NATIONAL DEFENCE

U.S.-CANADA—STATEMENT ON DEFENCE CO-OPERATION

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago the hon. member for Algoma East (Mr. Pearson) asked for a statement in connection with the subject of defence co-operation between Canada and the United States, and I propose on this occasion to make such a statement. I do not think the present is the occasion for a more lengthy statement than I am about to give, but the opportunity will come later on during the estimates to discuss this question at length. I am prepared, however, to sketch in general terms the basic framework of our defence co-operation with the United States.

As the house is aware, the machinery of defence co-operation between Canada and the United States had its origin in what is known as the Ogdensburg declaration of August, 1940, by the president of the United States and the then prime minister of Canada, Mr. Mackenzie King, foreshadowing the development of the closest defence collaboration between the United States and Canada. Arrangements arising out of this declaration were effective during the last war in the political, military and supply fields.

In November, 1945, the United States government forwarded a request to the Canadian government urging that the collaboration in defence which had been so effective during the days of war should be maintained; that Canada and the United States should agree to the continuance of the permanent joint board on defence which had been established in August, 1940, and set up military arrangements to ensure the continuance of close co-operation of the defence forces of both countries in the defence of Canada and the United States. It was agreed that the permanent joint board on defence would be continued and a military co-operation committee would be set up, directly responsible to the chiefs of staff in each country, to discuss and process joint measures for the defence of Canada and the United States.

Following negotiations in the permanent joint board of defence, there emerged a joint statement of principles approved by the two governments laying down in broad terms the conditions governing the continuing partnership in defence of the two countries. These conditions and principles were announced in the House of Commons on February 12, 1957. Defence co-operation and collaboration between Canada and the United States has therefore continued without a break and with continuing impetus since 1940.

When Canada and the United States signed the North Atlantic treaty, the arrangements and procedures for defence collaboration were continued under the Canada-United States regional planning group as one of the regional groupings of NATO.

I would emphasize that the only restrictions which exist in defence collaboration are those imposed by law and not by desire. This limitation is only in the field of thermonuclear weapons, and is mainly concerned with the composition, construction and manufacturing techniques of nuclear weapons. The house will realize that the manufacture of nuclear weapons is not an urgent defence requirement for Canada. On June 15, 1955, by means of an exchange of notes, agreement was reached between the government of Canada and the government of the United States for co-operation in the atomic field for mutual defence purposes. At that time agreement was reached that each government would make available to the other government atomic information deemed necessary to:

(a) the development of defence plans;

(b) the training of personnel in the employment of defence against atomic weapons; and

(c) the evaluation of the capabilities of potential enemies in the employment of atomic weapons.

The finalizing of this agreement in this very important field was followed by the participation of Canadian military personnel in United States exercises involving thermonuclear explosions, so Canadian troops could be trained in the procedures for decontamination of personnel and vehicles and the detection of radiation resulting from these kinds of explosions. In short, there exists today the fullest co-operation in all aspects of military operations in areas where atomic weapons may be used.

In President Eisenhower's statement of November 7, to which the hon. member for Algoma East made reference, the President made particular reference to Canada-United States partnership in the construction of our continental defence system. Collaboration in air defence was undertaken soon after the close of the last war, and a joint effort was made to develop a comprehensive air defence system for the common defence of North America. This system, concerning which the house has been fully informed, comprises an aircraft control and warning radar installation in the southern part of Canada, known as the "Pinetree" system, which was jointly built and is jointly operated by Canada and the United States. This was followed by the joint arrangement for the construction of the mid-Canada line and the distant early warning line, and a common communications system. For administrative convenience these projects were constructed separately by each government, but they are operated along with the "Pinetree" chain as a complete early warning and interceptor system. In order to work out these intricate air defence problems of an operational and scientific nature, a joint Canadian-United States military study group consisting of service officers and scientists was set up.

One result of studies conducted by this group was a recommendation made to the chiefs of staff of both countries in December, 1956, for the establishment of a joint headquarters to provide for the operational control of the air defence of Canada and the United States. These recommendations of the joint study group were approved by the chiefs of staff of both countries and the United States Secretary of Defence approved these measures early in April.

This bilateral arrangement within the Canada-United States regional planning group of NATO is a further step in achieving the agreed NATO objectives for the Canada-United States regional planning group, which are as follows:

(a) to provide an effective base for and effective protection of the strategic nuclear counter-offensive capability;

(b) maintenance of an effective early warning and air defensive system.

This arrangement within the Canada-United States regional planning group was reported by both countries to the NATO council before it was made public.

It is realized that this comprehensive air defence system is a defence against the manned bomber, and it was recognized some time ago that steps should be taken to provide for defence against the further threat of the intercontinental ballistic missile. As early as July, 1956, negotiations were commenced for joint collaboration in the study of methods and procedures for dealing with defence against the ICBM. The defence research board, in collaboration with the United States air force, has undertaken a substantial research program which will aid in solving the problems of producing a warning system and defence against the ICBM. Research studies, including field and laboratory studies, of the factors which will make feasible the radar detection of an ICBM warhead and the interception of this warhead by a destructive missile are now being thoroughly and jointly investigated.

The radar to be installed in Saskatchewan is part of this activity. It is worthy of note that this radar has been loaned by the United States to be operated by the research workers of the defence research board as part of our contribution to the research against this new and serious threat. It is our intention to follow up very closely this joint development and to give this project of creating a defence against the ballistic missile high priority in our defence program.

Other joint efforts of considerable significance are the projects for the development of defensive measures against the missile-carrying submarine, including new long-range submarine detection techniques and improved methods of destroying submarines. These measures are being developed by the two navies, in an effort to combat the threat of missile attacks against North American ports and installations.

There is consultation and co-operation on defence on all levels. Officers of all services are integrated into the major schools and training establishments of all services in the United States. The cold weather testing of United States and Canadian weapons, including missiles, is carried out at the Canadian test station at Churchill, Manitoba. While co-operation in these fields is indeed very extensive, there are other areas where more joint work can be done, and we intend to fully explore further co-operation and consultation in these important fields of defence and particularly research and development.

I think that generally summarizes the situation, Mr. Speaker. The Minister of National Defence will deal more fully with the question of collaboration with the United States, as I said at the beginning, when the estimates are before the house.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Algoma East): Mr. Speaker, I realize, of course, that this is not the occasion on which to discuss the statement the Prime Minister has just made. However, I should like to thank him for that review of the situation and to express the hope that the detailed consideration of the extremely important matter to which he referred will take place before long.

Interesting as his statement has been, Mr. Speaker, it certainly has not answered a great many of the questions in our minds concerning particularly the North American command, or NORAD, as it is called, and the implications of the action that has been taken by the government in regard to continental defence under that command. I refer to military implications and indeed political implications.

We on this side of the house realize that on a question of this kind which is of such great importance to Canada, to the United States and to NATO, we should act with a maximum degree of unanimity. But before we can secure that unanimity, Mr. Speaker, we must have all the available information and particularly the information with regard to the alteration, if there is any alteration, in the responsibility of the Canadian government for the actions of Canadian troops, and also the relationship of this command to NATO.

I notice that reference has been made to that relationship but not, if I may say so, in a form which gives me any clear indication that this command has any direction relationship to NATO whatever, or not in the sense that that relationship was established after debate and discussion in this house, as was done in so far as sending Canadian troops to Europe was concerned. The information we have received up to the present time has been inadequate, so far as I am concerned. After more complete information has been received I hope all the doubts we have will be removed, and that we on this side of the house will be able to support any move for continental defence in the interests of both countries and therefore in the interests of peace.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, if I may say a further word, my hon. friend says there was not sufficiently full information placed before the house, and I feel I should answer that immediately so there will be no misunderstanding.

I would like to point out that those who served in the cabinet of the present the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. St. Laurent) had full information on this matter. Indeed as far back as May 11, 1956, there was an agreement between the chiefs of staff to refer to the joint study group the integration of operational control of the continental air defence of the United States and Canada in peacetime. They supported the principle of a single commander under collective security arrangements which had been well established by the North Atlantic Treaty Organization, with the examples of the supreme allied commander in Europe and the supreme allied commander for the Atlantic having operational control over all assigned forces.

I would also like to point this out in answer to my hon. friend. He may not have had the information, but these things occurred during the time the government of which he was a member was in power. On the 18th day of February, 1957, after full consideration of the matter, the then minister of national defence recommended the establishment of an integrated operational control system for the air defence of Canada, the United States and Alaska under a single commander, with a reminder that the United States should recognize "the need for adequate consultation with the Canadian authorities on matters which might lead to the alerting of the air defence system". He spoke for the cabinet on that occasion.

On February 28, 1957, the minister asked that the deputy commander should be a Canadian, and he stated at that time that he anticipated government approval would be given to the arrangement, which "we" brought into effect, on the 15th day of March, 1957.

However, on that date the matter was withdrawn and on March 24, on instructions from the then minister of national defence, officers proceeded to Washington to advise the United States chiefs of staff that there was no disagreement on the part of the then government regarding the plan but that it would not be possible to give formal approval, for it was intimated that the matter might become a political issue and it was not considered advisable to have the formal approval until such time as it was not a political issue. So on the 26th day of April the then minister of national defence cleared a dispatch to the United States pointing out that a decision, while there was no probability of any change, could not be expected until June 15.

I thought my hon. friend must have forgotten those facts—

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —because they deal comprehensively with the arrangements which were entered into.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, perhaps in view of the importance of this matter and in view of the facts or the details put on the record by the Prime Minister in the statement he has just now made, I might be permitted to add a word.

I think if the Prime Minister will do a little more research into the proceedings of the cabinet defence committee and the cabinet he will discover that while all these matters about which he has spoken were considered and, I think, approved by the officers of the Department of National Defence and perhaps, though I have not all the details, by the minister of national defence, that is not the same as to say that they were approved or even considered by either the cabinet defence committee or even by the cabinet. If the Prime Minister will look up the records of the cabinet he will find out, I think, that this particular matter which was approved so quickly after the election by the government of the right hon. gentleman was not considered in any way, shape or form by the cabinet defence committee or by the cabinet, and no decision can therefore have been taken with regard to it.

INQUIRY AS TO REDUCTION IN EXPENDITURES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): My question is directed to the Prime Minister. Has the attention of the Prime Minister been drawn to the reported statement of Lieutenant General Simonds that if the $300 million wasted on that dead duck the CF-105 had been used to stockpile Canadian wheat in Europe it would have been spent to much greater advantage? Has the Prime Minister considered a substantial reduction in current military expenditures, and would he consider using any moneys thus saved to stockpile wheat in Europe, or otherwise to give economic assistance to the free nations?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I have not seen the report of the speech by Lieutenant General Simonds or the opinions allegedly expressed by him. After all, it is a matter of opinion. If he did express what has been stated by my hon. friend it is a matter that would have to be considered in all its implications before any answer could be given to it.

Mr. Argue: I wonder whether the Prime Minister might answer that part of my question which asked if a reduction in current military expenditures had been considered, and whether such a reduction would be used for economic assistance by way of wheat stockpiling or otherwise.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think hon. members will agree that if they receive an answer to their question, whether or not it is a satisfactory answer, they should not attempt to improve the situation by asking the question again; because there is no right on the part of hon. members to insist upon an answer.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I would point out to you that I was merely repeating my question to the minister, which I submit he had not answered. If he considers it answered, that is perfectly all right by me.

Mr. Speaker: I understood that it is part of the question that the hon. member is repeating. I was suggesting that this is not a regular procedure, and I ask the hon. member not to push the matter further.

UNITED NATIONS

FAO—STATEMENT BY U. S. REPRESENTATIVE ON WHEAT DISPOSAL POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Melville): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the Minister of Agriculture. Has the government any report or comment to make on the announcement reported to have been made at FAO by Mr. Charles Hoeven, representing the United States, that it is their intention to increase expenditures in their policy of making food products, including wheat, easily available to nations throughout the world?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the announcement to which the hon. member has referred. I do not know what is in it, and therefore I am not really in a position to comment on it.

However, perhaps I should say this. I was present last Thursday in Rome when the United States Secretary for Agriculture, Mr. Ezra Benson, made a speech of about three-quarters of an hour to an hour in length in regard to American ideas concerning surplus disposal. I may say that the whole tenor of his speech was that in his opinion and in the opinion of his government the Americans had done a great humanitarian work in providing food for hungry peoples throughout the world, and he was assuring the meeting that his country would continue to do this. He did not go into the matter of surplus disposal as far as other countries were concerned. The whole tenor of his speech was in regard to his government's intention to continue to make food available where there were people suffering from hunger.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Agriculture has described the American disposal of surplus food as a great humanitarian effort. Is there any indication that the government of Canada will follow this humanitarian example?

Mr. Harkness: I did not describe it as that; I said Mr. Benson had described it as that. Of course I would agree that there has been a very large element of humanitarianism in the policy followed by the United States with regard to supplying surplus food to meet the needs of countries in southeast Asia.

GRAIN

WHEAT—INQUIRY AS TO ADDITIONAL QUANTITIES TO INDIA

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I have a supplementary question for the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is Canada at this time doing anything to provide additional quantities of wheat for India, in the light of the reported discussions now going on between the United States and India with the object of making additional quantities of wheat available under public law 480?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, any arrangements that may be made with India in the future will be duly announced here in the house. We are aware of their difficulties with regard to food supplies, and we are quite prepared at any time to discuss the problem with our fellow members of the commonwealth from India.

Mr. Argue: Well, Mr. Speaker, my question was this. Are any negotiations being entered into with India at the present time or have any negotiations been entered into with India to provide additional quantities of wheat for that country, or does this government do nothing but protest to the United States?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend seems to want to make a speech on the subject.

An hon. Member: You make one.

Mr. Churchill: I will be very happy to make a speech if you want to listen to me.

Mr. Pickersgill: Listen to him.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Make a remarkable one.

Mr. Lesage: A first class one.

Mr. Churchill: We have had conversations with the representatives of India with regard to the supply of wheat to that country.

Mr. Argue: With regard to the supply of additional quantities of wheat?

Mr. Churchill: Yes, with regard to the supply of additional quantities of wheat.

WHEAT—PRICE OF SALES TO MILLERS IN PRAIRIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. A. Tucker (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is he yet prepared to give an answer to the question I directed to him a week ago and the supplementary questions the next day, with regard to the price at which wheat is sold to millers on the prairies?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have ready a long answer to what was a rather long question. If it could be accepted as an order for return I should be glad to have it printed in Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[For answer referred to above, see appendix "A", pages 1098-99.]

FINANCE

BANK OF CANADA—DIFFERENCE OF OPINION WITH GOVERNMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. James Sinclair (Coast-Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Actually it is a repetition of a question he was asked last Monday in Oakville, which he refused to answer on the ground that he could not answer it outside the House of Commons. Since he is now inside the House of Commons I should like to ask him, has there been a clash of opinions between the Bank of Canada and the government on economic policy?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): I am not aware of anything that could be called a clash.

Mr. Sinclair: A supplementary question. Does that mean the Minister of Finance is now in accord with the policy of the Bank of Canada, which he called an unhappy legacy earlier this session?

Mr. Fleming: The expression "unhappy legacy" does not apply only to what the hon. gentleman has just mentioned. There are a good many things in the unhappy legacy to which that expression ought to apply. When the time comes to deal with any questions of policy in the house I can assure the hon. gentleman that they will be dealt with fully.

[Later:]

Mr. F. C. Christian (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question supplementary to the one asked by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano. Would the Minister of Finance reveal to the house the nature, scope and result of his recent discussions with Mr. J. A. Coyne, governor of the Bank of Canada?

Mr. Sinclair: Now you can make a speech.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am quite sure the minister is fully capable of answering that question—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: That is doubtful.

Mr. Speaker: —but I doubt if the house would be patient to listen to him during the period of time it would take. I really must suggest to the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary that this is scarcely the type of question he could expect to have answered on orders of the day.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Is this a supplementary question?

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Yes. While you have ruled, Mr. Speaker, that the question asked by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary is not one that can be answered on the orders of the day, may I ask the finance minister when the house can definitely expect him to make a statement with respect to the results of his conference yesterday with the officials of the Bank of Canada?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I can assure my hon. friend that, when the government is in a position to announce policy or to make any announcement that will justify occupying the time of the house, that will be done. I can also assure my hon. friend that, so far as yesterday's meeting is concerned, it was not the only meeting of its kind that has ever been held. The Bank of Canada is an adviser to the Minister of Finance and meetings are held from time to time, with varying frequency, with the senior officials of the Bank of Canada and senior officials of the Department of Finance. The meeting that was held yesterday was one that had been arranged a few days in advance. It was not the first meeting of that kind that has been held in recent times, nor is it the last of its kind that will be held.

Mr. Hansell: In other words, we are not going to be told.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure that my hon. friend has been in the house long enough to know that it is highly improper for any responsible minister to disclose publicly communications that pass between him and the advisers in his department.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not the position you used to take.

Mr. Fleming: In this respect, Mr. Speaker, advice received by the Minister of Finance and communications passing in that relationship between him and the senior officials of the Bank of Canada are clearly within that well recognized and time-honoured rule.

REPORTED STATEMENT BY MINISTER AT OAKVILLE, ONT.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Has his attention been called to the report of his speech to the Oakville-Trafalgar chamber of commerce appearing in yesterday's Journal and, if so, is he correctly quoted when this report carries within quotation marks these words:

"—the danger of inflation has been checked and the rise in the cost of living is now levelling out".

If the minister has been correctly quoted, can he inform the house as to the source of this reassuring information, in view of the fact that the latest figures produced by the dominion bureau of statistics indicate that in October the consumer price index reached a new all-time high of 123.4?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house has listened with much interest to the speech of my hon. friend. He smuggled into his question things that he thought would be taken as statements of fact; but if he is going to put it on that basis I must take issue with what he puts forward in certain respects as statements of fact.

An hon. Member: He was quoting you.

Mr. Fleming: So that the house may have a balanced impression of what I said at Oakville I would very much like to have the opportunity of reading a couple of paragraphs in which I dealt with the subject.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Marler: Table it.

Mr. Pearson: We do not want a speech, we want an answer.

Mr. Fleming: I had a text on the occasion in question, and the statement read by the hon. member for Nanaimo was not complete.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): How about answering the question?

Mr. Fleming: I will. I was asked if I was correctly reported, Mr. Speaker, and this is what would have been a complete report of what I said in this respect:

It is the duty of the Minister of Finance to keep the economic state of this nation under constant examination. Without any hesitation I say to you that the Canadian economy is undeniably strong. There are sectors in which its advance is not as swift as at other periods and, like the United States, we entered some months ago upon a more level plateau of economic activity.

Mr. Sinclair: After June 10.

Mr. Fleming: No, we entered upon it before June 10.

Some hon. Members: Go on with the speech.

Mr. Fleming: We have improved a great deal since June 10 in many respects. To continue:

We always face a problem of seasonal unemployment in the winter months.

Mr. Sinclair: Double that of last year.

Mr. Fleming:

But Canadians can continue to enjoy full confidence in their future. No nation in all the world offers its people the same long-term bright prospects as Canada.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Is that what you inherited?

Mr. Fleming: No, that is what we have improved upon a great deal since June 10.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: We took an unhappy heritage and improved upon it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest that the minister confine himself to the reading of the paragraph, and that the house confine itself to listening.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): We want an answer.

Some hon. Members: Answer.

Mr. Fleming: I continue, Mr. Speaker:

Our gross national product will establish a record this year. The numbers of our employed are higher than they have been at this season of the year in all our history. The total volume of our trade is at record heights. The rise in the cost of living, which has continued for a considerable time, now is levelling out. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has expressed optimism over the outlook for Canadian wheat sales. The market for Canadian government bonds has shown a notable increase in strength in recent weeks. Interest rates on Canadian treasury bills have dropped three-tenths of one per cent in the last two months —a remarkable trend when it is recalled that since mid-July the rate paid by the United States treasury on its treasury bills has risen by one-half of one per cent. On October 1 the Canadian government floated a new bond issue of $700 million. The issue was oversubscribed and the books were closed on the issue one-half hour after they were opened.

The danger of inflation has been checked. As its contribution to this end the government has been warring against waste, extravagance and inefficiency. At a time when more capital is needed to sustain the development of our resources and maintain the momentum of the Canadian economy I shall continue to urge the Canadian people to do their full part in the creation of capital in the only way in which capital can be created, namely, out of their savings.

I shall be glad indeed to continue this, Mr. Speaker, or to send my hon. friend a copy of it. He asked specifically about the matter of the cost of living. The cost of living in Canada has been rising for a very considerable time, and my hon. friend will have observed a reference in my statement to the fact that the rise has levelled out. He will have observed the fact that in the month of October the rise was only one-tenth of one per cent. I am speaking from memory now but I think the rise in the consumer price index was from 123.3 to 123.4. Having regard to the upward trend in the cost of living which has now continued for a very considerable period, that is, I assure my hon. friend, ample evidence in my opinion to warrant the statement I made that the rise in the cost of living has now levelled out. I am not the only one who entertains that opinion.

STATEMENT ON REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF CHANGES IN TEXTILE ITEMS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): On Monday, November 11, the hon. member for Stormont (Mr. Lavigne) addressed this question to my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce:

In view of a substantial recession in the textile industry, will the minister give consideration to changes in tariff items 523b, 553 and 523d?

Mr. Speaker, I did state to the house some time ago that all the items in the Customs Tariff respecting textiles were referred by me some weeks ago to the tariff board for study and report. The tariff board begins its hearings next Monday, November 18, and I can assure the hon. member that I have taken due note of his request that the government increase the tariff.

INQUIRY AS TO TARIFF BOARD STUDY ON FLUORSPAR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. May I ask whether the board has yet begun a study with respect to fluorspar?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): The tariff board has not yet begun that inquiry. The inquiry on the textiles items will be quite extensive and prolonged.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF PRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask a supplementary question, which I think might be helpful to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Sinclair: He needs help.

Mr. McIlraith: He is beyond help.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): When does he intend to present the budget or budgetary proposals to which he made reference at a press conference toward the end of July? He indicated that there would be a budget or budgetary proposals at this session of parliament and that would give him an opportunity to deal with the question of the relationship between the government and the Bank of Canada.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, whatever is put before the house in that regard on behalf of the government will be done in due course, and the house, in accordance with the usual practice of ministers of finance as I have observed it in the past 12 years, will be notified in due course.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the minister, will there be a budget at this session?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I tell my hon. friend what I told him on a previous occasion, that whatever is required in order to place properly before the house any recommendations or proposals of the government in this regard will be done in accordance with the practice of the house.

Mr. Sinclair: Straight evasion.

HIGHWAYS

STEWART-CASSIAR, B.C.—SURVEY AS TO SOUTHERN TERMINUS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I have a question I should like to ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Is it true that the survey made by the Department of Public Works into the Cassiar-Stewart road indicates that it is less costly to make the southern terminus of the road at Alice Arm than to make the southern terminus at Stewart and, if so, what is the difference in estimated cost?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I doubt if that is the kind of question that should be asked without notice. Has notice been given?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I hould like to thank th hon. memer for Skeena for giving me notice of this question. The survey made by the Department of Public Works as simply a preliminary reconnaissance survey, and any findings of that survey must be considered as tentative indications only and subject to confirmation or correction by detailed surveys that have not yet been made.

The preliminary reconnaissance survey referred to indicated that the use of Alice Arm as a southern terminus for the route might result in a saving of something in the region of $3 million in the construction of the road itself. It also indicated that a southern terminus at Nass bay might be considered.

However, any savings in road construction costs could easily be counterbalanced by greater port construction costs or by engineering problems that could render development of good port facilities impractical. The final estimates of road costs and of harbour costs cannot be made until much more detailed surveys and studies are carried out on all phases of the project.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

GORDON COMMISSION—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF STUDIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if he would table the studies published by the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects. I think I should point out to the house that the preliminary report was tabled on January 10 of this year and the final report is in the course of preparation. Some 15 or 16 of the studies referred to in the preliminary report have now been printed, and I should like to ask that they be tabled.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): My hon. friend was good enough to speak to me on this subject some days ago following his asking of a similar question in the house with respect to one particular study that had been made under the auspices of the royal commission to which he has referred. I made inquiries as to what had been the practice in times past with reference to the tabling in the house of studies made on behalf of royal commissions, and I was informed that it has not been the practice in times past to table such studies.

The only occasion I personally recall when copies of the studies were made available for distribution to hon. members was when a volume was prepared gathering together the various studies that had been made on behalf of the Massey royal commission on the arts, letters and sciences. That volume was made available to all members and distributed, I think, through the distribution office.

Apart from that case I have been informed that it has not been the practice for royal commissions to have copies of their studies printed and distributed through the distribution office. I can assure my hon. friend there is no unwillingness on my part, or on the part of the government, that these studies should be made available, because I am sure they are extremely useful studies. They are not all completed as yet, and they are not all—

Mr. McIlraith: I believe 16 of them are.

Mr. Fleming: They are not available as yet in printed form, in a volume, so they could be made available for distribution amongst hon. members. If there are sufficient copies available in the hands of the royal commission for distribution I will certainly be glad to make inquiries and see if copies can be made available to such hon. members as wish them. I have had no indication that it is the intention of the royal commission to have these studies put into a volume for distribution, as was the case with the Massey royal commission.

Mr. McIlraith: I wonder if, in view of the somewhat lengthy answer, I might be permitted a supplementary question. With reference to the practice, I may say the only case I could find was that of the Rowell-Sirois commission report, when the 32 appendices were tabled with the report. That was in 1940. I did not ask that these studies be distributed, but that they be tabled in the house to become part of the records of parliament. They are readily available. The printing bureau has circulated a price list of them, and has been circularizing the country at large. This is within the knowledge of the Minister of Finance.

My question was whether he would table the studies, not whether he would distribute them.

Mr. Fleming: So far as tabling them is concerned, I shall be happy indeed to table copies. So far as distribution is concerned, I shall undertake to look into the matter to see if copies are available for such members as may be interested in having them.

CRIMINAL LAW

INQUIRY AS TO REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON INSANITY AS A DEFENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Would the Minister of Justice table the report of the royal commission on the law of insanity as a defence in criminal cases? I understand this report was completed some weeks ago and is available now.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): I am glad to inform my hon. friend that steps are in hand now to arrange the tabling of this document.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

UNEMPLOYMENT—EFFORTS TO OVERCOME PSYCHOLOGICAL EFFECT OF GOVERNMENT PUBLICITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. I apologize for not giving him notice, but I found that impossible because I have only just thought of it. In view of the fact that the report today from the bureau of statistics shows that unemployment in September of this year was 90 per cent greater than unemployment for the same month last year, will the minister consider stepping up the activities of his department in order to overcome the psychological effect of this government publicity on unemployment?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, when I took over the portfolio of Minister of Labour in June of this year I found that the unemployment situation in Canada was not too good. I immediately took certain steps, in conjunction with the government, and in the intervening months we have found unemployment dropping quite a bit from the date when we took over.

Mr. Sinclair: It always does.

Mr. Starr: It is rather unfair to compare this year with last year.

Mr. Sinclair: Why?

Mr. Starr: Perhaps the hon. member would compare it with 1954 and 1955. I think he would find a different picture. I want to assure the hon. member that the labour department is doing everything to keep in close touch with the situation, and doing everything possible to alleviate it.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to inform the minister that I was exercising the same comparison as the government publication in question.

HEALTH AND WELFARE

AIR AND WATER POLLUTION—STATEMENT AS TO FEDERAL ACTION WITH RESPECT TO SHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yesterday when I was answering a question concerning action being taken in regard to air pollution by ships, the hon. member for Laurier asked a supplementary question as to whether the international joint commission was considering water pollution in the great lakes area. I answered that it was my understanding the international joint commission was concerned with this matter. I am advised that the international joint commission has studied the pollution of boundary waters, and has issued a comprehensive report on the matter. The report deals, of course, with pollution of water from land sources as well as from ships.

I might also mention that in 1956 an amendment to the Canada Shipping Act was passed to provide for approval by Canada of the international convention for the prevention of pollution of the sea by oil. This convention comes into force on July 26, 1958, and provides measures for curbing pollution of the high seas by oil from ships. The same amendment to the shipping act also empowered the governor in council to make regulations for preventing pollution of our domestic waters by oil from ships.

As a first step toward enforcement of the pollution convention and our own domestic anti-pollution regulations, the Department of Transport has appointed a marine inspector at the port of Montreal and is proceeding with the designation of various provincial, municipal and harbour police officers throughout our ports as inspectors for this purpose. Their efforts will be co-ordinated by the marine inspector at Montreal.

SHIPPING

ST. LAWRENCE SEAWAY—STATEMENT ON EQUIPMENT TO KEEP CHANNELS OPEN IN WINTER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Kingston referred in a question to experiments being carried out in Sweden to free water channels from freezing in winter, and asked if such equipment was being considered in connection with the St. Lawrence seaway.

I indicated in my reply that we would be interested in the results of such experiments. In the meantime I have learned that experiments using this principle, which is that of air movement from the river or harbour bed or at subsurface level by releasing air bubbles to prevent freezing, have been taking place both in Canada and in Europe. Officials of my department have been keeping in touch with the results of these experiments, which are extremely interesting and could lead to useful developments in this field. Further information and further tests are required, and will undoubtedly be carried out by interested groups.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

EXTENSION OF PERIOD OF BENEFITS TO UNEMPLOYED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Wilfrid LaCroix (Quebec-Montmorency): May I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Is it true that the government has decided to extend the benefit period under the Unemployment Insurance Act to 52 weeks, as promised by the Prime Minister at a Conservative rally on May 4, 1957, at Campbellton?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): No decision has as yet been made by the government pertaining to the question asked by the hon. member.

OLD AGE PENSIONS

INQUIRY AS TO FURTHER INCREASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Wilfrid LaCroix (Quebec-Montmorency): May I ask a question of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Is it true that the government has decided to increase again the old age pension, as a result of the fact that the Liberals have given $46 and the Tories only $9?

CANADIAN NATIONAL STEAMSHIPS

TRANSFER OF VESSELS TO FOREIGN REGISTRY—REQUEST FOR RECONSIDERATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I saw that he was endeavouring to rise a few moments ago and I tried to reach him before he made that effort. Would the minister reconsider his decision to allow the Canadian National Steamships to transfer its ships to Trinidad registry, an action designed to break the strike of the seafarers' international union, thus throwing 200 more Canadians out of work.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the action of the Canadian National Steamships was in no way an attempt to break any strike. On Monday I outlined very carefully the steps that led to the action that was taken. If the hon.

member will read the answer I gave at that time I think he will receive the information he is seeking.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question. Will or will not this action throw some 200 Canadians out of work, or will they be rehired?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, the action taken by Mr. Hal Banks on July 24 threw 226 Canadians out of work.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister a supplementary question. Would the minister not consider it better to change the registry of Mr. Banks rather than the registry of the ships?

POTATOES

MARITIME PROVINCES—REQUEST FOR PARITY PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Murphy (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Prime Minister. What action has been taken or is being considered by the government to ensure adequate parity for maritime potato growers based on a fair price-cost relationship?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the question of legislation respecting agricultural prices was referred to in the speech from the throne. At the earliest possible date on which we can do so, that legislation which the government has in mind will be introduced.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

OTTAWA—STATEMENT ON POSTPONEMENT OF CONSTRUCTION OF NATIONAL DEFENCE HEADQUARTERS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Gour) asked a question regarding the construction of a new national defence headquarters.

A brief answer is that there is no provision in the 1957-58 estimates for the commencement of construction of such a building in the present fiscal year. I should not like, however, to give the impression that consideration is not being given to the possibility of erecting such a building or buildings at some future date, but no decision as to the location or the possible date of commencement of construction has yet been reached.

OTTAWA—STATEMENT ON REPORTED POSTPONEMENT OF CONSTRUCTION OF POSTAL HEADQUARTERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. O. Gour (Russell): Mr. Speaker, may I have an answer from the Minister of Public Works to the question I put to him yesterday?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Yes, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday the hon. member for Russell asked whether the project for the construction of a new building for the Post Office Department had been shelved. The answer is that it has not been shelved. On the contrary, plans are under preparation and will be finished some time in the new year. It will then be possible to decide when actual construction can begin.

TELEVISION

NEW BRUNSWICK—STATEMENT ON COVERAGE FOR NORTHERN AREA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. G. C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, on Tuesday, November 5, the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Robichaud) asked what action is being taken to provide the 250,000 people of northern New Brunswick and the Gaspe coast with television facilities.

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation advises me that if an application for a private television station in this area is made —and there are reports to the effect that such an application is being made—and the application is subsequently approved and the station established, the corporation would expect to provide national program service for that station.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a related question. In view of the enhanced interest I have myself in television, may I ask the minister how soon he expects the microwave system to be extended to St. John's, Newfoundland?

Mr. Nowlan: Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to speak definitely for St. John's, Newfoundland. After watching the television appearance of the former minister last night I can understand the interest he is taking in the matter. I am sure he will maintain an interest in the television programs of the C.B.C. I can tell him that the microwave system will be continued at least to the mainland by the end of December or very early in January of this coming year, and I would hope that the citizens of Bonavista-Twillingate will have an opportunity of seeing the hon. member on television in the early spring.

Inquiries of the Ministry

LIVESTOCK

REQUEST FOR CLARIFICATION OF STATEMENT BY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Could the minister clarify his meaning when speaking to the dairy council on September 9, 1957, when in dealing with the curtailment of wheat acreage he said in part:

> The acreage released from wheat growing might be more suitably utilized for fodder crops to support an increased number of livestock.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I am greatly flattered by the attention the hon. member for Moose Mountain has given to my speech delivered in Winnipeg.

Mr. McCullough: I may tell the minister that I have read his speech and that I am still inclined to believe he was advocating an increase in livestock production.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member, having read my speech, has profited accordingly and is now much better informed about the situation in western Canada.

Mr. Pickersgill: Not much better.

Mr. Churchill: Oh, yes. Two days ago, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member used these words, as reported at page 951 of Hansard, and he was speaking to me or about me:

> I refer to the statement he made in Winnipeg suggesting to farmers that they go into livestock production, thereby using up a lot of surplus wheat.

I said he did not have his facts correct, nor did he. I made no such suggestion. I made no proposal that that be done. I did not say that this was a way to use up surplus wheat. If I may have your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will read the paragraph which seems to offend the hon. member and his colleagues sitting beside him.

Mr. Coldwell: Read the whole paragraph.

Mr. Churchill: I will not read the whole speech, but there are 39 paragraphs devoted to the wheat problem in western Canada. Paragraph 22 which was elevated by someone who was reporting the speech into a headline about "cattle rather than wheat" or something like that, caused some hon. members, having read only the headlines, to comment accordingly. Here is the paragraph. If this is a proposal—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Coldwell: Read the paragraph.

[Mr. Nowlan.]

Mr. Churchill: The paragraph reads as follows:

> The long-range view with regard to our wheat entails a forward-looking policy with regard to general production, and it may well be that progressively over the years—

I draw your attention to that phrase "it may well be".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: This is the withdrawal.

Mr. Pickersgill: Just pie in the sky.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. I would ask you to remind the Minister of Trade and Commerce of standing order 39. Then perhaps he will answer the question as the hon. member placed it before him.

Mr. Churchill: I have been asked to clarify the situation, and I can only do so by reading the actual words and giving a little explanation—

An hon. Member: No comments.

Mr. Fleming: How about letting him read without interruption?

Mr. Speaker: Well, if the hon. minister will proceed to read the quotation.

Mr. Churchill: At the moment I might direct my hon. friend's attention to—

Mr. Gardiner: No comments; it will not do you any good.

An hon. Member: Read the paragraph.

Mr. Churchill: I will read the paragraph if I have the opportunity of explaining some of these remarks that have been made by hon. members opposite—

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. Churchill: I got as far as:

> . . . it may well be that progressively over the years our acreage devoted solely to the growing of wheat should be appreciably reduced and greater emphasis should be placed on diversified crops and on the livestock industry.

Mr. Coldwell: Read the next sentence.

Mr. Churchill: I will read the next sentence. The interprovincial farm union brief presented to us this summer mentions reduced acreage on four occasions. However, I will read first the next sentence:

> If this is done, wheat production—

You see, I did not advocate that it should be done—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: That is not a directive to anybody.

. . . wheat production might be kept to the average figure of 400 million bushels and the acreage released from wheat growing might be more suitably utilized for fodder crops to support an increased number of livestock.

An hon. Member: The headline writers were right.

Mr. Churchill: The report of the Saskatchewan royal commission suggests that in 25 years a 50 per cent increase of meat production will be required.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Provided it is a question for information and not for comment.

Mr. Argue: Is the minister able to tell the house whether he thinks at this time there should be greater emphasis on the livestock industry, in view of the fact that beef producers in Ontario and eastern Canada are going broke and the hog market has collapsed.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I have never suggested that there should be greater emphasis at this time on the livestock industry; my hon. friend knows that very well.

HARBOURS

CORNWALL, ONT.—INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. P. Lavigne (Stormont): Mr. Speaker, may I address a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister received any communications from representatives of the city of Cornwall with regard to the establishing of a harbour commission for that city?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I would like to thank the hon. member for his courtesy in advising me of his intention to ask this question. I have received no representations so far from the city of Cornwall for the establishment of such a commission.

FISHERIES

CHEAKAMUS RIVER, B.C.—MAINTENANCE OF WATER FOR SPAWNING PURPOSES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask a question and it is about fish, not wheat. My question is addressed to the Minister of Fisheries, and I have given him notice.

Has the minister received a joint request from the united fishermen and allied workers' union, the British Columbia federation of fish and game clubs, the native brotherhood of British Columbia and the fishing vessel owners' association that commitments by the British Columbia Electric Company to maintain a sufficient flow of water for spawning purposes on the Cheakamus river be honoured? If so, what action has been taken to comply with this request?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): I would like to thank the hon. member for Comox-Alberni for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. The answer to the first part is yes.

With regard to the second part, as to the action which has been taken, I would advise that when I was in British Columbia recently I discussed this problem with the senior officials of the British Columbia Electric Company Limited and impressed them with the fact that the department would expect the company to maintain a sufficient flow of water below the dam for spawning salmon. Following my return to Ottawa this understanding was confirmed through an exchange of correspondence with the president of the British Columbia Electric Company Limited.

LAMPREY EELS—STATEMENT AS TO USE OF POISONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): I would like to take this opportunity to reply to a question asked on Friday last by the hon. member for Port Arthur. The hon. member asked whether I had any recent information on the effectiveness of poisons and plans to use them against the lamprey eel in inland waters, especially in lake Superior.

This is a rather involved and long answer, Mr. Speaker, and I understood on Friday you suggested that it should be put on the order paper; so might I ask that it be made an order for return.

Mr. Speaker: The Clerk has informed me that the proper method of dealing with the suggestion of the Minister of Fisheries would be for the house to consent to have the answer printed in Hansard. Is that agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. W. A. Tucker (Rosthern): I understood, Mr. Speaker, that that was the understanding in regard to the question I asked of the Minister of Trade and Commerce; that the answer would be given in the same way.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: That is correct. That is the proper procedure, and I am sure the house will accept it for both answers.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

HOSPITAL INSURANCE—OPPORTUNITY FOR DISCUSSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Prime Minister if he might clarify today or at some early date the extent to which the provinces will be given the opportunity at the conference between the federal government and the provinces on November 25 next to discuss with the federal government the matter of hospital insurance.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): There is no clarification required, Mr. Speaker. If the representatives of the provinces wish to discuss hospital insurance they will certainly have every opportunity to do so.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Prime Minister. Will the federal government not take the initiative in discussing the hospital insurance question at the forthcoming conference so that something might be done to implement this legislation at an early date?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there is nothing whatsoever to prevent such implementation. There may be some matters requiring discussion; and if there are, at that conference everybody will be given the fullest opportunity, if the various prime ministers of the provinces so wish, to discuss these matters fully.

HOUSING

N.H.A.—STATEMENT AS TO POLICY AT KITIMAT, B.C.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): On November 11, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Howard) asked me this question:

Is the minister aware that the previous long-term policy of the Aluminum Company of Canada at Kitimat in granting second mortgages to its employees who buy houses under the authority of N.H.A. has been or might be discontinued?

Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation have contacted the company in Kitimat and have obtained this answer:

The company has not changed its policy of granting second mortgages to employees who wish to build or purchase a house in Kitimat financed with the facilities of the National Housing Act. Second mortgages will be granted to home owner employees for houses financed under the act during 1957.

Aluminum Company of Canada has not yet considered the housing needs of employees in 1958. It has been the custom of the company to determine the project for each year at the close of the preceding year. Consideration is now being given to the 1958 program. At present no change in policy relating to the granting of second mortgages is in contemplation.

[Mr. Tucker.]

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST THAT DATE BE FIXED FOR EXTERNAL AFFAIRS DEBATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the seriousness of the international situation, and in view of his own indication that there should be a discussion of international affairs in this house before long, can he say whether arrangements will be made to have such a discussion early next week?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is no intention to set aside any day of next week specifically for this purpose. However, there will be an opportunity to discuss this subject on the supply motion which will be moved on Monday. We have several other matters of legislation which we believe require early attention. Then when the new Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Smith) comes into this house the matter will receive attention and a date will be fixed.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, November 12, consideration of the motion of Mr. A. R. Smith (Calgary South) for an address to Her Majesty the Queen in reply to her speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, during the time I occupied the floor of the house last evening I drew attention to the manner in which this parliament might find ways and means of obtaining money with which to pay for the benefits to Canadians envisaged in the program outlined by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker).

The house, I think, agreed with me and would now agree with me that Canada is fully able to render all those benefits physically possible. There is no doubt that we are able to produce all the goods and services which all Canadians would require in order to enjoy a high standard of living. Our problem, then, is to devise adequate means of turning Canada's physical possibilities into financial possibilities, to make what is physically possible, financially possible. This task should not be too difficult if we bear in mind that a dollar bill is only a ticket, a ticket to goods and services; that it is only a claim, much as a theatre ticket is a claim to a seat in a theatre. The Hudson's Bay Company made-beaver was a token standing for or representing the skin of an adult male beaver in prime condition. The made-beaver token was worth, or would be a token to or a claim to any goods or services in western Canada in those days to the value of such a beaver skin.

Our word "pecuniary" is derived from the Latin word "pecus" meaning cattle. Presumably, in the far-away days of Latin history, Latin men used for money a token, ticket or tag made of leather and most likely representing or backed by the cow.

The question arises: who is to create the tickets to the goods and services in a community? I took the position that the government of that community ought to have and exercise that power and function. I pointed out that our fathers of confederation placed in the British North America Act provisions giving the parliament of Canada the power to create Canadian dollars. I pointed out also that parliament began to provide for the assumption and exercise of that power when it passed the Dominion Notes Act of 1868 granting the dominion minister of finance the power to create Canada's dollars in accordance with certain conditions. I briefly sketched the historical development of that act through the years down to the passage of the Finance Act of 1914, in virtue of which the minister of finance had the right to create dominion notes backed by any one of several different kinds of securities, including dominion bonds. This was a very definite step forward. I discussed the question of what makes money funny and what makes money sound.

Let me ask the question now: a dominion one dollar note created by Canada's finance minister with twenty-five cents worth of gold behind it, created and lent to one of the chartered banks of Canada—was that dollar note sound, or funny? And why? A one dollar dominion note similarly created and lent to a bank by Canada's finance minister under the Finance Act of 1914 but backed by a Dominion of Canada bond—was that dollar sound, and why?

Or one of the 16 million dollars created under the Finance Act of 1914 by the minister of finance, backed by only railway securities and spent into circulation rather than lent, that is spent for government purposes. Was that sound, or not? Or, finally, was one of the 10 million one dollar dominion notes created by the minister of finance under the Finance Act of 1914 with no backing at all except the credit of Canada, that is Canada's ability to deliver goods and services where, when and as required, the notes being spent into circulation—was that note sound or not?

The answer would be that each of these notes was sound, provided there were enough goods and services in Canadian markets to absorb that note without causing a scarcity of goods accompanied by a rise in price resulting from that scarcity of goods.

Now it is most important, Mr. Speaker, that we should divest ourselves of one of the most erroneous concepts which has grown up during the last few years, namely that inflation is just a rise in price. In actual fact, inflation is a rise in price resulting from a scarcity of goods.

In chapter IV of the royal commission on banking and currency for Canada, Lord Macmillan and Sir Charles Addis, the two commissioners representing certain big interests in the city of London, England—which is a most important thing for Canadians to recognize—made statements and conclusions to justify themselves in criticizing the Finance Acts of 1914 and 1923 as being deficient and inadequate, and for recommending the setting up in Canada of a central bank, the Bank of Canada.

The two main Canadian members of the commission, Sir Thomas White and Mr. Beaudry Leman, strongly and firmly disagreed with the two big interests men from the city of London, England. Sir Thomas White expressed his opinion in a masterfully reasoned and emphatically worded memorandum of dissent from that part of the report which is recorded in paragraphs 141 to 148 inclusive of the report, dealing with bank deposits in Canada under the finance acts of 1914 and 1923, this first of Sir Thomas White's memoranda appearing on page 83 of the report.

Sir Thomas White submitted an even more comprehensive and unanswerable memorandum of dissent as regards the finance acts of 1914 and 1923, setting forth convincing evidence of their unexcelled success in financing the Canadian economy from August 1914 through world war 1, through the reconstruction period and through the depression down to October 3, 1933, the date of the handing in of his memorandum. This memorandum is found at pages 85 to 91 of the report. Mr. Beaudry Leman, the other main Canadian commissioner, also wrote a vigorous memorandum of dissent from certain of the London men's arguments and conclusions in the main report. Mr. Leman's memorandum dated September 27, 1933, appears at pages 95 to 97 of the report.

Who was Sir Thomas White? Sir Thomas White was the Canadian minister of finance during world war I. He was the minister who introduced the Finance Act of 1914. He was the finance minister who administrated the act all throughout world war I as a member of a Conservative government, and then as a member of the Union government he administered the Finance Act of 1914 through the trying reconstruction period. During the course of his lifetime Sir Thomas White served as (1) vice-president of the Bank of Commerce, (2) director of the Canada Life Assurance Company, (3) director of the National Trust Company, and (4) director of the Steel Company of Canada. Such a man ought to be worthy of attention when speaking of matters pertaining to finance. Mentioning, as recorded on page 89 of the report, such financial problems as "refunding our outstanding loans", "the flotation of new issues, whether in Canada or elsewhere", "the sale of treasury bills", "the management of an exchange stabilization fund", "reducing unemployment", and "raising the domestic price level through monetary action"; at page 89 of the report Sir Thomas White follows with these words:

> In the solution of all these problems it is my belief that the existing banking system of Canada supplemented by the provisions of the Finance Act, affords the government a much more efficient instrument than that system controlled and regulated by a newly-created central bank, independent, in theory at least, even of the government of the day.

And who was Beaudry Leman? Mr. Leman held the degrees of B.Sc., C.E., and D.C.Sc. During the course of his life he served as (1) president and managing director of Banque Canadienne Nationale, Montreal, (2) vice-president of General Trust of Canada, (3) vice-president of Credit Foncier Franco-Canadien, and (4) director of (a) Fairchild Aircraft Ltd., (b) Montreal Tramways Company, (c) Ogilvie Flour Mills Company, (d) Provincial Transport Company, (e) Napierville Junction Railway Company, (f) Consolidated Bakeries of Canada Limited, (g) Shawinigan Water and Power Company, (h) Delaware and Hudson Railroad Corporation and (i) Allied War Supplies Corporation. He was 55 years of age at the time of the writing of his memorandum.

Such were the two men whom Canada put upon the royal commission. Such were the two commissioners whose opinions and emphatic protests the two big interests men from the city of London, England, so cavalierly disregarded, perhaps because Mr. Beaudry Leman in his memorandum of dissent set forth six cogent and well-supported reasons against establishing a central bank in Canada. In each of the fourth, fifth and sixth of these reasons he clearly indicates his feeling that the decisive power over Canada's financial system should reside unchallengeably in the hands of the parliament of Canada, much, no doubt, as it did in 1933 when the treasury board consisted of the minister of finance and five other ministers nominated by the governor in council, those ministers at that time being the minister of trade and commerce, the minister of railways and canals, the minister of national revenue, the minister of marine and the minister of justice with the deputy minister of finance serving as secretary. See the report, paragraph 136.

Neither Sir Thomas White nor Mr. Beaudry Leman expressed any doubt about the soundness of the $10 million issue unbacked to be spent into circulation, or the $16 million issue against railway securities to be spent into circulation, or the $50 million issue backed by imperial treasury bills issued to be spent into circulation. These two authorities, therefore, apparently believed that dollars issued by the minister of finance to be spent into circulation, not lent, had their place in the Canadian economy and that such issues when spent scientifically would be sound. This, Mr. Speaker, is exactly the attitude of Social Crediters.

May I just point out to the all-wise gentleman who wrote that editorial in the Financial Post of October 26, 1957, against Mr. Low and Mr. Aberhart, the kind of authorities he has backed right into; and if he feels he is in a position to question the opinion of Sir Thomas White and Mr. Beaudry Leman, I can only say he has a great deal more conceit than an ordinary man needs.

If a Social Credit government were in power in Ottawa the minister of finance would open his attack upon the problem of unemployment, the problem of surpluses and the problem of the shortage of purchasing power in the hands of consumers by, first, paying a certain scientifically calculated percentage of the price of goods and services as they enter into consumption thereby paying the sellers for granting the consumer a discount—such discount being called by Social Crediters a "compensated discount"—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member but his time has expired.

Mr. Blackmore: May I just finish this sentence, Mr. Speaker? And such discount constituting part of the just price mechanism advocated by Social Crediters, the net result of which discount brings down the price of goods rather than allowing them to go up and consequently is diametrically opposed to inflation.

Mr. Habel: A rather long sentence.

Mr. L. R. Crouse (Queens-Lunenburg): Mr. Speaker, now that the opportunity is offered me to take part in this debate, and speaking for the first time in this house, I should like to join with those who have preceded me, if I am not too late, in paying my compliments to you, sir, upon your elevation to the highest office within the gift of the House of Commons. I listened with much interest to the approval given your appointment by the leaders and members of all parties in this chamber and I feel you have already given ample evidence of your willingness and ability to discharge the duties of your high office with dignity and dispatch and to the satisfaction of all hon. members.

I have listened with interest to the hon. members who have participated in this debate, both the new members and the old veterans, and one cannot help but feel he is among orators. I also cannot help but feel that many hon. members have had considerable experience in public speaking due to their training as lawyers or professors and speaking as a businessman—and I am sure every businessman in this house will agree—I would point out that we are not usually famous as orators nor do we rise to such great heights of oratory.

At this point, Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. MacLean) upon his appointment. In my opinion this was a very wise choice and is clearly justifiable for we in the Atlantic provinces produce more fish than is produced anywhere else in Canada.

I have the honour to represent the constituency of Queens-Lunenburg. It is a constituency that has long been represented by a member seated on the side of the government in power and I am pleased that this precedent was not broken after the election of June 10. By the way, I would like to thank the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) as well as the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) who were kind enough, at great personal inconvenience and expense, to come to Nova Scotia and speak in my riding during the past election. They were of considerable help in my election. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate made the prediction that it would be a political miracle if a Conservative member were elected in Queens-Lunenburg and more so if a Conservative government were elected to power. As a prophet he has not gained many followers in Queens-Lunenburg. Unfortunately he is not in his seat, but I am pleased to see that he has lived to see that his prophecy did not come true.

If Canadians were to choose a fishing capital for their country, the very likely choice would be the town of Lunenburg in Nova Scotia. Lunenburg would deserve this honour on several counts. In the days of sail she was the home of the largest deep sea fishing fleet in North America. Her name on the taffrails of the fleet ranked for 100 years with Gloucester and Boston. Her ships were in every Atlantic fishing port and on every foggy fishing bank. Her ships traded in every port from Labrador to the West Indies. Today a large number of deep sea fishing draggers still operate from her harbour.

For generations her people have had the reputation of being sincere, industrious and hard working. They are known throughout Canada as seafaring, God fearing people who derive most of their living directly from the sea. Others derive a living from those industries associated with fishing such as fish curing, fish packing, oar and block shops, shipbuilding and ship refitting. Some are engaged in manufacturing, which was carried out in a small way and which flourished during the past war. As a matter of fact, in my riding there are several firms which build and equip gasoline engines for sale to the local fishermen. Mixed farming is also carried out in my constituency, with the concentration heaviest in the Bridgewater district. We also have lumbering, the shipping of pit props and in Queens county the heavy concentration of pulp cutting provides a steady income for many people.

I mention these facts so that you will see that my constituency represents a fair cross-section of Canadians, and I think it is significant that these people saw fit to reject the representative from the former administration and elect a member to support the present Conservative government. Members of the former government have found it difficult to find reasons why this change was made and they have searched for the reason on the floor of the house. They were on the right hand of the Speaker so long that they cannot seem to adjust to being on the left, and they were certainly left on June 10.

It is for this reason that I have attempted to give you the background of my people. They are all hard working, thrifty, rugged individualists who abhor waste of any kind. They could never understand why such large sums were expended on the approaches at Port Aux Basques, Newfoundland, for the ferry, William Carson, or why the development branch of the Department of Fisheries spent from 1954 to 1956-57 a total of $817,-440 for a pilot fish-drying plant in Valleyfield, Newfoundland, which was in effect in competition with Nova Scotia plants established by private capital. Nor could they understand the delay and expense in establishing the Bluenose ferry service and its construction outside of Nova Scotia, a province famous for generations as shipbuilders, and why it was berthed in the United States over night rather than at Yarmouth, Nova Scotia. It was bought with the Canadian taxpayers' money and it was felt that any industry accumulating from this operation should accumulate to the benefit of Canadians. It was felt that these items and the indifferent attitude to costs generally taken by the former government contributed to the inflation which was creeping throughout Canada. To these thrifty people inflation meant a lowering in value of their hard earned income and their savings, and so a change in government was inevitable.

May I express a further thought on inflation and our many problems. When the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate spoke yesterday he questioned what the government was doing about these many problems and, in fact, we hear many hon. members on the other side of the house question when we intend to implement our election promises. Well, Mr. Speaker, I would remind the opposition that we inherited a rather leaky ship of state from the Liberal government. When the leaks became apparent, the ship was passed over to us by the Canadian people. All Nova Scotians know that when you secure a 22-year-old ship that did not receive the best of care it must first be hauled out, the barnacles removed, the worm holes plugged, then scraped clean, caulked and painted. Next the rust and corruption of 22 years must be pounded free throughout the whole ship and the engines and rigging must be given a thorough overhaul. Finally, a new captain and crew must be instructed in its operation.

All this is necessary before a voyage is planned and, depending on the condition of the ship, will take from six months to a year. I am sure the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate realizes this is true for he owns a schooner. I submit to you, sir, that the Conservative government is in this position today and we have a major refit on our hands in this Canadian ship of state. In the meantime we are effecting some emergency repairs and in due course I am sure the government will arrange a suitable voyage for everyone.

There is no doubt in my mind that the present government is doing the best it can at this time. I see no evidence in any department that they are not trying to do a good job, and as elected representatives of the various constituencies it is our responsibility to assist the government in every possible way.

With this thought in mind, I should like to say a word at this time about our merchant marine. Engraved in stone over the main entrance to the parliament buildings are these words:

> The wholesome sea is at her gates,
> Her gates both East and West.

At this, our inland capital, these words serve to remind those who make the laws of this great nation that their community begins at the sea and grows and prospers as seafaring men in ships carry its commerce. Behind the seamen, giving them the tools of their trade, are the shipyards turning the inanimate products of the forests, mines and factories into the ships that keep business moving and growing.

For more than two centuries the commercial shipyards of this country have been sending out ships able to withstand the buffetting of the seven seas or designed with skill to meet the special needs of shippers in Canada's inland and coastal waters. The building and repairing of ships is the oldest of Canada's manufacturing industries. Canada's present-day shipbuilders have moved in step with changing and exacting demands of a mechanized age and are producing steam-powered ships, oil burners, giant tankers, diesel fishing trawlers and rugged icebreakers to penetrate northern waters as Canada pushes back her last frontier.

However, since the end of world war II shipping circles in the maritime countries have been watching with apprehension the increasing amount of merchant tonnage registered in Panama, Liberia, Honduras and Costa Rica, countries which hitherto had no interest in shipping matters. The reason for this attention is that all concerned know that ships registered in these countries are operated virtually tax free. The governments concerned give neither supervision, control nor regulation to the ships. The owners are not nationals of and have no connection with the country of registration. The crews are non-nationals of the registering country. There are no collective agreements providing minimum crew wages or working conditions in these countries. There are no labour relations providing safeguards for crew members. In fact, almost everything most valued in traditionally maritime countries is absent.

The combination of all these factors brings about the situation that ships so registered are a menace to the traditional merchant navies, the national economies of traditionally maritime countries, international maritime standards and seafarers national wage levels and working conditions.

Because of their tax-free and almost total lack of government supervision they are given trade advantages over the ships of maritime countries. At the end of 1956, there were 1,420 ships registered in Liberia, Panama, Costa Rica and Honduras, with a total tonnage of 11,305,000 tons, which represents 11.5 per cent of the world tonnage. The increase in 1957 looks as if it will be more than 2 million tons. In fact, 20 per cent of the world's new shipping presently building is for these flags.

Because these registered ships carry such a large proportion of the world's cargoes the result is a reduction in net shipping earnings in the maritime countries. If national merchant navies are to be preserved, let alone expanded, the matter should be dealt with on diplomatic and legislative levels. The governments which are members of NATO should give support to the calling of a conference of the representative countries for the purpose of convincing these governments that their present negative attitude or open encouragement of these policies is unfair and harmful to all. Such policies, therefore, should be terminated.

We have spent large sums, over $300 million, of the Canadian taxpayers' money to provide the St. Lawrence seaway. Was this to provide a water route for foreign shipping only? I think not, Mr. Speaker. We have the shipyards and the men and during the war our merchant navy was counted as the fourth arm of the service but in spite of this our merchant navy has dwindled to ten ships. In my constituency, and throughout Nova Scotia, a large number of people make their living by building and repairing ships of all kinds, steel as well as wood. Today we see our fish drying flakes rotting along our shores. Is this to be the fate of our shipyards?

Let us examine the problem. No one will deny that we build the finest ships in Nova Scotia, comparable to the ships built anywhere in the world. Our seamen are unsurpassed by any that ever stood a watch. In 1789 when one of the oldest companies in Canada, Zwicker and Company of Lunenburg, were starting in business, and in the years that immediately followed, Canadians built the ships that caught the fish; built and manned the ships that delivered our fish and lumber to foreign markets, and at wages comparable with the earnings in other industries.

Then, a gradual change took place. The unions took over the affairs of the labouring classes including those of the seamen on cargo carriers. A debatable hourly wage was instituted, certain regulations pertaining to shipping were passed, and all of these things were upheld by the government. Today, as a result of these regulations and the high wages demanded because of our high living standards, we are unable to maintain our own fleet of cargo carriers and must depend on foreign shipping to carry our commerce.

What of the men in Nova Scotia, and throughout Canada, who like to work at shipbuilding? What of the men who love the sea, who love to roam her vast expanses in preference to a job ashore? Are we to destine them to a landlubber's life because this nation is not maritime minded enough to provide them with a ship which will carry the products of our own industries? Look at our Canadian coastline and envisage the possibility of trade on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. I believe you will agree that it is way past the time when this matter can be ignored. It is a time for action, for sober thought, in regard to the future of our merchant fleet and seamen.

Few Canadians know that, in the days of wooden ships and iron men, Nova Scotia had more shipping per capita than any country in the world. It was the ambition of every Nova Scotia boy to become a sea captain. Many of them did and seven became admirals. Nova Scotia sent her best men to the sea as privateers, as traders, as fishermen and the sea gave up her riches to this maritime province. Nova Scotia seamen were great because they knew their craft. They not only sailed their ships but built them. They knew every stick of wood, every square inch of canvas that went into them. Today, the only impetus to maritime shipbuilding is in the realm of building pleasure craft. In the event of another war, the Royal Canadian Navy will have to call again on the merchant navy for trained personnel.

From the viewpoint of the Atlantic provinces, it is of the utmost importance to our economy that trade with the British West Indies be improved, and to carry that trade a larger, more modern and better equipped fleet than we have at present is required. It is hoped that Canada will, in the future, import more citrus juices from the West Indies. This will provide the West Indies with more Canadian dollars with which to buy our fish and wheat. In my opinion, in order to re-establish a Canadian merchant marine it is necessary for Canada to form a definite marine policy under which owners are protected from foreign shipping. I suggest that action be taken by the government at the earliest possible date to enunciate their policy.

At this time I should like to say a few words about the tourist industry in Nova Scotia. Many of our citizens depend upon this industry for a livehood, and the industry received a boost when the Bluenose inaugurated a ferry service. It is a matter of great concern to many Nova Scotians, however, that this ferry is incapable of handling all the tourists who desire to visit the province from that great nation to the south of us. I would suggest that to alleviate this situation a further ferry service be instituted between Boston and, perhaps, Liverpool or Shelburne, Nova Scotia. These ports are two of the finest on the eastern seaboard and are unequalled as all-weather, deep water ports at which docking facilities are established. This further service would provide an alternate route for the convenience of the travelling public and Liverpool, known years ago as the privateer capital of the world, would welcome this new industry. I should like to impress upon this government the need for giving this matter every consideration.

The establishment of a national park area along the south shore of Nova Scotia would be of further interest to the tourist. I would propose something similar to the park on the north shore of Prince Edward Island, in an area lying between Liverpool and Cape Sable island. Beautiful sand beaches, suitable for salt water bathing, abound in this section and the inland lakes and rivers of Queens county provide opportunities for the finest of trout and salmon fishing. I believe the establishment of a national park in this area would be, not only valuable as a tourist attraction but would provide an ideal vacation spot for native Nova Scotians. In the event of a nuclear war, these national parks would be invaluable. People in thickly settled areas could be evacuated to these camp sites where water and sewage facilities are provided. Because of their location these facilities would not likely be contaminated by fall-out so I would urge the government to give some thought to this proposal.

The speech from the throne offered much comfort to our senior citizens, to the blind and disabled persons. Those worthy citizens, the war veterans, were not forgotten and the scale of their allowances is to be increased. Farmers can look forward to legislation guaranteeing greater stability in the prices of their products and the government is pledged to strive to secure additional markets for the products of our fisheries. This will be of great interest to my constituency for fishing is the real basis of our existence in Queens-Lunenburg. Most of our industry and enterprise is allied with fishing, directly or indirectly.

In the past few years great strides have been made in modernizing fishing methods and in improving the manner of marketing fish. The development of cold storage facilities throughout the country has helped distribution and has helped bring delicacies of the sea to those inland cities which, otherwise, could not enjoy our fine seafoods. The modernization of our fishing fleet has been gradual over the years. Very few of our graceful deepsea salt fishing bankers, which helped make the industry famous, are left. The memory of these ships has been perpetuated by a replica of the schooner Bluenose on the back of the Canadian 10-cent piece. This vessel should have, and could have, been preserved by a more thoughtful government.

Today we see a new and different fleet made up of diesel-powered long liners, sword fishermen, scallop draggers and ground fish draggers, ranging in size from 55 feet to 65 feet in length. It is true that we have some deepsea trawlers ranging up to 115 feet in length, but the majority of the fleet today is made up of smaller ships, individually owned or owned by groups of fishermen.

With the increased growth of this fleet, a definite need arose for a protection service or a coast guard. This request was made of the former Liberal administration and it was ignored. It was ignored because apparently no members of the former administration have spent any time at sea, as I have. They were unaware of the need and did nothing for the maritime fishermen. Needless to say, at election time the maritime fishermen did nothing for the Liberal candidates, as evidenced by the large number of members from the Atlantic area.

During the past summer two specific events occurred on our eastern seaboard which outlined the need of a coastguard. The Jean and Edith captained by Mr. William Evans, is a 65-foot fishing dragger, fishing out of Sydney, Nova Scotia. This ship broke down on the grand banks off Newfoundland and radioed for assistance. Unfortunately no one was listening and, as the winds blew and the seas rose higher, it looked as if this was the end. Fortunately, however, our United States friends have a coastguard stationed at Argentia, Newfoundland, and just when it appeared as if all was lost they found the small dragger and towed it to Newfoundland.

Later in the summer the Alfred D., a 65-foot fishing dragger, also broke down on the grand banks. When it appeared as if no one would rescue them, Captain Bernard Tanner, by a stroke of good luck, heard their call for assistance, and though he has only a 65-foot dragger, he towed the Alfred D. 400 miles to port.

If we abolished the 12-mile fishing limit, and used the present ships engaged in fisheries protective work, we would have the nucleus of a Canadian coastguard without any additional cost to the taxpayer. I would impress upon this government the definite need of a Canadian coastguard, and urge it to consider establishing this service at the earliest possible date.

I listened with much interest some weeks ago to the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) when he referred to the prices received for fish some 20 years ago. I should like to remind this house that there has been little change between then and the present time. In fact, the price of fish in Nova Scotia has been more stable than has the Canadian dollar. The cost of living index shows that it has decreased considerably in value during the past 10 years, but we receive almost as much today for codfish as we received 10 years ago.

In 1947 the cost of constructing a 100-foot fishing dragger was $140,000 and codfish was selling to the wholesalers at 3½ cents a pound by fishermen. Today a dragger of 100 feet will cost $280,000 and codfish are worth 3¼ cents a pound, according to the press of Thursday, November 7.

There is no clearer evidence of the inflation that has spread throughout Canada, and the neglect and disregard of the fishing industry in the last 10 years under a Liberal administration with regard to costs. Unfortunately the price of fish did not rise in proportion with the costs of the ship, and the fishermen are today faced with these higher costs, not only for the ship but also for oil, rope, paint, fishing nets, refits and in fact everything connected with the fisheries operation.

It is clear that the fishermen do not need subsidies or assistance from the government. What they need is a fairer price for their landed product in relation to their increased costs. Clearly the time has come for governments, both federal and provincial, to direct their efforts and funds to the encouragement of greater fish consumption. In addition, I would urge the present government to add to its investigation program and investigate the prices and the spread in prices paid to Canadian fishermen, in comparison with their United States counterparts, with a view to improving the economic lot of the fishermen of Canada.

We have had a strange event happen this week. There have been rumours to the effect that an investigation into the primary prices of fish was to be carried out and on Monday an announcement was made in the local press that prices paid to the fishermen in the maritime provinces would increase by 20 per cent. At a time when all other commodities were advancing in price the prices paid to the fishermen remained static or declined. Now when other products are levelling off or declining we are advised by the manipulators in the fishing business that they are advancing the prices paid to the primary producers by 20 per cent. To those fishermen who were told that they would have to tie their boats to the dock, to the workers in the fish plants who were told that there would be no employment for them if they voted for a Conservative government, this will be extremely welcome news and certainly a contradiction of what they had heard prior to June 10.

I have listened with interest to hon. members on both sides of this house, representing constituencies in the west discuss the problem of wheat. I have never been to the west but I should like to remind hon. members, after listening to the many discussions, that this is a problem of abundance, of God's bounty. There is a biblical reference that in another time it was decided to tear down the barns and build greater. We have done just that in Canada, Mr. Speaker, and today there is much soul-searching to sell this wheat. We have no similar glut of fish on the eastern coast for the product of our primary producers is sold in the open market at a price which the public are willing to pay. This simple expedient was apparently never recently applied to the product wheat which has a value set by the government. We hear of the injustices to the western farmer, but he is still allowed to plant his crop.

Consider the attitude of the former Liberal government with regard to the Canadian fishermen. Our fishermen had to remain outside a limit of 12 miles from the Canadian coastline, while fishermen of every other nation were allowed to fish within three miles of the Canadian headland, and to fish on our prolific inshore banks. Further, if one of our Canadian fishing draggers were caught fishing within the 12-mile limit, a $500 fine was imposed. Yes, Mr. Speaker, there was little doubt in the minds of Canada's fishermen that it was time for a change. I would impress upon this government the need of reviewing the 12-mile fishing limit.

In closing, I think it is only fair to say that the people of Queens-Lunenburg look forward to the future with new hope under the present government. I am certain that their requests, which have always been modest, will be given every consideration and that we will advance along with the whole Atlantic area and enjoy under this administration a fairer share of the national economy.

Hon. Jean Lesage (Montmagny-L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, my first words will be to compliment Mr. Speaker on his election to his high office. His legal and parliamentary experience and knowledge, his urbanity and affability commend him to the unanimous choice of this house.

(Translation):

Mr. Deputy Speaker, I want to take this opportunity, while you are occupying the chair, to congratulate you on your appointment to this significant post and to assure you of our conviction that you will guide the debates in this house with justice, fairness and impartiality.

(Text):

I wish also to congratulate the mover and the seconder of the address. They have given a good account of their ability despite the poorness of the material with which they had to deal.

I have read the speech from the throne a number of times with great attention. I have even tried to read between the lines. However, I must confess, Mr. Speaker, that I have failed to see in it the great things which hon. members opposite have talked about in such glowing terms. The first half of the speech from the throne is devoted to Canadian nationhood, Commonwealth solidarity, the Colombo plan, the North Atlantic Treaty Organization and the United Nations. On these subjects we all agree and there is nothing new in what has been said. As a matter of fact, there is not even the suggestion of a new approach.

Then the speech from the throne goes on with the somewhat trite statement:

> . . . my ministers look forward to meeting next month with the leaders of the provincial governments in order to discuss fiscal relations.

Well, despite the importance of the subject and the pledges given by the Prime Minister during the election, we have in this debate heard not one word from the cabinet about the policy of the government in that field. Moreover, it is clear from the answers we have received since the beginning of this session that the government has no set policy nor is it preparing any proposals which it could lay before the conference.

It seems to me that serious study of these grave problems—and I am very sorry I have come to hold this belief—is as far away from the minds of the ministers as electioneering and partisan politics are ever-near and ever-present. It looks as if the cabinet will be as far from ready for this federal-provincial conference as the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) was for the Mont Tremblant conference. It is clear from the letter addressed by the Prime Minister to the premiers of the provinces on October 31 that the government is merely preparing the physical arrangements for a conference, the only accomplishment of which will be to prepare for another conference.

Then the speech from the throne mentions a bill providing for vacations with pay for workers under federal jurisdiction. We know now that the provisions of the bill do not satisfy labour completely. The speech also expresses the pious hope that new markets will be found for our fisheries and agricultural products, but since June there have been no signs that this hope will be realized.

The speech from the throne also mentions legislation to provide greater stability in the prices of farm products. I suppose this legislation will follow the resolution which is on the order paper. A careful reading of that resolution tends to show, having in mind the constitutional limitations of parliament, that it means nothing more than the continuance of the policy of price support. It looks like the same policy with a different setup and a more costly and cumbersome administration. After all, if you will allow me, Mr. Speaker, to translate from the French this addition of $50 million to the revolving fund is nothing but "powder in the eyes" of the public.

Leaving aside for the moment the paragraph on national development and the subparagraphs on cheaper power for the Atlantic provinces, and the South Saskatchewan dam and the development of the Columbia river to which I will come later, what is left of the speech from the throne? The government is increasing its assistance to wheat growers and to the recipients of social security payments according to policies which have been developed by the Liberals; with the difference of course which I mentioned the other day that there is no increase for the recipients of family allowances in spite of the promises made by the Tories in Quebec during the last electoral campaign.

Oh, it is so very easy indeed to increase public expenditures, especially when no consideration is given to its possible detrimental economic effects or to the additional taxation it might involve. It was because of the inflationary pressures existing at the time, which still exist to some extent, that the previous administration did not feel it could do more than it did in those fields when it had the responsibility of office. However, the fact that the present government has seen fit to provide these additional benefits does not give it the right to act as if it had initiated all the policies under which the benefits are made available and to present itself—as did the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) the other day—as the only defender of the little people of Canada. Oh, it is quite easy to act quickly when the only thing which is involved is the increasing of the amount of benefits and assistance within the framework of already existing Liberal policies.

I am glad to see that the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton) is in the house because I now wish to come to the point made in the speech from the throne with respect to a national development policy. As was to be expected, that policy is not defined in the speech from the throne, nor was it defined or explained by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) when he referred to it in this debate on October 15. I have gone through the discourses of the Prime Minister and those of his predecessor as leader of the Conservative party in this house with reference to this subject during the past years, but I have not been able to find any definition of a national development policy or plan. On October 24 of this year I asked the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources if it was his intention to outline to the house the famous national development policy or plan which the Conservatives had been talking about for years. As I expected, I received no answer. Anyway, it is usual to receive no answer from the minister. The only logical conclusion to which we can come is that this government has no national development plan or policy in mind.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Nonsense.

Mr. Lesage: Well, I hope the parliamentary assistant, instead of interrupting with remarks like "nonsense"—which might easily apply to him—will rise during this debate and, if he is so good and so well informed, will give to this house an explanation outlining this famous national development policy of the Conservative party. I challenge him to do so.

As a matter of fact what does the speech from the throne mention and what did the Prime Minister mention in his speech on national development? He merely mentioned the creation of facilities for the production and transmission of cheaper electric power to the Atlantic provinces, assistance in the financing of Beechwood, discussion with Saskatchewan on the South Saskatchewan dam and discussions with the United States government on the development of the Columbia river. Most of these things are not new. They certainly cannot be presented as constituting a national development policy.

After all, a national policy must be precise in scope. It requires principles and methods, and it has to be made available to all regions of Canada. There is nothing of the sort in the government proposals for those things I have just mentioned. Moreover, the democratic way in which to initiate a national policy in any field is for the government to spell it out in a special piece of legislation and submit it to this parliament. But the government is content with promises; it has become accustomed to that since the last electoral campaign.

The first promise is about the creation of facilities for the production and transmission of cheaper electric power in the Atlantic provinces. This is, after all, only a continuation of the policy which was announced in this house by Mr. Harris, the former minister of finance, on March 14 last, and detailed by myself on April 9. However, since October 14 it has become obvious that whatever is intended by hon. gentlemen opposite is not for the Atlantic provinces, but only for Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

Then I understand that the government intends to initiate new discussions with the government of Saskatchewan with regard to the South Saskatchewan dam. The previous government had such discussions, but they were not successful. If the present government can come to reasonable terms with the government of Saskatchewan, so much the better, but after the answers the Prime Minister gave in this house last week I am afraid it will take a long time, even more time than the present administration will have at its disposal.

Finally, the speech from the throne says, and I quote:

> My ministers are pressing for a favourable settlement of international problems in connection with the Columbia river.

I am astonished that any government should have the nerve to put into Her Majesty's mouth words which have so little relation to the truth. After the questions I put in the house to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources on April 22 and 24, it is obvious that there has been no discussion with the United States authorities on the subject since I led a delegation to Washington on May 20 last. Nothing has been done in this field, as nothing has been done in other fields by this government of words and promises, even on such an important matter as this, and the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources should know it by this time.

I should like to turn now to vital matters which are not mentioned in the speech from the throne. In several of the fields in which we have grave problems what we find is government by postponement. Yes, sir, government by postponement. Instead of facing the issues and defining its own policy, the government calls conferences and appoints royal commissions. What is the policy of the government in the field of trade? It is a policy of conferences. The government has refined this technique to a point where we have conferences called for the specific purpose of organizing another conference. The government is so convinced of the merits of this new technique that it claims a great victory —I am thinking now, of the Minister of Finance—when it has succeeded in making the physical arrangements for another conference.

In the field of trade we know now that this 15 per cent policy is nothing but a monumental bluff. Michael Barkway has been quoted at length in this house by hon. members on this side, but I should like to put on Hansard a quotation from an article by Blair Fraser which appeared in the October 26 issue of Maclean's magazine. Writing about the attitude of the Minister of Finance at the conference held at Mont Tremblant, he had this to say, and I quote:

> Rightly or wrongly, everybody in the room was convinced that the reason he—
> The Minister of Finance
> —could not talk about Canada's proposals was that Canada had no proposals worth talking about.

And Mr. Fraser concluded his article with the following paragraph:

> Like the weavers in the old story of the emperor's new clothes, Fleming and his advisers had been working all summer on the fabric of this great Canadian idea, a commonwealth trade conference. And on the day of the big parade it was not the innocent voice of a child but the bland tones of a chancellor of the exchequer that set off the deadly cry: "The Emperor has no clothes on".

In point of fact, Mr. Speaker, the government is so busy preparing conferences that it has no time to prepare itself for those conferences.

In a more restricted field, what is the attitude of the government with respect to certain tariffs now protecting Canadian industries, such as the tariffs on textiles? The government has no policy, or, rather, it has decided to make a reference to the tariff board so that the board can supply a policy to the government. What about the problem of our economic relations with the United States? Here, again, no policy but a conference, where something or some one was fixed. As to who did the fixing, I believe what happened at the FAO meeting yesterday in Rome is revealing as to the intentions of the United States government with regard to the protection of Canadian trade.

When the Conservatives were in opposition they used to blame the Liberals for the low level of farm income and the spread between the retail prices of agricultural products and the receipts of farmers. Now that they are in power, what is their policy? Here again, they have no policy or, rather, the government has announced its intention to create a special committee of the house to investigate this problem, and we can infer from the Prime Minister's remarks in this house that once the committee has terminated its study a royal commission, a new Stevens commission, will be appointed to consider the work of the committee. Thus we have conferences to prepare other conferences, and royal commissions to study the reports of parliamentary committees. In the meantime, we have government by postponement. In this way the Conservative party hopes to hide from the Canadian people the fact that on major issues it has no policy.

In the field of energy, here, again, we have heard no policy announced by this government. We all know that the Gordon commission devoted a good deal of attention to this problem and will in its final report make specific recommendations which were anticipated in its preliminary report. Before knowing what will be the final recommendations of the Gordon commission in this respect, the government appoints a royal commission whose main purpose is to make an inquiry on the recommendations of another commission before these recommendations are presented in final form. This is what can be called quick action, but what about the wisdom of the action. Of course, everybody knows why this royal commission on energy was appointed; every one in Canada knows that it is to hide the fact that the Conservative party wants to continue the pipe-line policy initiated by the past Liberal government.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Shame.

Mr. Lesage: Yes, it is true.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Shame.

Mr. Lesage: That is why the royal commission on energy has been appointed. The Conservatives strongly criticized this policy of the past Liberal government and of course they do not dare admit publicly now the fact that they endorse the policy. What they wish to do is hide that policy of theirs behind a royal commission. They do not have the courage to admit they will have to follow our policy in this matter. They intend to escape their responsibility by appointing a royal commission.

Contrary to a well-established tradition—and this is remarkable, you know,—there is no reference this year in the speech from the throne to the current economic situation. It is the first time since I have been in this house that there has been no reference to the economic situation in the speech from the throne. This omission is certainly not justified by the absence of economic problems. It can only be explained again by the absence of government policy.

After all, at present we have both rising prices and rising unemployment. Unemployment is rising rapidly and I am sure it will attain new post-war heights during the coming winter. It is expected that there will be several hundred thousand unemployed during the coming months in Canada. What is the government doing about this situation? The government, through Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation, has made available an amount of $150 million in the form of loans in order to stimulate housing construction. This is not a new policy but the application of Liberal policy. This amount was always authorized in the act passed by parliament under a Liberal administration.

What else is the government doing to meet this situation? We have been told by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) that the government is concentrating its building program during the winter months. Here again is a policy initiated by the Liberals but at the same time there is evidence that the government in its endeavour to reduce over-all expenditures as promised during the election is cutting down its construction program, which of course will have an adverse effect on employment.

During recent months prices have risen continuously and in spite of what the Minister of Finance said on orders of the day prices have not ceased to climb. In the situation we are now facing rising unemployment and rising prices are not incompatible. Moreover, in the long run, despite what the Minister of Finance has said, the experts in the field of economics in the United States, the United Kingdom, Europe and Canada all agree that the great danger in the free world is still inflation.

What is the government doing to curb the so-called creeping inflation and to reduce inflationary pressures? Here again it has no policy. We have not heard a word from the Minister of Finance on this subject. However, the minister made a speech a few weeks ago in Montreal in which he made quite astonishing statements on the problem. In substance he said that the curbing of inflation was the responsibility of the individual citizen and he implied that anti-cyclical budgeting was an unwise policy. The minister surely knows that inflation is a collective phenomenon which feeds itself and develops into a spiral. There is very little that the individual citizen as such can do to prevent rising prices.

The Conservative government wants to appear as the party of the common man by increasing some of our social security payments but it still supports the good old reactionary fiscal policy of the Bennett regime which contributed so much to aggravate the depression of the 'thirties. Since the second world war all the democratic governments whether Conservative or Liberal, except the present Canadian government, have recognized that one of their primary responsibilities is to ensure a high and stable level of employment and income and that fiscal policy is one of the most effective weapons in the fight against unemployment and inflation. Surely the Minister of Finance knows that economic instability, whether it manifests itself in the form of unemployment or inflation, has its roots in the private sector of the economy and that a government whose policy it is, according to the Minister of Finance, to rely mainly on private initiative to eliminate those undesirable conditions is evading one of its basic democratic responsibilities. What we need at present is a positive and dynamic fiscal policy to cope with the present economic situation but the government is offering a negative policy based on the old fashioned and outmoded approach of Tory laissez-faire.

Absence of policy, Tory laissez-faire and government by postponement are the main characteristics of the present government. The Canadian people are still waiting for clear-cut policies on matters of national concern but the government is silent. We had an example of that today. The members of the cabinet have consistently refused to answer questions and to give information on important matters of policy to this house and to the people of Canada.

The reasons for this absence of policy and for refusing information are quite obvious when we hear the Prime Minister and the members of the cabinet mention the possibility of a general election. That is their refuge whenever they are reminded from this side of the house of their lack of policy. The Prime Minister would like the people of Canada to believe that the dissolution of parliament would be an act of courage on his part.

On the contrary I maintain that in the present circumstances it would be a confession of failure. It would be an admission that his administration cannot cope with the problems it should face. It would be nothing less than a retreat from hard realities.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, having listened to the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage) for the last few minutes I am quite convinced that one of the prerequisites of a successful Liberal politician is to have an illimitable amount of gall. We have just heard a former cabinet minister asking the government to express its policy and while I think he has the right to ask for it and the right to expect it I would point out that during the years I have been in parliament I have never listened to a Liberal policy being expressed except what had been filched and stolen from other parties. Now that the Liberals are in opposition they still fail to express any policy because when the hon. member for Algoma East (Mr. Pearson) was asked the other day by a Tory what Liberal policy was with regard to a certain subject the hon. member for Algoma East said, "Our policy is to wait and see what your policy is". Thus we listen to Liberal and Conservative members batting nothing from one to the other.

I want to discuss today certain aspects of Liberal policy in the past which have brought us as a nation to a very precarious situation at the present time. Three years ago I introduced this subject of the extent of United States domination over our economy, and in the last three years the situation has become appreciably worse. There are many sincere people in this country who are very worried about our capacity as a nation to survive. The more pessimistic have told me that within a predictable number of years this House of Commons will be the capital of another American state. I do not happen to share that pessimism but I do think that the situation today, from the point of view of Canadian independence, is extraordinarily serious, and it is this which I want to examine. On February 4, 1955, as found at page 855 of Hansard, I had this to say. It aroused the wrath of a good number of people but I am not taking back one word.

> Most of the foreign investment here is American, although quite a substantial part is European. And under certain conditions I welcome both. I welcome more European investment because I want to see greater diversity of investment in this country, rather than have us almost in thraldom to one country.
> But the significant thing is that when one looks at the financial structure of Canada one is struck by the small, the almost insignificant part which Canadian capital itself has played in the opening up of this country. When I think of the Canadian capitalist I think about what Robert Burns said about the mouse—the "tim'rous beastie". Unquestionably, when it comes to investment in their own country, Canadian capitalists are frightened, cowardly creatures depending always upon outsiders to do the job which they should be doing themselves. They are men without vision, men without confidence, men without any courage whatsoever. I think of what the future of Canada has for all of us, and then I realize that Canadian capitalism has abdicated in favour of the foreigners.

That situation has become even more apparent over the last few years. I repeat what I said about foreign investment. We need it in this country but in doses not so great that it threatens the independence of Canada. The speech I made at that time aroused the ire of Mr. Grant Dexter, one of the most respected members of the press gallery and one for whom I have a decided personal liking, although I must say he is constantly blinded by Liberal blinkers. He wrote in the Free Press:

> Suggestions that Canadian investors are timorous or that we are in danger of being enthralled or enslaved by foreign capitalists must be set down to socialist rhetoric. The truth is otherwise.

I am sure Mr. Dexter would be the first to admit today that the truth is not otherwise. I want to call one or two witnesses. The first is a most reliable one despite Mr. Dexter's concept. I mean the editor of the Financial Post. The Financial Post had this to say editorially a short while ago:

> Canada now finds itself with around 60 per cent of its industrial machine and a high percentage of its raw materials owned by foreign corporations. That means a great many of the big decisions affecting this nation and its people are made outside the country and the pace of foreign ownership is increasing.

When I am told that over 60 per cent of Canadian industry and very much more of Canadian raw materials are owned by foreign capitalists I wonder what is wrong with our own capitalists, and I accuse them, and rightly so, of cowardice in letting outsiders come in and do the job which they themselves should be doing. When I am told by the editor of the Financial Post that a great many of the big decisions affecting this country are made outside of it, then I adhere to my original words that we are living in a state of thraldom to a foreign country.

But there are other witnesses one can call. For instance, in the Canadian Journal of Economic and Political Science of November last year there was a most interesting article by two members of the dominion bureau of statistics, Messrs. C. D. Blyth and E. B. Carty, who have done some extraordinarily good work in the field of Canada's balance of payments. They had this to say:

> No other nation as highly industrialized as Canada has such a large proportion of industry controlled by non-resident concerns.

I am one of those who believe that where you have economic control ultimately you have political control, and when that is the situation then to say we are not in a state of thraldom is to talk nonsense. To take still another issue of the Financial Post, I find the following:

> That Canada should proceed through a decade of unparallelled boom and development, and find herself more than ever a hewer of wood and drawer of water, is a fact that is, to say the least, disturbing.

I, Mr. Speaker, find it alarming, for if we are hewers of wood and drawers of water it is not a matter of our own volition it is not a matter of our own free will. It is being imposed on us from outside, so how can we say that we are free? We are not. I object to this foreign domination but I do not blame the Americans one iota. They are playing the game as they know it under their free enterprise system. It is not the United States investor who is to blame. It is the Liberal government in past years which sold Canadians down the Hudson river. They are the ones who have got to take the responsibility.

In time to come the Tories may be faced with the same strictures but they are going to be given a chance to show in the meantime precisely what they can do. It is not as though the Liberal government had been ignorant of what was happening. They had been told by Mr. Coyne of the Bank of Canada and their other economic advisers that the effect of this foreign investment in Canada was to add fuel to the inflationary flames. They were told last year by Mr. Coyne that a billion dollars too much money was in our economic system and that therefore the effect of it would be inflationary.

What action did the Liberals take? They did nothing very much except to give us the free enterprise answer that if there is inflation it is the fault of these terrible workers who want increases in wages. But the workers of this country have every right to the highest possible standard of living they can secure and workers' wages always follow the cost of living and never precede it. Therefore when the workers come out for higher wages it is to meet a cost of living which has been brought about by the fiscal policy of one government or another.

The Liberal government knew that inflation was upon us and they knew how it was being caused because Mr. Coyne tells us in his report this year how it was being caused and he must have told the government last year how this was happening. On page 4 of Mr. Coyne's recent report he says:

> In Canada, the chief cause in inflationary pressures was a great increase in capital expenditures, a boom in investment, particularly business investment in resource development and in fixed assets, construction, and expansion of equipment. A significant part of the total, including many of the largest projects, arose from large foreign enterprises taking the lead in developing Canadian resources with a view to export of raw materials to the country of origin of the foreign enterprise.

I draw Mr. Dexter's attention to this again.

> A significant part of the total, including many of the largest projects, arose from large foreign enterprises taking the lead in developing Canadian resources—

Where were our Canadian entrepreneurs? Where were our Canadian capitalists that they had to let foreigners do the job for them? What was the effect of all this? The government of the day, the Liberals, suddenly became alarmed. They got certain advice from Mr. Coyne and Mr. Coyne tells us what it was on page 41 of his report. I disagree with this statement and I am going to make an amendment to it. Mr. Coyne says:

> In the circumstances of 1956, and in view of its statutory responsibilities, the central bank had no alternative but to restrain monetary and credit expansion since it was clear that any significant increase in the money supply would have added to inflationary pressures.

That is not a correct statement. One word is missed out and I am going to put it in.

> In the circumstances of 1956, and in view of its statutory responsibilities, the central bank had no alternative but to restrain Canadian monetary and credit expansion—

What the central bank did, and this was a matter of government policy, was to restrain Canadian business, to restrain Canadian enterprise, and it succeeded for a very obvious reason. Canadian business is dependent upon whatever money market there may be in Canada for its capital requirements and when these requirements are cut and whittled down then business and industry itself are cut and whittled down. Canadian industry was left flat on its back while United States industrial enterprises could expand as much as they liked, and again the reason for that is obvious. These United States dominated subsidiaries in this country have tremendous reserves of undistributed profits, great reserves for depreciation and other reserves which they can use for expansion.

If they run short of these reserves, all they have to do is go to their parents over the line and get some more money for expansion. The end result of Liberal policies in this country, therefore, has been a net increase of United States domination over Canadian industry at the expense of our own Canadian industry. The Liberals will not be allowed to forget that in a hurry so far as I am concerned. They have hurt Canadian industry and have given all the assistance, all the aid they possibly could to foreign industry to come in here and eventually assume the degree of control which I am going to point out.

Now, I mentioned before the names of two Canadian civil servants, Messrs. Carty and Blyth. We ought to be grateful to them for the work they have done in the annual statement of the Canadian balance of international payments. I want to quote some of the figures which they have given because they are worth considering. A study has been made which covers production and employment in manufacturing by United States controlled firms which have a Canadian investment of $1 million or more. It is worth noting that these companies represent about 90 per cent of the capital in all United States controlled manufacturing companies in Canada. It is worth noting further that they account for 30 per cent of the selling value of all factory shipments in 1953. I am dealing with 1953 because unfortunately these figures do not go beyond that date. I hope the dominion bureau of statistics will take steps to project these figures and bring them up to date so we will know what has been happening.

They account for 30 per cent of the selling value of all factory shipments and 21 per cent of all the employees engaged in manufacturing, although they represent just about 2 per cent of all manufacturing establishments in Canada. Here is industrial concentration with a vengeance. Two per cent of the manufacturing establishments in Canada account for 30 per cent of the selling value of factory shipments and employ 21 per cent of the labour engaged in manufacturing.

Now let us examine this table a bit more closely. There is a statement here, statement No. 21, which gives us some idea of what is happening. It is headed "Share of United States Controlled Manufacturing Establishments in Selling Value of Factory Shipments, Employment", and so on. In establishments with 1,500 employees and over, and there are 20 of them United States controlled, the selling value of factory shipments was 52 per cent—that is of all shipments in that category —the employment was 40 per cent in that category and the earnings were 41 per cent. In establishments employing between 1,000 and 1,500 employees, and in this category there were 25 United States establishments or 39 per cent of the total, the selling value of factory shipments was 45 per cent; 41 per cent employment and 43 per cent earnings. In the group employing between 500 and 1,000 employees, and in this category there are 79 establishments, 39 per cent of the selling value of factory shipments is controlled by those in this group; 33 per cent of employment and 36 per cent of earnings. As a matter of fact, 45 per cent of the production of all establishments with factory shipments of $5 million or more was in 212 United States establishments. This is what I mean when I talk about the concentration of industry and the concentration of economic power.

It is pointed out by Messrs. Blyth and Carty:

> The above data show that investment and production are highly concentrated in a small number of the larger firms controlled by non-residents.

What they say is obviously true. Let us take another table, statement No. 20 on page 29 of the Canadian balance of international payments, "Manufacturing and Mining Enterprises in Canada, Concentration and Control". It is divided into four groups. The first one is "Petroleum Exploration Development and Refining", and of all enterprises in this category 67 per cent of the control is outside Canada. There are also "Large Enterprises"—this includes all manufacturing and mining companies with an investment in Canada of $25 million and more—and there are 13 large enterprises in this category, 81 per cent of which are controlled outside of Canada. When I say "controlled" I do not mean to say that they are United States owned. Certainly not, but the great majority most emphatically are. Then, we come to "Mining other than Petroleum Exploration and Development". In this category 55 per cent of all enterprises is controlled outside of Canada and 68 per cent of the large enterprises—which in total number about 14—is controlled outside of Canada. In the grouping "Manufacturing other than Petroleum Refining", 47 per cent of all enterprises is controlled outside of Canada—the number of enterprises is 55—and 54 per cent of the large enterprises is controlled outside of Canada. In the grouping "Total Manufacturing and Mining", 51 per cent of all enterprises is controlled outside of Canada and for the large enterprises, which total 82, 62 per cent is controlled outside of Canada.

Then, the report goes on to say on page 28:

> The capital investments in these large enterprises were about 80, 70 and 55 per cent respectively controlled outside Canada. In each of these areas of investment foreign control represents a significantly higher proportion of the large companies than it does of the industry as a whole. If account were taken of the changes in control which have occurred in this group of enterprises since 1953, the ratios of non-resident control would be 95, 75 and 57 per cent respectively (based on 1953 book values), or about two-thirds for the whole group.

There is part of the story of the concentration of foreign-owned enterprises in this country. There are many other tables which one could put on Hansard to substantiate the case I am making, but I am not going to do it, primarily for the reason I simply do not have the time.

What is the effect of this concentration, economically and socially, on this country? We know that these companies are not owned by great masses of shareholders. In the United States, on the other hand, there are many thousands of shareholders who have shares in the ownership of their companies even though they have no control or no say in the direction of them. This is not so here because the majority of the equity capital is held, of course, by the parent company. Take, for instance, Ford of Canada. There are Canadian investors in Ford and yet none of them are naive enough to think that anything they say or do is going to affect the control of this company which is dominated exclusively by the United States.

Then, again these large United States enterprises are not unduly concerned about their shareholders. I call to witness here Mr. Gordon Huson who is editor of the Business Quarterly which is published by the University of Western Ontario. He tells us on page 254 of the fall, 1957 issue:

> —both Canadian General Electric and Canadian Westinghouse in making offers to buy the shares of minority shareholders wielded the whip by announcing that future dividends were to be cut to increase investment.

They told Canadian shareholders they were going to cut dividends. "You had better sell out to us because we do not want any Canadian shareholders in our concern." This seems to be a deliberate part of the policy of these corporations. These figures show the reason why. United States corporations, in distinction to ours, are eternal. They think of themselves in terms of eternity. They outlive governments, and sometimes even outlive nations. Our Canadian corporations do not think, perhaps, so far ahead. Yet the fact remains that these United States corporations are not paying out too much in dividends. They are holding large amounts of undistributed profits. They are keeping their reserves for further investment in Canada and for further control in Canada.

The very size of these corporations discourages competition in this country. No small manufacturer is going to set himself up against these giants because he knows what is going to happen to him. Their very size, as I say, discourages competition. Their size is one of the effects of what is so humorously called free enterprise. By its very nature free enterprise has got to expand, has got to grow and it can only do so at the expense of other companies. Free enterprise becomes monopoly enterprise. It is worth noting, of course, that the 500 big United States corporations have 750 plants in this country and they are the ones who do most of the controlling. The effect of these giant corporations in so many fields is to kill competition. It is true that ostensibly there is an element of competition. After all, they would not dare kill off every competitor, so they allow some to exist with a rather cynical bow to the combines investigation branch. If the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) were here, I would tell him how I think he could make this branch really effective.

If we want to stop combines, there is no sense in fining them because they regard a fine merely as payment of a licence to carry on with their combinations. If we want to stop combines and cartels in this country the way in which to do it is to send each of the directors who is responsible for breaking the law to prison for two years without any alternative. That would stop combines in Canada. It would also, of course, stop the investigation branch of the combines department in Canada and no branch likes to put itself so completely out of business.

I refer again to the Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Macdonnell) in the Conservative government, and also Mr. Grant Dexter who maintain that foreign investment in relation to total investment has fallen. It is not so and it is demonstrably not so. Rather than put the figures on Hansard, I would ask these gentlemen to go and look up the 1956 figures. Also let them examine into the basis for their argument because it is quite spurious.

After all, what is Canadian investment? Canadian investment includes housing, roads, hospitals, schools, sewers, and public works of all sorts. I do not think we have ever got to the stage where we were ready to ask outsiders to come in and finance our homes. It is possible that provinces and municipalities must get outside help in financing schools and so on when they borrow outside of the country. But by and large those are the items which make up the great mass of Canadian investment. But on top of that, Canadians also invest money in industries in which they have a primary interest such as beverages, textiles, clothing, food processing and a multitude of smaller concerns. But there is one big one in which I think up to the present there is still Canadian control and that is in primary steel. Canadians, for some reason, have always been prepared to invest in primary steel. However, United States investment has been in different fields. It has been for years in petroleum, mining, smelting, electrical appliances, automobiles, chemicals, pulp and paper. These United States subsidiaries control large segments of these industries. Let me quote from the Gordon commission in connection with this matter.

> The influence which foreign-controlled concerns exert in some industries may be greater than the percentages which the amount of foreign capital investment in these industries might imply at first glance. This is because, in Canada, a relatively few large firms tend to predominate in many industries; and the influence which they exert in such industries may be pervasive and compelling. If these few large firms, or a majority of them, are controlled by non-residents of Canada, it may follow that the foreign capital invested in the industry, because of the way in which it is concentrated, in fact dominates or at least influences greatly the operations and the general conduct of the entire industry.

That is an extremely interesting statement, "Foreign capital ...dominates or at least influences greatly the operations and the general conduct of the entire industry".

What is happening is that they are not only dominating industries but they are now beginning to dominate the economy of the country as a whole. That situation, I maintain, presents many difficulties to Canada today. One of the great dangers it presents is the disappearance of us as a political entity. Here is what is happening. Again I come back to the Financial Post. You will notice, Mr. Speaker, I am using most reputable sources for my quotations. Mr. Michael Barkway had some rather interesting articles in the Financial Post in recent months. One appeared in the issue of August 10. Mr. Barkway has this to say:

> Over a steadily widening area of Canada-U.S. trade the normal relationship between buyer and seller is being abolished.
> In the majority of these bulk commodities there is no longer an American buyer bargaining with the Canadian supplier. The American buyer is doing away with that old fashioned process. He is getting control of the Canadian seller.

In other words, what is happening is what I outlined earlier, namely that free enterprise can only continue to exist by expansion, by domination, by the eradication of competitors and eventually by the creation of monopolistic industry. Yet that is the logic which actuates those who believe in free enterprise.

But there are also some other interesting facts to consider. I am quite sure that 90 per cent of the iron ore exported to industries in the United States comes from United States controlled companies in Canada. More than 90 per cent of our oil and gas are United States controlled, and about 80 per cent of our non-ferrous metals mined and smelted in Canada are United States controlled. About 50 per cent of the pulp and paper comes from United States controlled industries.

There are great implications in the concentration which exists. The Americans are dominating these industries. What is wrong with Canadians today? Could they not have gone into these many fields which the Americans are in? The excuse that is given is that Canadian capital could not afford to take the risk of going in and opening up the northern regions of Canada because they had no guarantee of any markets. That argument, I suggest, is fallacious because Americans needed our products. But in typical free-enterprise fashion the Canadian capitalist sat on his hands and waited for the Americans to come in and do the job for him because the Canadian is afraid to gamble on his own country. The Canadian is afraid to risk his money on his own country. The inevitable result has been that foreigners have come in and have done the job for us. Certainly there are markets had free enterprise had any reality and had those Canadians who owned the capital gone out and fought for the markets. A more legitimate excuse is that the Americans had the technical knowledge. That I admit, but I still insist also that even today you can still hire brains.

In many ways—and I insist on this—we need United States capital. But that capital should have been controlled for the welfare of the people of Canada. A great many people shudder at the thought of this word "control". Yet let me remind the house that somebody is going to control this country. It is either going to be the democratically elected members of parliament or it is going to be big business for its own greater glory and of course its own greatest profits.

These are some other matters that should be giving us a good deal of concern. What, for instance, about the future shape of the Canadian balance of payments? That is going to be a substantial headache for Canadian governments in the future. I do not intend to go into the balance of payments question at the moment, except to say this. Rather over $100 million a year is paid out in interest to the United States. Figures for dividends, however, are of importance. In 1953 we paid $233 million; in 1954, $237 million; in 1955, $281 million; in 1956, $326 million. These payments abroad must have an appreciable effect upon our balance of payments. Of course, they add to the debit. As I see it, they are going to cause all sorts of unhappy moments for those in the Department of Finance who are responsible for the whole balance of payments situation.

These difficulties are going to arise in abundance. They are bound to, because the Americans have invested so extensively in what we might call risk investments. I do not think the risk is as great as it is made out to be because after all the markets were there. Since it is risk capital the profits will necessarily be greater and so when the many enterprises of the Canadian north have been opened up and get going they will be making very high profits. The rate of profit will be very high indeed and much of it will be paid to American investors.

But concentration of capital will mean the freezing out of Canadians, because I think we have to remember that trade is no longer being decided solely by the wishes or the desires of the government. American owned subsidiaries in this country of ours can decide the pattern, no matter what the government of the day has to say about it. Let me quote Mr. Huson again:

> It is therefore disturbing that whole industries in which foreign control is predominant are not allowed an interest in export markets because of the attitude of their parent companies.

Their parent companies are true free enterprisers and they do not want competition. The Canadian subsidiaries are told what they are going to do with their production and they have no alternative.

As Mr. Huson says:

> In several cases the purchase by an American parent of a Canadian firm actively exporting to several markets has brought such exporting to an immediate end.

Once again the domination of a Canadian industry by foreign control, by people outside of this country. I am convinced that no free enterprise government can tackle this problem adequately, even although the Prime Minister goes around shaking a warning finger. The government may tinker with the problem; they may play with it; but I doubt if they will deal effectively with the situation which confronts us. In almost every case where a Canadian subsidiary manufactures the same product at its United States parent it is not allowed to export to United States.

All you have to do is look at our balance of payments to see how necessary it is that we export to the United States, yet the parent companies will not permit those exports and here is one of the largest markets for export which is denied to us. All this has been due to Liberal policies in the past. Here you have real control of industry; here you have real domination; here you have real concentration; here you have that age old prerogative of the harlot—power without responsibility.

Can a government believing in free enterprise clean this mess up? The government has a responsibility in this matter which it will have to shoulder and it will duly suffer at the hands of the Canadian people if it does not do something about it. But what does the Prime Minister say in his speech at Dartmouth:

> "United States companies investing in Canada should not regard Canada as an extension of the United States market."

So what? What does the Prime Minister intend to do about it; what does the Tory government intend to do about it? They have this problem; they have it and now it is theirs. They had better try to get some answers to it. Here is a picture of free enterprise working in the usual conventional way—not the free enterprise of the opium smoker but the free enterprise of actual crude everyday fact.

If new members of parliament are particularly interested in the antisocial effects of free enterprise I suggest they just go down to the parliamentary library and read there the story of how the United States oil companies and chemical companies during the war were dealing with nazi cartels and combinations to their own greater profit when their own people were dying. That is free enterprise. They could study also the story of Canadian free enterprise which is no better and see that when war was declared it refused to produce the materials needed because the level of profit was only 5 per cent. Let the Canadians die so long as we have profits—that is free enterprise.

Let me give you another and more recent illustration. George Humphrey, who was recently secretary of the treasury of the United States and was one of the architects of the anti-inflationary policy of the Eisenhower government left the treasury to become chairman of the National Steel corporation. American steel companies raised the price of steel this year by $6 per ton and this was followed by an investigation by a United States Senate committee. Mr. Humphrey admitted that the $6 per ton increase might be temporarily inflationary. What nonsense. Somebody has said you can no more have temporary inflation than you can have temporary pregnancy. You either have it or you do not.

An hon. Member: The other you can see.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): He was asked by Senator Kefauver since his plant was operating now at 80 per cent instead of the 98 per cent capacity of early this year if it would not be advisable to lower prices and so stimulate sales, but Mr. Humphrey couldn't risk it. Mr. Humphrey was not at all encouraging. He was told for instance that wage increases were only $3.50 per ton. Then Mr. Humprey was asked why he had raised the prices by $6 per ton and he had no answer for that. He was told the cost of steel scrap had fallen by $3.87 per ton which would more than make up the increase in wages, but he had no answer for that. Instead he said that the increase of $6 per ton would only mean an increase to the United States consumer of $540 million but that none of them would feel it because it was spread out over such a large number.

This man who in government was all for anti-inflationary policies is now a free enterpriser. He has failed to live up to his duties and responsibilities to the people over whose destinies he once presided in such a high and august office. But as I say he is now all for free enterprise. Then he was asked if his present policy was to quote prices as near to those of competitors as he could get. He agreed that that was so. You see, Mr. Speaker, the free enterprise concept is to charge everything the traffic will bear and damn the consequences. These industrial tycoons never think for a moment about the social effects of their actions upon the country. We have seen that in Canada. There was a committee of parliament which met a few years ago and the president of Canada Packers appeared before that committee. He agreed in reply to questions that his company charged what the traffic would bear. Well of course we cannot expect socially responsible behaviour from these pirates.

Now getting back to Mr. Coyne on page 11 of his report he said:

> The endeavour to maintain stability of prices in conjunction with economic growth, to achieve expansion without inflation, depends for its success on the attitudes and activities of all members of society.

Of course it depends on the attitudes and activities of all members of society but I maintain that capitalistic free enterprise is essentially antisocial and therefore it has got to be controlled for the benefit of all the people. And I say again, it depends upon who is going to do the controlling, the elected representatives of the people or private industry, itself, for its own private profit.

What can be done about it? Well obviously there are some things that even this capitalist free enterprise government might do and we will have to wait to see whether we will get any initiative or ingenuity of action out of it. We have to get some of our eggs out of the American basket. We have to increase our trade in other parts of the world, particularly China, and for the Prime Minister to get up and say we are not prepared to recognize communist China but we are going to trade with them—we want their money but we will not recognize them—is a piece of absurdity. Some day he is going to regret it. The Chinese people are not going to forget in a hurry what the Prime Minister of Canada said recently in this house. There is a great market in China for Canada, not only there but also in the whole of Asia. The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) had better make much more determined efforts than he has done up to now to try and secure part of that market.

Simultaneously Canada should be closely studying and negotiating with nations in Europe which are intent on setting up another great free market. Free trade with the United Kingdom is not enough; free trade with the commonwealth is not enough; we should try to join this new market and thus bring the old world in to redress the balance in the new. But those solutions are not going to affect the fundamental problem which confronts us through the domination by foreign industry of this country and the concentration of industrial control.

There is only one answer and that answer is simple, practical and effective. Since less than one out of four United States subsidiaries will offer stock to Canadians, let the government introduce legislation whereby it will purchase 51 per cent control of certain corporations. Then at last we will be able to say we can control our own economy and control our own country. We will not be dependent upon whims of Wall street or any other area for the wellbeing and the welfare of Canadian citizens.

I admit that to expect such drastic action from a free enterprise government—even the pseudo kind of free enterprise government we have—is probably asking too much but that is the only answer, I am convinced, which is going to work. Of course, a formula for payment offers no difficulties. The foreign investor will merely switch, in part, his holdings from equity capital to bonded indebtedness but his investment will be secure. He will get a reasonable return.

Since we are being constantly reassured that the investor only wants to invest in a growing country and, perish the thought—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry but I must inform the hon. member that his time has expired.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Perhaps I might be allowed to conclude my sentence.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I will have to ask the consent of the whole house. Do the hon. members wish the hon. member for Winnipeg North to continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Since we are constantly being reassured that the investor only wants to invest in a growing country and perish the thought, has no desire to make a killing at the expense of us natives, his wishes should be honoured.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, in the first instance I wish to associate myself with all those who have congratulated the mover and seconder of this address. I do that with the utmost sincerity. I must also congratulate the Speaker and his deputies and commend them for the manner in which they discharge all their important duties. Sir Robert Borden once said of the Speaker that he must be impartial, firm, courteous and, above all, patient, and I think that in the last few weeks we have seen demonstrations of all these essential virtues.

I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, that it is necessary for me to identify myself in a manner somewhat different from that which other hon. members have used. I come from a riding which elects two members, the dual riding of Queen's. I am the junior member. The senior member is the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. MacLean). He is my senior in parliamentary experience, of course, but more surprisingly, if one looks at him, he is my senior in years as well. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Morris) spoke about the distinction between the two men bearing the name of his constituency in terms of one being long and the other short. I do not think any great distinction can be drawn between the Minister of Fisheries and myself in this respect, but we might invite comparison in the matter of width and here again, I would defer to him in that regard.

A maiden speech, as one member of this house observed years ago, is always a valuable exercise. To the new member it gives a rare opportunity to experience a deep feeling of humility, an attitude good for the soul as well as for the mind. To the other members of the house it affords an opportunity to show indulgence, one of the greatest virtues of men and especially, it is said, leaders of men.

While I am not lacking in the proper sentiments of humility concerning my own shortcomings as I speak in this historic chamber, I have no need to feel such sentiments about my constituency nor my province. Through the years in previous parliaments my predecessors have doubtless described the glories and beauties of our fair green province and lauded the virtues of its citizens. What has been said in this line is, of course, no exaggeration, for Canada's garden province is known far and wide as one of the beauty spots of the continent. A steadily increasing number of tourists attest to its charm and hospitality.

But to the list of descriptive superlatives which might be applied to Prince Edward Island and its people must be added one more. Unsurpassed we have long been in many things. On June 10 we displayed our unchallenged superiority in something else, the excellence of our political judgment. The call for a new deal was sounded all over Canada, but in our province it was clear, it was unmistakable, it was unanimous. For the first time in history, Prince Edward Island sent a full slate of Conservative members of parliament to Ottawa. We are today the only 100 per cent province. 'Twas not ever thus, Mr. Speaker. Indeed, over the years our province has shown a remarkable fidelity to the Liberal party. In the provincial election of 1935 a neighbour of mine was leading the Liberal party and he was so triumphant in the result, that every single Conservative candidate was defeated. For four years the Prince Edward Island legislature did not include a single opposition member. In the dominion field, too, the Liberal party has been almost as successful down through the years.

What caused the change? Hon. members opposite will doubtless be interested in this question, since they have been indulging in a good many post-mortems lately. Of course, there is never just one reason for political change, but I will touch on one major cause of the total collapse of the Liberal position in my province. On June 10 Prince Edward Island decided to register a strong protest against the treatment it had received at the hands of the party controlling the national government. This protest was primarily on economic matters. We rejoice in the prosperity of this country but we believe that it is in the interests of the whole country that the maritime region be not allowed to fall farther and farther behind.

In Prince Edward Island we are faced with serious financial difficulties. Freight rates are high, there are serious communication and transportation problems. We lack the sources of revenue which are available to other provinces. There is a growing number of abandoned farms. Provincial governments, faced with rising costs of public services, have to meet increasing large budgetary deficits.

To ensure equality of services for all Canadians, we believe that fiscal need and economic capacity must be considered with great attention in the realm of dominion-provincial relations. It is not the fault of the people of Prince Edward Island that there are no oil deposits there, nor are we to blame if we are not blessed with iron and coal deposits. We do not have Ungavas and Kitimats, but that is not the fault of the people. We lack the ingredients of modern industrialisation. Yet we are Canadians, entitled to the benefits of this great and beautiful country.

We feel that down through the years we have made our contribution in many and, indeed, all phases of Canadian life. But we have waited long. We have been hopeful that our position would be recognized and our peculiar situation appreciated. With what result? Last spring, just at the time when our province was faced with a serious deficit, we heard the interesting news from Ottawa that due to a strange miscalculation Prince Edward Island had, of all things, been overpaid by the dominion treasury and was therefore in debt to the tune of almost $1,250,000.

How did this strange mathematical blunder come about? It came about because our population rise was gravely miscalculated. Why was it miscalculated? It was because many of the young people of our province found it necessary to go to other parts of Canada and so, piling Pelion upon Ossa, we not only lost a great many of our people at the productive and energetic period of their lives, but we had to pay for it on top of that.

When the representatives of the provincial government came to Ottawa to treat for terms, indeed on the eve of an election when one might have thought that such a time was propitious for satisfaction, what did we find? An agreement was made whereby with abundant generosity the government of that time agreed that Prince Edward Island might be given this benefit: they could pay the money back in five equal instalments. I may say that this generous gesture was not overlooked by the people of our province when the opportunity came to express themselves on this particular attitude taken towards Canada's smallest province.

Now our people were definitely influenced and impressed by the program of the Conservative party. They were convinced that here was a truly national policy which would take cognizance of the special problems of the maritimes and of the province of Prince Edward Island and would build, develop and foster a truly national Canadian economy. We have the feeling, and it is a justifiable one, that in such a development program our part of the country will not continue to be a Cinderella in relation to the total Canadian federation. We maritimers—and the de luxe maritimers of Prince Edward Island, if I may use that modest expression—are convinced that much can be done in the way of self help and I quite agree with the Premier of Nova Scotia when he said that the time is opportune for us to attack our own peculiar and pressing problems, but at the same time we require—and I think the economy of Canada generally requires—a great deal more attention to those problems which the advancing technological developments of this country have made pressingly acute for the maritime provinces.

It has often distressed me that when we talk about maritime problems we are often answered in terms of economics. We are told about the distances and the lack of markets and the lack of raw materials. I do not accept these economic arguments as being sufficient. This country of ours was built in defiance not only of geography but of the laws of economics. Through political action and by a union of people with a high dedication of purpose we took an entity which was a contradiction of terms as far as a nation was concerned and built out of it a united country. In other words, the laws of economics did not always prevail; government action and government leadership were necessary. We have only to look at many aspects of the Canadian economy—how we built our railways and establish our tariff policies and so on—to understand clearly that the laws of economics were not always followed in the creation of the Canadian nation. To the members of the Liberal party as they compile their list of reasons for catastrophe I offer them gratis this one particular item as far as the episode in Prince Edward Island is concerned. We look forward to a better deal in our province and we feel that our needs and difficulties will be met.

It is not my intention to speak on issues of a purely provincial nature. This is a national parliament and I think it is our function and duty as members thereof to deal with issues which bear on the whole of the nation. There are, however, matters which are very acute to us and which have a definite bearing on the development of the whole country.

We in Prince Edward Island have problems in the field of agriculture. We have heard a good deal about wheat, fish and poultry and we are interested in all of these things but we have an important crop too, the potato. Now, it is one virtue of our people that we can apparently produce a better potato than any other part of the world as any agriculture market list will show.

Mr. McIvor: No, Ireland.

Mr. Macquarrie: I think our potatoes would compete even with those grown in Ireland. As I go up to the sixth floor I often wish that the purchasing agent for the parliamentary restaurant could be convinced of the priceless virtue of our potato crop. We are looking forward with anticipation and satisfaction to the agricultural program of the party now in power and we feel it is absolutely necessary that this particular commodity, the potato, be given special consideration.

Not long ago I recall buying a bag of potatoes in the spring of the year from a friend of mine. He said he could give me a basket, about half what I wanted. I inquired as to the price and he said it would cost $2.40. Just a year after that, again in the spring, I returned and asked for some more potatoes. This time he was more willing to sell them and he sold me a bag this time and sent his son down to put them in my basement. He charged me 50 cents. It seems to me this illustration demonstrates the sensitivity of the potato market. It underlines the tremendous risk, the almost complete insecurity, which that particular agricultural producer has to undergo. There is no guaranteed price. We appreciate that the western farmer has the problem of selling and delivering his wheat but at least he knows that it will not command five cents a bushel one year and perhaps $3 another year. The potato farmer of Prince Edward Island is faced with uncertainty throughout the entire process.

On motion of Mr. Macquarrie the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

BROADCASTING COMMISSION RECOMMENDATIONS

Question No. 136—Mr. Benidickson:

Referring to page 223 of the report of the royal commission on broadcasting, 1957:

1. What were the 51 locations on the first plan referred to?

2. Are plans being worked on for the construction of any of the 27 low power repeater stations for television transmission in centres of 5,000 population or more as recommended by the commissioners, and if so, is such planning being done for such a station in the districts of (a) Kenora; (b) Rainy River?

Answer by: Hon. G. C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue):

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation advises:

1. The submitted plan referred to did not include specific locations, since it was known that future needs would vary depending on a number of factors, including the establishment of privately owned stations.

2. No plans are being worked on for the construction of specific repeater stations in specific areas.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ASKED BY MEMBERS FOR ROSTHERN AND ASSINIBOIA

Question No. 1—Mr. Tucker:

Mr. Speaker, is the same formula used in regard to wheat sold to the millers for domestic consumption as when it is sold to them for milling for export?

Answer:

The price at which wheat is sold to the mills for domestic purposes is the same as the price basis for export, with the exception that on flour sales to specific areas (excluding the United Kingdom, Europe, the United States and its territories and possessions) an adjustment in the purchase price of wheat is granted by the board, to enable Canadian mills to compete with suppliers from other countries in specific flour markets.

Question No. 2—Mr. Tucker:

In view of the fact that wheat is being sold at Vancouver for $1.71 and a fraction and at Fort William for $1.60 and a fraction, the effect being that the Fort William price is 11 cents below the Vancouver price and that the price to millers is based upon the Fort William price, will the minister look into the question of why the basing of that price at Fort William does not, in effect, constitute an element of subsidization by the western farmers to the consumer or the miller?

Answer:

This question relates to a pricing policy adopted by the wheat board some time ago. Prior to February 1954, the board had been able to quote identical prices for wheat in store Fort William/Port Arthur, and in store Pacific coast ports. However, in February 1954, in the light of conditions existing at that time the board adopted a policy of quoting separate prices for wheat in store Pacific coast ports, in store Fort William/Port Arthur, and in store Churchill. The policy was adopted in order to make board wheat competitive in overseas markets irrespective of the port of shipment. The policy was made necessary by variations in forwarding costs, including ocean freight rates, which tended to make one or another of the Canadian export routes more attractive to overseas buyers.

A policy of quoting different prices for wheat in store Vancouver and in store the lakehead is utilized when the differences in the costs of laying down Canadian wheat in overseas markets necessitates such action. For the balance of the crop year, 1953-54, the board asking prices for wheat ex Pacific coast ports ranged higher than its asking prices for wheat in store Fort William/Port Arthur; the difference was as much as 8 cents per bushel. The spread gradually narrowed in the crop year 1954-55 and by February 1955, board asking prices for wheat in store Vancouver and in store Fort William/Port Arthur were virtually the same. For limited periods the Fort William price was slightly higher than the Vancouver price. In the crop year 1955-56 there was not a great deal of variation between board asking prices for wheat in store Vancouver and in store the lakehead. At times the lakehead price exceeded the Vancouver price by a few cents a bushel. Throughout the crop year 1956-57 any marked difference between board asking prices for wheat in store Vancouver, and in store the lakehead did not occur until May of 1957 when it was again necessary for the board to quote higher asking prices for Pacific coast ports.

At the start of the present crop year the asking prices were about 5 cents per bushel higher at the Pacific coast and only in the last 60 days has the difference widened out to the 11 cents referred to in the question.

The variations in the board's asking prices basis in store the lakehead or in store Vancouver has been brought about by external factors which have affected the position intermittently in the past three and a half years. Normally it is a position which ordinarily corrects itself. The normal position is for board asking prices in store Vancouver, and in store the lakehead to be identical.

In the opinion of the Canadian wheat board it would not be advisable to change the basis of its selling to mills in all parts of Canada to meet what are considered to be temporary price situations, particularly since flour mills have established locations throughout Canada related to freight rates applicable to wheat and flour and the price at which wheat can be acquired basis in store Fort William/Port Arthur.

The board's asking price for wheat basis in store Fort William/Port Arthur is the basic price for wheat. It is this price which governs the distribution of the major part of Canadian wheat supplies, and the basis which must govern export flour prices if all mills in Canada, regardless of their location, are to have an equal opportunity of competing in foreign markets. It is also the basic price recognized by the international wheat agreement for the purpose of the administration of that agreement. It would not seem desirable at the present time to alter the price basis on which wheat is supplied to the milling industry throughout Canada upon a temporary and abnormal situation which has arisen at the Pacific coast as a result of variations in the laid down cost of wheat, particularly in the United Kingdom and European markets. Being temporary and abnormal the wheat board should be in a position to adjust its pricing policies without regard to domestic considerations.

Question No. 3—Mr. Argue:

Why is the price to millers based upon the lower Fort William price instead of the higher Vancouver price?

Answer: See No. 2.

ANSWER TO QUESTION ASKED BY MEMBER FOR PORT ARTHUR

On Friday last the hon. member for Port Arthur asked whether I had any recent information on the effectiveness of poisons and plans to use them against the lamprey eel in inland waters, especially in lake Superior.

I have now seen the original press release of November 1, 1957, issued by the United States fish and wildlife service which gave rise to the reports to which he referred.

As the hon. member is aware, prior to the formation of the great lakes fishery commission in the spring of 1956, a great deal of more or less independent research had been carried out on the life history and control of the parasitic sea lamprey in the great lakes, that in United States spearheaded by the United States fish and wildlife service and that in Canada conducted by the fisheries research board of Canada and the province of Ontario. Both groups had investigated the use of poisons to kill the larval lampreys or ammocoetes since this larval period spent in the mud of the river bottoms constituted 4 to 6 years of the total life. The adult stage, lasting about 18 months, was being controlled by electrical barriers placed in the rivers to intercept and kill the spawning runs.

In 1956 the great lakes fishery commission decided that its United States agent, the United States fish and wildlife service, which had already established facilities and tested about 6,000 chemicals, should continue to stress that phase. The present tests reported by the United States fish and wildlife service are thus all part of the composite program of the great lakes fishery commission to which Canada contributes 31 per cent of the funds.

Of the 6,000 chemicals tested, five or six were found to be specific for lamprey larvae in low dilutions but did not affect other fish except in much greater strength. These six have been rigidly checked in artificial raceways using caged fish as controls. Tests have also been run on deer and cattle with negative results.

On October 29, the first natural stream test was made. One chemical, dowlap (3-4-6-trichloro-2-nitrophenol) was distributed by using a precision mechanical feeder at a rate of 30 parts per million into a two mile stretch of Little Billie's (Elliot) creek emptying into Duncan bay on lake Huron near Cheboygan, Michigan. By noon on October 31 it was demonstrated by the caged control lamprey that a 92 per cent kill had resulted. The effect on trout and other game fish in this excellent fishing stream had been negligible. Tens of thousands of larval lamprey of all sizes were dead.

This is the first of the actual tests in natural streams and more are now being run. If these are equally successful, we will have a method of controlling four or five years of the lampreys' six or seven year life. The electric barriers will control the adult stage. The results are extremely encouraging but not entirely proven. We are certainly hoping for continued success.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, November 14, 1957

The house met at eleven o'clock.

POWER

GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING NATIONAL DEVELOPMENT

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a statement at this time in regard to the power situation in general, and in particular the attitude of this government toward the situation in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick. I wish to inform the house that an agreement has been reached with the premiers of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick on a program for the development of power which I believe will have a profoundly beneficial effect on the industrial development of those provinces.

It has been the declared policy of this government, both before and since it assumed office, to take action to improve the economic well-being of those parts of Canada which, through no fault of their own, have not fully shared in the economic growth of this country in recent years. The Atlantic provinces are among these areas. One of the factors that has been to their disadvantage in attracting industrial development has been the fact that power for industrial use has not been available in as large a quantity or at as low a price as in other parts of Canada more favoured in this respect. Among the most important considerations of industry in selecting a location in which it will establish is the availability of a sure supply of power and at reasonably low cost.

It seems only fair and equitable that the government of Canada should take measures to assist in meeting this basic requirement of the maritime provinces for industrial growth, particularly since it is possible to do so on a basis that is largely self-financing and self-liquidating. The program that has been discussed with Premier Flemming and Premier Stanfield, and which will be implemented by the government of Canada in agreement with the governments of those two provinces, is a threefold one. As forecast in Her Majesty's speech from the throne, the federal government will provide, on a basis of full repayment by the province of New Brunswick, the necessary financing for the Beechwood hydroelectric project now nearing completion.

This will involve a loan of approximately $29 million. The terms of this loan have been the subject of discussion between the Minister of Finance and the provincial treasurer of New Brunswick, who have reached complete agreement. Subject to the approval of parliament, which we will invite before the end of this session, the federal government will lend to the government of New Brunswick the full cost of construction of the Beechwood plant, but not in excess of $30 million, at 4⅜ per cent per annum. This is the regular current lending rate to crown corporations such as the St. Lawrence seaway authority, and is based on our own borrowing rate plus a service charge of approximately ⅛ of 1 per cent. The loan will be for a term of eight years, repayable in equal annual instalments of combined principal and interest of approximately $4,500,000.

The Beechwood plant will be of great value in making available a substantial block of relatively low cost power, and also in providing that combination of hydro and thermal power that is so important in any well balanced electrical system.

The second aspect of the government's program is the construction of the thermal power plants that will provide the backbone of the future power supply of the entire area of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. With the economic development that can be expected following the assurance that lower cost power will be available in large amounts, there will undoubtedly be a very considerable growth in the power requirements of these two provinces. The future possibilities of hydroelectric development in these provinces are limited, and most of the growing need will be met through power from steam.

It has been agreed that the necessary plants will be built by the federal government and sold to the provinces. In order to improve the efficiency of the whole power supply the federal government will also construct the interconnection lines that are needed in order that the two provinces may pool their power resources. This will introduce very substantial economies and will in itself reduce the cost of power significantly. Both the plants and the lines will be sold to the power commissions of the two provinces with payment over a long term at the same interest rate as provided for the Beechwood project.

Hon. members will realize that the availability of funds for both the Beechwood plant and for the thermal power plants and interconnection lines at the borrowing cost of the federal government will in itself reduce the cost of power in these provinces. However, it is apparent that the reduction achieved through lower financing costs will not reduce the cost of power for industry to the extent necessary to put the two provinces on a comparable basis with more favoured provinces in our country. Notwithstanding the availability of substantial supplies of coal in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, the situation at the present time is that coal for power in the maritime provinces costs more than coal brought in from the United States for the production of power in Ontario.

While central Canada has, of course, advantages in addition to this one in attracting industry, it has seemed to the government that if the maritime provinces are to be given a fair opportunity to attract industrial growth they must be able to secure coal for the production of power for industrial use at a price that does not exceed the price of United States coal in central Canada. The government has therefore decided that it will provide a subvention on coal used for the production of power in the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia to the extent that is necessary to equalize the cost of that coal with the cost of coal used for the same purposes in Ontario.

I need not emphasize that the subvention on coal will have a double value. It will reduce the cost of the power that is produced from the coal, and that will help greatly. It will also do much to ensure that the coal produced in the maritime provinces continues to be used for the growing power demand of those two provinces and will not be replaced by oil brought in from foreign fields.

This program, I may add, carries the full and enthusiastic support of the premiers of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick and will, I believe, have a lasting and beneficial effect on the economic growth and welfare of the Atlantic region.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister one question following his important and I think interesting announcement this morning, which I hope will benefit the maritime provinces. Will he discuss with the province of Saskatchewan in connection with the South Saskatchewan power project similar assistance in the financing of that project? I understand this would help to lower the cost of financing.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, a meeting has been arranged with the premier of Saskatchewan and other representatives immediately following the dominion-provincial conference, and I may add that the basic concept and the spirit of this policy will apply wherever a case by a provincial government is made out.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Leader of the Opposition): May I put just one question, Mr. Speaker. I am sure everyone will rejoice to find that the project which had been suggested well over a year ago now, that there might be established power plants that would be turned over at cost—or in that project it was suggested that it was the output which should be turned over at cost—to the provinces, with an integrated distribution system for the two provinces of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, is now going to be realized, though the present government has found it necessary, in order to make it possible to produce power which would be competitive with that available even from fuel in central Canada, to provide a subsidy on the coal so used. That would probably have the double-barrelled effect of aiding the coal industry as well as providing more attractive power for industrial purposes. In connection with the whole matter, now that the arrangements have been concluded, is there still any objection by the government to producing the report of the Montreal Engineering Company, which had been asked to study and report on the whole situation?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I thank the right hon. gentleman for his observation and for having distinguished between the plan we produced and the one we believed to be impractical and which was placed before the people during the election by the former government. As far as the question of the right hon. gentleman is concerned, I think the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources is in a position to answer it.

An hon. Member: A distinction is not a difference.

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to table the report by the Montreal Engineering Company in regard to the requirements for power plants and transmission lines in Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

In doing so I should like to make it clear that the report is in the nature of professional engineering advice on a specific range of problems. In providing such advice, which I think has been very competently given, the engineers of the company had to examine to some extent or make assumptions on certain matters not strictly of an engineering character. In relation to these there can well be differences of view, without affecting the accuracy of the technical advice. Unless this is understood there could be misinterpretation of some aspects of the report.

For instance, the Montreal Engineering Company projection of future demands excludes future requirements of pulp and paper companies and any demands which might be created by a large electro-smelting operation. This does not mean that the Montreal Engineering Company or any government is of the view that these developments will not come about. It is rather because if one had to make a firm determination by August, 1957, of the future demands, it was logical to predict industrial demands, as is done by commercial enterprises, only when a firm contract is placed.

Also included in the report is an assessment of coal reserves in certain maritime areas. This is a matter on which there is a good deal of difference of view, even, I believe, among competent engineers. The government does not necessarily subscribe to the assessment made in particular cases.

It was the view of the two provincial governments that it would be best to conclude the arrangements the Prime Minister has just announced before tabling this report. It was as a courtesy to the provinces, therefore, that it has not been tabled before this.

Hon. George C. Marler (St. Antoine-Westmount): May I ask the minister a question with regard to the report he has just tabled. Are we to understand from his statement that the government disassociates itself from the recommendations of the report?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): My statement was absolutely clear on that point.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the Prime Minister whether the government has initiated any conversations with the governments of the other two Atlantic provinces with a view to the extension of those policies which we all welcome—at least the policy regarding the thermal plants—to those other two provinces.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, as I pointed out at the conclusion of my statement, we were approached by the two provinces in question, and it was with respect to those two provinces that the statement was made by the government. Any other provincial government which chooses to make representations will receive the consideration which the case it makes out deserves.

Mr. Pickersgill: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Do I understand, then, that the federal government intends to take no initiative in this matter?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, after all, each of the provinces has to determine whether or not it desires to make any application to the federal government under this policy. It is not for us to press upon any province a policy which, in its way, is peculiarly a matter of provincial responsibility.

Hon. Jean Lesage (Montmagny-L'Islet): A question on the same subject, Mr. Speaker. May I ask the Prime Minister what will be the role of the northern Canada power commission in the implementation of the policy he has just announced?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, when the matter is brought up for implementation through legislation a very full statement in that connection will be made. The role of the crown company in question will be such as may be necessary in the implementation of the general plan.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources if an agreement has been reached with the premiers of Nova Scotia and New Brunswick as to the location of the first thermal plants to be built under the agreements which were announced by the Prime Minister?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, the present state of negotiations among the governments concerned is that the general principles have been arrived at as announced by the Prime Minister, but I do understand that the location of the first plant has been agreed upon.

Mr. Lesage: As to this agreement on principles, which has been reached by the Prime Minister and the premiers, is there anything in writing or any exchange of correspondence confirming the agreement?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I think I can handle that question. The agreement is now presently being worked upon by the officials of the governments of the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia and the federal government. As a matter of fact I think they are meeting in Ottawa today.

Mr. Lesage: Is it the intention of the government to table that agreement when it is completed?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Certainly, Mr. Speaker, we would be glad to table it.

Mr. Pickersgill: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wish to ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources if in line with the Prime Minister's answer to me the federal government waited until the government of Saskatchewan approached it about the Saskatchewan dam, since this matter is primarily within provincial jurisdiction.

Some hon. Members: Answer.

Mr. Sinclair: It was a simple question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Was there any interference from the province of Saskatchewan?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry but I did not get the point of the hon. member's question.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think perhaps I can clarify it. As I understood the Prime Minister, he said he would wait until the other two Atlantic provinces approached him before any initiative could be taken in power policy. I wondered if the same policy was being applied in the province of Saskatchewan with respect to the dam?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): Mr. Speaker, I can certainly assure the hon. member that the government of Saskatchewan is always very interested in what is going on out there.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not an answer.

Mr. Marler: Another evasion.

[Later:]

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Melville): In view of the answer given a few moments ago by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources with regard to what he suggested might be the attitude of the provincial government of Saskatchewan toward the South Saskatchewan river dam, might I ask him whether he still holds the same opinion with regard to that matter as he did when he was leader of the Conservative party in Saskatchewan? Incidentally, that opinion was the same as I had announced in this house on one occasion, so I cannot complain about it very much if he does. He said if they formed a government provincially his government would build the South Saskatchewan river dam. Does he still hold that point of view, that the Saskatchewan government should build that dam?

Mr. Brooks: That is not a question; that is a political speech.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): My belief now is the same as it was then, that the dam is economically feasible, that any government could build it and it could be made economic in all aspects. I still hold the same opinion.

[Later:]

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, of which I have not given him notice. The Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario pays more than 4⅜ per cent at this time for money for capital expansion. I believe it is something over 5 per cent. My question is, would this commission receive a lower interest rate on borrowed money if the Ontario government made the same application to this government in respect of capital expenditures as New Brunswick and Nova Scotia have done?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I think the statement the Prime Minister made on the power situation in the Atlantic provinces answers the question.

Mr. Marler: It would be nice if the minister would answer a question occasionally.

[Later:]

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Speaker, I want to see that I understood correctly the answer of the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources to the question asked by the hon. member for Welland.

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): I answered it.

Mr. Lesage: Yes, but I want to be sure I understood it correctly. I will ask a supplementary question. Do I understand that if the government of Quebec wishes to borrow money for its hydroelectric developments in Quebec, from the federal government, it can get it at the rates mentioned by the Prime Minister?

Mr. Hamilton (Qu'Appelle): In answer to the hon. member for Welland (Mr. McMillan) I said that as to the question he asked in relation to Ontario or Quebec or any other province, the answer could be found by a careful reading of the Prime Minister's statement of policy.

AIR TRANSPORT

CANADIAN PACIFIC AIRLINES—APPLICATION TO FLY MONTREAL-VANCOUVER ROUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister say whether the application made by Canadian Pacific Airlines for permission to fly the Montreal-Vancouver route has the blessing of the government?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, having been in the house a long time I am sure the hon. member knows that it would be completely wrong for the government to indicate whether any particular application has or has not the blessing of the government before it has been considered by the air transport board.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the government given any study to the matter of determining whether or not in its view the volume of air traffic in Canada would now warrant two trans-Canada air lines?

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Speaker; I, together with the officials of my department and air line personnel, have been making a thorough study of the whole question almost from the time this government took office, and I expect to be expressing some views on this matter in the house before long.

[Later:]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Transport a question arising out of his statement that since coming into office he has discussed the question of air routes across Canada with officials of air line companies. Does this mean that he discussed this question with officials of Canadian Pacific Airlines?

Mr. Hees: In a general way, yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask a supplementary question. If the minister has discussed this matter with the officials of Canadian Pacific Airlines, am I not entitled to an answer to my first question, as to whether C.P.A. has the government's blessing in the application that has been made?

An hon. Member: You have already had your answer to that question.

Mr. Hees: When on an inspection tour this summer of harbours and other things which come under the jurisdiction of my department, I met the president of Canadian Pacific Airlines in Victoria and had dinner with him, and on that occasion he outlined the views his company had about international operations, national operations and matters pertaining to the air industry in general. I listened with great interest to what that gentleman had to say on that occasion and on other occasions. I have learned a great deal from what he has told me. However, I did not express to him at any time my opinion or the opinion of the government as to what our attitude might be with regard to the specific matter in question.

Mr. Coldwell: I understand the discussions were unofficial, that they were not departmental discussions.

An hon. Member: Social discussions.

Mr. Hees: The discussions were completely unofficial. It was a social occasion, and I met Mr. McConachie with mutual friends at a very pleasant dinner in Victoria. These matters on that occasion and on other occasions were discussed completely unofficially.

Hon. George C. Marler (St. Antoine-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, might I ask a supplementary question of the minister. Has he received from Trans-Canada Air Lines any word approving the application of Canadian Pacific Airlines?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I am really amazed at the lack of knowledge displayed by a man who has been so recently in charge of this department. He knows perfectly well that any application made by Canadian Pacific Airlines or any other air line has nothing to do with the officials of T.C.A.

Mr. Marler: Mr. Speaker, that is not the question I put to the Minister of Transport. I know what went on in the department in my own time, but I do not know what goes on at the present time. That is the reason I asked the minister if Trans-Canada Air Lines were backing the application of C.P.A.

Mr. Hees: As I said before, T.C.A. has nothing whatsoever to do with the application of any other air line.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask the minister a question. Has he discussed the matter with either the president or any officials of Trans-Canada Air Lines?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He just discussed it with C.P.A., not with T.C.A.

Mr. Power: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Transport if he is aware of the fact that when an application is made before the air transport board, all other interested parties are also aware of it?

Mr. Hees: That is, of course, a matter for the air transport board. My answer was that T.C.A. had nothing to do with the application made by any other air line. If T.C.A. wishes to appear before the board when a board hearing is held, and opposes an application, they have a perfect right to do so, as has any other air line. But no air line has anything to do with the making of an application by any other air line.

FREIGHT RATES

RAPE SEED—APPEAL FROM DECISION OF TRANSPORT BOARD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Johnson (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has an appeal been made to the government from the decision of the board of transport commissioners to grant the exorbitant freight rate of 70 cents a hundred on rape seed shipments? If so, can the Prime Minister inform the house if the decision to grant the appeal will be made known at an early date, so farmers can soon arrange for their spring seed supplies?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I must thank the hon. member for his courtesy in giving me notice of his intention to ask this question, but unfortunately I received the notice only a couple of minutes ago. In the interval I made an inquiry, and the information I have is that no appeal has been made as yet. I am not saying that further inquiry might not reveal that one had been made, but there is nothing either in the files of the board of transport commissioners or in the hands of the clerk of the privy council to indicate that any such appeal has been made.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ROYAL COMMISSION ON ENERGY—EXPORTS OF NATURAL GAS TO U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Louis Lewry (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can the Prime Minister indicate whether a report from Washington in this morning's Globe and Mail is correct, to the effect that the newly appointed royal commission on fuel resources will immediately deal with the export of natural gas from Canada and will enable gas to be exported within three to six months, and that Mr. N. J. McNeill, general counsel of Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited, has every confidence that Trans-Canada will be able to persuade the commission to sever the Trans-Canada case from its general study of Canadian fuels?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, all I can say is that the royal commission is set up for the purpose of determining those questions in connection with gas export which are of immediate moment, and also having regard to future policy and the future needs of Canadians. When the royal commission will report and the nature of that report is, of course, not for me to anticipate.

Hon. George C. Marler (St. Antoine-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, a supplementary question. Could the Prime Minister tell us when the first sittings of the commission are likely to be undertaken?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I will try to have that information for the hon. gentleman at the next session.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The next session? Why not tomorrow?

Mr. Marler: I take it you meant the next sitting.

LIVESTOCK

REQUEST FOR ESTABLISHMENT OF PRICE SUPPORT FORMULA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Peter Stefura (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. I sent him notice of my intention to ask this question, but perhaps the notice I gave was too short and in view of the busy day he has perhaps he would give an answer tomorrow.

In view of the drastic drop in livestock prices, has the government been in consultation with representative farm organizations to arrive at a definite formula for adequate price supports? If so, will such formula be proposed for enactment this session? Is the minister aware of the urgency of such legislation, and does he intend to introduce such legislation without delay? And being aware that the small producers are planning their next year's production now, is the minister prepared to issue any directive to the farmers of Canada today?

Mr. Marler: Good speech.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, there are several questions, and I should like to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of them. However, I should like to point out that the way he prefaces the question—and this has occurred four or five times before—I do not think is in accordance with the facts. He says "in view of the drastic drop in livestock prices". Now, I do not know of the drastic drop in livestock prices to which my hon. friend and various other people who have made the statement in prefacing questions are referring.

I have here the prices on the Toronto and Winnipeg markets for good steers and grade A hogs. On November 19, 1955, the price of good steers on the Toronto market was $19.50 and on the Winnipeg market $19. On November 17, 1956, it was $20 on the Toronto market and $18.84 on the Winnipeg market. On November 9, 1957, it was $17.50 in Toronto and $17 in Winnipeg. That is a drop of approximately $2 a hundred as from two years ago and a year ago at this time, which I do not think can really be called a drastic drop.

Mr. Marler: How much more has it got to go?

Mr. Harkness: When we come to the situation in regard to hogs perhaps the gentleman opposite will not be making as much noise. On November 19, 1955, the price of grade A hogs at Toronto was $23.50 and at Winnipeg it was $20.96. On November 9, 1957, the respective prices were $26.62 and $24.08. Rather than being a drastic fall as from two years ago it is quite a considerable increase. As of a year ago there has been a reduction. On November 17, 1956, the price at Toronto was $30.50 and at Winnipeg $28.

The main point is this. These constant prefaces to questions about a drastic fall in the price of livestock I think are hardly justified. There has been some fall in the price of livestock, which I regret very much, but it is not a drastic fall; and as far as hog prices are concerned they are considerably better now than they were two years ago at this time. They are poorer now than they were a year ago at this time.

Mr. Gardiner: Or a month ago.

Mr. Harkness: In regard to some of the other questions, I might just add that everybody who is familiar with the livestock business knows that when you get a large production of livestock, which has been the case so far as hogs are concerned, particularly in the fall of the year, you always get a drop in prices.

> Has the government been in consultation with representative farm organizations in arriving at a definite formula for adequate price supports?

We have, of course, been in touch with the federation of agriculture and the farm union organizations and have heard their representations in regard to this matter over several months past, and are fully aware of their views in regard to this matter.

As far as the other questions are concerned, as to whether such a formula will be proposed for enactment at this session and so on, the hon. member is aware, as are all members of the house, that we have on the order paper a resolution providing for a stabilization program for farm prices and that will be proceeded with as soon as it becomes possible to do so and will, of course, become part of the general program of this government and of the laws of this country.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member is very confident.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): May I ask a supplementary question. I wonder if the minister could inform us as to the drop in hog prices within the last two or three months. Is the minister implying that the very low prices under the previous administration should now be continued?

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I say to the hon. member that hog prices for the last three months are information that is available to anybody. It is not necessary to ask the minister about that.

Mr. Argue: They would change the minister's answer.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

INDIAN AFFAIRS—INSPECTION OF FIRE HAZARDS ON RESERVES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): I have a very brief question of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. Is he in a position now to give me an answer to a question I asked him some time ago regarding a fire on the Songhees reserve?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): There have been inquiries made and I have two memoranda on the subject. I find I am not in a position to condense them into one, so if the hon. member would wait until tomorrow I will undertake to answer him then.

INCOME TAX

WESTMORLAND COUNTY, N.B.—INQUIRY AS TO ALLEGED SNOOPERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Murphy (Westmorland: I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the lack of announcement with reference to income tax cuts, will the Prime Minister inform the house if the loyal and hard-working civil servants of the Department of National Revenue are to be regarded as income tax snoopers who pillory and push around honest Canadians, as indicated in a document bearing a facsimile of his signature and sent to thousands of the citizens of Westmorland county? If not, will the Prime Minister so notify the same citizens of his change of heart in the same way?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the facetiousness of my hon. friend gives the answer to his question.

Mr. Murphy (Westmorland): This is not a facetious question. It is a matter that is of vital importance at this time of year when the income tax—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has asked his question and has had his answer, and unless he has a further question we shall pass on to the next one.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY, WINNIPEG—REPORTED DISMISSAL FOR FAILURE TO CROSS PICKET LINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Is the minister aware that the members of a Canadian Pacific switching crew in the Winnipeg area who felt that they could not cross a picket line two days ago have been informed by the Canadian Pacific Railway that their services are no longer required?

Will the minister look into this matter to see if there is not some protection for such employees under the national labour code, since these employees do come under federal labour jurisdiction?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I shall be glad to look into the situation and report to the hon. member.

PIPE LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—INQUIRY AS TO EXPLOSIONS IN SASKATCHEWAN AND MANITOBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Louis Lewry (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister, in view of his answer to a question I put to him on November 4 in connection with explosions in the Trans-Canada pipe line in the provinces of Manitoba and Saskatchewan. At that time the Prime Minister replied that as yet he had no information on the cause of these explosions, but he would make inquiries and let me know possibly the day following. I wonder if he has any further report at this time.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): As I reported the other day, a very complete investigation was made, and as yet there is no satisfactory conclusion as to the reasons for the explosions in question. The investigation, I understand, is continuing and I expected to be able to give my hon. friend an answer, as I stated, within a day or so. As yet I am not in a position to do so, and cannot until such time as the board of transport commissioners are in a position to advise me.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. W. Hodgson (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Public Works): The answer to question No. 105, Mr. Speaker, is a voluminous document and I would ask permission to table it as a return.

Mr. Speaker: This return which is offered to the house should properly have been made on Wednesday, I am informed by the Clerk, but it could be accepted now by unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

PUBLIC WORKS—ALLOTMENT TRANSFERS

Question No. 105—Mr. Bourget:

1. Have any transfers of allotments been authorized by treasury board, since June 22, in the estimates, supplementary estimates and further supplementary estimates of the Department of Public Works?

2. If so, how many, and in each case (a) what was the amount transferred; (b) from what heading or project was each transfer made; (c) to what heading or project was each transfer made; (d) what was the reason for the transfer?

PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION

INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION OF LEGISLATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Peter Stefura (Vegreville): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Does the present government have plans for introducing legislation this session to broaden the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act to make all areas eligible, instead of restricting the application of this act?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): This is a question which I have looked into to some extent and upon which I have received representations. It is not, however, what you might call an emergent matter, and therefore not a matter with which we could properly deal at the present session.

Mr. Marler: What does the minister mean by "emergent"; something which emerges, or what?

Mr. Harkness: I think the hon. member has a dictionary, and perhaps he could look in the dictionary and find the meaning of that word.

Mr. Marler: I suggest the minister might do so himself.

FISHERIES

STATEMENT AS TO INTRODUCTION OF COMPULSORY INSPECTION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): On Friday last the hon. member for Gloucester inquired regarding the possible introduction in 1958 of compulsory inspection of fresh and frozen fish, and as to whether facilities would be made available to those interested in the industry to appear before a committee of the house to discuss any proposed amendments to the regulations enacted under the authority of the Fish Inspection Act.

A decision has not yet been taken regarding amending the regulations enacted under the Fish Inspection Act to provide for the compulsory inspection and grading of fresh and frozen fish. It is not contemplated, however, that a committee of the house will deal with proposed amendments to the regulations. It has been the practice of the department to have full discussion with the industry through its association, the fisheries council of Canada, and with others on proposed amendments to regulations. Meetings with the industry and others interested will be convened before proposals for amending the regulations to provide for compulsory inspection are presented to the government for its consideration.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

ISRAEL—INQUIRY AS TO REMOVAL OF ARMS EXPORT PROHIBITION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Algoma East): May I ask the Prime Minister whether consideration has been given by the government to the removal of the prohibition on the export of defence equipment from Canada to Israel, and if so, what is the result of the consideration?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I would rather not answer that question offhand. I think it is of sufficient moment to demand a rather complete reply, and it will be given in due course.

NATIONAL REVENUE

FILM CENSORSHIP—SUGGESTED ASSUMPTION OF FEDERAL JURISDICTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): I have a question which I believe should properly be directed to the Prime Minister, but if I am in error perhaps we will get it straightened out. Does the government intend to accept the suggestion of Mr. Silverthorne, chairman of the Ontario censorship board, which was to the effect that the federal government should assume jurisdiction over the censorship of films in order that uniformity of censorship may be accomplished?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I do not know what Mr. Silverthorne said, but I can think of nothing that would be more unconstitutional than that.

BRIDGES

SAINT JOHN, N.B.—STATEMENT ON REQUEST FOR CONSIDERATION OF HARBOUR PROJECT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, on November 12 the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Murphy) asked me this question:

Will the government consider the construction of a harbour bridge at the port of Saint John, New Brunswick, similar to the Angus L. Macdonald bridge in Halifax?

I find that there is no record in the Department of Public Works of any such proposal having been submitted. I also find that the federal government took no part whatever in the construction of the Angus L. Macdonald bridge in Halifax. Evidently the cost of that bridge was met by the province of Nova Scotia, the city of Halifax and the municipality of Dartmouth.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, November 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. A. R. Smith (Calgary South) for an address to Her Majesty the Queen in reply to her speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. Heath Macquarrie (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I may say that I was delighted that so much of this sitting was given over to a discussion of the maritime provinces. We are not an overly sensitive people, but we do not like to be ignored. It is a very happy situation for us to find that we are now being considered since this new government has come into office.

Along with the matters that have been discussed heretofore there is in the province of Prince Edward Island another pressing problem which underlies and affects the only three industries of which we may boast, namely agriculture, fishing and the tourist trade. For years and indeed, I think, ever since Prince Edward Island has sent its members to the Canadian parliament there have been discussions about one particular aspect of transportation, namely the link with the mainland. During the administration of Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Wilfrid Laurier this matter was discussed day in and day out, and finally in the administration of Sir Robert Borden our province was given continuous service with the modern car ferry as it then was.

We are hoping that history may repeat itself, and that the present Conservative government may be able to provide what is at this time the modern answer to our transportation problems. We feel that the time has come to build a road to the isle. We feel that a causeway across the Northumberland strait, is in this modern age of technology and science, not only feasible but indeed quite possible within a reasonable space of time. The service now existing, while once very adequate, is now incapable of coping properly with the traffic of goods across the strait. It is also a costly operation, causing an annual deficit of about $1¾ million to keep our ferries running.

We therefore feel that the building of a causeway upon which there may be some reasonable toll would be a self-liquidating project. It would give us a link with the mainland and, better still, it would give the mainland a link with us! Such a causeway would improve our three basic industries and would give a tremendous boost to the economy of our province.

I hope the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Transport will give this their most careful consideration.

I know that my friends and colleagues from Prince Edward Island will not allow anyone to forget their very great interest in this problem. I know of no greater memorial to this government, which we hope will stay in power for a long, long time, than the development of such modern and fine engineering projects, and particularly such a fine boon to the maritime provinces as this particular project which is so close to our hearts.

It has been pleasing indeed to observe the type of legislation which the government has put through. I have been greatly interested in it all, and so have the people of my constituency. The old age pension increase is one example. My personal preference at one time had been for $60 per month as a fair and reasonable amount. But the calculations and the explanations of the minister with respect to the economic and fiscal situation struck me as altogether satisfying. I am impressed with the fact that this new increase is 37½ per cent over 1949 as against a 23 per cent increase in the cost of living for the same period.

There is one feature about this matter which has a special appeal to the people of my province, and that is the increase in allowable absence from three to six months. Many of our people in years gone by found it necessary to move to the United States, especially the New England states. In this, you see, they were anticipating a certain section of the Gordon report. Many of the older people like to spend part of the winter season with their families in the south. Therefore it will not now be necessary for them to return in the midst of winter. I have already had a great many letters of appreciation on this point.

This is an historic time for a new member to enter the Canadian parliament. The opening by Her Majesty the Queen of course was an unforgettable occasion; the change of government after 22 years of power dominance by one party was in itself something unique. We have also seen something else which I think is new—certainly in degree—in Canadian history, and that is the rapid implementation of election promises by a newly elected government!

We have also seen during this historic time in the record of Canada the end of certain things, and I have a feeling that a great many myths have recently died. We, especially those of us who are young—and I boastfully put myself in that class—had become almost inured to certain myths which had gotten about. I would not say any party did it deliberately,—but they got about. One of those myths was that one party had some sort of monopoly on social welfare legislation. Of course, as any projection back through history or any look through the contemporary record of various provinces under different governments or different political parties would indicate, clearly that is not the case. One could turn to the debate on old age pensions in the year 1907 and there get a cross section of party opinion. There was also the myth of indispensability; that it would be impossible, or at least dangerous, to replace a political party. There also was another myth of invincibility and that well known query "Who is going to stop us?", which had almost passed into the category of a rhetorical question.

There is another very assiduous myth—that national unity adheres to one particular party. I remember we used to be told by so many leaders of the virtue of voting a certain way for national unity. We had in this house at least a partial demonstration of the falsity of that myth from one of the members on the other side, the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) who gave, I think, a convincing demonstration. He did me the honour of quoting part of an article I wrote. I appreciate his compliment; and while I do not mind for myself being dealt with in this way, I cannot allow to pass any imputation with respect to that great statesman Sir Robert Borden to the effect that he should be adduced as an argument for that which was put forward by the hon. member for Laurier. It would be very immodest of me to practice the art of self quotation, but may I be permitted to put my finger on one very short sentence in the same article, which I think perhaps displays Sir Robert's attitude a little more fully:

> (Sir Robert Borden) was not given to pious preachments about his dedication to the furtherance of national unity, but he was nevertheless fully aware of the need for the harmonious interaction of the two great ethnic groups.

Sir Robert Borden did not foster racist divisions, and no man in this country need be ashamed of his Canadianism, whether in this parliament or in the councils of the world, where he strongly and clearly enunciated our national aspirations and became the chief architect of mature Canadian nationhood.

In this party, of which I am proud to be a member, there is no place for any narrowness of outlook on ethnic, religious or cultural lines. We are the great national party of today. We are the only party with representatives from every province in Canada. We have here, and I am proud of it, descendants of many of the peoples whose contribution has made the rich Canadian cultural mosaic. I was always very interested in this great myth of national unity and its association with one party, and am glad to see it has been finally and completely shattered.

One has been impressed also with the impact of the outside world upon our deliberations. The importance laid upon foreign affairs in the speech from the throne has I am sure struck us all; and if one looks back through the debates in the Canadian parliament over the years one sees a gradual development of interest, awareness, information and concern with the outside world.

Indeed, one may say there have been great events even since the speech from the throne was read by the Queen, events so great as to overshadow many of our regular considerations and routine thoughts. Indeed these are stirring and challenging times, and in them petty politics and narrow partisanship seem much out of place. Our earth is now encircled by two man-made satellites, built and launched by the Soviet union. As members of the human species we are thrilled at man's conquest of the lofty heavens, and the imagination warms at the prospect of future triumphs in the vast and illimitable reaches of space. There may be things in store for us which go beyond the fondest dreams of this present moment.

Yet we feel a chill dread about the objects which are swiftly passing through the space around this earth. We wonder if this may be a prelude not to a glorious triumph of man's ingenuity, but a horrible forerunner of man's inability to live peaceably upon this green earth. Whatever else has happened we must admit that we of the western world are late in this field of space conquest. May we not be too late! The forthcoming meeting of NATO at which the leaders of the western states, including our own Prime Minister, will gather may well be a turning point. One is interested in the reaction of people in the western world to this new development. It seems to me we must strike an attitude somewhere between that of panic and that of complacency.

Indeed, linked with this scientific development there is a tremendous political campaign which is exceedingly dangerous. Mr. Khrushchev has said that the western bases in Europe are obsolete. That would be a most dangerous thing to believe. Far from being obsolete they symbolize something which is indispensable to our survival, namely the unity of nations; and I think we will see a great deal more interdependence rather than less.

I am interested in the questions that arise on this very topic from time to time. We must redouble our efforts, and we must turn into practical canons this common ideal which we share. It is not only for parliaments; it is for peoples to meet this present situation. Just the other day in that wonderful newspaper the Christian Science Monitor I read a very simple sentence which strikes me, as does so much of the writing in this paper, as clear, meaningful, and succinct. Speaking of the American people it said:

> We prefer a tax cut, we think—to a satellite or a missile—until the Russians have one. And then the heart searching begins.

This is a time, I would say, for some soul searching and heart searching not only among the people of the United States but among the allies of the United States. I think we must look very carefully into our educational system so we may meet the present challenge with strength and unity.

From that sense of urgency and common purpose about which I heard the Prime Minister speak at the United Nations some weeks ago may something come which will take us from our present position of second best. These are great and stirring days. May we all be able to measure up to our responsibilities in facing them.

Hon. James Sinclair (Coast-Capilano): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate on the address I must first warmly congratulate you on your election as Speaker of this House of Commons. It is just one month ago that the members of this house unanimously selected you to preside over our debates, and in that month you have amply justified our high hopes. You have shown a very sound knowledge of the rules of the house and, even better, a sound appreciation of the customs of this house. You have displayed a judicial attitude; you have given your rulings with firmness, but alleviated them with a very important ingredient, a sense of humour—a quality I warmly commend to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming).

Mr. Fleming: How about applying that comment to yourself?

Mr. Sinclair: You, Mr. Speaker, and I have no common political affiliation, but we have another common bond. Our mutual benefactor expressed the hope that his young scholars would esteem the performance of public duty in their later life as their highest aim. His scholars, on the whole, have done very well in later life, but not too many of them have engaged in public life. You, sir, have amply justified the hopes of Cecil Rhodes by your public service in your own city, in the legislature of your province and here in the parliament of Canada.

While speaking in this vein I think I should also congratulate the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) the two Ministers without Portfolio (Mr. Macdonnell, Mr. Browne) and the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lambert) for the way in which they too have lived up to the hopes of Cecil Rhodes.

It is customary at this time to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address. There was a special interest among the older members of this house in the speech delivered by the mover, because we all knew his father well. His father occupied a very high position in the hearts of this house. He had a very unusual gift, the gift of catching the ear of the house. New members and strangers in the gallery may have noticed at times that when some hon. members get up to speak, though they may be making a good contribution to the debate, others are slipping through the door, reading newspapers or writing letters. Then another hon. member gets up, the house fills, and all listen.

I believe the two private members who were best able to catch the ear of this house in this way were the late Art Smith and Clarence Gillis from Cape Breton South. I think this was because they spoke only on subjects which they knew well. They spoke lucidly, without bitterness or rancour, and enlivened their speeches with an occasional picturesque phrase. That is why we were so pleased to find in the first speech made by the mover of the address that he was following the example of his illustrious father. I am sure that must have been especially warming to his mother, sitting in the gallery.

I am now going to make a reference to the seconder of the address. It is understandable that the attention of older members should have been focused on the mover. I have great sympathy with the seconder, because I was in exactly the same position myself in 1940 when I seconded the address in the reply at the opening of the war parliament. The hon. member who moved the address had a distinguished father who was still in the House of Commons. Well, I think the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault) and I can console ourselves in this; we may not have been endowed with distinguished ancestors, but both of us are well blessed with a good number of lively, bright young descendants.

Now I should like to say a word to my successor in the ministry of fisheries. During the years I occupied a seat on the government side in the House of Commons I repeatedly said I was sure I had the best job in the government of Canada, in touch with an absorbing industry, an industry of ever-increasing importance in our national economy, assisted by a very able and loyal department and a devoted band of scientists, and having an extraordinarily interesting body of men to represent, the fishermen of Canada. I know my successor will get as much pleasure in grappling with the ever-increasing problems of conservation, protection, marketing, and international control of the seas as I did.

During my period of office the hon. member for Queens took an active interest in the work of the department, and I can assure him I intend to do the same during his period of responsibility. But I wish to make one special reference to his attitude in past years. I went to Russia two years ago to try to arrange for an exchange of information between the Russians and ourselves on fisheries matters, since we fish the same three oceans of the world, and a year later I had the Russian minister return to see our fishing, and especially to see the advantages of free life in Canada.

