I was also pleased to hear his remarks about the co-operation he has received from and the confidence he places in the senior officers of the armed services of this country. This is quite contrary to some of the remarks made on former occasions by some of his colleagues, particularly the Minister of Agriculture, who is presently in the committee.

In his remarks today I do not think the Minister of National Defence tried in any way to indicate to the committee or to the country that NORAD is a part of NATO, with which matter I will deal a little later, but he did say that the air defence scheme of the North American continent has been approved both by the government of Canada and the government of the United States. There might be some doubt about that when we refer to the evidence at the meeting of the committee on external affairs on December 2.

I thought I observed one discrepancy, though I might have misunderstood the minister, when he stated that there will be little that the NORAD commanders will be able to do in the first few hours of war except to reinforce the most threatened areas with whatever additional fighter aircraft and missiles become available after the battle is opened. I think this is directly opposed to the remarks made by the minister in a press release some time before this house opened, when he described the push-button control of the defence of the North American continent.

I was interested to note how the rules of aircraft flying over Canada apply and the requirements about filing flight plans and so on. This seems to contradict the reply of the minister in which he said that the whole procedure is carried out in a matter of moments. I submit that after flashing signals to the headquarters at Colorado Springs there will be no opportunity to spend some hours in preparation.

I was somewhat amazed at one statement made by the minister for which I am sure he must have an explanation, to the effect that the divisional headquarters as presently organized will be reduced in strength during the next few months. I presume he does not intend to leave us in the position where we would not be prepared for retaliatory ground action after an attack. He mentioned that there will be some reduction in the R.C.A.F. auxiliary squadrons, and it would seem important to remember that for the small cost involved in maintaining R.C.A.F. auxiliary squadrons they serve as a good pool of trained personnel to keep available in case we wish to expand our use of retaliatory armed bombers.

In the statement he made this morning concerning the reduction of the ground forces it appeared that the minister disregarded the possibility of further local skirmishes or infiltration by an enemy into this country, and that he has not made adequate provision for preventing such happenings by having trained forces available in reserve. On such occasions it may very well be that the regular forces, which in the future will be composed of trained technicians, will have their hands full in dealing with matters of a more technical nature than would be required in the case of skirmishes or infiltration.

I listened with interest to the minister's explanation of the present role of the militia and the role it will adopt in future. I notice that he included in his explanation a comment to the effect that the militia would also take military training along with the civil defence training, which he stated on previous occasions would be emphasized. Under the schedule of training of the militia in the past it took two years to produce a trained soldier. I had an opportunity to review a directive concerning training as it will be conducted, and taking into account the same amount of training it will be spread over a period of five years. In other words it will take five years to produce a trained soldier for the reserve if the new directive for training is carried out. There is a turnover of men in the militia approximately every two years, and it occurred to me that under the new schedule of training there would be a very low percentage of trained personnel, as far as military training is concerned, if the new trend in the training of militia is to continue.

In the minister's statement I observed no mention of waste and extravagance in his department, and I am sure he will agree with us that before he took over there had been a paring down to the basic essentials.

In relation to construction and the requirements of equipment the minister mentioned that there was a deferment. It seems to me that when there is a deferment we just put off from this year to next year those things we might have needed this year. The construction and requirements of equipment for this year are essential to the welfare of the country, and in particular it would assist the employment situation if such construction were allowed to progress during this winter.

I realize that my hon. friend the Minister of National Defence was for many years a great soldier; and today a great soldier, for several years the defence critic of the official opposition in this house, now finds himself in a new position. He is on the pinnacle where he must initiate a policy to defend Canada, one that would prepare us to retaliate and destroy an aggressor. The position, I am sure, must feel new to him, but he is not alone in this situation because our great partner to the south, the United States, also has a new secretary of defence with but nine weeks of experience on the job. This is all the more reason why particular care must be taken to formulate a defence policy in accordance with the present circumstances, events and eventualities.

We had expected that today Canada's new defence minister would have made a more detailed reappraisal of the defence of Canada, if we were to read and expect action from the speeches he has made in the past. I was disappointed the other day when a member of the C.C.F. party asked about a white paper and received a negative reply. It would seem to me that this would have been the appropriate time when, as the minister explained, there had not only been a change in personnel of the government but a great change in the weapons of war, for the minister to have made available a reappraisal and an assessment of the problem in a white paper.

He has made very little available as far as a report of his appraisal of the defence of Canada is concerned. We know that scientific developments and announcements within the last month do justify a reappraisal of our defences, a report to the nation on our defences, and an assurance from the Minister of National Defence or the Prime Minister that scientific research with respect to defence weapons is progressing.

I do not think it is essential that we must always, in this instance anyway, follow the footsteps of our neighbour to the south. There is an underlying uneasy feeling that the United States has become inferior in some respects compared with Russia. If our government feels that certain items of defence are lagging owing to United States tardiness we must be prepared to take the lead as we did in the Suez question, or encourage the United States to speed up.

My hon. friend the Minister of National Defence, and his government, I must say are faced with some problems right now, and one of the biggest problems is the defence of this country. Even with the use of conventional, outmoded weapons, their first problem is manpower, but manpower now required in addition to the conventional troops who still may be required in the category of manpower which I have indicated. How is the minister recruiting and keeping civilian scientists and engineers? Are his service personnel becoming the skilled technicians, or in other words has he sufficient brain power, in the light of recent weapon advances, in his military establishments? I am sure the minister would want to report to us and assure us that we are not lagging in that department.

We are also dependent upon Canadian industry and the industry of other nations for the weapons of war. The minister should tell us what effort he has made to have industry in Canada continue to co-operate with our defence program as it did in world war II, when Right Hon. C. D. Howe headed the department of munitions and supply. I would not like to feel that our industry has been discouraged in morale and frustrated by the lack of a fiscal and trade policy.

It has been reported that there have been interservice rivalries, and that there has been some waste in defence funds and a slowdown in the development of new weapons. I am sure the minister should report to us to erase this inference. The minister would also want to assure us, since the militia has been more or less erased, that we shall have sufficient conventional troops to discourage a conventional attack or a mop-up after a conventional attack upon our country. We are entitled to know whether under the policy of the government he intends to scrap the development and production of manned planes in favour of an accelerated missile program.

The minister, in formulating his policy, must consider whether he wishes to put greater dependence on nuclear air power and reduction in conventional forces, to the point where his policy has led to an inflexible situation by which we could not meet a threat of local limited war.

I notice that in his statement this morning the minister was more or less of the opinion that if we had an attack it would be an all-out attack. It seems to me that there are two types of nuclear war, a total one and a limited one. Some think of a nuclear conflict only in terms of mushroom clouds, total devastation over vast areas and an all-out nuclear war. This might never come about, because it might be disastrous to both sides.

The scientists today are concentrating on nuclear weapons which can pinpoint their effort without radiation; for instance, a weapon which could be pinpointed upon a troop or civilian concentration. These weapons could be used in a limited nuclear war, limited in scope, in arms and in area and waged by professional fighting men. This type of war could be triggered or push-buttoned if and when an aggressor should attack North America. This type of war would be a distinct possibility. Nuclear war would be short, including the detonation and mopping up. It would be over in days or possibly in weeks.

The new nuclear weapons and the H-bomb have provided this nation and other nations of the world that may be involved in a war with a great many avenues of thought and policy. There are those who say that if we find ourselves in war we should use our most effective weapons against our enemies. Today the most effective weapons which warring nations would have would be the H-bomb and nuclear weapons. If we can believe reports from the United States—whatever the truth is of the Russian claim to having successfully tested an intercontinental ballistic missile—they are ahead of the Russians. If this is so it is an immense advantage to Canada as well as to other NATO nations, but we must bear in mind the fact that there is a great possibility that nuclear war would be a limited one. There would then, as the minister told us this morning, be no time to mobilize and train troops and engineer and produce weapons, process and store the essentials of life, food, and so on. This is an important matter. If we are to win this type of war we must win it years ahead by preparedness.

The minister mentioned NORAD this morning. I should like to refer for a few moments to sessional paper No. 183, which contains the order in council dated July 31, 1957, along with a joint statement by the secretary of defence of the United States and the Minister of National Defence of Canada. I might say that I agree with the policy of the joint air defence of North America. Among other things, I was interested in the principles and procedures which are involved in the establishment of this particular defence. I think it needs a review and some scrutiny. I am assured that this is the only document that deals with the important matter of this particular phase of the defence of North America. Yesterday when I asked the Minister of National Defence whether there was any further order in council dealing with this matter other than the one to which I have referred, his answer was in the negative.

For a moment I should like to put on the record what I really think this order in council does. As I see it, it does two things. It appoints Air Marshal Slemon and makes provision for his pay. It instructs him that he is to take his orders from a superior at the Colorado headquarters. There is something else that has been raised. What justifies the 40 members of his staff being out of this country under a foreign commander, General Partridge? I do not believe we have had that answered yet in this house, except probably by an explanation which added to the confusion.

Mr. Pearkes: I wonder whether I might help the hon. member. The figure 40 is quite inaccurate; 13 is the number.

Mr. Henderson: I am very glad to have that information at this time, Mr. Chairman, and I wish to thank the minister for it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the hon. member permit a question? In view of the fact that he has made reference to sessional paper No. 183 and the order in council of July 31, 1957, will he say where he finds in this order in council anything which indicates to whom Air Marshal Slemon is responsible?

Mr. Henderson: I think it is indicated, Mr. Chairman. He is to be deputy commander in chief. He is described as such, which would imply that he would have a commander in chief.

Mr. Coldwell: He might be responsible to the President of the United States.

Mr. Henderson: Yes. It is now some time since the order in council was passed, and we have been advised that over this period of time there has been consultation, but we have found that there has been consultation on a military level only. Included in the statement issued by the secretary of defence of the United States and the Minister of National Defence of Canada, which statement accompanied the order in council, there is a particular sentence which is important and which I should like to read. It is in these words:

> This system of integrated operational control and the setting up of a joint headquarters will become effective at an early date.

That was five months ago. The statement that the command became operative immediately is further supported by the answer to a question I asked the Minister of National Defence on November 5, as found at pages

757 and 758 of Hansard. I asked the minister if the command was operative, and the minister replied:

> Yes, it is operative on an interim basis until the formal agreement has been drawn up as I explained to the house.

Hon. members will realize that an agreement must have some limitations, and although we might agree with the policy or purpose of the order in council we certainly would like to know what the limitations and details of the agreement are at this time, five months after some kind of an arrangement was made, during which period of time the headquarters of General Partridge and Air Marshal Slemon has been operative.

We were particularly interested in knowing what consultation there had been with the government of Canada, and on November 6, 1957 I asked the minister how there could be consultation with the government of Canada prior to Canadian fighters being put in the air if there was an attack by an aggressor. The minister answered, "Mr. Speaker, by telephone or other means." On that same day there was the following exchange between the Prime Minister and the hon. member for Essex East as found at page 812 of Hansard:

> Mr. Diefenbaker: Oh, oh.
> Mr. Martin (Essex East): The Prime Minister says "oh, oh." This is an extremely important matter.
> Mr. Diefenbaker: It certainly is.

The Prime Minister agreed that it was extremely important. In the light of the meeting of the external affairs committee the other day and in the light of what has been said in the house and the reference in the minister's statement this morning, it would seem that the same principles were involved as in the case of the arrangement made in the early part of world war II by Mr. King and Mr. Roosevelt. For the sake of clarification perhaps I might read a portion of Mr. King's speech on the address in reply to the speech from the throne at the 1940-41 session of parliament. I wish to refer to page 54 of Hansard for November 12, 1940.

Perhaps I might preface what I am about to read by saying that even at this stage, five months after the arrangement was made for NORAD, the Department of External Affairs has never been consulted with respect to any agreement or arrangement with the United States concerning the defence of the North American continent and the involvement of Canada in that defence. I will refer to that later, as that was one of the matters discussed by the external affairs committee earlier this week. Mr. King had this to say in his address:

> The first inkling of developments already under way was given to the public by the President of the United States, on August 16. On that day Mr. Roosevelt announced that:
> "The United States government is holding conversations with the government of the British Empire with regard to acquisition of naval and air bases for the defence of the western hemisphere and especially the Panama canal. The United States government is carrying on conversations with the Canadian government on the defence of the western hemisphere."
> I shall have something to say to the house in a moment about these conversations. I wish first to recall the events which followed immediately on President Roosevelt's announcement.
> The following day, which was August 17, I met the president at Ogdensburg. Our conversations that day, in continuance of conversations previously held, culminated in the formulation of an agreement which was made public the next afternoon, in a joint statement issued by Mr. Roosevelt and myself.

I would point out, Mr. Chairman, that in this instance the early stages had passed, the command now became or was immediately operative, and the matter was not dealt with on a military level but a government level, which I suggest is a complete difference in principle from what has been applied in the case of NORAD.

An hon. Member: There is quite a difference now, too. There was a war on then.

Mr. Henderson: Well, there is more time to make an agreement now and probably reach an agreement much faster without having other things to do. The Prime Minister and the president had discussed the mutual problems, and these were the terms of the agreement:

> The Prime Minister and the President have discussed the mutual problems of defence in relation to the safety of Canada and the United States.
> It has been agreed that a permanent joint board on defence shall be set up at once by the two countries.
> This permanent joint board on defence shall commence immediate studies relating to sea, land and air problems including personnel and material.
> It will consider in the broad sense the defence of the north half of the western hemisphere.
> The permanent joint board on defence will consist of four or five members from each country, most of them from the services. It will meet shortly.

It is interesting to note that the instance which concerns us at the present time, NORAD, does not conform to the same principles that were adopted at the beginning of world war II. As found on page 56, Mr. King stated:

> Our common problems of defence were discussed at length and in a more concrete and definite way when I visited Washington in November, 1938, to sign the new Canadian-United States trade agreement.

I think it is interesting to place on record the minute of cabinet in 1940, which is not included in sessional paper 183 to which I referred today. On page 56 there is also the following:

By a minute of council approved by His Excellency the Governor General on August 21, the establishment of the permanent joint board on defence was formally ratified and confirmed.

With the permission of the house, I should like to insert in Hansard a copy of the complete minute.

The copy of the complete minute sets out very well the procedure to be followed in the establishment of a joint command of this nature. It is in these terms:

The committee of the privy council had had before them a report, dated August 20, 1940, from the Right Honourable W. L. Mackenzie King, Prime Minister and Secretary of State for External Affairs, representing:

That on August 17, 1940, at the invitation of the President of the United States, he proceeded to the United States to Ogdensburg in the state of New York, to meet Mr. Roosevelt for the purpose of discussing mutual problems of defence in relation to the safety of Canada and the United States.

If I may stop there for a moment, we can see that this arrangement certainly was on a political level and not a military level, as was indicated in the external affairs committee this week. I continue with the following quotation found in the minute:

The Prime Minister and the President have discussed the mutual problems of defence in relation to the safety of Canada and the United States.

It has been agreed that a permanent joint board on defence shall be set up at once by the two countries.

This permanent joint board on defence shall commence immediate studies relating to sea, land and air problems, including personnel and material.

It will consider in the broad sense the defence of the north half of the western hemisphere.

The permanent joint board on defence will consist of four or five members from each country, most of them from the services. It will meet shortly.

That the actions of the Prime Minister in conducting the said conversations and in agreeing, on the part of Canada, to the establishment of a permanent joint board on defence for the consideration of the defence of the north half of the western hemisphere, are in accord with the policy of the government as approved on many occasions by the war committee of the cabinet and the cabinet itself.

May I state, Mr. Chairman, that in the instances we have been discussing this session we have had no indication from the present government on this matter, although they would like to say that this matter was discussed in cabinet and that it received the approval of the war committee of the cabinet; I presume that today that would be called the defence committee of the cabinet.

The Prime Minister, therefore, recommends that his actions in conducting the said conversations and in agreeing to the establishment of the said permanent joint board on defence be ratified and confirmed.

[Mr. Henderson.]

The committee concur in the foregoing recommendation and submit the same for approval.

I might say that beyond page 57 Mr. King also related that these declarations marked the first public recognition by both countries of reciprocity in defence.

In the sessional paper we had filed, and the order in council with the statement of the Minister of National Defence and of the secretary of defence for the United States, we failed to have a cabinet minute.

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to have to interrupt the hon. member, but I must advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Henderson: Could I have two minutes more?

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

The Chairman: With the unanimous consent of the committee.

Mr. Henderson: Thank you, Mr. Chairman. If I may, I should like to direct my remarks for a moment to the manner in which the principle involved in the establishing of NORAD has been handled. May I make an observation from the committee on external affairs, where the Secretary of State for External Affairs was asked what relationship there is, if any, between Canada's participation or membership in NATO and the joint air defence program with the United States. The Secretary of State for External Affairs said he was unable to answer that question. He was then asked where he could get the answer.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs, I observe, was prepared to make a statement about NORAD; and he said the Prime Minister had made a statement in the house, and that this question would be considered further on the estimates of the Department of National Defence. He reiterated with emphasis that so far as his department are concerned they had not been brought into this matter whatsoever, that there had been a discussion on the military level and that his department would deal with the political aspect of it.

It seems to me at this time that although the command is operative, this matter never reached the level of the political aspect, nor has parliament been advised or been able to approve of any permanent or fixed formal agreement which there might be between the two countries with respect to the air defence of North America. It would seem that the principles involved in making an arrangement of this kind between the two countries are not in any way similar to the principles involved in the procedure as between Mr. Roosevelt and Mr. King in 1940.

If I might just bring my remarks to a conclusion at this time, I should like to do so by saying this. The other night I was reading the Dulles policy as outlined by Mr. James Shepley in Life magazine January 16th, 1956, in an article entitled "How Dulles Averted War Three Times—He Brought U.S. Back From the Brink". I should like to conclude these remarks with a sort of warning to the present Minister of National Defence and the present Secretary of State for External Affairs that they should review the situation and make sure that in the handling of a matter so important as NORAD, the joint air defence of North America by Canada and the United States, they have not conducted matters so loosely that there would be a possibility that they might be involved in a policy of what we might call this "brinkmanship"; that Canada by inadvertence, lack of information, negligence, carelessness or otherwise, might unnecessarily be brought into a sphere of policy whereby war would be thrust upon us not of our own making or concurrence.

Mr. Coldwell: I was very happy to listen to the minister this morning when introducing for the first time his estimates to this house. We sat in very close proximity in the last house and were often able to have a chat. I have a very high regard for him, but I must say that I do not envy him in the task that lies before him in this extremely important department.

When I was participating in the external affairs debate on November 26 I stated that we should take a new look at our external policies as well as those of national defence, because the two departments and their policies are more or less linked closely together. Today the Minister of National Defence has introduced estimates that were compiled by his predecessor in office and before some very startling new developments occurred in the production of nuclear and thermonuclear weapons in the past six months.

May I say to my friend the hon. member for Kingston that I do not see that it is realistic at all to talk about a limited nuclear war. I do not believe that such a thing is possible. It seems to us that these estimates are not only sadly out of date but that they should be carefully scrutinized by this parliament before they are approved and adopted. I recollect how hon. gentlemen opposite, when they were in opposition, demanded that the estimates of the Department of National Defence presented by the former Liberal administration should be scrutinized by a committee of the House of Commons. What they said then I think is true today, and even more true than it was then. On June 21, 1956, as reported at page 5244 of Hansard of that year the then leader of the opposition, Mr. Drew, had this to say:

> The estimates now before us call for an expenditure of $1,775 million.

That is almost identical with the amount we are discussing today.

> Further amounts probably will be added by the supplementary estimates which will be presented later. What have we before us to really tell us whether this money is being properly spent or otherwise? We really have nothing but bland assurances which were not substantiated by the detailed facts which would make it possible for us to pass judgment on this vitally important question.

I say that what Mr. Drew had to say on that date is equally applicable this afternoon. We have nothing but bland assurances with no facts to make it possible for us to pass judgment on this vitally important question. We have not even a new white paper. The white paper we have before us is the one that was presented to this house by the former minister of national defence last April. If I may quote again I should like to do so. Speaking in the same debate on June 22, 1956, the present Prime Minister said this, as reported at page 5321 of Hansard:

> We are left in the dark. We do not know. In order to obtain information we have to read the reports of the United States Senate committee or the House of Representatives committee . . . Are we receiving value for our expenditures? One does not have to have the knowledge gained by committees to conclude that in too large a measure there has been a wasteful disregard of the requirements of the people as a whole and waste of the moneys collected from the people through taxation.

Even today we are obliged to learn a great deal about North American defence from representations and statements, of which I will perhaps say more in a moment, that are made before a committee of the Senate of the United States. Today we are left more in the dark than ever before, because apparently the Minister of National Defence, without any conference with the Department of External Affairs, has committed our armed forces in North America to the control of a United States commander without the safeguards which we insisted upon when, through diplomatic channels, we agreed to place certain of our forces under the North Atlantic treaty command or, as my hon. friend said a few moments ago, following the Ogdensburg conversations between Mr. King and the late President Roosevelt.

When were these arrangements reached? We do not know. As the hon. gentleman a few moments ago pointed out, we have just the one document, the order in council, and a press statement; that is all we know about it. If the rumours are correct this had been before the former government for some time, on the recommendation of the former minister, but the former government felt it could not approve of the arrangement; yet this decision was made shortly after the present government took office, on July 31 this year. How was it done? Where was it done? And what assurances were given prior to the passing of this order in council? Perhaps we shall get that a little later on. We certainly should.

One could quote extensively from speeches made by the new cabinet ministers including the Minister of Justice, the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of National Defence himself, to the effect that these estimates should be more carefully scrutinized by a parliamentary committee than they have been, and today we have nothing further to substantiate the defence estimates than we had in previous years.

As I said a few moments ago, in the past few months fantastic changes have taken place in the world's military technology, accompanied by almost as rapid changes in strategy and tactics. Indeed, progress in current military science has become so accelerated that nearly every weapon now designed is said to be a transitional weapon soon to be superseded by something more revolutionary. The staggering increase in the rate of obsolescence of weapons of war is a problem which not only all military planners must face but which parliaments like our own must consider before we agree to stupendous expenditures without careful inquiry into the validity of the demands of this department.

