which we came to be in this situation.

• (1850)

In the summer of 1988, the Supreme Court ruled that Canada's existing abortion law was unconstitutional, largely because of unbalanced access in various regions of the country. In their judgment, the members of the court effectively ruled out the possibility of a new law that absolutely protected the foetus at all stages for all causes. At the same time, the court indicated that the Parliament of Canada had the right to limit, through law, the basis upon which an abortion could be obtained.

The House was given an opportunity to seek out, from a range of options, a perspective upon which the law could be designed and drafted. What proved to be the case was that there was no more consensus on this issue in the House of Commons than there was in the nation. The House was then faced with the dilemma of accepting a less than perfect law or living in a vacuum of no law.

I recognize that law alone cannot transform a human heart or soul. Law is an important ingredient in the process that involves other institutions and other persuasions.

What I have had to consider is, what kind of society would we have, what kind of protection would there be for the unborn, and what are the possibilities for improved legislation if this bill fails to pass? I am convinced that we need a law, even if the present Parliament cannot grant the law that meets my ideal.

The proposed law does underline the view that human life has unique value. It does make a wrongfully acquired abortion a criminal act. It does avoid an arbitrary judgment about the value of a human being at various stages of gestation.

The single fact that a medical definition is, in my view, imprecise would be the wrong reason to allow society to live for an untold period of time without influence of law on this issue. If the bill were defeated, there would be an absence of a signal for the guidance of society. Moreover, an imperfect law can be built upon and changed over time. The absence of law could propel society into a set of attitudes from which we might never recover.

It is incumbent upon me to express my deep gratitude to the literally thousands of constituents of Crowfoot who have helped me comprehend and resolve my position on this issue. The issue is not concluded. The case is not resolved. However, Parliament and society must walk together for a while longer until a stronger consensus is acquired.

Finally, I want to say that it is not merely a question of abortion. It is also a question of our attitudes towards each other as human beings with respect to sexual relationships.

Sex is not a dirty or smutty issue, or a subject to be hidden from conversation. Rather, it is a matter upon which Canadians everywhere must become more comfortable. Sex education does not mean abandoning responsibilities to the school system and certainly it does not imply that the subject be dismissed in silence.

Too often, pre-school children are given a lesson in sex relations when what they wanted to know was, "Where did I come from?". Likewise, and unfortunately, frequently, teenagers are given lessons in biology when their curiosity is about interpersonal relationships. The matter of "how I am to behave with another" or "what am I to do about these powerful feelings that I have" cannot be answered by showing charts and graphs of the human reproductive system.

We must seek to achieve a society that embraces sexual respect. Sex must be thought of as an instrument of communication in relationships. Sex cannot be an object, exclusive and apart from all other obligations. As a society, we have to mature in the nature of our human relationships and, as a society, we have a long way to go.

Madam Deputy Speaker: Questions or comments? On debate, the hon. member for Wetaskiwin.

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, I too welcome the opportunity to express my concerns on Bill C-43. I supported the bill on second reading so that we all could be afforded the benefit of a committee addressing this complex and highly controversial issue. That has of course occurred. Unfortunately, no amendments were recommended to support more fully my pro-life views. Consequently, I tried to move specific amendments. Again, unfortunately, all were ruled inadmissible. Last night's votes now leave me and all of my colleagues in a very serious and difficult predicament. As others have said this is a very personal and emotional issue.

To begin with, I would like to quote from Mr. Justice Bernier who, on July 26, 1989, in the unreported Daigle case stated:

> The child conceived but not yet born, whatever the definition of his civil status, is a reality which we must acknowledge. He is not an inanimate object, he is the property of no one, he is a living human entity, different from the one of his or her mother who carries him; he is an entity who exists because of two human beings who gave him life, who procreated him; he, to begin with, has a right to life and to protection from those who conceived him or her.

I concur with Mr. Justice Bernier. I too believe we must acknowledge the child conceived but not yet born. This was the major reason for my moving amendments: to protect specifically the unborn child and to define what in law is a foetus.

The Supreme Court of Canada has clearly requested of Parliament to state its intentions. In the Morgentaler case the justices unanimously were of the opinion that the protection of the foetus was a worthy legislative intent. I believe that the majority of this House would agree as well that the protection of the foetus is a worthy legislative intent. Many of my constituents have clearly indicated that the foetus must be protected. This protection is a duty of the state; just as it appropriately is the duty of the state to protect others who are unable to protect themselves, such as perhaps the mentally ill. However, its intent must be clearly stated. As the Supreme Court of Canada in the Daigle case stated:

> One can ask why the Quebec legislation if it had intended to accord a foetus the right to life, would have left the protection of this right in such an uncertain state.

One can ask the same question of Parliament.

The other side of the issue, the rights of women to the security of the person, guaranteed under Section 7 of the charter, cannot be ignored either. We as parliamentarians must pay heed to the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada.

The intentions of government which guided this new legislation as stated earlier are: first, balancing the woman's constitutional rights with society's interest in the foetus; second, ensuring that fair and reasonable access to abortion is not denied; and, third, ensuring that all abortions are performed by qualified medical practitioners based on a health ground.

The first of these intentions, balancing the woman's constitutional rights with society's interest in the foetus, is one aspect of the present bill that is lacking.

Some have argued that to amend Bill C–43 in any way renders it unconstitutional. I am of the view that the Supreme Court of Canada would not ask Parliament to legislate for the unborn specifically if only to strike it down as unconstitutional.

Mr. Chief Justice Dickson in the Morgentaler case stated:

> I agree that protection of foetal interests by Parliament is also a valid governmental objective.

He adds later on page 75:

> —state protection of foetal interests may well be deserving of constitutional recognition under section 1.

Madam Justice Wilson also stated:

> I believe that the main objective advanced to justify a restriction on the pregnant woman's section 7 right is the protection of the foetus. I think this is a perfectly valid legislative objective.

Others argue, and it may be true, that the criminal sanction does provide for some protection for the unborn by implication. But, this is not adequate. It is inadequate by virtue of the fact that abortions may be performed for any reason falling under mental, physical or psychological domain. An abortion may be performed by virtue of any of those reasons, which is an exhaustive list, a woman may desire to have an abortion, including as a method of birth control.

• (1900)

It is the latter with which I am not at all in agreement. This has not balanced any societal interest in the foetus, no legal personality has been given to the foetus, nor have any rights been confirmed upon the foetus. But most importantly no specific intention has been made by Parliament to protect the foetus.

Such an intention must be clear and unequivocal in the eyes of the court. To this end, last night I expressed my support for several amendments of this bill which I felt would have accomplished that. If the pro–life amendments had passed, I would have no doubt been able to support the bill at third reading. Only then would we have shown an intention to confer rights on the unborn, a measure which is clearly appropriate for Parliament to take, as stated by the Supreme Court of Canada Justices. In my view it is also the duty of Parliament to protect those who are unable to protect themselves.

The question now becomes, because there have not been any pro–life amendments passed, based on my conscience, am I prepared to support the bill at third reading. Madam Speaker, I do not think one can compromise with life and therefore I will not be supporting Bill C–43.

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, I once again rise to speak during third reading of Bill C–43, an act respecting abortion. I voted for this bill on second reading in the belief and optimism that the government would welcome amendments to clarify and strengthen the intent of the bill.

I must now speak against this bill because, despite the sincere efforts of a good number of my hon. colleagues in proposing amendments to make the bill a viable and meaningful one, to be truly an instrument of protection for the unborn, the government for the most part refused to allow the necessary changes. Therefore, the bill remains unacceptable. It neither promotes, protects, nor preserves fundamental Canadian values such as respect for human life, particularly the lives of unborn children who will be the women and men of the future.

It does not defend the most vulnerable and defenceless. Let us remind ourselves that unborn children can only articulate their aspirations through our own feelings, love, sacrifices and compassion.

Also, the bill does not address the rightful concerns and needs of women. It does not provide for a balance of rights, not even a compromise. Rather it is a capitulation of both the unborn's and the woman's rights.

On January 28, 1988, the Supreme Court of Canada declared Canada's abortion law unconstitutional on procedural grounds and not, I repeat, not on the basis that abortion is a constitutional right. In fact, the Supreme Court clearly indicated the state has a legitimate interest to protect the foetus, the unborn child.

Also, the Chairman of the Civil Liberties section of the British Columbia branch of the Canadian Bar Association has noted:

> Careful review of the decision reveals that far from vesting an untrammelled right to abortion, the court has left Parliament leeway to change the law in ways that are significantly more favourable to the preservation of foetal life than the law which the court struck down.

Regrettably, the bill now before us is more permissive than the law which was struck down.

Indeed, there is no constitutional right to abortion. The Charter of Rights and Freedoms specifically mentions voting, religion, language and minority rights. It does not contain anything about the right to abortion. I will therefore never fathom, and I am confident all Canadians are with me on this sentiment, that the infliction of death on innocent human lives in the wombs of their mothers would ever be a legitimate exercise of anyone's right unless there is a compelling, serious and substantive medical reason or reasons for that given pregnancy that imminently threatens the life and health of the pregnant mother and for which medical condition no alternative treatment exists.

As Mr. Justice William McIntyre pointed out when the Supreme Court of Canada rendered the old law ineffective, there has always been a clear recognition of a public interest in the protection of the unborn. There has been no evidence of any general acceptance of the concept of abortion at will in our society. In fact, public opinion polls have consistently indicated that roughly 70 per cent of Canadians oppose elective abortion, suggesting that some type of genuine medical threat ought to exist before abortion is allowed.

Admittedly, some of the defeated amendments would probably be violations of security of the person under Section 7 of the Charter of Rights and Freedoms, but this would not have rendered such amendments unconstitutional. Chief Justice Dickson explained this in the Morgentaler case:

> I wish to reiterate that finding a violation of security of the person does not end the inquiry on Section 7 of the Charter. Parliament could choose to infringe security of the person if it did so in a manner consistent with the principles of fundamental justice.

Indeed, the protection of the foetus is a concern that outweighs the woman's right not to carry the foetus to term, unless genuine medical threats exist.

We must protect the most defenceless of us if we are to maintain a strong foundation to protect the rights of all of us.

During its appearance before the legislative committee that examined this bill, the family and friends of the handicapped made the following observation:

> Bill C–43 represents an attack upon the efforts of the disabled to obtain equality in society and win the dignity and respect to which they are entitled. The Bill would allow for abortion for the widest possible reasons. It would enshrine in law a principle that the lives of some may be destroyed for the convenience of others.

It continued:

> It is true that the Bill does not make any explicit reference to handicapped children. However, it does allow abortion where psychological health is threatened. The Law Reform Commission Report of last year made clear that such a clause can be used to authorize aborting disabled children.

This is a major flaw in the bill. We have to recognize that the unborn are human beings. For centuries the English common law of property has recognized unborn children as autonomous human beings and their property rights have been protected by law. In 1795, an English court interpreted the meaning of "children" in a last will and testament to include a child "in the womb" of their mothers.

Under tort law, learned authorities have maintained "that the unborn child in the path of an automobile is as much a person in the street as the mother". How then can we as Canadians and parliamentarians accept that such an unborn child becomes less a person when instead of an automobile, a physicians's forceps, suction machine, a salt or hormonal solution is used to cause that unborn child's death?

The proclamation by the Supreme Court of Canada that the state has a legislative interest to protect the foetus is a tacit admission that once human life has commenced in the womb of the mother the state not only has the right but the duty of safeguarding that unborn human life, and through this protection, protects and preserves society itself.

What do we have in this bill? Health is defined as including:

> For greater certainty, physical, mental and psychological health.

In common language this in effect is abortion on choice.

• (1910)

Why? When the Canadian Medical Association appeared before the legislative committee, it said:

> It is recognized that 85 per cent to 95 per cent of induced abortions are done for psychiatric reasons, but there are very few absolute psychiatric reasons that are a threat to life—

The Canadian Physicians for Life, also appearing before the committee, confirmed that 96 per cent of abortions are performed for non-medical reasons.

The National Action Committee on the Status of Women also testified before the legislative committee:

> Women have abortions for many reasons. Most of them are social and economic in origin.

Indeed, the loose definition for health would make this bill a legal prescription for abortion on demand.

In introducing this legislation, the Minister of Justice stated:

> This bill has been carefully drafted to achieve a delicate balance between the conflicting views on the abortion issue.

The minister is only partly correct. In defending the government's approach to rejecting all amendments the same minister said:

> Any amendment to the bill could be perceived as unfairly favouring the state's interest in protecting the foetus to the detriment of the woman's constitutional right to security of the person could endanger the legislation's constitutional validity.

Only the Supreme Court of Canada can make a definitive determination of the constitutional validity of any law passed by Parliament. Both the Minister of Justice and the Law Reform Commission agreed to this view during their appearances before the legislative committee. Hence, the government should have allowed amendments to clarify and insist that only genuine medical threats to the life and health of the pregnant woman could constitute valid indication for abortion. That I attempted to do. Unfortunately, my amendments were defeated. This government chose not to make that choice.

Many submissions to the legislative committee supported the necessity for many amendments.

Indeed, this bill, unamended, is tantamount to abortion on demand, which is a perversion of the purposes of both law and medicine. Law in a civilized country is meant to preserve justice and to protect the weak from abuses by the strong. Medicine is meant to protect life. When legislation permits abortion on demand, it violates both.

Modern science and medicine are much too far advanced to permit the fiction that the being which inhabits a pregnant woman's womb is not a human being. From the moment of conception the foetus has all the necessary genetic material which makes it a distinctive individual, coded into its own DNA which is different from anyone else's, and unmistakably human. While still in the womb, the foetus is a doctor's patient, just like its mother, and with science at its present stages, can be operated on and treated while still in the womb. That is why we have departments of obstetrics in schools of medicine and in hospitals. That is why the discipline of perinatology has evolved in medicine. Any argument which does not recognize the human nature of the foetus is becoming every day more patently untenable.

Like any individual living outside the womb, the foetus must be granted the same rights to life and liberty as any other human life. In any society which strives to maintain liberty, limits must be drawn. No liberty is absolute in this world; instead, each person's liberty is limited by the liberty of others. It is largely unquestioned that the law is right to lock up thieves and murderers, to breach the security of their persons, to deprive them of their personal liberty of movement because it has been used to violate the liberty of other individuals in the society.

In the same way, the foetus' right to the most basic liberty, the liberty to live, should not be overruled by the mother's right to choose in the absence of genuine medical threats. Abortion on demand violates this basic principle. It claims the woman's liberty to be limitless vis-à-vis the liberty of her unborn child. The liberty of the foetus to live and exercise further liberty must be protected only if the mother so wishes. This in effect is a denial of the individual humanity of the foetus because it is a denial of the rights which belong to human beings by virtue of their humanity. Any denial of the humanity of the foetus is simply untenable.

The problems to which abortion seems to be the solution must be addressed. Although some women use abortion simply as a matter of birth control, a tragedy which must be stopped as soon as possible for we cannot as a compassionate and caring society continue to condone some 70,000 deaths of unborn babies every year, there are many who would appeal to such an answer only in the case of severe problems. A simple prohibition of abortion is not a sufficient or compassionate answer either.

The most clear-cut of these problems occurs when the mother's life is physically threatened by her pregnancy. In such extraordinary circumstances, the same exception which is made for self-defence in other circumstances can be applied. The chances of death of the mother must be weighed against a genuine concern for the foetus as a human being in its own right. Once the medical profession is convinced that the risks to the mother's life are great enough to warrant the use of abortion to save her life, then in such circumstances the mother should be persuaded to agree to the medical procedure.

Such cases, however, occur comparatively rarely in the context of the many abortions which are performed. Other cases involve a wide range of less clear-cut considerations. Among these are societal problems which have both economic and psychological ramifications for a prospective mother.

More provisions to deal with these problems must be made, such as homes for single mothers during pregnancy, financial assistance, child care centres, educational programs, and other services as may be helpful. Governments are duty bound to provide them to solve the causes of why some pregnant women consider abortion.

Most important, perhaps, better counselling must be provided so that individuals are truly able to decide what to do both in order to avoid unplanned pregnancies and in order to deal with them without sacrificing the child. Many women who choose to undergo abortions have not been acquainted with the other options including adoption, nor with the devastating physical and psychological trauma on them of having an abortion. These were startling revelations made before the legislative committee that examined this bill.

A law restricting abortion only to medical indications is not punitive to women. It is in a very real sense a guide or a legal tool to protect their interests during their hours of need. Both child and parents have needs and both must be addressed, neither one being sacrificed to the other. Abortion on demand effectively addresses neither in that it fails to deal with the root problems, making a pregnant woman opt for abortion and may cause further damage to her at the same time as her child is killed.

Some of my colleagues in this House have argued against placing the subject of abortion in the Criminal Code of Canada. In reply, I would like to quote from a legal scholar, Mr. Joseph Maingot of the Law Reform Commission of Canada, who said:

> The criminal law can make a significant contribution by addressing the issue of abortion. Criminal prohibitions on abortions are desirable for both functional and symbolic reasons. Functional, because criminal prohibitions will reduce, although not eliminate, abortions. Since foetal life deserves legal protection, it follows that a reduction in abortions is a net social benefit. The symbolic function of the criminal law is our nation's fundamental statement of public policy. It is the instrument by which the community draws a line between the tolerable and the intolerable. Criminal law defines those whose interests are worthy of respect and protection and in my view, they should include all members of the human family. Ultimately, the criminal law is a mirror of what we are; it reflects our commitment, or lack of commitment, to human dignity and equality.

That is why we have laws directed at degrading pornography, against hate, against child abuse, and laws on affirmative action programs. The state has a key role to play in the development of a collective conscience to sustain social peace and respect for citizens of different viewpoints. Any law shapes and reflects the collective conscience of any society. We should have laws that will continue to preserve, promote, and protect Canadian values.

In conclusion, Bill C-43 could make legitimate, even noble, the performance of abortion outside the tradition of medical practice. I deeply believe that we need to rethink Canadian values as I stated at the beginning of my debate. We must protect the most vulnerable and defenceless in our society, epitomized by the unborn children whose aspirations for life can only be realized when we adults in Parliament, men and women alike, sensitively reflect their aspirations by passage of a law that truly protects the lives of the unborn in the wombs of their mothers. Let us say yes to life at all times and no to abortion on simple choice.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, I want to make it very clear that I totally disagree with the orientation of the previous member. I think that a woman has every right to reproductive choice.

I want to ask him a couple of questions of a little more technical nature, since he takes the stand that a woman has no right to reproductive choice. Would he comment, first of all, on whether he opposes the use of IUDs or the morning-after pill, both of which are a form of medical treatment that allows a woman not to carry through a pregnancy after fertilization takes place?

If he feels that a woman has no choice in reproductive matters, does he support her right to birth control, to use both chemical and mechanical forms of birth control, or does he feel that a woman is in a position where the only time she is permitted to be involved in intercourse is when conception is to take place?

I think that those are the logical extensions of what the member is saying, that a woman has no choice in terms of her reproductive capacity.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Madam Speaker, it is a fundamental principle in cross-examination even in a court of law that you do not answer your own question because you are likely to be wrong in the answers you will give yourself. That is exactly what happened. The hon. member asked a question. He assumed I had answered it, but completely wrong.

As to the question of whether I believe in reproductive choice, I do not even know whether we agree on the definition of reproductive choice and what is reproduction.

Reproduction is when you begin from nowhere, from nothing. Once you have that something, you have reproduced a product, and that is what I call reproduction. If what he believes I am asking, and it is a big if, is that after a product has been produced you can destroy this product, human life, then of course my answer definitely is no. Whether a woman should marry and reproduce, that is her ultimate and paramount right. Whether a woman should have birth control or not, that also is her right.

Once a human life has been created, created by the Supreme Being, that human life must be protected. Let me remind my hon. colleague that even the Charter of Rights and Freedoms of the Canadian Constitution, invokes in its preamble the supremacy of God and the rule of law. Invoking the supremacy of God indicates that no more shall we have a law which violates the principle of God. Incidentally, I once heard the same sentiments from the lips of a justice of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I have heard the hon. member for Surrey North. Somebody else is rising in the House whom I will recognize and then come back to the hon. member. The hon. member for Dartmouth.

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, I listened to my hon. colleague from Winnipeg North espouse his convictions and views on this very delicate, contentious and difficult matter. There were a few things said on which I would like clarification.