We visited Newfoundland first, and then we came to the lovely, green garden of Prince Edward Island. The government of Prince Edward Island held a state dinner, and at the state dinner the Russian guest saw for the first time something new, something they do not have in Russia, a member of the opposition, in fact the hon. member for Queens as he was at that time. I took special pains to introduce him to the Russian minister, and I explained to our visitor that this was the man opposed to me as minister, a man who was going to do his best to defeat our party and who, if this came about, would probably succeed me as minister. Mr. Ishkov agreed politely, but I imagine he was not altogether convinced and really felt that it was a "Potemkin" opposition, as the term they use in Russia goes.

A year has passed since then. I am no longer minister of fisheries and the hon. member for Queens is. I understand my friend Mr. Ishkov is no longer minister of fisheries, either. But there have been a number of other changes in Russia as well since that time. Mr. Molotov is somewhere in Outer Mongolia. Mr. Malenkov is managing a power plant in Turkestan, and Mr. Ishkov is managing a fish plant in Murmansk. Mr. Speaker, I prefer our system because I am still in parliament, not running a fish plant in Aklavik.

This debate on the address does, of course, open the whole field of public policy for debate. I had intended to speak on the financial, trade and employment policies of this government. However, it is a little difficult for me to make such a speech because we have had so little information about the financial, trade and employment policies of this government. Of course we remember the speeches made by supporters of the government when they were in opposition. We remember the many election promises they made, promises which have been singularly neglected in the House of Commons. But we find that the really important policy declarations now seem to be made either in C.B.C. broadcasts or in speeches at Oakville and Winnipeg, and we second class citizens in parliament are obliged to rely on newspaper accounts and questions on the order paper in an effort to find out what is government policy on these matters.

This does, of course, give the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce an opportunity to read once again with relish the speeches they delivered outside this house, as they did yesterday, the happy little narcissists. It may give them pleasure, but it is not very satisfactory to the other members of this house.

I had intended to speak especially on the question of unemployment. I did not hear the broadcast of the Prime Minister last week on this subject, but I read an account in the Vancouver papers last Saturday in which the Prime Minister is reported as having said that those who mention unemployment are creating a fear complex, a depression complex, casting gloom in the land. I say this is the most serious domestic problem facing Canada today, and we will spread fear and gloom if we do not discuss this matter thoroughly and frankly in the House of Commons and suggest to the government action which can be taken to curb unemployment in Canada today. We certainly are not going to solve it by ignoring it, by sweeping it under the rug.

Interestingly enough, in the same issue of the Vancouver papers there was a Canadian Press story bearing the headline, "Jobless Expected to Hit 750,000," and it starts off:

> A qualified government official predicted today unemployment this winter will likely hit at least 750,000, the highest since the end of the second world war.

This comment was made not by a Liberal member but a qualified government official. Unemployment right now is roughly double what it was in the same month a year ago. In Vancouver last week there were 20,000 registered unemployed, and in the province of British Columbia 40,000. The province of British Columbia is especially vulnerable because we are mainly producers of primary products which are sold on world markets without any protection of the tariff.

There is, of course, one great difference between the condition now and the condition in the thirties. We now do have a floor of social security which was not available to those who were unemployed in the thirties. Unemployment insurance benefits, unemployment assistance paid jointly by the federal government and the provincial governments, family allowances and the universal old age pension all put cash payments into the family group which were not available during the thirties. These, however, are no substitute for employment, and the government this winter must make every effort to maintain the highest possible level of employment.

I said I intended to speak on these subjects but I have changed the nature of my speech because of a matter which has arisen which is of concern to all members from British Columbia, members of all parties. It is a problem which concerns us and one in which we are pretty well agreed on the solution, an example of solidarity of British Columbia members irrespective of party which has been seen before in this House of Commons. Since it primarily concerns my riding, although it is also of major interest to the other members from British Columbia, I am going to try to give the house an objective account of the problem; and if I am unfair in my exposition or in my deductions I would welcome interruptions from any of the other British Columbia members on this matter.

The problem is the threatened closure at this time of Britannia Mines in British Columbia. Perhaps I should give a word or two of background. Britannia Mines is one of the great copper mines of the world. For many years it was the largest producer of copper in the British Empire. It is located 30 miles from Vancouver, in a position of some isolation. There is no road connection, and until about a year ago all communication was from the sea. They now have a rather irregular rail service provided by the P.G.E., which is still in the throes of construction in that area.

The mine has operated continuously for 55 years, and there is lots of life left in it. They still have large deposits of low-grade ore. It has always been noted in the mining world as a mine with one of the cheapest costs of operation. Over the years it has given the lead in many new mining methods. The copper is not actually smelted there. The concentrates are sent down to a smelter at Tacoma in the United States. This is an unusual mine and does not go down into the ground; rather it goes up. The mine tunnel comes in from sea level and then shafts go up 4,600 feet into the heart of this mountain, with grade levels every few hundred feet all the way up.

The mine is of special interest to me not only because I am the member representing the area but because it was in this mine that I first started to work 33 years ago. I think we all remember our first job. I remember this particularly well because my father and mother were very much opposed to my going to work in what they regarded as a very dangerous occupation. Finally, when I insisted, my father said to me, "Well, go, but you will be back within a week". If he had not said that I think I would have been back within two days, because it was hard work, but it provided a great training in mining.

It was there, too, I had my first experience with the burden of taxation, a matter which now interests me much more. British Columbia then had a law which said that every male over the age of 18 who did not support a family had to pay a $5 poll tax. I was not 18 at the time; rather, I was 16. However, in order to work underground I had stretched my age to 18, so I was nicked for this $5 poll tax which I thought was most unjust. It took ten hours of work to pay the $5 poll tax, but of course that was my fault because I had stretched my age to 18. Since my first experience with taxation I have always felt that most taxes would be better spent if left in the pockets of the taxpayers.

The mine has been a great training ground for successive generations of engineers in western Canada. Today the mine is not on the early scale, when it employed over 2,000 miners; but it still employs 800 miners. The whole community contains 1,650 people or 312 families. The monthly payroll today averages just under $300,000 and the monthly supply bill spent by the company in Vancouver averages $150,000 a month. Over the years the company has produced almost $400 million of copper wealth. It has paid heavy taxes both federally and provincially.

Over the last year there have been extraordinary fluctuations in the price of copper on the world markets, the New York export market and the London metal market. There was a high of 47 cents and a low last month of 22.175 cents. The break-even point for the Britannia operation is 30 cents, and when copper declined below this price last May the company started losing money. Last August the price declined to 25½ cents, which was 4½ cents below the break-even point, and the company began to lose between $70,000 and $80,000 a month.

The company wanted to stay in operation and went to the mine-mill union and asked them to share this loss by taking a 15 per cent cut in wages. The company said if they closed down the mine with the expectation of reopening again it would cost them between $35,000 and $40,000 a month, so they were prepared to assume a loss of that proportion providing the union took a 15 per cent cut in wages as their contribution to maintaining employment in this mine.

The union pointed out that their present wage scale was below the wage scale in most other mines because of the difficult position at Britannia. The union leaders said they did not feel a wage cut at this time was the real answer. It would result, of course, in lower purchasing power for that group, which would be reflected in Vancouver, and it would probably lead to other cuts in other mines around the country and start a spiral of deflation.

The press accounts to the effect that the union had refused to take a wage cut to maintain employment did lose public sympathy. The press accounts were most unfair, because the union did better than take a wage cut. The union pointed out that it was not a cut in wages that the company wanted, it was a cut in the cost of producing copper; and the best way to achieve that, they said, was not to reduce the take-home pay of the miners but to have the miners work longer and harder and so cut the unit cost of production in that way.

This is what the union agreed to do last summer. They agreed, first of all, to forgo taking a 5 cent wage increase which was embodied in a two-year contract signed a year earlier. Secondly, they agreed to work a basic 44-hour week instead of the 40-hour week provided in their contract and under provincial law. They agreed, too, to an alteration in the working time of the miners. The men who regularly worked under what are called portal to portal agreements, who got 42 hours' pay for 38 hours' work, now agreed to work 42 hours for 42 hours' pay.

The most important concession the union made was to waive what are called punitive rates for work on Saturday and Sunday, time and a half pay if they were called upon to work on Saturdays and Sundays. This actually means that the men do not work on Saturdays and Sundays, which after all is what the men really want. Work in a mining community is generally done in continuous shifts, day, afternoon and graveyard shifts, and these shifts rotate during the course of the month. There are few times when all the community is free to take part in a normal sort of community life together, which makes life in Canada so pleasant; but by having a closure such as this, with Saturday and Sunday off because of the extra pay the company would have to pay to keep the mine in operation on these days, they did enjoy on the week ends the community life which is taken for granted by most other Canadians.

The importance of this concession to the company was that they could now run seven days a week, 24 hours a day, and so get full value out of the very costly capital equipment in the mine and in the mill. It was last August that the union and the company agreed to this program, and the price of copper was then 25½ cents a pound. The company and the union agreed to make all these concessions for one year or until copper had climbed back to 30 cents, the break-even point. During the month of August the union leaders met members from all four parties in Vancouver to explain what they were doing. The members also wanted to meet the management of the mine. We met them the day following and they explained the situation from their point of view, and assured us that they did want to keep the mine in operation. It was not a shortage of ore but rather the depressed price that was the reason for the present crisis.

After that meeting the members present sent a wire to the federal Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois). Perhaps I should read it:

August 26

As there is serious danger of unemployment in base metal industries because of depressed prices, the following British Columbia members of parliament urge that the federal government be prepared to take emergency action to keep the base metal mines operating.

This wire was signed by Messrs. Taylor, Vancouver-Burrard; Winch, Vancouver East; McLeod, Okanagan-Revelstoke; MacDonald, Vancouver-Kingsway; Irwin, Burnaby-Richmond; Hahn, New Westminster; Herridge, Kootenay West; Christian, Okanagan Boundary; Sinclair, Coast-Capilano; Regier, Burnaby-Coquitlam; and Broome, Vancouver South.

With this agreement the mine continued in operation and the program achieved the success which was hoped for. I do not think there was much enthusiasm at national headquarters of the union for this plan which had been worked out, waiving the agreement, to work longer hours and to cut out over-time pay, but the local union leaders did support it in the hope of maintaining employment.

Because of the men's extra efforts the break-even price of the cost of production at the Britannia mine fell from 30 cents to 27.9 cents a pound and the United States smelter, which smelts the concentrates, joined in to help this program by cutting their smelter costs half a cent a pound, getting the break-even cost down to 27.4 cents a pound. The company absorbed the remainder of the loss, amounting to about $40,000 a month. Unfortunately, however, since last August world copper prices have declined still further to a low of 22.175 cents, and that meant additional losses to the company of about $80,000 a month or a million dollars a year.

The company have now given notice to the union that they cannot afford to carry on with these losses unless some other form of assistance can be given. It is the feeling of the British Columbia members of all parties that since the company, the smelter and the men have done their best to keep the mine going, the 800 men employed and the community of 1,600 happy, the federal and provincial governments must now assist.

Let me turn to what would happen if the mine were forced to close at the end of the month. Eight hundred men would lose employment, and with 20,000 already unemployed in Vancouver everyone in our province knows that they have no real hope of getting employment this winter. They could, of course, go on unemployment insurance, because they all have full coverage.

It is more than only this unemployment at Britannia. The ratio of population to primary workers in our industrial towns in British Columbia is about five to one or six to one. At the great pulp and paper company at Powell River and the great smelter at Trail the population is of the order of about six times the number of men actually engaged in the mill. In Britannia it is only two to one because all the other service works, ancillary industries, are in Vancouver; so that in addition to the unemployment in Britannia an equal amount of unemployment will develop in Vancouver because of the closing down of this big industry.

Housing is another problem. The people today are all satisfactorily housed up there. The single men are in good bunk houses, in single rooms, and the married people in 312 houses at rents which range from $7.50 to $20 a month. Last year the company finished 33 new, modern houses in addition, which is evidence that the mine is not worked out. The company would never have spent such an amount of money if the mine were worked out. If the mine shuts down these people will have to be evacuated from their homes because there will be no power, no light, no water and no snow plowing, and they will have to try to find housing in Vancouver, which is a very difficult thing to do these days. It is very costly, and it will drain them of their savings.

Let me take a look at the economic loss if this mine is forced to close. Today these men pay $35,000 a month in personal income tax. If they go on unemployment insurance the very minimum will be $80,000 a month which will be drained out of the unemployment insurance fund. The loss to the people of Britannia means the loss of their homes, the loss of their employment and they will have to move to Vancouver, with the consequent drain on their personal savings. The social loss is the difference between being gainfully employed and idle.

What can be done? One suggestion was that the government should stockpile copper. That is not supported by most mining people. Most of the troubles in the copper industry have come about through governments stockpiling, which drew copper away from industrial users and which then artificially stimulated the price up to 47 cents, which in turn brought a lot of very low-grade holes in the ground into production. Then the price began to collapse and government stockpiles were dumped on the market which, of course, brought an all-time low price of 22 cents a pound.

Floor prices were suggested. Well, floor prices may be the answer in agriculture and fishing in Canada, but they are not the answer as far as copper is concerned because we produce only 7 per cent of the copper of the world, and a floor price would be of assistance to all the mines, the mines which do not need help as well as those which do.

The third possibility is a direct subsidy to this mine to restore the position to that of last August, when the company and the union reached their agreement. The price of copper was then 25½ cents a pound. That would mean a 2½ cents a pound subsidy today. The monthly production of this mine is 1½ million pounds of copper. It would cost the government $37,500 a month at the present price to restore conditions to where they were last August. If copper continued to climb in price, of course, that subsidy would decline in amount.

What would this payment achieve? Well, socially it would keep 800 men in this community of 1,650 gainfully employed, living in their present homes, continuing their community activities and producing a needed commodity, copper. They would continue their schools, their churches and their little hospital up there. It would also continue employment in Vancouver for those other industries which supply the mine.

Last week I had meetings at the mine with these workers and their wives, and one thing that struck me about the group there was that they were the oldest group of miners I have ever seen in Canada, and I have visited over the years most of the main mining properties in Canada. Britannia is a stable community 55 years in operation. The miners who were working when I started to work there 33 years ago are still in the company employ; their whole life is there, and if they lose employment at this time there is very little opportunity for them at their age ever to regain work in mining.

Economically, such a subsidy would maintain a payroll of $300,000 a month at Britannia, along with expenditures by the company alone of $150,000 a month in Vancouver. It would mean that the government would still get $35,000 a month in income tax from these employed miners. It would save a drain of $80,000 per month at least on the unemployment insurance fund.

There is a precedent for such aid. In 1948, under similar circumstances, the former government brought in the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, not to help the mines but to maintain employment in these northern gold mining towns where the mines were finding the fixed price of gold and mounting costs made mining uneconomic. We split the cost roughly between the mines and the government. The program has enabled these mines to stay in operation, maintaining employment and housing. The cost of this program last year was $12 million.

The subvention paid to maritime coal mines is a similar piece of legislation which has enabled the maritime coal mines to stay in operation. Today the Prime Minister announced the extension of that policy to apply to coal mined in the maritimes and used in the maritimes. We supported that. Another example is the guaranteed price for uranium until 1962, which has enabled the great development at Blind River to go ahead, a further example of direct government assistance of this type in the field of mining.

We have many more precedents in other fields. Price supports for farmers are an example of the same principle. Price supports for fishermen have been paid on the prairies, the great lakes and the Atlantic provinces. Fortunately they have never been needed in British Columbia. The subsidy to the railways for the bridge across northern Ontario; subsidies to the steamship companies for maintaining operations on our two coasts, are other examples. The British Columbia members have, in general, supported all these precedents I have mentioned. Last week we all voted, for example, for cash advances to prairie farmers. We want to help the primary producers in every part of Canada. Now we do expect the government to take action to help this particular group of primary producers in our own area.

Yesterday the British Columbia members met the leaders of the miners' union and passed a resolution which was sent to the cabinet, supporting the proposal of the miners' union that this subsidy be paid. Of course the Minister of Finance will immediately raise the question, will this policy have to be extended to other base metal mines? There are two other major producers of copper in the country, International Nickel and Noranda. Both these companies are in a very happy profit position. International Nickel, of course, has the nickel market as its primary source of profit. Noranda has a complex manufacturing industry as well as mines. There are one or two small copper properties, but they have high grade copper and are making money. The best evidence of that is that all these other copper mines in the last year have granted substantial pay increases to their miners, in contrast to Britannia where the miners have taken substantial cuts. The director of the mine and mill union assures us he knows of no other copper mine in this predicament. So far as the lead and zinc mines are concerned, their problem will arise next year if the United States does raise the tariff on lead and zinc.

We all know the tendency of people to lean on the government in time of trouble. The Britannia miners, however, can come to the government in this respect with clean hands, because they have tried to help themselves. If it had not been for the continued drop in copper prices the arrangement they worked out last summer would have been sufficient. It is true that another government has a responsibility, because the provincial government has the primary control over mining. The provincial government receives a royalty, of course, on all mining production, and they get a 5 per cent sales tax on all purchases. I feel a joint program should be worked out between the federal and provincial governments.

I believe we British Columbia members regard this as a key case, not of mining but of employment. If government action is taken in this key case it will certainly do a great deal to dispel the gloom and despair of many people who are unemployed, and others in British Columbia who are fearing unemployment. We have acute unemployment problems in British Columbia.

I think the satisfactory solution of this particular problem could well be the signpost of government action. If the mine closes down I am afraid a lot of people in British Columbia will regard this as a return to the thinking of the thirties, when the relief camp was the only answer to unemployment. If, however, direct government action keeps this mine in operation, in conjunction with the sacrifices already made by the company, by the smelter and by the miners, it will be a very positive approach. It will be heartening to all British Columbians. It makes good sense economically, because a $37,000 monthly subsidy keeps $35,000 in income tax payments rolling in and saves $80,000 per month in unemployment insurance benefits.

It is because of this that the British Columbia members of all parties have sent a letter to the Prime Minister supporting the presentation which was made by the union to the government this morning. I think I can speak on behalf of them all in urging the government to give prompt and favourable consideration to this positive approach to help unemployment in British Columbia at this time.

Mr. Hahn: Before the hon. member takes his seat I wonder if he would entertain a question. What would be the effect on the mine itself if it were to close, that is on a long-range basis? Would the mine be reopened, or could it be reopened?

Mr. Sinclair: The Britannia is an old mine and a very wet mine. There is a great deal of water in British Columbia, as the hon. member knows. If the mine were closed for any length of time it would be very difficult and costly to reopen it. The company would hope to reopen it, because they would hope to maintain it. It would be a difficult proposition if they had to close down, because of the nature of the mine and the nature of the ground.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, on this occasion I should like to speak about two matters. One is unemployment and the other is related to it, that is, some of our industries in Canada. During the session this year members from all parts of the house have been indicating to us and to you, sir, the ever-growing unemployment problem. The speech to which we have just listened was an excellent account of some of the unemployment conditions occurring in British Columbia. I believe this situation applies not only to British Columbia but to the whole of Canada.

I am afraid the reason for this condition is not any local situation, because the condition is general across the whole country. Of course it is my opinion, and I think the opinion of authorities across Canada, that one of the greatest causes contributing toward this unemployment problem is the financial system under which we are operating; that is, the present financial system followed by the Conservative party and which was carried on by the Liberal party. It is the tight money policy which is causing a great deal of the disturbance throughout the whole of the nation.

In this regard I should like to refer to an article which I read in the Gazette of Tuesday, November 12, 1957. The headline reads "Montreal Economist Raps Juggling; Ottawa Tight Money Policy Contributes to Recession". The article reads:

> Canadian monetary policy "has certainly contributed to the recession we now are in," J. R. Petrie, Montreal consulting economist, said today in an address to the annual tax conference of the Canadian tax foundation.
> "I do not," he added, "place the whole blame for this recession on monetary policy, but a determined enough credit squeeze can take the froth off any boom, and cause a downward swing in economic activity."

Then farther down in the article he said:

> "It is true that many prices are still rising, but if this be inflation it is not the kind of inflation we had five years ago when the pressure on prices was caused by a shortage of goods in relation to demand. There are no shortages now."

A little further on he said:

> Maintenance of tight money is not going to solve the cost-price-push. While I am not satisfied that easier money will stop this recession now, I am convinced that the maintenance of existing monetary policy will aggravate both its amplitude and existing.

Then he ended up in this way:

> I am in full sympathy with maritime business and political leaders who protest against tight money.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that when authorities of that kind attribute our recession—I suppose they hesitate to use the word "recession"—to the tight money policy, considerable attention should be given to that matter. The members of the Social Credit party in this house have on many occasions gone into this problem. The hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) has dealt with it in detail on several occasions. Not only this year but in years gone by he has pointed out the dangers of such a monetary trend and indicated that the result would be universal unemployment.

Of course that is the thing that is happening now. From the hon. member who has just spoken we have had an account of how the mining industries in British Columbia are collapsing. How the lumber industry has collapsed has been pointed out by others. Then we have the example of secondary industries closing across the country, creating more unemployment; and particularly we have the coal industry in western Canada, of which I will speak in a little bit more detail later on, closing and that too causing a continuation and accelaration of the recession.

It cannot be said that this unemployment problem we have been facing is of a local nature because it has been unquestionably pointed out:

> Canada's unemployment total, usually stable at this time of the year, jumped by 20,000 during September to 194,000. The jobless represent 3.2 per cent of the labour force, almost double the 1.7 per cent of a year ago. At the same time there were 5,854,000 persons with jobs, a drop of 103,000 from the previous month's record total of 5,957,000.

This is not the opinion of myself. It is borne out most emphatically by a release which we received the other day from the Department of Labour and the bureau of statistics dated October 23 which has this to say, and I am quoting from this report:

The number of persons without jobs and seeking work, which usually remains relatively stable at this time of year, increased by 20,000 during the month to 194,000, representing 3.2 per cent of the labour force, compared with 1.7 per cent a year earlier.

Then down further they have this to say about this alarming situation:

Unemployment in September was still considerably higher than last year in virtually all local labour markets.

That is the statement which was given by the government, or by the Department of Labour and the dominion bureau of statistics. This unemployment is being experienced, as I indicated, in British Columbia, in the Atlantic provinces, in the central provinces and in western Canada. I have literally hundreds of newspaper clippings which I have saved over the last three or four months and which indicate that this problem is ever increasing. Let me just give you one or two. I have many more, but I do not want to take up the time of the house by reading them all. Here is one I have from the Albertan of Monday, September 16, 1957. It reads in part as follows:

Initial and renewal claims for unemployment insurance benefits in July totalled 117,107, an increase of 55 per cent over last year's corresponding total and an advance of 30 per cent over the June figure.

You will note, Mr. Speaker, that the increase has been most rapid since June 10. I am not implying that the present government is responsible for all this situation, but I am pointing out most definitely that they have now had an opportunity to tackle this problem but that so far their policies have not been any different in this respect than those of the Liberals who preceded them. Here is another clipping which is headed "Fears Bad Lay-off in Construction," and which reads in part as follows:

Ottawa (CP)—Raymond Brunet of Hull, Quebec, past president of the Canadian Construction Association, says one-quarter of Canada's construction labour force of 550,000 may be out of work between December 15 and March 31.

Then here is another one from my own province. It is from the Calgary Herald of Wednesday, October 21, 1957. It is headed "Cement Plant Lays Off 97" and it reads in part as follows:

Shortage of orders led to a lay-off of 97 workers Tuesday at the manufacturing plant of Canada Cement Company Limited in Exshaw.

The measure was taken to reduce the number of shifts being worked at the plant from three to two daily. Duration of the lay-off is not yet determined.

As was pointed out in one of the articles I read, this recession is different from the one during the hungry thirties because then there was a shortage of goods. There is no shortage of goods now. Certainly there are inflated prices, but there is no shortage of consumer goods. One of the causes of the increase in prices, of course, is the tight money policy which was started by the Liberals and pursued by them, and which is being continued without interruption by this present government.

If we are going to look for the causes of this general recession across the country we had better look to that cause at which all the authorities are pointing, namely the financial system in this country. The premier of New Brunswick, Mr. Flemming, indicated this not so long ago when he was pointing out the deplorable economic conditions in his province. The Social Credit members have pointed it out on a number of occasions here in this house. It is time the government began to take some cognizance of this fact and see what can be done.

I think one of the reasons for the unemployment problem, and which has its bearing on the tight money policy, are the unusually high interest rates which are being charged industry. Of course those interest rates always go into prices, thus making it much more difficult for our people in this country to buy the goods which are produced. Then, of course, as unemployment continues prices remain high, fewer consumer goods are produced, more people are on the unemployment lists and so the vicious cycle continues.

One of the reasons we have been able to hold our head up as high and as long as we have, of course, is the tremendous amount of credit buying that has taken place across this country. Credit buying has amounted in the last year to about $2\frac{3}{4}$ billion. That credit buying is certainly not going to help the economy for any length of time, because when people are short of purchasing power, when they lose their jobs and have their incomes cut and then are obliged to revert to credit buying or buying on the instalment plan, their prices are greatly increased. The interest rates on this credit extension in a great number of cases have amounted to anywhere from 5 per cent to 50 per cent, and the ones who are being hit the hardest are those who are in the unfortunate position of having no jobs at all or on fixed incomes.

What have this government been doing to solve the unemployment problem? Have they a policy which is going to solve this serious condition? My mind goes back to the action this government took just the other day when the seamen in the Montreal area went on strike for higher wages. I am not at this point taking any part on the side of the unions or anybody else's side. I am just pointing out the condition as it exists. The seamen went on strike for an increase in pay. The government immediately brought forth what I suppose they considered an appropriate solution, and so they permitted eight vessels of Canadian National Steamships, a government owned crown corporation, to be transferred to foreign registry. The ships will be registered at Port of Spain, Trinidad. The company stated that by doing this they will be able to compete with other shipping companies who are hiring foreigners on their ships at lower rates of pay, and this government is a partner in that action.

Perhaps some of the members of this house have never been to the West Indies. It was my privilege to visit that area about a year ago, and I am going to say to the members of this parliament that Canadian National Steamships will have no difficulty whatsoever in getting lots of cheap labour anywhere in the West Indies. When we made that trip throughout the West Indies we stopped at nearly all the ports which were doing business with the commonwealth, and on every occasion when we stopped at these ports the docks were just lined with workers, hundreds of them, seeking employment. I have never visited a place where the economic conditions were as low as they are in the West Indies and, make no mistake about it, Canadian National Steamship Company, as far as employment on these eight ships is concerned, will be able to get a lot of cheap labour.

The distressing part of this whole thing is that here we have the government of this country in an effort to solve their internal unemployment problems saying in effect to the working people of this country, "If you do not lower your standard of living and accept lower wages then we will get foreigners to take your jobs." I do not think anything could be more deplorable. The government is saying in effect to all industries in this country that one of the ways to lower their costs and, incidentally, to increase their profits is to hire foreign labour. You might as well go out and lower your immigration barriers and allow foreigners to come in and absorb the work which Canadians are doing.

That is not the solution. What is going to be the result? The result will be, as in the seamen's strike, that all these men will be thrown out of work, their families will no longer have the pay cheques coming in each month, and their standard of living will be reduced considerably—almost to nil—with their purchasing power gone.

They will be buying less consumer goods. Of course, there again is a vicious cycle; less purchasing power, less consumer goods used, less production from the industries and then, naturally, more unemployment. That is not the way, surely, to solve our internal unemployment problems, and the government must accept a portion of the blame because they were the ones who permitted this action to be taken. I cannot help but think that this action on the part of the Conservative party smacks very largely of what happened in the hungry thirties. We had unemployment problems then, and when the unemployed of western Canada decided to come down to Ottawa and complain they were stopped at Regina by the police. I will not go into the treatment they were given; I will not expand on that but unfortunately, although it may be a coincidence, that was the time when the Conservative government was in power under the former prime minister, Right Hon. R. B. Bennett.

Is that going to be the policy of this government? It certainly looks like it, because it smacks most strongly of the iron hand for our unemployed. I think there could be some alleviation of this problem, but before I go on to a different angle of my talk may I call it one o'clock.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I was about to branch out into another topic, namely the subject of industry in Canada. I think one of the things which would help solve our unemployment problem in this country would be for the government to embark on a determined plan to decentralize industry. This question has been brought before the house on a number of occasions in days gone by but too little attention has been paid to it, with the result that most of our industries are concentrated in the two central provinces of Ontario and Quebec because of a number of factors which give these two provinces an advantage with regard to the employment of people as compared with other parts of the country.

One of the factors which has prevented industry from locating in the Atlantic and western provinces is the discriminatory freight rate system we have in this country. We in the province of Alberta have felt this discrimination keenly over a number of years. We have the highest freight rates in Canada, and industry is therefore hesitant about moving to that part of the country to establish factories. It is impossible for industries in the west to compete with industries located in central Canada while they have to pay such exorbitantly high freight rates. It is not a good thing for the country as a whole, either from an economic standpoint or from the point of view of national defence, that industries should be concentrated so heavily in the two central provinces. It would be an easy matter for the enemy to ruin us in a few months with the help of modern weapons now at their disposal.

Another reason it has been difficult to establish industries in western Canada is the tariff structure. Industries which have settled in central Canada enjoy a very high degree of tariff protection while industries in other parts of Canada have very little. I am thinking especially of the agricultural industry in western Canada. The agricultural industry has no tariff protection, or very little. Certainly there is no tariff protection with regard to wheat. The farmers must sell their wheat on the open market and buy all the goods they require on a protected market.

This is particularly true in respect of our coal industry, and I want to spend a little time in considering the coal industry not only in western Canada, Alberta and Drumheller in my riding, but in all other parts of Canada as well.

It is true that both the present government and the government which preceded it have been applying the principle of subsidies. Quite clearly the application of subsidies alone has not been sufficient to enable industries in other parts of Canada to compete against those of the two central provinces. That is particularly true in the case of coal. As I say, the government's policy has not changed. It is true that in one or two instances there have been increases in subsidies. The Prime Minister mentioned something of this sort this morning while he was speaking about the provinces of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and I expect the position in those two provinces will be somewhat eased as a result. But we in the west have found that the subsidies which have been provided are not sufficient to keep our coal industry alive.

The coal industry is essential to Canada, particularly in wartime. This was brought home to us during the last war when the United States government refused to ship us any coal, and we had to depend upon our own resources. Had we found ourselves then in the same position as we find ourselves today, we should have been in a very difficult situation indeed because today our mines are rapidly closing out not only in the west but in other parts of Canada as well.

When I speak of tariffs I am not unmindful of the fact that a certain amount of tariff protection is good. What I am complaining about is the unequal tariff protection which results in a situation in which almost the only industries which enjoy protection are the large manufacturing industries concentrated in Ontario and Quebec. The coal mining industry has no such protection, yet little has been done about it. I have myself brought the question before the house many times and other hon. members have done the same, but so far nothing has been done which would stimulate the growth of this industry.

Only the other day, on November 4, the Calgary Herald carried a report of a speech by Mr. C. V. Daniels, president of the Calgary chamber of commerce, in which he said that the Alberta coal industry is in an extremely depressed state because of declining markets for its products in Canada and elsewhere. Mr. James J. Part, the city manager of Drumheller, also pointed out the need for decentralization of industry and for some assistance to be given to the coal mining industry in that area. He pointed out that Drumheller is an excellent spot—and so it is—for the establishment of industry if some of the obstacles to which I have referred were removed. Down in the valley there we have the largest supply of coal in Canada. In Alberta there is over 48 billion tons of coal, yet our mines are being closed year after year at an ever-increasing rate. As I say, we have plenty of coal in the Drumheller area—cheap coal, too, for industrial use. We have electric power; we have a mighty river running through the area; we have gas and oil, all the inducements which would encourage industry to locate there. If some attention were given by this government to the decentralization of industry and to the changing of our present unfair tariff structure, a great deal would be done to encourage such relocation.

I noticed that the other day when I asked the Minister of Transport about this question he seemed unsure about whether there was any undue discrimination in Canadian freight rates. The minister has been here a long time and has heard a good many of us speak on this question in the house, and if he does not know that now he had better get acquainted with his department soon.

The other day I wrote a letter to the dominion coal board asking for some information on this subject, and they produced some figures from the bureau of statistics and sent them over to me. With the permission of the house I should like to have this short table put on record in Hansard.

Mr. Speaker: What is the source of the table?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): It is from the coal board, Mr. Speaker, and these figures, supplied by the dominion bureau of statistics, refer to coal production.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member permission to have this table inserted in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): The table is as follows:

Coal Production in Canada

	8 mos. Jan.-Aug. 1957	1956	Cal. Year 1956
Nova Scotia	3,716,765	3,895,816	5,775,025
New Brunswick	589,936	627,068	985,290
Saskatchewan	1,174,140	1,200,403	2,341,641
Alberta bituminous	798,179	1,372,671	2,064,403
sub-bituminous	903,103	1,113,949	2,264,284
British Columbia	728,925	1,006,267	1,481,891
Total	7,911,048	9,216,174	14,912,534

I will refer to the table only briefly, then; but I should like to point out that in Alberta alone so far as coal production is concerned, in the first eight months from January to August, 1957,—I am referring to Alberta bituminous—we produced 798,179 tons. In the same period in 1956 we produced 1,372,671 tons, a drop in the first eight months of this year of 574,492 tons. In 1957 Alberta produced 903,103 tons of sub-bituminous coal, while in 1956 we produced 1,113,949 tons, a drop of 210,846, or a total drop of 785,338 tons. That shows the extent to which our coal industry is being destroyed in western Canada. Total coal production in Canada for the first eight months, January to August, 1957, was 7,911,048 tons and in the same period in 1956 it was 9,216,174 tons, which indicates there has been a drop in the first eight months of this year amounting to 1,305,126 tons. This has been going on year after year, until finally our mines are in a deplorable state.

The other day the hon. member for Red Deer asked some questions in the house and received answers. The questions were as follows:

During each of the calendar years commencing January 1, 1952, what was:

1. The total number of coal mines in operation in Alberta?
2. The total tonnage of coal produced in Alberta?
3. The number of Alberta coal mines which ceased operation?
4. The total tonnage of coal imported into Canada?

[Mr. Johnston (Bow River).]

The answers received by the hon. member were as follows:

	1952	1953	1954	1955	1956
1.	157	146	136	116	104
2.	7,194,472	5,917,423	4,859,136	4,456,578	4,329,639
3.	18	19	35	16	19
4.	24,932,853	23,265,541	18,579,989	19,742,531	22,613,374

If you consult these figures, Mr. Speaker, you will observe that from 1955 to 1956 we had a decrease in Alberta production of over 127,139 tons. From the answer to the third question it can be seen that every year we have had a great number of mines closing. I do not have the figures for 1957, but for the years I have dealt with it is shown that an average of more than 20 mines in Alberta closed each year because they lacked markets.

Hon. members will notice that imports of coal from the United States in 1955 totalled 19,742,531 and in 1956 totalled 22,613,374, which represents an increase in imports from the United States of 2,870,843 tons; and there is nothing to indicate that the imports for 1957 will not exceed those of the past two years.

What is the result of all this? Because we are using so much coal imported from the United States we are giving the people of that country employment in their coal mines, while at the very same time we are destroying our Canadian mines and putting our own people out of work, thereby aggravating the unemployment problem here in Canada.

A subsidy offers some relief, but it is only a palliative. Two per cent of Ontario's total requirements last year came from the western provinces and 98 per cent from the United States. Forty-two per cent of Quebec's total requirements came from the eastern provinces and 58 per cent from the United States. Ontario is our natural market. I think some attention should be given to the Canadian coal industry.

As I say, a subsidy is not enough and it will not solve our problem. We could very easily see to it that imports of coal from the United States were cut down a little. Last year they shipped in over 22 million tons for sale in the Ontario market. If we were to give the Canadian mines only 2 million tons of this 22 million which is imported from the United States it would not hurt the United States economy at all, and would serve to bring back to life our own Canadian market.

What we need most of all is a national fuel policy, one that will provide employment for our own people and protect this country in time of war. If we were to reduce our United States imports by just two million tons as I suggest this would give our own people the employment that is so greatly needed to keep our coal industry alive. It would revive the western coal industry and also give the Atlantic provinces the stimulus required to revive their coal industry. In short, let us make Canada for Canadians and not so much for foreigners.

(Translation):

Mr. M. J. A. Lambert (Edmonton West): Mr. Speaker, as a new member, may I congratulate you on the honour conferred upon you by this house in choosing you as its Speaker. It is an honour which assuredly reflects the high regard which hon. members have for you. Your thorough knowledge of both languages will no doubt prove a great asset in carrying out your responsibilities, and this ability is more particularly appreciated by us, who speak both French and English. May I also point out that, since the opening of this session, I have been agreeably surprised to find that so many English-speaking members, especially on this side of the house, have shown remarkable familiarity with the French language. Let us hope that their number will increase with the growing realization, by every one, of the advantages of being bilingual.

I should like to quote from an article which appeared in a bulletin entitled "Industry" published by the Canadian Manufacturers Association, and which I am translating as follows:

"French and English are in fact the two official languages of Canada, but the proportion of Canadians who can speak both is unfortunately small, barely twelve per cent. Of the remaining 88 per cent, 67 speak English but no French; 20 understand French and not English, and one person in a hundred speaks neither language.

It is imperative that we do better than that before we can genuinely feel that we have reached the status of an indivisible nation. There should not be a single English-speaking Canadian who does not have some knowledge of French, no more than there should be a single French-speaking Canadian unfamiliar with English; because a Canadian who, for some reason or other, lacks a good command of both official languages of his country is not only the poorer, in the matter of language, but he is, in fact, divorced from several million of his fellow-citizens, and all the obstacles to an efficient and true unity are in this way, much more real. At this time, when students of all ages have registered for a new term in our schools, colleges and universities, it seems particularly fitting that we give some thought to those matters."

Mr. Speaker, I would also like to congratulate your deputy, the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Courtemanche) whose geniality and poise so eminently fit him for this position. May I also, like all those who preceded me, tender my congratulations to my good friend the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith) for his contribution in moving the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Though he hails from a locality scarcely known to the people of Edmonton, he has been to me, for many years, a colleague for whose judgment and experience I have the highest regard. By the same token, I commend the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault) for his excellent speech when seconding the motion of the hon. member for Calgary South.

It would indeed be ungrateful on my part to pursue my remarks without expressing my sincere thanks to the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) for appointing me parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes). Like so many others in this house, I am a veteran of the second world war. While I do not claim to be an expert in the matter, I may say that I take a great interest in national defence. I acknowledge my shortcomings, my limitations, but I should like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that I could not have found greater satisfaction than in working under the direction of the hon. Minister of National Defence. As was stated previously in the house, he can be described as being unfailingly a gentleman in the true sense of the word. I am very grateful to the hon. members opposite for referring to him in those terms.

Mr. Speaker, it was more than sixty years ago that my father, then eighteen, left his birthplace in the county of Terrebonne, and went to Edmonton, which at the time was a little known still less developed district. A little later, his family followed him. Young though it is, western Canada has its traditions. My grandfather was Conservative member for St. Albert in the last parliament of the Northwest Territories, in Regina, from 1901 to 1904. Most of this constituency is now part of the one I represent. The village of St. Albert, a monument to venerable Father Lacombe, that pioneer missionary of western Canada, is now on the threshold of promising development, after lying dormant for nearly fifty years. A great construction and modernization project is contemplated, and I should like here to wish my electors from St. Albert every success in their undertakings.

I should like to point out that Alberta has some sixty thousand French-speaking citizens. However, no more than about 4,000 of them live in my constituency, which has a total population of nearly 120,000. The fact remains that I was elected in Edmonton West because I was bilingual, because, you see, where I come from, we all feel united. In voting for me the people of Edmonton West did not feel they were supporting a member of a party which practices disunity. So I would suggest to the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), who, unfortunately is not here at the moment, as well as to the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) and others, to go out west and find out for themselves about the views of the French-speaking population there.

Mr. Speaker, they would be amazed to learn that those people do not share the opinion expressed the other day by these gentlemen. Though a small minority, we have lived in co-operation and harmony with our neighbours. If those hon. members would only lift their noses out of the mud with which they are trying to cloud the waters of national unity, they would realize that the Conservatives are recognized as a national party which is consistently working for the unity of this country. The enthusiasm with which the hon. members opposite greeted the inanities we heard the other day about national unity, and which were repeated more recently in Joliette, just shows to what extent the principles held by the Liberal party are bankrupt. The same applies to the emphasis laid on the so-called Diefenbaker-Duplessis axis. For want of something better, it has become the cry of despair of the Liberal party.

If I may venture a suggestion, let them come out of their shells; let them travel in the rest of Canada. They will be welcomed with kindness, especially out west, for our hospitality is well known, but I assure you, Mr. Speaker, they will listen to a few home truths.

People come over from Quebec each year to visit us, and in my opinion they realize that harmony can prevail among people of different races and different faiths without their indulging in snide remarks or bickering. Liberal members have but to look at us, sitting on this side of the house, and they will see an example of the national unity of races and religions. The Conservative party derives its strength from all sources. We are Anglo Saxons, French Canadians (and it should not be forgotten that we got 575,000 votes in the province of Quebec on June 10), Ukrainians, Scandinavians, Italians, Chinese . . . Is that evidence of disunity?

(Text):

I had the opportunity to congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago on your election as Speaker of this house. May I be permitted a moment of personal gratification. I join you, sir, in this house not only as a fellow member of Hertford college, Oxford, but with considerable satisfaction as one of that body of Rhodes scholars who are members of this house. Amongst these scholars we number you, Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton), the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne), both members of the treasury benches—and I should like to welcome back to this house the hon. member for St. John's West—and on the other side of the house there is the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair), also a former occupant of the treasury benches. Recently we were pleased to read that another Rhodes scholar had achieved distinction in the person of Mr. Justice St. Germain, whose appointment to the supreme court of Quebec province will be welcomed by all.

I would say also that I have been more than ordinarily surprised at the large number of Rhodes scholars who occupy high positions of trust in the government of Canada. Indeed, if one looks at the list of Canadian Rhodes scholars and assesses their achievements as a whole, one cannot have but a feeling of satisfaction at the fulfilment of the trust and expectations of the administrators of the Rhodes trust in approving their choice of scholars. You, sir, have been secretary for the Rhodes trust of this country for many years, and you know whereof I speak.

If I may be permitted, Mr. Speaker, I should like to urge upon the members of this house that, should the occasion arise, they recommend that young, promising students of this country strive for Rhodes scholarships in order to gain an education that, in my very humble opinion, is on a par with, and in many respects and in the minds of many superior to that which can be obtained anywhere else. In so doing they may assure to this country in some measure a source of leaders as well in industry as in the professions and public life. It may be said that Canadian Rhodes scholars as a whole fulfilled the vision of Cecil Rhodes in establishing these scholarships.

As a new member of this house, Mr. Speaker, I of course had my first impressions from the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I am astounded and somewhat disappointed in the attitude of many of the members, particularly those opposite. We have heard recitations of serious ruin in so many constituencies. Surely this country has not reached its present eminent position because of all these disasters, either actual or predicted, about which some members appear to be concerned. I would have thought that it was the function of a member not only to have the nature and status of his constituency in its proper perspective, but to tell the rest of the people of Canada what his own people were doing rather than what they were not doing. It is not in the spirit of pessimism that we must approach our functions as members of this house.

I am not by that saying there are no problems, some grave and some of a more minor nature, which exist in this country today. Problems have existed in the past; they exist now, and they will exist in the future. We were not born into a paradise, a sort of Shangri-la, where life would go on serenely at all times. The fortunes of this country and its achievements have not been built by Canadian people who, every time some difficulty arose, cried to the heavens and had their members run complaining to parliament asking what was the government doing about it.

The constituency of Edmonton West, Mr. Speaker, is one of the most heavily populated in this country. There are upwards of 120,000 people living in a relatively small area, composed of 85 per cent urban dwellers and 15 per cent farmers and small holders. The rural area is in the main a good productive area, the better part of which lies in the milkshed of the city of Edmonton. There are no vast farm holdings there, but the farmers of my constituency are an industrious group of men and women who have had the initiative to cope with their problems and get on with the job.

The city of Edmonton, of which I represent only a part, has made tremendous strides since the end of world war II. The population has more than doubled so that now in the metropolitan area of that city it numbers almost 275,000. This great growth has not been without problems and grave difficulties, to some of which I shall refer later. But again, Mr. Speaker, that growth, like that of the rest of Canada, has not been the result of appointing ourselves the death-watch beetles of our economy.

This growth of Edmonton, and of many of the towns in its area, has been in part the result of the developments in the oil and chemical industry. Notwithstanding the credit that may be assumed by certain people for the prosperity of Alberta, there is no doubt in the mind of anyone that this prosperity is in good measure the result of resources placed there by divine Providence. There has been generally good administration of all those resources. By this I do not mean to say that it has been the best of administration and due solely to the abilities of that political party which has administered the affairs of Alberta during that time. In my humble opinion it would have taken knaves and fools to do worse.

However, notwithstanding the claims of the Alberta government that it has done so well in the past ten years and that the provincial government is in the equivalent of a debt-free position, this position has been achieved at the expense of the municipalities. Great and serious demands have been made on the municipalities because of the vast expansion that has occurred in Alberta, yet the revenues of those municipalities have not been commensurate with the needs that had to be fulfilled and fulfilled immediately, not at some indefinite time in the future. The sharing of the wealth of the province has not been equitable. I would say, sir, that the buoyant financial position of Alberta has been, to a considerable extent, at the expense of its municipalities. The responsibilities of those municipalities are not all the creation of the provincial authorities. The change in social concept has imposed new burdens upon them, duties which have their origin also in laws passed by this house. I would submit, sir, that today even more than in the past our development makes it imperative that we have another look at our structure of government, federal, provincial and municipal, and that we reassess the responsibilities devolving upon these levels of government so that sources of revenue can be made commensurate with the responsibilities.

As the hon. member for High Park so ably pointed out earlier, in the sphere of municipal government we have one of our major problems existing in this country today. I would strongly recommend that the representatives of the municipalities take an integral part in the future deliberations between this government and the governments of the provinces of this country. It is my earnest hope that such representatives may be permitted to sit in as observers at the forthcoming conference later this month. I would further hope that they would be invited to participate as members in subsequent negotiations and conferences which will no doubt arise in the not too distant future.

I deem it an honour, sir, to sit in this house with my good friend the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith), to whom I must once again extend my congratulations on his address in moving the reply to the speech from the throne. There is always strong rivalry between Edmonton and Calgary, and I hope that will continue for many years to come. I believe some of the progress in both these lively cities has been due to this rivalry. I need not emphasize that Edmonton occupies the forefront in population, in the commercial activity of its immediate area, and of course one must not forget certain athletic endeavours. There is one particular type of sport which at the present time occupies the attention of a good number of our people in Canada. Mr. Speaker, with the advent of these cooler temperatures I should like to warn hon. members of this house that once again there is coming out of the west, out of the land of snow, a fierce horde of Eskimos. Shortly many members of this house—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Don't speak too soon.

Mr. Lambert: —may find that on a Saturday at the end of this month they have business of some sort or other to transact in Toronto. The memorable struggle for the Grey cup will take place that day, but that is the sheerest of coincidence. To all those members who come from Ottawa, Montreal, Hamilton or Toronto, and may I add Winnipeg, I would give fair warning that this year's Eskimos are bigger, faster and hungrier than ever.

At this junction I should like to pay tribute to all those men and women who have devoted their time, their energy and in a good many cases a good deal of their money to support and encourage and direct the athletic teams of this country, be they the most highly qualified professionals or the most enthusiastic bunch of peewees or midgets in some community league. To them and to our sportsmen we owe a great deal in Canada.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, the city of Edmonton has made great progress in the past 10 years. It has doubled its population in that time, by up to 15,000 per year in recent years. It has built thousands of housing units per year. Its commercial construction has kept pace. At the time of the election credit restrictions had reduced housing construction almost to a standstill. What was done? A plan was formulated by the builders and real estate agents to meet the needs of Edmonton. Along with the representatives of industry I was very pleased to bring this plan to the attention of the government.

The answer to this and no doubt similar proposals from others was quick action in making available $150 million for National Housing Act lower cost housing. Edmonton's reaction was to get on with the job, with the results as announced by the Minister of Public Works. Edmonton is among the leaders of this country in house building since the election. As of November 1 it had taken up $7 million of the fund to start 732 housing units. That is the sort of thing I referred to earlier. A problem existed but the answer lay in what the people did for themselves, given the opportunity. Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that they must be commended.

To date we have dealt with legislation to implement cash advances for farm-stored grain, increases in old age pensions and supplementary allowances, blind and disabled pensions, war veterans allowances and other changes for the benefit of veterans. These were emergency measures, the need for them having accumulated for a long time. They were but the first instalment in the fulfilment of a long legislative program of this Conservative government.

This is a prelude to the implementation of a national policy for the benefit of all Canada. This is not a promise of fulfilment tomorrow. It will take time, but given goodwill and the placing of national gain and development ahead of petty partisan advantage or politics, that program could come to fruition before too long.

In this national program I submit we must not be overly preoccupied with props and palliatives. Let us not neglect the foundation, the pillars and the roof of our economic structure. Let us not provide pillows and pads to cushion every fall to the detriment of national initiative and individual responsibility. We have heard a great deal about the rights of citizens, but what of the corresponding duties and responsibilities? We have heard little or nothing of them. I would ask those who seek to emphasize rights to dwell also upon those duties, to pause and reflect upon them most carefully—those duties of citizens and those duties of members of this house—not to any one particular group of our citizens but to the people of Canada as a whole.

Mr. Speaker, there are many matters upon which I could dwell and urge upon the government. I spoke previously of a national policy. This would include the development of that vast hinterland of the great northwest. There in that great majestic country of mountain, lake, forest and endless Arctic waste lies untold wealth. Therein lies part of the great future of this nation. If this generation is not to see the complete fruition of that development, let us pass on to our children and generations to come the legacy of a plan well conceived and well initiated. To northern Alberta will come a great measure of the benefits of such a program of northern development, and upon the people of that region devolves a greater than proportionate share of responsibility for the carrying out of that program. I feel sure that enlightened self-interest will prevail, and that they shall not be found wanting.

Mr. Speaker, for years there have been representations made to the government that an alternative trans-Canada route be built through the northern section of the western provinces, using the Yellowhead pass. These pleas have apparently fallen on deaf ears. I would submit, Mr. Speaker, that the present position of our national highway system is indefensible. We have wasted years in the past by inactivity, by a refusal to look to the future. The whole of the blame is not to be assumed by the federal government; the provinces concerned must too take part of the responsibility.

The present route utilizing Rogers pass is, I submit, the least preferable of any route. It is exceedingly costly to build, and there is some considerable doubt as to its providing a year-round route. On the other hand the Yellowhead pass has a much lower gradient and has not the snow conditions prevailing on the presently proposed route. From a national defence point of view it is essential that as soon as possible we develop alternative routes through the mountains to the Pacific coast. The degree of vulnerability to which we are exposed is frankly frightening. The few lines of communication that we have could be so easily put out of commission. Then from a tourist and a commercial point of view the arguments in favour of alternative routes are unanswerable.

Alberta is at the apex of the freight rate structure, and we should like to be able to ship out our products and bring in products from both west and east by the cheapest means possible, by road transport if that be the preferable way. There is no reason why we should have to depend upon long trips over United States highways to bring our goods from western Canada to eastern Canada and vice versa. It is ludicrous that people from northern Alberta who wish to go to the lower mainland in British Columbia or to the fine mountain resorts in the interior of that province should have to travel by United States highways. I need not point out that Canadian tourists spend far more in the United States than do United States tourists in Canada. I would say today, build our roads within Canada so that Canadians can travel in Canada if they choose to do so; so that they may spend their money here and get to know their country better.

This ability to get around one's own country might perhaps do something to dispel that lack of knowledge we have of one another's area. At the present time I find there is a regrettable ignorance of conditions in eastern Canada on the part of the people of the west, but perhaps not to the same degree that there is among the people of central and eastern Canada about the west.

In this connection may I be permitted this observation. As a western member in Ottawa I can find nothing, in fact less than nothing, in the newspapers of Central Canada about either the west or the far east of this great country. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether there has been erected a sort of paper curtain at the great lakes, but there are important things of interest to both citizens and members of government in central Canada happening in other parts of Canada. I do not know whether or not the reason for the situation to which I have referred is preoccupation with local affairs. However, if I may be permitted to do so I should like to suggest to the press of this country that they could do a great deal more for the unity of this country and the knowledge we may have of one another if they concerned themselves a little bit more with the events taking place outside the particular provinces or city in which a newspaper is published.

I hope I do not appear to be too critical, but I offer that suggestion as something in the way of constructive criticism. I believe that a newspaper has qualities which permit it to be more useful in that sphere than other means of communication. Radio and television, if not heard or seen, are missed, but a newspaper can be put aside and can be picked up tomorrow or can be passed from hand to hand. The printed word remains. I feel that perhaps in the not too distant future we shall have what I should like to consider a truly national press. I merely make that suggestion as a plea to have more news of Canada as a whole.

Yesterday, Mr. Speaker, we heard from the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Broome). He pointed out some very serious criticisms about Trans-Canada Air Lines. Well, frankly we in Canada have been put in a most ludicrous position because of the monopoly which exists in favour of Trans-Canada Air Lines. In a recent number of the Edmonton Journal a story was written of two residents of Alberta, one from Edmonton and one from Calgary, who when coming back from the Orient had to land at Edmonton because the airport terminals in British Columbia were fogbound. Perhaps the members from British Columbia would not admit that, but fog does exist out there. However, they landed at Edmonton airport and were told they could not terminate their journey there; they would have to wait until the fog lifted in Vancouver when their aircraft, at some indefinite time in the future would go to that city, then take their chance on Trans-Canada Air Lines coming back to Edmonton and Calgary. In addition, they were not permitted to make personal contact with their relatives. They had to speak to them on the telephone, one of these relatives down in the lobby and the other the traveller up in a room. They were not permitted access to their relatives because they had not been cleared by the immigration authorities.

There, I would suggest, we have bumbling of the worst sort. Why would the immigration authorities in Edmontoin not be able to examine those people and clear them? All that stems from the monopoly accorded to Trans-Canada Air Lines, which prohibits Canadian Pacific Airlines from landing at intermediate points in this country on its international route.

Frankly, how ridiculous can we get?

Yesterday we heard a speech by the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage). With a great roll of thunder the hon. members of this house were assailed as to the so-called lack of policy by this government. I believe the hon. member called it government by postponement. In the most, to my mind, chameleon-like intonations he recited chapter and verse of the alleged and actual problems which face us today; but he will have to admit, as will most members opposite, that these problems existed prior to June 10. They were there. If the administration of that time did not know about them then they ought to have known about them. Either way it was dishonest. They did nothing about them if they knew of them, and as I say, if they did not know about them then they should have known. Theirs was government by ignorance, either wilful or blissful.

Yesterday we heard not one word of constructive suggestion; no alternative was proposed. Is that the policy of the official opposition or is it, as someone said on the other side of the house, their policy to see that those on this side of the house carry out the government's policy? I would have thought that the role of the official opposition, the responsible role of the official opposition, was to offer constructive criticism and alternatives, not merely to criticize for criticisms's sake or with an eye to certain forthcoming events.

An hon. Member: You were not here last session.

Another hon. Member: And all you fellows will not be here next session either.

Mr. Gardiner: You will join our ranks then.

Mr. Lambert: Many things have been said in this house which would bear repeating, but I have not the time at my disposal today. I would commend to the members of this house Her Majesty's speech from the throne, and it gives me great pleasure to support the motion of the hon. member for Calgary South.

Mr. E. B. Huffman (Kent, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, I find just a little difficulty in rising at this time after such a parade of Rhodes scholars in this chamber. Nonetheless I do not say that with any envy, because I do appreciate the privilege of sitting with those members who have earned that good fortune, and I appreciate the fact that we who have not had that privilege can join with them here. I would like to commend each and every one of the Rhodes scholars in this house who have seen fit to offer themselves for public service in this country, and I trust they will continue to do so for many years to come.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Huffman: Mr. Speaker, from reading in Hansard what has been said in regard to the position you hold at this time I find that if I were to express my opinion toward you I would have to repeat what has been said on a number of occasions. Therefore if I say to you today that I concur in everything that has been said as to the way in which you have conducted the proceedings in this house since you have taken the Speaker's chair I am sure you will feel that my reference to you, sir, is equally sincere as any other words which might have been used.

As I stand here today I am also reminded that on some other occasion a late member for Calgary South used to stand almost in this very area, and like the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) I enjoyed the privilege of listening to that former member because he always spoke without rancour or partisanship. I think when the present member for Calgary South moved the address we could detect many of the fine qualities which had commended the late Mr. Smith to all members of the house no matter where they sat.

There was only one thing I found missing. As I recall a conversation with Mr. Smith, I learned that he started out as a Liberal, so possibly the wheel will go a complete cycle and the present member for Calgary South will come back to the first political love of the Smith family.

An hon. Member: There is still hope for the hon. gentleman.

Another hon. Member: He has seen the light.

Mr. Huffman: I expected that. Mr. Speaker, at this time I would like to bring to the attention of the house a certain matter, and my reason for doing so is because of a resolution passed by the regional women's institute convention held in Ridgetown, which is located in my district. The resolution is as follows:

> Therefore be it resolved that if no action has been taken in two years from date the income file was sent in by a farmer, individual or a businessman whose net annual income was $10,000 or less, that these returns become final and complete and that no further action can be taken.

I recall that on January 28, 1957, at page 695 of the first volume of Hansard for the session, there was a resolution before the house standing in the name of the hon. member for Middlesex East, in these words:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should consider the advisability of amending the Income Tax Act and regulations made under that act, so as to provide a final receipt for those income tax returns filed for the preceding calendar year for individuals whose income is $10,000 or less.

Now there is a great similarity to the resolution passed by the members of the women's institute meeting as recently as November 4 and 5. I would like to commend the members of this very important organization for taking such an active part in the things that pertain to government as well as to the home. I think each and everyone of us is very conscious of the very important part which the members of the women's institute play. We all know that in many cases they are the bookkeepers in small businesses, for farmers, and so on, and consequently they are conscious of the need for some regulation of this nature.

When the motion was before the house last January I suggested to the mover of the motion that I thought because the government had the right to go back over a two-year period to repay to a taxpayer any overpayment that might have been made, it was quite reasonable to expect that the government should have two years in which to investigate an income tax return if it so desired. I should also like to say that I think the people appreciated the action of the previous government when it reduced the period available for re-examination from six years to four years. I do hope that at this time the government will pay some attention to the recommendation which is made in this resolution and reduce the period from four years to two years.

I recall that in speaking on this item I did express the hope, as well, that instead of just including what is concerned in this resolution, namely those with incomes of $10,000 and less that because there are so few individual taxpayers or small business people earning above $10,000 I did not think it was in the public interest to discriminate in that field. May I refer to the words which the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White) used in closing the debate on this subject on page 714 of Hansard:

> I greatly appreciate the suggestion of the hon. member for Kent, Ontario (Mr. Huffman) that a two-year limit might be acceptable. As I said, my intention was to bring to the attention of the government the problems confronting individual taxpayers. Again, the hon. member for Kent, Ontario, suggested that this include all individual returns except corporations, companies and so on.

Mr. Fraser: The hon. member for Middlesex East has that resolution on again this year.

Mr. Huffman: Yes, but it is in a different form from the previous one.

I think it is essential that real consideration should be given to this subject. When we had a period of six years for re-examination of an income return I think many people whose incomes were being re-examined found it difficult to explain many of the items which were in the return. Consequently, if this period could be reduced to two years as requested in this resolution I feel it would place the taxpayer and those people who are concerned with returns of this nature in a much better position to explain anything which might be asked of them.

There is another reason why I think this should be done, and done as soon as possible. We find that if the period goes back too far, normally the person whose income is being re-examined will find it necessary to get legal opinion, engage an accountant and so on, and any expenditure incurred in trying to have the income tax file cleared is not allowable as a charge which can be assessed as a deduction in the following year.

These are some of the things to which I think people are objecting, and so I commend these considerations to the government for examination and I am sure that when the Minister of Finance brings down a budget, as he has stated he will do, and when changes in the Income Tax Act are being considered this resolution as passed by the women's institute of the region from which I come will receive serious attention from the government. I can see no reason why this proposal should not be accepted because, on examination of Hansard at page 715 of the same date, January 28, 1957, I note that ten of the ministers who are now sitting with the government, five of the parliamentary assistants and others supported this motion. I note, too, that some of the ministers were not present when this motion was called. I certainly think, however, that the proposal would receive a majority in the cabinet in favour of the passage of this Income Tax Act change.

There is a further item I should like to bring to the attention of the government. I think it was put very clearly by the hon. member for Lambton-Kent (Mr. Campbell) when, speaking in this house on November 11, he said that Ontario wheat growers were in a worse position than the growers in the west as far as price is concerned.

During the month that this house has been in session I have asked the government if they would bring forward legislation pertaining to the resolution No. 8 on the order paper. That resolution reads:

> That it is expedient to introduce a measure to establish a system of guaranteed prices for certain agricultural commodities to be named therein and to provide that prices may be guaranteed for any other agricultural commodity or commodities as named from time to time by the governor in council—

Some other words follow in connection with the establishment of a committee, and so on.

Now on the occasion on which I asked for this legislation to be brought in, before the debate on the address had been concluded, I felt that my request was a sincere one, and I was more convinced than ever that there was a good reason for making it after the hon. member for Lambton-Kent had made his remarks the other day. Last Friday the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) asked the leader of the house if this legislation would be proceeded with before the address in reply to the speech from the throne was concluded. I thought it was a rather unfortunate remark when the leader of the house said that the hon. member for Essex East and myself were only seeking publicity.

I would like to say that that was not the reason for referring to this motion and seeking to have it brought forward at the earliest possible date. I felt there was just as much reason for bringing this forward as there was for bringing forward the resolution with respect to cash advances. We were not interested in obtaining publicity, which was the term used by the house leader, and this definitely was not the reason for our raising the question.

One other reason for making this request was that almost as soon as the present government took office back in June there were representatives of farm organizations coming to Ottawa to lay before the government their requests for assistance of one kind and another. I believe the reason that the hon. member for Lambton-Kent spoke on wheat was because representatives of the wheat growers organization were in Ottawa. It will be necessary to have a change made in the Agricultural Prices Support Act because wheat is specifically excluded from that act at the present time. It was my hope that we would have notification on the order paper of the government's intention to amend the act at this session in order to include wheat. In addition, representatives of other primary producers and the growers of different commodities have come to Ottawa to present their claims. I believe the farmers in the Fraser valley and the primary producers in the eastern provinces have equally as much right to be heard and to have legislation passed to benefit them as have the prairie wheat farmers especially when we postponed the debate on the throne speech in order to bring forward as early as possible legislation concerning cash advances.

The other day I asked the government if the request of the sugar beet growers would be entertained. My reason for raising this question is that shortly the sugar companies will be negotiating contracts for the coming year. When the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand (Mr. Charlton), who is now parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness), spoke last session, as reported at page 3319 of Hansard, on April 9, 1957, he said:

> We have always stood for a flexible price support program with prices based on a formula and stated well in advance of the production period.

At that time the house was discussing the amendment of the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) requesting establishment of adequate support prices.

The government has had all the necessary information that could be placed before it for the introduction of such legislation because the provincial ministers of agriculture have been here as well as representatives of the various farm organizations. I am sure that farm organizations across the country have placed this problem before the government. I feel that the longer we delay some action of this kind the more difficult it is going to be for the sugar company to get the number of acres under contract that many of us would like to see. I hope this legislation will be brought before the house at the earliest possible moment and that certain provisions contained in this resolution will be spelled out in such a manner that every one will know exactly what is going to happen with respect to a certain commodity. We would also like to know exactly what commodities are going to come under the Agricultural Prices Support Act.

From time to time there has been genuine concern in the rural communities because of the action that has been taken on previous occasions by hon. members opposite. We recall that on at least two occasions a parity price motion has been before the house and on those two occasions hon. members opposite supported it. On another occasion during the past session the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort (Mr. Bryson) presented a motion regarding 100 per cent parity, on which occasion our friends who now form the government voted against the motion.

Mr. Harkness: The Canadian Federation of Agriculture is also against that.

Mr. Huffman: May I say that the hon. member was against it.

Mr. Harkness: Yes, I was.

Mr. Huffman: There were the two occasions. Now, there was some difference in the motion itself—

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Mr. Huffman:—but it was a parity motion. From time to time questions have been raised in this house concerning flexible prices, price supports, parity prices and deficiency payments and I think it will be a matter of some confusion to those in rural areas until we know exactly what is the intention of the government.

Under section 9 of the Agricultural Prices Support Act there is a form of parity. This section provides that the board will step in and buy farm products when the prices fall below the level of other products and that they will endeavour to maintain the prices of farm products at a fair relationship to the price of other commodities. This is the policy that has been followed since this act was passed in 1944. This act was in effect when this country underwent the transition from a wartime to peacetime effort and in many instances it certainly provided the balance which was needed in the industry. Possibly there were times when this stated floor price was not as high as we would like to have had it but at this time I hope the government will spell out in clear language exactly what it has in mind so that our people can follow the example recommended by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture when he said we should have this well in advance of the production period.

Many primary producers organizations are meeting at the present time. I have had the farm union representatives call on me at my office and I know that the Ontario Federation of Agriculture met in Toronto last week. I was notified that this organization passed a resolution asking that the government consider the extension of cash advances to include primary producers in all of Canada which is the same position I adopted in this house.

When the present Prime Minister spoke on April 9, 1957, as reported at page 3305 of Hansard of that date, referring to the Agricultural Prices Support Act he said:

> —that a policy has developed that is used only in extreme circumstances, and that its present uses are not providing the necessary floors to maintain a responsible, profitable agriculture . . . we believe that action must be taken and taken at once.

Therefore I commend to the government at this time the words of the Prime Minister and the words of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture who is in my view the listening post for agriculture in eastern Canada. I trust that the hon. member for Brant-Haldimand will use his influence with the Minister of Agriculture in seeing that the primary producers in every part of the country will receive consideration as early as possible. There are other quotations that I might use in regard to this very problem but I feel that I have said enough along this line.

At this time I would like to make a suggestion to the government in this form. For some years past we have found that storage has been a problem in this country. There is a regulation in the Income Tax Act to the effect that if a company or an individual wanted to build storage they could apply to the minister of trade and commerce, whose department gave approval to the project. If that project was approved, accelerated depreciation was allowed and it could be depreciated at 33⅓ per cent a year, or in full in three years. I would like to suggest that at the present time the terms of the act might be extended to individuals who would like to build storage in which they would be able to maintain their commodities at home so that they could be fed in market channels when they were needed and in that way there would be provided one of the better balances that are necessary in agriculture especially.

At the present time the Income Tax regulation works in this way. If the construction is of steel the depreciation is 2½ per cent so that it takes 40 years to get full depreciation. If it is of wooden construction the depreciation is 5 per cent so that it takes 20 years to get full depreciation. Therefore, there is not a great deal of encouragement for anyone to build the storages because of the depreciation allowances in the Income Tax Act. My two recommendations have to do, first with the Income Tax Act as it applies to the length of time for re-examination of files; and, second, accelerated depreciation. I commend them to the government. I think it is a case of live and let live; but live and let live is never as good as live and help live which is a part the government can play.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, it has not been my practice in the years that I have been in this house to join in the chorus of congratulations which this debate seems to draw forth. I have been quite content to let the leader of this group speak for all of us in the felicitations that he has extended during the course of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, as he has done at this session. However, on this occasion there is one word that I would like to say. As a previous speaker has already pointed out, it is exactly a month ago today that this house chose the hon. member for St. Paul's to be the Speaker of the House of Commons in this twenty-third parliament. I was more than satisfied that day that we were making a wise choice and I am sure all members agree with me that the intervening month has proven the wisdom of our choice. Indeed, His Honour has occupied the chair with dignity. He has been fair and firm in his decisions and, as another hon. member has pointed out, he has exercised the good humour that is required in the pursuit of his duties. We are satisfied that His Honour will do a good job. We give him our support and we wish him well.

It has been our practice as a C.C.F. group in parliament, during the years that we have been here, to welcome good legislation no matter who brought it in and even if there were some who thought that that legislation was stolen from our platform.

In that same vein we have welcomed the legislation which parliament thus far has been given an opportunity to endorse, particularly the legislation respecting cash advances to prairie farmers and the legislation in the social security field. We shall continue to give our support to beneficial legislation that is brought in by this government, or any government that may be in power at any time. Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, so long as we are in the opposition we shall remember that it is the job of an opposition in this democratic parliament to point out the shortcomings of the government in power and to prod that government into the implementation of its own promises and into the implementation of other measures that are for the good of the people of this country. I can assure the members of the present government that we in this group will continue to fulfil that role even as we sought to fulfil it during the days when the Liberals sat to Mr. Speaker's right.

In my remarks this afternoon I intend to point out some of the serious shortcomings of this government which are already showing up and I intend to do what I can to prod this government into action along certain lines. Perhaps at the start I should remind hon. members opposite, both those who are in the cabinet and those who are on the back benches, that they delude themselves if they interpret what happened on June 10 as meaning that they were elected on their own merits. What happened on June 10 was that the people of Canada voted against the former Liberal administration. The people of Canada were disappointed in the slowness with which that former administration moved in such fields as social security and the people of Canada were apprehensive with respect to the dictatorial manner in which the previous government was handling parliament. Therefore, on June 10, Canadians went out and voted against the former government. The result of that vote was that no party had a majority of the popular vote in this country and no party had a majority of the seats in this House of Commons. In other words, this present government, with a minority of the seats and with a minority of the popular vote, is in power more or less by default. This government is still in the position of having to prove its worth to the Canadian people and I suggest that there are signs that it is not going to succeed in that effort. In fact, I suggest there are few signs of that effort even being made.

I know that it is a very popular type of speech for hon. members opposite to make to list the things which have been done already in this session of parliament which have had the endorsation of the entire House of Commons. May I point out that all of those items that have been put through are items that simply had to be passed because of the way in which the votes were cast on June 10. Those were issues that were discussed from the Atlantic to the Pacific in that election campaign. There was deep concern over social security measures. There was deep concern over the position of the prairie farmers. In fact, the government was just the instrument for bringing before parliament some of the things for which the people of Canada voted on June 10.

But after you have looked at those items of legislation, beneficial and acceptable as they are, I suggest that all you have from this government opposite is a bits and pieces program, without any general over-all policy or philosophy. Where does this government go from here? Where does it go when it has finished putting on the statute books the items that have been mentioned in the speech from the throne? Where does this government go in certain important fields which I shall indicate in a moment? In fact, I suggest that one of the reasons the government opposite is trying its best to lay the groundwork for an early election is because it does not know where it is going after a few more items have been passed.

Apparently the election may come sooner than some people think from a remark that was dropped this afternoon by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Hodgson). He interjected to say to some of the Liberals opposite him that some of them would not be here at the next session. If he knows what he is talking about, that means the plan is for an election before the next session of parliament. Perhaps he is right for, as I say, the government is running out so far as its bits and pieces program is concerned.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in order to be quite specific when I make the statement that this government has no over-all policy, that this government does not know where it is going, let me list a number of fields in which any government worth its salt should give leadership. I will take only a minute to talk about trade because it has been talked about very effectively by members in other parties on this side of the house, and it was spoken to very forcefully, very effectively, a few days ago by my colleague the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Zaplitny). The government does not know whether or not it wants to shift 15 per cent of our trade from the United States to the United Kingdom. The government does not know where it stands with respect to the United Kingdom's proposal for a free trade area between this country and that. The government does not know whether or not it wants to take the necessary steps to develop trade with China. In the whole field of trade, this government simply does not know where it is going, has not got any over-all policy.

The same remarks are true of the field of finance. The government uses constitutional excuses for not telling us, through the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), what that minister is saying in his conversations with the governor of the Bank of Canada. But it is quite clear that the same Minister of Finance does not know whether or not he favours tight money or easy money; does not know in what direction we should be going in terms of the control of finance, in terms of control of investment, in terms of social planning so far as finance is concerned. In fact, I suggest that those opposite are completely at sea so far as the real, basic factors in financial policy are concerned.

The government is likewise at sea in the field of taxation. They do not know where they are going and they do not know what they are doing. The Minister of Finance told the press last July that there would be a budget at this session. Can we get out of him now whether or not there is going to be one? I defy anyone to determine, from what the minister has said in answer to questions, whether or not there will be a budget at this session. He probably does not know because the bringing down of a budget involves some changes in taxation structures. During the election campaign the Conservatives promised they would raise the tax exemption levels. I suppose they are sufficiently familiar with income tax matters to realize that if they raise the income tax exemption levels without making any other changes they will be giving the greatest bonanza to those in the upper income brackets. Perhaps they realize that if they are going to do all the things they are proposing, and at the same time raise the income tax exemption levels, they are going to have to find some other sources of tax revenues and that would raise the question of what they should do about taxation in the upper brackets; that would raise the question of what they should do about corporation income tax. I say, Mr. Speaker, those at your right are at sea in this field; they do not know what they are doing. This is a time that calls for leadership in these fields. There is no sign of it from this bits and pieces government across the way; this government that can use high-sounding words but cannot give any leadership, cannot tell parliament when anything is going to be done or even what is going to be done.

The same remarks are true in the important field of federal-provincial relations. There is going to be a conference and it is only a week or two away. Can we get out of the government any indication of what its plans are? All we can ascertain is that some of the provincial governments are going to put a rather terrific squeeze on this government, and our fear is that some rather unfortunate changes in federal-provincial tax-sharing arrangements might be made which could have the effect of lessening the unity of Canada so far as taxation matters are concerned. This is an extremely important field and the federal government should be giving the lead. No government can give the lead in a matter like this unless it knows where it is going and this government, despite all the bits and pieces of fine legislation we have had at this session, does not know where it is going.

I might mention housing. The government and its supporters like to stand up and talk about that move to increase the amount of money available under the National Housing Act, which was already there under the previous legislation. But there has been no suggestion that this government realizes that what is really needed is a reduction in the interest rate on mortgages, or that what is needed is the provision of housing on a no-down-payment basis such as has proven satisfactory in the United States. This is an important economic and social problem affecting our people. This is something in which there should be leadership, but at a time when we need such leadership we have in power a government that is there only by default, not because the Canadian people put them there but because the Canadian people put the Liberals out. This government has failed to give leadership in this important field.

I shall not take the time to go into agriculture because that has been fully debated in this house, and my colleagues have spelled out the situation. It is clear again that this government is prepared to bring in certain palliatives to assist the farmers in western Canada in getting their yearly income, such as it is, spread a little more evenly throughout the year. However, this does not solve the basic problem of the price-cost squeeze so far as the farmers are concerned. It does not solve the problem of enabling the farmers to receive their fair share of the national income. I suggest that here is another field in which this bits and pieces government is completely lacking in any over-all policy.

Mr. Harkness: You are suggesting nonsense.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I turn to the field of labour. My hon. friend is an expert in nonsense, and I leave that field to him.

Mr. Harkness: You know more about it than I do.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I turn to the field of labour. Here, too, there is a woeful lack of leadership. During the election campaign there were many speeches made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and others as to what a Conservative government would do in the field of labour. They were going to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act; the benefit period was to be extended to a full year and benefits were to be increased. These were not items that were going to be attended to some time a few years from now, these were things that the Conservative party suggested they would go at immediately. Now when the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) is asked about amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act he gives us that same old answer the Liberals used to give us, he is studying the matter.

This government promised the labour people of Canada in the course of the election campaign that there would be an overhaul of the national labour code; that the conciliation procedures would be speeded up. Does the government not realize that there is every possibility that within a matter of months it may be faced with a number of labour disputes?

Surely hon. members are aware of the situation that may possibly develop between the non-operating employees of the Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway. Is this government going to do the same as the last government did, namely wait until the dispute has reached a crisis and then in the middle of the crisis, change the rules? Oh, they did not like it when the previous government did it. But this present government has no policy and is giving no lead in this field. It does not know where it is going here any more than in any other situation.

The government talked about legislation to provide for minimum wages and for annual holidays with pay and for statutory holidays. The Prime Minister made speeches like that, particularly during the early part of this year and during the election campaign in various parts of Canada, but so far this session we have had only one measure touching any of these fields; and even in that one measure the government has fallen short of the request made to them in all sincerity and in all faithfulness by the Canadian Labour Congress as well as by other labour organizations. It looks to me as though the government does not know what it is all about and that it does not understand labour matters any more than it understands some other matters. Certainly it is not giving any lead in this field. I cannot say we have bits and pieces; we have just one bit so far as labour legislation is concerned.

The same thing is true in the social security field. I know that hon. members opposite think it is wonderful what they did in a short space of time by way of amending various statutes that had been on the books for a few years, in some instances, or many years, in others. But I submit to you that there was no real analysis of the situation as to the amount of the pension necessary for our senior citizens and others. I submit to you that the $55 figure which is now the law of the land does not measure up to the Prime Minister's assurance to the old people of Canada that, if his party came to power, they would receive a pension to meet today's cost of living.

I submit to you that, in the light of the increase in the gross national product since 1949 when the figure of $40 was set, there was a complete lack of policy, a complete lack of fairness and a complete lack of justice to give to our people only that much increase when the increase in the gross national product has been something over 80 per cent, which means that the increase in old age pensions should have been brought up to something of the order of $75 a month. There is no real policy on the part of the government, no leadership, no understanding of the basic issues, no concept of the social factors involved in this matter. It is just a government that likes to indulge in words, that enjoys being in office, that enjoys the fact that it is administering the affairs of the country, enjoys the fact that it is able to bring in some bits and pieces of legislation but which in the long-run has no over-all policy and indeed has no policy with respect to these individual items.

Where is it in the field of transportation? It has some real problems facing it in connection with the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships. There will be problems arising because of the relationships between the railway employees and the two major railways in this country. There will be problems arising because of demands for increases in freight rates. Here is a field, the field of transportation, in which some real understanding and some real leadership is called for. But we have a government that does not know where it is going at all.

Where is it with respect to air transportation in this country? Hon. members are aware of the interesting exchange we had this morning with the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) with respect to the application made by Canadian Pacific Air Lines to compete with Trans-Canada Air Lines on the Montreal to Vancouver route. Hon. members are aware of the attempt of the cabinet ministers to be extremely careful and extremely cautious on this point. Yet at the same time from back benchers on the Tory side of the house there is carping criticism of what they refer to as to the T.C.A. monopoly which, I suggest, is one of the fine examples of something that is important in this country, namely public ownership of a natural monopoly. Not only do they not know where they are going, but ignorance in this field means that they are likely to slip back.

Where are they in the field of pipe line policy? They do not know. They have had to appoint a royal commission to find out what should be done in that field. In the meantime many questions are left unanswered, despite the fact that hon. gentlemen opposite joined with us in 1956—I know it was at the end of the debate but nevertheless they joined with us at the end—in calling for public ownership of the Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Company so that the money to be made out of this natural monopoly might accrue, not in millions to private individuals but to the people of Canada as a whole. Where are they going now in pipe line policy? They know no more in that field than they know in these other fields. They are a bits and pieces government that comes down with a few items of legislation, all of which are good, but it has no over-all philosophy, no over-all understanding as to where it is going.

What is its policy with regard to the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation? We have ideas as to what they might like to do as regards the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. At least it is not going to be sold, at least not for $50 million. The Prime Minister made that point clear. But where are we going with respect to the C.B.C., with respect to the Fowler report and these other important matters?

Another field in which this government is very much at sea is in the field of defence. I leave the matter at that for the moment because I want to come back to it in a few minutes in connection with my remarks. Likewise I suggest that it is at sea in the whole field of external affairs and on that matter too I will say something in just a moment.

But before I do so I should like to come back for just a moment to the question of the old age pension and say that the people of Canada have found it quite a disappointment that a party which gave the impression to the country during the election campaign that it stood for $60 a month—that impression was given very carefully; it is hard to pin it down, but the impression was given—should now try to buy our older people off with $55 a month. We still feel that under present conditions the pension should be $75 a month, but the least that the party opposite should have done was to implement the promise it made, namely that if elected it would bring in $60 a month. As hon. members know, a situation developed in my own experience that made it necessary for me to be home in Winnipeg for a few days, in fact while these social security measures were being debated. As one would expect, I picked up comments with regard to this matter from a number of people. I say to you quite frankly, Mr. Speaker, that I thought people would be pleased, that that would be the only kind of comment I would get, namely that the people would be pleased that the pension was to be increased to $55 a month, that people would forget that we had asked for $75. Mr. Speaker, I had many a phone call and met many persons on the streets of Winnipeg who expressed nothing but disappointment that this government which gave the impression they stood for $60 tried to buy the old people off with $55 a month.

That is not leadership. That is not facing up to the needs of the day. That is not being faithful to the promise that these old people would have a chance to keep up with today's cost of living. This is the work of a bits and pieces government that does not know where it is going and that is not conscious of the real needs of the people of this country.

When are we going to get action with regard to the pensions of superannuated civil servants? When are we going to get some action with regard to Canadian National Railways pensioners, particularly those who are still on the basic pension of only $25 a month? Those are matters on which hon. gentlemen opposite, along with us in this group, had a great deal to say when they were on this side of the house. But now that they are on the other side of the house, what do we find? Oh, we get words. We get the same kind of assurances that the Liberals used to give us but we still get no action. These people are supposed to be satisfied with the general legislation that has been passed, but that is not good enough.

There is another item concerning which this government is showing that it is not a cabinet that is prepared to give leadership and that is in this whole field of health insurance or more particularly hospital insurance in the terms of the legislation that was passed in this house last April. I read again today some of the debates that took place last April. The Conservatives who at that time sat over on this side of the house insisted, along with us, that amendments should be made in that legislation to extend its coverage and to make possible its early implementation.

The Conservatives in the early part of 1957 wanted the six province requirement reduced to five provinces so that this legislation might be brought in with the least possible delay. Well six provinces have now indicated their agreement so we have got over that hurdle.

These people who wanted action when they were on this side of the house are now on the other side where they can do something about it, but they tell us no agreements have been signed with any of the provinces and they are now even quibbling over the meaning of the words "in operation" and "in force". This looks to some of us as though an attempt is being made to stall the implementation of the hospital insurance program just as long as it is possible to do so. I have no doubt Premier Frost will be remembered and that his desire to have his plan in operation by the first of January, 1959, will not be overlooked, but Premier Frost and Ontario are not the only premier and only province in Canada.

We submit that those provinces which already have plans—British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and some of the others—are entitled to their share of federal money just as soon as six provinces have their plans in force so far as legislation is concerned. That is the way the act reads and I defy the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) or anyone else to put any other interpretation on the legislation which was passed last session.

I remind the house that the minister of health in the province of Nova Scotia is calling for a clear statement as to where the government stands. The minister called for that information by letter dated September 30 and again on October 16 he referred back to the previous letter asking for a statement, which he seems unable to get. When the premier of Saskatchewan sought information on the matter in a letter during the summer the Prime Minister told him that he could not make a statement prior to the opening of parliament in October. Well parliament has been in session for a month and we still have no statement. For a while we were told it would not even be put on the agenda of the federal-provincial conference on November 25 and 26. Now we are told it can be discussed if the provincial premiers want it discussed.

Well, Mr. Speaker, these gentlemen across the way may be proud of the fact that, as they think, they won the election; they may be proud of the fact that they are in power but they are not giving leadership in this important field of health; they are not giving leadership in any field, and I submit to the government members that unless they do come through with something in terms of leadership on this important item their days on the other side of the house are numbered.

There is another field in which we are not getting leadership from across the way. We have moved into a new era—let us admit that; it is a simple statement of fact—since the day when the first sputnik was launched. It is a new phase of life so far as mankind is concerned and yet these people opposite think of everything that has happened, so far as the Russians are concerned, as only a military challenge. Well it is a military challenge all right. It should make us think about our so called defences but I submit that the tremendous advances which the Russians have made in the scientific field call for far more than just the kind of panic that causes us to reappraise our military defences: it demands that we re-examine our whole approach to a number of very important aspects of our way of life.

One thing it calls for is a tremendous expansion of what we spend and of what we do in the field of scientific research. This is something which is supported not only by those of us in this party but by members of other parties who have placed resolutions on the order paper. As a matter of fact a few days ago I noticed in a newsletter of one of the banks in this country—certainly no socialist organization—a strong plea for tremendous increase in the amount of public money to be spent on both basic and applied research.

I say, too, that if we are going to meet the challenge which the Russians have given to the world we have got to do something about our whole educational situation in the west. No longer should we hold back on this question of the federal aid to education because of some of the niceties which have been brought out in debate in years gone by. Yes, we have the British North America Act which gives the provinces full control over education, and that fact must be respected, but the opportunity for education in all of the 10 provinces of Canada to be raised considerably by means of financial aid is here for any government that will give the leadership required. The last one did not do it; this one has shown no sign of it. It looks as though in the next election the people will have to vote for a real change instead of merely the fictitious change they got on June 10.

I suggest also we have to do something to try and capture for our free way of life the enthusiasm and the zeal of our people in the way the Russian regime has captured it for their dictatorial way of doing things. To me one of the ominous things in the world today is the fact that that regime has been able to stay in power for 40 years. We do not brush it aside by simply saying it is a dictatorship, that it is a form of slavery. Any regime that has been able to stay in power that long has somehow been able to captivate its people and to get its people feeling that life under that regime and life in pursuit of the objectives of that regime is worth while. I submit that is one of the reasons they have been able to make these advances in science.

When we ask for adequate social security, for adequate old age pensions, for a proper national health program; when we ask for the social and economic planning necessary to eliminate unemployment altogether and when we ask for public ownership of some of our great national projects, we are suggesting that we should have the kind of society under the banner of freedom in which every citizen of the land feels he is a participant in the things we are doing. We can do these things to a much greater extent than can be done under a system of slavery or dictatorship, but as yet we do not seem to have the leadership that calls forth that sort of zeal and enthusiasm.

I urge that there be such leadership in this country and that this government realize that during the time it is in power it should be giving some of that leadership. There should also be leadership in the field of external affairs. I have in mind an editorial in the Vancouver Sun of which copies I believe were sent to all of us. I think it is time we shook off the Dulles era of diplomacy; it is time we shook off the notion that you can deal with the Russians by insulting them; it is time we shook off the notion that when they produce their intercontinental ballistic missile our only answer is a speed-up of the arms race on our side.

I am conscious of some of the things which were said by some of us in a debate a few years ago. We were a minority but we expressed the fear that a certain course of action which the west was taking would be a case of going beyond the point of no return. Maybe we are beyond that point and if so the time has come to realize that the Russians, even with their present superiority over us, are just as afraid of annihilation as we are and just as afraid of world war as we are. Surely the time has come for the west and the east to sit down as equals, to realize that we have tremendous scientific possibilities and to try to work out a basis of living together, using this modern scientific knowledge to build a better world for all mankind.

This is not an age in which to be frightened; this is not an age in which to panic into more defences and into an arms race; it is not an age in which to give a country like Canada only a bits and pieces program. This is an age in which the government should be giving leadership. The last one did not do it and this one shows even less signs than the last one of giving the leadership we so sorely need. It may be that the Canadian people will have to avail themselves of the next opportunity—the next election, which no doubt is not far off—to put in power a party with vision—a party prepared to give leadership in times like these.

Mr. Donald MacInnis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, in rising in this house for the first time let me congratulate you on your appointment to such a high office. I wish also to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Rising to speak in this house is somewhat different from rising to speak in my own local union but I am proud to say—and this is no reflection on parliament but a boost to my union—that the big difference is all in favour of the union, because nowhere in all of Cape Breton would you find a group of men who would continuously denounce and criticize any business before them and then rise as one entire bloc in their places and vote for it.

I must apologize to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill). We are sorry that we who are the so-called backbenchers of this party do not act in accordance with his expectations. We have no intention of following the example of the backbenchers of the previous government. I further feel that since I have been elected to represent Cape Breton South I should be lacking in my duty if I were to sit idly by while an hon. member in opposition thinks he is qualified to speak for the maritimes, when he and his party have failed to act in that respect. I am perfectly willing to listen to anyone on national issues, but I still feel that maritimers are best qualified to speak on maritime problems, and we are elected for that purpose.

I would remind the house, that during world war II the constituency of Cape Breton and, in particular, the town of New Waterford, had the highest percentage per capita of volunteer enlistment of any part of this country, and yet since the war this achievement has been met by a complete lack of appreciation by the previous government.

Miners who during the war were considered so important to the war effort that they were "frozen" to their jobs, and even taken out of the service to work in the mines were made jobless without any consideration from the past administration.

You will forgive me if I say that I enjoy the predicament in which the official opposition now find themselves. It is very similar to that of the Cape Breton miners during the past 12 to 15 years. The thought of another election to them is somewhat like the threat of mines closing down to the Cape Breton miners.

The opposition speaks of giving the present government an opportunity to carry out their election promises. This comes rather inappropriately from them in the light of a statement made in this house by the member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) as reported at page 183 of Hansard of 1957:

> We do not feel we are a broken-down party, and I believe those sitting on the other side of the house will be convinced that that statement is correct within a few months.

I say to you, sir, their contemptible attitude is one they intend to continue as long as it fits in with their political purposes, and it indicates we can look forward to a change following their convention, at which time they hope to re-organize and re-group.

Everybody in this house knows that the maritime provinces have had, and still have, grievances due to economic difficulties that the previous government would do nothing about. The hon. member for Inverness-Richmond (Mr. MacEachen) admits this, and he had this to say as late as Monday as recorded at page 972 of Hansard of November 11, 1957 as follows:

> The present Progressive Conservative leader and his candidates, as I say, capitalized upon this peculiar and legitimate grievance, and presented a commitment to the people of the Atlantic area prior to the election of June 10.

Since he himself considered it a legitimate grievance, I would remind him it was also an old one which he and his party failed to recognize and deal with.

He drew the remarks of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) in respect to coal subventions to the attention of this house, and he referred to the throne speech in which it was stated that this government was prepared to pay subventions on the movement of coal for power purposes in the maritime provinces. Let me now draw to the attention of the house what his leader had to say in respect to the maritime problems according to a press report:

> If it was found that power could not be produced at reasonable prices, the Atlantic provinces would have to do without.

He further stated that eventually coal would be too valuable a material for production of synthetic products to be used as a fuel. He did not want to see coal centres turned into ghost towns, but he would not encourage any immediate substantial increase in coal production. It would not be fair to future generations in the maritimes who would greatly benefit from the increased value of coal as an industrial raw material. If federal developed thermal power aided Nova Scotia coal mines, that was incidental. His concern for a ghost town of the future is most touching. I would also draw the attention of the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond to page 974 of Hansard when he quoted a statement made by the Prime Minister in Minto, New Brunswick:

> There should be and must be a subvention on coal transported within these provinces for power purposes.

Well, he had his answer this morning. I should also like to draw the attention of hon. members to the attitude of the former minister of fisheries as contained in a press release from Westville, Nova Scotia, on November 25:

Westville, March 25. The mayor of this Nova Scotia mining town feels Hon. James Sinclair, dominion fisheries minister "should have been chased out of the province for what he said about our coal industry" during a visit to the province.

Mayor Alfred Matheson was one of several civic and union officials in Nova Scotia's coal producing areas to criticize remarks made by Mr. Sinclair in a recent address at Antigonish, Nova Scotia.

The fisheries minister was quoted as saying that uneconomical coal mines must eventually close and that in view of a tremendous demand for labour in Canada there is "no point in subsidizing an industry merely for the sake of providing employment".

Mr. Sinclair later told a press conference "the only value of a subsidy is to tide an operation over a difficult period, if in the end you see that it is going to be of value".

I may say, sir, that the former prime minister figured that coal would be very valuable in the future. The press release continues:

"Mines are not like fisheries. They do not work out, and there is no sense in trying to keep a mine alive which you know is going to be permanently uneconomical."

In his reply, Mayor Matheson said that wheat farmers, gold mines, railroads and even fisheries receive subsidies. He also referred to unfair competition to Nova Scotia miners from the importation of 33 million tons of American coal a year.

"We're fighting for another coal mine in Pictou county and we shouldn't let some western politician come in and knock us down", Mayor Matheson said.

United Mine Workers Locals have also criticized Mr. Sinclair's statements.

Union officials at Princess local in Sydney Mines termed the statement, "brazen, and a black eye to organized workers in the coal industry in this province".

William Carey, a board member of United Mine Workers, told union members that "to have the Minister of Fisheries come into Nova Scotia and dictate a policy cannot and will not be accepted by the coal union".

Mr. Sinclair, who arrived in Vancouver today, declined to comment on Mayor Matheson's statement.

He reiterated his previous remark that there "is no point in keeping these marginal operations going with subsidies on the grounds that they provide employment when there is such a shortage of labour all over Canada".

I do not wish at this time to elaborate on the situation of the coal industry in Nova Scotia. With the change in ownership it is hoped that the Avro Company will improve the position in Cape Breton. But I do say now that a pressing problem for the miners of Cape Breton is the matter of wages and working conditions. The miners of Cape Breton have sacrificed much these past years. One has only to go back to the Sir Andrew Rae Duncan royal commission report to realize what they have contributed to the industrial life of this country. At that time the commission felt that the miners who were the backbone of the company were entitled to a raise. Company policy was that they were part of an over-all industry and as such could not receive any rate. Today however the company has reversed its position and our miners are still suffering. I might point out that if the company had continued its previous policy the miners would be in a much happier position and the losses suffered at some collieries could be easily absorbed by the over-all profits and further closings could be thus eliminated.

I would now like to make a few brief remarks for the benefit of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate the former minister of citizenship and immigration. I have representations from groups in my constituency that would prove the administration of that department under the hon. gentleman was nothing less than discriminatory. This could be further supported by the opinion voiced by the Canadian Labour Congress. On Tuesday the hon. member saw fit to criticize the makeup of the present cabinet. I find this a strange attitude indeed considering his own position in the last cabinet. This hon. member in his own written opinion is an expert on fish; that is in his own written opinion.

I also wish to comment on the remarks of the hon. leader of the C.C.F. party. To my surprise this party that makes so much of the slogan "The Political Arm of Labour" through its leader had this to say as reported at page 855 of Hansard of November 7, 1957:

May I ask the Prime Minister this supplementary question. Is it not a fact that the Saskatchewan government has been on record to the effect that it would bear the whole cost of the electrical installation and some other costs, but that since the government is to assist in the development of electricity in the maritimes Saskatchewan does not expect to be discriminated against by the government of Canada?

The hon. member was referring to the commencement of construction of the South Saskatchewan river dam. The hon. member says in effect that Saskatchewan would pay the whole cost of electrical installation, but if the dominion government is to assist the maritimes in power development it must at the same time aid Saskatchewan. This is the crudest kind of political horse trading I have ever heard of. We supported legislation to help western wheat growers but we did not do it on a quid pro quo basis in return for comparable benefits to the maritimes; we supported it as proper and necessary legislation to assist western farmers. I suggest to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) that he should take a similar stand in respect to legislation designed to assist us. Where would we get with legislation in this house, I ask the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, if every member said, "Yes, I will vote for this legislation if you will do the same thing for my constituency". It would mean putting dominion politics on the auction block of local self-interest.

An hon. Member: What is it on now?

An hon. Member: You are still young.

Mr. MacInnis: I am glad to see there are so many who are willing to represent Cape Breton South in this house, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): A good riding.

Mr. MacInnis: In reference to further local problems I would like to draw the government's attention to the conditions of the local harbours. Sydney harbour, which during world war II saw more shipping pass through it than any other harbour on the eastern seaboard, is now in a run-down condition. Its one wharf has long since been condemned. With the opening of the St. Lawrence seaway Sydney could once again become a very important seaport. Numerous inquiries from world cruises had to be by-passed because of lack of facilities. This problem is under consideration and work will commence next spring. However, I will be pressing for greater improvements.

The harbour at Glace Bay is also being given consideration and further plans are being worked out. Conditions for local fishermen along the coast are anything but desirable and an improvement will be looked for. It is my intention to keep the problems of Cape Breton South very much in evidence and the co-operation shown me by the government to date has been very much appreciated and I feel certain that the government will continue to recognize the needs of the maritime provinces.

Another matter I am obligated to bring to the attention of the house was a remark passed by a member of the official opposition. It came at the time the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Coates) had asked the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois) a question regarding the Springhill mine disaster. This statement was not included in Hansard—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Why?

Mr. MacInnis: —but nevertheless it was made. The hon. member to whom I refer cried out, "Send them a wreath". I say that the hon. member responsible for this remark has much to be ashamed of.

[Mr. MacInnis.]

In closing, Mr. Speaker, I wish to point out that the opposition cry about promises made during the election campaign, but if their own tactics—not promises but intimidation—had worked they would continue to feel justified that they were doing the right thing. If any of my hon. friends feel that these remarks are unwarranted I would refer them to the tactics used in Newfoundland and Nova Scotia and as a further reference to the Ottawa Journal of May 18 carrying an article which contained a remark made by an hon. member of the official opposition who in speaking to a civil service gathering had this to say:

> That civil service wide salary increase could come as soon as the vote in the general election has been counted.

But the hon. member qualified it, linking it to a Liberal election victory. What can this be but intimidation?

Hon. George C. Marler (St. Antoine-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, though it is now some time since the opening of this debate I feel that I should begin my remarks by felicitating the mover (Mr. Smith) and the seconder (Mr. Arsenault) upon their maiden speeches in this house. I thought that despite the apprehension which the mover of the address said he felt he spoke with the easy assurance of a veteran and displayed none of the nervousness which we have come to associate with a member's first speech in this house. I was not a member of the Commons at the time his father was in this house but as a reader of Hansard I must say he created upon my mind a most favourable impression and I note from what has been said during this debate that that favourable impression is shared by many hon. members who are present today.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, I was pleased also to hear the new member for Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault). He spoke with great ease on the conditions in his constituency. He was rather pessimistic about agriculture, the lumber industry, mining and fisheries. This was all very interesting but, in my opinion, he was forgetting that all those matters come under provincial jurisdiction. Consequently, Mr. Speaker, may I say to him that when I sat in the legislative assembly, the members of the Union Nationale spoke only of the extraordinary prosperity which was then prevailing in all parts of the province, including the county of Bonaventure, and I have no doubt they still have the same opinion today. It was their policy to say that everything was going fine. Well, I am rather disappointed with what the hon. member had to say. I am sure that after a while especially after taking a leaf out of the book of Union Nationale party members in the legislative assembly, he will start praising the policy of his leader.

(Text):

Before continuing with my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I should like to say how very much I regret the circumstances which made it necessary for the Leader of the Opposition (St. Laurent) to announce some weeks ago his decision to retire from the leadership of the Liberal party. I believe it is no exaggeration to say that no one in Canada in our own times has commanded greater respect from those like myself who have been associated with him in the Liberal party, as well as from his political adversaries, and indeed from Canadians all across our country. I cannot help thinking, Mr. Speaker, that in the future, when we come back to look more objectively than we do at the present time upon the period in which he presided over the destinies of Canada, we shall realize even more fully than we do today the greatness of the contribution he has made. I know it was with a heavy heart that he reached the decision as to his retirement; but I hope he will derive much satisfaction not only from the general regret that is being felt in all parts of the country, but also, and perhaps more particularly, from the fact that during the eight years or more he was Prime Minister of our country Canadians came to regard prosperity in Canada as a normal and natural state of affairs.

I think, Mr. Speaker, they had good cause for that state of mind because the last eight years have been without parallel in the history of Canada. Year after year, in almost every field of endeavour, new records have been established that have made Canada the envy of the western world. In support of those views I could cite many figures but I shall merely point out that during that period of eight years Canada's gross national product increased from $15.6 billion in 1948 to an all-time high of nearly $30 billion in 1956. To all intents and purposes the gross national product had nearly doubled during this relatively short period which ended on December 31 last.

What was the situation at the end of June, 1957, when the present government took office? I think the question merits some attention because already hon. members on the government side of the house are talking of the economic conditions which then prevailed in much the same terms as they would have used if the new government had inherited a first-class depression. Perhaps these same members are not unconscious of the fact—perhaps it is an unfortunate one—that in the minds of many Canadians economic depressions are still closely associated with Conservative governments. But what are the facts of the matter, Mr. Speaker? I am going to cite only a few figures to show that despite the sombre description given by Conservative members, the present government inherited a prosperous economy.

First, corporation profits before taxes for the calendar year 1956 were the highest in history, and corporation net earnings for the first six months of 1957 were greater than those for the corresponding period of any previous year except 1956. In fact, corporation net earnings for the first six months of 1957 were $2,249 million compared with $2,254 million in the first six months of 1956; that is to say they were only one-quarter of one per cent less than the record first half of 1956.

Second, industrial production for June, 1957, was only slightly below the record level attained in October, 1956. It was not at the record level of October but I think all objective people would say that it was at a not unsatisfactory level.

Third, Canada's gross national product for the first and second quarters of 1957 substantially exceeded that of the same period of any earlier year, being estimated by the dominion bureau of statistics at $14.4 billion in contrast with $13.5 billion last year.

Fourth, labour income for June, 1957, reached an all-time high for any month of $1,327 million. More people had jobs than ever before and average weekly wages and salaries were likewise at an all-time high level.

Fifth, total retail trade for June, 1957, was greater than for any previous June, just as total retail trade for the first half of 1957 was substantially greater than for the first half of 1956.

Sixth, the total of gross domestic investment in housing, non-residential construction, machinery and equipment for the first half of 1957 constituted an all-time high for the first half of any year.

These few figures show quite clearly that when the present government assumed office toward the end of June this year Canada was enjoying a very high degree of prosperity and I suggest that this was the general conviction of Canadians at that time. But, Mr. Speaker, despite the prosperous state of affairs which existed last June, attention is now being focused upon the level of unemployment. The statistics for September, 1957, published jointly by the dominion bureau of statistics and the Department of Labour are disquieting and because they are disquieting I believe I should say something about this important matter. In proposing to do so I am not unmindful of the words in the Prime Minister's radio address last week in which he is reported by the Ottawa Journal of November 9 to have said:

> It seems clear that the strategy of the high command of the Liberal party is to spread fear and gloom and preach doom and to pretend that where unemployment exists this government is to blame.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) is reported to have attributed what he described as the levelling off partly to international conditions and partly to the Liberal government for not maintaining Canada's international markets and her monetary policies which he said "froze development". Then he went on to say:

> Criticism is of the essence of our system, but the sowing of the fear of mass unemployment is a dangerous course to follow, for it can lead to a depression complex whether so intended or not.

This certainly was not the attitude of the Conservative opposition in March, 1955, when, on a motion to go into supply, they moved an amendment referring to the grave state of unemployment in Canada. In moving this amendment, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough), now Secretary of State, said at page 1602 of Hansard:

> In the midst of wealth we have human misery.

She went on to quote the remarks of an unidentified industrialist which were as follows:

> I'm very much afraid that we are in for more chaotic conditions in the auto industry in 1955 than we lived through in 1954.

A little further on she gave another quotation from the same industrialist:

> Don't ever forget this. We will never again experience the lush seven years we did during 1946-1953. Those conditions are as dead as yesterday's newspaper.

Mr. Speaker, if I might interject this parenthesis, the curious part is that the dreadful conditions of 1954, this chaotic state, was the year in which the industry produced an average of about 30,000 vehicles per month, and in that same year in which the hon. member for Hamilton West was referring to chaotic conditions in the automobile industry they reached the total of 38,000 cars per month and in 1956 even more.

The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), now the Minister of Finance, in those dulcet words he always uses when he speaks, spoke of the situation as a stark, ugly fact in Canada today. Then, he went on to add:

> There are people in Canada today who are going hungry as a result of unemployment.

Mr. Speaker, does anyone believe that those were not the kind of statements that spread fear and gloom? Let me quote the remarks of the former leader of the opposition, Mr. Drew, at page 1649 of Hansard for March 2, 1955. After he had referred to the various statistics as to the number of persons who were unemployed—hon. members who were in the house at the time will recall there were two sets of figures and the opposition always used the worst ones—he said:

> Whichever set of figures may be accepted, the fact remains that there is unemployment so extensive that it should no longer be disregarded by the government or by any other hon. member.

Of course, that was the kind of statement that was intended to inspire confidence. Then, the leader of the opposition read the following quotation from the Montreal Gazette, which is recorded at page 1650 of Hansard for the same date:

> The situation is actually so serious that every effort must be made to inform the Canadian people, who are living in relative prosperity, that a considerable group of their fellow citizens is out of work, and that many more will be facing a similar tragedy if immediate action is not taken to increase employment.

Is that the kind of statement that was calculated to give encouragement to the unemployed? Was this the kind of statement to inspire confidence? Mark you, Mr. Speaker, the opposition associated itself with this quotation. Mr. Drew went on to say:

> That is exactly what we are seeking to impress upon the government; that is exactly what we are seeking to place before the government, hon. members and the people of Canada by presenting this resolution at this time.

The present Prime Minister also participated in the debate. He concluded his contribution to it with this sentence as reported on page 2039 of Hansard for March 15, 1955:

> Will he—

Referring to the then prime minister.

> —not state that he realizes that if we continue to deliberately delude ourselves concerning the unemployment situation we shall bring about a fear complex in this country which will have serious results in the future?

What a strange change in thinking seems to have taken place since the hon. gentleman crossed from this side of the house to the other. Then the leader of the opposition, Mr. Drew, because a subamendment had been presented, made these comments which seem to me rather appropriate at this time, bearing in mind the present Prime Minister's remarks. At page 2498 of Hansard for March 29, 1955, he said:

> Surely there is no suggestion that the dominion bureau of statistics is deliberately seeking to undermine public confidence.

Then, he went on:

> Far from there being any suggestion that this discussion seeks to undermine confidence, may I say that we would indeed be open to criticism if we failed to bring forward the facts that are produced by agencies of the government set up for that purpose, and to seek action by the government to deal in some way with a situation which is apparent from a study of those very figures.

The Prime Minister, speaking on this subject, has obviously changed his point of view in the relatively short space of time since that debate was held. At that time he did not seem to feel there was any restriction that ought to be put on a discussion of unemployment. Now, as we know, that subject is taboo. He would like us to put it in our desks and forget it.

It may be thought that the situation which was discussed in March 1955, and which was the situation which prevailed in January of that year because the statistics as to January employment had then just been published, when some 362,000 persons were out of jobs and seeking employment, was relatively much graver than the situation revealed by the September 1957 figures to which I referred a moment ago. An examination of the relevant data shows this not to be the case. The figures for September 21, 1957 show that 194,000 persons were then out of a job and seeking employment compared with only 168,000 in September 1954, so that it is quite clear that if unemployment increases at a rate not greater than that which prevailed between September 1954 and January 1955—when the situation was described by the Conservative opposition as grave—there will be over 450,000 persons out of jobs in January 1958. Let us hope, Mr. Speaker, that the rate which prevailed over those months in 1954-55 will not be repeated in the same space of time in 1957-58.

The figure I have just mentioned, that of some 450,000 persons, seems to be supported by the labour department itself because a spokesman quoted by the Ottawa Journal said that unemployment, as measured by the number of persons without jobs and seeking work, should be no more than 475,000 by February. I just ask myself, what would the hon. gentlemen opposite be saying if they were sitting on this side and that condition was, in fact, about to become a reality. Regardless of the figure that is used, whether it is the 450,000 which I suggest would be a justified prediction on the September figures, whether it is the 475,000 mentioned by the labour spokesman or whether it is 750,000 as I heard on television at the end of last week, the fact does remain that the present level of unemployment is most disquieting.

Before I leave the September 1957 figures, I think I should draw to the government's attention the clear implications which they have when examined closely and are compared with the figures for September 1956. First they show that whereas on September 22, 1956 there were 97,000 persons without jobs and seeking work, there were 194,000 or twice as many on September 21, 1957. This is the result of what I might describe as a purely superficial examination of the figures.

A more careful examination of the figures shows that there appears to have been a substantial deterioration in what I might call the volume of employment, the work content, so to speak, disclosed by these statistics. In September last year nearly 90 per cent of the total labour force worked 35 hours or more during the survey week, whereas in the corresponding survey week of this year only 85.5 per cent of those with jobs worked more than 35 hours. In other words, there has been a marked diminution in the percentage of the labour force working 35 hours or more, and a substantial increase, a regrettable increase in the numbers working less than 35 hours. There is also an increase in the number of those with jobs but not at work. Clearly, the amount of employment shown by the September figures is much less than at the corresponding time last year. For that reason, Mr. Speaker, I believe that the situation merits the closest attention of the government.

I know the dangers of concentrating attention principally on unemployment figures, and I realize that by doing so one may create a false impression as to the present state of the Canadian economy. Therefore, in giving the figures which I have given this afternoon I am not suggesting that Canada's forward march has been permanently halted, but I am suggesting that there is a serious problem which the government must meet. During the election campaign the Prime Minister promised to increase benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act, to eliminate the waiting period and to extend the benefit period to a full 52 weeks.

Though no legislation for this purpose has been introduced or has been announced by the government so far in this session, I am sure hon. members will realize that even if this legislation were introduced it would not in itself diminish the number of persons who are unemployed. It would merely attenuate and soften some of the effects of unemployment upon some of the labour force. It would not be a remedy for unemployment and it would not provide payments to workers who for one reason or another will be unable to draw unemployment insurance.

In his radio address the other night the Prime Minister spoke of "sowing fear of mass unemployment which might lead to a depression complex". This is just the sort of thing that the Conservative opposition was doing in 1955. But, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to take that line. However, I want to point out to the government that nothing engenders fear and lack of confidence so much as does uncertainty; and it is a fair statement that the government is itself responsible for a great deal of the state of uncertainty which now prevails in Canada.

There is uncertainty as to the trade policies the government intends to follow. During the election campaign the Prime Minister repeatedly promised that he would call a conference of all commonwealth countries to discuss the problem of trade, so that Canada might recover the markets which he said the Liberals had lost. We know—but only in a very general way—of the efforts that have been made in connection with a commonwealth conference on trade, and we know that the government has organized a large mission of Canadians to visit the United Kingdom. But, Mr. Speaker, between the election campaign and the present time, a curious change has taken place.

The trade mission to the United Kingdom is proposing not to find out how the United Kingdom can be persuaded to buy more of our agricultural primary products and more of our manufactured goods but, on the contrary, its purpose is to try to persuade the British to sell to Canada more goods manufactured in the United Kingdom. In fact, we have been given the impression that it would be considered to be almost indecent for the trade mission to talk of the objectives which seemed so important during the election campaign. I say, Mr. Speaker, that this change of purpose is the kind of government action which promotes uncertainty in trade circles in Canada.

Then we also have the Prime Minister's offhand proposal to divert to the United Kingdom 15 per cent of the purchases Canadians make in the United States. There is uncertainty as to whether Canadians are to take this proposal in all seriousness, but this is of small moment compared to the uncertainty which the diversion of some $600 million of trade would have upon Canadian importers, distributors, retailers and consumers.

Then there is the uncertainty arising from the meetings at Mont Tremblant and at Ottawa of the representatives of the United Kingdom government and our own. What were the proposals put forward by the British, and what proposals were made by our own representatives? What are the policies being followed by our government? In response to a request for information the Minister of Finance made a statement which though spread over several pages of Hansard, gave no significant information whatever. Mr. Speaker, if I might just make a remark in parenthesis, it reminded me of the letter of a school boy who feels that he must tell you what he did all day hour by hour from the time he woke up to the time he went to bed but who does not really tell you anything about what he was thinking or what he was going to do. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that even after listening to the statement of the Minister of Finance, both parliament and the nation itself are completely in the dark as to the trade policies the government intends to follow. We have more uncertainty.

Then there is uncertainty as to the policy to be followed by the government with respect to tight money. During the election campaign the Prime Minister repeatedly described for the benefit of Canadians the dire effects of the credit restrictions introduced by the Bank of Canada: they had struck a body-blow here and another body-blow there; small business had been strangled, and so on. Accordingly the electorate believed that the Conservative party was committed to putting an end to credit restrictions, and that belief was reinforced after the election by the statement made by the Minister of Finance as reported by the Ottawa Journal of June 26, 1957:

> There very definitely must be early relaxation of the rigours of the tight money policy.

But, Mr. Speaker, despite repeated questions, hon. members have been unable to get from the government an answer as to what has been done to bring about such a relaxation; not what will be done but what has been done. The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance (Mr. Bell), in answer to such a question referred to "the many things that have been done" by the government. But no one on the government side of the house, Mr. Speaker, will provide one item of specific information on the subject. No one will say just what has been done.

The Minister of Finance on one or two occasions has alluded to the $150 million which the government has made available for housing; but surely no one will contend for an instant that the earmarking of that amount for housing has added to the available supply of money. All that has happened is that $150 million have been set aside for housing out of the total supply of money, and there is accordingly that much less available for other purposes. I am not complaining of this situation Mr. Speaker; I am merely drawing attention to the facts of the matter.

The Minister of Finance speaks of tight money as an unfortunate legacy from the Liberal government, and even the Prime Minister in his radio address last week blamed the Liberal government for the monetary policies which we followed. Mr. Speaker, if these statements are true, why does not the present government—which has in the matter the same authority as had the previous government—implement its promises to the electors to change monetary policies; or, Mr. Speaker, if the statements are not well-founded, why does not the government admit the fact and tell parliament and the people of Canada what policy on credit restrictions they propose as an alternative? Surely in a matter such as this, and having regard to the conflict between the Conservatives' promises before the election and their silence and inactivity since that time, the people of Canada have a right to the kind of statement of government policy which will put an end to the uncertainties which the government has itself created.

Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Finance the other day referred to a slight reduction in the rate of interest now being paid by the Bank of Canada or by the government on treasury bills. He seemed to feel that this was a tremendous step forward. May I say that I have read with the closest interest and attention recently published statements of the Bank of Canada and their balance sheet, and I can see no indication whatever of any action taken by the Bank of Canada which has brought about this small reduction in the rate on treasury bills. I therefore ask myself, and I ask the government to tell us this: What has the government done to carry out its representations to the people of Canada that it would make a change in its policy with regard to tight money?

Then, Mr. Speaker, there is uncertainty as to the government's policies with respect to inflation. Before the election the Prime Minister was telling the country that federal government expenditures constitute the biggest inflationary factor in our economy, and that the Liberal government ought to cut its expenditures. Of course, that was before the election. What is the government's present policy?

We have very little to go on, Mr. Speaker, but though parliament has been in session only about a month, it has already authorized measures that will increase government expenditures by at least $200 million per annum, not counting either cash advances on farm stored grain amounting to another $100 or $150 million or the $150 million to be made available for housing, to which I referred a moment ago. In other words the government is going to have to find $500 million of new cash.

The contrast between the thousands of words of pre-election statements and the silence which the Prime Minister seems to have imposed upon his colleagues is indeed surprising; just as the reduction of expenditures promised before the election contrasts strangely with the measures which the government has recommended to parliament.

We recall of course the promises of the Prime Minister to increase the payments to the provinces and also to reduce federal taxes, but how do all of these measures, whether adopted or contemplated, fit into the framework of a balanced budget? This is an important question, because the people of Canada I think should know at the earliest opportunity the budgetary policy to be followed by the present government. Nor is it unreasonable that the people of Canada should expect a statement from the government on this important subject. The policies advocated by the Prime Minister during the election were a change from those followed by the previous government and the people of Canada are entitled to know to what extent the promised change is to be carried out.

As I have endeavoured to point out, there is uncertainty as to the trade policies to be followed by the government; there is uncertainty as to its monetary policies; there is uncertainty as to its budgetary policies and there is even uncertainty as to whether it will present a budget during the current session.

I suggest that the government would be following a wise course if it sought to dispel these uncertainties by making clear, unequivocal statements of policy; by doing this they could remove many of the uncertainties with which Canadians are now faced and for which the government itself is fully responsible. It is an extraordinary thing, particularly having in mind the loquacity to which we became accustomed before the election, that so far no minister holding a portfolio in the government has participated in the present debate. May we expect some of them to do so before the debate concludes or is there to be uncertainty even on that point?

Mr. B. R. Leboe (Cariboo): Mr. Speaker, I would like first of all to mention that I, too, believe that the speeches of the mover (Mr. Smith, Calgary South) and the seconder (Mr. Arsenault) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne were speeches of quality in both content and delivery, with the exception of some matters which were indefinite.

I would like to congratulate the Speaker and those associated with him on their appointments, and also to say that I rise at this time to speak more from a sense of duty than in the hope of getting results.

I would like to go back to that old question which I think is worthy of mention and that is the question of construction grants for our little old Pacific Great Eastern railway. You will recall the other day I asked a question of the Prime Minister which will be found in the October 28 edition of Hansard as to what was his policy concerning these construction grants. You will also recall that he turned the question over to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes) and of course I knew I could not get an answer from him because it was an answer which would only come from the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) himself. I tried in a supplementary question to push the point and to get a clarification on what I wanted to know, and all I got was a great silence.

Now this silence on the part of the Prime Minister surely cannot be directed to the hon. member for Cariboo but must be directed to those people in British Columbia whom he represents. I personally do not think that the smug position of the Prime Minister is good enough. At least when the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. St. Laurent) was in government, when I rose to ask questions on this matter, although I did not like the answer I received at least I did get an answer as to what was the government's policy on that question.

I think these grants should be forthcoming to the Pacific Great Eastern railway which in the final analysis would mean at least $100 million to the people of British Columbia. This money is badly needed because of the tight money policy which is now being carried out following the policy laid down by the previous government. This policy is one which, as has been pointed out, was loudly denounced by the members now sitting on the government benches before they attained office.

I want you to notice that I do not use the same words in this connection as do the Conservatives. They use the word "power" but I prefer to think of it as office. In that connection I would like to say that this tight money policy has made a great deal of difference to the revenue of provincial governments all across Canada. Naturally the provincial governments, with falling revenues, are faced with a task that is almost insurmountable. I would like to refer to an excerpt from the Edmonton Journal of November 9. In part this article had to say:

> Production and sales in the forest industry, the backbone of British Columbia's economy, are down more than 10 per cent and sales tax collections likewise have fallen, the report said.
> Reports circulating in the capital say government income from forestry is down more than 30 per cent. Estimates say the industries contribute about $85 million ($38 million from sales tax, the rest from other taxes) yearly to the treasury. Therefore a 30 per cent drop would leave Mr. Bennett—

If I might interpolate here that refers to the premier of British Columbia.

> —about $25 million short.

The paper said the drop would also affect industries dependent on the forestry business.

Now as long as this government is going to be dragging its feet in respect to this matter it looks like an impossible situation for the provincial government and the municipalities of this country. I think the people generally accept that as a true statement and a true appraisal in that connection.

The members of the opposition have been plying the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) with questions in order to try and find out what his financial policy is going to be. We have heard rumours of a split between the governor of the Bank of Canada and the finance minister. This has been denied, but I should like to put it on record that if one does not occur soon, or the governor of the Bank of Canada does not change his mind, the present Minister of Finance will not much longer be sitting where he now does. The people of this country are watching this situation carefully, and it is a matter which touches them where it hurts most, namely the pocket book.

Much has been said about unemployment. I will only say this. It is foolishness for us to bury our heads in the sand and say we must not scare the people because that would make matters worse, when we know very well we have a parliament in Canada whose task it is to deal with the country's problems as they exist. These statements have, to a great degree been made outside the house rather than inside it, but it seems to me the problem of unemployment in the province of British Columbia is a real problem.

My attention was drawn the other day to a newspaper clipping in which the leader of the opposition in the British Columbia legislature was reported as asking questions of the responsible ministers of the British Columbia government with regard to the unemployment situation there. I think his words could more appropriately have been directed to this government here, because the tight money policy is the policy which has affected the economy of British Columbia and brought about the present situation.

The lumber industry and the plywood industry in the province of British Columbia has suffered a great deal, particularly in the northern interior area. The $150 million which was given over for housing to the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation is only a drop in the bucket as far as we are concerned. It would mean, at the most, the movement of 100 million feet of lumber in the whole of Canada, and that is not very much so far as the forest industry is concerned. As I say, it does not help the forest industry very much, nor does it give a great deal of assistance to the people who need houses.

Now I wish to make a reference to the consumer index which was the subject of discussion in the house a short time ago when attempts were made to show that there was a levelling off in the cost of living. I should like to point out that the levelling off has been at the cost of the consumer because in many industries a true levelling off does not take place. The people who have suffered in this country are those engaged in the primary producing industries such as lumber, agriculture and mining. These people have to sell on a supply and demand market, whereas the secondary industries of this country do not sell their products on a supply and demand market to any great extent. The cost prices of the articles produced by secondary industries are based on the cost of production and, therefore, as the cost of production rises, the cost of the end product rises accordingly. Therefore when we talk about a levelling off of the consumer index we find that if we look at the situation carefully in reality some people are paying the shot. I do not think they appreciate their position in this regard.

One of the silliest statements I have heard for a long time was made by the present Minister of Finance this session and also by the previous minister of finance, and that is with regard to saving money while at the same time the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) puts out a statement that we must seek new markets. We know, Mr. Speaker, that when we export goods we are going to import an equal amount of goods or something very close to it, goods which have to be purchased by people here. Therefore, trade being a two-way matter, we still have the goods in this country on the shelves. Now the Minister of Finance is saying: let us save more, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce is saying: we must seek new markets. I think they had better get together and discover which one is going where, because you cannot save more and buy more at the same time, at least I have never been able to do it.

Mr. Speaker, we experienced a great disaster in the Peace river area not so long ago, about the third week in October, when the bridge over the mighty Peace river between Dawson Creek and Fort St. John gave way. This bridge is on the Alaska highway, mile zero being at Dawson Creek and it goes north for 1600 miles. The amount of traffic which passes over this particular highway is so heavy that only one who has actually witnessed it would believe that this northern route would ever have as much vehicular traffic as it has.

Highway 97 starts way down in the southwestern states travelling up through California, up through Oregon and Washington into British Columbia, through to Kamloops and on up to Alaska. Many thousands of tourists use this highway almost all the year round, and, of course, the collapse of this bridge has created a most unfortunate bottleneck.

I wish to say, however, that I am not disappointed in any manner with the handling of this situation by the Minister of National Defence, (Mr. Pearkes) under whose jurisdiction this bridge comes. But I wish to express the hope that the minister will not listen too closely to his advisers. His advisers are military men and they look after this bridge from a military point of view purely and simply. I want to say to the minister that I believe he has a moral responsibility in connection with this bridge. I believe this government has a moral responsibility in connection with it. If the department feels it has not, then it means we should be looking forward at an early date to a highway policy which will embrace a national highway system in which this area would be included. I believe a bridge across the river at Taylor Flats is absolutely essential. Either a new bridge should be built, or the present bridge rehabilitated as soon as possible.

I am sure that if there were a member in this house from the Yukon,—and I regret very much that there is not—he would be addressing the chamber very much along the lines I have been following in the last few moments and he would emphasize the importance of this great highway to the people of the Yukon.

Other people are interested in the project. I have an excerpt here from the Prince George Citizen, datelined Seattle, Associated Press. It reads as follows:

> B. Frank Hintslemon, former Alaska governor, Wednesday urged the Alaska international rail and highway commission to give priority to improvement of the Alaska highway, then give consideration to an Alaska-United States highway link through British Columbia east of the coast range. The 13 man commission ended a two day meeting here Wednesday night.

It is possible, perhaps, that this highway is one of the most important highways in Canada because it does have a defence value. I have, therefore, taken a few minutes today to bring it to the attention of the house in the hope that we will not find ourselves too long without a bridge across the river at the point close to Taylor Flats. I was pleased that the previous government saw fit, even if it was just before the election, to introduce a paving program to pave the first 50 miles of the Alaska highway from Fort St. John to Dawson Creek and I do hope that if the present government is here long enough—

An hon. Member: What a question.

Mr. Leboe: —it will follow the example set by the previous government and extend the paving of that highway north. As I pointed out, this is very important to the people in that area and all the people to the south right down to the southern part of the United States.

I have a few words to say about the C.B.C. and the National Film Board and when I say "a few words" I mean just that. Under the present policy for television broadcasting we find that there is an unequal division between the parties in this house in terms of the time allotted to them for television broadcasting. I maintain that this completely overlooks the wishes of the people who are looking at their TV sets and recognizes the situation only from a political point of view. If political television broadcasts are to be continued I think there should be an equal division among the four major parties in this house and an equal amount of time should be allotted to each to present their views so the Canadian people will get what they are looking for and will be assisted in finding out what the various parties stand for, what their platforms and programs are. I do not think anybody except perhaps those who are in political office will argue the point. If a canvass were made of the listening audience across the country I am sure it would be found the people generally would look most favourably upon a policy under which 25 per cent of the listening time were allotted to each of the four major parties.

Now, just a word about the National Film Board. I seem to be ranging far and wide in my remarks but these are just a few thoughts I have in connection with these various subjects. It has been brought to my attention that the National Film Board will not release the film "The Sceptre and the Mace" through its channels for six months. I think this policy should be scrapped at once. There are many people who for conscience sake never darken a theatre door. This film will be released through commercial theatre circuits for a period of six months before it is released through the circuits of the National Film Board. As I undertsand it this is being done to defray expenses. It is the taxpayer who pays in any case and therefore why should the people who want to see this film be deprived of seeing it through National Film Board channels for a period of six months or more? Many centres throughout the country lack theatres but many have social groups to whom the National Film Board material could be made available. This film should be shown across Canada while the visit of Her Majesty the Queen is fresh in the minds of the people. I do not see for one moment why we should have to wait for six months to view this film on the pretext that we are trying to save some money through releasing it commercially in the first instance. If we think it is possible to save some money for the National Film Board we should perhaps investigate the possibility of uniting the efforts of the National Film Board and the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation. Possibly we could save enough money by this means that the authorities would not have to worry about the few dollars they will collect through the rental of "The Sceptre and the Mace" and other films.

Another subject I wish to raise is the need of airports. As we travel across the country we see a great need for establishing new airports and extending the facilities of existing ones because registered aircraft in Canada continue to increase rapidly and the miles travelled by people by the medium of airplanes is increasing every day. Also, new applications are being made for charters. I trust that the government will look into the situation a little closer in respect to the seaplane base in Prince George. A lot of the chartered aircraft in the northern areas of British Columbia, as in other parts of the country, take off and land on water and Prince George is one of the chief centres in western Canada in that respect. A good seaplane base at this point is extremely essential.

There was some mention in this house the other day of the Wenner-Gren project. This happens to be considered for construction in the Cariboo riding. It was described by some hon. members as a steal, a give-away program and many other things but I can refer those hon. members who are concerned about it to three documents, the memorandum of agreement of 1956, the one dated in October 1957 and other related material that is available for distribution in British Columbia. I would also refer them to the water act of British Columbia which is the key to all these agreements. Hon. members of the C.C.F. party have been inclined to throw cold water on the proposed construction to be brought into being in the Cariboo riding at what is known as the Rocky Mountain trench. I have before me a clipping from the Ottawa Journal dated April 2, 1957 and I would like to read a part of it for the benefit of those hon. members. The article has reference to a pulp agreement in Saskatchewan and says in part:

> Under the agreement, the American group is given an option on 12,000 square miles of crown-owned spruce, fir, jackpine and poplar forests. Construction of the mill, with a minimum production of 300 tons daily, would start before September 1.

This announcement was made by A. G. Kuziak, natural resources minister of the Saskatchewan government. It seems to me that the members of the Saskatchewan government know on what side their bread is buttered as do some of the rest of us, and jealously will get these people nowhere. The people I represent in British Columbia are very happy about this proposition and they are the ones who live in that country. They are developing that country and they are the pioneers whose children today are engaged in the fields of engineering, surveying and so on which are the keys to prosperity in our province. We are looking forward to great things happening in the Cariboo riding.

Mr. John Pratt (Jacques Cartier-Lasalle): Mr. Speaker, may I add my congratulations to the many already extended to yourself and to the Deputy Speaker, and also to the mover and seconder of the motion for an address in reply to the speech from the throne.

May I also say how sorry I am that the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. St. Laurent) has chosen to relinquish his high office. I have always admired his personal qualities and qualifications and I sincerely hope that he will continue to serve his country for many years to come in some other important capacity.

The tradition has been very well impressed on me by now, Mr. Speaker, that in addressing this house for the first time one does not plunge into the controversial but rather dwells on the delights and innocent requirements of one's home constituency. I am sure that I do not need to dwell upon the delights of the county of Jacques Cartier-Lasalle with its great industry, its beautiful scenery and its highly intelligent population; but I would like to say a few words about the innocent requirements of this important riding which already consists of over 100,000 people and which will probably double its population within the next decade.

I certainly do not need the pressure of tradition to encourage me to concentrate on the problems of my riding, as indeed my entire campaign platform in the recent election was based solely on our own local problems and nothing else. However, local though those problems may be, they are actually of national interest, as similar problems exist in many other constituencies right across the country.

One of the most urgent of our problems is the continued and growing pollution of the Ottawa and St. Lawrence rivers, in as much as it could adversely affect the health of many thousands of citizens in every municipality along the banks of these streams. It is a disgrace to allow this disgusting, barbaric practice of dumping raw sewage and industrial wastes into our beautiful lakes and waterways. It is a practice which must be stopped but the expense involved is great. It is not fair that the municipalities should be expected to pay the entire cost out of their limited revenues. It is a responsibility of all three levels of government. The federal government is involved not only because many of these streams such as the Ottawa and St. Lawrence rivers are navigable but because many such streams run across interprovincial and even international borders.

My constituency is also seriously concerned about the question of railway level crossings. Again, this is an archaic situation which has been allowed to exist and grow worse right across the land but it has reached an appalling state in the western section of the island of Montreal which constitutes the riding of Jacques Cartier-Lasalle. We are very happy and proud to be the absolute hub of railroading in Canada, but in consequence we have four of the busiest lines where the fastest trains in America continue to take their toll of human life and suffering and where parents dread the thought of their youngsters crossing and recrossing the tracks on their way to and from school, and where the nights are made absolutely hideous by the never-ending scream of train whistles in the hands of nervous drivers trying to prevent the inevitable death and destruction. This problem was solved in Europe in the middle of the 19th century with picks and shovels. Surely, we should be able to cope with it in 20th century Canada with all the wonders of modern power shovels and bulldozers.

Equally pressing is the question of increasing highway traffic, with the lack of adequate bridges over federal canals and navigable waters causing bottlenecks which are not only a nuisance to the travelling public but which are costing millions of dollars in lost time to commercial and industrial transportation. The traffic complex at the Lachine canal in Ville St. Pierre is a nightmare of bad planning and lack of planning. At the other end of the riding there is a single bridge over the canal which creates a bottleneck at Ste. Anne de Bellevue, resulting in stalled traffic for two or three miles on either side of the block. This happens every weekend with ordinary traffic. What would happen with a civil defence evacuation, under emergency conditions, of a quarter of a million people?

When we speak of civil defence we realize in Jacques Cartier-Lasalle that it is difficult to formulate specific policies, or consolidate specific plans, owing to the complexity and increasing rapidity of scientific progress, but this is all the more reason why the federal government, with its greater access to last-minute information and its greater access to the necessary funds, must itself take the leadership and not lean so heavily on provincial or municipal initiative.

There were only two other planks in my election platform, namely to obtain better postal service in the developed areas of my constituency and to ask that the cities and towns be given a fair share of the national tax dollar. I would like to congratulate the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton) and thank him for all he has done and is doing to improve the postal services in Jacques Cartier-Lasalle. I would also like to congratulate and thank the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) for all he has done and is doing to further the cause of mutual understanding and mutual co-operation between the federal, provincial and municipal levels of government. I congratulate the Prime Minister and the Postmaster General on their initiative in getting things started and I personally thank them for helping me to achieve already at least part of my platform promises.

A recent magazine article remarked that it was highly unusual for a comedian to become a member of parliament. After listening to some of the hon. members in this house I find that it is not at all unusual for a member of parliament to become a comedian. I would like to say just a word about my first reactions as a wide-eyed newcomer to this historic house. At first, to be quite frank, I was rather disappointed at the hard, cynical way in which some of the older members put their party interests above the common good. I was, therefore, very pleased to hear in the speeches of some of the newcomers the kind of idealism that I had always associated with a true understanding of the real, traditional significance of parliament. I could not help but wonder whether these young men in time would also become hard, cynical and myopic in their narrow focus on the interest of party above all else. Since then I am happy to say I have heard several battle-scarred veterans of many years in this house reveal an idealism that is far too simple and straightforward to be merely histrionic and I am sure there is no better example for a young man to find than an old one who has kept faith with his principles.

However, there are still too many who seem to have come here to get rather than to give. I have heard far too many talk of their heritage, their rights and their privileges and not nearly enough of their duties, their responsibilities and their potentialities. Let us think less of our separate past and more of our tremendous collective future. I would like to feel that, at least from now on, this house is regarded by all as somewhat more of a parliament and somewhat less of a snakepit.

There are two reasons, Mr. Speaker, why I think I should cut this speech short and not take up any more of the valuable time of this house. First, because I have an uneasy feeling that, like so many hon. members, I may tend to use rather too many words for what little I have to say and, second, because I realize that this year we have an unusually large number of Conservative newcomers, some of whom are still awaiting their opportunity to speak. I trust, Mr. Speaker, that neither of these two mild understatements will be regarded as controversial. It is also six o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. W. J. Henderson (Kingston): Mr. Speaker, I rise to take part in this debate on the throne speech with a sincere feeling of appreciation to the electors of Kingston riding for returning me once again to parliament as their representative. I should first like to direct my remarks to you, Mr. Speaker, and to congratulate you as the first Commoner. Over the years, you have shown integrity and industry in your profession, and may your political career be as illustrious.

I rise today with a great deal of humility to direct my remarks for the most part to the affairs and conditions of the Department of National Defence. I do so with humility possibly because my knowledge of defence matters may not be as great as that of some members in this house, and because the Department of National Defence is headed by a renowned and respected soldier, carrying with him the highest award for gallantry that a soldier may earn. I am sure that in the last parliament when the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes) had my position on this side of the house, and the then minister of labour, the Hon. Milton Gregg, V.C., occupied a front bench on the government side of the house, we were inspired to have two such gallant men in our midst.

I should like to say a word, not to be interpreted as faint praise for the Minister of National Defence, but upon reviewing Hansard since the beginning of the session I find that he is the only active minister of the crown who has accepted his responsibility and has not endeavoured to make political speeches and avoid his responsibility by claiming the inadequacies of his predecessors. I have previously stated that my knowledge of defence is limited. This same condition may apply to some of my colleagues on this side of the house, and on the other side of the house, but we as members know that if this situation kept us quiet there would be a long silence in this forum. I am advising the minister that we serve notice on him now that we have a willingness to learn, so to speak to be taught, not only for our own purposes but so that the people of Canada will learn that their country has an appropriate defence force and that the security and respect of Canada has not been tinkered with to fulfil election promises of a desperate political group trying to remain in power.

I have for eight years been the representative of the Kingston constituency, a constituency whose military tradition is second to none in this country. May I interject that I am happy to have retained the confidence of my electors as expressed in the last election, and so be able to be here taking part in the discussion, particularly on military matters. During the eight years I have represented Kingston I have been compelled to deal a great deal with the Department of National Defence and to learn something about its operations. This has been true because the defence establishments in and around the city of Kingston are amongst the most important in Canada. I feel, therefore, for these reasons I probably have some modest competence to discuss the affairs of the Department of National Defence.

It has been evident that the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) either does not have a financial policy for Canada or refuses to advise Canadians of his policy and having expressed my admiration for the Minister of National Defence, I would not want to think he had fallen into the same category. We would want to feel, as Canadians, that all was well with defence and the security of Canada. We have heard rumours that anywhere from $200 million to $500 million could be cut from the defence budget to provide the answer to election promises, including a cut in income taxes. Let me say this at the beginning, if it can be done without impairing the security and defence of Canada we would greet this action with approval. Our ministers in the past, the Hon. Brooke Claxton and the Hon. Ralph Campney, would have done the same thing. There was one assurance that we had when they were heading the Department of National Defence and that is they had a policy, a recognized and consistent policy. It is evident that Canadians are becoming disturbed about their security and defence today.

If I might for a moment, I should like to refer to a newspaper article that appeared in the Toronto Star of October 17, 1957 which I think sums up the situation very well. It says:

> Is the government hacking away here and there just for economy? Just what is the program? If changes are required, what are the reasons? Mr. Claxton and Mr. Campney, the former defence ministers, had a defence policy, a consistent policy. It was a program which carefully took into account the needs of Canada for the defence of our homeland and for meeting our commitments to the United Nations and the North Atlantic Treaty alliance.
> The new defence minister may have information which proves that the defence program should be changed to meet changing conditions. If that is so, the people ought to be told in clear, forthright terms. Let there be no tinkering with Canada's defences.

In recent months we have heard from members on the government side great orations about Canada first policy, anti-Americanism. We have heard about the regency of Canada in the north, but it can be noticed now that United States newspapers are writing about the islands north of Canada. North of Canada should be known as the north pole, and the islands should be known as Canadian islands. The regency of Canada in the north depends upon her small settlements and the ships which make their appearances in the north. Our attention has been drawn to the presence of H.M.C.S. Labrador in the north in picture parade of the Family Herald of October 24, 1957. This newspaper shows a picture of the crew of H.M.C.S. Labrador raising a naval ensign over an abandoned trading post. According to recent reports the H.M.C.S. Labrador has been transferred from the Department of National Defence to the Department of Transport for duty as an icebreaker on the St. Lawrence, which job I hasten to say probably it can do well. However, what about the Labrador as Canada's medium for exhibiting sovereignty over the Canadian Arctic? What about the scientific and survey work which the Labrador could do in the north?

Is it the policy of the government that Canada does not want to know as much about the north as Russia? Are we to disregard the words of this ship's last master, a Royal Canadian Navy captain, who no later than last week said:

> There is no other ship internationally known as well as the Labrador for its pioneer work in the Canadian Arctic, and no ship has done so much tangible good there.

Do we take it the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) is anxious to have this ship under his command and simply says, "this will be an economy move all around"? Is this the policy of the Minister of National Defence that he adheres to or does he simply take the explanation of the Minister of Transport and comply with his wishes? What training is the Royal Canadian Navy going to carry on in the Arctic? What fleet are we to have in reserve or in being? I would suggest to the Minister of Transport and the Minister of National Defence that they read the book entitled "The True North", if they have not done so, in order to familiarize themselves with the initiative and foresight of Captain Bernier who did so much to establish the sovereignty of Canada in the Arctic. Just after the turn of the century Captain Bernier came to parliament hill and gained the support of 60 per cent of the members of the House of Commons for his work. It has been said of him that he, more than any other man, kept Canada from tossing away its Arctic inheritance.

The minister has now seen fit to make a change in another branch of the armed forces, the militia. In reply to a question I asked him on October 16, 1957, page 37 of Hansard, he inferred that the militia would have training emphasizing civil defence and the militia's role otherwise would have been glamorous and phony. In reply to another question, he hesitated to set a date for the transfer of the role of the militia to that of civil defence.

Summer camps are to be abolished and the number of days training paid for by the government are to be reduced from 60 to 40. All this may mean the end of the militia but if this is the government's conclusion, let us hear it definitely. I suggest to the minister that he has set a date for the end of the militia, namely January 31, 1958. If that is not correct, let him tell us so. This may be the date that the militia resorts to the role described by the present Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith). I quote from the Montreal Gazette of September 20, 1957, Mr. Blakely's column, in which he says this:

> Civil defence is at times a discouraging and thankless task.

If the Minister of National Defence wishes to take away the uniforms and rifles and issue the militia in January with dungarees, brooms, pails, shovels and fire-hoses, let him make his position clear.

The militia has played an extremely important role in Canada's defence in the last two wars and in peace time. The permanent force has provided a nucleus for the active voluntary forces, and its tradition can best be expressed by extracts from speeches made by the minister's own colleagues in the cabinet. I refer to a report in the Halifax Chronicle-Herald of September 1, 1954, which is "PC Member Gives Views on Issue" and reads in part as follows:

> George C. Nowlan, Q.C., M.P., Progressive Conservative member for Digby-Annapolis-Kings, speaking in connection with the proposed disbanding of the North Nova Scotia Highlanders, gave his opinion of this proposal in an interview here in which he said: . . .
> "For years we, of the opposition, have been deploring the treatment accorded the reserve army by our government, and have been urging that definite action be taken to further the interest in, and increase the efficiency of, this essential part of our national defence effort. How can this be done by disregarding the reputation, traditions and the dress which are the greatest attraction and asset of any military organization".

The present Secretary of State (Mrs. Fairclough) speaking on national defence supply on July 20, 1956, as reported at page 6269 of Hansard of that year, said this:

> I should like to make just one more plea to the minister on this basis. The city of Hamilton has always been very proud of its military men in all branches of the services; its militia has been a source of great pride to Hamiltonians generally, and it has a good auxiliary naval force. It seems too bad that one arm of the services should be left out of active participation. I know it is a matter of great regret to Hamiltonians generally and those who were members of the 424 squadron in particular.

She goes on further and says this:

> In all seriousness I ask the minister to give great consideration to this matter, because it is not a light thing to discourage so many persons who are actively engaged in military exercises of this sort, particularly when their activities have been a source of pride and a matter of interest for a quarter of a million people in that district.

But I think the greatest supporter of the militia is the present Minister of Transport. Speaking on national defence supply on June 30, 1955, as reported at page 5539 of Hansard of that year, he said this:

> I am also disturbed about what appears to be happening to another great Toronto militia regiment, the Queen's Own. I understand that their recruiting base has been shifted to Calgary, which to me sounds absolutely fantastic. The Queen's Own is a Toronto regiment and has been for many many years. It is one of the really old battalions of this country. Its roots are in Toronto, its spirit is in Toronto, its alumni are in Toronto, and if you want to raise men for the Queen's Own you had better leave the recruiting base in or near Toronto so the traditions of that regiment can remain intact.

I think the treatment of the militia by the government at the present time and the creation of the first, second, third and fourth Guards battalions is stupid. Why not leave these fine regiments intact with their traditions and names that mean so much to them? Why not leave them with the most important things they possess, their uniforms, their names, their traditions? Why do what bureaucrats are always trying to do, streamline or simplify, and in so doing complicate and lose what originally was possessed?

As a former member of the militia and knowing how much these things mean, I appeal to the minister to stop what I consider to be this stupid process of destroying the really important things that keep a militia regiment going, and the only things that do. Leave them intact. Let our regiments remain the fine regiments they are, with the fine traditions they have had for many years past.

I ask you, Mr. Speaker, where are those members of the present cabinet and what support are they now giving to the militia they supported a short time ago?

Besides the morale and traditions of the militia, let us consider that we may still have many conventional skirmishes before the 30-minute war which the minister may have in mind. Let us remind him that although gas was used in world war I, it was not used in world war II, although both sides could have used it. The same may be true of the hydrogen bomb and other nuclear weapons. We may have a war without them. Would it not be better for an aggressor to take over our lands without destroying them? On the other hand, if for any reason we are the aggressor, I am sure that the minister has heard of conventional troops under the town major. Our active forces may have more technical duties to perform in the case of a conflict. I say it is the obligation of the Minister of National Defence to produce irrefutable information that the militia, the citizen army, will not be needed again before he abandons it and places the personnel in the role of air raid wardens and so on. The members of the militia are entitled to know their future.

Why might the minister be hesitant to give the details of the new roll of the militia? I should like to refer to an article in a paper published in a militia city, namely the Kingston Whig-Standard of October 12, 1957. It is entitled "The End of the Militia?" and it reads in part as follows:

But if the government has come to this conclusion, why does it not say so? Far better to abolish the militia straight away than to keep willing people on a string and slowly cut off their supplies, thus forcing them out in favour of civil defence. Maybe the abolition will come after the next election. The reason why it does not come before is clear. Disbanded militia men, keen on their regiments, might be disgruntled enough to vote against the government who cut them off without a penny.

Or is the minister by maintaining the membership of the militia gradually accepting the advice of the new minister, the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Mr. Smith, and using the militia as the nucleus for implementing the brain child of the new Secretary of State for External Affairs? I quote from the Toronto Globe and Mail of November 29, 1947.

A year of national service—not essentially military—for high school graduates was advocated yesterday by President Sidney E. Smith of the University of Toronto in an address to Toronto Rotarians—"I have something in mind not entirely military and would go so far as to suggest the organization might have a civilian chief".

Canada's militiamen deserve to be given all the information of their future role.

Let me for just a moment refer to the permanent forces of Canada. I shall have more to say about it at a later date, but it is indicative that their amenities and their privileges will be lessened. For example, the curtailing of the current affairs bureau, the decided closing off of the defence construction building program, and also the unnecessary moving of the personnel and their families from one area to another.

The minister must realize that these men and women and their families have devoted their lives to a very honourable and necessary profession in which they have been highly trained. The minister should consider his department's policy very carefully before he disturbs the personnel and their families and takes away from them their accommodation and the amenities to which they are entitled. We trust the minister will not hide too long behind the delays attributed to designers and architects. I say we have the finest forces in the world and let us not prejudice that standard by a hit and run policy initiated by any political strategy.

The minister has been credited with making several announcements of cutbacks in the Department of National Defence expenditures. If there is waste and extravagance and duplications, as has been claimed by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), let him give us the chapter and verse. We have heard spot announcements as I have just mentioned, such as "Current Affairs bureau next for Pearkes' axe", "R.C.A.F. braces for cuts in budget", and so on. I suggest that the minister, in dealing with the R.C.A.F. is carrying out a policy reflected by his predecessor in office 25 years ago when his party was in power. As a matter of fact a very famous training centre of the R.C.A.F. by the name of Trenton also came into the news then. I quote from Hansard Volume 1 for 1932 at page 597:

Mr. Sutherland: Trenton will be very seriously cut down.

Mr. Ralston: But my hon. friend is adopting Trenton instead of Borden.

Mr. Sutherland: If the hon. gentleman instead of developing Trenton had stopped the development at that time a great deal of the trouble we are having at present would have been obviated.

Now we find 25 years later that we hear of the transfer of air training command headquarters from Trenton to Winnipeg. I believe the minister was recently trying to retrace his steps however, possibly for a purpose, and I was interested the other day—to be exact November 7—as reported at page 850 of Hansard—to find this question asked of the Minister of National Defence by his colleague the hon. member for Calgary South.

Mr. A. R. Smith (Calgary South): May I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence? Can the minister confirm speculation that certain major changes are planned in the operation of the R.C.A.F. training command in the immediate future?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for having given me notice of this question. Reductions in the R.C.A.F. NATO training program will lead to certain reorganizational changes involving a reassessment of the facilities required by the R.C.A.F. training command. No firm or positive action has yet been taken on this matter, and in any case no changes are planned for 1958, with the exception of the R.C.A.F. station at—

And then it goes on to describe the stations. I ask the minister what is his policy, or is he just trying to get past another election date?

An hon. Member: Who is talking politics now?

Mr. Henderson: We have very little information about what the minister has really done to the department. I say to the hon. member who interrupts me that he had better get up and defend the militia. The minister has announced a nibble here, a bite here and a chunk out of here, but what is his policy? Has he adhered to the warning given to him by General Simonds, supported by the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness). I am sure the present Minister of National Defence can now tell us if his colleague the Minister of Agriculture last year was making an irresponsible statement when speaking of the subject of national defence on July 19, 1956. He is quoted in Hansard of that date at page 6173, as follows:

When it comes to statements of opinion concerning the subjects General Simonds dealt with in his article, I am more prepared to accept his opinion than the minister's.

I may say this is referring to the article in Maclean's of June 23 written by General Simonds:

Having been the chief of staff and having spent his lifetime in the Canadian army, General Simonds I think is perhaps better qualified than is the minister to express an opinion as to the efficiency of Canadian defence headquarters. I think he is better qualified than is the minister to state an opinion as to whether defence headquarters could operate efficiently and effectively in the event of war.

He goes on to say this:

In any event it has been my contention for several years past that defence headquarters is topheavy and as a result wasteful and inefficient. I now have two very powerful witnesses to reinforce that claim. General Simonds has said in this article that the headquarters is topheavy. The minister, of course, said that was only his opinion. I think that that opinion is a very weighty one and it is reinforced by General Macklin and every other retired officer with any experience with whom I have ever spoken in regard to the matter. General Simonds said that in a real crisis national defence headquarters would come to a grinding, shuddering halt. I claim that is probably correct, in spite of the minister's opinion to the contrary.

Would the hon. minister still be influenced by General Simonds' statement when he said last week that the CF-105 was a "dead duck". He made this statement on November 11, as reported in the Ottawa Citizen of November 12, 1957, as follows:

He said Defence Minister Pearkes' decision to use the militia in a civil defence role is "an attempt to convince the people that something is being done when nothing is being done at all."

We as Canadians may well be disturbed when we read the headlines of the Vancouver Sun of November 6 and the press clippings from the Vancouver Sun of that day. The headline says: "Our Defence Outmoded by Missiles" and the clipping says "we are defenceless, Simonds declares", "Ex-chief of staff blasts Ottawa 'Fumbling Stupidity'." The events which have happened in the last few months with respect to the development of guided missiles and nuclear weapons by nations of the world will force the government of Canada to face the making of very important decisions. We must recognize the fact that the threat of guided missiles must be met. This cannot be accomplished by vote-catching economy cuts that could hinder the defence program of Canada.

Although the Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer) and the president of the Progressive Conservative Association have announced that the election campaign is now on—this was confirmed this afternoon by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Hodgson), and was also so capably dealt with by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—I am sure that Canadians and fellow members of NATO would be more pleased if the government could divorce itself from its election campaign long enough to deal with the immediate problems of the defence of Canada and formulate a defence policy which would discourage our enemies and encourage our allies. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that in the present circumstances the Prime Minister and the Minister of National Defence, with apparently no policy, who has been forced to nibble, tinker and meddle with the defence of Canada, should take the appropriate steps to set up a committee on defence to examine that matter and hear witnesses and assure the people of Canada that they have provided security and to prove that this government has a policy on defence.

Mr. Louis Lewry (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would like to join with other members of this house who have spoken in this throne speech debate by extending congratulations to yourself and to the mover (Mr. Smith, Calgary South) and the seconder (Mr. Arsenault). A good job very well done.

Coming from Moose Jaw-Lake Centre, in the centre of Canada, I hope to give my constituents the kind of service they should expect from their member in Ottawa; also I intend to continue to pursue and uphold the policies of the C.C.F. as long as my stay in this house continues.

The Lake Centre part of my riding was at one time represented by the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker). Speaking non-politically, of course, I might add, his representation was considered excellent; he set an example that I hope to take as my own, may I repeat—non-politically.

I may say however that I intend to do my best to prove that the right hon. Prime Minister is a poor prophet. According to a press story a week after the June 10 election, he wired the Progressive Conservative candidate his congratulations and the news story indicated that the Prime Minister believed that the Progressive Conservative candidate might win Moose Jaw-Lake Centre in another election. The Tories had better not count that egg in their basket.

When I checked into my office in the House of Commons, I found there was no electrical wall plug. The electrician promised to have one installed but while waiting I borrowed a 10-cent plug to enable the use of the desk lamp socket. I was told by the electrician that he had to have the plug returned as he said it was the only one they had. I am happy to be able to report to my constituents that unlike the Liberals' Petawawa army camp and its horses, the Conservative government has only one plug on its payroll so far.

The speech from the throne indicated that some of the election promises made during the campaign by the Conservatives were to be carried into legislation. We of the C.C.F. group are pleased to see this legislation for which our members have been clamouring for years and for which we have indicated our approval and support.

Coming from a constituency half urban and half rural I can tell hon. members that farmers are in a depression and that this is being carried over to business places in western Canada. If the farmers of Canada are not prosperous, businessmen are likewise not doing business.

The latest dominion bureau of statistics index indicating the number of commodities and services used by prairie farmers shows some interesting facts. The farmers' cost of living and production now stands at 240.5, with the years 1935-39 represented by 100. In other words, it now costs prairie farmers $2.40 to buy what a dollar would buy in 1935-39. This means, therefore, that the $1.40 initial wheat payment is worth only 48.2 cents in the 1935-39 value of money on a basis of No. 1 northern at Fort William; at the average country elevator point it is worth approximately 50.5 cents a bushel. How can the western farmer be expected to buy a $7,000 combine on 50 cent wheat?

In all probability the Conservative government may be called upon to set up a royal commission on markets for trade, or may even suggest doing so itself. I am not laying claim to ownership of some recent verse, but I think the house may be interested in the following which sets out what may be expected from the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) on the subject of trade. It is entitled "The Trader":

Said Honest John, on power bent,
"What can I say, confound it?
With joyous cheer the air was rent:
"Eureka I have found it!"

"Our trade with shrewd old Uncle Sam
Is getting mighty skittish
I'll wave the flag and beat the drum
And holler: Let's buy British.

So up and down our fair domain
He stumped the June election
And kept repeating his refrain:
"The commonwealth connection."

So loud his voice, so bright his eye
So hard the anvil smitten
That even skeptics were convinced—
And so was Mac of Britain.

And when the smoke had cleared away
And Liberals lay buried
To Canada without delay
The British Traders hurried.

"You wish to trade" said they, "my lad
On even-steven basis?"
"A Free-Trade hand we'll deal, b'gad
And give you all the aces."

In utter horror and despair
Our Honest John recoiled
They'd stripped him clean; his bluff was bare
His gimmick had been spoiled.

"Up drawbridge, lad" cried he to Don
"And bar the gates," to Gordon
"Call out my trusted Tory troops
And form a solid cordon."

And in his tower, cold and bare
In turn, he cried and shouted
He beat his breast and tore his hair
He raged and sulked and pouted.

"O woe is me! O lack a day!
How could they so deceive me?
They know I mean not what I say
Why must they now believe me?"

In meditation thus he sate
While hours passed uncounted
And as he pondered on his fate
His tribulations mounted.

Then, all at once, a blinding light!
His doubts and fears were shattered.
"'Arise, my lads, on with the fight!
"Our foes will soon lie scattered.

"I have a plan—a master plan!
To solve this sad condition.
"We're off the hook, confound it man,
We'll set up a commission!"

Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal now with some of the pre-election promises made by the present government. I do not want to indicate at all that, as the Prime Minister stated shortly after this house opened, the Liberals expect the Conservatives to do everything in five months that the Liberals failed to do in 22 years. Nothing of the sort. We just want the Tories to carry out the promises they said they would carry out if elected.

There appear to be no plans under way for an immediate reduction in taxation as suggested by the Prime Minister when he was leader of the Tory opposition, back in Toronto on April 25. He said at that time that when the Conservatives formed the government of this country a session of parliament would be called to reduce taxation. We have the session of parliament, but no budget appears on the horizon. In fact, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), seems reluctant even to discuss a budget.

The Prime Minister also said that the Tories would have a vigorous immigration policy to increase the population of Canada. After they took over the reins they took steps to stop immigration.

Speaking in Charlottetown on April 29, the present Prime Minister said that the pipe line bill had made millionaires of a few friends—a few companies—who had bought shares in Trans-Canada Pipe Lines Limited at $8 a share. He asked: "Who risked the money? You and I. Who made the profits? Those pampered pets." Whose friends are they now? Whose pampered pets?

The Tories made the promises, but for downright flaunting of public opinion the Liberals took the cake in western Canada. On May 6, the son of the former prime minister, spoke in my home city of Moose Jaw, and I quote:

I'm from the east. I'm not a wheat man, but at least I have a solution which could be an answer to some of the wheat sale difficulties.

[Mr. Lewry.]

The hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. St. Laurent) spoke of a new method of treating wheat being developed by an American company, whereby it looked and tasted like rice. Since more than half the population of the world is rice-eating, the hon. member saw in this the possibility of greatly expanding Canada's wheat market and providing a solution of the present wheat-selling problem. He said the new product had been tested in Puerto Rico and India and had been considered favourably by the Canadian government. There were problems concerning rice-producing countries which, however, would have to be met, he added. I am wondering now if the Tories are continuing to offer such an easy solution to the problem of the wheat surplus in Canada.

Moose Jaw is the buckle of the wheat belt. Our farmers grow the finest hard wheat in the world, but the policies of the Liberals for 20 years, now apparently being continued without change in any respect by the present administration, have put our western farmers on the brink of depression. They are moving off the farms because of the lack of any planned agricultural policy of the federal government. The youngsters cannot make a living in farming any more and they cannot be enticed into staying on the farm. Agriculture is the mainstay of a large part of the economy of our country. That should be recognized by the federal government as it is recognized in almost every other agricultural country in the world.

Some of the problems that the farmers in my constituency have told me of include the dire need for equalization of delivery quotas for all shipping points. They demand the right to deliver their grain to elevators of their own choice. If they get a quota opened up, they cannot make deliveries because there are no box cars; or if there are cars, there are no orders and the elevators are full. In many communities in my constituency, farmers are forced to deliver grain to the line elevators simply because the box cars are not distributed at the delivery point in accordance with the place where the farmers wish to deliver their grain. As an example, at one time the pool elevator at Bulyea in my constituency purchased 80 per cent of the grain at that point. At present the percentage has dropped to 60 per cent, simply because the box cars are spotted at the line elevator, forcing the hard-up farmers to deliver grain there, over and above what the line companies should have.

Today I received a letter from a farmer in the centre of my constituency. It reads in part:

My farm consists of 240 acres, 210 of which are under cultivation. The other 30 acres is in pasture. So you see what a 5-bushel quota means to me for two years in succession. I have stored up enough grain for over two years ahead, and have nothing to live on. We small farmers have the same living expenses as the medium or large farmer. If it was not for the cream cheques, I would have had to leave the farm two years ago. But no matter how hard I try and save, if this present quota set-up continues I will have to leave the farm on which I have lived for 22 years and raised my family of four children. My farm and machinery are paid for, due to the hard work and self-denial of my family. But if the present set-up is not changed I will have to sell it to a larger farmer for the price he offers me, not for what it is worth, as I will have no other alternative as I have been going backward year after year since 1953. This is the part that hurts most of all. All that will be left for me is to sell the farm, move to the city, walk the streets and start all over again as a day labourer now that I am of middle age. All this would not be necessary if we had a party in power that had the welfare of the common man at heart.

I noted with some interest a news story in the press not too long ago to the effect that this House of Commons is back on the Thursday to Tuesday weekend. I am not at all convinced. I believe that story was written in an effort to indicate to some constituents—and it cannot apply to mine as the long weekend is not long enough for me to go home to Moose Jaw-Lake Centre and back—that these eastern members of parliament are not spending their time in the house.

I am wondering what those same reporters would report back to their editors if the members of parliament revealed that the press gallery appears to be on a one-hour question period alert on many occasions. My fellow members of the fourth estate file out of the press gallery like homing pigeons after the question period. On many occasions the press gallery fort is held by one lone reporter many hours of the day. We realize they have work outside this chamber; perhaps they will realize that we also have duties to which we must attend outside this chamber.

While I am on the subject of the press I would point out that it is becoming increasingly evident—and this is not criticism of the working reporters in the house—that the editors back home are using their large pencils to delete from stories filed in Ottawa, references about their elected members here and apparently there is no rule so far as party preferences are concerned. If you come from Saskatchewan, newspapers in Ontario and Manitoba use the stories, but not the newspapers in Saskatchewan; or, at most, not in the home constituencies of the elected members. There also appears to be an iron curtain around news from western Canada in eastern newspapers. We do not read news from Saskatchewan in the great journals of the east. I was somewhat surprised to pick up a Regina newspaper the other day which contained the following story:

Enthusiastic Liberal delegates on their way to Moose Jaw early this week for a two-day provincial council convention ran afoul of the R.C.M.P. radar timing device located temporarily at the half-way point between Regina and Moose Jaw.

Out-of-pocket delegates by way of explanation said they had been caught because they were in a hurry to get the convention started and draft up a plan for better living in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Castleden: Liberals in a hurry.

Mr. Lewry: I continue:

Notable among the delegates thumbed off the highway for a date with a ticket were Hon. Lester B. Pearson; provincial Liberal leader A. H. "Hammy" McDonald; and provincial president Dr. H. S. Jamieson, all in the same car.

"A clean sweep if ever there was one", one of the car's occupants remarked.