We must also ask ourselves today to what extent is it wise or possible to continue to adhere to an arms race when we know that the new and terrible weapons of war give neither security to our people nor defence. Air force General Earl E. Partridge, commander in chief of NORAD, to whom our own Canadian defences have been committed, asserted before a Senate committee—I might say before Russia had launched her satellite—as follows:

> If the aggressor's weapon is the intercontinental ballistic missile this continent stands today almost as naked as it did in 1946, for I have no radar to detect missiles and no defence against them.

This statement is one we should bear in mind when we are considering the recommendations now before us from the Department of National Defence. While these are the estimates for 1957 to 1958—and one does not care to move any reduction in them because much of the money has already been spent—if estimates different from these are not brought in for 1958-59, then I think some of us will have to move for a reduction in the estimates, particularly if no parliamentary committee is set up to inquire very carefully into these matters at that time.

As I said in the external affairs debate, the only defence possible is one based upon the elimination of war itself through negotiation with other countries—particularly those who may be potential aggressors. Yesterday again one of the military leaders of the United States was reported as having said—and I heard this myself, of course, over the C.B.C.—that the Russians were so far ahead of the United States that there was imminent danger of destruction. His solution, of course, was that more money and more energy must be devoted to more weapons for United States armies and those of her allies. There was no suggestion that a new approach must be taken to end the disastrous arms race which is now in full effect—with Russia, I might add, apparently in the lead.

In the circumstances now clear to us all, we have lost the power to defend ourselves. Nor have the Russians power to defend their people in their country, for General Norstad, head of NATO, testified before his Senate committee a few weeks ago that the west could attack Russia from 250 NATO bases in a complete circle around that country, and that even if the Soviets had 200 per cent of his attacking power they would still be destroyed. Incidentally, when we were given this information we were told it was confidential, but before the senate committee of the United States General Norstad makes this statement publicly and openly, and it is reported in the United States press. Apparently the United States Senate can be given information which is denied to us except under confidential or secret circumstances.

It is a grim situation which faces us when we begin to examine the proposals and expenditures of the Department of National Defence, yet our leaders continue to talk in terms of war. I said in the debate on external affairs that the present arms race really dates from the production of the atomic bomb in 1945. It was then that one of the wisest United States statesmen, Mr. Stinson, secretary of the army during the second world war, told the last United States cabinet meeting which he attended in September, 1945, that "unless the Soviets are voluntarily invited into partnership upon a basis of co-operation and trust" a desperate arms race would follow. Mr. Stinson urged direct negotiations with Russia to that end, and at once, but unfortunately his advice was not followed.

Similar sentiments were expressed in the United Kingdom and in Canada, but Washington decided to keep the atomic bomb, as she called it, "a sacred trust". So, on November 15, 1945, the United States, the United Kingdom and Canada issued a declaration which did the very thing that Stinson had warned against. Since then we ourselves have spent many billions of dollars on defence. Indeed, nearly one-third of our entire budget in recent years has been spent in this field, or one-half of our controllable expenditures.

The estimates now before us provide for an expenditure of $1,717, million and these may have to be supplemented before the end of the current year, I do not know.

Mr. Pearkes: No.

Mr. Coldwell: I am glad to hear the minister say that. We are warned that if we proceed to reorient our military requirements in the direction of modern nuclear and thermo-nuclear weapons this amount will have to be vastly increased as the years go by.

What is the alternative? On October 7 the New York Times, which has given consistent support to United States leadership in the cold war and against Russia and the satellite countries, had this to say:

> The truth is at once more ominous, more exacting and more enchanting. The greatest adventure of all is not to go to the moon or to explore the rings of Saturn. It is rather to understand the heart and soul of man and to turn away from wrath and destruction and toward creativeness and brotherly love. We cannot look at the world today without realizing that our mastery of ourselves has not kept pace with our mastery of inanimate nature. We now have the power to destroy each other and all the works of civilization, but we have not yet invented a sure way to control this power. In a sense, a part of us never came down from the tree, never crawled out of the cave. Now we must arise out of our long childhood and play the part of wise, mature and humane men—all of us, all mankind, of whatever political or religious faith—or we shall surely die.

This is a very different statement to the kind of statement which comes under the description of the "brinkmanship" of Mr. John Foster Dulles. There is no doubt that the idea of defence is regarded by many people as a principal function of the national state. Yet today we know there is not a people on the face of the earth who can be defended from wholesale and terrible death and destruction if another big war comes. Obviously then we are on the brink of destruction, with no sure defence, unless we revise our national policies and rely on negotiation instead of piling up obsolete weapons of war for which we are providing again in the estimates now before us.

As I said at the outset, our defence program, in spite of the change in government, is to continue free from adequate inquiry under the critical scrutiny of a parliamentary committee. Unlike the governments of the United Kingdom and the United States, the Canadian government has never been compelled to justify before parliament its defence policy involving huge annual expenditures. We should now demand that it do so.

Yet these expenditures, to a very large extent indeed, are for the production and maintenance of obsolete weapons that could contribute little or nothing to the defence of Canada. One could go into each branch of the services and show how pitifully inadequate they are to meet the threat of modern nuclear war. We are still spending huge sums of money on conventional weapons that, by comparison, are as out of date as the weapons used in the South African war were out of date in the second world war.

Our air force, which like our other services contains well-trained and devoted personnel, is equipped with planes that, we are told by competent authorities, are now quite obsolete. Both the United States and the U.S.S.R. have modern planes which are far in advance of anything we possess; yet they too offer no defence against the guided missile. Even before the recent and startling developments Lieutenant General Guy Simonds, the retired chief of our army general staff, on the C.B.C. television program "Citizens' Forum", last February declared that the re-equipping of the R.C.A.F. home squadrons with the mark V of the CF-100 was money "down the drain" since the plane was already obsolete.

Those are not my words. They are the words of Lieutenant General Guy Simonds. Is it true that the conversion of our air force to the mark V CF-105 would cost about $8 million per unit or over $1 billion in all? All this would be required to convert one obsolete plane into another obsolete plane, if we may take what Lieutenant General Guy Simonds says as an accurate statement of the position.

One could develop this statement still further and point out that apart altogether from the guided missiles, these obsolete planes could never intercept the higher-flying and faster Soviet intercontinental jet bombers if they were loosed upon us. Nor, as General Partridge has already indicated, can the three radar screens, namely the "Pine-tree" line, near the Canada-United States border, the mid-Canada line, or the distant early warning line, apprise our cities or our forces of the approach of the new intercontinental ballistic missiles.

And into all this we are pouring hundreds of millions of dollars. In an article in Macleans magazine of February 18, 1956—and again, may I say, before the Russians announced the success of their intercontinental ballistic missile—General Macklin, who was adjutant general of the Canadian army until last June wrote:

> This being a free country, it is open to the advocates and architects of this gigantic defence to justify its terrific cost in money, machinery and men to the groaning taxpayers who have to pay for it. I am not aware that, so far, they have made any notable efforts to do so.
> The whole business has been announced to parliament and the public bit by bit and many of the details are still hidden from us. Perhaps they have to be, in the interests of security, though "security" has far too often itself been used as a wall behind which many an expensive bonehead play has passed unseen by the public.

And we know perfectly well that we have been told in this house on former occasions by former ministers of defence that some of the equipment, orders for which were placed in the factories at the blueprint stage, would be obsolete before the actual equipment came off the line. I believe I remember Mr. Brooke Claxton telling us that in this house with regard to some aircraft.

Members of the house are, therefore, entitled to ask the new government of Canada to justify these estimates which were placed before us by the previous administration and which are quite similar to those which from time to time the gentlemen who now occupy the posts of responsibility, vacated by the Liberals, criticized so severely. We have no right to pass these estimates without the most careful inquiry and scrutiny.

However, from what I have said it is obvious that we believe there is no hope of defence in the proposals that are now before us. On the contrary, we believe that Canada must press for a new look at our defence and international policies which are so inextricably linked. We believe that our surest defence lies in endeavouring to bring about a progressive reduction in defence expenditures through the elimination of threats of war. Hence we urge our government to use its influence to further the cause of world peace through negotiation. We believe that if these estimates were thoroughly investigated and all expenditures for obsolete planes and obsolete equipment of every description eliminated, we could transfer substantial sums of money for the most effective means of human well-being and international security.

The future of the world is not going to be decided on the battlefields, because battlefields may make the future of mankind uncertain. On the contrary, the devotion of our efforts to the relief of human suffering, the promotion of human health, and relief of world-wide hunger would do more to promote world peace and our own security than any other endeavour we could undertake. I should like to repeat a quotation from the editorial of the New York Times to which I have already referred:

> Now we must arise out of our long childhood and play the part of wise, mature and humane men—all of us, all mankind, of whatever political or religious faith—or we shall surely die.

Unfortunately the signs are few that governments will take effective steps to ensure that we have peace unless they are forced to do so by a mighty demand from the peoples whom they govern. Only an aroused and awakened public opinion can stop this drive to universal annihilation, and as far as we are concerned in this house with the estimates before us, can we say to the people of Canada that after we have spent every penny of this $1,717 million Canada is going to be any safer for it, when we know, and are told by competent authorities such as the three I have named, that we have no assurance of warning in case of attack, that the equipment we are relying upon for defence is obsolete, and that we have been spending hundreds of millions of dollars wastefully?

I say to the new government that I am surprised that after all they said when in opposition regarding the need for a scrutiny of these estimates they should come before us with these estimates practically unchanged and ask us to vote them virtually in toto. We expected that they would set up a committee early this session before which we could call the responsible officials of the department for questioning regarding these expenditures.

Right from the conclusion of the last war the door has been shut against members of parliament inquiring into the activities of this department. We have been told that national security demanded it. But in the light of statements which are now being made by General Partridge, and the fact that our own air force is under the control, as I understand it, of a foreign government these estimates should be scrutinized. The hon. gentleman is shaking his head. He has been shaking his head all afternoon—I do not mean the minister but the hon. gentleman beside him, probably his assistant. He can shake his head as much as he likes, but that will not stop me from saying what I think, and not only what I think and wish to place before the house, but what some other people more competent to judge than he is seem to think.

I want to conclude my remarks by saying that this parliament owes a duty to this country not to let these estimates pass lightly but to see to it that we look into matters carefully, make up our minds what we should do about it, stop the waste and inefficiency and the obsolescence in this department and co-operate with all others as far as we can to achieve the only way in which mankind can find safety, by the removal of the threat of nuclear war from this country and the world.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, may I begin by admitting that I do not pose as a military expert. I am speaking strictly as a layman who would like to see the right thing but perhaps not knowing exactly what the right thing would be in the field of armaments and military science. I would say at the outset that we deeply appreciate the courtesy of the minister not only today but since he came into his important office because on a number of occasions this year the present minister has given evidence of a desire to keep us informed and help us understand the rather difficult problems that arise from time to time. I want also to express to him our thanks for his courtesy in sending us a copy of his speech which he delivered earlier today. This thoughtful action gave me a better opportunity to follow exactly what he had in mind with regard to government policy.

If the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and I had got together earlier today or yesterday I do not suppose we could have followed a more parallel course in what we have to say. I should like to begin by discussing the matter of the committee which he brought up and there is only one thing I can say that would differ from what he has presented here as a good reasoned argument for the committee. I gave him and his colleagues a chance just the other day to make it possible for us to have a committee of that kind set up and he and his colleagues turned down the proposal by voting against the amendment we moved.

Mr. Coldwell: That is not the reason we turned it down.

Mr. Low: I understand that but the proposal would have given the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar and his colleagues the right and opportunity to put into practice what the hon. member preached here today, and I say it is about time we practise what we preach.

Mr. Coldwell: We usually do.

Mr. Low: Otherwise we will never have the careful scrutiny of these estimates which he suggested we must have. We, too, feel that recent developments in the field of intercontinental ballistic missiles and interspace travel and advances in all branches of technology require a reappraisal of our whole defence policy. We feel that such a reappraisal must not be left exclusively to the military leaders of this country. This parliament must apply itself diligently to this particular task, too. Neither the time nor the facilities are available in the committee of the whole in which we find ourselves at this moment to do what anybody could possibly call an efficient job.

The government should have set up a defence estimates committee early in the present session to get started with its work and that work should be carried on continually for the duration of this parliament. Nothing less than many months of effort would be required to secure the information which we should have if the reappraisal I spoke of is to be made.

We suggest that this committee should have the authority to summon witnesses and send for papers. I suggest to the minister that it is not too late yet. We cannot in conscience do less than our full duty as representatives of the people and I say we are not doing our full duty unless we make a very careful and detailed scrutiny of the proposed estimates for defence. The establishment of a committee to study the estimates in the greatest detail is essential if any worth-while reappraisal of our defence policy is to be made.

Such a committee is especially essential in the light of the foolish policy the government has adopted in trying to force unduly the present session to a conclusion. The other day I said what I deeply feel in that connection. I cannot possibly see how anybody could declare that he has done his full duty to the people who sent him here and to his country if he does not prepare himself to stay here as long as it is necessary to thoroughly scrutinize the estimates, particularly those of the Department of National Defence, and study and reappraise our whole defence policy. That is one of the reasons I feel, as I said the other day, it is foolhardy to suggest we should start sitting longer hours for the purpose of trying to finish up before Christmas or perhaps just a few days after Christmas. It seems utterly childish and foolish to me to make this attempt and in all seriousness I suggest that the government even yet should reconsider its determined policy in this regard and agree to the setting up of the committee about which we have spoken.

I would like to mention that earlier this year on February 26, 1957, when the leader of the Liberal party, the hon. member for Quebec East who was then prime minister moved a motion to appoint a select committee on estimates, the hon. gentleman who is now the Prime Minister had some rather cogent remarks to make and I would like to quote his comments as they appear at page 1655 and the following pages of Hansard. This is what the present Prime Minister had to say on that occasion as reported at page 1655:

> Today expenditures are fabulous in amount and, except for ministers in the government, there are no adequate research opportunities whereby parliament may properly discharge its responsibilities.

This was part of the hon. gentleman's argument for a better opportunity for members of this house to study the detailed estimates and secure information from the department so they would know what they were doing.

The hon. gentleman who is now the Prime Minister, as reported at page 1657, had this to say:

> Throughout the years I have said—and I repeat it now—

You notice that he admits having said it throughout the years which would indicate it was a conviction with him and if it was a conviction with him through those years I suggest it should be now. I continue:

> Throughout the years I have said—and I repeat it now—that there is today no means whereby expenditures can be examined. There is no means available. In the first place, members of the opposition naturally have not that research knowledge which is necessary; they have not available to them the civil service. They are obliged to depend on information that comes in that desultory way that has existed throughout the years. Gladstone once said: It is more difficult to save a shilling than to spend a million. An estimates committee, properly set up, could bring about savings in this country which would be beneficial not only to the departments concerned but above all to the taxpayers.
> Up to the present time, with the exception of that committee which was set up during the days of the war—I refer to the war expenditures committee—there has been no serious endeavour through the years to meet this problem of a careful examination and scrutiny coupled with the necessary recommendations as to the achievement of savings.

I agree with that and I believe the argument is just as valid today as it was on February 26 or at any previous time for the setting up of a committee for the purpose of a detailed analysis of the estimates of which we are about to go into as careful a study as is allowed in the committee of the whole in the few remaining days left before the government hopes to adjourn or prorogue or whatever it is going to do.

Then the hon. gentleman said this:

> The committee that is now being set up—

Which was the committee on estimates—

> —under this resolution is but a copy of the one that has been in existence for two years. In the light of that experience I say that unless it has the power to call witnesses and to ask for papers, it is nothing but a sham and a delusion.

Well, what is the use of having a committee unless you do clothe it with the authority to call witnesses and to ask for papers? It would be a sham and a delusion. Therefore, the committee we are asking for should be clothed with the authority to call witnesses, especially, Mr. Chairman, in the light of the fact that over these past few months we have retired generals of the army who have made scathing criticisms of the way in which our defence policy is being applied. But I do not necessarily believe all that General Simonds has said, nor General Macklin, both of whom were quoted by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar; but the very fact that those people were in the know, that those people had great responsibility while they were leaders of our military forces in this country, gives some credence to what they say. It seems to me that in the light of what General Simonds said particularly, as is quoted in the Ottawa Citizen of November 6, 1957, we should have a committee. By the way what he said was headlined in these words:

> Millions Wasted on Obsolete Arms, Simonds Attacks Suicidal Policy

He goes on to make some pretty strong accusations, and he says at one point that he saw only marginal hope that the defence department will modify its policies. He is speaking of the new one. He continues:

> "They spend too much time trying to think up defences for their past decisions, justifying past policies."
> Much of the trouble, he said, stemmed from "vested interests" who would not yield to new facts.

These are serious accusations and if there is a shred of truth in them, Mr. Chairman, it seems to me that there ought to be a thorough investigation of the matter and General Simonds ought to be summoned before that committee to give evidence and to submit himself to serious questioning by the members of this house. It cannot be done, of course, unless we do have a committee.

General Macklin has also made some pretty pointed remarks about our defence policy and he should also be heard. I am not going to weary the committee by quoting what he had to say, but he did declare that Canada's missile radar defence could not possibly stop all the bombers, nor could it warn of guided missiles coming into our country. Well, let us get these men before us and any others who have been free in providing criticism and accusations. Let us get them before that committee and let us examine them most thoroughly and ask them to substantiate the things they have said. It does seem important for us to know. I say we cannot know unless we have some such thing as the committee about which I have spoken.

Let me say a word about our position with regard to NORAD. There has been for some days in this house not a continuous debate but a continuing one about the joint air defence of America. I would just like to say one word about it. It seems clear to me that Canada just would not have the manpower and other resources to defend all of Canadian territory in case of an attack and do it by itself; consequently, in my judgment, we will need the assistance of the United States which does have the manpower and the armed strength. Since this is so, there must be some form of agreement between Canada and the United States regarding the joint defence of North America.

The minister mentioned this morning that this agreement was in the process of development. The procedure and the details are in the process of being worked out. I thought there was nothing peculiar or unusual about that. One hardly expects to enter into an agreement with any other country without first having established the formal and detailed basis upon which an agreement of that kind can be made and be made successfully. For that reason I thought the minister's explanation this morning was quite clear and to me quite sensible. The agreement which is being worked out, however, must make provision for continuation of United States radar and other bases in the northern part of Canada.

We must never allow Canada to become a no man's land between an attacking country and the United States. We insist, therefore, that the defence of Canada must start in the far north. That being the case, we have to join with the United States, it seems to me, in providing the strongest type of warning lines in the north and keep them up to date. I see no alternative to it at the moment unless, Mr. Chairman, it is possible to get such men as General Simonds and those other experts who volunteer information outside the house to come in and give us the information in evidence before the committee and have them undergo careful questioning. If they can show us where it is foolish to spend our money on those northern radar lines then, of course, it would be possible for us to make the necessary change.

We believe that any joint continental air command must be in a position to move to the defence of our country instantly when the attacker has been spotted. There will be no time for consultation once the attack has been launched. We believe that the form of the agreement should provide for whatever Canadian units are to be involved and to be used along with United States units to meet any danger that arises without any further consultation about who is to issue the command or under what circumstances the units are to be used. However, we do believe that parliament should be given the general facts about the agreement as quickly as it has been developed and before action is taken to involve any of our units in any action.

I do not mean to say by that that the details of strategy and all that sort of thing should be divulged to parliament. Nor do I even suggest meeting in camera to hear the details. I refer only to the general form of the agreement, together with the facts about what part Canada is expected to play, who is to command the forces and whether Canadian units can be ordered into action without further consultation with the government or parliament. Once this parliament has approved the general agreement with the United States, then I think all haggling over details should stop.

I should like to say before my time lapses, Mr. Chairman, that I realize some of the problems the new Minister of Defence is up against. I know they must be terrific and I have to make allowances in anything that I say for the short time in which he has been Minister of National Defence; but I have also to keep in mind the many years during which he has been a leading military figure in our country. I give him credit for approaching his task with realism and I do hope he will be successful in effecting those savings of which he spoke, and I think he will be. I do not think there is any question about it. But one of the great problems he faces is the decision about weapons that Canada is developing or already has. Whether we should continue on with the use of conventional weapons or whether we should scrap those, stop all the work on the development of further supersonic jet planes, and that sort of thing and try something else, I do not know.

I am sure that the minister himself is struggling with that problem, but as he struggles with it I am quite certain he will come face to face with the urgent need in this country of better trained, more skilful research and scientific personnel. Various papers in the country for several months past have been emphasizing the need to divert some of the millions of dollars now being spent on defence into the better education and better training of engineers, technologists and skilled researchers. This raises in my mind the question of whether Canada's most effective contribution to defence against aggression might not be the spending of some millions of dollars on research and financing the technical training of a great many more Canadians.

I think perhaps that is going to be essential, particularly if what the minister said this morning is to be made a reality, that is, that through the joint efforts of Canada and the United States at the bases in Texas we are to develop interceptors that will be successful in stopping ballistic missiles that are aimed at us and which we can detect in time. I hope the minister will have something to say on that matter before he closes the debate. In fact, in the course of studying his estimates, if we are going to study them right here in committee of supply, it will be my purpose to remind him of the question and perhaps to draw out from him some of his ideas with regard to this important problem.

I agree with him that our participation in NATO, taking our full responsibility therein, is the best way to show our determination to prevent aggression. I do not think there is any question about the need for pooling the strength of the western nations in such an alliance as NATO. I believe what the minister said this morning is perfectly true, that our collective security is bound up in NATO and we must keep ourselves as strong as we possibly can in that connection. We must never let down our guard and the only way we can be sure that other nations will not launch a war against us is by reminding them through some such collective arrangement as NATO that if they do their sins will rebound on their own heads with redoubled force. I feel that alone is one of the best assurances against war so I do not plead for one moment that we should divert needed moneys from the provision of those weapons of war that are essential to prevent aggression. But I do ask the minister to consider most carefully the possibility of diverting some moneys into the proper training and education of the skilled personnel this country is going to need if we are ever going to keep ourselves free from aggressors.