Quotations were made from submissions to the committee of which he was a member, and I assume that he was there for most or nearly all of the presentations. The statistics quoted by the hon. member for Winnipeg North indicate that the vast majority of abortions that are obtained are for social and economic reasons.

Is it the hon. member's belief that if this bill is passed as is, without the accompanying regulations or companion legislation, it would clearly indicate that the government through its agencies and departments is prepared to address those social and economic reasons that many women have to go and seek abortions?

Is it his belief that this bill will lessen the likelihood of this government, or a subsequent government, revisiting the issue and putting in place those very programs which would be necessary so that women who find themselves pregnant do not have to seek abortions for social and economic reasons? Our social programs would be expanded and targeted so that would no longer be the case.

Mr. Pagtakhan: Madam Speaker, I thank my hon. colleague for his thoughtful questions. Yes, indeed, I was with the legislative committee for most of the time, and yes indeed the vast majority of the bases for abortion as indicated by the Canadian Medical Association and the Canadian Physicians for Life have been the result of social and economic difficulties. It is my belief, which is shared by many Canadians, that if we allow this bill to pass as is, unamended, the words "psychological health" could be used—and the Minister of Justice has indicated that—to include social and economic difficulties as a consequence of poverty.

Could a government of the day be complacent and not address real issues of poverty, real need for assistance for the needy? Yes, I believe that that is a real possibility; in fact I would submit a real probability. That is why I am very concerned that the bill, unamended, is unacceptable both to me and my constituents of Winnipeg North.

Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, I asked the member whether he agreed that a woman had the right to use two forms of birth control, IUD and the morning-after pill. He neglected or refused to answer them.

I ask him again: Does he believe that the woman has the right to use an IUD and the morning-after pill?

Mr. Pagtakhan: Madam Speaker, my answer is that I do not believe in the morning-after pill. In terms of the IUD, I think there are better forms of birth control than that. That is fraught with dangers.

• (1930)

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Madam Speaker, I know that by now everyone in this House knows my intense and deeply felt opposition to this legislation, Bill C-43. My party position has been brought to question in this House of Commons. The position of the New Democratic Party seems to be thought of as extremist by some members here, trying to rationalize their illogical support for this bill.

I stand for family planning education. I stand for research into safe and effective contraception. I stand for support for pregnant women and for families. This is a social policy approach to the abortion issue, rather than an ineffective criminal law approach.

Some people then may find family planning to be an extreme position. Some people seem to find support for families extremist. Some people seem to find equality for women, the need to be able to make decisions about our own bodies and our own lives extremist.

No one wants to face an unwanted pregnancy. The solution is to eliminate or at least reduce the number of unwanted pregnancies, not to criminalize abortion.

It is a national tragedy that support and equality for women are considered to be extremist views in this country, and seen in the same light as wishing to give a zygote full legal and social rights as a human being. It is an appalling contradiction.

In British Columbia and in Ontario women entering clinics are harassed and intimidated. The Everywoman's Health Centre in Vancouver was broken into and the medical equipment there worth thousands of thousands of dollars was vandalized and destroyed.

Some of my colleagues and I have received threats of physical violence from an organization. This is what is really extreme, not views that support women, children and the family. Equality for women, the right to decide our own fate, is not extremist.

When members here talk about a balance of rights, they should consider what we are really talking about. The Tories are being pressured by cabinet to vote for this criminal bill, something which was so evident last night.

Pro-choice Tories are told this bill will have absolutely no negative effects on women. Anti-choice Tories are told that it may not be everything they want, but that it does encompass the principles that they stand for—criminalization from conception onwards.

To believe that the bill will have absolutely no negative effect on women is to ignore Canada's top legal experts, Canada's medical authorities and the majority of the women in this nation from coast to coast who know this first-hand. It is to ignore what they are saying.

If this bill is to have no effect and there will be no prosecutions, as the Minister of Justice would have us believe, then it is an improper use of the Criminal Code. If it will have an effect and charges will be laid, as under every other criminal abortion law we have had in Canada, then the effect on the women and the doctors will be profound.

Not only is Bill C-43 a bad law because it is a lie, it is simply a bad piece of legislation according to a majority of respected legal experts in this country. Of 18 constitutional lawyers at the most respected law schools in this country, 17 of them seriously challenged the validity of the justice minister's legal arguments in support of Bill C–43. They have called it "legal nonsense".

Professor Ryder from Osgoode Hall law school states:

> —it creates no entitlement whatsoever; —Bill C–43 will do nothing to remove the provinces' ability to place restrictions on funding and access to abortion.
>
> The purpose of criminal law is to punish, deter and stigmatize conduct that is inimical to the public interest. Criminal law takes the form of a prohibition coupled with a penalty. Given these characteristics of criminal provisions, it is an oxymoron to speak of a criminal law entitlement. Indeed, recriminalizing abortion will place the procedure once again under a shroud of immorality, and consequently will deter women from seeking access and will deter doctors, hospitals and governments from providing services. This suggests that the true basis of Bill C–43 is the government's accordance of a moral status to the foetus that transcends and is independent of women's priorities and aspirations.

He goes on to state:

> The Justice Minister has claimed that "by occupying the field" of abortion regulation with Bill C–43, the doctrine of federal paramountcy will prevent the provinces from further restricting access. With all due respect, the Justice Minister is relying on a long abandoned conception of federal paramountcy.

Two University of Victoria law professors say that the minister's legal arguments are: "untenable" and "simply wrong". They say the bill does not create entitlement. They say she "does not provide a convincing rationale for the enactment of a federal abortion law".

Two University of Ottawa professors concur that the minister's arguments are "totally without merit from a constitutional point of view". They say it does not create any sort of national standard for abortion.

They wrote:

> It is clear that the federal government has several statutory mechanisms available to regulate abortion standards at a national level. There is therefore no factual basis for the claim that a Criminal Code provision is necessary to create a national standard for entitlement to abortion services.

They go on to state:

> The absence of federal criminal legislation in relation to abortion does not in any way modify or expand the provinces' legislative authority over abortion.

Bill C–43 will have a detrimental effect on access. Doctors and women told the legislative committee this over and over again.

Doctors who came to us from the Province of Quebec said that up to one–third of the doctors in that province who are currently performing abortions will stop if this bill becomes law.

There is only one doctor in all of Newfoundland who performs abortions.

I think it is important that we look at what the situation is like in this country right now, today, with no law.

This doctor is based at the St. John's General Hospital in Newfoundland. The General's policy is to provide only early abortions and to require approval by a gynaecologist, a psychiatrist, a social worker and counselling by a registered nurse. These access barriers are in no way contradicted by Bill C–43.

In fact Bill C–43 encourages these types of referrals because of its health criteria.

Bill C–43 does not provide any kind of national standard. The St. John's General will continue to have these built–in delays and referrals, while the Morgentaler Clinic in Montreal will continue to place no barriers before women to abortion. Thus there is no national standard.

No hospital in Prince Edward Island will perform abortions today. In P.E.I. the province will not pay for an out–of–province abortion unless a five–doctor panel approves the woman's reasons for having one. Few applications are approved and costly travel expenses are never reimbursed.

Bill C–43 will not change things for the women of Prince Edward Island. Criminal law does not change stringent and restrictive provincial health practices.

In Nova Scotia, a law was passed to outlaw health clinics that provide abortion services. C–43 will not outlaw this Nova Scotian law. In fact, doctors who provide the only legal abortions in Nova Scotia at the Victoria General Hospital have said that if this bill passes, they will cease to do so. We have that from the hon. member for Halifax. She released a letter from a doctor there who has said that. This would leave no access in Nova Scotia at all, directly because of Bill C–43.

New Brunswick requires the approval of two doctors before it will pay for an abortion. Bill C–43 does not touch this requirement in any way.

• (1940)

Under Bill C–43, if a province wanted a 25–doctor panel to approve an abortion, it would still be legal and perfectly valid under this bill.

Bill C–43 has no effect on provincial health regulations, other than to make them more stringent in order to comply with the health requirements of Bill C–43.

In my province of British Columbia, the right–wing Social Credit government tried to withdraw funding for abortions. It did withdraw funding for abortions for a time after the Morgentaler decision came down, and then was made to stop that by the courts. That province is spending $20 million to try to discourage abortions.

Bill C–43 will have no effect on this other than to encourage the abuse of the law in provinces where the anti–choice movement or the government in that province is strong and rather bizarre, as in my home province of British Columbia.

Anti–choice zealots have chained themselves to clinics. They have defied injunctions. They have risked jail. They have been in jail. They have been fined. They have risked injury. These are the very people who will be using Bill C–43 against women and against doctors.

I am not making this up. We have press reports which state that the anti–choice people themselves have indicated that when this bill is passed they will use it as another legal tool to harass women and doctors. They have made promises to do that.

I have to say that as a woman I really did feel betrayed last night when my amendment, the only pro–choice amendment proposed to this bill, was defeated by such a wide margin. It was defeated by more votes than the regressive anti–women, anti–choice amendments were defeated.

Some women have believed that simply by voting for women candidates their views will be represented in this House of Commons. The votes last night on the amendments to the abortion bill proved that that theory is sadly mistaken.

I believe that the Tory women on the other side of the House really sold out the women of Canada, along with the government. Not one woman on that side of that House supported the only pro–choice amendment.

I do want to thank the members in this House who did support the amendment for women's rights to decide for ourselves just how many children we will have and when we will have them.

Every member of my caucus, man and woman, who was here voted for the pro–choice amendment. Five Liberals out of a caucus of 84 voted for the pro–choice amendment. Only two Tory members in this House of Commons voted in favour of choice. This government has a huge majority in this House of Commons and yet only two members on that side of the House voted in favour of the only pro–choice amendment. Those two were men. Not one Tory woman stood up for choice.

The commitment of these individual Liberal and Tory women for choice who did support my amendment is strong. Unfortunately, those Liberals are a minority in their caucus and the Tories were facing incredible pressure to vote against choice.

When Canadians are at the ballot box they will know that if they want to vote for choice, if they really want to vote for the fundamental equality issue for women, then they must vote for the New Democratic Party.

This bill does not define entitlement. It is a bill of disentitlement.

It states that women are not entitled to abortions unless they meet criteria unrelated to their own goals and aspirations and unless they meet the criteria set out by the state. This is supposed to be a government that is opposed to state intervention. This is a government which keeps telling us over and over again that it does not believe in state intervention in the marketplace, in rent controls and all those kinds of social programs that my party says the state belongs in. Yet this government wants to be involved in and have state control over the most intimate, personal, and agonizing decision that a woman is ever forced to make. It is absolutely bizarre.

The justice minister said today that "criminalization" is an emotional word and that it was misleading. It is an emotional word and it brings out strong emotions. Unfortunately, it is deadly accurate in this case.

This bill makes abortion a crime. You bet it is an emotional word to those doctors who will now have the possibility of criminal charges hanging over their heads. You bet it is an emotional word to a physician like Dr. Henry Morgentaler who spent time in jail, who was convicted under the last criminal abortion law. It is certainly an emotional word to the millions of Canadian women who thought that, finally, after the Supreme Court threw out the last criminal law on abortion, they would no longer be criminals for deciding the number and spacing of their children, that they were now free to choose what to do and what decisions to make about their own reproductive health and about their own lives.

We have seen demonstrations right across this country because the recriminalization of abortion is an emotional time in our history. It seems as though we are going back to the 19th century.

It is a sad time in our history. It is a time when we are turning our backs on women and children. We are ignoring family planning by cutting down on the social support network that makes it easier for women to bring children into this world. This a time when we have taken the regressive step of putting abortion back into the Criminal Code, instead of the progressive step of making this a society in which women feel that they can bring children into a society in which women have real choices.

Other people have said that this criminal bill is a matter of values. I agree. I think that recriminalizing abortion says a great deal about what we really think about women.

This bill needs to be defeated on principle and because of the real effect it will have. The minister has said many times that society has an interest in protecting the foetus. Instead of criminalizing abortion, which is an ineffective way of protecting the foetus, why is the government not concerned about reproductive health hazards in the workplace? Why is this government not concerned about the environment and poverty? These are the real threats to the foetus.

In poor parts of Montreal the incidence of low birth weight babies is comparable to that of the Third World because their mothers were malnourished during their pregnancy. It is appalling. The minister can best advocate the protection of the foetus and of women's health through social policy measures, not a criminal act that will jail doctors for up to two years and make women liable to aiding and abetting sections of the Criminal Code.

There was a time not long ago that the minister was advocating women's rights rather than foetal rights.

I want to quote from an editorial which appeared in The Vancouver Sun of February 11, 1988. This goes back to just after the Morgentaler decision was handed down in the Supreme Court. Before the minister came out against her former leader, Premier Bill Vander Zalm, The Vancouver Sun wrote:

> It was quite a sight, a sight I will never forget, to see Cabinet aspirant Kim Campbell do a crab-like scuttle from the television reporter who asked her if her opinion on abortion coincided with the Premier's. Regardless of her views on abortion, Ms. Campbell is too smart to elucidate them. A woman tangibly eager for power, ambition cloaks her like a mantle. Ms. Campbell will keep her trap shut.

The current Minister of Justice read that. It must have had an impact on her because she then called The Vancouver Sun columnist Nicole Parton and, with courage, she put her career on the line to stand up for what she believed in.

She told Parton that the Socred caucus was unwilling to break ranks with Vander Zalm because of caucus solidarity and that it was essential to the government, but that she was now willing to break that caucus solidarity.

• (1950)

She is in the same position now, except it seems that her ambitions have been realized. She is now in cabinet. It is ironic that her name is now on the bill that will put abortion back into the Criminal Code. Where is that courage that we all admired a few years ago?

Yesterday, at my constituency office, after I had spoken on the amendments in the House of Commons, a call came in on my answering machine. It was a call from a young woman. She was crying. I want to take a moment just to let you know what she said. It was a very emotional message.

I will read to this House exactly as she said it, because I think this is what we are talking about. This is the kind of situation and the concern that women have:

> Hi Dawn. Thank you very much for speaking out in Parliament in favour of pro-choice. When I was 17, the child my father gave me when he raped me, he forced to have aborted. He drove me to Washington State and I had no say in the matter. I am pro-choice because that decision was mine to make and not his. How I feel about it is my choice, my decision and no one has the right to take that away from me—certainly not a bunch of parliamentarians who hang around and get paid $65,000 a year to spout their—

I will leave that word blank. She then said:

I am being abusive. I am sorry. Good-bye.

I think those comments from that young woman tell us exactly what we are talking about here today. It is an emotional debate. It is an emotional issue. It is not going to go away. It is not going to go away when this bill passes. There will be challenges.

I urge all members to think carefully again, to re-examine their position and vote against Bill C-43.

Mr. Francis G. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): Madam Speaker, the issue of abortion is a matter that has caused great distress and concern among many people, women and men, in my constituency of Highlands—Canso in particular since the restrictions on this practice were removed as a result of the Supreme Court decision in 1988.

There is no question that I have received more mail from my riding on this issue than on any other issue. I want to quote a few letters from some of the constituents who have written to me expressing their views that legislation to restrict this practice and to prevent this tragedy from occurring be re-introduced.

The first letter comes from Sister Theresa LeBlanc of Antigonish who writes:

Surely in a country such as ours, where human rights are respected, the most fundamental right, the right to life, will be guaranteed and protected by Canadian legislation to the most helpless of all, the unborn.

Another woman from my riding also wrote. She is Mrs. Vera Landry of River Bourgeois, and she says:

I am upset and ashamed that as women we would even consider claiming the right to kill another innocent human being in an effort to further our own equality. The quest for justice for women must not be accomplished by denying justice to others.

A third person, Mr. Duncan MacIsaac of Judique, writes:

The divisive issue of abortion is a tremendous test of moral leadership for those who seek truth and desire to uphold life.

The debate we are involved in tonight is about life and about rights, fundamental human rights for all human beings from the moment of conception, from the moment that we can define their possibility as human beings. It is that which must not be forgotten. That is what this debate is all about.

Bill C-43 was an attempt by this government at a law to legislate on abortion. At second reading I said that this bill, as drafted, was deeply flawed. I pointed out areas in which I thought the bill was vague and ambiguous. Yet, because I know that Canadians abhor the current legislative vacuum and want legislation that would express our desire for restrictions and would support Canadians so that abortions would be reduced, I voted for this legislation at second reading. I voted for it so that it could go forward to the committee stage to be clarified, strengthened, and improved.

Unfortunately, despite the testimony of many distinguished interveners , Bill C-43 emerged from committee unchanged. Amendments were proposed which were considered yesterday at the report stage which would have improved this bill, which would have strengthened it in many respects. I voted for many of these amendments. In fact, I even introduced one myself. I voted for these amendments in the hope that we could have legislation on the books which would reflect the views of society that abortion is not a practice which we in this civilized society condone.

I voted for several of these amendments in the hope that we could strengthen this bill, so that it would convey that message to Canadians. Unfortunately, none of those amendments were accepted and it is with regret that I must say tonight that I will be voting against this bill at third reading. I will be voting against this bill because it does not accomplish what the majority of Canadians want, which is legislation that will be a reflection of Canadian society at this point in time.

Bill C-43, as presently drafted, is a divisive bill. It drives an even larger wedge between already vehement opposites in this debate. It encourages the kind of debate which has taken place in Canada recently, a debate which ignores the shared ends of each side and concentrates on the differences. It concentrates on the extreme positions which have been advocated by those who proclaim themselves to be pro-life and those who proclaim themselves to be pro-choice. The pro-choicers accuse the other side of being anti-choice and the pro-lifers accuse the other side of being pro-death, extreme labels which have polarized Canadians.

Unfortunately, Bill C-43 has contributed to and promoted that kind of negative debate. The tragedy of the debate is that is focused on the means and not on the ends. Nobody likes abortion. What is required is a policy and program of the government to bring down abortions. That program has to include an abortion law which conveys that message, but it has to be broader than an abortion law.

• (2000)

No one is naive enough to believe that by itself legislation on abortion is going to accomplish a reduction in abortion. If there is a commitment toward this, it has to be part of a much broader program of support and policies by this government, a program of policies which affirms life, which affirms values that we share as Canadians, including family values and values that respect life at all stages.

We must reduce the number of unwanted pregnancies through value-based sex and family planning education. We must be open and up front with our children so we may be able to face the overwhelming pressures of adolescence and adulthood. We must use education in our homes, our churches and our schools to instil in our young adults a clear sense of sexual knowledge, morality and responsibility.

We must address socio-economic concerns facing pregnant women today. Child care must be addressed by this government now, not at the time of the next election. Equal pay and opportunity remain huge obstacles. The recently released report of the task force on barriers to women in the Public Service confirms this. Stricter enforcement of support agreements is another urgent requirement. The recently established Family Orders and Agreements Enforcement Assistance Act is a step in the right direction, but it must be strengthened. Affordable housing is desperately required, especially in cities with a high living standard and a low vacancy rate.

Of course we must go beyond legislation and programs of government to work toward changing the social attitudes we express as a society. On this point the Catholic Conference of Bishops, in their testimony before the committee studying Bill C-43, was particularly eloquent. Let me quote a passage from that testimony. The bishops said:

> Government reforms are not sufficient. They must be accompanied by social changes throughout society. Communities must be more responsive to families and women in need. Adoption needs to be promoted as a solution to an unwanted pregnancy but with greater compassion for the agony of giving up a child. Educational, cultural and other institutions, including the Catholic Church, must be more active in promoting the equality of women and respect for them as persons. Some male attitudes and behaviour have to change radically if there is to be an end to violence against women, more co-responsibility in parenting and more respectful inter-personal relationships.

These are challenges for us as a civilized society. They are challenges we will constantly be required to meet, and a legislative framework that includes legislation respecting abortion is part of that support mechanism for fostering the kind of attitudes that we need to foster in a society that protects rights for everyone.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): I would like now to ask the hon. member to conclude, please.

Mr. LeBlanc (Cape Breton Highlands—Canso): This debate will continue long after this vote and long after we have been replaced as members in this chamber. Let us be able to say, though, that in our debate we have furthered not our own agendas but the cause of Canadian women and their children.

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, yesterday I rose in this House and spoke on report stage and I said that I was sad about what had happened, about how 25 years after the first go-around on this issue we were back again arguing the same points and discussing the same things. Tonight, however, while I am still sad, I am also angry. I am angry because last night I saw, as the hon. member from New Westminster said in her eloquent comments earlier, the way the votes went and the lack of comprehension by so many in the House about this issue and the all too strong comprehension by too many others.

