As the dressmaker was about to deliver the package at the express office, a fine looking man stepped up and asked her if she had finished that dress for Mrs. Judge Allen. She said she had and was about to forward it to Albany. "Well." said he, "I am Judge Allen, and I'm going right to Albany and will deliver it to Mrs. Allen." The packet age was given to him and—that is the last of it.

The Providence Journal says the moral of Mr. Howells' last novel, "A Foregon of Mr. Howells' last novel, "A Foregone Conclusion," is objectionable in this, that it marries a Providence girl to an outsider. This sort of thing, has been going on till it calls for severe measures of suppression. The amount of beauty and bank stock—they can't take the real estate—which has gone out of this town through the marriage ring is appalling. We have no patience, when we see some handsome young fellow, who has borrowed the money to pay for his passage here, stand up and say to one of our heiresses, "With all my worldly goods I thee en dow." His worldly goods, indeed! His wife will have to pay his tailor bills.

The Aldine for January, 1875, is certainly entitled to the credit of being the very best number yet issued of that beautiful publication. In both pictures and literary matter, this month, there is an infinite variety and corresponding excellence. Pictorially, the leading attractions are "A Daughter of Cleopatra," supplying one of the highest types of the duskier Oriental beauty; three magnificent views of the mountains of the "Delaware Water Gap; an attractive foll-page, "Fisherman's Luck;" "Love's Offices" and "The Appointment," two admirable companion pictures, telling their stories with life and vigor; a very striking "Silver Full-Moonlight," weirdly attractive; a fine view of the new "Western Union Telegraph Building," New York; and an elaborately executed portrait of Miss Margaretta B. Moore, the popular elocutionist. The Shutles there are no holes in the Osborn Shuttle, and the thread can be put in its place in an instant. The Tension is self-regulating, which cannot be approached for smoothness.

na'ters, in our conversations, that you have been desirous of avoiding the discussion of them, I have not pressed them upon you. But the change in the political condition of the country has not, up to this day, resulted in a better state of things for the people. I think that the man who was chosen to represent the opinions of the new governing power would confess as much. The time was not ripe for change. If you want a tree, alter it has attained a full and s rong growth, to grow one way or the other, it would contess as inden. If you want a tree, after it has attained a full and s rong growth, to grow one way or the other, it must be trained very gently. These men demanded an impossibility. They asked for equality, and already they have shown themselves for place and pay. The flavor of Egypt's flesh-pots has proved too strong for their patriolism."

"If have never heard you express an opinion," said Sassafras, "upon the action of the King in deserting the post."

"He was both weak," replies Coltsfoot, "and wanting in a sense of duty."

Sassafras does not pursue the subject; and indeed presently it fades from his mind before the pressure of a deep affiliation. His child, so sweet a source of joy and happiness in their home, sickens and dies. The little one lies lift for many days and nights, and neither love, unwearying attention, nor heartfelt prayers can save it. The mother, in her care for her darling, begrudges the claims which nature makes upon her; and even when, after long, long hours of watching, sleep mercifully steals from her for a little while the pangs of grief she suffers, she will not leave her darling, but lies by his side with her hand upon his neek, as though by that tender caress she can move the hangel of Death to stay his hand. In vain. The last hour comes surely, and in the dead of night the flower dies with the dim light of its parents' eyes shining upon it.

Come from the chamber with me; the early of the parents' eyes shining upon it.

But this Christmas shall be the last they shall spend together in that humble cottage of love and content. CUNNING LITTLE DICK.

The change came about in a strange way. It had been Coltsfoot's habit for many years to visit certain places on Christmas-day, and he had often spoken to Sassafras of the beautiful and touching scenes he had witnessed at this season in a large hospital, where the sick poor were cared for. Sassafras had expressed a wish to see these scenes, and upon this Christmas-night he accompanied Coltsfoot to the hospital. They left Bluebell at home, with Iris, Lucerne and, Daisy, saying they would return at nine o'clock. Robin was also at home, making big eyes at Iris, and thinking, as he had thought three years ago, how pretty she was. He had not, however, yet mustered sufficient courage to put his thought in words. CUNNING LITTLE DICK. in words.

On their way to the hospital, Coltsfoot conversed with Sassafras upon the state of the country, and Sassafras learned much that astonished him. The new administration had utterly failed to remedy the evils of which the people had complained; the most unscrupulous of the Quamoclits and Whortleberries had got into powe,, and were making the worst use of it. Not only were they incompetent, they were corrupt: and the people in every part of No-land were crying out for a change.

"They say they were happier under Sassafras, and they are asking where he is. The papers are full of the theme; even the papers owned by the Reformers say it would be a happy day for the country if the King could be found and induced to resume his crown. The principal one of these papers is edited by Old Humanity—" Sassafras, in an agitated tone.

the dim light of its parents' eyes shining upon it.

Come from the chamber with me; the grief of three stricken souls is too deep, too sacred for our eyes. They find consolation in their faithful love for each other, and a stronger consolation in prayer. In the chamber of death, with the inanimate form of their beloved before them, they see a light beyond the grave. It falls upon the face of their child, and he lives again, and stretches out his arms to them.

So Bluebell and Sassafras live their lives throughout three changes of the seasons. SMALL & HATHEWAY. 35 Dock street.