I do not think I will speak longer at this time. There are many questions we would like to ask regarding the details of the estimates and we will do so when they are before the committee. But I ask the minister and the government once more to consider setting up a committee to study the defence estimates before whom we can call experts to give evidence and to justify the things they have so freely said to the newspapers and in addressing clubs and other organizations across this country.

There is only one final thing I wish to say. While we are concentrating our attention on military affairs, on national defence, I think we should also try to keep ourselves balanced. Let us never forget that the moral influence Canada can exert in this troubled world can be much more effective, if it is properly mobilized and exerted, than all the military weapons that might be piled up put together. We have a place that we can fill and I certainly suggest that we keep our minds on that phase of world affairs as well.

Mr. Stick: Mr. Chairman, the debate on defence is one of the most important debates that comes before parliament. I have listened with a great deal of interest to the speeches made thus far. Particularly I should like to make reference briefly to the speech of the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I should like very much to agree with everything he said, and there is much with which I can agree, but I cannot agree with any letting down of our guard as far as the security of the country and its people is concerned. Peace does not rest with us. Russia can have peace tomorrow on most favourable terms if she desires it and she can also have war. Whether we have peace or war in this world depends largely on Russia.

It may be news to members of the house that during the 1940's a special committee was set up by the authorities in Russia to study the question of whether they could have co-existence with the western nations or, in other words, whether communism and the free world could live side by side in peace or whether there would have to be war. That committee was composed of some of the most eminent men in Russia at that time. They spent about two years studying the question and brought in their report to the politburo or the supreme praesidium as they call it today.

After studying the question from every angle they came to the conclusion that war between the communist world and the free world was inevitable. You may not subscribe to that and I may not subscribe to that, but that was the essence of their report. It was considered by the ruling body in Russia and was accepted. Furthermore, they set three dates when war would be possible, 1952, 1954 and 1956, but they made the provision that circumstances might arise in the course of the timetable they had set which might extend their recommendations to 1960.

Anybody who has studied and followed Russian methods down through the years can readily see, Mr. Chairman, that right along they have been basing their policy on that report. They have tested the west on more than one occasion. They have tested our preparation to resist in Korea. From Korea they went to southeast Asia and now they are testing us in the Middle East.

On the basis of this information, what are Canada and the free world going to do? It is a well known fact, and it only needs to be stated to be believed because it has been stated time and time again, that the communists mean world domination and unless we accept peace on their terms we must provide the resistance by which our people may continue to live in a free and democratic way as we are doing today. This raises the question of what we are going to do regarding defence. This is a defence budget. This is a debate on defence, and the whole safety of the nation is bound up in it.

I come from the province of Newfoundland and we have problems there that probably do not apply to the provinces inland. Furthermore, we know what war is at first hand. One only needs to remind this house that we had the submarine menace all around our coast during the last war. From our coast we have seen actual sinkings of ships by German submarines. We have had submarines around our coast since then. A few years ago we had five Russian submarines around our coast. We had reports during the past summer of many submarines—I will not say what they are because I have not that definite information—around our coast. They were reported around our coast continually during the whole summer. I am not so naive as to believe that those submarines were there for friendly purposes.

I raised the question in this house with the Minister of National Defence and let me say that I received from him the greatest co-operation which I appreciate immensely. At his invitation I discussed with him some of the problems which we must face on the east coast, particularly Newfoundland. At his request I wrote to him and gave him my views. He acknowledged that letter in a very nice way and said that he would take the matter up with his department and look into my proposals. I do not propose to quote from my letter to the minister in any way with regard to security but perhaps if I quote some parts of it this house may be given some idea of what is in my mind. I shall quote some parts of the letter which I think I can quote without involving security. In my letter to the minister I said this:

> The submarine menace to our shipping in case of hostilities is no figment of the imagination but a reality in view of recent events taking place around the shores of Newfoundland for some time. When it is known that Russia has about 500 submarines, numbers of them of the latest model, the danger to our shipping is apparent.
> I should like to point out that Newfoundland is very vulnerable to this danger, chiefly because almost all our needs, including food, is imported by water. If this supply is severed, great hardships will ensue and it will be the first duty of Canada to supply our people of Newfoundland with food, etc., and the only way this can be done will be by air.

I made recommendations which I will not specify because I think they can be classified under security but I ended up in this way:

> I shall be happy to further discuss those proposals with you or your officials at any time.

I think that clearly sets out the position in which we shall find ourselves in Newfoundland in case of hostilities. That is not all. In his remarks today—and I shall paraphrase them—the minister gave some assurance to this house that the submarine menace is being taken care of. But shortly afterwards he also said that the submarine menace was receiving the most careful consideration. I agree with the minister in what he said there. I do not want this house to take my word alone with regard to the seriousness of this submarine menace. I shall quote two or three articles and I shall be as brief as I can. This statement is by Field Marshal Viscount Montgomery. It is from Chatham, England. The article states as follows:

> Field Marshal Viscount Montgomery, Deputy Supreme Allied Commander in Europe, said that control of the seas still is more important than guided missiles.

I have here a report from Paris which reads as follows:

> U.S. Admiral Jerauld Wright warned today that Russia is building a huge navy designed to isolate North America from Europe and destroy the North Atlantic Treaty Organization . . .
> The Admiral said that Russia has developed the largest submarine fleet ever known in peacetime.
> Moscow is building a navy larger than all the others in the world combined except for the U.S. navy, he said, for the purpose of "the isolation of North America from Europe, the defeat of NATO at sea and therefore the destruction of our alliance".

I think I have said enough to draw the attention of this house to the seriousness of the submarine menace. The latest designed submarine the United States had, powered by atomic energy, left a year or so ago to manoeuvre. I think she left in the vicinity of the Azores. She was to penetrate the defences of North America within certain defined limits in order to test the defences against the modern submarine. She set out on her course and was detected by the anti-submarine detection of one of the United States destroyers. However, she promptly got away from it. She penetrated all their defences, surfaced around Cape Cod and then wirelessed to the authorities what she had done. If she had not been circumscribed and kept within limits—she could not go out of those limits—she could very easily have evaded the destroyers that sighted her by their detection devices. But she was within those limits; and even within those limits she penetrated all the defences we had —that was about a year or so ago—and then she surfaced.

I look upon defence against the submarine menace as vital to the safety of Canada. I look upon it as vital to the safety of the troops overseas and the supplying of our allies. This morning the minister said something with which I agree and I again paraphrase what he said. He stated that we cannot in the first phase of war by sea use our shipping. I agree with that statement. We have Canadian forces overseas. We have allies in Europe, particularly in Great Britain. We are vulnerable to the submarine menace. We in Newfoundland shall need food in a very short time if hostilities break out. From what I can understand, Great Britain today has only about three weeks' to one month's food supply on hand. If this submarine menace is as dangerous and threatening as I have tried to point out, and as I believe to be absolutely true, then the only way in which we can supply the province of Newfoundland and our allies is by air. That stands to reason. We have not the facilities with which to do it and it is time we woke up to the fact that we should have them.

This is a point about which I am greatly concerned. I think the authorities here, particularly in the higher command, must wake up to this fact also. We have co-ordination in our forces and I am glad to pay tribute to it. I believe we have good co-ordination in the lower ranks. However, I am not too sure that we have it in the higher ranks. When you hear retired generals criticizing what the higher command does, and in no uncertain terms, one is left to wonder what is wrong with our higher command. I am not against differences of opinion between the army, the navy and the air force and even within those services; that is all to the good, but when those services are shown up before the general public as being inadequate and not only the general public but the members of the forces themselves realize this indecision which is taking place in the higher command, how can you expect the morale of our troops to be kept at the pitch which we all desire?

I think it is high time that our higher command got together. I do not care whether they call in General Simonds or General Macklin or whoever they call in, but I think they should get together and iron out these things and tell this country where we stand. This uneasiness with respect to our higher command today is penetrating down to the ranks and it is having an effect on the morale of the troops. From what little knowledge I have, it would seem that some of our troops in the different services are seriously considering giving up their careers and going back into civilian life because they are afraid they are going to be disbanded and cast out upon a cold and hungry world with no prospects of work.

Now I have one final word to say on this united command. I may take a different attitude from some of my colleagues on this side of the house. As you know, we have in Newfoundland the United States strategic air force and in that province we are dependent principally upon those forces for our defence. Let that be understood, there is no mistake about it. Now I asked the minister who would give the orders to this strategic air force in Newfoundland in the case of an emergency when it would have to go into action and the minister very courteously informed me that this strategic force would get its orders from St. Hubert. Well I have nothing against that, but I understand the headquarters of the strategic air force is in Colorado Springs. Then we have another command in St. Hubert and we have this air force operating in Newfoundland and I think also in Labrador, certainly in Greenland.

Now my suggestion to the minister, which I put in all sincerity, is that he should, without any waste of time, look into this business and get it ironed out so that everybody will know exactly where they stand. If General Partridge has the authority to order action on the part of the United States forces or the Canadian forces—I do not care whether it is on Canadian or United States territory then he should not have any strings attached to that authority in the case of necessity. He should have full authority to issue orders immediately without having to wait to contact Ottawa, or contact the minister or the Prime Minister and then have them contact St. Hubert and St. Hubert contact the forces in Newfoundland. We are getting into a state now where I think war is liable to take place and if you give authority—I do not care whether it is to an United States general or a Canadian marshal as long as you think the man is fitted for his position—then I think the time has come for instructions to be given to him in such a way that there will be no waste of time but that he should have full power to order troops into action without having one hand tied behind his back. He should be in a position to act immediately if an emergency arises. I do not care whether the forces fly over our territory or over United States territory so long as they do a good job in defending the people of the North American continent.

I think what the minister has done is to settle political questions before setting up the co-ordination of his military responsibilities. May I say in all sincerity that I think he has put the cart before the horse—whether it was done by the former government or his government is immaterial to me but he has now settled political questions before military ones which I think is wrong and the first step should be the setting up of the military command. I ask the minister, for the safety of the people of the North American continent, to get this question settled and settled quickly so that there will be no trouble in the event of hostilities and there will be no waste of time.

I have one further suggestion to make and that is with regard to food supplies in Great Britain. Our western friends may appreciate this point. If Great Britain is to be an ally and to play her full part in NATO she cannot do so unless she has food. Now I make this suggestion for what it is worth: I think we should help Great Britain by putting food supplies in that country, and I include grain and other things, which would last between four and six months and which could be stored in case of emergency.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Stick: Furthermore, I suggest that Great Britain should use those supplies as she needs them day by day and they can be replenished as necessary. I say this because I am convinced if these hostilities should arise, then automatically it becomes obvious that we shall have to supply Great Britain with food and the only way to do so would be by air. Well, we do not have those facilities today with which to do it. It may also be a means of helping our western farmer to dispose of some of his surplus grain and it will certainly be of great assistance to Great Britain to have food stored against a possible emergency and to be able to use that food as it is needed. Not only will it be helping Great Britain, but we will also have an ally who will be able to fight and will not be half starved.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): Mr. Chairman, I do not think there are too many points which could be added to those raised by my leader, the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, in his excellent speech this afternoon. I do believe however that his point of view should be buttressed as much as possible in order that it may be given full consideration by the government, because I think there is a definite need which is becoming more apparent by the day for a review of the role filled by our Department of National Defence. I think we have to get away from the Maginot line philosophy which was enunciated by the hon. member for Trinity-Conception where we think in terms of a 1914-1918 war or a 1940-45 war. We now have to gear ourselves to developments which have taken place within the last month and a half and consider the effects which those developments have upon our defence.

When the Minister of National Defence was first appointed to his post I fully expected he might follow the pattern set down by Great Britain in the announcement that there would be reductions in the defence expenditures. At that time, I think, a lot of consideration had in fact been given to this point. However, shortly after he took office an announcement was made that a lot of his criticism had been unfounded and that there would be no significant changes in the defence expenditures. I think at this time, as pointed out by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, it is virtually impossible to make any significant changes in the estimates because the greater part of the year has passed by and it would be most difficult to make reductions in expenditures which would be meaningful.

I believe the comment of the minister, when he was asked to remark on the launching of the Russian sputnik, was that it was "out of this world". I think that comment was something from which we should take our keynote and start gearing our defence thinking to procedures which might, at the moment, seem to be out of this world, but which will be upon us in the very near future.

We already see newspaper speculation about the date of the launching of a rocket to the moon. There is an indication that in five or seven years they may be able to construct manned satellites capable of going to Mars and returning. This seems as spectacular to us now as the invention of gunpowder might have seemed to someone in prehistoric times. We must be aware of the tremendous developments which are taking place in the applications of science to the techniques of destruction, and I think we should ask ourselves just where Canada stands in this great arms race between Russia and the United States. It seems to me that we are in the position of a kindergarten pupil running in the senior foot race. Yes, we get there, but we are so far behind that we might just as well not be in the running. I mean by that, of course, that with our limited resources we can never hope to compete against the scientific development which goes on in the United States and in Russia.

I think an example of this could be cited in the Arrow, the CF-105, which, I believe, cost us over $200 million and perhaps as much as $300 million to design. It has been admitted that this plane is virtually obsolescent before deliveries have been made. We cannot possibly derive much pleasure from the thought of spending $200 or $300 million upon an aircraft which is obsolete. I recognize immediately that in the course of experimental research expenditures are necessary, and that all the expenditures do not pay dividends. But I think we must consider the effectiveness of this expenditure, because Canada over a number of years has spent billions of dollars—the present estimates cover an expenditure of $1,700 million—and can anyone here honestly say that through the expenditure of all this money we now have a defence. We are all aware of the fact that we depend on the strategic air command of the United States for our defence and for the power of retaliation in the event of attack. We are dependent also on the forces of NATO to provide the unified defensive force of the western world.

Having in mind the startling scientific developments which have taken place abroad, and thinking of the jet bombers now being flown by the strategic air command, we can very easily ask ourselves just what is the role of manpower, or what is the limitation of human beings in future air warfare. Air Marshal Joubert of Great Britain recently wrote a book on rockets in which he dealt extensively with the developments which have taken place in Germany, in Peenemünde, beginning as far back as 1934. He gave evidence to show that had Hitler been as impressed by the technique of rocketry as he was by more conventional aircraft there might have been a tragic difference in the outcome of the second world war.

Air Marshal Joubert asks: what is the limitation on a human being? We find that in aircraft travelling at many hundreds of miles an hour, one, or even two pilots cannot cope with the machine because of the tremendous speed reached and the comparatively slow reaction time of a human being. We are wondering just what is the role of the piloted aircraft in the face of the development which will be taking place in the next three or four years.

Over the past number of years we have prided ourselves, or at least some hon. members have done so, over the radar defence lines, the mid-Canada line, the "Pinetree" line and the distant early warning line. We may very well ask ourselves now how effective these devices will be in face of the intercontinental ballistic missile or the intermediate ballistic missiles. I believe the present radar installations are limited to a range of 70,000 feet. How effective are they going to be in detecting a missile travelling at an altitude of three or four hundred miles?

I have a feeling that our defence budgets over the years have been drawn up by the generals, the field marshals and the admirals. I think it is very understandable that as they go through the echelons of these various services they should make efforts to maintain establishments. As the budget is drawn up, a certain colonel is going to try to maintain his establishment; he does not like to see his position made unnecessary. I think there is an undue amount of pressure applied for the sake of maintaining establishments which no longer perform their role in the defence of this country.

I should like to endorse to the best of my ability the suggestion which was made by my leader, and which has been made repeatedly in this house by members and supporters of the government when in opposition and by present members of the opposition, namely that we should establish a defence estimates committee to enquire into all aspects of the expenditure of these huge sums of money. I think this is most necessary, and that any consideration of defence expenditures should bear in mind not only military aspects of the matter, but that economic and political considerations should be brought to the forefront.

Speaking as a layman on military matters, and that is in fact what most of us are—I am one who did most of my military work as a foot slogger—it appears to me that one development which can be made toward the modernization of our armed forces would be to unify our armed services. I can see that in former wars there was need for an army, a navy and an air force because each was performing a specialized role. But today, with the development of the hydrogen bomb and nuclear weapons, I think consideration could be given by the government to the unification of all our armed services under one command, whether it is to be called the defence force, the armed service force or anything else. I think economies could be made administratively by this means, and I think, also, that a decision such as this would assist in establishing the chain of command.

One obvious argument in favour of this suggestion is the present situation in the United States where there is great rivalry between the navy and the army as to which service is going to launch the first successful rocket. This has led to the ridiculous situation where two branches of the armed services of a country are competing against each other instead of pooling their knowledge, and I have a suspicion that we Canadians are not completely immune from the criticism which must be directed against such folly.

It would seem to me that with the developments which have taken place in the last few years the question of manpower has become relatively unimportant. It is true that in terms of small localized wars men are necessary, but manpower will not win wars against nuclear weapons. The suggestion which has been made by this group is that a United Nations police force be established to provide sufficient manpower to control any localized outburst or any small wars.

We must look upon nuclear weapons as provoking all-out war or none at all in view of these technological advances. I think, too, that in future estimates a second look should be given to the role of the militia in Canada. I notice that announcements have been made indicating changes which are being proposed in the role of the militia. We might as well face the fact that they can throw away all the old British 303 Enfields and Sten guns because they will never have the opportunity of using them.

When I visited NATO headquarters in 1954 I had the pleasure of hearing Field Marshal Lord Montgomery address us and he pointed out at that time the hopelessness of getting a militia trained in time to go into action in a modern war. It would require at the least three months to get a militia man trained so he could take part in modern combat. I think most of us are of the impression that if a nuclear war is launched we will not have three months for preparations of this kind.

The militia might very well be geared to playing a most useful role connected with civil defence. They should be provided with radiation indicators so they would be able to determine if in fact radiation were present to a harmful degree. They should be trained to fight fires and to deal with similar local emergencies. If this were done they would be fulfilling a useful role and I am certain that those who are members of the militia would be happier to know that they in fact had a more vital part to play in the defence of Canada than is the case at the present time.

It would seem also that a suggestion could be made related to the example of NATO. In NATO we as nations have each given up a bit of our sovereignty for our common defence and I think Canada's role in defence could be given further consideration in the light of this fact. We cannot ever hope to compete against the United States and Russia in the arms race but it would appear to me that if some agreement could be arrived at where we as a country were to specialize in some particular phase of defence we would be making an even greater contribution to the common defence of the western world. If we were to concentrate on the various aspects of rockets and if the major portion of our defence role were to be geared to scientific development perhaps in the long run we would achieve further protection. I believe we must be careful, however, in any such arrangement to safeguard some aspects of our sovereignty in that no foreign power should be allowed to involve us in a war without our consent. That is the point at issue in discussions of NORAD at the present time, the concern that the United States might possibly control certain Canadian forces.

I want to emphasize again the request that future estimates of the Department of National Defence should be reduced to give consideration to the new look which we are presently taking in external affairs and which we should also be taking in terms of our defence expenditures. Recent scientific developments have produced a tremendous change and we should not be trapped into a Maginot line philosophy. We must put ourselves in a position to progress with the times. This will require a re-allocation of defence expenditures a larger portion of which of necessity must be channelized through our universities in the form of scientific research which along with giving us military defence will assist in the progress of our country and of humanity in general.

The second prong of this approach, as it were, must be to give further consideration to abolishing the causes of war. As we look back through history we find that war in the main has been caused by greed, hunger and oppression. As long as we can look around the world today and see countries which are in a relatively backward state who look with envy at the advanced standard of living that prevails in western countries we are leaving the door open to a furthering of the causes of communism. Discontent will exist in those countries and the forces of communism will be received only too readily. It is the challenge of the western nations to fulfil their responsibilities to these countries of the world which are sometimes referred to as backward—but which are more accurately described as underprivileged—which have been dominated by other countries over the centuries and now have a lower standard of living than ours. We must give consideration to applying some of our defence budget to the supplying of food to these countries through our national organizations and the United Nations so the prevailing standards of living can be raised in these countries and they may become real allies of free humanity.

Mr. McLeod: Mr. Chairman, other speakers have covered in a general way much of the ground I intend to cover and I agree with most of what has been said. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar in his remarks brought out some excellent points worthy of the careful and earnest consideration of this committee but I would say to him and to all hon. members that we must face the difficult international situation with our eyes open. Idealism will not counter communism and the outstretched hand must be backed by strength when it is offered to one who for years has shown no disposition to accept a hand that is offered in peace and good will.

I listened with a great deal of interest to the outline of our position as given by the minister this morning. I will give his statement very close reading tomorrow and I am sure we all will have a much broader knowledge and understanding of the condition in which we find ourselves at the present time. I did observe that he referred at length to the part we play in the Far East, the Near East, the Middle East and NATO. We are glad to know that our nation is taking its rightful place in defence of the western nations. These are important considerations from an international point of view to prevent aggression and to demonstrate our preparedness to retaliate effectively and promptly in case of attack but I believe our people are more intimately concerned with the possible direct attack on the North American continent and will not be satisfied until they know that no effort is being spared to guarantee the greatest possible degree of defence in the face of modern methods of direct attack. Future attacks, we believe, will come from long-range missiles, long-range bombers and long-range submarines and these may be based miles beyond our borders.

In the face of that, Mr. Chairman, our people want some assurances that very careful attention is being given to this possibility by our defence department and that science is being mobilized to the full to study and to try to find an answer to this very serious problem.

Now, in regard to the estimates proper, it is hard to get down to details when we find that an immense amount of $1,670,000,000 is lumped in one item. It is impossible, as I said, to give any detailed consideration to those estimates and therefore we must deal with them in a very general way. However, when we are considering the expenditure of such a large sum of money—and the taxpayer's money—we who are the representatives of the taxpayers in this house have the responsibility of seeing that this expenditure is given careful consideration. To do that job intelligently, Mr. Chairman, we must have information.