I did not notice any report of such a clean sweep in eastern newspapers. They must have had a sympathetic judge, too, for the C.C.F. to allow such notable Liberals to get away with just a fine.

Another point I would like to mention is that during the election campaign suggestions and promises were made in connection with the need for expanding industries. Coming from western Canada, I can say that while Saskatchewan in the past 15 years has developed from a totally agricultural province to a province with secondary industries there is much need yet for industries within our province. In the overcrowded east industry is forced to pay higher prices for land. In Saskatchewan we have acres of suitable land available for expanding industry at a very attractive price compared with the rates here in Ontario. From a point of view of defence and decentralization a policy of assistance to such industries to locate in the central provinces of Canada should be developed.

Our municipalities both urban and rural, in the west in particular, are continually facing increasing tax rates and increasing demands for services. Having spent some seven years in the mayor's office in Moose Jaw I can tell you that the elected representative closest to his elector is the councillor and mayor of a city or town, the reeve and councillor of a rural municipality. The Prime Minister has already taken action to discuss with the provinces the matter of provincial-federal fiscal relations. We have not been assured that the views of municipalities will be considered or discussed except only in so far as the provinces may wish to do so. The municipalities all across Canada are facing ever-increasing financial burdens with no hope of relief unless a new fiscal arrangement on the sharing of the tax dollar can be worked out.

I mentioned a moment ago the fact that Saskatchewan in the past 15 years has changed from a total agricultural economy to one with developing industry. Much has been said in the press both here and in the west about the failures of the crown corporations in Saskatchewan. I wish to point out that the crown corporations of Saskatchewan have resulted in a much more buoyant economy for the people of our province. Despite what may have been said and regardless of what you may have been led to believe the government of Saskatchewan has been better able to give social welfare services to our people with the help of the crown corporations.

Taking into account those few corporations that did fold the total wages paid to the workers of the 21 crown corporations of Saskatchewan up to the end of 1956 was $30,562,000. In addition, grants in lieu of taxes paid to municipalities totalled some $308,500. And dues and royalties paid back to the provinces were in excess of a total of $5,500,000. Some people would defame their own province and foul their own nest by maligning the crown corporations and their operations but the people of Saskatchewan are proud of the accomplishments and the results of the operation of these industries and services.

I suppose as most new members do prior to taking their seats in the house, Mr. Speaker, I sought information on the proceedings and operations of this level of government. I was fortunate in having been given a copy of an autobiography of an esteemed former member of this chamber, the Hon. Sir George W. Ross who for 11 years represented the Ontario riding of Middlesex West. I was told by my hon. friend across the way, the present Conservative member for Middlesex West (Mr. Thomas), that he is the first Tory to represent that riding in about 75 years so I am sure he and other hon. members on that side of the house will be interested in hearing some of the references in this book. Dealing with initiation day in the House of Commons in the year 1873 Mr. Ross states:

> My seat was to the left of the Speaker (or rather to the left of his chair, for there was as yet no Speaker), and about the middle of the fourth tier of seats. Who designated me to this particular part of the chamber I do not know. I answered to the label on my desk. It was the same as that of my wardrobe locker, "Ross—Middlesex". My seat was well situated for observation, and, comfortable though it was, I felt myself in strange surroundings—strangers to the left of me, strangers to the right of me, strangers in front of me, shuffled and chattered. But many were old acquaintances by reputation, good, bad and indifferent—

Later he continues:

> The routine of the house soon becomes uninteresting. After listening to a few speakers on any question one feels there is little more to be said. Why should you not in self-defence, if for no other reason, go to your room or take a stroll through the lobbies with some fellow member and avoid the ennui of a tedious debate—or, what may be preferable, go into the open air and recuperate your flagging energies? Then there is the freedom of number nine—> —where you can smoke your pipe or cigar and enjoy the good fellowship of others who like yourself have been overcome with the tedious reiteration of arguments neither new nor forcible. Or you have some correspondence to attend to, or an interview from a friend with a grievance, or business with some minister in his private room, or something to look up in the library. And so to keep your place in the house for a long sitting becomes irksome. Nothing but a full dress debate by the leaders commands your attention; all the rest is "vanity and vexation of spirit". As a consequence days and weeks are spent to very little purpose; you have added nothing materially to your knowledge of public questions, you have marked time, that is all. Now, to a young man, a few sessions spent in this way is fatal to his career.

I remind hon. members that this description was written back in 1873.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the hon. gentleman would permit a question. How does the hon. member relate that quotation to the amendment now before the house?

An hon. Member: He has to fill in his 40 minutes somehow.

Mr. Lewry: Mr. Speaker, I am glad the hon. member raised that question because that is the point with which I intended to deal next. I turn now to Mr. Ross's description of the session of 1882. He says:

> The chief interest in the session of 1882 centred around the bill to adjust the representation of the electoral districts of the province of Ontario, better known as the gerrymander bill. Under the constitution the representation of the different provinces must be adjusted decennially, Quebec alone remaining constant—

And so on. I continue:

> Sir John Macdonald introduced the bill on April 28, or within three weeks of the close of the session, and the excitement on the opposition benches was intense. Nearly all its active members were affected by the changes proposed. It was evidently the intention of the government to hold its majority by brute force, otherwise why change county boundaries and shift municipalities like pawns on a chess board, regardless of symmetry or public convenience? Nothing more unfair could have been devised, and the debate was accordingly warm and aggressive.

—Accordingly I presented what I called an alternative bill in part as follows:

Whereas by the census of the year of our Lord 1881 and in accordance with the British North America Act of 1867—

Et cetera—

Therefore Sir John Macdonald, by and with the advice of party wire-pullers and Tory deputations from the province of Ontario and with the connivance of the Tories from the other provinces, enacts as follows:

1. The House of Commons shall consist of 211 members, a majority of whom shall belong to the Conservative party.

My suggestion to the Liberal opposition in this house is that they could very well copy the example set by Mr. George Ross in 1882 and move a similar motion to the effect that the House of Commons shall consist of 265 members, a majority of whom shall belong to the Progressive Conservative party, and I am sure hon. members opposite would willingly support it.

In conclusion, we welcome the measures indicated in the speech from the throne and we urge that the measures be placed before parliament with the least possible delay in order that the benefits proposed therein may accrue to the people of Canada at once. However, we also urge consideration in our amendment that the government deal with inflation, unemployment and other serious problems that face this country. Mr. Speaker, I will support the amendment.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago the hon. member for Algoma East (Mr. Pearson), in speaking in this debate, drew attention to—I take it deplored—the fact that not many cabinet ministers had thus far taken part in the debate. I can give him the reason at once, Mr. Speaker. It is that there are so many new members in the house, able members, who should have every opportunity to participate in this debate. But it has occurred to me that some things might be said tonight at this stage of the debate after we have heard now nine days of debate arising upon the lack of a motion of want of confidence on the part of the official opposition and upon a motion of want of confidence on the part of the C.C.F.

It is in no perfunctory sense, sir, that I offer my hearty congratulations to those two new members, the mover and the seconder, of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Both of them acquitted themselves with distinction and, like so many of the other new members in this house who have participated in this debate, have earned the congratulations that have been generously showered upon them.

Perhaps you will forgive me a personal word, Mr. Speaker, having regard for the composition of this new house and another change which is to take place on Monday next. It was in the month of September, 1923, that a third-year class in English constitutional history in the University of Toronto awaited the arrival of a lecturer and when the lecturer stepped into that classroom it was hard to identify him as a lecturer. He was youthful looking; he looked more like an undergraduate but he proved to be a very capable and popular lecturer. That gentleman, Mr. Speaker, is now the hon. member for Algoma East (Mr. Pearson). I was one of the students in that class.

Then one thinks of a scene two years later in the first-year classroom at the Osgoode Hall law school when a class that included the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier), the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), Senator Brunt, the late Senator Joseph Bench, Mr. G. R. Boucher, the former member for Carleton, Mr. William Robinson, the former member for Simcoe East, Mr. Frank Flaherty, a member of the press gallery, and myself awaited the arrival of a lecturer in a class on the law of personal property. He when he arrived also was a young looking lecturer. He is today the Secretary of State for External Affairs, Doctor Smith. Students of his learned much from him; I am sure he is capable of teaching us a good deal yet if we are still capable of learning.

This session has now run five weeks, Mr. Speaker. If one were to endeavour to sum up its features I think there are two that would be outstanding. The first has been the ample government program put swiftly before the house in fulfilment of the pledges given to the Canadian people during the election campaign. The second has been behaviour, irresponsible to an unprecedented degree, on the part of those yonder who have been busy heaping upon the government criticism and denunciation and yet in the votes insist on supporting the government with might and main. Their criticism of us has been bitter; they have jeered at us; they have sought to harry us; they have sought to harass us; they have sought to delay us; they have endeavoured to ridicule us.

Mr. McIlraith: No.

Mr. Fleming: They have said we are unfit to hold office, Mr. Speaker. If they really mean what they say, then I suggest that their consciences should dictate to them that they should act and vote in accordance with their own words.

The record of the government, sir, in those five weeks has been an exemplary one of promises fulfilled with dispatch. Look at the pensions legislation. Five bills now have met the approval of the house; bills which hon.

gentlemen opposite had ample opportunity to introduce to provide for the increases which these bills provide for, but which they did not find it in their hearts to introduce when they were the government and had an ample majority to support them in this house at the last session.

Legislation has been introduced for the benefit of veterans. Cash advances have been provided for farm-stored grain. A measure is on the order paper to give to agriculture the fulfilment of the promise of a new deal for that basic industry of Canada. The government's program for national development, applicable to all parts of Canada, received today a striking measure of fulfilment in the announcement that the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) made with respect to the financing of the Beechwood project in New Brunswick and the whole power development project that is going to bring very great benefits to the Atlantic area.

Mr. Pickersgill: The Liberal program.

Mr. Fleming: And the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. St. Laurent) might just as well spare himself the effort of trying to prove that the program which was announced in that behalf today by the Prime Minister is some mere continuation of a program initiated by the former government.

This is not the same kind of program for national development in the Atlantic areas, sir.

Mr. Pickersgill: Explain.

Mr. Fleming: They had their opportunity to do something to assist in the financing of the Beechwood project but they would do nothing in that regard. It remained for this government to come along and to pick up the pieces and to provide a measure of assistance in the financing of that project which we think will bring great benefit to that part of Canada.

And, sir, in the matter of fiscal relations and other relations between the dominion and the provinces, the fact does not yet appear to have penetrated the perception of hon. members opposite that on Monday and Tuesday, the 25th and 26th of this month, there will assemble under this roof a conference of representatives of the dominion and provincial governments in this country.

Now, the hon. member for Twisted-Billingsgate, I think the name was given to the house not long ago—

Mr. Pickersgill: It was not even funny the first time.

Mr. Fleming: All right; then let's have it Twisted-Billygoat.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. McIlraith: You should have a little better trend of humour.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member, by whatever name he may be called, was indulging in his favourite occupation. I would have thought that by this time the hon. member would have learned something from June 10, but evidently no lesson has yet been learned by him. His whole speech on Tuesday of this week in this house in relation to dominion-provincial relations can be summed up in two words, "Hate Ontario". Now, he ought to know—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: He ought to know by this time that that same campaign was attempted in the maritime provinces by the Leader of the Opposition in the election campaign and the people of the maritimes responded to it by electing a strong representation of Conservative members to the House of Commons. The people of the maritime provinces knew very well that the man who then headed the Conservative party and today heads this government is not the kind of man who plays favourites with any part of Canada, but at all times recognizes his full responsibilities to all parts of Canada. The hon. gentleman opposite spent his best efforts that day in erecting a straw man and then proceeding to tear him to pieces, to dismember and throw acid on him and finally to set fire to him.

Mr. Pickersgill: You do not need acid to set fire to a straw man.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member indeed delved into the realms of fancy, and in his case it was a disordered fancy. I can say to the hon. member, and to all members of this house, that it is not the intention of this government in entering upon that conference a week from Monday and Tuesday, to follow the tactics that were adopted by the former government in its meetings with the representatives of the provinces of this country. We have no intention of laying down any cut and dried, hard and fast program and adopting towards the provinces a take it or leave it attitude; that is not our method. We recognize the important responsibilities which the governments of the provinces bear and we shall, I hope, all of us, sit down together as Canadians, to try to devise understandings that will be of benefit to all parts of Canada.

Sir, five months will have passed—

Mr. Pickersgill: I wonder if before the hon. gentleman departs from that subject I might be permitted a question? Can he assure the house the government has no intention of departing from the principle of equalization now existing in the arrangements with the provinces?

Mr. Fleming: The hon. gentleman knows quite well what has been the position taken by this party and by its leader in that respect.

Mr. Pickersgill: I do not.

Mr. Fleming: If he needs a further reminder, it is on record. If he is not satisfied with that, he will have ample opportunity to hear, during the opening proceedings anyway, a week from Monday, what is said in that regard. The principle of recognizing the needs of the provinces will certainly be vindicated in a much more Canadian manner than was the case under the former government.

Mr. Pickersgill: We shall see.

Mr. Fleming: Next week, on the 21st of this month, this government will have been in office five months. What was the situation to which we fell heir on June 21? One hon. member opposite managed to indulge in a little frankness on the subject. The hon. member for Algoma East, when speaking in this debate, did say that we inherited serious problems when we took office. Those were on our doorstep.

So that there may be no doubt in anyone's mind—I do not pretend that this enumeration is complete—here are but a few of the problems that we inherited: First, the heaviest tax burden on the Canadian people in all their history; second, expenditures running at the highest rate in all Canadian history; third, waste and extravagance in government; fourth, a record wheat surplus—what a legacy that was for a new government to inherit at the hands of a government which had neglected the problem!; fifth, the highest trade deficit in Canada's history; sixth, a record deficit of astronomical proportions in our commodity trade with the United States; seventh, the continued loss of the traditional market of the Canadian primary producers in the United Kingdom.

Mr. McIlraith: That is for farm products?

Mr. Fleming: Eighth, our Canadian trade eggs, under the policy of the former government, placed to a dangerous degree in one basket; ninth, a cost of living that had been rising under the regime of the former government, not just for months but for years; tenth, the highest interest rates in a generation; eleventh, the tightest credit conditions; twelfth, a substantial measure of unemployment, substantially larger than a year before at the same time; thirteenth, dominion-provincial relations in a very disturbed condition with provinces and municipalities up and down this country, ten provinces and 4,500 municipalities, all complaining about injustices received at the hands of the dominion government; fourteenth, pensions inadequate for our aged persons, for disabled persons, the blind and the veterans; fifteenth, and let this not be forgotten, Mr. Speaker, a public till that was practically empty.

Mr. Pickersgill: What about the half billion dollar surplus you were talking about?

Mr. Fleming: The surplus the hon. member mentions was not there in cash when we took over; the till was virtually empty. In sixteenth place, just to make sure that their successors would have to pay some of their bills, they left the $100 million to be provided for the Canada Council in this year's accounts instead of taking care of it last year; seventeenth, heavy maturities of dominion government bonds falling due in so short a time that it left little or no opportunity for adjustments and for easy timing in providing payment of these maturities; eighteenth, a capital shortage that was creating financial embarrassment for provinces and municipalities and businesses.

These are but a few of the elements in the heritage that was passed on to this new government at the hands of their self-satisfied predecessors.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask the minister if he has not forgotten something?

Mr. Fleming: I have not attempted to give a full enumeration at all.

Mr. Coldwell: There is one very important one, and that is the Trans-Canada Pipe Line agreement.

Mr. Fleming: The Trans-Canada Pipe Line agreement may well be mentioned because it was Her Majesty's loyal opposition last year, represented in this government today, that took its firm stand on that issue and hon. members of the C.C.F. need not be arrogating to themselves any exclusive credit for the noble fight that was put up over that and the parliamentary issue that arose from it.

Now, sir, let us be judged by our efforts and by our accomplishments in this space of less than five months. Let us be judged as a government by the legislation we have introduced in this house. Let us be judged by our administration. We are content to be judged by those standards. This government has set, I think, a new record for hard work on the part of ministers,—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: —led by the example of the Prime Minister. The entry of this new government into office has been like a breath of fresh air here in Ottawa, sir. It was a breath of fresh air indeed, as those who had occupied the positions of office previously, in the language of the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage), those worn out men were not only worn out but driven out.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is it not true that the air was air conditioned?

Mr. Fleming: Speaking of accomplishments, as far as that matter is concerned let me say this, and I think it can be said with reasonable humility.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: No previous government in Canada's history has accomplished as much in five months for the good of Canada as has this government. I would there were time to review the whole record, Mr. Speaker, but I will take time only to mention a few of the highlights.

On wheat, this great national problem,—not just a western problem but a national problem—we have provided cash advances on farm stored grain and my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) has thrown into sound disposal policies with respect to that wheat an energy which has not been exhibited in that respect for many and many a year.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: We have grappled with the problems of waste and extravagance. We have faced the problems of these government maturities. In the one issue of government bonds that has been marketed since this government came into office, an issue of $700 million last month, the issue was over subscribed and the books were closed within half an hour of the time they opened. The twelfth Canada savings bond campaign was inaugurated several weeks ago. I am happy to report to the house that the sales of series 12 of the Canadian savings bond have, up to November 8, been pushed to the highly gratifying total of $654 million, an increase of 27 per cent over sales at the comparable date last year in respect of the eleventh series.

Mr. Richardson: May I ask the Minister of Finance a question?

Mr. Fleming: I am afraid I will have to ask to be excused from answering a question. My time is limited. I have only a few more minutes and I will have to ask the hon. member to reserve his question.

Mr. Pickersgill: On a point of order, Mr. Speaker—

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Monteith: Sit down.

Mr. Fleming: Here is just a sample of the way in which they try to take up our time. The hon. member knows—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I was rising on a point of order.

Mr. Fleming: To take up my time.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the minister not mistaken in saying that his time is limited? Is he not replying to an amendment—

Mr. Monteith: There is a vote at 9.30. What are you talking about? Sit down.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member, of course, has overlooked the rules. I do not know whether he even knows them. But if he did know them he would know that by the rules this debate must end by 9.30. I should like to deal with questions; ordinarily I welcome them, but at this time, if the hon. member will permit me to do so, I should like to continue with my remarks as I have a good deal of ground yet to cover.

Mr. Pickersgill: I beg the minister's pardon.

Mr. Fleming: Much has been said about inflation. The Leader of the Opposition wound up his speech in this house on October 16 by touching on the dangers of inflation. The amendment which is about to be voted on tonight, and which was introduced by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) if you please, calls upon the government to give immediate consideration to the menace of inflation. Mr. Speaker, we have been at all times very mindful of this problem. I am happy to say to you, sir, as I said on a similar occasion several days ago, that the threat of inflation in Canada has now been checked.

Let me give you several proofs. In this house two days ago I referred to the fact that in the past two months interest rates paid by this country on its treasury bills had dropped by 3/10 of one per cent. I am happy to report that in the weekly issue of treasury bills today we have achieved a further reduction which now brings the reduction in the last two months to 4/10 of one per cent. Today, Mr. Speaker, the Bank of Canada rate, for the first time since early last spring, dropped below 4 per cent. With the drop in the rate on treasury bills the bank rate today arrived at the figure of 3.99. It was last February and then briefly in April that that rate crossed the 4 per cent line for the last previous time.

Another feature that bears out the assertion I have made as to the checking of the dangers of inflation comes from New York this afternoon, following the close of business in the financial houses. The federal reserve bank of New York this afternoon reduced its rediscount rate, which is the counterpart of the interest rate of the Bank of Canada, from 3½ per cent to 3 per cent. I may remind the house that the federal reserve bank of New York had increased its rediscount rate just in August from 3 per cent to 3½ per cent. Today's reduction is a significant development indeed, Mr. Speaker.

I give another example. It is the strengthening of the market for Canada bonds. The strengthening of the market for our bonds has really been phenomenal in recent weeks. Many of the issues are selling at from four points to six points higher than they were selling two months ago. With this strengthening has come an improvement in the financing opportunities that are open to municipalities, provinces and business. But we are still not satisfied. I do not wish to give anybody the impression that we are satisfied. However, we find these improvements most gratifying indeed, and they fully support the confidence that the government has shown in its own policies in the face of the doubtful heritage it received at the hands of its predecessors.

There is one final matter which I might mention—I mentioned it in the house two days ago—and that is that the rise in the cost of living, which has gone on literally for years under the former government, has been checked. Two days ago I mentioned that in October the consumer price index rose only from 123.3 to 123.4.

In this list of promises fulfilled and duties discharged by the government let me remind the house of what we did with regard to housing. The tight money policy made its effects felt more severely with respect to house construction than perhaps in any other sector of the Canadian economy, unless it be in its effect on small business and credit to the agriculturalist. Facing that situation and in the due fulfilment of our undertaking given to the Canadian people, we looked at the slow-down in the rate of house construction in this country under the policies that were in effect when we took over, and we provided an additional $150 million for loans for new housing construction. That money has added substantially to the rate of housing starts in Canada in these past three months and will contribute substantially to employment in the winter. That was a courageous action. We took it. Why did not our predecessors take it if they had any regard for the decline in house construction or for employment in this coming winter?

On the matter of trade, what irks hon. gentlemen opposite is not that we did not fulfil our promises. What irks them is that in the matter of our trade undertakings we have fulfilled our undertakings to the letter. This government had not been in office two days when the Prime Minister left for London and, in London, made the first plea for the holding of a commonwealth trade and economic conference. Then followed the conference at Mont Tremblant and its achievement of unanimity on the part of the commonwealth countries, of which eleven were represented there, in favour of a commonwealth trade and economic conference next year. The plans are going forward and we have reason to hope that the other countries in the commonwealth will accept the invitation of this government as extended to them to hold that important conference in Canada.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): How many of them have accepted now?

Mr. Fleming: The hon. gentlemen opposite have sought at every opportunity to jeer at this decision to hold a commonwealth trade and economic conference. Why? I will tell you why; it is not merely because we have done something they could not do, it is because we have done something that they made no effort to do and in which they do not believe. We have listened to their carping criticisms; we have listened to their jeers about our efforts to expand trade within the commonwealth. They do not like the commonwealth. They do not like the idea—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gardiner: One was held before.

Mr. Fleming: —of expanding trade and economic relations within the commonwealth. If they have some regard for the commonwealth why did they not do something about expanding trade with the commonwealth; why did they not do something about it while the Canadian farmer lost his commonwealth market? And yet they jeer. How they jeer at the declared policy of this government to seek, by reasonable means, to divert to the United Kingdom and commonwealth sources purchases now made in the United States.

The hon. member for Algoma East had some very weasel words to say on this subject. Look at his remarks at page 331 of Hansard. He undertook to say, and oh, how much it hurt him! He criticized what the Prime Minister said in declaring his policy in favour of that diversion of trade and then goes on to say:

> I do not for one moment suggest that if it could be done by the right method and without doing this country any harm in other ways, it would not be a good thing to do.

Weasel words! Double talk! He exerted his very considerable talents to prove that it could not be done. Give us time and we will prove that diversion is a possibility. It has never been said that this could be done overnight; it has never been said that it could be done in a year or in a year and a half, but it is our policy. It is a policy that, given time and opportunity and the confidence of this house, will be put into effect. Give us the confidence and we will do the job. This diversion will not be accomplished at the expense of the Canadian producer. No, this is a matter of diverting from the United States sources to commonwealth sources purchases that we are now making in the United States.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not what you said in Washington.

Mr. Fleming: It is exactly what we have said at all times. It is what we said at Washington as well.

I can see that I am not going to be able to finish, Mr. Speaker, but I do wish to say to the hon. member for Essex East who is just now interrupting me that I do hope that although having his overweening ambition directed to a certain event on the 16th of January next he will keep from making any more distorted and untrue statements such as those which have been tumbling from his lips during his public appearances recently.

The hon. member for Essex East deplores what he says is a strange thing "to increase trade by taking business away from our best customer". Who is the best customer? What about the best customer of the United States? How about Canada? Does he want to see Canada go on as it did last year, purchasing in commodity trade from the United States $4,167 million worth of goods while that country bought from us only $2,819 million, for a trade deficit of $1,348 million. Does he like that? He says "hush hush. We must not say anything to offend our best customer." Then there is a deficit on current account; presumably he likes that too. The Canadian deficit on current account with the United States last year was in the amount of $1,640 million and the record of the former government showed a deficit in the international current account of $1 billion in the first six months of 1957. This is part of the heritage to which we fell heir. Well we intend to continue to make the same vigorous presentation of Canada's trading interests and rights as did those of us who had the honour to represent this government at Washington and who met face to face with the members of the United States cabinet one month ago.

I come now to the matter of the trade mission which will leave for the United Kingdom next month, as announced by my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The words which came from the lips of the Leader of the Opposition in his speech in this debate on October 16 will not be forgotten. We heard from him words which belittled the proposal again on October 23, which belittled the efforts of the government in this respect to send a trade mission to the United Kingdom which would seek to increase the flow of trade between these two countries. But he changed his tune—a remarkable change of tune—at the end of last week. You would not have recognized the same man. It was the same voice but it was a different kind of thought behind it.

The trade mission which is going to the United Kingdom next month is the most important trade mission which has ever gone out from this country. Those public spirited men who are the members of the mission and who have so readily and generously responded to the request of the government that they serve in this capacity are giving their services free. The government is paying the expenses but these men are giving their services and I think that what is called for, and deserved on the part of this trade mission and its members and the government that appointed it, is something better than the jeers of the hon. members opposite.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but it being 9.30 o'clock p.m. it is my duty pursuant to section 4 of standing order 38 to interrupt its proceedings and forthwith put the question on any amendment now before the house.

The house divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Coldwell) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

Mr. LaCroix: Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. LaCroix: I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Speaker: Is the hon. member for Essex East rising on a point of order?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No; to speak, Mr. Speaker.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Absolutely.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I recognize the member for Quebec-Montmorency.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, with all of the applause which the hon. gentleman and I are receiving it is difficult to understand what you are saying. I have now your permission to speak?

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker,—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Will both hon. members please resume their seats? Will the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency resume his seat? Does the hon. member for Essex East rise on a point of order?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No; to speak.

Mr. Richardson: Mr. Speaker, may I rise on a point of order?

Mr. Speaker: I have recognized the member for Quebec-Montmorency to speak on the question which is on the main motion. Now, of course, it is in the disposition of the house—

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker,—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): On a question of privilege, there is a list agreed to by the whips in which the first speaker is a Liberal, the member for Essex East, and I want the hon. member to have the floor.

Mr. Speaker: I heard the member rising on a question of privilege. Actually, I have no list and I have no names before me.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): You have the list.

Mr. Speaker: I repeat, I have no list with any Liberal name on it and, in any event, I remind members of the house that arrangements between whips are not any part of the official standing orders and while they are followed as a matter of custom I have, in this instance, recognized the member who appeared to me to rise first and that was the member for Quebec-Montmorency.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency rose to ask for an adjournment, to call it ten o'clock, and the hon. member for Essex East is ready to speak now and raised objection to it being called ten o'clock.

Mr. Speaker: There is no point of order as to who shall be recognized. If hon. members are dissatisfied with the ruling of the chair in selecting one member or another it is always within the power of the house to move that the other member be given the floor, but I have recognized the member for Quebec-Montmorency.

Mr. Cardiff: On a question of privilege, there was no name from the Liberal side of the house inserted in the list; there is no name from the Liberal side of the house on the printed list.

Mr. LaCroix: Mr. Speaker, may I call it ten o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: By leave, has the hon. member permission to call it ten o'clock?

Mr. LaCroix: I move the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Speaker: Moved by Mr. LaCroix, seconded by—

Some hon. Members: The hon. member for Pontiac-Timiskaming (Mr. Proudfoot).

Mr. Speaker: —that the debate be now adjourned. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Speaker: Those in favour of the motion will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay. In my opinion the yeas have it.

On motion of Mr. LaCroix the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Marler: What is the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Green: Tomorrow we shall continue with this debate.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

T.C.A. PASSENGER VOLUME, LAKEHEAD

Question No. 58—Mr. Fisher:

1. What was the passenger volume per month of T.C.A. flights into the lakehead and out of the lakehead from June, 1956 to June, 1957?
2. How many potential passengers out of the lakehead converted their tickets to other travel means or cashed them in during the above-mentioned period?
3. How many extra T.C.A. flights were set up out of, and into, the lakehead in the above-mentioned period?

Answer by: Mr. MacDonald, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Transport:

1. During June, 1956, two Viscount, two North Star and one DC 3 flights were operated daily into the lakehead, these numbers increasing by June 1957 to six Viscount and two DC 3 flights daily—an increase of about 50 per cent. Actual passenger volume figures are not released to the public by the company in this regard as this information would be of advantage to competitive transportation agencies.

2. To ascertain the number of potential passengers who converted their tickets to other travel means or cashed them in would require lengthy and costly research on the part of T.C.A. all across the country since tickets are refundable at any T.C.A. office across the system while, in addition, many tickets are purchased under the air travel card system which may not be used and then are turned in for credit to the monthly account of the subscriber.

3. Three Viscount and eleven DC 3 extra sections originated at the lakehead during the period June 1956 to May 1957 inclusive.

CHIGNECTO CANAL

Question No. 66—Mr. Murphy (Westmorland):

1. With respect to the feasibility of the Chignecto canal to link the bay of Fundy with Northumberland strait, what investigation is being carried on in this connection?
2. What persons are carrying out the complete investigation?
3. What persons are engaged in investigating (a) the estimated cost of the project; (b) the other economic factors involved?
4. When is it expected that the investigation will be completed?

Answer by: Mr. MacDonald, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Transport:

1, 2, 3 and 4. A series of economic studies regarding transportation problems in the Atlantic provinces are being carried out by officials of the economic branch of the Department of Transport, in consultation with and under the general supervision of an interdepartmental committee composed of senior officials from the various departments interested in this over-all project.

Included in the problems to be studied is the Chignecto canal proposal, but because of limitation of staff it has not yet been found possible to carry forward any intensive investigation of this particular item. When it is reached, of course, full attention will be given to the question of obtaining proper advice, engineering and technical views.

NEWCASTLE-CHATHAM, N.B.—TELEVISION RECEPTION

Question No. 106—Mr. McWilliam:

1. Have representations been received from the municipality of Northumberland, New Brunswick, and/or the towns of Chatham and Newcastle, New Brunswick, or other public body, requesting the erection of a T.V. satellite station in the Newcastle-Chatham area of the province of New Brunswick?
2. If so, what is being done with a view to improving T.V. reception in this area?

Answer by: Mr. MacDonald, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Transport:

1. No.

2. See answer to No. 1.

WINDSOR, ONTARIO, AIRPORT RESTAURANT

Question No. 110—Mr. Martin (Essex East):

1. Have tenders been called for the operation of a restaurant at Windsor airport?
2. If so, has a contract been awarded or a concession given for the operation of such a restaurant?
3. What company or individual has been awarded the contract or concession?

Answer by: Mr. MacDonald, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Transport:

1. Proposals were invited from all interested parties for the operation of a restaurant in the new terminal building at Windsor airport.

2. The offer most favourable to the department was accepted, but the party concerned was compelled on medical grounds to withdraw, and consequently an agreement for the concession was not concluded.

3. The department has now approached the party which made the next most favourable proposal. In the event that this party is not prepared to proceed, new tenders will be invited for the concession.

HECATE STRAIT—DIXON ENTRANCE—APPORTIONMENT OF WATERS

Question No. 131—Mr. Lesage:

1. Has the government reached agreement with the government of British Columbia on the stand it should take in negotiating with the United States the apportionment of waters in Hecate strait and Dixon entrance?

2. If not, have there been any discussions with the British Columbia government or officials of the British Columbia government on the subject since June 22, 1957?

Answer by: Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources):

1 and 2. There have been no further communications from the government of British Columbia on this subject since the exchange of correspondence between July 9 and October 3, 1956.

GULF OF ST. LAWRENCE—CROWN RIGHTS

Question No. 132—Mr. Lesage:

1. Are the waters of the gulf of St. Lawrence Canadian waters?

2. If so, are the seabed and subsoil of the gulf of St. Lawrence the property of the crown (a) in the right of Canada; (b) in the right of Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland; (c) if the answer to (b) is in the affirmative, what part is respectively within each jurisdiction?

Answer by: Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources):

1. On February 8, 1949, shortly before the union of Newfoundland with Canada, the then prime minister (Mr. St. Laurent) made the following statement (Hansard—p. 368):

> We intend to contend, and hope to be able to get acquiescence in the contention that the waters west of Newfoundland constituting the gulf of St. Lawrence shall become an inland sea. We hope that, with Newfoundland as a part of Canadian territory, the gulf of St. Lawrence west of Newfoundland will all become territorial waters of Canada, whereas before there would be only the usual off-shore portion that would thus become part of the territorial waters. Of course that is a matter which is not governed by statutes; it is governed by the comity of nations. It is our intention to assert that position and it is our hope that it will be recognized as a valid contention.

The government sees no reason for departing from the principle enunciated in this statement.

2. According to international law the seabed and subsoil under the territorial sea is vested in the littoral state. The law officers of the crown have advised that the administration and control of the seabed and subsoil of the territorial sea is vested in the crown in right of Canada.

HUDSON BAY—CROWN RIGHTS

Question No. 133—Mr. Lesage:

1. Are the waters of Hudson bay Canadian waters?

2. If so, are the seabed and subsoil of Hudson bay the property of the crown (a) in the right of Canada; (b) in the right of Canada, Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec; (c) if the answer to (b) is in the affirmative, what part is respectively within each jurisdiction?

Answer by: Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources):

1. Yes. The waters of Hudson bay are Canadian waters by historic title in accordance with the universally accepted international law doctrine applying to historic bays. Canada regards as inland water all the water west of a line drawn across the entrance to Hudson strait from Button island to Hatton headland on Resolution island.

2. The law officers of the crown have advised that the control and administration of the seabed and subsoil underlying Hudson bay is vested in the crown in right of Canada.

HUDSON STRAIT—CROWN RIGHTS

Question No. 134—Mr. Lesage:

1. Are the waters of Hudson strait Canadian waters?

2. If so, are the seabed and subsoil of Hudson strait the property of the crown (a) in the right of Canada; (b) in the right of Canada and the province of Quebec; (c) if the answer to (b) is in the affirmative, what part is respectively within each jurisdiction?

Answer by: Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources):

1. Yes, by historic title.

2. The law officers of the crown have advised that the control and administration of the seabed and subsoil underlying Hudson strait is vested in the crown in right of Canada.

	$6,991,822

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, November 15, 1957

The house met at eleven o'clock.

TABLING OF ORDER IN COUNCIL RESPECTING BENEFITS TO MARRIED WOMEN

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I beg leave of the house to table copies of order in council P.C.1957-1477 revoking section 161 of the regulations of the Unemployment Insurance Act regarding married women. Perhaps for the information of the house I might make a statement at this time.

I should like to announce that effective November 17 the unemployment insurance commission is revoking its regulation that imposed additional conditions for the receipt of unemployment insurance benefit on certain married women. In other words, as far as unemployment insurance is concerned married women in the labour force will now be on exactly the same footing as all other claimants in the labour force.

Perhaps I should take a minute or two in order to outline the events and reasonings that led to this decision, and I believe I can best begin by noting the special conditions to which married women have been subject.

In effect, the regulation required any woman who claimed benefit within two years after the date of her marriage to have 10 contribution weeks during that period; and further, if she was working at the time of her marriage the 10 contribution weeks had to be made after her first separation from that employment. This special condition purported to show that the claimant had not left the labour market as a consequence of getting married.

There were, of course, exceptions to this rule. The additional condition did not have to be fulfilled if her separation from employment was a consequence of her employer's policy against retaining married women; or if, for instance, she was laid off because of a shortage of work. But in spite of the exceptions quite a number of married women have been affected by this regulation ever since it came into being.

The married women's regulation was introduced in 1950, and it has had a stormy life in the seven years of its existence. As with everything that has overtones of discrimination, it has been a focal point for controversy, and that is perhaps one of the most cogent reasons for abandoning it.

At the time this regulation was introduced it was argued that a goodly number of newly married women, who had ceased to depend entirely on their own earnings, were nevertheless representing themselves as seeking work for the purpose of drawing benefit. I have always felt that this was a highly dangerous argument since it implied that one knew, without possibility of error, what was in another person's mind.

Again, it was suggested that married women were making far more claims in proportion to their numbers than were single women or men. This again was a dangerous argument, since it involved casting the shadow of suspicion on an entire class numbering in the hundreds of thousands because it was felt, although it could not be proved, that there was chicanery on the part of a few.

Since 1950 I know various hon. members have from time to time fulminated against the provisions of this regulation. Perhaps the most persistent and effective champion of the rights of married women in this regard is the Secretary of State, the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough). Again, throughout the recent election campaign the Conservative party promised that one of their first acts in office would be the revocation of this regulation.

I think there are two basic reasons why we rejected the arguments of those who were its proponents. First, there is an almost natural repugnance against anything that has the slightest shading of discrimination, even though the motives of those who favour it are of the highest. Second, and perhaps more important, I believe we sensed that those who favoured the married women's regulations were completely ignoring one inexorable fact. That fact was that the working wife or mother was not a temporary product of world war II but was in fact the indication of a new social trend. If married women in the labour force had only been a temporary phenomenon of the war years and the immediate post-war years, in all likelihood this particular problem would long ago have solved itself. But the married woman in the labour force has long since proved herself to be no temporary phenomenon.

From June 1951 to June 1957 the number of married women in the labour force increased from 303,000 to 543,000, a gain of 80 per cent. Some of this increase is due no doubt to older women returning to employment when their children have reached an age when they no longer require their mother's full time. It is, however, probably safe to assume that the increase is due in the main to the growing extent to which single women, upon becoming married, continue to work. This I think is the new social trend which I noted a few moments ago.

Because of the economic factors that have been at work during these past years more and more women have found it necessary to continue working after marriage in order to maintain a reasonable standard of living. Again, it is likely that many married women continue to work because they enjoy the stimulation of the many contacts afforded by a working day as opposed to the housewifely routine. It is a known fact that nowadays many women take a temporary leave of absence for the purpose of childbirth and resume their normal working routine as soon as satisfactory arrangements are made for the care of the child. This is a pattern that has now won wide acceptance both in industry and in the civil service. And, I might add, it is a pattern that strongly indicates that married women are in the labour force to stay, for as far into the future as one can look.

In view of the undoubted importance and permanence of married women as working women, there is no justification for retaining a regulation which implies that statements made by them as to availability and willingness to work are less reliable than similar statements made by other classes of insured persons. There is no justification for retaining a regulation that forces married women to be treated differently from other groups, such as persons who are on pension from their former employers and seasonal workers. Most of all there is no justification for retaining a regulation that discriminates against those married women who, although unable to meet the additional condition that applies to them, are genuinely in the labour market. I believe that whatever good it may have done is far outweighed by this single effect it has had.

I should like to conclude by noting that each year some 12,000 married women will now be entitled to the protection of unemployment insurance benefit, protection that this regulation has prevented them from receiving. By that I mean 12,000 is the number of married women who were disqualified in the past year by regulation 161. Although this revocation is not retroactive, I would suggest that married women who have been disqualified under this regulation should get in touch with their national employment office to have their claims reviewed. In the event that the review of their claim indicates that the disqualification might be removed, we would wish to have no delay in the implementation of that removal.

TABLING OF REPORT OF ROYAL COMMISSION ON INSANITY AS A DEFENCE

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table four copies in English and four in French of the report of the royal commission on the law of insanity as a defence in criminal cases.

CANADIAN VESSEL CONSTRUCTION ASSISTANCE ACT

AMENDMENTS RESPECTING DEDUCTIONS, REASSESSMENTS, DEPOSITS, ETC.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport) moved the first reading of Bill No. 72 (from the Senate), to amend the Canadian Vessel Construction Assistance Act.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

TUNISIA—REPORTED DELIVERY OF ARMS BY U.K. AND U.S.

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Prime Minister a question. Would the Prime Minister care to inform the house whether the Canadian government had any prior information about the intended delivery of arms by the United States and the United Kingdom to Tunisia?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, any information received does not go beyond the general information which has appeared in the press. I should not like to say anything further at this time, and I am sure the hon. gentleman will understand that nothing should be said or done now which might in any way aggravate the situation that now exists. I think the right hon. gentleman, with the experience that has been his over the years, will understand that I should not like to go any further at this time, or to add to the information that appears in the press, or say anything that might in any way result in the present situation not being resolved at the earliest possible date. When information is available that can be given to the house without having the potential danger to which I referred I will certainly give the house the fullest possible information.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Then I am right, Mr. Speaker, in assuming from the Prime Minister's reply that there was no prior information of the intention to make these deliveries, and that the press has reported everything that is available? Of course

I was not asking the Prime Minister to comment upon the information that has been supplied through the press.

Mr. Sinclair: The same as Suez; no information.

Mr. Coldwell: Was there prior information given to Canada?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I would not like to say, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Sinclair: Why not?

Mr. Diefenbaker: —the extent to which Canada received information in anticipation of what actually took place at this time.

Mr. Sinclair: That is no answer.

IMMIGRATION

RESPONSIBILITY FOR ASSISTANCE TO UNEMPLOYED IMMIGRANTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to address a question to the Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, and I am sincerely seeking information. I trust that his answer will dispel the miasma of ignorance and discontent which exists on this subject at the present time. Will the minister inform the house of the government's policy with respect to emergency assistance to unemployed immigrants and the per diem allowance, provided for such immigrants, other than Hungarians?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. gentleman for his courtesy in informing me of his intention to ask this question. I cannot answer it except at some length. I have an answer here, and if it would meet the hon gentleman's wishes and the wish of the house I would be glad to table the answer and ask that it might be printed as a reply to the question just asked in the form of an appendix to Hansard of this date.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the house to accept the suggestion of the Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration?

[For answer referred to above, see appendix, pages 1217-18.]

LIVESTOCK

HOGS—REQUEST FOR IMMEDIATE INCREASE IN FLOOR PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Is the minister aware that the price of hogs to the producer has dropped about 11 cents per pound in the past 10 weeks, and will he take steps, if necessary by order in council, to raise the floor price on hogs immediately until such time as the price support legislation can be passed in this house?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I do not know whether or not the figure of 11 cents a pound which was mentioned by the hon. member is correct. Certainly there has been a varying drop in different parts of the country, but in any event the hon. member is taking the amount of drop from the highest point hogs had reached during the past year or more—

Mr. Castleden: Last autumn.

Mr. Harkness: —to the present time. The matter of a drop in hog prices at this time of year, as the hon. member knows, is traditional and has been a part of the general pattern as far as hog marketings are concerned. This is a matter, of course, to which we are paying very considerable attention, and I trust that the drop in hog prices which has taken place thus far will not be continued.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE OF RIVER PILOTS, KINGSTON MARINE DISTRICT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Transport a question. Has the minister a statement to make in connection with the status of the Montreal-Kingston pilots?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): No, Mr. Speaker, I do not think I can add anything to what has already appeared in the papers. I said in a statement to the press that I had a meeting of some two hours with the pilots on Wednesday afternoon and discussed the matter very thoroughly. I had hoped that we had reached an agreement, and I was extremely disappointed to learn the following morning that we had not.

Hon. George C. Marler (St. Antoine-Westmount): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Transport. Newspapers reported the intention of the department to levy fines on pilots who ceased to carry out their duties. I believe there was also the threat that the pilotage district would be dissolved. Will the minister say whether that threatened action has been taken or is being contemplated?

Mr. Hees: I do not know of any such threat ever having been made by my department.

Inquiries of the Ministry

PIPE LINES

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—STATEMENT ON EXPLOSIONS IN SASKATCHEWAN AND MANITOBA

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, several hon. members have asked questions in regard to the result of the investigation into the breaks on the Trans-Canada pipe line, and I have now a report from the board of transport commissioners to the effect that:

> All of the breaks experienced in our testing program so far have occurred because of a fatigue crack in the parent metal of the pipe, but we have not determined what causes this fatigue nor what limits it to a relatively short length, 2 inches to 18 inches, along the factory weld in the pipe. The pressure within the pipe finally overstresses the remaining metal and the rapid propagation of the pressure wave brought about by that failure results in a tearing and ripping action in the metal itself.

While there has been no determination as to the cause, the board of transport commissioners are advised that the Battelle Memorial Institute, an independent research laboratory, has been hired to make an investigation into the cause of the failure, and the board has not yet received from the company the results of its investigation.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRIES AS TO METHOD OF DEALING WITH ESTIMATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Since the minister has indicated that a budget will not be brought down this session, will he give the house an assurance that his estimates will be brought in at an early date; and, second, will he give us the assurance that on the first item we shall have the widest possible scope for discussion of financial policy?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the statement which is the prelude to my hon. friend's two questions is not correct. I have made no such statement in this house this session. As to the first of his questions, the estimates of the Department of Finance will be brought before this house at whatever time they can be appropriately reached in the course of the discharge of the business of the session.

As to his second question, I am quite sure the chairman of the committee of supply will permit discussion on any matters that are pertinent to the first item in the estimates of the department.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Speaker, just a supplementary question to the first part. I said:

> Since the minister has indicated that a budget will not be brought down this session.

[Mr. Hees.]

That was the impression that was left with us. Will the minister say now whether or not a budget will be brought down?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I repeat what I have said I think on two or three occasions this session; that whatever is required under the rules and practice of the house to permit the introduction and dispatch of whatever financial proposals the government chooses to lay before this session of the house will certainly be done.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): May I ask the Minister of Finance whether it is his intention to refer departmental estimates in toto, or in part, to an estimates committee of this house, in accordance with his own and his colleagues' very strong opinions expressed in the previous session?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, no estimates committee has yet been set up, and whether that will be an appropriate way of dealing with the estimates of any department I do not think anyone can yet say. So far as an estimates committee is concerned, what has been said by myself and others on that subject in times past did not apply to the Department of Finance any more than to any other department. It was said by way of observation as to a method of dealing with the estimates of all departments, some at each session.

Mr. Winch: I should like to ask a supplementary question. Perhaps my question should be redirected to the house leader. Can the house leader inform us if an estimates committee is going to be appointed this session?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Well, Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to make a statement on that at the moment, but I would point this out to the hon. member. We are dealing with estimates which were brought down last spring and considered in part at that time, and there will be new estimates brought in shortly after the new year for the ensuing fiscal year.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is that a promise?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is there going to be a new session?

Mr. Green: If members of the house have any desire to finish the business before Christmas it might be very difficult to fit in the work of an estimates committee.

[Later:]

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the house leader. Since he has expressed some doubts as to the feasibility of establishing an estimates committee this session, can he tell the house now whether or not the government has the intention of setting up a special committee to consider the estimates of the Department of National Defence?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I cannot give the hon. member a statement on that point, although in that case again the remarks I made a few minutes ago would be applicable.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): I should like to ask a supplementary question. Did I understand the house leader correctly when I thought he said a moment ago that new estimates would be brought in early in the new year?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I meant to say, whether I did or not, that with the commencement of the next session the estimates for 1958-59 would be brought down. Of course it is desirable to get the 1957-58 estimates out of the way in the meantime.

Mr. W. A. Tucker (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the house leader. Is it no longer the opinion of the members who are now members of the government that the efficient and expeditious consideration of the estimates would be facilitated by referring some of them to the estimates committee. I would further like to ask if it is the intention of the government to refer the Department of External Affairs estimates to the external affairs committee.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that we cannot get into estimates at all until next week, and then there are only four weeks after that before Christmas, my personal opinion is that it would delay matters if estimates were referred to an estimates committee. Also there would not be an opportunity to give them careful consideration. There might be some advantage to the government in doing so, in that these are largely the estimates of the former government, and I am rather surprised that the hon. member is asking that we refer these estimates to the committees.

Mr. Tucker: There is nothing wrong with them.

Mr. Green: With regard to the second part of the question, it is hoped with respect to external affairs estimates that we can arrange for a day fairly soon on which to debate external affairs and then, at the end of the day, refer those particular estimates to the external affairs committee for consideration.

INQUIRY AS TO CONTINUATION OF PRESENT SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Colin Cameron (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, I would like to address a question to the house leader. In view of his repeated statements this morning about the shortness of the period between now and the Christmas recess, can he inform the house what obstacle there is in the way of this session of parliament being continued after the new year?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): As the hon. member knows, this session was called to deal with certain legislation which was considered to be very urgent, and to dispose of the estimates of the current fiscal year. We now have only a little over four months remaining—

Some hon. Members: Four weeks.

Mr. Green: —four months remaining in the current fiscal year, and it was never the intention to have a regular session which, as hon. members know, lasts from five to six months. The work of the regular session will have to be done next year. After all, we spent quite a few months here this last spring working on the governmental business of 1957, and I am sure the hon. member who is asking the question would not expect any government to go ahead and try to conduct a full session at the present time under these circumstances.

INQUIRY AS TO PROCEDURE RESPECTING DIVORCE BILLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question either to the Prime Minister or to the leader of the house. In view of the references which have been made to the possible length of this session, whether it is to be short or long, and in view of the government's interest in maintaining the dignity and effectiveness of parliament, may I ask if the government has any ideas as to what is to be done this session regarding the many divorce bills which are before parliament?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I fancy that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has a far better idea than I have about what is going to be done about divorce bills this session. I doubt very much whether it will be possible for the government to work out a solution to this problem in the next four weeks.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF PRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. James Sinclair (Coast-Capilano): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Does he not feel, as the leader of the new government, that it is extremely important that at the first session of the house under that new government the nation be given a clear exposition of the financial position and the state of the nation through the customary budget debate?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the solicitude of my hon. friend. The answer to the question of whether or not there will be a budget has been given by the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Sinclair: What answer?

Mr. McIlraith: He did not deal with the question.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I seem to remember that over and over again in days past, when the question was asked if and when a budget would be brought down, the answer invariably was that the house would be notified in due course. I am not forgetful either of the fact that—I forget the years—there have been two occasions in any event in recent years when there was no budget. At that time my hon. friend was a member of the house, and I heard no objection raised by him.

Mr. Sinclair: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the vast experience the Prime Minister has in these matters, can he ever recall in Canadian history when a new government facing a new parliament did not bring down a budget during the first session?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I have already referred to the fact that there have been cases in which there has not been a budget, and I suggest that my hon. friend would have the answer to his own question by a simple perusal of Hansard.

Mr. Sinclair: Perhaps the Prime Minister did not understand my question, so I will repeat it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It seems to me that spokesmen on both sides have understood what the other has said—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: —and that the matter is now developing into a debate. If the hon. member for Coast-Capilano has a supplementary question which is not a statement of opinion and does not continue a debate, I will permit it.

Mr. Sinclair: Sir, it was not a supplementary question. The fact is—

Mr. Fleming: It was a speech.

Mr. Sinclair: —that the Prime Minister obviously misunderstood my question. Perhaps I phrased it wrongly. I asked whether he could ever remember a case where a new government at the first session of a new parliament did not present a budget.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I seem to recall that at the session in the fall of 1930, which was called as an emergency session, there was no budget, and that the government had just come into power. I should add that I do appreciate the interest of my hon. friends in the preservation of parliamentary government, for I also seem to remember that in 1948 they introduced taxation by radio.

Mr. Sinclair: Do I understand now that the Prime Minister is, as usual, using the example of R. B. Bennett in the conduct of public affairs?

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the Prime Minister a supplementary question. From what the Prime Minister has now said, referring to past history, are we to infer that there will not be a budget at this session, contrary to the indication given to the press by the Minister of Finance in July that there would be one?

An hon. Member: In June.

Mr. Sinclair: June 25.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In June or July.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, there is to be no inference whatsoever taken from anything I have said. As far as the alleged representation made by the Minister of Finance is concerned, my recollection in that regard is that the Minister of Finance has already stated in this house that the statement in question had not been made by him.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

FINANCE

REQUEST FOR PROVISION OF CREDIT FOR SMALL RETAILERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the statement in his speech in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne respecting the plight of retail merchants, would the minister indicate whether it is the intention of the government to bring in legislation this session to make it possible for small retailers to receive financial assistance, as recently requested by the retail merchants of Canada?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to say that I did not hear the first part of the hon. member's question. Would he mind repeating it?

Mr. Hahn: In view of the statement in his speech in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne respecting the plight of retail merchants, would the minister indicate whether it is the intention of the government to bring in legislation this session to make it possible for small retailers to receive financial assistance, as recently requested by the retail merchants of Canada?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I did not make any suggestion to indicate that any legislation would be introduced at this session. As a matter of fact, if we do not make faster progress with the business that is already waiting to be dispatched at this session I do not know how far we shall be able to go.

Mr. Sinclair: If the minister would give shorter answers it would be easier.

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) has a great time these days larding up the record with his interjections, and the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) does the same thing. I have been sorry many times that I have not heard their interjections as I went along. I found them on the record afterward—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Fleming: —and they were very senseless interjections.

Mr. Sinclair: Hold your temper.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Nobody wants it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Because the Minister of Finance considers the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) to be out of order, that does not give him the right to continue out of order. The Minister of Finance has risen to answer a question, not to raise a point of order.

Mr. Fleming: Yes. In the course of answering that question may I point out that I was as usual interrupted by the loquacious hon. member for Coast-Capilano.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fleming: But he is not one whom you can expect to observe restraint, or the rules either.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fleming: Who is answering the question?

Mr. Sinclair: No one.

Mr. Fleming: There appear to be at least 20 to 25 hon. members opposite who consider that they are in each case the minister of finance and are called upon to answer questions put to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. McIlraith: We would not like to be.

Mr. Fleming: Perhaps my hon. friend will not need to worry about having to make a choice on the subject.

Mr. Sinclair: Don't turn your back to the Speaker. Address the Speaker.

Mr. Fleming: There still seem to be a great many ministers of finance in the chamber, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I suggest to hon. members that if they continue to interrupt I shall consider it sufficient provocation to allow the minister to comment on the remarks made. But I would ask him if he would go ahead with his answer, and I would ask hon. members if they would allow him to answer the question.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, I am rising on a question of privilege. As a matter of fact I think the house is being treated with contempt by the government. This morning we have had three examples of perfectly legitimate and proper questions which have been evaded. I think that we are entitled to answers to those questions. I rise to protest at these infractions of the rights and privileges of this parliament.

Mr. Fleming: Then may I suggest to my hon. friend that he address his admonition to hon. gentlemen opposite, who are loudly interrupting and trying to shout down ministers who are endeavouring to answer questions.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I take it that the question of privilege was addressed to the chair.

Mr. Sinclair: And not to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Speaker: May I say to the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that my understanding of the rules and practices relating to oral questions before the orders of the day are called is that no member is entitled to insist on an answer. It is quite within the practice and the rights of whoever is asked a question to take it as notice or to refuse to answer. I therefore cannot entertain as a matter of privilege the objection that has been raised, because I do not think it offends the privileges of the house. It is not that sort of matter. I would ask the Minister of Finance if he would answer the question.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, as I was saying to the hon. member, we have received representations from various organizations on this subject. Some of the requests would involve legislation if they were to be acceded to and others would not. I have already indicated that these various representations are under consideration. Whatever action is taken on them will depend upon various factors. I cannot give a categorical answer to the hon. gentleman at this time as to what may be the outcome of these presentations, or what legislation might be involved if effect were given to them.

CITIZENSHIP AND IMMIGRATION

INDIAN AFFAIRS—STATEMENT ON INSPECTION OF FIRE HAZARDS ON RESERVES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, on October 30 the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron) asked me the following question:

> Has the minister's attention been drawn to the statement of Mr. A. Beasley, chief of the View Royal fire brigade, appearing in the Victoria Daily Colonist of October 23 in connection with the recent fire on the Songhees reserve which cost the lives of two Indian children, in which Mr. Beasley stated that the Indian affairs branch carries out no inspection of chimneys and other fire hazards on the reserve and that the Indian agent at Duncan had failed to reply to four letters written by Mr. Beasley in regard to fire protection on the reserve?
> If so, can the minister inform the house as to the correctness of Mr. Beasley's assertion that no inspection is carried out, and can he tell the house whether his department is considering entering into agreements with municipalities contiguous to Indian reserves to ensure fire protection on the reserves?

I want to apologize to the hon. member for the length of time which has elapsed between his question and my reply, but I wanted to get the facts absolutely correctly. I have now received a report from the superintendent of the Cowichan Indian agency in which the Songhees reserve is located, and in which he advises that the fire occurred in a large old building occupied by Mrs. Thomas George at 1441 Craigflower road. Mrs. George was caring for six grandchildren. It is thought that fire started in the stovepipe connecting a cook stove and the chimney. The outbreak was seen by passers-by on the well-travelled highway which passes the house, and four children were brought out of the house with the grandmother. Unfortunately two could not be found in the smoke, and were burned to death. The report continues that the superintendent of the agency went to Victoria immediately and helped the chief make arrangements for rehabilitation of the family, and he wishes to go on record as saying that the chief and council did an excellent job of organizing, and the generosity of friends and neighbours, both Indian and white, was overwhelming.

Now with regard to the allegations in the newspapers, in the Victoria Times on Wednesday evening, October 23, there was a leading article which stated in part as follows:

> Chief Beasley criticized the department of Indian affairs for not sending agents to inspect chimneys in the Songhees Indian reserve.
> Although not responsible for the area the brigade answered the alarm as a courtesy, he said.
> Recently he wrote four letters to the Indian agent at Duncan complaining about the lack of fire inspection.
> Chief Beasley claimed he didn't even have the courtesy to reply.

The agency superintendent reports that he interviewed Mr. Beasley that same evening, asking him to produce copies of the letters he alleged had been sent. Chief Beasley claimed that the reporter had made a mistake and denied that he had ever sent as many as four letters, but he maintained that about seven months ago he had written a letter to that office.

The superintendent advises further that on his return to the agency next day he made a careful search of their filing system but could find no trace of any letter from Mr. Beasley, nor could any member of his staff recollect having seen such a letter.

The superintendent has since written to Mr. Beasley asking him for a copy of this letter in order that he might know exactly what was proposed. The superintendent adds that, during the conversation referred to, he asked Mr. Beasley if his fire department would be interested in negotiating an agreement to provide fire protection to the Songhees and Esquimalt reserves, such as are in existence with other fire departments in that agency. Chief Beasley said he would take it up with the officers of the View Royal fire department and let the superintendent know. This conversation has been confirmed in writing by the superintendent, but as at the date of his report he had received no reply.

In answer to the other part of the question with regard to this matter, since 1955 it has been and still is the policy of the department to negotiate, wherever possible, agreements with municipalities for the extension of fire protection to reserves adjacent to municipalities. It appears that no such agreement has been negotiated for this particular reserve, but that matter is under negotiation at the present time.

REQUEST FOR REPRESENTATIVES OF MUNICIPALITIES TO ATTEND FORTHCOMING MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Claude Richardson (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. I regret that I did not have an opportunity to send him notice of the question.

In view of the strong recommendations made yesterday in the admirable speech of the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lambert) for representatives of municipalities to be made an integral part of the conference between the dominion and the provinces, is it the position of the government that at next week's meeting between the dominion and the provinces representatives of the municipalities will be invited to participate?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as I have already stated on previous occasions, the stand taken by the government in so far as the conference which is to take place next week is concerned is that, as the municipalities are the creation of the provinces, any representation by municipalities will be determined by the respective provinces. There has been no change in attitude in that regard.

AIR TRANSPORT

CANADIAN PACIFIC AIRLINES—APPLICATION TO FLY MONTREAL-VANCOUVER ROUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the prohibition contained in section 15(2) of the Aeronautics Act against any surface carrier being granted a licence to operate a commercial air service unless it has the approval of the governor in council, how is it possible for Canadian Pacific Airlines to make its application for a licence to fly the Montreal-Vancouver route without prior approval of the government?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is quite right in that before a licence can be granted it must receive the approval of the governor in council, but that approval is granted after the application has first been heard before the air transport board. If it is approved by the air transport board it is then submitted to the governor in council for approval.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, then may I ask if this is the course which was followed with respect to previous applications by Canadian Pacific Airlines before the air transport board? Is it not only fair and proper to a company which goes to the expense of making such an application, and is it not fair to the country which is also put to expense, to know in advance whether it is government policy to approve such a licence?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, as I said to the hon. member yesterday, in my opinion—and I believe it is the opinion of the government and I think it would be the opinion of the hon. members of this house—it would be completely wrong if the government expressed its views in favour of or against a certain application before it had gone before the air transport board for consideration.

BRIDGES

VICTORIA AND JACQUES CARTIER—PROTEST AGAINST PROPOSED INCREASE IN TOLLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jean Boucher (Chateauguay-Huntingdon-Laprairie): May I direct a question to the hon. Minister of Transport. Has the minister received a telegram from the Laprairie chamber of commerce protesting the proposed increase in tolls by the Victoria and Jacques Cartier bridge authorities, and if so what will be the government's policy on this matter?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have received such a telegram, and at the present time the question of tolls on these bridges is still under consideration. I am not aware of any proposed increases in these tolls.

GRAIN

WHEAT—DEFICIENCY PAYMENTS TO WESTERN FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Prime Minister arising out of a telegram I received this morning. Has the Prime Minister received any request from western farm organizations or wheat pools asking the government to give serious consideration to the making of deficiency payments to western farmers because of the present price of wheat?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have no recollection that anything of that nature was received this morning. However, I will look into the matter and see whether any message of that kind did come in. I have no information on it.

Inquiries of the Ministry

PUBLIC SERVICE

BRANTFORD, ONT.—STATEMENT ON REQUEST FOR REINSTATEMENT OF DISMISSED EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, some days ago the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar asked me a question concerning Charles Kratzmeir, who had formerly been an employee of the public works department in Brantford, and a day or two later the hon. member for Kent, Ontario, asked a further question.

I have now had an investigation made, and the facts are these. A few days before the election of June 10 two men, Charles Kratzmeir and Ambrose Truman, were hired by the Department of Public Works purely on a party basis and neglecting any question of veterans preference. On election day they took part in the election in support of the former government. Subsequently it was found that Ambrose Truman had served in the merchant navy, although this fact was not brought out at the time he was hired. Mr. Kratzmeir had no war service. Mr. Truman has been continued in his employment and is on the job at the present time. I do not think he lost any time, actually. Mr. Kratzmeir has been replaced by a veteran, who was employed through the national employment service.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask the Minister of Public Works a supplementary question. Am I correct in saying that the request made by the labour organization in Brantford with regard to one of these men has not been accepted by the minister or the government?

Mr. Green: No request was made to me by any labour organization, but the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar did mention it when he asked the question. In view of the facts I have stated this man is not being reinstated in employment.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A further supplementary question. May I ask the minister who recommended the dismissal?

Mr. Green: For one thing, the whole story has been in the press. I understand a great deal of this commotion originated with the Liberal association in Brantford. When an investigation was made the facts were ascertained as I have outlined them, and as minister I am accepting full responsibility for the action which was taken.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Is it not a fact that the hon. member for Brantford, sitting behind the minister, is the one who recommended the dismissal?

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. Green: I received representations from several people in Brantford.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Can the minister say who made the representations?

Mr. Green: If the hon. member for Essex East really wants me to go into this question of patronage on my estimates I will be delighted to do so, but I would be very much surprised if he stays in the house to take his medicine.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, what the minister has just said is surely contrary to the rules of this house. I will tell him—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I agree with the hon. member for Essex East that what the Minister of Public Works said was contrary to the rules of this house, and I trust the hon. member for Essex East will let the matter drop there and not continue it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I should be very glad to, Mr. Speaker, but in view of your ruling, for which I am grateful, I would request you to ask the Minister of Public Works to withdraw his rather cheap observation.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to withdraw.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): May I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Public Works, and before I ask the question I wish to say that I agree with the general position taken by the government. In the light of information received recently which would indicate that veterans preference has not, in some instances, been observed, do I understand from the minister's remarks that veterans preference is still being maintained?

Mr. Green: We try to do our very best to observe the veterans preference at all times.

SHIPPING

NORTH SYDNEY—REPORTED DELAYS IN LOADING OF COAL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. G. W. Ashbourne (Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. Will the minister please look into the matter of delays occasioned to vessels loading coal at North Sydney for Newfoundland, and see if these loadings can be expedited?

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, I will take the question as notice.

UNITED NATIONS

FAO—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF SPEECH BY MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. A. Tucker (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether the speech he made at the FAO meeting in Rome has been made available to hon. members and, if not, whether he would consider tabling it as a sessional paper. I think it would be interesting for us to be able to read the speech and see what stand was taken by the government.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I should be glad to table a copy of the speech made on that occasion, but unfortunately I have not a copy with me; I did not bring one from Rome. We would have to send over there for it, but if I am able to get a copy I will be glad to table it.

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Thursday, November 14, consideration of the motion of Mr. A. R. Smith (Calgary South) for an address to Her Majesty the Queen in reply to her speech at the opening of the session.

Mr. Wilfrid LaCroix (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, if there is to be any budget, which of course I doubt very much, and if there is to be any decrease in taxes, I hope that with regard to income tax the government will respect the family organization of agriculture in the province of Quebec, and will not impose unwonted charges on a system of agriculture which has been the strength of our nation.

I hope the basic exemptions with regard to income tax will be increased from $1,000 to $1,500 for single persons and from $2,000 to $3,000 for married taxpayers, in line with the wish I have expressed more than once on the floor of the house and also in line with promises made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker). Let us hope, too, that the Unemployment Insurance Act will be amended to take into account agricultural problems and, more particularly, to cover agricultural workers. I also hope the qualifying period for unemployment insurance will be reduced.

I take advantage of this opportunity to protest against the new trade policy of the government. The London government knows full well that Canada is incapable of allowing British industry free access to our markets. This would spell the doom of our woollen and cotton mills, of our factories producing shoes, gloves, slippers and other goods, which provide employment to several hundred thousand workers in Canada, several hundred of whom are in my own constituency. At the present time these industries survive only because of the protection afforded by customs tariffs. Free trade, preferential tariffs or anything of the sort would certainly bring about their disappearance. Everyone knows that the cost price of anything made in England is lower than that of goods manufactured in this country, where salaries are higher.

The attitude adopted by the Conservative government since it has come into power with regard to our trade relations with Great Britain has caused unemployment in almost every branch of industry and commerce in this country. At the present time there is unemployment on a scale unknown since the days of the Bennett administration. Mr. Bennett had already tried his economic policies with England, and the only thing they brought our country was a period of intense unemployment and, to Mr. Bennett, a seat in the British House of Lords where he spent the rest of his life. Unless we maintain the Liberal policy of protecting our industries against depreciated currency and low salary countries our Canadian industries will be wiped out and foreign investments in this country will diminish. The best means to increase our exports to the United States is to insist upon the processing of our natural resources here in Canada, as we have already done in the case of pulpwood and as we should do also in the case of iron ore, processing the latter into steel by means of smelters built in Canada. That would facilitate shipping through the St. Lawrence seaway and reduce our trade deficit with the United States.

Representatives of several manufacturing concerns in several industrial sectors have already stated categorically that to accept the British proposal or something similar would be deliberately courting disaster. It would mean the shutting down of several factories and the laying off of many thousands of Canadian workers at a time when owing to a recession in a certain sphere of our economy and to wide scale immigration, unemployment is on the increase. As a result of the high salaries and the standard of living prevailing in this country, in many fields we cannot compete with British industry and the industries of many commonwealth countries. This new trend which is apparently taking place in the trade policy of Canada will likely cause another period of uncertainty in financial circles, which will then hesitate to make further industrial investments as long as the future trends of our trade policy are not definitely set out.

The Prime Minister, who before the election of last June 10 blamed the Liberal government for not standing by England's side in her declaration of war on Egypt, notwithstanding the fact that Great Britain had not consulted Canada, went through his whole electoral campaign stirring up the fanatical feelings of certain imperialists in Canada on this subject. However, the day after the election he did not hesitate to put under the direction of an American the whole of our air defence thus sacrificing our independence; and he did so after a conference with the United States Secretary of State, at which he had meant to speak firmly to the Americans. The only result so far discernible by Canadians is that the Prime Minister of their country has beaten a hasty retreat.

Since the last British garrison left our shores, about a century ago, we have assumed full authority over our armed forces. By this fact Canada has been able at least to direct its own international policy, of which military establishments are but an expression. It is owing to this Canadian independence in military matters that the hon. member for Prince Albert, acting as leader of the opposition, could blame the Canadian government last year for following the policy of the United States in the Suez incident instead of pursuing a policy which should have been, in his opinion, an endorsement of the British operation. That, however, would not only have brought us automatically in the war beside England, but would have unmistakably brought on a third world war, which fortunately we were spared thanks to the firm attitude of Canada's former secretary of state for external affairs, the hon. member for Algoma East (Mr. Pearson), whose gallant efforts in that field have just earned him the award of the Nobel prize for peace, a unique honour since he is the first Canadian to receive this prize for his contribution to world peace. How will Canada be in a position to pursue its own foreign policy if national defence passes to United States command?

I wish to draw another matter to the attention of the government. Here are the comments made by L'Action Catholique on Tuesday, September 10, 1957, after Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent had announced his decision to relinquish the Liberal party leadership:

> History will recognize that the Hon. Mr. St. Laurent was a great prime minister. At all times, he has enjoyed the respect and consideration of all Canadians. He had political opponents but no enemy.
> Notwithstanding certain attitudes which they would have liked to be different, French Canadians will admit that, under the administration of the Hon. Mr. St. Laurent, the cause of bilingualism in Canada and of our representation in the civil service has improved. His views and actions in such matters have placed his successors in a position from which they cannot back out with impunity.

Has our racial group lost ground since June 10 last as far as its representation and influence are concerned? The following is what I read on that subject in Le Soleil of Friday, August 9, 1957:

> It will be the first time in a very long time that the French element is reduced to such a minor role in the administration of our country, which is bad from the simple electoral point of view for the party in power and particularly for Canadian politics.
> With two ministers confined to minor assignments the voice of French Canada will hardly be heard. Such a situation is a matter of concern not only for the province of Quebec but for all political observers who have the future of our country at heart. Looking back on history, Mr. Bruce Hutchison, in a recent issue of the Financial Post, said that the first condition of success for a Canadian government was to rely on the support of French and English Canada.

As for the criticisms levelled at the government on that score, the new Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) said in Montreal that the province of Quebec must elect more Conservative members if it wants more representatives in the Progressive Conservative government. He also emphasized the fact that his leader had chosen three ministers among the eight Conservative members elected in Quebec. He even felt it necessary to add that those three ministers hold very important posts.

The Prime Minister was in the position of a lawyer who must rely on doubtful arguments to defend a very bad case. British Columbia has three representatives in the cabinet, including the Minister of Justice, (Mr. Fulton), and these three departments are still more important than the three assigned to Quebec representatives. Yet British Columbia elected but seven Conservative members, and its population is but one-third of Quebec's population.

It is possible, without violating parliamentary tradition, to choose ministers outside the House of Commons. The Prime Minister, Mr. Speaker, did not hesitate to call on Mr. Sidney Smith of the University of Toronto to make him his Secretary of State for External Affairs. French Canadians, on the other hand, must be satisfied with two ministers, since the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton), the third Quebec minister, represents the Anglo-protestant minority, and those two representatives must accept the two least important portfolios of the whole federal administration.

The appointment of the Secretary of State for External Affairs gave the province of Ontario a seventh representative in the cabinet. However, in a speech delivered on television some time after the election the Solicitor General (Mr. Balcer) told us that the eight elected Conservative members in Quebec were all qualified for ministerial positions, a statement confirmed recently by the Prime Minister in a television broadcast. The Prime Minister argued that we are living in a bilingual country. I can tell him, in this respect, that it is not enough to come to the province of Quebec and read a few words, with the help of a Mona Lisa smile, to convince my fellow citizens of his sincerity, but it is necessary to translate those ideas into facts.

Mr. Balcer: That is not cheap?

Mr. LaCroix: Otherwise the voters of Quebec might take the liberty in 1958 to show the Prime Minister, who calls the tune and attempts to follow the devious and brutal policy of give and take, that Quebec is more than an ordinary province. This it will do by making him feel deeply sorry for playing this little game of hide and seek, even if he keeps playing it until the very eve of the next election.

I would like to avail myself of the opportunity offered by this debate, Mr. Speaker, to ask the government, as I have done on previous occasions for at least 20 years, for a distinctive Canadian flag. There is nothing in the speech from the throne to indicate that the government will agree to solve this Canadian flag problem which has been plaguing us ever since confederation and which, as long as it remains unsolved, will maintain our country in a ridiculous position in the eyes of the world. Yet a solution would be welcome, the matter being more than ever topical.

The time seems ripe for action, Mr. Speaker. Our fellow citizens throughout the country appear ready to make certain concessions. The Toronto Star cited a few interesting facts in this connection the other day. For example, the Toronto junior chamber of commerce adopted a resolution indicating in no uncertain terms its wish for the adoption of a national flag containing neither the fleur-de-lis nor the union jack. For a protestant and English-speaking group to have adopted such a resolution without this giving rise to acrimonious debate among its members is certainly proof that the fanaticism of certain people is on the wane. The Toronto Star also indicates that a similar resolution has been adopted by the Toronto section of the native sons of Canada.

Consequently, Mr. Speaker, I have prepared an amendment which in every shape and form I would consider to be not a non-confidence motion.

I move, seconded by the hon. member for Pontiac-Timiskaming (Mr. Proudfoot), that the following be added to the address:

> We respectfully urge, however, that Canada should have a distinctive national flag and, in the opinion of this house, Your Most Gracious Majesty's advisers should consider at once the advisability of taking steps to give to this country a truly Canadian flag.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, is it proper for a motion to be seconded by a member who is not in the house?

Mr. Speaker: Is there a seconder to this motion?

Mr. LaCroix: It has been indicated that the seconder is not in the house. To meet the point of order raised by my hon. friend, the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Poulin) will second it.

Mr. Speaker: A seconder is necessary before a motion is properly before the house.

Mr. LaCroix: A seconder is indicated. The seconder is the hon. member for Beauce.

(Translation):

Mr. Benoit Chabot (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, it is with a pleasure not unmixed with emotion, that I now rise to speak on behalf of the constituency of Kamouraska—

Mr. Bonnier: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker: Will the hon. member yield the floor to the hon. member for St. Henry (Mr. Bonnier), who is rising on a question of privilege?

(Translation):

Mr. Bonnier: Mr. Speaker, when the question was put yesterday evening, the C.C.F. amendment was ready in English only. In view of my very limited knowledge of English, I would have liked to know exactly on what matter the vote was called. Luckily for me, the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. St. Laurent) rose ahead of me, and I followed his example. However, there will be circumstances when the former prime minister will not be here and I would then be among the first to vote on motions which have not been read in my native tongue and which I would not have understood. I do not see why this should be. A man should always know why he votes, just as he should never sign any document without knowing exactly what he is putting his name to.

When the vote was called last evening, I heard several members who I thought were newcomers unfamiliar with the standing orders, shouting "Question! question!"

Among those voices, I heard that of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) repeating "Question! question!" The hon. minister must have been aware that the amendment is normally read in both English and French and he should have studied French a little longer. It would not have done him any harm.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order! I wish to point out to the hon. member for St. Henry (Mr. Bonnier) that it has been the practice in the house to use both languages. However, a member who speaks English exclusively cannot be required to speak French no more than a member who speaks French only can be required to speak English.

It might be preferable that a motion be read in both languages when it is put to a vote, but as there are many experienced members among the Liberal party, I am convinced that the hon. member knew that the C.C.F. party had moved an amendment and that, according to our standing orders, the house had to deal with it last night.

On the other hand, a member is always within his rights if he requests that the motion or amendment be read in his native tongue.

Mr. Wilfrid LaCroix (Quebec-Montmorency): Mr. Speaker, with your kind permission, I would like to repeat in French the amendment submitted by me to the house when Mr. Speaker was in the chair.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry that I did not understand the hon. member. Would he please repeat what he has just said?

Mr. LaCroix: I would now like to read in French the amendment which I forwarded to the Speaker while he was in the chair, and which was written in English.

We respectfully urge, however, that Canada should have a distinctive national flag and, in the opinion of this house Your Most Gracious Majesty's advisers should consider at once the advisability of taking steps to give to this country a truly Canadian flag.

Mr. Benoit Chabot (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, it is with a pleasure not unmixed with emotion that I now rise to speak on behalf of the constituency of Kamouraska. The atmosphere of dignity which befits this house never fails to impress a new member, but the sympathetic welcome of the hon. members, regardless of the party they belong to, is comforting to the newly elected.

As an independent member, allow me to say that the recent visit of our gracious Queen Elizabeth II and of her husband, Prince Philip, greatly warmed the hearts of Canadians, strengthened our convictions and stimulated our efforts to safeguard the prerogatives and rights of each ethnical group in our beautiful country, in a spirit of frank co-operation and sincere understanding.

(Text):

At this time, Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate the Prime Minister of Canada on his wonderful success in his victory of June 10. This victory was the result of tenacity and his hard-working spirit. I sincerely hope the whole of Canada will appreciate having him as their Prime Minister, and that his administration will contribute to a better Canada.

I should also like to congratulate the Prime Minister on his choice for the position of Speaker in this new parliament, as well as for his nomination of the hon. member for Labelle (Mr. Courtemanche) as Deputy Speaker. As we know, their duties are of great importance, but due to the fact that these hon. members are competent we are sure they will fulfil those important duties with great diligence, as their undeniably good record will reveal.

As an independent member of the house, I assure the Prime Minister that it will be a pleasure as well as a duty for me to support his government as much as possible and as long as his government presents measures which will contribute to bring peace and happiness in the homes of the Canadian people, and as long as they do not come into conflict with the sacred rights of my province and with the interests of my constituents.

(Translation):

Mr. Speaker, it is with pride and pleasure that I say to this house that the right hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. St. Laurent) will go down in history as one of the greatest figures of any country. In my estimation, he is the very personification of frankness and sincerity. Everything about him bespeaks dignity. Through the prestige of his personality, no one will have contributed more to the great cause of national unity. On behalf of my electors, I congratulate him and I thank him.

May I, Mr. Speaker, commend the member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith) who has so eloquently moved the address in reply to the speech from the throne. He shows promise of becoming one of the best speakers in the house. I also congratulate the seconder of the address, my hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault). His electors will be proud of him and will be glad to be so worthily represented.

Mr. Speaker, several of the bills mentioned in the speech from the throne are bound to improve the lot of many Canadians, and I am glad this is so. However, allow me to endorse the views expressed by my colleagues who spoke before me about the unstable situation of our agriculture in general. I think the government should give very special consideration to this matter and especially to family farming. The recession of farming across the country in general, is even more deplorable in my constituency, the county of Kamouraska.

Being mostly agricultural, this area is even more threatened than elsewhere. First, in so far as climate is concerned, there are barely five months of summer, and because winter lasts seven months or more, there is a sharp increase in production costs.

The farmers in my constituency live far from the great markets, pay high prices for the transport of their products and cannot afford hired help. Even their sons have to take outside jobs to earn money to pay for clothes, amusements and, of course, education. A supreme effort is urgently needed on the part of the government to establish as soon as possible, on a logical and reasonable basis, a price support on potatoes, and to adjust prices of butter and hogs, to mention Quebec products only.

I hope therefore, Mr. Speaker, that the farmers of Quebec and the lower St. Lawrence will fare better under the new Conservative government. This is what everyone everywhere, from coast to coast, has been hoping since June 10. While Canada is a rich country, in her soil and sub-soil, to the point of arousing the envy of foreign interests, while it is a country that is still young and in full development, I would ask every member in this house why 80 per cent of our Canadian families are unable to secure the goods needed in these times and to provide the necessary education for their many children without going into the red and endangering their economic and family security?

The house spends a goodly part of its time considering representations of all kinds, from every part of the country and from every class of citizens, while the whole world is extolling Canada's wealth. Is it not paradoxical, Mr. Speaker? Where does the trouble lie? Does anyone know? If so, is there any possibility of any real and sincere attempt to correct it?

Fifty years ago, there was a production problem, which was solved by technology and mechanization. Today, the problem is one of distribution and marketing of the goods produced. The new social measures enacted by the government will alleviate to some degree the serious consequences of the present problem, but I am afraid that nothing is going to be done about its basic cause. Governments will increasingly have to face a people suffering from philosophical and spiritual depression as well as from mechanical and materialistic hysteria.

For those two reasons, people will not restrain their greed in the face of so many products of science and progress, which means that the task of our present and future leaders will be extremely difficult. Social security legislation will become more and more necessary to offset less and less adequate wages.

By the force of circumstance, governments are more and more pressed to resort to compensatory legislation, but, Mr. Speaker, I must admit that I am afraid of the effects of paternalistic government side by side with anonymous private enterprise whose ultimate aim is profit. Because technical progress is more rapid than philosophical and educational advance, it creates a dangerous chaotic state in which governments have to be extremely cautious.

The chaos created by an industry progressing at 100 miles an hour, beside an agriculture which is still going at a leisurely 20 miles, will force governments to legislate so as to balance this disproportion. I welcome the announcement in the speech from the throne of legislation tending to improve such conditions.

This gap is even more deplorable in the eastern part of Quebec, because families there mainly depend for their living on agriculture and the lumber industry. Seventy to seventy-five per cent of our young people are leaving the land to go to the city for lack of industrial jobs.

This exodus is a social evil which should be stopped at all costs by stimulating smaller industries and by promoting the development of untapped natural resources. For instance, Mr. Speaker, I want to draw the government's attention to the airport now being built in my county, near Notre Dame du Portage. The hopes of the people and local chambers of commerce in the counties of Kamouraska and Temiscouata are centred on this airport. This landing field is being built with funds voted by the last government and I hope that the present government will pass further legislation to facilitate an early completion of this project. In order to prove its usefulness and significance, I shall quote the words spoken by the hon. Leader of the Opposition at a meeting in St. Pascal during the last election campaign.

I quote:

Stating he was very optimistic about the outcome of the current campaign, Mr. St. Laurent then referred to the construction work which is about to start on the future municipal airport. After describing this project as a substantial and justified improvement for Riviere du Loup, in the field of communications, the prime minister suggested that the Trans-Canada Airlines might include Riviere du Loup as a stopping point of one of its domestic air routes. Adding that our local airport might eventually be used by chartered aircraft, Mr. St. Laurent also revealed the existence of a project to operate a helicopter service between Riviere du Loup and Manoir Richelieu for the speedy transport of travellers and tourists.

The use of this airport would greatly help the economic development of our district, as stated by the former Prime Minister himself.

There has been for some time a great deal of talk about winter shipping on the St. Lawrence, from the gulf to Quebec. This project would help relieve winter unemployment and promote the completion of a dyke in deep water in the county of my hon. friend the member for Temiscouata (Mr. J. P. St. Laurent), at Cacouna. Soundings with regard to this project have been undertaken by experts and it has been found that, because of the action of certain sea currents, the river at this point is, from natural causes, almost always free from ice. The building of the Notre Dame du Portage airfield and of this dyke in deep waters with the help of the government would be beneficial to the economy and industry of our district which is now suffering from an alarming depression.

If completed in the near future, these two projects would help us take advantage of the magnificent development on the north shore, just across the river. Our farmers would be able to dispose of their produce in a natural way, and our workers could travel more easily. Mr. Speaker, that part of Quebec which I represent in this house deserves special consideration from the present government, for this is the first time since confederation, that the constituency of Kamouraska has not been represented by a Liberal member. Having been a Liberal constituency for 90 years, the constituency of Kamouraska has now sent a new face to Ottawa. My constituents have the greatest confidence in their new member. And for that reason I would like to make out a strong case in this house for the need of generous government action with regard to those problems peculiar to my constituency and to my province.

Increased benefits have just been voted to our older citizens, to the blind, the disabled, and the veterans. Moreover, the western farmer will henceforth receive cash advances for his grain. That is all well and good and I congratulate the government, even though the balancing of the budget may suffer thereby. The speech from the throne has forecast substantial increases to the benefit of agriculture in general. The farming population of this country is looking to Ottawa and expecting with greatest confidence the implementation of support prices calculated to increase their security.

I would ask the government not to forget the farmers who produce pulpwood. There are many of them in my constituency. From one year to the next they have no idea what price they will get for their wood. Those producers must be protected by an adequate support price so that they will not remain at the mercy of powerful large companies.

Mr. Speaker, there is a great deal of speculation on the reasons for the great change brought about on June 10, 1957. In my humble opinion, if the present government is a Conservative one, it is because the people have understood that it would be more liberal in its social legislation. On the other hand, if the opposition is now made up of Liberals, it is because it was felt that the Liberals were or wished to be more conservative in intent and in action.

The recent increases voted for the benefit of our older citizens, our blind people, our disabled citizens and our veterans will be such as to bring comfort to thousands of Canadian homes. Should the government do nothing else, it would have proved its usefulness to the country.

We hear much talk in this house about Canadian unity. Unfortunately national unity is often seriously grieved in its heart and soul!

If the very few trouble-makers within both our great races in this country kept silent instead of taking advantage, for political and personal purposes, of certain prejudices as old as our country itself, national unity would fare better and there would be greater understanding between the majority of the citizens of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, one of the greatest dangers which threaten our modern civilization, possibly more than any nuclear weapon, is the licentious use being made of the great propaganda media, namely television, radio and the press, in the name of art, freedom of speech and of the press.

More and more, and for the sake of so-called freedom, the hearts and minds of our young people and even adults are being poisoned by the most disgusting publicity given to crime, and by the stirring of the basest instincts of human nature through obscene and salacious stories.

It is the duty of the government to keep watch on those propaganda media so that they will not be used for the degradation of our society. Hon. members of this house should adopt the interpretation of the supreme court of the United States as to the precise meaning of the word "obscene", so that our judges may know what to think on this point. If in the name of art and freedom we allow our growing generation to degrade itself, we are aiding and abetting the disorders that will follow as a result of the imbalance of minds and of real values caused by a propaganda which knows no restriction in the detailed exposition of crime and lust.

Mr. Speaker, I regret that the increase of family allowances does not appear in the program for this session. My constituency is part of a section of this country where, according to a recent survey, the ratio of children below fifteen to the number of families is the highest of all Canada.

If family allowances were substantially increased, especially for children of twelve to eighteen years of age, I think it would be a good way to help universities and educational institutions, without encroaching upon constitutional rights. If an allowance of $12 to $15 a month was granted to any school child up to the age of 18, what a fine subsidy to education that would be without encroaching too much upon constitutional rights, especially when we know that education is an essential condition of our economic future. I hope the government intends to increase the family allowances soon.

I urge the government to make our unemployment insurance legislation more flexible so that it may be easier for bush workers to receive unemployment benefits. The government should also revise eligibility requirements for such benefits so that our bush workers will not be forced to accept inconsistent and inhuman working conditions as happens so often.

I would feel remiss in my duty if I concluded those few remarks without supporting my hon. friends who urged the government to equip this house with a system of simultaneous translation.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, with the co-operation of all parties in this house, let us get together to give our country a distinctive Canadian flag, red and white, sealed with a maple leaf, so that every Canadian may salute that flag while singing, each in his own language, the joy, the glory and the expectations of Canada.

When all Canadians are united around the same flag the different elements which make up our beautiful and great country will love and understand one another better and join in the fulfilment of the great destinies which Providence has assigned to them.

(Text):

Mr. G. W. McLeod (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, like other members of this house I listened with a great deal of pleasure to the speeches made by the mover (Mr. Smith, Calgary South) and the seconder (Mr. Arsenault) of the motion to adopt an address in reply to the speech from the throne. I do believe that the history-making event when that speech was delivered in person by our gracious Queen imbued hon. members and the mover and the seconder with a greater sense of responsibility.

I would go further and say that every member in this house seems to be showing a greater interest in the proceedings, due possibly to the fact that the responsibility for carrying out the program in this house has been placed on his or her shoulders by Her Gracious Majesty. Then again I am satisfied that a very wise choice has been made in the selection of our Speaker and his deputy, and that instead of congratulating those two hon. members I should congratulate this house on having such personable gentlemen in control of its proceedings.

I wanted to thank the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) and the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton), but they do not happen to be in the house and I do not know whether their parliamentary assistants are present. Today in the city of Vernon a new federal building is being opened, and yesterday at about 5.30 p.m. I received an invitation from the Minister of Public Works and the Postmaster General of Canada requesting the honour of my presence at the official opening of this new building in Vernon on Friday, November 15. Now, Mr. Speaker, while I thank them for this gracious invitation, I wish, though, they might have made some provision for a magic carpet by means of which I could have taken advantage of it.

While I am in such a generous mood, Mr. Speaker, I have some further thanks to offer, and here again the hon. gentleman to whom I offer them is not in the house. I owe the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) a very heartfelt vote of thanks, and the reason I am in his debt goes back prior to June 10. On May 24 the hon. member in a stumping tour through the interior paid a visit to my riding, and it is reported that he addressed an audience of about 200 people there. At this meeting, in the usual vein of the former minister of fisheries—a vein which, I would say, goes back and is a hand-down from the days of old partisan politics—he made certain statements which may be of interest to some hon. members of this house. I should like to read a report of those statements which was carried in the Vancouver Sun on Saturday, May 25. I shall condense it considerably. The report talks about this meeting at which there was "stirring music and hard words", and speaking of the hard words it says:

These hard words, which brought an audible gasp from the crowd of more than 200, were delivered by Mr. Sinclair against the riding's sitting member, Social Crediter George W. McLeod.

Mr. Sinclair charged the member with doing nothing for his riding. He said the riding has not elected a government member in 46 years—

A pretty good choice on the part of this electorate for 46 years.

—and that of all those members who sat in opposition "the present member is the weakest, most futile member in the house today."

"He may be a good husband and father," Mr. Sinclair said angrily, "but he is a timorous, timid and weak little man who sits in the corner of parliament with the small bloc of Social Crediters."

A little farther down we find the former minister taking a rap not only at me but at other hon. members representing the interior of British Columbia.

Mr. Sinclair said the interior has a man to the north—

I am sure the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) will listen to these words.

—who "talks points of order"—

Of course that is a throwback to a debate on which I possibly agree with the former minister of fisheries.

An hon. Member: Be careful.

Mr. McLeod:

—a man to the south (Owen Jones, C.C.F. member for Okanagan Boundary) who "babbles socialism"—

Mr. Owen Jones, who is not presently in this house, is nevertheless, I will say, a man who has won the respect not only of his riding but of all hon. members here.

—and the local member who "just collects his pay".

Mr. Speaker, the one thing which amazes me is that after such a description as that I should have the nerve even to go and collect my cheque. But I will say this; that is one thing I have never missed. However, I want to pay the hon. member for Coast-Capilano my respects for having brought me a lot of very good advertising. It said in the paper that there were possibly 200 people at his meeting. My first public meeting, which followed his one week later in Vernon, was attended by close to 700 people; and those 700 people came, possibly, to see for themselves what such a weak, miserable, useless member looked like. Therefore I feel that I owe the hon. member a very great debt in respect of the free advertising he gave me during the electoral campaign.

Mr. Speaker, before I continue with that portion of my remarks which is more pertinent to the speech from the throne, may I call it one o'clock?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: My attention has been called to a printing error which appears on the cover of Routine Proceedings and Orders of the Day with respect to the hours of sitting. These hours of sitting should read: 11.00 a.m. to 1.00 p.m. and 2.30 p.m. to 6.00 p.m. instead of 2.30 p.m. to 6.00 p.m. and 8.00 p.m. to 10.00 p.m., as printed.

At one o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. McLeod: Mr. Speaker, before lunch I was dealing with certain statements which had been made by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) in my riding. During the course of these remarks I drew attention to his statement relative to my neighbour to the south, Mr. Owen L. Jones, the former member for Okanagan Boundary, and I paid a personal tribute to that gentleman. I hope my hon. friends in the C.C.F. ranks across the way did not misunderstand me and attribute those words to the hon. member for Coast-Capilano because that hon. member in speaking of Mr. Jones described him as the man "to the south who babbled socialism."

I wish now to outline some of the problems with which our part of British Columbia is confronted and I am satisfied they are of such broad proportions that they affect the whole economy of Canada in many of its phases. In the first place I would point out that one problem which is developing and causing great concern to the various municipalities in the northern part of the interior is that with respect to future water supplies. It is perhaps rather peculiar to think and talk about a shortage of water in an area where we have such an abundance of lakes and rivers; however, it is not always so easy to bring that water to those points where it will do the most good. For this reason we now have an organization looking to the future when we anticipate a much larger concentration of population at which time additional supplies of water will be required not only for domestic purposes but also for irrigation. I refer to the organization known as the North Okanagan metropolitan water board. This board is considering the whole problem of finding a suitable supply of water that can be provided to the various municipalities and will give them ample supplies on a gravity basis. Such a source is available. It is going to take a considerable amount of money to complete the exploratory engineering. I understand it will cost a minimum of $80,000.

In thinking of this project I cannot help but recall similar things that have been planned and then brought to completion under the P.F.R.A. regulations in parts of the prairie provinces. For this reason I make the plea, as I have made it yearly and perhaps more often since coming to this house, that we have some such plan of water distribution made available to the people of British Columbia. I would recommend as I have in the past that the word "prairie" be eliminated and that the name of this act with all its benefits—and I maintain that it has many benefits that can be applied to all parts of Canada—be changed to read, "National Farm Rehabilitation Act".

In our part of the interior of British Columbia we require extensions of experimental farm services. I am glad to say that during the past summer there has been some improvement. There has been some worth while extension of the services we have received and I will only continue my plea that this present government look into the program and accelerate the improvements that are being made thereunder.

Another thing about which we have heard a great deal and which has captured the imagination not only of the people of B.C. but of the whole of Canada is the development of power on the Columbia river. No part of British Columbia will benefit more directly from the development of power from that source than will my part of British Columbia and we are directly thinking, of course, of the Mica creek dam. During the past three or four years we have heard much about the problem of downstream benefits.

We had been given to understand that it was a matter of first importance to the late government and that swift action was being taken to secure a speedy settlement of the whole problem of downstream benefits on international rivers. We have not heard anything about any such action recently. In fact, questions put forward to elicit information in this respect have been casually brushed off by the present Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton) with the evasive statement that there is nothing to report. We believe this is a matter of urgency and that the economy of the interior of British Columbia and the projected advance in that economy which we are sure could be forthcoming are entirely dependent on the development of power on the Columbia river. We have looked forward with great anticipation to prompt action by the government in solving the problem of downstream benefits. In the past this was given prior consideration but now we are told that before anything can be done we must have the report of the Borden commission.

I would point out that we do not require a Borden commission to convince us of the great benefits that would accrue from the development of this project nor do we require that commission to persuade us of the need of developing it at an early date. Any delay in bringing this matter to the state where work can be proceeded with is nothing less than a blanket, and a wet blanket at that, withholding development of the whole interior of British Columbia.

As was mentioned by the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) the other day, we too have an airfield problem in practically every town in the interior, but there is a slightly different point of view from which we may look upon the development of airfields in our area. At the present time the civil defence authorities have designated the interior as a receiving centre in case of trouble or attack on the densely populated coastal areas. If these events should occur and if it becomes necessary to move the hundreds of thousands of people from the coastal areas to the interior, how is it going to be done? We do not have roadways and we receive no assistance from the federal government to provide them. In any case the coming method of quick evacuation and speedy travel is by air making better facilities imperative.

Therefore, I would suggest that this government take a new look at the matter of airfield development. Look at the future prospects of such progress, such development and travel and give the three important areas in my community every consideration. I am referring to the airfield at Ellison which, though in my riding, is maintained and kept up by the city of Kelowna. Nevertheless, this is becoming a great centre, and we hope it will be a great centre in coast-to-coast transportation if and when the Canadian Pacific Air Lines gets a charter to fly to Montreal. At the present time it is planned to make the Ellison field an important stop in the air transportation service between Vancouver and Edmonton.

The city of Vernon has a small field, but a splendid area is available to the north which has been inspected by officials of the Department of Transport and which has been pronounced to be one of the best in the interior of British Columbia. In order for the city to get appropriate rights to the land so that it can be held in reserve for airport services it is necessary that they should know the over-all national program of this government in regard to the development of civil flying in this part of the country.

We have a field in Revelstoke on which thousands of dollars have been spent locally together with grants from the federal department. In the past couple of years promises have been given that a further $10,000 or $12,000 would be granted in order to complete the runway but, for some reason or other, the powers that be have seen fit to cancel those appropriations just when it seemed we were on the threshold of receiving them.

I cannot let this opportunity pass without referring to unemployment. Here, Mr. Speaker, I must say that I stand 100 per cent behind the remarks made by the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hahn) in the house the other day. We are not talking blue ruin; we have no fear complex because we know that with proper government policies, financial and fiscal, the problems that are facing the country at the present time can be solved. All that we are asking is that the government give serious consideration to those problems as they arise. I do believe that the present Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) is doing the best within his power but I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that he is not the one who is responsible for unemployment. He is the minister who, under the unemployment insurance service and under the employment service, provides perhaps some measure of alleviation but he has nothing whatever to do with unemployment. The department of government that has more to do with unemployment is the Department of Public Works, which announces that public spending is being cut; that public buildings are being shelved in general. I maintain that in a time like this when we have unemployment the government, instead of talking retrenchment, instead of talking economy, instead of holding up the public works program, should be accelerating them and should be spending more money into circulation.

I hold in my hand the October 28 issue of the Vernon News, which contains this headline:

> Unemployment Up In City
> Doubles Over 1956

Official figures from the national employment service indicate that unemployment has more than doubled. The article goes on to say:

> Number of unemployed persons registered at the national employment service is 2.6 times higher in October this year than over the same month in 1956.

I am not quoting these figures because I am afraid, Mr. Speaker, or because I want to create a feeling of fear and pessimism, since I have every confidence in the future of British Columbia and in the economy of British Columbia, provided that the present government will take the proper steps to give it a chance to progress and to develop.

The other day we had a very clear analysis of another problem that is developing in the province of British Columbia and which will contribute to the unemployment situation. That analysis was made by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) and I should like to congratulate him on the clear and forthright manner in which the problem was presented to the house. I am going to back him up, Mr. Speaker, and ask this government, in the face of this serious threat of 800 more people being added to the rolls of the unemployed, a problem which is becoming increasingly greater across Canada, what they intend to do about it? Do they intend to sit idly by and say, we are doing everything possible? I am going to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that this is one thing that requires and demands the attention of the government before the whole unemployment problem in British Columbia is aggravated by an additional 800 men. In this respect we were shown how it would actually save this government money by subsidizing or paying the necessary amount of money to keep the mine in operation.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I should like to take you back for a few moments to the campaign which preceded the election of June 10. At that time most Canadians were beginning to feel the pinch and the effects of the tight money policy. This tight money policy, as was said in the house the other day, was hitting them where it hurt. Rightly or wrongly the people of Canada believed that the tight money policy was responsible in large measure for the increase in the cost of living. They believe it is responsible for the slow-down in municipal projects; it is responsible for higher taxes in municipal and school districts, owing to the high cost of borrowing and the high interest rates on money which they require to borrow. It is responsible for the slow-down in basic industries, especially the lumber industry in British Columbia, which has shrunk by more than 30 per cent in gross income during the past year. It has brought about difficult employment conditions and a tightening of credit that has made it impossible for the small businessman and the small farmer to secure the necessary funds to carry on.

All opposition parties, including the great Conservative party, played this up during the last campaign but none of us gave it more attention than did the Conservatives. I am going to tell you, Mr. Speaker, that the Conservatives made pledges which will never be forgotten. They said that if they were returned and placed in office they would take immediate steps to alleviate the tight money situation. The people of Canada have not forgotten that pledge.

I would like to ask you, Mr. Speaker, what has this government actually done? Minister after minister has risen in his place and said that the government has taken all necessary steps but I should like them to name one thing that this government has done as a government. It is true that there has been a lowering of the interest rate, but was that the result of government action? Or was it the natural action of the Bank of Canada? This is something I should like to hear explained. The Conservative party now in power condemned the Bank of Canada just as loudly as the rest of us and also condemned the previous government for allowing themselves to be placed in a position where they were dominated by the Bank of Canada.

But again I ask, what is the change? I should like to have seen, and I think the people of Canada would like to have seen, some action by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) and the government whereby they would stand up to the Bank of Canada and say: Here is government policy, and this is what we want to see made effective in Canada. Instead, what do we learn? We learn that there is no difference of opinion between the Minister of Finance and the governor of the Bank of Canada.

Another trump card of the Conservative party during the campaign was the question of the supremacy of parliament. Far too many promises were made, promises which the government is finding it quite hard to live up to. They promised that the tight money policy would be alleviated at once. They promised that the supremacy of parliament would be restored and that the rights of members would be protected. I am just going to refer briefly to what I think about the whole question of the supremacy of parliament. I make the broad statement that never in my experience has there been so much flouting of the rights of private members as there has been during the past month. I have never seen such evasion on the part of ministers and very seldom have I seen a prime minister go out and make speeches on policy and proposed policy of the government before presenting such policies to parliament, which should be first to learn of all matters of legislation.

I see that my time is growing short, Mr. Speaker. I should have liked to go considerably further in discussing the matter of parliamentary supremacy because I know there is much that could be said. However, I shall analyse the situation a little further. What were the people looking for when they voted as they did on June 10? I maintain that the electors of Canada were looking for an alternative. What did they get? What alternative has the government offered in any policy they are considering at the present time? I simply ask that question, and I know that the people of Canada are asking that question, too.

In what way are the policies of the present government different from the policies of the government which the people of Canada rejected in the hope of finding an alternative? I could go on and elaborate but I will simply take a couple of items that are or have been on the order paper. I am very glad to see that there is a resolution extending assistance to the agriculturists of Canada. I think everyone knows that legislation in that respect is long overdue and is one of the most important things required in this country. But what about the price support program? In what way is it an alternative to the program which the Liberals have had for a good many years? The government says that it is going to be enlarged and broadened, but the same policies are going to be in effect. Is that an alternative? Is it anything different from what was offered before?

Reference can be made to the legislation passed by the house dealing with welfare. Is it an alternative? Is there any different approach? I say to hon. members that it is the same approach. We are not satisfied with the alternative for which the people of Canada voted and what they hoped to get last June 10. We also read about trade. I was greatly encouraged by statements of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) that commonwealth and British trade were going to be increased. There was a lot of talk about it. I like many other Canadians looked hopefully to the government. What happened? The minute that Britain said to Canada, all right, Canada, if you want to trade with Britain we are prepared to go the whole way and give you every opportunity to trade with us. What happened? Immediately the government started back-pedalling. In effect they said to the people of Canada, and to England, we did not mean all this about trade with Britain; we were just talking so do not take it too seriously. That is the way that the people of Canada size up the situation.

I find, Mr. Speaker, that I have only one minute left. I have an announcement that I should like to make. Today we shall be taking the main vote on the motion before us and I should like to read to the house a statement endorsed by the Social Credit members.

In regard to our stand on the main motion the leader of this group pointed out that in order to solve our economic problems it will be necessary to bring about certain reforms in the existing financial system. We moved an amendment to that effect which was defeated. We are still of the same opinion. However, we believe that the government should be given an opportunity to show what it can do in dealing with the problems of the nation as outlined in the speech from the throne. We will therefore, Mr. Speaker, support the main motion when the vote comes later today.

Mr. J. R. Taylor (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, it is with humility that I rise in my place for the first time in this distinguished house to continue the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. You will recall, sir, that the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) honoured a westerner to move the address in reply to the speech from the throne. He delivered a most fitting address and referred, as was natural, to his illustrious father who passed away some time ago. Later in the debate my colleague, the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Maloney), spoke about his father who likewise served so well in the house but who did not live to see his son honoured in this parliament.

Fortunately, my father is living and has been observing his son carry on his parliamentary duties. While in Ottawa dad was interviewed on television about his hockey career and I gave him moral support. Today he is in my rooting section and I feel he will get as great a thrill out of these proceedings as he ever got out of the alleged back-handed goal scored over 40 years ago in this very city.

There is another person whom I should like to see in the gallery of the house. I refer to the mother of the Prime Minister. It is my understanding, sir, that she is the only mother in Canadian history who ever saw her son become prime minister of this country. Perhaps in the near future she can be present to see her famous son lead the government.

I appreciate this honour and opportunity of speaking in this august chamber and the privilege of representing the constituency of Vancouver-Burrard. I think it is the usual custom to offer congratulations to you, Mr. Speaker, upon your appointment to high office. I did not know until the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith) pointed it out that you were born in Red Deer, Alberta. Long before I came to know the name of Roland Michener, I knew well Michener hill which is on the outskirts of Red Deer. The hill is as prominent to the citizens of Red Deer as Mr. Speaker will be to this house. In congratulating you, sir, I should like to congratulate others. When I think of the physical disabilities of the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod and of how he has overcome them, which was obvious during the opening of parliament, I must say that he deserves special commendation.

I will never forget the opening of parliament in October, 1957 as the majesty of it all unfolded itself before our very eyes. I am sure that when I get back to Vancouver many of my constituents will want my personal observations on the activities in the house. My report, sir, will be in most glowing terms. I personally appreciate the fact that the Prime Minister took time to refer in such a fitting way to the late Dr. Blair who died a few days after the recent election. His remarks were followed by those of the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. St. Laurent) and in turn by those of other hon. members. This served notice upon the newcomers that if you serve well in this house, all will remember you in such a nice manner.

I was glad to see the Prime Minister pay personal tribute to another member, namely the hon. member for Algoma East (Mr. Pearson) upon his winning the Nobel peace prize. You will recall, sir, that the Prime Minister crossed the floor of the house, shook hands first with the Leader of the Opposition and then turned to his left and shook hands vigorously with the hon. member for Algoma East. That is what newcomers wanted to see, namely a great leader paying tribute in such a nice manner for work well done. Sometimes I think that the Prime Minister has a heart bigger than himself. Probably it is because of that that the nation decided to "follow John" in the last election.

I want to report to my constituents about the fitting and kind remarks made by my Prime Minister concerning the retirement as leader of the hon. member for Quebec East. My constituents have great respect for the Leader of the Opposition. I have always looked forward to hearing him speak. His decorum and deportment set a mark for us all to attain. We Canadians have been so fortunate in having leaders like the Prime Minister and the Leader of the Opposition. While I am not of the same political faith as the latter, I have always joined in the thunderous applause that attends his appearance at meetings of the Canadian Bar Association and other such meetings.

Before commenting on the speech from the throne, may I also refer to my predecessor, Dr. MacDougall, who represented my constituency of Vancouver-Burrard and who passed away in this house prior to the last election. I never knew him personally but everywhere

I go in this house people who knew him have a kind word for him. If I can be remembered as he was I shall feel that my service here in this house was not in vain.

Before the election I received from one of my constituents a poem which reads as follows:

To "follow John" I'm not content
Until I find which way he went.

After the election there was a further poem:

Now having boldly followed John
And made our wishes clear,
This is the thought we dwell upon—
Where do we go from here?

Upon reading the speech from the throne, the nation knows which way John went and which way he goes from here. Members of the opposition say that he has not kept faith with the electorate. I suggest, sir, that the Prime Minister has kept faith. Undoubtedly the opposition policy this session will be "irritation without challenge".

I should like to refer to an article written in the Vancouver Sun by Mr. Elmore Philpott, a Liberal, who in the last parliament sat but a few seats from mine. Mr. Philpott wrote:

The 1957 speech from the throne is an historic document for several reasons. But the one which means most to the people of Canada is that the Conservatives have spectacularly kept their main election promises.

Prime Minister Diefenbaker has not only itemized the main points on which he was morally bound to take action at this session, but he also outlined intended action in several other matters which might well have been postponed for the future without giving justification for this cry of bad faith.

The whole country, regardless of party preference, should be delighted to see this proof that the old party of Sir John A. Macdonald has thus demonstrated that its official title of "Progressive" Conservatives has taken on new meaning for the whole Canadian nation.

Mr. Frank Bernard, a member of the Vancouver board of trade and, I suggest, a man who represents the feeling of most British Columbia businessmen, is delighted that the Prime Minister has seen fit to strike a royal commission to inquire into important industrial matters relating to power. The appointment of Mr. Leon Ladner of British Columbia, lawyer and industrialist, is most appropriate.

Senior citizens in my riding, like Mrs. Emilie Campbell, welcome the relief in higher old age pensions.

Citizens throughout my riding will be gratified that action is to be taken concerning power on the Columbia river.

The speech from the throne had hardly been concluded before the Prime Minister added two new planks to his sessional legislative program. One dealt with federal subsidies on shipments of maritime coal destined for power generation on the east coast. The aim was cheaper power to attract industry to that area. The other was abolition of the debate-limiting Commons closure rule; and tomorrow the Prime Minister will add further planks to his program. As one rookie M. P. jokingly said to me: "Brother, watch John; you ain't seen nothin' yet!".

Many of the problems which exist in my constituency are common to all. Many of the hon. members who have spoken have made reference to them and I do not intend to repeat what they have said. However, I wish to add a comment about reforms in the immigration set-up. I feel that there is a need to review and amend the act, the regulations and the administration thereof. Time does not allow me to discuss all the suggestions I have in mind but may I suggest one. Immigration appeals should be heard by an immigration appeal board, and not by the minister. For a generation now persons having immigration problems have approached the immigration minister. Often these people are represented by members of this house, and far too often the cases in the past were disposed of after some informal and injudicious hearing, tinged often with partisan feelings.

If a proper administrative set-up is provided for the hearing of immigration cases, no member would again find himself importuned to interpose in administrative rulings. An applicant for admission should be able to test his admissibility under a proper administration set-up. If he does not qualify he is excluded; if he does qualify he is to be admitted. If then, there are persons who have been excluded but whose cases involve unusual and compelling circumstances a private bill should be applied for. In applying for a private bill all members of the house would know who was applying and what were the special circumstances. Open and fair hearings together with publication of immigration decisions would revolutionize the present set-up.

Before leaving this subject may I suggest that careful consideration be given to the many recommendations passed by the Canadian Bar Association dealing with immigration practices and procedures. Much praise is due to John McDonald, an Ottawa lawyer, who worked tirelessly to bring about these recommendations. He championed a cause which he conscientiously felt was right and it is to be hoped that it will not be long before the suggestions of his committee will be incorporated into the immigration laws of this country.

The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) is considering many problems relating to television. I feel that we have a unique situation in Vancouver; the government has granted one television outlet in this area of over one-half million people. If you do not want to watch this station, then the alternative stations are all United States stations. Within television range are five United States channels or stations which send out splendid programs to the large audience in my area. The learned Mr. Fowler felt that there was a danger of Canadians becoming engulfed by United States television. We in Vancouver were engulfed long ago and the situation at this time, I suggest, could hardly be worse. To partially correct the situation in my area I would suggest that additional Canadian private stations be permitted to operate at the earliest possible date.

The financial statement of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for the year ending March 1957 is a story of deficit and debt. The fact that a government agency fails to show a profit should not evoke surprise; other government departments and agencies cost the public large sums of money. It costs money to run the armed forces, the police force, the customs and postal departments; the only difference is that these undertakings come under the heading of public utilities whereas broadcasting, like newspaper publishing, is quite able to subsist, and subsist usefully, under a system of private enterprise with no drain on the public treasury.

I suggest that wherever private enterprise can do the job and do it well the government should not be in that field. I personally like the C.B.C. station in Vancouver; there is much to commend it, but when I realize that under private enterprise I would get pretty well the same, if not better programs at no expense whatsoever, to me, then I have serious misgivings about the continuing interference of the government in this field.

I believe there is a useful function to be performed by a publicly-owned broadcasting system in assisting such things as educational programs. The government can also assist with respect to the broadcasting of serious music and the drama which has an appeal, admittedly, too limited to justify broadcasting commercially. However, none of these functions require the operation of a broadcasting machine running several radio and television networks, with 30 of its own stations, and employing 6,000 people at a cost to the country of nearly $40 million per year.

Then there is another matter which I would like to mention. The last links in the trans-Canada highway between Golden, British Columbia and Banff are being built and the highway through the mountainous territory is expected to be completed next fall. I suggest that real assistance be given to the provinces in the establishment of all kinds of tourist facilities including outdoor camping grounds, certainly in this area, and probably coast to coast on the trans-Canada highway.

Investment by the senior government in this field is investment in something which is definitely Canadian. There is no danger of engulfment here as there is in television; there is no danger of competition. Investment here will, I suggest, bring far greater rewards than in the field of television. Investment in our parks, the finest in the world, will bring about lasting rewards. Public investment in television will, in my opinion, not attain that end.

Having referred to the national highways and to the question of tourists, may I suggest that the federal government give consideration to classifying the tourist trade as an industry so that operators may borrow from the industrial development bank. On the one hand the tourist trade is acknowledged as the third largest industry in Canada but, on the other hand, no adequate recognition is given so that resort operators can borrow from approved sources. Because the tourist dollar is so important to Canada all possible assistance should be given to the resort and hotel operators.

Now may I refer to one thing which has upset the friendliness and amiability of the house. I refer to the bitter address of the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier). I was sorry to hear his speech about alleged racial and religious differences. He accused the party of Sir John A. Macdonald of all sorts of things. To a westerner this is upsetting and I feel that I can speak for all newcomers in the house in hoping that such bitterness will not be continued.

If I was disheartened by what the hon. member for Laurier said I was delighted by the activity of another French Canadian. A few Saturdays ago my wife and I went to Montreal where we saw the hockey game between Chicago and Montreal. We saw Maurice "the Rocket" Richard, score his 500th goal in a blaze of glory.

An hon. Member: You were lucky.

Mr. Taylor: We rose with the 15,000 people, French and English Canadians, to cheer the wonderful Rocket. There was no disunity there. Nor was there throughout the sporting fraternity of the nation on that night.

Everyone loves to visit the grand province of Quebec; it has a charm all its own and the friendliness of its people adds a cubit to Canada's stature. What French and English have in common as Canadians is far more than the differences which divide them. With so much to be done, let us get on with the job and forget our minor differences.

In conclusion I would like to remind hon. members that engraved in stone over the main door of this building are the words:

> The wholesome sea is at her gates;
> Her gates both east and west.

Keep your eyes, Mr. Speaker, on the western gates. There is in that area the fastest industrial growth in all Canada. In the past 15 years the population of British Columbia has grown 71 per cent, compared with a national average of 35 per cent and business has been keeping pace with that expansion.

Mr. Speaker, October and November of 1957 have been thrilling months for me. I saw Her Majesty open Canada's parliament for the first time; I made my first appearance in the Supreme Court of Canada, and I have made my first speech in the house. I will always be grateful to the people of Vancouver-Burrard for making all this possible.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we are all very grateful to Her Majesty the Queen for having come to Canada to take part in the opening proceedings of this session of parliament by reading in person the address which is now under debate.

I should like, in accordance with custom and because of my long relationship with him, to extend to Mr. Speaker, as other hon. members have done, my sincere congratulations upon his having been selected by all hon. members of this house to act as their Speaker. When the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) proposed Mr. Speaker's name to hon. members he referred to the reply which the Times newspaper made to Lord Palmerston who had inquired what were the necessary qualities of a person who was to occupy the chair as Speaker at Westminster. The Times replied: "Imperturbability, good temper, tact, urbanity, and, if possible, a training in the law." I think we have all recognized after four weeks that the Speaker has other qualities, too, and that pre-eminent among these is the quality of fairness and impartiality.

I should like to offer my congratulations also to the hon. member for Calgary South (Mr. Smith) for his excellent maiden speech when he proposed the motion that is before us. Those of us who were members here at the same time as his father could not help but feel that he not only did honour to himself but to his father's name. It must have been a matter of deep satisfaction to his mother who sat in the gallery that day to realize that her son had begun his public life, in this house, under such happy and successful circumstances.

(Translation):

To the hon. member for Bonaventure I also offer my sincere congratulations, not for what he said but rather for the ease with which he said it.

(Text):

Today I propose to deal with certain observations made last night by the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). I will not attempt to cover all he said, because he did traverse quite a wide field. I want to deal mainly with that portion of his speech which took up least time to say but which, I should have thought, would have comprised the major portion of his contribution to our deliberations. I refer to the proposals made by the Prime Minister and those of Her Majesty's government in the United Kingdom in the matter of trading relations between these two nations. But the hon. gentleman in that careful, moderate manner of his, began by saying that the problems of the government were considerable, largely because of the inheritance from the administration directed by the right hon. gentleman who now leads the opposition. And he listed these inheritances in detail.

I will simply say by way of reply that no government, certainly in this day of complex arrangements, can hope to be free of important problems of a domestic and international character covering all aspects of the life of the nation or of the world. No manipulation of words by the Minister of Finance can alter the fact that when the present government took office late in June it did so as the government of a country whose prosperity was never higher, whose prospects were never brighter, whose prestige was never so great among the nations of the world. And so, if in the meantime, certain economic disquietudes have arisen, no one with a sense of fairness will argue that this administration, in office for five months, is responsible for this particular uneasiness in its entirety. But I think we have the right, and indeed, the duty, just as did the Prime Minister when he sat on this side of the house, to charge the government in relation to the disturbing situation now confronting us. No amount of palliation will or can overlook the fact that at the present time whatever may be the cause there are disturbing economic factors—how fundamental I do not know—which affect the material well-being of many hundreds of thousands of people in our country.

In agriculture, low prices; in our industrial life, much unemployment; these are factors which not only the government but all of us have to consider, and it is therefore of the greatest importance that we should give serious consideration to an analysis of the policies of the government in respect of a matter which fundamentally, has occasioned much uncertainty and which in the course of the next few months could have a definite bearing on the economic progress of Canada and a great effect on the level of employment in our country. So many people in their economic lives are affected by the policies of any government in the matter of its trading relations with other countries.

This government has made much of its trading policies. Indeed, during the course of the election and long before in this house the Minister of Finance in particular spoke of the desirability of promoting a greater measure of commonwealth trade as a means of stimulating the lifeblood of our economy. Last night, looking toward those of us who sit on your left, Mr. Speaker, he said: "The fact is that hon. gentlemen opposite do not like the commonwealth." I venture to suggest to my hon. friend, my classmate whom I have known longer perhaps than anyone in this house that a common appreciation of the great purposes of the commonwealth of nations is not promoted in this country by alternately blowing hot and cold in the matter of closer relations between this country and the commonwealth in the economic or other spheres. By its brusque and belittling reaction to a serious proposal put forward by the United Kingdom, this government I submit with respect, has done a grave injury to the commonwealth.

It has shown it is willing to exploit the kindly sentiments most Canadians feel for the United Kingdom and for other commonwealth countries like Ceylon, India and Pakistan, let alone the countries of Australasia but unwilling nevertheless to take the most elementary steps towards giving practical expression to those sentiments when an element of political risk to itself or financial injury to some of its supporters appears.

Now, the Prime Minister said during the recent election that one of his aims would be the holding of a commonwealth economic and trade conference. And because of arrangements made by the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. St. Laurent) the present Prime Minister shortly after the election with the good will of all Canadians went to Great Britain for the purpose of participating at his first conference of prime ministers of the commonwealth.

If we can gather an accurate impression from the press both in the United Kingdom and Canada his presence and vigourous approach in this particular matter seems to have captivated public attention in the United Kingdom, but one of the most amazing things it seems to me is that a careful perusal of the communique issued after the prime ministers conference makes no reference whatsoever to a proposal by the Prime Minister of Canada for an economic and trade conference with the commonwealth countries. Could it be that the prime minister of Australia, the prime minister of Great Britain, the prime ministers of Ceylon and of Pakistan and India wanted to make sure what kind of conference it was going to be? Perhaps they bore in mind the words of Sir Robert Borden that there is nothing wrong with a conference except that conferences seldom produce good results unless the parties conferring each know what they want to achieve and there is some measure of agreement in advance on the objective. I think that is a very important consideration particularly for Canada at the present time.

What is the position of other countries vis-a-vis Canada? We were reminded the other day by Mr. Macmillan in the statement he made at the Guild Hall that what Britain wanted was capital assistance. Likewise those of us who have had any experience in government know—as I am sure is the case with the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) and the Minister without Portfolio from Newfoundland (Mr. Browne) who has just returned from Asia—that the great need of the Asian members of the commonwealth is for capital assistance, capital aid in carrying out their projects. Are we going to be able to meet that objective when this conference takes place? Are we going to be able to offer to these countries the kind of assistance which in so far as they are concerned is the motive, the reason, the raison d'être, for an economic trade conference with commonwealth countries?

We all remember there was another conference held in this very chamber in 1932, the imperial economic conference convened at the suggestion of the then prime minister of Canada, the late Lord Bennett. With regard to that particular conference it is debatable even now whether it contributed much to the unity of the commonwealth itself and there is little doubt as to whether it did not contribute to a deterioration in the relations between many nations of the world. But it can be said for the late Lord Bennett that when he invited other governments to a conference he had something for them to confer about.

It would be extremely interesting to know whether or not before he went to the prime ministers conference the Prime Minister of Canada had forewarned the commonwealth countries in the usual and customary diplomatic way of the kind of proposal which he intended to put forward at that conference. There could be no objection, indeed there is everything to be gained by commonwealth statesmen meeting from time to time to discuss common problems, political, economic and international, but a conference called for a special purpose, particularly an economic purpose, presupposes care in preparation and a serious amount of consideration as to the likely outcome unless danger and damage are to be caused instead of resulting in some constructive situation.

It is a simple fact that in our free economic system there are only a few things that governments can do to change the normal course of trade. One is to put up barriers against imports whether by means of tariffs or otherwise. Another is to take down such barriers as already exist. Mr. Bennett in 1932 had a definite plan and part of that plan was to put up barriers against imports from non-empire sources. That was a definite objective; but what is the objective of the present government in this particular?

The Prime Minister of Canada returned to this country after the prime ministers conference and the first thing he did was to go and meet the journalists and newspapermen who are in this building, serving this nation with distinction. During the course of his conference with them he said that he was prepared to make a proposal which would have a great bearing on our economic relationships both with the United States and with Great Britain. He would shift 15 per cent of Canadian purchases in the United States to the United Kingdom. We have since estimated, of course, that the total of this shift would come to at least $625 million but this was not indicated by the Prime Minister at that time. However, what I think is most amazing is that the proposal should have been made, not in the United Kingdom, not at the prime ministers conference where as far as our Prime Minister was concerned the dominant theme was commonwealth trade but outside of that conference in Canada immediately after his return from the United Kingdom.

That raises, I think, legitimate doubt as to the circumstances of the birth of that particular idea. Was it the result of careful planning and consideration? Was it the result of preparatory work that had been done by the Prime Minister's economic and trade advisors? Or was it just an idea that suddenly came to him, one that had the quality of the spectacular, one that would fit in with his enthusiasm, understandable as it was, at the moment? Was it, as has been suggested, a reckless idea; or was it one that had been carefully considered?

One has reason to doubt whether the suggestion really deserves the designation of "proposal" for not once during the course of the present session of parliament has any hon. member sitting on the treasury benches made any reference to this proposal except that made last night by the Minister of Finance who simply said, "Give us time".

He did not say how long. "Give us time and we will provide for a shift in Canadian purchases from the United States to Great Britain".

That was the only mention of this proposal made by any member of the treasury since this session began. We believe from the communique that flowed from the conference in Washington, when Canadian and United States ministers conferred, that the proposal, or the idea of a shift in Canadian purchases, was really something not to be taken too seriously; it was something in the very long term, in any event. Because of this assurance, apparently, United States cabinet ministers were able to say with satisfaction, understandable satisfaction, "Well, if this shift is not really going to take place for a long time we have no hesitation in giving you assurances on some points of concern to Canada".

But long before the Washington conference what had happened? Her Majesty's government in the United Kingdom had taken this matter seriously. They knew that a proposal such as that which the Prime Minister had in mind was one that could not be implemented under the terms of the general agreement on tariffs and trade. And so the British government came forward with a formal proposal in Ottawa, through the chancellor of the exchequer, after the conference at Mont Tremblant.

We have the assurance of the Minister of Finance in that very exhaustive report he gave us two or three weeks ago about these various conferences, when he said that the first formal presentation of the British free trade proposal was given some time during the visit of the chancellor of the exchequer to Ottawa after the conference at Mont Tremblant; but he did not deny that on September 10 the minister of agriculture, Mr. Amory, had discussed the British proposal with him. We do know that Sir David Eccles, the president of the board of trade, was in Washington and had discussions with officials of the government of Canada about this very matter.

The Prime Minister has denied that when the president of the board of trade was at the United Nations, on the occasion of the Prime Minister's visit, there was any discussion between them with regard to Britain's free trade proposal. Well, Mr. Speaker, one must accept and one readily accepts the word of the Prime Minister; but nevertheless no member of the government can seriously take the position that the first real intimation of this very important proposal, perhaps the most important proposal ever made by one commonwealth government to another in the matter of trade, had not been brought to the attention of this administration long before that eventful evening within the luxurious surroundings of Mont Tremblant.

Then we are told by the Minister of Finance in a speech he made in New York that the assurances which he had been given by his counterparts in the government of the United States were not fully satisfactory and so we have this change of position. At one moment they are satisfied with their talks at Washington and a few weeks later the expression in New York, with these ministers absent, by the Minister of Finance is that after all the assurances were not as satisfactory as he would have liked. Apparently our ministers were treated in Washington by the Americans seemingly just as my hon. friend had treated the British at Mont Tremblant, because, if this proposal had been brought to the attention of the administration on September 10, as he admits it was, it deserved serious study and consideration.

How was it treated? Well, we really do not know because the Minister of Finance is reported as merely having said that it was laden with difficulties; there was no sympathetic consideration even offered or suggested. We do not know yet, therefore, what this British proposal was in detail; but obviously the Minister of Finance himself does know because he spoke of it at least at Mont Tremblant. We do know what it was in broad outline. It was a proposal to lower the barriers of trade and, as I have said, there are only two ways in free countries to influence the course of trade. One is to lower barriers and the other is to raise them. As parties to the general agreement on tariffs and trade both the British and ourselves are pretty well stopped from raising new barriers against non-commonwealth countries.

Now, surely, it was open to, and it was the duty of a government that speaks so feverishly of its love for the commonwealth to the point of trying to create division to see that that proposal, having in mind all of its implications, would receive friendly attention and not downright dismissal. It is certainly a proposal that would have been accepted by Sir John A. Macdonald. It is a proposal that would give free entry to the British market of all products in Canada, including automobiles. It would have meant free entry on a preferred basis because British restrictions against the United States, our principal competitors, would remain unchanged. In the trading situation which is now developing it would have meant more; for Britain is about to obtain free entry to all the markets of western Europe, France, Germany, Italy, the low countries, Scandinavia. Our metals and forest products, our wheat, which is now going to Britain in substantial quantities, would be sold in larger quantities to their flour mills and their factories to increase their production in order to sell more of their products on the European market. It would mean that Canada would get entry into the European free-trade area. In any event, it is a proposal put forward by a friendly government, and it should have received the kind of treatment which it deserved, particularly having in mind the provocation for that proposal, namely the suggestion made by the Prime Minister of Canada in the press gallery to Canadian newspapermen after the prime ministers' conference.

I would like to make this observation in passing, Mr. Speaker. We asked the Minister of Finance to give us some details of the proposal of the Canadian Prime Minister with regard to this shifting of purchases from one friendly country to another. I asked him to table the proposal of Her Majesty's government in the United Kingdom and his reply was that no one should know better than the interrogator, myself, how improper it would be for a minister of the crown to table such a document. That recalls the words of the Minister of Finance when he sat on this side of the house. He criticized my leader, then the prime minister, about the kind of position we were going to take at a prime ministers' conference in London several years ago. Here is what the Minister of Finance said:

> If parliamentary institutions enjoyed here in Ottawa the health that they ought to enjoy, no Canadian prime minister would go to an important commonwealth conference without having first invited a discussion in parliament on the position that he was going to take on behalf of his country in the deliberations of that conference.

This is what he said on the eve of the Mont Tremblant conference:

> For a number of reasons the arguments to be advanced by the Canadian government in favour of a commonwealth trade and economic conference were on the secret list and would remain so.

If my hon. friend's words had validity when he was in opposition, Mr. Speaker, surely those words afford justification for my asking him to give us more precise information about the proposal of his own

Prime Minister as well as the proposal made by Her Majesty's government in the United Kingdom.

But what about this proposal of the Prime Minister? Is it a practical thing? Is it desirable? Is it not something that should be debated in the house? The Prime Minister is the author of it. He spoke early in this debate. He made no reference whatsoever to his proposal or, for that matter, to any aspect of our trading relations with any friendly or other country.

Let us examine this proposal to shift purchases from the United States to another friendly country, in this case the United Kingdom. We all respect the judgment of a former distinguished public servant of Canada, the former assistant deputy minister of finance, now head of the department of economics at the University of British Columbia. Here is what Professor John Deutsch had to say about this idea of shifting from one traditional or well-established trading channel to another:

> We want prosperity but we fear the American trade on which it's based. We can't have it both ways. We can either develop our country ourselves and accept a lower rate of growth and prosperity or else we must do business with the United States.

This proposal for a shift means taking business away from our best customer. We do not want to take business away from our best customer. We want to increase trade with Great Britain. There is no one in the house or in the country who does not want to do that. Our objective should be to sell as much as we can to the United States in return for which there must be purchases and at the same time to build up our total volume of trade with all commonwealth and other countries.

But we talk about unemployment. I live in a city where there are now over 14,000 men out of work. English automobiles can come into Canada free of duty. Canadian automobiles cannot now enter Great Britain free of duty. I do not say that this is a fully acceptable proposal but I say it is one which on its very face deserves careful examination. I do not believe that we are contributing to the economic strength of this nation by disturbing, on the basis of ill-considered consideration, important trading relations that amount to almost $4 billion in their totality.

I do not believe that we should overlook the statement of the president of the board of trade made the other day in the United Kingdom that he had grave doubts that it would be possible in the foreseeable future for Great Britain, in the face of great demands made on her by European countries, to sell goods to Canada in the amount suggested by this 15 per cent shift. But let us look at the future. We hope to build in this country a growing nation giving added economic strength and well-being to our people, and one of the ways by which we are going to do that is not only to improve the domestic but also to improve the external market. And the United States is a very important market, no matter what anyone, for sentimental or other reasons, may think, as was stated the other day by the chancellor of the exchequer himself.

In 1956 our exports of goods and services to the United States amounted to nearly two-thirds of our total exports. While there will be fluctuations from time to time, it seems probable that over the long pull the United States will continue to require increasing quantities of our principal exports to that country—newsprint, lumber, nickel, copper, lead, zinc, aluminum, iron ore, asbestos, gypsum and in the future we hope large quantities of oil and gas. These are the materials in which the United States sooner or later will be deficient and which we will have in abundance.

It seems likely, therefore, that not only will our exports to the United States increase considerably in absolute terms but that such exports may account for as much as 70 per cent or three-quarters of the total exports of this country in the years to come. The probability that our exports to the United States will increase is one of the important reasons why we can be optimistic about our long-term future prospects. Our access to the United States market, even though it is largely restricted to the export of raw materials and semi-processed goods, is the envy, as Prime Minister Menzies said, of most nations in the world.

We should remember that the considerable volume of Canadian exports to the United States is one of the great strengths in the Canadian economy and an important reason for our optimism about the long-term future. It seems to me that we should do nothing that would disturb this. That objective is not inconsistent with the broad intentions apparently in the minds of those who are charged with responsibility at the present time in the United Kingdom.

The Prime Minister is one of those who strongly supported my colleague, the hon. member for Algoma East (Mr. Pearson), in his efforts to incorporate into the North Atlantic Treaty Organization article II, by which we sought to supplement military co-operation by economic co-operation among those countries who were the original signatories to the North Atlantic Treaty Organization itself. It seems to me that the policy of the government revealed by its negative attitude to the British proposal, by the reckless manner in which it has made its own proposals, indicates that the government is not acting in a manner consistent with the declared purposes of the Prime Minister several years ago as to the great value of economic as well as political co-operation among the free nations of the world who are members of the defensive alliance which was established as the result of an effort to try to resist aggression from any quarter.

If my hon. friends are sincere about commonwealth trade why did the Prime Minister of this country, when Mr. Macmillan came to Ottawa, not take advantage of that opportunity at least to outline to him for the first time the nature of his own proposal for a 15 per cent shift? I asked the Prime Minister on Friday, the day Prime Minister Macmillian arrived, whether he would take advantage of Mr. Macmillan's presence in Ottawa over Friday night and Saturday to discuss further the details about the United Kingdom proposal for free trade and his own proposal for a 15 per cent shift. This was the reply of the man who speaks feverishly and sometimes almost with excessive emotion about what he is going to do for the commonwealth: "I will if there is time."

On the Monday after this visit, when the Prime Minister had conferred with the British prime minister, discussing, I know, very important matters which arose out of the discussions between the President of the United States and the prime minister of Great Britain, I asked the Prime Minister if he had taken advantage of the opportunity of the visit in Ottawa of the British prime minister to discuss with the latter his important proposal of a 15 per cent shift and the proposal put forward by Her Majesty's chancellor of the exchequer for a free trade area between Canada and the United Kingdom. This Prime Minister who, as I say, regards himself as a champion of commonwealth unity and is regarded as such now by a great section of the press in the United Kingdom, made the categorical answer to me: no.

Mr. Speaker, I believe that we have to accept the observations made a few moments ago by the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke (Mr. McLeod) that there are reasons for believing that political considerations had something to do with the claims made by hon. gentlemen opposite during the election campaign and with the statements they are now making about ways and means of improving our trade position with the United Kingdom and with other commonwealth countries. Let no one say that from my remarks it can be construed that we are not desirous of seeing trade promoted between this country and other commonwealth countries. We recognize the need for a political community of interest and in this very difficult period we must acknowledge the need for an economic community of interest. But it is one thing to make a boast of intention and it is something else to give proper indication as to how that intention best can be fulfilled. I submit that, good as it may be and enjoyable as I am sure it will be, the delegation of 50 Canadian businessmen headed by my genial friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce is not going to bring about a revolution in the trade between the United Kingdom and this country.

By the way, in passing I should like to inquire why the automobile industry, one of the important sections of the industrial life of this community, is not represented in that delegation. The minister may have a good reason and I hope that at some time before he leaves for the United Kingdom he will tell us about this. But the house will recall that I asked him on several occasions whether he was going to the United Kingdom with this delegation and, if he went, whether he would discuss trade matters with his opposite numbers. While I do not remember the exact words he used, Hansard will bear me out when I say that his reply was to this effect, "Well, that would depend upon instructions I receive from my Prime Minister". Mr. Speaker, one of the reasons why this government is floundering is that it is a do-it-yourself government. It is a government made up of a group of well-meaning individuals headed by a Prime Minister whose confidence in himself is such that he believes that he alone can make government pronouncements and that he alone can bring this nation back to economic safety and normalcy.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order. It is my understanding that the hon. member who is speaking has used more than 40 minutes.

Some hon. Members: No.

An hon. Member: Learn your rules.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There is only one Speaker in this house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If I have done so, the Speaker will call my attention to the matter.

My final observation is this. The Prime Minister will be leaving in a short time to take part in important deliberations at NATO when the heads of the governments of all the free countries of NATO will gather for the purpose of further collaboration. He will find there, as he now knows, that that organization, contributed to so largely by my leader and by the hon. member for Algoma East (Mr. Pearson), is one that is playing a major part in the easing of international tension and is providing the west with security against the soviet union. He will find there that if nothing else was ever done by the administration which he has opposed so vigorously, the contribution made by the present Leader of the Opposition in the suggestion, along with others, for the establishment of NATO represents a contribution which justifies every Canadian, regardless of party, in saying at this time that Canada, in the middle of the twentieth century, through its government of the day, made a vital contribution to the peace of the world.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speech just delivered by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) and I listened the other day with equal interest to a speech of the same length delivered by the hon. member for Algoma East (Mr. Pearson). I take it that the speech in each case was at least to some extent a pitch or a bid for the leadership of the Liberal party at their coming national convention. I am sure that anyone who heard both speeches, and who knew nothing else about the two hon. gentlemen, would have the greatest difficulty in deciding which one to support. Anyone listening to those two speeches would have even greater difficulty I am sure, in attempting to ascertain the trade policy if any, of the Liberal party at this time. Both speeches dealt with trade. We heard from them for a total of 80 minutes. While they suggested that the government's trade policy was not what it should be and that the government at times had made statements that were rather reckless and inopportune, one certainly could not criticize them for having stuck their necks out or for having provided any leadership in the way of suggesting a trade policy.

Another thing which I think was notably absent from the speech of the hon. member for Essex East was any reference to the speech made this morning and the amendment moved by his colleague the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix). Speaking as he did as a prominent member of his party following the the hon. gentleman who moved the amendment this morning, I would have thought that he might have placed on the record the official position, if there is one, of the Liberal party on this extremely important amendment. As far as we in this group are concerned, over the years we have always supported the idea and the principle that the time would arrive when Canada should have a distinctive Canadian flag. When we first supported that idea as a political party I am sure that it did not have the same general support across this country as it now has. It would seem that in 1957 the people of this nation, in a spirit of great unity, have come to support the idea of a distinctive and truly Canadian flag.

Many speeches have been made on this subject in the past. I think it is fair to say that all political parties have given support to this idea in one form or another. The former leader of the opposition Hon. George Drew in 1953 I believe made a very eloquent speech supporting the principle of a distinctive Canadian flag. We know that as far back as 1946 a special committee of this house did a great deal of work on this subject and made a report—I think it was almost unanimous—supporting a distinctive Canadian flag and contributing a suggestion for such a flag. I am not going to say at this time—indeed I am not sure—what type of design I would support myself, whether it be the exact design presented by that parliamentary committee or some other design. However, it seems to me that at this session of parliament we should be able to give some consideration to making a step forward towards the day that we have in this country a distinctive Canadian flag.

Towards the end of my remarks, Mr. Speaker, I expect to move an amendment to the present amendment that is before the house. I am not quarrelling with the principle of the amendment but there is one part of it, as it now stands, which I think could be changed. The present amendment reads as follows:

> We respectfully urge, however, that Canada should have a distinctive national flag and, in the opinion of this house, your most gracious Majesty's advisers should consider at once the advisability of taking steps to give to this country a truly Canadian flag.

We suggest that this amendment is asking the government itself to take these steps to provide a truly Canadian flag. We do not feel that this should be the prerogative of the government to decide precisely how it might best adopt for this nation a truly Canadian flag.

We feel that the question of arriving at a flag of a distinctive nature for Canada is something that is not a government measure but is something which should be reached by the agreement of all the major political parties in this house. We suggest that the government itself should not be making the decision but should be providing the means by which parliament, representative as it is of the Canadian nation, can make the decision. The amendment I shall move at a later time is as follows:

> That the amendment be amended by deleting therefrom all the words after the words "taking steps" and by substituting therefor the following words:

"to make it possible for parliament to reach an early decision with respect to a truly Canadian flag."

I would ask that the government and the house leader give consideration to this suggestion: that the form of this motion with a subamendment added thereto should not be taken in the spirit of being a want of confidence motion. The government should not consider that its own life as a government should be at stake in the vote on this resolution.

Mr. Hansell: May I ask a question of the hon. member.

Mr. Argue: Yes.

Mr. Hansell: I am sure he is aware of this but I will ask this as a question: is he aware that in 1946, I believe it was although it may have been 1947, that very thing was done by parliament and a special committee of parliament made recommendations to the government at that time.

Mr. Argue: I believe the hon. member must have come in late; I referred to that in my opening remarks. I do not think there is anything I might add in answer to his question.

Mr. Hansell: I just meant that the hon. member's amendment calls for something which has already been done.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Argue: My understanding is that this has not been done but if the hon. member for Macleod wishes to give his opinion of what is the exact position in the country at this time we shall of course listen to that opinion.

A committee made a recommendation and there the recommendation has remained ever since, and parliament itself has not followed through by adopting a distinctive Canadian flag. I would suggest to the leader of the house that this motion should not be considered by the government as a want of confidence motion.

We already have an important precedent in this respect on December 5, 1951 when a member of the government party at that time, Mr. A. J. Bater, then the member for The Battlefords, moved a subamendment to the address on the speech from the throne in these words:

That all the words in the amendment after the word "regrets" be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

"the serious difficulties encountered by the western farmers in harvesting their crops, and commends Your Excellency's advisers for the continuing attention they have given to the problems caused thereby, and is confident that effective measures will continue to be taken to help the farmers in meeting these problems."

[Mr. Argue.]

When the vote was taken on this subamendment and the amendment they were both carried and this addition was made to the speech from the throne. I would therefore suggest to the government on this important national issue which I suggest is not a partisan issue or an issue between or among the political parties of this country, the government should "take off the whips"—to use a suitable phrase—and allow a free vote of members of this house on a very important national question.

Last night I listened to the speech of the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming)—

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if before the hon. gentleman leaves that subject he will permit me to ask one question for the purpose of clarification. Does he understand the word "distinctive" to mean not including the emblem of any other country?

Mr. Argue: Mr. Speaker, I have already said—

Mr. Pickersgill: Do not evade the question.

Mr. Argue: I already said in my opening remarks that I was not advocating a flag of any particular design but was merely supporting, and I am sure this group is supporting the same principle, that it is time Canada had a truly distinctive flag.

Mr. Pickersgill: Evasion.

Mr. Argue: I listened with a great deal of interest to the speech made last night by the Minister of Finance and in many respects in the things he said he blew rather hot at times and rather cold at others. One thing he did not seem to be able to make up his mind about was whether the government had sufficient confidence of this house, whether it had too much or too little confidence. In his remarks he chastised a member of the official opposition for being so anxious to get up and support the government with might and main. Towards the end of his speech he said "Give us the confidence and we will do the job".

That last reference looked to me like an admission, in view of the things he had to say in the opening part of his speech, that the government was terrified most of all of this one thing: that in the various votes the government might keep the confidence of the house and therefore have to deal now with the great national issues which face this country because, as I see the things the government has done so far, and they have been good in the main, they have not dealt with the root of the basic problems which face our country.

I agree with those who have said that within the period of eight weeks or, if you wish to take the full term of office of this government within the period of five months, more has been accomplished than in any similar period for some years in the history of Canada. I say the fact that something more has been accomplished is an indication that the present position, where the government has a minority in this house, is the best goad there is for government action and the best assurance to the public of this nation that democracy is functioning in our country. I think when the vote is taken on the sub-amendment to which I have referred we shall then see to what extent this government believes in full democracy in parliament because I do not think it is necessarily the best thing that these great national issues should be decided by one party in the traditional sense that the Prime Minister makes up his mind, then there is cabinet solidarity and therefore party solidarity and, no matter what the issue, something is rammed through parliament which in many instances people do not like.

I remember last year as a member of a standing committee on agriculture, taking part in the great debate on payments for sheep—as to whether it was overpaid or not. I also remember sitting on many committees in this house where a pattern has been followed and if there was a controversial issue referred to the committee, that committee was used by a government with a majority of the members of the committee to stifle discussion and to prevent full consideration of the report. We suspected in many instances the reports were written not really by the committee but initially in the office of the minister of the department concerned, and the report was then handed to the members of the government party, that is to say the Liberal party, and the great "whitewash" took place.

Mr. Gardiner: On a question of privilege. I am sure the hon. member is not attempting to apply all the words he has now used to the committee on sheep payments which met last session. On that occasion the decision was not prepared in the minister's office; it was drafted by one of the members of the C.C.F. party who sat on the committee, and supported unanimously, too.

Mr. Argue: I can appreciate that there may be exceptions, and if something different was done in that case, it was the exception which proves the rule, because I have sat in so many of these committee meetings—committees of which the former minister has been a member, or whose proceedings he has watched from the bleachers because he was very much affected by the discussions—when a rubber-stamp report was made, a report which was not supported by anybody except members of the government.

Mr. Speaker, measures have been passed this session providing for cash advances, increases in old age pensions, blind persons' pensions, disability pensions, war veterans' allowances and so on; they have all been passed through their various stages. It would seem to me that people in the country generally feel that something is being accomplished in the present session of parliament, and accomplished with reasonable despatch; and they will not look kindly on a government which wants to duck some of the most important issues which face the country, and escape them, possibly by calling an election which, according to this morning's press, would cost almost $7 million on the basis of the cost of the last election.

We have heard a good deal from the Minister of Finance both in the course of his speech last night and through the answers he has given to questions asked in the house, and one of the questions most often asked of the minister was whether there would be a budget. I suspect now that there will be no budget introduced this session. I have heard many speeches by many ministers of finance in the past, but I have never heard a speech which was quite so reckless and irresponsible or so verbose as the speech delivered last night by the present minister.

I think that speech contained many statements which cannot be substantiated on a basis of fact. The minister made a statement which I felt was rather reckless when he said the threat on inflation in Canada had now been checked. He took that position because the cost of living index has appeared to level off to some extent, although it is still going up. To my mind, the figures provide no such indication; rather, they are an indication of a further loss of revenue to primary producers and a further reflection of the deterioration of the position of agricultural producers in this country. The daily bulletin put out by the dominion bureau of statistics relating to this increase in the cost of living from 123.3 to 123.4 had this to say:

> In the current month a decline in the food index from 121.9 to 121.7 was not quite sufficient to balance increases in the other four component groups. Substantially lower prices were reported for pork, with lesser declines for beef, most fresh and canned fruits and vegetables, margarine, coffee and eggs.

There it is, the check to inflation which the Minister of Finance was talking about last night. Any check there is has been brought about mainly because the prices of pork, beef, fresh and canned fruits, vegetables and eggs have fallen. I do not think that is a situation with regard to which the government should feel much satisfaction. With regard to this suggested arrest of the inflationary spiral, we in this group have been asking the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) what he intends to do about setting an adequate floor price for hogs. Mr. Speaker, if one was sitting in this house and did not know what changes had taken place, and was relying merely on the answers given by the present Minister of Agriculture and by his predecessor in office there would be no means of telling which one of them was replying.

Somebody in the Department of Agriculture is evidently good at statistics. If they cannot go back one year to prove things are not so bad, they go back two years or ten years or twenty years. Thus we have the spectacle of the Minister of Agriculture getting up and saying: do not blame us for what has happened since we took office, just relate the situation today to what it was a year ago. Even on that basis there is not too much for the government to be satisfied with, because the price of cattle has been softening. Our complaint about the price of hogs is that almost ever since this government took office this price has been dropping at a very rapid rate.

On June 22 this year, the day after the government took office, the price of hogs at Toronto, grade B-1 dressed, was $31.50. For the week ending November 2, 1957 the price was down to $26.25, a drop of more than $5 a hundred. The price a year ago was not much different, but the price in the same period a year ago had increased from $27.50 on June 22 to $29.50 in November. That is what happened in the period of the summer and fall months last year. Hog prices stayed relatively stable in this country. What has happened since June 21? Hog prices have been fluctuating, but the trend has been downward; there has been a very substantial drop, and one hopes that in these circumstances the government will come forward with proposals to place an adequate floor price on hogs, and that it will not stand up, as its representatives have done in this house, and say: the old floor price has not yet been reached, so what are you complaining about? If all this government can do by way of price support legislation is to repeat the type of legislation which the former administration placed on the statute books, I think their support in rural Canada will not be any greater than it was during the time of the former administration.

The case of oats and barley provides another instance in which prices paid for agricultural products have fallen. The sale price of these products today is very little higher than the initial price, two cents a bushel in the case of No. 1 feed barley and about seven cents in the case of No. 1 feed oats. This means that at this moment the Canadian wheat board in its oats and barley operation is almost certainly suffering a net loss. That in turn will mean no further interim payments, no further final payment and, in fact, it represents such a low selling price as will require moneys to be paid into the wheat board account from the national treasury. Is this the way to check inflation? I think the truth of the matter is that the threat of inflation has not been checked.

I note that an application was before the board of transport commissioners some weeks ago asking for a further 10 per cent increase in freight rates in this country. Would the Minister of Finance or any member of the government say that there would not be an increase in freight rates? Does the government suggest that a substantial increase in freight rates is not an inflationary move? I think it is. There have been recent increases in prices of farm machinery and automobiles; are these increases not considered inflationary? I think the very announcement made by the Minister of Finance last night to the effect that the bank rediscount rate and interest rates generally would probably soften and that we are going to move away from the tight money policy of the former administration is in itself an indication that inflation has not been checked. I think the Minister of Finance will have to withdraw that statement as the months go by because, as we see it, inflation is certain to continue under the policies of this administration.

The Minister of Finance is satisfied that he has dealt with inflation. He is satisfied also that the government has dealt with the trade problem in spite of the two speeches to which I have referred. Indeed, he seems satisfied that everything is being done to increase markets for Canadian products. Moreover, he seems most satisfied that everything that conceivably could be done to increase our export markets for grain has been done. On November 14, as reported at page 1162 of Hansard of that date, the Minister of Finance said:

> —the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) has thrown into sound disposal policies with respect to that wheat an energy which has not been exhibited in that respect for many and many a year.

A little later he went on to say:

> —in the matter of our trade undertakings we have fulfilled our undertakings to the letter.

I thought one undertaking of this government was to recover the overseas markets for agricultural products that had been lost.

The Minister of Finance tells us the government has accomplished its undertakings, yet we see a substantial fall in exports for Canadian agricultural products since this government took office.

I am now going to compare the exports of wheat in July of this year as compared with July of last year, July being the first full month in which this government was in office. Wheat exports dropped from 28 million bushels in July 1956 to 22½ million bushels in July 1957, a decrease of 5½ million bushels. In August this year our exports of wheat dropped by 3 million bushels compared to last year. There was a further drop of 3½ million bushels in September this year as compared to the same month a year ago. The figures covering our barley exports for the same period indicate that there was a drop of 2 million bushels in July 1957 as compared to last year, a drop of 6 million bushels in August and a drop of 3 million bushels in September compared to the figures for the same months a year ago.

The government has been in office since June—not long it is true; not long in which to redirect new export policies—but the Minister of Finance stands up in the house and says that the undertakings of the government have been accomplished as far as international trade is concerned, and with the accomplishment of the undertakings of the government referred to by the minister we have witnessed an extremely drastic drop in export markets for wheat and barley. Is that the satisfactory situation for which the government now wishes to claim so much credit? As far as inflation and trade are concerned I think the government has a long way to go to solve these pressing problems.

There is something else which the government has not yet tackled. We heard from members over the years when they were in opposition the constant cry that there should be set up a committee of this house to examine into the question of defence expenditures but now that the situation is reversed the new government does not seem anxious to have such a committee established. We are all aware of the new state of defence in the world and the new potential threat created by the existence of sputniks. I think every hon. member of this house fully supports international co-operation amongst friendly nations for the maximum amount of defence that can be provided for the free nations and I think we all support the NATO provisions for defence. I think one can judge from what one reads in the press, that the NATO shield, as it is being called, and the NATO forces are sufficient, if war occurred, to wipe out the soviet union, as a military force, yes almost as a nation. I do not think there is any one in this house who believes that if such a war came we would not be wiped out too; so where do we go from here when each camp apparently has weapons of a type and in such quantity as to completely destroy its possible opponent?

The battle for men's minds still continues. It is still most important that we do everything we can in a practical way to ensure the maintenance of freedom throughout the world in those countries that enjoy political freedom and work to extend it; but I think the time has long since passed when we can say to ourselves that an expenditure of almost $2 billion on our current type of national defence provides real defence. A man of such prominence as Lieutenant-General Guy Simonds, the former chief of the general staff, has said that 80 per cent of our defence forces are obsolete. He said that the $200 million or $300 million that has been spent on the development of the CF-105 has been wasted, that the CF-105 is now a dead duck. What is this government doing? It says it is going to continue its development. When we asked to find out by way of a parliamentary committee whether a statement by a person of the prominence of Lieutenant-General Simonds is correct or not the government would not provide us with such a committee. We had hoped that this government would see the folly in putting all of our defence projects, or almost all of such eggs, in a military basket.

I had hoped the government would see the immediate necessity of making substantial increases in economic assistance to friendly nations, expanding the assistance given by Canada under the Colombo plan, not in a small meagre or mediocre way but under a great plan whereby Canada could lead the world in relation to its resources in the provision of economic and technical assistance to people in free nations. The government increased Canada's contribution under the Colombo plan; indeed the announcement was made the other day. It is no longer going to make the small contribution of $34,400,000; rather it is increasing its contribution to $35 million, less than a 2 per cent increase. The Colombo plan is designed to help lend economic assistance and technical development to the commonwealth countries and southeast Asia and I suggest it is there where the future course of democracy in the world will be decided in terms of whether it increases in strength or decreases.

My study of the program of the Nehru government suggests to me that India today is in a deep financial crisis. Earl Atlee, according to this morning's press, said that India has decided to use almost all of its sterling reserves in meeting the great economic crisis which faces that country. Are we going to do something now in a spectacular, dynamic way to show the world that we mean business in economic assistance and in helping our fellow men?

The idea that I am about to present is not new; I presented it in the house on April 13, 1954. I said at that time I felt that the time had arrived when we should take $500 million out of our defence budget, being spent on armaments, and use it for economic assistance.

I believe my time is about up, Mr. Speaker. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch):

That the amendment be amended by deleting therefrom all the words after the words "taking steps" and by substituting therefor the following words:

"to make it possible for parliament to reach an early decision with respect to a truly Canadian flag".

I would go further, Mr. Speaker, and say that the Canadian people are prepared to provide economic assistance to underdeveloped countries not just by transferring the amount of money they have in a defence program now to some other program, but I believe the Canadian people are willing to pay the price and to pay the cost of providing our share of the economic assistance that may be necessary to see that friendly nations are able to maintain democracy in their countries.

I have been informed that recently the British labour party announced that if they are returned to power in the next election they would be prepared to take three per cent of the gross national product of Great Britain and use it for economic assistance to underdeveloped nations. I suggest that Canada should do the same thing; that $1 billion as a long-term investment program from Canada in a planned way is not too much to suggest as our share of the price that must be paid to see that democracy is retained in those parts of the world that now enjoy it.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, this afternoon it is my privilege to say a few words on behalf of the government in closing this throne speech debate. In the first place, may I say that we appreciate the suggestions and the criticisms—although they are a little harder to appreciate,—which have come our way in the course of this debate. After all, in a debate of this kind we have the democratic system at its best, and the debate has been an excellent one. We are particularly proud of the part which has been taken by the new members of our own party of whom we elected so many. We are fortunate in having, I think, a larger proportion of new members in the present house than any government has had for some time. Without exception these young men have shown—I am sure everyone in the house will admit this—that they are deeply and genuinely interested in the welfare of the country and are not hesitant about making suggestions to their own ministers. That, of course, is as it should be.

[Mr. Argue.]

We have before us at the moment an amendment moved by the hon. member for Quebec-Montmorency (Mr. LaCroix) which would add to the address the following words:

We respectfully urge, however, that Canada should have a distinctive national flag and, in the opinion of this house, your most gracious Majesty's advisers should consider at once the advisability of taking steps to give to this country a truly Canadian flag.

To that amendment the hon. member for Assiniboia has moved a subamendment this afternoon which deletes the words:

to give to this country a truly Canadian flag—

to make it possible for parliament to reach an early decision with respect to a truly Canadian flag.

In moving this subamendment the hon. member directed some honeyed words to the government. He said: After all, this may be a vote of no confidence but, nevertheless, let us not treat it as such; let us just be on a friendly basis and forget all about this being a vote of no confidence. Well, he is a very experienced politician. He has been here for a long time and he knows just as well as I do, and as all the other members of the house do, that this amendment and the subamendment which have been moved today, if they were approved by the house would constitute a vote of no confidence, and for that reason they cannot be accepted by the government.

I agree that this flag question is a very important one; but I point out that the manner in which the issue has been brought before the house today is really ridiculous. It should never have been tossed into a debate of this kind. Other steps might have been taken by way of a motion, or something of that kind, so that the question could have been considered in the manner which it merits. It does merit the most careful consideration and that is absolutely impossible under the conditions in which this amendment has been moved today.

I should like to say a few words about the speech of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue). He is a great admirer of minority government and why would he not be? Where the government of the country does not have a majority the members of his party believe that that gives them a chance to hold a gun at the head of the government and say, "Here, you do what we want or we will pull the trigger". Now, this is just a splendid illustration of the futility of a four-party system in a democratic country. Our whole system of government is based on the government of the day having the responsibility of giving leadership to the Canadian people.

Mr. Ellis: Let us have it.

Mr. Green: That responsibility can only be assumed where the government has a majority. If we are to have in Canada perpetually a system under which two small parties are able to hold up the government of the day, then government in this country will have reached a sad state.

An hon. Member: Who is holding you up?

Mr. Green: Like everyone else in the present house, the members of the government are making the best of a situation which is really not in the best interests of democracy in Canada. I am afraid we cannot agree with the proposal that for all time the government of Canada should be in a minority. Then he rather amused me by the vehemence with which he attacked the Liberals for their criticism of us for being so slow in doing the things the Liberals thought should be done. The Liberals were unreasonable. The Conservative government had worked faster than any other government for years and deserved great credit. Why were they being criticized by these wicked Liberals?

But when he came to the latter part of his speech and the subjects in which he was interested, the government had been terribly slow, they had dragged back, they were not doing this, that and the other thing. Why did they not hurry up? Everything was wrong. Now, he cannot have it both ways.

An hon. Member: You don't know them.

Mr. Green: Either what he said first is right, that we are getting along fairly well and are meeting these problems fairly promptly or else we are not getting along at all. I think that in his less forensic moments he will agree that his first statement was the more accurate one and that the present Conservative government actually has moved and is moving to settle the problems facing this country more rapidly than any government of Canada has done for many a long year.

Mr. Ellis: It is impossible to go as slow as the Liberals.

Mr. Green: I urge him to show a little patience. We will get around to all the problems that deserve to be settled in anything like the way he suggests. Do not be in too big a hurry.

Then, Mr. Speaker, I am sure we all find it very difficult to know just what value to place on the remarks made by the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) at this session of parliament. One minute I think, well now, he really means that, he is really advocating that policy, and then the next minute I think, now he is imagining he is standing up in the coliseum in Ottawa on January 16 and pleading for votes for Martin. It is very hard to divide these two attitudes. I really do not think they can be divided. I think they are all mixed up and that for the remainder of the session we will just have to take his remarks with a grain of salt and wish him good luck in this great competition.

He waxed eloquent on quite a number of different subjects. One was unemployment. He almost got around to criticizing the tight money policy which his own government adopted but he did not quite get that far. You know, Mr. Speaker, he reminded me of the slogan which was painted on billboards all over the country, "Vote for Canada, vote Liberal"—

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Green: —as if the Liberal party were the only party that could govern Canada. What a myth that was!

Mr. Pickersgill: Wait and see.

Mr. Green: And yet he is still labouring under the delusions which he had before June 10. The Canadian people took a part in these questions, you know—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Most of them voted for us.

Mr. Green: —just a few short months ago.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Most of them voted for us.

Mr. Green: Now the hon. member and his fellow Liberals are sitting to His Honour's left. They have lost half of their leaders. Half of their cabinet is gone. These are things which happened in Canada this summer but I do not believe the hon. member for Essex East has awakened to that fact yet. He said today that the prestige of Canada has fallen since the Liberal government went out of office. The only thing that has fallen since the Liberal government went out of office is the Liberal party, and it has fallen with a real thud. But the fact is that the prestige of Canada never stood higher in the world than it does today.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is what I said.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is what he said.

Mr. Green: That is not a matter of parties, and it is very unfair and unwise for an experienced member of the house—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I rise on a question of privilege. No hon. member has the right to say of another that he took a particular position if that hon. member denies it. I did not say that at the present time Canada's prestige was not high. I said Canada's prestige at the present time was high because of the government headed by the right hon. gentleman who is the Leader of the Opposition.

Mr. Green: Well, Mr. Speaker, that is saying what I indicated in slightly different words.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh no, not at all. The usual distortion.

Mr. Green: I repeat that the fact is that the prestige of Canada has never been higher.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Pickersgill: Hear, hear.

