"Nolly, you have no romance in your nature," says Nicholas, severely.

"Noll, you have no romance. Of course there was nothing for it but to shut my eves again and resign myself to my fate. I wonder I'm not dead," says Nolly, pathetically. "I never put in such a time in my life. Well, another quarter of an hour went by, and then I cautiously opened my eyes and looked again, and would you believe it?"—indignantly,— when they are quite convulsed with delight.

"Yes, go on, Noll; what did she say" repeats Geoffrey, the most generous encouragement m his tone. They have all, with a determination worthy of a better cause, made up their minds to forget that they as listening to what was certainly never meant for them to hear. Or perhaps consideration for Nolly compels them to keep their cars open, as that young man is so overcome by the thought of what he has unwillingly gone through, and the weight of the secret that is so disagreeably his that it has become a necessity with him to speak or die; but I believe myself it is more curiosity than pity prompts their desire for information on the subject in hand.

"I didn't listen," says Nolly, indignant of the speak of die; but I believe myself it is more curiosity than pity prompts their desire for information on the subject in hand.

"And pray what was to happen if I didn't? I gave 'em ten minutes; quite sufficient law, I think. If they couldn't get it over in that time, they must have forgotten their native tongue. Besides, I wanted to get down; the forked seat in the laurel was not all my fancy had painted it in the beginning, and how was I to know when they were gone unless I looked? Why, otherwise I might be there now. I might be there until next week," winds up Mr. Darling, with increasing wrath.