The root problem here is that true equality for women does not exist in our country, no matter how many women MPs, cabinet ministers, deputy speakers, party leaders, leadership candidates, vice-regals, and onward and upward women in positions of prominence we have. It does not exist, and there is not a woman who sits in the House or in the country who does not know in her secret soul that equality does not exist.

The term "reproductive choice" has become synonymous with the word "abortion". It should not be. It should mean a range of choices which would preclude the necessity for abortion, but that range of choices is not available for women in this country or indeed any country in the western world.

Regarding the kinds of reactions to women that we have heard over the last several days, I compliment the hon. member for Cape Breton Highlands—Canso on his most reasoned remarks and for his support for social programs, despite the fact that we disagree on the most basic issue. Yesterday, when speaking against some of the amendments, I talked about the fact that the problem can be solved only by fostering equality and the kinds of social support networks necessary to make this society friendly for women and children. "Friendly" may be too strong a word. The word I really mean is basically "decent". It is not, and again, every member knows it is not for far too many women and children.

I have a good friend in Halifax at my old university, Mount Saint Vincent, who is an historian and a feminist. I remember her once saying to a class in women's studies that the women's movement is the most cataclysmic movement in social history, certainly since the Industrial Revolution, and possibly even more cataclysmic than the Industrial Revolution. All I can say—I do not say it with humour but with deadly seriousness—is it is amazing that women have managed to achieve this kind of cataclysm given the leg irons that are on them because of this want of equality in our society.

What we see here—I almost hesitate to say this, but I have felt it for a long time—with far too many people in this Chamber who oppose a woman's right to choose is truly a reaction to the women's movement. I do not say that this is the reason for all those who oppose a women's right to choose, but I say it is the reason for a frightening number. Mr. Speaker, if you do not believe me, you should have been at the study of Bill C-43. You would have heard, and I think it would have struck fear into your heart.

We hear, and heard, from men saying: "Women cannot be allowed to do this. Women cannot be allowed to do that." Women are coming to the point where the question of what we are and are not allowed to do will no longer be acceptable.

Over the past two days, I have listened in the House to some things that truly astound me. For example, I have heard that most abortions take place for socio-economic reasons, as if the socio-economic reasons being cited were mere fripperies and women resort to abortion because a pregnancy is merely inconvenient. Do these people live in the real world? Do they live in modern-day Canada where one million children go to food banks? Do they live in real-life Canada where women are subject every day to violence and to death? Do they live in the Canada that less than six months ago saw 14 young women cut down in the prime of their youth and their scholarship because they were women who dared enter a formerly male-dominated profession?

Socio-economic reasons are not fripperies. I suggest to some of my colleagues who sneer at socio-economic reasons that they should perhaps do some visiting in some of the housing projects in this country, in some of the community clinics and in some of the women's centres, those that are able to remain open, to find out the lives of fear, poverty and desperation that so many women live.

Mr. Speaker, I will tell you another thing. Many of the women who suffer this way are not, by any means, living in the physical poverty that we can identify in our cities and towns. Many of them are living in an equal poverty of spirit and poverty of choice in some of the finest addresses this country can provide. The enslavement and the enchaining of women goes on, in many cases, undeterred.

We are going to see this bill pass on Tuesday and we are going to see the criminalization of women. We are going to see the criminalization of abortion, which for the past two years has gone on in this country without any law and without an opening of the floodgates, without the moral fabric of the country falling apart and without, God knows, even women managing to take over the political spectrum. This law is unnecessary and it is a fraud. It is an insult to the intelligence and the morality of the women of this country, and also to the intelligence and the morality of the men of this country. Those of us who advocate a woman's right to choose do not say that men have no right in a family decision. Again, when the situation is optimum, when the question to be decided is between two equal partners who take full responsibility for their actions and for the results of their actions, that is one thing. But too many women in Canada face these decisions alone because they have been left and deserted physically, emotionally and morally by their partners.

In my one remaining minute I would like to say that I am tired of the threats I have received. I am tired of being called a baby-killer. I want to say that I received a call today from a young woman from Manitoba who told me that doctors there are already beginning to cancel appointments, so that access in Manitoba is going down. I want to say that I sympathize with the people my colleague from Cape Breton Highlands—Canso mentioned. I have had letters from those people too. I want to say that I wish I had the luxury to hold those views, because it would be a luxury to say there is no need for abortion in this country. All of us in the women's movement live for the day when that will be so, but until we root out the causes—poverty, ignorance, violence and fear— the need for abortion will continue. Until we do that, nothing—no law, no government—will stop abortion. It will only drive the practice into the nether world of criminal activity and turn desperate women and sympathetic doctors into fugitives from so-called justice.

Is that what Canadians want, Mr. Speaker? I do not think so.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, before I launch into a full discussion of Bill C-43, I will see if I can get away with a minor bending of the rules by making a comment on the other issue that is before the country. I can tie the two together by saying that I think both the issue of the constitutional crisis that this country faces and the issue of Bill C-43 deal with the same underlying principles. That is the question of whether we, as legislators and parliamentarians, can provide the leadership to develop in this country a sense of tolerance, understanding, compassion and a real belief in the rights of others.

On the issue that others are meeting in this city tonight to deal with and try to come to grips with, I want to offer the wisdom of Dennis Lee. A friend of mine, Elicia Scott, sent me this poem which she found in a book of Dennis Lee's called Garbage Delight. It is called "A Pair of Pants". It reads:

> Johnny came from England. Jackie came from France. They went to see a wise man about a pair of pants. One said they're too long. One said they're too little. The wise man took the pair of pants and ripped them up the middle. Now each one has got a pant leg, each is freezing, too. And yet it seemed the only thing that anyone could do.

Turning to Bill C-43, I would like to confirm that along with the other members of my party, I intend to vote against Bill C-43 on third reading. I believe this bill offends the rights of Canadians and, in particular, the rights of women. I believe it is a bill which imposes on doctors a responsibility which is not properly theirs to have. It is a bill which makes a criminal act of an act which should not be seen as a criminal act. It is a bill which will not do its stated purpose of protecting the foetus.

As a Christian and one who has held a position in the Anglican Church of Canada as Vice-Chancellor of the diocese in which I live, I want to make it absolutely clear that I do not speak for the church, and I do so from that perspective and from the perspective of understanding, I believe in the sacredness of human life. I believe an understanding of the sacredness of life cannot lead to the conclusion that abortions, in virtually every case, should be made criminal. Those cases, which are to be exceptions, are to be decided by doctors. This is really not a medical decision.

An attempt to squeeze into this law an idea that the decision in individual cases of whether or not to have an abortion is a medical one is a perversion. I believe, as earnestly as I can, that this bill does not provide a principled answer. It denies the principles enunciated by those who believe that the foetus is a matter of human life, and those who believe that until the foetus is born, the predominant right is that of the woman. The extent to which the foetus has rights is a matter to be determined in the final analysis by the conscience of the woman who bears the child.

Let me take my time to focus on the comments of the Minister of Justice. The minister has had the responsibility of introducing this bill and seeing it through the House. She has made a number of speeches and comments on the bill. Let me deal with her comments on report stage because I understand that, and having reviewed her comments this morning, I appreciate the fact that this embodies her rationale for what is a profound change in her position. I believe it is not too strong to say it is a betrayal of the position of the rights of women in this country and, therefore, the rights of all Canadians. In her speech to the House on May 22, she first raised the canard that somehow the Supreme Court of Canada imposed an obligation on this House to act. That is simply wrong. Any careful reading of the Supreme Court decisions confound the proposition that she makes that the Supreme Court of Canada in the Morgentaler case in effect called on the House of Commons to come up with a law that allegedly balanced the rights of women as guaranteed by the Charter of Rights and as enunciated by the Supreme Court of Canada with the alleged right and the societal interest in the protection of the foetus. The fact is the Supreme Court of Canada said no such thing either in the Morgentaler case, in the Borowski case, or in the Daigle case.

• (2020)

The minister says on page 11666 of Hansard:

> It is our role as parliamentarians to bring forward legislation that reasonably reflects the various views and interests of Canadian society in a manner acceptable to that majority of Canadians, and that respects constitutional guarantees.

This bill does not deal and respond to those responsibilities. I suggest on an even higher plane it is critical that the first duty of Parliament in an area of sensitivity such as this, it is our duty to respond to principle and to try to deal with the rights of Canadians irrespective of the majority. As it happens, the majority favours the position of choice. That is an irrelevant argument to the argument of principle which is that surely now as we approach the 21st century the time has come for us as a civilized society to understand that women have the right to choose and make the decision in this most difficult of all decisions.

The Minister of Justice went on to say that the highest court of the land recognized this responsibility by stating in the Morgentaler affair that it was its role to examine the laws and it was the role of Parliament to achieve this balance. Again there is the implication that the court was imposing a duty.

That simply is not consistent with the language of the court's decision. Let me read from the decision of Chief Justice Dickson in the Morgentaler case: "I conclude that the procedures created by section 251 of the Criminal Code for obtaining a therapeutic abortion do not comport with the principles of fundamental justice. Simply put, assuming Parliament can act, it must do so properly." Assuming Parliament can act, and the Chief Justice added emphasis to those words in his decision. There is no direction by the Supreme Court for Parliament to act. It is an entirely proper position for Parliament to take that there must be no criminal law in the area of abortion; that the issue of abortion is a matter of conscience and of right. It is a difficult decision but it is one which must be left to the women.

In her speech the Minister of Justice went on to talk about the legislative committee. She proclaimed the myth that following months of hearings, including testimony from many individuals and groups expressing strong views at either end of the spectrum of opinion on abortion, the committee recognized its duty to attempt to strike a fair balance between the rights and interests of women and society's concern that the foetus be protected. Over 90 per cent of the briefs and evidence received by that committee were against the bill and called on the committee to reject the bill.

From day one the majority on that committee had its mind made up and was determined to endorse the political solution to the political problem that the government and so many members of the Liberal party had, a solution which is not principled, a solution which will divide this country in the longer run and will destroy lives in the long run.

The minister concluded her remarks by saying: "It would be my hope that these members do not condemn this bill for not reflecting their own personal positions, but recognize its ability to respond to the concerns of their fellow Canadians in a matter that is understandable, workable and fair."

Let us look at the bill and see whether it is understandable, workable or fair. Let me remind the House and the country what this bill provides. It sets out new wording to Section 287 of the Criminal Code, which reads as follows:

> 287.(1) Every person who induces an abortion on a female person is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to imprisonment for a term not exceeding two years, unless the abortion is induced by or under the direction of a medical practitioner who is of the opinion that, if the abortion were not induced, the health or life of the female person would be likely to be threatened.

The bill goes on to define "health" to include physical, mental and psychological health.

First, this bill clearly makes the inducement of an abortion a criminal offence, except in certain circumstances. Those circumstances affect the opinion of a human medical practitioner who must exercise an opinion. We already know that medical practitioners are going to have different opinions on individual sets of facts. They are asked to form their opinion on the question of whether the abortion, if it were not induced, would put the health or life of the female person in jeopardy. It is expected that the medical practitioners will pass judgment on whether a failure to induce the abortion would cause a threat to physical, mental or psychological health.

What we have here is a disguised failure of this Parliament to make a decision. Instead, it is turned not back to the person who ought to be making what is a moral decision, but instead to medical practitioners who are asked to make it on the vague test of physical, mental or psychological health.

Those from the anti-choice side of this House, who moved amendments last night, were perfectly correct when they said that the language is not certain and not clear. It is doubly not certain and not clear when it is turned over to a medical practitioner who, after all, is not a lawyer. He is asked to express a medical opinion.

The bill is not understandable. It is not workable in that it imposes an onus on those who seek to escape the effect of the criminal law to demonstrate the onus, and it is far from fair. There is no question that there are going to be different views of medical practitioners. Access to abortion is going to vary across the country. There is no distinction made on the basis of age or condition of women, and it is going to be taken outside the realm that it ought to be in in determination.

One set of legal issues, which have been raised by the minister, have been put to the test of law professors and lawyers across the country. In her attempt to justify this bill, the Minister of Justice offered the propositions that, first, there was at law a requirement for a medical justification for legal abortion and that that would create a national standard of entitlement to abortion for Canadian women. The minister secondly argued that it was necessary for Parliament to use its criminal law power to restrict the ways in which provincial legislatures can restrict access to abortion.

Those were two critical arguments that the minister used to justify this legislation and to attempt to persuade, as she apparently has successfully done, her colleagues in the Conservative and Liberal parties to vote for the bill.

• (2030)

A series of legal opinions were sought and there were 17 opinions returned from professors and other experts across the country. Before I get into the detail of them, I just want to read what the Minister of Justice said about these distinguished constitutional experts.

When it was put to her in the Justice Committee on May 10, 1990, the Minister of Justice said that she first of all had not read any of the opinions. However, she proceeded to pronounce that their arguments were utterly without foundation. She then went on to say that she did not recognize any of the leading luminaries in constitutional law in Canada in the list of people named in The Globe and Mail article.

The minister appears not to have either taken the trouble to ask for a comprehensive review of the opinions, but she proceeded to dismiss the opinions as coming from those who were beneath her dignity to know.

Let me tell the House about some of the opinions. First of all, may I offer the opinion from the Faculty of Law at the University of Toronto of seven professors, one of whom I had as a professor and so did other distinguished members of this House, if I can include myself in that category. However, apparently they failed to get through to the Minister of Justice. I am thinking here of Professor Risk. I include Professors Duclos, Macklem, Rogerson, Colker, Grant and Roach, seven professors from perhaps the most distinguished law school. I hesitate to get too comparative in this, but it is my Alma Mater.

All of them took apart the minister's arguments limb by limb. At the end of this six-page letter of opinion, there is nothing left of the arguments.

On the question of a national standard of entitlement, these professors, as did others, Professor Bruce Ryder from Osgoode Hall, Professor Andrew Petter from the even more distinguished University of Victoria, Martha Jackman, professor of constitutional law, and Sandra Rodgers, professor of medical legal issues at the University of Ottawa and on and on, all make the point, first of all, that this inept bill, Bill C-43, does not create any national entitlement to abortion. Quite the opposite. It makes abortion, in most circumstances, a criminal offence.

Mr. Speaker, I see you waving your finger of one minute at me, so I am going to ask my colleagues if they feel so minded to put a question to me. I will give them, when the time comes, an opportunity to learn even more about the opinion of professors at the various universities on the inadequacies of the Minister of Justice's opinion.

Let me just finish by saying that people across this country do not want this bill. They do not want abortion to be a matter of criminal law. They do not wish the matter turned over simply to doctors to decide. Women across Canada do not want this bill. The courts have made it very clear that this bill, by making abortion illegal, intervenes in one of the most difficult decisions that a person can make.

Let me conclude by quoting from Madam Justice Wilson who said: "This decision, that of having an abortion, is one that will have profound psychological, economic, and social consequences for the pregnant woman. The circumstances giving rise to it can be complex and varied. There may be and usually are powerful considerations militating in opposite directions. It is a decision that deeply reflects the way the woman thinks about herself and her relationship to others and to society at large. It is not just a medical decision. It is a profound social and ethical one as well. Her response to it will be the response of the whole person".

This decision about the future of a foetus is one which is a profound social and ethical question. It is not one that Parliament can make, a Parliament, predominantly, as has been noted, of men who will never face this decision. It is not a decision which doctors can make. It is a decision which women make, and I urge the House to vote against the bill.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): It seems that at least two members have listened to your suggestion for questions and comments and I recognize the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam on a question or comment.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Indeed, I am taking up the suggestion of the hon. member because I am very interested in hearing what is the legal analysis from the 17 law professors. The women in Canada have a right to have spelled out for them what the analysis is. I would ask the hon. member if he could, in the time allotted for questions and comments, provide me and the women of Canada with that information.

Mr. Brewin: I thank my friend for the very perceptive question. I do appreciate it. It does give me a chance to add some remarks which I had hoped to squeeze in in the main part of my speech.

It is perhaps clear on the face of it that the question of national standard of entitlement is not established by this bill. That is a specious argument. Let me go to the second of the two arguments that the minister raised in which he stated: "It is necessary for Parliament to use its criminal law power to restrictive the ways in which provincial legislatures can restrict access to abortion".

There are a number of flaws with that, but the main one is that all of the cases demonstrate clearly that the provincial legislatures operating within their areas of jurisdiction, and in this case probably the area of health, could enact even more restrictive legislation than this Parliament enacts and that such legislation would not be deemed to be in conflict with validly enacted federal legislation.

In the case of car accidents, for example, or car offences, the federal Criminal Code applies one standard. In provincial legislatures which have enacted additional standards, that legislation has been upheld by the courts.

In the justice committee the minister pronounced herself and dismissed all of these arguments as not knowing what they are talking about. She said that they were talking about the paramountcy principle and then proceeded to demonstrate that she did not know anything about the paramountcy principle at all.

The only case that the minister could even refer to was one decided in 1896 on the paramountcy issue, subsequently completely changed and developed in a different direction by courts. The paramountcy issue is the following. If there are conflicting, validly enacted federal and provincial legislation, then the federal law will prevail. But first there must be a finding of valid provincial legislation and then there must be a determination of conflict. It is that point which the minister fails to understand but she demonstrates in her discussion of the Westindorp case, which she completely misunderstands and misquotes.

This legislation does not so occupy the field in the area of abortion that it would prevent more restrictive legislation be enacted by provinces. This law does not establish national standards. This law is not something that is required by the courts.

As we watched the votes unfold last night, the vote by the Liberal Party brought me great sadness. This is a difficult issue to make partisan. Yet by their votes, both the Conservative and Liberal parties demonstrated that when the crunch really comes the talk about women's rights is just talk. A mere handful of Liberals stood up, 5 Liberals out of a caucus of 83 or 84—some of them are off running for leader right now—and voted for the position that abortion should not be a matter of criminal law at all; a handful.

• (2040)

Women across Canada and men across Canada who are concerned about the profound issue of women's rights are going to have to ask themselves, as they move towards future elections, whether it in fact aids the cause of women's rights to have more Liberals in the House. Last night demonstrated beyond doubt that Liberals, as with Conservatives, cannot be counted on to stand with women when it really matters.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): I was pleased to hear my colleague from Victoria's comments. It is almost a breath of fresh air to hear from a man in this House articulating the position of choice for women in such a clear and forceful manner. It is also a pleasure to hear him look at the legal ramifications of this bill. That leads me to one of the questions that I have.

One of the rationales that we have heard around this place for bringing in criminal legislation has been the Chantal Daigle case last summer, when Canadians from coast to coast were horrified to see this young woman's life displayed across television sets from coast to coast, to have the most intimate details of her life spoken of in cafés, in barber shops, on street corners, in all the places in Canada. People did not like that spectacle. They wanted to ensure that it would not happen again. One of the rationales we keep hearing is, if Bill C-43 passes that will stop that kind of display.

I would like to ask my colleague, how will Bill C-43 stop civil injunctions? Will it, in fact? Or will we continue to see this kind of display, this kind of action by some of the more reactionary, more forceful, more nasty anti-choice people in our society?

Mr. Brewin: The answer is that the bill will in fact encourage legal action. It will make abortions in most cases illegal. The lines, when they are not illegal are vague. That is an invitation to legal action. It is an invitation to injunctions. The Supreme Court of Canada in the Daigle case made it very clear that it frowned on any law which put women through the court system during pregnancy. I am quite convinced that, in due course, this bill, which we are agonizing through here and which the country is agonizing through, will be ruled unconstitutional by the Supreme Court of Canada.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I was interested to hear the hon. member from New Westminster—Burnaby refer to the legal analysis that we have just heard from the hon. member for Victoria and the thoughtful and articulate way in which he has expressed his concern for the legislation that is before us.

I will find it very difficult under the circumstances to be able to put forward the thoughtful, rational words that are necessary. I am afraid that after listening for hours and hours this week to women being denigrated, I am rapidly getting to the point that it is going to be very difficult to maintain rationality, to maintain dignity, or even to maintain the respect that is necessary to speak in this House.

In an article in The Vancouver Province, the Justice Minister stated that the criminal law has two major purposes. First, the preservation of the peace and protection of the public, and secondly, the safeguards of equality, fairness, and a guarantee of the rights and liberties of the individual against the state".

This bill will not preserve peace on the question of abortion. Indeed, the outrage expressed by both sides on this question ensures that the legislation will ensure an ongoing inflamed debate.

With regard to the protection of the public, just what public is the minister suggesting must be protected by this legislation, and from whom?