Mr. Green: To turn to the question of the commonwealth, the hon. member for Essex East ridiculed the part taken by the present government in the commonwealth conference. I have sat in the house for 22 years and have watched the reaction of leaders of the Liberal party to commonwealth matters. On every occasion they have gone to commonwealth conferences determined that they would not give any leadership at those conferences. They would attend all right but they were oh so careful never to put themselves in a position of giving any leadership.

In 1957 the new Prime Minister went to the United Kingdom just two days after his government had been sworn in and he gave leadership at that conference.

Mr. Pickersgill: What leadership?

Mr. Green: He gave that leadership because his thoughts and his heart were in that direction.

Mr. Pickersgill: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Hodgson: Oh, sit down.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman suggest on what particular subject the Prime Minister gave leadership at London, because the communique indicated that he did not talk about trade?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, there is another example—

Mr. Pickersgill: Answer the question.

[Mr. Pickersgill.]

Mr. Green: —of the same kind of attitude taken by the hon. member for Essex East. What the Prime Minister did was to go to London determined to give leadership to the commonwealth.

Mr. Pickersgill: What kind of leadership?

Mr. Green: There was such a difference shown in the attitude of the man who attended this conference.

Mr. Pickersgill: Read us the Globe and Mail on Thorneycroft.

Mr. Green: I will come to trade in a minute. I do not believe any fair-minded Canadian would deny that the attendance of Canada's Prime Minister at this conference in 1957 has been one of the greatest contributions to commonwealth unity that has ever been made by any Canadian.

Mr. Pickersgill: What about Mr. Thorneycroft's visit to Ottawa?

Mr. Green: You see the splendid results in so many directions.

Mr. Richardson: Where?

Mr. Green: You would not be able to see it if I told you.

Mr. Pickersgill: Why not tell us and find out?

Mr. Green: Then the hon. member for Essex East and the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) ridiculed the efforts of the present government to increase trade with the other commonwealth countries.

Mr. Pickersgill: We merely asked questions.

Mr. Green: Of course they were never interested in commonwealth trade. Year in and year out we have pleaded in this house for Canada to take some steps to promote greater commonwealth trade but never was a move made in that direction. The hon. member for Essex East forgot all about that this afternoon when he soared in those flights of oratory of his. That has been the attitude taken by the Liberal government here for many long years. After all, this trade conference has not yet been held. To hear the hon. member for Essex East one would think that the trade conference had already been held and that it was a great failure,—something which pleased him very much—and that the responsibility for that failure rested entirely on the present Canadian Prime Minister. What are the facts?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes; what are the facts?

Mr. Green: The Prime Minister of Canada was able to arrange for the calling of a preliminary conference to plan for a full-scale trade conference which is to take place next year. That was a worth-while accomplishment. Many people were convinced that it could not be done. Nobody was more hopeful that it could not be done than were the senior Liberals sitting across from me today.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Green: Surely.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I wonder whether my hon. friend, who is in such a delightfully happy and friendly mood today, could give us the agenda of the proposed commonwealth conference which is to be held?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, did you ever hear a more foolish question? Now I know he will never win that leadership. This economic and trade conference is to take place next year. I suggest to these Jeremiahs across the way that they forget trying to wish it into failure and that they do what they can to make it a great success. If they believe in promoting commonwealth trade half as much as the hon. member for Essex East tried to tell us today, I am sure they will all accept my suggestion.

Then he complained at considerable length about an attempt being made to shift Canada's purchases from the United States. He tried to strengthen his argument on that point by dealing with exports from Canada to the United States and in so doing I thought he was drawing a rather long bow. The actual fact is—and the hon. member for Essex East knows it very well—that last year the adverse trade balance against Canada in her trade with the United States was over $1,200 million or over $100 million a month. But the Liberal government, before the election, was not a bit interested in that matter. Right Hon. C. D. Howe said it was a good thing.

Mr. Pickersgill: So it was.

Mr. Green: The Canadian people decided that question, just as they decided several other questions, on June 10. I am really amazed that the hon. member for Essex East would rise in his place today and make a speech in which he criticized the present government for trying to get that adverse trade balance reduced. It is things of this sort that make one place little value on his remarks.

Mr. Speaker, I do not want to waste all of my time on those two hon. members.

Mr. Sinclair: You have so far.

Mr. McIvor: Are you wasting it?

Mr. Stick: You waste time on more than that.

Mr. Green: After all, the main subject for debate should be the speech from the throne. I am going to presume on the good nature of the house by reading again just one paragraph from an article written for the Vancouver Sun by our old friend Elmore Philpott who sat here during the last parliament and who is now with us in the press gallery. Mr. Philpott never made any attempt to hide the fact that he is an ardent Liberal. In this report written to his paper after the commencement of the present session, he had this to say under the heading "Keeping Faith":

> Ottawa—The 1957 speech from the throne is an historic document for several reasons. But the one which means most to the people of Canada is that the Conservatives have spectacularly kept their main election promises.

And may I say that every word of this is true.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Green: The article continues:

> Prime Minister Diefenbaker has not only itemized the main points on which he was morally bound to take action at this session, but he has also outlined intended action on several other matters which he might well have postponed for the future without giving justification for the cry of bad faith.
> The whole country, regardless of party preference, should be delighted to see this proof that the old party of Sir John A. Macdonald has thus demonstrated that its official title of "Progressive Conservatives" has taken on new meaning for the whole Canadian nation.

How could the present government have a finer endorsation than the one I have just read?

I need only remind hon. members that the house has already enacted legislation to provide for cash advances on farm-stored grain, has already increased the payments under the Old Age Security Act, has made possible increased payments under the Old Age Assistance Act, the Blind Persons Act an the Disabled Persons Act, and has increased the benefits under the War Veterans Allowance Act. These are all bills which have already been passed by this house, and some of them have received royal assent.

Other measures on the order paper are the bill to provide annual vacations with pay for employees in federal works, undertakings and businesses; a bill to amend the Pension Act which has already passed the resolution stage; a resolution preceding a measure to establish a system of guaranteed prices for certain agricultural commodities; and a resolution that it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize the construction of a branch line for the Canadian National Railways. These are measures actually passed or in the process of being passed by this house, in most cases implementing the campaign promises made by the Conservative party.

Yesterday announcement was made of a policy which will implement the paragraph in the speech from the throne dealing with power in the Atlantic provinces.

We have acted in other fields as well.

When we came into office we found that as a result of deliberate policy pursued by the former government the construction of homes in Canada had dropped off to an alarming degree. That was a tragedy, not only for the young people and other Canadians who needed homes of their own or needed homes to rent but for the building industry of Canada and other connected industries such as the suppliers of furniture and all the articles that go with the building of a home. In that particular field, when we took over, there was rapidly developing a spirit of defeatism which might very well have cast a great shadow over the national economy in the months that lay ahead. Fortunately it was not necessary for us to have legislation in order to do something to meet that situation and we decided that $150 million should be made available for the construction of lower priced homes in Canada. That was being done by means of what are known as agency loans where the government puts up the money and the loans are made through the banks and other lending institutions.

We were not absolutely sure that such a plan would be successful but we have been very gratified by the results. I have before me the figures up to November 8 last, which was only nine weeks after the plan really came into effect, and at that time loans had been approved to the amount of $93,309,331 for a total number of units of 9,995. In addition to those loans which had been approved there were in process of approval loans amounting to another $35,710,000 making a total of $129,019,331. That means that the money is rapidly being used up and I may say that if there is a need for an additional amount under the scheme the government will be taking steps to meet that situation. There has been some holding back and there have been some difficulties with respect to the Atlantic provinces. In that area, as of the end of last week, there had been only 201 units covered by loan but that figure did not include applications which had not yet been approved. The money committed to these loans in the Atlantic provinces totalled $1,712,232.66. There had also been some delay in the province of British Columbia, but in that province the situation is much better than formerly and the figures for British Columbia as of the end of last week were 466 units for a total value of $3,988,089.11.

Mr. Pickersgill: Pretty good Liberal legislation.

Mr. Green: No; it may have been good Liberal legislation but the former government did not do anything about it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: How ridiculous can you get?

Mr. Green: The former government was deliberately—I repeat, deliberately—holding back construction of homes in Canada at the time it went out of office.

Mr. Pickersgill: Utter nonsense.

Mr. Green: And if it had been re-elected on June 10 this housing situation in Canada today would have been—

Mr. Pickersgill: Much better.

Mr. Green:—very very bad. This is only one example of the way in which the present government is trying to meet the conditions which face the Canadian people. There are various problems coming up from time to time, problems which are under consideration every day. However we are trying to deal with them as they arise. I suppose it is too much to expect that we would get much credit for these things from any of the opposition parties in the house. Perhaps it would be expecting too much of human nature.

In closing I would like to point out this fact: this government has been in office less than five months. I think we have already shown we are endeavouring to give leadership to the Canadian people and I believe the Canadian people are fair enough and reasonable enough to realize that fact, no matter how much abuse we might get from the other side of the house.

We have listened for years to the talks from your right, Mr. Speaker, in earlier parliaments that no one could run the country but the Liberal party since they were the only truly national party.

An hon. Member: Hear, hear. That is right.

Mr. Green: How hard it would be for them to explain that statement today.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: We will explain it.

Mr. Green: Theirs was the only truly national party; there were no men or women anywhere else in Canada who could run this country; just those people sitting to your right.

An hon. Member: That is being proven every day.

Mr. Green: It was the same story in the press. I think they almost had the press gallery convinced that it would be disastrous if Canada were ever to do away with the Liberal government. It looked at times as if they were here for a thousand years; I must admit I sometimes felt that myself. But what happened when the electorate of Canada decided it was time for a change? A change was made. Of necessity new men and women had to take on the responsibility of leadership and the members of the present government have done that. None of the members of the present government had ever been in a cabinet.

Mr. Pickersgill: That is not correct; how about the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne)?

Mr. Green: Oh yes of course. After we had been sworn in at Government House, an announcement was made by the clerk of the privy council as follows: "Now gentlemen there will be a meeting of the cabinet at 2.30 this afternoon", and one of the new ministers remarked, very wisely so, "and will you please tell us how to get there?"

Mr. Marler: Is this a cabinet secret the hon. member is divulging?

Mr. Green: However, we found out the extent of the services which were available to cabinet ministers, how they could press a button and have a prepared speech on any subject on their desks in half an hour. We realized just what a lot of nonsense this story was that members of the former cabinet were supermen.

Mr. Pickersgill: Would the hon. gentleman tell us who prepared this one?

Mr. Green: Really, Mr. Speaker, all the members of the former cabinet had to do—and the same applies to members of this cabinet if they wish to follow the practice—was to get up and read something on a sheet of paper. This practice was followed quite frequently by former ministers and, in fact, we had quite a bit of it from the hon. member for Essex East this afternoon, but no doubt he got into that bad habit while he was a member of the government.

I should like to say this before I close: We have had the finest assistance from the members of the Canadian civil service. I know the former ministers will agree with these comments. These men and women are in the civil service as a career; it is their life. They have been supported for many years now by leaders of all the parties; all the leaders of all the parties since Sir Robert Borden introduced the merit system about the time of the first world war. They have stood firmly behind that system. Today Canada has reaped her reward from that policy. Here we had these senior civil servants—I do not suppose one of them had ever been in a senior position except under a Liberal minister—and yet these men and women have served us devotedly. They really have rendered a great service for Canada. I hope—I am sure—that it will always be possible for Canada to keep a civil service of that type.

Mr. Speaker, the time has practically gone and we must vote on these amendments. I repeat once again, for the benefit of those who were not here when I began my remarks, that this amendment and the subamendment would, if endorsed, mean that this house is voting no confidence in the present government. No matter what attempt may be made to picture them as something else, that is what they actually are. If one of them were to be adopted by this house, that vote would constitute a vote of non-confidence in the present administration.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house ready for the question?

Some hon. Members: No.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I think there are still two minutes before the time at which you will be required by the rules of the house to put the question. We have heard a speech, very amusing in parts, from the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green), but there are realities which we have to face and which, I am sure, he and his colleagues are prepared to continue to face as a result of June 10.

The hon. gentleman has said that it is not very comfortable to be a member of a government which does not have a majority in the House of Commons. But that is the situation which arose as a consequence of the election of June 10, and it was under those conditions that the former government resigned and the hon. gentleman's leader accepted the responsibility of forming a cabinet. It is that situation which we have faced since parliament met on October 14.

We declared that we would not obstruct the government in its efforts to implement the promises it had made during the election campaign, and I declared in my first remarks on the address in reply to the speech from the throne that it was not our intention this session to move an amendment to the motion for an address, and that having come to that conclusion it was not our intention to support amendments made from any other quarter of the house, because there could be only one of two consequences; if the amendment carried the government would be defeated and would be prevented from putting before parliament the legislation required to implement its election promises, and we did not feel that was what the Canadian public wished to have done at this time.

That situation still persists, and we are not disposed to support these amendments which would in constitutional practice amount to a no-confidence motion. We will, following their rejection, as I expect they will be rejected, not oppose the main motion to express thanks to our gracious sovereign for having opened this session of parliament. But our concurrence in that address will not mean more than our undertaking to give serious consideration to all the measures which the government will bring before parliament under the terms of the speech with which Her Gracious Majesty opened the present session.

Mr. Winch: Just what are you applauding, may I ask?

Mr. Speaker: It being 5.30 o'clock p.m. it is my duty pursuant to section 4 of Standing Order 38 to interrupt these proceedings and forthwith put the question on any amendment now before the house.

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost. The question is on the main motion. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works) moved:

That the said address be engrossed and forwarded to Her Majesty the Queen.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works) moved:

That an address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General praying that His Excellency will be pleased to transmit to Her Majesty the Queen an engrossed address which the Commons of Canada, in parliament assembled, adopted in reply to Her Majesty's speech at the opening of the first session of the twenty-third parliament.

Motion agreed to.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works) moved:

That the address to His Excellency the Governor General, adopted this day, be engrossed and presented to His Excellency the Governor General by such members of this house as are of the honourable the privy council.

Motion agreed to.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, it is the intention next week to have a supply motion and then we should like to have estimates on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday. In order to do that it will be necessary to get unanimous consent to drop the first Thursday which is allotted for private members, and I would ask leave of the house to revert to motions.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask a question first? Is it the intention of the government to proceed with the motion to go into supply on Monday?

Mr. Green: Yes. I would ask leave of the house to revert to motions in order to move a motion by unanimous consent.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member unanimous consent to revert to motions?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

MOTION TO SUSPEND STANDING ORDER 15 (3) FOR THURSDAY, NOVEMBER 21

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): By unanimous consent I move:

That, on Thursday next, notwithstanding the provisions of standing order 15 (3), government orders shall have precedence over all other business, except the ordinary daily routine of business.

Motion agreed to.

Business of the House

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I wonder whether the house leader would indicate what departments will be opened at the conclusion of the supply motion that will be presented on Monday? Would he also indicate what departments it would be proposed to discuss in committee of supply on Wednesday, Thursday and Friday of next week? Perhaps while I am on my feet I might ask whether he could give any further indication as to the plans for a day's debate on external affairs.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, we are in the course of discussions between the parties in the hope that it will not be necessary to have six supply motions. If an agreement can be reached to that effect, we would ask to have more than six departments put in on Monday or Tuesday, whenever the motion to go into supply happens to be adopted. At the present time I cannot say with certainty that there would be no changes in this plan. The present intention is to call the department of the Secretary of State (Mrs. Fairclough) which I think will be discussed first. As hon. members know, the Secretary of State is a lady and we thought that the lady should be first. Then it is the intention to call fisheries, mines and technical surveys, justice, veterans affairs and external affairs, but not necessarily in that order, apart from the first department I mentioned. Possibly the week after next we can arrange for a one-day debate on external affairs in order that those estimates may be sent to the standing committee on external affairs.

Mr. Argue: I wonder whether I might ask the house leader a further question on the business. Could the house leader say whether it is the intention of the government fairly soon to move the resolution dealing with price support legislation for agricultural products? I thought that this was one of the pieces of legislation that was considered to be of an emergency character and that it would be brought forward soon.

Mr. Green: I think so, Mr. Speaker; but I am really not in a position this afternoon to say just when that would be done.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

APPENDIX

ANSWER TO QUESTION ASKED BY MEMBER FOR KOOTENAY WEST

ASSISTANCE RENDERED TO UNEMPLOYED IMMIGRANTS

1. Emergency hospitalization or medical and dental care.

This assistance may be granted to immigrants while en route to their destination if, of course, they are without sufficient funds and lack the necessary assets to cover the cost involved. The Department of National Health and Welfare assumes the responsibility for the payment of the accounts of emergency hospitalization and for emergency medical and dental care. Hospital authorities, doctors and dentists submit their accounts to the authorizing immigration officer who certifies accounts and transmits to national health and welfare for payment.

2. Emergency transportation assistance.

This assistance is given as a means to ensure that immigrants are placed in gainful employment as quickly as possible following their arrival. It is extended to those who do not have sufficient funds to pay their transportation expenses to a suitable locale of employment. Emergency transportation assistance is requested on form Imm. 397 which indicates the transportation required and is presented to the transportation company. On receipt of the transportation company's invoice it is certified by the district superintendent or officer in charge and submitted to the chief treasury officer for payment to the transportation company.

3. Emergency food and shelter.

The department has authority to provide food and shelter for immigrants who, through no fault of their own, require such assistance during their first year in Canada. After the first year immigrants are normally eligible for provincial or municipal welfare assistance. Emergency food and shelter assistance is authorized in the form of a voucher on Imm. 428 and presented to the landlord or store by the immigrant. The landlord or store owner concerned certifies that the goods or services have been provided and returns the Imm. 428 together with the supporting vouchers to the immigration officer, where it is checked and certified and returned to the chief treasury officer for payment by cheque.

4. Medical-welfare agreements.

The federal government has concluded medical-welfare agreements with the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, Ontario and Newfoundland, and also the Northwest Territories. The agreements provide for welfare assistance in varying degrees, as well as hospital expenses, for a period of 12 months, to immigrants rendered indigent through accident or illness during their first year in Canada. The federal government has also concluded an agreement with the government of Nova Scotia which covers hospitalization and expenses incidental thereto. The federal government and the provincial government concerned share equally the cost of assistance granted under the terms of the agreements. The provincial health or welfare authorities are responsible for determining eligibility for assistance of any immigrant claiming aid under the agreements. Federal responsibility for the administration of the agreements is vested in the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, and the provincial governments submit their claims for one-half the expenses incurred to this department.

5. Family assistance.

Family assistance is a grant, on behalf of children (immigrants' or settlers'), and payable to their parents, designed to assist the family in becoming established during the first year after their admission or return to Canada for permanent residence when they are not normally eligible for family allowances. It is payable on behalf of children of immigrants and settlers (settlers include Canadian citizens and returning residents), legally admitted to Canada for permanent residence, provided they are not eligible for family allowances, and in the case of Canadian citizens and returning residents they have not previously received family assistance in respect of the child/children being applied for. It is payable at the end of each quarter, at the rate of $5 per month for each eligible child from April 1, 1956, or from the date of admission or return whichever is the later date, until a period of 12 months has elapsed from the date of admission or return. Eligibility for payment lapses unless application for family assistance is submitted prior to the termination of one year's residence in Canada. It is not payable during residence outside of Canada. Application forms are available at immigration offices throughout Canada and are given to new arrivals at ports of entry. Family assistance cheques payable to the mother or guardian are issued by the chief treasury officer in quarterly payments.

6. Assisted passage.

The purpose of the assisted passage loan scheme is to assist suitable immigrants in financing the cost of their transportation to Canada. The loans are interest-free and are available to cover the cost of transportation for dependants as well as for the working head of the family in cases where this financial assistance is necessary, and also to residents of Canada who are anxious to bring their dependants, i.e. wives and unmarried minor children, to this country but do not have sufficient funds to cover the passage cost. Residents of Canada may apply at the nearest immigration office. Application may be made overseas at the Canadian immigration office in the country of the prospective immigrant's residence. Assisted passage loans are issued in the form of a transportation warrant Imm. 500 which are exchanged by the transportation company for steamship or air passage tickets which include inland transportation. The transportation company forwards to the chief treasury officer an invoice accompanied by the original Imm. 500 and is reimbursed by the chief treasury officer.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN NATIONAL STEAMSHIPS

GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING VESSEL REGISTRATION—RETURN OF TRINIDAD CREWS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Transport a question. Has the policy of the government with reference to the transfer of registry of the Canadian National Steamships to Trinidad been altered, and will the minister tell the house why the aircraft carrying Jamaican crews to Montreal were instructed to turn back?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): In reply to the first part of the hon. member's question, I am not aware of any change of policy in this regard by the management of Canadian National Steamships. In answer to the second part of the question, the decision to turn back was one of the management of Canadian National Steamships.

[Later:]

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that the two Trans-Canada Air Lines planes were chartered at rather high cost to the taxpayer for the transport of seamen from Trinidad to Canada, apparently to take over Canadian National steamships, could the minister give the house some information as to why this decision was made to turn back the flights?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, as I have indicated to the hon. member for Laurier, this decision was one taken by the management of Canadian National Steamships. If the hon. member wishes to ask the management of Canadian National Steamships what thinking led them to make this decision which they have taken, I would suggest he put this question to the management of that company when they appear before the special committee on railways and shipping owned, operated and controlled by the government.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a supplementary question to the minister. This is to the government and not to the company. What labour organizations have protested to the government since the Minister of Transport announced his intention of permitting the crown company to transfer flag registry of these ships a week ago today?

Mr. Hees: The only labour organization of which I know that made a protest has been Mr. Hal Banks in person, who did so over television last Thursday night.

[Later:]

Mr. Byrne: I would like to address a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport. Does the minister think, with the use of public funds put into the hands of Canadian National Steamships, they have the right to make a decision while a plane is in mid-air or to reverse a decision without consultation with the Minister of Transport?

Mr. Hees: The management of the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships is entrusted to the management of that company, and I feel sure the hon. member will have ample opportunity to question the actions of that company when the officials appear before the committee I mentioned a few moments ago.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Byrne: Was the minister advised in any way that these planes were going to be used for the purpose of bringing in strike-breakers from Trinidad?

An hon. Member: Who knows they were?

Mr. Hees: The answer is no, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. Chevrier: I do not want to pursue unduly the matter of steamships, Mr. Speaker, but in answer to the first question I asked in connection with the alteration of government policy, the minister said there had been no change in that policy, and I had understood from his statement some time ago that the government had approved of the transfer of registry.

My question now is, am I to infer from his answer that Canadian National Steamships will still pursue its policy of changing the registry of these ships from Canada to Trinidad?

Mr. Hees: As I answered the hon. member earlier, I have no information on any plan to change the plans announced last week by the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships.

Mr. Chevrier: Your statement says it was approved by the government.

Mr. Hees: Well, Mr. Speaker, I think I have given a very clear answer.

[Later:]

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct another question to the Minister of Transport. Can the minister say whether Canadian National Steamships hired Trans-Canada Air Lines planes, or whether it was the new owners of the steamships?

Mr. Hees: It was Canadian National Steamships.

[Mr. Hees.]

Hon. James Sinclair (Coast-Capilano): May I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Transport, based on his answer to the hon. member for Kootenay East suggesting that he should raise this question of the Canadian National Steamships in the special committee on railways and canals. How can the hon. member do this if the minister has not yet made up his mind whether or not a committee is going to sit?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I said "when it does sit".

PIPE LINES

NORTHERN ONTARIO PIPE LINE—LETTING OF CONTRACTS TO U.S. COMPANIES

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. What steps does the government propose to take to prevent tenders for the trans-Canada pipe line construction from being called from a selected list, it is alleged, of 12 companies, eight of whom are United States companies, two subsidiaries of United States companies, and two presumably Canadian, when the financing is provided by the people of Canada?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I should like to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. Tenders for the northern Ontario section of the all-Canadian natural gas pipe line are called by the Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation and not by Trans-Canada Pipe Lines.

Tenders were invited from 11 companies, being all the companies at present operating in Canada who were deemed capable of undertaking pipe-line construction of the type required for the northern Ontario section. The area is divided into five sections, referred to by letters of the alphabet and known as spreads. Five contracts have been awarded. For spread V the contractor is Nelen Limited and Associates; for spread W, Morrison-Shivers Limited; for spread X, Majestic Contractors Limited; for spread Y, River Construction Corporation Limited; and for spread Z, Mannix Company Limited.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask a supplementary question. Where are the head offices of these companies, or of any company of which any of them may be subsidiaries? May I say that this morning I sent the minister part of an article from the construction association bulletin in which it is alleged that there are several Canadian companies that can do this work equally well.

Mr. Churchill: I have not had an opportunity of reading that article, but I see it is here. My understanding is that of the five I have named, the Mannix Company Limited is virtually an all-Canadian company. The others originated in the United States but have offices established in Canada.

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is there a condition in the contract that Canadian labour is to be hired, and that the importation of labour from the United States must be restricted to those who have skills which are not available in Canada?

Mr. Churchill: I have not a sample of the contract in front of me, but I believe that to be the case. From information supplied to me, and from observations on the scene of the work which I made last September, I am aware that most of the labour on the pipe-line construction in the northern Ontario section is Canadian. It is only in certain specialized lines that skilled personnel from the United States are required.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): May I ask a supplementary question. Having in mind the fact that the Minister of Trade and Commerce answered verbally a question asked by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, could I assume it is in effect an answer to question No. 138 on the order paper concerning a similar matter, which has been there for some time?

Mr. Churchill: That answer was ready for tabling last Wednesday, but we did not reach the questions. I have it ready for tabling today.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATO—INQUIRY AS TO DISCUSSION OF ARMS SHIPMENTS TO TUNISIA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Algoma East): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Before doing so, perhaps I may be permitted to extend to him my congratulations and good wishes as he enters the House of Commons and takes on a portfolio which, perhaps I am in as good a position as anyone to know, offers him new and enlarged opportunities to continue to serve the country, as he has already done with such distinction in war and in peace.

My question is whether the hon. gentleman can tell the house if the decision of the United States and the United Kingdom governments to send arms to Tunisia was discussed in the North Atlantic council before that decision was made public.

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in the first place I desire to express to the hon. member for Algoma East my deep appreciation of, and gratitude for, his kind words of welcome. I wish through you, sir, to express to him the hope that I shall be a worthy member of this house, and indeed I declare my intention to do my best to live up to its high traditions.

I am indeed grateful, Mr. Speaker, to the hon. member for Algoma East for sending to me a copy of this question which, in effect, is: was there or was there not consultation within the NATO council before the United Kingdom or the United States took the action of sending arms to Tunisia. I have ascertained that the answer is no.

INCOME TAX

INQUIRY AS TO NEW EDITION OF BOOK ON PENSION PLANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to my friend and my enemy the Minister of National Revenue. In view of the fact that the minister's predecessor banned his own department's blue book entitled "Pension Plans for Income Tax Deductibility", first edition, as unfit literature for certain income taxpayers to read, and in view of the promise of the former minister that another edition of this booklet would be issued after further study of the objectionable paragraphs by his officials, would the minister inform the house when the second and expurgated edition of this blue book in question may be available for general use?

Hon. G. C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the hon. gentleman realizes the attention which I pay to literature which requires censorship, and I presume that is why he has referred to this volume as an expurgated one. If it were expurgated I have not had the time to give the blue book the attention which I know the hon. member would expect me to give, but I have known that such a volume, expurgated or otherwise, has been prepared in draft form, is presently being considered by the officers of the department, will shortly be submitted to me and thereafter I will be able to answer definitely the question which has been put to me by my charming and gracious friend.

Inquiries of the Ministry

NEWFOUNDLAND

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF LIEUTENANT GOVERNOR

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. T. Stick (Trinity-Conception): I would like to direct a question to the right hon. Prime Minister. When will the Prime Minister announce the appointment of a lieutenant governor for the province of Newfoundland?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I hope it will be the day after tomorrow.

POSTAL SERVICE

GRAND RAPIDS, MAN.—REQUEST FOR IMPROVEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Can the Postmaster General promise any improvement in the mail service at Grand Rapids, Manitoba, where they claim they only get mail every two months?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member's question was somewhat more rapid in reaching me —I got it about an hour ago. The matter is now being looked into and every effort will be made, if the facts are as stated, to improve the situation.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SUPREME COURT OF CANADA—REPORTED WITHDRAWAL OF JUDGE FROM CASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in the absence of the Minister of Justice may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Is the Prime Minister aware of the report that this morning in the Supreme Court of Canada the right of Mr. Justice Locke to sit on a certain case was challenged, and that Mr. Locke withdrew from the case? Has the minister any comment to make on what is reported to have happened, and could he say whether this is a precedent which might be followed in other courts in the future?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge whatsoever of what the hon. gentleman has in mind. I have not heard any report in that connection; therefore I am not in a position to give any answer.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister if he does learn that the report is correct, will he make a statement on the matter tomorrow?

[Mr. Nowlan.]

NATIONAL CAPITAL PLAN

REPORTED ABANDONMENT OF PROPOSED GREEN BELT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister based on a report which appeared in the Ottawa Journal on November 16. I may say I have not given him notice of this question, and if he wishes to let the question stand as notice I will be quite content.

My question is whether or not the government has decided to abandon plans for the proposed green belt around the national capital, or whether the government has made any changes in policy affecting the green belt and, if so, what are those changes?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer to both questions is in the negative.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

INDIAN AFFAIRS—INQUIRY AS TO PLACING ON AGENDA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Are there any arrangements to place the matter of Indian affairs and dominion-provincial co-operation relating thereto on the agenda for the forthcoming dominion-provincial conference.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker.

[Later:]

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question supplementary to the question I asked earlier of the Prime Minister about Indian affairs. Would the Prime Minister or the government look with favour on a request, if it were made, to place this matter of Indian affairs on the agenda of the dominion-provincial conference?

Mr. Speaker: The house does not concern itself with purely hypothetical questions, and I think this question comes in that category.

[Later:]

INQUIRY AS TO LETTER FROM PREMIER OF MANITOBA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I could ask the Prime Minister if he has received a letter from the premier of Manitoba, which has been referred to in the press, regarding the agenda of the federal-provincial conference and, if so, would he be willing to table the letter?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will make inquiries. I have no recollection at the moment of such a letter, but if there is one it will be tabled.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

BRITISH COLUMBIA—INQUIRY AS TO EXTENSION ON VANCOUVER ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister of which I sent him notice this morning. In view of the pledge to extend the trans-Canada highway to northern Vancouver island, made by the Progressive Conservative candidate in Comox-Alberni during the last election campaign, will the federal government proceed with the construction of this highway? Or will the Prime Minister propose this extension at the forthcoming dominion-provincial conference?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the trans-Canada highway comes under the jurisdiction of the Department of Public Works, so perhaps I should answer this question. As the hon. member knows, this highway is being constructed as a joint venture between the federal government and the provincial governments. Any change in the terms of the agreements with the respective provinces would have to be made with the consent of both parties. As yet there has been no change made in the agreement with the province of British Columbia along the lines suggested by the hon. member.

FRUIT

APPLES—REPORTED IMPORTATION OF UNITED STATES CULLS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. C. Christian (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the hon. the Minister of Agriculture of which I have given him notice. Has the Minister of Agriculture anything further to report to the house relative to the importation and sale of cull apples from the United States in Canada, and the steps being taken by his department to promote the sale of Canadian apples in Canada?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of this question. The fruit, vegetables and honey regulations made under the authority of the Fruit, Vegetables and Honey Act makes the following provision with respect to apples being imported into Canada:

> Apples shall not be below the requirements of Canada commercial or "C" grade.

The regulations further provide:

> Importations from the United States of America may be considered in compliance with the foregoing if the accompanying United States government inspection certificate as endorsed by the United States inspector "meets Canadian import requirements" as follows: (a) apples shall meet the requirements of one or other of the following grades, namely, United States extra fancy, United States fancy, United States No. 1 or United States No. 1 cookers, of 2¼ inches minimum diameter or 234 box count size, and additionally the condition requirements of "Standards for Export" as defined by the United States Department of Agriculture—

Apples that meet the requirements for Canada commercial or "C" grade or comparable United States grade are not considered or classified as culls. Should it be found that after having entered Canada apples from the United States are below the certified or declared grade the importer or consignee is required to regrade the apples according to Canadian standards.

Recently two shipments of imported apples—and some apples given to me by the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Gardiner) came from one of these shipments—have been found to be below grade and have been placed under detention for regrading, but the inspection of imported apples from the United States indicates that the proportion of below grade apples is very small.

During the five crop years, July 1, 1952 to June 30, 1957, importations of United States apples into Canada averaged 744,000 bushels, while during the same period Canada exported to the United States an average of 1,493,000 bushels.

An hon. Member: Good Liberal policy.

Mr. Harkness: The Department of Agriculture is actively engaged in many ways in promoting the sale of all agricultural products, with particular emphasis on those which may be in surplus supply.

The 1957 Canadian apple crop is presently estimated at 13.4 million bushels, slightly lower than the 1950-1954 average of 13.6 million bushels. A sterling allocation of a dollar equivalent of approximately $3½ million has been provided for importations of North American apples into the United Kingdom, and it is anticipated that a satisfactory volume of Canadian apples will be exported under this allocation. In addition, a significant volume of Canadian apples is being exported to markets in western Europe. Exports to the United States may be expected to be in the neighbourhood of 1½ million bushels. It would appear that there should not be any difficulty in disposing of this year's crop at relatively satisfactory prices.

TRADE

WHEAT—REPORTED USE OF ADDITIONAL MONEY TO FINANCE CREDIT SALES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Can the minister say whether he was announcing government policy when, according to a report of a statement he made in Winnipeg, he said that the $100 million to be voted by parliament as additional money for the Export Credits Insurance Act will be used at least to some extent to finance credit sales of wheat; and was the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources also stating government policy when, according to a press report, he said the availability of this money should result in credit being extended for the sale of 50 million bushels of wheat in 1958?

Mr. Benidickson: An extension of good Liberal policy.

Mr. Fleming: There is no such thing as good Liberal policy.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have one or two press reports here which do not seem to coincide with the one which the hon. member has mentioned. I am therefore at a loss to answer his question; but the Export Credits Insurance Act has been used for some considerable time as an assistance to exporters who enter into trading arrangements concerning the sale of our wheat overseas.

Mr. Argue: Since the question of the press report has been raised, I wonder if I may refer, for the minister's benefit, to the issue of the Montreal Gazette of this morning, page 2, in which is stated, in a Canadian Press message from Winnipeg dated November 17:

> Mr. Churchill said Canada may come into sharper competition with the United States in the field of grain sales on credit as a result of action now being taken in parliament.

The article goes on to say:

> Mr. Churchill said the change will give the crown corporation more room to insure exporters against losses and may bring more Canadian action in the trend toward credit deals in wheat.

Was this statement made by the minister?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I have now discovered the press report to which the hon. member refers, and I notice that the second paragraph is in quotation marks as a statement of mine. The other statements are not in quotation marks, so I think the hon. member can hardly attribute them to me; they are an expression of opinion on the part of the reporter.

[Mr. Harkness.]

Mr. Argue: I wonder if I may ask a supplementary question. Has the government any policy for the extension of credit sales of wheat to match the new policy announced, according to the press this morning, by the United States Secretary of Agriculture, Mr. Benson, who is asking congress for another billion dollars for its surplus disposal program?

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member wishes to know if we have any policy with regard to extending our credit sales of wheat. The answer is yes, and I have stated that in the house on other occasions. I do not know what is so surprising with regard to that particular inquiry at the present time.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): If and when the minister receives a report from the trade commissioner at Hong Kong with regard to the latter's recent visit to China, will he also say whether or not credits will be extended to China if China requires them in order to buy Canadian wheat in 1958?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I will be glad to give the house a report when I receive one from the trade commissioner.

CANADIAN SURPLUS DISPOSAL PROGRAM—REQUEST FOR STATEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jacob Schulz (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that the United States just announced their fourth surplus disposal agreement with Pakistan amounting to $53 million, which brings the total of such agreements between the two countries to $186 million, would the minister be prepared to make a statement to the house at this time as to what our government is doing with regard to disposing of our surplus agricultural products?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Springfield has referred to the United States disposal program as it relates to Pakistan. I am not at all sure whether that is an outright gift or a long-term arrangement or what it is, but only recently it was announced here in this house that we have made a gift of wheat to Pakistan which is very acceptable to that country.

Mr. Coldwell: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Was the wheat proposal a gift or was it part of the Colombo plan?

Mr. Churchill: It was under the Colombo plan, actually, as a gift.

Mr. Coldwell: As a gift?

Mr. Benidickson: May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is it a gift or is it something arranged to create counterpart funds?

Mr. Churchill: Counterpart funds—they might use them when they wish to. Insofar as Canada is concerned it was a gift under the Colombo plan.

Mr. Coldwell: It was part of the Colombo plan; that is the whole thing.

[Later:]

Mr. Schulz: Again I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, Mr. Speaker. I am not sure that he got my question last time. I was not particularly interested in the kind of deals he made with Pakistan, but with what this government is doing with regard to disposing of surplus wheat in general.

Mr. Churchill: If the hon. member will sit down I will answer. The hon. member wants to know what the government is doing with regard to disposal of our surplus wheat in general.

Mr. Argue: We have been trying to find out for months.

Mr. Marler: You won't know any more after this.

Mr. Churchill: I regret that I did not have the opportunity to make the speech I had prepared to deliver at the second reading stage of the cash advances bill; otherwise the hon. member would have had full information. But the most energetic steps are being taken to dispose of our surplus wheat. The wheat board representatives spent about six weeks in the United Kingdom and in Europe in an endeavour to promote sales of our wheat, and I was there for a part of that time with them.

An hon. Member: They did that last year.

Mr. Churchill: I think substantial results will come from that. Inquiries are being received from various countries in Europe and elsewhere with regard to the purchase of Canadian wheat, and I see no reason to doubt that we may reach an export total of 300 million bushels this year. If you add that to the home consumption of approximately 150 million to 160 million bushels of wheat, and then subtract from that total the production for this year, you will find that we should dispose of 100 million bushels of the surplus that was handed over to us when we took office on June 21.

Mr. Tucker: Because of a short crop; that is all.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister say whether any further negotiations are taking place between Canada and India for the supplying of additional quantities of wheat to that country because of the very widespread and disastrous famine conditions there?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, we are aware of the difficulties that India is facing with regard to feeding her population. I do not think any questions should be asked, or answers expected, with regard to negotiations that may be going on at this moment with various countries of the world, because India is not the only country that is affected by a shortage of crops.

I assure the hon. member that we are just as anxious as he is with regard to assisting any country in need.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): May I ask a supplementary question. Is the government intending to go beyond the normal channels of trade in order to compete with the United States of America in the disposal of farm surpluses?

Mr. Churchill: I wish the hon. gentleman would explain what he means by "going beyond the normal channels of trade".

Mr. Coldwell: Accepting sterling.

Mr. Quelch: The United States of America is using the method of barter and also the method of accepting foreign currency, and these methods are beyond the normal channels of trade.

Mr. Churchill: The Canadian wheat board has been accepting convertible sterling for the sale of wheat. The wheat board has not proposed any barter deals, nor has it suggested accepting local currencies that are not convertible into dollars.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Strange as it may seem, it is on wheat.

In view of the television news service and press releases that on the return from a visit to China of ten days our trade commissioner reports that there is a strong possibility of sales of wheat to China next year, has the minister any additional information that he can give on that possibility?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I think this question, or one similar to it, was asked earlier today, and I said that when I receive the report of the trade commissioner who has just recently returned from China I will be very pleased to apprize the house of the facts.

Mr. Coldwell: The minister has been asked a number of questions on wheat. I wonder whether he would be prepared to have that very good speech that he could not deliver some little time ago mimeographed and distributed to the house.

Mr. Churchill: I am continually flattered by the remarks of my hon. friend on my speeches. I just recently gave another one in Regina, my hon. friend's home town, which was very well received, and he is welcome to all my speeches.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Perhaps the minister should publish a book.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

ONTARIO—ASSISTANCE TO UNEMPLOYED WHO HAVE EXHAUSTED BENEFITS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Labour or the Minister of National Health and Welfare, or possibly both, whether in view of the fact that many unemployed workers have exhausted their benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act, there is some reason for expecting that the province of Ontario is likely to accept the federal government's proposal for assistance to the unemployed in these circumstances under the public assistance act?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I am unable to give a categorical answer to the hon. member at this moment. I do not know what the intentions of the province are or whether it will accept the present formula.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Perhaps the minister will permit a supplementary question—

Mr. Speaker: May I say it occurs to me that the question which the hon. member for Essex East has asked is not strictly in order, because it asks about the likely action of a government for which this ministry has no responsibility. I would ask the hon. member not to pursue this line of questioning in his supplementary question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, my question was based upon a reply which was given to me in writing some days ago as to the stage of negotiations reached between the two governments in this matter, and it was predicated upon the existence of correspondence between the government of Ontario and the federal government.

[Mr. Churchill.]

As the Minister of Labour knows, many people have exhausted their benefits—

An hon. Member: Speech.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Perhaps the Minister of Labour would be good enough to take this very important question into consideration, because there are many people getting federal assistance, and I should appreciate it if he could give a reply tomorrow or later this week.

STRIKE OF RIVER PILOTS, KINGSTON MARINE DISTRICT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, could I ask the Minister of Transport a question. Is the minister aware that three foreign ships have rammed the locks of the seaway at Iroquois in the Montreal-Kingston pilotage area because according to officers—I take it of his department—they did not have pilots and caused considerable damage to the canal property as well as to themselves? Will he say whether there is any change in the negotiations between the officials of the Department of Transport and the pilots themselves? I will be glad to send this clipping over to him.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any change in the negotiations between our officials and the pilots. I was not aware that any ships had rammed this lock. I will look into it and give my hon. friend an answer tomorrow.

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REPORTED CLOSING DOWN OF HOWE SOUND COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I am going to ask a question of the Prime Minister. Has the Prime Minister been advised that on the 19th of this month the directors of the Howe Sound Company are meeting in New York to consider whether or not to close the mine at Britannia? Has the Prime Minister been advised of representations of the union, and the view that all B.C. members in this house share? If so, is it possible for the Prime Minister to advise us at this time as to whether any action is being taken by this government to keep the mine at Britannia in operation?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, as far as the first two questions are concerned, I have not that information; but I know the situation generally that prevails at the Britannia mine, and in order to secure certain information and also ascertain what, if anything, can be done, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) is presently in British Columbia.

NEW WESTMINSTER, B.C.—LAY-OFF OF SHIFT ON DREDGE NO. 322

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Is the minister aware that the Department of Public Works dredge No. 322 is laying off one full shift of crew members, effective November 30, in the New Westminster region? Would the minister indicate what is the purpose of the shut-down?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): May I take this question as notice, Mr. Speaker?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING—INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (St. Antoine-Westmount): May I ask the Minister of Transport whether it is the intention of the government to set up a special committee on railways and shipping owned and operated by the government at the present session of parliament?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I will have to confer with my colleague, the leader of the house, on that matter, and answer as soon as I can.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO PRESENTATION THIS SESSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. May I ask the minister whether his vision is good enough to see the banner headline of this issue of the Winnipeg Tribune of June 26, which reads: "Fall Budget to Slash Taxes"? I wonder, also, if his vision is good enough to see the smiling picture of himself in the left hand corner.

Mr. Sinclair: If the minister's vision is not good enough to see the paper held by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), he can look this way; this is the same one.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Based on this press report my question to the minister is this. In view of the definite statement outside the house that there would be a budget at this session to slash taxes, can the minister not now give a definite statement inside the house as to whether or not this action will be carried through?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, to the first question the answer is no, to the second question the answer is no, and to the third question the answer is that that information will be communicated to the house at the appropriate time.

Mr. Sinclair: He is learning.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if the minister's answer to the first question about his vision is "no", perhaps he had better see an eye doctor.

Mr. Benidickson: Smile, like in the picture.

WHEAT—ON-SITE STORAGE ERECTED BY FARMERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. In view of the fact that on-site storage for wheat owned by elevator companies and by individual businessmen has currently been approved by the wheat board, would the minister say whether an individual farmer or a group of farmers who are prepared to erect on-site storage of an acceptable standard would be given the same consideration?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question, the answer to which is as follows. The board of grain commissioners will only accept applications for on-site storage from licencees of the board. Such licencees must have adequate equipment, such as scales, to receive grain from producers and to issue the necessary documents. In other words, such on-site storage is regarded as an annex to the elevator licensed to receive grain at that delivery point.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ROYAL COMMISSION ON ENERGY—INQUIRY AS TO COMMENCEMENT OF SITTINGS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (St. Antoine-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Prime Minister a question with regard to the royal commission on energy. Last Thursday I asked him if he could say when the first sittings of the commission were likely to be undertaken, at which time the Prime Minister replied, as reported at page 1106 of Hansard of November 14:

I will try and have that information for the hon. gentleman at the next session.

I am not sure whether or not he meant the next session, but could the hon. gentleman let us have the information today?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I will try to have that information at an early date.

Mr. Sinclair: That might be the next session, too.

PRIVILEGE

MR. MCIVOR—REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN OTTAWA "CITIZEN"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege for two reasons. On Friday a report appeared in newspapers across Canada commenting on the small number of members in the house; that is my first reason for raising the question of privilege. The other reason is that I am convinced that every member of parliament will either be in his seat or where duty calls him. I rise on a question of privilege at this time to state that one reason some hon. members were absent is explained by an article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of November 15, which says that 20 M.P.'s from Canada are now abroad and, Mr. Speaker, you would admit that even a member of parliament cannot be in two places at the same time.

Mr. Sinclair: Ottawa and Toronto.

Mr. McCleave: You've got 70 members missing today.

SHIPPING

NORTH SYDNEY—STATEMENT ON REPORTED DELAYS IN LOADING OF COAL

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Speaker, on Friday last the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay-Labrador (Mr. Ashbourne) asked me the following question:

Will the minister please look into the matter of delays occasioned to vessels loading coal at North Sydney for Newfoundland, and see if these loadings can be expedited?

The answer is as follows. Due to a wildcat strike and the 'flu epidemic there was a drastic cut in production during the past month in the North Sydney mines, causing delays in loading schooners for Newfoundland and larger carriers to St. Pierre and Miquelon. A check last night revealed there were schooners capable of carrying 3,500 tons of coal waiting in or near the port loading facilities at North Sydney.

A meeting was held this morning in Sydney attended by Mr. MacDonald, recently appointed executive vice-president of Dosco, Mr. Harold Gordon, vice president and general manager, Dominion Coal Company, Neil McLellan, chief of transportation, Dominion Coal, Captain J. L. Gullage, expeditor for Newfoundland government and schooner operators, the mayor of North Sydney and some members of the board of trade, North Sydney.

The situation was thoroughly studied and discussed, with the result that another meeting will be held this afternoon or tomorrow morning between Mr. McLellan, his operating staff and Captain Gullage and the committee of schooner operators to work out shipping schedules which are aimed at bringing shipping time back to normal by or before the end of this month.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—REPORTED RAILWAY AND ROAD DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. Would the minister care to comment on the reported statement in this morning's press by the deputy minister of northern affairs and national resources that expenditures of $85 million for railway and development roads in the Great Slave and Great Bear lake areas are essential for development? Does this important statement constitute government policy for the expenditure of what is termed a "trifling amount" relative to the natural wealth to be exploited in this region?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Acting Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact that the hon. member has given me notice of this question. Unfortunately, I received it just as I was coming into the house; therefore I shall take it as notice. However, I would point out to him what I think he knows, that announcements of government policy are made only by members of the government.

WAR DEAD

GOVERNMENT CONTRIBUTION TO COST OF PILGRIMAGE OF MOTHERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister, of which I have not given him notice. If it requires it, perhaps he will take this as notice. Has the Prime Minister received, as most members of the House of Commons have, a letter from the mothers of war dead, asking consideration by the government of a financial contribution to aid in the pilgrimage of the mothers of war dead to graves overseas; and is any consideration being given to this request?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I have no knowledge of such a request but, as the hon. member has said, it can be taken as notice and I will have the matter looked into.

SUPPLY

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

Mr. St. Laurent (Quebec East): Does the Minister of Finance not care to make a statement at this moment?

Mr. Fleming: No.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Leader of the Opposition): From the supplementaries we have an indication of the additions to the original estimates that the minister wishes to have considered by the house, but he did give us some indication that there were in the other estimates items that he was not going to ask the house to give favourable consideration to, and there was the suggestion that perhaps he might have a list of those items prepared. It would certainly be a convenience, and it would probably make for a more expeditious consideration of the estimates, if we could have that information, if it were convenient for the Minister of Finance to have them tabulated so we could see what the general effect would be.

Perhaps when the minister closes the debate on the motion he might inform the house whether it would be possible for him to help us to that extent in the full consideration of the estimates.

I would like to make a brief statement about the attitude of the official opposition regarding this and the succeeding supply motions provided for by the rules. The house leader expressed the hope that it might not be necessary at this session to have six of those supply motions. We realize that this is not an ordinary session for which the rules were intended to have ordinary application.

In so far at least as the voting of supply is concerned, this is a continuation of the session that was interrupted by the general election. Except for the supplementary estimates, the other estimates are those which the preceding government recommended to the house at the last session of parliament and we would be quite prepared to facilitate their consideration. So far as the official opposition is concerned, we would be willing to forgo the right members have in ordinary session to six of these motions and we would even be prepared to agree to have all but one or two departments called when this motion is agreed to. The reserving of one or two departments would mean that there would have to be at least one other supply motion which would provide an opportunity to discuss whatever developments might have taken place in the meantime and would, I think, preserve the rights of parliament to retain such an opportunity for the voicing of grievances if they did arise.

With that reservation, we believe that the time of the house that can be devoted to motions to go into supply would be more profitably used in considering the estimates themselves than in a general discussion. That is all the more true in view of the fact that the time is now limited. The year for which these estimates have been prepared is well advanced and at a not too distant date we will be reaching the time when consideration will have to be given to the submission of estimates for the following year. I do not think it has ever been the experience of parliament to have two successive years' estimates under consideration at the same time.

For that reason and for the general reasons I gave when I spoke in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the official opposition intends to offer no amendment to this motion to go into supply nor to support any amendment that may come from any other quarter. The reasons, I think, are obvious. There are only four more Mondays after this one before Christmas and though these motions do not, under the rules, have to be submitted on a Monday they are drawn in such a way that they envisage the use of the two first days of a week for the consideration of each one of these motions. If two days were taken to discuss each one that would take up so much time that the reason we gave for our stand on the address could not reasonably be expected to be implemented.

We felt it was the desire of the public that the government should have the opportunity to put before parliament the legislation it felt was required to implement such of its promises as, after its experience with the responsibilities of government, it feels can be implemented at this time. Although certain of these measures have been dealt with by the house, there are still others to come forward and we think it is in the public interest that there be a fair opportunity to have these measures brought before parliament to be dealt with and to be considered and disposed of.

Perhaps the leader of the house would also consider whether it would not make for the expeditious consideration of the estimates if an estimates committee was set up to which such departments as public works, northern affairs and transport could be referred inasmuch as there are many items of more particular interest to some members of the House of Commons than to others because of their local, immediate effect. That, it seems to me, would leave more of the time of the general committee available for the consideration of the portion of the estimates that are of more general application throughout the whole country.

I can assure the members of the government that, so far as consideration and disposition of the estimates are concerned, we are prepared to proceed in such a way as to leave the government a full and fair opportunity to have the house consider whatever legislation they feel it is their duty to submit in view of the campaign they waged. In order that such legislation may receive the consideration it deserves, we will be prepared to co-operate and to expedite the serious, businesslike consideration of the estimates so that the appropriation bills can be dealt with in the proper order and at the proper time.

Of course, we wish to reserve our right to criticize the present administration of government departments, but it will be our policy to expedite that discussion and to expedite the adoption of the items required to enable the government to carry on the business of the country without any impediment resulting from the fact that Christmas is coming upon us pretty rapidly, in fact at a rate as rapid as the shortening at the present time of the daylight hours.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, we of this group have already demonstrated our readiness to co-operate in placing upon the statute books such important and beneficial legislation as has been introduced by the present government. We are also prepared to co-operate in the proper and expeditious consideration of the estimates that have been placed before this session of parliament. But, Mr. Speaker, we are not prepared to abdicate our role as an opposition party in this House of Commons. We believe that even in a parliament made up as this one is, where no party has a majority, it is still desirable in the interests of democracy that there be a government and an opposition. If my hon. friends of the Liberal party are not prepared to be that opposition, we are.

We are prepared when there are opportunities presented by the rules of the house to state our grievances and, if necessary, to divide the house on some of these matters particularly where we feel the present government is falling down. We are amazed at the suggestion that because Christmas is coming or because new estimates may soon be prepared for presentation to parliament the time should be curtailed for the consideration of $5 billion of public money which is before the House of Commons in the form of the present estimates.

Mr. Benidickson: That was not the point at all.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It may be argued by both the Conservatives and the Liberals that these estimates are those prepared by the previous government. Quite true. But it is also a true statement, it is also a statement of constitutional and parliamentary fact, that those estimates were presented to this session of parliament by the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). They are thus the present government's estimates. I know the minister made certain qualifications, but they are the present government's estimates. It is the present government that is administering the affairs of this country and is spending this money. We submit that members of parliament would not be doing their duty if they did not properly consider estimates involving this huge sum of money of the order of $5 billion.

We feel, Mr. Speaker, that these are important days in the history of democracy and that this is no time for an opposition in a democratic parliament to abdicate its function. I can assure you we have no intention of doing so. That is not to say we will delay unnecessarily the proceedings of the house. This does not mean we will not reach some compromise with the house leader in trying to arrange the business of the house. This does not mean that we are not prepared to surrender even perhaps some of our rights in view of the length of time that there is between now and next summer, shall I say, for two sessions of parliament. But let no one imagine that we are going to surrender our rights in any wholesale fashion on these supply motions, nor are we prepared to agree, as the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. St. Laurent) was prepared to do, to cut down to two or three the number of motions for going into supply.

We are not prepared to agree, as he suggested, to the calling of all the departments but two or three when this supply motion is concluded. Already too many grievances have piled up since this government came into power for it to be suggested that only one or two supply motions might be moved at this session of parliament. As I say, we are prepared to discuss these matters with the house leader in the usual way. It is no secret that we have already been doing that. But we are giving our pledge to the Canadian people that in so far as it lies within our power there will still be an opposition playing its role in this democratic parliament.

HEALTH INSURANCE—FEDERAL PAYMENTS TO PROVINCES WITHOUT DELAY

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise today, Mr. Speaker, on behalf of this group on this first motion for Your Honour to leave the chair for the house to go into committee of supply to state a grievance and to move an amendment. The grievance is one which has been apparent right from the day this session of parliament opened. As a matter of fact, it was the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) who got the floor just ahead of me and first drew attention to it on the second day of this session. It has become apparent to us that hon. members across the way, who last session were so keen on an early implementation of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, are now stalling with respect to the implementation of that important piece of legislation.

Mr. Fleming: Nonsense.

Mr. Quelch: I rise on a point of order, Mr. Speaker. I think it has always been understood in this house that when a subject is introduced the discussion of that subject will continue before going on to another one. The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. St. Laurent) brought up the question of procedure, and he was followed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). Now, the hon. member has left that subject and is going on to another one. I merely want to stress the point that if he moves an amendment now it should still be in order to deal with the question of procedure, which was first of all introduced by the Leader of the Opposition followed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, without any other person having a chance to discuss the same matter.

Mr. Pickersgill: Closure.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I believe it is quite clear, Mr. Speaker, that any other member would be able to comment on the question of procedure in the course of his remarks on my amendment.

Mr. Speaker: When the debate has shifted from one grievance to another there is some question about the possibility of an hon. member reverting to an earlier grievance. However, I do not consider the remarks about procedure to be a grievance. I do not think there will be any difficulty, when it comes time for the hon. member to deal with the question of procedure, certainly not from my present point of view.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Before the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) rose on a point of order I thought I heard a suggestion from the front benches opposite that I was talking nonsense. We shall, of course, answer that charge by a number of references I shall be making to the record. Before I do so, perhaps in order to let the house know the terms of the amendment we propose to move, I might move it now. I may say that it spells out the grievance we have in mind and therefore I move, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue):

> That all the words after the word "that" to the end of the question be struck out and that the following words be substituted therefor:
> "this house is of the opinion that the government should consider the advisability of taking immediately whatever steps are necessary so that federal payments under the provisions of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act will be available without delay to any provinces with hospital insurance plans in operation, as a further step toward the achievement of a nation-wide health insurance plan based on federal-provincial co-operation".

In moving this amendment I want to make it clear that in our view the government has failed to take the steps that it should be taking to make sure that federal money will be available under the provisions of this act at the earliest possible date. Perhaps before I give the evidence as to the failure of the government to act on this important subject I should give hon. members a few interesting quotations from the record of the last session of parliament. This story of health insurance, and it is also true of hospital insurance, is of course a long one in the House of Commons and in the country generally. As a matter of fact, the Progressive Conservative party has had a fair amount to say about these matters for a number of years. I would say that for a few years they were a bit confused as to where they stood with respect to health insurance, but last year when the former minister of national health and welfare brought in his bill No. 320, they gave it full support. They, as we did, sought amendments to it. They, as we did, moved amendments, but after the amendments were disposed of and we came to a final vote on third reading there was a recorded vote in this house and every member present voted for Bill No. 320 which is now chapter 28, I believe, of the statutes of 1957.

During the debate on that bill, and the resolution preceding it, hon. members who are now on the government side of the house took certain positions very definitely. In the first place, they wanted the legislation implemented as early as possible. They wanted these benefits to get to the provinces and to the Canadian people with the least possible delay. All of us who were here will recall the very valuable and helpful contributions that were made in that debate by our late good friend the then member for Lanark, Dr. Blair, who was the spokesman for the Conservative party on that occasion.

On March 25, as reported at page 2645 of Hansard when we were debating the resolution concerning this matter, the late Dr. Blair said this:

> For the past 12 years, on behalf of the Conservative party, I have advocated measures to benefit health conditions and care for the people of Canada. All political parties in this house have been in favour of such a measure. We may not all have agreed on the general form of insurance, but one point is clear, and that is that we all appreciate the fact that the public money that is spent on legislation to combat sickness, disease and misery, will pay high dividends in health standards and happiness of the people of our nation.

Later in that same speech, on page 2648 of Hansard for March 25, 1957, the hon. member said this:

> We regard the whole matter as of the most vital importance. This party is of the opinion that such a plan should be available to any or all the provinces.

Later, he said:

> If it is necessary now, let us put a plan into operation as soon as it can be done in an orderly way. Every month of delay is another month when we permit these discrepancies to exist.

In the same debate on page 2658 of Hansard the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) is quoted, in the concluding paragraph of his speech, as follows:

> I end by urging the minister to waive this silly requirement of six provinces. Take five provinces, sign them up and let us get the whole matter under way without further ado.

That was the present Minister of Transport when he was on this side of the house. In the same speech he praised the part which Premier Frost had played in bringing the matter to a head and his whole plea was for immediate action to get this plan into operation.

A little later in the course of that debate a point of order was raised regarding an amendment to the resolution moved by the hon. member for Lanark, the late Dr. Blair, which was an amendment which would have removed the requirement that six provinces agree to the legislation before it could become effective. The validity of the amendment was challenged. Now, who spoke in support of the validity of that amendment but the present Minister of Finance, the member for Eglington. As one would expect, in the course of his remarks on the point of order he veered off from the point of order to the substance of the amendment and made it clear that the purpose of Dr. Blair's amendment was to accelerate the coming into effect of this legislation.

The contribution of the Minister of Finance will be found at page 2663 of Hansard for March 25, 1957. He thus joined with the others in making it clear that his party wanted to see acceleration—immediate action—to get the plan into effect with the least possible delay.

Well, that was at the resolution stage. When we got to debate in committee of the whole, after second reading, this plea for speed was made again. As a matter of fact there was an excellent demonstration of the desire of the house to get early action on this legislation evidenced by the fact that there was no debate at all on the second reading of that bill. The house was ready to give speedy passage to this legislation but, when we got into the committee of the whole on the clauses of the bill, the late Dr. Blair, again speaking on behalf of the Conservative party, said as is recorded at page 3099 of Hansard on April 4:

> At the resolution stage, I pointed out certain things with which we were not in agreement. However, we do welcome this bill and we want to see it in operation.

In that same speech at page 3101 the same member said this:

> If this bill is necessary at the present time, if it is going to help people, let there be as little delay as possible. Again I point out it is not necessary to have the six provinces, or a majority of the people agreeing to it to bring it into effect. Under these conditions the sooner we get this bill into operation in any province the better it will be. It is possible that when the bill is being discussed in the house we will make suggestions from time to time but we want to see this bill passed and the plan put in operation as soon as possible.

That was the whole tone of the remarks of my hon. friends opposite when they were on this side of the house: "Let there be no delay; let us get this legislation through and get it into effect." As a matter of fact the present Prime Minister himself got into the debate when we were at the third reading stage, as recorded on page 3385 of Hansard for April 10, 1957. Here is what he said:

> Naturally we are very pleased with the legislation. I think a word of tribute is due to the premier of Ontario the Hon. Leslie Frost, who, at the last dominion-provincial conference demanded that the subject be placed on the agenda and ever since has applied pressure in order to achieve the legislation now before us,—

There you have it, Mr. Speaker; all of those who were on this side of the house and whom I have quoted—except Dr. Blair whom we do miss from this house—are now important personages in the government of today. You will note that when they were in opposition they were most insistent that what was most important about this legislation was to get it into operation at the earliest possible moment.

A second point which my hon. friends opposite made with respect to this legislation was that it should be changed so that it could be readily implemented. In particular they wanted a change in the requirement that six provinces agree to the legislation, as a specific way of getting it into effect without delay. All those who were here will remember the fight we of the C.C.F. put up on this score; they will know how time and time again we tried to get the former minister of national health and welfare to settle for four or five provinces; in fact we tried our very best to get five provinces accepted when he had five provinces representing the majority of the population of Canada. However, the point I am making today is that an equally strong fight was put up on this point by those representing the party now in power.

If I may again refer to the late Dr. Blair I would point out that on March 25 he moved an amendment calling for a change in the terms of the resolution which the former minister of national health and welfare had introduced. That resolution stipulated that a majority of the provinces, representing a majority of the population, had to agree before the plan could come into effect. The late Dr. Blair went further than we went; we were trying to get the six province requirement cut down to five but the late Dr. Blair, on behalf of the Conservative party, moved that the plan go into effect when any province had entered into an agreement. He reduced it right down to the singular in an attempt to persuade the House of Commons that the importance of this health legislation was such that it should be made available to the people of even one province if that one province was prepared to enter into an appropriate agreement. That amendment which was moved on behalf of the Conservative party is to be found on page 2648 of Hansard for March 25 of this year. I would remind hon. members again that on that point there was support from the present Minister of Finance. When the validity of the amendment was challenged, he made it clear that it was a major concern so far as his party was concerned to get rid of that six province requirement in order that the legislation might be made effective without delay.

As reported on page 3247 of Hansard for April 8, Dr. Blair when we got into the committee on the bill again moved that the appropriate clause be amended by reducing the requirement of six provinces down to five. In other words this Conservative party first tried to move that this legislation be made effective if one province agreed and, when they lost out there, they made a tactical retreat to a very sensible position, namely that it should become effective if five agreed. The late Dr. Blair was supported once again, as I have said, in that amendment by the Minister of Finance who was taking an active part in that debate, making it clear that the whole desire of the Conservative party was to get the legislation amended so that there would not be any roadblocks involved and so that it could be brought into effect and federal money made available to the provinces at the earliest possible moment.

When we got to clause 6 of the bill—that was the clause which had in it two subclauses and hon. members will recall that one of them was the six-province requirement—we tried to get a separate vote so that we could get rid of the second sub-clause. We lost out on that, but certainly it can be said that the Conservatives were as anxious as we were that the change should be made.

Then when we got to the third reading of the bill, two amendments were moved for reference back; the present Minister of Finance moved the second one, and I moved the first, which called for reconsideration of this clause that demanded that six provinces agree. The Minister of Finance and others in his party supported us in that amendment, and when the vote was called, as recorded in Hansard at page 3379 of April 10, we found that among those voting for our amendment to refer the matter back to committee and reconsider this clause were such persons as the present Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), the present Minister of Finance, the present Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith), the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill), the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr), the Secretary of State (Mrs. Fairclough), the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green), the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness), the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) and the senior Minister without Portfolio (Mr. Macdonnell). There you have 11 members of the present government, a majority of the present Conservative cabinet, who on April 10 of this year voted for an amendment to reduce that requirement of six provinces to something less, as a means of making it possible for this legislation to come into effect at the earliest possible moment.

At that time the premier of Ontario was saying that this was a ridiculous requirement, this requirement of six provinces. I might point out that he is still saying so, but in those days his view was being expressed here by those of us who were on this side of the house, by the Conservatives as well as by members of the C.C.F.

In summing up this part of my contention I would point out that there were three determined efforts made to get rid of this six-province requirement, one led by the C.C.F., one by the Conservatives, and one which was a joint effort. We failed on those three occasions because of the adamant position taken by the Liberals, but nevertheless the record shows that the Conservatives were just as anxious as we were to get rid of that requirement as a means of making it possible for this legislation to come into effect at an early date.

Then the same hon. members opposite had a third point which they made during the course of that debate, which was that the coverage of the legislation should be broadened. In particular, and they agreed with us in this, they felt it should be made to cover those in tubercular and mental hospitals; and hon. members opposite, led by the present Prime Minister, who asked questions about the matter on the orders of the day, supported by others, came back to this theme, as we did, again and again. As a matter of fact, in the speech which the Prime Minister made on third reading he said he welcomed the legislation and congratulated Premier Frost on having brought the matter to a head, but that he still hoped that in the end, before the legislation was made final, it would be broadened so as to include coverage for mental and tubercular patients.

On clause 2 of the bill, as recorded at page 3239 of Hansard of April 8, the present Minister of Finance moved an amendment to change the terms of that clause so that instead of tubercular and mental patients being excluded from the provisions of the bill they would specifically be included. Likewise, on third reading of the bill, after our amendment regarding the six-province requirement had been defeated, the present Minister of Finance also on April 10, moved another amendment to refer the bill back to committee of the whole for the purpose of broadening the clause which had to do with the extent of coverage, making it clear that the purpose of his amendment was to include mental and tubercular patients.

The present Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) was interested in the legislation, as well, and wanted the provisions to be broadened so as to include capital costs and depreciation as part of the shareable cost under the program. The present Minister of Agriculture made an interesting contribution to the debate with regard to the position of the Northwest Territories and, particularly, with regard to the position of Indians and Eskimos, making the point that it should be clear that they, too, were fully covered by the legislation.

In other words while there was the usual criticism which it is the right and duty of an opposition to make, though there were these amendments, and considerable discussion, the upshot of the whole debate as one remembers it, and as I have recognized again through reading it over the weekend, was that hon. gentlemen opposite wanted to see this legislation put into effect and its benefits made available to the people of Canada at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Speaker, I now come to a fourth point which hon. gentlemen opposite made in the course of that debate. Perhaps they should remember some of the things they said, to which I will now make reference specifically, when they are a bit restive under some of the critical things now being said by such speakers as the hon. member for Essex East, the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) and others who have sharp tongues. Hon. members opposite kept making the point —and I will prove this by chapter and verse —that it looked to them as if the former Liberal government was insincere, as if the former Liberal government did not really want this legislation to become effective. They reminded the former government again and again, as we did, that this question had had a history dating back to 1919, and that it had taken 38 years to reach this point. They pointed out also that the government had put into the legislation certain "roadblocks" which led a number of important people opposite to believe that this legislation was just something intended for the election, something which the former government did not really want brought into effect.

I turn for a quotation in support of what I am saying first to the senior Minister without Portfolio, the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell). I turn to the issue of Hansard of April 8. At page 3249 he said:

> Why does the minister feel it necessary to have his hands tied absolutely in case his optimism is not justified?

He was referring of course to the present member for Essex East who had said, with his usual optimism, that he would get seven provinces or more, and was sure that the six-province requirement was not a roadblock.

Mr. Pickersgill: He proved to be right.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member for Greenwood continued:

> The inference one would tend to draw would be that for some reason I cannot understand the minister does not want this thing to go through.

This is what a Conservative speaker said about the former Liberal administration, that is was insincere, that it did not want this hospital legislation to become effective. The hon. member for Greenwood continued:

> That is the inference a reasonable man could draw, unless the minister does what he has not done yet and explains that there is some reason in principle, a more effective reason, against now arming himself as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre indicated with a power or discretion so that if these other provinces do not come in within the next month or six weeks, the measure could still become law.

This is a reasonable man speaking, the representative for Greenwood, and he concludes:

> I repeat, unless the minister gives some reason for sticking to this, which he has not done, then the only inference I can draw is that for some reason that I do not understand the minister does not want this to go through.

That is a clear charge of insincerity against the former Liberal government by a Conservative member, who said that this legislation was just window dressing and that the government of that day did not intend to bring it into effect.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): And they were proved wrong.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And as recorded a few pages later the hon. member for Greenwood made it clear that this was not just something he had said by accident, for on page 3251 of Hansard he returned to the charge and said:

> I want to ask the minister once more whether he is going to answer the question I asked. If he does not, I want to ask him whether he can suggest to me any reason why I should not say, and say in public, that so far as I am concerned, I can only come to one conclusion, if the minister is not prepared to answer the question, that he does not wish this bill passed.

The hon. member for Greenwood was not alone in that suggestion that the former Liberal government was just indulging in window dressing. The present Minister of Finance had something to say along this line as reported at page 3248 of Hansard of April 8, 1957. These are his words:

> If the federal government had been more earnest in connection with this matter and had offered terms that were not so difficult for the provinces to meet, he certainly would have had the majority of the provinces before this time. If he really wishes to bring in the provinces, let him not insist upon such rigid terms.

There is an echoing of the words of the hon. member for Greenwood, the suggestion that if the former government was sincere in its desire to get hospital insurance implemented it could show that sincerity by cutting down on the rigidity of its terms. But let us not stop with the present senior Minister without Portfolio and the present Minister of Finance; let us see what the Prime Minister had to say on this point as to the sincerity of the present government.

Mr. Fleming: Present government?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am sorry, I meant the former government. The sincerity of the present government—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Can now be challenged.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —is now in question as well, but I shall come to that later. The present Prime Minister spoke just shortly before the debate on third reading concluded. I have already quoted part of what he said in which he welcomed the legislation and paid tribute to Premier Frost for having brought the matter to a head, but then towards the end of his remarks, as reported at page 3386 of Hansard of April 10, 1957, he said this:

> As I have followed the course of the legislation I have wondered sometimes whether the government really intended when it was introduced that it would go into effect, for the minister imposed a veto on its application by providing that a majority of the provinces in number and in population would have to join the scheme before the legislation would become effective. That I cannot understand. Why is there this departure from the provisions in the past for the bringing into effect of social legislation unless the reason for the imposition of the qualification in question—> —was the hope that the legislation could not or would not be implemented?

Listen to this:

There, Mr. Speaker, we have three important ministers in the present cabinet, the senior Minister without Portfolio, the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister himself, on record last spring saying that in their view the attitude of the former government in imposing these restrictions and in making it difficult for this legislation to be brought into effect was an indication to them that the former government was insincere, indulging in window dressing; that it really did not want hospital insurance to become part of the law of the land. These same hon. members I have quoted together with the Minister of Transport made it clear on several occasions that in their view they were the ones who had fostered health insurance, they were the ones, led by Premier Frost, who had brought this matter to a head. All of this was designed to give the impression that if the Liberals were insincere and if the Liberals were just carrying on the long story that started in 1919, give the Conservatives a chance and something would be done. Well, what have they done?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Nothing.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I thought I heard the hon. member for Essex East say, "nothing". If he did not, he certainly could have said it.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is what I said.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member is perfectly correct, they have done nothing. They have been in office since June 21. Plans have been made for a federal-provincial conference and hon. members are aware of the difficulty we have had getting statements as to whether or not the hospital insurance program will be discussed at that conference. We were told at first it would not be, and then we were told that it might be if ministers representing the provincial governments wished it to be discussed and when we asked whether the federal government would take the initiative in pushing this matter the reply was the same, "There is nothing standing in the way; the provincial governments can discuss this matter if they wish to do so". This is the kind of answer that is coming from hon. gentlemen opposite who said that my hon. friends in the Liberal party were insincere because they had put certain roadblocks in the legislation itself.

I point out there was no mention of the subject in the speech from the throne and there was very little mention of it in the official Progressive Conservative propaganda distributed during the election. In this respect we have something to say which is a little different from what we say with respect to many other items. In many instances we are asking the present government to implement the promises it made in the election campaign but so far as hospital insurance is concerned they were careful and cautious, relying on the impression they gave here last spring, the impression that they were the sincere ones, they were the ones who wanted something done. However, in the speech from the throne there was not a word about it nor has there been a voluntary statement on the matter by any minister of the crown since this house met on October 14. They have answered questions but it has been extremely difficult to get any proper answers to our questions on this subject.

We have ascertained by the questions we have asked that no agreements have been signed by any of the provinces although six appear to have indicated their agreement to go along with this plan and it may be that the correspondence with Manitoba amounts to the agreement of a seventh province. Nothing has been done about the contention of the Conservatives last spring that coverage should be extended to mental and tubercular hospitals nor has there been any suggestion that the legislation be amended to cut down the requirement of six provinces so the legislation might come into effect with fewer provinces signing agreements.

Perhaps the most ominous thing that has happened in connection with this matter is what I would refer to as a false interpretation that has been placed upon certain words in the act by the new Minister of National Health and Welfare. I confess that the minister did not take much part in the debate on this question in the last session; others of his colleagues were interested in health matters and he had other interests, but it does seem to me that he should have made himself fully aware of the background of the question I asked one day as to the difference between the words "in force" and "in operation". That background is extremely interesting and very significant. When the federal government made its proposals to the provinces in January last the paragraph having to do with a majority of the provinces representing a majority of the people agreeing to the plan ended up with these words:

—to take effect when the majority of provinces have such plans in operation.

The original proposal made by the former federal government was that what amounted to six provinces representing a majority of the people had to agree and those six provinces had to have their plans in operation before any money could be made available. Likewise, when the former minister of national health and welfare placed his resolution preceding the bill on the order paper on March 4, 1957, it read, as reported at page 1823 of Hansard of that date:

That it is expedient to introduce a measure to authorize contributions to be paid out of the consolidated revenue fund to provinces in respect of costs incurred by them in providing insured hospital and diagnostic services pursuant to provincial law and to agreements made in accordance with the said measure, to commence when at least six provinces, containing at least half the population of Canada, have entered into such agreements and qualified for the receipt of such contributions.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that was a confirmation of the original proposal that there had to be what amounted to six provinces; that those six provinces had to agree to the proposal, and also that those six provinces had to have their plans in operation before any single province could get one dollar of federal money. Well, if the new Minister of National Health and Welfare does not know it, other Conservatives opposite do know that that was the cause of great concern to many people in this country who were interested in hospital insurance, and it was a cause of particular concern to their own Premier Frost of Ontario. Premier Frost said—I am paraphrasing his words, but I agreed with him 100 per cent and I still do—that it was silly and fantastic to say that no single province could get a single dollar until all six had their plans in actual operation. I think I am being fair to Premier Frost if I put it this way. He said on several occasions that that would mean that five provinces could go ahead and spend huge sums of money, put up the necessary buildings, get the bookkeeping machinery ready, get contributions started by the provinces, or by the people of those provinces, with a view to starting their plans on a certain day, but if the sixth province, say Prince Edward Island, did not have its plan functioning by that same date, then the other five provinces, even though they might represent the majority of the population of Canada, would not get a dollar of federal money.

Premier Frost characterized that proposal of the former minister of national health and welfare as silly, ridiculous and fantastic, and he was right. What happened, Mr. Speaker? We debated it in the house; we had questions about it time and time again, and I give full marks to the former minister of national health and welfare for meeting the objection, for changing the legislation. When the bill was finally brought down there was wording in it that was different from the wording in the resolution. It was different from the wording in the terms given to the provinces in January. There was wording that made it clear that the plan was to work in this way. As soon as six provinces had agreed to the program, and as soon as six provinces had their legislation on the statute books, in force, such as by being proclaimed, any one province which had its plan in operation would be able to draw its share of the federal money. As I say, that was made clear by the former minister of national health and welfare in the House of Commons on March 25, on page 2680 of Hansard. This is the way he put it:

> When we get to the bill we will be able to discuss it much more effectively. The answer is that there is a difference. In the original proposal we said that when six provinces representing the majority of the people had plans in operation the federal government would pay, but the plans had to be in operation. It is now proposed that once we have the necessary authority we will conclude agreements with at least six provinces. If those six provinces sign and if they have the necessary legislative authority to implement their various schemes, as some now have, and if the law with respect to those schemes has been proclaimed or otherwise in force, that will be sufficient. In other words we do not have to wait for them to be actually in operation. When we come to the bill my hon. friend—

He was referring to me.

—will have an opportunity to discuss this.

Then I said this:

> I thank the minister for that statement which is the most important one he has made all day. Is it clear that if six provinces have legislation in this field which has been proclaimed it will be possible at that moment for provinces having plans in operation to start drawing money from the federal government.
> Mr. Martin: With an agreement signed.
> Mr. Knowles: Good.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That was evidence of sincerity.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have already said that I give my hon. friend, the member for Essex East, full marks for having done something that governments do not like to do, for having made a change in the legislation from the time it was first drafted to meet a legitimate objection that had been pressed from the opposition side.

I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that that change was given statutory effect in section 6(2) of chapter 28 of the statutes of 1957, which reads as follows:

> No contributions shall be paid under this act until at least six provinces, containing at least one-half the population of Canada, have entered into an agreement, and the provincial law in relation to those provinces is in force.

Now, Mr. Speaker, there is all the difference in the world between a law being in force and a health insurance plan being in actual operation, and the former minister made it crystal clear that that was the significance of the change that the former government made.

May I point out to my hon. friends opposite, many of whom are lawyers and must know how these bills are drawn, that the fact that there is a difference between the words "in force" and the words "in operation" is supported by this, that in the very next section, section 7, there is a provision that the money will continue to be paid so long as the provincial plan remains in operation. In other words, to start getting the money all that is necessary under the act is for six provinces to have the legislation authorizing their plans in force. Then, the money is paid to any province that has a plan in operation but, of course, you have to keep your plan in operation in order to continue to draw the money. But, Mr. Speaker, despite the fact that that was perhaps the major issue in months of consideration of this matter last spring, the Minister of National Health and Welfare rose in his place in this house on November 11, in answer to a question of mine, and said that his understanding is that "in force" and "in operation" mean the same thing. What a let down for Premier Frost, Mr. Speaker! What a let down for premiers of other provinces who counted on the terms of the legislation as it was passed last spring, counted on the statement made by the former minister of national health and welfare!

In our amendment, Mr. Speaker, we express the view that this government should take whatever steps are necessary so that federal payments under the provisions of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act will be available without delay to any province with hospital insurance plans in operation. What are the steps that the government should take? In the first place, since they already have the knowledge that six provinces have agreed, those six being British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Ontario, Prince Edward Island and Newfoundland, we contend that they should make definite and positive efforts to get agreements signed with these six provinces. So far as I have been able to ascertain there has not even been a master agreement drawn that these provinces might sign.

Other steps that we think the government should take include an effort to win some of the other provinces. At the last session the Minister of Finance said that the former minister of national health and welfare might have got more provinces in if his terms had not been so rigid. I remind this government that the government of the province of Nova Scotia, which is headed by a Conservative administration, has been pleading with this government for information as to where it stands on the question of hospital insurance. The other day I referred to two letters, which are on the table of this house, from the health minister of that province, one in September asking where the government stood, and another in October asking for an answer to the letter of a month earlier. There is interest on the part of a government headed by a Conservative administration which might be turned into agreement to the hospital insurance plan, if only a little interest were shown here at Ottawa.

I submit that in Manitoba there is a new interest in this matter. I know that the government we have in Manitoba has taken a new interest in a number of matters since the 10th of June. The political climate has changed a bit. All right, let us take advantage of it. Here is a province which, until the 10th of June, was pretty cool to the hospital insurance legislation—now on the statute books—but which is now interested in it and yet despite its interest has difficulty in getting letters from the premier answered by the Prime Minister of Canada. There are at least two provinces other than the six which have already indicated their willingness to agree, that are showing an interest that might well amount to agreement. I think Mr. Speaker, it is pretty clear that it may not now be necessary to wipe out the six-province requirement because six, seven or eight provinces are ready to go along.

But what about this question of sincerity? My hon. friends across the way, speaking through the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance and the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell), charged the Liberals with insincerity, with not wanting the legislation to come into effect. What have they done about it since then? What have they done to try to get those provinces that are interested to sign agreements? What have they done in terms of saying to Premier Frost, who has a tremendous program to launch that will cost a great deal of money, that if by chance there are not six they will introduce the necessary amendment to the legislation so that they can get started with fewer provinces? They took that position last spring and they took it very strongly. As I have already said, they took it three times, once on their own initiative, once when they supported us and once when it was a joint effort.

If they are sincere, if they felt they had the right last spring to challenge the sincerity of the Liberals, I suggest it is time for them to say to the house and to say to the country: We are out to get six, seven or eight provinces to agree if we can but if we cannot do that we are going to ask parliament to amend the legislation so this important program can go into effect with even fewer than six provinces. I think, Mr. Speaker, that the Minister of National Health and Welfare or the Prime Minister should immediately clear up the confusion that was created when that fictitious interpretation of the words "in force" was given on the 11th of November. That has been a cause of concern to Premier Campbell of Manitoba, a cause of concern to Premier Douglas of Saskatchewan and no doubt is a cause of concern to Premier Frost, although I do not have a direct quotation from him on the point since November 11.

But I would point out that Premier Frost did have something pretty strong to say about this matter, as reported in the Globe and Mail of Wednesday, October 30, 1957. Under the heading, "Frost Urges Repeal of Hospital Act Bar", I note this:

The federal government—

The reference now is to the Conservative government.

—was urged last night by Premier Frost to repeal the section of the hospital insurance act requiring that six provinces introduce plans before there is a federal participation in costs.

Mr. Frost described the requirement as fantastic and silly.

I agree with him that it was fantastic and silly when the previous government put it in the legislation. It is even more fantastic and silly for the present government to rely on something which they opposed with all their might and main.

He said that although six provinces, including Ontario, have indicated they wish to participate in a hospital insurance scheme, restrictions placed in the act by the Liberals are tying the hands of the Diefenbaker administration.

"Ottawa should throw out these restrictions and proceed on the basis of dealing with single provinces", the premier suggested. "If the act remains as it is we can go only so far. Ottawa should change the act so an effective date for starting provincial plans is established and leave it up to the provinces if they want to participate."

As the federal act stands now only four provinces—British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan, which already have hospital insurance plans in operation, and Ontario, have met its requirements. Unless two other provinces adopt the necessary legislation, Ottawa cannot share costs.

In all other instances where costs have been shared, such as old age security, the federal government has dealt with provinces individually, Mr. Frost added.

"The departure from this established practice in the case of hospital insurance is a silly provision. It has no validity."

I agree thoroughly with what Mr. Frost said as reported in the press of that date. I agree with the position he took last spring. My hon. friends opposite agreed with him last spring. What are they doing about it now? It looks to us, Mr. Speaker, as though this legislation is one of the inheritances which is an embarrassment to my hon. friends opposite. Oh, they liked to talk about health insurance when they could kick the Liberals around for taking 38 years to do anything about it, but now they are in power what are they doing? Oh, I suspect that they realize that they are going to have to do something about it in due course. I suspect they realize they are going to have this legislation in effect by January 1, 1959, because Premier Frost has set that as the target date so far as Ontario is concerned.

I give full credit, Mr. Speaker, to Premier Frost. He was concerned, not only that the legislation be amended so that Ontario could count on the money when it had its plan ready but he was concerned that provinces like British Columbia and Saskatchewan, which already had plans in operation, might start right away to draw their share of federal money towards their plans. It looks as though the federal government now in power has decided that British Columbia and Saskatchewan will not get any money towards their plans which are now in operation until the last possible date, and that date has been fixed for them by the Conservative premier in Ontario.

I much prefer the view Premier Frost has taken throughout the piece. Yes, he is pressing for action in Ontario but he has also pressed the rights of the other provinces. His point in this press report is quite correct, that just as the federal government has dealt with the provinces individually with respect to other social security matters, so they should deal individually with the provinces on this important issue.

I suggest also that we have a right to be apprehensive about this matter because of certain editorials that have been appearing in some of the newspapers of the country, mostly the Conservative press but in some Liberal newspapers as well. I have in mind, for example, the Winnipeg Tribune of my own city which has cautioned the government to be careful about the Martin hospital insurance plan. In addition to that kind of thing, we have this book which was sent to all members of parliament, I presume, entitled "Underwriting Canadian Health, An Economic View of Welfare Programs", prepared at the request of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce. We all received copies of this book with a covering letter written by the general manager of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce in Montreal. It is a book that accepts the fact of welfare programs, including health and hospital insurance, but cautions the country against going too far.

In other words, Mr. Speaker, there are forces at work on the Conservative government of the day suggesting that they have to be careful about the welfare state, careful about welfare programs, careful about getting too deep into health or hospital insurance. With voices of that kind getting, as I have no doubt they are, the ear of the Conservative government, I think we have reason to be apprehensive whether or not early action is going to be taken to bring this important piece of legislation into operation.

Hon. members know where we have stood across the years. We have contended that there should be a nationwide program of health insurance with provision for provincial participation and administration. We have moved amendments to that effect in this house time and time again. Hon. members know that we want and feel that the Canadian people are entitled to much more than just hospital insurance. We feel that the day must come in this country when the care of the health of our people is on the same basis as education, available to all our people according to their need of that care rather than to the length of their purse. We shall continue to press forward towards the realization of a full health insurance program for the Canadian people.

We recognize that what we are pressing in this amendment is only for one step in that direction, but it is an important step. We contend that it is a betrayal of the Canadian people to have even as much delay as has taken place so far as this legislation is concerned. It was put on the statute books last April. Before the spring was out we knew six provinces had agreed. We had the story in the last session of parliament of the Conservative members fighting for this legislation to be put in a form so that it could be implemented early. We think we have the right, on behalf of the Canadian people, and we do it on this motion to go into supply, to demand early action on this important matter. My friends opposite condemned the Liberals for having made an election issue out of health insurance for seven or eight elections. They condemned them for having taken so long, from 1919 to 1957, to reach the point of presenting the Health Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act to parliament. They condemned them for playing politics with health insurance, and particularly with this hospital insurance legislation. But it looks to us, Mr. Speaker, as though that is exactly what this government is now doing, toying with it, stalling and trying to find new interpretations of certain words in the act; leaving it to the provinces. They are doing nothing that is consistent with the aggressive battle that they waged here last spring.

The Conservatives condemned the Liberals for having made health insurance an election issue on a number of occasions, but it looks to us as though they are planning for this to be one of the issues in the next election whenever it comes. We are quite prepared to have health insurance or even the implementation of this hospital insurance legislation made an election issue. But we want something better than just the right to fight it out at an election, which we are prepared to do from the Atlantic to the Pacific. We want action on it, and we contend that the Canadian people are entitled to that action now. That is the purpose of this amendment, to ask this house to tell the government to stall no longer but to take immediately whatever steps are necessary so that federal money will be available to provinces like British Columbia and Saskatchewan that have plans already in operation, and to the other provinces as rapidly as they bring their plans into effect.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, as I have already indicated I place before the house the following amendment, seconded by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue):

That all the words after the word "that" to the end of the question be struck out and that the following words be substituted therefor:

"this house is of the opinion that the government should consider the advisability of taking immediately whatever steps are necessary so that federal payments under the provisions of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act will be available without delay to any provinces with hospital insurance plans in operation, as a further step toward the achievement of a nation-wide health insurance plan based on federal-provincial co-operation."

Mr. Speaker: The question is on the amendment, but before any other member rises, perhaps we could follow the practice in similar debates of disposing of one grievance at a time, since that tends towards the orderly discussion of the grievances. In fact, there is a precedent for the point of order which was raised by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch) that after this grievance, for example, has been superseded by another subject, a member would be out of order in returning to this question which has been proposed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles).

Under these circumstances, therefore, if hon. members who wish to speak on this grievance would now rise, that would meet the rules and practices in debates on supply motions.

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): With reference, Mr. Speaker, to your earlier ruling concerning the matter of procedure and the fact that we would be permitted to put forward our views on this question, may I do so now? I intend later, of course, to deal more specifically with the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). With reference to the procedure, may I say that we in this group are not too happy to see the number of supply motions reduced, particularly since it was suggested also that the number of private members' days might likewise be reduced in order to complete the work of the house before Christmas. We are not particularly happy about the situation because we recognize that, to a degree, it means the termination of the supremacy of parliament.

Private members' days are the only opportunities afforded members to bring forward particular problems and grievances relating to their own ridings and to the nation as a whole. We are, therefore, rather reluctant to go along with the idea, although we do under the circumstances, fully realize that there is a difficulty at this time. This session of parliament, which is generally called the special session, has been called for the express purpose—I am not sure whether or not the express purpose is the immediate calling of an election—of introducing legislation that would appeal to the public. I would say, however, it is desirable legislation, and we have supported it.

However, we would look forward to the presentation of a budget before such a decision were made so that the people of Canada could decide for themselves whether or not we are in a position to expend $5 billion each year; whether we are going to be half a billion dollars in the red because of these particular expenditures or whether we can afford them. That is all I have to say with reference to procedure. We will go along with the idea provided we can see that the rights of the nation are protected and particularly that the rights of parliament are always protected in the future.

With reference to the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I find it rather difficult to understand. As I interpret it, and my interpretation might be wrong, it reads thus:

—the government should consider the advisability of taking immediately whatever steps are necessary so that federal payments under the provisions of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act will be available without delay—

I will not read the rest of it because it is that part which causes me some concern. As I interpret it, we are asking the government to accept the advisability of taking immediate steps to do certain things in respect of the act itself. I would suspect that the first thing the government would do would be to point out that the government is taking certain steps at this moment. The government has called a dominion-provincial conference and has invited certain representations from the various provinces. The government has indicated to those provinces that they are prepared to discuss the hospital insurance plan.

Under these circumstances it does seem to me that there is some redundancy in the amendment itself. If the government, of course, is not prepared to carry on and discuss hospitalization with the provinces then it is a completely different matter. One must, I know, really search to glean information on these things. It does take a considerable amount of reading and thought in an endeavour to discover exactly how the government feels with respect to discussing this problem.

Possibly the minister will be in a position to tell us more about it when he again takes his turn in this debate, as I trust he will, and will explain to us that the government is going to meet with the provinces to discuss this very problem, in which case this amendment of course would be meaningless because there could be absolutely no need for it as far as I can see. The government would have taken some action towards implementing this proposal.

This is a very important amendment, however, because it raises a problem which certainly has been discussed prior to the election, and is still being discussed today in my own province. I am sure the same is true in any other province having a hospital scheme in operation or, not having such a scheme in operation, having set up the machinery to put it into operation. It is important to the provinces to understand why the rules of the game have been changed.

For instance there is the interpretation placed upon the act, or a certain section of it, as was so well pointed out by the member who introduced the amendment. We should know why that particular rule has been changed. The implementation and bringing into force of this scheme is most important in my own province. We have in that province a hospital scheme which has been in operation for some years; we have certainly benefitted from the knowledge gained over those years and it does seem to me that if this scheme were made usable or operational at a very early date, before the six provinces set up their own schemes, then other provinces would gain from what we have learned in respect to the operation of the dominion-provincial scheme.

For this reason I very much favour the sentiment expressed in the amendment itself, as do all the members of this group. We are satisfied that this will probably bring to the attention of the government the need to do something more explicit, for instance by making it a point of discussion between the two levels of government in this country so that something definite can be done towards the implementation of the scheme itself across the nation.

Now with respect to the remarks made as to the sincerity of the government with respect to the setting up and putting into operation of this scheme, we can say all we like about the insincerity of the former government, but nevertheless the fact is that the act was brought into being by that government. The Conservative government of today, which complained so bitterly of the insincerity of the former government, is I would say just as guilty unless it changes its attitude in respect to implementation as quickly as possible. This point has been raised not only in the current session but also in the last session of parliament. I remember that so distinctly—as I am sure every hon. member who was in the 22nd parliament will remember without the necessity of referring to Hansard to prove the point. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) must also well recall that time and time again members from all parties doubted—possibly the Liberals did not doubt it too much—the sincerity of the government of that day with respect to this legislation. For that reason, the only way this government can prove that they are completely sincere with respect to this matter is to put it into operation in those provinces which have had the experience of running a hospital scheme. These provinces include Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia.

From that experience the federal government and other provincial governments would gain sufficient knowledge so that the rough spots could be ironed out and those provinces which are thinking of setting up their own schemes would be in position to determine exactly what form of premium collection should be adopted and to deal with other small problems which might arise.

It is an acknowledged fact in my own province that we collect our premium in a different fashion from the province of Saskatchewan for example, which I understand has a yearly premium much the same as used in respect of ordinary insurance. We have a 2 per cent sales tax which goes towards paying for the hospital scheme. Now certainly it should be beneficial to a province which is deciding to enter this scheme to have an opportunity of choosing which of these schemes they prefer, rather than being forced to make an initial choice and probably losing a lot of money for the taxpayers because of inefficiency which might creep in as a result of inexperience.

In my own province for instance it is a recognized fact that we began with the collection of premiums, just as is the case of Saskatchewan today, but we found it undesirable to carry on in that way because it did not apply too well in our case. It was difficult to collect premiums; we did not have the same security for collection as did the province of Saskatchewan because more people moved about from job to job. We ran into many other difficulties when for instance we found an individual who, having moved from one job to another thinking that his premium was paid, found that he did not have his insurance paid after all, and was therefore not eligible for hospital coverage.

Now it is true that these are small problems, comparatively speaking, but nevertheless they are an indication of the type of thing which must be met in each province and which that province's government must be prepared to act upon before setting up its own scheme. I would ask the minister to consider this question when he answers to the amendment and possibly confirm that this is a matter which is going to be placed before the dominion-provincial conference to be discussed at that time. In such a discussion it will make it possible for these provinces, by bringing out a few points, to come to a definite understanding as to when and how this scheme shall be put into operation.

My own thought on this subject, and I am satisfied that the members of this group concur in this viewpoint, is that the best way of dealing with the matter would be similar to the application for unemployment insurance when in the early stages we made it applicable on a certain basis to only one particular province. I think that was true of the logging industry in British Columbia. We had one province come in, and on the basis of the experience gained in its operation there we broadened it out as the years went on.

I do not think it is healthy for the people of this country to feel that either the present government or the former government is lacking in sincerity, or that their members of parliament are not sincere in bringing forward their suggestions. I am satisfied after listening to the representations which have been made in the past four years from the four parties in this house, including our independent members, that there is a particular desire to put a national hospital scheme into effect, and that such a scheme should be brought into being as quickly as possible so that all provinces may benefit from it.

Mr. Speaker, I have nothing further to add at this time, except that I hope the minister will take this whole question under advisement, and let us know in due course during the debate whether the government has changed its mind.

(Translation):

Mr. Rene Begin (Quebec West): Mr. Speaker, I wish to take advantage of the amendment now under consideration to say a few words about hospital insurance.

Representing as I do a constituency made up mostly of workers, I am very much interested in the adoption of legislation which came so near being passed under the Liberal government, and more particularly under the able sponsorship of the former minister of national health and welfare (Mr. Martin).

All members of the house will admit that illness is a luxury. All those who represent constituencies like my own know how many people come to them and say that they cannot afford to pay their hospital and medical bills. Illness is indeed a luxury. I could quote from memory hundreds of names of men, women and children who would need hospital care but who cannot afford it.

I therefore urge the government to implement as soon as possible this national welfare measure, and I would remind them that a young and prosperous country's greatest asset is its manpower. I do not object to the principle of the legislation, but I submit that for the middle class it would be beneficial legislation. People who have the wherewithal can get proper medical and hospital care; so can the completely destitute, but not so the middle class person of limited means, who has to pay all along the line, and this is rank discrimination. Without any partisan bias, I hope that we will very soon be in a position to endow this country with this magnificent piece of legislation.

(Text):

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendment which has been moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I have always taken a great deal of interest in the question of health insurance and hospital insurance and I should most certainly like to add my word in support of an amendment which asks for action now, during this present session.

However, before making my comments I should like to say a few words with regard to remarks made by the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. St. Laurent) and the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Hahn) who, I regret, is not in his place at the moment. Both these gentlemen began their remarks by dealing with the question of procedure, and the time available in the house this session. Mr. Speaker, I should like to make it exceedingly clear, as our party has done every since the house opened, that we are most desirous of co-operating at all times with the government with regard to the introduction of beneficial legislation, and in respect to speeding the work of parliament. We have also made it clear that we believe in principle in the supremacy of parliament and not just in giving lip service to the expression.

Mention has been made both by the Leader of the Opposition and by the hon. member for New Westminster of the hope of getting to our homes by Christmas. It has been my privilege always to have been home at Christmas during the 50 years of my life, and I certainly look forward to being home this Christmas, but I personally—and I know I am speaking on behalf of this group—do not place being home at Christmas before our responsibilities as members of parliament and before doing the job for which we are being paid.

Mr. Blackmore: Very likely nobody else in the house does.

Mr. Winch: I hear words but cannot make sense of them—

Mr. Blackmore: They were words with too much sense.

Mr. Winch: If the hon. member says it is good sense, then I am glad to agree with him, and I apologize if I did not understand what he said.

We have heard a great deal from the government side about the supremacy of parliament. That includes the bringing up of grievances, and it also means the discussion of estimates. I hope we can be home by Christmas, but only if the working of parliamentary democracy says we can. Not one of us was forced to run for parliament, and having done so and been elected, let us do our job.

On the amendment itself, may I say I am sure all members will agree that this is a matter of importance because it deals with a subject which, I am convinced, is uppermost in the minds of the majority of the people of this country. In broad principle, this is a question of health insurance; more narrowly, it is a question of hospital insurance. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has placed on record the attitude and opinions of leading members of the present government as shown and expressed at the last session which was held this year with regard to hospital insurance. It is obvious that at least until this amendment was proposed neither the hon. members of this house nor the people of this country knew what was in the mind of the government as far as the implementation of hospital insurance legislation is concerned, as placed on the statute books last session. From the answers we have received to various questions which have been asked since the house met, and from statements made by cabinet ministers outside it would seem a reasonable conclusion that the government has either not yet made up its mind what it is going to do about hospital insurance, or that it has no intention of doing anything about it at all.

As I have said, Mr. Speaker, I agree completely with the remarks made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre; as a matter of fact, he did a masterful job. But strange as it may seem, I want to go a bit further than he did in making a direct statement and I hope I will not be misunderstood until I can complete what I want to say. That is, that in my estimation, having sat through the session last spring and heard the leading members of the present government, then the leading members of the opposition, express their views about hospital insurance, and having both heard and read the statements made by Conservative candidates in British Columbia in the last federal election campaign in regard to that subject, I can stand in my place here in the House of Commons and tell the members of the present government that as far as hospital insurance is concerned they are guilty of treason. Now, the reason I can use that term—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would ask the hon. member not to use a term of that kind in connection with any member of this house because treason is an indictable offence for which a man may be executed and I am sure he does not want to impute that kind of offence to hon. members of the government. He is using the word "treason" in a loose sense and I would ask him to withdraw the use of the word "treason".

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, you will remember what I said but I do withdraw the term. This morning—now, do not prejudge me this time—I went down to our parliamentary library and asked the attendant if I could have the most authoritative English dictionary and the most authoritative United States dictionary. The attendant said the most authoritative English dictionary is Murray's New English dictionary and the most authoritative United States dictionary is Webster's International. I looked up the word "treason" in both volumes. Murray's New English Dictionary defines treason as "betrayal of the trust undertaken by or reposed in any one; a breach of faith". Webster's International dictionary describes treason as "the betrayal of any trust or confidence". Mr. Speaker, I bow to your request and I now say I charge the present government, according to Murray's New English dictionary, with a betrayal of the trust undertaken or reposed in it and a breach of faith, and according to Webster's International Dictionary I charge it with the betrayal of a trust and a confidence as far as hospital insurance is concerned. After hearing an outline of the position taken by the Conservative opposition last spring as described by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, surely we can say there has been a breach of confidence and a betrayal of trust.

Hospital insurance which is now in effect in British Columbia, Alberta and Saskatchewan is something that is desired by all the people of Canada. Hospital insurance is a principle accepted by the previous Liberal administration and by the Conservatives when in opposition. To any fairminded, reasonable and honest person it was clear until the opening of this parliament the Conservatives believed in hospital insurance going into effect, let us say as soon as six provinces had agreed by legislation and by signature in Ottawa, and that payments would be made to any province having a plan in force or in operation, if you want to put it that way. However, no action has been taken by this government nor has any been intimated up to the present time.

I think we have no reason to apologize for asking why there has been no mention of the subject in the speech from the throne and no direct answers to any questions. This can be for three reasons only: (1) the government does not yet know what to do, as a government, as far as hospital insurance is concerned; (2) because of the partial fulfilment of promises made for increases in certain pensions the government is worried financially and wants to stall the additional cost that would be involved if hospital insurance were put into effect now; or (3) for the purpose of political expediency the government want to tie in with some other province in a provincial election and possibly in a federal election. None of the above reasons represents a sufficient explanation of the government's present attitude. Its attitude is unfair in view of the policy it enunciated when in opposition in that it is making the three provinces that already have plans in operation a sacrifice to political expediency.

As I said when I opened my remarks I have been interested in the question of hospital and health insurance for many years. In 1936 the province of British Columbia pioneered the field. A complete health insurance program was introduced in the provincial legislature by the Hon. G. M. Weir which was passed. Dr. Allon Peebles who now resides in Ottawa was made the first chairman of the health insurance commission. Although passed by the legislature the plan never went into effect because of sabotage by the medical profession in British Columbia. However this did not stop the province introducing a plan. Since that time it has gone into the field of hospital insurance as have the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta. The taxpayers of those provinces have spent millions of dollars through these plans to give the people the benefit of overall hospital insurance.

At the last session of parliament the Liberal government, the official opposition and the other two parties in this house agreed that the federal government had a responsibility in terms of the health and hospitalization of the Canadian people. The act was passed and we all expected that it would go into effect speedily. Any dereliction of responsibility in putting the plan into effect as speedily as possible is penalizing not only the provinces which already have their plans in operation but is also deterring the other provinces which contemplate a hospitalization plan. I am convinced that a province like Ontario, with the hundreds of millions of dollars it will cost them to put their plan into operation, is contemplating doing so only if they can get a 50 per cent grant from the federal authority immediately. Unless there is a clear statement from the government that their policy is that a province shall receive federal payment as soon as the plan is actually in operation I am afraid that not only Ontario but the maritime provinces, which have agreed to come in, will be deterred in their planning. But if Ontario is to be given any assurance that when their plan goes into effect in January, 1959, they will be paid 50 per cent then, Mr. Speaker, it is only right, it is only just that Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia should be paid now because they have their plans in operation.

I know what it will mean in British Columbia. Most certainly we shall carry on, but what this government is doing—unless they now establish the policy that the money will be paid in the immediate future—is that they are stealing around $18 million a year that rightfully belongs to British Columbia in order to fulfil some of their own election promises.

Hospital insurance is an important issue, Mr. Speaker. To the provinces that have not got it it is a blessing yet to come. The provinces that have it can reasonably and rightfully expect the declaration of principle of the Conservatives in opposition, now the government, that before this session ends, they will agree to contribute 50 per cent of the cost. We also expect, sir, that what was said by the Conservatives in opposition will be outlined by them as a government in the acceptance of half the cost of the mentally ill and those who are suffering from tuberculosis.

I cannot use a certain word, Mr. Speaker, but I ask you to remember the definitions of that word dealing with breach of trust and of breaking of faith. I suggest to you in conclusion, sir, that we are not asking for anything more than the Conservatives' promises, and that they get away from the strange metamorphosis that has overtaken them since they moved from the ranks of opposition to the seats of government, that they now put into action the things they proposed and demanded when they were on this side of the house. If not, sir,—well, take the definition of the word that I cannot use—there is a penalty for them and they will reap that penalty when they go next to the polls.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I am speaking on this motion because the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) has, until this evening, to be somewhere else; otherwise he would be speaking at this time.

Mr. Hodgson: He is not looking for votes already, is he?

Mr. Pickersgill: First of all I should like to say, sir, I feel that the motion moved in amendment by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) does illustrate almost perfectly the wisdom of the stand taken this afternoon by the leader of this party, because this motion is not really, in the proper technical sense of the term, a grievance at all. It asks the government to do something by legislation which is really, in the present circumstances, quite redundant. It asks them to amend the legislation that we were responsible for inviting parliament to enact.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Not necessarily.

Mr. Pickersgill: To amend this legislation in order to accomplish something which, to all intents and purposes, has already been accomplished because, before we went out of office, six provinces had agreed to come into this scheme.

The hon. gentleman from Winnipeg North Centre who is usually very cogent, sir—I admit that—on this occasion has missed the point entirely. It seems to me he is not talking about what is the real obstacle to the implementation of this scheme. He has set up a straw man and then proceeded to tear him down. It seems to me that what the hon. gentleman was complaining about in nearly all of his long speech was not that the legislation was insufficient but that the administration of his department by the Minister of National Health and Welfare Mr. Monteith appears to be, if not inefficient at least to be something less than frank.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: And with that view I am sure all of us agree, and no one more than I, because I think the hon. gentleman has given evasive answers, or no answers at all, to at least as many of my questions as he has to anyone in the house on this particular subject. But, of course, sir, there is another reason why this motion would not accomplish the object it professes to have in mind and is therefore in a strict sense insincere. I am not saying the hon. gentleman is insincere, but I am saying his gesture is insincere. I say that for this reason. Unless the government is willing to accept this motion which, as I say, is not strictly a motion of want of confidence, it would be a motion of want of confidence, the adoption of which by the house would prevent the committee from going into supply. It would force an election, and it would certainly delay, and delay very considerably, the very objective which the hon. gentleman professes to wish to attain, and for that reason alone—I am speaking only for myself; that is one of the advantages of being in opposition—I will have great pleasure in voting against this motion.

I will have great pleasure in voting against it for another reason, namely that the position taken by the government I belonged to I believe is just as right today as it was at the time it was taken.

An hon. Member: You belong to.

Mr. Pickersgill: I said "belonged"; past tense.

The Leader of the Opposition (Mr. St. Laurent), when he originally explained why the former government required six provinces to agree to this scheme before it would be put into operation, said that we as a party did not believe in taxing all the people of Canada for the benefit of a relatively small section of the people of Canada, and until a majority of the provinces, representing a majority of the population, were going to be included in such a scheme it would be doing just that. I believe that that national stand, that national outlook, was the right one and I still think it is the right one.

An hon. Member: Why didn't you put it in legislation?

Mr. Pickersgill: The legislation is there; it is on the statute books and it will come into operation, I assume,—of course, I have no right to speak now for anyone but myself—as soon as six of the provinces have schemes on their statute books. I certainly agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that that is what the law means. It does not mean that six provincial schemes must actually be in operation; it means that they must be on the statute books, capable of being brought into operation as quickly as circumstances would warrant. It seems to me that that is a sensible provision. It seems to me that there is not any great likelihood that that outcome will not be realized during the course of 1958. To say the least this particular motion is somewhat premature.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made a great deal of the position he was taking that there must be a constitutional opposition in this house and he suggested that my friends and I had abdicated this responsibility and that he and his friends were taking this great burden from our shoulders. I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that the first duty of an opposition—the most essential of all duties, historically and in every other way, of an opposition in parliament—is to criticize the estimates. What the Leader of the Opposition said this afternoon was that he thought it was more important that in the limited time available—the time is limited; we cannot change the calendar or at least I do not think we are going to try to do so—in this fiscal year we would be doing our duty better and more profitably by criticizing the estimates than by making academic speeches on academic motions which, if they passed, would defeat the very object they profess to be seeking to carry out.

There is not a word that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre said on the motion today that could not have been said just as appropriately on the first item of the estimates of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) although it is true that he would have had to take two or three turns to say it under the rules. He could not have monopolized the time of the house for as long as he did when he was moving a motion of want of confidence. But perhaps in the interstices he could have obtained an answer or two from the hon. gentleman who is in charge of this department, which would have been a refreshing change.

It seems to me that the government can be justly criticized on two counts. It can be criticized for being dilatory about this matter. I think the most shocking example that has come to my notice—and perhaps it has come to my notice because I pay a little bit more attention to the province in which I spent 30 pears of my life than I do to some others—was the history of the correspondence between the minister of health of Manitoba and the premier of Manitoba and ministers opposite. According to the facts that have been brought out with difficulty, in this house this session, in July the minister of health of Manitoba wrote to the then acting minister of national health and welfare, the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Brooks), and he received an acknowledgment but no reply to his letter. On August 1 the premier of Manitoba wrote to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) and he received no acknowledgment of his letter. In September, when the hon. member for Perth was appointed Minister of National Health and Welfare, the minister of health of Manitoba wrote to him and I am not sure—I am speaking from memory—whether he received an acknowledgment or not but he certainly received no answer to the questions he raised. On October 16 the premier of Manitoba wrote a second time to the Prime Minister asking for an answer to his first letter and to these other letters.

Several days later I asked the Prime Minister whether there had been any answers to those letters and he had no recollection of it. I admit that he gave a very polite and courteous reply as soon as he had a chance to check the matter. But I say that this is evidence—and it supports the evidence which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre himself produced—of a dilatory and rather irresponsible attitude, I do not say on the part of the Prime Minister who has multifarious duties, although I would have thought that a second letter from the premier of a province asking for a reply on as important a question as this would not have been brushed aside. However, it is surely a serious charge against the Minister of National Health and Welfare that four months after the government had come into office and well over a month after he himself had assumed office he had not yet had time to familiarize himself with important correspondence with his opposite numbers in provincial governments and with the premier of a province.

But what I think perhaps is an even more serious charge, Mr. Speaker, is the charge that the government has been extremely evasive in this matter. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who is usually encyclopædic in these matters, surprised me by failing to point out that, although the Prime Minister during the election campaign did not say much that is on the record about health insurance he did make two statements that are recorded in the press. He made a statement in Winnipeg, and because it was made in Winnipeg I would have thought that the hon. gentleman would have noticed it particularly. He also made a statement in Saskatoon. On both occasions the Prime Minister, then the leader of the Conservative party seeking office, pointed out that mental and tubercular patients should be included in this scheme and he certainly gave every impression that if he came into office that would be done and done without any serious delay. I think at least half a dozen different members of this party and an equal number of members of the C.C.F. party have been trying off and on ever since the session opened to find out whether the government has any intention of carrying out that promise. It does not seem to me that it is an improper question or an unreasonable question or one that it should take the government very long to make up its mind about. I find it hard to understand why they are so secretive about it. I think it is within the recollection of all of us that we were obliged to listen to a great deal about secrecy when we were in the government and when hon. gentlemen opposite were sitting on the opposition side of the house.

Mr. Campbell (The Battlefords): You learned a lot in 22 years.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think there is one difference between our situations. I said this the other day, Mr. Speaker, but perhaps you will pardon me if I repeat it. There is a great deal of difference about being secretive about those things that have not been decided. Under our system it is a constitutional rule that when a minister speaks he speaks for the government and commits the government. Therefore until the government has made up its mind under our parliamentary rules a minister is perfectly entitled not to answer. But day after day, week after week, month after month and year after year we were censured because we carried out that proper rule.

But this ministry, Mr. Speaker, is different. This ministry will not even tell us about the things they have decided. This is something new. This is something we have never seen before in parliament, at least in the 20 years I have been around here. If the Minister of National Health and Welfare or the Prime Minister would rise in his place and say, "Notwithstanding the fact that we gave a solemn assurance before the election that we would include mental and tubercular patients, we are taking a second look at the matter; we are not sure we were not imprudent", or if they would say, "We have not made up our minds yet", I think we would all say, "That is an honest attitude". I know that for my part it would satisfy me perfectly.

But the Minister of National Health and Welfare gave an extremely evasive answer to my question. He said he thought I would discover that all the Prime Minister's promises would be kept. The premier of Manitoba and the minister of health of Manitoba assumed that that meant that mental and t.b. patients were going to be included. A day or two later the Prime Minister was asked, I think by the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Deniset), whether or not this was correct and he said no assurance had been given. I think a little frankness, a little straightforwardness on this question is something we are really entitled to have in this house.

I do feel, as I have said already, that there is ground for criticizing the government for the lack of zeal, the lack of interest that has been shown in this question, when compared with the zeal and the interest they professed when the members of the government were on this side of the house. To that extent, I agree with the hon. member. But I must say, that I see no point, no useful purpose that could be served by adopting the amendment itself. If carried, as I have said, it would certainly defeat the professed object—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Pickersgill: Certainly.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would he explain how the passing of this amendment, and the defeat of the government if that were the result, would defeat the object of the amendment? Would it not still be possible for the government, under the legislation which is on the statute books, to take the neccessary steps to bring this hospital insurance plan into operation? As a matter of fact, would the member not agree that if the government were defeated in the house on this issue it would probably get into action on the matter rather quickly?

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member has one disadvantage that I do not share with him, he has never been a member of a government.

Mr. Sinclair: He never will be.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would not go that far. After June 10, I will be very chary about making predictions as to who will serve in governments. The hon. gentleman never has served, but I have served in one government and I have been rather close to several and I believe that when a government is in the midst of an election campaign—I say this not in criticism of any government—they are not apt to be devoting the same energy and attention to the implementation of policies as they would be doing at other times.

It does seem to me we can be quite assured that if the government were defeated on this issue and had to go to the country, at a time when the public obviously does not want to have an election and on an issue that I imagine would seem to most people a side issue, compared with the tremendous problems that face this country at this time, international problems and national problems, that far from accomplishing any object the hon. gentleman has in mind it would defeat that object and do a lot of incidental damage as well.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Oh, oh.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): The hon. member will be laughing on the other side of his face before long.

Mr. Pickersgill: The incidental damage I was thinking of would be having no effective government at a time when this great NATO meeting is going to be held; at a time when things look rather dark. I was thinking also of the possibility of being in the midst of an election at a time when, as we know, there is a very serious matter in dispute between the railways and their employees. It seems to me, sir, that this is not a time to be talking frivolously about defeating governments and about having elections. It is a time to be getting on with the essential business of this country and that, sir, is precisely what the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. St. Laurent) said we ought to do by getting on as quickly as we reasonably could with the consideration of the estimates. It does seem to me that most of the grievances that most of us could possibly foresee are quite capable of being discussed on the estimates themselves.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): I wonder if I might call it six o'clock?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, in rising to speak on this amendment I find it strange that so far we have had no speakers whatsoever from the government side of the house. As was so very capably pointed out by my colleague the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), in times gone by, in fact as late as last spring, in this house and indeed right across this country from coast to coast during the election campaign various members of the present government had plenty to say on this matter. Therefore, as I say, I find it rather strange that at least to date they have been silent.

I had also looked forward to hearing the comments on this particular subject of my namesake in this house, the former minister of national health and welfare. I was quite surprised, not so much at the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate who spoke or at least intimated that he spoke in behalf of the former minister, as at what he had to say when he did speak. I found it very difficult to follow just what he was trying to do, whether he was trying to support the government, whether he was supporting the amendment or whether he was trying to put forth the policy of the Liberal party on this matter, if any.

Even having noted the obvious determination of the Liberal party in this parliament to support the Conservative government, come what may, I may say I was really shocked to hear the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) refer to health insurance which so materially affects the health of this nation of ours, as it is being discussed at the moment, as something frivolous. I cannot see how any member of this house can maintain that the health protection of the people of this country is a frivolous matter which should not be raised and discussed in this house. Possibly, if as he intimated he was speaking for the former minister of national health and welfare, who in turn has been responsible for putting forward the policy of the former Liberal government in regard to health insurance for Canada, then that explains the reason why we have waited 40 years for the implementation of the Liberal promise of health insurance which was first made to this house in 1919.

I would like to say in conjunction with this amendment put forth by our party that there is a definite urgency to get on with this job of providing health insurance in this country. In addition to the reasons so well outlined by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I would draw the attention of this house to the fact that there are very powerful forces at work in Canada trying to stop or delay the health insurance as we now know it and to prevent it from spreading into a more comprehensive plan to cover the needs of the Canadian people.

To illustrate this point I would like to draw attention to this book which I believe was made available to all hon. members of this house. It is entitled "Underwriting Canadian Health—An Economic View of Welfare Programs", and it was done by a firm of consulting economists, William Lougheed associates, Toronto, at the request of the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and the Canadian life insurance officers association. I would particularly like to point out an item contained in the preamble of the survey. This survey was for the express purpose of setting out:

> —the urgent necessity of countering any tendency of the new hospital scheme towards "natural" growth into the areas or surgery, medicine, dental and nursing care.

Now there are scarcely two more powerful organizations in this country today than the Canadian Chamber of Commerce and the Canadian life insurance officers association. In Canada they represent a tremendous amount of money, a tremendous amount of wealth and a tremendous amount of influence and I think in all fairness it can be said of both these organizations, judging from their past records, that it is business first, and nothing afterwards. I submit their primary interest is certainly not the health of this nation. As I say, their first consideration is that of their business interests.

We all know that costs in connection with health in this country are steadily rising, as they are in all other parts of the world. These costs are rising to the extent that people just cannot afford to be without health insurance and I submit that the motive behind these delaying tactics is to create a situation where everybody is going to be compelled to buy life insurance from these various insurance companies. I do not know just what costs were involved in conducting this survey but I assume that they were considerable. This survey had to be undertaken, the returns published and distributed over the wide field in which they have been distributed, and I think it is rather ironic that the money used to conduct the survey—to use its own words, "for the express purpose of stopping a national health insurance plan"—was raised from the very people who pay premiums to these very insurance companies. In other words, the people's money is being used to cut their own throats.

I maintain that in addition to the reasons previously given, these points I have here outlined provide all the more reasons for getting on with this job without further delay. In closing I might say, Mr. Speaker, I am still awaiting with interest an indication from the members of this government as to whether they hold any of the same views they expressed in this house last year and to the Canadian people just prior to election.

Mr. R. M. T. McDonald (Hamilton South): Mr. Speaker, I rise to speak in this debate for several reasons. I have heard from hon. members across the way talk of "delay, dodging, stalling, and putting off". Our government has been in power for five months; the cabinet minister concerned in this matter for three months. This government has introduced more legislation in those five months than it took other parties many years to introduce.

An hon. Member: How do you get that?

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): The hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) has put forth amendments to the Old Age Security Act, the Old Age Assistance Act, the Blind Persons Act and the Disabled Persons Act. The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) talked about political expedience, stalling and no government. This government comprised of 112 people, have the three opposition parties scared to death. I think it is of great benefit to the Canadian people right now to have a minority government.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): It keeps everybody on his toes.

Some hon. Members: That is right.

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): Really on their toes. The C.C.F. party says it is the party of the people—no political playing or delaying. I just wonder? I have merely heard the C.C.F. members speak about communist China, wheat, unemployment and health insurance. Now probably they speak of communist China because it gets big headlines in the newspapers. As to wheat, well we know we have a surplus inherited from the Liberal party but I believe the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) is trying very hard to sell this wheat because he knows the farmer needs the money.

Unemployment. I would talk to the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill). The first time he rose in this house I believe he talked about the great immigration policy of the Liberal party. Our party when we took office, tried to slow down immigration to cope with the development of this country on a delayed basis. If the Liberals had taken this development up in the early part of 1956 the unemployment they are talking about today would be much lower.

Health insurance. The Liberal party in 1919 put forth a health insurance program. They were in office through 1927-1930, the years which took us into the depression years. They had plenty of time to think about rehabilitation and health after world war I, and they had plenty of time from 1935 to the end of the last great war to implement this plan. In the big money-spending and taxation years between 1946 and 1957 they did absolutely nothing with regard to putting this plan into immediate effect. I note they say that everything is on the statute books, but it was not actually done. I believe this government should be given its due course of time; they have done a great job as far as I am concerned.

I am not as well versed in getting up and twisting words around in my speeches but I do believe that if in this house people would think about the people first and not get up and try to twist around issues that are political footballs—

Mr. Winch: Does the hon. member believe that the hospital insurance scheme is a football?

Mr. McDonald (Hamilton South): The way you are putting it, it is.

I see our Minister of National Health and Welfare has a billion dollar estimate to go over. I do believe this party will bring forward a health insurance program based on planning. The amendment moved by the C.C.F. to the speech from the throne seeks for social and economic planning. I think it takes more than three months for a minister of health and welfare to plan a health insurance scheme which the Liberals could not carry out in 40 years, and I am sure that within the next little while all parties will know that this party will put forward this scheme, because all members are in favour of this scheme. If you boys will give them a chance and not push them too much they will do it. If we can push through the estimates and the other legislation I believe you will get it more speedily than if one member gets up and talks for an hour and a half.

(Translation):

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, I do not share the opinion expressed by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), and, for the reasons explained by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill), I will certainly not vote in favour of his amendment. This hospitalization insurance and diagnostic services legislation, put on our statute books by the preceding government, was obviously appreciated by most Canadians, as evidenced by the fact that six provinces have already entered into the plan. As far as the province of Quebec is concerned, that proposal was also welcomed by the people and confirmed by the June 10 vote.

There is no point in dwelling at length on the advantages of this social service. Most people in this country, have studied it, understand it and would be happy to see it implemented. However, the province of Quebec has withheld its approval and for a very simple reason. The Union Nationale government of my province wants no part of it because this social security measure was originally put forward by a Liberal government in Ottawa.

That is why I would like to ask the present government, one enjoying the good graces of the Quebec Union Nationale, to use its influence to have this measure accepted. It would be a great service to our people.

On polling day, June 10, many people in my constituency came to ask me to pay their hospital bills, even before casting their votes. My answer was immediate. I referred them, with my best regards, to the proper authorities.

Mr. Speaker, I am stating these facts so that you will understand the urgency of making such a service available to the great majority of our families of modest means.

(Text):

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I hesitated a moment or two before rising to my feet because I thought it probable that the former minister of health and welfare might wish to take part in this debate and, personally, I should be very glad to hear him do so before we end the proceedings.

I was rather interested to hear the hon. member for Hamilton South (Mr. McDonald) come forward so valiantly to the defence of the government. Certainly it is encouraging to see him stepping in so valiantly when some of the more senior members of his party have been strangely silent so far in this debate. Perhaps they feel the references to some of their former remarks which were put on record this afternoon by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) might not gibe too well with what they might wish to say at this particular time, and therefore they may be a little more reluctant to speak than was the hon. member for Hamilton South.

Actually I think the hon. member for Hamilton South may be still at the honeymoon stage, as far as his attachment to the present government is concerned, if he imagines that it is going to go charging full speed ahead without an occasional prod from the opposition. Certainly the motion for Mr. Speaker to leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into a committee of supply is one of the occasions when those of us on this side of the house have the right and the responsibility to point out what we believe to be the weaknesses of the government.

Mr. Broome: They haven't any.

Mr. Barnett: That is a matter of opinion. The house would be a rather dull place if we were all in agreement on that point. It is all very well for people like the hon. member for Hamilton South to suggest that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has been a busy man and that we should have a little more patience than we have before bringing up such delicate matters as putting health insurance into effect. I think, however, that if hon. members on the government side were to examine a little more carefully the motion proposed on behalf of the C.C.F. group they would see that all it is proposing is that those who are now on the government side should do what they said they were prepared to do when they were in opposition, and what they were urging the former government to do as recently as last April.

It would not be in keeping with the facts to suggest that this question of health insurance is one which involves stepping into unexplored fields. After all, I remember that a long time before I was a member of this house I received a copy of a draft bill which was presented for the consideration of a committee of this house, outlining in complete detail the operation of a national hospital insurance plan.

I remember having participated in a forum with representatives from one or two political schools of thought on the subject matter of that draft bill and certainly I know that we found this draft bill was something which had involved a lot of careful preparation and study. Therefore I suggest that the amendment we are proposing is simply a matter of asking those who now sit on the treasury benches to live up to their announced belief as expressed earlier in the current year, nothing more or less than that.

When the former minister of national health and welfare sat across the floor from this group, as he probably remembers only too well, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre and others in this group kept urging and prodding him to move a little more speedily than he was doing. However, when he did get to the point of bringing in the hospital and diagnostic services bill last year we welcomed the fact that he was bringing it into the house although we did not hesitate to point out some of its shortcomings. I am sure the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) would not expect us to be any less diligent in prodding the present Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) than we were in prodding him.

Health Insurance

It does seem strange to me, as was very well documented by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, that the present minister has been so reticent and evasive in the manner in which he has discussed the introduction and development of the hospital insurance plan. Like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I must confess I was really alarmed the other day when he started this business concerning the question of whether "plans in force" and "plans in operation" were synonymous terms. Certainly anyone who had listened to the discussion which took place in this chamber when the bill for hospital insurance was brought in could place no construction on the remarks made by the present Minister of National Health and Welfare other than that he was trying to back out of this scheme. That is something as far as we in the C.C.F. group are concerned which is not a side issue as was suggested this afternoon by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill).

That remark of the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate will perhaps haunt the Liberal party for a long time because in spite of their slowness over the years they have been rather fond of parading themselves as being the great apostles of such measures as health insurance and other social security measures and when one of the former cabinet ministers of the last administration in this house suggests that the question of pressing forward in the field of hospital insurance is a mere side issue, one in which we should not seek to prod and push the present government, I suggest he has put something on the record that reveals, as some one has suggested, what is, after all, the true attitude of the Liberal party when one gets right down to brass tacks.

Sometimes we wonder why it is that the professions that are made by some hon. members—quite sincerely, I think—who sit on the Liberal or Conservative benches seem to wither away so quickly when they have the responsibility of executing plans and putting them into action. I rather wonder whether or not the explanation for it does not really lie in the sort of thing that one reads in publications such as the one I have in my hand. This particular document, volume 113 of a bulletin called "Industry" dated March 1957 is published by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, Incorporated. On the subject of hospital insurance it has this to say:

> Government-sponsored hospital insurance is coming because most Canadians have indicated that they want it, because all the national political parties profess themselves in favour of it—

[Mr. Barnett.]

I like that phrase, "profess themselves in favour of it".

> —and because there is little organized opposition to it of a national character.
> Even so, it would be wrong to assume that individual qualms are few and far between. There are still people who view the advent of government into the field of medicine—even on this limited scale—with deep foreboding: for them it is "the thin end of the socialist wedge".
> Such people are apprehensive that hospital costs will soar, that they will be met increasingly out of taxes rather than contributions, and that rancorous disputes between the provinces and Ottawa over this aspect or that will both sour the scheme and broaden the extent of government intervention.

As far as I have read, that statement is perhaps descriptive but then this article goes on to say:

> Nor should these be lightly dismissed as idle fears. Bureaucracy and needless extravagance have been early features of all such government schemes ever since Bismarck's Germany became the first country to provide state insurance against sickness back in 1883.
> When government crosses the hospital threshhold, economy flies out through the window.

You know, Mr. Speaker, that sounds almost like the hon. member for Vancouver South (Mr. Broome) talking about T.C.A. When one reads such expressions of sentiment as that in an editorial publication of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association one cannot help but wonder whether the expression of such views might not be having much more influence with the present government behind the scenes than we may be aware of, because it seems to me if the government was listening to the expression of views put forward by certain other organizations in this country we would be getting the kind of action which is proposed by the C.C.F. amendment at this time. For example, in the recent memorandum to the government of the Canadian Labour Congress they have this to say:

> The Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act has in effect been endorsed by all the provinces but one. It should become operative forthwith.

What a contrast there is between the point of view expressed here by the Canadian Labour Congress and the point of view expressed by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. Which one of these organizations is listened to by the government? Which one of these organizations has the inside track in the policymaking of the government in respect of these matters? When we see the government being strangely silent on the question of when it is going to implement and make effective this act which is on the federal statute books we cannot help but have the suspicion that the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and its representations may be receiving a lot more attention from the government than are the representations so recently made to the government by the Canadian Labour Congress. The Canadian Labour Congress in its memorandum goes on to say this:

> As matters now stand, two provinces, Saskatchewan and British Columbia, have full-fledged hospital insurance schemes already in effect. Two others, Alberta and Newfoundland, have rather more limited schemes in terms of population covered. Ontario has declared its intention of introducing a scheme beginning in 1959. Presumably the other provinces will follow suit.
> Under the circumstances, we believe there should be no unnecessary delay in making dominion grants available to those provinces which are already providing hospital services of the kind and quality outlined in the act.

That is precisely the point of view that I for one want to stand up and support in this house. In the province of British Columbia we have had quite a considerable number of years of experience with a hospital insurance plan and, as I may have remarked before in this house, it really came as a bit of a shock to me, after I came to spend some time in the province of Ontario as a result of my attendance in this house, to realize that people in this province were still worrying about hospital bills, and so on. I suddenly realized what a tremendous sense of freedom I had enjoyed for a period of years owing to the hospital insurance coverage that I had as an individual citizen.

I cannot help but be reminded of the fact that we got hospital insurance in British Columbia in 1949 only because it was necessary in the opinion of the then government of British Columbia, a coalition of Liberals and Conservatives, perhaps the same sort of coalition that seemed to be developing here this afternoon. We got that hospital insurance program only because there was a group in the legislature led by the present hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch), the leader of His Majesty's loyal opposition at that time in Victoria, who were prepared to stand up and battle day in and day out for that sort of thing. It was because—it was generally recognized in British Columbia at that time—of the existence of the threat to the government of that kind of opposition that we really got our first hospital insurance plan in operating form in the province of British Columbia. The fact of the matter is that today in British Columbia no one would dare attempt to touch that hospital insurance plan.

In the light of the sort of thinking that has been expressed in this house many times by the former minister of national health and welfare when he talked about the national health grant program, I would suggest that the argument that has been put forward by the Canadian Labour Congress as well as by many others should be given effect, and that those provinces which have a hospital insurance plan in operation now should have the benefits of the federal government's participation in this scheme.

I suggest that that is one of the things which will give an opportunity to provinces like British Columbia to do further pioneering in the field of providing adequate health and hospital services which are so necessary apparently in this country in order for us to move ahead in these fields. I am as sure as I am standing here that the minute this money is made available to the province of British Columbia, under the terms of the act we are discussing, there will develop in that province a strong program to ensure that the extra money which comes from the federal authority will be made available for the extension of our various health services in that province. As a matter of fact, I doubt very much whether there will be any real objection to that kind of development from any quarter in British Columbia today. I suggest that, owing to the fact that the people in certain provinces have seen fit to do some of the perhaps necessary pioneering work in these fields within our country they should be given the opportunity to move ahead now in some unexplored fields, and thus lead the way to bringing closer the day when we shall have a complete national health insurance plan throughout the breadth of Canada.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Question.

Mr. Poulin: Mr. Speaker, it is my intention to raise another grievance.

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I ask the hon. member to defer his raising of another grievance. I believe there are still members who wish to speak on the amendment which is before the house, which is the only proper subject to discuss at this moment. I call on the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond.

Mr. T. J. Irwin (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, of course it had not been my intention to say anything about this amendment, but so far as I am concerned—and I think I can speak for my group—I am willing to go along with the amendment because all that the amendment asks for is the implementation of the intention of section 6, subsection 2 of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act, which reads:

> No contributions shall be paid under this act until at least six provinces, containing at least one-half the population of Canada, have entered into an agreement, and the provincial law in relation to those provinces is in force.

I do not think this is too much to ask. I do not think the government can accuse us of unnecessarily prodding it when we ask it to implement something that is already on the statute books, because any statute is the business of any government, no matter when it takes office. That statute is already there, and we are asking them now to put that part of the statute into force at once.

The province of British Columbia was ready for this section of the statute long before April 12, 1957, because when I look at section 5 of the same act I find it contains the terms of the agreement with the provinces. Subsection 2 reads:

> In every agreement, the province shall covenant and agree
> (a) to make insured services available to all residents of the province upon uniform terms and conditions.

I submit right now, Mr. Speaker, that British Columbia is the only province that complies absolutely with this condition, because any person resident in British Columbia for one year is covered by the hospital insurance act in that province. Every single person in that province is ready now to take advantage of anything that the federal government may see fit to do to make things a little easier.

The hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) quoted the Canadian Labour Congress' memorandum of October 21, 1957, but he did not read quite far enough. Let me take up where he left off:

> Since they (the province) have been shouldering the burden for some years without assistance (apart from health grants), they should immediately get the benefit of the act. Anything else is less than fair. Furthermore, to make these grants available to them now would undoubtedly cause the more laggard provinces to get their own legislation into effect all the sooner.

Then a little further on we find the following:

> We think the government agrees. Certainly the Conservative party in opposition voted to censure the late government for not announcing legislation for this purpose. Again we hope that what the party voted for in opposition it would carry out in office.

When the present government were in opposition they voted for this hospital insurance scheme. They voted for subsection 2 of section 6. What we are asking them to do now is to implement it. There is no reason why it should not be implemented.

May I say that I have another reason for saying a couple of words in support of this amendment.

One of the reasons I am supporting this amendment is that I should like to smoke out into the open the present Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith). I have an idea that the gentleman in question is quite willing to go along with this matter. I have an idea that he is quite willing to go along with it and that the government is willing to go along with it but I should like him to say now whether or not he is going to do it. If he does not say he is going to do it now, we will know that he has no intention of doing it now or probably at any other time.

As to my friend the hon. member for York-Scarborough (Mr. McGee), he spoke for a moment or two about what this government had done with regard to old age pensions, old age assistance, disabled persons and blind persons in the legislation they brought down for them. That is fair enough as far as it went but it has nothing to do with hospital insurance; not a thing in the world. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is time this government got around to implementing all these things that it was so anxious about in previous sessions and at least to implementing the suggestion that was brought forward 40 years ago and for which we are looking now. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this amendment should carry.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether, before discussing this particular matter, I might take advantage of this the first day in the House of Commons of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Smith) to extend to him a very sincere welcome. I do so for, like the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), all former students of his, I have a special reason for being particularly proud that he should become a member of the House of Commons. I cannot extend to him wishes for a long tenure, but I can say to him quite sincerely that we are indeed proud that he joins the ranks of the class of 1928 serving this country in the parliament of Canada.

I must take issue with the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) who, speaking of the opposition sitting to your immediate left, Mr. Speaker, said that we had apparently abdicated our role as an opposition. The hon. gentleman, of course, did not expect to be taken too seriously when he made that observation because he knows that in this session the real opposition of the government has been that led by the right hon. gentleman who is the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. St. Laurent). Likewise he said that we had apparently, because of the statement of the Leader of the Opposition, given indication of an abdication on our part to discuss the estimates. That, of course, again is a statement that I know he does not wish any of us to take seriously because it is in no way in accord with the observation made by the Leader of the Opposition. We shall exercise our right of constructive criticism.

What we are concerned about here at this time is to see that in the present unusual situation this government is given an opportunity of carrying out its election promises at the earliest possible moment. It is because of that consideration that we have taken the stand which was stated by the Leader of the Opposition today and which has governed our conduct in respect of other matters involving amendments and other moves in this house that would have led to no other course than a dissolution of this parliament at this time.

I do not think anyone should be misled by the terms of the amendment before us. On its face it looks like an innocent amendment and I have no doubt that it will be used by hon. gentlemen to my left in the far corner as an indication that only they and those who supported that amendment really are interested in seeing that hospital insurance in this country is furthered. I am sure that statement will be made by hon. gentlemen at what they regard as appropriate moments. But let my words now be associated with such declarations when I say that this amendment would be a very effective way of further postponing the day when we can have a real advance made in the matter of hospital insurance. What would be the consequence of it? The consequence of the acceptance of the amendment in this form would mean that this government would be defeated. That would mean that there would be no federal-provincial conference. That would mean that this government would not be in a position to carry on the kind of negotiations with the provinces that are necessary in furthering hospital insurance in Canada. That is what this amendment would mean. Instead of this amendment being a positive step forward for the implementation of hospital insurance, it would be a step that would at least suspend any of these negotiations which are necessary to the ultimate adoption of hospital insurance in Canada.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would my hon. friend permit a question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Did he discontinue negotiations with the provinces after parliament was dissolved last April?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I certainly did not, as I will indicate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Then how does my hon. friend make the argument he is now advancing?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is quite a different matter. Our government had declared its policy. This government has not yet declared its policy. That is the difference. I am glad my hon. friend has recognized in his amendment the indispensable position of the provinces in this matter. If I may say so, he has not always taken that position.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Yes, we have.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says, "Yes, we have". I do not want to do him an injustice but my impression is that in former declarations and submissions that he has made in this house he has given the impression that this particular kind of matter depended entirely upon actions of the federal government. From the terms of this amendment or from the implications, at any rate, we can see that he now recognizes that a matter of this sort depends upon co-operation of the provincial governments as well. If this amendment has the faults which I believe it possesses, it nevertheless serves the purpose which I am sure really was in the mind of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, namely to join with the Liberal opposition—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —in bringing to the attention of the government the importance of doing something about this matter.

What are the facts? Shortly after the speech from the throne was read I took advantage of the opportunity, on behalf of those of us who sit in this group, to inquire of the genial Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) why he had not seen fit to put in Her Majesty's mouth words that would express the intention of the government in the matter of hospital insurance. In the speech from the throne nothing whatsoever had been said about health insurance. Then, as the house knows, shortly thereafter I took advantage of a motion somewhat similar to this one to urge on the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith)—I think in the presence of the Prime Minister—the desirability of an early statement by the government of its position with regard to health insurance. I pointed out that there was a great silence on the part of members of the government with respect to this matter. I noted, of course, with satisfaction, that the Minister of National Health and Welfare, when he had taken office, made a public statement in which he said that one of his intentions was to further the establishment of hospital insurance in Canada. I again acknowledge his statement. But his has been the sole voice of those sitting on the treasury benches.

During the election campaign the Prime Minister made many speeches. I have carefully examined the many varied and interesting utterances of the Prime Minister and I find it difficult to find that he made many references to hospital insurance. I think the only reference he made that I recall at the moment was a somewhat abbreviated reference, if I may use the term, to hospital insurance in the city of Winnipeg.

Mr. Pickersgill: Also Saskatoon.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) points out the Prime Minister also said something along this line in Saskatoon while he was near home. I suppose that was a good place to say something that was obviously popular in Saskatchewan.

There are good reasons, therefore, in the face of this silence on the part of the government for those of us in the opposition to conclude that the government, if interested in hospital insurance, at any rate has not given great evidence of this interest or of its intentions. I feel that this particular debate today will serve the purpose of giving us an opportunity of urging the government to make a statement of its intentions, both as to Bill No. 320 as it now is on the statute books, and as it might be in the light of any changes which, in view of the position government members took from this side of the house, they might want to make.

The fact is that the correspondence between the Prime Minister and the various provincial premiers indicates that at the coming conference on November 25, understandably a fiscal conference, there is going to be little opportunity, if any at all, for a discussion of hospital insurance. Hon. members will recall that I asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) on several occasions whether or not an opportunity would be afforded at that conference for provincial governments to discuss hospital insurance. The minister indicated that there should be no difficulty in having some kind of discussion with the provinces. But the correspondence between the provinces and the Prime Minister of Canada does not support that view. This correspondence clearly establishes that in the mind of the government this conference on November 25 is to be a conference dealing with fiscal matters and with fiscal matters alone. Of course, if a province wants to bring up the question of hospital insurance incidentally, in so far as it involves a very considerable expenditure on their part as well as on the part of the federal government, there could be no objection to that, I take it from reading the correspondence. However, the correspondence does not give any basis for discussion of further demands by the provinces on the federal government, for concessions or modifications in the existing law, except in a letter written to the premier of Manitoba on October 29. Then, the Prime Minister did say there would be an opportunity at the dominion-provincial conference for discussing hospital insurance.

This letter preceded the letter that was sent to all the provinces later. We have to ask the Prime Minister which letter is to govern the situation in so far as this conference is concerned, the letter that was sent to Premier Frost and all the other premiers or the first letter sent only to the premier of Manitoba? The provinces are vitally interested in this. Manitoba is not one of the provinces that has, as yet, agreed to come in on the basis of the bill which was passed at the last session. Premier Campbell has said that because of the failure of the Prime Minister—undoubtedly a busy man—to answer his correspondence the acceptance of hospital insurance in Manitoba has been delayed. But for that delay there would have been progress made by that province in the matter of accepting the general offer laid down by the federal government in Bill No. 320.

Then we had a further complication that obscures the picture, or at any rate fails to give us a clear indication of what the government really intends to do about this matter on November 25. One of the members on this side, I think it was the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) asked the Minister of National Health and Welfare if the t.b. and mental health patients were to be included in the coverage. The minister gave a reply that I think would lend itself to the interpretation that that might be done.

Mr. Monteith: Just like yours.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend says, just like mine. If they were like mine, they were unequivocal. Then the hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Deniset) asked the Prime Minister the same question on another day, and the Prime Minister said there was no commitment. On the one hand, we have a statement from the Prime Minister, and on the other that of the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Now, the Minister of National Health and Welfare will not misunderstand me if I say that, much as I have respect for him and his authority as minister, I am bound to recognize that any declaration made by the Prime Minister must be regarded as having primacy in so far as declarations of policy of the government are concerned.

We have, therefore, these various contradictions which serve as a background for the building of a vacuum in so far as knowing what the intentions of this government really are. We do not know, for instance, whether or not they have abandoned the position that they took when Bill No. 320 was under consideration, that the bill was acceptable, that the bill was a forward step but it was wanting in many particulars. The Minister of Finance, it will be recalled, moved an amendment to the effect that there should be included in the provisions of the bill certain features that were not included. We were told, not in an amendment, but in a whole series of speeches by hon. gentlemen when they were in opposition, that in addition to not covering tuberculosis and mental illness the bill was wanting because it did not provide for sharing alike with the provinces in the matter of depreciation. There were many speeches made by hon. gentlemen opposite that, in addition, the federal government should share in the cost of administering the scheme.

Now what is the attitude of the government with regard to these questions? Have they now decided, confronted with the responsibility which is theirs, that they do not propose to accept in government what they urged when they were in opposition? What is the reason that provinces like New Brunswick and Nova Scotia are not in the scheme? The situation before the election was this. Six provinces had accepted the federal proposal; they were the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, Prince Edward Island, Ontario and Newfoundland. The governments of New Brunswick and Nova Scotia were in intense negotiations, not only with the officers of the department but with myself. In answer to the question put by the member for Winnipeg North Centre, may I say that after the dissolution of this house and during the course of the election, I took advantage of my unsuccessful mission to certain parts of Nova Scotia to discuss with the premier of that province matters having to do with the acceptance by Nova Scotia of the hospital insurance proposal the federal government had made.

I can say that the negotiations I had with Premier Stanfield resulted in marked progress, and I had reason to believe that there was a likelihood of that province coming in. As a matter of fact the next day the premier of Nova Scotia made a statement in which he said there was no question that the Nova Scotia government would accept the proposal put forward by the federal government. Later I saw the minister of health for Nova Scotia and the minister of health for New Brunswick in Montreal, again during the course of the election, where I had a more successful mission, incidentally. They both indicated, in the presence of each other, the great likelihood of their provinces coming in. Now why have Nova Scotia and New Brunswick not come in since June 10; what reasons have they in their minds today for not having accepted the proposal to which, at that time, it was evident they were giving favourable consideration?

Is it because this government has now taken some steps which are not acceptable to either one of these provinces? I do not know; we have had no statement on this matter from the government. We do know, however, that the government of the province of Nova Scotia has set up a second body to study from the point of view of Nova Scotia the advantages of this particular hospital insurance proposal of the federal government which is now part of the law of the land.

Has something developed in the meantime which causes them to feel they could not get from this government, under this law, the same kind of deal, for the extension of which the previous administration had received the approval of parliament? Do they feel that possibly because they share the same political conviction or ideology with the present government they might get a better deal? If that is the case then there should be no difficulty in the way of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) telling us just what is the situation.

However, here is the picture today, and it is a serious one, in so far as implementing this measure is concerned. Premier Frost has indicated that he proposes to bring in his act on January 1, 1959. It will be recalled that last winter the Prime Minister of Canada, in correspondence with the premier of Ontario, urged that premier to bring in his scheme at an early date and, while the then prime minister recognized that this was a matter exclusively within the control of the province of Ontario, he wanted Premier Frost to know that if he could bring in his measure before January 1, 1959, he would have the support of the federal government and, providing the necessary conditions embodied in the legislation were met, the federal government would be prepared to share with the government of that province the cost of hospital insurance in the province of Ontario.

Now Premier Frost has indicated the rates which will be charged to insured people in Ontario under his plan. That of course is a matter over which this parliament has no control or authority, but it does indicate that he is moving along with his scheme. Furthermore I know from my own conversations with Mr. Swanson, the head of the hospital insurance commission in Ontario, that the authorities were making and are making every preparation for the implementation of their measure—so far as they are concerned —on the date Premier Frost has set for himself. But, under the act—and this is what the government must bear in mind—if when Premier Frost comes to set in motion his measure there are not the number of provinces with schemes in force, not in operation as the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre properly pointed out no payments will be made by the federal government to the province of Ontario. No one would quarrel with the government of that province if there was a delay in the implementation of its scheme if they could not count on the federal government paying its share of this very laudatory but expensive proposition respecting the health of the people of Canada. So for that reason hon. gentlemen on this side of the house have every justification in pressing the government and prodding the government into action so that there will in fact be no delay on January 1, 1959, in the implementation of the scheme in the province of Ontario or in any one or other of the other five provinces.

Now the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre says, as he said last year and on other occasions, that there is a way out of that situation. That way, he says, is for the federal government to pay money to any province which has a scheme in being. Now that looks like a very attractive proposition but I think, on analysis it is one that really cannot stand up. I say this because in British Columbia they have had a hospital insurance scheme for a number of years; they have had a hospital insurance scheme for a longer period of time in the province of Saskatchewan, and that argument would have applied equally four, five and ten years ago as well as, it is urged, it applies today or as it did when the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre made it last spring. The refusal of the federal government in that particular is based upon the sound proposition that it has no right to ask all the taxpayers of Canada to foot the bill for benefits—no matter how good they may be—for a minority section of the people of the country with respect of a particular provincial enactment. That is the principle behind our proposition and if it should eventuate that this present government changes its position in this particular, then I think other provinces will be in a strong position to say "Well, what you have done"—let us say Ontario—"you should have done for us a long time ago."

It is for those reasons that this government owes it to the house to tell us what negotiations have been carried on since they came into office, if any negotiations have in fact been carried on. We were told by the Minister of National Health and Welfare that his officers are ready at all times to discuss these matters with the provinces. Well I say to him, of course the officers of the public services are ready at any time to discharge their duty, but that was not the question and it is not the question. What is this government doing to see that it makes itself available and what is it doing and what is the minister doing to further these negotiations with the provinces? That is the real question and unless we get a satisfactory answer to this interrogation we have the right to conclude that this matter of hospital insurance is going to be very considerably delayed indeed.

That is the proposition of which the province of Ontario should be aware, as I am sure it is, because last April in another room in this building I sat with my officials and those from the Department of Finance and from the province of Ontario, and it was pointed out by the provincial treasurer of Ontario at that time just exactly what the position would be in which Ontario would find itself unless we were energetic in our negotiations with the other provinces in getting them to accept the terms of Bill No. 320. The provincial treasurer said, "We will have taken great steps in regard to other insurance schemes with labour, management, insurance companies and so on and there will be nothing but confusion in the province of Ontario unless we have some assurance at some stage"—which would have been about the month of September last—"that we can expect payments to be made by the federal government."

Now that was the position at that time and we therefore sat down with the provinces to discuss with them the terms of the kind of master agreement that we would want to conclude between the provinces on the one hand and ourselves on the other. What progress has been made with regard to that kind of agreement?

When we left office we had exchanged the terms of the proposed clauses with various provinces. What has happened since that time? Has an agreement with Ontario been signed. We certainly would have signed an agreement, I am sure, by the end of June and certainly not later than the end of July.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Well some hon. gentlemen say, "oh, oh". I am saying I know whereof I speak. When I talk about these matters I can talk, as hon. members in this house know, about something into which this party and I have put our best endeavours over a long period.

What is the situation in regard to Saskatchewan? Saskatchewan has had hospital insurance for some time. There would have been no difficulty about an agreement with Saskatchewan, and, but for one point—that was the question of residence—I do not think there would have been any difficulty in connection with an agreement with the province of British Columbia. What has happened with regard to those two provinces? What negotiations are taking place? What is the state of participation by those two provinces? These are surely legitimate questions which one should, and can, put with propriety tonight to the Minister of National Health and Welfare.

What about the province of Prince Edward Island? Have officials of the department gone down to Prince Edward Island within recent months to discuss the terms of the main agreement? Have there been any preparatory steps taken in that or any other province which has already consented to the scheme? These are questions the answers to which will be the kind of argument or the kind of evidence which will establish in our minds and in the minds of the people of this country whether or not this government really intends to bring in hospital insurance at all.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Will the hon. gentleman allow a question? I followed his statement with great interest, and I should like to ask him this: if the answers he receives are not satisfactory or adequate, does he still intend to follow his leader in a vote of confidence in this government?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. Prime Minister is too experienced a lawyer to expect that a catch question can fool me. I do say this: from the public life of my leader I do not find much difficulty in following him anywhere and, secondly, if the answers are in the negative I will continue to prod the right hon. gentleman as strongly as I can. He knows perfectly well that if the answers are in the negative the acceptance of this particular amendment does not further the matter one way or another; all it would mean is that the right hon. gentleman would no longer enjoy the great luxury of being Prime Minister of Canada.

It should not be forgotten, Mr. Speaker, that this bill was put on the statute books at a time when it did not have to be put on the statute books, in conformity with the announcement of policy which had been made in regard to this matter. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre will, I am sure, agree with me in this, that when we met the provinces we said that once six provinces had expressed their intention of accepting the proposal of the federal government we would take the necessary legislative steps to implement our end of the bargain. The hon. member and his leader nod their heads. We introduced this bill in parliament when we did not need to introduce it, in accordance with our declaration of policy. At that time only five provinces had accepted. Nevertheless, as an earnest of our intention—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And in response to pressure.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Well, I am not going to deny that the hon. member does serve some purpose in this house on some occasions; that is why he is here. But the fact is that we put the act on the statute books before there was any requirement on our part to do so. Hon. gentlemen criticized us, and they continue to criticize us, for maintaining the principle of acceptance by six provinces. I explained at that time—and I have evidence to confirm this—that, first of all, we did not believe that in a matter of this sort, where there is divided opinion, it could be justified that all the taxpayers of Canada should be called upon to pay for something for a minority group, and if we had not insisted on the principle of six consenting provinces we would not have this approximation tonight of a national hospital insurance scheme or, rather, of a scheme which would be nationwide in its scope. We would not have had certain provinces in it. We kept saying that in this house; we kept pressing that on the provinces in the negotiations in which I took part in every province except one, where we got the required consent. Not that my participation brought about specific agreements, but it was an indication of the determination of the government of which I was a member to do everything it could to persuade the provinces to accept a measure which we believed to be in their interest.

Mr. Speaker, there can be no doubt about the importance of this question. This is a matter which has required careful collaboration between the provinces and the federal government. It is a matter which is going to involve an expenditure of considerable sums of money, roughly half the cost being shared by the federal government. It is true that some provinces, the wealthier provinces, are receiving less from the federal government than others, but we developed a plan of financial assistance which took into account the needs of the poorer provinces. Assistance in the case of Nova Scotia would amount to well over 70 per cent and in the case of New Brunswick close to 70 per cent. It would seem, therefore, that there can be no legitimate reason for those provinces, having in mind the great financial benefits to them, not coming into the scheme unless this government sitting on your right, Mr.

Speaker, has put some obstacle in the way which is not yet apparent to us or to the people of Canada.

Mr. MacInnis: The people of Nova Scotia never accepted anything from you.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member was never more correct in his life. They did not.

Mr. MacInnis: They never accepted it from you. It was only acceptance in principle. There was nothing definite.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member has not followed too carefully what I said. But I say this to him: his constitutents—the men who work in the coal mines—are the ones who in Nova Scotia are asking that the government of Nova Scotia should accept this.

Mr. MacInnis: You are wrong there.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Have you followed some of the reports of our mine workers union with regard to this?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): The hon. member indicates that perhaps they are not anxious. He sits on the government side. He is now indicating that this government has some doubts about this hospital insurance bill. If that is the case, then I hope the government will soon acquaint us with an intention which, apparently, the hon. gentleman has just now revealed. Apparently this government does not feel so sure, if what the hon. member said is right, and if the indication given by the hon. member is correct, perhaps this government is now taking a second look at this measure and thinking now that we have increased old age pensions and brought in these other social measures we cannot go any further. I don't agree with that position, of course.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): On a point of privilege—

Mr. Speaker: The hon. gentleman knows he cannot interrupt to ask a question unless the member who is speaking yields the floor.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I yield the floor.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I was just wondering if you had followed some of the reports from our mine workers union and so on with regard to this question.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Yes, I have. The mine unions, I know, want more than this. But I have not yet seen any mine union or any union which has not joined with the Canadian Congress of Labour in the tribute it paid to the former government for bringing in this particular measure.

[Mr. Martin (Essex East).]

Mr. MacInnis: There is definitely no affiliation between the miners' locals and the Canadian Labour Congress.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I hope that as a result of the action already taken by the government involving well conceived modifications of social measures introduced by those who sit on your left, Mr. Speaker, we are not now going to be told that because of the financial implications of these measures we cannot expect action on the part of this government with regard to hospital insurance.

This measure is now the law of the land. If we had been sitting on your right, Mr. Speaker, there could be no doubt but that we would have made and concluded agreements with all the consenting provinces, and if we had not we would not have come back to this house and placed any province in the embarrassing position like the one which unless something is done, is bound to confront the province of Ontario. I therefore say with confidence that this is a measure which will mean a great deal to the people of Canada. This is a measure that will provide for individuals receiving at the hands of the taxpayers of Canada, and through their own contributions in the provinces as well as their own participation in the tax loads imposed on them by the federal government, benefits that will be of the greatest social significance and it would be nothing short of a tragedy if this government, now reluctant to commit its opinions to this house and to the country, were to take any steps or avoid taking any steps that would delay a measure which means so much to the people of Canada.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Why don't you vote the way you speak?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, I would first of all, of course, take great pleasure in setting at ease the mind of the former minister of national health and welfare (Mr. Martin). He seems to be so concerned—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is right.

Mr. Monteith: —as to just what is the purpose of this government. I think I can assure him before I conclude my remarks that we have been progressing very favourably and I venture to say just as rapidly as he could progress in this position if his government had been returned to office on June 10.

Some hon. Members: Much more so.

Mr. Monteith: Due to the complexity of the agreements and the need for consultation with the provinces and so on I am quite convinced that no agreements could have been concluded and actually signed prior to this date. During the course of my remarks I will endeavour to point out to the hon. member for Essex East just what stage of development these agreements have now reached. Before doing that, however, I would like to remind hon. members that this is a want of confidence motion. As a consequence, without any further remarks and just to show how silly the situation is, I believe I could sit down at this moment and the government would be definitely sustained.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Trained seals over there now.

Mr. Monteith: Yes, but they are not all on this side; there are still trained seals in the other parties.

Mr. Pickersgill: Some of them are pretty slippery.

Mr. Monteith: Despite all the talk, as a result of such a vote a majority in this house would indicate that they believe we are taking whatever immediate steps should necessarily be taken to implement hospital insurance in Canada. There can be no other interpretation. As I said, this government would be sustained on a vote and without any discussion whatsoever. As a consequence, a majority in this house believe that we have been taking whatever immediate steps should be taken despite the terms of the amendment.

An hon. Member: Tell us about it, then.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, we are as well aware of all the points brought out by the previous speakers as they are. We have been studying this act and the implications of it as well as the future agreements with the provinces. I would remind the house that this legislation was passed last spring and incidentally it took the present chief opposition party the period of time that has elapsed since 1919 to get around to bringing in this legislation.

I wish to point out some of the steps this government has taken since it assumed office in the field of health insurance. First of all, all the interested provinces have been visited by the officials of my department for consultation.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): When?

Mr. Monteith: A few weeks ago the minister of health of Newfoundland was here in Ottawa consulting with me. Only last week the newly-appointed chairman of the hospital services planning commission of Nova Scotia, Mr. Black, visited me in Ottawa. Next week there is to be a meeting between the officials of the department of health of Ontario and my own department. These are only a few of the over-all meetings and consultations which have been in progress over the past few months.

Mr. Marler: Has there been any action?

Mr. Monteith: Plenty of action, more than there would have been if you had been in power. In the last two weeks I have personally met with the medical advisory committee of the Canadian Medical Association, the Association of Canadian Medical Colleges which represents the deans of all the medical colleges in Canada, the Canadian Hospital Association and the Dominion Council of Health. As I say, that was within the last two weeks. All these associations are definitely concerned with the application of our hospital insurance scheme in terms of how it is going to benefit Canadian citizens. All these bodies expressed their wish to co-operate with the Department of National Health and Welfare and also with the provincial authorities concerned. I would like to stress here that this is a co-operative enterprise in conjunction with the provinces. We, as the dominion government, are not forcing the pace.

Mr. Marler: That is true.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Ah, ha!

Mr. Monteith: This is a matter of co-operation and we are taking the provinces into consultation and working closely with them. That is the only way success can be achieved. We are not forcing something on the provinces. The provinces are moving forward with their plans and we are assisting in whatever way we can. We are always available for consultation and assistance.

On November 13 in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) said in effect that if the premiers of the provinces wish hospital insurance matters to be discussed at the forthcoming conference on November 25 and 26 an opportunity would be given to discuss these matters fully.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But what was the question?

Mr. Monteith: You asked the question, you should know.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I do.

Mr. Monteith: The hon. member asked if an opportunity for discussion of hospital insurance would be provided at the first opportunity. My department is arranging a conference of provincial technical officials in December to assist in ironing out any differences of opinion, regulations, etc. The hon.

member for Winnipeg North Centre appears to believe that this is an extremely simple matter. I would simply like to mention a few of the issues which have to come up for discussion at this time and I hope he will see, as I hope all other hon. members will, that this is a most complicated situation. I am quite sure the hon. member for Essex East will agree with me that he had not any idea when he was minister of this department that the whole thing could be put into force overnight. We have never said we would put it into force immediately. I have never taken any other stand but that we would put it in force as soon as we conceivably could.

Amongst the considerations which have to be discussed at this conference of technical officials of the provinces and my own department in December are the following: draft regulations, the draft agreement, the details required of provincial schemes for administration, medical problems related to the program, nursing education, the method of sharing calculated costs, the nature of reports and statistics and discussion with regard to certain groups now covered by the federal government.

Maybe it seems easy. Maybe, at one time, when I sat over there, I thought these things were easy; but I am sure the hon. member for Essex East will agree that these things are complicated; they do require consultation. We have acted in complete co-operation with provinces which are interested; we have followed through; we have wasted no time whatsoever.

Mr. Pickersgill: What about Manitoba?

Mr. Monteith: Yes, Manitoba, too; we have wasted no time there at all.

Mr. Pickersgill: Two months to get an answer to a letter.

Mr. Monteith: Mr. Speaker, I should like to say that we are acting promptly, and we intend to come up with a hospitalization scheme which is possible of implementation in co-operation with the provinces and for the betterment of all Canadians.

I should like to say a word about the interpretation of the term "in force". The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked me a question on November 11 last. There were two or three questions. The final question on his part was as follows, as reported at page 942 of Hansard:

> Mr. Speaker, may I ask a further supplementary question? In view of the fact that that is not the interpretation that was given to the last house by the former minister of national health and welfare, would the minister have appropriate inquiries made as to what is the legal meaning of those words?