It is certainly discouraging when we find ourselves in the position in which the Minister of National Defence found himself some months ago when he assumed the important office which he now holds. Shortly after assuming office, according to the press, he is reported to have made a statement along these lines: "My criticism of the Department of National Defence in the past was based upon lack of information". This is another way of saying that it was based on ignorance of what was going on. I am not using the word "ignorance" with any personal implications; but I am emphasizing this point to show that we members of this house must be kept informed, and it is to the government of the day that we look for this information. But, Mr. Chairman, I am sorry to say that under this present administration, although we were promised greater personal responsibility as members and greater responsibility as a parliament, we find that we are kept in the same state of ignorance as we were when the Liberals were in power. According to the old saying, ignorance is bliss; but in matters that affect our international relationships and our national well-being and our people's pocketbooks so much as does this national defence spending and national defence policies, we should not be kept in ignorance.

The people of Canada do not object to heavy defence spending, provided they are satisfied the department is looking after their defence efficiently and is giving value for the money spent. In order to keep our people satisfied there must be a feeling of confidence in the administration which can only be fostered by giving out a reasonable amount of information of what is being done. We do not expect that many of the secret arrangements which are being planned among the various top officials of the different organizations to preserve and to defend our western nations should be given to us. We are not looking for that kind of information; but I would say to the minister that we as members of parliament have, I think, passed the age when we may have been looked upon as juveniles. I do believe that we are responsible and are able to decide in our own minds that which can be given, that which can be publicized and that which cannot.

In order to see that that information is given to us I would certainly support the recommendations that have been made by every speaker thus far for a committee on national defence. That committee, Mr. Chairman, should be a permanent committee; it should not be too large. Besides studying the policies and the expenditures of the department, it could also act in an advisory capacity to the minister of the department which means so much to us and to our future welfare. Our party made the same request in discussing our external affairs problems and we think that in those two fields, so closely linked, the parliament of Canada should stand united. To do so, though, parliament must have some say in formulating policy and in carrying out that policy. I mentioned the two fields of defence and external affairs as being closely linked. I would go farther, Mr. Chairman, and say that they are interlocking. For that reason certain aspects of our integrated defence policy with the United States give us cause for alarm. We, as a proud and aggressive people, are jealous of our sovereign rights. We have bravely and boldly stood for those rights since confederation and I hope it will always be our guiding principle in dealing with other nations.

Expressions have been made by responsible officials of a foreign, though quite friendly nation, that under integration we shall have lost some of those rights. I am glad to note that our Minister of National Defence and our Prime Minister have repudiated those statements; yet I am sure that in the minds of all of us we cannot conceive of such a responsible member of another government making such statements unless there was basis in fact for those remarks.

I am going to say with all the force at my command that we are in favour of integration. We believe it is one way to make the best use of our defensive power, but we say that it must be a temporary arrangement and one which is not irrevocable. Then, since it is so closely linked with our external affairs, the whole plan should have been worked out in conjunction and consultation with the Department of External Affairs.

Instead, what do we find? We find the same ignorance on the part of the Department of External Affairs that I say we as members of this house are faced with when we are giving consideration to the estimates of the department. I am going to refer to an article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of December 4 in its report of the session of the committee on external affairs. I am going to read just briefly. It appears that the Secretary of State for External Affairs was being interrogated about the progress that had been made and negotiations, if any, that had been carried on. He is reported as having said that his department was not concerned.

The word "concerned" there is in quotation marks. I cannot countenance that the Secretary of State for External Affairs of this country would say that his department was not concerned in such a state of affairs. I am sure there must be something wrong despite the fact that the word "concerned" is in quotation marks. In any event, the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that his department was not concerned in the arrangements that had led to the establishment of the command. If that is a fact, I think it is one of the most serious things that parliament must face and consider at the present time.

We have also heard that negotiations are taking place at the service level and with respect to that the minister replied that negotiations were being conducted at the service level and that the two commanders are now working out recommendations on the basis of which there will be an intergovernmental exchange of notes specifying the command's terms of reference. Apparently that is right because I believe that is what the Minister of National Defence said this morning, that the top officials of the military organization are working out the plans under which this integration shall take place. One member who just spoke said that the cart had been placed before the horse and I think he used a very apt expression to describe these negotiations.

To me, Mr. Chairman, this is a most serious reflection on the Department of External Affairs when we see something that will affect the political well-being of Canada for years to come being handled by the military authorities. In fact, it would appear that the service commanders are now drawing up political terms which when completed will be turned over to the two governments. That is something which must not go unchallenged. In fact, it is a challenge to the civil authority which must always remain supreme. The Department of National Defence, responsible to the government of Canada and through it to the people of Canada, must take no action to override the civil authority.

We can look back through the history of Britain and the history of Canada since confederation and see that the civil authority has always been supreme. Now we have a serious threat that our military officials are going to dictate to the civil authority of Canada plans and policies which will become effective and which will govern us to some degree for many years to come.

Mr. Mitchell: Mr. Chairman, I feel I might be allowed to say a few words in the debate on the estimates of the Department of National Defence. However, in so doing I do not intend to set myself up as a military expert in any way or even a critic of national defence. My remarks are going to be of a much more local nature, in fact, so local that they apply only to the constituency I represent. I am sure the minister can almost foretell what I am about to mention as he has been spoken to in this regard before. I hope he does not feel I work under the principle that the squeaking wheel gets the grease, although I will admit it has certain merits in certain places.

I want to ask the minister and the department to give serious reconsideration to the matter of certain moneys which were in the estimates brought down by the former minister of national defence last spring. Certain moneys were set aside for the building of very necessary accommodation in Sudbury. I am sure the minister had a first-hand opportunity to see the trying conditions under which the military people in our area are working when he paid us a visit on November 10 and graciously assisted in the unveiling of a new cenotaph.

There is a unique situation in the city of Sudbury regarding the proposed building and I should like to bring it to the attention of the house. I think hon. members will all agree that as soon as a suggestion is heard in a community that the government intends to buy some property for the erection of any kind of building the land automatically goes up in price, possibly to a great many times its real value. Such is not the case in our city. A few years ago a public-spirited citizen donated a parcel of land amounting to approximately 5.6 acres for which he paid $10,000. The land is now being held by the crown and the stipulation was made that an armoury would be built thereon. The land was received in the Queen's name by the previous minister of national defence, and in his estimates of last spring he attempted to fulfil his promise to make the building a reality.

I understand that the Department of Public Works feels it is being overcharged most outrageously for the properties now being occupied in view of the accommodation that is supplied. A year ago I was asked to intervene in the matter to see if the owners of the buildings would reduce the rent. I may say I was successful in having it reduced somewhat but I also feel that the rent is still exorbitant. Of course, the owners of the buildings take the view that they are not particularly anxious to rent them for the purpose for which they are now being used and as far as they are concerned they feel they would receive a greater monetary return from new buildings which they would be pleased to construct.

Unfortunately, the property now being held by the crown is affected by a proviso in the agreement of sale between the former owner of the property and the gentleman who donated it to the crown and that proviso is that if an armoury should not be built on this location the land will revert to the original owner at the original price. This land has been examined and tested by the engineers of the department. I am not prepared to prove this but I understand that plans were drawn up for the erection of the building but they are now pigeonholed.

[Mr. Mitchell.]

The reason I am on my feet today is to make a serious appeal to the minister and the department to reconsider their decision not to erect this building at the present time. I feel that we will lose the property which was given to us for this purpose if action is not taken soon and I also believe that we are paying an exorbitant rent for the premises now occupied. I am deadly serious about this request to the department and I hope the minister will see fit to reconsider the matter very shortly.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I have a brief word. I appreciated very much the Minister of National Defence allowing us a few days ago to hear one of our distinguished generals. By the outlines on the charts, and we can see those outlines yet, he showed us what Canada was doing and what it was prepared to do. The reason I rose at this time is to say that it is not aeroplanes that win the war. Neither is it submarines or bombs. I ask what it was that defeated Germany in the last war. They had the best equipped army in the world. They had more aeroplanes and more submarines than any other country. They had everything that would indicate that Germany was going to win. Why did Germany not win? If they had had more aeroplanes, would they have won?

A call went out across the country, Mr. Chairman, for a day of prayer. That was a big day not only here but in other countries. What happened? Germany made three outstanding mistakes. The Germans were clever. Germany was supposed to have the best brains in the world. Our students used to go there in order to complete their education, as they thought; but they did not do so. What were the three mistakes? After Dunkirk, when the allies were beaten, the first mistake they made was that they did not wipe England off the map. Why did they not do so? That was the first mistake they made. The next mistake was Pearl Harbor. Why was the attack made on Pearl Harbor? The attack was made because they thought it would help win the war. But what did it do? It brought the United States wholeheartedly into the war. The third mistake they made was that they attacked Russia and kept on attacking her with the result that they were finally beaten. I can hear so many in the opposition saying "Too little and too late"; but you are never too late when God is first and when your men rally behind you in the way our Canadian youth did. That is why we won the war.

Mr. Blackmore: In following the fine rousing remarks of the hon. member for Fort William and the equally fine remarks of the hon. member for Trinity-Conception as opposed to the spirit of fatalism and of defeat breathed by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, it seems to me that it is fitting that just a few more things be said. If we say that we simply cannot win and if we give up, we do not give the Lord a chance to play a part at all. We may not be able to do very much when we start, as was the case in the battle of Britain in world war II, but if we do all that we possibly can and if we rely on the God of battles, we shall have a chance of winning. My feeling is that it is very much the same as we approach this dreadful crisis in world history, the worst the world has ever known.

It seems to me also that we should give a little bit of thought to another matter which was referred to indirectly by the hon. member for Trinity-Conception. I refer to the kind of people we are opposed to. Most people think it is the Russian people we are opposed to. That is the last thing in the world we are opposed to. We are opposed to the group of men who conquered Russia in the so-called revolution back in 1917, who now rule Russia with an iron hand and who intend to extend that sordid rule over all the people of the world. There is no use in talking about co-existence with those people. With them it is all or none. They talk co-existence but it is the last thing they think of.

May I refer to the remarks of three of their leaders. I mention Lenin first. In 1923 Lenin announced to the world—or so it would be announced to the world—that it would be unnecessary to defeat the United States in a military way, that she would fall into their hands like an over-ripe fruit. All that is necessary is that enough people in Canada and the United States speak as did the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar, and the whole of North America will fall into their hands like an over-ripe fruit.

The next communist leader who said a most significant thing in this respect was Manuilsky. This man, if I recall it correctly, spoke in 1930. He said this—these are not his exact words; I am not quoting; I am speaking from memory—"We will put on a peace offensive which will surpass anything the world ever saw and when we get them all softened up we will smash them with the iron fist". If the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar had wanted to play right into Manuilsky's hands or into Lenin's, he could not have done it better.

The next man is Khrushchev. I cannot remember just exactly what it was that Khrushchev said, but fairly recently he made a remark which I have already put on the record in times past and which did not in any way indicate that he had receded from the position of Lenin and Manuilsky but rather that he was following on as a member in the team, aiming to accomplish the thing which the other two had foretold. Let everybody bear in mind this most important matter.

May I repeat once more that we are not fighting the Russians; we are not fighting the Chinese; we are not fighting any of the people who have come under the domination of the so-called communist organization which is another outfit entirely, parading under the mask of communism. We are not fighting the peoples who are their fronts; we are fighting the men hidden behind communism. Let us never forget that fact.

While we are on the subject may I suggest to the Minister of National Defence that, with all the ardour of his being, he impress upon the leaders of the United States, Great Britain and the other NATO nations that if they do not single out those men in their governments who are agents of that group of people who are behind communism it will do no good at all to find out new secrets, because those secrets will be in the hands of Moscow before we ourselves hear about them.

I have taken occasion to refer to this matter two or three times in the house previously. Some people have supposed that there is nothing to what I have said. May I say that it will be a great deal better if they can learn now than at some later time when they will say, "Oh, if I had only known". It could have been known but they were just simply too narrow-minded and blind to listen, so that they could have been told.

May I urge upon the minister that he take the utmost care with regard to this matter. Let me remind him that immediately after the first satellite went up from Russia, Gouzenko who is in a position to know a great deal more about the matter than does anybody in this house or probably anyone else in this country, announced to the people of Canada and the United States, as far as he could cause his voice to be heard, that the Russians had put the first satellite into the air because the secrets which the United States and Canada had discovered had been transmitted to Russia by people imbedded in the administrations of our countries. I saw that statement in at least two papers.

Let me urge the minister,—and I do not think I need to do so—that he pay no attention to those who join in this cry of defeat. He will find plenty of them; he will find pretty nearly every C.C.F. member and every socialist in the country among them. Pay no attention to those people; pay attention to the people who believe in Canada, who believe in the British flag and in the British people, who believe in the future of Christianity and who believe in the future of freedom. He should put everything he has got into his task and, if it becomes necessary, as indicated by the hon. member for Fort William, at some future time to call a day of national prayer let him not hesitate to do so. As has been so very well stated by Tennyson:

More things are wrought by prayer than this world dreams of.

And I think that there is a statement in the Bible by the Lord saying:

I will yet for this be enquired of by the house of Israel, to do it for them.

That is all I will say on this matter at the present time.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, I am aware that the estimates now before the house were prepared by the former administration and, as a supporter of that administration and of that party, I naturally support these estimates. We have before us expenditures of over $1.7 billion for various kinds of military offensive and defensive weapons. We all regret that so much money has to be diverted into unproductive channels when it could be used in so many other ways for human betterment but we realize that this expenditure for military weapons is necessary even if some of the equipment becomes obsolete before it becomes operational.

It is right and fitting that we should make every possible preparation for possible war—a war which we hope will never come—but it does cause me some concern, as it has caused me concern every year since I have been here that we should make an effort to provide for war which does not exist at the present time and yet seem to be so unconcerned about a war which does exist at the present time, a war which in fact has been going on continuously for the last 40 years and which has recently entered a new and decisive phase. I refer, of course, to the war of ideas.

We have become almost panic-stricken because soviet Russia has taken away our lead by launching sputniks and guided missiles. Yet, on the other hand, we are extremely apathetic, complacent and indifferent about an even more deadly weapon, the communist ideology, to which I understand my hon. friend from Lethbridge was referring a few moments ago. Military weapons are not the only means of fighting a war or of protecting ourselves against war, there are political weapons and economic weapons. In soviet Russia, however, military, economic and political weapons are all controlled by and subordinated to their ideology. Our hysteria about the sputniks and the ICBM's is exactly what Russia wants at this time because it diverts our attention from their ideological weapons upon which they are relying for ultimate victory and it diverts also our attention from the necessity of developing ideological counter weapons of our own.

The word ideology is one which we use with a certain amount of discomfort. We do not seem to have any very clear idea of what it means. We use it in a casual and offhand manner, but we do not take the trouble to analyse or to dissect it and we are very often content to confuse it with idealism, as did my hon. friend from Macleod when he spoke earlier in this debate. An ideology is an idea in action; an idea that includes a plan for remaking the world; an idea that has become a force because it has captured the hearts and souls of human beings to such an extent that they are prepared to give everything they have to assure its triumph. Over the years the anti-democratic countries have perfected ideological weapons, techniques and strategies; they have won many countries with the force of their ideas alone and without firing a single shot. We try to counteract that purely by military political and economic means.

By means of their ideology the communists can achieve and have achieved the following objectives and during the period of co-existence it is upon the achievement of these objectives that they rely for ultimate victory. Now the first objective they seek to attain is to destroy and weaken our belief in the central values which the democratic nations wish to preserve and endeavour to defend. What are we doing to counteract that? What are we doing to build up our defences against it? The second objective is to undermine confidence in the ability and the moral integrity of national leadership, that is, of all politicians, military and administrative leaders and those with whom the citizens are in contact and who have their confidence. The third objective is to weaken the ability and the willingness of a nation to co-operate for common aims by destroying group solidarity. In the fourth place they seek to destroy the peoples' psychic equilibrium and personal adjustment to existing conditions.

These objectives are being achieved by the communist ideology right here in Canada, and that is something about which we cannot feel too complacent. As the hon. member for Lethbridge pointed out, it is not necessary for everyone in a nation to be a committed communist; Lenin took over Russia with only 11,000 of them, a hard core of 11,000 people committed to his ideology. I am told by a reliable source that there are about 8,000 committed communists in Canada at the present time. When we consider the defence of our country we must consider all aspects of defence, not the military aspect only.

The minister pointed out that our policy is based on collective security within the framework of NATO. That collective security is only as strong as NATO's ability and will to resist and to act decisively; it is only as strong as NATO's unity. And what is NATO's unity based on today? It is based on fear, and it is hardly strong enough to withstand the internal stresses and strains of conflicting self interest among member nations. What NATO needs primarily, and what we need, I think, to contribute to NATO is a positive and moral ideology which is capable of counteracting these objectives which I listed a few moments earlier, and capable not only of resisting them but of taking the offensive against them.

The original idea of NATO as a temporary shield while defences were mobilized was sound, but the present idea of NATO as a permanent Maginot line is unsound and that is what NATO has developed into, a ring, as we have been told, of 250 bases. The only difference is that we have armed this modern Maginot line with nuclear weapons and guided missiles instead of the conventional weapons of the old Maginot line. But the fundamental idea is the same, and it is unsound.

In the ideological war, as in the war of arms, the best defence is attack, and in the war of ideas NATO must therefore take the offensive. Earlier today hon. members have spoken about removing the causes of war. I think the hon. member for Kindersley referred to poverty and hunger as among the factors which caused war, and he spoke of them, in the way most of us do, as though they were something separate and apart from ourselves, something abstract, which does not concern us as individuals. That is not so, and I think that is where we have been missing the boat all along. The mess we are in today in external affairs, in the United Nations, in the Middle East and in all the theatres of the world has been brought about by people who have been regarded as being extremely practical. One of the reasons why we have not come to grips with these problems is because we have lacked a positive ideology, and we have lacked a positive ideology because we have thought of these things in the abstract without relating them to ourselves. To develop an ideology we should begin, of course, with ourselves, because as I am so is my nation.

When we, the people of the democratic countries, begin to live out in our lives the things we talk about, then democracy will have an ideology capable of taking the offensive against communism. It would be a good thing, if, as some hon. members have suggested, we could do something about alleviating the hunger in the world. We all sympathize with the hungry nations in Asia; and here we are in Canada with a huge pile of surplus wheat and other food products. It has been suggested that instead of spending money on arms we should use that money to purchase commodities to give to the hungry millions of the world. This, in itself, would be a good thing, but it would not be an ideological move, and it would not serve any ideological purpose because of the very fact that we have a surplus and there is an element of self interest in getting rid of it.

In other words, the situation would be as it was pointed out in an article in the last issue of Maclean's Magazine in which the writer described Canadians as we appear to the have not nations of Asia and Africa. They note that when we give, we give selfishly of our abundance and without any sacrifice. It is the total commitment to an idea which constitutes an ideology and which makes it so effective. The thing which attracts people to communism—wealthy people, learned people, scientific people—is not the communist idea itself so much as the commitment of the people to it, that is, the total commitment of the communists with whom they come into contact.

NATO needs an ideology. Some time ago when the bureau of current affairs was set up I thought that might be the beginning of the development of the ideological training of the armed forces. I noted today that the minister said this bureau was going to be discontinued. I am not criticizing the minister for this, because I do not think the bureau of current affairs has ever served the purpose I hoped it would. I have followed its course over the years. It has probably done some good, but nothing which was vital to the needs of the day. I agree with the minister that there are things more pressing and more urgent. But I cannot agree that there is anything more urgent today than the development of ideological training for our services and for our people, and I think the armed services would provide a good starting point.

I was interested in looking over a Soviet news bulletin some time ago in which an explanation was given of the demotion of Marshal Zhukov. I am not going to read all the relevant parts, but I can paraphrase what the bulletin said. What it amounted to was that Marshal Zhukov was becoming less and less enthusiastic about ideological training in the armed forces. One sentence of the bulletin reads:

> Comrade Zhukov by his incorrect actions reduced party organizations to the status of purely educational organs.

Then it went on to say that the other thing that was wrong with Marshal Zhukov was that he was not personally living up to his ideology but was glorifying himself instead of the party principles which made him what he was. As I said before, I would like to see some concern and some recognition of this need on the part of the Conservative government.

Mr. Coldwell: Would the hon. member permit a question? Surely he is not urging that the government should set up an organization in the army to spread the ideology of the Conservative party?

Mr. Carter: No, I said it should be a moral ideology that is above party, race and creed and that such an ideology is in existence and there are training schools where people could be trained in it. I would like to see some real attention given to this aspect of our defence.

NATO needs an ideology and when the NATO countries develop a positive ideology then they will be able to act in a realm of unity above their divisions of pride and prejudice, above the barriers of their social and national characteristics and above the isolation created by their individual points of view. The starting point for nations as well as for individuals is with an honest admission of past mistakes and failures, honest apologies for the harm they have done, honest efforts to put right what can be put right and an honest appraisal of our motives, past, present and future. With such an ideology NATO could revolutionize the thinking and conduct of the world and without that ideology NATO's policy will always be dictated by events and the events will be dictated or engineered by Moscow.

Mr. Bryce: Mr. Chairman, I do not know whether or not this is the right time to raise the point concerning government tenders for supplying food to the armed forces. In Manitoba today it is only the large packers who are getting such business and I wish to speak about the situation. If this is the wrong place to raise the question I will bring it up again at some other time but it occurred to me it should come under the heading of administration.

I see no reason why a small packer should not have the right to tender for supplying food to the services as long as he can deliver the goods. The little fellow does not pay as much income tax as the big fellow but he does pay income tax. I am not talking about a packer who has just established himself in Manitoba but I am referring to the small packers some of whom have been in business there for 40 years. I wonder if the minister would be good enough to give us his assurance that the small businessman in Manitoba will receive a square deal when it comes to tendering for supplies of food to the armed forces.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Chairman, perhaps I might answer that question now. I would point out that our requirements are supplied by the ministry of defence production. We inform the ministry what is required for these services and they let out the contracts. I would suggest to the hon. member that he should direct his question to the Minister of Defence Production when the estimates of that department are before the house.

Mr. Bryce: Well, is there a Minister of Defence Production?

Mr. Pearkes: There is an Acting Minister of Defence Production.

Mr. Bryce: All right, I shall do that. Thank you.