The second purpose, she said, was the safeguard of equity and fairness and a guarantee of rights and liberties of the individual against the state. How does Bill C–43 safeguard and protect equity and fairness, and how does it guarantee the rights of women in Canada?

This is not a compromise bill. This is a bill that recriminalizes abortion. The Liberals want this bill to pass because they would like to have the issue laid to rest in anticipation of forming the next government. The Liberals anticipate that once the bill is in place they will not have to deal with it if indeed they do become the next government.

To those who watched the votes last night it became very clear to Canadian women where the hearts and support of the Liberals are on issues as they pertain to women. The verbal rhetoric will escalate as we go into an election campaign, but unfortunately the Liberal Party has neither the policy nor the will, as evidenced last night, to ensure that Canadian women's rights and justice for Canadian women will prevail under their governments.

For the Tories, this bill, in my view, is a sacrificial offering to the radical fringe, the fringe that does not like turbans, that opposes pay equity and that in many ways has demonstrated that it very much dislikes women. The government is offering up on the sacrificial altar of expediency the right of women to choose.

The Minister of Justice, the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, parted ways with Bill Vander Zalm and his Socred cronies in Victoria because of his interference on the question of abortion in British Columbia. Women in the riding of Vancouver Centre trusted the Minister of Justice. They believed that she would stand with them on this most basic of rights. They were thrilled, as were many women in this country, when the hon. member was made the first woman justice minister.

The hon. member for Vancouver Centre, the Minister of Justice, has broken ranks with her sisters, the women of Canada, the women who supported her, the women who celebrated her appointment with her, and has turned her back on them. She has stood in this House and offered an arrogant rationale implying balance in a bill that devastates the rights of women in this country.

I have a letter addressed to the Minister of Justice that was sent to me by a constituent of mine and that I would like to put on the record. It reads:

> Dear Minister,
>
> Re: Proposed Recriminalization of Abortion
> I would like to be able to congratulate you on your appointment as Justice Minister, since the appointment of a woman to that position is an historical event and should be one that all women wish to celebrate. However, I believe that the Prime Minister's decision to appoint a woman to the Justice portfolio was neither made in a spirit of commitment to women's equality nor in recognition of the potential contribution that a woman incumbent could make to all women in Canada. Rather, I believe that your appointment is a thinly veiled attempt to counter all the bad press that the federal government has received over its recent decision to cut federal funding to women's programs across Canada.
>
> Further, I believe that your appointment was intended to cloud the fact that the proposed abortion bill will recriminalize abortion. I believe the Prime Minister considered your B.C. reputation as a supporter of a woman's right to reproductive choice and decided that he could rely on that reputation to reassure Canadian women that the hon. Minister would be fair in her representation of women on this issue. I believe the Canadian women are not that easily fooled—and it gives the minister's name.

• (2050)

> Those same women who applauded your position on choice are now wondering why you have turned away from them to endorse proposed legislation to recriminalize abortion. I know why. It is politically expedient for you to abandon the wishes of the majority of Canadian women on this subject at this time. That is nothing for us to celebrate.
>
> The majority of Canadians support a woman's right to choose whether or not to have a child. I demand that you, hon. Minister, act on behalf of the majority of Canadians in opposing the proposed abortion bill. I must advise you that if you do not, I will do everything within my power to ensure that Canadian women know that you favour political expediency over the rights of women, and I will be encouraging them to ensure that you are not re-elected to the House of Commons.
> Yours truly,

This past year, January to December 1989, provided a long list of rude awakenings for Canadian women, women who thought we had won the right to make our own reproductive decisions. Women in Ontario were shocked when the Supreme Court of Ontario judge granted Barbara Dodd's former boyfriend an injunction preventing her from having an abortion. The decision followed a hearing at which neither Dodd nor her lawyer were present.

Women in Quebec were shocked when Chantal Daigle's former lover persuaded a Superior Court judge to order the young woman to carry her pregnancy to term. The province's highest court upheld the ruling.

Women in Nova Scotia watched helplessly as Premier John Buchanan's government passed a law to prevent Dr. Henry Morgentaler from operating a Halifax clinic that was to facilitate safe, timely abortions in the underserved Atlantic provinces.

Women throughout the country looked on with amazement and shock as this government introduced a new criminal abortion law that could lead to the imprisonment of both women and their doctors for abortions performed for reasons other than health.

All this in spite of the fact that in 1988 the Supreme Court ruled and came down with a decision that struck down Canada's abortion laws because they forced women seeking abortions to meet a criterion that is unrelated to their own priorities and aspirations.

Now we are in 1990, and now we have listened through this long week to member of parliament after member of parliament get up and, in the most sanctimonious terms, vilify the women of this country.

Part of the argument that was put forward was an argument for women to carry children to term and for the government, I assume, or society as a whole, to provide to those women the kinds of support that are necessary for them either to bear the children and keep them or, as some might suggest, to bear them for another, which is an option I am sure those who have suggested it have not thought about in terms of the person who is doing the bearing.

Having said that, in the last 18 months since this parliament began I have not seen one shred of evidence from the government to show that there is any intention on the part of the same government that brings forward such regressive, cruel legislation—not one shred of evidence that that government in fact plans to provide the support necessary for women to be able to bear these children and raise these children with the support of the community.

In fact, it is important for us to note that the number of working families in this country has steadily increased between 1973 and 1986, and in fact is up by 19 percent. There is a disproportionate number of working-poor families residing in western Canada. Often these include families with two incomes. Roughly 60 percent of working-poor families consists of couples with dependent children.

Has the government provided any kind of assistance to these families? No. The government has put a cap on CAP in western provinces. The government has clawed back child allowance. The government has failed to deliver on the child care that was promised and, to top it all off, the government is throwing in a 7 percent goods and services tax. This lack of support is totally unrealistic.

In 1966, a minimum-wage worker who supports a family could earn 46 percent of the poverty line income. Those are 1986 figures, Mr. Speaker. The minimum wage has not increased in this Parliament since 1986. Even if both spouses were fully employed at the minimum wage, they could only earn 92 percent of the poverty line with both of them working. I do not know if this government expects that they should run out and steal the other 8 percent. I do not know how this government plans that they should find the 7 percent to pay the goods and services tax, but I do know that this kind of policy is not going to help those mothers and fathers face poverty and deal with additional children if in fact their choice were one that is abortion.

There is a failure by this government to set an example for the rest of Canada about how it will provide this wonderful support that it keeps saying we as a community must provide. It is easy to get up in this House and say that we as a community must provide support to the women of Canada.

I will tell you something: if you start looking at the statutes that have come into this House to be debated in this House about supporting women, not one of them will help a woman who is faced with these kinds of choices.

I could go into detail on the legislation, but I do not intend to because I think it has been amply described by my colleagues from the New Democratic Party.

This is a sad week for women in Canada, and it is going to be a sadder week next week when women return to the life of a chattel, being subject to male analysis of the decisions we make and to being threatened with jail if those decisions are the wrong ones in the view of those men. In fact, the minister, as the hon. member for Victoria says, used as her paramountcy a decision from the last century. There are generations of women who have been born since the last century who remember, and who will continue to remember, their sisters, their neighbours, their mothers, their friends, without the right to have a legal safe abortion, who helped each other in desperation, knowing they were breaking the law, watching some die or suffer horribly, but willing to make that sacrifice because there was no alternative.

• (2100)

Women will continue to have abortions in this country. The ante will go up tremendously if this bill passes. I am finding it very difficult tonight, as I said at the beginning, to make a speech that gives the dignity to this House that it deserves. I am absolutely devastated at the thought that in 1990, 50 years after we women became persons, we are faced with the fait accompli of Bill C-43, the recriminalization of abortion.

The hon. member for Victoria drew a parallel between the constitutional crisis Canada faces and this bill. I agree with him totally, not only does this bill parallel the constitutional crisis, this bill is the Meech Lake Accord of women in Canada.

I condemn this bill for its lack of fairness, for its lack of equity, for its lack of justice. I condemn it on behalf of a great number of women in Canada.

Mr. John Brewin (Victoria): Mr. Speaker, I would first like to thank the member for her kind words. I would also like to take this opportunity to congratulate the member for New Westminster—Burnaby for her fight on this bill. It has been terrific. I am proud to be sitting next to her in this House and to be associated with her in this battle.

As I was listening to her and to the member for Mission—Coquitlam I noted a sadness, particularly among women, in this debate and in the vote. It is a sadness with which I empathize. It is not a pleasant thing to see the society in which you live a lesser place than you would like it to be. I think that is the perception of what is happening.

I happened, for quite different reasons, to go into the reading room tonight and I found a book called The Long Distance Runner, the autobiography of Michael Harrington. Michael Harrington is an American socialist. He told a joke that William Buckley told on him in introducing him. He said: "That is like being a skyscraper in Desmoines".

He tells the story in this book of his life as a democratic socialist in the United States. He describes it as the long distance run. Part of it is the evolution of his thinking as the years went along, part of it is an account of the joy of accomplishment and the despair at the losses and the difficult times. He concludes, as it happened just before he died recently of cancer, to say that he would not have traded his life for any other, that the struggle for social justice is important and worth it. Whatever the short-term loss tonight, it is a fight that must go on.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for Victoria for what he has just put before the House. I think it probably reflects the sentiments of many Canadian women. Many of the women who have spoken in this House believed, I think, that we were part of the last generation of women who would have to face unwanted pregnancy with no alternatives but to break the law. In fact, we find ourselves part of a generation again facing those alternatives. That is the legacy we have to give to our daughters.

I too want to draw a little bit of a comparison. There was a black and white film put out years ago. It is still around in some places. It was put out by the International Ladies Garment Workers and is about the organizing drives in New York at the turn of the century. There is a song which closes the film. The chorus in the song says: "Every generation has to win it again". I guess that is what we are facing here.

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, I would like to speak very briefly at the third reading stage of Bill C-43 and express my reservations about the legislation tabled by this government.

Jesus Christ said something I think is very apt in this case; "Forgive them, for they know not what they do". I think these words are a very good description of this government, which has tabled a bill that does not in any way deal with the problem facing our modern society.

In fact, neither pro-life nor pro-choice supporters can identify with this bill. Both groups are disappointed by this legislation. I fail to see why the government refused to pass legislation similar to that which exists in most of the world's industrialized countries. I am referring to legislation that clearly specifies that in the early stages of pregnancy, it is exclusively up to the woman to decide whether or not she will keep her child. In most modern countries, the legislation provides that this decision may be made by the mother without any intervention by the State, and in a totally decriminalized context.

In most of these countries—I am thinking of France in particular—there is a provision that in the second quarter, the decision is a matter between the mother and a physician. In other words, the decision must be medically approved if the abortion, if that is what the mother wants, is to take place.

In the last three months of pregnancy, most industrialized countries provide that to have an abortion is a criminal act, except in cases where the life of the mother is in danger.

I think the legislation before the House today might, in the opinion of those who support the pro-life movement, open the door far too wide to abuse. If we read the wording of the bill very carefully, it is indeed a possibility. Conversely, and this is where the situation gets rather confused, we have had both on second reading and at the report stage of this bill and now on third reading, parliamentarians who said that in fact, the bill was far too restrictive and that in the final instance, the whole bill should not be subject to the Criminal Code.

I think the amendment proposed by the hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby (Ms. Black), who suggested repealing sections 287 and 288 of the Criminal Code, had some merit. I did not vote in favour of the amendment because personally, I think the decision, at least in the early stages of pregnancy, should be entirely up to the mother and certainly not subject to the Criminal Code. Personally, I think that in the final stages of pregnancy, abortion would constitute a crime, just as a mother who cuts her child's throat in the days and weeks following its birth would be committing a crime. If we apply criminal sanctions to the mother who commits such an act in the weeks following birth, I don't see how we could not do so when an abortion is done in the weeks preceding birth. There would otherwise be a double standard.

I think it is unfortunate that the bill ignores the various stages of pregnancy. The medical profession has very clearly addressed the whole question of deciding when life really begins. Is it at the time of conception, during the first few weeks, or during the first few months? I suggest that this still has not been resolved at the medical level. But it seems to me that after a number of weeks, there is undoubtedly a living being in its mother's womb and to carry out an abortion at that time could be accepted by society only under very stringent conditions and on the basis of a clear decision of the medical profession.

I can say this with the utmost conviction because my father was a general practictioner who probably delivered a few thousand babies in his lifetime, operating for many years in such rural areas as the Lower St. Lawrence, near Rivière-du-Loup, Kamouraska, Saint-Pascal, but especially in Kamouraska, and later on in Charlesbourg, a suburd of Quebec City. He is no longer here to discuss with me and tell me how I should have voted on this bill. I am quite sure that he did not carry out many abortions. And if he did I am sure it was clearly to save the mother's life.

As several other Parliamentarians, I took it upon myself to seek opinions. This is a bill on which hon. members may vote freely, irrespective of their party affiliation or party line, according their conscience. I have been able to realize to what extent Canadians are divided on this issue, for having sought the opinion of my own children—I have two daughters and two sons—I know what they think, and I can tell you that if one of my sons is pro-life, the other is pro-choice, and that if one of my daughters is pro-life, the other is pro-choice. They are, like the rest of the Canadian people, deeply divided on this issue. Unfortunately, the bill we have before us does not help in any way. I hope that the bill will pass on third reading. I think it will. We just have to refer to the final votes on the report stage and see what happened then to conclude that Bill C-43 will very likely pass on third reading.

I hope that this law will not have as much trouble in the courts as the previous law because in reality, it is no longer possible, I think, to successfully prosecute a doctor who performs an abortion. The experience of the criminal courts in recent years clearly shows that when a physician is taken to court, a trial with judge and jury is automatically requested. In today's modern society, it is impossible to bring together 12 jurors who are unanimous on this question. That is why I find it rather unfortunate that the government decided to maintain this as a criminal matter. I am convinced that when it comes to trial in court, this question, again, will never be settled. I do not see how we can find 12 jurors who will unanimously convict a physician for performing an abortion.

I also find it regrettable that so much emphasis is put on the physician's responsibility. It seems to me that doctors practise their profession in conditions that are often very difficult in our modern society. It is not the doctor's duty to pass a legal, much less a religious, judgement. Therefore putting so much emphasis in the bill on the physician's responsibility seems to me to be fundamentally wrong. I am quite disappointed to see how determined the government is to pass its bill in its present form.

Personally, I will vote against this bill on third reading because I think that it does not meet the needs of the day.

For sure, the Canadian government cannot legislate in this area without using the Criminal Code, since it is possibly the only law that allows it to legislate.

• (2120)

But it seems to me that this issue, which I think ought to be decriminalized, should be strictly regulated by provincial and medical authorities in each Canadian province. Had we been able to get the agreement of the ten provinces to put the matter of abortion under civil law to allow abortion during the first weeks of pregnancy, as I said earlier, I suggest we might have had a piece of legislation which would have been much fairer and much more serene, but which could have provided stricter sanctions for abortion in the latter phase of pregnancy.

I voted for an amendment introduced by the member from Fraser Valler East (Mr. Belsher). His amendment had to do with the physician who concludes that without abortion the life or health of the mother might be seriously threatened. I thought that adding the word "seriously" would in a way restrict the open-door approach to abortion on demand which seems to be a characteristic of this bill. I am very disappointed that the government did not see fit to accept this amendment from one of its own backbenchers.

I vividly remember the words of Mgr. Lebel, president of the Canadian Conference of Catholic Bishops, who expressed strong disappointment when he learned that the parliamentary committee on abortion did not accept any of the amendments to Bill C-43. For that reason, he thought, the bill itself should have been scrapped.

I for one believe that, at the very least, the amendment of the member for Fraser Valley East should have been adopted. I suggest we will end up with a faulty piece of legislation which will fail to meet the requirements of our modern society. And I am afraid—I hope I am wrong—that again the Supreme Court will be called upon to rule on the contents of the legislation, and perhaps a few years down the road we will have to get back to Parliament to re-open the debate on the abortion legislation.

[English]

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I was listening to the member from the Liberal side very carefully and I must say that I ended up somewhat confused about just exactly what his position is on this issue and on the bill.

He kept returning to the issue of late abortions. He said several times that late abortions are a crime. I wonder if he is aware that 89 per cent of the abortions that are performed in this country take place before the twelfth week. Late abortions very seldom happen. When they do happen, it is for catastrophic reasons.

I have a friend who underwent a late abortion last year. She was five months pregnant. She was pregnant with her third child and it was very much a wanted child. She had no option but to go through with this abortion. It was not her choice. It was not what she wanted to do, but to save her own health, and for the sake of the two children she already had, she had to go through this.

When you talk about making late abortions a crime, this is the kind of situation you are talking about. Does the hon. member suggest that this woman, after going through medical consultation, should have gone through some other kind of procedure, some other kind of panel, some other kind of medical decision? The medical decision had been made. I really find it difficult to understand what he would want to see put into place.

The other thing that left me somewhat confused was that he talked about wanting abortion to be decriminalized but said, on the other hand, that society wanted regulations in place. Well, the fact of the matter is there are already regulations in place. Women are self-regulating about this issue, for one thing. It is not an issue that women take lightly. It is an issue that women struggle with incredibly. There are regulations in place by the Canadian Medical Association as well which deal with all of the issues the member was speaking of.

Just exactly what does he mean about crimes in the later stages? What does he means about regulations when we already have regulations?

[Translation]

Hon. André Ouellet (Papineau—Saint-Michel): Mr. Speaker, before answering the hon. member's question, I want to say to him that, up until the third reading stage, this debate on Bill C-43 had been held in a non-partisan way with respect for the personal views and convictions of every member of this House.

I deeply regret that the New Democratic Party, at the third reading stage of this bill, has decided to turn it into a partisan issue by increasing their interventions, questioning speeches made in this House by members of other parties and attempting to ask questions to their own members. They want to turn this debate into the NDP mutual admiration society, which I find totally unacceptable in this context. From the beginning we have seen a non-partisan debate where all members can express their own personal views and convictions dictated by their conscience.

I say to the hon. member that I am quite familiar with the position she has expressed and that I respect her views. I would like the NDP members to limit themselves to their own speeches and let other members, be they Conservatives or Liberals, freely express their opinions in this debate where partisanship has no place.

I explained a while ago—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): Order! The hon. member on a point of order.

[English]

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I am not going to say what I think about the remarks that have just been made. I am going to ask you to clarify something. Under the rules of this House, under questions and comments members have a right to question any other member, regardless of which party they are from. Would you please clarify that, Mr. Speaker?

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): I do not think that what has been said by the hon. member is a point of order. The hon. member for Papineau—Saint Michel was expressing an opinion, which all other members of the House may not share. However, the member may come back to that topic, if she wants, for the rest of the period of question and comments.

• (2130)

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, since I have an opportunity to comment further on my position on this bill, I would like to add that I am sorry the government did not accept an amendment that was proposed by the hon. member for Glengarry—Prescott—Russell, which provided that an abortion should be induced only by a medical practitioner. He suggested removing the words "or under the direction of" to make it clear that an abortion should only be induced in very special circumstances and only by a medical practitioner, not by other persons who do not have the ability to assess properly the consequences that an abortion might have from the health point of view. I think the purpose of this amendment was to ensure that everything is done under the best possible conditions by the persons best qualified to perform a medical act that I feel should only be done in very special circumstances. I think it is also unfortunate that the government did not accept an amendment I thought was entirely appropriate in the circumstances.

[English]

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, since it is not possible to have clarification of the ruling, I would like to express my opinion.

Because a group of people representing a particular political party are attracted to that party because of its clearly articulated policies, I feel we should be able to get up in this House and articulate that position very comfortably. These members feel so strongly about the issues that they are at least prepared to stay and ask questions of other speakers or make comments on those questions. The rules of this House allow any member to question any other member regardless of whether they are in the same party or what their views are. I understand this to be an entrenched right in this House.

I would like to say that I take very grave exception to the position of the hon. member who spoke just before my intervention. I would very strongly ask him to consider not making this a partisan issue, something he is accusing others of doing.

[Translation]

Mr. Ouellet: Mr. Speaker, I am willing to give the hon. member the benefit of the doubt and assume she is not trying to make a partisan gesture. It certainly is not my intention. I think I expressed, as I said from the outset, my own personal position. I hope that all other parliamentarians who will speak in this debate will do the same. I have noticed that during the last few hours of this debate, there has been a certain emphasis, if I may use this term, by certain members in a certain corner of the House of Commons, and if that is not a partisan gesture, so much the better!