[Mr. Monteith.]

My answer was:

> Mr. Speaker, in my studies at the moment concerning the act I have every intention of doing that.

I have done that; I said I would study this. I have, and I have had a legal opinion. I should like to read section 6 subsection (2) of the act:

> No contributions shall be paid under this act until at least six provinces, containing at least one-half the population of Canada, have entered into an agreement, and the provincial law in relation to those provinces is in force.

The legal opinion I have is as follows:

> As a general guide I should think that the provisions of subsection (2) of section 6 as quoted above would be satisfied if the provincial statute has become law notwithstanding that the payment of benefits thereunder may by the terms of the statute be postponed to some future date.

Now, that simply means, I presume, that when it has become law in the province, no matter if they do not undertake to make a payment until some months in the future, it is still considered to be in force.

May I point out that some of the provinces have not reached the stage of development of their legislation where the question of being in force is at all pertinent. They just have not reached that stage. In an important matter such as this any final decision can be reached only after the actual legislation of the provinces concerned has been reviewed. Some may have to be amended; others, of course, have not got their legislation on the statute books yet.

There has been a lot of talk today about our being dilatory in pushing this legislation. Mr. Speaker, I can only say that we have been pushing this legislation with every intention of getting it into force as soon as possible. Let us remember that there are still many important points to be decided. Most of those important points must be resolved in consultation with the provinces. We have to work with them. We do not settle these things alone; they must be settled in consultation with the provinces.

All I can say, Mr. Speaker, is that we are going forward with this legislation very rapidly. We have every intention of following it through without delay. We are going forward orderly but hastily. We do intend to come, and will come to a satisfactory and a beneficial conclusion which will react to the benefit of all Canadians.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): My hon. friend asked me a question at the outset, and my answer—

Mr. Monteith: Did I ask you a question?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I understood the minister to ask me a question.

Mr. Monteith: No, I did not.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I understood the minister to ask me a question. My hon. friend says no. The reason why we are taking the position we are is that, as he knows well, if this government were defeated on this measure we would be delaying the implementation of hospital insurance for some months.

Mr. Monteith: I understand your excuses.

Mr. Pickersgill: We do not understand your excuse.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is a subterfuge of the first water.

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I am sure the house and the country is indebted to the usual diligence of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for having brought this matter before the house and the country at this time. It has had at least this much effect, that for the first time since this house went into session we have had a statement from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) as to some of the steps that have been taken to bring this legislation into effect. We have been told at least this much, and I am sure it will be of great comfort to the provinces that the government is available for consultation.

The spokesman for the official opposition in this matter, the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), in his contribution was almost amusing because it occurred to me that he was under great difficulty in making his presentation; and the great inconvenience under which he was working will be realized when we know that he had to check on his speech with the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. St. Laurent) before he chewed the heck out of the government. As he went along he tried to leave the impression that in this case the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was in some strange and weird way joining with the Liberals to do something. Now what would he be joining with them to do? On this question the government has been giving us nothing but profound silence up until now, and the only thing in which we could have joined with the Liberals in this matter would be to make the silence more profound because they had nothing whatsoever to say about it until the amendment came before the house.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Oh, yes.

Mr. Zaplitny: As a matter of fact, as the hon. member for Essex East went on with his speech one could not help but get the impression that he was quickly reaching the point where he was almost saying "I wish I had moved that amendment myself".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): If it were not for the peculiar situation in which we are I certainly would have.

Mr. Zaplitny: But there were two statements, one by the hon. member for Essex East and the other by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) to which I must take issue on a matter of principle. Both of them stated that in their opinion the chief reason why the government could not move until they had six provinces in agreement on this matter was—and I think I took the words down correctly—that in principle they object to all the people of Canada paying for something of which only a minority of the people could take advantage. When you lay that alongside the attitude of the same members of the previous government—and we remember the attitude they took with relation to the Trans-Canada pipe line, where they were quite prepared to have all the taxpayers of Canada contribute very handsomely to a few Texas millionaires who were going to have all the advantage,—then it is a little difficult to follow them in that principle.

The reason why I intervene in this debate at all, Mr. Speaker, is to try to get an answer to something which we have endeavoured to find out from the government, and which the minister in his reply has not yet disclosed.

The question is where the government stands in relation to its pledge made before and during the election campaign that, in their opinion, tuberculosis and mental illness should be included under this legislation.

We have a particular interest in this matter in the province of Manitoba because for some time it was given out to us in Manitoba by the provincial government that it was on this matter they were trying to make up their minds; in other words, that that was the reason for the delay by the province of Manitoba in declaring its intention as to participation under this legislation. Only very recently, according to a report in the Winnipeg Free Press, the minister of health and welfare in the province of Manitoba had something to say about this matter. I will quote from the report which reads in part as follows:

> Hon. W. Bend, Manitoba health minister, said Wednesday Prime Minister Diefenbaker laid it down as "a matter of principle" for the Conservative party that national hospital insurance should cover TB and mental patients, and he added that the Prime Minister "cannot break faith".

Those last three words are in quotation marks, "cannot break faith". It is not clear whether those last three words are a declaration of confidence or a veiled threat. But in any event in the opinion of the minister of health of Manitoba this present administration and the party that is in power is firmly committed to the inclusion of tuberculosis and mental illness under this legislation. On various occasions since this house met we have endeavoured to find out from the minister what the situation is and in the answers given, we have a contradiction which I should like to point out and I hope that some other member of the government,—perhaps the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) himself—will stand up before the debate ends and clear up this matter once and for all. I find that on October 31 as reported at page 599 of Hansard, the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) asked the following question:

> Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of National Health and Welfare whether it is the intention of the government to carry out the promise made in Winnipeg by the Prime Minister to include mental and tubercular patients in the federal hospital insurance plan.

Here was the answer given by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith):

> Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member will find that it is the intention of the government to carry out all its campaign pledges.

He might have made that statement on the spur of the moment and he may have been trying to be facetious about it but I can assure him that that answer was very carefully noted in the press in western Canada and, as a matter of fact, as a result of that answer it was stated by the premier of our province and the minister of health in our province that they accepted that as a clear indication that it was the intention of this government to include tubercular patients and mental patients under this legislation.

But I find that on November 4 I addressed to the Prime Minister a question which arose out of actual reports in the Winnipeg newspapers saying that at last the government has announced in the house officially through its Minister of National Health and Welfare that it intended to include those two categories of illness under the act. I addressed the following question to the Prime Minister on November 4, as reported at page 701 of Hansard:

> Has the government given a firm commitment to the province of Manitoba that tuberculosis and mental illness will be included in the federal government's share of the cost of the public hospitalization plan? If so, when was this commitment given and in what form?

The Prime Minister replied as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, there has been no commitment, direct or indirect.

At the time I wondered why he added those last three words "direct or indirect", because he could have argued there was no direct commitment in the sense that neither he nor any minister of his government had officially communicated with the government of Manitoba to inform them that the government had now adopted as a policy the inclusion of those two categories of illness. But when he said "direct or indirect", it could have had only one implication, namely that he was repudiating the answer that had been given by his own minister on October 31, wherein the minister had said it was the intention of this government to carry out all its election pledges; and in the context of that answer he was referring particularly to the question of the inclusion of those two categories.

It appears to me, Mr. Speaker, that what the Minister of National Health and Welfare said on October 31 was contradicted or repudiated by the Prime Minister on November 4. That is the only impression that was left in my mind and that was the impression that was left in the province of Manitoba. That leaves the government and the people of Manitoba in exactly the same position they were in when they started. They still do not know what the position of this government is with regard to the inclusion of tubercular patients and mental patients. It is a matter of interest not only to the people of Manitoba but to all the provinces across this country. It is a matter which will have to be taken into account in the setting up of the legislation which the provinces will have to put on their statute books to deal with this matter, in the calculation of the cost, and in the calculation of what premiums if any they will have to pass on to the individual under this scheme.

I see no reason whatsoever why the Prime Minister, in the course of this debate, cannot rise in his place and clear up this one simple elementary question: Is it or is it not the intention of the government to do something during the course of this session to implement the promise which they so clearly made on many occasions to improve the present legislation by including tuberculosis and mental illness under the act? If the government will not disclose their stand on that question today, then the only inference we can draw from that fact is that they are backing away from the election pledges which they made and we even have reason to be suspicious, along with the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), that the government is backing away from the whole proposition of a national health insurance plan.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I think this debate today has served a very useful purpose. I think the debate has forced the hand of the minister. It would suggest to me that, in view of his statement in this house on Monday last, he has made a great deal of progress. In addition to noting his remarks at the end of his statement on Monday last in which he referred to being quite prepared to take this question of definition into consideration, I think one should also have on the record his remarks in answer to the question asked by the hon. member by Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) as to the definition of "in force". At one point the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) replied as follows, as reported at page 942 of Hansard:

> I think possibly the only answer to that is the interpretation of "in force".
> Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the minister not make clear what he understands by the words "in force"?
> Mr. Monteith: Yes. My understanding as of the moment is that "in force" is implied to mean in operation. Whether or not that is a correct legal opinion, that is what I am given to understand as the implication.

So I suggest that this new legal definition which the Minister of National Health and Welfare gave to the house tonight is sufficient reason or sufficient accomplishment to warrant the debate that took place in the house today on this very important question.

I am indeed surprised that a party which earlier this calendar year was in such a hurry to have a national hospitalization program should now be so slow in advancing the date of this program coming into effect. As has already been stated, last session the hon. member for Lanark, Dr. Blair, moved a motion which I think was an excellent one putting the position of the official opposition at that time, namely that a scheme of hospital insurance should not have to wait until six provinces have their plans either in operation or in force, but moneys made available by the federal government should be available to one province that had its scheme in operation.

I certainly do not agree with the statement of the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) that it is always necessary for a federal government to wait until the majority of the provinces comprising a majority of the people of this country are prepared to advance legislation before the federal government should be prepared to give a lead. It has been suggested to me by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) that that was not the suggestion in the old age pension plan; that was not the suggestion in the amendments that were made in this very session to statutes that required contributions by the provinces. Instead the government said that any time a provincial government was prepared to match such things as disability pensions, then the federal government was prepared to pay the money for the additional amount that could be provided. Even this government does not always wait until a majority of the provinces containing a majority of the people of this country are prepared to act.

I do not see that that is the role of the federal government, that legislation necessary to the welfare of the people of this country should wait until the provinces with a majority of the population are prepared to go ahead in a certain direction. Indeed, the former government, of which the hon. member for Essex East was a member, has not always taken that attitude. They did not take that attitude with regard to unemployment insurance. They did not adopt that attitude with regard to the trans-Canada highway.

Mr. Pickersgill: Unemployment insurance is a national scheme, and always has been.

Mr. Argue: We have heard for so many years that the provision of benefits to take care of the unemployed is a matter of provincial jurisdiction.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask the hon. gentleman a question? Was he perhaps confusing unemployment insurance and unemployment assistance, because there has never been any provincial unemployment insurance of which I am aware?

Mr. Argue: I was not confusing them at all. The party, of which the hon. member was a minister, said for so many years that the providing of assistance for the employable unemployed was a matter for the provinces. Finally the former Liberal government said that even if the provinces do not like what we are doing we are going to give leadership and we will go so far as to not ask them for one dollar of contribution to this scheme. I say, therefore, the position now taken is going backwards when it is stated we must wait until six provinces have schemes in force. My hon. friends did not take this attitude last spring.

There is one reason, though, which I can understand, for their change in position. It might be possible that they do not know from where they are going to get the money. They are hoping privately, in the recesses of their minds, that they are not going to have to pay any money under this act in 1958 and that it will be January 1, 1959 before they are called upon to pay any money. The Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), therefore, will not have to meet this problem in this calendar year. He is grinning right now. I think the Minister of Finance should not always be retreating. When he was in the opposition he was in favour of a much wider and a much faster health program than he is today. I should like him to take part in this discussion and tell us why this government, now that it is in office, has not taken exactly the same position it took when in opposition, namely that the provision of a hospitalization program for the people of this country was so important that federal money should be paid immediately to any province, even though it was paid to just one province, if that province had a suitable hospitalization plan in operation.

On motion of Mr. Argue the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: I assume the house will proceed with this debate tomorrow?

Mr. Green: We shall continue with this debate tomorrow, and if we get into supply we shall take the estimates of secretary of state, mines and technical surveys, veterans affairs—

Mr. Chevrier: In the same order as given on Friday night?

Mr. Green: No, the order is changed, and then fisheries.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And would that be the order for Wednesday?

Mr. Green: I expect so, Mr. Speaker.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

STEWART-CASSIAR ROAD, B.C.

Question No. 95—Mr. Lesage:

1. Has a survey been made by the Department of Public Works of the Stewart-Cassiar road?
2. If so, what were the conclusions reached by the survey party or parties as to route, approximate costs, etc.?
3. Has a final agreement been reached with the government of British Columbia as to the sharing of costs for the building of the road?
4. If so, what are the main conditions of the agreement?

Answer by: Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources):

1. A full survey has not been made by the Department of Public Works. However, a preliminary reconnaissance survey of most of the route has been carried out by that department.

2. Tentative conclusions based on the preliminary reconnaissance survey are that the total cost of the Stewart-Cassiar road would be in the region of $20,000,000 and that there are two possible southern terminals apart from Stewart which might be more economical to use. However, while the cost of road construction alone might be lower in using an alternative terminal, the cost of port development might well be higher and more than counterbalance savings in the road itself. In addition, it is not certain whether the development of port facilities at the other possible terminals is practical from an engineering viewpoint. Final estimates of the total cost of the project cannot be made until much more detailed surveys and studies are carried out.

3. The final agreement has not yet been signed as there are still some points to be worked out.

4. As soon as the final agreement is signed it will be tabled in the house.

JASPER AND BANFF NATIONAL PARKS—CHAIR LIFTS

Question No. 147—Mr. Lesage:

1. Have tenders been received following the call for tenders issued on March 1, 1957, for gondola or chair lifts concessions in Jasper national park and in Banff national park near lake Louise?
2. If so, (a) how many in each case; (b) from whom; and (c) what are the reasons why concessions were not awarded?

Answer by: Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources):

1. Yes.

2. (a) One tender was received for the gondola lift concession near lake Louise; no tender was received for the concession in Jasper national park.

(b) The Ski Club of the Canadian Rockies (1947) Limited.

(c) The single tenderer has not submitted full details of the manner in which the development of the concession would be financed.

CHEESE—PRICE SUPPORT COST

Question No. 163—Mr. Lavigne:

How much has the price support on cheese cost the federal treasury during the fiscal years 1954, 1955, 1956?

Answer by: Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture):

Nil.

FINANCE

TABLING OF REPORT OF TARIFF BOARD

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should like to table copies in English and French of a report which I received yesterday from the chairman of the tariff board. It is the board's report on reference No. 124, fruits and vegetables. The report is accompanied, as is usual, by a transcript of the evidence received by the board at its public hearings.

I know there will be widespread interest in the contents of this report, both on the part of hon. members and on the part of fruit and vegetable growers, processors, and others concerned. For that reason the tariff board, with my approval, gave priority to the completion of this report and a special effort has been made to avoid any delay in tabling it. In that connection I wish to thank my colleague, our gracious Secretary of State (Mrs. Fairclough), for facilitating the prompt printing of the report despite the fact that the Queen's printer was heavily committed on other work.

The tariff board reference arose from the fact that in recent years there had been representations from producers pointing to important changes in techniques of production and methods of distribution, as well as in prices, of fresh fruits and vegetables. It had been suggested that the system of seasonal tariffs was in need of revision. The tariff board was therefore asked to make a study of the items in the Customs Tariff covering fresh fruits and vegetables of a kind grown in Canada and, if such study indicated that amendments to the Customs Tariff were desirable, to prepare a revised schedule of tariff items, with recommendations as to rates of duty. The board was asked also to indicate any consequential amendments which might be required in the tariff items covering the same fruits and vegetables in processed form.

As I have so recently received the tariff board's report, there has not been time for my colleagues and me to make a thorough study of its analysis of the situation and its recommendations as to future action. I am, however, in a position to give the house at this time some indication of the nature and extent of the proposals contained in the report.

The tariff board received briefs from the Canadian Horticultural Council, processors' representatives, the Canadian Association of Consumers, and others. It held public sittings in Ottawa for three days in July and two days in September. In formulating its recommendations the board appears to have taken account of representations included in the briefs and evidence placed before it at the sittings.

The board's recommendations follow the council's suggestion for the continuation, in principle, of the present statutory provisions for fresh fruits and vegetables. These provisions are intended to give greater protection during the Canadian producers' main marketing season than in the off season. They consist of a basic ad valorem rate of 10 per cent for which may be substituted seasonal specific duties. These seasonal rates have generally a considerably higher ad valorem incidence than the 10 per cent off-season rate. The duration of the application of the in-season rate varies from product to product, depending on the length of the Canadian marketing season.

The tariff board had before it requests from the Canadian Horticultural Council and processors' representatives for 45 changes in the tariff. The requested changes included increases in seasonal specific and other duties, extensions in the periods of application of seasonal duties, the dividing of the application of such duties into two separate periods, and combinations of these forms of tariff protection. The board in its report recommends the adoption in full of the council's proposals in respect of potatoes, asparagus, cauliflower, corn on the cob, lettuce, parsnips, sour cherries, cranberries and prunes. The board further recommends the adoption in part of the proposals in respect of brussels sprouts, cabbage, carrots, celery, cucumbers, mushrooms, onions, peppers, apricots, peaches and pears. Consequential amendments are recommended in the duties on canned and frozen asparagus, frozen brussels sprouts, canned mushrooms, canned apricots, canned and frozen cherries, cranberry jelly or sauce, canned and frozen peaches, and canned prunes.

In its report the tariff board notes that at the public sittings there were suggestions that there should be recourse to the principle of fixing values for duty purposes. The board, however, made no recommendations on this matter, as being beyond its terms of reference.

The Canadian Horticultural Council submitted a request that an additional duty be charged on vegetables imported prepacked in consumer-size polythene or cellophane bags. In making the request the council stated that the bags, if imported alone, would be dutiable at 20 per cent ad valorem whereas for prepackaged vegetables they were dutiable only in so far as they added to the gross weight of the vegetables. Another reason for the request was that the shipping of vegetables in this form led to a greater degree of trimming and preparation, thereby reducing the ad valorem equivalent of the specific duty.

In the light of its study of these representations the tariff board recommended that an item be inserted in the Customs Tariff to provide that an additional duty be charged on certain vegetables when imported during periods of seasonal specific duty in packages weighing five pounds or less. The vegetables to which this provision would apply are green beans, brussels sprouts, carrots, beets, cauliflower, lettuce, peas, parsnips and corn on the cob.

As I have said, the government has not yet had an opportunity to consider the recommendations presented in the report which I have just tabled. I can, however, assure hon. members that the report will be studied carefully, and that the government will give serious consideration to the tariff board's recommendations. If we decide to take action along the lines of these recommendations we would expect to take the necessary steps in conformity with the general agreement on tariffs and trade.

AGRICULTURE

BUTTER—ANNOUNCEMENT OF CHANGE IN PRICE SUPPORT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I should like to announce that the price support on first grade creamery butter has been changed by adding butterfat in any form which the agricultural prices support board may specify. At the same time the government has added to the list of products under import control, butter oil and any other form of butterfat containing 55 per cent or more of butterfat. Butter oil imports have been increased during the past few months, and it has been deemed advisable to control the imports so that the butter price support program will not be affected.

IMMIGRATION

EDDIE CALLAHAN—REPORTED ISSUANCE OF DEPORTATION ORDER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. I notice that he is not in his seat. If his parliamentary assistant will take this as notice it will be satisfactory.

The press of this morning carries the news that the Department of Citizenship and Immigration have served a deportation order against one Callahan charged with attempted murder and assault with attempt to maim the returning officer in the constituency of Laurier. The question I would like to ask the minister is whether he will assure the house that the deportation order will not go into effect until such time as the trial of Callahan has been held.

Mr. John B. Hamilton (Parliamentary Assistant to the Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I understand that according to the same press report it was indicated that there would be an appeal in connection with the order in question. Therefore I do not think I should make any comment on that aspect of the order; but I do understand, sir, that any order of this type remains in abeyance until the trial on the charges takes place before the criminal courts.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY, WINNIPEG—REPORTED DISMISSAL FOR FAILURE TO CROSS PICKET LINE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. I wonder whether he is yet in a position to answer my question of last Thursday regarding suspension from service a week ago today of members of a Canadian Pacific Railway switching crew in the Winnipeg area who felt that they could not cross a picket line. When he answers that question will he also say whether he is aware of the press report in last night's Ottawa Citizen that a strike vote has been called among members of the brotherhood of locomotive engineers on the Canadian Pacific Railway, western lines, as a result of picket line incidents of this type?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I wish to assure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre that we are still investigating in order to get a full report on the matter which he brought to my attention in the house last Thursday.

As to the second part of the question, I say that I am not aware of what has happened in the matter to which he referred.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the minister's investigation include an inquiry into that matter as well?

TRANS-CANADA PIPE LINES—ENTRY PERMITS FOR U.S. EMPLOYEES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, similar to the previous question I asked on behalf of the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher), of which notice has been sent to the minister. Can the minister inform the house whether his department has made any recommendations to the Department of Citizenship and Immigration regarding the length of time covered by the entry permits to be given to American pipeline construction workers who come to this country for the next season's work for Trans-Canada Pipe Lines?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. The reply is that the Department of Labour has made no recommendation to the Department of Citizenship and Immigration regarding the length of time covered by entry permits to be given to American pipe-line workers who come into this country for next season's work for Trans-Canada Pipe Lines.

The present procedure is that before entry of pipe-line workers from the United States is permitted the Department of Citizenship and Immigration consults the national employment service as to the availability of Canadian workers for the particular jobs. If Canadian workers are available for the jobs in question, then entry of American workers is not permitted. Where there are no qualified Canadian workers for specific jobs, then entry of American workers is permitted.

The entry forms issued by the immigration authorities are temporary permits. The time of each permit assigned varies according to the contractor's estimate of the length of time required to do the job. These estimates are approved by the national employment service. Thus, from this point of view, the national employment service is continually making recommendations as to specific cases and specific jobs, but no general recommendation has been made by the department as such, since none has ever been considered necessary.

STATEMENT ON STRIKE OF RIVER PILOTS, KINGSTON MARINE DISTRICT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Yesterday the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) referred me to a report that three foreign ships had rammed the canal locks at Iroquois, and asked for a further report on the walk-out of the Kingston district pilots.

I am glad to inform the hon. member that the press report to which he referred was apparently erroneous. The canal is continuing to operate and ships are continuing to move through the canal in substantial numbers, although in one or two cases minor damage has been caused to canal walls by ships passing through.

As far as the pilots are concerned, I have again assured their representative that my earlier offer that a scheme guaranteeing them reasonable security of employment would be worked out, if they so desired, still holds good. I also assured them that my officials are prepared to meet with them further at any time to discuss these matters. The district has not been cancelled nor is it intended that the district will be cancelled this autumn, although this course of action was at one stage requested by the pilots themselves.

I have again urged the pilots to return to work, and I understand they are meeting again today to consider their position.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask a supplementary question. The press report I sent over to the minister states that five ships have now rammed the locks. Is that report still erroneous?

Mr. Hees: Well, Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the latest report.

Mr. Chevrier: I sent it over to my hon. friend yesterday.

Mr. Hees: I made inquiries of my department and the answer I have given is the one prepared for me by my officials.

NEW WESTMINSTER, B.C.—STATEMENT ON LAY-OFF ON DREDGE NO. 322

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Yesterday, the hon. member for New Westminster asked me about the rumoured lay-off of one shift of the crew of dredge No. 322 at New Westminster which he thought was to take place at the end of November. In reply may I say that there is no intention of laying off any shift.

Inquiries of the Ministry

TRADE

STORAGE FOR SURPLUS GRAIN—SUBSIDY ON FLOUR EXPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. A. Tucker (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Was the minister enunciating government policy when he spoke to the Saskatchewan wheat pool annual meeting in Regina last week and said that farmers should not be expected to provide the storage for surpluses? If so, what steps has the government taken, or does it propose to take, to carry out this policy?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, when I was speaking to the Saskatchewan pool organization in Regina on Friday I said I was sure that in the house on Monday—I was out by one day—someone would rise and ask me whether or not I had been making a statement of government policy, and my prediction was correct. I do not recall the actual words the hon. member has used; I do not recall having used them at all. Could he pin it down a little more closely in my statement?

Mr. Tucker: It is reported in the Leader-Post that the minister made that statement in his speech, and that he also made it in a room in the Saskatchewan hotel to a reporter.

Mr. Pearkes: The Fort Garry hotel?

Mr. Harkness: Did you have a microphone in it?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, I have the speech here and if I can get the paragraph—

Mr. Pickersgill: Not this again, surely?

Mr. Churchill: —to which the hon. member is referring—

Mr. Sinclair: It would be easier to make those statements in the house rather than in the country.

Mr. Churchill: I would be very glad to make them in the house; I have no objection at all.

Mr. Sinclair: Let us have the budget.

Mr. Stick: Is this one of your first-class speeches?

Mr. Churchill: I cannot find the actual paragraph but I said this. There is no question about it being first class.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Let others say it.

Mr. Bourget: Who prepared it?

Mr. Pickersgill: Which button was pushed?

[Mr. Green.]

Mr. Churchill: What I said was based on a reproduction of the speech at Winnipeg of which my hon. friend from the C.C.F. is so enamoured. I used this paragraph there and what I said in Regina was a repetition of it. I was dealing with the general wheat situation, having made a survey of it, and I said:

> . . . it would seem wise to take a long-range view of our wheat problem rather than living just from crop year to crop year. I think it is wrong to consider our surplus wheat production as a millstone around our necks. Rather, we should be deeply grateful that such an abundant food supply is available.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: I continue:

> Canada has been in the wheat business now for two full generations and our wheat production is a permanent feature of our economic history.

Mr. Pickersgill: This is just one of C.D.'s old speeches.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Your best speech.

Mr. Churchill: This is a decided improvement upon Liberal policy and Liberal speeches in the past.

Mr. Pickersgill: At least he used to know what was in them.

Mr. Churchill: Then I went on to say that in times of surplus production it would be wrong to place the whole burden of that surplus carryover on the farmers, and I think it is that to which my hon. friend has referred. It is not right that the farmer alone should bear that burden under circumstances over which he has no control. Consequently I suggested, so far as our top grade wheat supply is concerned, that in times of surplus the nation as a whole should bear a greater responsibility than that of the farmer.

Mr. Tucker: May I ask a supplementary question. Do I take it the minister was just enunciating what had been done by the previous government and not suggesting that some of the burden should be taken off the farmer who has to store so much of his grain on his own farm? I took it from the statement the minister made in his hotel room, as reported in the Leader-Post on the 15th, and also from the report of his speech, that the minister was saying that the farmers should not be expected to provide storage for surpluses. There is as much surplus wheat on the farms as in the elevators.

Mr. Churchill: I do not quite understand—

Mr. Tucker: What I am getting at, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Harkness: Why don't you ask your question?

Mr. Tucker: Was the minister just stating what the previous government had done and not indicating that they intended to do any more, or was he saying that they were going to do something more?

Mr. Churchill: I have been at pains to point out that the previous government did very little and that we have provided a program that will improve the situation.

An hon. Member: Explain.

Mr. Tucker: I want to know what the government is doing in this regard in addition to what the previous government did. That is what I am asking the minister.

Mr. Churchill: I will enlighten the hon. member. I have what I said here and I shall read it. I went on to say:

> Despite the fact that wheat is grown in practically every country in the world, our top grades of Canadian wheat are in a class by themselves and command a premium in the world market. These top grades should be considered a national asset, and, in years of surplus supply, the country as a whole should bear the extra cost involved in storage and carrying charges rather than have that cost become a burden on the farmer. For similar reasons we should resist the pressure to dispose of our top grade surplus wheat at bargain prices. The result of this serves only to dislocate the international trade in wheat.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I have a supplementary question arising out of the minister's statement that in times of surplus supply farmers should not be called upon to bear the whole carrying and interest charges for wheat. Would the minister say whether the government has given any consideration to making this very laudable policy apply to surpluses of oats and barley?

Mr. Churchill: I am glad to receive praise, Mr. Speaker, from my hon. friend who is so knowledgeable with regard to all these problems. The surplus supply of oats and barley has not been quite the problem that we are endeavouring to solve with regard to wheat. We are quite prepared to consider reasonable means or schemes to help with that problem as well.

Mr. Argue: Would the minister not say that the carrying charges levied against income from oats and barley is one of the contributing factors to the very difficult position at the present time, in that there is no surplus likely to accrue from the sale of these commodities at present prices?

Mr. Churchill: That may be.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): I have a supplementary question, too. I should like to refer to this most interesting speech—

Mr. Churchill: Which one?

Mr. Benidickson: —to which the minister has referred; the one he made in Regina. I take it that there he said, within the last six months—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has a question based on the speech I shall permit it, but I do not think he ought to endeavour to read this speech which the minister has refrained from reading.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister did read it to the house. I think I have to make some reference to it, and I shall do so briefly.

Mr. Nowlan: No; ask your question.

Mr. Benidickson: The minister having said in Regina that our exports of flour—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Benidickson: —to Trinidad, Barbados and British Guiana, having been reduced very substantially in the last six months—for five months of which they hold responsibility—is the Minister of Trade and Commerce offering any policies that would not do what was asked yesterday, exceed the policies of the United States government in subsidization, but equal the policies of the United States government in meeting this kind of competition?

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member is suggesting that we subsidize our wheat which is turned into flour at the same rate as the United States government does, and that amounts to about 90 cents per bushel of wheat. If the hon. member thinks that is a suitable policy to follow he should advocate that in the house and see what support he gets for it. We are facing extraordinarily difficult competition from the United States due to that subsidization of their flour, and it is for that reason we have lost sales in those areas mentioned.

[Later:]

Mr. Tucker: Mr. Speaker, on the question of subsidies on wheat exports, I would ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce to what extent subsidies on wheat exports in the form of flour are involved in the answer given to my question as recorded on page 1098 of Hansard, where he said:

> The price at which wheat is sold to the mills for domestic purposes is the same as the price basis for export, with the exception that on flour sales to specific areas (excluding the United Kingdom, Europe, the United States and its territories and possessions) an adjustment in the purchase price of wheat is granted by the board, to enable Canadian mills to compete with suppliers from other countries in specific flour markets.

Do I understand from this that the wheat grower is subsidizing the export of flour to compete with flour exported from the United States, which millers may get at subsidized prices?

Mr. Churchill: I am not clear about the last sentence of the hon. member's question, but there is some assistance given by the wheat board for the export of Canadian flour. It amounts to about 12 cents per bushel.

Mr. Tucker: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. I wonder if the minister would get exact information as to the extent to which our wheat growers are subsidizing the export of flour, in order that we may suggest that consideration should be given to the government bearing that expense instead of the wheat grower.

[Later:]

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce supplementary to the question asked by the hon. member for Assiniboia, referring to the well advertised speech in Regina. I would ask him why in his answer he accepted praise for the policy of the country as a whole bearing the cost of storage—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Benidickson: —on western grain rather than having the cost become a burden on the farmer, when that was a policy of the previous government?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. We have had a fairly extensive discussion of the speech or speeches made in the west.

An hon. Member: The west wind blows.

Mr. Speaker: We are about to engage in the continuation of the debate on the motion to go into supply, when there will be ample opportunity to air grievances, which I think have been sufficiently debated this afternoon.

[Later:]

Mr. Jacob Schulz (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. How long has this policy of subsidies on flour exports, paid by the producer, been in effect, and what was the reason for instituting such a policy?

Mr. Speaker: I understand the hon. member's question refers to the discussion—and I call it "discussion" advisedly—that took place earlier today. If so, I would ask him to accept the ruling I made when the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) referred to it.

[Mr. Tucker.]

Mr. Schulz: That applied only to speeches; it did not apply to the answer the minister gave.

Mr. Speaker: I regard it as a supplementary question, and in my opinion there have been ample supplementary questions on that subject today.

HONEY—IMPORTATION FROM THE UNITED STATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. What action does the government intend to take with regard to the importation of United States honey into this country, when we have sufficient honey of our own to supply the Canadian market?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I should like to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. I may say that in the letter accompanying the notice he indicated that he wanted an answer in considerably more detail than the question itself would perhaps call for, and thus I must apologize to the house for the length of the answer which I give.

Official honey production figures for Canada are not yet available, but the 1957 crop is presently estimated at 31,200,000 pounds as compared with 24,272,000 pounds in 1956 and 25,031,000 pounds in 1955.

Imports of honey from the United States into Canada for the first seven months of this year, January to July inclusive, totalled 2,958,741 pounds as compared with 1,590,341 pounds during the same period for 1956. Of this total, almost 2,500,000 pounds entered Canada during the first five months. Despite the increase in imports early in the year, stocks of honey on hand in Canada as at June 30 of this year were about 450,000 pounds less than the stocks on hand at June 30, 1956.

Honey imports during the months of September, October and November, 1956, totalled over 1,200,000 pounds as compared with an unofficial total of less than 300,000 pounds during the period September 15 to November 15, 1957.

Prices paid for bulk honey imported at Toronto are in line with prices quoted by the United States department of agriculture, and the delivered duty paid price is approximately 17 cents per pound, which is the same as the price for domestic honey f.o.b. Toronto. Domestic honey prices have remained practically unchanged for the past year or more.

As there is no indication that either the volume or price of imported honey is depressing the domestic market, no action appears to be warranted or is contemplated at the present time. The department is, however, continuing to watch closely both the volume of imports and market conditions in the United States and Canada.

[Later:]

Mr. T. J. Irwin (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Agriculture arising out of a question asked by the hon. member for Selkirk. Can the minister tell us how much Canadian honey was exported in the last two years, specifically to the United States?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, this is a question which I think should be on the order paper. Naturally I cannot answer it on the orders of the day without statistics before me.

Mr. Speaker: I agree with the minister. If the minister does not wish to take it as notice, then I suggest the hon. member should put it on the order paper, where it properly belongs.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

NATO—REPORTED STOCKPILING OF NUCLEAR WEAPONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Algoma East): I should like to ask the Secretary of State for External Affairs whether he has any comments on a report which has been received that the Secretary of State of the United States told his weekly press conference that nuclear weapons were now being stockpiled in NATO countries.

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that this question relates to two departments, the Department of National Defence and the Department of External Affairs may I suggest that the Prime Minister be permitted to answer the question.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, according to a press report this morning Mr. Dulles allegedly made a number of statements. I think I have to refer to those statements in order to answer my hon. friend. The first statement purported to have been made by him is that the United States has nuclear warheads in Canada along with missile bases to back up the early warning radar system. Mr. Dulles went on to say that the United States was studying the possible formation of several stockpiles of atomic weapons in Europe.

When these statements were brought to my attention I could only conclude that Mr. Dulles had been misquoted or misinterpreted. It is interesting to note that a press dispatch has just come in in which Mr. Dulles' statement about warheads being stationed in Canada is somewhat reduced or obliterated. The further statement is made that the opinion was apparently based on information that he received from the Pentagon. Apparently we shall have to wait until we find what Mr. Dulles said before any comment can be made on the question. But in order to make it perfectly clear, I might say that the earlier portion of that statement as to nuclear warheads being stored in Canada has no other basis than the newspaper report.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, might I ask a supplementary question of the Prime Minister. Is there any agreement at all between Canada and the United States for the stockpiling of atomic weapons on Canadian soil?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the answer is no.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Does he know of any arrangement, understanding or agreement between Canada and the United States providing for the stockpiling of atomic weapons on Canadian soil?

Mr. Speaker: That question has already been asked and answered today.

ISRAEL—STATEMENT ON REMOVAL OF ARMS EXPORT PROHIBITION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Sidney E. Smith (Secretary of State for External Affairs): Mr. Speaker, on Thursday, November 14, before I came into the house, the hon. member for Algoma East (Mr. Pearson) addressed this question to the Prime Minister:

> May I ask the Prime Minister whether consideration has been given by the government to the removal of the prohibition on the export of defence equipment from Canada to Israel, and if so, what is the result of the consideration?

In reply to that question the Prime Minister on November 14 said:

> I think it—

That is the question.

> —is of sufficient moment to demand a rather complete reply, and it will be given in due course.

I now give this answer to the question. Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member knows, the export of defence equipment to Israel is only one facet of the broader question of arms export in general, which is under constant consideration and continuous review. The role of the Canadian government in this matter is to receive applications for export permits and to deal with each on its merits.

As regards applications relating to the area in the Middle East in which hostilities occurred last year, there are two governing considerations. First, the United Nations in its resolution of November 2, 1956, recommended, in the light of the military action then taking place in the Middle East, that member states—and I now quote—"refrain from introducing military goods in the area of hostilities". This United Nations recommendation lent international authority to the decision which had already been taken on a national basis by the Canadian government of the time to withhold permission to export to the area any significant military equipment.

It is our view today that developments since the inception of that policy have not been such as to warrant the government in adopting a new policy. We intend therefore to continue to act in conformity with the spirit of the United Nations resolution unless circumstances should dictate a change.

Then there is a second factor which must be kept in mind. In view of the obligations Canada has undertaken through its participation in the United Nations emergency force now stationed on the Egyptian-Israeli frontier, the government is bound to avoid any action which would render more difficult the peacekeeping function of that force or increase the risk of hostilities which might involve its Canadian members. The government is satisfied at the present time that the policy I have described here is the best one and the one that is most conducive toward these objectives.

I would add, Mr. Speaker, that since the decision taken by the government at the end of October, 1956, there have been no shipments of military equipment to Israel. At the time of that decision, permits that had been issued and were still valid were suspended, and no new permits have since been issued.

[Later:]

Mr. L. D. Crestohl (Cartier): Mr. Speaker, with reference to the statement made earlier by the Secretary of State for External Affairs I would like to address this question to him. Can the minister tell the house whether any member states of the United Nations have violated or are violating the request of the United Nations not to send military equipment to the Middle East?

Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, I will take that question as notice. I am unable to reply adequately at this stage.

[Mr. Smith (Hastings-Frontenac).]

CANADIAN NATIONAL STEAMSHIPS

GOVERNMENT POLICY RESPECTING VESSEL REGISTRATION—RETURN OF TRINIDAD CREWS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Transport this question. Did the Minister of Transport have any prior knowledge of the intention of the Canadian National Steamships to send back the aircraft carrying West Indian crews to Canada? I wonder if I may also ask him to give the house some explanation of what is happening with reference to this change of flag from Canada to the West Indies. What I was going on to say was this—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Chevrier: We had a number of questions on the order paper, and the information given was certainly not conducive to our knowing what was happening. I should like to have now, over and above the answer to this question, if I may, an explanation from the minister as to what is actually happening with reference to the transfer.

An hon. Member: Continued next week.

Mr. Chevrier: There are two questions which I have asked; one which I should like to have answered, and the other asking if the minister would be good enough to make an explanation.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I am not quite sure what the hon. member wishes me to explain. In answer to the first part of his question, which I believe was—the question was started so long ago that perhaps the hon. member would repeat it.

Mr. Chevrier: Well, I gave the minister notice of this question.

Mr. Hees: I will be very glad to answer the part of the question of which I had notice, which was whether I was aware of a decision—

Mr. Chevrier: Of the intention of the Canadian National Steamships—

Mr. Hees: —of the intention of the Canadian National Steamships—would the hon. member mind—?

Mr. Chevrier: Yes. Did the Minister of Transport have any prior knowledge of the intention of the Canadian National Steamships to send back the aircraft carrying West Indian crews to Canada?

Mr. Hees: The answer to that question is yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Chevrier: May I, then, ask this supplementary question. Having regard to that answer, does the minister not think he should give some indication to the house as to what has transpired with reference to the transfer of the flag, because in his statement to the house he indicated that it had the approval of the government, and later he said it was a decision of the Canadian National Steamships. I should appreciate it, and I am sure the house would, if the minister would take the house into his confidence and tell us what actually happened with reference to the transfer of the flag.

Mr. Hees: It is a very simple story. The flag has been transferred.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): What part did you have in it?

Mr. Hees: It was a decision of the management of the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): With your approval.

Mr. Chevrier: I do not want to pursue this matter unduly, but yesterday the minister said we could obtain all the information we wanted from the Canadian National Steamships, but the Canadian National Steamships, on being approached, said they had nothing to say, nor did they intend to say anything about it. That is why I am asking the minister to give us this information.

Mr. Hees: I said yesterday that the time to ask these questions would be when the management of the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited, appears, as it does every year, as the hon. member knows, before the special committee on railways and shipping, owned, operated and controlled by the government.

Mr. Chevrier: Is the minister in a position to tell the house now if that committee is going to be set up?

Mr. Hees: It will be set up as soon as it is practicable to do so.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Since C.N.S. is a crown corporation, I wonder if he could tell the house what rate of salary was to be paid to those labourers who were being brought in from Jamaica to replace our own Canadian seamen?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, may I suggest I am not aware that any labourers were brought in from Jamaica.

Mr. Sinclair: Those whom you tried to bring in.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I said "were being brought in". Of course they were turned back, but certainly there must have been some agreement with them before they left Jamaica. What was the agreed rate of salary?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any agreement that was made with any such people.

Mr. Pickersgill: Why not?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister if he could make inquiries of the officials of C.N.S. and advise the house at a later date?

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, I should be glad to.

Mr. Sinclair: There must have been some offer of pay.

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. I will admit that my question has been answered in part by the answer given by the Minister of Transport, but not fully. Was the Minister of Labour consulted by the Department of Transport or the Canadian National Steamships before a decision was made to bring in Trinidad seamen to man the strike-bound ships?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): No, Mr. Speaker.

HOUSING

N.H.A.—REQUEST FOR LOWER INTEREST RATES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Frank Howard (Skeena): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the reduction in interest rates announced by the industrial development bank, will the government indicate whether it will arrange to have the interest rate reduced on loans made pursuant to the National Housing Act?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): The rate of interest under the National Housing Act, Mr. Speaker, does not come under the jurisdiction of the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Howard: I beg your pardon, Mr. Speaker. Maybe I could direct the question to the Minister of Public Works, if he is the appropriate minister. I see he is in consultation.

Mr. Fleming: Would the hon. member repeat his question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not know of any reason for that observation to have been made by the hon. member for Skeena. The question was not directed to the Minister of Public Works, and I was telling him what the question was.

Mr. Howard: Mr. Speaker, that is exactly what I was waiting for. I thought the Prime Minister was informing the Minister of Public Works—

Mr. Harkness: Why did you make the observation you did, then?

Mr. Nowlan: Why did you ask the wrong person in the first place?

Mr. Chevrier: Keep your temperature down.

Mr. Nowlan: What about yours?

Mr. Chevrier: Oh, mine is away down now.

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member has a further question to ask, would he please put it?

Mr. Howard: Well, I have the same question to ask of the Minister of Public Works, apparently. In view of the reduction in interest rates announced by the industrial development bank, will the government indicate whether it will arrange to reduce interest rates on loans made pursuant to the National Housing Act?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, now that all the flurry is over, may I say that at the moment there is no intention to make any such reduction.

PIPE LINES

NORTHERN ONTARIO PIPE LINE—WINTER CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Notice of this question was sent by the hon. member for Port Arthur (Mr. Fisher) who unfortunately had to leave the house, and I wish to submit this question on his behalf. Could the minister inform the house whether there is any provision or plan in relation to the contracts announced by Northern Ontario Pipe Line Crown Corporation for the trans-Canada pipe line for any of the preliminary work to be done this winter? If not, has the minister any word on the likely starting date of construction?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I was grateful to receive notice of this question. The answer is that the contracts provide that clearing of the right of way must be commenced within two weeks of contract award and must be completed, including the disposal of the brush, on or before April 1, 1958. That means, Mr. Speaker, that work on that section of the line will be commenced very soon and will continue throughout the winter.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

Mr. McIvor: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Is that not the same answer you gave to me personally less than a week ago?

Mr. Churchill: Yes.

POWER

NEW BRUNSWICK—STATUS OF BEECHWOOD DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, and in his absence to the minister responsible. My question is this. Is the Beechwood power project in New Brunswick nearly completed, and is any part of it operating?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Acting Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I would have to inquire from the power commission of New Brunswick in order to get the answer to that question. I shall be glad to do so and produce it for the hon. member at a later date.

NORTHERN AFFAIRS

NORTHWEST TERRITORIES—STATEMENT ON REPORTED RAILWAY AND ROAD DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Acting Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, whilst I am on my feet I would like to reply to a question which the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) asked yesterday and which I took as notice, concerning a press report of a statement made by the deputy minister of northern affairs and national resources with regard to the construction of a railway line and roads for the development of certain areas of the Northwest Territories. I have now had an opportunity to read the address to which the report referred and also to ascertain the context in which the remarks were made.

Mr. Robertson, in his capacity as commissioner of the Northwest Territories, was asked by Carleton University to provide the final lecture in a series of four lectures sponsored by the extension division of the university on the subject "The New North". In dealing with the possibilities of future economic development in the north Mr. Robertson stated: "The main factor in the high costs of economic development in the north is transportation" and went on to deal with the inadequacy of present transportation facilities. The particular reference in the press report to which the hon. member referred is one in which Mr. Robertson stated as follows:

A railway to Great Slave lake will cost about $65 million. It is essential if we are to get anywhere in that region. Basic resource roads to start the development of the area around Great Slave lake and north to Great Bear lake will cost perhaps $20 million.

The statement that the railway is essential is, of course, a statement of opinion. It does not constitute a statement of government policy, but I may say that the government is very much aware of the importance of developing better transportation facilities in the north and, as hon. members know, the two Canadian railways have this summer been jointly undertaking certain investigations into the problems involved in a railway to Great Slave lake.

The hon. member also asked about a reference in the press report that the cost of the railway and of development roads would constitute "a trifling amount relative to the national wealth to be expected in this region". The statement, as reported in these terms in the press report, does not represent the actual text of Mr. Robertson's remarks. Referring to the figures of $65 million and $20 million Mr. Robertson said:

These are substantial figures—but proportionately they are a trifle compared with the public cost of the C.P.R. that was assumed by 3,000,000 Canadians in 1885.

The population figure should actually have been 4,500,000. However, this does not affect the point. The point Mr. Robertson was making was that while $85 million constitutes a substantial amount, it is not nearly as large in relation to the population and wealth of Canada in 1957 as was the public portion of the cost undertaken by a much smaller and poorer population in 1885 in relation to the construction of the C.P.R. I am advised that the value of cash and land subventions to the C.P.R., in 1957 dollars, amounted to $71 per capita in 1885. The costs Mr. Robertson mentioned amount to $5 per capita.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO LETTER FROM PREMIER OF MANITOBA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Louis Deniset (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister regarding his answer to a question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill). Has the Prime Minister now received the letter sent to him recently by the premier of Manitoba regarding the agenda of the federal-provincial conference? If so, will he table the letter now, as he said he would?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Yes.

HARBOURS

WINDSOR, ONT.—REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT OF PERSONNEL OF NEW COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is he in a position to tell us when he may announce the personnel of the new harbour commission in the city of Windsor?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, we have been waiting for some time for the nomination from the mayor. That has arrived, and we shall make an announcement very shortly.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): I shall be glad to help my hon. friend with the nominations.

ADMINISTRATION OF JUSTICE

SUPREME COURT OF CANADA—REPORTED WITHDRAWAL OF JUDGE FROM CASE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Prime Minister whether he is going to make any comment on the incident that took place in the Supreme Court of Canada yesterday morning, to which I drew his attention yesterday on the orders of the day?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, yesterday my hon. friend asked me a question in regard to Mr. Justice Locke having withdrawn from a case after counsel had suggested that he should do so. The question was:

Has the minister any comment to make on what is reported to have happened, and could he say whether this is a precedent which might be followed in other courts in the future?

I think it is traditional that ministers of the crown make no observations on the conduct of judicial proceedings or on anything arising out of those judicial proceedings, except in the manner provided for under our constitutional practice. As to whether or not this will be a precedent, may I say that will be for successive courts to determine on the basis of the circumstances that exist in the case before them. I need hardly add that, having regard to what took place in the court, Mr. Justice Locke's reputation as a great jurist has not been impaired.

Health Insurance

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL RELATIONS

NATIONAL CROP INSURANCE—INQUIRY AS TO DISCUSSIONS WITH PROVINCIAL GOVERNMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture. Has the minister had discussions with any of the provincial governments or with any of the ministers of provincial governments on the question of a national crop insurance plan? If so, can he inform the house as to the result of such discussions?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, when the provincial ministers of agriculture were here to see me some two or three months ago this was one of the subjects discussed. No decision was arrived at in regard to the matter. I assured the provincial ministers that I would have the matter investigated and studied in the economics division of the Department of Agriculture, and a study has been going on in that division since that time. I have had one or two interim reports, but I have nothing in the way of a final report nor have I any recommendations to make at the present time.

SUPPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, November 18, consideration of the motion of Mr. Fleming for committee of supply, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).

HEALTH INSURANCE—FEDERAL PAYMENTS TO PROVINCES WITHOUT DELAY

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, the amendment moved yesterday by this group asks that under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act money should be made available without delay to any province that has a hospital plan in operation. As has already been pointed out, this is of great importance to at least three provinces in this country at this time. The thing that disturbed me in the discussion yesterday, having in mind the historic attitude of the Conservative party toward the whole problem of health insurance and hospitalization insurance, is that there is a growing body of evidence that the government is now attempting to evade, to postpone—

An hon. Member: How silly can you get?

Mr. Argue: —and to retreat from the attitude and the position it took during 1957 both in the house and in the recent election.

[Mr. Diefenbaker.]

As evidence for that statement I refer first of all to what has already taken place during this session, when there was a discussion as to the interpretation of the words "in force" and "in operation". Only last evening did we get a categorical statement from the minister that when six provinces have acts on their statute books in force, in the sense that they have been proclaimed the law of the province, those provinces that have plans in fact in operation will then be eligible for payments. After its initial retreat the government, by that statement, seems to have come up at least to the position taken by the previous administration.

But I am going to point out that this is a long way from the position taken by that party in the house during the session just before the election. How strongly, vigorously and adequately did so many leading members of the opposition of that day appeal to the government of the day that money under this scheme and under a hospitalization scheme should be made available immediately to any province that had a scheme in operation, even though there should be only one province. At that time the official opposition went so far as to move an amendment asking that that be done. Today the government is not only not prepared to make money available immediately to a province or group of provinces that have schemes in operation, but they are asking that the act be left as it has been, with the result that at least six provinces must have legislation in force on their statute books.

There is another instance in which the Conservative party has retreated a great distance from the stand it took in the house last spring and during the election. I refer, of course, to the strong plea and categorical statement made that people in mental institutions and in tuberculosis sanatoria should be covered under this act by making the provinces eligible for payments on their behalf. That position was taken by leading members of the Conservative party, and in the statements they made in the house last spring they left no doubt as to their position.

The Minister of Finance, who in those days at any rate was noted for direct and forthright statements, had this to say on that point as recorded on page 3381 of Hansard of April 10, 1957. In speaking on a motion to refer back to the committee, he said:

> I put before the house the ground that there can be no justification in good sense or in principle or in humanity or in the existing facts of life as applied to the financial difficulties of the provinces and municipalities of this country, for this government to try to drive a wedge between general hospitals on the one hand and tuberculosis hospitals and sanatoria and hospitals and institutions for the mentally ill on the other hand.

That was a very strong statement by the present Minister of Finance. He went on to say:

I ask the house, therefore, to send this back in order that this clause, unworthy of the Canadian parliament, unworthy of the pretensions of the government that this is a comprehensive scheme, should be reconsidered and that its shortcomings should be remedied and that the scheme should in fact be made what the minister improperly pretends it to be, a comprehensive scheme of hospital insurance.

Surely those words are just as true now as they were on April 10. Surely they are much more pertinent today than they were on April 10, since the hon. member who used those words is now on the treasury benches and in a position to make moneys available, and as a member of the government is in a position to have the legislation amended so that tuberculosis sanatoria and mental hospitals can be included under the act.

At that time the hon. member for Eglinton was not speaking as an individual member of the Conservative party. He was not speaking on his own initiative. He in fact was stating party policy because, shortly after making his statement, he was supported by no less a person than the present Prime Minister. The Prime Minister of today, the leader of the opposition of that time, had this to say as recorded on page 3386 of Hansard of April 10, 1957:

This legislation which is designed to bring about the beneficial results which were pictured in such lucid language by the minister just before the dinner adjournment should not remain incomplete by denying to these institutions equality with the hospitals qualified under this legislation. The legislation as it is in its present form, beneficial as it will be, acceptable as it is to members in all parts of the house, is a step in the right direction. But the goal that all of us have in mind will not be achieved until the two types of institutions to which I have made reference are included within the provisions of this legislation.

I ask why the government has not provided legislation at this session to amend the act so that mental hospitals and tuberculosis sanatoria can be included. That was part of the position taken by the Conservative party in the house at the last session. It was not, I may say, a position inconsistent with the stand taken by the Conservative party during the election. It was not a position confined only to this house. As a matter of fact it was a position that was enunciated in the election campaign itself. The hope and the promise were held out to the people of Canada that a Conservative government would correct this very serious omission.

I have in my hand a report taken from the Winnipeg Tribune of May 14 of this year referring to a statement made by the Prime Minister. It is in these words:

The Conservatives, he said, would repair a "serious omission" in the federal health plan which does not include tubercular and mental institutions.

Then, as if to underline that statement and to show that it was a correct statement, the Toronto Globe and Mail of May 28 of this year carried this further report under the date line of Saskatoon, May 27. It is as follows:

Noting that the Canadian Hospital Association was meeting in a nearby hotel, Mr. Diefenbaker reminded that the Conservative party had consistently advocated health insurance.

The main reason that the plan is so far advanced today, he added, is because Ontario's Premier Frost, a Conservative, forced the federal government to place it on the agenda of the 1956 federal-provincial conference.

Mr. Diefenbaker said the Conservative party still believes that hospital insurance should cover patients in mental and tuberculosis institutions.

I ask if the government still believes this statement by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker). Does the government intend at this session to fulfil its very definite commitments to the electorate of this country? Are we to take it now that the Conservative party is in power this definite commitment is going to be relegated to the waste paper basket, the same as similar promises have been relegated over so many years by the previous administration?

Well, Mr. Speaker, we in this group are consistent in the attitude we have taken towards national health insurance. We believe in an over-all national health insurance program, but we are interested in the meantime, before that time arrives, in getting the government to act by proceeding as rapidly as possible. We are suggesting by this amendment that payments should be immediately available to any province that has a scheme in operation. In the field of hospitalization insurance Saskatchewan has led all the provinces in Canada. As far back as 1947 the government of Saskatchewan provided an over-all system of hospital insurance for the people of that province. I can well remember the hopes of the members of the government of that day, namely that the federal government would provide for an over-all health insurance program whereby the people of Saskatchewan could obtain money under that legislation.

Saskatchewan has waited now for over ten years. According to the attitude of the government we are going to have to wait a further period of time before any moneys are paid into our hospitalization plan. The plan has already cost the people of Saskatchewan from 1947 to 1956 a total of $147 million. The people of Saskatchewan believe the federal government had a responsibility in this field over those years. They believe that they have been shortchanged by approximately $70 million by the governments in office during that time. They do not look kindly on the suggestion that they are going to have to wait another year; that in 1958 they will be denied, under the probable effect of this legislation, as much as $10 million or $11 million for their hospitalization plan.

I suggest that during this session the government should amend the act in keeping with the statements of the Conservative party when in opposition and provide that any province with a plan in effect could immediately obtain its share of the money provided by the federal government for such a scheme. The premier of Saskatchewan is on record many times in this regard. According to the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of May 14 he made a statement that Saskatchewan was disappointed in the attitude of the government because it appeared certain that money would not be available for at least another year. The people of Saskatchewan believe that they have been short-changed; that they should not have to wait another year. They did not agree with the attitude of the former government that under the provisions of this legislation six provinces must have a scheme in force before federal moneys would be available. What does that mean? It means that one province, the sixth province, could hold up moneys going from the federal treasury to the provinces that are prepared to implement such legislation. If Prince Edward Island were the sixth province I can understand there would be a tremendous amount of pressure that might be brought to bear on such a government to provide legislation, since they would be the roadblock preventing moneys from being paid under such an act as this to the five provinces that had systems in operation.

I do not believe any province should be placed in such a position. I do not believe the provinces themselves want to be placed in that position. I think the premiers of the various provinces, in any event the great majority of them, agree with the premier of Ontario that money should be made available immediately to any province that has a system in operation. I make a plea to the government that in this session they introduce legislation to amend the act along lines suggested in the amendment now before the house, that any province including the province of Saskatchewan shall immediately be entitled to money from the federal treasury. I think that is a stand that is consistent with the stand of the Conservative party. I think it is a stand that is consistent with the stand taken by the premier of Ontario. I think it is a stand that is supported by all logic and all reason. I suggest it is a stand which will lead to the earlier implementation of a national health insurance plan.

We know that when you say there must be six provinces with plans in force and that within those provinces there must be a majority of the population of this country you delay the time at which federal moneys can go to the provinces and hence delay the time when the people in many of the provinces will have a hospitalization plan in operation. In other words this provision in the act, as the members of the opposition in the previous parliament earlier this year so ably pointed out, was placed there as a means of stalling, postponing; a method of delay and procrastination. The same arguments that applied to these provisions relative to the hospitalization insurance are equally valid relative to national health insurance. I suggest that not only should the federal government be prepared to pay money to a province that has a hospitalization plan in operation, but the federal government should be prepared to pay money to those provinces that might wish at this time to embark on a system of comprehensive health insurance. I am convinced in my own mind of this, although I have had no consultation with any member of the Saskatchewan government, that if the federal government would make moneys available immediately to Saskatchewan under this act Saskatchewan will not use those moneys as a method of saving money for some other department in its budget.

Rather Saskatchewan is more than likely to say, "Now we have an opportunity to expand our own health program in Saskatchewan and to include other important health services, and this money now available from the federal government will allow us to provide a more adequate system of health care for the people of Saskatchewan".

I know that there are in this country forces which are opposed to health insurance. In the mail just today we as members of parliament have received a statement by the Canadian Chamber of Commerce in which they state they are opposed, directly and definitely, to a national health insurance program. I do not think they speak for Canadians generally. I do not think they reflect in any way the spoken word of the Conservative party over the last number of months. I suggest that the government should pay no attention to these people. I suggest that the government, instead, should maintain the faith of the Canadian people in the commitments and the statements it made, both in this house and during the election campaign, by proceeding now to include mental hospitals and sanatoria in the provisions of this act and to make moneys under this act immediately available to any province that has a system in operation and to proceed quickly towards the time that Canada shall have a national health insurance program that I believe is supported by the vast majority of Canadians at this time.

Mr. E. L. Morris (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, when the bells rang yesterday afternoon to summon us to this house, I confess that I came in trepidation for I had been forewarned that the supply motion which was to be introduced would give way to a free-wheeling debate in which the opposition might raise any number of subjects. Of these we would have no advance warning. We now know that we are launched into a debate on health insurance. As I sat last night and listened with some degree of affection to the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin), who was in fact speaking on the first occasion when I came into this house as a spectator, I must confess that my mind went back to that afternoon early in March, 1939 when, as an under-graduate university student, I came to Ottawa. I remember the scene very well. This morning I went to the library to consult references and to check my recollections of what happened. Mr. Speaker, on that afternoon of March 6, 1939, as reported at page 1573 of Hansard of that year, one of the hon. members who is now in this chamber moved:

> That in the opinion of this house, the government of Canada should try to secure amendments to the British North America Act, to provide periodical health examinations and provision for suitable treatment for all those suffering from disease.

That was, Mr. Speaker, in 1939. What did the hon. member say about his motion? He said this:

> I know the Minister of Pensions and National Health (Mr. Power) will give it his fatherly approval just as soon as the means are at his disposal.

Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who introduced that motion on March 6, 1939 was the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) who again today sits in this house, 18 years later, and listens to demands for immediate action on health insurance.

Mr. McIvor: Thank you.

Mr. Morris: What answer did the minister make? Later in the day as I sat in the spectators' gallery the then minister of pensions and national health said this as reported at page 1587 of Hansard of March 6, 1939:

> This and similar resolutions that have been placed on the order paper during past years—I may say in increasing numbers in more recent years—indicate that the people of this country are more and more taking an interest in public health, and so far as I am concerned that is absolutely all to the good. . . .
> There has come to a very large number of people in this country the belief that every citizen is inherently entitled to as much right to protection from sickness and disease as to protection from the more violent, if often less hazardous, attacks of those who wish to steal his property or injure his person. . . . I believe we have placed behind us the view held in days gone by that sickness, disability and illness were each man's individual concern.

I have been quoting the Liberal minister of pensions and national health of that day, as reported in Hansard. On that day in March, 1939, the hon. member for Fort William was seconded by another member who recalled that he had in fact introduced a resolution on health insurance in this house in 1931. That was one of the predecessors of the present hon. member for St. Boniface (Mr. Deniset).

Mr. McIvor: That was Doctor Howden.

Mr. Morris: He then on April 27, 1931 introduced a motion in this house:

> That, in the opinion of this house, a measure of federal state medicine would be in the best interests of the Canadian people.

He went on to say this:

> If the greatest need of the state is health, then the greatest effort of the state should be directed towards securing the health of its people. Surely the provision of an adequate measure for the control and direction of the health of the Canadian people would be in the best interests of Canada.

Mr. Speaker, on February 16, 1928, one of the predecessors of the present hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles)—I refer to Mr. Heaps—introduced in this house a motion:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the committee on industrial and international relations be authorized to investigate and report on insurance against unemployment, sickness and invalidity.

He said this:

> Mr. Speaker, last year I introduced a motion almost identical with the present resolution. I was extremely pleased with the very hearty support which it received.

That was in 1927, 30 years ago. This particular matter, he said—

> —is not by any means new. It has been debated in this house on several occasions and it has also been discussed by several of the provincial legislatures. In the platform of the Liberal party in 1919, one finds a reference to this very important question.

What do we find in the Liberal party platform of 1919, a document which is surely receiving some of the attention of the hon. member for Essex East in these trying days? We find a resolution:

> Whereas human life and physical efficiency are the nation's greatest assets;

And whereas the conservation and improvement thereof should be the country's first care;

Therefore this gathering of Liberals in convention assembled, August 7, 1919, pledges itself to a vigorous prosecution of the measures best calculated to conserve the life and improve the physical standards of our Canadian citizenship.

Mr. Speaker, this motion was passed, by an earlier Liberal leadership convention, four years before I was born. Last night we heard the hon. member for Essex East say in this house that he was afraid this matter of hospital insurance was going to be very considerably delayed; after five months in office we are now to be "considerably delayed" in the enactment of a measure promised by the Liberal convention of 1919.

Specifically, and without intending to divert the house from consideration of the amendment now before it, I want to refer to three matters raised by the hon. member for Essex East. In his remarks last night he dealt at some length with an unsuccessful mission he made in Nova Scotia by which, I dare say, he meant to refer with some grace to his election campaign in that province. He said, as reported on page 1261 of Hansard:

I can say that the negotiations I had with Premier Stanfield resulted in marked progress, and I had reason to believe that there was a likelihood of that province coming in.

Later he said:

We do know, however, that the government of the province of Nova Scotia has set up a second body to study from the point of view of Nova Scotia the advantages of this particular hospital insurance proposal of the federal government—

And so on. From all of which I think, even on a careful re-reading this morning, one can only assume that the hon. member for Essex East meant to imply that the government of Nova Scotia had come up against some obstacle to its implementation of health insurance or hospital insurance, and that it had therefore set up a second body.

What are the facts? The facts are that under a previous administration, under a Liberal provincial administration, a body had indeed been set up, but upon the assumption of office by a new Conservative government in Nova Scotia it was discovered that that first body had in fact made no report because it had not met, and it was therefore disbanded and replaced by a royal commission which is now examining the Nova Scotia case on hospital insurance and, as the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) said, and as all Nova Scotian members on this side of the house know perfectly well, the chairman of that commission spent some time in this city only a few days ago consulting with the federal government and its authorities. The hon. member for Essex East also said, as recorded on page 1263 of Hansard:

We developed a plan of financial assistance which took into account the needs of the poorer provinces. Assistance in the case of Nova Scotia would amount to well over 70 per cent and in the case of New Brunswick close to 70 per cent.

Now, Mr. Speaker, we have in Nova Scotia what we refer to as three kinds of inexactitudes; quite large prevarications, extremely large prevarications, and Liberal statistics. That is what we have here. This has been repeatedly denied by the minister of health for Nova Scotia and by the premier of that province. It is 70 per cent, perhaps, of what the hon. member for Essex East in his capacity as a minister of the crown offered to Nova Scotia. Mr. Speaker, the position of Nova Scotia in respect to hospital insurance has been made perfectly clear on numerous occasions. The premier of Nova Scotia, if I understand him correctly, has said repeatedly that that province will introduce a system of hospital insurance not later than January 1, 1959, with or without—this is what he said prior to the election—an agreement with the federal authorities.

The Nova Scotia government wanted some consideration to be given to the sharing of costs for tubercular and mental patients. Mr. Speaker, as of last March, I believe, there were nearly 9,000 more mental patients in Canada than all other hospitalized patients put together, which simply goes to show that more people had gone crazy under the Liberal administration than ever before in Canadian history. We wanted some sharing of the cost of caring for mental and tubercular patients, for administration and for depreciation. So the figure may, in fact, have been 70 per cent of an offer, but it was less than 40 per cent of what the province of Nova Scotia wanted from a joint hospital insurance program.

Finally, Mr. Speaker, let it not be thought that I infer that the hon. member for Essex East does not believe in hospital insurance. I am too young a man to have lost all my belief in other people's ideals. I am one of the Conservative members—and there are very many—who wish to see introduced at the earliest possible date a comprehensive system of hospital insurance to protect our people from dire want. Yet, last night, when my friend and colleague the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria (Mr. Muir) had the temerity to interject a remark into the speech of the hon. member for Essex East, that hon. member wheeled on him and, with a long forefinger—the most overworked forearm in the House of Commons—said to the hon. member for Cape Breton North and Victoria: "Do you mean to tell me that perhaps your government is not now anxious about this?" He said at page 1264:

> He sits on the government side. He is now indicating that this government has some doubts about this hospital insurance bill. If that is the case, then I hope the government will soon acquaint us with an intention, which apparently the hon. gentleman has just now revealed.

I want to say, as a young man and as a newcomer to the house, to the hon. member for Essex East, without violating any of the rules of my party caucus, that we do not operate in that way on this side of the house. The hon. members on this side of the house do not state government policy. Government policy comes from the cabinet. We are supporters of the government because by personal conviction, and the record of this government in assistance to Nova Scotia since the election, and by the wish of our constituents, we support, in a majority of cases, this government.

To have it said that when a private member on this side of the house on the back benches rises and raises some point, to have it said that he is stating government policy, may be true of hon. members who sit on the opposite side, but it is another clear case of the continuous capacity of those who now occupy front benches across the floor of the house that in their vision, now limited by the 20 feet across that floor, they will suppress every word spoken by their back benchers. We do not state government policy, and we do not come here to be rubber stamps, either. We have a perfect right to urge upon this government, while supporting it, measures which we think are of benefit.

Finally, the hon. member for Essex East was asked by the Prime Minister: "If the answers he receives are not satisfactory or adequate, does he still intend to follow his leader in a vote of confidence in this government?" The hon. member for Essex East did not, of course, reply to that, but he said that if he accepted the amendment under discussion all it would mean would be that the right hon. Prime Minister "would no longer enjoy the great luxury of being Prime Minister of Canada". That struck me, on re-reading Hansard this morning, as a remark which was unnecessary and, in fact, unseemly.

Mr. Speaker, during the unsuccessful mission which the hon. member for Essex East paid to Nova Scotia before the election, a circus came to town the same day and the Liberal party hired the front elephant in the circus, and along the sides of this front elephant, lachrymose and morose, were hung two large posters. The right flank was inscribed "Vote for so and so"—I will refrain from giving the names—and on the left flank was inscribed the legend "The best is yet to be".

I remarked in a radio broadcast at that time that the architect of this slogan had apparently little knowledge of English literature for it came from Robert Browning's "Rabbi Ben Ezra" and the Liberal party had neglected to put in the first line. The full quotation from the poem reads:

> Grow old along with me!
> The best is yet to be—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Ha, ha, ha!

Mr. Morris: Well, Mr. Speaker, when we found that the Liberal campaign committee was so diligent in the hiring of elephants we went to the proprietors of the circus who were themselves good Liberals. However, having seen some of the handwriting on the wall they consented to rent us the stern elephant. This was a very small elephant with only residual tusks and drooping ears. Over its flanks we draped a sign which I think answers the hon. member when he said that our Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) would be deprived of the luxury of his high office. Coming down the sunlit street in Halifax, as the hon. member for Essex East wined and dined and tried to sell us into a hospital insurance plan we did not want—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Oh?

Mr. Morris: —on the stern elephant as it stomped and whistled along hung one sign bearing four words which are good enough for us, "John Diefenbaker never forgets".

Mr. Martin (Essex East): A funny place to put that.

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we are all very much aware of the importance of the question that has been before us yesterday and today. On many occasions we have debated questions having to do with the material well-being of the people of Canada and without question those problems are extremely vital and important but I am sure we all agree that one of our greatest assets individually and as a nation is health. Therefore, when this matter was raised yesterday as a grievance we wondered just how much good would accrue from a debate of this matter at this time although we did recognize the fact that it was a very important issue that was before us.

We have listened to debate after debate on the matter of health insurance and we have listened to question after question directed both to the previous administration and now to the present administration on this same subject. When the announcement was made during the last session by the former minister of national health and welfare that a measure was to be introduced providing for a system of health care we looked forward with some anticipation to the introduction of that measure and when it was introduced we were both pleased and disappointed.

We were pleased that the government had finally come to the point where it was prepared to take action on this important matter. I am not going to go back into history as some hon. members have done and try to indicate the first time this matter was dealt with and recommended. I think sometimes we are prone to spend too much time in looking back and considering what has taken place or what has not taken place in previous years. I think the most important thing is what are we prepared to do at the present moment and what does the future hold with respect to these important matters we discuss?

Last session when the Liberal government brought forth the hospital insurance act we were glad it had finally taken the action. We were pleased as well that the people of Canada could now be assured of some measure of assistance in the event of illness in their families. I am sure we are all aware of the tremendously increased costs of hospitalization and health care. It seemed as though it was getting to the point where one could not afford to be ill unless one was pretty well in the millionaire class. The ordinary individual simply could not afford the high costs of hospitalization and medical care. When this measure was brought in by the previous government I thought it offered a ray of hope, some feeling of security to the people of Canada that now they would be able to face eventualities confident that after all there was some one interested in their welfare and willing to assist in the meeting of these responsibilities. However we were disappointed that after the passage of such a length of time and the repeated assurances of the then minister of national health and welfare to the effect that the government was as interested as any member of the opposition in the maintenance of the health of the Canadian people the proposed measure fell far short of what we had anticipated.

Those hon. members who have been in this house for a long time have, I suppose, waited for years for the introduction of that legislation and although the legislation has been introduced they are still waiting. The provinces are still waiting, too. As pointed out on several occasions by different hon. members, a number of the provinces already have hospital insurance programs in operation and those provinces are waiting for some decision and positive action. I do not know, but it is possible they may have to wait for a few years yet unless some action is taken to expedite the matter and bring it to a successful culmination. The Canadian people are still waiting for this scheme to go into effect. A great many people are under the impression that the national hospitalization program is already in operation and of course they base their assumption on what transpired last session when the hospital insurance act was passed. However, hon. members are aware that it has not come into operation and the people are still waiting and wondering.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) made a statement last evening and clarified some of the points and questions that had been raised not only in this debate but on previous occasions. He gave us the assurance that the government intended to implement this project.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): When?

Mr. Patterson: You answer that. But he did say the government had no intention of backing away from this project and intended to carry it through to a successful conclusion. We appreciated that statement. I believe the minister went farther than the government had gone on previous occasions and many in fact were wondering at one time whether or not the government actually intended to carry through with the proposition. The minister also outlined some of the negotiations that had been proceeding not only with the provinces but with various health associations. We were pleased to receive that assurance because many of us wondered what, if anything, was being done to try to bring this matter to a head.

The Minister of National Health and Welfare assured us last night that everything possible was being done to encourage and to assist in working out the details of this particular measure. He referred to the spirit of co-operation which exists between the federal administration and the respective provinces in the consideration of this important matter. I am sure we all recognize the fact that this is something that has to be implemented in co-operation with the provinces. That has been emphasized in times gone by and, of course, I do not think any one of us—I know none of us in this group, anyway—feels that it can be implemented in any other way. It must be done by co-operation between the federal and provincial authorities.

In this connection I should like to say that if the Minister of National Health and Welfare had made his statement some time ago it would have been of tremendous assistance to us in consideration of the matter. Questions were asked; the answers were evasive. Hon. members endeavoured to secure some information but we could not get it. I suggest that if the Minister of National Health and Welfare had made his statement some weeks ago we would have a better appreciation and understanding of the situation as it exists. Therefore, I think he must accept some responsibility for the fact that this particular amendment has been moved at this time.

We in the Social Credit group have supported the principle involved in this amendment. I have said that there are several provinces that already have hospital insurance programs in operation. Alberta has one, Saskatchewan has one and I know that my province of British Columbia has a very fine hospital plan in operation.

It will be recalled that at the time of the dominion-provincial conference on this particular matter the province of British Columbia was prepared to go much farther than the plan which was finally adopted. British Columbia, through the provincial minister of health and welfare, Mr. Eric Martin, stated that the government of British Columbia endorsed the principle of an all-inclusive national health program. At that time the provincial minister of health and welfare from British Columbia stated that the services that should be included in that plan should be hospital care for both acute and chronic conditions, including laboratory and X-ray diagnostic services to in-patients. He also stated that it should include laboratory and X-ray diagnostic services to out-patients as well. It should include home nursing services, medical care services and dental care for children during the early stages, certain drugs, prescriptions, artificial limbs and appliances. He suggested that all of these things should be included in a national plan.

He went on to outline the government's views with respect to the financing of this particular matter but I am not going to refer to that at the moment. In this connection we also recognize that possibly some of the provinces and the federal government were not prepared to go ahead with such a comprehensive plan as was outlined by the minister of national health and welfare from British Columbia. I do not know that they have any particular objection, possibly apart from the fact that the plan was too ambitious for initial introduction, and it may be that later on some of these things would have been considered. Anyway, following that conference, a telegram was forwarded from the minister of health and welfare of the province of British Columbia to the then minister of national health and welfare. The content of the telegram is as follows:

> The government of British Columbia has studied the initial and limited proposals submitted by the government of Canada for a national health program and regrets the restricted nature of the plan presented. Nevertheless, British Columbia is ready to sign an agreement forthwith and strongly urges that an expanded program be instituted without delay.

As far as a national health program is concerned, I think that indicates clearly the position of the provincial government. It was desirous of seeing a greatly expanded program and yet was prepared to sign an agreement to go along with the plan that was presented by the federal administration.

Some of the restrictions or limitations in connection with the program have been referred to already. For instance, there was the requirement that six provinces, representing over 50 per cent of the population, must have signified their intention of entering into the plan. We have before us the amendment which urges that immediate steps be taken to facilitate the payment of grants to the provinces when they are ready to enter into the program and when they have a plan in operation. But I believe that this matter which is now before us, and the question of the six provinces representing 50 per cent or more of the population, should be given a very thorough study and something worked out whereby the provinces which now have plans in operation should be able to receive some assistance in the financing of their plans.

Another question which was raised was the question of those who had been disqualified, the medical and tubercular patients. After all it seems to me that if we are going to take care of sick folks we ought to take care of sick folks and not draw a line and say that we shall look after this one or that one but not the other one. I think the plan ought to be comprehensive.

Another question was raised by the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke (Mr. McLeod). Perhaps some hon. members considered it a minor objection, a minor point. His point was that because of the limited equipment or facilities that some hospitals had at their disposal they would not be able to render service under this particular measure. The then minister of national health and welfare assured us that that matter could be and would be taken care of by negotiations with the provinces. These are some of the points that were raised and discussed. I think possibly these are some of the points that were in the mind of the mover of this particular motion when he brought it before us.

We are advised, Mr. Speaker, that a dominion-provincial conference is to be held in Ottawa. The Minister of National Health and Welfare stated in his address in reply to questions—perhaps I should give the direct quotation as I criticized the Minister of National Health and Welfare on one occasion for misquoting me and I had better make sure that I have the quotation right or I may hear about it. I am quoting from page 1265 of Hansard. The Minister of National Health and Welfare said:

> On November 13 in reply to a question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) said in effect that if the premiers of the provinces wish hospital insurance matters to be discussed at the forthcoming conference on November 25 and 26 an opportunity would be given to discuss these matters fully.

I should like to ask if up till now any of the provinces have made representations to the effect that they wanted this matter discussed at the dominion-provincial conference.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is a matter of public record. Manitoba and Saskatchewan have done so.

Mr. Patterson: If they have, that is just fine. I know that statement was made by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and I wonder whether we could have the assurance—we may have it on record but I did not catch it—whether or not this matter will be on the agenda for the dominion-provincial conference.

Mr. Monteith: I could not say any more than I did last night.

Mr. Patterson: The matter will be discussed if the provinces wish it? Is that right?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Maybe it has to be six representing a majority of the population again.

Mr. Monteith: Not necessarily.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Good.

Mr. Patterson: If the government is so anxious to expedite the matter and get the plan into operation, would the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) himself place this subject on the agenda and say definitely that it will be discussed at the dominion-provincial conference? If that were done it might put a different light on the whole matter. I believe that the present government wants to see this being implemented but I think they could help us a little bit if they would be more precise in some of their statements and give us a fuller understanding of the situation existing at the present time. I believe that the intent of the amendment moved is to speed up things. I think that is what its purpose is.

[Mr. Patterson.]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear.

Mr. Patterson: Its purpose is to get the matter rolling, to get the whole plan into operation as soon as possible so that the people of Canada can be assured that in the event of illness and hospitalization they will be able to receive some assistance even if they do not live in the provinces of Alberta, British Columbia or Saskatchewan.

Mr. Jacob Schulz (Springfield): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I should not speak on the amendment because I have never been too much interested in health insurance in the past. It involves doctors, nurses and hospitals and the worst of it is that you have to be sick to make use of these services. I am one of those fortunate individuals who have always enjoyed good health so I speak today for those who need these services worse than I do, and I am quite sure there are many who need them badly. That is the reason the legislation was brought into force in the first place. Even though it took a long time, the people had enough power to persuade the government to put it on the statute books of the country.

Many people are sometimes subjected to long illnesses, and I think that is the main reason why we should have a national health scheme. Sometimes people are forced to use their lifetime savings to pay their bills. There is another reason, perhaps still more important. I think that a health scheme is a part of civilization. It is a part of the social function of any civilization and I believe that any country that does not have a social health scheme is not quite civilized. I do not think that hon. members on the government side would want Canada to be less civilized than other countries, especially when we are living in the most fortunate, richest and most beautiful country on earth. Therefore I am quite sure that the government will implement the legislation.

I cannot even see why we are worrying so much about it because it is already an accepted fact in people's minds and no government would dare do away with it because such action would spell the doom of that government. If the present government tried to do so, I am quite sure that even the good showmanship of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) could not save the government. This legislation is accepted and it must go through.

Of course, some of those who sit on the government side still believe in individualism and the law of the jungle. Perhaps that is the reason they sit on that side, but nobody can ever escape what is already on the statute books of the country. I believe that the government is sincere. I believe there are very capable people on that side of the house. On Friday last we all heard how quickly the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming) had checked inflation. If anybody can tackle anything so intricate as the economics of inflation and stop it in such a short time he should be able to implement this scheme.

We have also heard how the government has implemented its promises with regard to trade to the letter. As I listened to the minister making these statements, I could not help but feel he must never have heard the saying that the tongue is like a worn tire, liable to slip when it goes too fast. It must have slipped because surely nobody can fulfil anything to the letter in such a short time, and nobody expects it. The minister put on a performance on Friday which astonished me. As a matter of fact, I was so busy watching him that I could not even listen to what he said. I had to read Hansard the next day to find out what he said because his performance was terrific. When I looked at him I really was convinced that he must be trained in the law and still living up to the old fashioned philosophy of the law school, that when you have the facts on your side hammer them into the jury, when you have the law on your side hammer it into the judge but when you have neither the law nor the facts on your side then hammer on the table. If hammering on the table can implement the health scheme, then we will surely get it.

But there is one thing that worries me, the confusion existing in the ranks of the government. First there was the confusion that came from the mouth of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) which forced us to move this amendment and take up time that could perhaps be used more beneficially in dealing with other matters. But we had to resort to such a move. There was no other way out. Somehow or other we had to force the minister to make a statement, and I am glad that he finally did. But it proves that there is confusion and according to the Winnipeg Free Press everybody was astonished at the minister's first statement.

We listen to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) and we get the same impression, confusion and, even more, complacency. Day after day we put questions to him to try to get some indication where he is going with regard to selling our surplus wheat. This has become the greatest problem this country is faced with. What answers do we get? Certainly, we do not expect this government to sell all this wheat in a day or in a year, but I do believe this government should have charted a course, set an objective. All we got out of him yesterday was that he has an objective of exporting 300 million bushels of wheat this year. Does he not know that we sold 309 million bushels in the 1955-56 crop year? Does he not know that the average export sales for the last eight years amounted to 282 million bushels? That means that his objective today is to sell 18 million bushels more than we sold during the last eight years. Is that the way in which we are going to tackle this billion bushel pile of wheat out there?

When I listen to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness), I get still more disturbed because there is evidence of the same complacency. The other day he gave us an answer to the question of what they were going to do about falling hog and livestock prices. Apparently he is learning from the former minister of agriculture how to answer questions when he stated that a $2 drop in prices in two years was not too drastic. This is the answer, in spite of the fact that the index of farmer's costs went up 10 points in those two years. However, in spite of all this I still believe we are going to get this hospital insurance plan, even though sometimes this complacency makes me wonder. There is a little saying which goes like this:

> Trust him little who praises all,
> Him less who censures all,
> And him least who is indifferent about all.

I hope the day will come when this complacency and confusion will be cleared up and we will go on and do something. I do believe this government will do it, because just think what would happen if this government should try to go through the next election without implementing this hospitalization scheme. This is something about which I am particularly worried. Have they got enough time to do it when they are so busy thinking about elections? This is what they seem to have constantly on their minds. They would spend another $6 million of the people's money for nothing. They threaten us every day with elections, and then they turn around and ask for our support so that they can implement their promises. It does not make much sense.

Just think what would happen if the government should go out in the next election campaign without implementing this scheme. Think what we would do to them, and what the Liberals who put this act on the statute books would do with them. I do not want to see this government defeated, at least not yet until we are ready to take over. I do not want to see the Liberals come back again, because they are useless.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just as useless as the Tories.

Mr. Schulz: They are even useless as an opposition, as they showed yesterday. I cannot see how this government can go out into the next election campaign without implementing this plan. As a matter of fact there is one very encouraging thing upon which I am absolutely depending, and that is that the government group now includes some ladies. I always find that ladies are more softhearted and have a more humane attitude. There is a saying that women are wiser than men because they know less and understand more. I hope that will hold true in this case.

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), in moving his amendment has taken advantage of the peculiar situation in this house to try to gain some cheap glory for his party. It is cheap glory because it is taken without risk. He has said that if the Liberals abdicate their responsibility and their right to oppose this government his party will take up that job. If he really means that I wonder what he would do if the Liberals and Social Credit voted first against this government on this amendment. Would the C.C.F. support their own amendment?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Absolutely, and you know it.

Mr. Broome: Everyone knows that this is a minority government and that we are carrying on by permission of the opposition parties. Repeatedly members of the C.C.F. group have stated that there is no reason for calling an election; that this government, in its program, has the support of all opposition parties. Then what is the reason for this lack of confidence amendment? I think I have indicated what that reason is.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Because the government is not going ahead with the hospital insurance plan.

Mr. Broome: The C.C.F. are safe from the consequences of their own actions, Mr. Speaker. There is no question of opposition parties abdicating their right to oppose. They will certainly do that when they think they have something that will make a good issue upon which to go to the country. From what I can see of what this government is doing, the opposition certainly has not got a good issue yet. The C.C.F. opposes for the sake of opposition; it obstructs for the sake of obstructing, and I am coming to the point of thinking that it talks for the sake of talking. I think the effectiveness of members of the C.C.F.—

[Mr. Schulz.]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is the hon. member reading for the sake of reading?

Mr. Broome: —is measured by the numbers of pounds of Hansard they have contributed over the years.

The hon. member has made a great to-do, as have other members, in regard to this booklet which I believe is entitled "Underwriting Canadian Health; An Economic View of the Welfare Program", compiled by the firm of consulting economists, William Lougheed Associates of Toronto at the request of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association and the Canadian Life Insurance Officers' Association. Hon. member after hon. member has tried to intimate that this government is a tool for one section of the economy of this country, the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that this government represents all classes in Canada, all people in Canada, rich and poor alike and that if there is any class party in this house it is the party to which the hon. member belongs.

I was very much taken with the speech delivered by the hon. member for Comox-Alberni (Mr. Barnett) in which he quoted from a booklet entitled "Industry", another publication of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, as reported at page 1256 of Hansard for November 18, 1957. The quotation reads:

> Government-sponsored hospital insurance is coming because most Canadians have indicated that they want it, because all the national political parties profess themselves in favour of it—

Then the hon. member said, "I like that phrase, 'profess themselves in favour of it' ". Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that it ill becomes any hon. member of this house to intimate that his party has a corner on sincerity or a corner on service to the Canadian people or that only his party speaks for the little man. Mr. Speaker, this is just plain common sense. The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker), the leader of our party, captured the hearts and minds of Canadians from coast to coast by his obvious sincerity and his obvious concern for all Canadian citizens but particularly by his manifest desire to help the little man.

Mr. Speaker, this party has representation from one end of Canada to the other. We reflect a national viewpoint. We reflect responsibility in government as well as responsibility to the people. The fact that the C.C.F. party consider that finance is something to be lightly brushed off indicates to me their absolute irresponsibility. It is the ordinary person in Canada who pays taxes. We do not get the money as a gift. We take it from the people and it is our job to distribute that tax money in the best manner to aid and to help all the citizens of this country.

Mr. Speaker, I have been in this house for about six weeks and I believe that the Canadian people will say that this government, under the greatest provocations and obstructions, has done more for the people of Canada than any previous government has ever done. We have seen the question period—I have looked up back Hansards—grow from what was customarily 15 minutes or 20 minutes to over an hour, most of which time has been taken up by hon. members of the C.C.F. party. In fact, today we had duplication in questions. They are even running out of questions to throw at the ministers. I have seen the ministers answering questions and doing their very best to give this house all of the information they possibly can give. In the minds of reasonable members there is no question that the ministers are doing a terrific job and I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that in the minds of the Canadian people there is no doubt that the ministers are doing a tremendous job.

I have been in this building every day, except the first week including Saturdays and Sundays and there has not been a Saturday nor a Sunday when I have not seen four or five ministers here. I left the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) at 10.30 on Sunday night. I was talking to the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton) at ten o'clock. These men are working hard for the good of Canada. Our hon. friends over there on the other side of the house are doing as much as they can to harass the government; that is all it is; it is just straight harassing tactics—and to obstruct the operation of government. I remember the cash advance bill on which they talked for a full week in order to say yes.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I would remind the hon. member that we are speaking on an amendment which has to do with health.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: May I also say that I do not consider it to be according to the best parliamentary practice to impute motives to hon. members and say that their actions are simply to obstruct. I would ask the hon. member to revise that statement.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Speaker, I apologize to hon. members. They are not obstructing. They are simply taking up a lot of time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is obvious that is the end of your speech; you will not take up much time.

Mr. Broome: We have used up two precious days in debating this amendment which, as far as I can see, has served no useful purpose whatsoever. In good time this government will be bringing forward legislation which the Canadian people want.

Mr. Speaker: I recognize the hon. member for Lapointe (Mr. Brassard). As it is almost five o'clock, perhaps the hon. member would prefer not to be interrupted and to call it five o'clock.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I do not believe we interrupt the business at five o'clock when a supply motion is being debated.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry. I call upon the hon. member for Lapointe.

Mr. Brassard: Mr. Speaker, may I call it five o'clock?

Mr. Speaker: No. The clerk reminds me quite properly that we do not interrupt the business of the house today in order to deal with private and public bills.

(Translation):

Mr. Augustin Brassard (Lapointe): Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to take only a few minutes to state politely to the government that my constituents are at a loss to understand its attitude with regard to family allowances and hospital insurance.

I have received a great many letters asking me to give the reason for the puzzling, not to say ominous silence which the speech from the throne observes with regard to these two matters. Obviously, because of the rules of the house, I can only speak at this point on hospital insurance.

The constituency which I have the honour to represent in this house, Mr. Speaker, is mainly made up of workers and farmers. I need not stress the point that the people of the constituency of Lapointe are most interested in the hospital insurance plan. It is a well known fact that the average Canadian can hardly afford to be sick or to undergo hospital treatment, without mortgaging his salary for months, even years ahead. It is therefore hard for anyone to understand how the present government, whose candidates were so lavish with promises in the last elections, should show such little concern for legislation which could mean so much for the great majority of Canadians.

Every time I return to my constituency, men come to me and tell me of the serious financial difficulties they are experiencing as a result of someone in their family having needed medical or hospital treatment. Up to the time the speech from the throne was delivered, I would explain that the hospital insurance plan which had been prepared with such skill and devotion by the former minister of national health and welfare would bring about a happy solution to their financial problems of hospital treatment. But I confess that we are much concerned with the government's stand in connection with this plan. If another national convention of the Conservative party were held, the party might perhaps find an easy way out of the situation by passing a resolution to the effect that it is in favour of the principle of a hospital insurance plan as well as of family allowances, as it is no doubt in favour of the great principles of chemistry and physics. I admit that it is an easy and not too embarrassing way of avoiding a definite measure; however, the public does not benefit very much from such statements of principle.

I therefore urge the hon. Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) as well as the government to give some throught to the average citizen who so urgently needs hospital insurance, and to take action to put such a plan in operation as soon as possible.

(Text):

Mr. P. B. Rynard (Simcoe East): Mr. Speaker, it seemed to me a paradox when I heard the former minister of health get up in the house last night and, with almost impassioned oratory, cry out that the hospital insurance plan should be instituted without delay.

However, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) at least realizes that, today, all emergency cases at least in the province of Ontario, and I would say across Canada, are admitted to hospital. No one can be denied hospital care under the public health acts of the various provinces. A great number of people, the majority of people, are covered at the present time by one plan or another of hospital insurance.

Naturally my hon. friends across the floor should realize that the crying need across Canada today is for hospital beds; many people have to wait a week to six weeks or even more to get admission; many of these cases require surgery, some have conditions that worsen as time goes on, and for many who suffer malignancy, which accounts for one in eight of all deaths, delay in admission to hospital may make the difference between recovering or receiving treatment too late.

I was interested to check up on the waiting list of one group of practitioners, and I found that of those waiting for admission for surgery or medical care over 70 per cent were fully covered in respect of the necessary treatment. Some of them would likely have to take rooms and services less costly than those they were paying for, because of their inability to get the service for which they were paying. The great majority of patients on these waiting lists have been waiting a month or more for admission because there were no hospital beds available to accommodate them.

This then, is the plight of the Canadian people and of the doctors who are looking after them. We need more hospital beds, which means more ward beds, more semi-private rooms and more private rooms.

Mr. Speaker, I think you will agree with me that it has been borne out by experience that under any general comprehensive insurance scheme there will be a sharp increase in the number of beds required as soon as a hospital plan becomes effective. No one will deny this. Where will these beds come from? In my opinion, for the proper care of the sick today we need a realistic building plan which will lead to the provision of the necessary hospitals together with beds and equipment, to meet this problem. The municipalities today find themselves in no position whatever to finance such an undertaking because over the years more and more money has been taken from them by both levels of government.

We also need more out-patient diagnostic services to save hospital beds for people who are really ill. In other words, we need to curtail our admissions to hospitals in the case of those who with proper facilities could be treated as out-patients. Free diagnostic out-patient services would be of prime importance in treating diseases in incipiency, and in protecting patients from morbidity, long hospitalization or even, perhaps, mortality. This has been well recognized by our governments, as shown by the provision across the country of travelling health clinics which provide X-ray examinations free of charge.

I am concerned about costs. As I understand it, I regard Premier Frost's original ideas on hospitalization as being very sound, when he included those who for health reasons could not purchase any plan and those older people who did not have the wherewithal to pay for one. I think this plan would have been a good staircase on which to build, step by step, a full plan. But this, I think, was refused by the previous Liberal government on the grounds that it must be all or nothing.

Costs are an important factor in any plan. Roughly, as I understand it, the cost of hospitalization would be covered by payment of one-third from the insured, one-third from the federal government and one-third from the provinces. In the records of most provinces which I have been able to check, hospital costs have been doubling about every eight years. The economy has been advancing at the rate of about 35 per cent over the same period of time. Even in Saskatchewan, where they have a health plan which is quoted as one of the most successful, costs have doubled in less than eight years.

Let me say this. Hospital beds must be provided, and must be provided at the federal and provincial levels because of the inability of the municipal taxpayer to accept any more on his already over-taxed shoulders. This fact must be recognized. All this must be added to our consideration of any hospitalization plan, because beds are the first necessity and must be available before any plan can be successfully carried out. I realize that grants are now being made, but these are totally inadequate to supply those beds.

Therefore, in conclusion let me say that anyone who feels that all this can be done in a few months or in a few days is not facing the facts, and I doubt very much if those beds can even be provided as early as the date the premier of Ontario has set. Provision of these facilities must be an integral part of all discussions, and it must be agreed on by federal and provincial governments before any plan of health insurance can be effective.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there is little I can add to the discussion which has taken place during the last two days on the amendment moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). It is well to recall the wording of that amendment, which is to the following effect, namely:

> this house is of the opinion that the government should consider the advisability of taking immediately whatever steps are necessary so that federal payments under the provisions of the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act will be available without delay to any provinces with hospital insurance plans in operation, as a further step toward the achievement—

And so on. Now, sir, I think it is perfectly clear that this amendment was moved, not with the purpose in mind of achieving that which has already been achieved by the legislation placed on the statute books at the last session of parliament and accepted by hon. members in all parts of the house but that it has as its purpose placing the party represented by the hon. gentleman in the position of having brought about that which was achieved at the last session of parliament, namely the provision of a national hospitalization plan.

The law is on the statute books. It was the Conservative party, through the action of the premier of Ontario, which forced upon the government of the day the inclusion of discussion on the subject of hospital insurance, which brought about the legislation at the last session of parliament. There is no question about that. My friend the hon. member for Essex East (Mr. Martin) recently made a radio speech and also sent an epistle to his constituents both of which were designed to leave the impression that the party represented by him had a monopoly on social legislation.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I go back to 1935 and point out that it was the government of Mr. Bennett which brought in unemployment insurance, that it was the government of Mr. Bennett which brought in labour legislation to provide for holidays, minimum wages and the like,—

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Twenty cents a day.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —and that it was the party now sitting in opposition that having achieved power, through the instrumentality of the courts,—

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): That is out of order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —and with the assistance of eminent counsel representing the government of Mr. King was able to establish that that legislation was beyond the legislative competence of parliament.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Hear, hear.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That was the position of those sitting in opposition in 1935 and 1936. The law is on the statute books today providing for the setting up of hospital insurance and it is the worst kind of red herring and political opportunism that my hon. friend introduces an amendment such as has been placed before this house. The minister last evening stated clearly and unequivocally, as it had been stated over and over again, that this government is committed at the earliest possible date and in co-operation with the provinces to bring this legislation into effect and thereby provide something that every political party in this country has supported. I think it is only proper and fitting to point out that in the few weeks parliament has sat this government has shown its interest in human betterment and its belief that there is a necessity to maintain a high standard of social security in this country in the increases provided for old age pensions and blind and disability payments. This was action taken on the part of the government to assure that the policies which it recommended in opposition would be carried into effect. I go farther than that in connection with social security and say this. After all, hospital insurance is within the ambit of this matter and we in this government and party intend at the earliest possible date, in addition to the present pension systems, to give full consideration to investigating the insurance system in the United States to the end that we will bring about in Canada a rounded and effective contributory social security system over and above that which already exists.

What stand are we going to take in regard to hospital insurance? At the dominion-provincial conference this coming week we shall place before the various premiers of the provinces the opportunity to present their viewpoints, their desires and their wishes rather than to follow the course of the former government of appearing before that conference and in a cut and dried manner saying, "Take it or leave it". That is not the intention of this government. We intend to permit, indeed to encourage the discussion of any matter connected with the fiscal policies of this country which in the spirit of confederation will bring about something of a new relationship as between the federal government and the provincial governments, and as far as hospital insurance is concerned every opportunity will be given for a discussion of this matter.

Then following the considerations of this conference decisions will be made as to those changes which inevitably will have to take place if, in a spirit of co-operation, the discussions take place and opinions are given on the part of the various provinces. We are going to give the province an opportunity to provide their best counsel and advice to the end that something of the spirit of confederation will be restored to this country, a quality that has been lacking during the last several years when the federal government approached the provinces in a spirit of dictation.

Mr. Pickersgill: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: As far as hospital insurance is concerned, after hearing from the various provinces—those that have already consented to join the scheme—we shall bring before parliament either at this or the next session such changes, if changes are to be made, as will to the greatest possible degree implement the legislation and indeed bring it into effect at the earliest possible date.

This brings me to discuss this session because the Leader of the Opposition (Mr. St. Laurent) did so. I was thoroughly in agreement with the viewpoint he expressed that to a major extent this session is a continuation of the one before the election and that the major responsibility of this session is to consider those matters of an emergency kind and nature but in particular to deal with those estimates which were not dealt with prior to the election. As the right hon. gentleman has said—and I think the words might be taken to heart by some of those who are potential leaders of the party represented today by that venerable gentleman—

Mr. Stick: We will take care of that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —as his words appear at page 1233 of Hansard of November 18:

> We realize that this is not an ordinary session for which the rules were intended to have ordinary application.

Then he went on to say:

> The year for which these estimates have been prepared is well advanced and at a not too distant date we will be reaching the time when consideration will have to be given to the submission of estimates for the following year. I do not think it has ever been the experience of parliament to have two successive years' estimates under consideration at the same time.

In other words the major responsibility of this session is to implement those matters of an emergency nature as well as to pass the estimates that to a major extent have been expended and were even expended in large portion before this party came into power. The right hon. gentleman has adopted an attitude of reason but it does not represent the attitude of those associated with him. The debate thus far has indicated—and I take it that my friend the hon. member for Essex East speaks for the party of which he is a member—a most interesting paradox: the opposition party, a party that barks but does not bite.

Mr. Stick: We will bite you when we are ready to bite you.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A party that in its pride—

Mr. Stick: And it will be a good bite, too.

Mr. Diefenbaker: A party that in its pride says this government has not the confidence of either the house or the country. They say that out loud and then when the vote comes they silently steal away and vote support for us. What a course! The hon. member for Essex East called it courage in a television speech. He said:

> We must plan ahead,—

He was speaking of us but I am applying his philosophy to the party he represents. I continue:

> —not timidly but boldly, imaginatively and courageously.

What an example, Mr. Speaker. He says we are wrong. He says the reason they will not move a vote of non-confidence is that it might bring about an election. He says we are not carrying out our promises. He speaks loudly, sonorously, and he votes so silently. But there is some co-operation between the official opposition and the C.C.F. I think the hon. member for Essex East used some striking words last night. He said, as reported at page 1259 of Hansard:

> If this amendment has the faults which I believe it possesses, it nevertheless serves the purpose which I am sure really was in the mind of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, namely to join with the Liberal opposition—

I do not know whether the hon member for Winnipeg North Centre agreed with that co-operation but the hon. member for Essex East said:

> —to join with the Liberal opposition in bringing to the attention of the government the importance of doing something about this matter.

What a weird situation, Mr. Speaker! They criticize; they sneer; they scoff, but later tonight they will be voting confidence in us. Why do they follow this strange and tortuous course, Mr. Speaker? Is it frustration? Why is it? Is it mere opportunism at a low level? Everybody knows the answer. They are afraid to vote against us, Mr. Speaker. They whistle in their own graveyard; they fill the record with questions; they make speeches and then, Mr. Speaker, when the chips are down, to use a colloquialism, where will they be found?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Under the table.

Mr. Zaplitny: In bed with the Tories.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I asked the question and I stopped to give my hon. friends the opportunity to say they are going to do that which nobody expects they will.

What about my friends of the C.C.F.? They are courageous; they take a stand because they have already heard from the Leader of the Opposition that the Liberal party is not going to vote non-confidence in the government so they are in a position to speak valiantly and criticize fearlessly because they know there is no risk. Mr. Speaker, what a parliament it is—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Are you sure of your own members?

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Seals in training.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What is the reason for it, then? I think the person who let the cat out of the bag is the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Schulz). He said he believed that we were going to carry out hospital insurance absolutely.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): One day.

Mr. Diefenbaker: What they are trying to do, Mr. Speaker, is to endeavour to pretend later on that it was this non-confidence motion that forced the government to act.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the Prime Minister permit a question?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I did not bother my hon. friend; I let him proceed and I want to refer now to what I think is the confidence of political wisdom on the part of my hon. friend. He knows very well—at least one of those sitting with him knows very well —that the government intends to proceed, as the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Monteith) said yesterday and a few days ago, and bring in health insurance at the earliest possible date.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): When?

Mr. Diefenbaker: And that does not mean anything like what the Liberal party meant in 1919 when they said they were in favour of health insurance. Mr. Speaker, that at least gave us some indication of the meaning of eternity.

Why does the Liberal opposition take that stand? I have a great admiration for the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill). He has had a wide experience. It remained for him, though, to produce the greatest excuse of all for this tortuous course. Do you know what he said? Well, he said the NATO meeting was going to take place in December and there was some difficulty on the railroads. Here it is, as reported at page 1252 of Hansard:

> The incidental damage I was thinking of—

That is the damage in moving an amendment which you support. I continue:

> —the incidental damage I was thinking of would be having no effective government at a time when this great NATO meeting is going to be held; at a time when things look rather dark.

He was not speaking about political matters in his own party; he was speaking about the international situation. He continued:

> I was thinking also of the possibility of being in the midst of an election at a time when, as we know, there is a very serious matter in dispute between the railways and their employees.

The matter in dispute was in dispute at the time of the last general election. There was a commission sitting at that time. He continued:

> It seems to me, sir, that this is not a time to be talking frivolously about defeating governments and about having elections.

As far as this government is concerned, we intend to carry out the fundamental promises that we made.

Mr. Pearson: Fundamental.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We have already proceeded in that direction. It is a sorry picture when those in the official opposition who sat here on the government side less than six months ago do not carry out the suggestions of the leader whom they follow. Indeed the diversity of the tactics of the Liberal and C.C.F. parties gives some indication of how hopeless it is for the House of Commons to carry out its functions with the present unhealthy lack of a working majority on the part of the government.

My hon. friends opposite preach co-operation. Read their speeches in the house. Read their speeches outside the house. There is one thing about which these two parties are unified. They follow different tactics but they achieve the same end. The official opposition are afraid to move a vote of non-confidence. They are afraid to vote according to their voices. The C.C.F. pretend they are not afraid because they rely on the fact that the Liberal party is afraid. Yes, Mr. Speaker, they achieve the same end, a double standard in public affairs.

It is a looking both ways policy. The Liberals look to the C.C.F. to carry the ball for them and move amendments. They criticize but they dare not vote. The C.C.F. look to the Liberal party to assure that the government will be sustained against the criticism of both.

There, Mr. Speaker, is the situation today. I believe that the Canadian people appreciate the degree to which the government is carrying out its promises and endeavouring to discharge its responsibilities in a way that will meet the high responsibility that is ours. We are going to do that. There are further matters of legislation to be brought before this session which I believe will be of benefit equal to those already placed before the house. I am looking forward to the vote not with keen anticipation, and I say this more in sorrow than in criticism—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Don't cry.

Mr. Diefenbaker: They interrupt, Mr. Speaker, they condemn, but to use the abiding words of the hon. member for Essex East in his radio speech—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Television.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —they talk like lions, they will vote as lambs.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Before the Prime Minister sits down, would he answer a question? Will he tell the house by what date he anticipates that federal payments under the Hospital Insurance and Diagnostic Services Act will be made available to any of the provinces?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh!

Mr. Diefenbaker: It is a perfectly proper question. I intend to discuss this matter fully with the premiers of the provinces which have accepted and not desiring to anticipate what their decision will be, if it is reasonably unanimous it will bring about hospital insurance at a far earlier date than has been anticipated.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the Prime Minister permit another question? In view of his objection on April 10 of this year to the veto in the present legislation, that is the requirement that six provinces sign agreements, why does he in what he said just now require unanimity among six provincial premiers before he will decide when payments are to be made?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that is in keeping with the argument that was advanced the other day by the hon. gentleman. At no time has there been any suggestion to the effect that he has now suggested. When we meet on Monday and Tuesday next, this and other matters will be discussed with the provinces to the end that in co-operation a determination will be made to bring about hospital insurance at the very earliest possible date. The hon. gentleman can read into that statement exactly what I have in mind to place before the conference, but before placing it before the conference and having the view of the provinces I do not intend to go further at this time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What about the rights and the supremacy of parliament?

Mr. Tucker: May I ask the Prime Minister a question? Is he not pleased that we are ready to vote to keep him in office to carry out his promises?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that is not the purpose they have in mind.

An hon. Member: No answer as usual.

POWER—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL FUNDS FOR PROVINCIAL DEVELOPMENTS

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I am one who believes that basically governments have very little to do with interest rates. Under our free enterprise system, interest rates depend on the supply and demand of money, much in the same way as the price of commodities depends on the law of supply and demand. It is true that governments through their central banks may for a time raise or cut the discount rates and set a pattern in establishing how much the commercial world will pay for the use of money.

Last week the federal reserve banks in the United States cut the discount rate from 3½ per cent to 3 per cent, while ours is at 3.99 per cent, which represents quite a wide spread of almost 1 per cent. I would suggest that these rates were quite artificial because of certain disturbing elements in the economy of our two countries. According to a dispatch from Washington there was little or no pick-up in employment from mid-September to mid-October at a time when it was expected.

Then, too, in Canada, we find that steel output in October was 19 per cent below the level reached in October last year. Steel, we know, is considered to be a barometer of our economy and I hear that the output in November will be worse than that of November of last year. I hope that whatever the government does, or whatever steps it takes, it will be effective in overcoming our unemployment.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) announced the other day that the government proposed lending the province of New Brunswick $30 million, the estimated cost of the Beechwood hydro development. The province is being charged 4⅜ per cent, and since the government is lending money at cost plus ⅛ of 1 per cent handling charge, this suggests to me that the dominion government has to pay approximately 4¼ per cent for money for eight years. It is difficult to calculate what New Brunswick might pay for money for eight years, but looking at the bond quotations I surmise that New Brunswick would have to pay somewhere between 5¼ and 5½ per cent. This means that New Brunswick would save approximately 1 per cent of its borrowed money under this arrangement, and 1 per cent of $30 million is $300,000 for the first year; in succeeding years the amount would be correspondingly less.

Last year, according to the press, Premier Frost of Ontario took objection to the equalization payments to the smaller provinces, saying they were too high in relation to the amounts received by Ontario from the federal government. The federal payments to the provinces worked out at about $39 per capita and on this basis the equalization payments had to be paid to the smaller provinces. I can understand the premier's concern since the Ontario government has to bear a heavy cost in respect to education, highways and other services. The premier of Ontario said that residents of Ontario paid nearly half the federal taxes. This being so, the people of Ontario are really lending $15 million to New Brunswick in respect to this Beechwood project at a rate of interest lower than Ontario itself can borrow money.

The last offering of hydro bonds made by the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario were 5 per cent bonds and they sold slightly below par to return 5.09 and 5.19 per cent depending on the term of the bonds.

This suggests that money for the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario probably cost in the neighbourhood of 5¼ per cent at that time. This being so, why cannot the federal government extend the same arrangement to finance hydro development in Ontario through the Ontario government? Hydro has a big expansion program in hand now on the St. Lawrence river, and will need capital for this and other projects. In addition, the commission is also refunding previous hydro loans from time to time. If this arrangement can be made by this government, namely to advance money to Ontario and other provinces for similar projects, it would save Canadians much money, since the federal government always borrows money cheaper than the provinces or any of the provincial agencies. This would tend to keep borrowing within Canada, and the Ontario hydro for instance, would not be required to go to the United States to obtain money. This would save hydro users in Ontario millions of dollars and would tend to reduce hydro rates for all our people in that province.

Over the last few years hydro rates have gone up very substantially, and I find in Ontario that people are very conscious of the increase in these rates. After all, this suggestion would not cost the dominion government anything, because, as the Prime Minister said, this money would be loaned at cost plus ⅛ of 1 per cent for handling charges. I feel that the premier of Ontario will be out to help the people of Ontario with regard to the carrying charges on their hydro debt, and to give Ontario anything less would be discrimination against the people of Ontario. I am not registering an objection because the people of New Brunswick will be getting this money for the Beechwood project, but I do think that unless this principle is extended to people in other provinces, it is certainly discrimination.

This may be outside the scope of this particular discussion, but I do not see why, in extending this principle, the provinces should not advance money to the municipalities in much the same way. I think the municipalities would get much cheaper money if this were done, and would be able to finance their education, highway and other programs much more easily. Certainly, in Ontario at least, we have a municipal board, and before any debentures are issued the municipal board looks over the capital expenditure proposed. In educational expenditures, at least, the province could withhold its educational grant against any debt which a municipality incurred under such a scheme.

CANADIAN BROADCASTING CORPORATION—PROTEST AGAINST "THE PLOUFFE FAMILY" PROGRAM

Mr. Raoul Poulin (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I am glad that the rules of the house are such that they provide me with this opportunity of stating a grievance and of voicing a complaint which has been made to me by a large number of people—of the very best people—of the constituency I represent. This grievance has to do with a television program carried over the French network of the C.B.C. under the title La Famille Plouffe (The Plouffe Family).

I wish to go on record as being in favour of state control of radio and television. The control we have in this country is far from perfect. Being a human institution, the C.B.C. certainly deserves the severe criticism we have to level at it on a number of scores. Yet how much worse things could be if the only guarantees we enjoyed in this regard were provided by a syndicate of private interests actuated by no other motive than making money.

In spite of its failings, its mistakes, its slowness in getting things done or in reacting, its sins of omission or commission, the C.B.C. has nevertheless, on occasion, given evidence of its good faith. It is precisely because I believe in the good faith of the officials of that organization, then, that I would like to lay before the house a very unfortunate situation which they will no doubt set about to correct. Moreover, any sustained and persevering effort on the part of the Canadian taxpayer would make it possible to bring about the improvement and even the disappearance of certain programs which, in their present form, are far from being acceptable. Among these is La Famille Plouffe. What is the explanation for the fact that a writer who is not devoid of talent, and actors who should show some respect for their public, lend themselves to the presentation of scenes which are so definitely improper, off-colour, slanted and at times immoral and degrading.

I am no prude. I do not believe in going about this world of men with my eyes shut. I know that evil exists, that it has always existed ever since the unfortunate lapse of Adam and Eve, and that we are all exposed to it. But is that sufficient reason to display evil for all to see, to give it the appearance of acceptable and even commendable behaviour, and often to surround it with enticing artifice which tends to allay or dispel the natural repulsion it should induce? Anyone who has the responsibility of raising a family and who takes this duty seriously, will sometimes wonder what attitude to take towards his children when such scenes come into the home, almost forcibly, and violate its privacy. For want of a better explanation, teen-agers can be told that the TV set should remain off at those hours—I would call them tragic hours—or some attempt can be made to make them understand the impropriety and the utter stupidity of certain scenes. But what can you say to children of six, eight or perhaps ten? How can you reason with them? How can you explain those scenes to them? How can you let them play with fire and pretend they do not risk getting burned?

Therefore, as taxpayer and head of a family, and for the sake of moral rights and education, I must protest against the bad taste and insanity of certain episodes of that program: the trip to Florida, the paternal benediction, the visit to hell, the flagpole sitting, the sunbathing on the roof, all of them scenes in which the censor could have made wholesale cuts.

C.B.C.—Program "The Plouffe Family"

As member for Beauce county, however, I have another protest to make here. In the same program, impudence is carried to the point of trying to make the population believe that the flightiness and the vulgar manners of a certain character are representative of the degree of education and the behaviour of the population of one of the most beautiful counties of the province of Quebec. This disgusting type of propaganda has reached such proportions that a large American magazine, in its issue of November 4, felt it should give publicity to that character's reputation and thus give colour to an inaccurate and altogether unfair representation of the lives of the people whom I am very proud to represent in my country's parliament.

Let Mr. Lemelin, the author, and Uncle Gedeon, the actor, labour under no delusion. In Beauce county, in the province of Quebec, we have kept the fine tradition of the paternal blessing on New Year's day and, for my part, I am proud to continue that sacred tradition in my own home, but that benediction is not given in the stable, among the cows. There are some people from Beauce who, no doubt, go to Florida during the winter but it is no lustful junket requiring personal priming up with pep pills. In Beauce county, people still believe in the dogma of hell, and still have enough faith to pray God that those who deride us on television be spared from hellfire. In Beauce county, as elsewhere, but not more than elsewhere, immorality sometimes makes unfortunate victims, but even they have enough sense of decency to try to hide instead of lying in full view on the roof or verandahs.

No, let Uncle Gedeon go astray, as he himself claims to be doing, on TV or elsewhere in Montreal, but let him take care that, in doing so, he does not go to the dogs for good. Let him keep on spitting on the floor, and puff on his big curved pipe as he talks to the womenfolk, with his hat pulled down over his ears, and do it all, I must say, with amazing naturalness; he can let or induce Time magazine to write, and I quote:

> Impersonating a farmer from backwoods Beauce county, he has become Quebec's top nightclub and TV star.

At least I hope he will not have the public believe that the scenes he is interpreting and the degree of education he displays faithfully portray the way of life in the wonderful homes, and worthy population of the constituency of Beauce. And it is as a representative of Beauce that I wish to protest tonight with all the vigour I can muster.

Let the C.B.C. put a stop to these sordid, false and monstrous displays.

If Uncle Gedeon were a genuine native of Beauce, if he actually had spent the main part of his life in that riding, instead of just happening to live for a few years in a nearby parish, he would have learned to know us as we are, and would realize that the part he plays in that program is a travesty of truth and an insult to our people. He would also know by now that our good housewives, our good mothers of Beauce county do not leave rags that have become useless lying around the house, but just throw them into the fire.

Let the C.B.C. do likewise! If it is possible to correct the gross errors of this program,—which otherwise contains much that is good,—it should be done, so that something new and clean, genuine and honest may be shown.

If that cannot be done, let the program be scrapped, and the sooner the better.

LABOUR CONDITIONS—UNEMPLOYMENT

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I regret that the subject that I wish to introduce at this time this evening was not cleared with the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker). In his public statements, particularly the one made at the great convention of the Conservative party in Ontario, the Prime Minister said that for members of parliament to speak about unemployment is to lead the country into a fear complex that could lead to a depression. If the country is being led into a fear complex it is because the Conservative party is in power and we have no responsibility for bringing that about. One statement made by the Prime Minister has appeared in almost all of the papers in identical words. I believe this came from the Gazette. The Prime Minister said:

> We do Canada no good, the free world no good, in conveying a false impression which might have the effect of panicking the Canadian people into a depression.

> There are no words to express what I think of those who, for political purposes, endeavour to talk the Canadian people into a complex that might bring about the realization of their fears.

I am sure that all of us are quite aware of the fact that the Prime Minister is never short of words, and if he has words to describe that situation I wonder why he did not use them in the spring of 1954 when the Conservative party vied with the C.C.F. party for the opportunity to move an amendment deploring the fact that the then Liberal government were not taking steps to alleviate a serious unemployment situation. This was in the spring of the year when the unemployment situation was becoming less apparent and work was becoming available. As I have said, they did vie with the C.C.F. party and the Conservative party was able to get the floor ahead of the C.C.F. and the hon. member for Hamilton West (Mrs. Fairclough) moved an amendment. This amendment was discussed for about a week and during the course of the discussion the Prime Minister spoke for his full 40 minutes. If anyone was attempting to create a fear complex it was the Prime Minister who was then the hon. member for Prince Albert. But what a change in concept; what a change has taken place in his thinking since that time.

After speaking, as I have said, for about 40 minutes, this is the way the Prime Minister wound up his speech. He was endeavouring to get the then prime minister to express the opinion that there was a very serious unemployment situation in Canada. He kept prodding; he took every conceivable method to try to get the government of the day to indicate that there was a very serious unemployment situation. I quote from Hansard of March 15, 1955, at page 2039, where the present Prime Minister, obviously speaking to the then prime minister, said:

> Will he not state that he realizes that if we continue to deliberately delude ourselves concerning the unemployment situation we shall bring about a fear complex in this country which will have serious results in the future?

If that is not a direct and absolute reversal of thinking for his own political purposes I should like to know what it is? I have heard the term "Honest John" used rather loosely over there. I do not think we should hear that too often again. What did he offer in the way of a solution to the problem? It was rather nebulous, but here is one rather important suggestion.

Mr. Harkness: What is the grievance?

Mr. Proudfoot: Unemployment.

Mr. Byrne: Does the hon. gentleman not consider the fact that there are 300,000 unemployed today and that we are facing the possibility of having some 700,000 to 800,000 unemployed this winter, with the government obviously not taking any action whatever, a serious situation?

Mr. Harkness: One would never know what your grievance was until this moment.

Mr. Byrne: Whether or not the minister calls it a grievance is for him to decide.

Mr. Maloney: Did the hon. member express it as a grievance in 1954?

Mr. Byrne: With the hon. member mumbling in his beard it is difficult to know what he is saying. This is the remedy the then hon. member for Prince Albert had at that time:

> Professor J. K. Galbraith, professor of economics at Harvard, advocated reductions in personal income tax as a means of restoring a weakened economy. I believe that there must be a reduction in taxation. Today, company taxation is placing too great a load on initiative and in addition is taxing Canada out of the markets of the world.

The throne speech says that there is to be a tax reduction. We hope it will be brought in soon and that it will have the desired effect that the Prime Minister hopes for. Of course, the present Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) also had some suggestions at that time. Perhaps he went a little bit farther than did his colleague. I quote from Hansard of January 14, 1955. By the way, this was not in the same debate but it is quite obvious from this quotation that the then members of the opposition spent much of that session spreading fear and gloom. He said, as reported at page 218 of Hansard:

> I believe the government would do well to study the program about to be undertaken by the government of the United States.

He suggested that we undertake a large road-building program and went on to say:

> I am not suggesting for one moment that the government should embark upon a highway-building program.

He did suggest that the government should advance large sums of money to the provinces to carry on such a program. Then, he went further and said:

> The government should also provide employment for many thousands of Canadians for several years ahead by making it possible for more people to buy new houses.

He had another good suggestion with respect to the purchase of new homes. He thought that the amount of the down payment should be reduced from 15 per cent to 10 per cent. That is certainly a remarkable suggestion and the minister is in a position where he can make the recommendation. He had some further recommendations. As a matter of fact, there was no end to his recommendations to the government as to what could be done to alleviate the unemployment situation.

But it was not only the members of the Liberal party who began to note that a serious unemployment situation was developing. Innumerable representations have been made to us and every day the newpapers are indicating what the situation is. Unemployment insurance commission officials apparently have discussed the matter with certain officials of the Canadian Congress of Labour. In that regard I should like to refer to a report in the Toronto Star of October 18. It refers to a Mr. Gargrave who, I hesitate to say, is a member of the political education committee of the steelworkers' union, I believe. Apparently he had a discussion with unemployment insurance commission officials and they indicated to him that unemployment may reach as high as 900,000 this year.

I have a letter here from the construction and general labourers union of Vancouver, B.C., dated October 15, 1957, the day after the house opened. The letter is signed by C. H. Savage, secretary-treasurer, and reads in part as follows:

> We would therefore request you to put the unemployment situation on your agenda for a thorough discussion as soon as parliament opens. May we say that our officers are besieged daily by men in search of employment—

Should we not have met the wishes of this construction union? Should we have gone to the Prime Minister in confidence and whispered to him very carefully that there is a serious unemployment situation in British Columbia? Some of the British Columbia papers are becoming quite concerned about the attitude of the government with regard to the unemployment situation. They are urging that the government face up to the situation rather than try to sweep it under the rug.

British Columbia may be particularly hard hit. As to that, I do not know. I do know that the revenues of the province from the forest industry have dropped by 30 per cent. One-third of the revenues of the province come from the forest industry. It has been hinted by some columnists writing in British Columbia newspapers, men who are very close to the government at Victoria, that there is a possibility of an increase in the sales tax in order that the government may carry on. That would be disastrous because our industries are already hard hit by a 5 per cent sales tax and other general taxes which are having the effect of driving industries out of the province.

We hope that some action will be taken soon to alleviate the situation. It was pointed out the other day that some 1,400 men have been laid off at Kitimat. There is also the danger of the Britannia mine closing down which will put approximately 800 more men out of work. Then there is the construction industry which has already explained its position and the forest industry where there is approximately a 30 per cent reduction. These are very serious facts which have to be faced and I see no other way to deal with the matter. Simply to attempt to make it appear that there is no serious problem is not to face up to the facts at all.

We face another problem which may have an even more serious effect on the mining industry of British Columbia. Over the last few days it has been pointed out that the copper mines are in a very serious predicament. If the United States should go ahead with its proposal to impose a higher tariff on lead and zinc our mining industry will be almost wiped out. Something must be done in that regard. The government will have to take a stronger and firmer position with the United States authorities to make sure that nothing will be done that will put us in the position of having to try to export lead and zinc to the United States market in the face of a tariff rate that will be prohibitive.

While no action was taken by the last congress, it is quite obvious that strong forces are at work, and I believe that only today hearings began again in the United States and the lead and zinc producers of that country will be coming forward with very strong arguments. There is every danger that before long, probably by the first of the year, higher tariffs will be imposed unless the federal government takes very strong action to prevent it.

Since there is no further stockpiling in the United States it is obvious that necessarily there will have to be some curtailments of production, but the United States economy requires large amounts of imports from other countries, particularly from Canada. It is realized by Canadian producers that they will have to reduce the amount of their production and, so far as lead and zinc are concerned, the very large company with which I am more familiar has reduced its tonnage by some 20,000 tons over the past few months. They are playing their part.

It is up to the government to face up to these issues and do what they consider necessary. If necessary, they should continue this session on into the new year, but let us have something done that will provide for the unemployed by putting them to work. Then, too, let us hear that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) is going to do something about increasing the benefits under the Unemployment Insurance Act for those who will have to maintain their families during this winter on the meagre amount that is allotted.

[Mr. Byrne.]

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Actually, Mr. Speaker, I am a little bit hazy as to just what subject matter the hon. member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) raised. However, I believe what I wish to say is related, at least in part, to the matter he raised. I took it that he started his grievance from the point of objecting to the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) suggesting that we in this house were somehow doing a disfavour to the Canadian people if we attempted to bring before the house a true report of the conditions existing in the parts of Canada from which we come, in respect to unemployment or other related matters. Certainly, on that point I find myself in agreement with the hon. member for Kootenay East.

I noticed that he started out by suggesting that the Prime Minister had taken a different view when he was in opposition. I am not particularly concerned about that quarrel between the hon. member for Kootenay East and the Prime Minister, now that the hon. member for Kootenay East finds himself on the opposite side of the house. However, I certainly consider that it was a little improper for the Prime Minister, when no more had been said than has been said in this house about some of the symptoms of unemployment that are arising in this country, to make the suggestion that we should, in effect, "pipe down" and not report to the house conditions as we find them.

In my own constituency, for example, I know that one of the large logging and forest products companies recently announced the closure of seven of its logging camps. I know that there are several hundred plywood workers in British Columbia who have recently been laid off because of a lack of orders for plywood products. Actually I do not know whether or not the hon. member for Kootenay East would agree with me, but I believe the real grievance we have to bring forward is a grievance on behalf of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr). So far as I can see this government is doing exactly what the previous administration did. They are putting the Minister of Labour out on a limb by expecting him to shoulder the whole burden of dealing with the various questions that relate to unemployment as they arise from time to time. I would suggest, therefore, that the Minister of Labour is really the person who has the legitimate grievance in this connection. I realize that being a member of the government he cannot speak for himself in this connection in the house, so I am sure he will appreciate it if one or two of the members on this side speak for him.

We understand, of course, that within his own jurisdiction the Minister of Labour does have the authority to introduce amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. Several of us have suggested that this might be an appropriate time for him to do so. We realize that under the unemployment insurance commission comes the operation of the national employment service. I, for one, have already expressed some dissatisfaction over the fact that apparently all the Minister of Labour has done in connection with the national employment service is to issue some sort of a directive. He has been very hazy to date as to what results may have been achieved as a result of the issuance of this directive. I would suggest that if the operation of the national employment service is going to be more effective in this country than it has been in the past it requires much more than a directive. For one thing, there will have to be a great deal more use made of it by many of the large employers in this country than has been the case up until now.

There has been, I feel, a tendency on the part of many of these large employers to go to the national employment service when they are seeking workers with certain specialized skills. The practice throughout Canada as a whole, which I feel is all too prevalent, is for many of these employers to pick up their new employees from the line at the plant gate whenever they have an opportunity of doing that in periods of slack employment.

I would suggest that this matter of unemployment, when it arises, is really one for the concern and attention of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming), as well as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill), and that it is not altogether fair for people like the Minister of Finance to leave the Minister of Labour on his own to cope with unemployment problems. As the hon. member for Kootenay East was speaking, I recalled that when we were engaged in the debate on the last budget introduced in this house some of the problems which are coming to the fore today were brought out in discussion by some of the members. I said something in that connection myself at that time.

When one recognizes, as those of us who come from British Columbia do, that this winter is going to be a rather gloomy one for a good many of our constituents who are not going to be able to find work, we cannot but recall that during the last budget debate a great deal of the discussion centred around the inflationary pressures on the economy and upon the tremendous construction boom. So far as I am concerned, the situation that now is developing in the province of British Columbia, according to all reports, is something for which the provincial administration has to take a great deal of the responsibility. During the budget debate I made some reference to the last budget speech in the provincial legislature by the minister of finance, Mr. Bennett. I had this to say, as recorded on page 2580 of Hansard for March 21, 1957:

> As far as he can see,—

That is Mr. Bennett.

> —the only solution seems to be to go on spending and spending in the field of capital construction without giving any thought to what may happen if that capital spending should stop.

I would suggest, Mr. Speaker, that we are now beginning to see what some of the results are in the economy of British Columbia when the period arrives when this extremely rapid capital expenditure begins to slow down. I went on to say this:

> When he talks about industry adjusting from time to time and taking the steps necessary for the consolidation of gains, the only meaning I can take from that is that sooner or later industry is going to stop this rapid expansion of plant and equipment.
> Once that is done, then some of these thousands of people who have been attracted to our province may not be such welcome citizens as they are at the present time.

I made those remarks on March 21 of this year and they will be found at page 2580 of Hansard of that day. That is not very long ago. Yet already, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that some of the possibilities that I suggested then are coming to pass within our province. It should be of real concern to the members of this house that this is taking place. Undoubtedly and quite legitimately it should be brought to the attention of the government at this time.

The major industry in the Comox-Alberni area is, of course, the forest products industry. In that speech to which I have made reference I had something to say about conditions in the lumber industry. I pointed out that the great lumber corporations of the Pacific coast had over a period of years been able to make tremendous profits, a large part of which they had been plowing back into an expansion of the industry and into production facilities. In this connection I said on March 21:

> Sooner or later this program of rapid capital expansion will have to come to an end, and when that happens, particularly if it should be that the existing market has temporarily or permanently declined, then our province is going to be in a very grave situation, and many thousands of workers who have been working at what, compared with the national average, are quite good wages, are no longer going to have that sort of job.

Mr. Speaker, I think that enough may have been said in the house, and certainly enough press reports are appearing to demonstrate that the fears, if you want to call them that, which I expressed last March are actually becoming the realities of the situation as it currently exists in the province of British Columbia. In that speech I also suggested the possibility that a time would come when we would have built more pulp mills than necessary having regard to the amount of pulp we could sell and that when that situation developed we were going to have these various concerns competing for a larger share of an existing market or a contracting market, a situation which would result in instability of employment and in some of the lay-offs that in point of fact we are now experiencing in the province of British Columbia.

I think it is and would be ill-advised action on the part of anyone having the responsibility of government or of anyone supporting the government to suggest that when a member of parliament rises in his place and attempts to draw this situation to the attention of the house he is thereby being an alarmist, or is crying "blue ruin" or that by so doing he is aggravating the situation. As the hon. member for Kootenay East suggested, the Prime Minister on former occasions put into words the idea that if we do not rise in our places here and speak the facts we are deluding ourselves and are doing a disservice to the Canadian people. What else are we here for, Mr. Speaker, than to bring to the attention of the government, which has at any particular time the responsibility of looking after the welfare of this country, the facts of the situation as we see them?

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, as I said previously, I really feel that in rising to speak on the grievance raised by the hon. member for Kootenay East in this context I am really speaking on behalf of the Minister of Labour to his colleagues in the cabinet and asking them not to leave him out on a limb to cope single-handed with the solution of some of the problems that obviously are not entirely within his jurisdiction.

Mr. F. C. Christian (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I have a grievance and it is related to this question of unemployment. We are well aware of the fact that one of the first immediate things that was done by the government was to see to it that $150 million was provided for the purpose of constructing low-price homes. At the present time approximately $130 million of that sum of money has been allocated for that purpose and the government has intimated that when further moneys are required they will be made available. That particular effort on the part of the government was commendable and no doubt as time goes on a great deal of additional money will be required.

At the present time we are fully aware of the fact that there are in this country about 250,000 unemployed people. Various estimates are given and it is suggested that the number of those unemployed could rise to half a million or three quarters of a million this winter. In our own province of British Columbia the number of unemployed persons has doubled as compared to the number one year ago. That situation today applies in the Okanagan Boundary area from which I come where we have a number of industries such as mining, logging, ranching, fruit growing and others and where people at this particular time of the year are faced with the problem of seasonal unemployment.

I have heard various members of this parliament suggest that the government should face up to this situation. I suggest that the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) has a very difficult problem in this matter of unemployment and that if we, as members of parliament, can make suggestions to him, so much the better. However, thus far, after sitting in this house during the last five weeks, I have heard hardly any suggestions made for the purpose of minimizing the problems of the Minister of Labour. I should like to suggest that the federal government initiate an all-Canada work project.

At the present time the situation is favourable for that project because I believe that on November 25 and November 26 of this year there is to be a meeting between the various officials of the federal government and the premiers of the various provinces of Canada. I am more particularly concerned at the present time with those men in our country who are in destitute circumstances. What is going to be done in the next six months, twelve months or eighteen months to help those men who, through no fault of their own, cannot find employment? As you know, Mr. Speaker, unemployment is not a good thing for the country. It leads to increased crime. It means a waste of manpower. Not only that, but men who are not working suffer both mentally and physically.

I would suggest that the federal government initiate a works project and that men who are in destitute circumstances be given the opportunity to work on roads, to work on parks, to work on bridges and to work wherever they can serve a useful purpose for the country. It might be that when the government gives consideration to this matter it will say that these men who are in destitute circumstances should be paid a sum of money by way of a wage that is slightly in excess of the average amount paid to people who receive unemployment benefit. That would, indeed, be a great step forward. As the house knows, in times of war and national disaster there is never any trouble about getting money, and in this time of peace, when we have in our midst people who are in poor circumstances financially I think the least we could do is to look after our own citizens and give them employment.

Mr. Ambrose Holowach (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join with my fellow members in the Social Credit party in stressing the urgency of alleviating the serious and growing unemployment situation in Canada. I should also like to point out the necessity of creating conditions in which all these willing and able people in our great country will have ample opportunity of finding gainful employment. The question arises: what does this new government intend to do with respect to this serious situation? It is a basic question, since we have heard no statement from the government with respect to what their plans are, and there is no suggestion in the speech from the throne that they have an answer to this problem.

Across this country unemployment and lay-offs are growing alarmingly. Being broke, hitting the financial bottom, being without work, are situations which confront hundreds of thousands of our people at this very moment. I can understand their feelings of anger; I can sense their feeling of unhappiness as they wait impatiently for some exercise of judgment with respect to solving the difficulties which face them. Unemployment involves more than human tragedies, it involves a very serious loss of production for our country, because unemployment is never isolated, it is felt right across the board of our economic life. So, we repeat: what does this Conservative government intend to do with respect to this very serious situation? Responsible leaders and economists have predicted that this winter may see the greatest number of unemployed in postwar years. To substantiate this claim, I refer to a memorandum to the government of Canada dated October 21, 1957 issued by the Canadian Labour Congress, where on page 6 the following appears:

> The economic situation is causing us some anxiety. The August figure of persons without jobs and seeking work was 174,000. This is almost 69 per cent higher than last year. Even allowing for the increase in the total supply of workers available for work, unemployment in August was almost 64 per cent worse than last year. And the position is getting steadily worse. June this year was 31 per cent worse than June 1956; July was almost 55 per cent worse than 1956, August almost 64 per cent. There is every indication that September will be even worse.

Unemployment

> The proportion of unemployed to the labour supply in August was still not very high. But August is always one of the lowest months of the year for unemployment. With this big increase in the summer, what will unemployment be like at the peak next March?
> From August 1956 to March 1957, the number of persons without jobs and seeking work rose by 240,000. The same absolute increase this year would mean a March 1958 total of 414,000. But we shall be agreeably surprised if the figure is not considerably higher, unless the present trend is arrested or reversed. A very much smaller percentage increase than took place last year would bring the March 1958 figure up to the postwar peak of 9.5 per cent of the total number of workers. This winter may well see the worst unemployment since the war, perhaps as high as 450,000 persons without jobs and seeking work, and 700,000 unplaced applicants at N.E.S. offices.

Well, Mr. Speaker, I hope that those predictions are wrong. Nevertheless, there are several things, historical and economic, which bear repeating because they are true. I want to say this at the outset: I am not critical for the sake of being critical, but I say what I am going to say in order to emphasize the need of correcting this persistent problem seriously. What are the facts? During every session of parliament in the past the question of mass unemployment has been debated and discussed thoroughly. The answer, as presented in the case of the Social Credit party, involves the government's monetary and fiscal policies. By its very nature, unemployment involves monetary considerations. The federal government alone possesses the right of monetary correction. That is why we stand for, and demand, a new financial deal for Canadians.

The former Liberal government kept putting off the solution. Instead of action they adopted the attitude of letting the years bring what they may. Today we are again debating the unemployment situation. We deeply regret that the spokesmen for the new government seem to be meeting that situation in exactly the same manner as the previous administration. The same pattern appears. The only difference, as far as I have been able to see, is that on the one hand the Liberals openly mourn their loss of power, while on the other the new Conservative government has difficulty in constraining itself from showing its jubilation at being in power.

Unless the government announces without delay a new and dynamic monetary policy to meet the problem our suspicion will be confirmed that both the old-line parties have failed to devise policies which will create those conditions which I mentioned at the beginning of my remarks, namely conditions in which all our peoples will be able to find gainful employment.

I think it is a very sad commentary on the intelligence of this and previous administrations when we consider that when it comes to war or preparation for war they can use the techniques of finance to accomplish what is virtually impossible, yet as soon as the emergency is over we find the paradox of poverty in the midst of plenty, the paradox of our people having produced abundance of goods and services and then being unable, through lack of purchasing power, to acquire what they have been able to produce.

I admit that the problem of unemployment is not a simple one and it is equally true that the solution lies not only in increased production but in a greater consumption of our goods both here and abroad. Referring specifically to the domestic field, it is obvious that we need financial policies which will more equitably equate the earning power of our people with the productive capacity of the nation. At the present time our gross national product is well over the $30 billion mark, yet the total of all purchasing power in our country is many billions of dollars less. The claim is made that unemployment is seasonable, that it is unavoidable and normal. That is one of the phony arguments that has been used by the two old line parties as an escape clause because they have not got an answer.

Mr. Baskin: What is your answer?

Mr. Holowach: I will tell you right away.

Mr. Baskin: Let us have it.

Mr. Hahn: You will learn in a while.

Mr. Holowach: Our answer, Mr. Speaker, as I indicated before, is to make sure we reform our economic system and equate the purchasing power of our people with the productive power of this nation. We believe that parliament should have the power to determine a financial policy that will make it—

Mr. Baskin: What have we got now?

Mr. Holowach: —obligatory for the banking system of this country to monetize the real wealth produced by the people of Canada so that the total income of our people will automatically be sufficient to equal the total market value of their production. That is our answer.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): What is wrong with that?

Mr. Baskin: What is right about it?

An hon. Member: The fact that you smile about it, that is what is wrong with it.

Mr. Holowach: With respect to whether or not unemployment is normal I would say the only thing normal about unemployment in a country such as Canada is that it is a normal consequence of faulty monetary policy condoned by the old line parties.

[Mr. Holowach.]

Let us look at the facts. Across this country homes are desperately needed. We are falling further behind in the job of providing Canadians with decent and low-cost homes. Let us face up to the fact that shortages in housing are causing many crises in family life. Just how stupid can we be? We have the unemployed manpower, the materials and the skills to fulfil the housing needs but under the prevailing tight money policies of the previous Liberal administration as well as the new Conservative government home starts are dropping sharply and lay-offs in all fields of the construction industry are on the increase.

Roads and arterial highways are desperately needed across the country. Some 16 years ago we commenced constructing the trans-Canada highway, one single road across the nation and it is still in process of being completed today. How long do we have to wait before we start to build the other highways that are essential to the economy and defence of Canada? On repeated occasions I have drawn the attention of the government to the need of constructing additional trans-Canada highways and in particular a highway that would run from Winnipeg by way of Saskatoon, Edmonton, Jasper park and the Yellowhead route to the west coast. It is about time we did something in that regard.

Right across Canada there is the need of vast national undertakings and projects essential to the national interest which are physically possible and desirable. Let us consider for a moment the backlog of essential public facilities at the junior or municipal level of government. This backlog includes hospitals to restore the health of our people, schools to relieve the shortage of classrooms and sewerage and sanitation projects to meet the requirements of expanding communities. In the light of these needs it is nonsense to suggest that unemployment in Canada is unavoidable or inevitable. In fact the most amazing spectacle in our country today is that of underemployment.

May we ask this question: will this government which prides itself on being a new deal government possess the courage to implement fiscal policies which in their objectives will aim to make financially possible what we know is physically possible and desirable? If we are able to do this Canada can be built into a leading nation within our lifetime. The remedy calls for a full recognition of the role of comsumption in our economic system. If this is so, then we must overhaul our tax structure which has reached excessive and crushing proportions and is destroying the buying power of the dollar as related to the consumption of goods. The government must also help in meeting the credit and mortgage needs of our people in order that they may acquire homes at reasonable terms. Furthermore, the needs of small and medium-sized businesses must be recognized by reducing the crushing tax load and loan restrictions which face them. These are the shots in the arm which our country needs if we are to expand production and alleviate unemployment.

In this discussion of labour and unemployment problems I feel strongly there is one problem perhaps more worthy of our attention than any other. I have in mind the problem of older people seeking work and the difficulties they encounter in this connection. These difficulties are compounded not only by the barriers that are set up against them in industry but also by the neglect in legislation. Many of these older people are healthy and active but because of their age the opportunity to earn is denied them. Whether business is good or bad no one wants to hire the older worker. Finding a solution to this important problem of jobs for older people is a task for parliament, for industry and for the Department of Labour.

As a start I suggest the establishment of a fund and the institution of a program in the Department of Labour to help these people in the meantime by inducing priority in placement and to reduce the barriers erected against this worthy element of our society. I believe that to do this little bit is to do something that would at least give all of us a sense that we are participating in a positive action against manpower wastage as well as one of special humanitarian significance.

AIR TRANSPORT—SERVICE UNDER BILATERAL AGREEMENTS

Mr. A. R. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Speaker, I would not have the opposition feel that a member of the government party did not have a grievance with the government.

Mr. Byrne: We are sure that yours will.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): What I have to raise is a grievance which I think affects every constituency but perhaps I may apply my particular reference to the area I know best if the house will grant me that liberty. I intend in a very few words to make reference to air regulations and bilateral agreements but not necessarily to air carriers. My grievance is, if I may state it at the beginning, the lack of proper consideration for Canadian landing points which of course are subject to the international bilateral agreements. I do not blame Trans-Canada Air Lines; in fact I think I might even pay them a compliment to a certain extent. We have heard on a number of occasions in this house severe criticism of Trans-Canada Air Lines and even the question of its proposed sale has been raised, with which view I do not agree. As an active pilot and one who has flown on most airlines on this continent I would say that in so far as aircraft servicing and airline practices are concerned there is no finer airline in the world, bar none.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear, hear.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, I do agree with those who believe that it suffers from a rather sheltered position; and which very seriously affects its public relations.

In a paragraph or two I should like to urge upon the government the necessity of giving consideration to the problem of a number of communities which today are not serviced by any north-south connection and which, by their very nature, as I said initially, is regulated under the bilateral agreement and are influenced by what we regard as the cat-and-mouse game. The fact of the matter, Mr. Speaker, is that if you wish to initiate any possible landing right in one country or another you find that it involves a rather complicated agreement. The situation in Calgary is such—in fact, in the entire western area between Winnipeg and Vancouver—that we are not serviced to our southern cousins by anything other than one milk route. The net result is that a passenger—and there are a great many of them—who uses the south connection, such as it is, is forced to undergo a very lengthy layoff in one of two cities. In fact, it is nearly as fast to go by motor car or mule.

We in Calgary are in this position, and since it is applicable to a number of other centres, I would suggest that consideration be given to inviting the United States to reopen negotiations which admittedly have to date been conducted on a rather horse-trading basis in the past. I suggest that we point out to them that very large metropolitan centres are being denied free access by either Canadian or United States carriers. I am not concerned what carrier it might be purely because we are frightened to sit down around the negotiation table for fear that what we might gain on the one hand we would give away on the other. In the meantime those who are in the less populated areas have not the same influence and they suffer disastrously.

The city of Calgary is an example. It is a metropolitan centre which is naturally the headquarters of the oil industry. Because of the location of Calgary those personnel who wish to visit United States centres of industrial importance must go through Calgary. We have no airline route which would conceivably get them there directly unless they go into the city of Edmonton and take the northern route, or unless they take the bus in many instances and go to Lethbridge. It is interesting to note that 80 per cent of loadings for U.S. points from Alberta originate in Calgary, yet we have no service south. The net result is we have built up in the city of Calgary one of the biggest centres of private aviation of executive type aircraft that it is possible to have. Unfortunately, many of those people cannot afford this luxury and they have no hope of carrying out their business in an effective manner.

Therefore, my grievance, simply expressed, is this. Let us recognize that we are going to have to re-open the bilateral negotiations soon. Let us say that we are prepared to recognize that many of those areas—and particularly the constituency which I represent—have no service at all. Let us say to the United States that one of two carriers —two in particular in the United States— who are prepared to service Calgary should be permitted to come in unless some Canadian airline is permitted to give the same service. I hope, sir, that the government will consider this as a grievance because the problem is perhaps one of those which, from a convenience standpoint, is certainly most urgent.

REQUEST FOR EXTENSION OF BROADCASTING SERVICE

Mr. C. N. Barbes (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, I have a grievance to put before the house. With your permission I would like to speak about radio and television service more particularly as it concerns the area which I represent in this house the constituency of Chapleau.

A number of listeners in the Abitibi area have expressed the wish to be provided with certain religious broadcasts such as Sunday mass and morning devotions at 7.30 each morning, through the private stations at La Sarre and Amos.

Radio is a social service which should satisfy the tastes and the needs of the public. As the people of Abitibi are 90 per cent French-speaking and Catholic, it would be well for the C.B.C. to insist that the private stations associated with the government network, such as those of the Radio-Nord Inc. chain, provide their listeners with a good many additional broadcasts originating with the C.B.C. I make that suggestion also on behalf of listeners who are in poor health, old, crippled, or invalids. I know too that a great many people who have to look after numerous small children are unable to attend mass every Sunday because of the distance they live from the churches.

My request is also justified by section 21 of the Canadian Broadcasting Act (chapter 32 RSC). The broadcasting licences are defined as being a temporary and conditional alienation of an important and precious element of public wealth to the benefit of a group or a company.

The C.B.C. is empowered to set the periods during which a private station must carry network programs. Licence holders, especially those in private networks, who are thereby the sole broadcasters in an isolated area such as ours, have a duty to supply to the whole of their listening public the best programs of the French network.

As regards the radio program called "Morning Devotions", it is so varied and of such high quality that our people would like to enjoy it every day. It must not be replaced by songs or by music sometimes of a dubious if not bad taste. Would you agree, Mr. Speaker, to replace the daily prayer in the house by discussions relating to rock'n roll? Certainly not.

Private radio stations should at all times show themselves worthy of the licence that has been granted to them, and of the privilege of the exclusive use of the air, which is part of public property.

An effective way for the government to encourage a better standard of radio service in a given area consists in supplying that area with the additional service of the C.B.C., thereby giving listeners the opportunity to choose whichever program they prefer.

I favour private enterprise as long as it maintains for the benefit of the public a service always worthy of commendation.

I would like to add a few words, if I may, on a related subject. I assure you that, in the Abitibi area, we have long wanted to view the programs which the French television network has been broadcasting for the past five years in Canada. According to official reports supplied to us, 86 p. 100 of this country is now well covered in this field. We should like to have the same treatment in the Chapleau constituency. We should like the advantages of French television service because this service would only be normal, I believe, in an area where the population is almost 90 p. 100 French-speaking. It is only fair to ask the government to offer us at least the French programs if it is too difficult to give us the benefit of both networks as is already the case for many other areas.

A private station, CKRN - TV in our neighbouring county of Villeneuve, should soon start its TV operations but will not cover the whole of my area. For that reason, I ask the government to supply us with the services of the national network in Chapleau. At Rouyn, in the county of Villeneuve, CKRN - TV will assign 50 p. 100 of its time to French programs. But this is not enough. What we want is a transmitting station for the benefit of the eastern part of Chapleau, Barraute, to Clova and Parent, an area more than 200 miles long which will not be reached by the Rouyn station.

Everywhere in Canada, the population insists on getting numerous programs of an irreproachable quality. People who know have said that C.B.C. compares favourably with other richer and more extensive networks. Canadians may no doubt be proud of the C.B.C., and it is exactly because we are 125,000 Canadians proud of the progress made by our country that we insist and wish to see, in our own homes, with our own eyes, the gigantic growth of Canada through the medium of radio and television. We need a service of this type for our entertainment but still more, no doubt, for education purposes. We need television, for instance, for all our bush workers and our mine workers who live very far from the cities and have no other means than radio to witness the gigantic growth of our country. We must open a window to children and our fellow citizens so that they may know each other better and have more reason to love Canada, a country of more than 16½ millions of citizens who should have closer relations in order to achieve their goal, that is to live in good understanding, from one part of the country to the other.

To reach that goal, Mr. Speaker, it would be as necessary to supply all our fellow citizens with adequate radio and television services as to defend ourselves from external enemies who sometimes spread subversive propaganda.

We recognize that our radar systems of warning, those for example of Parent and Senneterre, which have been set up at great cost, are useful even if one day we find that guided missiles could fall on us before the signal is given by telephone to the prime minister's office.

And as far as we are concerned, Mr. Speaker, we believe that the requested radio and TV service is as urgent and more important, for several reasons, than the broadcast of numerous international programs in sixteen or seventeen foreign languages to serve the Norwegians, the Swedes, the Danes, the Finns, the Dutch, the Italians, the Germans, the Austrians, the Czechs, the Russians, the Ukrainians, the Poles or others. It would be more urgent to offer this service to the French Canadians of northwestern Quebec who have none at all than to the peoples of Europe or Latin America who do not pay any taxes in Canada. Canadians have to pay for that. May the government then give, without any more delay, complete broadcast service in French or in the two languages so recently spoken by our very gracious sovereign, Her Majesty the Queen, when she visited Ottawa.

Admittedly the government finances an important part of television. Such being the case we would like the C.B.C. to set aside a part of the money it receives to create a system of relay towers which would bring T.V., by microwave over the Laurentians, beginning at Ottawa or Montreal, and reaching northward as far as the constituency of Chapleau. This should be done even at the expense of reducing broadcasts beamed towards Europe.

Let the C.B.C. create a high power station to serve Canadians in Chapleau. Some of the larger centres enjoy the two networks at the same time, which is all to the good. But, Mr. Speaker, we would at least like to have French language television service throughout our home area. I could add at this point that my constituents have already begun, in large numbers, to pay towards the cost of establishing such a telecommunication service by buying receiving sets which are liable to a special 15 per cent sales' tax the proceeds of which are handed over to the C.B.C. which uses them to establish new services.

If the government were to decide that the development in question would cost the C.B.C. too much at this time, do not forget that it would be in a better position to justify the maintenance costs of the radar system passing through Parent, Senneterre, and along the "Pinetree" line, if a picture transmission service were added to the latter. If the government really wishes to economize as claimed, it would be easy for the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes), the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) who has the C.B.C. in his care, and the other members of the government, to direct that the "Pine-tree" radar line be modified to transmit television pictures as far as Parent and Senneterre, where radar stations are located and enable our people to receive the telecasts thus relayed. Some say that our defence and radio and television services are more or less kept in watertight compartments. Well, those are the very compartments which the government must open. Let us therefore hold a conference at the Parent station or, if it is preferable, at Senneterre, where the Gordian knot could easily be cut.

On behalf of all the people of my constituency, I therefore urge the federal government to take immediate action to achieve in the near future the two improvement and development suggestions which I have explained too rapidly here concerning radio and television broadcasting, particularly in the eastern part of my constituency.

After witnessing several days ago all that was done in order that our royal visitors could appear at the same time on the Canadian and American television networks, I am sure that, if the government will only give favourable consideration to our requests, everything will be in operation very shortly.

In a few weeks the C.B.C. has done wonders, and I commend those who have directly or indirectly taken part in this gigantic operation, which made it possible for us to see Her Majesty the Queen of Canada, and thus admire and respect her the more.

Unfortunately, the children of my district have, generally speaking, not been able to see Queen Elizabeth. We should not wait any longer; it is time to act and the whole population of Chapleau is anxious to see this project carried out.

It is true that the networks have cost many million dollars last year; five million people have seen live broadcasts of our great hockey games. And, as soon as the winter season begins, we, in my riding of Chapleau and elsewhere, also want to see all the hockey games and all the educational programs, which the C.B.C. may broadcast every day. The project is feasible, if the government really wants to give us the improvements I request and which the people of my county of Chapleau entirely approve.

(Text):

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, my grievance is the same one in principle as that of the previous speaker but with a different locale. I rise to protest the continued denial of satisfactory radio reception to some 5,000 of my constituents and the denial to those constituents of the opportunity to hear the excellent programs of the C.B.C. We have had radio operations in Canada for over 30 years. One would hardly credit that in one constituency there are over 5,000 people today who have not had the opportunity to enjoy the programs of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation except on very rare occasions in daylight hours. During the evenings they have to rely entirely upon United States programs which many of them do not enjoy to any great extent.

I speak from personal experience, Mr. Speaker, because my little log cabin is situated in this considerable area that is isolated from the general communications of the C.B.C. To show how difficult it is, I remember that one Sunday evening one of my daughters came and said, "The member for Macleod is speaking, daddy." We twiddled with the radio and could hear a squeak and a burp and finally we heard a voice say, "This is San Francisco; you have been listening to Charlie McCarthy." Anyway, Mr. Speaker, that is the sort of radio reception we get in our district. I know the department concerned and the C.B.C. have been interested in correcting this situation for some years. Some years ago studies were made with respect to installing a somewhat higher powered station somewhere in the interior of British Columbia. After various tests were made, it was found that even the expenditure of quite a large sum of money would not guarantee satisfactory radio reception to the area in my constituency to which I am referring. I understand from the engineers and technicians that this difficulty is caused by the mountainous terrain and the very small amount of soil over a large section of the mountains themselves at the higher levels. I understand it is a condition that also exists in some other parts of Canada.

Anyway when that was discovered I was informed the only way to correct this situation and bring the programs of the C.B.C. to these 5,000 people denied them was to go in for the erection of low-power relay stations. Naturally, I was all for that suggestion. I have been urging that for some seven years in this house, Mr. Speaker. We required some five stations, I understand, to satisfactorily serve the areas particularly mentioned. We had two stations installed, one at Castlegar and one at Kaslo. The one at Kaslo serves a population which is delighted to have the opportunity of listening to the C.B.C. and other Canadian programs. Naturally, this improved radio reception at Kaslo has caused an increasing ferment amongst those who have been denied radio reception for a period of 30 years, while at the same time we are spending many millions on bringing television to the majority of the Canadian people.

This situation is of such concern to these constituents of mine that the farmers' institutes, women's institutes, chambers of commerce, boards of trade and other organizations have dealt with the question at various meetings and have adopted resolutions and forwarded them to me as well as to the appropriate persons in the various government departments. In addition to that, at the last convention of the chambers of commerce of southeastern British Columbia a resolution was again passed asking the government to give consideration to the correction of the situation so far as radio reception is concerned in those areas of southeastern British Columbia denied it.

Now, Mr. Speaker, after we had the two stations installed, the one at Castlegar and the one at Kaslo—which incidentally is the birthplace, I believe, of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) and I know he is interested in this question so I expect him to support me on it—I have been informed that the others could not be erected because of a lack of funds and the expense in developing television. In order to service the district properly a low-power relay station should be erected at Balfour to serve the Kootenay lake area and the communities of Queens Bay, Kootenay Bay, Proctor, Crawford Bay, Gray Creek, Port Crawford and Boswell. There should be another one erected on Slocan lake, possibly at Roseberry. There is one required at Nakusp to serve the Upper Arrow lakes and south.

As I said before, I have urged the installation of these stations for seven years, then suddenly we were faced with the fact that there was insufficient funds owing to the increased expenditures of the C.B.C. on the extension of radio and television in other areas, but particularly with respect to television. Then I was told the matter would have to lay in abeyance until the report of the royal commission on broadcasting and television was received. Well, Mr. Speaker, that commission reported this year, March 15, and in its report dealt with this very important question. I have made many representations in this house and the matter has been brought to the attention of the special committee on broadcasting and television on several occasions. I had considerable correspondence with the various ministers, the governor of the C.B.C. and his technical and engineering Staff in British Columbia. I hope we are getting much closer to the time when the situation I have mentioned will be corrected.

I want to quote for a few minutes from the report because it mentions that this is a situation that has been experienced by other communities in Canada and certainly it should not be allowed to continue in this day and age. There is a chapter in this book entitled "Improvement and Extension of Coverage". I am quoting from the report of the royal commission on broadcasting, 1957, and this is what is stated at page 209:

> It came as something of a surprise to us that as much as 74 per cent of our total population is within reach of four or more radio stations during the daytime. At night, this percentage drops to about 43 per cent due to an increase in interference from distant co-channel and adjacent channel stations. The following table shows the percentages of population capable of hearing one, two, three or four or more Canadian radio stations.
> At first glance, it would appear that radio coverage in Canada is very good. And indeed it is. Yet there are still almost half a million people in this country who cannot, except under freak atmospheric conditions, receive the signal of even one Canadian station. After considering every aspect of this question with our financial advisers and the C.B.C. management, we have come to the conclusion that a limited plan for the extension of radio coverage is desirable.

Then, at page 210 the commission had this to say:

> The most important single element in this plan is the erection of the 97 low-power relay transmitters and the four new transmitters which is contemplated in our six-year forecast at a total capital cost of nearly $2 million. These new facilities, particularly the low-power relay transmitters, are to be located in remote areas of every province except Prince Edward Island which, for obvious reasons, does not give rise to as difficult problems as her sister provinces. The over-all capital investment in the extension plan will be about $3.3 million including a contingency of $1 million to provide for future growth and shifts in population.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do urge the government, when it is considering this report and preparing its estimates—I am now speaking to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees), the Minister of Public Works for sympathetic purposes, and I trust the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. Nowlan) will read what I have to say tomorrow morning as he usually does—to give consideration to the fact that radio services should be rendered to these people who are producing a lot of wealth in the isolated portions of this country.

Incidentally, I might mention in this respect that I represent the constituency that pays the highest income tax per capita in Canada and has the highest wage income per capita in large sections of the constituency as a result of the operations of the smelter, mining industry and lumbering industry.

This constituency makes quite a contribution to the national revenue, and on that basis and in view of all the circumstances and the fact it is working to pay its own share, I hope my representations will engender a favourable response from the ministers concerned.

BEET SUGAR INDUSTRY

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, I rise to voice a grievance in that the Canadian sugar industry appears to continue to be dangerously exposed to Cuban sugar producers. May I draw to the attention of the house a number of important facts concerning the beet sugar industry of Canada. The beet sugar industry does help, and could and would help Canada, first, to deal with her serious adverse trade balance problem; second, to ameliorate her wheat surplus problem; third, to make highly beneficial use of her fine irrigation districts in Alberta and elsewhere; fourth, to strengthen her supply position in case of war, particularly in reference to sugar for human food and for all its many other uses, as well as to certain extremely valuable livestock feeds including wet beet pulp, dried beet pulp, beet tops, beet molasses and beet tailings; fifth, to provide employment for many Canadians, and home markets for several Canadian products of which let me mention coal, coke, lime and bags, to list only a few; sixth, to conserve and enrich Canadian soils upon which the sugar beets are grown.

The beet growing industry is a thoroughly sound agricultural industry. It is just as sound as is any other branch of Canadian agriculture such as grain growing, poultry producing, dairying or livestock raising. The sugar beet growers, like the growers of any other product in Canada, are vulnerable to dangers within Canada such as factors like a cost-price squeeze. They are vulnerable also to unfair competition from outside Canada, factors like the cane sugar producers of Cuba, the Philippines and other tropical countries with low wage scales and exceptional climatic, geographical and other advantages, such exceptionally favoured cane producers, if unhindered by special Canadian restrictive measures, being, in any normal year, able to pour into Canada enough refined sugar to ruin Canadian sugar producers, either beet sugar growers and refiners, or cane refiners.

Canadian beet sugar refiners require the Canadian federal government's care, much as do other Canadian agricultural producers. Canadian beet sugar growers ought to be shielded by the Agricultural Prices Support Act. Canada's beet sugar producers ought to be secured by a Canadian sugar act appropriately like the United States sugar act of 1948, which act is based upon (1) quotas, (2) price adjustments; (3) extensive home production of sugar consumption.

May I give the house a few facts to show something of what Cuba has done in times past, and what conceivably Cuba might do again; facts to show also what Canada did to protect her producers both of cane and of beet sugar? During the year 1931 the price of Cuban sugar fell to an almost unbelievably low level. Tariffs could not shut it out. Canada, on January 27, 1932, passed order in council P.C. 181, granting power of fixing, for duty purposes, at $2.30 per hundred weight the price of outside sugar at place of origin. On January 30 appraiser's bulletin No. 3815 announced this fixing of sugar price. This measure shut Cuban sugar out of Canada.

The Liberal government on November 20, 1939 cancelled, as a wartime move, appraiser's bulletin No. 3815. This action left the sugar controller of Canada to take whatever means he might consider needful to exclude, or to admit, sugar from outside Canada. The Liberal government abolished wartime control of sugar on April 1, 1950.