Mr. Pearkes: While I am on my feet perhaps I might clear up one or two of the points that have been raised. I believe we all agree with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar that the essential need is to remove, if possible, the causes of war but until there is a realistic disarmament policy I feel we must maintain a reasonable degree of security so that our people can live and carry out their ordinary peaceful avocations.

The hon. member for Fort William, the hon. member for Lethbridge, and the hon. member for Burin-Burgeo have spoken about the ideological aspects of training. It would perhaps be interesting to note that in all units there is carried out a service which to a large extent replaces the work which was being done by the bureau of current affairs and of course the unit officers instruct their men on the day to day events of the world.

The hon. member for Kingston and others seemed to be under the impression that there was some lack of liaison between the Department of External Affairs and the Department of National Defence regarding the arrangements connected with the integrated command of the air defences. The original arrangement started as far back as May 14, 1956 when there was a meeting of the Canadian chiefs of staff and the United States joint chiefs of staff and a decision was made to refer the matter to a joint study group. At that meeting and all subsequent meetings representatives of the Department of External Affairs were present and that department was conversant with all that was going on. In addition to that, of course, the matter was referred to the cabinet as a whole and, as the Prime Minister stated, it was a government decision to adopt this integrated command.

I wish to assure the hon. member for Okanagan-Revelstoke that I fully appreciate the importance of civil control of the armed forces and under no circumstances will the military be permitted in any way to usurp, or override as he said, the civil authority or dictate to the government of the country. I can assure the hon. member that nothing of that nature is occurring at the present time.

The hon. member for Kingston asked about the question of manpower. Recruiting for all three services has been very good recently and we have the total number of men required to meet our commitments. Of course, there is always a shortage of technical personnel and, as the hon. member for Peace River stated, it is desirable that we give all the encouragement possible to the young men of this country to develop technical and engineering skills. It is for that purpose that research and development grants are made through the defence research board through universities for the encouragement of special projects. Regarding the total of money which is being spent on research at the present time, the estimates show that the sum of $64,796,000 is being spent on research and development. It is rather difficult sometimes, as hon. members will appreciate, to separate research from development but if necessary I could give further information regarding that subject.

The question arose as to whether or not our weapons are obsolete. It is easy to suggest that the weapons of today cannot meet the weapons an enemy may have in the near future. I believe that the weapons we have today are capable of meeting the weapons that any potential enemy has today. I believe our interceptors can intercept any Russian bomber that the Russian air force have today.

We are going one step farther: we are developing this CF-105, which is a supersonic interceptor. It will probably be five years before that CF-105 will be in squadron operation, if it turns out to be entirely satisfactory in every respect. I believe that the CF-105 will then be able to deal with any bomber that the Russians will have five years hence. Of course, it will not be able to deal with the intercontinental missile.

As I tried to point out in the remarks I made this morning, we are members of a team and we take on those tasks and produce those weapons which we consider we are most adapted to provide and whose procurement is within our means. In this partnership team we are providing the manned interceptor to meet the manned bomber. We have not gone into the missile field. The anti-intercontinental ballistic missile will be developed and provided by other partners of our alliance. We hope that there will be an opportunity for us to contribute toward that development, but our particular role in this partnership for the defence of the North American continent is to provide a proportion of the manned interceptors to meet the manned bombers and the best advice that I have, founded on the judgment given by our own military advisers and military advisers from our NATO partners, is that for many years to come there will be manned bombers. In fact, we know, contrary to statements which have been made elsewhere, that the Russians are still developing and producing manned bombers. It may well be, as I stated this morning, that if our deterrent fails and an attack does occur, that attack will be a combination of intercontinental missiles and manned bombers.

It is our sincere hope that the means of dealing with the intercontinental missile will be produced and developed by the time the Russians have any quantity of the intercontinental missile.

Reference was made to our radar line. I know that those radar lines were designed for and are capable of locating the bomber of today and can be developed to meet the bomber of the next few years. They are not designed to meet the intercontinental missile.

Now, there were a number of other questions which were taken up and I understand that we shall be departing to the other place in the near future and perhaps when we leave this general discussion and get on to the details they can be answered in their proper place.

Mr. Broome: If I may have a few minutes I would like to put before the minister a question with regard to armouries.

Mr. Pearkes: I wonder whether the hon. member would take that up when we come to the question of the army and the construction under the army when I shall have my advisers here to give me the details of that question.

Mr. Stefura: I have a few questions but I do not know where they come, whether they come under item 240 or not.

The Royal Assent

Mr. Pearkes: If it would be the wish of the committee, Mr. Chairman, I suggest we follow the procedure of previous years in which, after there has been a general discussion on policy, we took the details as given in the blue book dealing with the main subjects, such as administration, inspection services, navy, army and air force; then, the defence research board, and so on. If that policy is followed I can have my particular advisers here who can give the details. If we were able to start there at eight o'clock it would be most helpful.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Do hon. members wish to follow the procedure outlined by the Minister of National Defence? Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Defence services, departmental administration.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I thought the suggestion of the minister was that we would have the general discussion first.

Mr. Pearkes: After the general discussion we will have the discussion of the details and I said I hoped we could start at eight o'clock. I was under the impression that the general discussion was finished.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My colleague from Port Arthur wishes to say something.

Progress reported.

DEPARTMENT OF NATIONAL DEFENCE

Defence services—

240. To provide for the Canadian forces, the defence research board and other expenditures relating to defence, including costs incurred in the participation of the Canadian forces in the United Nations emergency force and contributions toward the military costs of the North Atlantic treaty organization; to authorize expenditures in the current year out of the amount hereby provided, not exceeding $130,000,000, under the provisions of section 3 of the Defence Appropriation Act, 1950, and to provide that, notwithstanding subsection (3) of that section, where equipment or supplies are transferred, the estimated present value thereof shall be credited to this vote instead of being paid into the special account mentioned in the said subsection (3), and when so credited may be expended for the purposes of the Canadian forces; and notwithstanding section 30 of the Financial Administration Act to authorize total commitments for the foregoing purposes of $3,338,164,131 regardless of the year in which such commitments will come in course of payment (of which it is estimated that $1,521,731,982 will come due for payment in future years), $1,669,450,149.

At six o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Fisher: Mr. Chairman, before I go any further I would like to correct a small error made by the Minister of National Defence. It is rather petty, but he did say that the member for Port Arthur was one of those who had spoken on the ideological training in the armed services. Actually it was the member for Fort William.

Mr. Pearkes: I have made that correction. I beg your pardon.

Mr. Fisher: Thank you. I wanted to make sure it was corrected because from my own personal memory of the services—I might add that one of the pleasures of my taking part in this debate is from the point of view of a former private asking questions of a former general—I do recall that we got horribly bored with some of the ideological training.

At this time perhaps I might also take the opportunity to refer to what was said by the gentleman from Alberta. Perhaps he did not mean to cast an aspersion upon the loyalty of the C.C.F. as a group with respect to our national defence, but I would just like to remind him that we have our share of returned veterans and if we, perhaps, are not so vociferous in referring to the bible or the crown that is no reason to infer that we are disloyal or unchristian.

Now what I wanted to speak about in particular had specifically to do with Canadian service colleges. Of course their estimates are scattered throughout many subjects but I do feel that this is the proper time to put my questions. I think it is one of the ironies in connection with education that the only full subsidization of higher education in this country at the present time should be for the purpose of producing soldiers and sailors. Of course, as a believer in full subsidization of higher education so that more people may get the benefit of it, this specific aspect of national defence intrigues me and it seems to me that if the production of regimental officers or air pilots is worthy of full subsidization the same principle should be much more widely extended to cover the training of scientists and specialists in the liberal arts. That of course is something else again.

Now one of the difficulties in there being no breakdown available, and no chance to examine the expenditures in connection with the service colleges and that aspect of the department generally, could be rectified if the minister, in the estimates, the public accounts, or in his departmental report, would provide some facilities for such an examination. That is the first request I would like to make.

The second point I would like to raise is this. A former minister stated there were plans for carrying on the equivalent of post-graduate work for graduates of the service colleges at the national defence college and at the army and air staff colleges. Now in what way is such post graduate work geared to advanced physical research in the fields of missiles, technology and atomic weapons. I would like to know how that is progressing. I have in mind a statement made in 1952 by Mr. Claxton on this very subject. I would also like to know something about the make-up of the advisory board of the Canadian service colleges. Who are the members, and are they still meeting once a year, and has the membership changed? Would the minister say if there has been any great change in the conceptions of the board since his government took office?

Another question I would like to ask, and I know of course that I will have to wait for the minister to obtain expert advice in order to answer me in this respect, is as follows: What is the comparison of costs for the production of officers at each of the three service colleges and what is the comparison of costs between producing an officer at a service college compared to an officer produced under the university training plan? I think these are all aspects of the departmental estimates which we should be entitled to investigate.

Now has there been any discussion about narrowing the rather liberal kind of education now available to students at service colleges? In the first two years especially the education in general is quite liberal and I would like to know if there have been any discussions about narrowing that education and making it more specifically military?

Another question I would like to ask is whether there is a provincial quota for the service colleges and if so have those quotas been filled in recent years and by what provinces?

Further, in 1952 there was an announcement made that the College Militaire in Quebec would have an objective of enrolment of 400 students. I would like to know if that objective has been reached and, if it has not what difficulty stands in the way?

[Mr. Fisher.]

I also have a similar question in connection with the rather different position with respect to the academic professorial staff in the service colleges and similar staffs at the universities. I would like to know whether there is a definite minimum and maximum in terms of pupil load and lecturing hours for the academic staff at service colleges. I have received some reports that such staff is overworked and other reports that they have practically a year-round holiday.

I would further like to know the position of the civilian teaching staff at the service colleges with respect to work in vacation time. For example, could an engineering professor take on private services for a fee or could an arts professor, who had published a book as a result of his studies carried on as an employee of the civil service, have the profits of the publication accrue to him?

Something else I would like to know is how the schedule of salaries for professorial staff in service colleges compares with that recommended by the association of university professors or with that of the University of Toronto which, I understand, is the general standard in Canada by which other colleges and universities govern themselves?

Another question I would like to ask is, can academic civil servants of the department belong to the professorial association of university professors; have they that right?

I would like to know the relationship between the National Council of Canadian Universities and the directors of the Canadian Service Colleges? Just what is the liaison between these groups and are the service colleges part of that national council?

More particularly, how many service college graduates in the last three school years have chosen to go on to take the degree at our universities immediately they were able to do so?

As a penultimate question I would like to ask what is the percentage of Canadian service college graduates which remains in the active forces after completing the term of service? Lastly, what percentage of the student body presently enrolled in the service colleges is, or could be, classified as French Canadian?

I realize, in reading this long list of questions, that it will take time to answer them and that there will be difficulties involved in doing so. I feel, however, that this is the place to ask rather than on the orders of the day and will look forward to sending over this list to the minister and later on, as the discussion continues, to having such answers as his assistants may be able to provide.

Mr. Hahn: I have just a very few questions at this time, Mr. Chairman, but as the night progresses I will have more to add. I would first like to compliment the minister in respect of his announcement than he expects to cut down on the expenses of the department. I may say that I have found him to be one of the most approachable ministers with whom I have ever had contact in this house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hahn: I find he is always prepared to meet one and to discuss problems although that does not necessarily mean that I agree with everything that is being done in his particular department. I did hope that we would have had the public accounts of Canada for 1957 by this time so that we could come to some reasonable understanding by a comparison of the estimates for last year with the amounts actually expended by the various departments. My reason for this hope is that I find this is one department in which there is a great discrepancy between the estimates and the actual expenditures.

The people in this country complain bitterly about excessive taxation to which we are subjected and I must under the circumstances refer to the public accounts of Canada for the year 1956 and in particular to volume I, page N-4, to illustrate my particular point.

The estimates set down by the department under departmental administration amounted to $3,494,080 while the amount actually expended was approximately half a million dollars less; $500,000 on an expenditure of some $3 million. Actually, the figure expended was $2,963,787. That represents a difference of about one-sixth, or 16 per cent.

Now I have taken time in the course of the day to review former public accounts and in many instances I have found a similar story. I have tried to discover by going through the estimates exactly where the discrepancy arises. I must say at this point that I do recognize the fact that the minister is new to this particular department and has not had the opportunity of checking these things for himself. He has not had the time. I know how much time it would take to check every individual item among the thousands of items which appear. The point I wish to make is, possibly, best illustrated on page 313 of the estimates for 1957-58 with which we are particularly concerned. I would direct the minister's attention to the section entitled departmental administration.

We see there, under the description of civil staff—possibly civil servants—one deputy minister, one associate deputy minister, three assistant deputy ministers—two at $12,000 and one at $10,500—making in all a total, together with their staffs, of 774 employees in the administrative staff compared with 776 last year. Now the question I have in mind is this: have these offices ever been filled at any one time, all of them, or have any been vacant for a year? Is it the intention of the department to fill these vacancies?

Again, I wish to say that all this points to the fact that we should have a special committee to study these estimates in the same way as other departmental estimates are studied. I could make some very pointed comments about this matter, but I do not intend to pursue the discussion very far at this moment. But if we do have each of these particular offices filled, I am wondering who are the individuals who fill them. As I said, in 1956 there was a discrepancy of over half a million dollars according to the public accounts. Certainly, under "Administration", this is an item identical with the one we find included in the estimates this year.

We find a saving of half a million, which would indicate that the department is expecting the taxpayers of Canada to pay half a million more each year than is actually required, because, to the best of my knowledge, I have never seen all the posts in this department filled at any one time. Possibly the minister would make a statement on this matter later.

I found, also, among other things, a matter which might best be described by reference to the white sheet at the back of the estimates. Let us take one example: construction or acquisition of buildings and works, including land. Hon. members will find that this year we are being asked to appropriate approximately $143 million as compared with $191 million last year, a saving of about $50 million. I should not say it is a saving; we are probably spending $50 million less on buildings. We are just not spending the money. It does seem that at this time we should be better advised to spend the full $191 million on new buildings, not only because we need the buildings but because this is one way of getting people to work.

While I am dealing with this particular question I wonder if the minister would indicate to the house whether there is any change in policy involved here. Are there to be fewer replacements of armouries? What is the decision of the department? In the city which I have the honour to represent we have an armoury which has been in existence for many years. The building is in very poor condition. Ten years or more ago the former government promised that they would replace this armoury. This was long before my time as a member of parliament, but I remember reading about it in the newspaper. This promise has never been fulfilled; there was always one excuse or another, and it seems that the appropriation was never there. If these moneys are not expended and the taxpayer has paid for them, the balance must have appeared at some place in the appropriation. What has happened to this particular balance? Is it being held, is it the intention of the department to carry on a building program or has it other plans. I am sure that each of the hon. members of the house who has an armoury in his area, replacement or renewal of which has been promised, would be very interested to hear the minister's observations on this.

There is another question which I think is very important at this time, and it arises out of a statement made by the Minister of Public Works last evening when he was introducing his housing legislation. If I recall the matter correctly, he indicated that the maritimes and British Columbia were not in a position to take advantage of housing loans. There may be several reasons for this situation, but it could be that these regions are suffering severely from unemployment and as a result the people do not have sufficient money available to make down payments. I find, on checking the loans made in various parts of Canada, that in the province of British Columbia we received only one per cent of the defence orders placed by the federal government. We represent eight per cent of the population, yet we received only one per cent of all defence orders. This is a depressed area, as the hon. member for Vancouver South has very recently found out, as has his colleague the member for Vancouver Centre—

An hon. Member: Better get your constituencies straight.

Mr. Hahn: No, I am going right through the list. They have all learned about it by now, including the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard. They all know about the condition of the province and the serious unemployment problem. The same applies to the maritimes.

Mr. Barnett: What is Mr. Bennett doing about it?

Mr. Hahn: We are building roads and highways and spending every available dollar in the treasury which is a lot more than this government is doing.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): What is Saskatchewan doing about it?

Mr. Hahn: If I may continue, sir, I would add that in circumstances such as these where the Department of National Defence has had all these extra dollars appropriated to it and available in the treasury a good place to spend that money would be in British Columbia and the maritimes and any other areas where there is a serious unemployment problem at this time in order to set those people at work producing some of the articles that are required in carrying out the defence of our country.

The Chairman: May I assume that we have now concluded the general discussion on this vote?

Mr. Herridge: Mr. Chairman, I have a few remarks to make. I would have made them this afternoon but unfortunately I had to be absent to attend the meeting of the external affairs committee.

First of all I must congratulate the minister on his appointment and wish him well in all he undertakes for revision. I think every one realizes that this is one of the most difficult portfolios to deal with in these most uncertain circumstances.

I was interested this morning in the minister's reference to the history of the militia, how it was based on the efforts of the pioneers to provide for their own defence and the defence of the country and how finally in the first world war it was used as the basis of the contingents that went to France. I know as far as my own constituency is concerned the units in Trail and Nelson have been kept going and training has been undertaken week after week, month after month and year after year by a few devoted persons who undertake this work under quite difficult circumstances, in some cases with little public support because of a lack of understanding and because of a degree of uncertainty as to their status in the light of developments that are likely to occur in the future.

In referring to the militia I personally prefer the term "home defence" under these circumstances and I suggested that its role should first of all be primarily home defence, second civil defence and third it should represent training to take action in the case of disaster in peacetime. I think there is a most worth-while role for the militia if training is undertaken along those three lines and that type of training would appeal to many of the younger men who would be willing to join the militia if there were training of that type.

From my experience as a result of talking to the officers, non-commissioned officers and the rank and file of the units in my district I have learned that you cannot arouse very much interest in training year after year on obsolete anti-aircraft guns which I understand were obsolete some years ago and which do not provide much outlet for interest for young men. Because that sort of training has been continued for some years it has been rather difficult to encourage young men to join the militia in our district. I suggest that first of all you have to have local support and to have local support you must have the type of program in training which engenders that support and local interest.

I suggest that the best results for the money expended can be obtained, particularly under circumstances such as those which obtain in my area, by basic infantry training in which there is training in basic discipline and the understanding of accepting orders and working together in circumstances of emergency. In addition to that I suggest such training could be coupled with frequent manoeuvres into various parts of the district which could be undertaken at very little cost. In fact, the units in my area have undertaken weekend manoeuvres on two or three occasions under the direction of their C.O's. and they have been very successful indeed. I have talked to a lot of the young chaps who were out on these manoeuvres and they appreciated them very much because they felt they were doing something of significance. In a situation such as ours, particularly in a mountainous territory, I believe it is most necessary that we have a corps of men who are well acquainted with the country, its physical features, topography, geography and that sort of thing. In that way the militia is capable of providing a highly adequate home defence in the case of emergency.

Secondly, I think the co-relation of the work of the militia with civil defence can be accomplished with good effect. I was extremely pleased when the minister suggested something more was going to be done in that direction. In fact, if civil defence works in conjunction with the militia I believe we will have a more effective civil defence because there will be a correlation of these two groups both aiming to provide some protection for the country in emergency and in peace.

I also suggest there is an opportunity to use the militia as a group of trained persons willing to be called out to meet any civil disaster in peacetime, particularly during floods and perhaps on occasions when there are very large forest fires when some particularly large organization is required. I stress again my belief that the militia can play a continuing and worth-while role if it is based on home defence, civil defence and disaster defence and alleviation in peacetime.

I am rather parochial in my outlook in some respects because I am essentially a village lad, you know. I feel there is a great deal of value in maintaining the old district names with respect to the militia. There is not much appeal in numbers and that sort of thing but there is a strong appeal in district names and they could be used to a greater extent in any reorganization of the militia. The Rocky Mountain Rangers were formed in the interior of British Columbia in the early days of the century and I remember the drill halls being built in Rossland, Nelson and Kaslo—I should win the support from the Minister of Public Works in this respect—and in other places and I also recall the interest taken in the militia at that time in an entirely different world situation.

The men who were trained there, like others who were trained in the militia, formed a ready nucleus for the overseas forces during the war. The famous 54 Kootenay regiment was based on the Rocky Mountain Rangers and rendered great service during the first world war. I suggest that the Minister of National Defence would be well advised to form a Kootenay regiment in the Kootenays with platoons or companies in the various towns in question. By so doing the minister would continue the tradition that has been established since the early days of this century and would attract to the militia the sons or grandsons of men who served in the Rocky Mountain Rangers and of those who served in the Kootenay regiment and whose fathers at various times throughout the years served with the militia and the overseas battalion that was formed from it.

I do urge the minister to give some consideration to that and when he replies I would like to get his response to my suggestion in respect of naming the units in the Kootenays, the Kootenay regiment. I am not talking of the engineers or technical groups, but those who are now known as anti-aircraft regiments. I suggest changing those to an infantry regiment. I think it will create much greater interest and will be more suitable for the development of the type of training that is required in that district and will be of considerably less cost than using this heavy equipment and the training that goes with it.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): I should like to make just one or two comments on questions which again involve generalities. First of all may I also congratulate the minister and those associated with defence planning on recognizing for the first time, in some 17 years that I have any knowledge of the armed forces, the necessity for planning flexibility in view of the nature of the defence that we have to make for our country.

I would like to suggest that some of the questions that the minister is going to be confronted with, which were partially covered by his remarks, can be answered when we come to the details of the estimates which we will be giving consideration to in just a moment. To be more specific, I would like to suggest to him that the reserve role which he outlined first of all in so far as it applies to the air force auxiliary units, one that we should have recognized some five years ago, would have to be changed. The reason he gave us was the necessity of carrying out a new role in the interests of civil defence with transport units. Perhaps a more important reason is that our weekend pilots who have done an excellent job with the auxiliary units will undoubtedly in the course of the next few years have some difficulty in flying the very fast jet aircraft on limited flying experience. But I would like to suggest to him that in so far as the use of transport aircraft, the Expediters most currently in use are not a satisfactory type, first of all because of their operational limitations. I would like to suggest to him that the Dakota, which has been the workhorse of the transport units in regular squadrons these past years, should replace the Expediter.