In concluding, I wish to say that I do not think Bill C–43 is the kind of bill I would have liked to see tabled by this government, and in the circumstances, when time comes to vote on third reading, I will vote against this bill.

[English]

Mr. Dan Heap (Trinity—Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak against Bill C–43, the act respecting abortion, on this third reading. There are so many issues in this, and some of them have been very well dealt with, such as the ambiguity of the bill or the question of the legal jeopardy and risk to a doctor as well as to a woman, and so on .I do not intend to go into those aspects. This is something I have been concerned with personally in the sense that I have seen it primarily not as a legal issue but as a moral issue.

My wife and the rest of my family and I have discussed this frequently over the years. My wife and I have seven children and a number of grandchildren, and we are glad of every one of them. My wife and I have never tried to prevent the birth of one of our children. We not only reverence life, but we enjoy and value it. But we came to the conclusion some years ago that we do not have the right as citizens to use the force of the law to prevent a woman from seeking an abortion from a qualified medical practitioner.

Furthermore, most of the mail and comments that I have received from my constituents are not concerned with the confusing aspects of Bill C–43. They are concerned with yes or no; abortion or no abortion. Some of them may qualify it by talking about the first or second or third trimester or about certain circumstances, but basically they are concerned either that abortion should be again made a criminal offence under our law or that it should not be. Therefore, I want to deal with what I consider the underlying moral issue, on which it is possible to take the position that abortion ought not to happen and yet, at the same time and consistently, to take the position that we do not have the moral means to use force or terror against a woman or a doctor who differs with us in that judgment.

I am encouraged by a large part of the brief that the United Church of Canada presented on this subject earlier this year. I may not agree with absolutely every detail of it, but it is one of the best statements I have found of the moral and religious issues at stake in this matter.

In their brief, at the beginning, they make three general points. One is: "We urge the Government of Canada not to use the provisions in the Criminal Code to regulate abortion". That in one sense completely covers the subject of this bill. They go on, and I wish to refer in a minute to their reasons for that.

They also say that they want the Government of Canada "to enact and enforce penalties for people who perform or attempt to perform abortions without the required medical qualifications or who perform or attempt to perform abortions in places other than those approved for that purpose". I am quite perplexed by that recommendation, that urging, because it seems to me that, in part, it is redundant, as we already have a law forbidding a person to do a medical service who is not qualified and the medical profession has its own internal code and disciplinary system to the same effect. So that is taken care of, and even though they seem to place it outside the Criminal Code, I do not understand how the United Church would plan to have the government carry this out. I do not know under what kind of jurisdiction they expect the government to do it. At any rate, it seems to me it is cancelled out by the first of their recommendations.

• (2140)

Their third recommendation, third urging, is that the government use shared funding under the Canada Health Act "to require all provincial governments to provide adequate contraceptive education and services to effectively reduce the incidence of unwanted pregnancies and to provide early access to diagnosis and, if necessary, termination of pregnancy so that any such abortion could be performed as early as possible". With the exception of the middle clause, which I find hard to understand, I think their position is clear and sound.

I want to refer to some of the theological and ethical principles that the General Council of the United Church states in support of that position, because that is the official position by the General Council of the United Church. They go on to say:

> The United Church of Canada affirms: the sanctity of human life, born and unborn. That life is much more than physical existence.

They go on to say that the taking of human life is evil. Then they make a point that I think should be made more often than it is in this debate.

> Our concern must not be limited to a concern for the unborn but it must also include a concern for the quality of life as a whole.

In this debate and in previous debates on this subject, I have said how disgraceful it is sometimes that a body such as a city council or the parliament seems to be concerned with children before they are born and not afterwards. It seems to make a mockery of everything they say.

The United Church goes on:

> Life in this imperfect world often places us in complex circumstances of moral dilemma and ambiguity where values ultimate in themselves seem at times to be in conflict with other values and rights.
> We are called as a people of God to take responsibility for our lives and the world in which we live. This may involve making grave decisions relating even to life itself.

Some of us who decided years ago to join the Canadian Armed Forces were certainly deciding to try to take lives, since that is what has to be done in war. We were urged to do that by practically all the religious leaders of Canada. In this point, the United Church is in line with the rest. Whether war is justified or not, they are making the general point that there are times when we have to make very grave decisions relating even to life itself.

They go on to say:

> A child has a right to be wanted, so that it may have some assurance of this essential element in human development. Bringing unwanted children into the world is irresponsible.

Then they come to the point at which so many members of this House seem to divide.

> Family planning, including vasectomy and tubal ligation, is a Christian duty. Our Canadian society has to make every effort to ensure that contraception is the only completely acceptable form of birth control—. The aim of all education, research and social pressure must be always to reduce the incidence of abortion and to promote effective contraception.

During my life, particularly during my married life and my life as an active member of the church, at present the Anglican Church, I have not been able to understand why some people teach that contraception is wrong. Some people seem to place contraception almost on a level with abortion in their scale of evil. I cannot for the life of me understand it because I believe it is true that the restriction or hindrance of contraception or a discouragement of contraception has in fact been responsible in part for many abortions.

The United Church goes on to says:

> To anticipate the use of abortion as a form of birth control and therefore neglect to practise contraception is medically and morally deplorable and socially expensive and such intentional use of abortion by individuals or governments is morally wrong.

The United Church does not say that abortion is good. It does no say that abortion is neutral, neither good nor evil. It says it is wrong, but it does not take an absolutist view of that. It goes on:

> We affirm the inherent value of human life, both as immature in the foetus—

Mr. Speaker, I think that is a broadly acceptable description of something which is disputed back and forth as to when a human person begins. The United Church regards the foetus as immature human life. It goes on to say:

> —and as expressed in the life of the mother and related persons. The foetus is a unique though immature form of human life and, as such, has inherent value. Christians should witness to that value by stressing that abortion is always a moral issue and can only be accepted as the lesser of two evils and should be the most responsible alternative available in each particular situation.

They conclude this paragraph by saying:

> Therefore abortion is acceptable only in certain medical, social and economic situations.

I believe that is a very careful, responsible statement by Christian people of the situation in which we find ourselves in this country regarding abortion. They go on from there to make four more points. They say:

> Based on these fundamental values, the major concerns of the church have been:
> (1) To reduce the incidence of abortion through effective contraception. This requires adequate funding for education and services provided by local and provincial health authorities.
>
> (2) To establish responsible choice for women with problematic pregnancies up to the approach of fetal viability with great stress on enabling any elective abortion to be as early as possible.
>
> (3) To ensure equality of access to abortion services for women across Canada, that is, to end the injustice to poorer and rural women and those from particular provinces.
> (4) To ensure that counselling is available for those considering abortions.

I am well aware that part of their recommendation is outside the purview of this particular bill we are dealing with, but I want to emphasize a point they are making because it shows that this bill is not only harmful but also unnecessary. If the bill were a little bit harmful but did a lot of good, we might have to accept it. When it does a lot of harm and is quite unnecessary, we should reject it.

What the United Church says is that the Canada Health Act should be used to pressure the provinces to make adequate provision for reproductive education and services according to its standards of comprehensiveness and availability. The federal government should use the threat of withholding health grants if provinces are not ensuring education in contraception and adequate access to early diagnosis and abortion services if necessary. Then they go on to make the point that:

> Re-criminalization violates women's responsible choice.

The United Church criticized the previous abortion law as "unjust in principle and unworkable in practice". I think they made a very powerful point in this matter.

I wish there was time to also go into the very good brief of the Planned Parenthood Federation of Canada. I can touch on only a couple of their points. They deal with the means of preventing unwanted pregnancies. I find it shocking that this government, which has tried twice now to criminalize abortion, has also reduced the funding for Planned Parenthood of Canada.

Planned Parenthood says:

> Meanwhile, unintended pregnancy among women, all pregnancy in adolescent women, the spread of sexually transmitted diseases, and increasing fertility problems continue to affect millions of Canadians and have serious social, health, and economic consequences for us all.

Farther down they say:

> The social, economic, and health consequences of the lack of fertility control have a major impact on the lives of individual women and on the status of women in general.

They are concerned with trying to prevent the problem that this government undertakes quite falsely and incompetently to cure on this law on abortion. The Planned Parenthood Association continues:

> In spite of the serious and costly consequences of unintended pregnancy and the spread of sexually transmitted diseases,—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): I would ask the hon. member to conclude, please.

Mr. Heap: Mr. Speaker, I simply want to conclude with the final paragraph of the statement of the United Church of Canada:

> These ways of witnessing and safeguarding the value of developing life are less ambiguous and more effective:

Than this law:

> —for example, responsible and widely available contraception, good prenatal care and adequate family income. As a society, we have a long way to go in terms of improving mother and child welfare, prenatal and postnatal, and all such policies affirm the value of life more powerfully than a criminal law.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): Questions or comments. The hon. member for New Westminster—Burnaby.

Ms. Dawn Black (New Westminster—Burnaby): Mr. Speaker, I think you will find there is unanimous consent in the House tonight for the following motion, that is, that the order for third reading of Bill C-43 be discharged and the bill be withdrawn.

[Translation]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): The hon. member seeks unanimous consent to present this motion. Does the House give unanimous consent?

Some hon. members: Agreed.

Mr. Plourde: No.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): Since the hon. member does not have the unanimous consent of the House, the motion is rejected.

Motion negatived.

[English]

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the only voices we heard were agreed.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): I clearly heard someone also who did not agree to that presentation. On debate.

Mr. Len Taylor (The Battlefords—Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, quite frankly, the abortion debate is one that I welcome.

I welcome this debate because it is an opportunity to focus attention not just on life, but on our whole attitude toward caring and sharing, attitudes New Democrats and their predecessors hold and have held very dear. It is a matter of understanding life, with all its important parts, and how we as individuals within a diversified society can best serve each other, not just in times of need but in everyday life when positive interaction prevents problems and stimulates development.

I state outright my support for life, life within the womb and later as the child grows to adulthood, aging, I would hope gracefully toward a natural death. In so doing, I express my understanding of our current society where children and adults die in poverty, without friends, without family and often without dignity.

Words are important. Definitions shape perceptions, and we have to be careful in our understanding of these definitions. We are all pro-life, and to suggest otherwise is nonsense. There is no other way to describe someone who bears concern and consideration for another's life, opportunity and future.

Some things enter into all this. The well-known Canadian Laurier Lapierre said it well not long ago, speaking at a convention that I attended in Saskatoon. The former television personality said that there is great support among Canadians for the sanctity of life. Then he added: "until after birth".

The North American society we have created through economic decisions taken by governments is responsible for thousands of deaths every year.

There are suicides. The farmer about to lose the land that he inherited from his father feels that he has failed. The worker laid off for the third time in 10 years feels he can no longer serve his impoverished family. The student whose strife-torn home life is affecting his grades and social interaction with others feels he has no future worth living. This is a society in which crucial individual life and death decisions are based on one's interpretation of one's own future. Desperate decisions to take one's own life or the life of one yet to be born are not taken lightly.

These are decisions reached in reaction to situations often created by others. They are decisions reached from deep within their souls, personal, private and often illogical. They are decisions not easily understood by you or me.

There are more than 60,000 abortions every year. We have to ask: Why? Are these the acts of indecisive women, uncaring women destined for hell? I think not, Mr. Speaker. A decision to take any life is one reached with much suffering, regret and guilt. Very often if there were alternatives, there would not be a decision to have that abortion. Community and local church support in this regard is very important.

As parliamentarians and members of this society, our goal is to reduce the number of abortions in Canada. It is a most admirable goal, one that I believe to be of utmost importance. However, if our society is going to achieve that goal or other goals such as the reduction in the number of suicides, the number of child or wife abuse situations or the number of crimes committed by juveniles, we are going to have to correct the social and economic problems that are the root cause of each. It is an admirable challenge, one we have to adopt as our own.

What all these problems have in common is that no law in and of itself will stop them. Young men and women will continue to commit suicide. Husbands will continue to beat their wives. Children will continue to commit crimes against person and property. People will continue to consider abortion as an alternative for their own futures regardless of well-placed words from well-meaning individuals, speeches from politicians and laws controlling their lives, until such time as society provides an alternative that they may consider in their personal decision-making process.

A woman who wants an abortion, and we must believe there are people who want abortions for many different reasons, and who has the means to obtain one will find the way to have that abortion regardless of the law. That was proved prior to the passing of Canada's first abortion law in 1967.

The true test of our society and our law-makers is our tolerance of the different needs and acts of individuals who make up our society. Governments and individuals have a responsibility to promote positive decision-making, to create a society which stimulates and encourages the joy of childbirth and child rearing. The protection of the child and the protection of the family is as important to the future of our society as is the protection of the rights of those who are yet to be born.

There is a certain amount of the current debate which refuses to acknowledge the existence of factors beyond the individual control and therefore allows little room for tolerance of any kind. On an issue of this importance, society must accept that there is no specific or definitive answer to the question of what is right and what is wrong.

The answer lies, rather, in a series of programs aimed at improving the conditions of the poor, the unfortunate, and the confused. The aim is to prevent abortions from taking place. We will not stop abortions by creating new criminals. We will, however, stop abortions by creating a society which not only wants children but also offers those children through their families and our communities a future full of hope, optimism, and joy.

Canada, you may know, Mr. Speaker, has no children's policy. No government action has ever been taken on the recommendations of the health and welfare committee of this House in 1981. The committee's recommendations were based on the United Nations Commission during the International Year of the Child and called for the establishment of a children's ministry, a children's bureau. That committee, supported by the New Democratic Party's social issues critic, called for the development and implementation of a comprehensive national family policy. It has never been done.

The purpose of the ministry and the policy would be to ensure that all Canada's children in whatever region they live have equal opportunities to develop as healthy, self-reliant, caring human beings.

The family as a basic human, working unit, has undergone major changes in the past decade. The extended family off the Indian reserves in this country is almost non-existent. Divorces are common. Children are being raised by single parents and teenage pregnancies are on the rise.

Almost every decision of government during this past decade has encouraged the trend toward a smaller and less caring family. It is encouraged by a society driven by the market-oriented economy. A government which cares only for those able to help themselves is a government which encourages abortion, crime, and death.

Inflation, unemployment, rising personal taxes, the increased cost of goods, have all taken their toll on people across this country. There is little hope among young people, a situation which is directly related to a less-motivated work force and a higher incidence of poverty and crime. Unemployment and job insecurity for parents have contributed to increased incidents of child abuse and wife battering.

There is a denial of certain human rights, rights which should be considered inherent in citizenship, a denial which helps to maintain the poor situation, the right to a decent standard of living, the right to free, efficient, and accessible health care, the right to a good education and a right to opportunities which will develop fully one's potential and aspirations. These are rights which only New Democrats have said in this House are a responsibility and priority of a government at the will of the people.

How does this way of thinking jibe with what has been happening in Canada during the past few years? Essentially, it flies in the face of government practice which has been to erode the place of the family and erode family benefits or basic rights of families from coast to coast.

Take, for example, the partial de-indexing of the family allowance and the change in the threshold rate, the rate at which benefits begin to be taxed back, from $26,800 to $23,500, a position taken in 1986. This effectively meant that many families below the official poverty line had their benefits cut. The net loss to the family benefit program by 1991 because of these two cuts will be $1.5 billion per year. These are cuts to programs that essentially aided children.

The NDP sees the family allowance as the most effective way to deliver benefits to families, particularly those at the poverty line. The party is strongly advocating a significant increase in the family allowance and restoration of full indexation with a raised threshold level.

In addition, the party continues to call for a 20 per cent increase in the refundable child tax credit, also to be fully indexed.

New Democrats recognize the right of men and women to continue being an effective parent or worker with equal opportunity and employment. A decline in the support to young families and a desire and need by women with children to pursue work outside the home has steadily increased the need for quality child care. A system of universally accessible, affordable, high-quality, licensed child care and parent support policies are prerequisites. If mothers are unable to find affordable, quality child care, most will be forced to accept only temporary, part-time, poorly-paid work or stay at home or, worst of all, accept inadequate child care.

The tax reform package outlined by the government is another example of current government policies being grossly unfair to families, particularly those in the low and middle-income brackets.

Under the new rules we find that profitable corporations will continue to pay no income tax. Wealthy individuals will continue to see their taxes go down from what they were paying in 1984 when the Conservatives were elected.

Taxes for the average family are increasing faster than their incomes. Since 1984, sales tax hikes have generated almost 60 per cent of all new government revenues. That means an additional $600 per year from the average family.

What is most depressing about that is that a Statistics Canada report indicates that 56 per cent of all low-income Canadians are women, women who are either elderly or are single parents struggling to raise a child on their own.

Families with small children and the elderly are most susceptible to illness. This government at the federal level succeeded in passing legislation providing for lengthy patent protection to American drug companies, the end result being that the cost of prescription drugs in this country has almost tripled.

In the province of Saskatchewan the Conservative government made it more difficult to obtain those drugs because of a ridiculous refund scheme for prescription drug costs. Neither federal nor provincial government has considered the implications of their actions on a young family or the elderly.

We are often told that children are this nation's most precious resource. We often talk in this Chamber about protection afforded to other resources such as forestry, mining and fish stocks. Yet when it comes to that precious resource of children what do we say and what do we do?

Mr. Speaker, let me just give you some statistics for the province of Saskatchewan. One out of every six Saskatchewan families is poor. Newfoundland is the only province in Canada with a higher rate.

In 1986, 42,600 Saskatchewan families were officially living in poverty, up from 36,900 in 1981. That is a 15.3 per cent increase. Add to this nearly 9,000 on-reserve Indian families who are not counted in the official surveys. Indian families in Saskatchewan, and I know across the country, are among the poorest of the poor.

• (2210)

One in every four Saskatchewan families with children under 16 earned less than $20,000 per year in 1986. In Saskatchewan, 64,560 children, or one child in every four, lives in poverty. In all of Canada one child in every six is growing up poor.

Between 1980 and 1986 the number of poor children in Saskatchewan increased by 12.8 per cent, even though the total number of children in the province declined by almost 4 per cent.

Nearly 70 per cent of Saskatchewan poor families live in single parent families headed by women.

Children make up 40 per cent of people receiving social assistance. The number of Saskatchewan children under 16 in families on welfare jumped by more than 50 per cent from 1981 to 1986. Since 1986 the social services department in Saskatchewan no longer publishes this data. Children receiving benefits from the Indian affairs department are not included.

Public begging and private charity have been the major response of the Saskatchewan government to child hunger and family poverty in the province. Food bank use in Regina, Saskatoon and Prince Albert has jumped by 50 per cent in two years.

However, the number of people receiving government social assistance in those three cities has fallen by almost 10 per cent in that same period of time. Many people are simply being cut off welfare or denied eligibility and forced into the streets.

Obviously, for too many families in our province, their home situation is characterized by poverty, hunger and profound stress. The numbers indicate that Saskatchewan, as I mentioned, has the second highest level of family poverty in Canada, second only to Newfoundland. Across Canada the poverty rate for children has reached an astonishing 17 per cent—an intolerable situation.

I suspect the situation will only get worse. Current government programs and proposals are taking more away from the poor and middle-income Canadians, in turn creating more poverty, more malnourished and less cared for children.

Of course the whole process is doubly difficult on those living in northern and remote areas where this government has just eliminated or is proposing to eliminate existing tax benefits that will increase tax payable from Canadians in northern Canada by almost 100 per cent.

You are motioning that I am almost out of time, Mr. Speaker.

Our goal is to reduce or eliminate the need for abortion, to stop the wanton destruction of life yet to be, but legislative force will not stop abortion.

As a colleague of mine said recently: "You cannot legislate against fear and desperation. Only sanity and common sense will produce the desired results".

When we create a society which protects families, whether it is the extended families that so many of our ancestors preferred, two parent families which many of us enjoy, or the single parent family which is becoming more prevalent throughout our country, then we protect the family from poverty, violence and hunger, then we protect the future of the countless yet unborn children.

Here in Canada we need a government willing to take its leadership role seriously. We need a government which is prepared to take a stand toward creating that caring society that is built on a platform of co-operation and hope. We do not need a government like we have witnessed that has brought in this bill today.

I am voting against this bill as I did at second reading because our responsibility is to the future. It is to the common good of all. If we are to prevent abortions, we have to care for the society we are developing for our children to grow up in.