In 1952 Cuban sugar began coming into Canada in great amounts. Apparently Right Hon. C. D. Howe had a personal promise from Cuba that she would refrain from sending Cuban refined into Canada in injurious quantities.

Will the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) look into the situation at present and, at an early date, give the house a statement upon the whole situation as regards Canadian beet sugar producers and Cuban sugar? Then will he tell us whether or not there has been anything comparable to the imposition of the $2.30 minimum at place of origin? If nothing like that has been done, I feel that our producers are in a dangerous position.

Some hon. members will wonder whether or not all of the statements I have made in making these remarks can be adequately substantiated with dependable data and other evidence. Because of the shortage of time at my disposal I have had to omit the plentiful documentary and other evidence in my possession. Those desiring to read that evidence may find much of it in a speech which I delivered on December 4, 1952, as recorded on pages 339-344, volume I of 1952-53 Hansard. They will find additional evidence in a speech which I delivered on December 17, 1952, as recorded on pages 840-845 in the same volume of Hansard. Still further evidence will be found in a speech I delivered on February 11, 1953, as recorded on pages 1841-1846 of 1952-53 Hansard; and yet more in my speeches of March 5, 1953, recorded on pages 2654-2659 and of March 16, 1953, as recorded on pages 2972-2976 of 1952-53 Hansard.

In my speech of April 7, 1953, recorded on pages 3560-3565 of 1952-53 Hansard is to be found a discussion of the United States sugar act of 1948, why it was enacted, and what it provides as a solution to the difficult problem of sugar in any country like Canada or the United States. The United States sugar act of 1948 has recently been extended indefinitely with modifications.

Mr. Speaker, I suggest to the minister that he give the most careful consideration to the drafting and introduction of a Canadian sugar act similar to that of the United States.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being ten o'clock p.m., it is my duty, pursuant to section 4 (f) of standing order 56, to interrupt these proceedings and forthwith put the question on the motion now before the house. Accordingly, the question is the following one:

Mr. Fleming, seconded by Mr. Churchill, moved that the Speaker do now leave the chair for the house to resolve itself into committee of supply.

Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and the house went into committee, Mr. Courtemanche in the chair.

The estimates of the following departments were first taken up and entered for consideration:

Questions

PITWOOD EXPORTS, ATLANTIC PROVINCES

Question No. 188—Mr. McWilliam:

1. What steps has the government taken towards securing pitwood contracts for overseas markets for Atlantic province pit-prop shipments during 1958?

2. What has been the result to date?

3. What are the future prospects?

Answer by: Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce):

1. In August of this year the Department of Trade and Commerce became concerned over the prospects for export sales of pitwood for 1958. Investigations into market possibilities were made and as information was collected this was passed to the trade and to the provincial governments chiefly interested. In particular it was made known to the U.K. authorities that Canadian producers were interested in tendering on the requirements of the national coal board as in previous years. This business is at present under negotiation by the producers.

2. Direct assistance by the foreign trade service to one concern was instrumental in the obtaining of a small contract from Turkey. No other reports have yet been received on contracts concluded.

3. A contract for some part of the national coal board's requirements is expected.

GOVERNMENT PROGRAMS FOR UNEMPLOYMENT RELIEF

3. What are the terms of reference of this committee and how does it operate?
4. Are any cabinet ministers members of the committee? If so, which ones?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): The answer to part 1 is as follows. There is a specific program the object of which is to increase winter employment so as to alleviate the normal seasonal slump in Canada. The program, known as the winter employment campaign or program, aims at providing an industrial and occupational climate favourable to the planning and execution of projects in the wintertime where possible.

The program, which is being jointly administered by the Department of Labour and the national employment service, enlists the services of national and local organizations, municipal groups and all available publicity media to make employers winter employment conscious. It enlists the support of federal government departments in undertaking new construction, maintenance, repairs and renovations in winter as well as procurement of supplies, where at all practicable. It sponsors a nation-wide information and publicity program.

Through winter employment committees across Canada, working closely with local employment offices, the program is co-ordinated on a nation-wide basis. Successful prosecution of the program is made possible through co-operation by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, the Canadian Labour Congress, the Canadian Construction Association, the Canadian Retail Federation, the Canadian Bankers' Association, the Canadian and Catholic Confederation of Labour and a number of other public-spirited groups who have lent their willing assistance. Provincial and municipal governments are also co-operating splendidly in scheduling projects in wintertime.

[Mr. Starr.]

The answer to part 2 is as follows. The interdepartmental committee on winter employment is made up of representatives of a number of departments. Its special interest is in scheduling, where possible and practicable, federal works in wintertime. Its powers are purely advisory.

The answer to part 3 is as follows. This is a committee established to advise cabinet on federal government participation on a departmental level in the winter employment program.

The committee endeavours to obtain information on projects which might suitably be carried on in winter and makes recommendations accordingly. It also attempts to co-ordinate these various efforts on an interdepartmental basis.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, this is not the last opportunity; there are several more days, and the answer will be given at any time on orders of the day.

For a copy of all agreements and correspondence exchanged between Canada and the state of New York, from January 1, 1955 to date, in connection with the building, operating and maintenance of the Ogdensburg-Prescott international bridge.

Right Hon. J. G. However, there exists a financial agreement relating to the Ogdensburg bridge between the United States bridge authority, the Canadian bridge authority and the state of New York. CANADIAN NATIONAL STEAMSHIPS

REQUEST FOR RENEWED NEGOTIATIONS ON WAGES AND WORKING CONDITIONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the reported offer of assistance to the minister by the president of the Canadian Labour Congress in the matter of the dispute between the Canadian National Steamships and the seafarers international union, will the government press for renewed negotiations on the wage and working conditions of the merchant seamen involved with a view to settling the dispute and returning the ships to Canadian registry?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I received a telegram from Mr. Jodoin, as the hon. member has intimated, and I replied to him as follows:

Thank you for your telegram which I received this morning. I have noted carefully the views which you have expressed. As the wage dispute is between the seafarers international union and the Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships Limited I believe it would be desirable if your offer to use your influence with the seafarers international union to try to bring about a settlement on an equitable basis were submitted direct to the parties to the dispute. I will however inform the company of the offer which you have made.

REPORTED INADEQUACY OF CREWS ON SHIPS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Transport a question. If the minister finds that this is the case will he apply against the crown corporation the penalty section of the Canada Shipping Act?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am advised by the management of Canadian National Steamships Limited that the crews which man the ships at the present time are quite adequate for the task which they have to perform, but if I find to the contrary I will certainly look into the matter. As I say, I will do this only if I find to the contrary.

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I add another question to the many which the Minister of Transport has been asked today.

Mr. Churchill: And which he has answered so well.

Mr. Chevrier: I remember having many busy days when I was over there but none similar to this one. I gave the minister notice of this question. Did the minister or anyone acting on his behalf issue instructions to Canadian National Steamships which resulted in the turning back of the aircraft carrying West Indian crews to Canada?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for his courtesy in advising me of his intention to ask this question. I am sorry to disappoint my hon. friend, but the answer is no.

Mr. Chevrier: It is not a disappointment. It is a confirmation.

DESTINATION OF VESSELS WHERE CREWS WILL BE TRANSFERRED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. What is the destination of the Canadian National Steamships vessels where the transfer will be made from Canadian to foreign crews?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I am not aware of any plans at the moment of Canadian National Steamships to transfer any crews.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I cannot hear the minister.

Mr. Hees: I said that I am not aware of any plans on the part of Canadian National Steamships to transfer any crews, and I am advised by the company that the destination at the present time is Halifax.

FINANCE

BANK OF CANADA—ALLEGED RELAXATION OF MONETARY RESTRICTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. James Sinclair (Coast-Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance, based on a C.B.C. news story this morning in which a speech given by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) in Vancouver was wrongly attributed to the Minister of Finance. What are the definite steps which have been taken by the Conservative government, according to the Minister of Justice, to relax the monetary restrictions of the Bank of Canada?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen any report of the speech wrongly attributed to me which my hon. friend says was made last night by the Minister of Justice, and I think it is hardly fair to expect me to answer to something which was in the mind of my colleague, if he made such a statement.

Mr. Sinclair: A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. The presumption is that the Minister of Justice was speaking as a member of the government when he said the Conservative government was relaxing the monetary restrictions, and I thought the natural person from whom to inquire about what these steps were would be the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Prime Minister—

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Speaker, I am still asking what are these steps taken to relax monetary restrictions about which the Minister of Justice spoke in Vancouver, saying it was the Conservative government which had done this?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I understand that question has already been addressed to the minister and he has given an answer.

Some hon. Members: Oh, no.

INQUIRY AS TO REBATE IF EXCISE TAX ON AUTOMOBILES CHANGED

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask the Minister of Finance if as a means of stimulating sales and relieving unemployment which exists in certain automobile centres like the city of Windsor he could give any assurance that automobile dealers will receive a rebate on excise taxes when and if the excise tax is lowered or eliminated—

Mr. Sinclair: In accordance with Conservative election promises.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —in accordance with the practice established by the previous minister of finance?

Mrs. Fairclough: Oh, no.

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Sinclair: No lecture; just an answer.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend of course completely spoiled his question by the rider he added at the end.

Mr. Sinclair: No lecture; just give an answer.

Mr. Fleming: What I would like to point out is that the fears that he apparently alludes to are based upon the actual experience that a great many motor car dealers in this country had under the former government, when that government 2½ years ago proposed a reduction from 15 to 10 per cent in that special excise tax on automobiles.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is this the budget speech?

Mr. Fleming: It will be remembered that at that time the government left the whole burden of the taxes that had been paid to rest upon the dealers. It will be recalled that following this—

Some hon. Members: Answer.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a point of order.

Mr. Chevrier: Deal with the question.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. Martin (Essex East): It is clearly not within the rules of this house, Mr. Speaker, for a minister in answer to a question—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): To make a budget speech.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —to deal with matters that have nothing to do with the question or that constitute a budget speech. Now, I ask the Minister of Finance in view of the serious unemployment situation in the city of Windsor—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Fraser: What about the speech you are making?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): —whether or not this request made to him by others can or cannot be met by him. If it cannot, all he has to do is say no.

An hon. Member: When did you stop beating your wife.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I am interested in the way my hon. friend has revised his question.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I take it that the minister is now speaking to the point of order which has been raised.

Mr. Sinclair: He is just speaking.

Mr. Speaker: Does the hon. minister wish to speak to the point of order which has been raised?

Mr. Fleming: I thought my hon. friend had attempted to ask a second question. I wish now to go on with my answer to the first question, which I had not completed.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question.

Mr. Speaker: I think the point of order was complicated by a further question, and perhaps the minister might deal with it.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question.

Mr. Fleming: I have not completely dealt with the first question yet.

Mr. Speaker: Order. We must give the minister a fair opportunity to answer the last question asked by the hon. member for Essex East.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I had not completed my answer to the first question.

Mr. Chevrier: You were making a speech.

Mr. Fleming: I pointed out, Mr. Speaker, that the dealers had been left to bear the burden of the tax that had been paid.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not true.

Mr. Fleming: Now, following the protests of the opposition of those days over that unfair treatment of the dealers—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Answer the question.

Mr. Fleming: —the act was amended, and the act as amended permits—

Mr. Sinclair: Who amended it; the opposition?

Mr. Fleming: —the sale of cars on consignment in such a way that if there should be any change in the tax there is no burden then left on the dealer. One would hope that in such a situation those who are interested in what may be done in regard to this subject would take advantage of those provisions of the act and make the purchases on consignment.

I can tell my hon. friend that so far as unemployment is concerned this is a matter of very lively concern to those who are responsible for any of these matters. If it became the intention of the government and were announced in due course that any change should be proposed to the house, naturally all aspects of the matter would be taken into consideration. There have been many representations on this subject. I could indicate to my hon. friend why in the light of past experience the dealers are so concerned.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Bring in your budget soon.

ARTS, LETTERS AND SCIENCES

CONFERENCE ON EDUCATION—SENDING OF OBSERVERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, in view of the Prime Minister's interest in education in general and in particular, including lectures to the opposition, I would like to ask him this question. In view of the great importance of the Canadian conference on education to be held in Ottawa on February 17 to 20 in 1958, will the Canadian government send observers to this great and unique national conference and will observers from the Canada Council also attend?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, there has been no decision made regarding the presence of observers. I agree with my hon. friend that this is a most important conference. As to the question as to whether or not there should be representatives from the Canada Council that, of course, would be determined by that council.

TRADE

UNITED KINGDOM—REPRESENTATIVE OF WESTERN POOLS IN DELEGATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. M. Johnson (Kindersley): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Has the minister given further consideration to the suggestion I made on Monday, November 11, that a representative of the western pools be included in the trade delegation to the United Kingdom? If so, could he report to the house if any changes or additions have been made in the personnel of this mission since it was announced by him on November 8?

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, when I was in Regina attending the meeting of the Saskatchewan pool association last Friday, a gentleman—I think one of the vice-presidents of that organization—was asked to become a member of the mission and consented to do so.

TRANSPORT

FERRY "WILLIAM CARSON"—REQUESTED PROVISION OF PASSENGER ACCOMMODATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport with reference to the William Carson, which is now plying between North Sydney and Argentia. In view of the minister's statement that if the William Carson could carry automobiles and passengers, and if the Newfoundland board of trade could show that this could be done, it would be done, what is he now doing to see that this assurance is implemented?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member is usually reasonably accurate. I am afraid he is inaccurate in his statement today. When I was in St. John's some time ago I talked this matter over with the Newfoundland board of trade and they told me they were confident that automobiles could be loaded on the William Carson. I told them that if they could demonstrate that fact, then I would recommend to the management of the Canadian National Railways that cars be carried on that ferry.

I have since been in touch with the management of the Canadian National Railways and they tell me that although they believe cars could physically be loaded on the ferry, there are many other factors which in their opinion make it very undesirable if not impossible to carry cars on the ferry at the present time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask a supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Has the minister received any representation from the Newfoundland board of trade since that announcement was made by the management? If not, is he aware of the statement made by the board which was reported in a recent issue of the St. John's Evening Telegram?

Mr. Hees: Yes; I had quite a lengthy talk with the president of the Newfoundland board of trade either yesterday or the day before—I am not quite sure which it was—and I think he understands my point of view and I certainly understand his.

LASQUETI ISLAND—REPORTED CANCELLATION OF PASSENGER AND FREIGHT SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Transport seems to be very popular today. I have a question for him also. I regret I did not find the opportunity to give him notice of it. If he wishes he may take this as notice. Has the minister received a telegram informing him that the only passenger and freight service to Lasqueti island, British Columbia, is cancelled, effective today, and asking him to provide for its resumption or for a suitable substitute service? If so, what action has he taken or will he take to deal with this situation?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I have not received such a telegram but I will make inquiries, look into the matter and see what can be done.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LESAGE—ANSWER TO STARRED QUESTION NO. 29

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Jean Lesage (Montmagny-L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. I could have done so earlier when answers were being given to starred questions, but I thought I should not interrupt proceedings at that time. My question of privilege has reference to the answer given by the Minister of Labour to starred question No. 29. The question reads as follows:

How many unemployed were registered in (a) Canada; (b) the province of Quebec; (c) the area served by the Montmagny office of the unemployment insurance commission, on or about November 1, 1957?

[Mr. Hees.]

The answer of the Minister of Labour contained the published figures of September 19. My question of privilege is this. Since it is well known that the unemployment insurance commission has these figures of registered unemployed throughout Canada every week, is not parliament, the House of Commons, entitled to those figures?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I posed these questions to the unemployment insurance commission and these are the figures I received as the latest figures available. If the hon. member is not satisfied with these figures, then I shall go back to the unemployment insurance commission and ask them if they can bring them up to date. These are the only figures they gave me in reply to the question.

Mr. Lesage: That is quite satisfactory. I am sure the unemployment insurance commission will supply the minister with much more recent figures.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

REQUEST THAT MEMBERS MAKE USE OF FIVE-PIN BOWLING LEAGUE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Health and Welfare. Since we have in this house, for the use of the members of the House of Commons and the stenographic staff, an active five-pin bowling league, would the minister not consider it in the best interests of the physical fitness and health of the members to make use of this exercise?

Hon. J. W. Monteith (Minister of National Health and Welfare): Mr. Speaker, if I may be permitted to answer the question I would say yes, indeed. I think the hon. member who asked the question is possibly the best living example in that regard.

Mr. McIvor: Thank you.

TRANS-CANADA AIR LINES—PASSES FOR MEMBERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Byrne (Kootenay East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. I regret that I was unable to give him notice. Since the disposition appears to be to give passes on Trans-Canada Air Lines to Jamaican seamen I wonder whether he would give more earnest consideration to his earlier suggestion that members of parliament living more than 500 miles from Ottawa should be given passes on the air line?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, as I explained the other day no passes have been given to anybody.

Mr. Pickersgill: Has the hon. gentleman not got a pass?

Mr. Hees: It was given to me; I did not give it.

Mr. Sinclair: And the Postmaster General?

Mr. Pickersgill: And the Postmaster General?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I did not get it from the Minister of Transport.

Mr. Sinclair: We don't care who gives them so long as we get them.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

STRIKE OF RIVER PILOTS, KINGSTON MARINE DISTRICT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. O. F. Villeneuve (Glengarry-Prescott): Mr. Speaker, in view of recent rumours I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Have there been any new developments along the St. Lawrence river in regard to the pilots' strike?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Pickersgill: Don't blush.

Mr. Hees: —I wish to thank the hon. member for his courtesy in giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. I am glad to inform the house that the pilots of the Kingston-Montreal pilotage district have today returned to work. This decision was taken on their part on the basis of my assurance to them that we believed we could work out a satisfactory solution to their problems in the course of the coming months before the spring season of navigation opens.

UNEMPLOYMENT—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT WINTER PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour, arising out of his answer to one of my starred questions on today's order paper. I refer to the question which read:

> Has the government any specific program to relieve unemployment this winter? If so, what is that program?

In view of the fact that the minister told us the aims of that program, the nature of the publicity being given to it, the organizations who were sponsoring it and so on, will he tell us what the program is?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I think I adequately explained the winter program. I have nothing more to add.

POSTAL SERVICE

SASKATOON-EDMONTON—EFFECT OF REMOVAL OF RAILWAY MAIL CARS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Louis Lewry (Moose Jaw-Lake Centre): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General, of which notice has been given. Can the minister say as to whether the removal of railway mail cars from the 300-mile run from Saskatoon to Edmonton will not result in poorer mail service to the citizens in that area; and does the minister intend to remove other railway mail cars in other sections of the country in an economy attempt, without regard to service?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, the action referred to was dictated because it was felt that the revised arrangement would result in an improved mail service, and it originated from complaints and information we received from that area that certain connections were not satisfactory.

To deal with the second and more general part of the question, I would say that the Post Office Department has never removed railway mail car service in an economy attempt without regard to service, and there certainly is not any intention of doing so in the future. Where railway mail cars have been removed and replaced by highway service it was for the purpose of improving the mail service, and in many cases because it was the only course of action to follow, the railways having removed the trains or changed them so that no adequate equipment was available. The economy factors which enter into this question are sizeable at times, but they are not the main consideration.

SHIPPING

C.G.S. "BAFFIN"—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF REPORT ON GROUNDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. A. M. Kirk (Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. In view of the wide interest in the matter, will he table the report of the inquiry conducted by his department following the grounding of the C.G.S. Baffin on Black rock on July 4 last?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, I would like to thank the hon. member for his courtesy in giving me notice of his intention to ask this question.

No formal investigation or public inquiry under the Canada Shipping Act was held, although at the request of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys a Department of Transport officer made a departmental investigation, the results of which were passed on to the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. This was a purely departmental report of a nature which it has not been customary to release to the public.

Mr. Kirk: May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the answer just given, would the minister agree to institute a public inquiry in order to assure the people, particularly those who live on the seacoast, that lives are not being endangered and public property not being subjected to undue risk?

Mr. Hees: I will be glad to look into the matter, and if there appears to be a real need for a public inquiry certainly one will be held.

AIR TRANSPORT

CANADIAN PACIFIC AIRLINES—APPLICATION TO FLY MONTREAL-VANCOUVER ROUTE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct another question to the Minister of Transport. We know this is not his birthday we are celebrating because he told us last session when his birthday is. In view of the minister's insistence last week that the application by Canadian Pacific Airlines to fly the Montreal-Vancouver route was a matter for the air transport board to deal with and about which we should not ask for any government statement of policy, how does he explain the statement made by his parliamentary assistant today that the application of Canadian Pacific Airlines to land at Edmonton and take on and discharge passengers there is being considered by the minister as part of a government review of civil aviation policy?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): Mr. Speaker, if those were the words used in answer to the question, the answer should have been that the matter is being considered by the air transport board.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the minister a supplementary question. If there is any change in aviation policy as envisaged in the statement of the parliamentary assistant, will that change of policy be brought to parliament before it is put into effect?

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

HARBOURS

WINDSOR, ONT.—REQUEST FOR ANNOUNCEMENT OF PERSONNEL OF NEW COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West): May I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Would the minister advise the house if the government has yet named the federal representatives to the Windsor harbour commission?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I did not quite hear the hon. member.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): Has the government named the federal representatives to the Windsor harbour commission?

Mr. Hees: Yes, Mr. Speaker, and we have just recently received the nominee of the mayor of Windsor. As I said yesterday, we expect to move forward on the matter very rapidly now.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): Can the minister tell us who the federal representatives are to be?

Mr. Hees: I can tell the hon. member after we reach orders of the day. I will be very glad to do so then, but I do not have the names with me at the moment.

COMMONWEALTH RELATIONS

INDIA—REPORTED REQUEST FOR FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. In view of the very serious financial difficulties facing the government of India at this time and reports that India is seeking loans from the western nations, can the minister say whether India has asked Canada for assistance and what consideration has been given to any such request?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, to my knowledge no request has been made by the government of India to the government of Canada for any such loan.

Mr. Argue: Can the minister say whether the government of India has sought private assistance or private investment within Canada as she is reported to be doing within other nations?

Mr. Fleming: Not that I am aware of, Mr. Speaker. Last fall the Indian finance commissioner, when in Washington, was known to be carrying on discussions with officials of the international bank, and also with representatives of the United States treasury.

COMMUNICATIONS

POLICY RESPECTING GRANTING OF SUBSIDIES TO TELEPHONE COMPANIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Raoul Poulin (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I have another question for the Minister of Transport. Has the Department of Transport discontinued its former policy of granting subsidies to certain telephone companies in order to help them improve their services?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I wish to thank the hon. member for his courtesy in advising me of his intention to ask this question. It is my understanding that the former government had this whole matter under consideration, and the present government also has it under consideration.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

HIGHWAY BRIDGE, CHATHAM-FERRY ROAD, N.B.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. McWilliam (Northumberland-Miramichi): May I direct a question to the Secretary of State. When can I expect an answer to my question No. 47, which was made an order for return on October 30?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Secretary of State): I will look into the matter and try to hurry it up.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

NATIONAL CONSERVATION BOARD—INQUIRY AS TO PLACING ON AGENDA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Have any representations been made to the Prime Minister by any provincial premier suggesting that the question of establishing a national conservation board be placed on the agenda of the forthcoming dominion-provincial conference?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know of no such request. I could be in error, but I do not think I am. I have followed all requests and I speak from memory, but I know of no such request.

TRADE

FLOUR—CORRECTION OF EXPORT ADJUSTMENT PRICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I should like to correct an inaccuracy that I was guilty of yesterday in answering a question by the hon. member for Rosthern. I said that the adjustment price on wheat used for flour for export amounted to about 12 cents per bushel. Actually the adjustment price varies from 8 cents to 10 cents per bushel.

Mr. W. A. Tucker (Rosthern): Will the minister make available to the house the actual amount involved in this subsidy policy over the past year?

Mr. Churchill: I think, Mr. Speaker, that is a proper question for the order paper, because it involves statistical material.

POWER

NEW BRUNSWICK—STATEMENT ON STATUS OF BEECHWOOD DEVELOPMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, yesterday the hon. member for Welland asked the following question:

Is the Beechwood power project in New Brunswick nearly completed, and is any part of it operating?

This information is, of course, within the jurisdiction of the province of New Brunswick. However, I have communicated with their officials and I have received the following from the New Brunswick power commission, that the Beechwood project is over 90 per cent completed. The whole project should be finished in February, 1958.

In the past few days one unit has been on tests to see if it can meet all the specifications for acceptance. While the first unit is, of necessity, in the hands of the operating department of the commission because the power from the unit has to be fed into the commission's system, if it does not meet the specifications it will be handed back to the construction department. It is a fact that Beechwood power is being used in the commission's system, but it is also a fact that the first unit is on trial runs and has not been accepted yet.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

STAMP ISSUE OF HER MAJESTY THE QUEEN AND PRINCE PHILIP

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Yvon L'Heureux (Chambly-Rouville): I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. It has to do with the issue of the stamps showing a picture of Her Majesty the Queen and Prince Philip. How many stamps did this issue comprise?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): If I understood the hon. member correctly he asked how many stamps did this issue comprise?

Mr. L'Heureux: Yes.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): I think that is a very proper question for the order paper.

SEARCH AND RESCUE

INQUIRY AS TO LIFESAVING SERVICE ON ATLANTIC COAST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): I should like to direct a question to either the Minister of Transport or the Minister of Public Works. In view of his sincere interest over a period of many years, would the minister say when we might expect the establishment of an improved lifesaving service or a coast guard service on the Atlantic coast?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I answered a question by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond, I think it was, some time ago in regard to what Canada does in the field of lifesaving and the preservation of lives on our two coasts and the great lakes. I think if the hon. member will refer to my answer he will see what the government does at the present time. If he studies the answer I think he will agree that the service provided is adequate.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): The minister did not think so earlier.

Mr. Hees: In further answer to the hon. member for Charlotte, may I say that if upon looking up my answer to the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond regarding what is the equivalent, in Canada, of the coast guard it is considered inadequate, I shall be glad to make a more detailed statement either on my estimates or before, if hon. members wish me to do so.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ROYAL COMMISSION ON ENERGY—INQUIRY AS TO COMMENCEMENT OF SITTINGS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (St. Antoine-Westmount): May I ask the Prime Minister whether or not it has yet been determined when the royal commission on energy is to hold its first meeting?

[Mr. L'Heureux.]

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I am unable to say at the moment, but as soon as I have any information in that regard I will communicate it to the house immediately.

Mr. Coldwell: Is the chairman of this commission in Canada or is he abroad and not available?

Mr. Diefenbaker: That I do not know, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. McIlraith: All the rest of the members do.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

UNITED NATIONS EMERGENCY FORCE—POSSIBLE WITHDRAWAL OF CANADIAN PERSONNEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of reports that one nation has withdrawn her troops from the United Nations emergency force, and another has announced the intention of doing the same, would the Prime Minister advise the house whether or not Canada is contemplating any similar action?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): The answer is no. In explanation I might point out that on September 23, when I spoke to the United Nations, I stated that Canada would be willing to continue its contribution to the United Nations emergency force as long as the United Nations considered it was necessary to do so. There has been no modification in our stand, and there has been no suggestion by the United Nations that there should be any alteration in our participation.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Courtemanche in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF THE SECRETARY OF STATE

406. Departmental administration, $264,655.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, it is not unusual for a man to inquire into the budget of a woman at home, but I think you will agree it is a distinction for a member of parliament to be the first to speak on the estimates of the hon. lady who sits as a minister of the crown. I think all members of this house will join me in congratulating the minister on the presentation of her first estimates.

(Translation):

I congratulate you, Madam, upon your appointment as Secretary of State and hope that you will put all your abilities as a hard-working and genial lady at the service of your department.

(Text):

The Department of the Secretary of State, Mr. Chairman, is not too well known to the public at large, but it is an important department dealing with a variety of matters of vital interest to the administration of our country. I do believe that more time should be devoted to the discussion of the estimates of this department, and that the members of this house should know more about the functions of its several branches. I am sure that during another session the minister will welcome a more detailed inquiry.

One of the functions of the Secretary of State is to report on the civil service commission. I am always happy to hear hon. members refer to the devotion, loyalty and standard of efficiency of our civil service. I thoroughly agree, and I believe this is at least one legacy whose transfer to the new government will stand them in good stead. What the civil service requires most, Mr. Chairman, is security and fair and honest treatment in matters of wages and promotion.

I have always said that we have the finest civil service in the world, but that we should also be the model employers. There are very important matters which confront the Secretary of State and the civil service commission, and I believe the time has come when the Civil Service Act should be revised to define and enlarge, if necessary, the powers of the commission; to establish its authority in certain matters relating to employee selection, salaries and promotion.

There has always been an open space between the treasury board and the civil service commission which allows for a great deal of ball-throwing and delay to the disadvantage of the civil service. In recent days we have heard rumours that a royal commission may be named to inquire into this matter. The minister might tell us if that subject has been discussed or whether it is the government's feeling that this is the proper course to follow. On the other hand, there has been talk that the commission itself is working on amendments to the Civil Service Act. Is it the intention to present any such amendments at this or future sessions? I am of the opinion that it would be much better if the government suggested its own revision of the Civil Service Act and gave the members of this house an opportunity to inquire into the matter. I do not think we should leave to others this task, which is essentially one belonging to the government and the House of Commons.

I might inquire also, Mr. Chairman, whether or not the minister has had any recent talks with the civil service associations in connection with collective bargaining and strike rights. There was much publicity about this some time ago. I believe that much has to be done to clarify the situation in the minds of civil servants and the public at large, but our first endeavour in any event must be to preserve for the civil servants of Canada conditions of employment which are the most favourable anywhere.

I should like to be brief, Mr. Chairman, and I do not want to deal with all the branches of the minister's department, but rather than stand up repeatedly I would direct inquiries to a few subjects at this time.

Has the minister received any of the reports of the royal commission on patents, trade-marks and copyrights? If the answer is in the affirmative, when were they received and when does she propose to table them? I do not need to ask the minister about whether the patent office will be moved this year to the experimental farm. I think it is a bad move initiated under the former government, but I had great hopes that the new administration would have seen eye to eye with me, the public and interested parties.

Finally, and to be brief, I would appreciate it if the minister would tell us whether all salary adjustments have been completed in the printing bureau. I am particularly interested in the case of the pressmen.

I think the minister will agree that I have been short. She may expect that on other occasions I will have something further to say. However, I wish to repeat what I said at the beginning, namely that this department is one which I hope will be given a little bit more publicity because extremely important branches of government fall under it.

(Translation):

Mr. Chairman, I feel that it is also one of the functions of the Secretary of State to see that bilingualism is maintained in the departments of the civil service. Of late years there has been quite an improvement in this respect, but the fact remains that, on many occasions, for all sorts of valid reasons, French-speaking Canadians have to complain about the way they are being dealt with. I hope that the hon. Secretary of State will recognize the justice and rights of bilingual representation in the civil service, and will take the necessary steps to improve the present situation.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There is one question I should like to ask the Secretary of State with regard to her estimates in general. As she will recall, when the Minister of Finance tabled the estimates early in this session he indicated that the new government did not necessarily stand by all the estimates printed in the blue book. His suggestion was that some of them would be modified or that in some cases all of the money would not be spent. Would she indicate at some stage whether that observation made by the Minister of Finance applies to any of the estimates of her department or to any of the other estimates for which she is responsible? Since I have made that reference to other estimates for which she is responsible, perhaps she might indicate whether she would welcome discussion by members on such items as the estimates of the chief electoral officer and of the printing bureau now or whether she would rather wait until her main estimates are disposed of.

Mrs. Fairclough: I thought it might be better to answer a number of questions at one time, but with reference to the last question put by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre may I say that I think it would be advisable to take them according to the divisions of the department rather than all at once, because the officials of the other departments will be here at that time.

Mr. Pickersgill: As a former incumbent of the office which the hon. lady now holds I should like to join with my colleague the hon. member for Ottawa East in wishing her well during the brief stay she will be making in the department. I say that because I feel that either the government will not be there very long or the hon. lady's merits will be recognized and she will be given heavier responsibilities more in accord with her abilities.

I rose to ask only one question. When the hon. lady answers the question asked by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre I wonder whether she would give us any example of waste and extravagance that the Minister of Finance has been able to find in her department.

The Chairman: Shall item 406 carry?

Mr. Argue: No, Mr. Chairman. If we are on the first item I want to associate myself with the remarks of the hon. member for Ottawa East in extending my sincere congratulations to the hon. member for having been the first lady in this country appointed to the cabinet. Knowing her as an opposition member and finding out what a genial person she is I am sure the opposition members of this house will get along with her just as cordially now that she is in a position of much greater responsibility.

I am wondering whether she can give us any further information—I think the question has already been asked—as to when the various reports of the royal commission on patents, trade-marks, copyrights and so on will be tabled and made available to the members. I know that the commission was set up in the summer of 1954, and that apparently the report it is to make on patents will be considerably delayed. Apparently they are just starting new hearings once again. I am wondering if there is some way in which the new administration can speed up the extremely important study which the royal commission is making in this field so that we may have the benefit of the recommendations of the royal commission to the end that the injustices in relation to patents may be corrected at an early date.

I believe that this is one of the most important studies that have been made in the country over the years. There has been a great deal of interest in the whole question of patents. There is a growing feeling that current patent law is not in the best interests of the nation, and that corporations are able, by way of patent registry, to prevent competition and to prevent developments and so in an extremely serious manner retard industrial growth, expansion and innovation in this country.

I might say that already in the past a number of eminent persons have appeared before the royal commission and some of them have been sponsored by two daily newspapers from Saskatchewan. I refer to the Regina Leader-Post and the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix. Both papers have taken a great interest in this field. I believe they have rendered an important public service. From my study of their submissions to the commission I express the hope that a substantial number of the propositions they have put forward may be in the report of the royal commission and its recommendations. Even more than I did a year ago when I made a statement on this subject, I believe there is no room for restrictive practices to prevent competition and to prevent industrial growth in this country.

Having regard to our development the matter is more serious today than it was even a year ago because we know that today we are losing the race with the soviet union in a great many industrial fields. We hear that statement from experts almost daily. Now that this new administration and this new parliament are declaring war on restrictive patents and restrictive practices that have grown up around the use of patents as a method of preventing competition, I hope that the new government may be able to get action in this field at a much quicker pace than was the former administration. I would ask the minister, if she will, to make a general comment on this particular subject and problem and to say whether she can hold out the hope that at an early date the report will be received from the royal commission on the question of patents. I would also ask whether she can say that any particular study is being made in that field by the present government in the hope that the recommended action may be taken.

Mr. Irwin: Mr. Chairman, I am pleased to convey my congratulations to the hon. member on her elevation to the post she now occupies, particularly having regard to the fact that she is the first lady cabinet minister, on a dominion basis, in this country.

I have had the good fortune to obtain a list of the acts which the hon. lady has to administer. I might say that in looking at the list it does seem somewhat formidable and I know she is going to put in some long hours at night trying to catch up with the various matters which come under her jurisdiction.

I do not want to take up any time just now because we will probably soon have a few questions to ask with regard to specific items but, just as a matter of curiosity, because I am a new member here and probably also for the enlightenment of some of the other new members, I would like to know what is the union office for the protection of literary and artistic works? This is under vote 412. I do not know what is the function of this organization and would be very pleased to hear something about it. I am sure the other new members would join with me in this regard.

Mrs. Fairclough: Would the hon. member repeat his question. I did not catch his reference.

Mr. Irwin: I was asking with reference to the title of the organization under vote 412, the union office for the protection of literary and artistic works. I just wanted to know what was their peculiar function. I am asking this information for the benefit of myself and some of the other new members in this house. Later on we will probably get around to this subject and will ask some questions. I do not think, Mr. Chairman, I have anything further to say just now except that I hope we dispose of this matter easily and quickly.

Mr. Macdonald (Vancouver-Kingsway): I would like to appeal to the hon. minister, after congratulating her on her new position, with respect to a case which I think does involve a grave injustice. I believe the hon. lady's department covers the field of custodian of alien property. Under the Japanese peace treaty such property as may be seized under that treaty is retained by the custodian.

I am referring to a case which I do not think has anything to do with war reparations but does involve a point of great personal injustice. In British Columbia two Canadians of Japanese origin, Mr. and Mrs. Kubodera, lived and became Canadian citizens; the husband was naturalized. In 1924 as they had no children of their own they adopted a Japanese girl; she lived with them for 12 years. In 1936 she returned to Japan where she became a music teacher and where she still lives and teaches music.

Mr. and Mrs. Kubodero are now dead, but they expressed in their valid last will and testament a desire that their estate should pass to the girl who was considered at the time of their death to be their adopted daughter. That estate was not large; the amount presently involved is, I believe, $6,325 but under our treaty with Japan, article 14, Canada specified that it shall retain, seize and liquidate the assets of any Japanese national. Under that provision the government of Canada is holding, and perhaps has already disposed into consolidated revenue, this sum of $6,325, which in their last wishes these two people wanted to pass on to their adopted daughter.

Now I think it is reasonable to say that when the Japanese peace treaty was concluded nothing of this sort was contemplated; I do not think we wanted to seize a relatively small estate such as has been left to this girl as part of war reparations which we could not otherwise exact from Japan. She, of course, is a private individual and it can hardly be suggested that she was to blame for the war.

While we run into situations in wars of this modern age where we cannot collect reparations from a whole people, it does not seem reasonable that we should turn about, as in this case, and seize a very small estate and chalk it up as some gain we have made in the way of collecting reparations from Japan.

Therefore, I hope the minister will look into this matter and see whether, in the interests of good relations with Japan which is a very good customer of Canada and a very important nation in Asia, it is worth while to hold on to this small estate left to a girl now living in Japan.

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Chairman, I would like to associate myself with the remarks which have been made with respect to the hon. lady's elevation to the office she now holds. I would certainly be one of the first to congratulate her upon such a wonderful achievement and I am very much in agreement with the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate in that it is certain as time goes on, should the government be in office, I am very sure she will probably receive a portfolio of greater significance than the one she holds at present. Not that this one is unimportant. I do feel it is a very important portfolio since it has control over the civil service commission which is an essential part of our society. I have always made it a practice to devote a certain amount of time to discussing these particular estimates. I intend to do so again today.

With respect to the expenditures hon. members, particularly those who were here during the last parliament, will recognize they seem to increase. I have particular reference to the items for paper work. Here I notice there is quite a steep increase with respect to publications of departmental reports and other material, to which I have no doubt we will come later, but we have an increase of from $472,000 to $658,000 which is better than one-half of the total increase which the department requires for the operation of the office of Secretary of State.

This figure is a most important one and I was just wondering, when I viewed the overall chart which indicated the comparison between last year's estimates and this year's estimates, why there should be such a marked difference in this particular field as compared with the others. I notice the other increase comes under civil service which accounts for approximately the balance of the change, a matter of $140,000 under civil service salaries and wages, making a total difference of about $320,000 or so in the actual estimates.

Now it does seem to me that this matter of the use of paper and stationery is a most important one in the operation of our governmental departments. I have frequently wondered, when I come on occasion to the House of Commons very early in the morning and find a heaping cartful of newspapers, exactly what does become of the paper. Is it used for some particular purpose? Does the government realize anything on the sale of it; is it consigned to an incinerator and burned or just what does become of the paper from this building alone, much less the Department of the Secretary of State? I would hope that the hon. lady in replying later would have something to say on this question and if the time permits and I should be in the house I will probably have more to say on the civil service and the operations of that part of the department. More particularly I would like information on this question having to do with paper.

Another question that has given me considerable concern is the Canada Elections Act and the part having to do with the operation of our elections. I will have certain recommendations and suggestions to make with respect to that at a later time, some of which might cost us a little more money but all of which I hope will result in a little more efficiency in getting our electoral lists more completely arranged so we do not have so many names that should be on the voters list omitted by mistake. However, I will reserve my remarks in that respect for a later time.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I simply rise to congratulate the minister on her appointment and to ask for some simple information. It seems such a short time ago that we were colleagues together behind the curtain on this side of the house—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Herridge: —and it has taken very few months for changes to have come about. I do sincerely congratulate the Secretary of State and trust she finds much happiness and achievement in her new position.

The question I wish to raise is this. We all know that if a celebration of the 50th or 60th wedding anniversary of a constituent is brought to the attention of the Prime Minister he is usually kind enough to recognize that occasion by sending a congratulatory telegram to the persons concerned. The former prime minister was always kind enough to send the member who brought to his notice these very important events a copy of any message that he might send, I presume in order that the member would know the matter had received attention. Would the Secretary of State when answering questions inform the house what is the procedure in these instances at the present time?

Mr. Cardin: Mr. Chairman, I would also like to extend my congratulations to the minister and I think I would not be far wrong if I were to say that she is the most gracious Secretary of State Canada has ever had.

The problem to which I would like to refer has to do with translations. Although I realize that the problem of translating government documents can be extremely difficult and we must expect there would be some delay in the translation of English documents into French, it has occurred to me there have been instances where the delay in translating publications has been rather lengthy. I am more particularly aware of the delays that have occurred in the Department of External Affairs where a delay of two or three months sometimes occurred before the French translation of English documents was available. I must say that while I was parliamentary assistant to the Secretary of State for External Affairs I did try to get an increase in the number of French translators in that department. I must also say I received a most sympathetic hearing from the officials of the Department of the Secretary of State but I am not sure whether my efforts were rewarded in any way nor am I sure that there was an increase in the translators for that particular staff. The problem that exists in the Department of External Affairs I think also exists in other departments and I would urgently ask the minister if she would consider making a check on the delays that occur in the translation of government documents.

Mr. Leduc (Verdun): Mr. Chairman, I would like to pay tribute, as a gallant Frenchman should, to the first Canadian woman to achieve cabinet rank, the Secretary of State. There is no denying that Canadian women will be well represented in this gracious lady and for this the Prime Minister deserves commendation. It was Young who wrote, "He who wishes a woman ill must let her act as she pleases", but the Liberal members harbour no such ill feelings for the Secretary of State. She will therefore allow us to criticize such legislation and estimates as she might bring down. Like Sheridan, we in the Liberal party recognize that the wisdom of men depends on the cultivation of the spirit of women. Let the Conservative government take heed of this useful counsel.

May I recommend to the Secretary of State two things. The purpose of these recommendations will have for their effect the amendment of the Canada Elections Act, first so that it will compel all candidates to divulge the address of their real domicile. The second recommendation is to fix the fee of enumerators who should be paid according to the number of persons duly registered on their lists. Thank you, Mr. Chairman.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I shall try to answer at least some of the questions which have been put to me. First of all may I thank hon. members for their kindness and for their compliments which I truly appreciate. I hope that in the length of time I have already been in this house hon. members have come to realize that I am not averse to criticism at all. Indeed, I welcome it and I trust I will have the wisdom to take an objective view of whatever criticisms are levelled at my department.

Dealing now with the questions which were asked by the hon. member for Ottawa East. He first of all made some inquiries with regard to the civil service commission. I quite agree with him that the government of Canada should be the model employer. However, with reference to the establishment of a royal commission no such thought has entered the mind of the government to date but the civil service commission itself is considering all aspects of the relationship of the employer to the employee in all departments where it is concerned. If it is found necessary to amend the act to bring about a better relationship I can assure the hon. member this government will be glad to welcome suggestions which are made to it in that respect.

The hon. member for Ottawa East also asked what progress had been made with regard to the institution of collective bargaining. I might say he knows as much about it as I do because I think everything that has happened to date has been reported in the newspapers and even some of the things that have not happened to date have already appeared in the newspapers. In making that last remark I have reference in particular to a much publicized meeting which was prophesied by the press and which has not yet taken place but which will take place in the near future.

With reference to the royal commission on patents, a matter which was brought up both by the hon. member for Ottawa East and the hon. member for Assiniboia, I would point out that on October 28 I answered a question which the hon. member for Assiniboia put to me with reference to the availability of these reports. At that time I told him that the report on copyrights was ready in English but a final draft in French was still in the process of being prepared. That is still the situation. I expect to have it shortly but in the meantime it has not come to hand. The hon. member for Ottawa East asked me when it would be tabled. I can assure him that it will be tabled just as soon as it is available.

Since I am speaking of the royal commission, I might refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Assiniboia. I agree with him that there is every urgency in the matter of these reports. The commission was given a tremendous task and it must be borne in mind that the members of the commission have other duties as well as those imposed upon them by reason of this particular commission.

While it is true that the sittings on patents will be resumed in March, and it may seem to the hon. member that that is quite a long way off and that the report will be delayed by reason thereof, I should like to point out that we expect to have the report on industrial designs shortly. It is thought well to take this step by step and table the reports as they are ready rather than hold up all of the reports until such time as the complete result of the deliberations has been printed. I shall be very glad to inquire whether there is any way in which this work can be speeded up.

Since he asked me to comment on the necessity for an early report, I might say I agree with him that it is in the interests of industrial growth that the matter of patents should be examined carefully; that the recommendations of the commission should be in the hands of the government with a view to taking such steps as may be feasible and desirable to protect our industrial life and the works of our inventors.

The hon. member for Ottawa East spoke about the move of the patent office and practically answered himself. This move was undertaken before this government came into power. In fact the plans were so far advanced that there was very little that could be done about it. Accordingly the move is proceeding or plans for the move are proceeding. Of course there are different opinions amongst those who are required to use the patent office and I can only say I hope that they will find they will be much better accommodated in their new quarters.

The hon. member's question with regard to the printing bureau perhaps could be answered by saying that some time ago I received a request for a conference with those concerned on the matter of salaries and wages. Probably the hon. member for Ottawa East had specific reference to what is now known as a time lag in the adoption of rates after negotiations by printing employees in other centres. I immediately answered the letter and said I would be very pleased to see those representatives at an early date and, to my surprise, they said they were not ready. Maybe they were not used to getting such a fast reply but in any event they were not ready and I am now waiting until such time as they are prepared to meet with me.

I assure the hon. member that I too would hope that bilingualism would grow in the civil service. Of course he understands as well as any that there are many parts of Canada where it is not necessary and where, even if it were a requirement of the service that a person should be bilingual, by reason of having no place in which to practice the second language it would soon fall into disuse. I know that from personal experience. It is unfortunate that the acquisition of a second language does not always bring with it the opportunity for its use. I could wish it were true in my own case.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre asked particularly with respect to the individual items and the amounts which it was expected to save in each department or on each vote. Mr. Chairman, one of the first matters that came to my attention was the expenditures which were authorized for this department—maybe "authorized" is not the word because just now we are seeking the authorization, but the estimates which had been proposed for this department. It took a few weeks to investigate them and by the time I had the reports all in I found to my surprise that the largest part of the estimates either had been apportioned or had been committed pending the approval of this house. So that in this department, although we expect to make a saving, I do not think I can pinpoint it to the extent of saying so many thousands of dollars on one vote or another. I can assure my hon. friend that I am keeping an accountant's eye on the amounts which are appropriated for the various votes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Perhaps the minister will permit a question at this point. It is clear, is it, that she will be asking the house to vote in full all of the amounts set opposite the items in her estimates?

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, this is a matter to which I gave a considerable amount of thought and, having regard to the commitments which have already been undertaken by the department, I think that in so far as my own department is concerned it would be advisable to ask for the votes as they stand and then effect what economies we can rather than try to cut regardless of the requirements of the department and then be forced to ask for some of that cut-back in supplementary estimates at a later date.

The hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond made reference to the rather formidable list of acts which are administered by this department and said that he expected I would spend long hours in perusal of my duties. I can assure him I have already spent long hours in that pursuit and I feel that I shall spend many more before I have a complete grasp of the many and various matters which are the responsibility of the Secretary of State.

To answer specifically the question which he asked with reference to Vote 412, the union office for the protection of literary and artistic works is a copyright union office, and this is the contribution of the people of Canada to this international office.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Kingsway brought up the matter of the claim of this young Japanese woman who has been unable to claim her inheritance by reason of confiscation. I might say to him that, regardless of the sympathy which each and every one of us has for individual persons, this is a principle which has been adopted by all countries. It is not Canada alone which has adopted this principle, and even if we wanted to it would be almost impossible to differentiate between claimants. What is right for one claimant is right for another without regard to the amount involved. It is unfortunate that as a result of wars many innocent people suffer not only financially but also in health and in other ways. I am sorry I cannot give the hon. member any encouragement to think that in this particular case anything can be done other than what has already been done.

The hon. member for New Westminster asked about the increase in the amount expended for paper. I think the hon. member has had some connection with the paper business and he probably knows that prices have gone up, as have the prices of a great many things. Not only have the prices of paper gone up but the prices of printing and otherwise processing, such as the making of envelopes and so on, have increased as wages and other costs have increased. I fancy it would be a study in itself to determine to what extent this accounts for the increase in the appropriation for paper.

But I might say to the hon. member that there are many ways in which an eye is kept on the amounts expended. For one thing, the organization and methods division of the civil service commission is constantly studying ways and means of effecting economies in staff and paperwork. There is also, as the committee knows, a suggestion awards board which receives suggestions from civil servants, many of which have been acted upon with resultant savings to the government. The Queen's Printer, I may say, also has the authority to question what he considers to be any abnormal requisitions and sometimes he does just that. All of these practices are pursued by the department. I would be glad to see if I can get a more factual reply to his question, but I believe that in general that fairly well answers it.

Mr. Hahn: Would the minister permit a question? The reason I mentioned the matter was that it has to do with the publication of departmental reports and other materials. I note on checking the summary of standard objects of expenditure and special categories that this department, taking this year compared with last year, is the only one where there is such a huge increase. For example, in the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys there is a drop from $216,000 to $179,000. In the case of the unemployment insurance commission there is a drop from $164,000 to $153,000. In the case of the Post Office Department, which usually has a good number of publications, there is a drop from $150,000 to $144,000. I was wondering whether there were many more separate publications this year compared with former years.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, just as a matter of speculation I would think it would be apparent that as the country grows and more people are in the country more and more reports will be required by more and more people and consequently the numbers will increase year by year. I realize that is not a complete answer, but in so far as any other departments are concerned no doubt the hon. member can get a reply with respect to those departments when their estimates are before the house because there may be particular reasons for a department having an increase or a decrease. There may be special reports and so on of which I would not know.

In answer to the question of the hon. member for Richelieu-Vercheres, may I say that I will be very happy indeed to check into the delay in translations. Of course, as the member knows, at different seasons of the year different problems beset the bureau. When the house is in session there is a great deal of work for the house and its committees which might at some period of the year delay other work. But in so far as is possible the bureau does try to have translations available as quickly as it can. If there are any specific instances the hon. member has in mind about which he would like to inform my office, we will see what we can do to speed them up.

Mr. Cardin: Perhaps the minister might be able to answer whether, for instance, there has been an increase in the translation staff of the Department of External Affairs, which I considered to be understaffed.

Mrs. Fairclough: I can say to the hon. member that so far as I am aware there has been no increase in the translation staff of the Department of External Affairs. If it were required by that department I believe they would have to make a request. The Department of the Secretary of State would hardly suggest to them that we should provide them with extra translation staff if they had not asked for them.

Mr. Cardin: Perhaps the minister may find in the records that the Department of External Affairs did ask for an increase in the translation staff. As a matter of fact, I tried very hard to get a couple of extra translators last year.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am informed there was an increase a year ago for the Department of External Affairs. There has been none this year.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mrs. Fairclough: Just a minute, Mr. Chairman. I still have a couple of answers to give. The hon. member for Verdun asked some questions and with his permission I will wait until we reach the estimates of the chief electoral officer before answering them.

Mr. Pickersgill: Is the hon. lady not going to answer my question? I think it is the only one she did not answer.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am sorry, Mr. Chairman, I thought I had answered them all.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would be happy to repeat the question. It was a very simple one. My question was, would the hon. lady enumerate the examples of waste and extravagance which the Minister of Finance found in her department?

Mrs. Fairclough: I thought I answered that when I answered the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Pickersgill: The answer is none then.

Mrs. Fairclough: No, I would not say that. I told him, as I tell the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate, that we expect to make some savings but at the time that I came into the department the funds were pretty well allotted.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the minister has not realized that the Minister of Finance has said over and over again that he had already discovered many examples of waste and extravagance, and we on this side of the house are naturally very curious to have some specific examples.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am quite well aware of what has been said, Mr. Chairman, and the hon. member's curiosity is evident.

Mr. Pickersgill: And unsatisfied.

Mr. Herridge: I am now the only member whose question the lady minister has not answered.

Mrs. Fairclough: I apologize to the hon. member. With regard to congratulatory messages on wedding anniversaries, it is possible to obtain a message from Her Majesty the Queen on the occasion of 60th wedding anniversaries and one hundredth birthdays. I believe also that if citizens are long-lived enough to go beyond those years it is possible at intervals, such as 65th or 70th wedding anniversaries, to secure messages. These should be channelled through the Department of the Secretary of State. It is the practice in the department to inform the Prime Minister also of such outstanding occurrences and I believe he usually adds his congratulations as well. Is that the information the hon. member requires?

[Mrs. Fairclough.]

Mr. Hahn: Referring to the question I posed to the honourable lady earlier, I would draw to her attention that possibly she misinterpreted my remarks. It appears that in this instance, in so far as departmental publications are concerned, we have a 40 per cent increase, which is possibly the greatest increase for any single department. The increase in other departments seems to be only about 5 per cent or 10 per cent. I am fully aware that there are probably more publications issued by this department, but I do not think the price of paper has increased to such an extent that it would account for the full increase. I am wondering, therefore, if there are many new publications or is this possibly one of those instances in which the Minister of Finance is going to make one of those savings about which the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate was so interested. Has that figure been reduced or is the $658,000 the figure with which the department intends to carry on?

Further in respect to the Department of the Secretary of State alone, I would point out to the minister that we have one increase that is probably the result of the increase in the price of paper, which I fully recognize has occurred. I draw her attention to the fact that in the case of office stationery, supplies, equipment and furnishings, we have an increase of $2,000 or about 2 per cent, yet as I indicated earlier there is a 40 per cent increase in so far as publications are concerned.

Mrs. Fairclough: I am sorry but I did not hear the last part of the hon. member's remarks.

Mr. Hahn: In the case of office stationery, supplies and equipment, we have an increase from $96,000 to $98,000, which is about 2 per cent. Then, under publications and departmental reports, we note there is an increase from $472,000 to $658,000, which is approximately 40 per cent. I am saying that this increase must represent new publications, and if so would she be prepared to tell us what they are?

Mrs. Fairclough: These figures are slightly misleading, because in the year 1956-57 there was a supplementary estimate of some $300,000 which brought the amount up to $770,000 instead of the $472,000 shown here. There is actually, therefore, a slight decrease, and that is one of the reasons for the change in the appropriation asked for this year. In addition, one of the reasons why this amount has increased so startlingly is because of the number of patents that are being printed.

PATENT AND COPYRIGHT OFFICE

410. Administration division, $122,670.

Mr. Small: I should like to ask the minister about the patents and copyright office. During the last two years there has been a considerable amount of complaint about the backlog of patents in the department. Last year I asked the minister about this backlog and he reported that considerable success had been achieved in catching up with the backlog. It was stated also that the department was being reorganized. It was admitted that there was a shortage of staff and a shortage of space which they were trying to rectify. I should like the minister to say a word about this backlog and the improvement being made in this condition and the increasing of staff to take care of it.

Mrs. Fairclough: One of the difficulties in the department has been the trouble we have had in recruiting engineers to examine inventions. Probably I could give the hon. member some statistics for which he asked with regard to the backlog.

The total number of cases pending as of March 31, 1956 was 72,608. In the ensuing year, new applications received amounted to 21,762. The number of applications allowed in that period amounted to 16,400; the applications which were abandoned, 3,941; leaving a total number of applications pending in the office as of March 31, 1957 of 74,029. This represents an increase over the number pending in 1956 of 1,421.

Mr. Small: Has there been any increase in the floor space allotted to this department, for which they were looking some time ago?

Mrs. Fairclough: Well, that was one of the matters brought up by the hon. member for Ottawa East. There is a move contemplated but it has not yet taken place. It is expected that somewhat more space will be available after the move has been accomplished.

PUBLIC PRINTING AND STATIONERY

346. Departmental administration $561,934.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I wonder if the minister would comment further on the matter of adjusting wage rates at the printing bureau, and in particular would she say whether she or the government is giving consideration to asking parliament to amend one of the provisions of the Public Printing and Stationery Act? I have in mind what experience has proven to be a rather ambiguous provision, the one which relates the wages of the employees of the printing bureau to the rates paid in the printing industry in Ottawa, Toronto and Montreal. This provision is generally regarded by the employees at the printing bureau as some sort of protection, but in practice it has not worked out that way.

As I recall it, though I have not the wording of the section in front of me, it says that the wages of employees at the printing bureau shall not be greater than the wages paid in the trade in Ottawa, Toronto and Montreal. That wording permits them to be less. I wonder if consideration is being given to clearing up this ambiguity and making it a little more mandatory, if I might use that word, that the rates paid employees at the printing bureau or in the greater Ottawa area shall be the rates paid in those three metropolitan centres.

Mrs. Fairclough: So far as I know, Mr. Chairman, that has been the case. The problem which has been presented over some considerable period of time I believe has been one of the retarded action on behalf of a certain number of employees where their wage rates are related to those which are the result of negotiations in the city of Montreal. In that regard, I should like to say that this is the very question which I agreed to discuss with the employees of the bureau. They are not yet ready to discuss it. If and when they are ready I would be very happy to discuss it with them.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am sure that after one of the linotype operators sets the minister's words tonight in the government printing bureau it will not be long before that meeting will be held.

Mrs. Fairclough: The date is already set.

Mr. McPhillips: This vote involves the officer known as the Queen's printer. I know that the minister's department is concerned to some extent with protocol; in fact the minister is custodian of the great seal of Canada. I am sure that she is concerned with the history and traditions of the nation. For nearly a century, in fact, for well over a century if you want to go back to the history of the provinces of Canada—the Queen's printer has always been known as "Printer to the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty" or "Printer to the King's Most Excellent Majesty", depending on the reigning sovereign. While it is true that the title set out in the statute is simply "Queen's Printer and Controller of Stationery", that has always been in the statute. That was not changed. To my knowledge it was only concurrently with the issues of the statutes of Canada in the second session of 1951 that this time-honoured title of "Printer to the King's Most Excellent Majesty" was corrupted down to simply the words "King's Printer". I think that is a shame. I think the time-honoured title belongs to the history and traditions of this particular office and I am going to recommend to the minister that this practice be put a stop to forthwith and that the traditional title be used for all government publications.

An hon. Member: An earth-shaking recommendation.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. member could do that when he dismisses all the deputy ministers.

Mr. Herridge: I understand that when a department requires some printing done by the Queen's printer, an outline of the work required is submitted to the Queen's printer and then an estimate is supplied to the department. I ramble around this town quite a good deal on occasion and during the past 12 years I have had a number of discussions with quite senior officials in various departments. I find that on the question of estimates the Queen's printer is a most unpopular person with some people. I find—and I have heard this quite frequently—that a department will ask for an estimate on a certain number of publications and give the Queen's printer the specifications. Then when they get the bill it is about twice as much as the estimate given by the Queen's printer. On a number of occasions it caused quite serious embarrassment in the departments concerned because the costs were considerable and I am informed that on some occasions it actually meant the necessity of asking for a supplementary estimate.

My point is this. Surely a branch that has been in operation as long as has this branch must acquire some experience in giving estimates. I would suggest to the minister that she look into the question and ask the printing bureau to supply her with a list of estimates for work to be done by departments and also to supply her with a list of the bills submitted in relation to those estimates.

Mrs. Fairclough: If I were to procure statistics, I wonder whether the hon. member would be willing to work a few nights looking over them. I can assure you, Mr. Chairman, that that is work that should be done by the department of the Queen's printer and not by the minister. However, I have every sympathy for the departments which find their quotations to be inaccurate. If the hon. member would care to give me a list of the particular quotations which have shown the inaccuracy to which he has referred I shall be glad to try to find out the answer.

Mr. Herridge: My information is such that I can speak only in general terms. However, I can assure the minister that my information is correct.

[Mr. McPhillips.]

Mrs. Fairclough: I am assured that those instances are few and far between.

347. Purchasing, stationery and stores, $1,175,114.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There is one other question I should like to ask the hon. lady. What consideration has been given to the suggestion that has been made from time to time that the government should show its belief in the right of labour to organize by entering into collective bargaining so far as the printing bureau is concerned and also by arranging for any printing that is farmed out by the Queen's printer to be done in union shops?

Mrs. Fairclough: I should like to answer the last question first. So far as I am personally concerned, I should like to see all printing done in union shops, where it is farmed out.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. lady is now in a position of authority.

Mrs. Fairclough: Sometimes there are occasions where work is going to a given area and they find there are no union shops in that area. I grant you those occasions are rare but it does happen on occasion. Just recently there was one order which had been placed with a shop which was not able to place thereon a union label. That situation was rectified at the suggestion of the minister.

With reference to the first part of the question, in a sense collective bargaining has been established for those workmen who belong to the trades because, as was intimated earlier, in one class the rates prevailing in Toronto, Ottawa and other places take effect immediately upon the effective date of the agreement reached by the local printers with the trades concerned in their own areas. That is also true of another group whose rates of pay depend upon the negotiations which are successfully completed in the city of Montreal. When you go beyond those classes, I think the matter is one which falls within the purview of the civil service commission where they are considering, along with the government, the whole field of employee relations.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask the hon. lady one other question? I ask this without prejudice to the position I have already taken, namely that in my view all government printing should be done in union shops. Pending the day when all printing is done on a union basis is there any reason why such printing as is now done in union shops could not carry the union label?

Mrs. Fairclough: So far as I know, there might be the odd instance where it could not carry the union label. I think each case would have to be decided on its own merits, depending upon the type of work that was done.

An hon. Member: What type?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Somebody is going to get close to a pun if he does not watch out. May I ask the minister if she will give consideration—I do not ask her for an answer now; I would rather she gave consideration to the matter and came up with a better answer later on—to the possibility of a directive being issued that wherever work is being done in a union shop that work should carry the union label?

Mrs. Fairclough: I shall be glad to do so.

727. Plant equipment and replacements—further amount required, $148,774.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Perhaps the hon. lady would indicate the reason for this supplementary item of $148,774.

Mrs. Fairclough: Yes. It is largely occasioned by a carryover from the previous year. In some instances equipment is ordered.

In some instances equipment is ordered and the appropriate amount is shown in the estimates. The end of the fiscal year arrives but delivery of the equipment has not been made. In the meantime the estimates for the next year have already been prepared, but this equipment having been expected within the previous fiscal year has not been included and when it does come in in the following year, it is necessary to ask for supplementary amounts with which to pay for it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Then may I ask if the printing bureau, in view of the amounts involved here, is now fully equipped according to the plans?

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I think the general plan of equipment is pretty well completed, yes, but of course from time to time there are always replacements.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And improvements?

Mrs. Fairclough: Oh yes.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF ELECTORAL OFFICER—

60. Salaries and expenses of office, $73,115.

Mr. Howe: Mr. Chairman, I have a word to say on this item with respect to advance polls at election time. The act was amended in 1951 but I notice that the people who are allowed to vote at advance polls are still covered by a very narrow list which takes in commercial travellers, fishermen, those employees employed upon the railroads, airships and other modes of transportation.

In this day and age when there are people working on construction, who leave their homes early Monday morning and do not get back until late Friday night, I do feel they should come under the same jurisdiction as commercial travellers. There are also people who work many miles away from their homes, who leave in the early morning and are not able to get back at night in sufficient time to vote on election day. I am just wondering whether the minister and the officials are giving any consideration to amending this act so that the categories of those who are entitled to vote on election day may be broadened.

Mr. Winch: I would like to add a few words with respect to this question of the advance polls. I realize it will probably require a change in the act but, speaking as a member from the city of Vancouver which is the source of supply of hundreds, if not thousands, of workers who actually work out of town, I wonder if it would not be possible for consideration to be given by the minister to extending the regulations with regard to advance polls to a far greater extent. I can assure the hon. minister that in British Columbia there are many thousands of people who are disenfranchised because of the limitations of the advance polls and I do hope that very serious consideration will be given to an enlargement of that section of the act.

There are a number of matters which could be raised under this vote but I merely wish to raise two questions. One is with regard to a question asked quite a while ago by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to which an answer may have been given. If so, I regret raising the matter again, but it is of importance and I would like a comment from the minister. In Vancouver I was informed during the last general election—and I am sure this is the case in respect to many other members in British Columbia—time after time that it was becoming almost impossible for union shops to compete and do the work in the preparation of the voters' lists and other material required in an election by the federal government because there had not been a change in the price that could be paid for such work.

Now in view of the statements made by the minister as recently as a few moments ago, I hope she is now in a position—bearing in mind that she is one who has in the past spoken so strongly in favour of the trade union movement—to give us an indication that, prior to the next election, the necessary changes will be made so that the union shops may be able to do the work required in the printing trades in a general election.

One other most important point, I think, to a great many if not all of the members of this house and to all candidates in all parties, is the assurance that those who are entitled to vote will know exactly where to vote. Under the present policy—indeed it may be the law—with respect to federal elections, after the lists of enumeration are closed the returning officer sends around a tear sheet upon which the voter's name appears. Now the fact that that tear sheet is sent to every person whose name is going to appear on the voters' list must be a mighty expensive proposition. This is a notification to the majority of the people that their names are on the list but it has been my very definite experience—and I think it must have been the experience of others—that most people upon receiving this tear sheet of the voters' list see their names thereon, feel happy and then the tear sheet goes into the wastepaper basket or the furnace. They do not notice that on the upper right hand corner of the tear sheet it tells them in very small print, that they vote at this or an approximate address. I do not know what has been the experience of the hon. minister but I do know the experience in my own constituency is that the phones are busy all day long with inquiries as to where to vote. We ask if they have not received a notification that they were on the voters' lists and they say "Yes". Then we ask "Did you not notice in the upper right hand corner it tells you where to vote?" The answer is no.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that in an act of parliament making provision for an election every care should be taken to ensure that the person knows where he votes. I can only speak provincially so far as British Columbia is concerned, but under our British Columbia provincial elections act no tear sheet is sent out at all. The returning officer sends to all those whose names are on the voters' list a post card telling them where they should vote. Now every person on receipt of that card knows he is on the voters' list and also knows exactly where to vote.

I would hope that it might be possible for something of that nature to be followed through on a federal basis but if it cannot be done immediately without a change in the act then I would suggest to the minister, through you, Mr. Chairman, that a change be made—and surely this does not require any amendment to the act—on the notification on the tear sheet in print of such size that the voter receiving this notification will know that this is the information as to where he votes and will hang onto it. This action cannot be taken by the returning officer because I took it up with the returning officer in Vancouver East and he told me he had exactly the same thought. He tried to have the size of print increased in order that it would be brought to the attention of the recipient and he was told he could not change the size of the print. I am certain the minister wants everyone to know just where he should vote and I would ask if she could arrange to have the chief electoral officer give authority to the returning officers to put the notification as to where a person votes in larger print than it has ever appeared in the past. I see no reason why this cannot be done.

There are many other things that could be spoken about on the subject of the Canada Elections Act but I will rest content with these three matters I raised hoping that something will be done in the near future.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Chairman, in view of the fact the question of advance polls has been raised I would like to offer a suggestion to the minister which I am sure has been brought to her attention previously and that is the suggestion which has been raised by the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities for the last four years that some uniformity be attempted in the regulations as far as continuity of advance polls is concerned. I am not suggesting the act should be changed in order to satisfy municipal or provincial representations but they have presented very comprehensive briefs on the question of continuity and also on the question of flexibility which several hon. members have raised, both of which suggestions are valid.

Having experience in the province from which I come where such uniformity has now been reached it might well be that the minister will take this into consideration in view of the remarks that have been made because of course there has been confusion with regard to advance polls which has created a problem in the past.

Before resuming my seat I would point out that my name being what it is I certainly have no objection to the name Smith being kept on the sample ballot.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Chairman, I know we have progressed far into the estimates of the Department of the Secretary of State but I would just like to add my words of congratulation to those that have been extended to the hon. lady on her elevation to the office of Secretary of State. I was impressed with the evident change in tone which has characterized the statements of various members as they have asked questions and made their contributions in this debate and it occurred to me that if we ever reached the point where a lady headed up each and every department of government this house would be a very quiet place.

Mr. Byrne: It would be all lady members.

Mr. Patterson: Many of the caustic comments would be omitted from our discussion and in fact it might even get monotonous at times.

We are now considering the estimates relating to the office of the chief electoral officer and several of the points I had intended to raise have already been raised by other hon. members, for instance the question of advance poll. I believe that the purpose should be to try and make it feasible for as many as possible of our citizens to vote in the various elections. If it requires changes in the act or in the regulations those changes should be effected because, as I have said, I believe that every qualified voter in the country should have the opportunity, shall I say with the least possible inconvenience, to cast his or her ballot in the elections that are held. I understand there are just certain areas designated under the Canada Elections Act where advance polls can be set up. There are also very close lines drawn as to who can vote at advance polls. I would suggest that consideration be given, not only to increasing the number of advance polls and placing them strategically across the country but also to extending the categories of those qualified to vote at advance polls.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Why should there be any restrictions?

Mr. Patterson: I am being modest in my request. There are several other matters I would like to mention and one is the system of enumerating as it is now conducted. I have not any plan to offer in this particular respect but I believe the system of enumerating could be vastly improved in many areas. For instance, in the last election we found there were whole blocks of residences entirely left out. I think I am safe in saying we found there were hundreds of eligible voters whose names did not appear on the lists at all. This may have been due to errors in human judgment but there were also instances where the names were given to the enumerators and then when a check was made at the time of the sitting of the court of revision the names were still not on the list and in some instances when those very same individuals went to vote on election day they found their names were still left off the list. I do not know just what can be done, whether it is a matter of enforcing the regulations or what other means can be employed to correct the situation, but I believe some attention should be given to these seeming irregularities in the matter of enumerating.

Another problem is the posting of voters lists. This question was raised during the last campaign when we discovered that some of the voters lists were nailed up on trees in different places and many were defaced possibly by children or by the weather. The lists had become almost impossible to read and in some cases they had disappeared altogether. It was suggested that when this particular section governing the posting of voters lists was placed in the act it had reference to the days when there was a common meeting place in each community perhaps under some great tree and the lists were placed there in what was possibly the most convenient place to find them. I would suggest that the voters lists be posted somewhere where they will be protected from the elements and where some supervision could be given regarding the condition in which they are kept.

The court of revision should be set up in perhaps the most populated area of a community. As it is now, I believe that those who are responsible for the court of revision can set up the office possibly in their homes, but in some instances that home may be two miles from the most thickly populated area of that community or of that section. Therefore the people from the populated area have to make a journey of one or two miles and perhaps turn off to a side road somewhere and look around in the dark to find the place where they are to check their names. I suggest that some attention be given to this particular matter as well.

Then, there is the matter of the political affiliations of the candidates on the ballots. I know this has been turned down. It was turned down by the previous administration on the basis that we were elected as individuals and not as members of parties. I think we ought to be at least realistic. I know we can possibly look back and say, yes, that was so; but after all we have to keep up with the times in some respects. It would save a lot of confusion if the political affiliation of the candidate were included on the ballot. This would be of tremendous importance in the event of two, or perhaps even three, candidates having the same name and in some instances the same initials as well.

Therefore I make these suggestions and recommend that consideration be given to some of these matters with a view to eliminating some of these irregularities and in other respects bringing our election act more in line with present day realities.

Mr. Peters: I also would like to congratulate the minister. I was afraid for some time last year that the first lady cabinet minister of the government was going to come from my riding. I am quite pleased to congratulate the present incumbent.

I would like to mention the matter of printing. Over the years we have seen where the printing for elections has been done, and where a vast quantity is given out at one time, the system of patronage is quite often applied. This means that while there are a number of printing shops in an area which could do this kind of printing, because a particular printing company is a friend of the party that has the giving of this patronage the contracts for printing are sometimes done on that basis. In a number of instances it works a great deal of hardship. I can recall one printing shop that did the printing for three ridings, and the time limit had been reached before the printing was available. On a number of occasions the time had expired before the printing was done. The problem was raised in my riding in the last election. I think the printing could be spread around not only because I do not believe in the principle of patronage in this matter or in anything else but because it would facilitate getting the printing done a lot sooner and would meet the requirements of the time limit.

I have another matter I should like to discuss, namely the voting of service personnel. I had the unfortunate privilege this year of being able to see all the ballots of the service personnel in my particular riding. I do not expect that to happen again, but it did give us the opportunity of seeing some of the things that were wrong with the system that we are now using in service personnel voting.

There is a time in December when the service personnel name the riding from which they come. When that is done I think lists should be made available to the candidates on the same basis as the voters' lists from municipalities are made available. We find that it is almost impossible for a candidate to find out not only the areas that the service personnel are in but also how many service personnel are in a particular riding. In most instances we do not come within 100 per cent of guessing how many service personnel there may be in a particular riding.

In discussions with some of the service personnel we find that there are a lot of things to be desired in the methods they use for taking the votes of the service personnel. We are told that—obviously the ballots that I saw and the areas from which they come bear this out—some particular areas are well represented. A large vote comes from them. Other areas have no votes coming from them. A directive should be issued to the officers in charge of voting along with information for election purposes and all the service personnel should be given the same kind of information as to who are their candidates and the ridings in which they are registered, together with all other pertinent information.

In a provincial election I had the opportunity to visit one of our large army camps at election time. In that particular camp the commanding officer informed me that he had no interest whatsoever in elections; he was not going to get mixed up in them, and no election discussion would take place at his particular camp. He would have been quite happy if they had declared all the service personnel out of bounds. The result is that one particular party who has a friend in that camp reaps the advantage. There will be a large vote.

We have examined the vote in this particular instance. The information which was given was in most instances one-sided. At the end of the year, in December, when the list is compiled—and I understand it can be changed only once a year—they should be made available. If the particular lists, with the number of people and the names of the people, can be made available, as is done in municipal elections, and still meet security requirements then that should be done.

Perhaps I should tell the committee why I saw the ballots in the last federal election. There was a recount and obviously we had the opportunity to examine them and find out from what areas they came.

There is another problem that enters into the situation when there is an army camp in a certain area. The service personnel themselves are listed as being registered in whatever district or riding they choose. As I said, they make their choice at the end of the year. But if they have their wives with them at the camp, then the wives must vote in the riding in which the camp is located. That in turn works another hardship because, if there is no method—and I think there obviously should be some method—of getting information to those people who are voting in that riding—in this instance the wives of the service personnel—hon. members can see the difficulties which arise.

In a recent election I was informed in Camp Borden that there were going to be no public meetings; no posters were to be allowed and there was going to be no literature distributed, although at that time there were 700 women in the riding who were eligible to vote. Therefore, I think some consideration should be given to changing the act. If we believe—and I think we all do—that our service personnel have the right to vote, then I think they have the right to know who they are to vote for. They should be given some information and that should not be just the prerogative of certain candidates. All candidates should be entitled to that information, and I think the women who are in the riding should be treated as other citizens in that riding, and they should be allowed to hold public meetings, or whatever the candidates decide amongst themselves should be done.

Mr. Small: I should like to add to the suggestion made by the hon. member for Fraser Valley with regard to the posting of voters' lists. He brought to the attention of the committee that these lists are exposed to the weather and are subject to being torn up by children or damaged in other ways with the result that they may not be complete. When the tear sheet is sent out people are notified that they are already on the list but there are always some people who are missed. To overcome that I suggest that there should be some central place in each subdivision where the lists can be seen. The location should be advertised and, if necessary, certain hours in the day should be set and someone should be there to give further information if it is needed.

I think it is a very necessary part of the enumeration process that the lists be posted and what I have suggested will overcome many of the difficulties that have been encountered during an election. It is a simple thing. It would only cost a little extra. These lists are exposed to the weather and subject to the hazard of being pulled off the post. The only way we can overcome that is to have the lists available under cover at some central spot.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, while I am sure the majority of members recognize that we can improve the election act by a number of amendments, I am also sure that for two reasons we can be proud of the way in which elections are conducted generally in Canada. The first is the sense of fair play that exists among the Canadian people. The second is the excellent and efficient senior officers who administer the act.

In view of the thousands who are denied the opportunity to vote under the present act, I support wholeheartedly the representations made by previous speakers regarding certain amendments, particularly with respect to an extension of the qualifications in the case of those who are entitled to vote at advance polls. My constituency is one of those that are particularly affected by the restrictions in the present act. We have large numbers of lumbermen and miners who have to work some distance away from home.

It is the practice in large sections of my constituency for loggers and lumbermen to travel anywhere from 20 to 50 miles to work and to return during the week ends, often by water transportation, sometimes by air or over rough mountain roads. Quite frequently a man returns for the week end or for a few days to the village in which he resides and then has to leave on Sunday to be back at work for Monday morning. Because it is not possible for these lumbermen and loggers to return at any reasonable expense for election day they are denied their right to vote under the present act. The same situation applies to a lesser number of miners in my constituency, particularly those who are working in small mines at high levels and in isolated places.

But we have a particular situation in the interior of British Columbia that I want to bring to the minister's attention, and I presume it exists in other forested portions of Canada. Large numbers of men can be denied the opportunity to vote on election day should they be called away to fight a forest fire. To illustrate, Mr. Chairman, some three or four days before the last election on June 10 a large fire started in the Big Bend country of the Columbia river.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Who started it?

Mr. Herridge: I think it was started by lightning at high levels. In order to meet such a fire menace in very large and valuable stands of timber it is often necessary to mobilize several hundred men and get them to the scene of the fire as soon as possible. In our district it is nothing unusual for all the mills to be closed down and anywhere from 100 to 300 men quickly mobilized and transported 100 or 125 miles. This fire was 175 miles away from the home towns and villages of the men who were gathered together to fight it. Here they were taken away on Thursday or Friday without the opportunity to vote at advance polls.

They were faced with this question. These men value their votes. These are men who should have the right to vote like all other Canadians should. Under the law they would have been able to leave the scene of the fire but it would take so long that if they demanded their right under the act to have the opportunity to vote they would have only been able to work about half a day and then return to their home towns in order to vote. Fire is a very serious thing in our district because the economy depends to a great extent on the forest industry, the sawmills and so on. These men decided to go to the fire. The heads of several lumber companies concerned telephoned me and also telephoned the returning officer but I said that the law was the law and we could not get around it under these circumstances. I did promise to bring the matter to the attention of the house at the first opportunity.

A large number of men were mobilized to fight this fire and they proceeded to the Big Bend country in the upper reaches of the Columbia. Happily the weather turned mild and there was some rain at high levels. By working like the very devil indeed they were able to put the fire out by Saturday night and they arrived back at their home villages in time to vote on Monday, fortunately for me.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And for them.

Mr. Herridge: And for them, I trust. Anyway, Mr. Chairman, I bring this matter to the attention of the minister because this situation can develop very quickly anywhere that forest fires are likely to occur in British Columbia, and I think other members will corroborate me in that respect. The result is that hundreds of men can be disfranchised under such a situation.

I urge two things upon the minister. I urge that very serious consideration be given by the minister to the extension of the qualifications for those with the right to vote at advance polls in view of the numbers denied the right at the present time who are working in the lumbering and mining industries and the relatively large numbers who can be denied the opportunity to vote in forested country should we be faced with a serious fire situation.

Second, I do think that to meet this situation fully and properly there should be an increase in the number of advance polls. At the present time it is usual to have advance polls in some of the larger centres but if our people, even under the present legislation, are to be completely and properly served, especially in these more or less isolated districts, provision should be made for a larger number of advance polls.

Finally, I simply want to say that the people who are denied the right to vote under the present legislation are usually workers involved in our primary industries in isolated places who are helping to increase the production of this country, people who have the right to vote and who treasure their vote. We want all Canadians to vote and I do urge the minister to give serious consideration to amendments to the present act to remove this injustice suffered, I presume, by hundreds of thousands of Canadians under the present law.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a few words.

The Chairman: Order. I recognize the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond.

[Mr. Herridge.]

Mr. Irwin: Mr. Chairman, I want to say a few words on this matter and follow up what the hon. member for Kootenay West has said about advance polls. There are two features with respect to advance polls that should be given attention within a reasonable length of time. I do not know whether it is possible to do it between now and the next election. I hope it is. These matters should be given attention because not only do the conditions outlined by the hon. member for Kootenay West arise but in a constituency such as mine something else happens.

There are a large number of fishermen in my constituency.

They generally come home on Friday night and have to spend all day Saturday fixing up their nets and getting their boats in order to go out again on Sunday. The advance poll is generally set for the Friday and Saturday prior to election day. The result of that is that these men, because they are not included in the schedule of those permitted to vote at advance polls, are disfranchised.

Furthermore, under the present schedule of districts that are eligible for advance polls the returning officer is confined in a constituency such as mine to Burnaby. The Richmond area cannot have an advance poll. Now that is wrong in principle because the fishermen all reside in the Richmond area. They are disfranchised because the returning officer cannot set up a second advance poll in Richmond. Then again when the advance poll is set up in Burnaby these men have to travel about 12 to 14 miles if they want to go there.

I am not a bit surprised that under the present system of enumeration we get a great deal of skipped enumeration. When an enumerator is paid only ten cents a name and finds a person absent from home there is not the foggiest chance in the world of that enumerator going back again. I would not blame him. I would suggest to the minister that consideration be given to raising the amount paid enumerators. I would point out that the return of ten cents per name has been in effect since 1934. It has not been altered during all that time. I would suggest that the cost of enumeration today is not too high when one considers the work that is done. If we are going to insist on enumeration, then we should take every possible step we can to be sure that the enumerators are properly compensated so that they will carry out their work in an efficient manner. You cannot expect an enumerator to call at a home three or four times for the ten cents paid for securing one name. It cannot be done.

I would suggest that the minister take up the question of a running enumeration, that is a voters list which is permanent, as we do in British Columbia. The voters lists are kept permanently and any person can get on the voters list whenever he wants. If a person moves from one place to another, he can get on the voters list there. The result is that the voters list is always up to date. I realize that would mean establishing a permanent registry of voters, such as we have in British Columbia, but that is less costly than enumeration.

I should like also to support the request of one of the other members for a reconsideration of the line rate that is paid for printing the voters list. This is not a question of unions or anything like that, but at the moment the line rate is such that printers cannot take voters lists in union shops. The line rate for printing these voters lists has not been changed for many years. It is about time that these matters were given a little consideration. I do not believe an amendment to the act would be required to take care of these things.

There is one other little matter which could be rectified by a change in the act. At the present time when the returning officer sets up polling areas one would naturally expect that he would put the polling station in the middle of the polling district. However, they do not do that. They set up a polling district and then they set the polling station over in one corner of it. The result is that in an area like Burnaby, what happened in two different places was that the polling station was established in such a way that people who were living within three quarters of a mile of the polling station had to travel nearly four miles to get to it, simply because it happened to be on the other side of a creek. I would suggest the returning officers be instructed to set polling stations where they will be equally accessible to all persons within a given polling area.

With regard to the matter of putting the political affiliation of a candidate on the ballot, I think that is a must. Now that there are quite a number of parties participating in an election I feel the people should know the affiliation of the person for whom they are voting. There are plenty of people who vote for the party. They do not know the candidates and do not know whether they are Liberals or Conservatives. I think they should be given a chance to vote for their party if they feel like it. There is no reason why they should not be given that opportunity. May I point out that the service vote is strictly on party lines because a serviceman can write in the name of the party on the ballot, not name the candidate at all, and that vote will be accepted. If that procedure is valid for the service vote, why should it not be valid for the civilian vote?

Mr. Byrne: While I have never been noted particularly for my gallantry, I sincerely congratulate the minister upon her ascendancy to the high position she holds. I might say further that is probably one indication of the fact that the bill which she brought forward so assiduously concerning equal pay for equal work for women was not so important after all.

I join particularly in supporting the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond in his observations that we are not paying the printers sufficient for printing the voters lists. In my travels during the last campaign I visited the printing office of one of the weekly newspapers. I noted they were not busily engaged in printing the voters lists. I asked him why that was so. He said he could not afford to do it, his time was too valuable, and he could not afford to hire help. He had no interest in printing the voters lists.

I cannot agree with the hon. member for Timmins that there is a great deal of patronage with respect to this, because it seemed to me that almost all the newspaper offices I visited were busily engaged in that work. They all had the same complaint, that they were not being paid sufficiently for the work they were undertaking.

Mr. Fraser: How about the candidate paying for his own printing, ballots and everything. The hon. member said there was no patronage, so how about the member paying for everything.

Mr. Byrne: I have no knowledge of what might have happened in the hon. member's riding, but I know in my riding those things did not happen.

The question of paying enumerators is also one which I am sure would not require a revision of the act. I am sure that an order in council might very well provide for a higher rate for each name an enumerator put on the list. This pay is not sufficient even in the urban areas, but the greatest difficulty is encountered in ridings which are predominantly rural. I feel that something should be done before the next general election.

With respect to the grievance which the hon. member for Kootenay West had, namely that constituents may be away fighting fires, perhaps that matter is not so urgent. This may transpire before the real hot weather comes so I do not think this matter is as urgent as is the need of increased rates of pay to the printers and to the enumerators.

With respect to changing the act in order to provide for enlarging the number of people who would be able to vote at advance polls, I think that is something that needs to be studied by a committee and I have no further recommendations on that matter. I have heard that innumerable difficulties would crop up if that course were to be undertaken. At the present time I do not want to press that point. I think the main thing to be kept in mind is that an election is pending, and I think the rates for the printers and for the enumerators should be given thorough and early consideration.

Mr. Rea: May I first offer my congratulations to the Secretary of State. I am not very often shocked, or at least that is what I am told, but when I went to the United Nations in September I was terrifically shocked to find that no government employee who is posted or who is on duty outside of Canada can vote. I see no reason why these people who are serving our country should not be in the same category as are the armed forces. The situation is very unfortunate. For example, at our embassy in New York, the clerks, the chauffeurs, the office help, and even the ambassador are not allowed to vote because the government has sent them there on duty and by so doing has disfranchised them and deprived them of their opportunity of voting. That is something that I shall discuss further.

What I wanted to say this afternoon is this and I have given this matter a great deal of thought. When the proper authorities come to discuss how this matter can be dealt with I shall offer some suggestions. I have worked out a system that I think will be all right. The first thing you must do is to preserve the secrecy of those that are voting. In some areas across this country there might be only two or three employees there and that matter would have to be guarded very carefully. I should be glad to offer my suggestions at the proper time when this matter is discussed.

Mr. Fisher: I should just like to ask a few questions of the minister. I should like to know how much money each individual returning officer in a constituency is permitted to spend in advertising two things, first, the courts of revision within the constituency and, second, the hours that employees may have off from work under the election act.

I make this further point in connection with the court of revision. To the junior chamber of commerce in our area which spends a great deal of time advertising the actual election day, I have suggested that they could take up this particular chore of advertising the court of revision.

I want to close with the comment that I hope the development in Toronto where they had the difficulty over the certificates that went to the court of revision will not lead to any change because we found those particular certificates to be very useful on the part of all parties at Port Arthur. The certificates to which I am referring are the ones where people go into committee rooms and fill out a petition and then the committee room people can take it over to the court of revision. We found that certificate to be extremely useful and I think it should be retained.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): May I also congratulate the Secretary of State on her appointment as minister for that department. I should like to back up the statements made by the hon. member for Fraser Valley with regard to names left off the voters' list. I say that because I had some experience with regard to it in the last election. Odd as it may seem, the enumerator came around to our own place and we were enumerated and given receipts. We had first, of course, looked at the main list nailed up on telephone poles and found that our names were not there. On the day of the election when we went down to vote ours were the only two names that appeared on the revised list.

I had about ten or so calls from people who were concerned about the fact that when they looked at the regular list which was posted they found that their names were not there. Then they went down on the day of revision to have their names put on the list. As far as I can understand it, the people in charge there took down the names on a book—that is on the poll book—and said, "Your name will appear on the voters' list." But when they went to vote their names were not on the voters' list. The fact that they had been enumerated and had slips did not give them the authority to vote. These people had absolutely no recourse whatever.

That sort of thing happened in the very poll at which I was myself. As I say, my wife's name and mine appeared on the list and we were the only two in the whole poll. The voter is put in a very bad position. He complies with the law. After enumeration is made he is given his slip, if he is in an urban area, showing that he has been enumerated. Then he checks the list when it appears in a public place, such as on a telephone pole or whatever it is. He finds that his name is not there. He goes down on the day of revision to have it put on. Then when he goes to vote on election day and finds that his name is not there, it is a serious matter. These people have complied with all the laws and all the regulations with regard to the matter and yet they are disfranchised.

To the minister and those in charge of this matter I suggest that there possibly is a way in which to overcome this difficulty. When the voter finds that his name is not on the regularly posted list it seems to me that when he goes on the day of revision to have his name put on the list he should at that time be given a card which has on it an appropriate government stamp to show that he has the right to vote, whether his name appears on the final revised list or not. He has gone to the trouble to inspect the list. He finds his name is not there. He goes down on the day of revision to have it put on the list. Yet when he comes to the poll, he finds that he is still not on it.

It seems to me that it would be a very simple thing for the government to send out cards which could not be duplicated, with government stamps on them, and which would be handed out by the returning officer on those days of revision so that such a person would be assured, after having gone to all this trouble, that he would have his vote when the day came. It would not be a very costly matter because there would not be many cards sent to each city. I would not imagine that there would be over 50, 75 or 100 in each case. It would be a simple process. It would assure the voter that he would at least have the right to vote after he has gone to all the trouble of making the proper inspection. I hope the minister will give this suggestion some consideration.

Mr. McMillan: As the member from the Niagara district and also as a neighbour I would like to extend my best wishes and congratulations to the gracious lady and minister, the hon. Secretary of State.

I have a question I would like to ask and that is the following: What would be the position taken by the chief electoral officer or the returning officer if the sample ballot hanging outside or inside the polling booth bore a name with an "x" after it which was the same name as that of one of the candidates.

I know this happened during the last election and I do not think it is fair at all because some of the people come in, see this name and think they should put the "x" after the name of the candidate whose name appears in this fashion.

Mr. Hardie: I would like to concur in the remarks made by other hon. members with respect to advance polls. As the minister knows, although the act says that people working on transportation are allowed to vote at advance polls, this does not apply in the Northwest Territories. We have somewhat different conditions in the Northwest Territories from those in most other parts of Canada, not only in respect to transportation. We have people working on water transportation, aviation, fishing, trapping and the like and, with no advance polls at which to register their votes, what happens? Frequently—as a matter of fact at just about every election—these people in varying walks of life are disenfranchised. I think the house should try to make it possible for as many of our citizens to exercise their right to vote as possible.

Now, as I have said, in the north these trappers and fishermen, because of their occupation, find it necessary to travel from one point to another. For instance in the last election we had people normally resident in Fort Providence and Fort Simpson who, because there was not sufficient work available for them, had to move, say, to Great Slave lake to fish for their livelihood. These people normally appear on the voters' lists in the posts or towns in which they reside. I think the situation in the Yukon is also different; people are nomadic and move from point to point in order to make their living; they had to go say from Whitehorse to Carmacks or to the United Keno mine, or some other part of the Yukon in order to make their living and so were disenfranchised. When they went to the polling booth the returning officer or his deputy would know that they were residents of long standing in the Yukon in the majority of cases and he would allow them to vote. He knew they passed the residence qualifications but, when the matter came before the courts, approximately 500 votes of a total of 5,000 registered in the Yukon were thrown out. In other words 10 per cent of those people who did cast their votes—there were many others who did not—by the actions of the courts in charge in the Yukon were disenfranchised.

Now I think hon. members will agree that 10 per cent of the people who actually vote is a very high proportion of the total figure in any constituency. I would like to suggest to the minister that with respect to the Yukon and the Northwest Territories special provision should be made.

The Chairman: I will call it six o'clock.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the leader what will be the order of business tomorrow.

Mr. Green: Tomorrow, Mr. Speaker, we shall continue with these estimates and then take the estimates of mines and technical surveys, veterans affairs, fisheries and justice.

Mr. Chevrier: In that order?

Mr. Green: In that order.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

2. If so, when was such change made and what is its effect?

3. How many applications for the admission of Chinese as immigrants have been received since June 21, 1957?

4. How many applications for Chinese have been (a) refused; (b) approved since June 21, 1957?

5. How many such applications are still pending?

Answer by: Hon. E. D. Fulton (Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration):

1. No.

2. Not applicable.

SALES TAX ON PANSIES

Question No. 140—Mr. Huffman:

1. Have any changes taken place since January 1, 1957, in respect to sales tax on pansies as grown by nurseries for home consumption?

2. If so, what is the nature of the changes and the date on which same took effect?

3. Have any refunds been made during the past year to nursery firms or individual growers of pansies in respect to sales tax previously paid?

4. If so, what are the names, addresses and amounts thereof?

5. Are pansies considered as nursery stock and if so, exempt from sales tax?

6. What is the regulation governing the refund of money paid in error?

7. Is there a time limit in which to make claim for refund?

Answer by: Hon. G. C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue):

1. Yes.

2. Exemption from sales tax by reversal of ruling re classification of pansies as nursery stock and by budget resolution providing exemption for "potted, flowering or bedding plants . . .", effective March 15, 1957.

3. Yes.

4. It is contrary to the established practice to disclose any information which would divulge the business of individual taxpayers. The Department of National Revenue had held for some years that pansies were not nursery stock but changed its ruling in the light of conflicting expert advice. One company had consistently opposed the payment of sales tax on the grounds that pansies were nursery stock and, having paid under protest, were entitled under the law when the ruling was changed to a refund of $207.48. For greater certainty the statutory exemption referred to in 2 was approved by parliament.

5. Yes, also under the exempting provision for "bedding plants".

6. Section 46, subsection (6) of the Excise Tax Act.

7. Yes, two years from the date of application to the department in writing.

With respect to the years 1956 and 1957, how do the amount of moneys collected under the succession duty act, as of October 31, 1957, compare to those collected as of October 31, 1956, giving figures?

Answer by: Hon. G. C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue):

In the first seven months of each of the fiscal years 1956-57 and 1957-58, the total amounts of dominion succession duty collected were, respectively, as follows:—

Fiscal Year
1956-57 (7 months)	$53,028,777.07

APPENDIX "A"

ANSWER TO QUESTION ASKED BY MEMBER FOR PORT ARTHUR

The answer to the above question is as follows:

1. Corporations are in default of filing, in the years indicated, the annual summaries under section 125 of the Companies Act as follows:

Year	Public Companies	Private Companies	Corporations without share capital	total
1955	57	158	16	231
1956	53	161	3	217
1957	287	893	31	1211

When a corporation is in default of filing annual summaries under section 125 for the current year, the department sends it a notice so advising.

When a corporation is in default of filing such annual summaries for three years, a registered notice is mailed to the corporation and, if no response is received, the company may be deemed not to be a subsisting corporation and no longer entitled to the sole use of its corporate name.

Such registered notices are being mailed to the 231 corporations, both public and private and without share capital, which are in default to file the annual summaries in the years 1955, 1956, and 1957 and, if no response is received, a further notice will be sent advising each company that it is deemed not to be subsisting.

A similar procedure will be followed in 1958 with respect to such corporations as are in default to file annual summaries for the years 1956, 1957 and 1958; also in 1959 with respect to such corporations as are in default for 1957, 1958 and 1959.

In order to specify the number of corporations on which the said penalty for three years' default was imposed in 1955 and in 1956 a considerable period of time would be required, since an individual examination of approximately 12,000 files would be involved.

2. See answer to No. 1.

3. It is for the Department of the Secretary of State to bring to the attention of the Department of Justice, for consideration and such action as is warranted, any case where a prosecution may appear to be in order. The Department of Justice Act, R.S.C. (1952) chapter 71, entrusts the Attorney General of Canada with "the regulation and conduct of all litigation for or against the crown or any public department, in respect of any subject within the authority or jurisdiction of Canada".

4. None.

PRIVILEGE

MR. LESAGE—ANSWER TO STARRED QUESTION NO. 29 BY MINISTER OF LABOUR

Hon. Jean Lesage (Montmagny-L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. Yesterday afternoon the Minister of Labour said, in answer to a starred question of mine, that the latest date for which data have been published regarding unemployment in Canada was September 19, 1957. On that very same day, yesterday, at ten o'clock in the morning, the press of the country already had in their hands for release at that time a press communique from the Department of Labour giving the figures of unemployment for October 17, 1957. It is clear, sir, that yesterday afternoon the Minister of Labour refused to give to this house information which he had already given to the press of the country.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: Shame.

Mr. Lesage: This, sir, is certainly additional evidence of the contempt which this government holds for parliament.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not sure that I understand the question of privilege which the hon. member is making.

Mr. Fleming: There is no question of privilege.

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Speaker, it is a very clear one, I believe. Yesterday afternoon I was refused information which had already been given to the press of the country in the morning.

Mr. Speaker: I understand what the hon. member has said, but in what way does he allege that the privileges of the house are infringed?

Mr. Lesage: With all due respect, sir, in answer to the question I asked the Minister of Labour said yesterday afternoon that the information as for September 19 was the latest information available, when he had already given information to the press in the morning as for October 17.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, in answer to the hon member for Montmagny-L'Islet may I say—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I am not sure that this is a matter to be debated in the house. It seems to me that if there is a question of privilege it is in the hands of the house to refer the matter to the appropriate committee to deal with it. I do not want to have a debate on the rights or wrongs of what a member has done. It seems to me that if there is a charge made against a member of the house it would have to be supported by a motion and referred to the appropriate committee.

Mr. Coldwell: Might the minister not have a reply to make immediately which perhaps, with due respect, he might be permitted to make?

Mr. Speaker: If it is the pleasure of the house to proceed to hear the minister, very well.

Mr. Starr: Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet asked in a starred question yesterday for the number of unemployed registered at national employment offices in Quebec, Canada and Montmagny. The figures released yesterday are released by the Department of Labour and the dominion bureau of statistics.

Yesterday the hon. member rose on a question of privilege to protest against certain figures which I supplied in answer to starred question No. 29. The hon. member's objection was that more recent figures were available than those provided, which were for September 21. I now wish to give the figures for registrations at the national employment service on November 7, which was not the date specified by the hon. member, it being November 1.

At the same time I should point out that these figures include a number of categories which extend beyond the definition of persons without jobs and seeking work, which is the basis of the dominion bureau of statistics figure. Registrations at national employment offices are derived from a count of applications on hand in every office at the close of business on a specified day. The count excludes registrations from persons known to have jobs and applying for other ones. Measures are taken to exclude persons who have secured work on their own since registration.

Nevertheless, I am informed that the figures inevitably include a number of persons who had found employment or who had left the labour force when the count was made. Although not all persons looking for work register at national employment service offices, all those who are seeking unemployment benefits, regardless of the length of time for which they may be out of work, must register for work.

Thus, Mr. Speaker, taken as a measure of unemployment, which was what the hon. member requested, these figures do not have the authority of the official dominion bureau of statistics figures of persons out of work and seeking jobs. For that reason they are not published as official unemployment figures.

In this connection I might add that it was the previous policy, as I imagine the hon. member is well aware, to release figures of national employment service registrations only for the dates specified in the official dominion bureau of statistics release. I have decided to change this policy, on the principle that hon. members of this house are entitled to any information which it is within the power of my department to provide. Therefore I will give the figures the hon. member requested, and better; I shall give them for November 7, 1957, as compared with November 8, 1956: for Canada, in 1957, 327,388; for November 8, 1956, 188,362; for the Quebec region, 1957, on the same date, 90,853; for November 8, 1956, 52,258; for Montmagny, November 7, 1957, 948; for November 8, 1956, 356. In the event the hon. member is interested, the figure for June of this year was 1,112.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Sinclair: Are you applauding 300,000 unemployed?

Mr. Speaker: Since this matter was raised on a question of privilege may I ask whether, in view of the statement which has been made by the minister, the hon. member feels that the question of privilege has been satisfied?

Mr. Lesage: I am satisfied that the figures given indicate that we have been right in claiming there is a great increase in unemployment.

Mr. Starr: Unemployment in your town was worse in June.

Mr. Fleming: Does the hon. member not wish to apologize now for what he said earlier?

Mr. Sinclair: You should apologize for 320,000 unemployed.

[Mr. Starr.]

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I say to the house that there is some confusion between what is a question of privilege and what is a point of order. In my opinion, when a member raises a question of the infringement of the privileges of the house it is a matter that is then placed before the house for action. The explanation should be satisfactory and the matter dropped, or it should be taken up by the house and referred to the appropriate committee. For future guidance of members I would ask them to bear in mind that the use of the privilege of the house is, to my mind, a serious matter.

THE ROYAL ASSENT

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received the following communication:

Ottawa, November 21, 1957

Sir:

I have the honour to inform you that the Honourable Patrick Kerwin, Chief Justice of Canada, acting as Deputy of His Excellency the Governor General, will proceed to the Senate chamber today, the 21st November, at 5.45 p.m., for the purpose of giving the royal assent to certain bills.

I have the honour to be,
sir,
Your obedient servant,
J. F. Delaute,
Secretary to the Governor General (Administrative)

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF ESTIMATES COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the house leader a question. Has the government reached any decision as to whether or not it will recommend to parliament the setting up of an estimates committee to which the estimates of certain of the departments might be referred?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, it is not the intention of the government to recommend the setting up of such a committee at this session.

Mr. Pickersgill: Why not?

Mr. Green: For the reasons I explained the other day.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question but may I direct it to the senior minister without portfolio, the hon. member for Greenwood. In view of the minister's contention, in an article he wrote a while ago and which appeared in the Queen's Quarterly, that the estimates committee should be strengthened and should be given the power to make its own decision as to what departments should be considered by that committee, may I ask whether he has been pressing these points on his colleagues in the cabinet?

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Minister without Portfolio): Mr. Speaker, as I understood the oath I took when I became a junior privy councillor, that is a secret.

REQUEST FOR ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS ON ORDER PAPER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I would like to ask the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources (Mr. Hamilton) or the acting leader of the house whether the government is in a position today to answer starred question No. 37, which the Prime Minister assured me yesterday would be answered before the federal-provincial conference.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister is in Montreal this afternoon—

An hon. Member: What is he doing?

Mr. Green: Wishing godspeed to the Canadian trade mission to the United Kingdom.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

An hon. Member: Could he not do that here?

Mr. Green: For that reason he is unable to be in the house until later in the day. When he returns I shall draw to his attention the hon. member's question.

[Later:]

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works, who I believe looks after the house order paper. I placed a question on the order paper on October 22, nearly a month ago, and another one on October 24. Would the minister try to facilitate the answers to those questions? I might help him with respect to the question asked on October 24. It was:

Has the government considered the recommendations of the joint parliamentary committee of 1946 on a design for a distinctive Canadian flag?

Perhaps the minister would consider that question has already been answered. If so, I wonder whether the answer might be printed in Hansard. Would he facilitate the answering of these questions?

Mr. Green: I will be very glad to look into these questions and get the answers as quickly as possible.

INQUIRY AS TO LEGISLATION RESPECTING AGRICULTURAL SUPPORT PRICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture or the Minister of Public Works. My question arises out of the serious and continuing drop in the prices of agricultural products. Can either minister assure the house that the resolution on the order paper which foreshadows a bill to support agricultural prices will be brought forward at the earliest possible date?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Yes, it is the intention to proceed with that as soon as possible.

Mr. Argue: Next week, perhaps?

Mr. Green: Well, now, Mr. Speaker, if I could be sure of just what the hon. member's party intends to do with regard to the remaining work of the session I might be able to give the hon. member a more definite answer.

Mr. Argue: In reply I think I can assure the minister that the members of the C.C.F. group would be prepared to discuss this resolution next week.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—FURTHER STATEMENT ON REPORTED CLOSING DOWN OF HOWE SOUND COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. J. Broome (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Has the minister any further information to give to the house with regard to developments at the Britannia mine?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I am glad to be able to report to the hon. member in reply to his question and to the house on the course of discussions which I have held in this connection.

I should like, first of all, to express appreciation of the fact that when they learned of the desire of the government to explore the possibility of keeping the Britannia mine in operation, the management decided to defer their decision on closure of the mine which otherwise would have taken place on November 19. As a result it became possible to explore the situation with some hope of success, and I know that this is appreciated by all parties concerned as well as by the government.

In Vancouver recently I had discussions with the mine management, at which time the implications of various alternative proposals were studied. I also had discussions with the union leaders. I proceeded to Victoria on Wednesday, where I had discussions with the provincial ministers chiefly concerned in the matter. At these last discussions the possibility of joint action on one or more of the various potential alternatives was explored. These discussions were most helpful.

I returned to Ottawa this morning and have made a preliminary report to my colleagues. The situation now is that this report is to be considered further, and further discussions are to be held here with company officials by whom the eventual decision, so far as the company is concerned, will have to be made. During these discussions the proposals which seem to have emerged from the earlier talks as having the greatest appeal and practicability will be further explored, together of course with any proposals or alternatives which may be advanced by the company.

It will be appreciated that in discussions of this kind, in which the dominion and provincial governments take part and in which a company and its men are directly involved, it is necessary to proceed by stages, with the result that it is not always possible to reach agreement or decision quickly. However, I wish to assure the house that this government is pursuing the matter just as vigorously as possible and is prepared to consider all practicable alternatives which may have a chance of forestalling the closure of the mine at this time.

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): I should like to ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Justice in view of his statement. Does any action taken by this government in connection with the Britannia mine apply equally to any other copper or base metal mines closing down or about to close down because of the low price of base metals?

Mr. Fulton: I am not in a position to answer that question because no decision has yet been taken as to what, if any, action lies open to us in the case of the Britannia mine.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No decision will be taken.

LAUNCHING OF SPECIAL PUBLIC WORKS PROGRAM TO ALLEVIATE UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Bourget (Levis): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Public Works of which I thought notice was not necessary. Can he tell the house whether it is the intention of the government to launch now a special program of public works across Canada to alleviate the very serious unemployment situation?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Well, I have no intention of launching an over-all program of public works across Canada because, as the hon. member well knows in view of his experience as a parliamentary assistant to the former minister of public works, that is quite impossible. If his government had left us a nice big program of public works on the shelf which could have been built up that might have been possible.

Mr. Sinclair: We had it right in the estimates.

Mr. Green: But such is not the case. We are taking every possible step to further development works across the country.

Mr. Bourget: On a question of privilege, the answer given by the minister was lengthy and I am entitled to tell him that if he will look—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is in order in raising a point of order but if he goes on, as he appears to wish to do, to tell the minister something I am afraid that goes beyond a point of order.

Mr. Bourget: Mr. Speaker, I just wanted to point out that every time—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It is not in order for the hon. member to do that. If he wishes to raise a point of order on what the minister just said I will hear him; otherwise I think he should not pursue the matter.

Mr. Bourget: May I suggest—

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Bourget: May I ask the Minister of Public Works to look on the other shelf and he will probably find some projects which had been prepared by the previous government.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, in reply may I say I have looked on all the shelves and under all the beds. We are going to do everything that can possibly be done in view of what had previously been done.

Mr. McIlraith: I can give you the names of buildings in the Ottawa area.

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: If it is a supplementary question I will hear it now. I tried to recognize the hon. member for Essex East. The hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate.

Mr. Pickersgill: I have a supplementary question for the minister. In that case, can he get on with the post office at Wesleyville, which was in this year's program and which has not yet been started?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to make inquiries about this post office.

Mr. Pickersgill: I would like you to get on with it.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

INQUIRY AS TO LETTER FROM PREMIER OF MANITOBA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder if I might ask the house leader, in his capacity as Acting Prime Minister, if he is in a position today to table the letter from the premier of Manitoba which the Prime Minister two days ago undertook to table?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Acting Prime Minister): No, Mr. Speaker, I am not in a position to do that, but I am sure the Prime Minister will also take care of that request at the earliest possible moment.

[Later:]

Mr. Pickersgill: Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I may ask the house leader a question. Since I asked my question my attention has been drawn to the fact that the letter in question and one from the Prime Minister were tabled in the house yesterday, according to Votes and Proceedings. I wonder whether the usual custom of having them printed as an appendix to today's Hansard could be followed, as was done with all the other correspondence from the provincial premiers?

Mr. Green: I have no objection to that course being followed.

Mr. Speaker: Does the house give its consent to the printing of those letters as an appendix to today's Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[For text of letters referred to above, see appendix, pages 1403-04.]

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

OTTAWA—REQUEST FOR COMMENCEMENT OF CONSTRUCTION TO ALLEVIATE UNEMPLOYMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. O. Gour (Russell): I would like to direct a few questions to the Minister of Labour.

As the minister is aware, and as we are all aware, unemployment is increasing every day; and in view of the fact that he indicated yesterday that he would be pleased to do everything possible to provide more work, would he be in favour of using his influence to wake up the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) so that he may begin to build at once the post office and public works headquarters, in addition to the three or four government buildings which are being considered as projects on Riverside drive and around Hogs Back.

Second, as the defence of the country is of the greatest importance at the present time, partly in view of the development of the Russian satellites—

Some hon. Members: Question.

An hon. Member: Order paper.

Mr. Gour: Could the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Pearkes)—

Some hon. Members: Order.

An hon. Member: Be a little more patient.

An hon. Member: We have had plenty of opportunity for exercising patience.

Mr. Gour: —be persuaded by the Minister of Labour (Mr. Starr) to begin early next spring the construction of the pentagon project on the government owned land divided by Donald street and lying partly in Eastview and partly in the city of Ottawa?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think perhaps I have allowed the hon. member to go beyond his proper scope in asking more than one question. He has already asked two questions, and I would ask him to leave it at that until we see whether answers are forthcoming to those questions.

Mr. Gour: I did say I had a few questions, not only one.

Mr. Speaker: I have asked the hon. member to leave it at that, and that is my ruling.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): In reply to the questions already asked and to the others that have not been asked I want to say that the ministers mentioned in these questions to my knowledge are wide awake and fully aware of the circumstances. They are doing their very utmost, again to my knowledge, to bring about these things which the hon. member sets out, and are giving them very serious consideration in order to alleviate the problem mentioned by the hon. member.

Mr. Gour: Thank you. I hope the minister will follow the two other suggestions.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps the hon. member would be content to put them on the order paper.

Mr. Gour: I would.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FISHERIES

FRASER RIVER—REOPENING OF AREA BETWEEN PATTULLO-MISSION BRIDGES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. Would the minister indicate what progress, if any, has been achieved toward deciding whether the area between Pattullo bridge and Mission bridge on the Fraser river will be reopened to fishing, as requested by fishermen in the area?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for having given me notice of his intention to ask this question. The salmon fishing season has just closed on the Pacific coast, as the hon. member is no doubt aware. A review of the situation above Pattullo bridge on the Fraser river is now under way. Final decision must await thorough study of all information. I may say further that a review of the whole situation will have been completed well in advance of the next fishing season.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

REFERENCE TO REPORT CUT UNLIKELY IN EXPENDITURES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. In view of a report in the Montreal Gazette this morning headed "Defence Cut-back Unlikely", could the minister confirm to this house that this report is true?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): I have not seen the report referred to; therefore I cannot confirm or deny it.

Mr. Robichaud: A supplementary question. It is mentioned in this report that if the estimates are lower than those presented by the Liberals earlier this year the reduction will be very slight. Is this true?

Mr. Pearkes: That information will be given when my estimates are brought before the house.

U.S.-CANADA—INQUIRY AS TO POWER TO COMMIT CANADIAN PILOTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Henderson (Kingston): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. This is further to a question I asked and an answer I received on November 6 with respect to the United States-Canada joint air defence command.

[Mr. Gour.]

My question is this. If there were an immediate attack by air over the Arctic by an aggressor, can the Canadian government commit Canadian fighters being put into the air without consultation with, or direction from, General Partridge?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): I think, Mr. Speaker, that is rather a hypothetical question; but at the same time plans have been discussed with General Partridge at integrated headquarters and are being evolved to meet a number of circumstances, and it would be a matter of only a very few minutes to obtain confirmation of the decisions that have already been made.

Mr. Henderson: A supplementary question; I am afraid the minister did not understand me. My question was, if there is an attack now over the Arctic by an aggressor, can the Canadian government commit Canadian fighters being put into the air without consultation with, or direction from, General Partridge?

Mr. Pearkes: There certainly would be consultation with General Partridge and it would be a mutual effort between the two countries, because both countries would be involved if there were hostile bombers crossing the Canadian Arctic.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Has the minister seen the statement made by Mr. Dulles yesterday in Chicago, in which he said in the event of a planned attack the officers in the field would take immediate action without consultation with the governments?

Mr. Pearkes: Yes; I believe that he was referring to operations in Europe.

Mr. Coldwell: Does that apply here?

USE OF CANADIAN BASES BY U.S. PLANES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Algoma East): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence on the same subject. In view of the statement reported today by the United Kingdom minister of defence that United States planes cannot use bases in Britain for military operations without first obtaining the consent of the British government, will the minister state whether the same policy is in force with respect to possible United States action from bases on Canadian soil?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): I will take that question as notice.

FINANCE

BANK OF CANADA—ALLEGED RELAXATION OF MONETARY RESTRICTIONS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. James Sinclair (Coast-Capilano): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Yesterday, in his absence, I put a question to the Minister of Finance about a C.B.C. report of a speech made by the Minister of Justice at the University of British Columbia. The Minister of Finance pleaded ignorance of what was in the mind of the Minister of Justice—

Mr. Fleming: No, he did not.

Mr. Sinclair: Now I should like to ask the Minister of Justice what are these definite steps which have been taken by a Conservative government to relax monetary restrictions of the Bank of Canada.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I have not seen the dispatch on which the C.B.C. news story is based, but I understand it was a report of a speech which I made at the University of British Columbia on Tuesday. In the course of that speech I said the government had been moving in the matter of monetary policy and credit restrictions ever since we took office. I outlined the various measures we have taken, including the provision of $150 million of new credit for housing loans. I also pointed out that there had been continuous review of monetary policies and discussions with the Bank of Canada with regard to credit restrictions and monetary policy generally.

I emphasized that the results of these discussions, and of the policies followed by this government since taking office, were now becoming evident in the reductions in interest rates which have been reported recently and which should do much to create an economic climate in which the restrictive trends initiated by the previous government would be reversed, and the Canadian economy could move forward again on that sound program of expansion which is the goal of this government.

Mr. Sinclair: I can understand, now, the ignorance of the Minister of Finance yesterday.

[Later:]

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Justice. I noted his reply that the government is taking measures to relax the tight money policy, and he cited as one of the methods the $150 million made available for housing. However, I should like to ask him, in view of the fact that the only method other than the one he mentioned that the public of Canada have noticed has been the rise in the interest rates—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is not asking a question. He is proceeding to make a statement about what the public of Canada understands. I would appreciate it if he would only state the facts necessary to the asking of his question.

Mr. Regier: Is the raising of interest rates on government bonds and on N.H.A. housing the government's method of making more investment money available?

Mr. Fulton: I think in reply I must say that there are too many misstatements of fact as a preface to the question to allow me to reply to it.

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

EXTENSION OF PERIOD OF BENEFITS TO UNEMPLOYED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Labour. In view of the serious unemployment situation as indicated by the release which was issued yesterday, can the minister say whether the government will give consideration to amending the Unemployment Insurance Act to extend the period during which seasonal or supplementary benefits are available?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, this matter is being given very serious consideration and I expect to have some indication of our decision in a matter of days.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): A supplementary question. Is there not already before us the intention of the government to bring forward a measure dealing with some aspect of the question put by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre?

Mr. Starr: I see nothing on the order paper, sir.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We trust it will be soon.

INDUSTRY

REQUEST THAT CANADIAN FIRMS PLACE CONTRACTS IN CANADA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. J. Irwin (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask a question of the Minister of Labour; I am sorry that I have not given him notice of this, but he may take this question as notice if he wishes. Whereas the British Columbia Electric Company Limited has placed a contract for transmission towers with an Italian firm; and whereas the construction of these towers would have given employment to many British Columbia workers for a protracted period—

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Irwin: Keep your ears open and you will hear it. Will the Canadian government take steps to urge Canadian companies to place contracts such as the foregoing in Canada even at an advanced cost?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I will have to take this question as notice.

PARLIAMENT HILL

INQUIRY AS TO PERMANENT ILLUMINATION FOR BUILDINGS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. It is not of earth-shaking consequence but it is of interest to all members of the house. As an electrician by trade I have noticed the beautiful effect of outside lighting on the parliament buildings, and I have heard most commendable comments by Ottawa residents and tourists. Will the minister say how long the temporary lighting will be continued; and will he give favourable consideration to making the necessary installations of an architectural nature so as to place the illumination on a permanent basis?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the members of the government, like the hon. member for Vancouver East, have been very favourably impressed by the lighting arrangements outside the building, and it is for that reason that the lights have been kept on since the departure of Her Majesty. We are now investigating what the cost would be for lighting the building in a similar way on a permanent basis, or at least while the house is in session.

HARBOURS

PORT COLBORNE, ONT.—INQUIRY AS TO DISCONTINUANCE OF PROPOSED IMPROVEMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. H. McMillan (Welland): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works, of which I have sent him notice. Are certain proposed improvements to the Port Colborne harbour and installations, as provided in the estimates of 1957-58, being discontinued? If so, why is this being done?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. The fact is that these improvements have not been discontinued, because all the work which was proposed in the 1957-58 estimates has already been completed.

RONDEAU, ONT.—INQUIRY AS TO TENDERS FOR CONSTRUCTION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. B. Huffman (Kent, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Public Works, of which I have sent notice. Were tenders called for the construction of a boat harbour at Rondeau, Ontario, and, if so, how many tenders were received?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, may I suggest with great respect that these are questions which clearly should be put on the order paper. I have the answer here but I suggest this is not the time to give it.

Mr. Pickersgill: May I ask a supplementary question. Is this not the clearest indication of why we should have an estimates committee?

Mr. Green: No, Mr. Speaker, I do not think it has anything whatever to do with an estimates committee.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Because you don't want to have one.

TRADE

MISSION TO UNITED KINGDOM—MATTERS TO BE DISCUSSED

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether I could ask the Minister of Finance a question. In view of the absence from the house of the Prime Minister under the circumstances mentioned by the Minister of Public Works, and the departure today for the United Kingdom of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, can the Minister of Finance tell us now what is the answer to the questions put to the Minister of Trade and Commerce the other day with respect to whether or not the government has decided to instruct him to carry on conversations with members of the government of the United Kingdom with regard, first of all, to the Canadian Prime Minister's proposal for a 15 per cent shift in Canadian purchases from the United States to the United Kingdom, and also the proposal made by Her Majesty's government for a free trade area between Canada and the United Kingdom?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to have a look at the questions to which the hon. member has referred.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will my hon. friend be able to give us an answer before the Minister of Trade and Commerce returns from the United Kingdom?

Mr. Fleming: If the questions admit of such answer.

MARMALADE—REPORTED MISUSE OF "PRODUCT OF CANADA" LABEL

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. McLeod (Okanagan-Revelstoke): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Minister of Agriculture. I understand that marmalade made from citrus fruit is being sold in Canada under a label designating it "Product of Canada". Is this not a violation of regulations of the department governing the country of origin, and if such is the case will the department take action to curb this unfair practice?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. Marmalade made from citrus fruit and labelled "Product of Canada", when sold in Canada, would be in violation of the regulations with respect to processed fruits and vegetables as administered by the Department of Agriculture. Under such regulations labels must be submitted to the department for approval. If the hon. member will let me know the identity of the labels to which he refers my department will look into the matter immediately and take appropriate action.

Mr. McLeod: I shall be glad to do so.

PUBLIC WORKS

MONTREAL—PROPOSED NUNS' ISLAND CAUSEWAY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the minister received representations from any group or groups opposed to the building of the causeway between Verdun and Nuns' island and, if so, from what group or groups?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I wish to thank the hon. member for his courtesy in advising me of his intention to ask this question. I have received no such representations.

UNITED NATIONS

PROPOSED INCREASE IN TECHNICAL ASSISTANCE BUDGET

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I have a question for the Secretary of State for External Affairs, notice of which was sent to his office, but in his absence I wonder whether I might direct it to the acting minister or perhaps to the Minister of Finance. My question arises out of the important and humanitarian proposal made by the United States that the United Nations technical assistance budget be increased from $30 million to $100 million. Is the minister in a position to assure the Canadian people that the government is supporting this worth-while proposal?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, this is only one of a number of suggestions dealing broadly with this whole field that are under consideration at the United Nations at the present time. I think the hon. member can be assured that the Canadian government is deeply interested in any enterprise of this kind and will certainly give to this and any other proposal serious consideration.

Mr. Argue: And support?

Mr. Fleming: It depends upon their details and on what may be the best way of handling these problems, because there are various suggestions being put forward broadly in regard to this subject at the present time.

Mr. Argue: Do I take it from the minister's answer that Canada is supporting a general expansion in this field—in appropriate ways, of course?

Mr. Fleming: I do not think I can go beyond the statement I have made today. This matter will continue, and I am sure there will be ample opportunity to discuss it as the situation develops at the United Nations.

FAO—REQUEST FOR TABLING OF SPEECH BY MINISTER OF AGRICULTURE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. A. Tucker (Rosthern): May I ask the Minister of Agriculture if he has been able to find out yet what he said in his speech at the meeting of FAO in Rome? If he has been able to find out what he did say, will he now table that speech?

Inquiries of the Ministry

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I was never in any doubt about what I said. The hon. member for Rosthern seems to be in considerable doubt. He asked me to table a copy of the speech. When he made the request a few days ago I told him that I did not have a copy of the speech available here, and that I would ask the delegation in Rome to send me a copy if they had one. That request has gone forward to the delegation at Rome, but we have not yet received the speech.

Mr. Sinclair: They threw it away.

Mr. Harkness: When it does arrive I will, as I said before, be delighted to table it for the edification of the hon. member.

Mr. Pickersgill: What is wrong with the Minister of Public Works' push buttons?

NATURAL RESOURCES

QUEBEC—INQUIRY AS TO DEVELOPMENT POLICY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Maurice Breton (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour. Naturally if we had a translation system I would be much more pleased to speak in French, but I will do my best in English. In view of the fact that the government is proposing to spend money in Saskatchewan, British Columbia and the maritimes on natural resources, does the minister contemplate also the spending of money in Quebec on natural resources?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I think I understood the hon. member to say "Minister of Labour"?

Mr. Breton: I meant the Minister of Public Works.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): I think the hon. member said "Minister of Labour". However, the answer to his question was given quite fully by the Prime Minister the other day, when he was asked a similar question.

POWER

DISPOSITION OF DOWNSTREAM BENEFITS IN INTERNATIONAL WATERWAYS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. McLeod (Okanagan-Revelstoke): I have a question to direct to the Secretary of State for External Affairs. Since he is not in the house, I believe the Prime Minister usually acts in these cases. Is the present Canadian ambassador to the United States continuing the efforts of his predecessor to have the question of downstream benefits on international rivers considered a top priority problem for settlement with the United States? Could we have an up to date report on the progress, if any, that has been made?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Acting Prime Minister): I believe this question was sent to the Prime Minister's office before the house opened this afternoon, and answers are being prepared. They will be given to the hon. member as soon as possible.

IMMIGRATION

EDDIE CALLAHAN—REPORTED ISSUANCE OF DEPORTATION ORDER

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): In the absence of the Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration on Tuesday I asked a question as to whether a deportation order served upon an individual in the city of Montreal would become effective before the case was tried in the courts of that city. The parliamentary assistant was good enough to give me an answer, which was good so far as it went, but I wonder if the minister would not now give assurance to the house that the order will not become effective until such time as the trial has taken place.

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Acting Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, my attention was directed, as I came into the house, to the question asked by the hon. member on Tuesday. I have not, therefore, been able to get the particulars as yet; but I think I can state with certainty that the policy in cases of this kind is not to take action to enforce a deportation order until the criminal trial has been disposed of. I shall look into the matter further and hope to be able to give the hon. gentleman a specific assurance tomorrow.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Courtemanche in the chair.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF ELECTORAL OFFICER

60. Salaries and expenses of office, $73,115.

Mrs. Fairclough: Yesterday we had quite a discussion on this item, all of which was very interesting. The members of this house having so recently gone through an election campaign, their knowledge of procedure is fresh in their minds. I found, on reviewing the questions which had been asked and the suggestions which had been made, that they fell into two or three precise categories. With your permission, Mr. Chairman, I will answer a couple of these questions.

I should like to point out that most of the discussion which took place yesterday is the type of discussion which normally takes place in the committee on privileges and elections. It is not usual for that committee to be set up in the first session after an election, but I expect that in the next session of this parliament that committee will probably come into being; then hon. members will have an excellent opportunity of discussing with the chief electoral officer any of the points which were raised. I might just say, though, with regard to the fee which is allowed for enumerators, that amount was changed last year in an effort to provide a more satisfactory method of enumeration. This matter is now being reviewed by the chief electoral officer, as is the matter of the rate to be paid for the printing of the voters' lists.

With regard to the latter, it was said yesterday by more than one hon. member in this house that the rate was so low it was practically impossible to have the work performed in union shops. I do not know what the union rates are in other parts of Canada, but in my own city the work is performed in union shops. I do not believe, therefore, that particular statement could be taken as a general indication of conditions across the country. Nevertheless, whether the rate is sufficient or not, it is being reviewed by the chief electoral officer, who has the matter under serious consideration.

Most of the other items mentioned were connected with advance polls, courts of revision and so on. There was one statement made which I think calls for an answer. It was a statement by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond, I believe, who said it was possible for the armed forces to write on their ballots the name of the party they wished to support rather than the name of the candidate. If I understood the hon. member correctly and that was his statement, then he is misinformed; that is not correct.

Other than that, Mr. Chairman, I think there are no particular points which need to be answered at this time. I would suggest to hon. members that they might save their comments and their experiences and present them to the committee on privileges and elections when it meets next session.

Mr. Hardie: I was speaking at the adjournment hour last night, and I thought I would continue today. In connection with handling elections in northern areas I should like to say, as I think the minister and the house know, that a large number of the people who vote are Indians and Eskimos. These people have their homes. Their homes are usually in the bush. What they call their permanent residence is in the bush, whether it be a log house or a tent, and they have no permanent residence in the villages or towns scattered through the north. They travel around the country trapping, fishing and hunting or working at jobs where there is work available. We also have, of course, a large number of white people who make their living by fishing, trapping, prospecting, logging or who are employed by water transportation companies, air lines or trucking companies. It is natural that these people must be away from their normal place of residence very frequently in pursuing their means of livelihood.

On June 10 last, at one poll at Fort Rae in my riding 74 people voted out of a total number of 221 on the list. At Fort Good Hope 65 voted out of 146 on the list; at Coppermine 24 voted out of 118; at Arctic Red River, 15 out of 46. At Bathurst Inlet I think there were two or three people who voted out of a total number of 50 or 60 on the list. The reason for this, Mr. Chairman, is that, in particular at Fort Rae, Fort Good Hope and Arctic Red River, the people at that time were in the bush. They live in the bush and they were out trapping muskrat and beaver. At Coppermine and Bathurst Inlet, just a short while prior to the election the Eskimos there moved into the barren lands where the cariboo was available.

As I mentioned last night, the handling of the election in the Yukon on June 10 last shows clearly that there is a need for advance polls, and a need for more polling divisions in the northern areas. It seems to me a shame that an election can be thrown out because people are interested enough to take the trouble to exercise their right to vote. I hope that our gracious minister will study this problem and will recommend amendments to the elections act which will rectify this situation.

Mrs. Fairclough: I shall be very glad to bring the matter to the attention of the chief electoral officer.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, the minister has answered in part one suggestion that I was going to make or one question that I was going to ask, but I suggest that it was a conditional answer. It has been the practice after every election to have the Canada Elections Act reviewed by a committee of the house in the light of the experiences obtained in that election. The hon. lady is perfectly correct, as far as my memory goes, in saying that does not always happen in the first session.

Mrs. Fairclough: It very rarely does.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Sometimes it happens in the second session after an election. However, she must be aware of rumours that are appearing in the press. She must be aware of things that are said by the Prime Minister from time to time and which suggest that another election could come at any time, indeed that it might come before another session of parliament is held. I can only assume that this is a decision to be made by the Prime Minister and that the hon. lady does not know what is in his mind. However, it seems to me that it is appropriate to make the suggestion that if there is to be a review of the Canada Elections Act between the election of June 10, 1957, and the date of the next one it might be safer to have that review take place at this session.

This is not an indirect way of asking the hon. lady whether she knows when the election is to be; it is quite direct, if she is prepared to answer. However, I suggest in all seriousness that consideration should be given to that review being undertaken soon so that if there are any changes on which there is general agreement, those changes might be put into effect at an early date. After all, it is common knowledge that the chief electoral officer, shortly after the election of June 10, sent messages that might be called "alerts" to the returning officers across the country. It is also known that in a number of instances returning officers have already asked candidates and runners-up in the last election to supply names of enumerators for urban areas. All of these things suggest to me that if there is to be a review, it should be undertaken now rather than be put off to the time of a second session of the twenty-third parliament which conceivably might never be held.

In connection with returning officers to whom I have made reference, I should like to ask the Secretary of State whether there is in the mind of the government any intention to make any wholesale changes in the appointment of returning officers. I know there are some who are under the impression that the chief electoral officer appoints the returning officers in the various constituencies. The hon. lady knows that is not correct. They are appointed by the governor in council—or in other words by the cabinet—and they are communicated to the chief electoral officer who publishes their names and addresses in the Canada Gazette. As a matter of fact, he is required by section 8(4) of the Canada Elections Act to publish that list in the Canada Gazette between the first and the twentieth days of January in each year. At the present time, unless some have died or have withdrawn from the position for one reason or another, the returning officers are those who were named in January of 1957. I have no brief for any particular returning officer. I am not suggesting that any returning officer should be replaced. But I think it is a proper question to ask whether those who are the present incumbents can assume that they will be continued or whether there is any intention on the part of the present government to make a change.

I was pleased that the hon. lady indicated that the question of the rate per line to be paid for the printing of the voters' lists is under review by the chief electoral officer. I am hopeful that this is the kind of change that could be made without an amendment to the act and if he recommends an increase in the rate per line, I trust that it will be brought into effect. From the information that I have from my own city of Winnipeg, both from employers and employees—that is from the management and from the trade union side—I can assure her that there were a number of trade union shops in the city of Winnipeg which felt that they could not take on this work this year at the rate that is now allowed.

There is one other subject on which I should like to say a few words even though it has been spoken to at some length. As a matter of fact, it is perhaps for that reason that I want to say this further word about it. I am delighted at the number of members who have expressed the feeling that the time has come to amend the act so far as advance poll privileges are concerned, particularly to widen the qualifications. As hon. members know, I presented a bill a number of times, in fact, there is one on the order paper right now—whether or not it will be reached, I do not know—suggesting that the privilege of voting at advance polls should be extended to any qualified voter who finds that he will be absent from his polling division on election day for any reason whatsoever. I may say frankly that I cannot see that there is any reason for any restriction. This is one of the issues where both the Canadian Labour Congress and the Canadian Chamber of Commerce take the same view and I hope that favourable consideration will be given to this change.

I should now like to call one more witness in support of the proposition that the advance poll should be extended to all who find that they will be away, even if they are away on vacation. My witness is a very important one and he is a very highly respected member of this House of Commons, one to whom I have already had the privilege of paying my personal tribute. I refer to the hon. member for St. Paul's, His Honour the Speaker.

The fact that the hon. gentleman is the Speaker means that he does not take part in the debates in this house. I would not want to quote something which he had written if I was going to argue with him but I feel I am at liberty to quote something of his with which I am in agreement. I hold in my hand a very excellent piece of election literature put out by the Progressive Conservatives in the constituency of St. Paul's urging the re-election to this House of Commons of a gentleman referred to in this leaflet as "Roly Michener".

On the fourth page of this document I find some useful information which was made available to the electors of St. Paul's concerning election arrangements. One of these bits of information reads as follows:

> If you are a commercial traveller, an airline pilot or stewardess, a railway employee or a sailor you may vote in the advance poll from nine a.m. to seven p.m. Thursday, Friday and Saturday, June 6, 7, and 8 (sorry, but Liberal government regulations will not permit advance poll for vacationers).

Mr. Fraser: That is right.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The member for Peterborough is correct; he is right—that is the way the act reads as put on the statute books by the Liberals, but I do not forget the fact that when my bill was before this house last session it was supported by this party, by the Social Credit party, by the member for Mackenzie River who has just spoken and by one or two other Liberals but it was opposed by the Liberals in the main and by all the Conservatives who were present.

Now however one of the foremost Conservatives, indeed the first commoner, has had it put on record that he objects to the Liberal government regulations having denied advance polls to vacationers. I agree fully with what His Honour has said and I hope that although he is not now on the floor where he can argue with regard to these matters the government will pay attention to what he has said, when some of the rest of us bring it to the attention of the ministers across the way.

I therefore hope, Mr. Chairman, that the growing support for this proposal will result in action being taken at an early date.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to prolong this debate on advance polls and I think this is scarcely the time to do so. We may be able to take up the matter when the hon. member's bill is before the house. I would however just like to say that if my memory serves me well, without the legislation before me, the measure of the hon. member, while it provided for an advance poll 10 days before election it did not provide for an advance poll two or three days before election.

I could not help but think yesterday when the hon. member for Kootenay West was speaking that his firefighters would have been out of luck because they did not know 10 days beforehand that they were going to be away fighting a fire, and a great many people who are absent for reasons other than the pursuit of their business also do not know that far ahead. I just make this comment in passing. With respect to the change in returning officers, I am sure the hon. member is quite familiar with the provisions of section 8 of the Canada Elections Act. I can only say to him that this is a law-abiding government; we intend to proceed according to the act unless and until that act is changed and it is not the intention of this government, during this particular session, to propose any change in the act.

With regard to the election date I am beginning to wonder, Mr. Chairman, just what goes on around here. Personally I am preparing for the next session of this parliament.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mrs. Fairclough: But after listening to the hon. member for Kootenay East, who represents the official opposition in this parliament, and now the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who represents another group, I wonder if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would tell me—since he is in the house—whether the two of them are preparing to "gang up" on this government.

Mr. Fraser: Mr. Chairman I would just like to say a word or two with regard to the question of enumeration. I know of cases where a person has been enumerated, has received his enumeration slip and felt sure he was on the election list but when the preliminary list was printed and forwarded, perhaps to one of his friends he looked at the list, discovered he was not on it after all. This is in spite of the fact that his name was written on the list given to the returning officer by the enumerator and the mistake would have been made by the printer who, in checking it over, had left off this particular name.

That means that the person involved has to go either to the returning officer with the slip he has received and get a certificate saying he can vote, or else go to the revising officer. In some cases of which I know these people are cripples who could not walk upstairs and it has meant that they had to go themselves, taking this slip with them. Where it has been a question of going to a revising officer, of course, an affidavit can be taken but in many cases the mistake has not been discovered until it has been too late to adopt this method of correcting the situation. I am wondering if there is any way by which the slip shown to the deputy returning officer could be taken as authority to vote.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, it is not supposed to be taken as authority to vote but I know that in some cases the privilege has been accorded to a person holding an enumerated slip. I might say however to the hon. member that the voter himself does not have to apply to the returning officer; it can be done by proxy. Someone can take it for him and procure a certificate enabling him to vote.

Mr. Fraser: But generally they do not find out until a day or so before election, or perhaps a week ahead of time, and then it is too late.

Mrs. Fairclough: No, they may take it right to the returning officer rather than a revision board.

Mr. Fraser: Another matter which I mentioned was the question of stairs and I just wondered if the hon. minister could advise the chief electoral officer to ask the returning officer to try and locate polling booths in places where people do not have to climb a dozen or more stairs. I have heard of cases where ankles and legs have been broken in some places which are not very well lit and of course there is also the question of persons with heart conditions.

Mr. Bryce: Mr. Chairman, I wish to bring forward a grievance before the minister which concerns the fishermen in my constituency who very seldom have the privilege of voting. We all agree I am sure that our people in Canada should have this privilege. We preach to them: Whatever you do get up and vote; it does not matter for whom you vote, but be sure to vote.

Now these fishermen have not had that privilege. It appears that the favourite time for elections is during some time in June and the fishermen from the districts of Riverton, Selkirk, Hnausa, Arnes, Gimli and Winnipeg Beach have to leave about the 29th or 30th of May. They must go to the fishing grounds which in some cases are about 200 miles away. Now the hon. lady may say to me "Well, what should I do about that?" Well, I would say "Extend the time for the advance polls." The last election was held on June 10 and these chaps had to be at the fishing grounds on June 6 so they did not get a vote.

I do not think anybody wants to do them out of a vote but I would like the hon. lady to see if she could get an amendment so as to enable an extension of the advance polls so that the fishermen in lake Winnipeg will have the right to their vote.

I think every good Canadian should vote, and these men complain bitterly to me about not having an opportunity. Election year after election year they have been deprived of the franchise. I am not going to take up a lot of time, but I see in the papers that there has been an awful lot of telegraphing of votes going on in different parts of the country, and maybe we will be able to get the fishermen trained to radio in their votes.

Mr. Byrne: Mr. Chairman, last evening I was endeavouring to assist the Secretary of State inasmuch as I felt that many of the problems which were raised at that time might better be raised when the committee sits, and I want to assure the hon. lady that my prognostications were based on the warlike speeches and "brinkmanship" that were used by hon. members of the government party.

Mr. Winch: Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the answers given by the Secretary of State, but I regret that she did not answer—or at least I did not hear her answer—one of the questions which I raised yesterday, and one which is to me of the utmost importance. If the act is not going to be changed before the next election, cannot provision be made for putting the place where a person should vote in a more prominent position on the tear sheet? I hope the Secretary of State has not forgotten that question, and that something will be done about it.

I am not at all sure when the next election will be called—I have not the faintest idea—all I know is that last week I was notified from Vancouver that the returning officers in British Columbia have now received all the supplies which are required, and neither the Liberals nor the Socreds nor the C.C.F. group have anything to say in the sending out of supplies to the returning officers.

There is one other thing I should like to mention while I am on my feet—it is strictly my personal view, but I wonder whether the Secretary of State would give any consideration to it. In the years in which I had the privilege of being a member of the British Columbia legislature I noticed that in the estimates every year provision was made for a conference which dealt with what was known as uniformity of legislation, and that almost every session certain bills were introduced with regard to which members were told: there is no change in principle, this merely follows the recommendation of the nationwide conference to adopt uniformity of legislation. That brought this to my mind—that every five years, at the outside and, as a rule, every four years, every province in Canada has a provincial election. As far as British Columbia is concerned, for a few years they held one almost very year. So far as this house is concerned it is every four years; perhaps the time interval is shorter, but in any case it is not more than every five years that an election is held. This means the establishment of voters' lists. Under federal legislation there has to be a brand new enumeration every time, a process which costs a lot of money; moreover, enumerations in every province of Canada must also cost a great deal of money.

Has any thought ever been given, or will it be given, to the advisability of establishing, along the lines of uniformity of legislation, a uniformity of eligibility to take part in elections both federal and provincial, and to the maintenance of a continuance up-to-date voters' list available at any time for use in a federal or provincial election, or in the event of a by-election?

I have thought this matter over for quite a few years, and although I recognize that certain technicalities might cause some difficulty I do not think it is impossible to establish uniformity of eligibility and a permanent record of voters which would be available for use in an election anywhere in Canada at any time. I am confident that if this were done hundreds upon hundreds of thousands of dollars would be saved to the taxpayers of this country, and to our provincial and federal governments. I should just like to throw out that suggestion now, and hope consideration may be given to establishing a system in Canada along the lines I have suggested.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I shall be very glad to bring the matter to the attention of the chief electoral officer, and I am sure that when the committee meets he will be glad to hear representations from the hon. member for Vancouver East on this interesting subject.

With reference to the remarks about the place of polling, I must say I find myself in complete agreement with the hon. member for Vancouver East. I have had exactly the same experience as he, and I have found that even in our own committee rooms many of our workers fail to see the location on the preliminary lists. I will consult with the chief electoral officer to determine whether or not he can suggest to the returning officers that this information be printed in larger type. Hon. members will notice that it does appear now in bold-faced type—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): But only in 8 point type.

Mr. Winch: But still small.

Mrs. Fairclough: Oh yes, it is small. It seems to me that it could be in much larger type to draw immediate attention to it and, as I say, I will be glad to draw that matter to the attention of the chief electoral officer. I do not think the mechanics of this proposal are a matter of any great difficulty. I believe all that is necessary is to make the suggestion to the returning officers, and it could easily be carried out when they place printing orders.

With reference to the assertion that supplies have already gone out, these are the preliminary supplies, and it is the usual thing that is done after every election. The same procedure is gone through by the chief electoral officer in each case.

Mr. McIlraith: As far as printing the place of voting on the voters lists is concerned, I want to draw the attention of the Secretary of State to the fact that there is quite a difference in each constituency depending on the particular printer used by the returning officer. In some constituencies the voting place is printed in the same type as other reading material printed alongside of it, but in others printers will set it up in bold-faced type which stands out clearly. This seems a matter which could easily be corrected by a directive from the chief electoral officer, within the scope of the present legislation, and that no additional legislation is needed.

As to the committee of the Canadian Bar Association dealing with uniformity of legislation, I am not aware that this subject of a uniform election act has come before this body. It is probably something which should be suggested to them for consideration, because it will certainly be a great convenience if the election acts of the provinces and of the federal government were similar in their main points. One of the main reasons for this being desirable is that the officials appointed under the federal act very often draw on their experience and knowledge of the provincial election acts and, consequently, you get practices which are perfectly fair as between the parties but which are quite offensive as far as the federal election act goes. These practices are entered into in good faith by the election officers concerned, so I do hope that the Secretary of State will look into this matter to see whether something can be done along the lines of getting uniformity of election acts, at least with regard to the main points. It is a matter that I imagine would take some time. I do not think it could be done quickly but I do wish the minister would take it into consideration.

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Chairman, what I have to say is very close to what the minister had to say in some of her answers. While she is considering this matter of absentee voting I am sure she will be interested to know—and I give this as an illustration—that one of the fishermen in my riding indicated to me that the last election was the first time he had had a vote since the war. It just so happened that he was not in port on the day on which the previous elections were held. Unless they are in port it makes it practically impossible for them to vote. A broadening of the advance poll regulations would certainly be worth while. The fishermen are not included today. If they were included the crew would have the opportunity to vote.

I am particularly interested in another class on which I did not hear the minister comment. I must admit I was not here at all times. I refer to the pay that is given to the enumerators, namely 10 cents a name.

Mrs. Fairclough: I did comment on that.

Mr. Hahn: Yesterday?

Mrs. Fairclough: No, today.

Mr. Hahn: I am sorry; I missed it. I wonder whether the minister would repeat it.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, what I said was—and the hon. member is aware of this—there was some change in the remuneration in the last election. Although the per-name rate was maintained, a minimum was established in an effort to secure a more efficient enumeration. Now, in some instances I understand the new rates did not work out as well as had been expected but I can assure the hon. member that the chief electoral officer is considering it very carefully.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Chairman, I have one item I should like to draw to the attention of the minister. It has to do with the use of schools as polling locations. In the last election the Vancouver school board made the schools available at the request of one returning officer and they then broadened their permission to include schools throughout the city.

The schools are used in municipal and provincial elections in British Columbia. In those schools you have not the problem of stairs. The location is well-known to all of the residents in the area. They are used to going there and voting. The surroundings have a dignity to them that you do not get in the ordinary polling places. It worked out very satisfactorily but only one returning officer in all of Vancouver took advantage of the offer of the Vancouver school board. They are considering whether, when the next election comes along, they might not even close down their schools for two or three hours. They do not need to do that because you can use the gymnasium or the auditorium and set up as many as 10 to 12 polling stations in the one location.

The one returning officer to whom I am referring is permitted to hire special constables. Well he hired one for about 10 polls. That man acted to direct traffic. I visited as many polling stations as I could on election day and the business of the day was being conducted in those schools and in those multiple polling areas much better than in the individual homes. I do not understand why more use has not been made of such public facilities by the electoral officers. It seems to me to be a sensible and a wise way of handling it and I would commend it to the minister.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I listened with keen interest to what the hon. gentleman just said and I should like to support him very strongly in the remarks he has made. I have particular reference to what happened in the constituency of Laurier during the last election day on June 10. I am not free to speak of those irregularities which took place —I would like to—because there is an investigation taking place at the present time; but I am sure that had the polling stations been established in a school, in a gymnasium, or in some other public hall, it would not have been possible for those irregularities to have taken place.

I have discussed the matter with the returning officer in the constituency and I think he, too, is of the view that consideration should be given by the chief electoral officer and by the minister as well, I am sure, to this suggestion. It would avoid those irregularities and it would avoid people going into the polling booth in groups, particularly when the polling booth is in a small room of a house. I think there is a great deal to be said in favour of it. There have been irregularities, not only in my constituency, but in other constituencies elsewhere in the province of Quebec, and it does strike me that this would be an excellent suggestion which the minister should take into consideration and give careful study to.

If I understand the act correctly, I believe it is the responsibility of the returning officer to make a recommendation to the chief electoral officer who afterwards decides whether in his judgment and in the circumstances existing in the particular riding it is appropriate to have the polling stations in a public building of some sort. But I do want to go on record as supporting to the fullest extent that kind of suggestion and I trust the minister will give it the consideration it deserves.

Mr. Argue: Mr. Chairman, I think we all agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Laurier and the hon. member for Vancouver South. I think it is fair to say that the practice which they wish to correct has already been corrected in some ridings in this country. I know that within my experience the returning officer that I have to work with in my constituency has almost invariably—as far as I know invariably—picked a public place when a public place was available at a convenient location. It is the normal practice in a village, town or hamlet that the polling place is in the community hall. Out in the country, if there is a schoolhouse available at a central location, the polling place is usually in the country school. I think it is a good practice. I agree with the support that has been given to this idea.

As far as my own constituency of Assiniboia is concerned, my returning officer, Jack W. O'Neil, of Viceroy, Saskatchewan who was appointed by the previous administration, has done a very good job. There is one practice that I think we all agree has grown up. The enumerators and clerks in rural polls, and the other officials in urban polls, have been appointed almost solely—at least to a large extent—on the basis of the party which they have supported. In the past the returning officer has appointed people who have supported the Liberal party. I do not think that is a good practice; I do not think it is a necessary practice and I do not think it is of any political advantage to the party in power. The general instructions which go out to the returning officers today, when they are finding officials to carry on this very important duty, should be to obtain the services of the people who can do the best job and not to give them first of all a blood test to find out how they voted in the previous election.

I am hoping that under the new government there will be a change in attitude. In my own constituency there will have to be because I do not think there were sufficient supporters of the present administration in the last election to man all the polls. Therefore, there is a very real opportunity to pick all these people on the basis of the job that they can do. I would ask the minister to take that into consideration. I do not think Canadians today appreciate, or approve generally, the attitude that you have to be a supporter of the government in power before you can obtain any of the small jobs as far as pay is concerned, but very important jobs as far as the welfare of our country is concerned and the proper functioning of the democratic system.

I go along with those who have said that there must be changes in the election act in order that the thousands of people who are now disfranchised in elections will get the vote. Mention has been made many times—it is not necessary to repeat it—that many people are away from home on election day and that the provision as to people who may vote at advance polls is far too restricted. As I see it, the mere extension of the qualifications with respect to people who may vote at advance polls is not going to do the full job in probably half of the ridings in the country. The experience we have had is that there are very few advance polls in rural ridings and if a person is eligible to vote at an advance poll he may have to travel 50 or 100 miles to reach that poll.

Therefore the mere extension of the qualifications in regard to those who can vote at advance polls so that more people may vote is not going to meet the situation fully. It might help to provide a great many more advance polls. Along with the suggestions that have been made, it would seem to me that the various election acts should be as uniform as possible. The government should be aware that in a growing number of provinces people now are able to vote by absentee ballot in a provincial election and when a federal election comes along they are completely confused. They have had a chance to cast their ballot in a provincial election if they are away from home. When a federal election comes along they assume they have the same privilege. They have probably been somewhat careless but the result is that they are not able to vote. They are not able to obtain a copy of the election act in order to study it. They assume they will have the same rights and they are disfranchised.

But there is a particular group that I think should be given special consideration. I think it is a shame that provision is not made for patients in hospitals to vote on election day. I think it is a shame that people who have to go to hospital after the writs are issued are disfranchised. Surely some special consideration should be given to this problem. People do not go to hospitals for fun and they should be given the chance to vote. There are polling stations in some hospitals but that does not mean that the patients who have to enter hospital after the writs have been issued can vote. The hospital polls are for the staff, the people who are ordinarily resident in that area, in the same way as any other poll. Therefore I ask that special consideration be given to people who are patients in hospitals.

There may be difficulties in providing an absentee ballot such as we have in some of the provinces whereby on election day a person can walk into any polling booth anywhere in the province, ask for a ballot, receive it and vote in his own electoral district. It seems to me that consideration should be given to providing that a person qualified to vote at one poll in an electoral district may cast his ballot in any other poll in that electoral district. The problem would not then be encountered of people changing from one electoral district to another and I think that a great majority of the people otherwise disfranchised would be given the chance to cast their vote.

Will the Secretary of State assure the house that these points and others will be given consideration by the government? I do not imagine anyone present today knows precisely when the next election will be. I think there should be a committee at this session but if there is not going to be one then I point out that we are in a committee now where suggestions have been made and I hope that consideration will be given to those suggestions and that appropriate amendments to the act will be introduced.

Mr. Irwin: Mr. Chairman, I have the idea that the minister probably has some difficulty with my accent which is similar to that of the hon. member for Selkirk. May I assure her that if she has she has only to draw it to my attention and I will do the best I can to clarify. Yesterday I mentioned something about the service vote and I understood the minister to say that I was misinformed. I may be misinformed orally at times but I can assure her that my eyes are rarely misinformed. When I was elected on June 10 last the minister's party just did not believe that 38 votes were enough to elect me. They had a recount and I won by 59 votes. When the recount was held the service votes were counted. I actually saw the ballots and I can assure the minister that a number of the ballots bore the designation "Social Credit" and a number "Liberal" and they were accepted as valid ballots by the learned judge who presided over the recount. I do not see any reason why the name of the party that the candidate represents should not be included on the ballot paper.

The hon. member for Assiniboia brought up the question of getting poll clerks and deputy returning officers from the various parties. May I suggest that the chief electoral officer suggest to his returning officers throughout the country that as far as possible they get their deputy returning officers and poll clerks from veterans organizations. They will get them without very much trouble and they will get a fairly large number of them. It might help to overcome the difficulty that faced the returning officer in my constituency on June 10. He finally had to turn to the Social Credit in order to get deputy returning officers and poll clerks, and we were delighted to see that he got them. That, of course, in the minds of some, might have had something to do with the result of the election. I would not know that, but I suggest to the minister that the best results could be obtained by applying to the proper authorities such as veterans organizations, parent-teacher associations, community associations and so on. Far better results will be achieved in securing deputy returning officers and poll clerks than by taking them from the various political parties.

I also understand that some hon. members misunderstood me yesterday when I referred to fishermen being disfranchised. They were not disfranchised because they were fishermen. Provision is made for fishermen to vote at advance polls, but these men were disfranchised for the simple reason that in the riding of Burnaby-Richmond only Burnaby is eligible for an advance poll. There is no provision for an advance poll in Richmond. As it so happens, the fishing district at Steveston in Richmond is a long way from the centre of Burnaby where the returning officer had his office, and because these fishermen did not arrive home until early on the last day they were disfranchised.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I do not think I can let the last statement pass without making a comment on it because of its possible effect on some future occasion when a recount is made. I would be the last person to set myself up as an authority against the opinion of a learned judge but it is definitely not in accordance with the Canadian forces voting regulations to mark ballots in the manner described by the hon. member. Section 34 states in part that the elector shall cast his vote secretly by writing thereon with ink or with a pencil of any colour the names or initials and surname of the candidate of his choice. Furthermore, section 78 says that in the counting of the votes the scrutineer shall, with the approval of the special returning officer, reject all ballots, and then it goes down to (b), that have not been marked with the name of any candidate.

Mr. McWilliam: I should like to raise a matter now, and I appreciate the minister might not be in a position to answer at this time but I would appreciate it if she would give me an answer at an early date either by letter or whatever means she may prefer. I should like to know what would be the position of a candidate on filing nomination papers in a federal general election or federal by-election when he has failed to file a return of his election expenses at a previous election. This question has arisen in a good many cases across Canada, where a candidate was unsuccessful in one election and did not comply with the Canada Elections Act by filing a return of his election expenses. Then in a later election he was nominated as a candidate and was accepted.

Mrs. Fairclough: I would be glad to try to secure an answer to that. I do not think I should take it upon myself to answer offhand.

Mr. Hahn: In so far as the reply the minister made to the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond is concerned with regard to the acceptance or rejection of ballots on a recount, I think the minister will discover that the jurists do not necessarily use the election act in making decisions on some of these ballots.

Mrs. Fairclough: I recognize that.

Mr. Hahn: Under the circumstances, I think she would agree that it would be for the jurists to decide whether or not he would accept it.

Mrs. Fairclough: I have already said that, in effect.

Mr. Hahn: I should like also to endorse what the hon. member for Assiniboia had to say in respect to setting up polling stations in hospital areas, and particularly within the hospital itself. I would ask the minister to give consideration to the possibility of setting up polling stations within hospitals. We have many instances where those in hospitals ask us if it is not possible for them to exercise their franchise. They are denied that right because they cannot get out of the hospital. It would be desirable, where we have large institutions of that type, to have that done. I make that request because I find that the servicemen in our Shaughnessy hospital in Vancouver can vote. I know that perhaps certain individuals might not be permitted by the doctors to exercise their franchise, but there are others who are not quite well enough to go out and who would find it desirable to exercise their franchise if a poll were placed in the hospital.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to say a further word, Mr. Chairman, about the matter which has been discussed between the minister and the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond. I do not intend to get into the argument between the minister and the judge. In fact, that argument being raised, I feel, gets us away from the point that was made by the member for Burnaby-Richmond. As I understand it, his point was that service personnel are entitled by law to know the political affiliations of all candidates whose names are on the ballot. This is set out clearly in section 15 of schedule 3 to the Canada Elections Act which is entitled "Canadian Forces Voting Regulations." It provides that the list of candidates sent to places where the service personnel are located must include the political affiliations of candidates. The appropriate words read as follows:

> —upon such list shall be inserted after the names and surname of each candidate, the designating letters currently used to indicate his political affiliations, such designating letters shall be ascertained from the best sources of information available to the chief electoral officer.

I quite understand how some of these service personnel made the mistake but it seems to me that the mistake, the subject of discussion between the hon. lady and the judge, is beside the point. The fact is that we do allow service personnel to know the political affiliation of those whose names are on the ballot. Why can we not be equally sensible so far as the civilian population is concerned?

There is another question I should like to put to the Secretary of State. Can she tell us where the cost of the last election, which I believe she gave to the house in another way, shows up in a book like the estimates, for example. The estimates now before us show a token item of $25,000 for expenses of elections in the year 1957-58. When the new estimates come down I suppose there will be a token item in them. Where does the actual cost of the election held on June 10 show up in any official records of parliament?

My last question on this item is one that I thought perchance the hon. member for Northumberland-Miramichi was going to ask when I saw him rise, in view of the fact he was the chairman of the committee on privileges and elections in the last parliament. The question relates to the matter of redistribution, and more particularly to the recommendation of a committee of this house during the last parliament that study should be given to methods of redistribution including the possibility of having that job done by an independent commission. When I questioned the previous secretary of state about this a number of times he assured us that material was being collected but it was always at the next session that this matter was going to be studied. I wonder if the previous secretary of state left behind the material he had collected and whether the present Secretary of State has taken a look at this material and whether she can say what the policy of the new government is towards parliament being given a chance to study redistribution by an independent commission.

Mrs. Fairclough: In reply to the last question, it has not been considered by this government as yet. If the material referred to is in my department, it has not been drawn to my attention as yet.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Or as the Minister of Public Works says, maybe it is on the shelf or under the bed.

Mrs. Fairclough: The cupboards are clean in my department.

With regard to the first question the hon. member asked, the expense of the election to which he referred appears as a statutory item in the book of estimates. It was a token amount to cover by-elections. The amount for the general election is paid from the consolidated revenue fund.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I presume it will show up in the public accounts.

Mr. Fisher: Perhaps Port Arthur is a fortunate place, but we do have most of our polls in schools and there is no real question of patronage in our constituency. It seems to me, however, if we follow up the logic of the proposal made by the hon. member for Assiniboia we will have to do something about this question of urban enumeration. At the present time people who are selected to do the enumerating are drawn from the two parties which finish highest in the poll. I would suggest the matter be taken under consideration.

I should like to return again to the comment I made yesterday in connection with the nationwide campaign at election time of the junior chambers of commerce which is designed to get the people out to vote. I feel that there is not enough advertising of the courts of revision. Having regard to the position that the minister holds, I feel that she might take advantage of this co-operation that is given to the whole electoral process by the junior chamber of commerce in getting them to concentrate some of their advertising and their energy upon the question of advertising the courts of revision so that no citizen will go without knowing what the court does and how it can affect his vote.

On the other point that I mentioned yesterday, namely the question of hours off for the purpose of voting to which every elector is entitled. We had a number of embarrassing cases in our constituency. In one of them I was well set to go ahead with the prosecution until I discovered that the foreman who was involved in refusing to let an employee off work to vote was unaware of the condition. Then even later I was pleased to discover that there had been no prosecution because I learned that he was a member of our party. I feel that in this particular case not enough workers know their right. It seems to me that it is the duty of the constituency returning officer to make that right known by some kind of advertising campaign. That, of course, requires money which the estimates must take care of.

Mr. Kucherepa: I should like to make a few remarks on the subject which is now before us. I certainly agree that we need some amendments to the Canada Elections Act, especially with respect to the extension of the advance poll. I think we might well consider a far larger group of electors who should qualify in this field. Further, I think that we could probably handle our active hospital vote in this way. The hospitals for the chronically ill are as a rule subdivisions in themselves. The active hospitals are not as a rule and they have listed there only the interns and the staff. But if we were to make provision for an advance poll, I am sure that even in large municipalities where a hospital may be located at a boundary line the returning officers in two different ridings or even three different ridings could set up an advance poll in those hospitals.

Furthermore, I think we should also consider the possibility of making some change in the appointment of deputy returning officers and clerks so as to have it compare in a way with the set-up which we have for enumeration which works, in my opinion, very well.

With regard to the posting of voters' lists on trees and poles, I do not know whether or not this is the most satisfactory arrangement. In the city of Toronto, in municipal elections in the past it has been the practice to post the voters' lists in schools, fire halls and other public institutions. During the past year we have made further amendments in order to allow those lists to be posted on poles. I think we might well consider the possibility of adding to the advertising of the voters' lists by putting them in the post offices and schools as well as in the present locations. It was my experience in the past campaign that in some cases no sooner were lists posted than they were down the next day. I would think that furthering this objective of advertising voters' lists might be in the best interests of getting more people on the voters' lists without the last-minute flurry. These are the few observations that I wanted to make at this time. I hope that some of the other suggestions which have been made by other hon. members will also be taken up by the proper committee and be given due consideration.

Mr. Smith (Lincoln): I should like to address a question to the hon. lady. It is rather in the lighter vein and she is not obliged to answer it unless she wishes to do so. During the last election my name, John Smith, was used on the sample ballot. I was just wondering whether she was making any change this time.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Make it John Doe.

Item agreed to.

Civil Service Commission—

86. Salaries and contingencies of the commission, including a grant of $3,000 to the Public Personnel Association to assist in defraying the costs of its international convention to be held in Canada in 1957, $2,961,606.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In view of certain changes that have taken place in the set-up of the civil service commission recently and certain changes that are pending, I wonder whether the Secretary of State has a general and informative statement to make on this item?