In so far as the reserve militia unit is concerned, I think that most of those who served in the militia, or those in this house who served in the militia, recognize as one member said that certain of our artillery pieces of equipment such as the 25-pounder, while it may be out of date, does nevertheless provide us with the firing power which if used in larger scale operations, will give us the elementary training that we require. What I do suggest to the minister and his department is that while there may be some reduction in the application of reserve units to either fighter squadrons, auxiliary units, transport units or artillery, the militia units, integrated as they may be, and although we may not give them the time with the permanent units at reserve camps as formerly, we should not in any way reduce the number of permanent force liason officers who are associated with them. Otherwise, the basic training which our militia units must carry out with two objects in view, namely replacements in permanent units and association with civil defence, will not be achieved. That purpose can only be carried out with a fairly high level and a very efficient group of permanent force officers who during the past years have been associated with the various regiments.

I do not think we should concern ourselves too much so long as we maintain the high level of training standards which the reserve units are experiencing today. This, of course, can be seriously limited if we do in any way reduce the association with the permanent units who have assisted with the training in the past.

[Mr. Smith (Calgary South).]

I should like to say a word to the minister on the long-term suggested plan of integrating some of the common ancillary forces with the permanent forces. I heard an hon. member of the C.C.F. party to my extreme right suggest today that perhaps we should integrate the forces as an entity, not just the ancillary sections, that is to say, administrative, medical or police. I would like to remind the minister and that hon. gentleman who made the suggestion that that is an experience that has been tried by every armed force in the world today and it has failed. I think the identity of the three services is essential. I think what might perhaps be regarded as a trial effort would be to use a common medical service, a common police service and a common accounting service. I think there are actually about six other units which, from the standpoint of the service to the main forces, could be incorporated on a basis which would indeed be of great assistance in saving money in the economy of our permanent forces.

I would like to make a reference to the comment of the minister which suggested that we will have in our permanent force a balanced brigade—three of them, I think. This is something which the armed forces have required for some time. We saw the rather regrettable situation when the emergency force was required for the United Nations. The regiment which was based in Calgary had to steal or beg from whatever source it could and from ancillary units to make up a complete composite brigade. The senior officers of both the air force and the army have maintained for some time that if a brigade is to operate efficiently it must train with its ancillary services, so that they can go into action immediately without having hurried wires or messages sent around the country to make it complete. I think it important, too, in the training of our permanent forces that we carry out as many integrated exercises with the United States forces as it is possible to do. Anyone in this house who suggests that because of integrated training we will become involved in an argument of national security or that the sovereignty of our country is endangered does not recognize the very practical and useful experiences that past exercises have given our own forces. I think the incorporation of our two units, that is to say the common forces, the permanent forces of the United States and Canada, as we are today trying to unify the continental command of the air force, will prove highly beneficial to say the least.

I would like to suggest to the minister that in defence planning as a whole the air members of the air force, again in recognition of the necessity of having a continental defence plan, should meet regularly with their counterparts in order to determine whether the use of our forces—and I refer specifically to aircraft now—is in the best interests of continental defence planning.

We have heard a great deal about the 105. It has been said that within the next five years it will no longer be considered to be a top flight aircraft. It has been said by the best known authorities on modern aircraft, and I am not referring particularly to those who may be in Canada, that it still will surpass anything on the drawing boards today. But even accepting that to be so, I believe that almost immediately we are going to have to give consideration to a new prototype which will provide not necessarily greater speed but greater range. I believe that the air members already carrying out planning duties can best do this in co-operation with the United States air force.

I should like to say a word to the hon. member for Kingston who was so concerned about the problem of filing a flight plan, the identifying of aircraft on radar screens and the time lag that might occur. If the hon. member was at all familiar with the procedure he would realize that it takes only a split second to pick up an aircraft on the screen and have fighter aircraft intercept before an enemy plane reaches the coast, and he would not be nearly so alarmed.

Finally, I should like to say this to the minister. Having regard to the white paper produced by Britain in July of last year, I believe, I think the Canadian government can take credit for the fact that so far as planning for defence is concerned the years ahead, as the minister himself said, have taken a somewhat different trend. It seems to me that this is the first attempt by any government to recognize that a change in the nature as we have planned here to take place involves not only the altered role of our militia units but our contribution to the continental defence of Canada and also, of course, to NATO. I believe that this is a very fine department of government, one into which a great deal of planning has gone, and I hope the minister will take into consideration the questions I have put before him.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Chairman—

The Chairman: Order. Shall we now proceed to the consideration of the several headings under this item?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): No, I want to say a few words before we proceed with the details. I can assure you that I will be brief. I was attending committees this afternoon and was not able to be in the house for that reason. I am not aware if anyone from the province of New Brunswick has brought up the matter to which I wish to refer. I know the minister has received petitions from towns and cities in New Brunswick and from many different organizations in that province protesting the closing of camp Utopia in my own county and the curtailing of a great deal of the activity which has been carried on at camp Gagetown.

Camp Utopia, which was established in Charlotte county in 1941, has been in use every year since that time. It is true it is a small camp but I believe the minister was misinformed when he was told that it was in poor condition. I have been there several times this year, last year and the year before and I find it is kept in very good repair and is an excellent camp. Those who go there year after year are very pleased with the surroundings. There would only be 70, 80 or 90 local people employed there but this is an area where employment is greatly needed and the closing of the camp only added to the unemployment. The camp was of great benefit particularly to the eastern part of the county, the town of St. George and one or two other smaller places. It was appreciated by one and all and as it has been in operation continuously since 1941 I regret very much that the minister decided it was necessary to close it at this time.

Camp Gagetown has been under construction now for several years. I know from my experience and the discussions I have had with officials of the Department of National Defence that the particular site was selected in order to give the province of New Brunswick an additional payroll which was greatly needed. It has been estimated that the payroll at camp Gagetown would be approximately $15 million a year. I know the Minister of Veterans Affairs will agree with me when I say that payroll was needed in our province. The people there had come to depend on it. They felt they had a permanent establishment which would provide that type of payroll for many years to come.

When the people were notified recently by the Minister of National Defence that activity at camp Gagetown would be greatly curtailed during the coming year, in fact that the number of troops would be cut from 10,000 to 4,000, it was a most alarming thing to the people of that area, particularly in our capital city of Fredericton, in Saint John and the larger towns. It was a great shock to all of us. I might add that it was most noticeable that there was no curtailing of the service in Nova Scotia. The military establishments in that province will carry on as they have in the past. I shall only appeal to the minister to reconsider the decision he has made. I can assure him that we in the province of New Brunswick are greatly in need of the assistance which was provided by camp Gagetown. Up to now that camp has cost close to $100 million. The building program, which was well under way, could have been completed in a short time, but it has also been curtailed.

Mr. Kennedy: May I correct the hon. member for Charlotte? He just made the statement that there had been no curtailment of troop establishments in Nova Scotia. Is he not aware that the third R.C.H.A. has been moved to camp Gagetown from camp Debert within the last few weeks?

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): No, I was not aware of that fact. In the petitions I believe reference was made to the fact that there had been no changes made in the province of Nova Scotia. However, if some part of the army has moved from Nova Scotia to camp Gagetown I feel that is no more than right because at camp Gagetown we have the most modern camp to be found in any part of Canada. I can see no reason why activity there should be curtailed in any way in order to be able to carry on in some other part of the maritime provinces or anywhere within reasonable distance of camp Gagetown which is a modern camp from every standpoint.

I am sure that particular site was selected in order to give New Brunswick a little shot in the arm because it was greatly needed. At this very moment there is a great deal of unemployment there. In my own county not only did we lose camp Utopia but just a couple of months before the closing of that camp we lost a textile mill in Milltown on the international border which had been there for 70 years with the result that about 450 people were out of work. That area today is declared to be a surplus area so far as employment is concerned.

I well remember when there was so much criticism of the suggestion in the Gordon report that those who were not able to make a living in the maritimes could be moved to other areas at government expense. Those who sat in the opposition at that time said that it was a dreadful thing for Mr. Gordon to even consider such an idea. But I note that today those sitting on the government side of the house are prepared to furnish cash to move these people to some other area. But the question today is, where can they go to find employment? There is a lot of unemployment in all parts of Canada. Before I resume my seat I ask the minister to reconsider the decision he has made and secure a little more knowledge closer to that source because the present situation is a great disappointment to the people there and will cause a great deal more unemployment than we have now. We had depended on camp Gagetown to provide employment and I feel it is a camp that should be maintained permanently at full capacity.

Mr. Pearkes: Perhaps I might clear up this point now with regard to camp Gagetown, camp Utopia and the other camps in the Atlantic provinces. As the hon. member will know, camp Gagetown was started two or three years ago with the intention of building permanent barracks for approximately a brigade group. There is no change whatever in that plan and we are moving troops into camp Gagetown just as quickly as we can get the accommodation made.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): At that point may I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Pearkes: Yes.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Did he not make a statement a short time ago that rather than having 10,000 troops in Gagetown in 1958, we would have only 4,000?

Mr. Pearkes: The hon. member is confusing those permanently stationed in camp Gagetown and those which are moved in for a short period of summer training. In the past few years there have been troops moved even from as far as British Columbia to camp Gagetown for a short period of summer training in order that they might train as a division. In the coming year it is not the intention to continue that divisional training but there will be troops training in Gagetown and there will be troops permanently stationed in Gagetown. There will be no reduction in the numbers which will eventually be placed in Gagetown. These troops will be moved from the other Atlantic provinces into Gagetown just as quickly as we can get the accommodation made, particularly the married men's accommodation. If we are moving troops into Gagetown as was originally planned—and that was a decision made not by me but by the previous administration—of course we have to move troops from Utopia also into Gagetown and that has already taken place. But we are looking into the question of Utopia to see whether some other use cannot be made of that camp.

While I am on my feet perhaps I might clear up one or two other points. The hon. member for New Westminster asked whether all the positions detailed under administration were always filled. No; they are not always filled. There is a constant review to see whether or not all these positions are necessary.

Then there was the question of armouries. The whole question of the accommodation for the militia or the reserve forces is under investigation. As I pointed out this morning, before the war we had some 4,000 regulars and about the same number of militia as we have today. Now we have 49,000 regulars and they are serving for a period of three years and then the great majority of them go into civilian life. Hence there is being built up a reserve of well trained men. Hence it is necessary to take a look at the whole question of militia accommodation or armouries as they are sometimes referred to. As soon as a complete survey has been made, the armouries which need replacing will be given consideration and will be proceeded with in those localities where they are most urgently needed.

I should like to thank the hon. member for Kootenay West for his very constructive suggestions with regard to the unit in his area. I should like to assure him that when we get these mobile support columns to which I referred this morning fully organized, a sub-unit will carry out one or some of the duties to which he referred. I think those are the main points.

Mr. Gardiner: I had not intended to say anything at this stage until the minister mentioned the armouries. I had the estimates here waiting until the item was reached. However, in view of the fact that he has just mentioned the subject, I think probably I should say a word now. I do not know that there would be any reason for my saying anything were it not for the report appearing in the press this evening. I was not here this morning. I was obliged to be at the banking and commerce committee and therefore did not hear what the minister had to say. In the report that is given in this evening's Journal I notice item No. 5 says:

> 5. The construction program has been reviewed and a number of lower priority items have been deferred.

From previous discussions with the minister I was under the impression, and have so conveyed the message to those at Melville where one of those armouries was intended to be constructed, that the whole plan was under consideration, and I would so understand from the remarks just made. But this report would give the impression that only some of them have been deferred and that they will be considered, and dealt with, I presume, at a later date. I was wondering whether the minister would make a further statement with regard to the proposed armoury at Melville so that it will be more clearly understood by the people there.

Before sitting down I want to join with the others who have congratulated the minister upon having taken over the ministry of defence recently. There is perhaps no one in the house who has had a wider experience in the armed forces of Canada than has the present minister. For that reason many of those on the prairies who have been associated with him will wish me to congratulate him upon having attained his present position.

Mr. Pearkes: I thank the right hon. member for Melville for his kind remarks. May I say how much I appreciate his interest in the local militia unit at Melville. Earlier in this session he brought to my attention the need for an armoury in that town. As our review is not yet complete I am not yet in a position to say whether or not we are going to go ahead this year with that armoury.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I listened with interest to the minister's remarks this morning, particularly that portion of them which dealt with a matter concerning which we have been trying to get information both here and in another place. When I say "another place", I do not mean the place that is usually referred to in that way but rather the meetings of the committee on external affairs. As I say, I listened to what the minister said this morning about the North American Air Defence command. I am fully aware of the positive assurances that have been given to us that the civilian authority is in ultimate control so far as NORAD is concerned. I am aware of the fact that in due course there may be something in the nature of an exchange of notes on an agreement between this country and the United States that can be made public. In other words, I am not asking the minister to go over the ground that he has been over several times. But it seems to some of us that there are one or two points concerning which we have the right to have information now. These are questions which have been asked here and they have also been asked in the committee on external affairs, but some of us feel that we have not yet been given the answers.

We understand that Air Marshall Slemon has been appointed deputy commander in chief of the Canada-United States air defence command by order in council P.C. 1957/1033 of July 31, 1957. What concerns some of us is the legal constitution of that air defence command. It is one thing to appoint an officer to a position in a command, but how did the command get constituted? We should also like to know the basis on which General Partridge was appointed to be commander in chief of that same Canada-United States air defence command.

So far as Canada is concerned, the only documents we have with regard to this matter are the order in council to which I have just referred and the joint press release put out by the minister and his counterpart in the United States on August 1. These two documents are contained in sessional paper 183 and I would like to ask if the minister knows of any similar documents in the United States appointing General Partridge to his position, or constituting this joint air command? As the minister knows, when General Norstad was in Ottawa speaking to the press and at various places, he made it clear that his authority as a military commander in Europe was derived from the NATO council. In other words, the military was under the civil authority. We know how that authority, namely the NATO council is constituted, and what we are trying to get is the corresponding information regarding the North American air defence command. We know who are the supreme and deputy commanders; they are General Partridge and Air Marshal Slemon. We know that they have been appointed to the command and we have documents telling us about their appointment, but we have no documents telling us about the constituting of the command itself.

Now let me be very frank with the minister and say that these are questions we asked this afternoon in the committee on external affairs and we were told that they were really questions which should be addressed to the Department of National Defence. I hope the minister of this department will not send us back to the other department again. We feel that it is desirable to have this matter cleared up.

The minister has made it clear today, beyond the shadow of a doubt, that the civil authority is in control but we would like to know the constitutional or legal basis of that civil control over the Canada-United States joint air defence command.

Mr. Pearkes: I would say that this legal control to which the hon. member has referred will be definitely drawn up and included in the formal note by which we set up this air command. We considered it desirable that the two commanders, General Partridge and Air Marshal Slemon, get together and get working as a team, to discuss this matter between themselves and refer back to their respective governments. The actual formal note is agreed upon when all the details have been worked out and there will be no doubt that the authority will rest with the civil governments.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Is it fair to assume then, in view of the importance of that formal note between the two governments, that it will be drawn in such terms—in other words, leaving out the elements of security—so that the note may be tabled here and also tabled in the appropriate place in the United States?

Mr. Pearkes: I would hope that that would be the case. I say I would hope because naturally we are dealing with another government and we would have to get the consent of that government before tabling it. So I say I would hope it would be drawn up in such terms that there would be no doubt that it could be tabled.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Can the minister say on what legal basis the civil side of this set-up is operating at the present time, that is between now and the time this formal note is agreed upon?

Mr. Pearkes: As I have said, they are operating on an interim basis now, under which the two commanders get together, draw up their plans both for the relationship between the command and the governments and also with respect to operational plans. However, I hope it will not be long before the formal note is completed and we will be able to give the hon. member full details on this matter.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am sorry if I do not seem to have grasped this as perhaps the minister thinks I should have done. I realize he has told me these two commanders are working together and drawing up plans. We have also been told that in the event of an emergency at the present time one or the other of them, on a certain basis, could take action. Now what is the basis on which they are working together and where is the civilian authority that enables them to work together at the present time or that enables them to take action in the event of an alert from the DEW line?

Mr. Pearkes: Well this morning I described the procedure which would take place if it was necessary to have any interception. I need not go all over that again.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): No.

Mr. Pearkes: But all the plans are referred to both governments and both governments are in agreement as to the interim operations of this command.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Do I gather then that these two commanders at the present time are working on the basis of interim notes between Canada and the United States, even if these interim notes are documents which cannot be tabled?

Mr. Pearkes: No; I would say interim discussions rather than notes. There has been no passing of any formal notes at all, but there have been visits to the government of the United States. We have had officers going directly from here to Washington where the whole matter has been discussed and both countries are in agreement as to the interim basis upon which this headquarters is working and would work in a situation of emergency which we certainly hope will not occur before the formal note is exchanged.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Do I understand from what the minister has now said that any contact between Canada and the United States has been, not by note —interim or otherwise—but by way of discussions and visits. Furthermore, if visits have been made and if discussions have taken place, have they been on the civilian level, the departmental level or solely on the military level.

Mr. Pearkes: They have been on both the departmental level and what the hon. member referred to as the civilian level through our Canadian representative, the Canadian ambassador in Washington, Mr. Norman Robertson; by the chairman of the chiefs of staff committee and by the two commanders themselves. I may say that there have been a great many discussions on this matter in the last few weeks.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I will add just one more question, and I wish to be perfectly fair and say that I asked the same question of the Secretary of State for External Affairs this afternoon: will he say how soon these formal notes or agreements may be completed?

Mr. Pearkes: Early next year.

Mr. Broome: Mr. Chairman, I was very pleased to hear the minister say that armouries were going to be replaced according to need. I should like to review for the minister's benefit some of the background on recent events with regard to the proposed armouries for the Irish Regiment which is a reserve unit in Vancouver.

This unit was promised a new armoury in 1914, and the promise has been renewed periodically ever since. They are presently training in a frame building which has been condemned for 20 years. The city recently completed arrangements with the Department of National Defence and turned over to the department some 10 acres of land in the southeast corner of the city in return for three acres of a park called Grandview park owned by the Department of National Defence. It was considered that this proposed location was ill advised and unsuitable, and a fight was led to try to stop the building of the armoury at that location. The location was in the middle of a single family dwelling area. It had no public transportation; the nearest bus line would be about a quarter of a mile away, and had a frequency of service of around twice an hour. The militia was not happy with the location, but they had been waiting since 1914 and were willing to take anything.

The arrangement had been that the city of Vancouver would operate a police training academy on the same land and in buildings separate from the armoury. Eventually the police commission decided to switch the police training academy to the Pacific National Exhibition grounds and the city council reversed their plans with regard to the location of this armoury.

The present situation is that the department and the city first of all agreed on the location in an area, which, as I said, was not suitable for an armoury. Now communications have, I believe, emanated from the city to the department asking for a review of this armoury question and its location in a more suitable area.

The modern thinking with regard to an armoury is that it should be located in a well-populated area and should draw its recruits from that area. That would mean a higher priced parcel of land, because the area which has been under consideration is in an undeveloped section, very thinly settled and, in fact, the only area left in Vancouver suitable for large scale subsidized housing development, homes for pensioners and so on. The whole question involves the need to reopen communications between the department and the city so that a more suitable location may be found and the way cleared for the building of this armoury.

An armoury is required by the unit, but the present location is not suitable and I should like the minister, when he has the chance, to have his staff follow this matter up so that it does not become bogged down, and discuss with the city council the new situation which has arisen so that suitable land may be acquired and the armoury built.

Mr. Henderson: Mr. Chairman, I just wanted to ask a question to clarify something in my mind. I notice that the Minister of National Defence in his reply to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre stated that discussions had been carried on between Canadian and United States officials with respect to NORAD. I also note that he intimated that arrangements were made through the Canadian ambassador in Washington. Do I take it from his answer that the Canadian ambassador was brought into this matter in order to make appointments or arrangements for the meetings with United States officials to discuss NORAD?

Mr. Pearkes: Yes, the Canadian ambassador has assisted in every way he possibly can to forward these various meetings which have taken place.

Mr. Henderson: Another question, Mr. Chairman. The minister asked us this morning if we would speak about as much on the general discussion as we could and I am sure we all want to co-operate and not speak too long on individual items other than those particular ones we want to ask about. The minister showed us how he spent an extra $41 million, by a $34 million increase in pay and allowances and another expenditure of $7 million on the mid-Canada line. He also stated that he had decreased spending in the department by about the equivalent amount of $41 million. I would ask the minister, in order that the members may more intelligently put a spending tag after each item, if he could give us a statement detailing his decreases in expenditure and naming the item to which each decrease would be applied. I think it will be easier for the members then to go over the items and know what they are talking about —what is still on the estimate, and if there has been a reduction what item is reduced.

Mr. Pearkes: I gave the general area in which reductions have taken place in the remarks I made this morning. To go over every item now would take a very long time, and it would be necessary for me to have my officials here with their lists of items that have been reduced. There have been reductions made in a large number of different items.

Mr. Henderson: Why I ask that of the minister is that there are a multitude of items and if he could tell us ahead of time, then we would not have to ask on these items: is this item reduced. If he would provide us with this statement—surely, there will be sufficient time overnight—or if he would make some arrangement whereby we could be told what items were reduced, time might be saved. If not it might occur to some members to ask whether this or that item was reduced, and this type of statement might eliminate that type of questioning. Or we might think we have something on the estimates which the minister has erased altogether, because he has not told us in particular about each item. I am sure that having reduced the estimates by $41 million he must have some kind of statement available he could attach to the various items or make an appendix to our proceedings.

Mr. Pearkes: Yes, I have a statement. When we have passed this first item and can get my officials in here they have a statement which goes into more detail.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I am sure the officials are as able to come in now as at any other time during the proceedings of this committee, and I think it would facilitate progress if we had a breakdown of the $40 million to which the minister refers, because all of us, I think, are concerned about some domestic items.

Mr. Pearkes: The hon. member will realize, of course, that there are different officials dealing with different branches—different officials dealing with the navy, the air force and the army. It is hard to get them all here around one small table.

Mr. Benidickson: I agree with the minister, but I think he will agree with me that perhaps no other department of government which presents estimates to the House of Commons has such a small number of items in relation to the dollars involved. I think, in consequence, that if he has changes to make, he could, in deference to the hon. members of this house who do not divide themselves up into categories of air force, navy and army, assist them by providing some form of breakdown of the reductions he is prepared to stand by, compared with the gross items which appear before us.