The bill before us is an easy way out. I am not looking for the easy way out. I have seen what the easy way out does. The pictures that we have seen on our television screens of children in Romania who have been born into families that did not want them and ushered away into institutions and homes where they have been forced to live naked and alone is something that I do not believe we can allow to happen in Canada. Those images on the television screen haunt me daily.

Voting against this bill is step number one. The next step is the difficult step. The next step is the one that we have to take using a government that has the courage to create a society of which we can all be proud.

Ms. Joy Langan (Mission—Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, my hon. colleague has referred throughout his speech to the poverty that faces the people of Saskatchewan, particularly women. There has been considerable discussion about poverty in this House around this issue. There has been discussion about federal government policies that in fact deny women the kind of economic and social support they need when it comes to bearing children.

I wonder if my hon. colleague would kindly talk a little about some of the policies that the Government of Saskatchewan has introduced in terms of support for women who are facing poverty and this question covered under Bill C-43. Would he comment on them and, for example, refer to programs such as Saskatchewan's work for welfare program?

Mr. Taylor: Mr. Speaker, I thank my colleague who, incidentally, I want to note has been doing a tremendous job here in the House on a bill of rights for children. It is tremendous work that I greatly support. I believe that if the government were listening we would have a real start to correct some of the problems that are affecting our children across Canada and, as she mentions, in Saskatchewan.

The Saskatchewan situation is a doubly horrendous one, not just because there is lack of child care in the urban centres where a lot of families—and I use the word families here to mean two-parent families—are looking for child care where both parents need to work but, more important, in the large rural parts of the province where farm families are being forced to secure second incomes in order to stay on the farm. Second incomes have resulted in a number of different situations, situations where one spouse works the farm and also works off the farm. There are other situations in which both spouses are forced to work off the farm, creating a situation which is dangerous for children.

One of the things that I find absolutely incredible when I read the newspapers concerning some of these things concerns children who are killed on the farm by machinery. When one looks at these things one has a tendency to think that there is carelessness on the farm. But when one examines more closely what is happening, it is that parents are attempting to care for their child because they do not have any child care but get the job done on the farm.

As you are aware, Mr. Speaker, many people who work on the farm use both spouses, one to drive the combine and one to drive the truck. The children are left close by to watch carefully what has been going on. The next thing you know when the business at hand gets moving, a child is under the wheel of a combine, a tractor or a truck in the field.

It is a horrendous situation that could be corrected if there was full-time accessible child care in the rural areas of our country.

I want to mention in reaction to my colleague's question one other thing. Until recently the Saskatchewan Ombudsman was Dave Tickell, a person who worked constantly on the needs of Saskatchewan children in foster care homes. The Ombudsman who worked for 10 years in the province of Saskatchewan warned constantly of the abuse and neglect of children who are in the care of the province.

• (2220)

I worked in the newspaper business before I became a member of Parliament and I talked to Saskatchewan Ombudsman, Mr. Tickell on many occasions. He consistently talked about the government's lack of desire to make any changes in the provincial foster care program. He said that the provincial government was ignoring the plight of children in foster homes who were complaining of emotional, physical and sexual abuse. He said that the policy of the provincial government offers foster children less protection from physical harm than that offered to children in day care centres, to young offenders in the care of the province, or even to the adult inmates of the provincial correctional centre.

Obviously, children in the province of Saskatchewan, in the eyes of the provincial government, are not and were not a priority for that government. Obviously, if we are going to take life seriously at at any level, we have to ensure that their care is ensured from day one. The provincial government of Saskatchewan had ignored that throughout its recent term of office.

I do not know if that completely answers my colleague's question, but I thank her for putting it. It allows me to expand a little further on what I had to say earlier. I very much appreciate the question she put.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): On questions or comments, the hon. member for Mission—Coquitlam.

Ms. Langan: I would like to thank my colleague for his answers to my questions. From the point of view of some of the comments that were made earlier today about the partisanship of this debate, I would like to ask him if he has thoughts in terms of how this debate has taken place in this House.

Mr. Taylor: Again, I appreciate the question that was put by my hon. colleague. The debate today has been most interesting. Actually, the debate over the course of this entire time has been very interesting. I have found it most unusual in the sense of members rising to talk in a non-partisan way, yet at the same time through their actions being extremely partisan in the way in which all of this comes together.

The people in my constituency have often talked to me about New Democrats. They ask: "Why is it that New Democrats want to kill all these unborn babies?" In the same breath, they talk about the Conservatives and the Liberals wanting to save all the unborn in the country. It seems to me from the debate here that the members of both parties opposite have very clear, defined, distinct positions that are easily read. When we look at the Prime Minister's statements when he opened the debate some time ago, when we look at the statement of the Minister of Justice when she opened the debate earlier today, and when we look at the statements of the former leader of the Liberal party in the debate on second reading, we find very clear statements of opinion from the members of all parties.

I will be able to take the Hansard of this debate to my constituency and show throughout the constituency the official positions that have been taken by the members of the opposite parties.

I do not want to have to defend my party's position on every doorstep in my constituency when much of the debate has been along similar lines. I feel very strongly that when the next election rolls around, if this bill is in place, the debate will continue to be as strong and as difficult as it has been through this time.

The people who have been arguing strongly on both sides of this issue are obviously going to continue to speak as loudly and as strongly as they have in the course of this debate. That is something that I believe is not very healthy, not in the interests of Canada as a whole. If we are to get on and build the society that is necessary to achieve equitable goals, fairness for all, decisions that are based on all of the factors and not just a minute few, we have got to have a strong understanding statement from the government.

I do not believe that this bill offers it. I do not believe that this debate here today has provided us with that.

Ms. Langan: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

I look around me and it is with great dismay that I think it is important to say that it would appear that in this House there is not a quorum.

[Translation]

Mr. Plourde: Point of order, Mr. Speaker.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): The hon. member for Kamouraska—Rivière-du-Loup (Mr. Plourde) on a point of order.

Mr. Plourde: Mr. Speaker, I do not know if my colleague talked with her House leader before making the quorum call, but she must know that there was an agreement among the three leaders of the political parties represented in the House forbidding a quorum call.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): The order issued on May 10 nowhere states that an agreement was reached forbidding a quorum call. Therefore, I ask the clerk to count the members.

And the members having been counted:

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): Since there is no quorum, ring the bells.

[English]

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): There is now a quorum.

Hon. Harvie Andre (Minister of State and Leader of the Government in the House of Commons): Mr. Speaker, I move:

That the debate do now adjourn.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): The motion presented does not apply, following the order made May 10 which is dated May 24, 1990. The order for third reading of the said bill is that it be the first order of the day and that the House continue to sit beyond the ordinary hour of daily adjournment until such time as no member rises on debate. Debate.

An hon. member: There is nobody rising.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Pronovost): I am satisfied that debate is now concluded. Pursuant to the order made Thursday, May 10, 1990, the putting of the question on the motion for third reading of Bill C-43 is deemed deferred until three o'clock p.m. Tuesday, May 29, 1990.

SUPPLY

ALLOTTED DAY, S.O. 81—MUNICIPAL INFRASTRUCTURE

Mr. Mac Harb (Ottawa Centre) moved:

That this House call upon the government to recognize that Canada's municipal infrastructure is facing a crisis of national proportions and that, given the serious implications to the nation's environment, economic prosperity and quality of life for Canadians, the government resume its traditional role as a partner with the provincial and municipal governments to address this national crisis.

He said: Madam Speaker, I want to thank our House leader for giving me the opportunity to speak on this very important issue today.

This issue has a tremendous impact on the cities, towns and villages which make up our country. Municipal infrastructure is not very glamorous, but it is absolutely vital to the health and vitality of our national environment and economy.

The motion we have tabled today calls upon the government to recognize this very simple, but extremely important fact. I would like to acknowledge at the very outset the tremendous work being done on this issue by the Federation of Canadian Municipalities. We thank them for taking a leadership role and speaking out on behalf of Canadian towns and cities.

Their research and well-documented studies have enabled us to make sense out of a very complex issue.

• (1010)

I cannot think of a segment of our lives not touched on a daily basis by municipal infrastructure. When people ask what is infrastructure, I think that before we even arrive at work in the morning we have probably showered, flushed the toilet, used the water from the kitchen tap to make coffee, and driven on paved roadways to our job that would not exist if it were not for services provided by local infrastructure.

Whether we live in big cities or in small towns, infrastructure provides the basis for our homes, our jobs, our standard of living, and the maintenance of our own environment.

For many years we were able to take these services for granted, and we did. Government at all levels turned away from building bridges and repairing roads and concentrated on what some call soft infrastructure, such as social services which also have become an integral part of the Canadian way of life.

Now we have used up the extra capacity that was built into the infrastructure in the first half of this century. The sewers, roads, bridges and sidewalks can no longer cope with the ever-increasing demands.

Often discussion on this issue turns into debates on who is responsible. Time and energy are wasted as politicians argue back and forth accusing each other. What I would like to say today is that there is no longer any time to debate who is responsible. We must accept the fact that we have a national crisis on our hands, a crisis that requires national recognition and assistance. The municipalities simply cannot do it alone.

As a former alderman I learned a great deal about the challenges facing municipal government, and this past year as co-chairman of the National Liberal Task Force on Municipal Infrastructure I was able to witness first hand just how serious this situation is in our country.

My colleague from Nepean and I visited towns where raw sewage flowed down open ditches. We heard from villages where residents must import fresh water. For example, on the east coast of this country we witnessed raw sewage being dumped directly into the ocean. A similar scene greeted us on the west coast.

Canadians along the Trans-Canada Highway reported ever-increasing accidents due to a badly deteriorating national road system. We heard from developers who are trying to fill a need for affordable housing but who are frustrated because of the inadequate infrastructure available to them.

In one municipality in New Brunswick we heard about an industrial park that was developed to promote economic development in this region where unemployment levels are reaching serious proportions. Unfortunately, so far the industrial park has no water supply. It is rather discouraging, Madam Speaker, for businesses that are thinking about locating there.

[Translation]

Since some of the oldest Canadian municipalities are in Quebec, it is not surprising that their infrastructure requirements are rapidly approaching a critical stage.

The dumping of sewage and untreated water into the St. Lawrence, which has gone on for centuries, has devastated this waterway that plays a vital role. According to the urban communities of Quebec, 500 million litres of untreated water and 50 metric tons of raw sewage are dumped into the river every day. Madam Speaker, that is as much as three times the capacity of the Quebec coliseum or the contents of 15,000 garbage trucks.

Besides this environmental nightmare, many municipalities located along the highways leading to the rural recreation areas of the province in the Laurentians and the Ottawa Valley say that they fear the influx of non-residents will contribute to the deterioration of roads and local services. These municipalities, which do not have the increased revenues of the tourist centres, must still absorb additional costs due to their proximity to these resorts.

[English]

Obviously, Madam Speaker, municipal needs are no longer a subject for discussion only at town council meetings. It has come up time and time again at environmental conferences, at the board tables of corporations, in housing reports, and in transportation studies. How does municipal infrastructure affect us on a national level?

Let us look for a moment at the issues before us today at the national level: first, a growing concern about the environment; second, real fears about the economy and our ability to compete in tough international markets; third, a monumental national debt and increases in inflation, interest rates, and unemployment levels; and, fourth, serious regional economic development and serious regional economic disparities which limit employment opportunities and force the migration of Canadians away from their homes and into already crowded urban centres simply to make a living.

It is my firm belief that in the middle of these issues and central both to the cause and their cure is the urgent need to rebuild and upgrade Canada's municipal infrastructure.

I would first like to outline the relationship between the environment and the municipal infrastructure. Canadians have ranked the environment as their top priority for federal action. The growing concern about the mistreatment of our greatest national resource, our environment, has prompted a wide variety of action on the part of all levels of government.

Canadians want us to save our waterways. They want us to stop polluting our land and our air. They want an assurance that their governments at all levels are safeguarding the inheritance of their children by following policies based on sustainable development. However, a quick look at some of the basic facts tell us pretty quickly that this is not what we are doing at all.

For example, Environment Canada figures tell us that only 10 per cent of all raw sewage east of Ontario goes through a treatment process. We also know that more than 8 million Canadians or one-third of our population live in municipalities without sewage treatment.

In Newfoundland, for example, over 48,000 homes do not have adequate water or sewer services, and 80 per cent of the population does not have properly treated drinking water.

In Toronto, as another example, the water quality is so bad that some politicians are calling for a $200 million pipeline from Georgian Bay.

Canadians are spending millions of dollars every year on bottled water, which is not surprising when we stop to consider that in many parts of Canada eating fish caught in lakes and rivers which are sources of drinking water is actually dangerous to human health.

In my riding of Ottawa Centre and across this country beaches are being closed because of unsafe levels of pollution. We are surrounded by water and yet told that we cannot swim in it or eat the fish. Our children are growing up in a world very different from the one we knew. Unfortunately, the environmental damage caused by municipal infrastructure is not limited to our waterways. The deplorable condition of the Trans-Canada Highway and a vast number of provincial and municipal roads is also hurting our environment.

We know carbon dioxide emissions hurt our air quality and contribute to global warming, and we recognize this as a national and international problem. We have unfortunately failed to make the connection between bad roads and air pollution, but the Canadian Automobile Association has made that connection. It estimates that 10.3 per cent of carbon dioxide emissions come from automobile travel. Travelling roads in poor condition uses more fuel than when roads are properly maintained and results in higher levels of emissions.

In Ontario, for example, vehicle registrations have risen by 85 per cent. Yet, using the province's own standards, as many as 50 per cent of the roads these cars are using will soon be listed in fair to poor condition.

The severe cut-backs to VIA Rail passenger service has also dealt a blow to the environment. By forcing more Canadians into individual cars, which must then travel over poorly maintained roads, we are increasing the environmental damage across the country.

• (1020)

There is also an international dimension to the dilemma. Canada and the United States have signed treaties regarding the maintenance of the water quality of the Great Lakes and other waterways. The deterioration of our infrastructure and our incapacity to treat sewage might affect our ability to meet these international environmental obligations.

Obviously any attention to address and halt the damage being done to our environment on a daily basis must include provisions to upgrade and enhance our infrastructure. If we are to turn to the economic aspect of municipal infrastructure, and if we are to survive in an increasingly challenging market-place of the next decade and the next century—and I must say that we should be trying not only to survive as a nation but to succeed—it is vital that we become more productive and more efficient as well.

I do not have to spend much time telling members in this House what changing markets and increased competition are costing our regions dependent upon the fisheries, the forests, and/or the steel industry.

If we want to ensure that Canadians, no matter where they live in this country, maintain a certain standard of living and opportunity for employment, we will have to adapt and attract an increasingly selective private sector, but we know already this is not happening.

The hearings we held in large and small municipalities across Canada revealed that opportunities are being lost due to inadequate roads, poor industrial infrastructure, and a lack of services for residential areas. If there are no roads to get workers to the factories, it follows that there will be no factories and no jobs for communities that are searching for new economic development.

I give the example of the United States which has been playing a leadership role in the field of infrastructure. The United States has already taken action on the problem, largely as a result of a report prepared by the National Council on Public Works. The report, presented to the U.S. Congress in 1988, indicated that inadequate infrastructure decreases productivity because private industry must then use its resources and labour to compensate for non-existent or inadequate public infrastructure.

Basically this means that firms compensate by using more capital and labour to produce the same output. What we must learn and learn quickly is that money spent on building or renewing infrastructure is money well spent. I am sure the government shares our concern that wasting money is no longer an option at any level of government.

Studies show that infrastructure may be the factor responsible for a community's demise, or it may be the very element that revitalizes that community. Money spent on municipal infrastructure brings with it a multiplier effect. It results in increased economic activity and higher levels of employment and returns revenues to all levels of government in the form of direct or indirect taxes and fewer claims on income assistance programs.

In fact a study done by the Federation of Canadian Municipalities in January 1988 showed that a $5 billion investment by each of the municipal, provincial and federal governments would go a long way toward resolving the infrastructure crisis and would create 314,000 jobs. The study estimated that the net cost to the federal government at approximately $416 million was a cost largely due to high interest rates.

It makes sense because not only would municipal infrastructure work be done by Canadians, but the bulk of the required materials could be produced in Canada. These are the short-term benefits. In the long-term Canada's infrastructure, now healthy and expanded to meet the needs of a growing diversified economy, would provide the jobs, homes, and standard of living Canadians have come to expect and deserve no matter where they live.

As well, the various levels of government would benefit from the increased economic base and the decreased number of citizens depending upon government assistance and the advantage of having a modern, competitive workforce and business sector.

Let us turn to the other compelling reason the federal government should become a partner at the municipal and provincial levels. The government has repeatedly refused to help in telling the municipalities that they should increase their water rates to cover the costs of repairing infrastructure such as sewers and roads. Unfortunately, while in need of revision water rates alone are not going to resolve the problem.

Transportation experts in the FCM have also called on the federal government to use some of its revenues collected through taxes on gasoline and fuels to upgrade our neglected roads system. Once again, this only makes sense, yet the federal government refuses to accept its fair share of the responsibility for maintaining and expanding municipal infrastructure. The hardest part of it all is that in the mid-1980s the federal government was a major contributor to the enhancement of the Regina drinking water supply system.

Right now, the government is involved in a multimillion dollar project in Halifax to install sewage treatment facilities. As well, the federal government made a major commitment during the 1988 election to take part in the clean-up of the St. Lawrence River, which in my view are commendable initiatives. The federal government has to be committed to those initiatives. We have to carry on and meet the rest of the commitment.

Time might be bad. Perhaps the government thinks that with the serious situation facing Canada the infrastructure problem is a temporary one which it will go away. If we listen to the mayors, the reeves, or the natives across our country we learn quickly that this crisis will require the co-operation of all levels of government: everybody. We are all responsible without exception.

By resuming its traditional role with the provincial and municipal governments, the federal government can ensure that no matter where we live in Canada we will have access to clean water and safe roads.

In summary, if we look at municipal infrastructure as a local, isolated problem which each municipal government must handle alone, we have failed to see the bigger picture.

Hon. Alan Redway (Minister of State (Housing)): Madam Speaker, I was most interested in the hon. member's comments with respect to the concerns he voiced about developers having a difficult time in providing affordable housing because of the lack of municipal infrastructure.

Also, he made comments with respect to the concerns that the road systems for commuting to the factories and the workplaces were not there, were in bad shape, or potentially would be getting into better shape.

Certainly I am well aware of that and everyone in this country is well aware of that. We are also aware, as are the developers and the hon. member, of the financial difficulties facing the country at the moment and the fact that Canadians are not interested in seeing their taxes raised. They are interested in seeing expenditures cut.

In the discussions of the task force, I wonder if the hon. member and other members of the task force investigated the situation of using the existing infrastructure more intensively, which is not all that bad a condition in most cases.

In fact, Madam Speaker, as you and I are aware there used to be a time when every house in this country had at least five people in it. Today, there is more like two or three people in it. The infrastructure that was built, that is the roads, the sewers, the schools and the public transportation systems, was to accommodate five or more people in a house are now accommodating only two or three people in a house. The infrastructure is there to accommodate a much greater number of people if there was an intensification of the use of the available land resources.

This is something that lies within the control of municipalities. I hope the hon. member pointed it out to the municipalities and developers. The developers are well aware of the fact and are looking forward to the opportunity to use the existing infrastructure more intensively. I hope that the hon. member, in his task force, pointed that out to the municipalities. I would urge him, if he did not, to urge the municipalities, as he has said, to co-operate with other levels of the government, use the tools at their command to be helpful to solve this problem rather than just looking to the taxpayers of Canada for more and more money.

• (1030)

Mr. Harb: That is the most interesting comment I have heard in a long time. We are dealing with areas where they do not have infrastructure. I do not understand how the minister wants me to tell a place like Halifax or like St. John's, Newfoundland to use the existing infrastructure for sewage when the only infrastructure they have to put their sewage in is the ocean. There is no infrastructure. There are no treatment facilities. There is no sewage system in place, period.

We are also talking about towns where roads are almost non-existent. We are not dealing with municipalities or with towns where there are existing infrastructures and we can go to those towns and ask them to use those existing facilities.

Mr. Redway: The FCM report dealt with all those issues.

Mr. Harb: Madam Speaker, he is talking about the FCM. I would suggest that the hon. minister should make a trip to Atlantic Canada. Perhaps he should go to Fredericton, Sydney in Nova Scotia, and St. John's, Newfoundland. He should go to those different parts of Canada and to the Northwest Territories and have a look at the infrastructure and come back to this House and stand up without blushing and tell the members of this House that they do have infrastructure.