Mrs. Fairclough: Because of the fact that those changes are still being made and because of the fact that there are a number of matters under consideration at the present moment, I had decided not to make a statement at this time. However, hon. members are free, of course, to ask questions if they wish to do so.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to ask the hon. lady a question with respect to transfers from one department to another. I understand that is something that can be done with reasonable facility between most departments but I am told that civilian employees of the Department of National Defence find it extremely difficult to get transfers to other government departments if they so wish. Would the minister inform the house of the present procedure with respect to transfers from one department to another and whether there is any difference in that procedure in so far as the civilian employees of the Department of National Defence are concerned?

Mrs. Fairclough: I am informed that the procedure is the same in all departments. The transfer requires the consent of the deputy minister of the department in which the employee is currently engaged and the move also requires the consent of the civil service commission.

Mr. Herridge: I have had several complaints made to me in this connection. I understand that the employees of the Department of National Defence find it much more difficult to get transfers than do the employees of any other department.

Mrs. Fairclough: I fancy in that respect the hon. member should probably speak to the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. McMillan: I wonder whether the hon. lady can tell us the number of civil servants? Can she tell us the total number of civil servants?

Mrs. Fairclough: The last number, as published by the dominion bureau of statistics, was about 148,000.

Mr. McMillan: Is the number about the same as that a year ago or two years ago?

Mrs. Fairclough: It is slightly more.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the minister comment on the wage and salary situation in the civil service? I am not asking for too lengthy a statement on this matter but as she knows a general adjustment or increase was put into effect just after the new government came into power. Can she say whether that has been made to apply to all civil servants? Can she speak also for public service employees generally, even those who might not be called civil servants as such? Also, can she make a statement as to the extent of the five-day week in the civil service or in the public service? Is it now general or perhaps I should say is it now universal?

Mrs. Fairclough: I shall answer the last question first. The civil service commission and the treasury board have been considering this question. It has been estimated that there are now about 6,000 classified employees who work longer than 40 hours per week.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Out of how large a total?

Mrs. Fairclough: Out of 148,000. It is now estimated that an additional 324 positions would be required at an annual expenditure of approximately $400,000 if the five-day week is granted throughout the service. The whole matter is under constant consideration with a view eventually to bringing them all on the same plane.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Perhaps this is an unnecessary comment but I hope that the statement made by the minister as to what it would cost to extend the five-day week to everyone does not mean that those other employees are going to have to be denied a condition which is so general in the civil service. After all so far as the other 142,000 are concerned it is obviously costing more to have them on the five-day week than if their positions were operating on a six-day week basis. As I say, I think this comment is unnecessary, but I can see that the statement the minister has made might be interpreted in some quarters in a way that might cause dismay.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I thought I had made it quite clear when I said the whole matter is constantly under review. No such imputation should be attached to my statement.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the minister answer the other question, as to whether the wage and salary adjustments which began about the time when the new government came into power have now reached everyone in the public service.

Mr. Fairclough: I am given to understand, Mr. Chairman, that the civil service is now covered by the general increase; all classified employees are covered. I think the only people who probably have not been taken complete care of are the deputy ministers.

Mr. McIvor: There is a question I would like to ask the hon. minister although I am not sure she is the proper person to answer it. My question is this: With respect to the bringing of pensions for retired civil servants up to the point where they ought to be, is there any consideration or any plan to take care of this matter during this session?

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, that is not a matter for the civil service commission.

Mr. McIvor: Thank you.

Mr. Hardie: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the hon. minister if there is anything in the regulations which prevents civil servants or persons hired by the civil service in the Northwest Territories or the Yukon from being paid for their transportation to the provinces for the purpose of holidays? I have received complaints in my riding from persons who, say, go into the Northwest Territories to work for a mining company and, after having worked there for some time, have the opportunity to apply for civil service jobs. Having got such a job they take on their duties and then the holiday period comes up. Such people are not provided, as are people hired for instance at Edmonton or Calgary, with transportation home.

Mrs. Fairclough: Well, Mr. Chairman, I think that would have to be a condition of employment of which such a civil servant must have been aware when he transferred from his other position; he must have known that that condition obtained.

Mr. Hardie: Is there anything in the regulations controlling that point?

Mrs. Fairclough: I am given to understand there is nothing in the regulations of the civil service commission; there may be something under the jurisdiction of the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

[Mrs. Fairclough.]

Mr. Hardie: I was wondering if this applied to the Post Office Department and all other departments.

Mr. Herridge: Could the minister explain why the cleaning ladies employed in this building have not yet received a raise as have other employees during the last two weeks, who I understand have received cheques covering such raise.

Mrs. Fairclough: This question was raised in the house some time ago. These people are employees of the house and I think the hon. member should speak to His Honour the Speaker, with regard to this subject.

Mr. Herridge: Well I made enquiries and was informed that these people are employees of the Department of Public Works. I want to get to the bottom of this thing; every morning I meet a delegation at eight o'clock and they want me to get some information for them.

An hon. Member: Do not get here so early.

Mrs. Fairclough: Since there seems to be some confusion, if the hon. member will send me a note on this matter I will inquire as to just who has jurisdiction over these people and what is the situation.

Mr. Hardie: I wonder if I could ask the hon. minister if anything is being done to give all the civil servants in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon the same sort of housing accommodation. We now find the Department of Transport provides a house, possibly worth $25,000 with furniture, linen and silverware supplied; Northern Affairs have a house with furniture; the post office provides a house with no furniture and so on. I wonder if the minister could tell me if the civil service commission is looking into this matter and whether a decision may be expected at an early date?

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, that is not a matter for the civil service commission. There is an interdepartmental committee on northern affairs which is presently looking into just such matters with respect to government employees in these areas.

Mr. Hardie: Is it not the job of the civil service commission to look after the employee relationships and cases where people in the service, no matter for what department they work, feel they are being discriminated against because they work for one particular branch of the service?

Mrs. Fairclough: Well, Mr. Chairman, only in a very general way would such a matter come under the commission; nevertheless the commissioners will be glad to take into consideration the member's remarks.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a further question of the hon. minister. Before I do so, since this is the first occasion on which we have discussed the estimates of the civil service commission since the new chairman took over his duties, as a fellow Winnipegger I would like to say how pleased we are at his appointment.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Some time ago I was pleased, as was the hon. the Secretary of State, that a lady was also appointed to the commission. I had better be careful when I mention the fact that she, too, is a fellow Winnipegger and that I believe the civil service commission is therefore in good hands.

From those remarks may I go on to my question. The previous government was asked on several occasions to consider collective bargaining for the civil service and it was either the previous prime minister or the previous minister of finance who promised that a study of this matter would be made, particularly having in mind what is done in the United Kingdom and in some other countries. I would like to know whether the new government is continuing the studies which the former government undertook? I have one other question but perhaps the hon. minister would like to answer that one first and I leave it to her to decide.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, the answer is yes; studies are being continued and may I say on behalf of the chief commissioner and the other commissioners that they thank the hon. gentleman very much for his kind remarks.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just one more question. I was pleased that the new government when it came into office last June acted quickly on the matter of civil service salary increases. I think that the new government would be prepared to admit, however, that it simply implemented something that was already in hand when the previous government was in office. The hon. lady knows that time moves rather quickly these days and, in spite of the confidence of the Minister of Finance that he has checked inflation, the cost of living is still rising and I understand that the civil service will shortly be asking the government for a further increase in salaries and wages to compensate for the rise in the cost of living since the last rates were fixed. Could the hon. the Secretary of State, in the genial and friendly way with which she has capitivated this house, assure the civil servants that such a request will be given her sympathetic consideration.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, all requests which are made by the civil service employees will be carefully studied and given sympathetic consideration.

Mr. Morris: Mr. Chairman, there are two questions which I should like to direct to the minister. The first is this: I wonder if she would be kind enough to ask the chairman of the civil service commission—I am glad to see him here this afternoon—if he will let us each have a copy of the text of his provocative speech made in Halifax recently on the philosophy of public service. I, certainly, as a new member would appreciate having a copy of the text of his address if it were available.

The second matter refers to the publication in the Canada Gazette of competitions held under the civil service commission. I am afraid I have left the copy of the Gazette that I wished to bring along back in my room, but if I recollect it rightly it says that in conformity with section 35 of the Civil Service Act the civil service commission herewith announces the following competitions which are now in progress. Several competitions identified as being now in progress were in fact not in progress at the time of publication of the Gazette, having ceased prior to that date. I wonder if we might have some clarification as to whether the Gazette will continue to be the official advertising organ for these competitions or whether the act will be revised so that we may not henceforth count upon publication in the Canada Gazette.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I am told that this matter is under active consideration at the present time. Probably time has caught up with the practice which has been effective, now, for some years. Actually the commission relies on advertising in the post offices and in newspapers; the Canada Gazette is really the official record.

Mr. Hardie: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the Secretary of State would check with the various departments of government which hire workers, especially in the northland, and recommend to them that they pay one scale of wages for a particular job. What is happening now, usually in regard to the hiring of native labour, is that the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources will hire an Indian to do labouring work and pay him $1.20 an hour. The Department of Citizenship and Immigration will hire a native in the same community to do labouring work and pay him $1.00 an hour; then some other department will come in and hire the same people as labourers at $1.40. I wonder if the Secretary of State will take the trouble to advise the departments concerned that the rates should be the same, and I hope she will recommend the highest rate.

Mrs. Fairclough: Mr. Chairman, I understand that Miss Addison, the commissioner, has just returned from this territory and is making a report on this condition. It is probably a matter of the rates for certain types of work, but nevertheless it will be looked into.

Item agreed to.

The Chairman: That completes the estimates of the Department of the Secretary of State.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

Administration services—

213. Departmental administration, $530,620.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if it is the minister's intention to report to the house on the activities of his department.

(Text):

Hon. Paul Comtois (Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys): Mr. Chairman, my statement will be a short one, on account of the fact that these estimates were prepared by the former government.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Good estimates.

Mr. Lesage: Well prepared.

Mr. Comtois: I hope so, but they have not been discussed yet. Wait for the criticism.

Since the date of my appointment as minister of this department I have carefully examined these estimates, together with my officers, and as a result it has been found possible to divert approximately $500,000 to other requirements which were not foreseen at the time these estimates were prepared. Specifically, about $250,000 was used to help defray the cost of the general salaries revision of May 1, 1957, and a smaller amount was used to assist in settling accounts resulting from the grounding of the C.G.S. Baffin in July, 1957. Hon. members will appreciate that had this action not been taken it would have been necessary to request additional funds by way of supplementary estimates in order to cover these items.

It must be borne in mind that the efforts of my department are concerned mainly with national development and scientific research and, in such directions, a maximum effort is required at the present time to enable us to keep pace with rapidly changing requirements in the scientific and technical fields.

Before closing, Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask the committee whether it would agree to postponing questions or discussion with regard to coal, or the dominion coal board, until we reach items 238 and 239. I hope everyone will agree that this be done in order that there may be no confusion in the discussion of the different items.

The Chairman: Is the committee agreed that discussion on the question of coal be deferred until we reach items 238 and 239?

Agreed.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, I had hoped that the minister would avail himself of this opportunity to report to the house on the activities of his department. I understand however that the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys were prepared by the previous administration, and this naturally accounts for the brevity of his remarks. Still, I am pleased to note that the minister has had no comment to offer on the remarks made by his colleague, the Minister of Finance (Mr. Fleming). The latter had stated that there had been an enormous amount of waste and extravagance in government departments. The fact that the minister has had nothing to say shows that, in his department at least, there has been no evidence of either waste or extravagance.

Mr. Chairman, I have a few remarks to make with regard to the mining industry. However, before going any further, I would like to offer my warmest congratulations to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois) for the great honour which has come his way. He is now at the head of a very important department and I wish him every success. I know that he will grant every request we may have to make of him.

(Text):

Mr. Chairman, I was hoping, too, that the minister would take this opportunity to give us a more complete answer to the question I put to him on October 16 regarding the amendment of the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. I was hoping that the minister would announce that the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act was to be amended so as to make it more profitable for gold mines to operate and thus more profitable to the gold miners, to the small property owners in the mining communities and to those who are dependent on this industry.

I should like to take this opportunity also to tell the minister that he is very lucky to be in charge of such a department as the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, because he has under him a group of men and women who are devoted, who are very able and I know they will facilitate his work.

In the past the heads of the different branches of the department have done some excellent work. Their employees have done whatever they could to improve the services of this department. Therefore, I wish to pay tribute to them for their devotion to the mining industry.

Not very long ago an important event took place, Mr. Chairman. From September 8 to October 9, 1957 Canada played host to the sixth commonwealth mining and metallurgical congress. In fact, we were hosts to an imposing group of mining people from 35 different countries. To show the importance of this congress I think it would be appropriate for me to read what was published about it in the Northern Miner of October 17:

> As a means of showing Canada's mining skills and wares to the world—to say nothing of displaying her scenery, her vastness, and her varied resources—it was an unqualified success. We doubt if any industry in any country has ever had a finer opportunity to place itself under scrutiny. Visitors from all over the world saw Canadian mining in wide perspective. They were able to see its diversity, observe its magnitude, study its enterprise, and evaluate its potential.

The article goes on to say:

> We think, however, that the congress did more than all this. While primarily a Canadian exposition, it permitted many people from many countries to meet each other, to exchange ideas, to compare notes and problems. Everyone on the tour learned much about Canada, of course, but it is a good guess that he learned much about many other countries, as well. Such a growth of acquaintanceship can work wonders in the spreading of understanding, the establishment of friendships, and the deepening of international appreciations.
> The sixth commonwealth mining and metallurgical congress did not just happen. It resulted from many months of planning and hard work by a great many enthusiastic workers on many committees in many places. To all of them goes unlimited credit for a task that was ably accomplished.

I wish to say here, Mr. Chairman, that some of those who worked hard on organizing this congress are precisely those who are on the personnel of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. Then, many other organizations did some good work in making this congress a real success. For myself, I had the pleasure to attend one of the meetings of the congress and I can say I was surprised to see the size of it and to see the interest in our mining industry of those who were visiting Canada.

There are other questions on which I should like to say a few words. I should like to deal mostly with the present situation in our mineral production. There are some soft spots in mineral production in Canada, and I am sure that when we see the statistics at the end of the year we will find that mineral production has suffered a substantial setback. The volume of mineral production for 1957 will be down not only in value but in physical volume as well. In 1956 the total production amounted to $2,068 million and the physical volume had increased by nearly 275 per cent as compared with 1935. There will be a substantial decrease and, of course, the decrease will be mostly in the metallics division.

If hon. members will look at the statistics for the end of July—these are the latest statistics we have on the production of Canada's leading minerals—they will find that the production of copper is down in 1957; the production of gold, lead and zinc is down and the production of silver is also down. By the end of the year we shall find that for the first time since 1946 the total value of the production and also the physical volume of production will be down.

We have a special problem in the lead and zinc producing industry. At noon today I read an article in the Financial Post of November 23 which was entitled:

> Canada Looks Like Losing U.S. Lead Tariffs Fight

I am afraid that within the next few months the zinc and lead producers in the United States may succeed in convincing the special tariff committee of the United States to increase the tariff on zinc and maybe establish quotas. Of course, in this matter the President of the United States has the last word and I hope he will not permit this increase in tariff because it would be very detrimental to the industry in Canada.

The zinc and lead producing industry in our country is a very substantial one. In the production of zinc Canada ranks second only to the United States. Of course, the largest producers are in British Columbia. The second largest producer is the Flin Flon mine in Manitoba. Lead and zinc mines producing ores and concentrates are also found in Quebec, Ontario, New Brunswick and Newfoundland. The trouble with the industry right now is the low price for zinc and lead, especially for zinc. The price is 10 cents a pound in the United States and Canada and I think it is only 8½ cents in the United Kingdom.

This is a difficult situation and if on top of this low price the United States decides to impose tariffs on zinc, which may be as much as 2 cents plus per pound, the industry will be in a very difficult situation. It is estimated that already Canada has shown co-operation with the United States. The mines in the United States complain that Canada is exporting too much lead and zinc to that country but this is not a fact. We have cut down our exports to the United States by a substantial amount. We may not have cut down our exports of zinc but we have reduced our production. I am told that it is estimated that cut-backs, closures of mines which were forced to close on account of the low price and a general decline in production will account for a 20 per cent reduction in production compared with 1956. This will mean a loss of production of some 80,000 tons of zinc during 1957.

Therefore we are hoping that the President of the United States will see his way clear to veto the decision of their tariff commission and that the tariff will not be increased so that our mines will at least be able to continue on a reduced scale in the production of refined zinc and zinc concentrates. If the president cannot do anything or if he is forced to agree with the tariff commission and increase the tariff, I think our government should look into the matter very carefully and maybe do something. Of course, I do not think that to retaliate against the United States, as was suggested, would be a good thing, but on the other hand if our lead and zinc industry is to suffer to the point that many of the mines have to close then I think something should be done.

It is a fact that many United States smelters depend on concentrates mined more particularly in the eastern part of Canada, in Quebec, Ontario and Newfoundland, in order to operate. Therefore I ask myself if it would not be wise for the government to study the proposal of encouraging the construction of a smelter in the eastern part of Canada in order to take care ourselves of our own concentrates. A very small quantity of concentrates is shipped overseas. I do not think any is shipped to the United Kingdom. We ship refined zinc to the United Kingdom, and if we were to refine more of our own zinc maybe we could find markets elsewhere in order to dispose of part of our zinc production.

I understand that this is a difficult problem because there is overproduction in the world having regard to the amount of consumption. Therefore there have to be cutbacks and some low-grade mines may have to close. On the other hand, it is very important that most of our mines be kept in operation. Moreover, in spite of the fact that we have overproduction I say that we should keep on looking for new mines.

During the last few months a discovery was made about 90 miles north of Senneterre, Quebec, and it would look as though there is a large deposit of zinc, lead, copper, silver and gold. It looks very much like the deposit will contain around 12 per cent zinc, one per cent copper, one or two ounces of silver and a few dollars in gold per ton. It would be very unfortunate if such a large deposit were left there unmined. The mining of the ore would probably provide a considerable amount of work for many men because actually the situation is the same in northern Quebec and northeastern Ontario as was explained to us the other day by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano with respect to the Britannia mine in British Columbia.

Today we had a report by the Minister of Justice about the situation of the Britannia mine. Here is a mine that has the ore, a mine with the organization to keep itself in operation. If the mine closes those people will have to move. I think these problems are quite serious and I hope that the government will give consideration to what was suggested by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano and other members on all sides of the house who are interested in this particular mine in British Columbia.

It is important, as I said a few minutes ago, that we continue to search for new mines because if we wait until we need the product it may be too late. I think the United States are making a mistake by trying to force some of the Canadian mines to curtail their operations and search for minerals. We all remember quite well that during the war we were asked to produce more copper, more zinc and more lead, and that even during the Korean war we were asked to increase our production. I hope that these points will be taken into consideration by the United States government when they have to decide whether or not they will increase the tariff and impose import quotas.

I should like to refer to another industry which is classified under the fuels division. I read an article about oil production and apparently oil production is going at a slow speed in Alberta. In the Financial Post of November 2, 1957 there is the following:

> On the oil and gas front—Crude oil nominations in Alberta for November dropped to 289,618 barrels daily—first time since May, 1955 that nominations have slipped below 300,000 barrels a day.

I am not an expert on oil but I understand that those who are experts expected that production would increase during 1957 and they were predicting a very high rate of production for 1958. Apparently the production in 1958 will not be much higher than that of 1957. These are some of the problems with which the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys should be concerned.

I understand that the matter of tariffs is properly the business of the Minister of Finance. Nevertheless, it is the duty of the department of mines to see that the industry is healthy, and the minister could and should make suggestions to the Minister of Finance to ensure the healthy state of this industry.

In so far as the copper industry is concerned, of course the price of copper came down and yesterday I think it was 27 cents in the United States and 25 cents both here and in the United Kingdom. Some mines have experienced difficulty in selling their copper at even 25 cents and have had to accept a lower price. This is not a matter about which the government can do much because it is governed by demand. Nevertheless, it is tragic in a way to note that some of the mines have closed down. It is tragic also to see prospecting and the search for new copper mines declining. The companies are spending less money for exploration. This is not a good thing. It is not a good thing for us and it is not a good thing for our neighbours to the south. Our neighbours to the south are finding that their reserves of minerals are low, in all minerals except perhaps oil and coal. This situation is especially true of the metallic division.

Some day the United States will be coming to us for minerals. We know that the United States companies have invested large amounts of money here and those companies have engaged in prospecting and exploration. Now, however, our friends from the south are trying to hurt the Canadian mining industry, especially in the way I mentioned earlier, and they should not do that if they want to continue to be on a friendly basis with us. They should be very careful what they are doing.

I do not wish to take too much of the time of the committee, but I cannot allow this occasion to pass without speaking about the difficult situation in which the gold mines find themselves. I feel that the proper time to say something about this is during the consideration of the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. If I say something about the gold mines, I do so on behalf of the gold miners, the ordinary working men and businessmen, the property owners in all the mining communities in Canada. I have a number of mining communities in my own constituency. There are many such communities in the constituency of Timiskaming and in the constituency of Timmins. There are some in British Columbia, some in northwestern Ontario and some in Manitoba. When I say that more help should be given to the gold mines, I am speaking on behalf of the people who live within those communities or in the smaller communities near large centres.

In northwestern Quebec, and the same situation applies in northeastern Ontario, if it were not for the mining industry there would be very little left for those who wished to work and to continue to live in those sections of our country. There would be the lumbering operations, but they are seasonal. The mining industry is the main industry in this part of our country. In the past, parliament has, as a whole, always endorsed whatever amendments or extensions were introduced to the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. I have heard so much from the Minister of Finance, when he was on this side of the house, in support of the gold mines that I feel we should not be too worried. On the other hand, on October 16 when I put a question to the minister of mines he said that he and the Minister of Finance had received a delegation, and with the officials of the department were exploring ways and means of increasing the benefits under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. Although the minister did not use those words he could not be considering decreasing the benefits so I deduced that the government is thinking of increasing the benefits under that act. Since that time we had not heard anything and the people in all parts of the country who are concerned with the gold mining industry are very anxious to hear from either the minister of mines or the Minister of Finance as to what is going to be done to help the gold mining industry.

The other day the hon. member for Timmins said something that I did not like very much. He implied that now somebody would be talking for the gold miners and the gold mining communities. I can tell him that if he reads the speeches I made during the last eight years he will find I never missed an opportunity to speak for the gold miners and the gold mining communities, as did many other members in this house. When we speak of the industry, naturally we speak of the gold mines, but when we are asking for some help we are asking that help for the gold miners and the gold mining community.

The Deputy Chairman: I am sorry, but I have to advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

(Translation):

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I know the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas) will forgive me if I do not follow up the excellent speech he has just given on the mining industry in his constituency.

I am very glad to take part in this discussion on the first item of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, and take this opportunity to congratulate the minister, not only on his appointment to the post which he occupies at this time but also for the courtesy he shows towards hon. members in his answers to their questions and in his general attitude towards them. I might add that some of his colleagues would profit greatly by following his example.

(Text):

I should like at this stage, sir, to take advantage of your presence in the chair to tell you how pleased I was with your appointment, and to congratulate you and wish you well in the new honour which has fallen to you. I pause for a moment to do that because you and I were next door neighbours for a period of many, many years as members of this house. I want to take advantage of the opportunity when you are in the chair to tell you sincerely, notwithstanding anything that might have happened in the house either recently or over the many years which I have been a member of the house, that I hold you in the highest esteem. I am very happy to see you occupying the position which you now hold.

I rose, Mr. Chairman, to deal with a question which, to me at least and I am sure to many other hon. members whom I will mention in a moment, is of the utmost importance. I refer to the demarcation of the boundary line between the southerly limits of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec on lake St. Francis. This is an old and vexatious problem. It is an old problem because it has existed over 40 years. It is a vexatious one because it has been the cause of a great deal of difficulty to those people who reside on both sides of an imaginary boundary line.

The hon. member for Stormont, my predecessor, has referred to this question on a number of occasions. He has shown a keen interest in it by the questions which he has asked. I am sure he has contributed in no small measure to bringing the question to the attention of the house and that is perhaps about all that can be done.

Along with other hon. members who are familiar with the British North America Act I realize that it is not within the jurisdiction of the minister to settle the question. But nonetheless, I think the minister is in a position,—for the reasons which I will give in a moment—because of the position which he holds, to use his influence or that of his department to bring to the attention of the provinces of Ontario and Quebec this matter which is causing great concern to the people of both provinces who live on either side of the boundary line.

The department over which the minister presides I think has a particular interest, first because of the fact that in that area there lies large numbers of islands, the property of the federal government in trust for the Indians and it is not possible to know in what area, either Quebec or Ontario, these islands are.

Another important reason which I think should interest the federal government is the fact that the St. Lawrence seaway authorities have given no less than $6 million worth of contracts, numbering about six or seven, for the deepening of the St. Lawrence seaway in lake St. Francis, which contracts are now in the course of being executed and where it is impossible to know whether the work being done is in the province of Ontario or in the province of Quebec. Hence it is a ridiculous position for another crown agency to be in.

If I may, I should like to take just a moment or so to give a quick historical background of the situation. It was in the year 1914, more than 40 years ago, when a trapper was apprehended by a Quebec game warden on a place called Ross island. The Quebec game warden maintained that the trapper was in contravention of the law of the province of Quebec. In other words, he maintained that the island was in the province of Quebec. The game warden went on to state that he had authority to lay a charge under the game and fisheries act of the province against the trapper. It was at that time that the authorities of both provinces began to look into the question, and here is what took place.

Evidently they went back to the original statutes which existed. I hold in my hand the first one or at least one of the earlier ones. I should not say it is the first one because it is not. It is 52-53 Victoria, chapter 28, an imperial statute entitled the Canada (Ontario Boundary) Act. It was passed on August 12, 1889. It goes on to say this:

> And whereas such boundaries, so far as the province of Ontario adjoins the province of Quebec are identical with those fixed by the proclamation of the Governor General issued in November, one thousand seven hundred and ninety-one, which have ever since existed:

And one of the clauses of the act reads as follows:

> 2. It is hereby declared that the westerly, northerly and easterly boundaries of the province of Ontario are those described in the address set forth in the schedule to this act.

Hence even from this early statute of 1889 it is clear that the northerly, westerly and easterly boundaries of the province of Ontario are established but that the southerly boundary which is along lake St. Francis was never delineated. One must therefore go back to the statutes of Upper Canada and the statutes of Lower Canada in order to ascertain where that boundary resides. The Consolidated Statutes of Upper Canada, 14 and 15 Victoria, chapter 4-5, section XI, reads as follows:

> The limits of the townships in the county of Glengarry shall in like manner extend to the middle of lake St. Francis, and to the middle of the main channel of the river St. Lawrence, but shall also include all the islands not herein otherwise provided for, the whole or the greater part of which shall be comprised within the outlines of the said townships so prolonged.

The corresponding statute for Lower Canada, which is chapter 75, section 62, of the Consolidated Statutes of Lower Canada, reads as follows:

> The county of Huntingdon shall be bounded . . . on the north by the river St. Lawrence, including all islands nearest to the said county and wholly or in part opposite to the same;

From those two statutes in both Upper Canada and Lower Canada, which were afterwards included in the consolidated statutes of the province of Ontario and later the province of Quebec, it became quite clear that the boundary was in the middle of the channel. The point was: Where was the channel? That was the difficult point.

After representations had been made by the federal government to the respective provinces a commission was established to inquire where the middle of the stream was or in other words where the boundary line lay between the two provinces. The commissioner for the province of Ontario, Mr. Rorke and the commissioner for the province of Quebec, Mr. Cote, in 1926, following their appointment as a commission, undertook to settle the question and together they were able to succeed in delineating the boundary on lake St. Francis from the westerly limit of the province of Ontario at Point Beaudette to a point about 300 miles south of Ross island. Beyond that they could not agree.

At that stage the province of Ontario suggested to the province of Quebec that they pass legislation and asked the federal government to approve it. The province of Quebec felt that that would not be the proper course. The province of Quebec said that until the whole boundary line has been delineated from Point Beaudette to the international boundary line opposite the city of Cornwall it would not be advisable to seek legislation from the federal government. However, at a later date the commission was established again and the boundary was delineated for another several miles until now an agreement has been reached between the two provinces to a point opposite what is known as Hamilton's island.

But there still remains another ten miles of boundary line to be delineated between the two provinces. There still remains also the question of having that part of the line upon which an agreement seems to be arrived at consolidated by legislation.

I bring the matter to the attention of the minister because I know of his interest in it. I know that he will want to do what is possible within the realm of his responsibility to have the boundary agreed upon. I should say to him that for many years I have tried to have something established with reference to the line; I have not been successful and it may be that where I have failed he will be successful. I wish him every success in that respect. I understand—and I say this with all deference—that he is a close friend of the premier of the province of Quebec.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Chevrier: It may be that he might be able to prevail upon that gentleman that this is really a question of importance, not only for the residents on both sides of the line but also in the general interests of Canada. My colleague in this house, the member for Stormont, I am sure will want to add some words in due course with respect to another reason which I will not pursue at this time because I am sure he will want to do so, but there is another reason of great significance to another department of government which will also be dealt with in due course.

There is this added feature that from time to time people who are either fishing or trapping or hunting in the area extending from Point Beaudette to almost the city of Cornwall, a distance of 30 miles, often do not know in which province they are actually doing these things. I mentioned a moment ago the inconvenience with which the seaway authority might find itself placed. I am not able to point to any particular inconvenience at the moment but I do know this: when the wage rates are different in one province as compared with another, when the unemployment insurance benefits and workmen's compensation benefits are different in one province as compared with another, and when many workers are engaged in work in an area which has not been demarcated, it then becomes difficult to ascertain certain facts.

I therefore make the suggestion to the minister, which does not seem to be unreasonable, that he should in my opinion—and I say this with all deference to him—call a conference of the representatives of the province of Ontario and the province of Quebec here in Ottawa and ask them if they will not set up a commission to complete demarcation of this line from the point upon which they have agreed, beside Hamilton's island to the city of Cornwall, so that we can have the southern boundary of the province of Ontario and the northern boundary of the province of Quebec in lake St. Francis delineated and that it can by statute be approved by this parliament.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I understand that we expect an important visitor about this time. Can I intrude into the arena of debate at this time?

The Chairman: Proceed.

Mr. Herridge: I rise on this occasion to make my annual appeal—I think it is my seventh—for the reference of these estimates to the committee on mines, forests and waters which has been in a state of suspended animation for 15 years. I am not suggesting that the estimates should be referred to that committee at this session because I recognize the shortness of time and the difficulties surrounding the matter, but I do urge that this be done at the next session.

To me it is fantastic that we should have a standing committee on mines, forests and waters remaining moribund for 15 years when the economic development in this country is concerned so with the development of natural resources. This is one of the two departments whose activities are particularly related to the development of natural resources; the other is the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources. I think on that account we should have these estimates considered very carefully by the standing committee of the house which is there to do the job if this government only sees fit to get moving into action. In addition, to that, Mr. Chairman, we have an excellent staff—

THE ROYAL ASSENT

A message was delivered by Major C. R. Lamoureux, Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, the Honourable the Deputy Governor General desires the immediate attendance of this honourable house in the chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly, Mr. Speaker with the house went up to the Senate chamber.

And being returned:

Mr. Speaker informed the house that the Deputy Governor General had been pleased to give, in Her Majesty's name, the royal assent to the following bills:

An act to amend the Old Age Assistance Act.
An act to amend the Blind Persons Act.
An act to amend the Disabled Persons Act.
An act to amend the War Veterans Allowance Act, 1952.

SUPPLY

The house resumed in committee of supply, Mr. Courtemanche in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

Administration services—

213. Departmental administration, $530,620.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, when the committee rose for nourishment at six o'clock I was making my annual plea for the reference of those estimates to the committee on mines, forests and waters. On checking I have found that I have done that for seven years and I suppose botanically speaking I should now refer to it as a hardy perennial plea. Anyway, I do this because of the importance of these estimates to the country and the importance of the work that is being done.

The committee on mines, forests and waters, as I said before, has been in a state of suspended animation for 15 years. I do hope the minister does something to revive it at the next session of parliament. This committee could do an excellent job; particularly in reviewing the estimates of this department, those of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys and the Department of Northern Affairs and National Resources.

This department is a very important one because the work it undertakes is very closely related to the development of the natural resources of this country and our greatest economic activity has been centred around the development of those resources. In this department we have an excellent staff of capable persons who are doing a magnificent job behind the scenes. Unlike some of us who sometimes know little and say much, these people are technically trained and give close application to the problems which are of great concern to the Canadian people and are of great value. If we only had the opportunity to hear what is being done in this department from the officers and staff in general we would be much better informed of the value of the work and the work of the department would be much better understood across this country.

The work of the staff of this department and of a number of other departments of government is done behind the scenes. The staff is unsung, unheard and largely unknown. In this respect I cannot help but think of those lines in Gray's Elegy In A Country Churchyard:

> Full many a flower is born to blush unseen,
> And waste its sweetness on the desert air.

If we had an opportunity as members of this house to discuss these estimates before the committee, to receive information from the officials and staff and to ask questions, it would be a great advantage to us in coming to conclusions which would give us a much better understanding of the valuable work which this department is doing and also, as I said before, widen the knowledge of this department's work among the people of Canada. This is a very important department at this particular time.

In addition to that, Mr. Chairman, it would relieve the committee dealing with the main estimates of a certain amount of work and I trust the committee will be established at the next session of parliament and so provide a great opportunity for a much better understanding of the work being done at the present time.

In this department, Mr. Chairman, we have five branches. The mapping branch deals with surveys. The hon. member who spoke prior to me before six o'clock gave a good illustration of the valuable work that the department is doing and can do. Another branch undertakes geological surveys of Canada. The mines branch is carrying on work of great value to the mining industries around the country. We all know of the valuable work which the dominion observatory does. The work of the geographical branch is most interesting and important and I am sure hon. members will enjoy hearing about it.

I see a rather more favourable impression on the minister's face than I have seen on previous faces. I trust that my plea at this time will receive favourable response when the minister meets the house at the next session of parliament. I do urge him to give consideration to this question and give us an opportunity to hear something more about the work of this department.

The last time I spoke on these estimates I took advantage of the opportunity to deal with the cruise of the Neptune and the taking possession of Ellesmere island for the Canadian government and the interesting part taken by Dr. Borden, a long-time constituent of mine, a surgeon and botanist on the expedition. Later on, as many hon. members will recall, I presented to the former minister of mines and technical surveys the only known copy of the proclamation which was read at the time of the taking possession of Ellesmere island during the cruise of the Neptune. That copy is now in the archives of Canada.

However, tonight I want to deal with another matter of serious concern to many of my constituents and to the people of British Columbia. I refer to the situation in respect of base metals which today in Canada generally are facing falling prices and declining markets. Before I deal with this matter I want to tell the committee that I shall not detain it at great length. This situation, which recurs in the mining industry possibly more than in any other industry, is clear evidence of the necessity for some overall national planning in this country and some greater co-ordination of the activities of the federal and provincial governments throughout the country. In fact, I think this problem could be faced much more effectively if there was co-operation between the federal government, the provincial governments, the industry, and the employees in the industry concerned. I think we could do a great deal as the result of that co-operation to plan more effectively the production of the base metals in this country, their utilization and sale and the development of the natural resources wherever they are found.

Now, I wish to bring to the attention of the committee a most interesting submission to the government of Canada on the situation in the non-ferrous metal mining industry by the international union of mine, mill and smelter workers in August, 1957. I might say that this submission was given very careful thought by rank and file meetings of the union membership, which totals about 34,000 in Canada at this time, and then by officials of the union and their research officers before it was finally drafted. I just wish to quote two or three paragraphs from this submission because I think they are quite significant. The submission, which deals with the general situation, has this to say with regard to the drastic drop in base metal prices:

> Base metal prices have fallen drastically this year. The Canadian price of lead is now 13¼ cents a pound, down 2¼ cents from the price of 15½ cents a pound at the beginning of the year. The price of zinc is now 10 cents a pound, 3½ cents below the price of 13½ cents at the beginning of the year—a drop of no less than 26 per cent. The present price of copper in Canada is 27⅞ cents a pound, down from 34¾ cents.

That was at the time this was written. I continue:

> But the price of copper fell even more in 1956 than it has this year; 14 months ago it was at 46 cents a pound.

That indicates the problems facing the base metal mining industry and the fluctuation in prices of metals at this time. I continue:

> Marginal producers cannot continue operation in the face of price reductions of this order. Large and well-established producers are also cutting back production in an effort, as they see it, to prevent a further fall in prices, and to bring the supply of metals into some kind of balance with demand. In either case, the main burden and hardship falls on the workers, their families and the communities affected.

Then the brief goes on to deal with the effect of the proposed U.S. tariffs on these vital interests in Canada and concludes with this:

> Finally, the proposed tariffs would add enormously to the instability and insecurity of base metal mining. The industry would become even more one of boom or bust. When prices were high, the United States market would be open and demand would surge ahead of supply. New mines would be developed and opened up, new workers would be employed, new towns built, or old, ghost towns revived.

That has happened in British Columbia in recent years.

> When prices fell, the United States market would be closed, demand for Canadian metals would fall off all the more, and the downward pressure on prices would be increased. As the Financial Post reecntly pointed out:

"Instead of a steady market with reasonably stable employment and production for Canadian producers, this country would become merely an emergency source for the United States, a place to turn for extra supplies when the home interests couldn't or wouldn't produce enough."

That was in the Financial Post of July 20, 1957.

This quotation recalls a statement which the same paper made during the previous metals crisis—

I think that was in 1953.

—when proposals similar to the ones now being made for sliding scale tariffs on imported metals were under discussion in the United States Congress.

I understand the matter has been laid over at the present time in the United States but there is no question that it is going to be a matter for discussion in congress early in the new year. I now go on:

"It (the tariff plan) is a shameless attempt to safeguard the marginal producers in the United States by turning Canadian and other efficient exporters into a kind of temporary supply on which the United States will draw only when prices are abnormally high and United States mines cannot meet the demand. Some of these protectionist congressmen have got to be shown that the rest of the world does not exist solely to serve the convenience of the United States."

That is also a quotation from the Financial Post. A good many Canadians are now coming to that point of view.

We understand that the position of the Canadian government is similar to the above, and that protests to this effect have been made to Washington. But they have fallen on deaf ears, and it is plain that something more is needed if the United States is to be made to give proper consideration to this country's vital economic interests.

That is what we in British Columbia believe, that something more is needed than just a verbal protest to Washington. In concluding my quotations I want to quote the final paragraph in this most interesting submission:

In 1952 the United States government urged Canada to expand production and increase exports to the United States by diverting from Canada's normal markets. This is brought out in the submission of the Canadian metal mining association to the United States tariff commission in November, 1953, which stated:

"In the years following world war II the demand for metals continued to grow. The competition for supplies throughout the world was such that lead and zinc were difficult to obtain, and prices reached very high levels in those countries where prices were not controlled. Even as recently as early 1952 the United States government was urging Canada to expand production and to increase exports to the United States. Even though this meant diversion from other normal markets and from markets where prices were much higher than those prevailing in the United States, Canadian producers complied at considerable financial sacrifice. The Canadian industry stood by the United States at a time when its need was stated to be urgent, and Canada is practically the only country from which the United States is assured of supplies at all times, whether under peacetime or wartime conditions."

Now that markets and circumstances have changed somewhat in the United States that is all forgotten and there are proposals to increase tariffs that will seriously affect the mining industry in British Columbia and across Canada. I do urge the government to take courageous and strong action to meet this situation. I do not underestimate the difficulties. These problems are all complex in our modern society but I am one of the good many in this country who think it is about time that the government of Canada stood up to these people and showed them that we are not going to be pawns of the United States so far as the development of resources, trade and industry is concerned.

Mr. Hahn: What do you suggest we do?

An hon. Member: No answer.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for New Westminster asks me to suggest what we should do. I am coming to that point on another issue. I am going to suggest a method of approach which looks like being successful in the near future. We do not know exactly what the present government has done to meet this growing threat, and when the minister replies to the remarks of various members on this item I should like him to say what has been done by the government of the day to meet the situation or what the government proposes to do. The hon. member for New Westminster asked me what would we do in this situation. I think I indicated in my opening remarks that we have a somewhat different approach. I cannot take the time of the house to go into our policies in that respect in full, but we believe that these situations arise because of the lack of a national policy for development and a national plan for investment in this country.

Mr. Hahn: Hear, hear!

Mr. Herridge: We believe that if we had some policy of that type we would not have this boom and bust in the mining industry and in other industries. I am very pleased to hear the hon. member for New Westminster say "hear, hear". We are together on that point.

Mr. Hansell: You did not tell us what the plan was.

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Macleod is so inclined to stimulate his miscroscopic ego by irresponsible, irrelevant and innocuous remarks that make no impression on the Speaker, or this house. I was going to point out that a new approach on a co-operative basis had been shown and

I think that was demonstrated the other day. As the member for the constituency in which the mine is located the hon. member for Coast-Capilano gave a very good recital of the situation that exists with respect to the Britannia mining company and its employees. He explained how the price of copper had dropped, how the company was losing large sums of money, how they then discussed the matter with the employees and agreed to continue to lose a considerable sum of money per month if the employees would forego certain benefits that were due at that time under their contract.

Both the company and the employees made certain sacrifices so that the mine has continued to operate since that time. Then the price of copper fell again and created a new situation in which the losses of the company were greater than it could consider carrying for very long. The union again made a very close study of the situation and also discussed it with the management. Their first action was to call together all the British Columbia members of all parties and the matter was discussed at a meeting held in the Hotel Vancouver over a period of two days. There were members of all parties present who were all sympathetic, and I am very pleased that after the union representatives had presented their difficulties and explained the circumstances there was unanimous agreement among the members from British Columbia on a telegram to be forwarded to the government of Canada in this connection. I will not go into the exact details but they agreed in principle that this matter should receive sympathetic consideration from the government of the country.

As I said before, the situation has deteriorated further since we came to Ottawa. National officers of the union and officers of the local concerned came to Ottawa and called another meeting of British Columbia members of all parties which they gladly attended. After a further explanation of the developments and difficulties in the industry those members once again supported the representations to the meeting, later to be presented to the government. I understand that the union representatives then met some members of the cabinet who gave them a sympathetic hearing. As we heard today, the Minister of Justice when in Vancouver made a further investigation of the situation and met the management, and we understand that the matter is now under sympathetic and serious consideration by the government.

Now, Mr. Chairman, in my opinion that spirit indicates the approach that will be necessary to deal with some of these questions. I understand the Minister of Justice met representatives of the provincial government, as well as management. It is in that spirit we are going to find solutions to these questions, through co-operation by all concerned, management, labour, the federal government and members from British Columbia. I should like to say, and I am proud to say—I think I am correct in this statement—British Columbia is the only province, the members of which from all parties, when its interests are threatened, can join together and show a common front.

This indicates an approach that can be taken to these questions. I am very pleased that this is somewhat to the discomfort of the hon. member for Macleod. In any event, in my opinion such an approach creates a better understanding of the situation and a greater appreciation of the difficulties in all persons concerned. I am sure that from this problem, from our point of view, will grow a greater appreciation of the necessity to do some planning with respect to the development of our natural resources, their utilization and investment to develop natural resources. It is in that spirit that I see a great hope in the future of doing something effective to meet this situation. This is a temporary, local situation. In the past governments have always reminded me of a forestry lookout. They see a fire and they go to try to put it out. If it rains the fire remains small. They put it out. Usually it continues to burn and does a lot of damage and goes out as a natural result of changed weather conditions; that is the attitude of most governments with respect to the economic fires in this country in the past and at this time.

I trust that this matter will continue to receive the very serious consideration of the government. I should like the minister, when he replies, to let us know what has been done in particular to meet the base metals situation, or what the government proposes. Later on, we shall look for continued favourable reports on the Britannia mine situation.

Mr. Lavigne: I should like to continue a subject referred to by the hon. member for Laurier, that is the demarcation of the boundary line between the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. The hon. member was quite capable of bringing this subject to the attention of the house. I am sure the information will be of value to the minister and his department. I had an opportunity of placing this subject before the house in July, 1956, when I asked the then minister of mines and technical surveys a question. In reply, the minister said as reported at page 6658 of Hansard for July 30, 1956:

I had the opportunity to see the records of the department and I find that the correspondence goes as far back as February 1938, when a series of questions was placed on the order paper and answered by Hon. T. A. Crerar, then minister in charge of this department. I would refer hon. members to Hansard of May 18, 1938, page 3241.

Since I became associated with this department there has been further correspondence. On December 8, 1953, I received a letter from hon. Lionel Chevrier, then minister of transport, pointing out the urgency of having this boundary survey completed. Following receipt of his letter, I wrote to the ministers responsible for boundary survey work in the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. The last paragraph of my letter reads as follows:

"You may wish to renegotiate the matter with the province of Quebec (or the province of Ontario), towards the completion of the survey for the demarcation of the line. I am fully aware that this demarcation is the entire jurisdiction of the provinces, but I simply submit that the final survey would prove beneficial to all concerned."

These letters were acknowledged, but no action was taken.

The matter of interprovincial boundary surveys is the responsibility of the provinces concerned. Our department does co-operate when a request is received from both provinces, usually by appointing the surveyor general as chairman of a three-man commission with a representative from each province; who are charged with the responsibility of completing the survey. The costs of such surveys are shared equally by the two provinces concerned and this government.

I can assure my hon. friend that, as soon as requests are received from the provinces of Ontario and Quebec for the completion of this boundary survey, our department will act immediately.

That was the stand of the former government in this matter. I took up this question with the hon. member for the county of Huntingdon in Quebec and the hon. member for Glengarry in Ontario. At that time I was assured of their entire co-operation. However, to this date no steps have been taken to bring this matter to a head. I feel it is very important. As the hon. member mentioned a little while ago, we should be interested as trustees of the department of Indian affairs because of the islands in that district. We, in the county of Stormont are not immediately affected by this boundary line because it touches the county of Glengarry. Our concern arises because many of our people go there as summer residents to enjoy the beautiful view of lake St. Francis and the fishing and hunting that the district has to offer. We find it very inconvenient, because at no time do we know whether we are in the province of Quebec or Ontario. Two years ago the game wardens on both sides of the river were having a field day bringing people to court for hunting or fishing in one province or the other.

You can see, Mr. Chairman, it is quite important that this matter should be settled once and for all. I think that with the new look in this house the government might be able to influence the provincial governments to come to an understanding on this point. As was mentioned earlier, we were concerned in this matter because of the department of Indian affairs, because of our fish and game laws and because of the development of the St. Lawrence seaway. Recently we have been concerned because of the great activity in the area around the city of Cornwall, the eastern limits of which are on the western boundary of the county of Glengarry. The city is expanding rapidly and its very active industrial commission is extending its operations into the county of Glengarry. Recently we had the opening of the Edo manufacturing plant, just east of the city of Cornwall.

What I am concerned with is the development of a harbour in that area, something which will bring about a serious problem if this question of boundary line is not settled. The city of Cornwall will spread to the east into the county of Glengarry but to the south it will touch the province of Quebec. We in the county of Stormont would be very happy if some action were taken in this matter. I hope the minister will use his influence with his party and his good offices to bring the two provincial governments to an understanding on this boundary line question.

(Translation):

Mr. Lesage: Mr. Chairman, first of all may I assure the hon. Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois) that I would be the last in this house who would want to embarrass him in any way. The trepidation—or should I say the fear—which was gripping me when I found myself for the first time in the same situation in 1954, is still much too fresh in my memory.

I rise to speak at this stage in the debate because I believe I should bring up a matter which, at the present time, is extremely important as regards the rights of the provinces to crown lands. In order to explain the problem more clearly, I should like first of all, to give some background information, and to be allowed to continue my remarks in English for that purpose.

(Text):

The act respecting the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys is chapter 73 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1952. Section 5 thereof reads as follows:

The duties, powers and functions of the minister extend to and include all matters over which the parliament of Canada has jurisdiction relating to mines, minerals, explosives and technical surveys.

Under section 7 the minister has a degree of responsibility for the demarcation of boundary lines between the various jurisdictions in Canada.

Earlier this session I had placed on the order paper a series of questions relating to the seabed and subsoil under territorial waters in Canada. The replies to the questions I asked can be found at page 1169 of Hansard. One of the questions was with regard to the crown rights in Hudson bay. The question reads as follows:

1. Are the waters of Hudson bay Canadian waters?
2. If so, are the seabed and subsoil of Hudson bay the property of the crown (a) in the right of Canada; (b) in the right of Canada, Manitoba, Ontario and Quebec; (c) if the answer to (b) is in the affirmative, what part is respectively within each jurisdiction?

The answer given by the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources is as follows:

1. Yes. The waters of Hudson bay are Canadian waters by historic title—
2. The law officers of the crown have advised that the control and administration of the seabed and subsoil underlying Hudson bay is vested in the crown in right of Canada.

I asked a second question which was similar with regard to Hudson strait. But of course there the only province which was involved was the province of Quebec. The answer there was similar to the one I have just read. The third question was with regard to the gulf of St. Lawrence where there has been more doubt as to the question of whether the waters of the gulf of St. Lawrence are part of the Canadian territorial sea. The answer to the first question which is substantive, as to whether the waters of the gulf of St. Lawrence are Canadian waters, is as follows:

1. On February 8, 1949, shortly before the union of Newfoundland with Canada, the then prime minister (Mr. St. Laurent) made the following statement (Hansard—page 368):

"We intend to contend, and I hope to be able to get acquiescence in the contention that the waters west of Newfoundland constituting the gulf of St. Lawrence shall become an inland sea—

The then prime minister continued along the same line, after which the answer goes on as follows:

The government sees no reason for departing from the principle enunciated in this statement.

On the question about the gulf of St. Lawrence which I had asked in the second part of the question, whether the seabed and subsoil were the property of the government of Canada or whether they were the property of the government of Canada, the governments of Quebec, Newfoundland, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, the answer was as follows:

2. According to international law the seabed and subsoil under the territorial sea is vested in the littoral state. The law officers of the crown have advised that the administration and control of the seabed and subsoil of the territorial sea is vested in the crown in right of Canada.

Of course, as to the question of whether the waters of the gulf of St. Lawrence, of Hudson bay and of Hudson strait should be considered by Canada as Canadian waters, as part of our territorial sea, I am in full accord with the answers given. But Canada is a federal state and even if, according to international law, the seabed and subsoil of what is now recognized as the territorial sea —to the three-mile limit—is the property of the littoral state, the question of knowing whether this property pertains to the federal government or to the government of the province concerned is a matter to be decided in Canada itself, according to our constitutional law and constitutional practice and the jurisprudence of our tribunals. So I was much concerned when I received these answers, especially the second part of them, in particular the one about the gulf of St. Lawrence, which reads as follows:

The law officers of the crown have advised that the administration and control of the seabed and subsoil of the territorial sea is vested in the crown in right of Canada.

I was concerned for a number of reasons. I remember studying—and I hope my memory serves me rightly—the decisions of the privy council in the cases of the Montreal harbour commission and in that case which is known across Canada as the fisheries case. If my memory serves me aright, I repeat, the decision of the privy council as to the seabed even under tidal waters was pretty much to the contrary of the opinion expressed by the law officers of the crown. Moreover, it has been the custom in the gulf of St. Lawrence for the Department of Public Works of this government to seek and to obtain the transfer of what are known as waterlots whenever the Department of Public Works wishes to build wharves in the gulf of St. Lawrence.

If as is said in this opinion of the law offices of the crown the crown in the right of Canada is the owner of the seabed and subsoil, why should this government seek and obtain from the provincial government of Quebec the transfer of the seabed which they need for the building of their wharves. Moreover, if it is true, as the law officers of the crown say, that the seabed and subsoil in the territorial sea are under the control and administration of the crown in the right of Canada, how is it that the government of Nova Scotia has always had the control and administration over the coal mines off the shores of Cape Breton? These mines are under the territorial sea, of course, or within what is called the subsoil of the territorial sea.

I was therefore greatly concerned with that answer and I wondered if this government was not in the process of depriving the provinces of the ownership of thousands, or even hundreds of thousands, of square miles of property in Canada. I do not affirm one way or the other but I wish to draw this grave problem to the attention of one of the ministers who has some responsibility for it.

I know that in the subsoil of Hudson's bay, just off the shore of the province of my hon. friend and just west of the coast of Ungava, great mineral riches have been discovered. According to the opinion given by the law officers of the crown, the nickel and iron ore discovered there would be the property of the government of Canada.

I know the hon. minister has always professed to be a great defender of provincial rights; I know this because I listened to him during the last electoral campaign and I have heard his parliamentary assistant say the same thing. I hope they will take up this matter with the law officers of the crown and with their colleagues in the cabinet and will see to it that this opinion is not simply given "off the cuff". I also hope the hon. minister will be able to secure, overnight, an opinion from those law officers explaining and substantiating, with the constitution and with the jurisprudence, that opinion which is mentioned in the answers I have received. As I said, this is a grave problem, and I know the members of this house would not like to have a question of this kind settled merely by some opinion of law officers of the crown. They would wish that the cabinet and the parliament should deal with such a matter. I sincerely believe that the provinces should be consulted with regard to it before any final decision is taken and before any final delineation is made between the boundaries of the jurisdictions of the federal government on the one hand and of the various interested provinces on the other; that is to say those provinces interested in Hudson's bay, Hudson's strait, the gulf of St. Lawrence and the seabed and subsoil of the territorial seas just off our Atlantic and Pacific shores.

I believe I have said enough to impress the minister and the members of the cabinet with the importance of this subject and I hope when he answers he will be able to deal with this matter or, if he cannot deal with it tonight, that he will be able to study it overnight and deal with it tomorrow when we resume the study of these estimates.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, I rise to speak about the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys and I do so having in mind some doubts and hesitations with respect thereto. These estimates were not satisfactory to many parts of Canada when the Liberals introduced them a year ago and I think, because no changes have been made, they still would not be acceptable in many respects today.

[Mr. Lesage.]

I come from a riding in the northern part of Ontario which has a very large mining area. You may know of the Kerr-Addison mine near Larder Lake, which is the largest gold mine in Canada and one of the largest on the continent. We have many other mines in Timiskaming which make up the Kirkland lake gold mining area and one of the very important gold mining fields. This area is well-known across the world. The problem with respect to gold is one of many facing the mining industry today and probably more difficult to solve than any other. We are continually faced in the gold mining industry with the need for an increase in the price of our products. That price is paid as a result of an agreement entered into between Canada and the United States of America a number of years ago. The mines have had to provide for the price of commodities purchased for their operation and we have had to keep in line with the cost of living, but we have found that the price for our product remains the same however as it was in the depression days.

With respect to this department an act was passed called the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. This act has been responsible to some extent for the maintenance and even the very existence of some of our mines. I would just like to refer to what the present Minister of Finance had to say in discussing the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act on June 12, 1956 as recorded on page 4972 of Hansard. He said:

> I have emphasized, sir, that this measure is no solution of the deep-seated problem of the gold mining industry. The difficulty and the flaw in measures of this kind is that they often lull the government and lull parliament into thinking that the problem has been solved, or at least that the problem has been met for the time being. No hon. member should delude himself into thinking that this measure is any solution, even on the short-run basis, of the needs and the problems of the gold-mining industry. These problems are going to require much more far-sighted solutions than are offered by the hand-to-mouth, stop-gap type of assistance that we have in the present measure.

Therefore, I say I am surprised that this type of legislation should have been reintroduced and that these estimates should not have been corrected to take into consideration the previous thinking of the present Minister of Finance.

We should look at some of the communities which have depended on gold mining assistance. Take two examples which were originally under E.G.M.A. in 1948 when it was introduced, the Young Davidson Mine, a subsidiary of the Hollinger Gold Mine of Timmins and, secondly, the Matachewan Consolidated Mines, both of Matachewan. These mines did receive assistance. Today there is nobody in those towns. A wonderful example is Matachewan. We had a community with a population of 4,000 or 5,000, having schools both public and separate, a fire department, hospitals, police force—completely equipped as a modern town—yet because of the limited assistance which has been paid under E.G.-M.A. these towns are now ghost towns and no people are working in the mining industry in those areas. We have not solved the problem of those communities or even tried to solve it.

Why, I should like to ask, are we interested in gold? I think that gold itself, as a commodity, has absolutely no value except as a means of adornment. If we want to make jewelry out of it, well and good. But the countries of the world when they signed the Bretton Woods agreement and set up the international bank set it up on the basis of a gold standard. We in turn in 1946 agreed to stabilize our gold price at $35 in relation to 13.71 grains of fine gold U.S., so that if we do not want to carry gold about in our pockets we have, to some extent, to support this legislation dealing with our financial affairs.

Personally, I am not too much interested in the gold. What I am interested in is what gold has done for this country. In 1909, or thereabouts, when gold was found in northern Ontario it had the same effect that the discovery of gold had in California; it spearheaded the development of that part of the country. Those young towns were built around the gold mining industry, and if that industry did nothing else it opened up the north of this province and created the communities we now find there. It was responsible, too, for the industries which are dependent on gold mining.

The problem of gold prices was faced when we agreed that if the price of gold was not to change, then emergency gold mining assistance should be paid. I think this assistance must be given, and that it must be increased, not decreased as it has been over the past few years under the former Liberal government. I think it has to be increased to take care of the needs of the communities in which gold is mined. The federal government has shown consideration to the gold mining industry in a number of ways. First, it pays a subsidy if mines cannot produce economically; secondly, it has allowed the gold mining industry three years in which to bring a new producing mine into production, without charging any income tax; and, thirdly, it has allowed gold mines to speed up the amortization of their depreciation. I think it is now time that we should take a further look at the E.G.M.A. whose provisions, as the Minister of Finance has said, were to be only a temporary stop gap.

I should like to suggest that this assistance be increased, but that it be increased with reservations. First, I should like to see E.G.M.A. assistance paid only to mines that need it. I know of some cases where this is not done, because I worked underground in a gold mine for 15 years and I know something about the situation. I am sure the Canadian people have heard of high-grading of gold. Somebody gets away with a few dollars of high-grade and it makes a good story in the newspapers. But many of these mines are being "low-graded". There are high grades in stopes which are shut off, and as a result the Canadian people are financing the production of low grade ore at a time when there is this other ore which would bring profits.

There are, of course, companies which need this assistance in order to be able to carry on at all. I strongly suggest that if this government is interested in increasing employment it should consider spending a few more dollars under the E.G.M.A. for the sake of reemploying a large number of people who have been thrown out of work by the closing down of marginal mines. But if we are going to pay under this E.G.M.A., then I think the Canadian people should insist that the money should go, first of all, to the people who work in the industry, because they are all underpaid at the present time in relation to other hard rock miners. Some, at least, of this assistance should be earmarked for the people who produce the gold.

Machines have been introduced and automation has been brought into the mines as well as elsewhere, and production has risen beyond the expectations that one might have expected from increased wages, but still, this increase which I suggest under the E.G.M.A. should also be paid in such a way that a percentage of it at least should go directly into the communities which are totally dependent on this emergency assistance. Surely if there is anything left over by way of profit, a reasonable amount should be retained locally, but some of these mines are taking the amount that is paid them under the E.G.M.A. and paying an equivalent amount to the shareholders, with the effect that the Canadian people are paying dividends to the shareholders.

According to the estimates, there are inspectors, federal inspectors. In my 15 years underground I never met a federal government inspector. They may exist, but I never met one. If there are any, I suggest they should take a look at this situation in relation to the amount of ore that is held in reserve, the veins that ore is in, and the assay value of that ore, so that we may ensure a much more honest practice than we have at the present time.

We have a large number of other mines which are closed because they cannot operate at a profit. Many of these are in the Kirkland lake area, and in each case the miners who lost their employment were not absorbed in other enterprises in the communities and had to leave those communities which, in turn, were dependent upon them. If we are going to continue the E.G.M.A.—and I say it has to be continued because we have no alternative at the present time—then we should insist on the requirements I have mentioned, namely that the needs of the miners and the needs of the communities should be met before any money is "divvied" out to anybody else. We have miners working in those mines who have no future. They have no pensions put away for their future. I suggest that some of this money could be used for government assistance to set up a national pension plan for mining and allied industries.

The Canadian people have had a great deal of benefit from miners, probably more from them than they have received from any other class of people in Canada. We find—and I think this can be borne out and has been borne out thousands of times in the past—that we have been able to develop the uranium fields which are so important to the Canadian people today because we have had miners who worked in the hard-rock mining industry for a number of years. It is possible to take one skilled miner and put four unskilled miners with him, but it is impossible to take all unskilled miners and expect to get a mine in operation. The fact that these miners have been able to move from the gold-mining fields into the copper fields of Gaspe, into Belle-Isle in Newfoundland, into the uranium fields in Elliott lake, the new property in Moak lake and the iron industry in the new Helen mining area is proof that hard-rock gold miners who spent their lifetime in the gold-mining industry are easily adaptable.

The industry is very important to the Canadian people because of its flexibility. One of the reasons why it is flexible is that we have the type of people who are willing to make the sacrifice to move from one job where they have security into a pioneering field. If we are to recognize this fact, then we should implement, with some assistance from the federal government at least in the administration of a pension plan. We should institute industrial portable pensions which will cover miners so that they can move from mine to mine and field to field, and still at the end of 20 years be able to retire on some kind of pension.

I am told that not too many miners last more than 20 years in the mines. We have a high mortality rate. Silicosis, heart trouble and all types of pulmonary diseases are prevalent, and some assistance should be given in that respect. I strongly urge that the new government take into consideration this matter of portable pensions for this industry. I should also like to say that of the hundreds of mines that are opened up every year very few exist long enough for industrial pensions under any other scheme.

In Timiskaming we have a number of other problems in the mining field. I think the gold-mining industry is of prime importance to the country. Because of the statements the Minister of Finance has made in the house over the years he must go out and effectively and very vocally ask for an increase in the price of gold from our United States buyers. On a number of occasions in recent years we have seen South Africa, Australia, yes and even France, ask for an increase in the price of gold and Canada has stayed quietly back and let somebody else do it. I think it is time, particularly in the light of what the minister has said over the years, that he take the lead in trying to increase the price of gold because that is the only solution on a long-term basis of this problem.

In my riding we have a number of people going into the uranium fields of Blind River. I would like to suggest to the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys that some consideration be given to those people because I can see exactly the same problem developing in the uranium fields of Elliott Lake as developed elsewhere. Frankly, I am surprised that we have not heard the representative from that area say something about it. We are hearing today, and we have heard it in recent years, that there are short-term contracts in the Elliott Lake area. We are asking the miners to leave northern Ontario to go into those areas and we are finding that they are being asked to build houses. The National Housing Act will cover them for a period of five years, which is the length of the uranium contracts. From then on there is a kind of half-baked deal between the mining companies and the employees to continue payments for 20 years. I am suggesting that some consideration be given to those people, because I think they are being taken in on the same kind of deal that my friends in the Matachewan area were taken in on, where, after they worked in the industry for 10 years or 15 years, spent their lives there, put all their money into housing and into the community, found that there was no more occupation for them in that industry.

I would suggest that some of the money given as emergency gold mining assistance be taken and put into secondary industries. Secondary industries could be put into northern Ontario if they do not have to pay any federal taxes for three years, if they could write off their complete depreciation in 10 years and still get a handout besides to help them get their original start. We are going to have secondary industries in northern Ontario and then Kirkland Lake will be a booming community instead of just holding its own. I think we have that obligation, not only to Kirkland Lake, Larder Lake, Matachewan and Cobalt, but to all the other towns that are dependent on mining because, no matter what we do about mining, there will come a day when there will be no more minerals of any quantity, or no worthwhile value, in that rock. Secondary industries must be developed to carry on the continuity of those communities which are hard to build up.

Let me mention Cobalt. I think it is a wonderful example because Cobalt certainly was a great old town. Everybody has seen the sign, or heard of it—if they have not they should go up and see the sign which reads, "Where all the silver comes from". We have seen a boom and bust in the silver market over the years. I have seen Cobalt when you could buy a shack for $10,000 and the next month you could buy the best house in town for $500. We have seen the ups and downs of Cobalt. Nothing has ever been done to stabilize the market for those products.

We have heard some discussion on zinc and copper and I think silver comes in that category; certainly this new metal cobalt comes in that category. I was very surprised to find that last spring the cobalt market had disappeared. There had been a long-term proposition but cobalt could be obtained much cheaper from the Belgian Congo. Is it the desire of the people of Canada to go to the Belgian Congo to buy our cobalt when we have a vast quantity of it already in Ontario and in Canada? I do not think so. Cobalt is necessary as a strategic war material. It is a metal that keeps; it can be stockpiled effectively. It does not deteriorate. We could pile it up in a yard some place and still maintain the cobalt; but we would not be able to get cobalt tomorrow if there was a need for it because there is no development of the cobalt veins in the Cobalt area. The cobalt is there.

But because the mining companys knew it was only a short-term contract, that it was going to run out in a certain period, they said, "Why in thunder should we block out a new supply of cobalt? Development work costs money." Why should they block it out? Because this is free enterprise, and I do not disagree that maybe this is the way they should run it, then we are in this position. We have need for the strategic war metal, cobalt, tomorrow—and the committee should know that cobalt is used in the manufacture of new types of metal. It is used in magnetos; it is used in all steel that is going to be used in very high temperatures and I presume that even in the missile program, which we may or may not be developing, this type of metal is very necessary. If we are going to spend the amounts of money that we as Canadians believe should be spent in this direction then it would be a lot cheaper to do it here than waiting until the need is much greater. If we believe that then we have to do the development work needed because it takes time.

In the meantime this community is existing on a boom and bust economy and I do not think that is the desire of the Canadian people. It certainly is not producing any wealth for the farming community because when people are living on relief you would be surprised how little good beef they buy and how little butter they buy. The farming communities close by are not doing any selling. In my opinion there should be further assistance for these mining communities in the estimates.

Near Kirkland Lake we have a very large iron deposit. It has been drilled and its potentiality has been ascertained. The necessary magnetometer surveys have been made. The amount of ore is very extensive, but what do we find has happened? The same thing has happened as in the case of a great many of our natural resources. Control of the property has fallen into the hands of United States interests. At the present time they have no need to develop the property. I think the Canadian people need that industry developed. I am sure that the people of Kirkland Lake and Dane need that industry developed, and I suggest that something should be done to assist in its initial development. In my opinion the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys has done very little in this regard.

We also have a field of coal in that immediate area which would be a great asset in furthering the development of secondary industries another phase of industry which would help to build up the communities in these areas. There is a large lignite deposit but some money is needed for its development and the establishment of a pilot plant so that we may know exactly how we can get the heat and energy from the coal. This is also something that should be developed under the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

There should be more money in the estimates for research. I should like to ask the minister two questions. Will he amend the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, the administration of which comes under his department, to make provision that when a mine receives assistance a percentage of that assistance will automatically go into the salaries and wages of the employees in the industry and into a pension plan for their retirement? Second, will emergency gold mining assistance be paid on a larger scale to mines that are now considered marginal so that they may operate? I think this is one of the ways in which the government can increase employment in all parts of Canada.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Chairman, I propose, as always, to be extremely brief. I should like to say a word in general about the estimates of the department and perhaps comment, and nothing more, on the predicament of what is Canada's largest mineral industry, the petroleum industry. As to the estimates I should like first of all to do something that is perhaps unusual with respect to a government department. As one who comes from the practical side of the industry I should like to congratulate the service or field personnel, particularly those men of the department of geology and geophysics who have for some time now assisted the development of the resources of our country, at times under rather difficult conditions. When I look at the department, Mr. Chairman, the only point which concerns me is whether or not we have taken into consideration the expansion of the development of resources in Canada. I notice that there is actually a drop in the number of geologists. I also notice that the amount of money we are making available to universities for exploration and research has not altered at all.

I think we should remember that what has made our country economically sound has been the exploitation and development of both natural and human resources. I believe we will agree that when we consider these estimates we are dealing with one of the most important departments of government, one which has been treated to some extent in the past as a poor relation of government.

I am going to make two suggestions to the minister. The first has to do with personnel. I do not know how he can expect to retain his staff of technicians having regard to the salaries that these men are receiving from the department. We are going to have to meet the competition of companies involved in the development of our resources. I happen to know something of the replacement of staff in this department. I happen to know also that it is not the intention of the government to try to compete with industry because it is expected that industry will naturally be a higher bidder. But when we expect these men to carry out this important task for us, we must recognize that they are going to have to have salaries comparable certainly to the amount of work they are doing for the department.

The other point to which I should like to make reference is one which the minister undoubtedly will have to discuss with the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources, one which has not hitherto been a problem. I refer to the natural resources underlying the national parks of Canada. It is a fact, of course, that there is no resource development of any national park in that sense. Naturally it is not expected that we should immediately open gold mines or oil wells in national parks, but I think we are going to have to recognize that certain areas of our parks represent vast natural wealth under the surface.

It is in this department that the leases or rights are held and therefore there must be some consideration of a future policy between the two departments with respect to whether or not these areas are going to be developed or on what basis they are going to be dealt with. Unquestionably the government is today losing money by way of royalties which they could well use.

I am going to close by referring to something that it was my privilege to deal with in the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I mentioned at that time the problem facing the oil industry, particularly in Alberta but also in western Canada generally. I do not like repetition and I do not intend to bore hon. members with the details. The fact of the matter is that every columnist from one end of Canada to the other has commented on the matter and I could do no more than repeat what they have said. Suffice it to say that the problem we have encountered in western Canada with respect to oil development is fast reaching a crisis in that a depressed industry is in a situation which is going to require assistance, not in the form of subsidies but in the form of intelligent planning with the aid of the federal and provincial governments. I have already expressed my views on how this can best be done and I will not repeat them here.

Perhaps some hon. members may look upon this industry, as is so often the case, as an industry involving only wealthy men and wealthy provinces. Let me reassure you that, while perhaps it is difficult to plead a case for Alberta which gives $20 to a number of its residents from oil dividends, there are still in Alberta a great many young men and women who today are without work because of the depressed state of that industry. Better than half of the drilling crews are today unemployed. Better than half of the exploration crews are today without work. Consequently, those auxiliary servicing crews that keep them in the field are also suffering.

I cannot help but feel a little frustrated, not with my own party but with the whole area of this eastern section of Canada which, when you complain bitterly about the depressed state of the oil industry, they say to you, you will now be short a few millionaires and they are going to have to get by with last year's Cadillacs. I remind you that a great many of our people, a substantial part of our population, are dependent on this industry. They realize that some action must be taken soon. I am going to sit down after saying this. This industry, which is so vitally affected by the department of mines and of course the geological surveys, has been given a great deal of assistance in many fields by the department, such as the development to some extent of the tar sands which represent the largest known oil reserves in the world. It has given us assistance in setting up what is now known as the mines ministers conference, an organization designed to bring uniformity into the laws on gas and oil in Canada. It has given us assistance through technicians and help in developing better methods for exploring for oil and gas. I am going to suggest, therefore, that a proper lead from government in aiding the oil and gas industry today and in relieving some of the problems that they have, rest with the minister of mines. I hope he will give this his consideration.

Mr. Byrne: In speaking about the unemployment situation on Tuesday afternoon, Mr. Chairman, I made reference to the critical situation that is developing in the lead and zinc industry. The hon. member for Kootenay West and the hon. member for Villeneuve made extensive references to that problem this afternoon. While prices are greatly depressed at this time, we are facing a much more serious situation in the threat of higher tariffs being imposed by the United States. The mine, mill and smelter workers brief, to which reference was made this afternoon by the hon. member for Kootenay West, points out just what may take place if these proposed tariffs are imposed. The union maintains a rather intensive research department in their head office in Toronto, and they have gone to some lengths to show just what the situation is with respect to these base metals.

There is a minimum of fabrication within Canada, so the major part of the Canadian production of lead, zinc and copper is exported. The brief goes on to say that about 80 per cent of the lead, 60 per cent of the copper and over 90 per cent of the zinc is exported. I should think about 50 per cent of the economy of both the east and west Kootenays depends on these base metals, especially lead and zinc. If this proposed tariff were imposed, one can see what would happen. While our market would not be wiped out entirely, it would undoubtedly mean large lay-offs and the curtailment of the industry generally. About two-thirds of our zinc production and over 40 per cent of our lead production is exported to the United States. The proportion of our copper and zinc production going to the United States has been rising quite rapidly. I know that the minister of mines cannot be responsible for any action that may be taken by United States authorities, but I hope he will impress upon the Minister of Finance and the Prime Minister the urgency of this matter so that they will make even stronger representations to the United States than they appear to be doing at this time.

There is another matter that seems to be affecting the mining industry of British Columbia. While it seems to be a purely provincial matter, I believe the federal government does enter into the picture. Some time ago I asked the Minister of Justice to look into bill No. 87, introduced by the provincial government. This bill provides for a tax on minerals of 25 to 50 cents on every ton of ore that is being mined for export. This provision seems to me to be a violation of section 2 of the British North America Act under which the federal government is responsible for the trade of our nation. The bill was introduced for the specific purpose of preventing, in so far as this restriction is able, the export of iron ore from British Columbia. The mining industry itself fears the extension of this legislation to cover other metals. Undoubtedly this fact has had something to do with the depression in the mining industry in British Columbia. The bill has been on the statute books since the last session of the legislature, but was only invoked some few weeks ago.

I know that the Minister of Justice has been very busy, but I am sure he is looking into this matter. I hope the minister of mines also will take the matter into consideration. Undoubtedly the measure was introduced into the provincial legislature in good faith, but the representatives of the mining industry view it with great apprehension. The hon. member for Calgary South has shown his dissatisfaction with what is taking place in the oil and gas industries. I think if he were to look about him he would find amongst his own colleagues people who have done more to contribute to the depressed state of the gas and oil industries in Alberta than any other group in this house or in all of Canada.

Surely the need for gas sales and gas export would be one thing that would depress the development of the oil and gas industry in that province. I understand that the premier of the province came to Ottawa only recently to make his representations to the Prime Minister in order to see if he would not do something to assure that gas may be exported and marketed in the United States under commitments given by the previous government. I hope that we are not going to find, after the next 15 years or 20 years, that we are left with enough gas in the ground to provide fuel for the next thousand years, as is the condition of the coal industry in Alberta and British Columbia. Had we taken, when coal was first being exported the attitude that seems to be taken over natural gas, those who opposed the export would have looked very silly indeed today. Atomic energy and fuel may soon displace even gas and oil.

But I am sure that the province of Alberta itself has made a thorough study of its reserves. The gas conservation board has been in operation for many years. If they have satisfied themselves—and they are responsible to the people of the province—that they have an unlimited supply ready for sale, we should not attempt to prevent the action they wish to take. I might say again to the hon. member that I think he knows probably as well as does anyone that it has been the attitude of his party that has very seriously affected the gas and oil industry in Alberta.

Mr. Thompson (Edmonton-Strathcona): Mr. Chairman, in view of the remarks of the hon. member who has just spoken and of the hon. member for Calgary South, I should just like to make a few remarks with regard to the gas and oil situation in the province of Alberta. The minister evidently intends to spend over $26 million in his department this year, of which over $10 million will be for salaries and $1¾ million for additional technical advice. It would seem that this would give the department a wealth of technical advice with regard to mines in Canada.

During the now famous pipe line debate and the election the present members of the government felt that the trans-Canada pipe line was an extremely important issue as well as the export of gas. Why is it then that the facilities of the minister's department have not been used by the government? Why is it that the export of gas must depend upon a royal commission which may report some years hence?

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, in rising to speak at this time I unfortunately have not the experience of the hon. member for Villeneuve who has had many years of experience in this house and who possibly has had time, as I have not, since this house opened to do some research and study on the mining picture as a whole across this country. I have found that the first month of a new member's time in this house is taken up mostly in finding where to look for what he is looking for. However, tonight I should like to deal with one specific aspect of the mining situation in Canada, one with which I am very familiar. I refer to the situation of the gold mining area in northern Ontario, with particular reference to the communities which are dependent on those gold mines, as was outlined so well by the hon. member for Timiskaming.

I should like to go back a few years to the time when I first arrived in the gold mining area of Timmins. It is necessary to go back to 1934. Possibly there are in this house hon. members whose memory does not go back that far. In fact, I think there may be one or two hon. members in this house who were born just about that time. That was in the middle of the days that have often been referred to as the "dirty thirties". I would not go so far as some hon. members have gone and refer to them as the former days or in fact the last days of the Conservative government. However, those were the days of the depression. Those were the days when men were travelling across this country from coast to coast. They were slandered. They were thrown in jail. They were called hoboes and everything else when, in fact, all they were—the biggest part of them—were merely people looking for a job and not knowing where to find it.

I recall arriving in Timmins in the summer of 1934. I will admit I was quite young at the time. However, during times of depression if you are big enough, you are old enough; and that is the situation in which I found myself. I recall that at that time before you could get a steady job in Timmins you had to overcome competition because there were in the neighbourhood of 5,000 and 10,000 men in the same position that I was in, who had come to Timmins from coast to coast because they heard that times were good in Timmins. I recall that when you could get a job as a spare-time worker they paid you 30 cents an hour up to 10 hours a day and if you worked more than 10 hours a day you were hired by the day and you were paid $3 a day. That is possibly fantastic in the opinion of people in this era; they possibly find it hard to believe, being used to the trade union movement as we have developed it in this country today. However, I can assure you that my memory is very good. I could name the place where I worked and so forth and so on, but I do not think we need to waste the time of this house by going into the details.

I can also recall when I first started working underground in the Buffalo-Ankerite mines which are closed down at the present time. They are one of the victims referred to by my colleague the hon. member for Timiskaming. It was a low-grade property with a huge ore base but the mine could not meet the problems of the gold mining industry, even with the present gold mining subsidy. The management had changed just before I started to work at this property. We had a new mine captain who used to make it his brag that every day when he went underground he fired the first man he saw regardless of who he was or what he was doing just in order to smarten up the rest of them. I would ask hon. members just to think for one moment of the position of the man who happened to be first seen that day. If he had a family of ten children it never entered the picture at all. He just happened to be the unfortunate man who was to be used as an example for the rest. Actually it was a very silly thing to do because all the men used to hide behind pillars, in the shafts or any place else available so that they would not be the first man seen.

I recall when I first joined the trade union. In those days you had to go into town, circle down through a back alley, go in through a tiny little door, pay your dues, take your union button home and hide it under the shirts in the drawer of your dresser. You dare not even mention the word "union" on the job because if you did so one of the 200 men at the gate would take your job the next day. Times have changed considerably since then but unfortunately, while times change evidently problems stay right with us. Possibly the problems we had in those days are forgotten today but we have a new set of problems facing us today.

These problems were very well outlined by previous speakers; not only the problems of the gold mining industry but also the problems of the communities which those industries support. In my opinion these are knotty problems; they are not problems which can be solved overnight or at one meeting. Wages, as has been mentioned, are extremely low in the gold mines and as a result of these low wages you will find other aspects of the community which are depressed. For example you will find rents in mining towns are very low for the simple reason that there are not as many miners there today as there were at one time. Consequently there is a surplus of houses in such places in these days of housing shortage. There are certain other aspects however which are not affected by low wages; food costs just as much up there as it does anywhere else and in northern Ontario there is an additional problem where we have higher costs for fuel as well as two extra months of winter in each year when fuel has to be used.

At the present time in the gold mining industry in Timmins negotiations are under way with all the local mines for a new collective bargaining agreement and the No. 1 item in those negotiations is the question of a pension plan. As the years have gone by we have seen, owing to the efforts of trade unions, pension plans have been established in various industries all across the country. Unfortunately, however, it seems to depend pretty well on the strength of the union as to how much is accomplished in this respect.

I can think of no industry in Canada from coast to coast which needs a pension plan more than the mining industry. There is no mercy in hard rock; if you are working underground and you have an accident you must remember that you are dealing with hard rock. That is why we see such a high incidence of lost-time accidents in gold mines; that is why gold miners have to pay an additional premium for their life and accident insurance policies. The insurance companies from their records recognize the fact that the gold mining industry is a very hazardous one. Added to that is the deadly, creeping threat of silicosis. Possibly it is not necessary to explain to this house that silicosis is not a disease, as many people think; it is merely a condition into which the lungs of miners degenerate after long service in the mines. It is just a series of scar tissues formed on the lungs from this silica dust which eventually prevents the lungs from expanding as they normally should. This brings about a general deterioration of the system until such time as the miner succumbs. I think I noted at one time the average age of a gold miner's life is 54 years as against the national average of about 67 years.

This condition brings about a situation where the miner is no longer able to carry on his duties and, as so well outlined by the hon. member for Timiskaming, we have no secondary industries in the gold mining communities which might absorb these older members at such times. That is why it is so important that pensions should be established for this industry. This has a very pertinent bearing on the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act which is considered with respect to the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys.

There is another aspect with which I would like to deal and that is the situation in respect to collective bargaining between the gold miners and the gold mine operators. I think this possibly ties in with the old picture of why this gold mining problem and this Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act has been such a problem. If these mines were small local properties then the problem would not be so difficult; they would either be paying propositions or they would not and they could be judged and dealt with accordingly. But we find the situation is far different from that. We find most of these mines are subsidiaries of vast, national, international, and in some cases intercontinental corporations.

Last summer I was able to obtain the financial report of one of our local mines which showed a profit on the local property of about $98,000. In addition it received a gold mining subsidy under the act of $385,000. However, they had charged the costs of development work done at oil properties against the local property and showed an overall loss of $28,000. That is just one aspect of the problems which are all mixed up in this Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

We also have to consider the fact that some mining operators today are the only people in Canada who absolutely refuse to co-operate with the trade union movement in any way, shape or form.

In my remarks some weeks ago during the debate on the speech from the throne I made reference to the situation in Murdochville, Quebec during this last summer. I do not think I need to go into the details here because I am quite sure hon. members are familiar with that situation. I mentioned also at that time that the same people who operate Murdochville either own or have controlling interest in five of the 11 mines in the Timmins area today. It follows therefore that the same mental attitude toward the trade union movement and collective bargaining which was displayed this summer in Murdochville will in all probability be carried into the gold mining communities in the Porcupine camp.

I would like to submit that this situation cannot be solved, in fact it cannot be even understood through a meeting with either one side or the other. If you meet with management you get management's side of the picture; if you meet with the unions you get the other side of the picture. I would like to suggest therefore that the only way to get a proper picture of the gold mining situation in Canada today, with all its problems, is for this house to take the lead by setting up a committee consisting of federal, provincial, and municipal authorities, plus representatives of management and union. That committee could go into all aspects of the gold mining industry and bring out a report, giving this house the true picture so that we will know how to take the necessary sensible and responsible steps with regard to E.G.M.A.

There is one other matter I would like to mention. In 1941 there were 28 gold mines operating in the Timmins area; today there are 11. In addition the Hollinger Consolidated Gold Mines in 1941 employed about 3,000 men while today they get a similar tonnage with about 1,100 men.

This might seem at the moment just a problem relating to the town of Timmins, or to the gold mining municipalities dependent on the gold mines, but I should like to bring to the attention of hon. members that some 126 communities in the province of Ontario are instrumental in supplying the needs of these gold miners. In one community they make the safety rubber boots that the miners wear; in another place they make the tracks on which they run the cars, and in another they make the machines. There are 1001 other things which are supplied to the miners which are not made in the gold mining communities, but in Toronto, Hamilton, Windsor, Kingston and London. So, if the gold mines go, not only are those communities directly affected but the repercussions are going to be felt right across the country. That is one thing which makes this a problem not only for the gold mines and the gold mining communities but also for hon. members of this house from one end of the country to the other, and certainly it is a problem for the government about which, Mr. Chairman, I submit it should use every effort to do something.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word or two about the gas and oil industries in the province of Alberta. One of the conditions which I think is contributing very largely in our part of the country to an ever-rising unemployment problem is the lack of employment in these industries and in the coal industry. These industries are three of the largest in the west, and they are three which are most affected as far as the gas industry is concerned. I want to agree with the hon. member for Kootenay East who said a while ago that this government must accept a large share of the responsibility for the depressed condition of the gas industry in the province of Alberta. Those of us who were here last year will quite well recall the outstanding effort—and I emphasize the word "outstanding"—which was made by the Conservative party in an attempt to defeat the proposal to construct a trans-Canada gas pipe line. If they had had their way the gas industry of the province of Alberta and, eventually of Saskatchewan too, would have received a very severe set-back.

Not only did this present government do its utmost to prevent the construction of the trans-Canada gas pipe line, but they have since done considerable damage to the possibility of having gas exported to the United States. Some time ago the leader of this party, the hon. member for Peace River, asked the Prime Minister a question concerning the possibility of exporting gas to the United States, bearing in mind a commitment which was given by the former minister of trade and commerce last year, and the Prime Minister stated, in effect, that he would not accept as his responsibility any commitment made by the previous government. That has certainly gone a long way toward supplying material for those in the United States who are endeavouring to prevent the export of Alberta gas into the United States. It is certainly not helping to build our export business, and it is certainly not helping to bring United States dollars into Canada to offset our tremendous adverse balance of trade. As I say, the present government must accept a large share of responsibility for this.

An hon. Member: Nonsense.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): If the hon. member will look up the records he will find out that what I am saying is absolutely true, and the people of Canada are becoming very conscious of that. It would pay new hon. members of this house, particularly, to go back and read over the records of some of the debates which took place last year.

An hon. Member: We read it in the newspapers.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): They might read back and see where the responsibility lies. No, you did not read it all in the newspapers. You read a very biased report, and if you were to read some of the reports in the newspapers now—I think it was the Financial Post—you would find out that they, too, have begun to change their ideas regarding what was published on the pipe line.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the hon. member suggest we should have that debate all over again?

An hon. Member: God forbid.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): That would be all right with me. Let me point out that it was the C.C.F. party who joined hands and went to bed with the Conservatives in an effort to stop—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We wanted the pipe line built under public ownership.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): —this enterprise and who must share responsibility to a large degree for the ever-increasing unemployment we have today.

An hon. Member: Time to go to bed.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): May I call it ten o'clock.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: Would the leader of the house kindly tell us the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Green: Tomorrow we shall continue with these estimates, and then with the estimates of the departments of veterans affairs, fisheries and justice.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

TRADE AGREEMENTS AND CONTRACTS FOR WHEAT

Question No. 198—Mr. Hansell:

1. What trade agreements presently exist between the United Kingdom and Canada for the purchase of Canadian wheat and when was each agreement signed?

2. How many contracts or purchases for wheat have been made by: (a) United Kingdom government; (b) other British purchasers, for each month of 1957?

Answer by: Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce):

1. None.

2. (a) None.

(b) Purchases of wheat and wheat flour by the United Kingdom are handled by the private trade. Individual sales contracts or purchasing agreements are negotiated by the private trade in the United Kingdom with Canadian exporters. Details of these agreements are, therefore, not known.

Export shipments of wheat and flour to the United Kingdom for each month during 1957 are as follows:

1957 Month	Wheat (bushels)	Flour (bushels equivalent)
January	6,107,641	981,253

APPENDIX

EXCHANGE OF CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN PRIME MINISTER AND PREMIER OF MANITOBA

Province of Manitoba
Office of the Premier Winnipeg

November 12, 1957.

The Right Hon. John G. Diefenbaker,
P.C., Q.C.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Diefenbaker:

I am glad to learn from your letter of October 31, 1957, that all provinces have accepted November 25 and 26 as the dates for the proposed federal-provincial conference and that the conference has accordingly been called for that time.

We in Manitoba are in entire agreement with your government in believing that the conference should centre on dominion-provincial fiscal relations and that though other current issues having a bearing on the main question can be discussed, the detailed consideration of these subjects should be undertaken by groups which are directly interested in them and which can devote more time to their study than the plenary conference would likely give. One of the most important of these is hospital insurance and I would therefore like to urge again, as I did in my recent letter on the subject, that arrangements be made for a full discussion of hospital insurance, either just before or just after the federal-provincial financial conference.

My colleagues and I are somewhat concerned about the wording of your letter of October 31, 1957, particularly in view of your earlier one of September 16, 1957. It seemed clear to us in the letter of September 16 that the meeting proposed for November 25 and 26 was indeed to be a detailed conference on fiscal relations and in view of the general tenor of that letter and the matters to which it refers we expected that the provinces were being invited to a conference which would deal exhaustively with the urgent and ever-pressing problem of provincial and municipal financial requirements. One small section of your letter of October 31, however, seems to indicate that you have changed your mind about the scope of this conference. There seems to be an implication in your letter that the November conference is really to be a preliminary one.

Were this interpretation of ours, which we can hardly credit, correct, we would indeed feel that a serious change had been made in the plans for this meeting. In giving consideration to your letter and invitation of September 16 we were impressed, as we believe many people throughout the nation are, with the urgency of the provincial and municipal financial problems as they relate to the fiscal arrangements between the various forms of government in Canada. It was in the light of these considerations that we made our plans to attend the meeting in Ottawa at that time, even though the dates were not the ones which we would have chosen. For this reason we find it difficult to think that we have been asked to make our decisions against one background only to find that the type of conference is now to be changed from a decisive one to one which, under a fairly easy interpretation of your letter of October 31, might well be of a preliminary nature only.

We are most anxious to have your reassurance that the conference to be held in Ottawa on November 25 and 26 is to be one at which significant agreements can be reached as to the adequacy or otherwise of the present fiscal relations as between the provinces and the federal government. It is, of course, recognized by all of us that the conference itself cannot decide those matters which are the prerogative of parliament and the legislatures, but we have found on previous occasions that both the federal government and the provincial governments have been able to arrive at conclusive agreements or arrangements which later on were found to be acceptable to our respective legislative bodies.

To sum up, we in Manitoba have now made our arrangements to come to the meeting in Ottawa on your suggested dates; we find ourselves in complete agreement with you that certain matters coming before the conference may well require a more specialized study than can be given to them by the conference as a whole, but we hope that your letter of October 31 does not in any way represent an intention of changing this coming conference from the decisive one which we expected from your letter of September 16, to one which has the value of only a "preliminary" meeting.

In any event Manitoba's representatives will be present, and we will expect the opportunity to place our case fully on record. We will be prepared to stay as long as is necessary in order to have full consideration given to these vitally important subjects.

Yours sincerely,

Douglas Campbell.

Dominion-Provincial Conference

Ottawa, November 17, 1957.

My dear Premier:

I have your letter of the 12th and note with pleasure that you are in agreement with the federal government that the November dominion-provincial conference should center on dominion-provincial fiscal relations and that an opportunity should be afforded to discuss current issues which have a bearing on our fiscal relations. I have in mind such issues as those which bear so important a relation both to the federal budget and to provincial budgets that we cannot reach a significant agreement on changes in dominion-provincial fiscal arrangements until these issues have been carefully examined.

It is not expected that within two days it will be possible to consider fully the variety of problems and suggestions that will be put forward. The arrangements which we have proposed are intended to make it feasible to deal seriously with the major problems. Some time will be required to consider what proposals should be made in the light of the views brought forward at the November meeting. We think it better to consider specific proposals at a subsequent meeting after we have all had an opportunity to study what is said at the first one and proposals arising from it. This need not, however, prevent our reaching agreement on any issues on which discussions next week reveal that general agreement has been achieved.

Yours sincerely,

John G. Diefenbaker.

The Honourable D. L. Campbell, M.L.A.,
Premier of Manitoba,
Legislative Building,
Winnipeg, Manitoba.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, November 22, 1957

The house met at eleven o'clock.

POWER

FEDERAL LOANS FOR PROVINCIAL DEVELOPMENTS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I wonder whether the Prime Minister is in a position now to answer starred question No. 37.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I regret that I was not here yesterday. I promised to give an answer at the first opportunity and I had it available, but it was necessary for me to be absent. The questions are as follows:

1. Are loans based on the principle applied to the Beechwood project to be available only for projects in the Atlantic provinces?

The answer is no.

2. If not, will all provinces qualify?

The answer is that any province that has a project for which there is an equally good case could qualify in respect of that project.

3. Are such loans available only for projects owned by provincial governments or provincial crown agencies or will they be available to private power companies sponsored by a provincial government?

The answer is no, they would not be available for private companies.

4. Are such loans available only for new or uncompleted projects or will they be available for refunding obligations of established power projects in the Atlantic provinces?

The answer is they would not be available for refunding obligations.

Hon. Jean Lesage (Montmagny-L'Islet): May I ask a supplementary question. The Prime Minister said, in answer to the second part of the question, I believe, that other provinces would be eligible if they had an equally good case. Would he be good enough to enlarge on that and tell the house especially if the words "equally good case" have in them the factor of inability to supply the capital necessary for a given development?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, the general policy, of course, arose in connection with the peculiar circumstances existing in the maritime provinces, where through the years there has been a realization on the part of Canadians as a whole that those areas did not at all times equal the general development in other parts of Canada. Wherever there is a position similar to that, naturally the similar circumstances will assure that similar consideration will be given by the government to applications made by provinces.

Mr. Lesage: May I ask a supplementary question. Do I interpret the reply of the Prime Minister as meaning that, under the present financial circumstances of Ontario and Quebec, this policy would not apply to them?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have given the general formula. My hon. friend will be able to determine the answer, on the basis of that formula, as to whether or not Ontario and Quebec would be in a similar category.

TRADE

MISSION TO UNITED KINGDOM—MATTERS TO BE DISCUSSED

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): Yesterday the Prime Minister expressed the hope that as a result of the mission going to the United Kingdom, a new concept of trade between our country and the United Kingdom would be born. Did that new concept to which he was referring mean the acceptance of the free trade offer made by the United Kingdom?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Again my hon. friend is placing himself in the position of interpreting the words I used. What I said in effect was this, that the mission in question is unusual in the sense that I believe it is the first of its kind; imaginative in its concept, in that businessmen, agriculturists, leaders in labour, fisheries and the like, go over to the United Kingdom with a view to ascertaining what can be done to bring about an increase in trade, which indeed would be a new concept having regard to the novelty of a group of outstanding men undertaking such a responsibility on behalf of this country.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): The Prime Minister was not in the house yesterday because of official preoccupation elsewhere, but I asked the Minister of Finance whether or not the Minister of Trade and Commerce would be taking advantage of his visit to the United Kingdom to discuss the British free trade proposal, and the proposal made by the Prime Minister, with members of the United Kingdom government while he is there. Can the Prime Minister say whether or not those discussions will be taking place?

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Minister of Trade and Commerce would not take advantage of the opportunity, but no doubt while he is over there discussions on any matter regarded as of mutual importance in the increase of trade will be taken up and discussed.

HAY—IMPORTS FROM UNITED STATES INTO BRITISH COLUMBIA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. W. McLeod (Okanagan-Revelstoke): I have a question, Mr. Speaker, for the Minister of Agriculture of which he has been given notice. Has the government become aware of heavy imports of hay from the United States of America into western and southern British Columbia, mainly delivered by trucks and trailers? If so, is any action contemplated to protect the hay growers of the Okanagan and Shuswap areas, who find it impossible to meet this competition?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I came directly from another meeting to this chamber, so I did not get the hon. member's notice. I do not know what is the situation with regard to these hay imports. I had heard some time ago that there were small quantities coming in, but I will have the matter looked into and give him an answer as soon as possible.

OIL

ALBERTA—INQUIRY AS TO GOVERNMENT ACTION FOLLOWING DECREASE IN EXPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I sent him notice of this question two days ago in the hope that I would be able to ask the question yesterday, but because he was absent on important business I have left it until today.

In the light of the statement made only yesterday over the radio by Premier Manning of Alberta to the effect that oil production in Alberta is being cut back by 60 per cent of what the conservation board allows as a result of the present export restrictions on oil, would the Prime Minister make a full and complete statement as to the action the government proposes to take to correct this situation?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I am sorry I did not have the opportunity of reading the statement made by the premier of Alberta, but I am sure he did not say that any reduction in exports to the United States was the result of any policy of this government. I do not want to go into the discussions the premier and I had, but I will say this, that at no time did he suggest that the reduction in any way resulted from any action by this government.

As a matter of fact, what happened was this. There was a very considerable market in the western United States following the Suez crisis. The situation in California particularly, and also in the other Pacific states, was such that a very material demand was made for Canadian oil. Within the last few months, however, particularly within the last period of about six months, there has been a continuing reduction in the demand for Canadian oil in that part of the United States which constituted the major portion of the Alberta market.

The reason for the reduction is that there has been a very large increase in oil production in the Middle East and distribution of that oil in that part of the United States has had the result of reducing demand for Canadian oil. We discussed together what action might be taken, and the matter is receiving consideration and will receive further consideration next week when the premier of Alberta is here in Ottawa.

I think it was the day before yesterday that Premier Manning phoned me with regard to a committee meeting—an administrative meeting—in Washington that begins on Monday and will continue for two days to deal with this problem of oil imports into the United States. The convener of the committee is Mr. Carson. The Alberta government will be represented by Mr. McKinnon of the resources board in Alberta. The government of Canada will have an observer or observers at that meeting, with a view to ironing out the difficulties that have arisen in recent months in consequence of the Suez situation, and I am hopeful that action may be arrived at mutually agreeable to both.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Algoma East): I should like to ask the Prime Minister whether the representative of the government of Canada at this meeting to which he has just referred will have exactly the same status as or perhaps a superior status to the representative of a provincial government.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I do not think there is any question of superiority of status on the part of any representatives. This is a United States committee, meeting as part of the administrative machinery of the United States and having for its purpose the design I mentioned. Any representatives there will be there purely in the capacity of onlookers following the course of events and subsequently, of course, having the opportunity to discuss the matters in issue.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

WINDSOR—INQUIRY AS TO PROGRESS OF NEW POST OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Public Works. Having in mind the labour situation in Canada as given by the Minister of Labour yesterday, and the statement that there is no shelf of public works projects on hand by the Minister of Public Works yesterday, would the government now be prepared to proceed with the immediate demolition of the buildings acquired by the previous government in preparation for the erection of a new post office building in Windsor, Ontario?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, as the hon. member will recall, I gave him a statement in connection with this proposed building some weeks ago. The situation then was that there was a lease on one of the buildings which was eventually to come down. I do not think there has been any change in the meantime. However, I shall be glad to look into the situation again.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): May I ask a supplementary question. Would the government be prepared to proceed with the demolition of the buildings already acquired? That is the question.

Mr. Green: I shall be glad to look into that situation.

WESLEYVILLE—PROPOSED NEW POST OFFICE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Yesterday the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) asked me this question:

> In that case, can he get on with the post office at Wesleyville, which was in this year's program and which has not yet been started?

I promised to make inquiries, and I now find that the previous government did not include anything in the estimates for this post office at Wesleyville. I am very hopeful that the new government will be able to take better care of the hon. member's constituency.

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): May I ask a supplementary question. Is it not true that the cost of that building is such that it does not have to be specified separately in the estimates, under the rules governing the estimates?

Mr. Green: The hon. member with all his experience, both in the civil service and in the cabinet, should know better than to ask that question.

Mr. Pickersgill: The answer is perfectly obvious.

WINDSOR—REQUEST FOR AID FOR CIVIC AUDITORIUM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. D. F. Brown (Essex West): May I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has the government received any communications from the council of the city of Windsor or any other association or any individual requesting financial assistance in the building of a civic auditorium? If so, what action has the government taken on the request?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): I will have to take that question as notice.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

REQUEST FOR GOVERNMENT ATTITUDE AND PROPOSALS AT FORTHCOMING MEETING

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a question of the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that this is the last sitting day before the conference with the provinces to be held on Monday next, is it the intention of the Prime Minister some time during the course of our sittings today to outline to the house the attitude the government will take with the provinces on Monday, and possibly also indicate to us the proposals the government has in mind in the important matters which will be discussed with the provinces?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I know the authority I am about to quote will receive the approval of my hon. friend. I remember a similar question being asked at one time of that outstanding parliamentarian, Mr. Mackenzie King, and the answer given was that under the circumstances he felt the course to follow was to await the event.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Then may I ask a supplementary question. Notwithstanding the high authority the Prime Minister has quoted may I also quote to him by way of interrogation, under the circumstances, an equally high authority—the Prime Minister himself—who asked a similar question of his predecessor.

Mr. Diefenbaker: And, Mr. Speaker, received a similar answer in general.

Inquiries of the Ministry

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO POSSIBILITY OF INCREASE IN PRICE OF GOLD

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. W. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Speaker, my question would have been addressed to the Minister of Finance, but in his absence I would like to direct it to either his parliamentary assistant or possibly the right hon. Prime Minister.

The question is, in view of the meetings between Mr. Dulles of the United States and Mr. Pineau of France, and in view of the sudden jump in gold mining stocks, has the government any information on the possibility of the government of the United States raising the price of gold to help prevent the collapse of the economy of France in the face of the Algerian situation?

Mr. Richard A. Bell (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, notice of the question reached me just as I entered the chamber, and I have not had an opportunity to make detailed inquiries. Personally I am not aware of any such proposal as the hon. gentleman mentioned. I will make full inquiries, and if there is any information which can be communicated to the house a statement will be made either by the minister or by myself on Monday.

GRAIN

CASH ADVANCES ON FARM-STORED GRAIN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. A. Tucker (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I have a question which I would like to address to the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce. When does he expect cash advances on farm-stored grain will be available to our farmers in the west?

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Never.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Might I answer that question, Mr. Speaker. I am speaking now from recollection as to the actual date, but I think the proclamation will make possible the inauguration of the system of cash advances on either Monday or Tuesday next.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

U.S.-CANADA—JOINT AIR DEFENCE COMMAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Prime Minister. Has his attention been drawn to an article in the issue of Time bearing the date of this coming Monday, November 25, on radar defence of North America, which has appeared since certain questions were asked and answered in this house? Is he aware of the assertion in this publication that if there is an alert from the D.E.W. line in northern Canada there will be immediate consultation between the joint chiefs of staff in Washington and President Eisenhower, whose decision to give SAC's bombers at NORAD the go ahead could be made within five minutes?

In view of this statement being made after certain questions and answers in this house, can the Prime Minister not give us a clear statement about the position of the Canadian government and the Canadian Prime Minister in this event?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): While Time is most time-worthy, I do not get it ahead of time and I have not seen it. Regardless of what appears in that magazine or any other, the situation is exactly as outlined by the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): What is that?

Mr. Coldwell: Would the Minister of National Defence outline the position?

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, as the house knows an integrated command has been established at Colorado Springs, with integrated headquarters, having operational control over the air force allocated for the defence of the North American continent. The air officer commanding the R.C.A.F. air defence command at St. Hubert has the actual command of Canadian forces. In the event of an alert, or of information being obtained by any source that hostile or unidentified aircraft are moving over Canada, the air officer commanding at St. Hubert has the authority to dispatch aircraft to investigate the situation.

While those aircraft would be investigating any unidentified planes, reports would be made at once to the government of Canada and to the integrated air defence command at Colorado Springs. Based upon those reports and the situation as it developed, action would then be taken according to plans which had been drawn up beforehand and agreed upon by the different governments according to the varying sets of circumstances that might arise.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. What about the United States air force, and United States planes in Canada? Would they be under the same obligation to report to the government of Canada as the Canadian commander?

Mr. Pearkes: The squadrons of the United States air force now stationed in Canada are under the command of the Canadian officer responsible for air defence at St. Hubert.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I wish to ask a supplementary question. What would be the case with respect to United States planes based in the United States? Is it possible for them to be dispatched over Canada on the decision of the United States government without the Prime Minister or the government of Canada being consulted?

Mr. Pearkes: The consultations are already taking place and, as I indicated, a series of plans are now being drawn up which will be approved by the governments of Canada and the United States. If the situation were such that United States air forces would be required for a particular operation over Canada, it may be assumed that that has been included in the preliminary plans and therefore it would be merely a question of advising the government of Canada that such and such a situation had arisen and such and such plans should now be put into force.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Algoma East): Mr. Speaker, I have a supplementary question arising out of the answer of the minister in connection with the Canadian command of United States squadrons in Canada. Does he mean by that that there is Canadian command over United States squadrons in Newfoundland, United States bases or leased bases in Newfoundland?

Mr. Pearkes: I am referring to the squadrons which are allocated for the defence of North America now stationed in Canada. At some of those stations to which the hon. member has referred there may be other aircraft which are not assigned to the defence of the North American continent.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister whether the intergovernmental agreement to which he has just referred has embodied certain plans that are being worked out in regard to continental air defence, and whether that intergovernmental agreement will be discussed and agreed to in this house before it becomes effective as an intergovernmental agreement?

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, that gives me an opportunity to review something of the past in this regard. On August 17, 1940, Mr. King and the president of the United States came to an agreement known as the Ogdensburg agreement. On the following day a joint statement was issued. Mr. King referred to it and simply placed it before parliament on November 12, 1940.

Again in 1947, some 11 days after the house opened, Mr. King made a statement on defence co-operation with the United States and traced the history at length, but did not place the matter before parliament for decision. The only order in council made at any time that was tabled in the house with reference to this question was that covering the setting up of the joint defence board. In other words, in the experience of the past matters concerning security have been reported on generally. With the exception of the order in council setting up the defence board, which was tabled, nothing further was done than to report to parliament.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): That is not right.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is the course that will be followed in this connection unless my hon. friends insist on a discussion of these matters. I leave it to their consciences to determine whether there should be a discussion on the whole question of defence and the arrangements between Canada and the United States. If the opposition will take the responsibility of saying they want these matters, which can be of dangerous import if given full publicity in the house, discussed in detail—

Mr. Martin (Essex East): No one has asked that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: —it will be done, but the responsibility will then be theirs.

An hon. Member: A straw man.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Would my hon. friends allow me to make my statement? In the past the course followed has been the one I have referred to. If my hon. friends want to depart from that course they have but to say so. We will then place all these matters before the house, and the responsibility will be theirs for what happens as a result of the widespread dissemination of this information. If either of my hon. friends, one of whom will no doubt be the leader of the opposition shortly, want the information personally or if the leaders of the other parties want it, it will be made available. I leave the responsibility with my friends of the opposition.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, I think on this side we have a full sense of responsibility in these matters and that we will discharge that sense of responsibility in the proper way. But in view of what the Prime Minister has said I should like to point out that the parallel he mentioned is not a parallel at all to the present situation and the proposed agreement.

Perhaps the time will come when we will be able to debate that in some detail.

The arrangement to which he referred was a wartime one and it did not touch the control of Canadian forces in the sense of putting those Canadian forces under the control of an officer of another country, to which, Mr. Speaker, I am not objecting. I am just asking for information concerning the matter.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, no, not objecting.

Mr. Pearson: The Prime Minister said that when we were in power we had not brought agreements of this kind to the House of Commons for discussion and approval, but I would remind him that the North Atlantic treaty pact, to which he has already referred in connection with this particular proposed intergovernmental agreement, was brought into the house, discussed, debated and approved, and that it was in accordance with that approval that Canadian forces in Europe were put under NATO command under a United States general, or it might have been a British general.

This was only done after parliament had all the information which was available. No secret information was brought forward, because that would have been quite improper on security grounds. All I suggest is that we are now contemplating another intergovernmental agreement of that character, and that the house has a right to all available information which will not infringe on security.

Mr. Diefenbaker: My hon. friend first referred to the conditions of wartime. I am not, for very obvious reasons, going to compare those conditions with the international situation today. But I do say this, and I ask my hon. friend to face the situation directly. Does he or does he not, speaking for the opposition, demand the production of the terms under which action will be determined? Does he demand particulars as to the degree to which the responsibilities of the officer in command and the second in command will be discharged? Does he want the production of the arrangements in that regard?

As far as the NATO agreement was concerned, as I recollect it the major reason for its presentation to parliament was that Canadian troops were to be taken outside Canada. It was determined in 1939 and earlier that Canadian troops should never be required to serve beyond the confines of Canada except with the consent and on the determination of parliament.

This is an altogether different matter. This is a continuation of the activities of the defence board which was set up. At no time throughout the years have its activities been debated in the house. Indeed, it would have been presumptuous for us in the then opposition to ask for the terms. But I ask my hon. friend to be very clear and to answer this question. Does he, on behalf of the opposition, require the production of the terms existing as a result of the arrangements made between the governments of the United States and Canada on a matter that concerns the very safety of our country, information that I feel ought not to be given for very obvious reasons? Does he demand the production of that?

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Speaker, that question is a very simple one and easy to answer. The Prime Minister, the head of the government, bears the responsibility for deciding what will or will not be produced in the house. So far as we are concerned, we would certainly not expect him to produce any information in the house which would prejudice the security of the country or the alliance; but, Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister surely is in a position to judge whether the answers already given to questions in the house on this matter have not been confusing and contradictory, and whether it is not time that the matter was cleared up.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I have a right to answer that.

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Speaker is on his feet.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I say the answers have never been confusing or contradictory.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I notice the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar rising. As this statement concerns a matter of undoubted importance and the house apparently is interested in hearing a limited discussion, I suggest that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar be given the floor. Perhaps we could make the balance of the discussion as brief as possible, as I feel it has gone as far as it usefully can. Does the Prime Minister wish to say something?

Mr. Diefenbaker: I do not want to take advantage of the opportunity you have given me to answer except to say this—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the Prime Minister misunderstood me. I suggested that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar be allowed to speak first and the Prime Minister can make his statement afterwards.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, the Prime Minister has suggested that if any members of the house, particularly the leaders of the groups in the house, require information of this nature to be produced he would be prepared to do so. When he said that I thought he was certainly abdicating his responsibility as Prime Minister and head of the government, and that the government must decide what involves security or the welfare of our country. If we should ask a question which impinges on security, it is up to the Prime Minister and the government to decide whether an answer will be given.

I was going to say that I think the opposition—I mean the official opposition—is in a special position in the house. My recollection over the years is that from time to time when former prime ministers were in office, particularly the late Right Hon. Mackenzie King, and matters of this sort arose the official opposition at least was taken into the confidence of the government through the leader of that opposition. I may say that was further extended at the time. I am not asking for that, because we have not the status the Leader of the Opposition has. I think a great deal of this sort of difficulty regarding security and so on could be obviated if the Prime Minister followed the precedent set by the late Right Hon. Mackenzie King.

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): I think the point made by the hon. member for Algoma East (Mr. Pearson) is a solid one, namely that if the government consider it unwise that this information should be given at this time, the responsibility for withholding it must rest with the government. They cannot ignore their responsibility by merely saying to the opposition, "If you demand that this information be given we will give it, and you must accept the responsibility." The responsibility lies with the government. The Prime Minister, alone or with his other ministers, knows what this information is. He knows whether or not it will be detrimental to the country to disclose it. If he considers it unwise to disclose it, then he must take the responsibility for withholding it.

Mr. Speaker: May I inform the house that if the Prime Minister speaks now he will close this debate.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The Prime Minister is not going to speak except to say this. As to what the hon. member for Acadia has said, that is naturally in keeping with responsible government; and what the hon. leader of the C.C.F. has stated is in the same category. If my hon. friends across the way had another theory I gave them an opportunity of having it carried out, and I noticed that they evacuated very quickly.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of National Defence arising out of an answer he made earlier in this exchange. Did I understand him to say that although there are consultations now going on between Canada and the United States in connection with preliminary plans, in the event of action by the United States following an alert Canada would be advised but not consulted?

Mr. Pearkes: I think perhaps there is some confusion in a word which is frequently used, "consultation". There is consultation in the planning stage, but perhaps the word "clearance" would be better when it comes to the operational stage.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Perhaps the minister would go one stage further and say whether Canada would be asked for that clearance at that so-called operational stage?

Mr. Pearkes: That would be my understanding.

Hon. Paul Martin (Essex East): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of National Defence. I do not expect him to answer this today unless he is prepared to do so. He will recall that a few days ago I sent over to him questions and answers that had been put to General Partridge on September 6. Can the hon. gentleman say whether or not, before those questions and answers were published, he or the officers of his department, since July 12 last, were asked to give their approval and if they did, in fact, give their approval to those questions and answers before publication?

Mr. Pearkes: Yes, Mr. Speaker. General Partridge gave that interview before he was appointed to the command at Colorado Springs. There were certain references made to the D.E.W. line, the mid-Canada line and the "Pinetree" line in some of the questions which were answered by General Partridge, and he cleared these with the R.C.A.F. for security reasons only. In other words, he did not want to include anything in the answers he gave which might infringe Canadian security arrangements.

Mr. L. T. Stick (Trinity-Conception): I have a question to direct to the Minister of National Defence. Can he tell the house whether the United States northeast air command in Newfoundland and Labrador comes under the jurisdiction of the R.C.A.F. at St. Hubert? If it will infringe security I do not want an answer.

Inquiries of the Ministry

Mr. Pearkes: As I stated earlier in this debate which is not a debate, those squadrons stationed in Newfoundland allocated or assigned to the defence of the North American continent are under the command of the R.C.A.F.

STATEMENT ON USE OF CANADIAN BASES BY U.S. PLANES

On the orders of the day:

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): While I am on my feet, Mr. Speaker, may I answer a question asked by the hon. member for Algoma East yesterday concerning the use of Canadian bases by United States planes. The hon. member's question was as follows:

In view of the statement reported today by the United Kingdom minister of defence that United States planes cannot use bases in Britain for military operations without first obtaining the consent of the British government, will the minister state whether the same policy is in force with respect to possible United States action from bases on Canadian soil?

After reading the press dispatch, I understand that the United Kingdom minister of defence, Mr. Sandys, was reported to have said on Wednesday that the consent of the United Kingdom government would be required before United States long range bombers could launch an attack from the bases they use in the United Kingdom. As there are no squadrons of the strategic air command of the United States based in Canada the question hardly arises.

Mr. Pickersgill: Except Harmon field.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

COMMISSION TO REDUCE UNNECESSARY GOVERNMENT EXPENDITURES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Patterson (Fraser Valley): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if the government is giving any consideration to the setting up of a commission similar to the Hoover commission in the United States, in an endeavour to effect a reduction in unnecessary expenditures of government.

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the answer is yes, full consideration is being given to that question. It is a matter that is rather comprehensive in its extent; therefore a complete investigation is being made.

TRANSPORT

INQUIRY AS TO CURRENT CONSTRUCTION PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (St. Antoine-Westmount): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Is the Department of Transport proceeding with the construction program provided for in the current year's estimates, or are the expenditures contemplated for this purpose being reduced?

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I think, on the whole, that the program that was started this year is going ahead.

Mr. Marler: May I ask a supplementary question. Do I understand from what the minister has said that there has been no action taken to stretch out the program with the object of reducing the expenditures in the current year?

Mr. Hees: Not to my knowledge, Mr. Speaker.

DEFENCE PRODUCTION

INQUIRY AS TO CURRENT CONSTRUCTION PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (St. Antoine-Westmount): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Defence Production. I should like to ask him if the Department of Defence Production is proceeding with the construction and procurement program provided for in the current year's estimates for the Department of National Defence, or whether the expenditures which were provided for in the estimates are being reduced.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Acting Minister of Defence Production): Mr. Speaker, the Department of Defence Production is merely a procurement and construction agency for the Department of National Defence. The estimates of the Department of Defence Production are very small and have nothing to do with the actual cost of the goods and equipment which are purchased, or of the construction work which is undertaken, so that any change in the vote for works of this kind would have to be made by the Department of National Defence.

Mr. Marler: May I address the question then to the Minister of National Defence, and ask him whether his department is proceeding with the construction and procurement program which is provided for in the current year's estimates or whether in fact a reduction is being made in the expenditures which were contemplated for this purpose.

Hon. G. R. Pearkes (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, I think those questions should be put to me when my estimates are before the house.

PUBLIC WORKS

INQUIRY AS TO PLANNING SECTION OF DEPARTMENT

On the orders of the day:

Hon. J. W. Pickersgill (Bonavista-Twillingate): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Public Works.

Mr. Green: Have you not had enough yet?

Mr. Pickersgill: I certainly have not. I have not got anything from the hon. gentleman, not even the public building that Mr. Winters started before the election.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Hees: How long before the election?

Mr. Pickersgill: About a year.

Mr. Harkness: Did you say "for the election"?

Mr. Pearson: You do not hear very well.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think it should not be necessary for the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Harkness) to ask whether Mr. Winters started any public building after the election. That is self-evident.

Mr. Harkness: I said, "Did you say 'for' or 'before' "?

Mr. Pickersgill: Before.

Mr. Harkness: I thought you said "for".

Mr. Marler: Mistaken as usual.

Mr. Pickersgill: Now that the minister is in such good humour, perhaps he would tell us whether the planning section of the Department of Public Works has been dismantled.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): No, Mr. Speaker. That branch of the department is very active.

Mr. Pickersgill: Then may I ask a supplementary question. Is it true that the head of that section has resigned? If so, would the minister tell us why.

Mr. Green: I have not heard of any such resignation.

Mr. Pickersgill: Could the minister perhaps inquire, since he says that section is so active?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to make such inquiry.

PRICE SPREADS

INQUIRY AS TO ESTABLISHMENT OF ROYAL COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct to the Prime Minister a question arising out of the great interest of the country in general in doing something about the wide spread between agricultural prices and retail prices. Has the Prime Minister anything further to report on the progress that is being made in establishing the royal commission on price spreads?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the government will very shortly be in a position to report on the personnel and setting up of the commission. I hope to be able to make this announcement within a very few days.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Courtemanche in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF MINES AND TECHNICAL SURVEYS

Administration services—
213. Departmental administration, $530,620.

The Chairman: This item will be found at page 43 of the blue book, the details at page 285.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, yesterday when we were discussing this item I was getting along very well until I just innocently, I guess, passed some remark about the trans-Canada pipe line and tried to put the responsibility where it belonged. Then there was quite a convulsion on the government side. In my remarks I did say that some of the press reporters were now becoming conscious of the injustice that was done on that occasion, and that at least some of them are trying to give publicity to the facts as they really existed on that occasion.

It is not my intention to go ahead and read the article, but I should like to point out that when I made reference to it yesterday I said it was either in the Financial Times or the Financial Post. I have the paper here in my hands, and it is the Financial Times dated Montreal, November 8. You will find the reference in an article written by "Tempus", an outstanding reporter, I may say incidentally, in this press gallery.

I was pointing out also, Mr. Chairman, that to a large extent responsibility for those unemployed in the construction work, the geological work and the survey work carried on by the department and by private industry in the development of gas rests with the policies of this government. I would hope that the Prime Minister, together with those who have responsibility for this loss of markets for the export of gas from Canada to the United States would do everything within their power to see that this situation is remedied and would give every encouragement to the export of gas into the United States so we should, in a measure at least, be able to solve some of our unemployment problems and certainly gain those much needed United States dollars which we owe to the United States.

I want to speak about oil for a minute or two. This morning I asked the Prime Minister a question with regard to the oil production situation. When he started to answer that question I thought probably he was of the opinion that I was blaming him and the government for the loss of those markets. I was not necessarily doing that at all. We have lost the market. What I was trying to find out—and I want to thank him for the extended remarks he made with regard to the matter—was what the government was doing or could do in order that we may be able to regain those necessary oil markets in the United States. I want to thank him again for the complete answer he gave.

When the hon. member for Calgary South was speaking on this subject the other day, he went to some length to point out the desirability of the government here and the government of the province of Alberta doing everything possible to see that the expansion of oil production in Alberta is continued, and particularly to see that arrangements are made whereby the exploration for oil shall be continued. He pointed out, and I agree with him entirely, that because of the lack of markets and the drop in our production, a serious unemployment problem in that industry is resulting; and of course that means an effect on many hundreds of people who are just ordinary small people and are certainly not those who are sometimes referred to as millionaires or multimillionaires.

There is one thing of which this house should be aware, Mr. Chairman, and that is that in the production of oil we are dealing with an industry that cannot, upon request, immediately start to produce the additional hundreds of barrels of oil that would be required in any case of emergency.

The only possible way in which we could meet an emergency—and we had an emergency during the last war which could have been disastrous—is through the continued exploration and continued development of our resources in Canada. In order to ensure immediate access to a supply of oil it requires not only months but years of intensive study, exploration, work and development. Therefore this government should be very concerned with doing everything possible to see that the oil industry of Canada is permitted to carry on and expand its work.

I was interested in a remark made by the Prime Minister regarding a meeting which is to be held in the United States with a view to seeing what can be done to solve this problem of exports to the United States. In case, however, we cannot regain our lost market in the United States for the export of oil, then we should be giving very serious consideration to using our own market for the consumption of our product, thereby giving our own oil industry an opportunity of expanding both exploration and production. I am aware of some of the difficulties which might face us in this regard because in the eastern part of Canada, particularly in the Quebec section, they are importing oil which they can probably get a little cheaper from sources outside of this country. However, I do not think we should allow the safety of Canada, both from a military and an economic point of view, to be interfered with for the sake of a few paltry cents per barrel of oil.

This question is too big and too important to allow anything of this nature to interfere with the continued development of our oil industry. Furthermore, it seems to be the consensus of opinion today that the larger oil companies on this continent feel they would like to save the oil in Canada, particularly in Alberta, as a reserve for an emergency, and therefore are going to use all the oil they can get from other sources, especially when they can get it a little cheaper.

As I pointed out a moment ago, it seems to me that the large oil companies should take another look at this proposition, because unless we are allowed to continue our development and exploration, when they desire further production in this country it just will not be there. We have had to face a similar situation in another of our industries, namely the coal industry. This coal industry is one upon which you cannot call immediately for production to meet your demands. The industry must be kept in operation, kept active and alive, if it is to be in a position to supply requirements when urgently requested to do so.

I will not go into the question of coal at this time, because I understood the minister to say when the estimates were first opened that he would rather we dealt with this subject when we came to, I believe it was, item 238, under dominion coal board. I will therefore respect his wishes in that regard. However, let me say again to the members of this house that this question of oil production and continued exploration would go a long way toward giving employment to those people who are now out of work because of our cut-back, and we should give this matter very sincere consideration. The government also should make every effort to see that our markets are regained for the export of oil.

Mr. Pearson: Mr. Chairman, before the minister speaks I would like to say just a word or two about a matter in which I know he and his department are most interested and which has already been referred to in this discussion, namely the development of uranium mining in this country. This development, of course, has been spectacularly important and in its most spectacular aspects has perhaps recently been centred in the area of Blind river and Elliot lake in my own constituency. This area has now become the greatest uranium mining area in the world, and in Elliot lake there is growing up a fine, progressive and modern community which will mean a lot to that part of the north country.

I know the minister and his department will wish to help in every way they can with respect to this development, and perhaps one way in which they could help would be to expedite the building of a dock at Cutler, near Elliot lake, which would be especially important for the importation of coal for the mining area. Incidentally this dock was promised, without qualification, by the Prime Minister when he spoke in that area during the recent election campaign.

The Algoma area—and this is some indication of its importance to our economy—including Blind river and Elliot lake—will, it is expected, next year produce something over 14,000 tons of uranium oxide, which will mean a production of over 34,000 tons of ore per day from that one mining area. It is also expected that the value of Canadian uranium production next year will likely reach the figure of about $400 million, which will perhaps make it the metal of greatest value produced in our whole country.

The sales contracts covering this enormous production are practically all made with the United States government and as my hon. friend knows, are underwritten by the federal government. As an indication of the magnitude of this operation, I understand for that purpose sales arrangements have been underwritten up to the end of 1962 amounting to more than $1,600 million worth of products.

There has recently been expressed some uncertainty—indeed, this uncertainty was expressed in this house last night—about the prospects of this mining industry. It has been suggested, and this suggestion has reached the press, that uranium as a source of atomic energy will soon be outmoded by what is called the fusion process, which is the joining together of two nuclei, replacing the fission process which is the splitting of the atom, and which of course requires uranium. It is also feared by some that the needs for uranium will be diminished by the development of what is known as the fast breeder process. Yet those who are informed on this matter and scientifically qualified to discuss it in a way which, of course, I am not, have stated—and I am referring now to the vice-president of research and development for Atomic Energy of Canada, Dr. Lewis,—that Canada's uranium future would not be in jeopardy through fusion, and Dr. Lewis went on to say that people are becoming confused between a scientific experiment and something which affects the economic future of the world.

Another fear has been expressed—and it was mentioned last night also during the discussion—as to what will happen to this industry when the current contracts, the magnitude of which I have mentioned, come to an end in 1962, a date very much in the minds of those people in this country who are working to develop these communities and this industry. I do not think we need to be pessimistic on this point. While it would be unwise to be pessimistic or to indulge in what I might call speculative optimism, yet I feel certain that the producers of this product in Canada will have continued markets beyond 1962; and perhaps it is a matter for some satisfaction and, in a sense, a reply to some of the more pessimistic forecasts, that the United States atomic energy commission which is, of course, a very important agency in the development of this mining has already secured options on Canadian production for several years beyond 1962.

I know, of course, as do other hon. members that the great bulk of this product is now going into military use, and perhaps I was in a somewhat incongruous position when I was Secretary of State for External Affairs inasmuch as in that capacity it was my duty and desire, as the representative of the government at international meetings, to do everything I could—and I am sure I had the support of the house in this—to make the use of uranium for destructive purposes unnecessary and impossible, but that at the same time, as the hon. member for Algoma East, I was doing everything I could to encourage and develop the use of that product.

As I say, most of this material—almost all of it, in fact—goes into military use, and it is a matter of great importance that the government should do everything it can, and I am sure it will, to push the search for markets for this product for civilian purposes. To that end, as the minister knows, contracts have been signed with the United Kingdom and, I think, with the government of the Federal Republic of West Germany.

With the development of this peacetime, civilian use of uranium it will become increasingly important that the government should explore every possibility of reaching agreement with any friendly country for the use of this material, though, of course, every agreement of this kind, because of the nature of this material, will have to be reconciled with security requirements, and will also have to be in accordance with the provisions of the United Nations regarding the peaceful uses of atomic energy.

There is also, of course, the important progress made in recent years in the use of uranium as a source of electrical energy. That progress has gone farthest in the United Kingdom where, indeed, electrical energy derived from uranium is now competitive with the same power derived from coal. But the United States and other countries are also moving ahead in this field and I think we can feel, without going overboard with extravagant optimism, that as the use of this material for warlike purposes diminishes—and we all hope it will diminish—its use for peaceful purposes will increase, taking up the supplies of this product which are now going into the manufacture of weapons.

It is also a source of some satisfaction from a Canadian point of view to learn that we have the largest reserves of uranium of any country in the world, as far as we know at present, and it has been said that the United States reserves will be exhausted in about 10 years. I think it is not extravagant or unrealistic to look forward to the day when this uranium will be needed in our own country, to, as a source of electrical energy.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, I wanted to put these facts on record in connection with a subject which is of increasing importance to Canada and the world; a matter which is of vital importance with regard to collective defence and which, I hope, will become equally important in developing means of collective progress, and I ask the minister to give every consideration, as I know he will, to whatever steps the federal government can take in this important development, especially, if I may say so, with regard to that area of northern Ontario which has become the uranium centre of the world.

[Mr. Pearson.]

(Translation):

Mr. Villeneuve (Roberval): Mr. Chairman, may I be allowed to say a few words at this time when the estimates of the department of Mines and Technical Surveys are being considered?

I wish at the outset to congratulate the hon. minister (Mr. Comtois) on his appointment to such a responsible position and to recall, incidentally, that the minister and myself are the only former students of Nicolet Seminary to sit in this house. May I also congratulate the hon. member for Lotbiniere (Mr. O'Hurley) on his appointment to the position of parliamentary assistant to the hon. minister.

The points to which I wish to draw the attention of the minister have to do with technical surveys, particularly with the mapping services. I have no criticism to offer with respect to the technique itself which, in my humble view, is just about perfect, but I believe that the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys should give its maps the bilingual character which befits this country.

Whenever I order maps from the department, as I often do, I find that they are practically all printed in English only. I have no objection to that as long as maps are also printed in French, making them bilingual publications.

I have often examined the famous map showing the whole of Canada and I genuinely deplore the fact that this official map, which is certainly distributed all over the world, is printed in English only. In order to emphasize the truly bilingual character of Canada, the department should make this map bilingual, from now on, so as to give justice to both the main racial groups which make up our country.

I also notice that a map representing a section of my constituency, particularly the Roberval area, is almost entirely labelled in English, in spite of the fact that this particular district happens to be one of the most exclusively French-speaking in the country.

I am not making any charges against anyone but merely pointing out this fact in passing. Since the minister, his parliamentary assistant and his deputy—who are all in the house at this time—are all three French-speaking, I hardly feel it necessary to labour that very important point. I thank them for the efforts they will no doubt make to satisfy us on that score.

(Text):

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, the remarks I am going to make and the questions I intend to ask relate almost entirely to the publications of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. I should perhaps explain that my contact with the publications has been as a librarian, providing prospectors and geologists with the various publications, and the point I want to make arises from my experience with the publications of the department.

The first general comment I would offer is that the publications of geological surveys, especially the earlier ones, contain some of the best accounts of history that are available. Unfortunately they are buried in those publications, and I would suggest that at some time someone in the department consider going back into the early reports, especially those of the 1850's, 1860's and 1870's, to take from them some of the excellent historical pieces on the trips of the surveyors across Canada.

The first question I would like to ask is how much co-operation with provincial geological surveyors is entered into in order to ensure that there is no repetition and that the publications or the coverage of each supplements the other. I have the feeling that there has been a certain amount of overlapping in the past. Second, does the department plan a cumulative volume of the provincial gazeteers that they are publishing at the present time one by one?

My third question is this. Does the printer of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys publications keep the typeset for the major publication such as memoirs? I am very appreciative of the fact that some of the more important memoirs are being reprinted, but if the typeset is kept I think more copies should be reprinted, because especially early in the series they are missing and at least in our area where prospecting is a major interest there has been quite a demand for them.

As a fourth question I would ask if the print is not kept set for reprints, when a reprint is made is there any plan for revisions in bibliography and any later information in connection with the area in order to insert it into the text?

The fifth question I would like to ask is the following. Is the ore dressing section carrying out any research now on the treatment of low-grade iron ores with natural gas being used as the heating process? I know they have been carrying out quite a number of experiments with low-grade iron ores, but it is this question of the natural gas which has arisen in our region where we have many low-grade iron ore deposits. If a group, say the holders of iron deposits, brought samples to the department for beneficiating trials, how would the costs of these experiments be borne?

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, my remarks will be brief, but I would like to comment on some of the points that have been raised by hon. members and answer the questions that have been put to me.

(Translation):

I am very grateful to the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas) for his kind remarks about myself and his high opinion of my department, which are quite different from the comments which the hon. member for Hull (Mr. Caron) had to offer a few days ago. Needless to say, I much prefer the remarks made by the member for Villeneuve. I would advise the hon. member for Hull to seek out that particular member and meet him more often for not only does this gentleman know a great deal about the mining industry but is familiar too with the department for which I am responsible.

(Text):

Mr. Chairman, I am grateful to the hon. member for Villeneuve for his kind remarks about myself and his high opinion of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys, which are quite different from what was said in this house some days ago by the hon. member for Hull. Speaking of the sixth commonwealth mining and metallurgical congress held in Canada recently, I fully agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Villeneuve that the congress was a complete success. While the congress visitors were here in Ottawa I had the honour of unveiling a plaque at one of our mines branch buildings commemorating the holding of this important congress in Canada.

Concerning the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, I might say a study is being made by my colleague the Minister of Finance and myself. We hope to be able to make an announcement during this present session. We understand that a delegation representing municipalities in northern Ontario and northern Quebec is planning to call on us in Ottawa following an economic study which has been made for them by a firm in Toronto. I wish to assure the hon. member for Villeneuve and others who have spoken on this matter that the government is following the lead and zinc situation very closely. I am sure he is aware that the Canadian metal mining industry is presently well represented in Washington, where the federal tariff commission has started hearings on the question of proposed increased tariffs and quotas on lead and zinc imported into the United States.

I thank the hon. member for Laurier for his complimentary remarks on my appointment. I can assure the hon. members for Laurier and Stormont that I shall look seriously into the matter of the Ontario-Quebec boundary in lake St. Francis and see what I can do, within the limits of my authority, to assist in solving the problem they have brought to the attention of the house. We have a great knowledge in my department of triangulation and triangles in the technical field of our survey operations. It may be that I can transpose this knowledge into improving and stabilizing the Ottawa-Toronto-Quebec triangle.

I can assure the hon. member for Kootenay West that I would be most willing, if it be the pleasure of the house, to have the estimates of my department placed before the mines, forests and waters committee at a future session of parliament.

Replying to the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet, I must say that I have been greatly impressed indeed by his very serious comments on the rights of the provinces and the dominion. Evidently there is nothing like being in the opposition to produce inspiration on the subsoil of the deep blue sea. Seriously speaking, however, Mr. Chairman, and with all due deference to the legal mind of the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet, I do not agree with him that I am the minister responsible for dealing with the question he has brought up.

Mr. Lesage: I did not say that. I said your department had some responsibility.

Mr. Comtois: In reply to the question of the hon. member for Edmonton-Strathcona I may say that the broad question of energy in Canada, including the matter of gas pipe lines, encompasses more than the authority of several of the departments and agencies of the government. It is partly for that reason that the government has seen fit to appoint a royal commission to study this important question. Furthermore, the full facilities of my department have already been offered to the royal commission that has been established to study all aspects of the energy question, and the department will continue to assist and to make information available to any group or organization interested in the national development of the resources of our great country.

I thank the hon. member for Calgary South for his concern about the salaries paid to staff members of my department. I can assure him that I hold these employees in high regard, and it is my plan to further their interests on all occasions.

I wish to say to the hon. member for Algoma East that my department is providing direct and important service to the uranium mining industry and is working in close co-operation with the crown company, Atomic Energy of Canada Limited. I wish to assure him that in all likelihood the research and other activities of my department in relation to atomic energy for peaceful purposes are on the increase.

(Translation):

I would also like to say to the hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Villeneuve) that I am grateful for his kind remarks. All those who have gone through the Nicolet Seminary have always remained good friends. Their opinions may vary but whether it be with regard to Nicolet or anything else, they always deeply respect one another and remain staunch friends.

(Text):

May I thank other hon. members who have spoken on these estimates. I fully share their concern for the well-being of the mineral industry in Canada, and I thank them for their interest in the operations and responsibilities of my department.

(Translation):

Mr. Lesage: I want to congratulate the hon. Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois) for the able replies he just made to the questions that were put to him. I have only one thing to ask him, and in doing so I will use the same comparison as he did. I hope that the serious problems which last night I brought to his attention, and to the attention of the government of which he is a member, will not be tied to a boulder and sent to the bottom of the blue sea. I hope he can assure me at once that those important problems will immediately be seriously considered by the government.

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, may I say to the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet that I had possibly misunderstood the question he asked me last night. However, he can rest assured that I am aware of my responsibilities when the rights of the provinces are at stake, and that I will not fail to discuss those matters with my colleagues, at the proper time and place. He need not worry about the intentions, desires, and even opinions, of the members from the province of Quebec.

Mr. Lesage: I only wish to point out to the hon. minister that I feel that the proper time and place to study those problems is here and now.

214. Explosives Act—Administration, operation and maintenance, $113,100.

Mr. Blackmore: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether we could ask you to speak more loudly. It is almost impossible to hear you down here. We cannot tell how you are getting along and what you are saying. I trust you will not mind my suggesting this to you.

The Chairman: Shall item 214 carry?

Mr. Blackmore: No, it is not carried. I want to ask a question. What is the nature of the Explosives Act to which reference is made in the item? What explosives are involved, and so on? We want to be able to judge the adequacy or inadequacy of the appropriation which is made.

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, this appropriation provides for the administration of the Explosives Act and regulations thereunder. The act regulates the manufacture, testing, storage, sale and importation of explosives. By regulation the transportation of explosives by road and private railway is also controlled. The act does not apply to explosives under the control of the Minister of National Defence nor to transportation by vessel, aircraft or public railway.

The primary objective is to ensure the safety of the public and of those handling explosives. All explosives manufactured in or imported into Canada must be first authorized by the minister. Samples must therefore be submitted before manufacture or importation for testing and examination in the explosives laboratory maintained by this division. Explosives already authorized are regularly examined to ensure conformity with the formula declared at the time of authorization.

In addition to the above, the chemical staff advises and assists other government departments regarding properties of explosives and other materials which may have explosive properties and tendencies. I think this answers the hon. member's question.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, I do not intend to speak on this item but I do want to say something about tar sands. Can the minister tell me under what item that can be discussed?

Mr. Comtois: That is item 230, page 44.

Mr. Peters: Do inspectors travel around to the various mines and check supplies of powder in storage, or is it simply a technical inspection as to the quantities of the ingredients of the explosive?

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, if there are provincial regulations in effect, it is a matter for the provinces. We make no inspection except in those provinces where there are no regulations.

Mr. Peters: Are inspections made in the factories that manufacture the product?

Mr. Comtois: Yes.

Mr. Fisher: There is one minor thing that interests me. I see there are three inspectors of explosives who all seem to be at the maximum salary. Is there any provision for them to get a further increment? Has there been a revision of their schedule?

Mr. Comtois: Yes, there has been a further increase.

Item agreed to.

215. Mineral resources division—administration, operation and maintenance, $217,595.

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): Would the minister tell us briefly the general purpose of this division, what it does and what plans it has for the future?

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, the division maintains a record of mineral deposits, mining and allied operations in Canada, and a record of all legislation and taxation, both federal and provincial, affecting the mineral industry. Economic research in the mineral field is undertaken, involving investigation of a number of metals with special emphasis on their utilization, markets and strategic aspects. In order to carry out this work effectively, officers of the division must periodically visit mines, smelters, and metal processing plants currently operating, as well as new fields under development. The expansion and growth of the mineral industry, especially in iron ore, base metals, oil and natural gas, has increased the need for field investigations.

Mr. Peters: Could I ask the minister how extensive is the check on assay reports and mine reports of ore bodies and/or grades, as well as reserves?

Mr. Comtois: We make checks from information we get from the dominion bureau of statistics, some annual reports and our inspections; that is the way we get our information.

Mr. Peters: What I had in mind was the checking of ore reserves, ore grades and so on. Do the inspectors from your department check to see that the grade established is a proper grade? This might not be important in connection with mines over which the department has no control, but there is one type of mining in which the department has a financial interest.

Mr. Comtois: This matter does not concern our department.

Mr. Peters: May I ask, then, which department is concerned with emergency gold mining assistance?

Mr. Comtois: I do not see how one could expect the department to know the grades of ore and such things. This information is given in the trade by the annual reports of the companies, and up to now this check is not being made.

Mr. Peters: Is it not a fact that the gold mining industry does make a regular report of the assay and the location of the ore faces they open up, and those maps and samples are sent to the department? I assumed they were sent to the department of mines, and that they entered into the consideration of payments under emergency gold mining assistance. A number of these mines are getting assistance when they are not in a position where they should, and other mines are not getting it because of the amount that is payable. I think this is quite pertinent.

Mr. Comtois: If the question concerns gold mines that is quite different, because we give subsidies to gold mines. In addition to that the gold is purchased by the government, so we are more concerned about the cost because we have to establish the subsidies.

Mr. Peters: Then from that answer do I take it your inspectors do make periodic inspections of that type of mining operation?

Mr. Comtois: Yes, we have inspectors and we make inspections of gold mines in view of the application of the emergency gold mining assistance.

Mr. Fisher: I think this is a fairly important point, Mr. Chairman, and I will give you an example. A short time ago there was a gold mine closed near my constituency. I was talking to a man responsible for the property, and he said there was no way they could bluff in this particular mine. They have a holding of rather low-grade ore which is right on the property. However, he said just to the east of them there were some gold mines—I think he was referring to the Porcupine camp—and they have some terrifically rich stopes which they have cemented up, and they are proceeding with the low-grade ore which comes under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act. Apparently there is no way of knowing how thorough these inspections are, and whether there is any check of this subterfuge suggested by the hon. member for Timiskaming.

Mr. Comtois: We have no knowledge of particulars of that sort, but if the hon. member has particulars or details to give us we will be glad to look into the matter and inform him on what is taking place.

Mr. Fisher: It is very difficult for people such as ourselves to get at any specific information, but I can assure the minister that the three members who come from northern Ontario started our working lives as miners. We meet miners and we talk to them. We know the gossip, and this is the gossip or the accepted attitude in the mining communities, that many of these mines are doing these things. This casts an unfair reflection on the mines themselves. I have more respect for the responsibility of some of the mine leaders. I think in this respect your inspectors might possibly clear the air if they gave a bit more detail about the type of inspection they carry out, how thorough and how complete it may be.

Mr. Herridge: I should like to ask one question. In the province of British Columbia the mines department has a branch similar to this. There are records kept of ore reserves and details concerning operations of the mines. In addition there is certain research work carried on by the provincial research council with respect to ores, processing and things of that sort. As one who is always interested in avoiding duplication of effort, can the minister inform the house as to what is done to avoid duplication of services or duplication of work in connection with the administration of this item?

Mr. Comtois: During the year we have many conferences between the federal department and the provincial departments of mines. Both departments are working in close co-operation, and I do not see what else could be done. We obtain very useful information from these meetings and our departments work closely together. I do not think there is any duplication.

Mr. Herridge: I am glad to hear that.

Mr. Comtois: We try to avoid that, and any time it might happen we try to rectify it.

Mr. Blackmore: I want to make all allowance for the fact that the minister is new to the game, but we have to decide whether we are going to examine these estimates or whether we are not. If we are going to examine the estimates we have to have the information necessary to properly pass a given item. It seems to me that the questions asked by the new members from mining communities a few minutes ago were deserving of much more detailed answers than the minister was able to give.

If the minister and his advisers are unable to give this information, then if he says so, well and good.

It seems to me he should be prepared to tell us why he is not prepared to give us more detailed information. When we are examining these estimates he ought to be able to tell us what he will do about being able to provide us with that information at a later time. While we are here in this committee examining estimates, the members' duty is to find out, in respect of every item, whether or not the money is wisely spent, whether it is adequate or inadequate and so forth. So if I might say this before we pass this item, then the minister will have something to keep his eye on and so will his advisers.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Chairman, I should like to say a word on this matter. I think it is a most unfair criticism that has been made by the hon. member for Lethbridge. The minister answered the questions to the satisfaction of the hon. members who asked them. I think they are the people the minister is obliged to satisfy. If they have any further questions to ask it is up to them to ask them. I do not think the criticism made by the hon. member for Lethbridge is altogether fair.

Mr. Blackmore: I must confess that I had the impression that neither of the hon. members was satisfied but that they desisted from asking further questions because of inexperience.

An hon. Member: Let them speak for themselves.

The Chairman: Shall item 215 carry?

Mr. Fisher: On that point, Mr. Chairman, may I say that I am not satisfied with the answer that was given. However, my reason for desisting was not so much my lack of experience but the fact that I thought I might either be making a nuisance of myself or embarrassing the minister. So I was prepared to let the matter go, because I know this is information I can find out for myself.

The Chairman: Shall item 215 carry?

Item agreed to.

Surveys and mapping branch—

216. Surveys and mapping branch administration, $69,106.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Could the minister tell us if the surveys branch has completed all the work planned for it last winter and last spring?

Mr. Comtois: I am sorry but I did not understand the hon. member's question.

Mr. Dumas: Could the minister tell us if in the last season the surveys branch has completed all the work planned for it? In other words, were all the aerial photography contracts planned completed last summer?

Mr. Comtois: Does the hon. member's question apply to the province of Quebec only or to the whole of Canada?

Mr. Dumas: To the whole of Canada.

Mr. Comtois: I thought the hon. member referred only to his area.

Mr. Dumas: No, I was inquiring about the whole of Canada.

Mr. Comtois: As regard aerial photography for the whole of Canada, we have practically completed the whole work except for some areas of the Arctic where the work under the contract extends over a period of six years. I believe this is the only area which has not been completely photographed. There are also some areas where, in spite of the instructions issued, the work has not been completed, for some reason or other, either because of bad weather or some other drawback or unforeseen event. However, all the required arrangements have been made and everything is under way from the national point of view.

Mr. Dumas: After recess or some time later while these estimates are being considered, perhaps the minister could indicate the percentage of aerial photographic work completed during the last season on the basis of the work planned for that season.

I should like to ask the hon. minister one or two questions about the same matter.

I wonder if, a little later, he could give the house the number of aerial photo contracts awarded during the last season, together with the names of the companies to whom such contracts were awarded?

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, the hon. member should perhaps ask those questions on the orders of the day, because we would have...

Mr. Dumas: I thought that the most appropriate time to ask that type of question was when the department's estimates are being considered.

Mr. Comtois: To give all the details he is asking for, we would have to look up the records right away and...

Mr. Dumas: I am not asking for an immediate reply, but perhaps in the course of the afternoon. After all, the department must have called for tenders to have this air photo project carried out, and tenders must have been considered before the department decided who were to be awarded the contracts. It seems to me that department officials could tell me immediately to whom contracts for aerial photography were awarded during the past season. It seems elementary to me. However, I do not insist on an immediate answer to this question. The department's officials may not have the data at hand; but I would like them to be able to supply them at the next sitting this afternoon.

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, I should be pleased to supply this information with regard to awarded contracts. No member of the opposition can very well attack them, as they were mostly prepared or given out before June 10 last.

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, I would like the hon. member to understand that there is on my part no intention to criticize. I am chiefly interested in knowing whether most of the contracts awarded to the successful tenderers were actually carried out, and I should like to know the names of the companies that were given the contracts.

Mr. Comtois: This information shall be supplied to the hon. member this afternoon.

The Chairman: Shall item 216 carry?

Mr. Herridge: One o'clock, Mr. Chairman.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Surveys and mapping branch—

216. Surveys and mapping branch administration, $69,106.

Mr. Blackmore: I wonder if the minister would give the house a general idea of the extent of the work done under item 216 in 1956 and thus far in 1957; that is to say such information as will enable the people of this country to appreciate what we are getting for the amount of money requested in this item.

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, this item provides for the expenditures of the surveys and mapping branch administration unit, which is composed of the branch director and a staff of 13 persons. Its functions entail the technical and administrative co-ordination, and direction of the following operational divisions: first the topographical survey, including national air photographic library and Canadian board of geographical names; second, Canadian hydrographic surveys; three, legal surveys and aeronautical charts division; four, geodetic surveys of Canada; five, international boundary commission—Canadian section; six, map compilation and reproduction division. This covers only the administration of the branch.

Item agreed to.

217. Geodetic survey of Canada—administration, operation and maintenance, $577,258.

Mr. Blackmore: Would the minister please tell the house and the country what is the general nature of the geodetic survey, and what would be the value of such surveys to Canada?

Mr. Comtois: There are two items or sections which might give the answer to that question. Firstly there is the economic part which is to provide for horizontal and vertical control by means of precise triangulation, precise traverse, shoran trilateration and precise levelling for the mapping and charting of Canada, so that all other surveys may be co-ordinated on a single datum on a nation-wide scale; to provide the horizontal and vertical co-ordinates and mathematical data required for development projects such as the St. Lawrence seaway, hydro-electric power developments, engineering projects, harbour improvement schemes, and oil exploration operations; to determine the position of survey stations in terms of precise astronomical latitudes and longitudes for control in the demarcation of provincial boundaries, for example, the 60th parallel of latitude.

The second is the scientific part which is to undertake investigations leading to a more precise determination of the size and the shape of the earth; to develop and test improved survey methods and improved methods of carrying out survey computations. To co-operate with other national geodetic organizations, through the international association of geodesy, in the solution of problems in geodesy such as the mathematical solution of long geodetic lines, the adjustment of shoran nets of trilateration, and the determination of the attainable precision in various types of geodetic work.

Item agreed to.

218. International boundary commission, $62,748.

Mr. Dumas: I would like to ask the minister if he could tell the house if the officers of the survey branch were satisfied with the experiments made last summer using the tellerometer for measuring distances and if it is the intention of his department to intensify the use of this instrument?

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, I can say we are very satisfied and that the officers who use the instrument were absolutely satisfied with the results.

Mr. Dumas: I understand it is the intention of the department to intensify the use of this instrument.

Mr. Comtois: We plan to purchase some more units.

Mr. Blackmore: Would the minister tell the house of two or three of the problems which are now before the commission and under discussion with respect to this item.

Mr. Comtois: Would the hon. member mind giving more details; I did not understand exactly what he meant by his question.

Mr. Blackmore: I notice this is the international boundary commission, including the topographical surveys, and I would just like to know if the minister could give the house two or three of the problems which are currently before that commission for consideration at this time.

Mr. Comtois: The problem actually is to keep in good order and condition boundaries which are already determined and agreed upon and to clear the problems that may exist on the said boundaries.

Mr. Irwin: I presume that under the control of the international boundary commission is the question of boundary markers. Now with regard to the marker at Point Roberts which is the last of six which were, I believe, set up on the original boundary demarcation when it was first laid out from the Rocky mountains to the Pacific coast, there is a situation of which I do not know whether the minister is aware. To the south of that marker, on the United States side, the state of Washington has acquired eight acres of land which they are clearing for use as a park. The Canadian government, however, has paid no attention to their side of the marker; as a matter of fact the marker on the Canadian side is sitting on private property. To illustrate how stupid this thing can get, the owner of that property has actually paid improvement tax on the marker itself. I would suggest that the department get in touch with the provincial government and try to make arrangements to clear six or seven acres of land north of the boundary and make that land into a park, right on the Pacific coast.

It might interest you to know that the United States carefully looks after their side of the marker; it is carefully pointed up and kept cleared and well defined whereas the Canadian side is entirely neglected and I do not see why.

Mr. Comtois: I thank the hon. member for bringing these facts to my attention and I will bring the matter to the attention of the international boundary commissioner for Canada.

Mr. Herridge: I would like to bring to the attention of the minister that some years ago —and I am now dealing with the functions of the board for geographical names—many organizations in my own constituency were very interested in getting a mountain peak named after a very prominent pioneer and citizen who was also a very prominent Conservative. I find some very unusual things with respect to geographical names. With regard to this outstanding citizen who made a great contribution to the Kootenay district in the early days, it has not been possible to name some physical feature in his memory, and yet it has been brought to my attention that in one case a creek has been named after a temporary pot washer in a survey camp. As one strongly in favour of paying tribute to pioneers, both federally and provincially, may I ask what procedures are followed by this board with respect to the naming of physical features of this country.

Mr. Comtois: The board is appointed and consists of a representative of the dominion government and a representative from each province. It holds a regular meeting once a year to discuss questions which come under its jurisdiction, receives suggestions from all over the country, studies the recommendations and prepares a report.

Mr. Herridge: If I send my suggestion to the minister will he take it up with the appropriate people and give it a boost?

Mr. Comtois: Certainly, I will look into it.

Item agreed to.

220. Construction or acquisition of equipment, $122,000.

Mr. Smith (Battle River-Camrose): I wonder if the minister would tell the committee the nature of the equipment required under this vote.

Mr. Comtois: This vote provides for the acquisition of technical and non-technical equipment for both field and headquarters use, such as transit levels, altimeters, photometrical supplies, camp and field equipment, motor vehicles, canoes, outboard motors, small hand tools and so forth.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I should like to ask the minister what is being done in connection with the development of tar sands in northern Alberta.

Mr. Comtois: That does not come under this item. It comes under item 230.

Item agreed to.

Canadian hydrographic service—

221. Administration, operation and maintenance, including Canada's annual contribution of $4,125 to the international hydrographic bureau, $3,395,513.

Mr. Kirk: On this vote, Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a brief reference to the grounding of C.G.S. Baffin on Black rock, a well marked obstruction off the coast of Nova Scotia on July 4, last. In so far as the hydrographic survey is concerned, I have in the last eight years had many contacts with the officials of the department and I have always found them very efficient and courteous, and I should judge from the report given by the minister on November 11 last, that the minister's finding is the same. I do know that the work being done is greatly appreciated along our coast.

But there is one matter we cannot understand, and that is how a ship equipped with all the modern electronic and navigational aids such as the Baffin has could run into such a difficulty. The report the minister gave on November 11 has one sentence in it that I should like to bring to the attention of the house. An inquiry was held, and the report brought out the fact that the grounding was due to a combination of circumstances but not to any negligence on the part of the hydrographic officers navigating the ship. From my knowledge of those navigating officers and of the hydrographic staff I do not find that hard to understand, but from the point of view of those who write articles and editorials in newspapers in the province of Nova Scotia, it is more difficult to follow.

What was this peculiar combination of circumstances which caused the grounding of the ship? Two or three days ago I asked the Minister of Transport if he would be willing to table the report of the inquiry which was carried out by his department—the report to which the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys referred to on November 11—but the Minister of Transport said the report was not a report made under the Canada Shipping Act; that it had been carried out by one of the officers of his department and, as such, he did not consider it appropriate for publication. But I think there are a great many Nova Scotians along the coast who are very much interested in the cause or causes of this grounding. The ship had all the modern navigational aids, and, as the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys said in his statement, they were the type of aids used on another ship, the Kapuskasing, and they had been found very accurate.

It may well be that something unusual occurred in the use of these instruments. They may have been found defective, and if so I think we are entitled to know, because instruments of this type are being used by fishing boats and many other types of ships all along our coast. If anything of this nature caused the trouble I think it would be for the good of the public to know whether lives are being endangered or public property being subjected to undue risk. That being so, may I ask the minister if he will table a report and give us a full explanation of what he means by the phrase "a combination of circumstances".

Mr. Comtois: I will certainly table the report. I cannot say it will be the report of the Department of Transport but it will be the report we have in our department.

Mr. Kirk: Did I understand the minister to say he was ready to table the report he has in the department?

Mr. Comtois: Not the report of the Department of Transport but the report we have, presented by our officers in our department.

Mr. Kirk: The minister is willing to table that in order to give us a chance to find out the reasons for what occurred?

Mr. Comtois: The reason is very simple. Some confusion arose in the reading of the instruments. There was some confusion, I understand, in the reading of the position of the ship—what is called the Decca positioning—that is the instrument used on the Baffin. That does not mean it was not good. Anyone can cut his finger on a very good knife. It was just a mistake or a misinterpretation. Anyway, the accident happened without there being any negligence on the part of the staff or the officers there, and that is the report we have.

Mr. Kirk: I still am not sure whether the minister said he would table the report.

Mr. Comtois: I am ready to table the report I have in my department.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I should like to follow up the questioning of my colleague who just took his seat. Will the minister clarify the chain of command on these hydrographic ships? There are some rumours to the effect that on hydrographic ships there is a divided command between the captain of the ship who is not classified as a captain but as a sailing master and an officer of the department who is classified as the officer in charge. I think the public would like to know just where the dividing line runs in the duties, responsibilities and authority of these two individuals. For example, which one of them is regarded as the senior officer? Which one is regarded as being responsible for the safety of the ship and the safety and lives of the crew? Who decides when the boat shall sail, when it shall anchor and where it shall anchor? Who decides when it is fit to lower the boats and land men on a lee shore? There is some feeling that part of the confusion to which the minister has referred is attributable to the confusion in command and I think it would be well for the minister to clear that up.

I noticed that in his reply to the question asked by my colleague the hon. member for Shelburne-Yarmouth-Clare the minister mentioned that the instruments were not working properly or were not giving accurate readings. I did not quite understand what his answer was in that respect but the question I want him to clarify is this. Just what was happening to the instruments? Did they fail? Were they not accurate? Was the captain in charge of the ship relying solely on instruments and was he not taking the usual precautions which every navigator would take regardless of instruments?

Mr. Comtois: It is difficult for me to give those details at the present time. If the hon. member will grant me some time in which to compile them I will table those details about the matter.

Mr. Carter: Thank you very much.

Item agreed to.

222. Construction or acquisition of buildings, works, land and equipment, $210,225.

Mr. Blackmore: Before this item carries, Mr. Chairman, would the minister give the house some idea as to what buildings, works and lands were acquired in the year 1956-57? There is quite a lot of money involved and I feel there should be some record of what the money was spent for. I wonder if the minister could enlighten us on that matter?

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, I think I answered that question on Item 220.

Item agreed to.

223. Legal surveys and aeronautical charts, including a grant of $500 to the Canadian institute of surveying and photogrammetry, $689,686.

(Translation):

Mr. Dumas: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the hon. minister could now answer the questions I put to him before recess.

(Text):

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, in answer to the comments of the hon. member for Villeneuve the situation regarding aerial photography is that most of our contracts are given to the three largest operators in Canada who are as follows: Photographic Survey Corporation, Toronto, Spartan Air Services Limited, Ottawa and Air Surveys Limited, Vancouver. I know of no reason for any delay in completing our contracts other than weather conditions. It is because of such occurrences that the department is most anxious to complete the aerial photographic coverage of the mainland of Canada in order to commence our plan for a similar coverage of the Arctic islands in 1958. At this date the mainland in Canada for all practical purposes is complete but due to problems of weather small areas may not be completed for another season or two.

Mr. Irwin: Mr. Chairman, I have a question or two on this item which I would like to have cleared up before it passes. On looking at the details of the item I notice there is an amount of $500 as a grant to the Canadian Institute of Surveying and Photogrammetry. I am not quarrelling with the amount or the purpose of it but on the large sheet which is attached to the blue book under column 20 which is headed "Contributions, grants, sudsidies, etc. not included elsewhere" is an item for this department amounting to $9,405,485. I notice throughout the estimates of this department there are assorted amounts for grants, subsidies and so forth. Is the figure of $9 million-odd shown on the chart the sum of all those which are shown in the book or is it in addition to them because according to the heading of the column it is additional? Would you please clarify that?

Mr. Comtois: The grants and subsidies are included in the emergency gold mining assistance and you will find this major item later on. Does that answer your question?

Mr. Irwin: So we can assume that the item shown on the large sheet is in addition to those tabulated in the book, is that correct?

Mr. Comtois: They are all tabulated in the book including the gold mining assistance.

Mr. Irwin: That item is in addition to what is in the book?

Mr. Comtois: No, no. It is not additional, it is the same thing.

Mr. Irwin: It is included?

Mr. Comtois: Yes.

Item agreed to.

224. Provincial and territorial boundary surveys, $52,300.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I would just like to express appreciation to the officials of this department for the way they have made the maps of Canada available for us.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Item agreed to.

Geological surveys—

227. Administration, operation and maintenance, including the expenses of the national advisory committee on research in the geological sciences, an amount of $1,875 for Canada's share of the cost of the committee on mineral resources and geology, London, England, and an amount of $40,000 for grants in aid of geological research in Canadian universities, $2,454,067.

Mr. Peters: Mr. Chairman, does this item include grants to the provincial mining schools like the Haileybury mining school and the one at Port Arthur?

Mr. Comtois: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Peters: Are grants made by the department to these mining schools?

Mr. Comtois: No, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Dumas: I wish to mention that those interested in prospecting and exploration in my constituency and in northwestern Quebec generally were very pleased to see that early last spring the department decided to publish the information gathered by the Dominion Gulf Company during the course of the years 1947, 1948 and 1949. I realize that the department has already published 21 or 22 of these aeromagnetic surveys and I notice that there are 10 or 12 yet to be published. Can the minister tell the house if the 10 or 12 additional maps will be published soon and available to the public in the near future?

Mr. Comtois: I am informed that we are proceeding with all diligence in producing these maps and they will be published as soon as possible.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, further to what the hon. member for Calgary South had to say last night, I should like to know whether the geological survey branch of the department has a difficult time keeping geologists at the present salaries. The hon. member for Calgary South intimated that they did. What has been the turnover? I should also like to have a break-down of the $40,000 granted to universities for geological research in terms of schools and types of research. For example, I should like to know whether this money is used to send someone out in the field or whether it is for laboratory projects. Third, I should like to know whether the money is apportioned through provincial channels or do applications come directly to the geological survey branch? If applications come directly, I should like to know what the total amount applied for is. I am assuming that there has been more applied for than has actually been granted.

Mr. Comtois: In 1953-54 there were 13 geologists appointed and seven left in the same year. In 1954-55 12 were appointed and three left. In 1956-57 there were seven appointed and 15 left. In 1957-58 we have taken on nine and four have left. From 1953-54 to 1957-58 we have taken on 41 and 29 have left.