Mr. Pearkes: I appreciate the hon. member's difficulty because I remember when I was sitting on the other side of the house I encountered exactly the same problem—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): In almost the same seat.

Mr. Pearkes: —and the hon. member will recall how we questioned the wisdom of lumping all these items into the one vote, No. 240.

Mr. Benidickson: Quite.

Mr. Henderson: Mr. Chairman, I was glad to hear the minister say that when he sat on this side of the house he experienced difficulty in understanding the grouping of these items into one vote. We have the situation where he has introduced his estimates and explained quite clearly how he spent $41 million. Now we would like to know the debit side of the story as to how he saved money. There may be items in the details of the estimates involving $3,000 or $4,000 in which some hon. member might be interested and as we proceed with the estimates some of these items might have been erased altogether unknowing to the committee.

I wonder if the minister would agree to the following arrangement. If we pass the present stage of general discussion would the minister when he brings in his officials deal initially with analysing for the members of the committee those items which represent a saving and then we could start dealing with the individual items. This might have the result of shortening the discussion and having the estimates passed more quickly.

Mr. Pearkes: I would be very pleased to do that as soon as you decide the general discussion is over.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if the minister could give the house some information concerning the total cost of developing the CF-105. I believe that is something which is public information and concerning which I have seen many figures put forward.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): I wonder if hon. members would agree that we have concluded the general discussion and may now proceed to a consideration of the several headings under the items. Is that agreeable to hon. members?

Mr. Benidickson: Well, Mr. Chairman, there are not really several headings. If one looks at the estimates and relates $17,000 to the first vote which is statutory, and to the main vote No. 240 which is as I roughly guessed something in excess of $1,600 million, one finds there is not very much discretion for the committee in getting down to individual items. I wonder if some summary is available that would relate to differences in expenditures as proposed by the minister in relation to the four items that I think are likely to be forthcoming before this committee.

Mr. Pearkes: I believe the hon. member was not in the house earlier today when it was decided that we would deal with the various items as listed under the details, such as the administration for the navy, army and air force; but if the committee would prefer to have item No. 240 dealt with as a whole it would be satisfactory. There has already been a wide range of discussion and I would be perfectly agreeable to that course of action. If the committee agreed, I could bring in the deputy minister and such other officials as are necessary right away.

Mr. Benidickson: Do I understand my hon. friend to say there was a commitment on the part of the committee earlier to refer to item No. 240 in stages based on the services involved?

Mr. Pearkes: Yes, that is correct.

Mr. Benidickson: That is satisfactory.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, I think it would be satisfactory if we followed the practice we followed in former years. Actually, in technical terms, all we have before us at the moment is item 240 for something in excess of $1,600 million but if the general discussion has been concluded could we not just let the item stand, proceed to discuss the various details beginning on page 313 and when we have concluded the several pages of details we will discuss we could come back and pass item No. 240 if the committee sees fit to do so.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): If it is agreeable to the committee we will discuss the details commencing on page 313.

Mr. Maltais: Mr. Chairman, before proceeding any further perhaps I may be permitted to direct a question to the minister because I cannot relate the subject of this question to any particular item. Have there been any negotiations with the United States for the establishment or construction of launching bases here in Canada for guided missiles either jointly with Canada or from which the United States could act separately?

Mr. Pearkes: I am afraid I did not fully understand the hon. member's question.

Mr. Maltais: Are any negotiations now taking place or have any taken place concerning allowing the United States to construct launching bases for guided missiles in Canada?

Mr. Pearkes: No, there are no guided missile bases being built in Canada at the present time.

Mr. Stefura: Mr. Chairman, in rising at this time I would like to express agreement with much of the discussion that has taken place this afternoon but there is one point I feel we have overlooked. In any event it has been troubling me and I believe it is of concern to many people in this country.

When we look at the total estimated expenditures for national defence we find they amount to approximately $4,866 million for this year. The minister said that one-third of the tax dollar will go toward defence. This is most interesting because our taxes have increased considerably since 1949. Whereas in that year we were paying a per capita tax of $160 we find it has risen today to approximately $325 per person.

Out of every dollar earned by people in Canada almost 25 cents goes into the federal treasury in the form of taxes. In view of this heavy taxation and our huge defence expenditures one cannot help but wonder sometimes, particularly in the light of certain press reports which appear from time to time, if we are getting our dollar's worth in terms of goods and services for every dollar we spend.

The first question I wish to direct to the minister arises from newspaper reports concerning the Mark IV and Mark V versions of the CF-100. These projects which commenced a little over a year ago have now been abandoned. I would like to know if the planes were ever completed and, if so, whether they were used for training or military purposes? Perhaps the minister could also advise me what was the cost of the Mark IV and Mark V versions of the CF-100. In asking these questions I am referring back to my original query as to whether or not we are getting our dollar's worth for every dollar we spend.

I noticed in the Toronto Star Weekly a report to the effect that the Mark VI version of the CF-100 was abandoned after the CF-105 came into being.

The question that arises is, how much work was done on the Mark VI version and how much money was spent on it? We see other items in the paper from time to time, but I have not been able to find out what the situation is at the present time. I hold in my hand an article from the Edmonton Journal of January last, which deals with the Department of National Defence. Perhaps I should read first and ask the question later. The article is headed:

Ottawa Rapped For Buying Life Insurance On Sculptor

It is a Canadian Press story from Ottawa, and reads in part as follows:

Six years ago, the defence department decided to instal underground steam distribution systems at 30 camps. Major repairs since have been necessary at 14 of these stations, chiefly because of faulty design. Original contracts at the 14 camps were worth $6 million and estimated cost of repairs came to $1,218,500.

Mr. Pearkes: Might I suggest that we proceed in the manner which was suggested earlier? I will be able to answer all these questions when the air force representatives are present, and give the actual amount of money. If we can start with the administration service I can give the information.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): I think the hon. member will realize that the minister can answer these questions a little easier when we come to the air force service. We are now on departmental administration, at page 313.

Mr. Stefura: I was bringing it up, Mr. Chairman, only with the idea of trying to find out whether we were getting our money's worth for every dollar spent. We all realize that defence is something that we must have. When we spend these dollars do we get our money's worth? Is there a careful enough check of these items. I will agree with the chairman. If the minister prefers to handle these things item by item I shall drop my question for the present.

Mr. Pearkes: In answer to the question regarding reductions in departmental administration, the total reductions which have been made amount to $380,000, and that is divided into professional and special services, $202,000; travelling and removal expenses, $17,000; postage, $20,000; publication of departmental records and other material, $51,000; office stationery, supplies, equipment and furnishings, $50,000; materials and supplies, $40,000.

Mr. Benidickson: Is that all related to the summary and total on page 315?

Mr. Pearkes: That is all related to pages 313, 314 and the first part of 315, yes.

Mr. Benidickson: So that the deduction comes from the left-hand column of page 315?

Mr. Pearkes: The amount of $3,745,000 is reduced by $380,000.

Mr. Benidickson: Would the minister be able to provide the committee with some indication relative to the previous year which would show the relation between the amount asked for and the amount spent under this particular category?

Mr. Stick: I understand we are on item 240, with particulars on page 313. Is that it?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): That is right.

Mr. Stick: You have not called it. We would like to know definitely what we are doing.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): We are on administration, page 313.

Mr. Carter: I have a question.

Mr. Benidickson: I think members of the committee will understand that year by year there is sometimes a balance left, despite the vote of the committee of ways and means, and I was wondering whether or not in the previous year the figure of $3,595,000 had been actually spent, or whether there was something underspent in that figure?

Mr. Pearkes: I have it under different items here.

Mr. Benidickson: Just the aggregate will be sufficient.

Mr. Pearkes: I will have to get it totalled up. I will give it to my hon. friend in a minute; it is under separate items.

Mr. Hahn: While they are adding these figures may I say I raised a question earlier in respect of the savings of the staff which the minister was kind enough to answer; that is, the civil staff, and my argument was based on this very first item, as I recall it, as compared with the 1956 public accounts.

Now, using the same figure for the past several years I find that the same thing holds true, namely that about one-sixth of these expenditures was never used; that is, expenditures that we had provided for. In this particular instance, if the minister can assure me that we are going to come very close to spending the $3,745,000 of the estimate I would be prepared to agree and say, well, that is just fine; but it is only an estimation of the dollars that are required to carry on administration. I find it difficult to reconcile my thought with economy in the operations of the department.

In this instance, I take the civil staff alone and I work it out on the basis of $2,952,000, as indicated on page 314. On that basis we would have another saving of about half a million dollars if the department were not to employ all of the civil staff which they indicate they are going to employ. I might say that by using the white sheets and the figures submitted therein I find we would have a grand total saving of $28 million in this department alone. I find that just the same percentage of expenditure is carried throughout. For that reason, the minister should certainly take another look at this particular item and give me a more conclusive answer in order to satisfy me.

Mr. Pearkes: As I indicated, in this item we expect to save, from the present indications, $380,000. There may be further savings, but I can assure the hon. member that we will not be employing any personnel for whom there is not the necessary work. If you ask why there happens to be these savings, of course, I must refer to the fact that there was a general election last summer. Because of that, some of those appointments could not be filled at the time. There were certain professional and special services which could not be proceeded with because there was no government, there was no authority to perform these services. I hope that by watching this very carefully we shall be able to save some more money before the end of the year. But it is necessary to employ the majority of these people. Remember a great many of them are permanent civil servants. Therefore, you cannot just turn them out on the streets in the middle of winter, and we have no intention of doing that.

Mr. Hahn: Mr. Chairman, I listened very closely to what the minister had to say and he has not answered my argument at all. In fact, we are farther apart on this than we were before. In 1955 there was no general election and in 1956 we appropriated the sum of $3,494,080, as indicated on page N-4 of the public accounts for that year.

The actual expenditure was $2,963,000. That was just for administration. The fact is that the saving apparently arose because we did not have as many on the civil staff as had been appropriated for. The same thing held true the year before and the year before that and I do not think elections had anything to do with it. It does not seem to have anything to do with it in view of the comparative figures as I go through the public accounts from one department to another. I must say I have been doing some homework. For that reason I say that with respect to administration the department could apparently save $28 million in civil staff wages alone.

I do know the minister indicated that there was going to be a reduction of $380,000 and I think he broke it down into postage, $20,000, and so on, but he did not indicate anything with respect to the civil staff and there must be some considerable saving there. I have a great deal of faith in the minister. I have known him for a number of years and I am satisfied he will look into the matter before another year but it is a matter of great concern. I am satisfied in my own mind, and it has not been proven otherwise up to now, that we are overestimating the dollars we require for the civil staff. It is not that we are going to have any more unemployed because I am not suggesting we should get rid of anybody. It is just that we are appropriating funds for civil staff and then never filling all the positions.

Mr. Pearkes: All I can say to that is that there is a constant review of the requirements going on. That practice has been in effect for years and it is still being continued. I hope that when the next estimates, which will be prepared by the present government, are presented next year they will show that the same practice is continuing.

Mr. Carter: There is one matter I should like to bring to the attention of the minister and it would seem that this would be the appropriate item on which to raise it. It has to do with the Canadian volunteer service medal. Many Newfoundland veterans have applied for this medal and have not been successful. They have based their application on legislation which provides that active service by a person in any of the naval or army forces of Newfoundland or by a person who was recruited in Newfoundland for any naval, army or air forces raised in Newfoundland by or on behalf of the United Kingdom shall be deemed to be active service in the Canadian forces. It is the provision that servicemen recruited in the Newfoundland forces would be deemed to be on active service in the Canadian forces on which these men have based their application for the Canadian war service medal.

I do not know if the minister is familiar with the problem but if he is not I would be grateful if he would look into it and see if something cannot be done about awarding the medal to these Newfoundland veterans as many of them had four or five years overseas service.

Mr. Pearkes: I will be very pleased to look into the matter.

Mr. Henderson: On page 315 I notice that the vote for 1956-57 was $3,595,000. Was that amount all spent?

Mr. Benidickson: That was my question before.

Mr. Pearkes: That information I now have. The estimate was $3,595,000 and of that amount $3,063,830 was actually spent.

Mr. Benidickson: In other words, the minister, well on into the present year, is able to tell the committee that he thinks that in 1957-58 he will likely spend less than the $3,745,000 asked for to the extent of $380,000. Last year under similar circumstances the committee was asked for $3,595,000 and at the end of the year the department had not used the full amount. In fact, they were under it by considerably more than the $380,000 on which the minister has placed so much emphasis in the committee.

Mr. Pearkes: The hon. member will no doubt recall that all wages of civil servants were increased just before the last government retired.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): Can the minister tell us the total number of civilians employed by the Department of National Defence? I have thumbed through the various pages and I have great difficulty in adding the figures. Has a compilation been made of the number?

Mr. Pearkes: The total strength as of October 31, 1957, was 51,941.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, I want to be deferential to the minister because he was always very courteous when he was on this side and we were discussing these matters. On the other hand, I know that some modest increases have been provided in departmental salaries, but am I right in thinking that on a comparable basis $532,000, although asked for in 1956-57, was not used by the department and that this is comparable to the $380,000 which the minister claims is in the nature of a saving and which he referred to, I believe, as being by reason of the election?

Mr. Pearkes: I did not refer to it as being by reason of the election. What I meant was that some of these appointments could not be filled during the changeover period between the two governments, but the reason why there is not a larger saving is the increases to all civil servants. This is the estimate at this time. Perhaps it may go a little higher. We cannot tell. I do not suppose that in a similar period last year any more definite information could have been given.

Mr. Benidickson: In other words, the minister wants the whole amount put in the estimates by the previous administration. He is simply telling the committee that he rather expects the windfall to the treasury at the end of the year will be $380,000 which will not be spent although in the previous year the similar windfall going back to the treasury unspent under similar items was $532,000.

Mr. Pearkes: There was not the same increase in civilian salaries as has been made this time. As I say, my estimate at this time is that there will be a saving of the amount I have mentioned.

Mr. Benidickson: There is a cushion in the amount you are asking, in what we may vote, which you estimate will be $380,000.

Mr. Pearkes: We are absorbing the increase in the salaries. In spite of that, may I say that after a review which was made a year ago on which these estimates were based, on the saving that had been made by not being expended, we still are hoping to be able to save $380,000.

Mr. Benidickson: Not save $380,000.

Mr. Pearkes: Not spend $380,000.

Mr. Benidickson: You are spending less than you are asking us to vote at the present time by $380,000 but in the previous year the committee voted $3,595,000. Under this item the department actually spent $532,000 less than the committee voted under similar circumstances.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Shall this heading carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Fisher: In the departmental administration—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Order. May I ask the hon. member whether he wants to speak on inspection services or departmental administration.

Mr. Fisher: Departmental administration. On page 314 you have some librarians listed. Where is the librarian grade 5 employed?

Mr. Pearkes: At the national defence library in Ottawa.

Mr. Fisher: Where is the listing for the librarian in the Royal Military College in this particular estimate?

Mr. Pearkes: You will find that under the army estimates.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Shall this heading carry?

Some hon. Members: Carried.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Shall I proceed to the next item?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): The next heading is inspection services.

Mr. Henderson: We have about five minutes to go. I wonder whether at this stage the minister could give us the same information ahead that he gave on the above item so that we might have it overnight and it might be reported in Hansard. Then probably we could go a little bit faster tomorrow in reviewing these items.

Mr. Pearkes: Yes. Under this item of inspection services there is a total of $1,431,267 which it is not expected to spend. We have reduced the amount of inspection services which have been carried out because it appeared that in some cases the inspectors were doing similar work to that being carried out by service officers; and with the general reduction in the construction work which is being carried out there has not been the need for as many inspectors.

Mr. Benidickson: The saving was what?

Mr. Pearkes: $1,431,267.

Mr. Benidickson: Actually we would want to know similarly what was the underspending in relation to the vote of parliament on this item for the year 1956-57.

Mr. Pearkes: It so happens that the savings are shown by the various sub-items and the expenditures of last year are shown under the various sub-items. It would be necessary to go through the book and add those items up before I could give you the total savings.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes. My hon. friend will give that information to the committee later in relation to this item which he quotes of $1,431,267?

Mr. Pearkes: I shall be pleased to do so.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): This question may have been answered previously. If so, I trust the minister will pardon me for repeating it. I gather that the saving to which he has just referred in connection with this item and the saving to which he referred in connection with the previous heading and the others that will come along are the figures that add up to the $41 million to which he referred in his general remarks?

Mr. Pearkes: They will add up approximately to that $41 million.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): My question is this. Is the minister asking for the total amount of vote No. 240 to be reduced by $41 million?

Mr. Pearkes: No; because we have had to absorb the increases in pay to the regular forces, the reserve forces and the additional cost of the mid-Canada line to which I referred in my remarks this morning. We are therefore asking for the full total, although I have hopes that by the end of the year we will not have spent the full amount which is being asked for.

Mr. Benidickson: I think the minister, when he talks in terms of changes and when he uses his own words since the election, will see why we should like to see something specific about these matters. I wonder whether it would not commend itself to him if overnight he would ask his officials to prepare for us some breakdown of the $41 million so that this breakdown would be available to the committee tomorrow, particularly as it relates to this item 240, or is that the number of it?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Item 240 is the big item.

Mr. Benidickson: As it relates to the big item 240. We have just gone through a section in which we have found that underspending in relation to the voting of parliament on the departmental administration item of $380,000 was actually considerably less than the underspending a year ago in relation to the same item. I wonder whether that work could not be done by the minister in order to save this rather tedious procedure in committee as we are examining the details.

Mr. Pearkes: This morning I gave the general reduction, as the hon. member recalls. I pointed out what were the increases in military pay and allowances. Then I went on to explain where the reductions were made. I said that no supplementary estimate would be asked to cover these expenditures. Then I went on to use these words:

> As a result of this review, a number of decisions have been taken which will reduce expenditures. Savings are being made in the operating costs of all three services. A decision has been taken to discontinue the bureau of current affairs.

There will be a definite saving there. I reduced the amount of advertising by one-third. My recollection is that the advertising is shown as somewhere about $2 million, so one-third of that will be shown. I have curtailed travelling expenses in all the services; that is the movement of personnel, the changes in station, visiting and that sort of thing. Then I went on to the question of construction of buildings and showed where there would be savings there and so forth. I gave the main item.

Mr. Benidickson: Quite so. I can understand that and I will read it. But on the other hand I think the minister will follow the progress of the committee and realize that now we are referring to the details of services and inasmuch as we have just completed a discussion under the heading of "Departmental Administration" and have some understanding of that, and as he has now gone only half-way to providing information on the second item in this new section under which he said he anticipates spending less than is mentioned on the estimates by $1,431,000, and inasmuch as we want to relate that figure to the previous year when the total asked for was $10,105,000 and ask how much was underspent that year, what I was saying was simply this: Could the minister and his staff overnight not carry out that procedure under all these categories before the committee sits again?

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Pearkes: We shall have a look at it and see whether we can produce the figures for the hon. member.

Progress reported.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

Mr. John Pallett (Peel): Mr. Speaker, may I have the leave of the house to revert to presenting reports of standing and select committees?

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member the leave of the house so to do?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BANKING AND COMMERCE

Third report of standing committee on banking and commerce.—Mr. Pallett.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask what is the business of the house for tomorrow?

Mr. Green: Tomorrow we intend to commence with the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, to consider them during the morning and afternoon and then in the evening we shall take up the estimates of the Department of Finance.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask if it is the intention of the Minister of Finance to give a financial statement at eight o'clock?

Mr. Green: Well I am afraid the hon. member will have to refer back to the statement already made on that point by the Minister of Finance himself.

Mr. Chevrier: Then, Mr. Speaker, may I just ask for further information. It is customary in the house to deliver a budget address at eight o'clock and we have been told there will be no budget, so I take it that since the Minister of Finance is beginning his estimates at eight o'clock he will be making some sort of statement to which I take it we are entitled. Does it follow from that that this will be the statement that will have to do with taxes and tax reductions?

Mr. Green: I think the hon. member may take it that the Minister of Finance will be making such a statement.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask what will be the business for Saturday?

Mr. Green: We shall probably continue with the estimates of the Department of Finance and, if not, with those of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Marler: Mr. Speaker, I wonder if the leader of the house realizes that a somewhat anomalous position seems to be developing. If the Minister of Finance is intending to make what might be described as a budget speech in presenting the first item of his estimates tomorrow, surely that is running directly counter to all of the traditions of this house with regard to budgetary discussion and also the usual adjournment—

Mr. Monteith: Better than by radio.

Mr. Marler: —in order to discuss the subject of the budget and in order for the figures to be presented by the minister for consideration.

Mr. Green: Well, the same point has been raised before on several occasions and has been quite thoroughly debated in the house. I can make no further statement on it this evening.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): May I ask a question of the minister. Do we understand that these tax changes that the minister will be announcing tomorrow night will be announced in the committee of supply rather than in the house with Mr. Speaker in the chair?

Mr. Green: I said, Mr. Speaker, that I thought the Minister of Finance would be making a statement when he opened his estimates. Further than that I cannot go.

It being seven minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

C.M.H. FORECLOSURES, SASK.

Question No. 192—Mr. Ellis:

1. How many foreclosure actions have been instituted by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation within the province of Saskatchewan up to November 1, 1957?
2. What was the amount in arrears in each case when foreclosure action was commenced by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation?

Answer by: Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works):

(1) Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has instituted six actions to terminate agreements for sale in the province of Saskatchewan up to November 1, 1957. No foreclosure actions have been instituted on mortgages in the province of Saskatchewan up to November 1, 1957.

(2) The arrears in each case where action was instituted to terminate the agreement for sale amounted to:

Date action instituted	Total
June, 1955	$388.00
June, 1955	393.64
August, 1956	256.00
February, 1957	280.00
April, 1956	228.80
May, 1956	199.00

The arrears represented from five to eleven monthly payments. All agreements were reinstated upon payment of the arrears with the exception of one case which is still pending.