What I saw across Canada, in the Atlantic as well as in western Canada is unbelievable. In this day and age in a society like the one we live in, still we do not enjoy the proper quality of water that we should be enjoying. We still do not have access to the kind of facilities we need. We still do not have infrastructure in places where we talk about protecting the environment and taking a leadership role on the environmental aspect. Yet we pollute. We are great polluters in western Canada and also in Atlantic Canada and it is our responsibility as a federal government to step in right now and help them out.

There is raw sewage being dumped into the oceans because there are no facilities.

Mr. Steve Butland (Sault Ste. Marie): Madam Speaker, it is easy to be critical of the government and I am prepared to do that, but one really has to question the credibility of the Liberal Party on this particular issue since in their years in government they were the ones that began the cut-back on this particular program of the federal involvement with the municipalities. In March 1984 they cut it out completely.

Mr. Gauthier: Nonsense. We put it into place.

Mr. Butland: So this task force that the Liberals enacted was an act of hypocrisy, extremely cynical and I would ask the member to defend what he was doing with this task force.

Mr. Harb: I am amazed, but then again when the criticism comes from colleagues to the left, we sort of understand that it is a sunny day outside and I guess that—

Mrs. Gaffney: He is light-headed.

Mr. Harb: The hon. member forgets that the vast majority, if not every program that we have enjoyed up until 1984 was a program that was put in place by a federal Liberal government.

I am amazed that the hon. member would stand up when I already have over 18 pages prepared which specifically outline that it is time for us as federal politicians to stop arguing with one another, face the reality, acknowledge that there is a problem, stop passing the blame and let us do something constructive for our country and our land.

In this House there are approximately 60 former municipal politicians, whether they were aldermen or mayors. I would ask every one of them to stand up in this House and tell me that while he or she was a mayor or alderman he or she did not promise people to act on issues of that magnitude, did not promise the town or municipality to stand up and defend infrastructure and the needs of the constituency.

We all brag about the environment. We all go back to our constituencies and talk about protecting the environment. Yet we are contributing to the pollution of our beaches and our rivers by not acting now. We are guilty by association. We are guilty by not acknowledging the problem and acting on it.

The hon. member knows, and I have a lot of respect for him, that it is time for action. We have to stop bragging and stop passing on the blame to different people. We have to act now.

[Translation]

Madam Deputy Speaker: In recognizing the next speaker for questions and comments, I wish to assure him that I have done my homework and will do my best, as he asked, to pronounce the name of his riding correctly. The hon. member for Carleton—Gloucester (Mr. Bellemare) has the floor.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): You are making great progress, Madam Speaker.

I was horrified to hear what the Minister of State for Housing (Mr. Redway) said.

[English]

I would like to congratulate the members for Nepean and Ottawa Centre for organizing this task force on infrastructure across Canada. I also appreciate having been involved in these activities and having been permitted to help organize the Ottawa area task force.

I am really shocked at what the housing minister said, especially since I know that the philosophy of the Conservative government is that of user pay.

As a former member of the Ottawa—Carleton Regional Council, and a former member of the City of Gloucester Council, and a member of the FCM, as the Minister of Public Works knows well, this government is freeloading in the area.

There is a filtration plant being built and local taxpayers, industries and businesses are the ones paying for it. The federal government, which is at least a one-third user, is not paying one cent. There is the Green Creek pollution control centre. Every time the federal building people and parliamentarians use the washroom, they are freeloading. They are not paying their fair share. They are not contributing a penny.

Some hon. members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Bellemare: They will tell you that they give grants in lieu of money. Look at them, they are in a panic. They do not contribute a single penny. They talk about grants to municipalities. They give money to the city of Ottawa as an individual, the City of Gloucester, the City of Nepean, but nothing to the regional government. The regional government is the body that pays and taxes for all the infrastructure. You are a bunch of free-loaders on the local taxpayers.

I would suggest to the regional—

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member's time has expired. He may want to let his colleague—

Mr. Bellemare: I am just waiting for the next speaker to stand up.

Madam Deputy Speaker: That is the hon. member's right, of course. The hon. member for Ottawa Centre on a short comment.

Mr. Harb: Madam Speaker, that is the kind of frustration we are seeing right across the land from people who have seen firsthand what is happening in the area of infrastructure.

The hon. member has a facility in his riding which is going to cost the taxpayers approximately $500 million to bring it up to date. There was a discussion about making a commitment on it.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The period for questions and comments has now expired. Resuming debate.

[Translation]

Hon. Jean Corbeil (Minister of Labour and Minister of State (Transport)): Madam Speaker, I welcome this opportunity to take part in today's debate on municipal infrastructure, on behalf of the government and on my own behalf. I believe a number of members in the House this morning are familiar with my own involvement in this question. For 16 years, prior to my election to the House of Commons in November 1988, I was mayor of a municipality in the Montreal area, and I also took a very active part in the proceedings of the Canadian Federation of Municipalities, both as a member of the board and as President of the Federation. The subject is therefore one that has interested me for some time. Like many members in this House, the subject is of particular interest to me because Canadians live in the towns and villages of this country. All members of this House live in urban or rural communities, with or without infrastructures.

I would like to point out for the benefit of all members that it is not enough to observe that a problem exists and then ask the federal government to take the responsibility for that problem, without considering other circumstances that exist as well.

I think we should realize that the first problem we face in this respect, although not the most serious one, is a very real problem: the jurisdiction of municipal matters lies with the provinces. That is something the federal government must bear in mind. In all negotiations that have taken place over the years on the issue of municipal infrastructure, the provincial governments had to be involved. Today, I can say we have never seen provincial governments rushing to get involved in an issue that by its very nature is first of all a matter of local jurisdiction.

Between 1960 and 1980, the government at the time had gotten into the habit of playing Santa Claus right and left in order to be re-elected, something it managed very successfully for a number of years.

[English]

Unfortunately for us and our children, during that 20 year period while the Liberal government of the day was trying to play Santa Claus to everybody, this country accumulated a national debt that is now at the $350 billion level.

In 1984 when this government took office, the annual operating deficit of the government of the day was $16 billion. In other words, the government of the day could not meet its operating expenses. It had to borrow $16 billion a year just to pay the grocery bills.

In the current year, this government, through serious administration and by making difficult decisions, unpopular decisions we all agree, had the courage of assuming our responsibility and—

Mr. Bellemare: And doubling the debt.

Mr. Corbeil: We had to double the debt that was left to us by the previous government, because unfortunately we have to pay the interest on the loan that was accumulated at the time, and 80 per cent of the additional deficit between 1984 and now is due to the deficit that was left to us by the previous government.

From an operating deficit of $16 billion in 1984, this government, through very unpopular decisions that had to be taken for the best interests of Canadians, has turned the situation around. In the current year, we have now an operating surplus of $9 billion. This means a turnaround of $25 billion in a short period of six years.

This is very well explained by the fact that while they were in power, the expenses of the previous government increased every year by 13.9 per cent. This may sound incredible to the Canadian population watching us today on television. But yes, that government had the nerve to increase its expenses by 13.9 per cent every year, accumulating a deficit that we have been paying since taking office, again through unpopular measures that had to be taken in the best interests of Canadians, and our children and grandchildren.

This government reduced the rate of additional expenses every year. It is now 3.5 per cent compared to the 13.9 per cent that we experienced during the term of the Liberal Party.

Therefore, having decided that we would attack the deficit which is the number one priority, it is no surprise that we had to determine that we were going to assume the expenses of our jurisdictions.

Mr. Milliken: And do nothing else.

Mr. Corbeil: If we do nothing else than bring back the finances of the country to a profitable level where Canadians will be able to compete with the rest of the world and will attain a competitive level where we can bring back prosperity to the country, I think that the present generation and future generations will be forever thankful to this government.

Mr. Milliken: You are driving us into a recession instead.

[Translation]

Mr. Corbeil: Madam Speaker, in 1980, the previous government, which had been accumulating this kind of increases to the tune of 13.9 per cent annually, decided it was time to do something, and it terminated a program it had established in 1960 because, I assume, it realized that this was not the right way to go about it. So it terminated the program that existed at that time. Obviously, four years later when this government took over the reins of power, we were not about to resume spending in an area that clearly did not lie within our jurisdiction.

We acted responsibly, as the federal authority, by cutting spending and introducing measures that were not popular, because we felt responsible to the citizens of this country.

Earlier, Madam Speaker, I was astonished to hear the first speaker introduce an element in this debate that municipalities have not even had on their shopping list for the past few years, and that is responsibility installing new infrastructures. The whole infrastructure dossier prepared by the Canadian Federation of Municipalities has always focussed on repairs and upgrading of municipal infrastuctures. I am surprised the previous speaker decided to break new ground in an area that is even further removed from the federal government's jurisdiction.

Madam Speaker, if our sole concern was to be popular and to get re-elected, we could keep saying yes to all demands, including some very legitimate ones, that are not our jurisdiction, just to please Canadians for a time. However, I do not think this is what a responsible government should do. A responsible government should, especially in times as difficult as these, be concerned about reducing a monstrous deficit that might otherwise put Canada in a situation that would be unacceptable to our children and our great-grandchildren.

The figures I mentioned earlier, Madam Speaker, and there are any number of statistics on the subject, showed that we are past the stage where we could spend, spend, spend, and hang the consequences. The present deficit, our national debt of $350 billion, is costing this country $40 billion annually in interest alone, nearly one-third of the federal budget.

We are now in a period of budgetary restraint which again forces us to make difficult choices to ensure this country's prosperity. We realize that municipalities, provinces, towns, school boards in fact, everyone has problems. The fact is that in this country, each level of government has specific responsibilities, and each level of government is responsible for deciding where it wants to spend its money. When we look at the budgets and financial situations of the provinces in this country, it is clear that financially, each of these governments is in a far more enviable position than this government, and therefore they are in a position to discharge their responsibilities with respect to municipal jurisdictions and to share these with the municipalities which are also in a pretty healthy financial position.

We are not ignoring a dossier that over the years has been built up by the Canadian Federation of Municipalities and which has shown there are specific problems across the country. However, with my experience of this dossier, I can say that there are considerable differences of opinion between the various municipalities on the way a program should be defined. There are wide differences of opinion between the provinces because in some regions of this country, in some cities and some provinces, the strategy used over the years has allowed them—those cities and provinces—to spend more money on renewing their infrastructure, and now, they are not very pleased with the prospect that other cities and provinces that did not apply this strategy will now enjoy the government's largesse.

Madam Speaker, I think everyone in this country realizes that we have a situation that bears looking into, but the bottom line—

[English]

The bottom line is that the federal government has to attack its deficit. That is its number one priority. Once the deficit has been taken care of, then the federal government can look at other ways of spending the taxpayers' money.

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I am slightly shocked and very surprised. I know the member across the way well, but I forget the name of his riding in the Montreal area. He and I both sat on the board of the Federation of Canadian Municipalities. I recall those days when he was the one who was here meeting with the federal government and trying to dredge more money out of it because of the seriousness of the situation of infrastructure right across the country. Now, because the member is on the government side of the House, we are hearing a different story. I find that absolutely appalling.

I would like to quote from the remarks of the present President of the FCM at a meeting in Edmonton in February, 1989, where he stated:

> And during the 1988 election campaign, a major commitment was made to clean up the St. Lawrence River, a commitment which can only be met if significant funds are made available for the improvement and installation of sewage treatment facilities throughout the St. Lawrence Valley.
> Thus, on the national platform, the government has maintained only opposition to our suggestions while in the context of regional announcements, it has committed to substantial and useful contributions as I have just outlined—A healthy beginning in the infrastructure dialogue would be for the federal government to acknowledge that it is already a financial contributor to Canada's municipal needs, and will undoubtedly continue to be so—

But why does it have to do it on an ad hoc basis? I would like the member to respond to that.

Mr. Corbeil: Madam Speaker, I thank the hon. member for her comments and I would be very glad to answer the question. It demonstrates that the government is open to examining some specific problems—

Mrs. Gaffney: Only under patronage circumstances.

Mr. Corbeil: —when the present government is asked by the provincial authorities and the municipal authorities to look at a specific problem. Under regional economic development programs, worker's information programs, and other programs of this nature, we have invested lots of money over the years and we are prepared to do so.

However, I want to emphasize to the member across the way that surely she must realize that the country is in a very serious financial situation. I do not renege on anything that I have done or said in previous years, but at the present time the first priority of the government and the country has to be to reduce the deficit. If we do not do so, there will not be a Canada at the turn of the century.

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, I come from an area that is one of the fastest growing areas in Canada and that is Surrey North.

We are in severe trouble because of the lack of municipal infrastructure. We have 9,000 children in portable schools. We do not have money to develop adequate sewers, roads, sidewalks, parks, and recreation facilities. We have had to send out notices to parents to say that they cannot put their children into minor league ball, sports, and athletic activities because we do not have a base to raise the dollars to put in those types of services. There have been discussions that we are $282 million behind our ability to meet the basic infrastructure necessary for a viable community.

Our community has very little industry and commerce. It is a residential community. It does not have the tax base.

Why does the hon. member feel that the federal government has no responsibility to those types of communities and the families in those communities?

Second, if the government is so worried about the deficit, why did it allow the interest rates to go up yesterday to over 14 per cent?

Mr. Corbeil: Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member will certainly agree with me that the responsibility of all elected people at all levels is to manage the local affairs and assume the responsibilities for the decisions that are taken for the local authorities.

I repeat that this government has a national debt of $350 billion. It is costing Canadian taxpayers $40 billion annually in interest payments alone. The priority of the government is to look after that deficit within its own jurisdiction before looking at other problems in other jurisdictions because, if we do not attack the problem of that deficit, there will not be a Canada in a few years and we will not have the money to do anything which is under our direct jurisdiction.

Mr. Eugène Bellemare (Carleton—Gloucester): Madam Speaker, I am really entertained by the minister, entertained by his white complexion and his wiping the sweat from his brow.

I remember the same minister sitting with me at the Federation of Canadian Municipalities at many conventions when we were both representatives of our municipalities. I will take up one of his themes:

[Translation]

repairs, infrastructures, local responsibility—

[English]

If that is the case, I refer to the Ottawa—Carleton area where there is over $1 billion in repairs going on. The basic theme of your government is "user pay". The taxpayers of this area are paying. The individual taxpayers are paying. The merchant taxpayers are paying. The industrial taxpayers are paying. But there is one freeloader, and you are the one who is freeloading. You are not paying your fair share.

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. member will want to continue after Question Period.

[Translation]

It being eleven o'clock, pursuant to Standing Order 30(5), the House will now proceed to Members' Statements pursuant to Standing Order 31.

STATEMENTS PURSUANT TO S. O. 31

[English]

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Terry Clifford (London—Middlesex): Madam Speaker, I am proud to announce in the House today an environmental initiative launched by a family in my riding of London—Middlesex.

Called "A Human Race Towards A Healthy Planet", the Stephens family has launched a trans-Canada bicycle expedition to raise environmental awareness and to encourage students and families world-wide to adopt positive action and attitude towards a healthy planet.

David and Andrew Stephens are doing the cycling with the rest of the family in support. They started out on May 1 from Victoria, B.C. and this Sunday they will be in my riding of London—Middlesex on their way to St. John's, Newfoundland for Canada's birthday, July 1.

David Stephens is a young Canadian who believes that actions speak louder than words. His actions tell all of us that a healthy planet starts with one person's commitment to make a difference.

The Stephens' human race towards a healthy planet shows how one family, when committed to a cause and working together, can make a difference. Their focus is on working together for a positive cause. Their example to the families of Canada is simple; let's work together to make one healthy, happy country from sea to sea. We should congratulate their efforts.

LITHUANIA

Mr. Rey Pagtakhan (Winnipeg North): Madam Speaker, "Please extend your hands and hearts toward Lithuania", plead the President of the Lithuanian Medical Association and the Minister of Health as they call for urgent medical assistance.

The economic blockade imposed by Moscow on Lithuania has severed basic medical services and supplies to that republic. Doctors are concentrating on emergency cases only and stocks of essential medications and surgical supplies, such as insulin, antibiotics, gloves, and intravenous sets, are being critically depleted.

The health minister has predicted that the rate of infectious diseases would increase, performance of essential surgical operations would be hindered and deaths otherwise preventable would become an eventuality.

I urge this government to respond to the plea of Lithuanians, to bring their cause to the attention of President Gorbachev when he and our Prime Minister meet next week, and to obtain Mr. Gorbachev's commitment that he will ensure the medical safety of every Lithuanian man, woman and child. We have faith in Mr. Gorbachev and therefore trust in his continuing good will.

HEALTH

Mr. Iain Angus (Thunder Bay—Atikokan): Madam Speaker, in 1976 I first raised the issue of the impact of industrial pollution on the respiratory systems of Canadians. For a number of years I argued that sulphur dioxide emissions were directly related to the higher than normal rate of respiratory infections and lung cancers in the residents of Thunder Bay.

Today, 14 years later, a study conducted by 11 Canadian and American Lung Association scientists clearly states that acid air can damage human lungs as badly as acid rain damages forests, lakes and trees. It also states that acid aerosols are increasing bronchitis, asthma and deaths from respiratory failure.

The federal and provincial governments should act immediately on this very serious matter. They should act by establishing monitoring devices and reporting daily to the residents of smokestack communities. They should work harder to eliminate the pollutants themselves, and they should continue to conduct studies to ensure that we have a full understanding of the impact of this chemical on the well-being of Canadians.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Bill Casey (Cumberland—Colchester): Madam Speaker, up until a few days ago, the people in my riding could not take the current constitutional question too seriously. However, recent developments have brought this situation to the forefront of every conversation.

Still the question often is, why does Quebec want so much? The answer is simple, they do not.

Since arriving here 18 months ago, I have gotten to know Quebecers for the very first time. The Quebec members that I now know are teachers and business people, mayors and journalists, mechanics, engineers, doctors and pharmacists, just like home. All they really want is to keep their way of life and culture, just as we in Atlantic Canada want to keep our unique culture.

There is a great deal of concern and speculation throughout the country about our future, and it is up to all parliamentarians, legislators and our leaders to bring this country together, because if we do not, none of us will be able to keep our way of life and all of our unique cultures in Canada.

KASHMIR

Mrs. Beryl Gaffney (Nepean): Madam Speaker, I wish to alert the House to the serious potential danger to international peace and security posed by the current escalation in the dispute between India and Pakistan over the status of Kashmir.

This dispute has existed since India and Pakistan became independent in 1947. The two countries have fought a war over the region twice, in 1948 and again in 1965. Hundreds of people, including many civilians, have been killed in recent clashes that threaten to erupt into a third war.

In 1948 Canada, as a member of the United Nations Security Council, was instrumental in stopping the war between India and Pakistan over Kashmir.

It is time for Canada to act again. We should use our current place in the Security Council to increase international pressure on the two sides to affirm their commitment to the 1965 ceasefire, withdraw military forces from the ceasefire line, desist from indiscriminate violence against civilians and negotiate peaceful solutions to the conflict. Canada should encourage the UN Secretary General to offer his good offices to achieve a just and lasting settlement. The international community should act now before it is too late.

THE CONSTITUTION

Mr. Arnold Malone (Crowfoot): Madam Speaker, in the fall in 1959 I left my home in Alberta to study at a university in Montana. While attending Montana State University, I became familiar with the frequent discussions about a proposed amendment to the American Constitution.

Today, as I address this House, the American public is again engaged in yet another consideration for a constitutional amendment to their Constitution. Since the Constitution of the United States was ratified in 1787, there has been a total of 26 amendments.

Clearly, what some Canadian premiers must come to understand is that it is not a requirement for Canada to construct a constitution that resolves all issues in all situations for all time at one moment. What is required is the building of an agreement by which the procedures for change are known and agreed upon. Thereafter, the first ministers will be able to meet the challenges of an unforeseen future.

Had the Fathers of Confederation applied the standards of perfection that are being imposed by some premiers today, the British North America Act of 1867 never could have been written. What is required now—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I apologize. The hon. member's time is now over. The hon. member for Dartmouth.

TRANSPORT

Mr. Ron MacDonald (Dartmouth): Madam Speaker, I rise today on an extremely serious matter, that is the escalation of tensions in the truckers' blockade.

Contrary to news reports this morning, the truckers have not left their blockade, quite simply because they do not believe this government when it says it will review their concerns. Indeed, I have just received a call from the president of a trucking firm who said that when one of his rigs tried to pull out of the line-up this morning, the driver was threatened by a shotgun-toting individual and told to pull back in the line or else. This incident occurred only a few hours ago at a Quebec border crossing.