Mr. Fisher: Does the minister not agree that these are rather catastrophic figures? Is he planning to do something about the matter and does he think salary boosts would alter the situation to a certain extent?

Mr. Comtois: Of course if salaries were higher we could keep more than we do. That is all I can say to that.

Mr. Stick: Mr. Chairman, I have a matter which I consider to be very important to bring to the attention of the minister. As he may or may not be aware the boundary between Newfoundland-Labrador and Quebec has never been settled. Newfoundland was awarded a large part of the Labrador territory by a decision of the privy council many years ago. There was not a dispute but a disagreement as to who had jurisdiction over large sections of Labrador, and many years ago a case was taken to the privy council for decision. That course was agreed to by the province of Quebec and by the dominion, as it then was, of Newfoundland.

As a consequence of that decision, which was incorporated in the terms of union, the boundary between the province of Quebec and Newfoundland-Labrador has never been properly defined. I have no desire to raise any quarrel between Quebec and Newfoundland but, as the minister is probably aware, big mineral developments are taking place in this territory. I understand that there are huge iron ore deposits on both sides of the border so that these companies eventually, and probably pretty soon, will have to find out to whom they are to pay their royalties, whether to the province of Newfoundland or the province of Quebec.

I know that this may not be the minister's responsibility but I was given to understand that such surveys are made by the minister's department on request from the provinces. This matter has not reached the stage yet where it is very important but it will soon. Speaking as far as Newfoundland is concerned, may I say that we do not want one inch of territory from Quebec to which we are not entitled. The minister's department may be called upon to carry out such a survey. I should like to know whether a request has come to the minister either from the province of Newfoundland or the province of Quebec to carry out such a survey, and if a request came would the minister be prepared to carry out a survey?

Mr. Comtois: We have never had any request either from Newfoundland or Quebec. If we receive a request we will certainly consider the application for such a survey.

Mr. Peters: Could we have a break-down with respect to the question asked by the hon. member for Port Arthur concerning grants to schools and what schools such grants go to?

Mr. Comtois: As this would mean making quite a long report I would ask leave to defer the giving of the information until the next sitting of the house in committee of supply. I will certainly be glad to give all the information.

While I am on my feet, may I reply to the question of the hon. member for Port Arthur. First, there is very close co-operation between the provinces and our geological survey, and I do not know of any duplication of effort. To answer his second question concerning provincial gazetteers, I do not think we plan at the moment to have a cumulative gazetteer of Canada. In answer to his third question, I do not know if the queen's printer keeps the type set up for publications of our department. I do not think he does. To answer his fourth question, at the moment we are carrying out experiments on reducing iron ore with city gas and we plan to do it with natural gas when it is available in Ottawa.

In so far as the fifth question is concerned, I would say that there is no charge to industries for research we undertake at their request, except for very special and costly projects.

Mr. Peters: In connection with this research, may I ask the minister if any assistance is given to universities or in any other manner towards the development of the lignite field in northern Ontario? In addition, has the department assisted in developing a process for the removal of cobalt from the ores in the Cobalt area?

Mr. Comtois: The answer to the first part of the question is no. The grants given are just for geological studies.

Mr. Fisher: In connection with the information given as to a break-down of the schools, could that be put into the annual report? It may be in there but I have not been able to find it. I think it is interesting and fairly important, especially if in the future the department might expand the size of the grants in aid in this particular regard.

Mr. Comtois: I will agree to that, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. Holowach: Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask a few questions of the minister with respect to these items. I wish to ask him a few questions which have been in my mind ever since this department had its estimates submitted to us. It is a question that could properly be asked of every one of the ministers whose estimates we are asked to consider. Common sense tells us that our main function at this time is to approve only those estimates which are absolutely essential to the maintenance of indispensable services. I think the only protection that the taxpayer of this country has is that we make careful examination of the mass of figures that are submitted to us in these estimates.

In order to protect the taxpayer's purse I think we ought to have a little bit of information with respect to the computation of these figures. I think one of the dangers in the manner of examining these estimates is that they are brought into the house and after a few political speeches on the need for spending more money on some pet local projects, they are passed. I think we would be fooling ourselves if we were to adopt the attitude that there is no waste in federal bureaucracy. This is no reflection on the dedicated men and women who are in the civil service, but it is a reflection on the situation which is a natural consequence of extravagant and ever-growing government in the past 22 years. Therefore in this connection I should like to ask the minister in what manner are some of these cost items determined in connection with item 227? What manner of checking is used to determine these to be indispensable? Are these estimates of costs submitted on the basis of current prices and wages or do they contain probable increases; if so, what percentage-wise?

Might I ask the minister, too, if in the discharge of his responsibilities and a preliminary examination of these estimates he is satisfied all of these items are absolutely indispensable? What consideration has he given to inducing private enterprise, by bid, to undertake some of these projects and make their information known to the government and to the public? I am not opposed to essential spending, but it seems to me that we are considering the original estimates of the previous Liberal government and the question is, is this a government which is dedicated to eliminating waste and extravagance? If it is, when and where do we start?

Mr. Comtois: As I told the committee yesterday, Mr. Chairman, these estimates were prepared for 1957-58. I am not quite responsible for everything that is presented today. However, I might say that since I was appointed on August 7 I have been looking very carefully at the work that is done in the department and how it is being conducted. I have been in another department in Quebec for 20 years and I have always been sharp-eyed about expenditures. I know that in this department every expenditure, every estimate is carefully studied and discussed by the officials of the department, then with the executives, then with the deputy minister and then with the treasury board. They are very carefully studied.

In so far as the estimates for 1958-59 are concerned, when they are presented at the next session I shall be fully responsible for them and I shall give hon. members every detail they request and the reasons for any expenditures in connection with any particular work.

Mr. Marler: I thought I understood what the minister just said, Mr. Chairman, with regard to these estimates. I take it, of course, that in submitting them to the committee he does stand behind them. He is not suggesting that the expenditures which are covered by them are not to be made; I hope that was not the purport of his remarks. I take it from what he has said that inasmuch as his government made a great issue of this question of waste and extravagance during the election campaign, now that he has had an opportunity of seeing the spending program of his own department he is satisfied there is no waste or extravagance in the items with which we are dealing now?

Mr. Patterson: In view of the statement just made by the minister, I wonder if we are to assume that the statement made by the Minister of Finance does not apply to this department, when he said they were not prepared to support all the projects outlined in the estimates. Is that assumption correct or are there some of these projects that the government is not backing?

Mr. Comtois: I may say that the major projects are going ahead. I cannot go any farther than that.

Mr. Patterson: I do not think that answer is quite satisfactory. I asked if there are any of these projects in these estimates that the government, the department and the minister are not going to back?

Mr. Comtois: Not in this department.

Mr. Irwin: Am I to understand from the minister's answer that all the estimates submitted here by the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys are going to be accepted by this government, without any exception? Is that what I understood from the minister's answer?

Mr. Robichaud: Everything is in good shape.

Mr. Comtois: There is always research going on in the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. It has been started and must go on.

[Mr. Comtois.]

We must meet the demands that are made by some other departments of government.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I appreciate the difficulty in which we seem to be placing the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys, Mr. Chairman, but I think he should understand that in our review we have the right to put this type of question to every minister as he brings his estimates before us. The Minister of Finance, on October 15 of this year, when he tabled the blue book of estimates and thus made them this government's estimates, said that nevertheless there were some of the programs contained in those estimates that the present government did not intend to proceed with and he said this, as reported at page 11 of Hansard:

> —such changes as this government proposes to make in the current year's programs will be brought to parliament's attention when the individual items affected are being considered by the committee of supply.

We have already had one department's estimates, namely those of the Secretary of State, which we have gone through. No changes were made in the estimates of that department. The point of my question now is to find out whether any changes are being made in the estimates of this department. Is it clear then that as far as this minister is concerned, what the Minister of Finance said does not apply to him but rather that all the estimates under this department will be voted in full by this session of parliament?

Mr. Robichaud: Maybe it applies only to the Minister of National Defence.

The Chairman: Shall item 227 carry?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I take it that silence gives consent but perhaps it might better be put on the record.

Mr. Comtois: It seems that perhaps the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was not in the house when I made my first statement when starting with the presentation of my estimates.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I was in the house.

Mr. Comtois: If the hon. member was not in the house, I will read again what I said, if he agrees.

Mr. Marler: Go ahead.

Mr. Comtois: As reported at page 1380 of Hansard I said this:

> Since the date of my appointment as minister of this department I have carefully examined these estimates, together with my officers, and as a result it has been found possible to divert approximately $500,000 to other requirements which were not foreseen at the time these estimates were prepared. Specifically, about $250,000 was used to help defray the cost of the general salaries revision of May 1, 1957, and a smaller amount was used to assist in settling accounts resulting from the grounding of the C.G.S. Baffin in July, 1957. Hon. members will appreciate that had this action not been taken it would have been necessary to request additional funds by way of supplementary estimates in order to cover these items.

It must be borne in mind that the efforts of my department are concerned mainly with national development and scientific research and, in such directions, a maximum effort is required at the present time to enable us to keep pace with rapidly changing requirements in the scientific and technical fields.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I recognize the statement the minister made yesterday. I may say to him that I am not quarrelling at all with the reallocation that he made within the framework of his estimates. I am not even quarrelling with the fact that he is not seeking a reduction in any of his estimates. What we are trying to find out, department by department, is whether the Minister of Finance meant what he said when he declared that somewhere along the line some estimates would be reduced. As far as this department is concerned, I take it that there is no reduction in the total amount of money asked.

Mr. Robichaud: In view of what the minister has just said, can the minister specify what services in his department were curtailed in order to allow a saving of $500,000?

Mr. Comtois: There was no service curtailed. It was just that some adjustments were made in some branches, projects that need not necessarily be completed this year. That is the only change that was made.

Mr. Hahn: In his address yesterday the minister indicated that approximately $500,000 has been diverted to other requirements. In diverting an estimate, I take it that you took from one estimate that figure of $500,000, and added it to another. Would he indicate which one was reduced and to which one an addition was made so that we would have more specific figures to work with?

Mr. Comtois: Some change could be made on account of the delays in deliveries of some purchases that had been ordered. Owing to those delays we could divert some moneys and apply them on another item.

Mr. Hahn: Would the minister indicate—

Mr. Comtois: In the same vote, I mean.

Mr. Hahn: Within the same vote itself?

Mr. Comtois: Yes.

Mr. Hahn: So the vote itself is not changed?

Mr. Comtois: No.

Mr. Barbes: May I first congratulate personally the minister for having been called as a member of the present cabinet. Then may I refer to a recent book entitled "Prospecting in Canada" published by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. My request would be for a translation of said work and for its distribution in our high schools and our libraries so that this very up to date publication may be available also in the French language for distribution at the earliest possible time. Many people in the district of Abitibi which I represent here will thus obtain considerable information which would eventually allow them to take a more effective part in connection with research and the development of new mineral deposits, be it for iron, zinc, gold or copper.

The minister is also requested to offer the public more publications in both the English language and the French language. This would be useful for more than one area in the province of Quebec at least. The publication to which I referred, namely "Prospecting in Canada" by A. H. Lang, published in 1956, publication No. 2529, contributes to the expansion of the Canadian mineral industry and to the success of many prospectors, students and companies. It includes very interesting data on the stature of Canada's mineral industry. It refers to prospectors of the past, prospectors of today and prospectors of the future. Conventional methods of prospecting and special methods also are explained in the publication. More particularly I refer to geophysical prospecting methods, the dip needle, the gravity method, seismic methods and electrical induction methods. It compares ground and airborne magnetometer surveys.

In view of the very interesting discovery in Chapleau riding of zinc and iron ore deposits lately, we ask the minister if he will order a helicopter-equipped party to complete more topographical mapping along the Harricana river and also along the Nottaway river which both flow towards James bay. Such mapping in the area north of lake Mattagami would permit more complete and adequate knowledge about possible hydraulic development associated with other mining and industrial projects of interest at the present time for the Harricana and lake Mattagami areas.

This would undoubtedly be useful at this time for the provincial authorities who, we are told, are considering the possibility of authorizing industrial development in the area.

The Chairman: Shall item 227 carry?

Mr. Blackmore: Before we go on to the next item, Mr. Chairman, to show you the kind of thing that troubles us when we contemplate some of these items, may I point out that we have $2,454,000 involved in this item for 1957-58. We were told that this is for administration, operation and maintenance including the expenses of a national advisory committee on research in the geological sciences. Judging from the other items which seem to be covered in the full item the expenses of the national advisory committee to which I have referred seemed to be, to say the least, generous.

I just wonder if the minister could give us the number of people who are included in that national advisory committee. I am not so much concerned about salaries because if they are the right men they are worth a lot of money but I would like to know how many men and women are involved.

Mr. Comtois: What the member is asking will be contained in the information I will give the hon. member for Timmins.

Item agreed to.

Mines branch—

229. Mines branch administration, $123,514.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): This is an item which I mentioned a while ago on which I wanted to get some information from the minister. This is the administration of mines and research branch administration, and I would like to ask the minister now what has been done recently with respect to the development of tar sands in Alberta?

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, we are carrying out some research experiments through our fuel division in an endeavour to remove the sulphur content from the tar sands and reduce the distillents. Research in extraction methods was conducted some years ago.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I understood the minister to say that there were programs of research being carried out. I could not hear him very clearly but I am sure that that is what he said and I would ask him to explain that because I do not understand it.

Mr. Comtois: I said experiments are actually being carried out in our fuel division.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Well, may I ask the minister what are those experiments which are being carried out. It does seem to me kind of ridiculous, Mr. Chairman, that after about 25 years when the federal government has been carrying out its experiments in the development of these tar sands, all the information we can get today is that there is a little bit more experimentation being carried on. I would like to know what progress is being made and what are those experiments?

[Mr. Blackmore.]

Mr. Stick: Hurrah.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): We can remember that during the war nothing had been done by the federal government—who were then the Liberals—until an emergency arose and we were on the verge of being denied any supplies of gas or oil fuel during that war. Then all of a sudden the government began to spend a few million dollars in an effort to get some extraction of oil and gas from the tar sands. We built a pilot plant which was burned up and that was the end of it. We have now spent more than $100 million—well I really do not know how much is being spent—but nothing concrete was given us in this report of the committee today.

I do not want to press the point too hard because the minister is a new minister but he does have his advisory staff right in front of him and surely we should be given something very concrete on what is being done to develop these tar sands, if anything is in fact being done.

Mr. McCleave: It is taking as long as it takes to get your Social Credit dividends through.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Please give us something to indicate what you are doing here to protect us in the case of an emergency. This is not the time to wisecrack, we are facing an important situation here.

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, we have produced through research in our fuel division a method of extracting bitumin and tar from the tar sands and if our experiments for the industry as a result of our research and studies and the compilation thereof, are found to be economically applicable, it is up to them to take advantage of the situation.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): But what type of extraction is being used? There are several types of extraction being applied; for instance, steam pressure. What is the type of which you are speaking and which you have developed, which I take from what you say has come to the point where it might be an economic feasibility and is now up to the industries to take hold of. What is this process you are talking about?

Mr. Comtois: I do not think such a discussion should take place at the moment. The compilation of our research has been given to the interested people and our findings have also been given to the national research council.

Mr. Quelch: Which oil companies are carrying out the investigations at the present time.

Mr. Comtois: Royalite and some other companies.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): What process which you have given them are they working on?

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, do you think I have to give a full course on research and experiments in this committee.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I do not wish to appear unco-operative with the new minister but surely this is the time when we are entitled to the information, since the minister has his experts before him. That is why I am asking him this question, as he can get his information right from his experts. This is not something new; we have discussed it, and I have discussed it personally, in this house on many occasions. The government has also spent on it literally millions of dollars. I am just trying to find out what we are getting out of this spending and what process, through all these experiments which have been carried out and as a result of certain conclusions, is being followed? To which companies outside of Royalite has this process been given?

Mr. Brooks: I wonder if I might just interject here. I think the minister is being asked about something which is really the province of the national research council and it is hardly fair to expect him to explain all the research which is being carried out on all the different minerals being mined throughout the country. I was in New Brunswick the other day and I noted a new system there called flotation in connection with concentration of base metals. It does seem to me unfair to ask the minister to give all this information on research. I understand his department does help in any way it can with respect to private companies who wish to do research. I have been in the house for 22 years and every year there has been a question on tar sands. Now I was very pleased the other day to read where some English company which was interested in the tar sands hoped to develop, through their research and so on, some method of abstracting oils from the tar sands.

However, I do not see how the minister could explain here the different methods which have been thought up to extract this oil from the tar sands. It may come within his province but, frankly, I do not really think it does.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, I am surprised that the Minister of Veterans Affairs should make a statement like that. He knows that the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys is the department under whose estimates this matter is always dealt with, and we have always had an opportunity of discussing these things. The minister has already told us that in the department over which he has jurisdiction they have been working on certain processes. He has even gone further and told the committee that they have perfected certain processes to the point at which they have been passed over to private industry in the hope that private industry will make them applicable in an economic sense. Now I am asking the minister—and surely we should be able to have this information—what are these processes. I am not asking him to define in detail the procedures involved, but I do want to have an outline of the information which the department must have.

After all, the expenditures with regard to this amount to millions of dollars. Surely the department must know of at least one type of treatment among the different types of processes they are experimenting with. It is not for the Minister of Veterans Affairs to get up and say it is not fair to ask the minister for this information. If it does not come under this department—

Mr. Brooks: I think it comes under the national research council.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Then the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys does not agree with the Minister of Veterans Affairs; those two gentlemen should get together behind the curtain and decide just who is going to take responsibility. What I want to know is what is happening to all this money, and I think the committee has a perfectly right to know.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Chairman, I think there is a reason for some suspicion being in the minds of a good many members of the committee with regard to the extraction of oil from these tar sands. Back in 1945 we had a committee set up of which I was a member, and at that time we had a Dr. Ellis, or Dr. Ells who appeared before the committee from the department. He gave a very optimistic report about the development of the tar sands. He had spent some 20 years up there, and was a master of the subject. As I say, he spoke in glowing terms, and the committee was completely prepared to make a recommendation regarding the development of these sands, but the next day another official, another officer from the department, a man who was apparently Doctor Ells superior, poured cold water over the whole thing and suggested we should forget all about it. Dr. Ells had suggested the steam pressure method of extracting the oil but, as I say, the next day another official came, a man who was apparently the superior of Dr. Ells and poured cold water over the whole thing.

That was about 12 years ago, and since that time very little progress has been made. It is true, as the hon. member for Bow River has stated, that a pilot plant was built. That was burned down. I think another was built, and that was burned down too. So there has been very little progress since that day, and it is only natural that some hon. members should be suspicious. I understand, now, that Royalite is going ahead. There is some talk of building a pipe line. But until they have found some satisfactory method of extracting the oil it is somewhat premature, it seems to me, to be talking about pipe lines.

When a feasible method of extracting the oil has been found, it will be quite soon enough to talk about building a pipe line to bring the oil down to Edmonton.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Can the minister tell us, now, after consultation with the technicians, what the processes are?

Mr. Comtois: Would the hon. member be satisfied if I sent him a full report of the work that is being done?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Personally, Mr. Chairman, I think I would be satisfied, but I doubt whether the rest of the committee would. They will have to speak for themselves. We are being asked to pass quite an item. In view of the fact that we have spent millions upon millions of dollars trying to develop this thing, and the department is not in a position to give us any more information, I guess we will just have to say that the department does not know anything about it and will try to find out something and let us know later. That being so I will sit down and say no more at the moment.

Mr. Irwin: Mr. Chairman, the department's salary expenditures amount to something like $10 million. Of that sum, approximately one-fifth is spent in this particular branch. What we are really wanting to know is what we are getting for it. Two and a half million dollars has been spent by this department and we cannot get a satisfactory answer about what is being done in a specific case. These resources belong to the people of Canada. Why should they not know what is being developed? Why should they not be told what is being done? They are paying the shot. If this was a private company the directors of the company and the shareholders would have the right to know and they would insist on that right and, believe me, the shareholders of Canada unlimited are making exactly the same demand.

Mr. Patterson: Mr. Chairman, the name of one company has been mentioned—Royalite—and the minister said there were others. Surely we could have the names of these other companies? Reference was made to a British company that was interested. Apparently the information was given to them. What was the name of that company?

Mr. Comtois: The Sun Oil Company, I believe.

Mr. Patterson: That is a British company?

Mr. Marler: Sun Oil is not a British company.

Mr. Patterson: Are we to assume that just two companies have received this information, Royalite and Sun? We still have not got the name of the British company. I do not know what is going on here. I think there must be a military secret involved, or something, because I cannot see why we should not get the names of the companies. We cannot get the name of one company. If information has been turned over to a British company, what was the name of that company.

Mr. Lesage: The British company was mentioned by the Minister of Veterans Affairs.

Mr. Patterson: Perhaps the Minister of Veterans Affairs could tell us, then.

Mr. Brooks: The hon. member probably had the same opportunity to get the information as I did. I got my information from the newspaper, that there was a British company which was greatly interested in the tar sands, and that there was a prospect of development.

Mr. Marler: Sounds like a curtain of secrecy.

Mr. Patterson: Perhaps the Minister of Veterans Affairs got his information from the newspapers, but surely we can get ours from the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys.

Mr. Comtois: I can tell the hon. member that every company has received information from our department. We know that Royalite and Sun Oil have taken advantage of our information. As far as the others are concerned, we do not know, but I can tell the committee the companies have received all the information we have produced.

Mr. Patterson: These companies have been given the information, but we in this committee do not know what is the information. The hon. member for Bow River has been trying to get the information, but we are still without the information which has been given to the companies.

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Chairman, I believe the minister should take careful note of this discussion. In the light of what has taken place, does he not think it is sufficient proof that the standing committee on mines, forests and waters should be called so that we could have representatives from the companies and others here to question them and find out what this is all about?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the minister say on what terms or conditions any processes developed by the department are turned over to private companies?

Mr. Comtois: I think I said this morning, Mr. Chairman, that the research we do and the information are given without any charge except when it is a very large project or something that requires a large expenditure.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Well, Mr. Chairman, I think part of the confusion created this afternoon arises from the fact that sometimes the minister has referred to information as though it were just a bulletin of some sort you might get from the Queen's printer and on some occasions he has referred to specific processes developed by the department for the extraction of oil from the tar sands. Which is it, just an information bulletin or has the department developed an effective process which it has turned over to a private company?

Mr. Comtois: The process is described in the report issued by our department.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): What is that process described in this bulletin? What is it called?

Mr. Comtois: The cold water process.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): And what is the name of the bulletin? I have been seeking that information for some time.

Mr. Comtois: There is the hot water process and the cold water process. That is all I can say right now.

An hon. Member: And the tepid water process.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Well, Mr. Chairman, the cold water process and the hot water process and the lukewarm water process were being discussed here during the last war.

Mr. Cardiff: Which would you like to have, hot or cold?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I am not fussy, I just want any one.

Mr. Comtois: I would suggest that the hon. member take one or two days off and visit our department and then he will be very well informed and will understand everything that is being discussed.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I am sure we would like to accept that kind of invitation which the minister extends.

Mr. Comtois: That is a standing invitation.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): However, would the minister expect that with one hurried trip we could learn as much as his departmental officials, his experts, have accumulated in knowledge over all these years? Perhaps he would like to enlarge his invitation to cover a period of two or three days and make it a government commission rather than a hurried visit. I am going to suggest that the minister allow this item to stand and that on Monday he bring in the officials who are acquainted with this process. I am not trying to embarrass the government or the minister but I do suggest that this item stand over until we can have the proper experts brought here who could explain to us what is being done particularly in relation to the development of the tar sands and various other processes the minister has referred to and about which we do not know very much and about which the minister does not know very much as he has admitted. He told us he could not give us the information. We want to know what the results have been from the expenditure of all this money. This process has been going on for 25 or 30 years and surely for all the money that has been spent the department must have found some little, wee, tiny process be it hot water, cold water or lukewarm water. We do want to know.

I might tell the minister that about a year ago the department had given up the idea of the hot water process and had started on another type of process. And the department at that time claimed that the cold water process—or rather the hot water process; I am getting my waters mixed up—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): —at any rate they claimed that the hot water process had proven useless in this case. It is true that in the province of Alberta they still maintain that the steam process is the best and that is the one they are working on there and they do not agree with the federal government. The minister says the federal government is still going on with the other process, the hot or cold process—take your choice—

Mr. Lesage: It is cold water that is thrown on the committee.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): —and I think the minister should allow this item to stand so the committee may have some proper information concerning it on Monday.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, it just occurred to me that after that lucid explanation given by the hon. member for Bow River we should not require any more explanation from the minister.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I do not know whether or not you are trying to make a wisecrack.

Mr. Richard (Ottawa East): Mr. Chairman, if I am funny it is because I am trying to be. I am not saying something that is serious and I think it is funny.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Well, you do not sound very serious to me so it must have been a wisecrack. I would not say we have not received anything from the minister but I would point out that the minister is not quite fully informed on this subject and I think he should take into consideration allowing the item to stand so he could bring down the information on Monday.

Mr. Lesage: He is informed now.

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, I am not here to conduct a scientific course concerning every detail of what is going on in my department. I am ready, however, to produce and to table every detail of what has been going on and what has been accomplished this year if this would satisfy the committee. If hon. members agree to that I am ready to produce every detail of the operation of my department in that respect. Otherwise I am ready at the next sitting to come back with full details and read to you for about half an hour or three-quarters of an hour every detail about the hot water process and cold water process. The hon. member will realize that ice water or hot water or cold water in scientific terms means something other than something to drink or something with which to burn his tongue.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Mr. Chairman, I am sure the minister has now gone into a little detail about this.

Mr. Comtois: Not at all.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I would point out to him, however, that it does not make any difference to me how the information is brought down as long as it is brought down. If he wants to table this detailed information that is quite all right. On the other hand if he wants to come back on Monday, and I think this would be the preferable way, he could take half an hour to give us the information and explain to the committee exactly what these processes are for which we have spent millions of dollars and that would be quite satisfactory to me.

[Mr. Lesage.]

Mineral resources investigations—

230. Administration, operation and maintenance, including a grant of $22,500 to the Canadian institute of mining and metallurgy to assist in defraying the cost of the sixth empire mining and metallurgical congress to be held in Canada in 1957, $2,780,073.

Mr. Bryson: Mr. Chairman, I hope this is the item under which I can put a question to the minister and I do so only to have some further clarification on it. It has been brought to my attention that independent prospectors are unable to buy or obtain some of the new instruments that are being used in the process of prospecting, for instance gravity meters. When they apply to the companies concerned they are told they are unable to supply individual prospectors with these instruments. Apparently only companies are able to purchase such equipment. Carrying it further, they are told that there was an order to that effect issued by this department. It seemed more than passing strange to me that this should be the case. I am not saying it is an absolute fact because I have not had the experience myself but I have been told these stories by quite reputable people and therefore I wonder if the minister could offer a word of explanation in answer to that charge.

Mr. Comtois: Could the hon. member be more precise about the type of instrument to which he is referring?

Mr. Bryson: I have reference to the gravity meter. That is the only instrument that was brought to my attention.

Mr. Comtois: We do not supply any instruments to prospectors or companies.

Mr. Bryson: That is not my point. The point I am trying to make is simply this. An individual prospector wishes to purchase a gravity meter. He applies to one of the companies, whether in Toronto or Montreal makes no difference, and wants to buy one for his own use. He is told they are not able to make this kind of sale. If he represented a big oil company or something of that nature he would be able to purchase the piece of equipment in question. When he investigates further he is told that this is because of a directive that originated in the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys. I am just asking for clarification. There may be no truth in it but I should like to find out more about it.

Mr. Comtois: I am informed that we never issued any directive or gave any authority regarding this matter.

Mr. Carter: I am interested in mineral resource investigations. Can the minister say whether the department has received any requests to carry out mineral investigations in Newfoundland and, if so, what investigations have been carried out?

Mr. Comtois: The department has done geological surveys, mineral research and topographic mapping according to the requests that have been received from Newfoundland.

232. To provide for payments to McGill University in connection with the development of a coal-fired gas turbine, $25,000.

(Translation):

Mr. Caron: Mr. Chairman, the remarks of the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys about me were brought to my attention. I should like to inform him that I am putting his advice into practice at once.

(Text):

Mr. Robichaud: I am sure the committee was pleased to hear from the minister today that he and his officials had scrutinized in detail every item of the estimates and on this side of the house particularly we were pleased and not surprised to hear the minister say that no waste or extravagance were found in the department. In connection with this vote, which provides for a payment to McGill University in connection with the development of a coal-fired gas turbine, I am not asking the minister for a scientific course on the experiment made to date but I think the house and the people of the country have a right to know how far the experiment has gone, what stage it has reached, if it is practicable and what results have been obtained to date.

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, I expected that question. I presume that the hon. member refers to the Mordell project conducted by McGill University at Ste. Anne de Bellevue, Quebec. I have some notes here that I have prepared on the subject. The experimental plant at Ste. Anne de Bellevue was subjected to its final program of test running in 1956. Considerable data was accumulated during that period. A conference on coal-burning gas turbines, planned by Professor Mordell, was arranged to coincide with the final operations in November, 1956. Representatives from Canada, the United States, Britain, South Africa and Australia attended the conference where the results of the Mordell project experiment were discussed in the light of world developments in coal-fired gas turbines. The final editing of the proceedings of the conference should be available very shortly.

The experiment has now reached the stage where the participation of industry or power utilities is necessary for its future development and utilization as an economical power unit. Though there is little hope now of producing a coal-fired gas turbine locomotive that would stem the tide of the rapid dieselization of our Canadian railways, the coal-fired gas turbine could find an application in the field of small power generating stations, particularly where lack of water prohibits the use of a steam plant. It also seems that the gas turbine combined with a steam plant could improve thermal efficiency and reduce water requirements.

I might give the following by way of a resume. The agreement between the department and McGill University was signed in October, 1950. Its purpose was research to improve the utilization of Canadian coal through the developing of a coal-fired gas turbine operating on a design of Professor Mordell, to be used in locomotives and stationary power plants. In November, 1953, the experimental plant was completed and trial runs, testing and experimenting were conducted during 1954, 1955 and 1956. In 1957 $25,000 was provided to maintain a staff for the completion of reports and to pay for expenses in housing the plant at Ste. Anne de Bellevue. For 1958 no moneys are to be provided in the estimates.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, I am rather disappointed that the minister has intimated the intention of his department to abandon this particular project in the sense of not intending to provide further funds to continue the experiment. The last time this matter was before the house was in the summer of 1956 when the estimates of the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys were under consideration. At that time the then minister of mines and technical surveys informed the house that the experiment was proceeding but that difficulties were being experienced with the heat exchanger and the combustion chamber of this particular engine.

He went on to say that it was intended that a symposium would be held in the fall of 1956 to evaluate the experiment. He further told the house that Professor Mordell was very optimistic that this particular experiment would reach the practical stage. I believe that already the parliament of Canada has voted $700,000 or more for this project. We have not been told today at what stage the project is, whether it has any practical application and whether any effort is to be made by the Department of Mines and Technical Surveys to develop the project to the stage where it can be applied to the locomotives on the railways of Canada which was, I think, the first objective and intention behind the project.

Every time this matter has been before the house members from Nova Scotia and other coal mining areas have been very keenly interested. We had looked forward to this experiment as a potential outlet for coal in the province of Nova Scotia. I hope the minister will tell us just where the project is now, whether it is to be abandoned, what application can be made of it, and whether it is really wise at this stage to abandon it.

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, after the conference was held it was felt that some time should be allowed in order to study and evaluate the results and see what further improvements could be made. It is for that reason certain delays have occurred. When the representatives are ready, they will notify the department and I presume we can take this matter up again.

Mr. MacEachen: Do I understand the minister to say that the delay or interruption in this project is for the purpose of evaluating the results of the experiments so far, and once that evaluation is undertaken, if it is found desirable further funds will be requested to continue the experiments?

Mr. Comtois: I believe the proceedings of the conference are to that effect, and when a conclusion has been reached there may be a recommendation for additional funds. If so, we will see what we can do. I hope something will be done.

Mr. MacEachen: May I ask the minister whether or not Professor Mordell still has the same optimistic outlook about this project, and whether or not McGill University has requested—

Mr. Comtois: Yes, he does.

Mr. MacEachen: Is the university at the present time in a position where they have enough funds to carry on the work they are doing?

Mr. Comtois: There is nothing being done now except the reports.

Mr. Bryson: Further to the matter I raised a moment ago and in view of the minister's assurance there was no directive sent out from the department regarding the matter, I wonder if the minister would carry the investigation a little farther and communicate with the companies to ascertain just what their policy is in this regard? If they are discriminating against the sale of gravity meters to individual prospectors, then that question would have to be taken up with the Department of Justice. Would the minister look into that?

Mr. Comtois: If the hon. member will give me privately more details so that I can make the inquiries I shall be pleased to do so.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): This question of the coal-fired gas turbine has come up almost every year for the last 10 or 15 years. As was indicated by one of the previous speakers, we who are from the coal mining areas have been very interested in the progress made on this project. I recall on one occasion the then minister of mines and technical surveys made a speech in which he forecast that it would not be very long before our coal mines would come back to life again because of the tremendous amount of coal that would be used in this type of engine. We all had great hopes that this was going to be the solution for our declining coal mines, but so far we have not seen any results.

I see now that this vote has been reduced by $75,000. This means that in effect there will not be much progress made in the future. It was difficult for me to hear what the minister was saying, but from what he said I took it the department has not given up the idea of developing a coal-fired gas turbine for railway locomotives; is that correct?

Mr. Comtois: I would say the government has not given up hope of developing such a gas turbine but it cannot be produced in time to stop dieselization. It will take some time before a final conclusion can be reached about these experiments. However, a gas turbine cannot be prepared in time to stop dieselization.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I understand that the minister has not given up hope, although he has given up research. I make that remark because the estimate has been cut down by $75,000, and that is certainly going to prevent very much increase in research. I would take it also from what the minister has just said that he has hopes that research will be continued in an endeavour to have this gas turbine used in railway locomotives. This was the purpose of development, but now I understand that development work has ceased and that the department is turning the information they have over to commercial organizations to use in a small way.

If that is the case, then all this stuff we have been told over the last years was just so much lukewarm water, if I may use that expression. Only last year we were told that the government had tremendous hopes for this project; just be patient, they said, and almost any time now this is going to solve our coal problems. I recall quite well that the former minister of trade and commerce, Mr. Howe, was on one of the committees of the house and he told us the project had been sidetracked entirely. Now the minister tells the committee it has been sidetracked but they hope to get it back on the main track later. What are we going to believe? May I ask the minister how much money has Canada spent to date on the development of this coal-fired gas turbine?

Mr. Comtois: We have spent $662,000.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Is that the total amount over all the years?

Mr. Comtois: Yes.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): That is over half a million dollars, as one of my colleagues behind me says, and so far as being used on a railway locomotive is concerned, it is a flop. I think a great deal of economy could be practised somewhere. Surely, it does not take over half a million dollars to find out that this experiment is no good. It almost parallels the millions upon millions that we spent on the tar sands, and then threw overboard. Now, we have got another project. If this government wants to look for places in which to economize I think I could go in as a greenhorn and show them places where they could save a few million dollars. They even went so far as to say it was going to solve our coal mining problem, that it was going to revive our coal industry, by spending that $662 million.

An hon. Member: $662,000.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): Yes, $662,000. We side-tracked it or at least side-tracked it from the main purpose for which it was intended. I think the government had better have a good look at some of these things. These are only two that I have found. I will bet that there are dozens in there like them.

An hon. Member: How much will you bet?

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): I believe that I could go quite a long way, so far that the government would not be able to tell me if I was right or wrong. Seriously, though, I think the government should take a good look at these things and see whether much of this kind of waste could not be prevented.

Mr. McCleave: I hope this matter is not in as hot water as are the tar sands we have heard so much about. It has been going on for some time now. I should like to ask the minister whether he knows whether this administration or his own department has asked the railways to co-operate with McGill University on this type of research so that some wheels might be put under this new gas turbine when it is ready to go. In other words, has the university co-operated with the railways?

Mr. Comtois: There have been some contacts between the university, the railway companies and our department about that matter. That is all I can say right now.

Mr. Muir (Cape Breton North and Victoria): I have been very much interested in this matter also. If it has been a flop, as the hon. member for "lukewarm" said, I am sure we cannot blame the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys. But I think the hon. member for Inverness-Richmond made a very good point. We from coal mining areas have been greatly interested in this project. The question arises: is it a flop? How far have we gone on it? Would it be possible that the minister could table a complete and comprehensive report and bring the house right up to date on the matter?

Mr. Comtois: Yes. I will look into it and see whether there is something that can be done in that way.

Mr. MacEachen: I want to make it clear that I realize that this has been an experiment and that, like all experiments, its outcome is uncertain. Last year, in 1956, we had in the house a discussion on this particular experiment. At that time we were informed that the technical difficulties were in connection with the combustion chamber and the heat exchanger and that Professor Mordell was working on those two particular difficulties. I am not worried that there should be difficulties. What I want to know is this. Have the difficulties become so great from the technical point of view or the experimental point of view that Professor Mordell has now advised the department that it is not worth while to continue with this experiment?

Mr. Comtois: No. We have never received such a report from Professor Mordell.

The Chairman: Shall the item carry?

Mr. MacEachen: May I just ask the minister this question? I understand the minister to have said that it is not the intention of his department to ask for funds for the next fiscal year for this particular experiment. Is that right?

Mr. Comtois: Yes.

Mr. MacEachen: If that is so, if Professor Mordell still feels that this is a useful experiment, why do we not go ahead and experiment with it until we have convinced those who are working on the project that this matter is not a fruitful outlet for the coal production in Nova Scotia?

Mr. Comtois: I should say that the report on the conference is under preparation. It is quite an extensive report and a very scientific one. After that it must be considered, and the conclusion must be studied again so that Professor Mordell should be in a position to recommend and to contact our department so that some additional funds may be voted or acquired in order to make further experiments.

Mr. MacEachen: May I just make one further comment to this effect. Some years ago when the actual turbine or engine was in operation at McGill or at Macdonald College the previous minister of mines and technical surveys arranged for those members from coal areas to visit the scene of the experiment and to discuss the matter with Professor Mordell. I wonder whether, at some time in the course of this session, the minister could arrange a similar visit to the site of the experiment so that the members of parliament who are really interested in the coal industry might convince themselves as to what course might be followed in this matter so that it will not be abandoned because of lack of interest or lack of knowledge on the part of members of parliament.

Mr. Comtois: Certainly. I shall be very pleased if such a visit can be arranged; and may I say that I will be the first one to take advantage of it.

Mr. Fisher: I should like to ask the minister a question in connection with research on the utilization of coal. Is anything being done or planned in terms of research on the Kopista system that has been successfully carried to some length in Russia, that is the use of low-grade coal deposits through the driving of shafts, the burning underground and the utilization up above, by some sort of distillation process, of the heat and the gases.

Mr. Comtois: We are following up these developments but we do not make any research ourselves.

Mr. Winch: I want to ask the minister this question. Is there any difference between the answer given now and the answer I received in 1954 to the same question?

Mr. Comtois: I was not here then.

Geographical branch—

233. Geographical branch—administration, operation and maintenance, including a grant of $250 to the Canadian association of geographers, $284,580.

Mr. Herridge: On this item which provides for the administration of the geographical branch I just want to rise to bring to the attention of the house the excellent work done by a voluntary organization in Canada in this field. I refer to an organization that was known up until recently as the Canadian Geographical Society but which lately has acquired the right to be known as the Royal Canadian Geographical Society. In view of the history of this organization, its publications and the work it has done, for the information of the house I think it would be worth while just to quote the item in this connection from the November issue of the society's magazine It reads as follows:

The Royal Canadian Geographical Society

Her Majesty the Queen has been graciously pleased to confer the title of "Royal" on the Canadian Geographical Society. This is a mark of appreciation prefixed to the title of those organizations selected by Her Majesty that are deemed worthy to receive such an honour.

At a special general meeting of the society, held on Friday, 4 October 1957, under the chairmanship of the president, Major-General H. A. Young, a resolution was passed unanimously by the members approving the necessary by-law to change the name of the society to "The Royal Canadian Geographical Society", and application to the Secretary of State for supplementary letters patent to effect this change has been duly made, in accordance with the provisions of the society's by-laws and the requirements of the Companies Act. This was granted as of 4 October 1957.

E. S. Martindale
Honorary Secretary

I mention that because I think it is something of importance in the life of this society which is functioning to the advantage of geographical knowledge and has done so for a good many years. The society publishes a monthly magazine and also provides funds for certain explorations and things of that sort and, on occasion, for lecturers and information on certain subjects.

I bring this to the attention of the members of this house because I think they should do what they can to support this very worthwhile organization to which they can belong for an annual fee of $5.

Item agreed to.

Dominion observatory, Ottawa and field stations—

234. Administration, operation and maintenance, including membership fee of $500 to the international astronomical union, a grant of $3,500 to the Royal Astronomical Society of Canada and a grant of $5,000 to the international union of geodesy and geophysics to assist in defraying the cost of the eleventh general assembly of the union to be held in Canada in 1957, $588,560.

Mr. Herridge: Excuse me jumping up again but these are two items upon which I would like to speak briefly. With respect to this item on dominion observatories I would like to say a word because I think it is appropriate at this point to make a few remarks in connection with the subject of time, that is time in a legal sense and not in the sense in which it is used by some of my colleagues.

In recent years we in the provinces have instituted daylight saving time and in peacetime the regulations concerning this time, as I understand it, come under the jurisdiction of the provincial governments. It is only under war conditions that the federal government has jurisdiction in that respect. I think we in Canada are a most illogical people; we have daylight saving time established in British Columbia during certain months and during somewhat different months in Alberta and in other provinces no daylight saving at all. Now I think that is a lot of nonsense.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Herridge: I think we should get a dominionwide understanding on this subject if we are to use daylight saving. It would be much easier for the railroads, the bus companies and all transportation services, not to mention all Canadians in general. I would like to ask the minister if he would consider having this matter brought to the attention of the coming dominion-provincial conference with a view to seeing if we cannot act with a little more common sense and arrange this matter for our better convenience as a result of agreement between the federal and provincial governments.

Mr. Comtois: Yes, Mr. Chairman, I will do my best, if there is time for such a proposition.

Mr. Irwin: I would like to ask the minister if he could prevail upon the provincial governments to leave the clock alone and allow us to utilize time in the normally established tradition. In my opinion this business of trying, when you live in Vancouver for instance, to adjust yourself to one time in accordance with the way they run the boats and another in accordance with the way they run the trains and so on, is very difficult. I think people should be allowed to use time in the normal way with respect to when they get up in the morning and go to bed at night and we would be far ahead of the game if we could just leave the clock alone.

Mr. Herridge: Well let us use it as a nation, whichever way we do it, and not as a province.

Item agreed to.

General—

237. To provide for purchases of air photography and the expenses of the interdepartmental committee on air surveys, including purchases of equipment, $1,500,000.

Mr. Peters: Will the minister give some consideration to seeing that regulations with respect to the E.G.M.A.A. payments are worded so that the payments are made for the betterment of the communities of workers rather than the way it is done now. Some of these find their way into dividends rather than serving the needs which E.G.M.A.A. was originally set up to serve with respect to the communities and the people who live in them.

Mr. Comtois: I will take this matter into consideration.

Mr. Peters: Would the minister also consider this matter on the international level and the possibility of actively participating in the negotiations for an increase in the price of gold in conjunction with the representatives from similar departments in Australia, New Zealand and South Africa when this matter is being discussed? E.G.M.A.A. to a large extent is only a stop-gap and I think the general feeling is that there should be some active participation in these negotiations which should be taken on an international level. Will the minister give assurance that this department will do something in this regard, particularly as we have found in recent years that the government has not even been represented when such talks have taken place.

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, I am ready to co-operate but this is a matter which concerns the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Marler: I would just like to ask a question of the minister as to whether there has been any change of policy with regard to the purchase of aerial photography, because I understand the policy followed in the past has provided for certain work to be carried out in each year by what I might describe as a pre-arrangement with the aviation companies. At times, however, these companies have themselves undertaken aerial surveys at their own risk in the hope that if the work was well done and the funds were available the department would purchase it. Has there been any change in policy with regard to the acquisition of such aerial surveys or is work being carried out on much the same lines?

Mr. Comtois: No, Mr. Chairman, there has been no change in policy.

Mr. Marler: Is the minister now in a position to know approximately the results of this year's operations? After all, we have come to the end of the summer season and I would think they would have some idea as to whether the amount we are dealing with now will be sufficient for the year's operations.

Mr. Comtois: The total work done has been higher than we expected; we have made arrangements with the treasury board so that the balance can be settled to the satisfaction of the contractors.

Mr. Marler: Do I understand, Mr. Chairman, that the total amount of the photography would exceed the amount of this estimate and that some further provision would have to be made later in the year for the additional work?

Mr. Comtois: In next year's estimates?

Mr. Marler: In next year's estimates.

Mr. Comtois: Yes.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask a question along the same lines. Would the minister inform us if we use the facilities of our air force to do any of this work or do we depend entirely on hiring commercial aircraft companies?

Mr. Comtois: Mr. Chairman, we are now entirely dependant upon private industry for this photographic survey work.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): Then may I ask if consideration has been given to the use of the air force, or what is the reasoning behind this policy?

Mr. Comtois: Until 1953 most of the work was done by the air force. Since that time we had to provide this service by some other means.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): As the minister mentioned a moment ago there is a very close link with regard to this emergency gold mining assistance between his department and the Department of Finance. I think I can go further and say that the Department of Labour is also closely related to this matter. As a result of this, Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether this is the appropriate place at which to discuss this matter, or whether there will be a more appropriate place on some other estimate. If it is in order I should like to bring up the matter now. The minister is well aware of what is involved. I have been trying for almost four months to arrange a meeting between the three departments concerned with the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act and the United Steel Workers of America who represent the gold miners in the gold mining areas of northern Ontario. I fully realize that a new government taking over—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): May I say to the hon. member that I do not think what he is discussing now comes under item 237. We passed the other one on the emergency gold mining assistance.

An hon. Member: This is item 237.

[Mr. Comtois.]

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Yes, I said we passed the one on emergency gold. This concerns air photography; it is to provide for purchases of air photography and the expenses of the interdepartmental committee on air surveys, including purchases of equipment. That has nothing to do with the price of gold or the emergency gold measure, so I contend that the hon. member is out of order on this item.

Mr. Regier: On that point of order, Mr. Chairman, the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act is listed, and this is the first item under that.

Mr. Brooks: Since a point of order has been raised on this, you will note, Mr. Chairman, that that item is statutory and does not have to be voted at all. The sum is provided under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act.

Mr. McIlraith: It is a statutory item.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Yes, as the minister has pointed out, that is a statutory item and has nothing to do with item 237 which we are discussing.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Could I find out when this matter may be discussed?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): On the first item, the item covering departmental administration. That was item 213. That was when it should have been discussed.

Mr. MacEwan: I have a short question to direct to the minister. Are these surveys for services in Canada let out to commercial companies on a tender basis or not?

Mr. Comtois: Yes, Mr. Chairman, on a tender basis.

Mr. Fisher: If private companies are carrying out surveys is the equipment held in this interdepartmental pool or is it leased out to the aircraft companies?

Mr. Comtois: All the equipment belongs to the companies.

Mr. Fisher: The minister says the equipment all belongs to the companies. What, then, do these purchases of equipment signify?

Mr. Comtois: This is for research and survey purposes in our own department.

Mr. Martin (Timmins): Mr. Chairman, I was wondering if I might have the permission of the committee to revert for a moment to item 213.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Has the hon. gentleman leave to revert to the first item; departmental administration?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): I am sorry, it is not agreed.

Item agreed to.

Dominion coal board—

238. Administration and investigations of the dominion coal board, $120,475.

Mr. MacEachen: Mr. Chairman, the committee will recall that when the estimates of this department were introduced the minister requested that the discussion of the coal industry be conducted under the items relating to the dominion coal board rather than under the first item. It is for that reason that those of us who are speaking on the coal industry will make general remarks on the items now before us.

I wish first of all to congratulate the new minister on the portfolio he now holds. He is aware that he holds a portfolio in one of the most important departments in so far as the province of Nova Scotia is concerned. The dominion coal board estimates have been used in the past by hon. members from the coal mining areas as an occasion to discuss conditions in the industry, to place problems before the committee and to enlist support for the measures that are necessary to sustain this industry.

I must say, Mr. Chairman, I regret that the ninth annual report of the dominion coal board which has been tabled has not yet been made available in printed form. This report usually provides a wealth of information and facts and a distillation of trends in the industry which must be studied if suggestions are to be made to promote. The ninth annual report has, however, been tabled, and it is a very useful document indeed, and the coal board is to be congratulated on the very successful way in which it has analysed the problems of the industry. I must say, Mr. Chairman, that this industry is causing concern, and has been causing concern, to the people of Nova Scotia, and I think any person who has examined conditions in the industry recently has greater cause for concern than ever.

This concern arises because the industry is a shrinking source of employment. The decline in the number of people employed in the coal mines of Nova Scotia during the past year is alarming. The Minister of Labour made some figures available with regard to this matter and the reduction in employment in the three main coal fields in Nova Scotia through the period September 1956 to September 1957 surprised even me, though I realized there had been a sharp decline. The number on the pay rolls in the coal mines of Nova Scotia in September, 1956 was 10,061; the number on the payroll in September of this year was 9,045, a reduction of 1,016. That is a very serious reduction because it represents a reduction of 10 per cent of the working force in a single year. The reduction in employment in the main coal fields is as follows: 226 in the Cape Breton area coal fields, 367 in the Pictou coal field and 423 in the Springhill area coal fields. As I said, this rate of reduction in the number on the payroll is frightening and if continued would in a single decade wipe out the mining industry in the province of Nova Scotia.

It is not a matter of coincidence that of the four towns in Canada declared to be areas of labour surplus by the Minister of Labour on October 31 in this house two of these centres are located in the coal producing areas of Nova Scotia. In reply to a question asked by the hon. member for New Westminster the Minister of Labour, as reported at page 598 of Hansard of October 31, said in part as follows:

> In the second place, Mr. Speaker, when it becomes evident that work is simply not to be had in a certain locality, that activity has dried up and there is little likelihood of work being found, or where the supply of workers is far in excess of the available jobs and will likely remain so, then the Department of Labour has recommended that such areas be declared labour surplus areas and transportation assistance has been supplied to workers who have promises of jobs in other regions. Windsor, Ontario; Springhill and New Glasgow, Nova Scotia; and St. Stephen, New Brunswick, have been declared such areas.

It can be seen that the declaration of the Minister of Labour is not a matter of coincidence because it reflects the trend already outlined in the reduction of the number employed in the coal areas of Nova Scotia. Furthermore the trend in coal output reflects as well the declining employment opportunities. I understand that from the years 1950 to 1956 there has been a decrease in the coal production in the province of Nova Scotia of more than 700,000 tons. I think the figures placed on the record just recently by the hon. member for Bow River show that in the first six months of 1957 there has been a reduction of about 180,000 tons in the coal production of the province of Alberta over the first six months of 1956.

Paralleling the decrease in employment in the mines of Nova Scotia and the drop in production has been an increasing demand for coal for industrial purposes and an enormous relative increase in the importation of United States coal. The hon. member for Bow River put a table on Hansard that will be found at page 1123 showing the fact that in 1956 Canada imported more than 22 million tons of United States coal for consumption in Ontario and Quebec. The dominion coal board makes the same point on page 6 of its tabled report, as follows:

The production of Canadian coal mines in 1956-57 amounting to 14.3 million tons, showed a decrease of 819,000 tons from the total for 1955-56. The loss was incurred mostly by the Alberta and British Columbia fields, but was also shared to an appreciable extent by those of Nova Scotia. Imports of bituminous coal for the comparative period were up 2.9 million tons but the importation of anthracite continued to decline.

The dominion coal board clearly underlines the fact that while the production of coal in Canada declined the general demand for coal increased and these demands were met in the period I have mentioned by the importation into Canada of almost three million additional tons of United States bituminous coal. How perplexing and frustrating it is to coal miners in Nova Scotia facing difficulties in their source of livelihood to observe these increasing demands for coal met from United States sources. Nova Scotia sells little if any coal in the province of Ontario and in any event has sold no coal in that area since 1950. We sell an increasing percentage of our output, however, in the province of Quebec, amounting in 1956 to 40.2 per cent of the total sale of Nova Scotia coal. Notwithstanding its supplies from Nova Scotia, however, the province of Quebec satisfies 58 per cent of its requirements from the United States. The fact that we are able at all to supply this market in Quebec is the result of the subvention policy that has been in existence in this country since 1928. The subvention policy has been our indispensable and successful weapon against the further encroachment of United States coal.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Five o'clock.

Resolutions adopted in committee of supply this day reported and concurred in.

PRIVATE BILLS

OTTAWA AND NEW YORK RAILWAY COMPANY

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Ottawa West) moved the second reading of Bill No. 30, an act respecting the Ottawa and New York Railway Company.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the purpose of the bill is to dissolve the Ottawa and New York Railway Company. This company is a wholly owned subsidiary of the New York Central Railroad Company. It was incorporated in 1882 and its act of incorporation was amended from time to time until 1898. The company owns the right of way known as the New York Central Railway line from Cornwall to Ottawa. That railway line was operated by the New York Central Railroad Company, and in 1952 the operating company discontinued the passenger service on the line.

In January of 1957 the board of transport commissioners for Canada authorized the abandonment of the line and the line has now been removed and there is in existence only the right of way. The right of way has been sold to the Canadian National Railway Company.

In addition to the railway line, the company owned a bridge at or very close to Cornwall known as the Roosevelt bridge. That bridge, as will be recalled by hon. members, carried vehicular traffic as well as railroad traffic. The removal of the bridge became necessary by virtue of the development of the St. Lawrence seaway and in accordance with the requirements of the St. Lawrence seaway authority. That meant that the railway line lost its connecting link with the New York Central system in the United States.

All outstanding accounts owing by the company have been paid but so that there will be no possibility of any unknown accounts appearing and no assets available to provide for them, the bill provides that the parent company, the New York Central Railroad Company, is liable for all claims, debts, causes of action and so on of the company. I do not know that there is much more I can usefully add by way of explanation of the bill, but if there is anything that hon. members think should be dealt with I will be very glad to answer if I can in closing the debate. If I am not able to do so, I would suggest that the information could be obtained from the officials of the company when they appear before the committee. I assume that the bill will be referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines in the usual way.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines.

RIO DE JANEIRO TRAMWAY, LIGHT AND POWER COMPANY, LIMITED

Mr. M. D. Morton (Davenport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 31, respecting the Rio de Janeiro Tramway, Light and Power Company, Limited.

He said: Mr. Speaker, may I, by way of introduction to the four bills with which I am concerned, make the preliminary statement that these bills concern the Brazilian Traction, Light and Power Company Limited and three of its subsidiaries, namely, the Rio de Janeiro Tramway, Light and Power Company Limited, the Sao Paulo Electric Company Limited and the Brazilian Hydro

Electric Company Limited. Briefly, the purpose of the first three bills is to transfer the head offices of the subsidiaries from Canada to Brazil. This is brought about by the difficulty of public financing in Brazil without becoming Brazilian companies, and it is the purpose of these bills to transfer the head offices so that these companies may take advantage of Brazilian regulations to become Brazilian companies.

May I state that representatives of the company will be present before the standing committee to answer any questions for which I may not have the answer today. Perhaps I should, as a matter of record, make a few preliminary observations. The Brazilian Traction, Light and Power Company is a Canadian company incorporated by letters patent dated July 12, 1912 under the Companies Act of Canada and has its head office in the city of Toronto, Ontario. The company, through its subsidiaries, operates companies engaged in furnishing electric power, telephone, gas and tramway services in the United States of Brazil.

The company's investment in Brazil is in excess of $900 million, this amount being represented by its investment in the shares and obligations of its subsidiary operating companies. The subsidiary operating companies are corporations which were incorporated in various jurisdictions, including Canada, Ontario, England and Belgium. Since the end of world war II Brazil, like our own country, has had a tremendous period of development and the Brazilian Traction, Light and Power Company is making every effort to keep pace and to facilitate Brazil's development through carrying on an extensive program to meet the various demands for light, transportation, telephones, etc. But it is having difficulty in financing to the extent that it finds, in order to take advantage of obtaining local financing in Brazil, it must become a Brazilian company.

In 1953 two of the subsidiaries of this company transferred their head offices to Brazil. One was a dominion company and the other was a company incorporated under the laws of the province of Ontario. The reason that they would like to use the legal fiction of remaining a person and of maintaining their present capacity as a company and not forming a new company in Brazil is to overcome the cost that might be incurred by reason of the various transfer taxes that would be applied against them in Brazil. It also avoids the tremendous time-consuming and costly task of evaluating the assets of each subsidiary which would be required under Brazilian law. It also avoids the necessity of transfers and the assumption by a new company of the obligations and liabilities of the present company. It also avoids the necessity of having to transfer the concessions, a difficult and complex problem due to the number of concessions involved which would affect various governments in Brazil. The present method will make the task easier.

As I said before, the first step in the implementation of this policy was in December, 1953 when the Brazilian Telephone Company, one of the principal subsidiary operating companies of Brazilian Traction, Light and Power Company Limited, applied to the parliament of Canada for a private act authorizing the transfer of its head office to Brazil. The application of this company was favourably considered by parliament and an act entitled "An act respecting Brazilian Telephone Company", being chapter 74 of the Statutes of Canada, 1953-54, 2-3 Elizabeth II, was then passed. The practical solution of the matter is based on the fact that article 71 of the Brazilian corporation law, decree-law No. 2627 of September 29, 1940, states:

> A foreign corporation authorized to carry on business in Brazil may be nationalized, subject to authorization of the federal government, by transferring its head office to Brazil.

It is also based on the legal theory set out in our law and covered by the Bonanza Creek Gold Mining Company case, cited as 1916, No. 1 appeal cases, at 566 and also cited as 85 L.J. P.C. 114, where a company has the capacity to apply for and accept a decree under the Brazilian corporation law, under which it would adopt Brazilian nationality. It is also considered on the basis of Mr. Justice Duff's remarks in the case of The Canadian Bank of Commerce versus Cudworth Rural Telephone Company, 1923 Supreme Court Reports, page 618, where it was stated that it was necessary to obtain a special act of the parliament of Canada to provide authority to transfer the head office out of Canada.

With this background, therefore, I should like to present first of all Bill No. 31 which concerns the Rio de Janeiro Tramway, Light and Power Company Limited, which company was incorporated in 1904 under the Companies Act of Canada, 1902. The two acts respecting the company were passed by the parliament of Canada, first in 1904 by which the name of the company was changed and its objects expanded to contain authorization to carry on a street railway business, and the second act in 1906 by which the company was authorized to issue bearer share warrants and to guarantee certain kinds of obligations of companies subsidiary to or controlled by it. The authorized capital of the company is $50 million divided into 50,000 shares of the par value of $100 each.

The company is engaged in the business of generating and distributing electric power in the state of Rio de Janeiro and in the federal district, which includes the city of Rio de Janeiro, and in the operation of a street railway service in the federal district. It is also engaged in the manufacture and distribution of gas for domestic and commercial purposes through a subsidiary company in Rio de Janeiro.

Mr. L. T. Stick (Trinity-Conception): I have no objection to this bill but there are one or two things upon which I should like to be enlightened. I understand that this company, the Rio de Janeiro Tramway, Light and Power Company Limited, is really a subsidiary of Brazilian Traction, Light and Power Company. As outlined by the hon. member for Davenport (Mr. Morton), this company has $50 million in shares of $100 par value each. Are those shares going to be issued to the Canadian public? What provision is going to be made by this company to pay these shareholders in Canada any dividends that may be earned in Brazil?

In recent years we have had the spectacle of companies in Brazil that have earned money but, by reason of a restriction by the Brazilian government, cannot get Canadian dollars to pay to the shareholders. If these shares are going to be offered to the Canadian public I think the public should be fully aware that this company is now becoming a Brazilian company and they may have some difficulty in getting Brazilian money converted into Canadian dollars to pay their dividends. I have nothing against the company and this may be a genuine corporation. Perhaps the officials of the company would be able to take up this matter and satisfy the committee when this bill comes before the committee on miscellaneous private bills.

Mr. Speaker: Order, if the hon. member speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. M. D. Morton (Davenport): Mr. Speaker, if the answers I give are not satisfactory to the hon. member I hope he will press the matter in the committee stage. It is my understanding that the parent company is practically the sole owner, through its shares, of the subsidiary companies which are being transferred to Brazil. The parent company, the Brazilian Traction Company, is still remaining a Canadian company and under Canadian laws. Their shareholders will remain the same. The head offices of the subsidiary companies, not the parent company, will be transferred to Brazil and they will operate in Brazil as Brazilian companies. Their further financing will be by the issue of bonds or debentures, whatever they might be, to the Brazilian public and not the Canadian public. That is one of the reasons they are transferring, in order that they might take advantage of financing in Brazil which they cannot do by remaining a Canadian company. I do not think that the security in respect of the assets of the company are in any—I was going to say any greater peril—different position than they are today because the physical assets of the company are in Brazil and they will remain in Brazil.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

SAO PAULO ELECTRIC COMPANY, LIMITED

Mr. M. D. Morton (Davenport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 32, an act respecting Sao Paulo Electric Company, Limited.

He said: Mr. Speaker, if I might add to the general remarks I have made concerning the other company, the fact is that the Sao Paulo Electric Company Limited is a wholly owned subsidiary of Brazilian Traction, Light and Power Company Limited, and was incorporated under the Companies Act of Canada in 1908 under the name of the Brazilian Electric, Steel and Smelting Company Limited, which name was changed to the Sao Paulo Electric Company Limited by supplementary letters patent issued to the company in 1911. The authorized capital of the company is $10 million divided into 100,000 shares of par value of $100 each, of which 60,950 shares are issued and outstanding. All are owned by Brazilian Traction, Light and Power Company Limited.

Mr. L. T. Stick (Trinity-Conception): I take it the remarks the hon. member made to the other question I asked him apply to this company as they did to the other one?

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

BRAZILIAN HYDRO ELECTRIC COMPANY, LIMITED

Mr. M. D. Morton (Davenport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 33, respecting Brazilian Hydro Electric Company, Limited.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the Brazilian Hydro Electric Company, Limited is a wholly-owned subsidiary of Brazilian Traction, Light and Power Company, Limited and was incorporated under the Companies Act of Canada in 1922. The authorized capital of the company is $5 million, divided into 50,000 shares of par value of $100 each, 100,000 of which are issued and outstanding, all owned by Brazilian Traction, Light and Power Company, Limited. This company is in the same position as the other one.

Mr. L. T. Stick (Trinity-Conception): I understand that the same condition applies to this company as to the other two companies.

Mr. Morton: Yes.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

BRAZILIAN TRACTION, LIGHT AND POWER COMPANY, LIMITED

Mr. M. D. Morton (Davenport) moved the second reading of Bill No. 34, respecting Brazilian Traction, Light and Power Company, Limited.

He said: Mr. Speaker, briefly the purpose of this bill is to enable the Brazilian Traction, Light and Power Company, Limited, the parent company of the companies of which we have been talking, to come under the regular provisions of the Companies Act and not to be limited in its number of directors as it presently is.

I might say that the Brazilian Traction, Light and Power Company, Limited was incorporated in 1912 under the Companies Act of 1906. Section 76 of that act at that time limited the maximum number of directors of the companies under it to 15. In 1914 the company obtained a special act of the parliament of Canada, being chapter 131 of the statutes of 1914 entitled "An Act respecting Brazilian Traction, Light and Power Company, Limited" which reads in part as follows:

> 5. Notwithstanding the provisions of section 76 of the Companies Act, the company may, by by-law in the manner provided in the said section, increase the number of its directors to not more than twenty.

The purpose of that section was to permit the company to have more directors than was at that time permitted under the Companies Act. Then in 1918 the limitation on the maximum number of directors was removed from the Companies Act and since that time the Companies Act has not contained any limitation on the maximum number of directors. However, the company still remains or continues under the handicap or limitation of this section that was passed in 1914. In order to overcome this limitation and to bring it under the Companies Act the same as any other company, we are asking that the section which I have read, namely section 5, be withdrawn so that the company then will not be limited in the number of its directors and could only change its number of directors in accordance with the act as it is now set out under section 87 of the dominion Companies Act.

Mr. Claude Richardson (St. Lawrence-St. George): Mr. Speaker, if the hon. member has the information readily available, I wonder whether he would let the house know whether the greater number of the shareholders of the holding company, the company referred to in this bill, are residents of Canada and whether the greater number of shares are owned by residents of Canada.

Mr. Morton: I am afraid I have not that information readily available but that information could be made available at the committee stage for the hon. gentleman.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

JOSEPH ALFRED VICTOR TASSE

Mr. C. E. Rea (Spadina) moved the second reading of Bill No. 36, for the relief of Joseph Alfred Victor Tasse.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, before this bill is given second reading it seems to me that we should have a few words about it from the sponsor, the hon. member for Trinity. I notice that he has been given the honour, or whatever he chooses to call it, of being the sponsor of divorce bills at this session. On today's order paper there are 64 that are attributed to him.

Mr. Pickersgill: The hon. member for Trinity?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Did I say "the hon. member for Trinity"?

Mr. Pickersgill: Yes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am sorry. I should have said the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Rea). In any case I was looking at the right member.

From the very fact that the hon. member for Spadina is sponsoring all of these bills, I would take it that that is not of his own choice but rather that this task has been assigned to him; and I think it is a fair assumption that the assignment was made by someone speaking for the government. On that basis it seems to me that we should be told whether the new government has any ideas as to how these divorce bills are going to be handled. I believe we should be told whether the practice of the last number of years is to be continued of having them put through parliament in the usual way, taking up the time of both houses and, I would say, offending what is referred to in the speech from the throne as the dignity of parliament, or whether some other method is to be found and proposed to parliament by the new government.

It is not necessary for me to indicate what we in this group think about this procedure. It is well known that we do not think this should be the business of parliament. We have suggested a concrete alternative which we think gets the business of divorce out of parliament without putting divorce courts in the provinces where they are not wanted. We are prepared to make our proposal again but we have deliberately withheld making any proposal at this session until there has been some word from the government as to their intention. I recognize that the hon. member for Spadina is not a member of the government. But because he has been assigned this task apparently by the government I think that he should tell us what the plans are. I ask that question in relation to the case that is now before us not because I have any interest in or even knowledge about this particular case but because it is the first one the second reading of which has been called.

Mr. Rea: Mr. Speaker, I think perhaps the hon. member for Vancouver North—

An hon. Member: The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

Mr. Rea: I mean the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. He made a mistake in respect of my constituency.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): We are equal now.

Mr. Speaker: I should inform the house that if the hon. member for Spadina speaks now he will close the debate.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On this bill.

Mr. Speaker: Yes, on this bill.

Mr. R. J. McCleave (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, before the hon. member for Spadina speaks may I say just a few words. I have read the evidence in the Tasse case. Without going into it now, I was going to ask the sponsor whether this evidence has been brought to the attention of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Fulton) because it involves what seems to me to be a very serious offence of fraud on behalf of the wife.

Mr. C. E. Rea (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, the duty of the chairman of the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills is generally to sponsor divorce bills. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asked whether there was going to be anything different in the procedure this year from the procedure that has been followed over the past years. Of course, as he mentioned and as he knows, I am not a member of the government and I do not know of any procedure that will be different from the procedures that have been used in years past. This is a right, apparently, which certain people have, that is to come to this government to try to straighten out their grievances. Therefore I can only say to you, sir, that I know of nothing which will be different this year compared with what has been going on in the past.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Knowles: On division.

Motion agreed to on division, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

SECOND READINGS—SENATE BILLS

Mr. Rea: May I have the approval of the house to take, en bloc, the bills referred to in items 33 to 67 inclusive and 69 to 96 inclusive.

Mr. Speaker: Is the house unanimously agreed to the adoption of the procedure suggested, namely that the second readings of the bills now be taken in the one motion.

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): There is an act here respecting Mexico Tramways Company, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: The proposal was to include everything with the exception of Bill 73 as I understood it. That is the only bill other than divorce bills standing on the order paper.

Mr. E. L. Morris (Halifax): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, as a new member I have read back through the debates in the years during which the late Mr. Woodsworth was leader of the party represented in this debate by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I have also consulted the standing orders but am unable to find, and would appreciate your direction now, as to how I should record my vote as being in opposition to this procedure?

Mr. Speaker: I understood that the house had agreed to the procedure of taking all these bills together and the hon. member is now raising the question as to how he may record his vote against the bills.

Mr. Morris: That is correct sir.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I understood he wished to record his opposition to the procedure, which could be something different than opposition to the bills.

Mr. Morris: I did say on a question of procedure and I regret that. What I wish to do is to record my opposition to the bills.

Mr. Speaker: Well then the hon. member will have an opportunity when the motion is put to register his opposition to all the bills in the one motion. Is it agreed then that we have the consent of the house that Bills Nos. 37 to 71 and 74 to 101 inclusive be now read a second time?

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, with reference to this motion, perhaps I might say a word or two on behalf of this group. We feel very strongly that some procedure other than the one we now follow should be found by which to handle these bills. Nevertheless this is one field in which we are prepared to give the government a little time to consider the matter and for this reason we did not insist that all these bills be called individually on second reading.

We reserve our right however, in the committee on miscellaneous private bills and at the further stages in this house, to ask that these bills be dealt with separately if we feel such a course is indicated. For example, there are cases such as the one which has already been referred to by the taller member for Halifax (Mr. McCleave) where we feel these bills should perhaps be singled out for further consideration by the house.

There are two matters at stake here; one is the question of each individual bill and whether or not it should be passed; the other is the question of this whole procedure. We think parliament should not take much longer before finding a way to deal with this matter which does not offend against the dignity of parliament as, in our opinion, does the present practice.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): Mr. Speaker, I understood you to say this procedure was with respect to Bills Nos. 37 to 71 and again from Bill No. 74 to Bill 96—

An hon. Member: No, no.

Mr. Speaker: To Bill 101.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): Then, Mr. Speaker, was it the intention to exempt Bills Nos. 72 and 73?

Mr. Speaker: No. Bill No. 73 is the only bill intended to be excluded from the motion and that is item 68 on the order paper. There does not appear to be a Bill No. 72 on the order paper.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): Oh, I am sorry sir.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Pierre Gauthier (Portneuf): I would like to speak sir with respect to this subject. In previous sessions, as the house knows, we have opposed divorce and during the last session most of the members from Quebec refrained from casting a vote on this question because we knew that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) would move bills to try and convince the house and the then government, as he is trying to convince the present government, to send these divorce cases to the exchequer court. Am I right?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is right. The exchequer court, sitting here in Ottawa.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Here in Ottawa. Now if this court sits in Ottawa it means that a court of divorce would be imposed upon Quebec and Newfoundland which we do not want. We will therefore oppose that measure if another bill comes before the house because we oppose any court of divorce in Quebec, and I think the same applies in Newfoundland.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The hon. member has one right now and he is a member of it, this House of Commons.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Pardon me?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I say the hon. member has a divorce court right now and he is a member of it, this House of Commons.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Yes, but it has been accepted by parliament, I believe, in the previous years that this procedure could be dealt with by parliament. The hon. gentleman now wants to change that procedure and we feel that, in this change, he is trying to impose upon Quebec and Newfoundland a court of divorce which we do not want. For that reason we are opposed to changing the existing procedure and as I say, we are firmly opposed to divorce in my province.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): I am not so much concerned, Mr. Speaker, with the procedure but I have heard nothing in this house in the years during which I have been here to indicate that anybody was concerned about a cure for divorce itself. The cause of divorce is selfishness and the use of strong drink and until we get such a cure—which really is the absolute surrender to the Prince of Peace—we are going to have divorce and we are going to have trouble with it. This is the breaking up of home life and the Christian home is the bulwark of the nation which is what we have to fight for.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, I am sure we all agree with the hon. member for Fort William. Nevertheless, that does not dispose of the situation, because if there were just one case of divorce coming from certain provinces in this country there would be no way in which that one divorce could be granted except in accordance with the manner now followed.

I do not know how to handle this thing, either, Mr. Speaker. I have given a lot of thought to it over the years. On occasions I have joined my voice with some in the C.C.F. group requesting that consideration be given to some other form of proceeding with these divorces, a form which would avoid bringing them before parliament but, frankly, I do not know of any other way in which it can be done while preserving the civil rights of the provinces of this country. That is the conclusion I am reaching.

I know it is nauseating, sometimes, for us to get piles and piles of evidence so exhaustive that we can never read it all, and yet have to pass bills on a limited understanding of them. In my experience I have had to deal, in a way, with matters of this kind. I have been brought in and asked to deal with various types of domestic problems; I have watched while cases were being heard in the courts of the land, and I will say this: I doubt very much whether the criticism which has sometimes been levelled at those who hear the evidence and make recommendations in another place is altogether warranted. I must confess that I, myself, have sometimes levelled mild criticism in that direction, but having a little experience, as I said, in hearing some cases tried in some of the courts of the country, and having heard some cases presented before the committee of the other place, I am going to suggest that the cases heard by the committee of the senate are just as thoroughly heard as they are by any other court.

These committees are regularly constituted and when the committee has to divide itself into sub-committees I am confident that they choose able men to act as chairman of those sub-committees, usually lawyers of some repute, and I am quite certain that they are as able as some I have known who have been appointed judges. The committee does its best possible work. Much as we may dislike the method which we have to follow, and much as we may dislike divorce, the problem still faces us, and it seems to me to be almost insurmountable. It is difficult to see how this could be dealt with in any other way.

I object just as much as anyone to the necessity for this procedure but at the same time the question has to be dealt with and it appears to me that it will be dealt with in the way it is now for a long time to come.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Would the hon. member permit a question? In view of what he has said about the satisfactory way in which he says the senate committee deals with these cases, would he be inclined to recommend that they should deal with these cases finally, in which case they would not have to come to us?

Mr. Hansell: If my hon. friend means that that committee should constitute a kind of judicial court or court of record, call it what you like, I would be quite willing that that should happen, because my own view is that the method of being heard by the senate and then the case coming here is something that is unnecessary, although there have been times when the odd, individual case has been reheard by the private bills committee and rejected even though the senate had recommended it.

But perhaps that could be remedied too; perhaps there could be provision for an appeal if one or other of the parties involved did not think he or she had received a fair hearing. But I should be quite willing to have an arrangement of the kind suggested by the hon. member, if that could be done. However, I doubt very much whether it could.

Mr. Erhart Regier (Burnaby-Coquitlam): Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to take very long in speaking on this matter at this particular time, though, like the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), I reserve my right to say more, possibly at a later date this session.

I fail to appreciate, once again, how we, elected as legislators, can be expected to act as adjudicators of our own legislation. I think that is an absolutely wrong course of action. Some hon. members may feel that they are not participating in a divorce court, but I contend that they are by the very fact that they are members of the House of Commons and have the right to pass a vote on these acts.

I regret that I fail to appreciate the thought which was expressed that we in the C.C.F. group want to force the divorce court upon anybody. I want to see that fair play exists, and that justice is done to these people, and we feel that when a group of legislators suddenly switches, at five o'clock into a group of judges, the fair deal to which these people are entitled cannot possibly be given them.

I regret very much that I have not the same confidence in the judicial capacity of the members of the other place as a few hon. members have expressed. I have often had the feeling that no member of the other place above even the age of 60 ought to have the right even to sit in on one of these cases.

I am going to close my remarks this afternoon by hoping that the sponsor, who is acting in a responsible position, has at least read all the bills.

Mr. Stick: How old are you?

Mr. Regier: I would also express the hope that all members of this house have looked carefully over the list of names because whether they know it or not it is technically possible for their own names to appear here and for this house to grant a divorce without their being aware that they are voting on their own cases.

MEXICO TRAMWAYS COMPANY

Mr. Percy Vivian (Durham) moved the second reading of Bill No. 73, an act respecting Mexico Tramways Company.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in the few minutes which remain before six o'clock I think I can very briefly explain the essence of this bill. There is a considerable printed explanation which I think can be compressed into these facts. This company was incorporated in 1906 and then wished to take on additional functions including the operation of a tramway in Mexico. At that time a company incorporated under the Companies Act was not permitted to do so without a special act and enabling legislation was enacted by this house. Subsequently this company went out of the tramway business in Mexico. It no longer wishes to pursue this endeavour and it is now asking that chapter 125 be revoked so that it may effect a return to what it wishes to be, an investment company, retaining the name Mexico Tramways Company but coming under the Companies Act under which in due time the name of this company will be changed.

Motion agreed to, bill read the second time and referred to the standing committee on miscellaneous private bills.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, Monday will be private members' day and an arrangement has been reached between the parties under which on Tuesday we will move to go into supply and we will discuss exclusively external affairs. If there should be a vote it is agreed that it will take place at ten o'clock rather than at 8.15 as provided under the rules.

Mr. Stick: Mr. Speaker, do I understand we are limiting the debate on external affairs to one day?

Mr. Green: Yes, Mr. Speaker, it has been agreed that one day would be allotted for that purpose. Mind you, the estimates will then be referred to the standing committee on external affairs as has been customary for some years.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is the minister in a position to indicate what government business it is intended to bring forward on government days next week? Will it be supply or will it be legislation?

Mr. Green: I am not in a position to say for sure but I believe arrangements have been made or are in process of being made for Wednesday to put through in all stages the bill amending the Unemployment Insurance Act and probably we would then go on with estimates. Thursday is to be a private members' day and on Friday we would take either estimates or legislation. I am not certain at the moment which it will be.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

C.B.C.—T.V. SATELLITE TRANSMITTERS

Question No. 143—Mr. Fisher:

1. What are the various types of T.V. satellite transmitters contemplated by the C.B.C.?
2. What are the relative costs of these types of transmitters?
3. What is the estimated capital cost of structures to house transmitters?
4. Are any of the contemplated transmitters to be of the unmanned, automatic type?
5. Is it necessary for the contemplated transmitters to work from a microwave relay set-up?
6. Has the C.B.C. any cost figures for the long-range television beaming type of transmission under development by Canadian Westinghouse?
7. Under present regulations could a private T.V. station charge a fee for the use of its VHF signal in a retransmission by a UHF set operated by (i) the C.B.C.; (ii) a private operator?
8. Has the C.B.C. any record of any successful American T.V. retransmitters of the unmanned type?

Answer by: Hon. G. C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue):

The Canadian Broadcasting Corporation advises:

1. The C.B.C. has contemplated the possibility of establishing true "satellite" stations which would pick up and rebroadcast programs originating from a "mother" station. The C.B.C. has also contemplated the possibility of establishing relay stations which would be fed through microwave network; or others which might be supplied by means of television recordings and film.

2. The true "satellite" station tends to be the cheapest type; a relay station operating from the microwave network, the next most expensive; and the station programmed by television recordings and film, the most expensive; but the cost of all depending on power, location and antenna.

3. From about $15,000 up, depending on power and location.

4. Any true satellite stations or stations working from the microwave network would probably be unmanned.

5. See answer to No. 1.

6. No.

7. Under present regulations a television station would have to agree to rebroadcasting of its programs by a satellite station. The matter of a charge is not covered by any regulations. The C.B.C. has not so far contemplated the possibility of its establishing satellite stations which would pick up from private stations.

8. Yes.

SPORTS

WINNIPEG BLUE BOMBERS—HAMILTON TIGER CATS—CONGRATULATIONS ON WINNING FOOTBALL TITLES

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. My question of privilege relates, as it should, to something that happened in this house. On November 14, as reported at page 1126 of Hansard, the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Lambert), who is also the member for Edmonton West, prophesied that there would be coming east in a few weeks a fierce horde of Eskimos whom he described as bigger, faster and hungrier than ever. I suppose, since the hon. member has had to eat his words, my point of privilege should be regarded as satisfied. Seriously, however, may I join with the Secretary of State (Mrs. Fairclough), the hon. member for Hamilton South (Mr. McDonald) and others in congratulating the Hamilton Tiger Cats upon what they did on Saturday. May I say also that we from Winnipeg are very proud of the Winnipeg Blue Bombers.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the minister explain the bill?

Mr. Richard A. Bell (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, the purpose of this bill is to authorize a procedure by which a life insurance company incorporated by parliament on a joint stock basis may be converted into a mutual company, and also to take some further steps to enable the control of Canadian life insurance companies to be retained in Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

An agreement between the government of Canada and the government of the commonwealth of Australia for the avoidance of double taxation and the prevention of fiscal evasion with respect to income taxes was concluded at Mont Tremblant on October 1, 1957, and this bill is to give parliamentary ratification to this agreement. The agreement is similar in form to the agreements which Canada already has with the United Kingdom, New Zealand, the United States of America and a number of other countries.

PROPOSED COMMITTEE TO STUDY SYSTEM OF SIMULTANEOUS TRANSLATION

Mr. Maurice Breton (Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should take into consideration the advisability of setting up a special committee of parliament for the purpose of considering the establishment of a system of simultaneous translation, in the official language which is not that used by the member then speaking, for all debates in the House of Commons and in all parliamentary committees.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the motion I have the honour to present today, seconded by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier), appeared on the order paper last session and is back again.

As a member of the house for many years I have realized how difficult it is for French speaking members to take part efficiently in the English debates. When I was at the United Nations in 1955 I found that their system of simultaneous translation in five languages was very impressive, and I felt it should be adopted here to meet the needs of both English and French speaking members.

Indeed, it is much easier from a technical point of view to translate in two languages than to translate in five, and I see no reason why we should not act immediately to realize such a project.

At the last session I inquired among my colleagues in this house for their opinion, and found that the majority of them were in favour of a project of simultaneous translation. I have said on a number of previous occasions that with nearly one-third of the members of this house being French speaking members it is normal that such a request should be granted. I also said that if we the French members were in the majority I am sure our English speaking colleagues would have insisted long ago on having this reform. May I say that the well-known reputation for fair play of which the British people are so proud is in my mind the best reason for believing that this house will unanimously grant this request.

In September, 1957, I wrote to the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton) regarding the system of simultaneous translation installed in this house last summer for the benefit of the delegates to the congress of the universal postal union. In reply to my inquiry the Postmaster General wrote:

> The most important point in connection with this matter is that since the House of Commons makes its own rules, I would imagine that before any system could be installed it would be necessary for the house itself to direct that it be done. Certainly, even though the system used for the universal postal union congress would not be satisfactory for permanent use, there would seem to be no technical difficulties involved in the matter.

I would also like to quote a paragraph from the speech from the throne, in which it is said:

> It will be the high purpose of my ministers to take steps to make both houses of this parliament more effective in the discharge of their responsibilities to the people of Canada.

We know indeed that when they were in the opposition the members of the present government fought for the rights of parliament. I feel that the first step toward protecting the rights of parliament would be to extend to each hon. member of this house the right and opportunity to be heard and understood in his own language.

International bodies of all kinds are adopting the system of simultaneous translation for the benefit of their members. It is fitting that an example of the harmonious relations that should exist between the two great races and language groups in our country should be underscored by the installation of such a system in the House of Commons. I also know that simultaneous translation is widely used in bilingual meetings in Canada and elsewhere. The following is a report from the Gazette dated May 23, 1956:

> The junior chamber of commerce of Canada, embracing almost 25,000 members across Canada, today asked Commons Speaker Rene Beaudoin to instal a simultaneous translation system in the house. The chamber made its request in a brief presented to Mr. Beaudoin by a delegation headed by Ross Smyth of Montreal, national Jaycee president.

May I add, Mr. Speaker, that on the east side of the Ottawa river there are four million people who speak French and that a great majority of them are unable to follow the debates of the house when they come to visit us. We should readily admit that the present system of acoustics is far from being perfect. Many hon. members complain that it is very poor and request the privilege of personal earphones. This is a privilege now granted to only four members, and it has been refused in the past because earphones interfere with the general system of acoustics.

Maintained at great cost, the present system could be replaced with better hearing results by the provision of individual earphones. I should not say exactly replaced, but improved with a system of earphones such as exists in the United Nations. I understand that in the United Nations the speeches can be heard quite well because of the natural acoustics of the hall, but translations are heard by means of earphones.

The system we use here was installed at a cost of $33,529. The annual rental of the equipment amounts to $7,500. The operation and maintenance cost $20,000 annually. Therefore the annual cost is $27,500. The wiring was done by public works personnel themselves; therefore that cost is not readily available. Here are some figures I obtained from the United Nations on the cost of simultaneous translation.

Mr. Speaker: While the hon. member is looking for the figures could I ask the members of the house to moderate their conversations a bit. It seems to be difficult to hear this afternoon.

Mr. Breton: Thank you, Mr. Speaker.

In the system they use in the United Nations they have personal earphones, and the cost of their system would not be of great help to us if our system were not exactly the same, but a comparison shows that it would cost $30,000 to instal 275 microphones in this house. If the number of microphones were reduced to one per desk, that is to say one for every two members, the cost would be $21,000. If you added to that the cost of installation of microphones for every seat in the galleries—and we have 625 seats in the galleries—the cost per seat would be $15, or a total cost of $9,375.

As I have already said, it is very important that the public which speaks French should be able to hear the speeches in French or in English in the galleries. I believe it is very important, and it is one of the reasons I think the system should be installed.

I should now like to quote what was said in the speech from the throne:

> It will be the high purpose of my ministers . . . to take steps to make both houses of this parliament more effective in the discharge of their responsibilities to the people of Canada.

I think I referred to that a few moments ago. The purpose would be to have the proceedings of parliament available to each member in his own language.

May I add, also, Mr. Speaker, that the system could be improved upon in many ways. I believe, for instance, that the French edition of Hansard is published in too big a hurry. If we had a system of simultaneous translation I think no one would complain if the French edition of Hansard were published a day of two after the speech had been delivered, because the words of the speaker would have been available in both languages at the time the speech was delivered. The difficulty now is that the reporters and editors are forced to work at high speed, and I believe this is inconsistent with the exigencies of the French language.

After seven years of experimentation in the United Nations I believe the system has reached the necessary degree of perfection. I believe the installation of such a system would be viewed in all parts of Canada as a symbol of national unity by recognizing the fact that both French and English are the official languages. Then the people who come from Quebec could be understood in this house and could take a greater interest in the debates.

It has been said that sometimes the French people appear to be taking little interest in the debates, but I think the reason is the difficulty they experience in following them. The acoustics are not good and the pace of the discussion is too rapid. As I said a few moments ago I think the best argument is this, that the British people, who are so proud of their fair play, cannot longer delay granting this request which would add so much to national unity.

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, this suggestion which comes from the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Breton) is an interesting one. It is interesting not only to those members of this house whose official language is French, but it is interesting also to those of us who claim English as our first and basic language.

I should tell the hon. member that some consideration has already been given to this particular suggestion. As he said, shortly after the postal congress had completed its deliberations in this chamber he wrote to the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton), as a result of which consideration was given to the system which was in effect at that time. I am sure the Postmaster General would be glad to give a more complete report on that particular point.

There are many problems to be solved in considering such an installation, and there are several types of installations which, presumably, could be made in this chamber. The hon. member has given us, Mr. Speaker, the benefit of his own research into the cost of at least one type of installation which could be made. However, I should like to comment briefly to the effect that I personally do not believe any such installation would take the place of the existing public address system in this chamber. It would be ancillary to it. I do not believe, either, that it would ever take the place of the printed translation which, after all, is for the record. Despite the fact that it is true these translators work at top speed to produce the translations for the record, I do not believe the installation of any system would take the place of that service because it is a service that, in itself, is necessary to the business of this house. I should like to repeat that any such service, if installed, would not do away with any of the existing services but would merely supplement them.

There is not only the matter of the mechanics of installation but there is the cost of installation, and there is the staff which would be required to man this installation. I am presuming, Mr. Speaker, that the staff would come from the translation bureau. As hon. members of this house know, for several years now there has been a real effort on the part of the officers in the translation bureau to provide, not only for this house but for all the government requirements, a desirable system of translation which would be uniform in vocabulary without regard to the type of document that was being translated. I think they have been very successful in that, so far as I can tell. Certainly it would be advisable to have the same system followed if the day comes when we are privileged to have a simultaneous translation service in this chamber.

I am told that while we have a number of expert translators, they are probably not trained in that particular field. In fact there are not too many people in Canada who are trained in the field of simultaneous translation. Existing translators could be trained, without too much difficulty, in a matter of 3 or 4 months to take on this service. Personally I think it would be advisable to train existing translators in the bureau rather than bring in new ones, and they in turn could be replaced by appointments to the existing staff of the translation bureau.

I think it would be well to inform the house and the hon. member who has spent so much time in exploring the possibilities of this service, that you, Your Honour, have taken an interest in it. I am assured by Mr. Speaker that he is quite ready to explore this whole matter on behalf of the house. If I might make a suggestion to my hon. friend, I believe if Mr. Speaker will do this for us the matter wil be expedited, whereas the appointment of a committee of the house to investigate it, with all due respect to members of the house, I fancy would occasion some delay because most of us are laymen in this field.

Mr. Breton: May I ask a question? I understand that this problem of simultaneous translation is a problem which the house should settle. I believe that members from the opposition side should be heard in this connection. I understand that Mr. Speaker, acting alone, perhaps could investigate this project, but the resolution before the house proposes the formation of a committee to investigate it.

Mrs. Fairclough: As the hon. member says, Mr. Speaker, it is a matter for this house to decide. There are several departments of government that would be involved in such a translation. Quite apart from deciding that there will be such a service, there is the question as to what type of service will be made available.

Early in his remarks the hon. member spoke of the excellent service which is available at the United Nations, where the proceedings of that assembly are translated simultaneously into five languages. When we were at the meetings in Paris of the NATO parliamentary association, we found a different type of service. It was something along the line of what is called a walkie-talkie. The sound was transmitted by radio to individual sets which the listeners carried. It was an extremely low power installation; as a matter of fact, if you carried your set out into the hallway you could not hear a thing. It had only sufficient power to be heard within the chamber itself.

These are all matters that would have to be considered, and most of them are of a highly technical nature. I suggest to my hon. friend in all seriousness that probably at least the preliminary investigation would be one for Mr. Speaker who is, after all, the representative of all of us in this house, of all parties. However, as he has said, it is a matter for the house to decide. My own opinion is that a more efficient way of handling the matter would be to leave it for the time being in the hands of Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, originally it had not been my intention to speak on this motion, but after listening to the mover I feel rather impelled to do so. I can understand very well the principle and the intent behind the expressions of the hon. gentleman who has moved the motion which is now before us.

In the House of Commons we are bilingual. In the House of Commons an hon. member may speak in English or in French. I think I am fairly safe in saying that almost all the 265 members, if not all, understand and can speak English. But this being a bilingual House of Commons it is understandable that French should be spoken here by right and by custom, and that those who desire to do so should feel rather badly when, speaking in the French language, they find that we unfortunately—perhaps because of our own lack of responsibility—do not understand or cannot immediately grasp their points and the import of their statements, and are obliged to wait for a period of 24 hours until we receive a translation.

From that point of view I can certainly understand the hon. member's outlook and his desire to have all members get, through simultaneous translation, what is being said at the time it is being said. However, Mr. Speaker, I am inclined to believe that in moving this motion the hon. member may be getting away from what he actually wants, namely a greater impression on English speaking people with regard to the learning and the usage of French. I can speak only as far as I personally am concerned, and I admit that I am one of those persons who know only one language, namely English, and perhaps even that not too well at times. However,

I have found it helpful listening to those hon. members who on occasion speak French, and trying to follow their speeches.

I think I am safe in saying, Mr. Speaker, that if you put in a system of simultaneous translation here you are going to make this house more mechanical and perhaps drive away that urge that some of us have to try to follow speeches made in French and in that way to learn, because then we would just pick up an earphone and get the translation.

In addition, Mr. Speaker, I believe there is something our French speaking colleagues should know, namely that you can lose a great deal of a speech by making it mechanical; an emotional and sentimental expression carries with it a great deal of effect. I honestly believe that even my friend the hon. member who is moving this motion would find that if you had a mechanical set-up whereby you could just pick up an earphone and listen to a translation, it would not be the same as listening to the direct speech. It can never be the same as getting it from the man who is speaking, with his emotion and his sentiment.

As I said, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the reason why the hon. member has moved this motion, but with all due deference to him I should like to say that I am afraid he has not thought this through on the mechanical and the financial basis. I apologize to him for saying that, but this happens to be my trade. We have here an excellent system of loudspeakers. Just on my left over above the clock is a control whereby, as one speaks, certain of the loudspeakers are on full power, some on half power and others cut out. They are controlled by an automatic panel installation up in the corner even further on my left. All loudspeakers are tied in, both in the house and in the galleries. It would be possible to make a tie-in such as the hon. member suggests, but it would be a most expensive and technical service.

I think I can say this, although I have not had experience on this kind of system but have had experience on others having installed a couple of systems in B.C.

For $31,000, sir, you could not even touch the installation cost for the seats of the House of Commons. Moreover, to the best of my knowledge you could not tie in our present loudspeaker system without terrific expense. It would require a brand new installation,—a new three-line service to every desk. One of these would be a line for English, one would be for French and the third would be the common return wire; that is technical language. You could not do it with less than three lines separate and apart from the two lines on the present loudspeaker system. This means, as I say, a brand new installation on the desks, not only of three lines to each desk, but a break-up of three additional lines on each desk for the earphones of each member sitting at those desks.

As an electrician I can say that is correct. The cost of tearing up these floors and putting in such a system would be high, and in addition to the two operators now in charge of our system we would have to have for the House of Commons alone two interpreters and one operator for the new equipment.

This motion says "in the official language which is not that used by the member speaking, for all debates of the House of Commons and in all parliamentary committees". I repeat, "in all parliamentary committees". If my information is correct there are four official committee rooms in our House of Commons, so this would mean, not only an installation in the chamber itself, but also in the official committee room on the first floor, in the railway committee room on the main floor and to other rooms on other floors. I am not sure of the exact number of rooms, but it would mean a separate and complete installation in every committee room.

Moreover, as you know, Mr. Speaker, and as those members who have been here in past sessions also know, on numerous occasions the House of Commons will sit at the same time as all the committee rooms are being used by members of the official committees.

Mr. Breton: May I interrupt the hon. member. He will realize that the first requirement of the resolution is the formation of a committee to study the system of simultaneous translation, and it is only on the report of such a committee that the house would act. The main thing is the formation of the committee to study the matter.

Mr. Winch: Well, I am reading the resolution; I note the remark of the hon. member, but what is the committee going to study? The resolution says the subject will be the installation of a simultaneous translation system in the committee rooms. The hon. member gave a figure which I think is quite out of line and is, in fact, absolutely fantastic; because the installation in all these committee rooms and in the railway committee room, which I imagine has a seating capacity of around 150 to 200 persons, would mean, as I say, not only operators for each committee room but also two interpreters for each committee and also for the House of Commons itself. That makes a total requirement of ten interpreters and five operators at the very least, who must be on the job.

This is a matter which I think perhaps, although I understand what he has in mind, the hon. member has not completely thought through to its conclusion. I think I have perhaps outlined sufficient to explain why I rise to say a word with respect to the wording of the motion moved by the hon. member. The terrific cost would be nothing like $31,000; nor would it be $50,000 nor, in accordance with the principles concerned, would it be $500,000. It will run into a great deal more for installation alone, in addition to the cost of administration.

Outside of all these considerations, about which I felt I should speak to the house, I would like to make a suggestion to the hon. member, which is that basically he will not achieve what he is after in putting forward this motion. Let us not make this house a mechanical one; let us not make this house one where 265 members pick up ear phones. Could we not, even in view of our present difficulties, try to appreciate—even if we do not understand—the sentiments and the emotions of those who speak in a language which I personally do not understand? Backward as we may be, let us aim for a situation where we try to follow what they are saying and really endeavour to pick up their language.

Speaking personally, I regret that we who are English speaking have been so backward in learning French. I had never appreciated that until I came to Ottawa. I assure my hon. friend he will not attain that unification and understanding if he makes this house mechanical as he suggests, rather than maintaining the sentimental, emotional and cultural unity which I am certain is the spirit he would wish to see in this house. I am sure this wish would be shared by his fellow French speaking members.

(Translation):

Mr. Samuel Boulanger (Drummond-Arthabaska): Mr. Speaker, I was quite gratified to read the motion presented by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Breton), asking for the establishment of a system of simultaneous translation in this house. Though I dissociate myself from any preconceived views with regard to language, which some English-speaking members might attribute to me, I would like to stress how beneficial such a system would be to the proper administration of this country.

There are in this house quite a number of English-speaking members who do not understand French and also some French-speaking members who have a little knowledge of English, but who are unable to express themselves fluently in that language, like myself, for instance. There is also—because of our rather inefficient, and at times non-existent loudspeaker system—the difficulty of understanding a member from the other end of the house, as was the case just a moment ago when the hon. the Secretary of State (Mrs. Fairclough) was straining her ears to hear what an hon. member had to say. This is also the case for us, who are sitting in this corner of the house; we do not clearly understand those who speak from the other end of the chamber. Such innovation would greatly contribute to a better understanding between the two ethnical groups who form our nation, and would constitute a gesture of approval from the government with regard to the observance of bilingualism.

No wonder French Canadians do not seem interested in the important problems of western Canada, nor the English-speaking westerners in those of the east. I am thinking of the prairie wheat and of our mixed farming in the east.

According to press reports, two organizations have already submitted briefs to the government asking for such a system, i.e. the Cooperative Union of Canada, with Ralph Staples as president, and the Conseil Canadien de la Coopération, whose president is Mr. Leger, who lives in New Brunswick.

At its last congress in Victoria a no less important organization, the Canadian Chamber of Commerce, which has 750 branches across the country, tabled a resolution for the establishment of such a system. In its preambles and resolutions, the chamber of commerce called upon the federal government to establish a simultaneous translation system in the Canadian parliament, for the benefit of members, newspaper correspondents and visitors.

This right was granted to us by the B.N.A. Act which recognized the official use of both French and English, not only in the House of Commons but in all federal government services.

Simultaneous translation of debates both in the house and in the Senate would enable everyone in Canada to get a more realistic and general grasp of all the country's problems, and at the same time would create a genuinely Canadian outlook of unity and understanding.

Professor Marsh Jeanneret, director of publications at the University of Toronto, expressed the view that nobody could call himself 100 per cent Canadian if he were not able to understand both ethnical groups that make up this nation and to be understood by both those elements. We must not be satisfied with being 70 per cent citizens.

The views expressed by this teacher and by the organizations I have already mentioned prove that bilingualism is a necessity in Canada.

I am not like the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) a professional electrician, and I do not know on what his calculation establishing the cost of this system at $500,000 is based, but all I can say is that, even at this price, it would be beneficial to our country.

(Text):

Mr. Victor Quelch (Acadia): Mr. Speaker, I listened with interest to the speech made by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch), in which he pointed out that the cost of such an installation would be prohibitive and also that the cost of operation would be exceedingly heavy. I may say that when I first read the resolution that was my general reaction to the proposal. On the other hand, we are prepared to support the setting up of a committee for the purpose of considering the establishment of a system of simultaneous translation into the official language not being used by the hon. member who is speaking in the House of Commons. But then the resolution goes on, "and in all parliamentary committees".

We do not think it would be even wise to think of making this possible in the committee rooms, because that would undoubtedly be very expensive, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Vancouver East. The hon. member mentioned that the whole thing would become mechanical. I think most of us have been down to the United Nations, and I think we have been amazed by the success of simultaneous translation there. An expert has listened in and been able to repeat the speech in the other language with, in most cases, all the fire and zest of the original speaker. I was amazed at the amount of emphasis that could be put into a speech by someone who had to listen in and speak at the same time.

I believe in some cases the translator improved upon the language or upon the delivery of the original speaker, and I think the same might very easily be the case in this house. An hon. member listening to the speech in the other language and trying to understand it would still be able to listen to the original if he wished to do so; he need only take off his headphones and listen to the speaker in the original language. If, on the other hand, he wanted to get a thorough understanding of what was being said, he could put on the headphones and follow the translation.

I think this would tend to increase the interest taken in the debates by those hon. members who are not familiar with the particular language being used by an hon. member speaking in the house. It would certainly tend to improve debate and therefore, as I say, we are prepared to support the motion. After all, the motion only calls for a committee to investigate the matter. If after investigation the proposal is found to be completely infeasible it would, of course, be dropped.

Mr. G. H. Aiken (Parry Sound-Muskoka): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Vancouver East I did not intend to speak on this motion, but his remarks have impelled me to say a few words. I wish to agree with the hon. member for Vancouver East, inasmuch as I feel that a mechanical installation in this chamber would detract from the speaking of the two languages.

I am one of the number of new members who have come to the house recently, and I should also like to say that I am one of the new members who have begun to take lessons in conversational French. I do feel that an installation such as has been proposed would probably tend to lessen the need for the conversational French we are learning. I should like to assure hon. members who speak French as their own language that there is quite a large group of hon. members on this side of the house, members whose own tongue is not French, who are now taking lessons in conversational French. I think not at this session, but probably at the next, they may hear quite a few efforts in weak but sincere French from hon. members on this side of the house.

I want to assure them that these lessons are now being taken because we are sincere in our wish to learn the French language. I believe the experience of listening to the French spoken in this chamber, attempting to follow it and attempting at some later date to use it ourselves in debates is valuable, and that it would be impaired if we had a mechanical installation in this chamber.

For that reason I think there is much to be said for the view expressed by the hon. member for Vancouver East. Our efforts here are the efforts of one group, one country. We are not a group of countries such as constitute the United Nations in whose discussions countries from all over the world take part. We are one country and one people. We should try, I believe, to speak together in this house and not to be divided by the mechanical means suggested.

(Translation):

Mr. Andre Gauthier (Lake St. John): Mr. Speaker, it gives me great pleasure and satisfaction to rise in support of the motion of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Breton) who asks the government to set up a special parliamentary committee for the purpose of considering the establishment of a simultaneous translation system. An innovation such as this would certainly promote better understanding between the members of the house, and therefore between all Canadians.

I hope this proposal will be welcomed on both sides of the house, and I add that our English-speaking colleagues should be the first to endorse a project of nation-wide implications such as the one proposed in the motion now before us.

French-speaking members are probably partly responsible for the fact that so far the need was hardly felt for the installation of a simultaneous translation system. In fact, those of us who have a perfect command of English address the house mostly in English. I realize that they do so for the benefit of the unilingual majority and also for the sake of being better understood.

But the consequence of all this is that French, theoretically one of Canada's two official languages, has practically disappeared from the debates, and active participation in debates is confined solely to members who have a perfect command of English. True, all speakers have the privilege of expressing themselves in their own language, but all do not have the satisfaction of being understood.

Then, Mr. Speaker, simultaneous interpretation would be a notable improvement from the viewpoint of all visitors. All of them would feel more at home while listening to the debates in their mother tongue.

I do not propose to go into the cost of such an undertaking; it would, in any case, be very cheap, in the light of the vast improvement it would mean both for the members and for the cause of national unity.

I had the opportunity of seeing one system of simultaneous translation in operation in 1954, at United Nations headquarters. If a translation system is satisfactory where five languages are spoken, it would be all the more so in this house, where only two official languages are involved.

The Junior Chamber of Commerce of Canada, which has over 25,000 members and which, in the past, has more than once given evidence of its desire to further the cause of national unity, has adopted the simultaneous translation of its own debates and, in May 1956, through its chairman, Mr. Ross Smythe, asked the Speaker of the House of Commons to establish that system which has promoted a better understanding and such a beneficial rapprochement between the two major racial groups in Canada.

Mr. Speaker, as I do not want to delay any longer the passing of this resolution and also because no further arguments are needed in support of a measure which everybody approves, I shall conclude by expressing the wish that the request of my colleague, the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm, meet with unanimous assent. This would be one more step towards national unity.

(Text):

Mr. J. O. Gour (Russell): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure for me to endorse the motion of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Breton), which presents members of this house with a great opportunity to fill a long-standing need for the installation of a simultaneous translation system. At the present time I am not in favour of extending this principle to every committee of the house, but I am much in favour of the idea of referring the matter to a committee for study, to determine how much it would cost to have such an installation made in the House of Commons.

I would have thought more of the English-speaking members would be in favour of this proposition because, after all, I think 95 per cent of the English-speaking members understand only English. Perhaps I need not point out to hon. members that I understand English far better than I speak it. Although I am not fluent in the language I understand it rather well. It is pleasant for us to speak in English because we try to be gentlemen in our behaviour toward our English speaking colleagues, and we trust that you will not pass too harsh judgment on those of us who attempt to speak in English. That is why I attempt to speak in English although I am not as fluent in the language as I might wish to be, but I do so in an attempt to be more agreeable and, if possible, more useful to my English speaking colleagues who do not understand French. I do not think, as was suggested by my friend the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch), that English speaking members really prefer to listen to us speaking French—

Mr. Winch: I am sorry, sir, but all I can say is, "C'est pourquoi je n'apprends pas à parler le français."

Mr. Gour: If we preferred to listen to hon. members speaking in their mother tongues we could disregard the earphones and simply listen and observe the way they spoke. I congratulate the hon. member who spoke a few minutes before me who said he is trying to learn French. Congratulations to that hon. member and to all English speaking persons who attempt to learn to speak French.

I would point out that when I was a boy the nearest school was 15 miles away. I had to work and sacrifice at 50 cents a day for a 12-hour day to give that money to mother and father in order that they could send me to high school to learn English. I have never stopped making every effort and sacrifice in my attempt to learn to speak English so I could better understand my English speaking colleagues.

Therefore I think that it would be well if the English speaking members in this house were to make about 20 per cent of the sacrifice in learning to speak French that French speaking members are making in an effort to learn English. If this were done all English speaking members would understand French better. I believe that everything possible should be done to maintain the equality of the two official languages of this country. I think the time will come when there will be more teaching done of English in the province of Quebec and of French in the province of Ontario and the other provinces, and I think the adoption by this house of a simultaneous translation system would do much to encourage and foster the development and preservation of the two official languages.

I was present at the postal congress and was happy that we were able to understand so well the various gentlemen who were speaking. Sometimes we could listen in French and sometimes in English, whichever we preferred.

I will not take any more of the time of the house, but will conclude by saying I think it would be a good thing to appoint a committee to make a thorough investigation of this question. I congratulate once again those English speaking people such as the hon. member to whom I referred who are trying to learn French. They will find it a nice language, and will grow to like it even better when they understand it. We can only be enriched through knowing the two official languages, and it is very pleasant and useful to be able to speak in the language of your friends. In this way you can draw closer together in spirit, understanding and friendship. That is all I have to say on the matter.

Mr. W. A. Tucker (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, I would like to congratulate the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Breton) for bringing in this motion. The way I approach this matter as a person of English speaking origin is to try to look at it from the standpoint of those who are of French speaking origin. When many of them come into this house they speak French, of course, as their mother tongue but perhaps do not speak English very well. Before they can take their full part in the debates of this house they have to begin learning English.

If it were said to the English speaking members that before they could take their full and equal part in the proceedings of this house they had to learn to speak French, as the mover of this motion said we would take another good hard look at the situation.

In a sense what we are saying to our French speaking colleagues, if we oppose this, is that because you are good at learning another language, because you are willing to get down to business and learn English, we are quite prepared to carry on indefinitely because we can get by on that basis. What we are saying to many of our French speaking colleagues is that because we are not ready to take advantage of the modern development of simultaneous translation they cannot take an equal part in the proceedings of this house with English speaking members.

We all know very well, Mr. Speaker, that French speaking members have just as much of a contribution to make to thinking on national problems as the English speaking members; but we also know that unless they can speak English they will not get the ear of the house nearly to the same extent. Therefore they are faced with this dilemma, either not to speak at all and not make the contribution that we should be glad to have them make, or else speak in French. If they do this very often the thoughts they bring forward are not brought home to the whole house.

Members may look at them in translation the next day but sometimes, because they are very busy, they do not look at it; therefore it is not brought home to all the members of the house as it should be. We also know that if they speak in French there is a tendency for those who do not understand French to leave the house. They say, "We will see it in translation the next day".

Therefore there is a feeling on the part of the French speaking member who may be speaking in French that his English speaking colleagues are not interested in the contribution he is trying to make because so many of them go out. They go out because they feel that since they cannot understand they may as well go out and do something and read the translation later on. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that is not the way in which we should carry on the business of this house, now that we have this modern technical convenience at our disposal.

Anyone who has been at the United Nations will realize how infinitely greater the problem is there, where what is said has to be translated into four other languages instead of into one other language as here proposed. This comes to my mind also in regard to what the hon. member for Vancouver East said. I support what the hon. member for Acadia said in that regard. I was greatly impressed when I attended the U.N. in 1947 when I first realized the extent to which the ministers of the western world were listening to the splendid interpretation being made of Mr. Vishinsky's speeches. It seemed to me they were getting pretty well all the feeling that he was putting forward in regard to the western world. It was a very important thing, I think, that people from other parts of the world could understand just how the soviet union did feel at that particular time. It was before NATO was set up; and the very fact that all the people attending that meeting were able to get the real feeling behind people like Mr. Vishinsky, representing the soviet union, was a great contribution to what later happened in the western world and their getting together in NATO to defend what was left of freedom in the world.

Now, then, in a very real way we want to make the union which was brought about by the fathers of confederation a real, working, happy, worth-while union.

Mr. Winch: Why did you not say this last year?

Mr. Tucker: I am one who believes that the confederation of our country would never have been possible if our French speaking fellow Canadians had not been willing to come into the agreement to bring about confederation. I feel that once they had trusted themselves to come into union in a country where they would be in a minority, then it is very much the obligation of the majority to live up to the very spirit on which confederation was based not only in fact but in spirit as well.

I think this resolution is working along that line. When we say to our French speaking members, "We are going to put it in your power to take a full and equal part in the proceedings of this house", which admittedly they have not been able to do up to now, we are meeting one of the bases upon which confederation was entered into, namely that the two languages should be used in the proceedings and debates in this house. What is the use of saying that in words and then having a situation where, in effect, if you are going to be a really effective member of this house you have to speak in English?

In other words, what you are putting in words you are not carrying out fully in practice, and every hon. member knows that is so. If a member rises in his place and speaks in French at least half the English speaking members cannot understand him. Many of them go out, because they are busy and conclude that they will read the remarks in the translation, but many of them do not do so. If they do read it in the translation the man who has spoken in French has not really fully, in spirit, taken part in that debate because the person speaking after him, in order to deal with the matter properly, should know what was said by he members speaking before him and not be required to read it the next day in the translation.

I was surprised at what I saw in Israel two years ago. We hear a lot about the bad feeling between the Jews of Israel and the Arabs who are living in Israel. When I visited the Knesset, the Israeli parliament, two years ago I was very surprised to find that there was simultaneous translation of the speeches made in Hebrew for the members of the Knesset who did not understand Hebrew and spoke only Arabic. I thought to myself well, this is really something to marvel at. We hear about the apparent bad feeling that is talked about so much between the Jews and the Arabs; yet there in the parliament of Israel they provide that the speeches made in Hebrew shall be understood at once by the Arabic fellow members of the parliament of Israel.

Why has this not been done before here? Some of us attended the United Nations in its early days when they were just beginning to fully introduce simultaneous translation.

Mr. Winch: Why did you not do it when you were sitting on the other side of the house? This is the first time you ever made a speech of this nature.

Mr. Tucker: I am sorry that the hon. member is trying to dig up something in regard to my attitude. My personal attitude has always been that we should recognize that what made confederation possible was the agreement of the French speaking people of Canada to come into union with the English speaking people of Canada. I have always been ready to take the view that no attempt should be made to whittle down the basic foundation upon which confederation was made possible. I have been one who has said that the English speaking people in their approach to the rights of our French speaking people should treat them exactly as English speaking people would like to be treated if they were in the minority instead of in the majority. I think that is the approach which all Canadians more and more are beginning to take to this question.

The hon. member for Vancouver East said this might defeat the purpose which the mover of the resolution had in mind, and the member who spoke before me seemed to have a similar thought in his mind. He suggested that it might discourage members from learning to speak French. I would suggest to hon. members that their fears in that regard are not well founded. Anyone who has listened to the simultaneous translations made at the United Nations, and at other international gatherings, will know that if a speech is being made in French, we will say, and you know a bit of French you can listen to the speech being made in that language, and at the same time you can listen to the translation being made in English.

The man who is doing the interpreting is probably a complete master of both languages, so by listening to the speech made in French and the simultaneous translation into English a person who really wanted to work at it would be able to understand French within a very short time. There are many members in this house who are really anxious to understand both languages and I suggest to them that, far from this system preventing members from learning the other official language of Canada it would enable them to learn it much more quickly. One could actually listen to one language being used and could hear at the same time a very splendid translation into the other official language.

Mr. Winch: It would have meant a great deal more if the hon. member had made this speech when he was on the other side of the house.

Mr. Tucker: My hon. friend has mentioned that I should have made this speech when I was on the other side of the house. I do not recall this motion being brought forward when I was on the other side of the house.

Mr. Winch: Why did the hon. member not move it if he felt so strongly about it?

Mr. Tucker: If it had been made when I was on the other side of the house I certainly would have supported it. As a matter of fact, my hon. friend moves me to recall one incident which did occur some time ago. As I recall it, the late Right Hon. Mr. Lapointe was about to speak on a bill to make provision for bilingual money, and I thought it would be a nice thing for me to say a few words in French in support of the bill. He was gracious enough to yield me the floor to do so. This is one of the nice memories I have of actually being able to make a small contribution towards the adoption of bilingual money in this country.

Mr. Winch: You would take money whether or not it was bilingual, and so would I.

Mr. Tucker: There were people at that time who seemed to fear that some people would not like the money if there were some French on it. My thought was that it would bring home to our Canadian people that the very foundation of our country lay in the willingness of the French speaking people and the English speaking people to join their destinies together and make a great nation. If we are going to succeed in that venture we must treat one another as real partners and respect one another's rights and one another's devotion to his own language. It is not respecting that devotion sufficiently to say to a man who is elected to sit in this parliament, and whose mother tongue is French, if you are going to make the contribution that an English speaking member can make you must first learn to speak another language. I believe we should say to the French speaking members, if you are elected to this house we will see to it that, so far as modern technical advances will permit, you will be able to make the same contribution to the debates of the parliament of your country as if you happened to belong to the majority who speak English.

I think, myself, that if we said that to our French speaking members in the house, where laws are made and the government is supported, then the person who did not speak English would have the same right to make his contribution to these debates as the person who speaks English and we would be showing the spirit which made confederation possible.

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): I would think that no one in this house would disapprove any measure which is practically possible that would better the understanding of what we say to one another, no matter in what language it may be framed. As a matter of fact, sitting here and listening to this debate I have thought of an improvement in this system which would be of particular benefit to the government. If we could find something which would interpret the government's good ideas in such a way that they would be understood immediately and approved by the opposition, that would be something additionally useful which might arise out of this debate.

Mr. Marler: That would need a master mind.

Mr. Pearson: It would be beyond your capacity.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Reverting to the present from that Utopian condition, I should like to say a few words about the system which was installed here this summer for use by the postal congress, because it has been referred to on several occasions. There have been recurring suggestions that it might have been left in the house for the use of members in their debates. This was impossible, Mr. Speaker. The system was a temporary one, installed in the light of the fact that the House of Commons is the master of its own destiny; that this chamber was only lent to the congress, and that nothing must be done in this chamber which would leave the slightest mark when the congress was finished. The wires ran on top of the floor and equipment was put on the desks with brackets. There was no boring of holes and there was no permanency about it. Had the equipment been required for six months or a year of continuous use, I have a strong suspicion that it would have been unsatisfactory because of the impermanent nature of the installation.

Then, too, the system was patterned after those in most bodies—I think this is very important in considering the problem which we face in the installation of a system—where simultaneous translation is in operation.

Mr. Breton: May I ask a question?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): This would make the fourth speech delivered by the hon. member this afternoon, so if he would hold his question until the end of my remarks I should be glad to answer it then. Most bodies which use simultaneous translation system have a restricted number of microphones and they are bodies which, shall we say, normally are in closer control of their chairman or presiding officer than the House of Commons tends to be at certain times.

In the general assembly of the United Nations, for example, the speaker comes to a podium and speaks from the only microphone which is available. In the committees of the United Nations, if my memory serves me correctly, there are microphones between the delegates, and in the junior chamber of commerce system again there is a limited number of speaking positions. One of the problems which this house is going to face is that of providing for a simultaneous translation system which will take into account the rather interesting and sometimes amusing interjections which might come from any part of the house at any time causing the translators, in effect, to speak for two people at one time.

This problem was not present during the postal congress proceedings. Our postal congress people were well organized. There was one microphone per delegation and while normally there were about 300 people attending these meetings, there were only some 95 microphones in use. In addition to that, and this is just a sidelight which may be of some interest to the house, there was a rather good system of control by which the chairman, who sat on a podium at the south end of the chamber here, could signal the control operator in the gallery and he could cut off any speaker at any time. I suspect there are moments, Mr. Speaker, when you might appreciate such a system for your own use.

Then, Mr. Speaker—and I am not suggesting this as an adjunct to the proposed installation—there were two brilliant lights at your end of the chamber. One was green and it signalled a man who was speaking so quickly that the translators could not keep up with him. When that light flashed the speaker automatically was expected to slow down. There was another light—what we might call an emergency light—which was red. When that light went on it meant that things were completely out of control, that the chairman did not propose to go on with the meeting and that the translation system had been turned off. Perhaps we might have used some of those in some of the pipe line debates. So in that respect, namely control over the microphones, there was quite a difference compared with the type of system we would have here in the house.

Again, Mr. Speaker, if we installed that system or one very much like it we would be obliged to do away with the majority of the people in our press gallery—I think that would be a most regrettable thing—because the equipment and the translation cabins which were required occupied the great bulk of space in the press gallery. Then I might mention in passing the matter of the channels as being another reason for the unsuitability of that system. There were six channels involved. Obviously we would not require such a great number of channels in our present situation.

From some experience that we gained on that system, Mr. Speaker, I would certainly agree with the Secretary of State (Mrs. Fairclough) that it would be a rather involved process to develop people to handle satisfactorily the translations. It is not an impossibility but we should not expect that this is something which could be done immediately. In the case of the postal congress these people came to Canada from fairly well all over the world in order to do this work. From time to time there were little difficulties which arose in the translations.

One which fortunately did not arise in the case of the postal congress but which arose at another meeting shows how difficult it is at times to carry the feeling from one language into another. In German there is a phrase which translates almost exactly into English "The dog in the lumberyard" but translated into English in those particular words it has little meaning. At this particular international convention, Mr. Speaker, the translator, unthinkingly perhaps, used the English equivalent of the words which sprang to mind and which was "The negro in the woodpile". That translation proved embarrassing to some of those who were listening to the translation. That is only one example of many which could be quoted, some of which would not be quite fit for use here in this house, of the difficulties which will be involved in developing completely adequate translation. But, as I have said, they are not insurmountable by any manner of means.

Having some experience with the technical problems involved in the introduction of a system such as this for us here in the house, Mr. Speaker, I want to suggest to you that it will not be an easy task to work out a satisfactory system to meet our needs. I do not even take into account the question of the great traditions of this house which must also be considered and which were discussed at some length when the original microphone system was installed. There may be those who feel, as they look back over the years, that there would be something undesirable in the installation of a translation system. I am not one of those. I think it has much that is desirable.

However, I think this debate—and this will be my closing point—brings before this house something which we should all remember and appreciate, and I am happy that it has been shown on both sides today. I refer to the great understanding and appreciation of one another's language, culture and background which has been developed in this house over the years since confederation.

I am one who comes from the centre of French Canadian language and culture in this country, namely the province of Quebec. I have lived throughout my lifetime surrounded by people who spoke French and who had a long tradition in the French culture. I have always found that they were particularly generous in their attempt—a very successful one, I may say—to learn the other great language of Canada and to understand and appreciate the other largest group in this country. I am inclined to think that our French friends have perhaps gone further in this direction than has the English speaking section of our country. However, I think that situation is changing. Over the last few years, in going across Canada from coast to coast, I have found an increasing interest in French as a language and in the culture of our French speaking colleagues.

In this connection I would say that I am not wholly happy about certain things which the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) mentioned in the course of his remarks. I do not say this critically but I think he would be interested in the matter. I am not at all sure that we should think—as he did throughout his speech—in terms of a minority group and a majority group in so far as the problems of language and of culture are concerned. Those were terms which the hon. member used on a number of occasions. I view Canada more as a nation of minorities, as a nation in which no one group, be it English or French or some other, has a right to consider that it is the dominant faction in this country. We have been built as a nation largely by those who speak French and those who speak English. But we have also brought to this country and assimilated many people of other cultures and we have at this point millions of Canadians whose mother tongue is other than English or French.

Now by tradition, and quite properly so, there are but two tongues used in this house. We respect them, we wish to encourage them and we wish to understand them. I think the study of this problem is a good idea; I know it is currently being studied, but let us never Mr. Speaker—and these can be my closing words—approach a problem of this nature with the attitude that the majority in Canada comprises one group from the point of view of language, religion or culture, and the minority comprises another group with respect to these three categories. Let us first of all think of ourselves as Canadians; let us think of ourselves as first of all being dedicated to this country of ours and, while we will work for a mutual understanding, let us never think of ourselves as being divided on the basis of language, religion or culture.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Algoma East): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with considerable interest to the observations of the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton) with regard to this motion but have not been able to come to any conclusion as to whether he is for it or against it. So far as I am concerned I propose to support the motion of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Breton) because I think it is a useful one. The Postmaster General did mention some defects which might arise if the idea of this motion became effective. He indicated that if we had simultaneous translation in this house it might discourage some members of the press gallery from attendance at our debates, but at the moment he made that cautionary observation the press gallery was not exactly crowded, without the benefit of simultaneous translation.

An hon. Member: It is not now.

Mr. Pearson: No, it is not now either; I think there is one extra member in the press gallery. The Postmaster General also mentioned other difficulties in connection with simultaneous translation. I have had some experience of them myself. It might indeed be hard to translate the expression "nigger in the woodpile" into a phrase which would mean the same thing in French, but I do not think these are very important practical difficulties. In any event, this motion, as I understand it, is that the government should take into consideration the advisability of setting up a special committee of parliament to go into this question and I was encouraged to hear the Postmaster General say at the end of his remarks that a study of this matter would be a good thing.

Its purpose is, as has been pointed out, for a study to be initiated by those members of the House of Commons who are most concerned by the motion. It would be a committee, as I understand it, which would examine and report only. Before that committee there could be discussed the technical, financial and other considerations which would have a bearing on the final adoption of the idea or otherwise.

It has been suggested by the Secretary of State (Mrs. Fairclough) that such an examination could be made, in a preliminary way, by the Speaker. Well, perhaps these two ideas could be combined and Mr. Speaker, who undoubtedly would have an interest in this matter, could carry on an investigation the results of which could be made known to the parliamentary committee. I do think the introduction of a simultaneous translation system into this house—and this has been previously mentioned during this discussion—would give a greater reality to our debates when members are participating in those debates using the French language, which I think we all agree is unfortunately not fully understood by a great many other members. Therefore there are speeches made in this house which cannot be understood as they are made by those who do not know the French language. This makes it very difficult for English speaking members, not understanding the speeches, to participate immediately thereafter in the manner in which they would like, that is to say, by commenting on statements just made. It also puts the speaker using French at a disadvantage.

I would therefore hope that this proposal of simultaneous translation, if it were found to be practical and desirable by a committee of the house, would remove this disadvantage now suffered by some of our members.

The experience of the United Nations with regard to this matter has been referred to by nearly everyone who has taken part in this discussion and that experience, I am sure, has been very much in the minds of those who have initiated this motion. The practicability and value of such a translation system in this house was also demonstrated by its use at the international postal conference which took place here last summer. The system at the United Nations, as I think the Postmaster General himself pointed out, does not require a member to go a podium and speak into a loud speaker to facilitate the working of the translation system. In the work at the United Nations, on committees, delegates speak from their desks as we do in this House of Commons and the simultaneous translation system does work in that way.

The earphones, I confess have uses at the United Nations to which I know they would not be put in this house. I recall how at times the deterioration of United Nations debates could be illustrated by the use to which earphones were put. At the beginning we would put on the earphones and turn to the Russian translation to listen with eagerness but, after a while, they would be taken off because you would get a little tired of some of those Russian speeches and this would be a way of ignoring them. Finally, as an indication of complete deterioration, we would turn the earphones inside out and put them on our ears in such a way that we would not have to listen to the Russian speech at all, even in Russian. Now I am certain if we had that kind of system in this house it would not be debased in such a way.

It has been suggested, Mr. Speaker—I think first by the hon. member for Parry Sound-Muskoka (Mr. Aiken)—that a system of simultaneous translation would minimize or reduce our desire to listen to speeches in French and thereby interfere with the process which very many of us in Canada are undergoing at this time, namely of becoming more proficient in our other language. But, of course, if we introduced this system into the House of Commons there would be no compulsion on anyone to use it in connection with any particular speech, and I should think that as we became more fluent in French our need for the translation would be less and less, and that we should be only too glad to listen to the French speeches without the aid of the system.

I would also point out—and this has been pointed out by a previous speaker—that it would have a positive advantage, in that it would be possible to listen to some of the speeches made, originally, in English, in a French translation, and, undoubtedly, on some occasions, to hear much better speeches in French than were, probably, being delivered in English. At least, that has been my experience when my own halting observations at international meetings have been translated into classic French.

Thus, I do feel that there are a good many arguments to be advanced in favour of this motion, which have been put forward by speakers from both sides during this debate. I hope, therefore, that the house will decide that this is a sensible motion, and that it does at least make a move toward recognizing the unity of this house and of this country in respect of language and that it will commend itself for sympathetic and, I hope, positive study to hon. members on all sides of the house, through the committee that could be set up.

Mr. Alan Macnaughton (Mount Royal): Mr. Speaker, in rising to support the motion of the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Breton), I should simply like to say that I am sure most hon. members of the house at the present time support and endorse the words of the hon. member for Algoma East (Mr. Pearson). The hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) seemed to imply that some of us were "Johnnies come lately" in this respect. We are not. At least a year ago several hon. members on this side of the house were much interested in this problem and formed a committee which did call upon the Speaker of the House of Commons to urge a careful study of this matter. For reasons best known to the former speaker, no solution was advanced at that time. I think the time has come when we should consider this. The point, it seems to me, is not the technical difficulties, nor the cost, though the cost is very important. These matters will be considered carefully by the committee to which I hope the proposal will be referred.

The point is that many of our French speaking associates in this house feel at a slight disadvantage in that they would like to hear without delay a French version of the speeches given in English. So the problem is not one of helping the English to understand French better, but, to put it into reverse, to assist the French speaking members in the house to understand the full import of what is being discussed in the English speeches.

Coming as I do from the second largest French speaking city in the world—the largest after Paris—we have daily contact with our French brothers, and we know from experience that the best way to learn French is by associating with our French speaking confrères; one of the best ways of understanding and learning French is to listen to the language and hear it spoken until your ears become acclimatised to it.

Many points have been covered by various hon. members who have spoken, and there is no purpose in going over the same territory again. But I should like to say at this time that the sooner this matter is brought to a conclusion and referred to a standing committee or to a committee to be set up to study this question, the better it will be for all of us in this house.

(Translation):

Mr. Louis Deniset (St. Boniface): Mr. Speaker, may I be allowed to say a few words in this debate. The request now before us is by no means extraordinary. No impossible demands are being made. We are only being asked to set up a committee to consider the matter.

(Text):

I just wonder, Mr. Speaker, how many hon. members actually understood what I have just said? I venture to say that more than one-third of the hon. members in this house did not understand a word of what I said in French. Quelle est la température à Vancouver-Est? How is the weather in Vancouver East?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Très bien.

Mr. Deniset: Mr. Speaker, suppose we have to take a vote right now? How can we vote properly if we have to wait until tomorrow morning for the translation? We should miss the benefit of the sonorous phrases which have been pronounced by the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton); we should not have the translation in time to vote today.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Good for you.

Mr. Deniset: The objections which have been raised are strictly technical. Is not a committee the best place in which to study technical and administrative difficulties? The hon. Secretary of State (Mrs. Fairclough) has said that the Speaker is looking into the matter. The inference is that she favours a study of the problem. I say, Mr. Speaker: let us have a committee, and let us have the Speaker look into it, and let us see who gets there first.

Mr. Raymond O'Hurley (Lotbiniere): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with interest to the speeches made by various hon. members concerning the motion now under discussion. As one who has always lived and who still resides in a French community, having spent my life there, and as the representative of French speaking elements near the city of Quebec, I think this motion as it has been proposed today is one which will have its importance in exemplifying that bilingualism in Canada is not only a word which can be used during election time but also a word which can be applied in action.

Mr. Speaker, my attitude is a firm one. There are no two ways about it. I think that though there are technical points to be studied and ironed out—I realize that this will be quite complicated and that cost will be an important item—nevertheless, the suggestion is worthy of consideration. In my opinion it is worthy of acceptance and the house should go on record, not only as being in favour of a study of this problem but as being willing to provide means of putting it into practice at the earliest opportunity.

I was surprised to hear the hon. member for Rosthern (Mr. Tucker) speak so eloquently on this subject, and what surprised me most was not the wording of his speech but that he should have come out so strongly in favour of this suggestion, considering the short period of time during which the present government has been in office. I think the hon. member should have spoken as wholeheartedly on this question in the past as he did today. But that does not change my attitude. My attitude is the same, and I say with all firmness and frankness that since confederation has been established; for 90 years on the basis of the upholding of both the official languages spoken in Canada, this house should have a simultaneous translation system at the earliest opportunity, and that the Speaker should continue his researches, or action be taken along the lines of whatever suggestion is adopted, to iron out whatever difficulties may arise in order that this house might see the application of this system which has been installed in other important assemblies throughout the country.

(Translation):

Mr. Georges Villeneuve (Roberval): Mr. Speaker, I do feel I should take part in the debate on this resolution introduced by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Breton) with a view to the establishment of a simultaneous interpretation system, from English to French and vice versa, in this house.

The British North America Act makes both French and English official languages in this country. Now if it is considered proper that the official record of the debates be published in both languages, I believe that it is well within the spirit of the constitution that these debates, which are officially translated, be also simultaneously interpreted at the very moment they are taking place in this house.

I propose to dwell more particularly on the practical aspects of the project under review.

Everyone knows that to take part in the debates in this house with complete peace of mind and in all circumstances it would be necessary to be perfectly bilingual. That is the aim of many hon. members but we must recognize that, in practice, things are not so simple. I myself feel that out of 265 members, 15 at the very most can be considered to be perfectly bilingual. Indeed I feel that is a generous proportion since, apart from two or three exceptions who have attained that ideal, other so-called perfectly bilingual members are much more at home in their native language than in their acquired language. After all it is only natural.

It is hardly necessary to be present at more than one sitting of the house to notice how acoustics remain relatively bad in spite of the improvements made a few years ago. As far as I know, nobody here has a built-in amplifying system, although everyone would need one to hear properly the speeches made in this house. Since the margin between hearing and understanding, in the strict sense of those two words, remains wide, I must confess, along with a great many of my French-speaking or English-speaking colleagues, that to follow the debates in this house constitutes a constant effort which it would seem unfair to demand of the representatives of the people during the six months or so that the session lasts every year. Added to these difficulties of hearing and of understanding, there is the fact that the questions under discussion in this house are extremely varied in nature, quite often of interest only to one section of the country, and are beyond the comprehension of members of the areas not directly concerned. This, to my mind, explains the absenteeism which is deplored by certain newspapers who do not always go to the trouble of looking into the cause for this state of affairs.

Up to this point the group on which the greater demands have been made from the point of view of bilingualism is certainly the French-speaking group. Do English-speaking members know that their speech and manner of speaking vary enormously according to the part of the country from which they come? Has anybody ever bothered to notice the difference between the English spoken by a member from Newfoundland and one from Alberta, between the English spoken by a member from Nova Scotia and another from British Columbia, and even between an English-speaking Quebec member and his Ontario colleague? The pronunciation, the tone, the words used are such that a French-speaking member like myself cannot help noticing if all these English-speaking members from various parts of the country speak the same tongue, the unity so displayed remains rather diversified, a fact which certainly adds to the difficulties of the French-speaking members who listen to all those learned speeches in this house.

On the other hand we have among us members of Germanic, Slavic and other origins whose English is at times not unmixed with a few exotic expressions which all add to the difficulties I have just mentioned. It is therefore in order to do away with these difficulties, this miniature tower of Babel, that I ask for simultaneous interpretation, so as to provide every member, whichever one of our official languages is his native tongue, with every possible means of realizing all his potentialities in this house.

Since my coming here in 1953, I have witnessed some noteworthy efforts in favour of bilingualism, on the part of French-speaking as well as English-speaking members, and I feel that the adoption of a system of simultaneous translation would only intensify this tendency which should develop on the basis of absolute freedom. National unity will not be attained by force and nothing can be more favourable to its achievement than by showing each of the two main racial groups, whose languages are officially recognized by the constitution, the consideration to which it is entitled with due regard for their normal modes of expression, language being always the vehicle of thought. As stated recently by a lecturer: "A man has no more reason to ask permission to love his own language than to love his own mother."

In my opinion, a system such as the one being considered would tend to give everyone the advantage of expressing himself and of being clearly understood.

Since my coming to this house, I have on several occasions spoken in favour of the measure moved today by my hon. friend from Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm. On January 27, 1955, on the occasion of the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I requested the adoption of a system of simultaneous translation in this house. In 1956, I was the first member to move a resolution similar in purpose as that of the hon. member for Joliette-l'Assomption-Montcalm, and, again at this session, I have had a similar resolution so registered under my name but unfortunately it is the 25th on the list, whereas the hon. member's is at the top. I shall be happy, when all have spoken in favour of this resolution, to be able to say that I myself have done my small share to obtain the adoption in this house of a system of simultaneous translation.

Earlier today I heard the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) give estimates, which I consider extravagant, as to the cost of putting in this equipment, and I would rather rely on the figures suggested by the hon. member for Joliette-l'Assomption-Montcalm who estimated that the installation would cost approximately $40,000, plus the salaries of four interpreters.

I am really puzzled and surprised at this sudden show of thrift on the part of my hon. friend from Vancouver East, and I hope he will reconsider the matter in all its aspects and realize that we are not asking the impossible, but mere justice. In my opinion, when justice is involved, there should be less talk of money.

Mr. Speaker, I also wish to point out to the house that the galleries too should be equipped with the system we are proposing for the house.

It must be realized that all visitors to the galleries are not necessarily bilingual. For my part, representing a constituency 98 p. 100 French-speaking, I have at times been sorry to hear constituents of mine who had attended a sitting of the house say: "It is too bad but we could not understand a single word; the only speeches made while we were there were in English." Well, those people went back home feeling less satisfied with their visit. If a system such as the one we are considering today had been in use in the galleries, I am convinced that these people would have been much more satisfied and would have gone back home much prouder of their Canadian citizenship. They certainly would have felt greater appreciation for their visit in the capital of their country.

The proposed resolution also concerns the system of simultaneous translation in parliamentary committees. My remarks to the house also apply to committees, in view of the fact that the questions raised are greater in number and that the speeches are rather in the form of questions and answers.

For the last congress of the International Postal Union, the government had seen fit to have a system of simultaneous translation installed in the house so that all delegates coming from all over the world could understand what was being said in the course of the debates. If it was then considered important that all delegates understand the debates, I am wondering why members of the house would not be granted the same privilege in following the debates of this house.

I hope that the proposed resolution will be considered favourably by all members on whatever side of the house they sit and whatever their political party. And so, after adopting the resolution, we shall be one step further on the way to national unity.

Mr. Yves Leduc (Verdun): Mr. Speaker, I am strongly in favor of this motion. May I be permitted to ask a question of the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton). In his absence I am sure he will be kind enough to take it as notice. My question is: When the international postal convention took place in this house last summer did the authorities responsible for the organization of the simultaneous translation system hire translators from Canada only, or also from elsewhere, for translation from French to English and from English to French? How much did the temporary system cost the government? Thank you.

Mr. John Smith (Lincoln): Mr. Speaker, I should like to rise in support of this resolution. I must admit, sir, that my knowledge of the French language is very limited.

(Translation):

First great war with the 22nd regiment! Germans heavily bombed! Do you speak French? Perhaps you understand fried potatoes, eggs, milk, Cognac, red wine, white wine...

(Text):

And a great many other words that you would not use in this house. Mr. Speaker, we are a bilingual nation or race and it is not my intention in any way to discourage that. I support it and I support the resolution.

(Translation):

Mr. Lomer Brisson (Saguenay): Mr. Speaker, in my opinion, no resolution was ever put forward which is more calculated to promote goodwill in this house and national unity in the country at large than the one moved by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Moncalm (Mr. Breton). All the citizens of this country will, I believe, thank him for introducing such a resolution today.

Mr. Speaker, we must however ask ourselves a question. While this parliament has been dealing with public affairs for some 90 years, what is the present position of its members as far as bilingualism is concerned? I believe that very few of us can boast of speaking both French and English fluently. I will therefore ask another question, even though many improvements have been made in this regard since 1867. How many among those who will come after us during the next century, assuming that bilingualism keeps on improving at the same rate, how many among them will be able to boast that they are perfectly bilingual?

Without being pessimistic, I believe that, at that time, even if other improvements have taken place it will still be said then, as it is today, that bilingualism is still confined to a minority in the house.

How much longer, Mr. Speaker, shall we see hon. members leaving the house to avoid listening for thirty minutes or an hour to a language which they do not understand? How much longer shall members who speak another language be forced to spend hours reading speeches which they could not hear or which they misunderstood? How much longer shall members under the pressure of circumstances, be compelled to refrain from speaking their mother tongue, the language most adapted to their feelings, their intelligence and their knowledge?

Mr. Speaker, I wish to pay tribute to the hon. member who, today, is asking the government not the immediate establishment of a system of simultaneous translation—because objections have been raised in certain quarters of this house, some saying that it would mechanize our debates, others that it would cost too much—but simply to lend a sympathetic ear to the proposal that a parliamentary committee be set up where experts could be heard, and where it could be determined whether it would be easy or not to instal a system of simultaneous translation.

For my part, I believe that a matter such as this is above party politics. If we really need mechanical devices to solve the language problem in this house, well, I, for one, prefer a true and real bilingualism provided by mechanical devices to a bilingualism which practically does not exist in this house.

If modern technology can actually give us a system, even mechanical, which could solve this national problem, I would favour it, the protestations of the hon. member for Vancouver East notwithstanding.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that I am in favour of the motion, and again I congratulate the mover and all those who seek to promote in this country the idea of simultaneous translation in this house.

(Text):

Mr. Theogene Ricard (St. Hyacinthe-Bagot): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great interest to the speech of the hon. member who has just taken his seat. There is only one regret in my mind. It is that in the past he has not devoted so much energy toward simultaneous translation. Maybe if in the past he had spoken as loudly as he did today we would be farther advanced.

The resolution before us is a very important one. Before we all agree to it, or before we all accept it, I think there needs to be a great deal of research done. I should like to go on record as recommending to this house that we study all phases of this question, even though I am of the opinion that the adoption of simultaneous translation would do a lot to aid national unity. If we had simultaneous translation, it would make the proceedings of this house much more interesting, not only to the members but to those who listen in the gallery. However, I would say that before we embark upon such an expenditure we should look into all aspects of the question very carefully.

Hon. George C. Marler (St. Antoine-Westmount): I am sure hon. members would agree that at this stage of the discussion it would be very difficult to add any very new ideas, but I should like to commence my very brief remarks by expressing my congratulations to the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Breton), not only upon the very clear exposition of the arguments which he invoked in support of his motion but also upon the facility he displayed in presenting his facts and arguments in English, which of course we know is not his mother tongue. I am sure there are many hon. members in this house who envy the facility with which he exposed the reasons he advanced, with which many of us agree, as to why this motion ought to be received favourably by this house.

It seems to me, from the arguments that have been presented by the various members who participated in the debate, that there are two fairly obvious advantages that simultaneous translation would have. It would, of course, enable English speaking members to understand the meaning of what is being said by hon. members who were using the French language. Conversely, it would also enable hon. members whose mother tongue is French more perfectly to understand what is being said in the house by hon. members who are speaking English. As the hon. member for Algoma East (Mr. Pearson) said, it would give a reality to our debates which I cannot help but think is missing at times. Very often it seems to me that when speeches are made in this house in the French language, the debate resumes afterwards just as if nothing whatever had been said by the member who had just spoken French.

I know that all of us would like to possess that facility in both languages which a good many members have, but knowing the difficulty of learning either English or French it does seem to me that the objection raised by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch), namely that the system would discourage us in this task, is not really a serious objection to this motion. I have a great deal of sympathy for the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm because in my own political career I have been in a situation similar to his. He is a member of this house in which the great majority of members are English speaking. It was my privilege to be a member of the legislative assembly of Quebec where the converse is true and the great majority of the members speak French and many of them, I am sure much to their regret, do not understand English too well. Consequently, Mr. Speaker, my own personal experience was that I could make no impression whatever in debate while I was speaking English. On the other hand, even though I had not attained perfection in French, in fact far from it, it did seem to me I made much more impression when I made my remarks in French.

At the same time, I realized to the full, just as I am sure many hon. members whose mother tongue is French realize, that it was exceedingly difficult, first of all to attain great proficiency in a second language, and it is even more difficult to become persuasive in that second language because while it is one thing to possess the vocabulary it is another thing to use it fluently, convincingly and as I say persuasively. I feel quite sure that the debates in this house would be much more effective if all hon. members knew simultaneously what was being said in either French or English.

I would say to hon. members whose mother tongue is English, and particularly to those who represent the western provinces, that the French speaking members in this house would understand the problems of the west much better if simultaneously the remarks of western members were being translated into French. It would enable members, particularly those from Quebec, to follow the debate much more closely instead of having to read the remarks in Hansard the following day. I think, Mr. Speaker, it would be a very real contribution to the debates of this house if we had simultaneous translation.

Some questions have been raised with regard to the technical difficulties that would be involved in installing the kind of system that would be required. Then, too, some other objections, which seemed to me to be rather secondary objections, were raised by the Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton). I am sure that these difficulties are very secondary in character and that if a committee were set up pursuant to this motion it could very easily determine whether or not these technical difficulties are insuperable. Personally,

I cannot believe that the difficulties are insuperable. I have not attended many international conferences, but I did attend one about a year and a half ago in which there was a simultaneous translation into English, French and Spanish and I must say it was carried on with great facility even in the committees of that conference. I cannot believe that in the House of Commons the task would be, by any means, beyond Canadian capabilities.

I do not want to reiterate the arguments that have been expressed by others. I think there have been many excellent arguments invoked during the course of the debate, but I did want to take the opportunity of saying I am fully in sympathy with the motion and if it comes to a vote I shall certainly support it.

Mr. Pratt: May I ask the last speaker if this question was ever raised in the assembly at Quebec during the many years he was there?

Mr. Marler: No, Mr. Speaker, it was not raised because the custom developed of speaking one language almost exclusively. There were, I think, only a few members of the house when I formed part of the assembly who spoke English as their mother tongue. If I might answer the question more fully, Mr. Speaker, the one exception was during the discussion of the estimates of the department of mines, the minister of which was English speaking. The critic on the opposition side was also English speaking. The discussion started in English with a few questions directed to the minister which he answered in English. Then, the premier usually spoke partly in English and partly in French. Then, we continued the debate in French for three quarters of an hour, when the critic in the opposition came back to ask in English the questions which had just been settled in French. Consequently, I think this is an excellent argument in favour of simultaneous translation.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): This afternoon, Mr. Speaker, we have had a very useful debate and personally I have been very much impressed by the reasonable attitude taken by all those who took part.

The hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Breton) presented his case fairly and I can assure him that he has sympathetic listeners on the government side of the house. I was intrigued to notice that he seems to have made two converts on his own side of the house. I refer particularly to the two members of the last ministry who have taken part in this debate today, namely the hon. member for Algoma East (Mr. Pearson) and the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount (Mr. Marler).

Mr. Marler: Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken in using the term "convert".

Mr. Green: I beg the hon. member's pardon?

Mr. Marler: I think the hon. member should not be using the word "convert" because it suggests our having had a different opinion on the matter. The hon. gentleman well recalls the fact that there was never an opportunity for either me or the hon. member for Algoma East to express an opinion in this house on the subject.

Mr. Green: The hon. member for Roberval (Mr. Villeneuve) pointed out—and I think correctly—that he had had a resolution on the order paper in an earlier session. Certainly if the members of the former government had been in favour of taking this step, there was nothing whatever to prevent them from doing so.

Mr. Chevrier: The subject never came up for discussion.

Mr. Green: However, they are learning very rapidly how to carry on in opposition.

Mr. Marler: We have a good example.

Mr. Green: The hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount has had a great deal of experience in that position in the Quebec legislature and he did not have quite so much to learn as did the rest of the former ministers.

Mr. Marler: The minister is learning very fast.

Mr. Green: However, all joking aside, this question has been receiving considerable attention from the government. We watched the proceedings of the postal union congress which were held here in this chamber just a few short weeks ago and there are studies now under way by several of the departments on this very question. For example, the Department of Public Works would be responsible for seeing that any installations were correctly made. The officials of that department have the subject in mind and, as I have said, have been working on it for some time. We are not in a position yet to give estimates with any degree of accuracy at all. I believe that the figures given by the hon. member who sponsored the resolution are low and that it will be found that the expense is considerably higher. I also believe that the cost of providing translators would run to at least $100,000 a year. That figure may or may not be correct. The studies of this problem have not yet gone sufficiently far for us to speak with any degree of accuracy. In the final analysis it is the responsibility of the government to place all of the picture before the house when a decision is to be made. Of course, Your Honour is in charge of the house and I suppose the primary responsibility must rest with Your Honour. As was pointed out by the Secretary of State (Mrs. Fairclough), the Speaker has the subject in mind and is trying to see that the best solution is worked out.

Then there is one further feature about this resolution. It calls for the setting up of a special committee. That is quite impossible at the present session. I explained to hon. members the other day that this session was called to finish off the business for the year 1957 and not to deal with the business for 1958. The main purpose, of course, was to have the estimates for 1957-58 considered and passed by the house. In addition to that, there was certain urgent legislation which had to be put through. But the session is a session of two months in duration, unless hon. members wish to stay here during the Christmas holidays and then on into the new year. However, I am sure that would not be the wish of the vast majority of the members of this parliament. There is no reason at all why we cannot finish the business before the Christmas season. The very fact that there is so little time remaining—in fact there are only four more weeks if we are to be through before Christmas—demonstrates that it would be utterly impossible to set up a special committee such as that which is asked for in this resolution. Even if the committee were set up, it would be quite impossible for that committee to do its work properly because the facts are not available to be placed before a committee at the present time and they will not all be available before the end of this year.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Before the minister leaves that point I wonder whether he would accept one question?

Mr. Green: Yes.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Does the motion ask that a committee be set up at this session? Would it not be possible, under the terms of this resolution, for the government to consider the advisability of setting up such a committee at a future session?

Mr. Green: When the house comes back after the new year for the 1958 session, consideration would then have to be given to the manner in which this question would be handled. I am not at all sure that the proper way in which to handle it is by means of a special committee. There are standing committees of the house which I think could do the job just as well as or better than a special committee. Certainly at this time, for the reasons I have given, there would be absolutely no point in having this question considered by a special committee or by a standing committee.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that all of us should give consideration to the various questions that have been brought out this afternoon in this worth-while debate. From what has been said hon. members can tell that on all sides of the house there is a keen interest in this proposal. I believe that the debate has been very helpful and I close my remarks with the statement I made at the opening of my speech which was to the effect that we are very sympathetic to this suggestion and that the facts which have been brought out this afternoon will be given very careful consideration by those departments of the government concerned. I now move the adjournment of this debate.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Before the hon. minister moves the adjournment may I say to him that there are still several members on this side of the house who would like to make a contribution to the debate and I wonder whether he could not allow them to make their contributions and make his motion later because they have been sitting here prepared to go on with these short statements and I am sure it would be of great help to them if he allowed them to do so.

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, I am very sorry but I waited until the mover was on his feet and after he had spoken that would have closed the debate; I waited purposely for that and I am afraid under the rules there is now no way in which I can do what the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) suggests.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Speaker, I understand the hon. member was on his feet to ask a question and not to proceed to be the last speaker and, if I understand the rules of the house, I do not think he is permitted to be the last speaker. I understand that once the debate has expired because of a lack of speakers there is either a vote taken on the resolution or the adjournment is moved as my hon. friend has now done. Those are the two alternatives as I understand them, but there are still a number of speakers waiting and I am sure the hon. leader does not want to move a motion preventing these members from this side of the house, and more particularly from the province of Quebec, from expressing themselves on the resolution.

Mr. Green: I would just like to make one point; I hope the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) does not mean to suggest that I spoke when I did in order to prevent anyone else from speaking. I have sat here all afternoon and have been prepared to sit until nine o'clock this evening without the slightest intention of cutting anybody off, but when the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm rose to speak I took it that he was then closing the debate and that if I did not then speak I would be cut off myself.

Mr. Chevrier: No I did not mean to make that suggestion at all and I hope my hon. friend did not take any of the language I used in that sense because that certainly was not my intention. My only intention in rising was so that he might allow his motion to adjourn the debate stand until certain hon. members had made their contributions. I believe the hon. the former minister of agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) was on the verge of rising.

Mr. Gardiner: I was up and I addressed the speaker.

Mr. Chevrier: I am sure the hon. member for Melville does want to say something.

Mr. Gardiner: I just want to say, Mr. Speaker, that I am sure the hon. minister did not notice I was on my feet and I of course did not notice there was any member on his feet behind me. I did address the Speaker but by that time my hon. friend had been acknowledged. I am not raising any objection at the moment but I do desire to say a few words.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): On the point of order, Mr. Speaker, I might suggest first of all that there has not yet been a seconder for the motion by the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) that the debate be adjourned. Apart from that, however, if he thinks the situation is such that he spoke sooner than he intended to, all he needs to do is to ask the leave of the house to withdraw his motion to adjourn the debate and allow the debate to proceed. If the government still wants to use this device of ending the debate, when it is over the minister could have somebody else move the adjournment of the debate. There really is no great problem at the moment, surely. All the Minister of Public Works needs to do is to ask the consent of the house to withdraw the motion whereupon the debate can continue. It is just as simple as that.

Mr. Green: Oh, I do not think I should be put in the position of having to ask leave to withdraw my motion. I would be very willing to have the motion stand and in the meantime allow anybody to speak who wishes to do so.

Mr. Chevrier: Thank you very much. I think that will meet the purpose.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I do not know where you will find that in the rule book.

Mr. Green: Perhaps if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre could put his blind eye to the telescope on this occasion with regard to the rules of the house it might be helpful.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. When a motion is not seconded it is dropped right away and we do not have a seconder for the motion of the hon. minister. It is not therefore necessary to withdraw the motion in question.

Mr. Green: Well, Mr. Speaker, I believe the house could do as I suggested—that is to say, by unanimous consent the motion could stand.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): The deputy speaker says that there is no motion.

Mr. Green: And then the debate could go on in the meantime.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: This motion is not debatable and since we do not have any seconder the motion is not a formal one.

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): I will second it.

Some hon. Members: It is too late.

An hon. Member: Closure.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Mr. Green, seconded by Mr. Starr, moves that the debate be adjourned—

Some hon. Members: Oh, no, that is curtailment of the debate.

Mr. Chevrier: I understand from the house leader that he is going to allow the debate to continue and, that being the case, I would suggest that the motion should not be put until after the speakers have spoken.

Mr. Green: That is quite satisfactory.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: That is correct, if no motion is put from the Chair.

Mr. Gardiner: Then, I would like to say a few words, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Green: We will want a good speech now.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Melville): Of course I have not had an opportunity to discuss this with anybody, but in view of the attitude taken by the hon. minister I do not think any of us should try to talk him out at six o'clock or later. There should be an opportunity for him to put his motion later on and I do not think we should try to talk that motion out. We should give him an opportunity to have the adjournment moved later and with that understanding I shall proceed. I was not here when the motion was moved and did not hear the earlier discussions—I have just returned this afternoon from the west and was not in the house. There were, however, one or two remarks made by certain speakers which I feel should be enlarged upon and they have to do with the fact that members on this side of the house had not moved such a motion or taken such an attitude during the time when we were in office. I would also like to deal with the further point that some people find it a little difficult to learn a second language. That probably is not because of their unwillingness to do so or a lack of desire on their part and I just wanted to give one or two of my own experiences in regard to both these matters. When I decided to go into public life I was quite young. I am not so young now.

Mr. Green: That is a long time ago.

Mr. Gardiner: Well, over 50 years ago I decided that I was going to attempt to be elected some time. The first thing I did was to go to university and the first subject I wanted to learn was the French language. I learned sufficient French to pass at least three examinations and I thought I knew something about it. Well, after that I had to make a living and in addition, when I did go into politics, I had to get elected. Between the two things it took a lot of my time. Furthermore, there were no French people living in the area where I lived and I found what I had learned about grammar and even my ability to pick up a newspaper and translate from the French into the English, understanding the content thereof, slipped away from me in a fairly short time. I was not able to make very much use of the knowledge of the language I had gained while at university. When I was nominated in a constituency I had people there who spoke every language spoken in Europe and in addition two of the languages which are spoken in the orient, Chinese and Japanese.

There was the problem of trying to satisfy all the people I was going to ask to vote for me. I was not able to speak to all of them in their own tongues, so I was not over-keen even to attempt to speak any language other than English in those circumstances. For some considerable time after I had been elected to the legislature there was never more than one person in that legislature who spoke or understood French, so there was no real reason for my speaking French there. That took up quite a number of years and, as I say, there was some difficulty about doing more than was required of me in the positions occupied.

Then I came to this house and, having sat here for 25 or 26 sessions covering over 22 years, I know I have missed a great deal by not being able to follow the speeches which are made in French. Of course, I have been able, when it was particularly important that I should do so, to wait until the translation was available and then to read it, but during all the time I have been here I have been a member of the government, that is until the election, and I know that hon. members who are in the government now will understand that there is a great deal more to do when you are a minister than when you are a private member of the house. So often I did not find it possible to read these speeches in translation, and I say once again that I think I have missed a great deal during those years.

I had the privilege as a member of the government of attending international meetings. Some hon. members have said: "Why have we not discussed this matter before?" Well, I think I am correct in saying that the development of facilities for rapid translation while a speech is being given is rather recent, and then, in addition to that, we are living on a continent which is quite different from Europe in that one language is spoken generally over the continent.

I was never more surprised than on one occasion when I was in Europe some ten years ago. I was called upon to deliver a speech to an audience of four or five hundred French people in the open air, and I knew while I was delivering it that not more than half a dozen of them could speak the English language, and most of those were part of a party in which I, myself, was included. I got up and delivered the speech in English just as if they all understood it. They listened, and as far as I could see they were taking it in, just as much as hon. members in this house do when I speak, though I am not always sure they do that here. But these people certainly appeared to listen. Just as I was about to begin the speech, some one said: "What about an interpreter"? But the official interpreter was not there, and they turned to a gentleman standing there and said "Can you interpret from English into French?" and he said "Yes."

Now I watched him while I was speaking, and to my knowledge he did not take down any notes. Then, when I had finished, he delivered the speech to the same audience in French and I agree with my hon. friend from Algoma East (Mr. Pearson) that it was probably a better speech as he delivered it than as I delivered it. Nevertheless, he made the speech and then, when it was over, I found out that he was neither French nor English, he was Russian. Yet he delivered that speech in French to that group of people, and they certainly understood him much better than they had understood me. Afterwards, the speech was translated back into English, from what he had said, and sent back to me in Ottawa—it reached me after I got home. It was sent to me for correction and all I have to say about it is that it said everything I was trying to say, and said it much better than I had said it, even though it had been translated from the Russian's French into English.

Mr. Macdonnell: May I ask the right hon. member a question? That is a very interesting statement. Does he say it contained not only the sense of what he said but, practically, a word for word translation?

Mr. Gardiner: Oh yes, it was word for word; if it differed in any place it was, perhaps using a word in English of somewhat finer meaning than the word I had used.

Mr. Green: A little more sensible?

Mr. Gardiner: No, it was a word that could not be misunderstood as conveying what I wanted to say. I find sometimes, in this house, that when I speak off the cuff as I do most of the time I do not know the dictionary well enough to use the word which conveys the exact shade of meaning I wish to express. But this gentleman had given the proper shade of meaning to every thought I had tried to put into the minds of those people at that time.

I imagine that when setting up a plan of immediate interpretation in this country there might be a little difficulty in finding interpreters of that type. Perhaps you could find interpreters who could immediately convert spoken English into French, and French into English. But they would not have had the same practice as they have in Europe where there are so many small countries talking different languages. So there may be some difficulty. But it is not impossible. I do not think this has anything to do with bilingualism. That matter was all settled at the time of confederation. There are bilingual rights in this house, and since those rights exist I think the best possible facilities should be taken advantage of at the earliest opportunity.

I am certainly in favour of the resolution, and if I have the privilege of being here when the matter is finally discussed and considered, I will support it. I take it, from what the minister has said, that it will not be possible to deal with the matter this session, and that even if a committee were set up now it would need to have the authority to continue on into another session and discuss the matter further. I quite agree that it is logical to contend it cannot be finished this session, but I think it is all to the good that as many of us who can do so should express our views on this subject, and if these views are as unanimous, as they have been up to the moment, then I think we can find ways of making it possible for all of us to understand at all times what is being said in this house by providing the facilities for simultaneous translation of speeches which can be heard at the same time in English and French.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I thank the leader of the house for having given hon. members on this side an opportunity for discussing this subject notwithstanding that he had already moved the adjournment. There are still a number of speakers who would like to discuss this resolution, and I was among those myself. That is one of the reasons, along with others, why I intervened at the time I did. I want, together with those who have risen on this side of the house, to support at this time the motion made by the hon. member for Joliette-L'Assomption-Montcalm (Mr. Breton) and I do this not only because of the fact that I believe a simultaneous translation of the debates in this house would be a good thing, but also because I believe that the resolution does answer at least some of the objections which were raised earlier during the course of the debate.

The resolution, in my opinion, is a very simple one. It states that the house—

> . . . should take into consideration the advisability of setting up a special committee of parliament for the purpose of considering the establishment of a system of simultaneous translation, in the official language which is not that used by the member then speaking, for all debates in the House of Commons and in all parliamentary committees.

A question was asked of the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) not long ago to which his reply was: "Yes, we are willing to consider anything," and I am sure that this would apply to the resolution which is now before the house.

The Postmaster General (Mr. Hamilton) after making a contribution to the debate I think said in effect that the idea of studying the question is a good one. That was also said by the Secretary of State (Mrs. Fairclough) who, while perhaps she did not use the same language, said that the Speaker has the matter under consideration. I think, too, that the leader of the house in rising earlier to make the contribution he did used words to the effect that the government was anxious to give this sympathetic consideration but that perhaps this was not the method by which to do it.

The point I would like to make at this time is this. With but few exceptions most of those who have risen to take part in this debate seem to me to have favoured the resolution. Well, that being the case it would strike me there should be no objection to accepting the resolution in its present state because of the statements that have been made by those who have taken part in the debate.

I realize that the point made by the house leader at the present time is perhaps one which could be useful on other occasions but I do not know that it is as useful on this occasion because, after all, this is private members' day. This day is devoted to private members' resolutions and whether we speak until ten o'clock on this or whether we do not I think makes no difference to the government. Of course, I am not suggesting by that statement that we are going to do that. I would rather approve of what the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Gardiner) said, that after the contributions which we intend to make are made the motion made by the leader of the house will be taken up by the house. But it would strike me that because of the arguments that have been made by most of those who have risen to speak in the debate the resolution should be accepted by the government.