The time to address the issues which have caused this blockade is now. This government has procrastinated and failed to acknowledge the inequities between the Canadian and American truckers until there were blockades set up at border crossings throughout eastern Canada.

I implore this government to take action today to resolve these inequities. I would certainly hope that we do not have to wait until there is further escalation, violence and even injury, before this government acts to ensure the competitiveness of the essential Canadian trucking industry.

THE STANLEY CUP

Mr. Willie Littlechild (Wetaskiwin): Madam Speaker, Mr. Pocklington said last night, "Alberta demands champions". The Wetaskiwin Relics recently won a COHA World Cup tournament in San Diego. Now, for the fifth time in seven years, the Edmonton Oilers have won the Stanley Cup.

Some hon. members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Littlechild: I was going to ask the House to join me in congratulating the management, Mr. Sather, Mr. Pocklington and others such as the coaching staff of Messrs. Muckler, Green and Low, and in particular, all the families and players of the Oilers hockey club for their victory. Congratulations as well to Mr. Bill Ranford in winning the Conn Smythe Trophy.

Once again it shows all Canadians across the country that if you set your goals high and believe in yourself, you can accomplish and succeed in anything you do.

THE ENVIRONMENT

Mr. Lyle Dean MacWilliam (Okanagan—Shuswap): Madam Speaker, Eurasian milfoil, an aquatic weed that has choked many of the lakes and rivers in the B.C. interior has defeated all efforts to control its spread.

Mechanical harvesting, while able to slow the growth of the weed, is unable to eradicate it. The weed is affecting the recreational and tourism potential of B.C.'s interior lakes.

Municipal and provincial governments have called for federal assistance to control this aquatic weed. It is therefore most disappointing to learn that Eurasian milfoil is not being researched for biological control by Agriculture Canada.

The Okanagan Basin Water Board has appealed to the Minister of Agriculture to get directly involved in developing the long-term biological controls necessary to preserve the resource value of the Okanagan Valley. Nothing has been done.

It is absolutely essential that the Minister of Agriculture make a strong commitment to research ways of eradicating Eurasian milfoil before the environmental impact of its uncontrolled growth gets completely out of hand.

TRANSPORT

Mr. Albert Cooper (Peace River): Madam Speaker, Loran-C is a very reasonably priced, helpful aid for private pilots in Canada. It is an aid to navigation that provides distance measuring equipment, indications of speed, headings and also information on airports in a region where a person is flying.

At the moment, Loran-C is available to the maritime regions of Canada and to parts of Quebec and Ontario, but it is not available with any degree of accuracy on the prairies.

I would encourage the Minister of Transport to take a very close look at Loran-C and provide an option of having this navigation system available to private and general aviation pilots throughout the prairie regions. It provides safety, a large degree of accuracy and would be very much appreciated by the private pilots of Canada.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Bob Kilger (Stormont—Dundas): Madam Speaker, it is becoming increasingly urgent for the First Ministers of Canada to find an acceptable and equitable solution to the current constitutional impasse. We are witnessing daily reports in the media on this issue which could have very serious consequences for the country.

The Meech Lake debate has caused a number of unfortunate events to occur throughout the country that do not reflect the wishes of a majority of Canadians who desire to have a united Canada.

We live in a great country built on the efforts of two founding peoples, and with the contribution made by people who came to Canada from other lands. Some of these people knew firsthand the terrible face of internal strife, political instability and economic chaos. Together with English and French speaking Canadians, and with the aboriginal peoples of Canada who recognized the beauty and potential of the land, we have built a country which we are all proud to call home.

We are indeed fortunate, and we all have an interest in working towards a better tomorrow for our country and for our children.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Mr. Lee Richardson (Calgary Southeast): Madam Speaker, today Albertans are proud to salute our Premier Don Getty for his leadership in support of the Meech Lake Accord.

Premier Getty's constructive proposal to pass Meech Lake now and adopt a list of principles to be discussed during a set period of time is a constructive proposal.

As the Prime Minister said yesterday: "Don Getty put the signature of the Government of Alberta on a piece of paper which was designed in Alberta's interest, in the interests of western Canada and, most of all, in the interests of a united Canada."

Premier Getty said: "I propose to honour the accord because it is indispensable that we all do so in the interests of Canadian unity."

CANADA POST

Mr. Don Boudria (Glengarry—Prescott—Russell): Madam Speaker, Canada Post is at it again. This time the victim is the Vars post office in my riding.

Last fall, residents of Vars heard a rumour and reacted swiftly by signing a petition against the closure of their post office. Some 374 residents, more than half of the community, signed the petition which I tabled in this House on December 8, 1989.

Vars is a growing community and even Canada Post admits as much. Yet the residents of Vars have just been "consulted" and their post office will be closing this summer.

These closures of post offices against the will of the people are done in the name of expenditure reduction, even if an outlet is profitable.

On behalf of the residents of Vars, I urge the minister to tell us today that he will instruct his officials to keep the Vars post office open.

HOUSING

Mr. Jim Karpoff (Surrey North): Madam Speaker, the housing crisis in Canada continues to worsen. The Canadian Homebuilders' Association has documented that, because of high interest rates, half the first-time home buyers have been forced out of the market. Residential construction activity in the first four months of 1990 is down. In April, the applications for residential building permits decreased.

What is the government's response to the growing crisis in housing? The Minister of State for Housing has told the mayor of Vancouver that he has no funds available to assist in developing affordable housing. Now the government has dealt another blow by increasing the bank rate to over 14 per cent. This can only have a devastating effect on an already bleak housing market. It appears that this government wishes not only to bring the housing industry to its knees, but it wishes to knock it flat on its back.

MEECH LAKE ACCORD

Ms. Mary Clancy (Halifax): Madam Speaker, I rise today on behalf of my constituents of Halifax who are fearful. Haligonians, indeed all Nova Scotians, are fiercely devoted to Canada. From its founding in 1749 through pre-Confederation battles, the birth of our nation in 1867, two World Wars, and up to the present, the Warden of the North and its people have believed steadfastly in this country and its future.

To us a Canada without the francophone fact, without Quebec, is unthinkable. We have so little time but we must ensure that Canada, worth so much, is not allowed to wither.

[Translation]

We have 29 days left to resolve the constitutional impasse. We must find solutions for our own benefit but also for our children, who have a right to inherit this beautiful, vast country of ours that is Canada.

ORAL QUESTION PERIOD

[English]

TRANSPORT

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport.

The blockage of border crossings this week by hundreds of angry Canadian truckers has brought home to Canadians just how important the trucking industry is for our economy. It has also brought home to Canadians just how harmful and ill considered it was for this government to put into effect full deregulation of the trucking industry without first being sure that American truckers have to live by the same rules of this country as Canadians. In fact thousands of jobs have been lost in Ontario in the trucking industry since this deregulation went into effect. I understand that the blockages have eased at certain border points like Windsor but are continuing at other border points.

One of the issues of concern to Canadian truckers is the issue of cabotage, the picking up and unloading of cargoes within Canada by Americans. Has the government begun enforcing our already existing laws against cabotage and, if not, could the minister tell us exactly when the government will begin enforcing these laws to resolve this ongoing issue, which is of great concern to Canadian truckers in terms of their jobs and their industry?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I appreciate my hon. friend's question.

No one is at issue with the fact that trucking is important to Canada. That is the reason I went to Windsor on Wednesday night-Thursday morning to meet with representatives of the independent truckers in an effort, with the assistance of the Minister of Transport of Ontario, to alleviate the situation.

As far as the issue of cabotage is concerned, we discussed that with the independent truckers. There are methods in place at the present time to make sure that it does not happen. It is a combination of an effort by Minister of Employment and Immigration and by the Minister of National Revenue. We had discussions with the provincial officials, and we have agreed to work together to see if we can improve methods of detecting cabotage, where it is occurring. Those discussions are ongoing.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, Canadians will find it strange that the minister is unable to tell us that he and the Minister of Employment and Immigration and the Minister of National Revenue are enforcing laws that are already on the books. It would be reassuring if he could tell us that that enforcement by his own colleagues and himself is beginning this weekend.

• (1120)

[Translation]

Madam Speaker, my second question is directed to the Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs.

It is particularly disturbing to see that some trucking companies in the United States are applying allegedly aggressive and unfair pricing policies that are prejudicial to Canadian truckers.

Has the Bureau of Competition Policy started to investigate these practices, and if not, when will it do so? This is another matter that is important to the trucking industry in this country, an industry that is in turn very important to our economy.

Hon. Pierre Blais (Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs and Minister of State (Agriculture)): Madam Speaker, I think we must realize that the Bureau of Competition Policy has a job to do and that it is in a position to respond to complaints that are filed with the Bureau.

However, it is not particularly easy when the hon. Leader of the Opposition starts accusing everyone by saying there are problems with the Bureau of Competition Policy, without being specific.

My colleague, the Minister of National Revenue, whom I am representing today and I, as Minister of Consumer and Corporate Affairs, are here, and we have legislation and regulations to deal with this. However, any serious complaints must first be identified and individuals and companies named, and only then will we be able to act.

I can assure you that we have all the resources we need to act, but I think the Leader of the Opposition should act responsibly and specify the nature of his charges so that we can do something about them.

Hon. Herb Gray (Leader of the Opposition): Madam Speaker, it is up to the minister to listen to Canadian truckers, and he should not avoid doing so when they have complaints to make. I hope he will listen to those complaints and act on them.

Finally, Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of National Revenue.

[English]

I want to know if the Minister of National Revenue has begun collecting the federal excise tax on gasoline to the same extent as the burden of that tax is imposed on Canadian truckers. If not, I would like him to tell us exactly when he will begin doing so.

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, it appears at the present time—and this comes forward from previous administrations, so I have no embarrassment in saying it—that there is no effective measure for collecting federal excise tax on shall we say full tanks of gas coming from the United States, whether it is in a Canadian truck or an American truck.

We discussed the method of the Ontario government of trying to collect its Ontario sales tax on the fuel. We undertook—and are moving on it immediately—to look at some method whereby we in Canada could begin to collect tax on full tanks of fuel in an effort to level out the playing field.

Ontario agreed to work with us on this initiative, and we will report back when we have something that we can deal with. I would hope at that time, if it requires legislation, that my hon. friend, the Leader of the Opposition, would ensure the House on behalf of his party speedy co-operation and no delays in the Senate.

THE ECONOMY

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Minister of Finance.

Yesterday the Minister of Finance lectured the House that high interest rates were necessary in order to keep Canadian costs of doing business competitive.

Also, yesterday the finance committee heard from Mr. James Taylor, President of the Canadian Exporters Association, who said: "the government's"—that is the Tory government—"high interest rate and high dollar policies are equal to a self-imposed tariff of 10 per cent on Canadian exports to the U.S. and 15 per cent on Canadian products sold overseas".

When is the government going to abandon this high interest, high dollar rate and allow Canadian exporters to be competitive on world markets and save Canadian jobs which have been going down—71,000 in the first four months of this year?

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, I think the hon. member will see, if he reviews the export figures over the last seven, eight or nine months, a gradual increasing trend in our export performance. While I accept the fact that the export sector of our economy is under pressure because of the interest rate policy that we are following, the same sector has been able to demonstrate increasing competitiveness and therefore an ability still to tap into foreign markets in spite of this policy.

I say to my hon. friend and I say to Mr. Taylor of the export association, as I have said to him on a number of occasions: if we do not deal with these underlying threats to our competitive position, the ongoing impact on individual companies in the export sector will be permanent.

It is important that we preserve this competitive position, and that means getting the inflationary pressures down. I remind my hon. friend that in 1989 we started the year with a 4.5 per cent increase in unit labour costs. That is the best measure of our competitive position that I can give. We started at 4.5 per cent and by the end of the year it was 6.9 per cent. That says we are losing business. If we continue that way we will lose business on a permanent basis, and that lost business means lost jobs.

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): Because of your policies.

[Translation]

Mr. Jean-Robert Gauthier (Ottawa—Vanier): I have a supplementary question for the same minister, Madam Speaker.

The minister must admit that his policies are not working. Will he finally tell the House that his budget of last February does not help Canadians, does not help Canadian exports and that it is destroying the Canadian economy? Will he give us a new budget as soon as possible to correct the economic situation the country is in?

[English]

Hon. Michael Wilson (Minister of Finance): Madam Speaker, my colleague has just referred to the difficulties with the budget. I would ask him to address his colleagues in the Senate because there are two bills right now that are being held up by the Senate.

Mr. Lapierre: They are being studied.

Mr. Milliken: Have a conference.

Mr. Wilson (Etobicoke Centre): The exclusive difference between the House of Commons and the Senate is on these bills. The questions are who decides to raise taxes and where should the spending cuts be?

If the Senate persists in doing this, what it is providing is a loan to the large corporations in this country which is in the hundreds of millions of dollars now. I have heard my colleagues opposite ask: "Why do you not you ensure that the tax system is fair and that large corporations are properly taxed?" Today, large corporations are not paying a large corporations tax simply because the bill has not been passed by the Senate. Until the Senate—

Mrs. Campbell (South West Nova): And they will not after.

Madam Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Essex—Windsor.

TRANSPORT

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Transport who has himself created much of the problem that has existed in central Canada this week among the truckers. The fact is that the minister was requested at least a month ago—

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): Who made the request?

Mr. Langdon: —to have a meeting with the key parties which have been involved in this protest. There was no response to that request.

Now another telegram has come from some of the same parties: the Canadian Brotherhood of Railway and Transport Workers, the International Brotherhood of Teamsters, the Transportation and Communications International Union. They have asked this minister if he is prepared to have an urgent meeting with them to discuss these problems that exist across the province, problems that persist today.

The minister knows himself that the blockade at Fort Erie is still in place. He knows that truckers across the province—

Madam Deputy Speaker: I am sure the hon. member does have a question.

Mr. Clark (Yellowhead): No, no, it is a major speech.

Mr. Beatty: Twenty minutes, Madam Speaker.

Mr. Langdon: My question is the following: In view of the continuing reality of these trucking blockades, is the minister prepared to meet with the groups that told him by telegram that they need an urgent meeting to discuss the crisis they see for truckers in central Canada?

Mr. Beatty: Questions and comments on the member's speech.

• (1130)

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, that was a great question on Tuesday and Wednesday, but it is a little late on Friday.

I was asked to go down to Windsor. I did go down on Wednesday night after the vote. I met with representatives of the independent truckers, and I guess that is key. There was no association there in terms of an elected representative or president, et cetera. That is part of the difficulty.

I met with representatives from those involved in the blockade on Thursday morning. We discussed their concerns. We agreed that we could satisfy their concerns.

We came out of the meeting and had a public meeting with the media. They were satisfied, the words were: "David's won". Unfortunately, David could not go back to the blockade and deliver all the other Davids. So we do not have the blockade lifted.

I regret that as much as you do. I made copies of my letter available to everybody. We are prepared to do what we can.

We have had the meeting you asked for. It just has not had the results we all want.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, I wrote to the minister on April 17 on behalf of these various unions requesting an urgent meeting because of these problems. The minister has not responded to that request. He has attempted to say that there are no problems that existed in the industry.

Is the minister prepared to respond to this telegram that has now reached him, a telegram which comes not from the independent truckers but from the many employees of trucking firms across this province? They are the key people at this stage who are carrying forward this trucking blockade. Is he prepared to meet and take some serious action?

Hon. Doug Lewis (Minister of Transport): Madam Speaker, I am prepared to respond to any request once I get it. To the best of my knowledge, it has not been received by my department. It has been delivered to my hon. friend. That is fair ball.

I understand that he is going to be dealing with his colleagues in the various unions. I do not knock that. If they want to meet and have discussions with me, they would be better off doing it directly rather than delaying it by going through my friend.

Mr. Steven W. Langdon (Essex—Windsor): Madam Speaker, I have to say to the minister that this is not a telegram to me. This is a telegram to him, a copy of which I happen to have. If he has not seen it, it is his department's fault, not my fault.

I want to ask my supplementary question of the Minister of Employment and Immigration since the Minister of Employment Immigration has also had a suggestion from the ministry in Ontario to the effect that people be deputized in the Ontario Department of Transport to enforce the immigration laws of this country against U.S. truckers who are taking loads from places that they are not supposed to.

Is the minister prepared to make a commitment at this stage that in fact she will accept this quite legitimate, straightforward and sensible suggestion from the ministry in the province of Ontario that this deputization of the transport ministry officials in Ontario take place? Will she take that advice? Will she act?

Hon. Barbara McDougall (Minister of Employment and Immigration): Madam Speaker, like my other colleagues, I am working very closely with the Minister of Transport on what is a very difficult issue, and one that I think the Minister of Transport has developed a strategy for. He has been very accommodating. I will continue to work with him on this.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of the Environment my question is directed to the acting Prime Minister.

Yesterday outside the House the new Minister of the Environment refused to endorse this government's policy to stabilize carbon dioxide emissions by the year 2000.

It is a commitment that was made by his predecessor two weeks ago, and confirmed last week in the House by the Minister of Forestry when he said, as reported at page 11612 of Hansard: "These are federal commitments".

Is it government policy to stabilize carbon dioxide emissions by the year 2000?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, as you know, the Minister of the Environment is in Winnipeg attending consultation sessions that are being held throughout Canada which will result in the development of commitments to the Green Plan that will be taken to the international conference in Geneva this November.

The minister responded to questions yesterday outside the House which confirmed what his predecessor said in Bergen, namely, that Canada aims at stabilizing CO_2 emissions in our country by the year 2000. His leadership was reflected in the Bergen declaration.

The hon. member should know that in order to achieve a target like that it will require sacrifices on the part of every Canadian. In fact it will require changes in our life-styles. This is why we have engaged in such a comprehensive consultation process which will result in the announcement of these commitments that are possible and sustainable later on this year.

Ms. Catherine Callbeck (Malpeque): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the Acting Prime Minister.

The former Minister of the Environment committed this government unconditionally to stabilize carbon dioxide emissions. The Minister of Forestry confirmed this in the House last week.

I want to ask the acting Prime Minister why this government is back-tracking on this very important issue? How does he expect Canadians to believe anything that this government now says about the environment?

Hon. Frank Oberle (Minister of Forestry): Madam Speaker, there is no back-tracking, as the hon. member would know if she had studied the deliberations of the Bergen commission.

Ms. Callbeck: The Bergen commission did not make any commitments.

Mr. Oberle: There are those who say that it would actually be possible by the year 2000 to attain a 20 per cent reduction of CO_2 emissions, particularly throughout the industrialized world.

The minister has stated on behalf of Canada a Canadian target, a Canadian commitment to stabilize by the year 2000 the greenhouse gases that are emitted in Canada to current 1990 levels. There is no confusion about that.

What we are doing now is consulting with Canadians who would have to accommodate these kinds of commitments. We will be the government by the year 2000. The hon. member will realize then that what we have done and what we have committed to will actually have been achieved.

FISHERIES

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Madam Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

He will know that the recent Atlantic fisheries aid package contained nothing, not a single red cent, for inshore fishermen and the related plant workers who are the victims of massive catch failure.

His colleague, the Minister for International Trade, said last week that the government was waiting until the end of the season. If he is talking about the winter season, it ended seven weeks ago. If he is talking about the summer season, it will not end until October. Surely, he is not suggesting that we wait until then.

Is the government now prepared to recognize the desperate plight in which those people find themselves right now? Is the government prepared to act right now to do something to help them ease their pain?

Right Hon. Joe Clark (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Madam Speaker, the government recognizes that there are problems in the inshore fishery. Those matters have been considered in companion with other actions taken by the government with regard particularly to problems caused relating to the stocks of northern cod.

I would not want to cause the hon. member to believe that there will be an imminent announcement with regard to the inshore fishery.

• (1140)

Hon. Roger C. Simmons (Burin—St. George's): Madam Speaker, my supplementary question is directed to the same minister.

He will know that 100,000 workers in Atlantic Canada make their living either in the fishing boats or in the fish plants. His colleague, the Minister of Fisheries and Oceans, admitted a week or so ago that the government has a plan to downsize that number.

Is the minister now in a position to tell us how many fishermen are going to be zapped, if you like, and be wiped out by the government's drive to downsize the fishery? Is he prepared to indicate whether there is a hit list of communities, if you like, that will be wiped off the face of the map by the government's mad scheme?