WINTER NAVIGATION STUDIES, LAKEHEAD

Question No. 213—Mr. Fisher:

1. Have any preliminary studies been made of the problems in keeping the Canadian lakehead harbours open through the winter?
2. If so, could such studies be summarized to indicate the feasibility of the matter?
3. To the government's knowledge, have American authorities made any studies or plans with regard to the possibility of keeping the American Soo locks open in the winter?

Answer by: Mr. MacDonald, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Transport:

1. The department has continually under review the question of improved methods of dealing with winter navigation in Canada. Programs involved range from development of icebreaking capabilities to studies of various technical experiments. All of these are of general applicability rather than related to any one port. In the case of the lakehead, the next most useful step will be the experience gained when the department's new great lakes vessel, which is being built to ice-breaker standards, comes into service and is available at the lakehead for use, in about 12 to 18 months' time.

2. Answered by No. 1 above.

3. It is understood that the United States authorities have performed a number of experiments regarding the keeping of the locks open under winter conditions, but the department is not aware of any definite decisions or plans by the United States authorities to keep the United States locks open for any specific winter period.

DREDGING WORK, LOWER FRASER RIVER

Question No. 244—Mr. Hahn:

1. Was certain dredging work carried out on the lower Fraser river between Tree island and the mainland (north side) or Lulu island during the past summer? If so, who authorized the work?
2. Was there a time limit on the project? If so, what date was the work to commence and terminate?
3. What was the purpose of the project?
4. Has the work been completed according to plan? If not, what is its present position?
5. Where were the dredging spoils from this project deposited, and by whose direction?
6. Has such fill material any monetary value in this area? If so, how much was received from its sale?
7. Was any crown land, either provincial or federal, requiring fill within a convenient deposit distance of this project?
8. Was any payment offered on a quantity basis for dredging spoils deposited on private land within dumping distance of this project at any time since February 1, 1957? If so, who made the offer and on what terms?

Answer by: Mr. Hodgson, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Public Works:

1. Dredging was carried out on the lower Fraser river between Tree island and the north side of Lulu island. This work was carried out by plant owned by the Department of Public Works who authorized the work.

2. This project was part of the schedule of work to be done by dredge P.W.D. No. 322 during the 1957 dredging season and no fixed dates were established for commencement or completion.

3. The purposes of this project are to block the upper end of the channel between Tree and Lulu islands and thus reduce dredging in the main channel above the block; to dredge out and improve the channel between Tree and Lulu islands below the block for all the holders of riparian rights adjacent to it.

4. Work has been virtually completed according to plan.

5. The spoil from this project was deposited in the provincial crown land located in the channel between the end of Tree island and Lulu island. Some surplus spoil was deposited on private land located adjacent to this spoil area.

6. The spoil has no monetary value in so far as the federal government is concerned and the spoil was not sold.

7. Provincial crown land requiring fill located in the channel between Tree island and Lulu island was used as a spoil area. Some surplus spoil was placed on private land adjacent to this crown land.

8. No payment was offered on a quantity basis for dredging spoils deposited on private land within a distance that could be serviced by equipment owned by the Department of Public Works.

HOUSING

BRITISH COLUMBIA—ANNOUNCEMENT OF JOINT FEDERAL-PROVINCIAL PROJECTS UNDER N.H.A.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I wish to announce that the federal government and the province of British Columbia have agreed to undertake jointly a low rental housing project in Vancouver, and a project for the development and servicing of residential land in Duncan, British Columbia, under the provisions of section 36 of the National Housing Act.

The housing project in Vancouver is being undertaken at the request of the city. It will consist of approximately 170 low rental units of various types, about 36 of which will be made available to senior citizens. This development is the second federal-provincial low rental housing project in the city. It is anticipated that it will cost about $1½ million. The project will be made available to families with low incomes. The rental should average about $44 or $45 a month. The cost of the project, as well as any operating losses, will be shared 75 per cent by the federal government and 25 per cent by the province, or by the province and the municipality if those two governmental bodies so wish.

This project will serve not only a very useful social need, but will provide as well additional employment opportunities to the construction industry in Vancouver. In the early days of the project it is likely that approximately 350 men will be employed on the site, and employment for a similar number will be provided in mills and plants off the site which manufacture housing equipment.

The project at Duncan, British Columbia, will also be undertaken by the federal-provincial partnership under section 36 of the National Housing Act, and will result in the development of an estimated 162 fully serviced residential lots for sale to prospective home owners. This project is designed to meet a growing shortage of serviced building lots in Duncan. It is estimated to cost approximately a quarter million dollars. As is usual in this type of project, the federal government will bear 75 per cent of the cost, with the remainder being borne by the province of British Columbia. When the services are installed these lots will be offered for sale at prices commensurate with the cost of development.

I wish to announce as well that the federal government has authorized the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to make a grant of approximately $7,400 to the city of Trail, British Columbia, to assist it in carrying out an urban renewal study. This grant is being made under part V of the National Housing Act, 1954. It is hoped that the study will assist the city in identifying areas of blight and in developing an orderly program of redevelopment, rehabilitation and conservation.

Hon. George C. Marler (St. Antoine-Westmount): Might I ask the minister whether other projects of like character in other provinces of Canada are now under consideration?

Mr. Green: Yes. The hon. member will be interested to know that ten days or two weeks ago we wrote to the city of Montreal concerning the Dozois scheme. I received a letter back from them just a few days ago. We are prepared to do our part to get ahead with that scheme as quickly as possible.

Hon. James Sinclair (Coast-Capilano): I am sure the people of British Columbia will welcome this announcement. I wonder whether the minister can tell us in what area of Vancouver this new development is to be located?

Mr. Green: It is on Nanaimo street—

Mr. Winch: And Forty-first.

Mr. Green: I forget the avenue.

Mr. Sinclair: It is in the east end.

Mr. Green: Nanaimo street and Forty-first avenue.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): A supplementary question, Mr. Speaker. Must a city first ask for this housing project before the government takes action and, if so, has Fort William asked for anything?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, the cities make the request initially. We could not very well move into a city and start this sort of development without the approval of the city. I am sure the hon. member would not want us to raid Fort William in that way. So far as I know there has not been any such proposal from the city of Fort William, at least in recent weeks.

Mr. McIvor: Thank you; there will be.

N.H.A.—PREVENTION OF FORECLOSURE ON HOMES OF UNEMPLOYED VETERANS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. B. Macdonald (Vancouver-Kingsway): I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works a question. Will the Minister of Public Works assure the house that foreclosure proceedings will not be taken on mortgages or agreements held by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation in veterans' projects such as Renfrew Heights in Vancouver, where purchasers are unable to keep up monthly payments owing to unemployment?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): I shall be glad to look into this situation.

FINANCE

INQUIRY AS TO FORTHCOMING ANNOUNCEMENT BY MINISTER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Will the minister give the house an undertaking that any tax changes which he may announce tonight will be presented as motions in the committee of ways and means, with opportunity provided for those motions to be discussed and that the decision on any such motions will be taken at this session of parliament?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I think before my hon. friend attempts to indicate what procedure should be followed it would be well to wait and see what is proposed.

Now, as to the procedure, I can assure hon. members that whatever procedure is followed will certainly provide ample opportunity for discussion. As to the third point the hon. member raised, I can assure him that any statement I make tonight is made in the hope of action on the part of the house at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. In view of the repeated assurances given by the Minister of Finance that if he had any budgetary proposals to make the usual kind of notice would be given to the house in advance, does he regard his failure to give notice of his intentions for this evening as an implementation of those assurances?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I have not made the statements attributed to me by the hon. gentleman, so I think his question in the second part requires no answer on my part. My statements are a matter of record—

Mr. Sinclair: They sure are.

Mr. Fleming: —and the hon. member may rest assured that whatever has been said will be fully implemented.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I would refer the minister to Hansard of November 13, at page 1066. That is a date as well as a page number that might be noted. The Minister of Finance said this in reply to a question of mine concerning budgetary proposals—not a budget, budgetary proposals. He said:

> Mr. Speaker, whatever is put before the house in that regard on behalf of the government will be done in due course and the house, in accordance with the usual practice of ministers of finance as I have observed it in the past 12 years, will be notified in due course.

My question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, is that the practice of the past 12 years has been for the minister of finance to announce a few days or several days in advance of the time that any budgetary proposals would be placed before the house. In this case no such announcement was given. We know what is going to happen tonight only because we pulled it out of the house leader last night.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member is not correct in trying to anticipate what will be done. I think the proper course for the house is to await the event before criticizing what is to be done, when the house has not been fully informed.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, on the question of privilege, I think in fairness to the facts two things should be said. My friend has referred to the practice. Evidently the practice appears to different members of the house in a somewhat different light. I can assure my hon. friend there is one practice there will be no intention of following, and that is the introduction of financial proposals by radio.

On the second matter, I can repeat my assurance that there will be ample opportunity afforded for discussion of whatever may be put forward before the house tonight. I have been asked more than once what would be the proposals of the government of a financial nature. I indicated then that I would be prepared to make a statement on that subject for the information of hon. members when the estimates of the Department of Finance were called. They are being called tonight.

It is quite incorrect and I think utterly unworthy to say that this statement was wrung out of the leader of the house last night. That is quite untrue. The fact is that intimation was given several days ago that the estimates of the Department of Finance would be before the house this week.

Mr. Sinclair: How many days ago?

Mr. Fleming: That was given several days ago. My hon. friend has only to add two and two together and arrive at four to realize on that information that the financial proposals of the government, whatever they might be, would be laid before the house.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I rise on another question of privilege. The Minister of Finance has said that something I said was unworthy of me, when he referred to my statement that we had to pull this out of the Minister of Public Works last night. Hansard for yesterday, at page 1948, records the Minister of Public Works as saying:

> . . . and then in the evening we shall take up the estimates of the Department of Finance.

That was all he told us until the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) began to question him, and it was as a result of that questioning that we learned there would be a statement tonight having to do with tax reductions. I submit that my statement was perfectly correct and in accordance with the record. The Minister of Finance has not kept his assurance that he would make an announcement on this matter.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): I do not know why I should be dragged into this duel. It certainly was thoroughly well understood by everyone, including the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, who I am sure gets all the privileges that anyone gets in this house. It was thoroughly understood that the Minister of Finance was going to make a statement on the financial situation when his estimates were called; and for the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre to rise in his place and say that he had to drag something out of me last night is just ridiculous.

Mr. Chevrier: I think I had to do it.

Mr. Speaker: Perhaps this discussion is ended. I hope I will not have to say what I intended to say. If any other hon. member wishes to pursue the matter I have something to say on the subject.

[Later:]

Hon. James Sinclair (Coast-Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance in the hope that he may be able to clear up the confusion with regard to today's business which is occasioned mainly by the statement he made yesterday as reported at page 1896 of Hansard, half way down the page, in referring to the order of business:

> —matters pertaining to the financial policies of the government will be open for consideration when the estimates of the Department of Finance are submitted to the committee of supply.

That was the statement made by the minister. Then we find this:

> Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): That is tomorrow?
> Mr. Fleming: No, that is not tomorrow.

In view of that categorical statement, how is it that tonight he expects to produce the estimates of the Department of Finance?

Mr. Speaker: Order. This matter has been discussed at some length already this morning by way of what seemed to be points of order and questions of privilege relating to something that is to happen tonight. It seems to me that the house, in trying to deal with this matter, or in raising points of privilege and order, is anticipating something that is to happen later and it does not seem to me to be in order to do this. Statements have been made as to the business tonight, and I think hon. members should await the event.

Mr. Sinclair: I may not have made my point quite clear to you, Mr. Speaker. Yesterday the Minister of Finance said we would not be discussing the estimates of the Department of Finance today. That was the point raised by other hon. members as to the lack of notice, the lack of preparation. I think the very least he could have done was to rise on a question of privilege at the opening of the sitting and say he was wrong yesterday when he said that we would not be discussing finance today.

Mr. Fleming: I shall be only too happy to relieve the mind of my hon. friend, and relieve any suspense on this question that may be in the minds of hon. members or even in my own mind.

Mr. Marler: That will take some explaining.

Mr. Fleming: It was indicated earlier in the week—if I remember correctly, I think on Tuesday—that the estimates of the Department of Finance were expected to be brought before the house sitting in committee of supply before the end of the present week. On Wednesday night the indication was given to the house by the leader of the house that on Thursday the estimates of the Department of Finance would be brought before the house.

An hon. Member: Department of defence.

Mr. Fleming: Department of National Defence, I should say. It was not altogether clear at that time as to what on the two following days of the week, namely Friday and Saturday, would be the order of business. He expressly reserved any specific statements about the order beyond that time.

Mr. Benidickson: Read what he said on Tuesday.

Mr. Fleming: I am speaking from recollection. My hon. friend will recall what I said, when the statement was made yesterday morning by myself, that I did not expect that the estimates of the Department of Finance would be on today—

Mr. Sinclair: You did not use the word "expect".

Mr. Fleming: —I fully expected that the estimates of the Department of Finance would be called tomorrow morning. It so happens as to the estimates of the Department of National Defence that the progress that was expected was not made with them. Consequently it was thought wise last night that there should be a variation in the plans for the business of the house for the balance of the week to this extent, that instead of waiting until Saturday morning for the estimates of the Department of Finance, they would be taken up on Friday evening. That is the extent of the change. As to the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, they are waiting to be called today.

The leader of the house cannot estimate precisely how long the house is going to occupy in committee of supply on the estimates of any one department, and he is doing his very best to give the fullest information to the house on these matters. In view of the fact that requests have been made in relation to the estimates of the Department of Finance, I would have thought that the advance in the introduction of those estimates from Saturday morning at eleven o'clock to Friday night at eight o'clock is not a very serious matter and might have been welcomed by my hon. friends in the light of some of the things they have been saying earlier in the session.

Mr. Sinclair: I am sure they would have been welcomed if it had been any other department than finance and when instead of item 1 of the estimates we are going to have budget proposals. Normally the opposition have had three or four days' notice of budget proposals.

Mr. Speaker: I think the house is now fully informed of what is going to take place tonight.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance a question. Since he is going to discuss probable tax and budgetary matters tonight, is he going to place before the house, so that we may have it in our possession, a white paper which is the usual procedure before making tax changes?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I dealt with that subject some days ago and I made it quite clear at that time—

Mr. Coldwell: You have dealt with so many things in so many different ways.

Mr. Fleming: —that there was no intention at this session of tabling a white paper. I invite my hon. friend to read back in Hansard.

[Later:]

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance a question. I wonder if in view of the point my colleague has just raised about the statement by the minister and the apparent confusion that exists, will the minister not give consideration to putting over his statement on finance until tomorrow so as to give us an opportunity of considering the position that will be brought about by his statement? There are a number of hon. members here who are anxious to speak, and it does not give them very much time in view of the statement that was made by the house leader. I also understand that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is most anxious to get ahead with his estimates because he must return to the United Kingdom. I wonder if in view of all these circumstances the minister would not give consideration to putting over consideration of his estimates until tomorrow?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I am always glad to oblige my hon. friend and other hon. gentlemen opposite, but may I recall to him that there have been repeated requests for a statement on the part of the Minister of Finance about the financial position, and in some cases they have been accompanied by quite unfounded assertions that there has been delay in making such a statement. Effort has been made to advance this statement for the convenience and information of hon. members.

In the second place, my hon. friend spoke about the desire of hon. members to discuss this subject. I can assure him that there will be ample opportunity afforded for that purpose. There will be just as much opportunity afforded for that purpose if we proceed this evening at eight o'clock as there would be if we were to proceed tomorrow morning at eleven o'clock.

Mr. Chevrier: My only purpose in asking the question was that last night I gave some indication that it was the custom of the house to give notice of these proposals, and I wondered whether in view of that practice and tradition the minister would not accede to my request.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I think there has been frequent and abundant notice given to the house already—

Mr. Pearson: That it would not be done.

Mr. Fleming: —both as to the time and as to the nature of the statement I have been asked to make on the introduction of my estimates.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Finance. Is it not usual when budgetary changes are made that all parties in the opposition are given an opportunity for some hours at least to consider what those changes may involve so that we may adequately prepare to discuss them? Is this not the case, and is it not a reasonable request that the discussion be put off for at least some hours? In fact, I was going to suggest that it be put off for a day or so, which is usual.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I do not think the practice has been at all what my hon. friend has suggested. I take it that it is the duty of all hon. members of the house to prepare themselves in advance for all questions that may arise in the course of a session. There has been a great deal said, not least of all by my hon. friend and those who sit with him, concerning the financial position and asking for a financial statement on the part of the government. I am simply complying with the requests that have been made by the hon. gentleman and others. I have said, I do not know how many times already, that there would be ample opportunity afforded for discussion.

Mr. Coldwell: May I ask the minister a further question. Is it not a fact that the financial spokesman for the official opposition has invariably asked that the debate on budgetary changes—and we understand something of that kind is going to occur tonight—should be postponed for some hours, in fact usually for two or three days, although I am not asking for that? The minister seems to have a queer way of twisting what individuals in this house have said.

Some hon. Members: Order.

[Later:]

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I should like to address a question to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, with the permission of my hon. friend I would like to revert to the question asked by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar. I think he might have forgone the concluding remark he made this morning.

Mr. Coldwell: Not after the irritation I have suffered this morning.

Mr. Fleming: I do not think the hon. member has suffered anything this morning. He has received answers to his questions. If I understand that instead of asking for advance information he is asking for an adjournment tonight I can assure him that we will be only too happy to accommodate the wishes of hon. members in that respect. It is not the practice of the government to give advance information to the opposition concerning financial proposals. My hon. friend is aware that the practice is simply, if the Minister of Finance is using a text, to hand a copy of that text to the financial critic of the official opposition and I believe to the leaders of the other two parties in opposition during the course of the remarks of the Minister of Finance.

Now, it has been the practice in that event, if whoever happens to follow the Minister of Finance on the part of the official opposition wishes not to conclude his remarks on the same occasion, to make part of his remarks and continue on a later occasion, and adjourn the debate for that purpose. Certainly if it is the wish to follow that course there will be no objection from this part of the house. I said there will be the most ample opportunity afforded for discussion, and if that is what the hon. gentleman is asking I can say there will be no objection on this side of the house to adjourning the discussion tonight, if that is the wish of hon. members.

Mr. Sinclair: I might ask a similar question. In previous budgets it has been the practice to accommodate the press. The gentlemen of the press have been locked up for three hours in advance of the budget proposals, with a copy of those proposals, so they could prepare accurate stories for the benefit of the Canadian people. Has such accommodation been afforded this year to the working members of the press gallery?

Mr. Fleming: My hon. friend keeps talking about a budget. I thought it was made clear to him and to other hon. members on Monday by the Prime Minister that it is not the intention of the government to submit a budget.

Mr. Green: With regard to the business, I think hon. members opposite may not have understood the implications of the finance minister's remarks. If it is the wish that we stop considering the estimates of the Department of Finance after the minister has made his statement, or after someone in the official opposition has commenced a reply, we would be very glad to do that and for the remainder of the evening deal with the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce. If, again, hon. members opposite do not wish to go on with the finance estimates tomorrow, then we will place other estimates before the house.

Mr. Chevrier: That was not my request nor my question. My request was that the consideration of the estimates be put off until tomorrow.

Mr. Green: We cannot agree to that, Mr. Speaker, but we would be willing to accommodate the opposition parties in the other way I have just mentioned.

Mr. Coldwell: May I say to the Minister of Public Works that what he has just said is very fair.

Mr. Low: Mr. Speaker, I would like to indicate to the house leader that the arrangement just suggested would be agreeable to us. I think it would be a very suitable arrangement.

Mr. Sinclair: Perhaps in my capacity as financial critic of the opposition I might point out that it is going to be very difficult to decide right now whether we adjourn or not, because we have not the slightest idea what the hon. member is going to say tonight.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: Who has?

Mr. Churchill: Do you want to write his speech for him?

Mr. Speaker: Order. We are discussing the arrangement of the business of the house. I think it might be limited to the house leader and the spokesmen for the other parties.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Mr. Chevrier: The minister without portfolio is going to settle the problem.

Mr. Sinclair: There is always plenty of warning.

Mr. Green: I see no reason why that decision cannot be made this evening. We could then switch to other estimates, if it is the wish of the members in the other parties.

Hon. J. M. Macdonnell (Minister without Portfolio): As I have been referred to, I should like to say a word. It was my privilege for several years to follow the Minister of Finance when the budget was delivered; but I received a copy of the budget speech only after the minister had begun to speak.

Mr. Chevrier: You had several days' notice, and you put us to sleep besides that.

Mr. Brooks: The hon. member has not wakened up yet.

Mr. Chevrier: And he has not wakened up yet. The Minister of Veterans Affairs stated a truism.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If as a result of what the minister says tonight we find ourselves confronted with actual resolutions that obviously would have to be dealt with in committee of ways and means, would it not be better to go into committee of ways and means so we can have the matter debated properly?

Mr. Green: Now I think the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre is just fishing.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Will the Minister of Finance follow the usual custom of wearing new shoes when he discloses his budgetary changes tonight, or will it be sufficient on this occasion to get a shine only?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I expect to wear the same shoes that I am wearing now. If I can borrow a dime from my hon. friend perhaps I might even get them polished for tonight.

Mr. Hayden Stanton (Leeds): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Does he not think the members on the opposition side of the house are desperately afraid that there will be something good for the people of Canada announced tonight?

BANK OF CANADA—REPORTED ADJUSTMENT OF LOAN DISCOUNT RATE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. J. Robichaud (Gloucester): Mr. Speaker, may I direct two questions to the Minister of Finance. My first question is, can the minister advise the house whether a new policy has been enunciated or adopted by the government in the last two weeks which has had the effect of having the Bank of Canada adjust its loan discount rate, which now stands at 3.92 per cent compared with 3.83 per cent during the past week, as reported in this morning's issue of the Montreal Gazette under the title, "Money Rate Goes Higher Again"? My second question is:—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. member confine himself to one question at a time.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I should think questions of this nature could more properly be asked of the Minister of Finance when the estimates of his department are before the house in committee of supply.

I thought the hon. member was aware that the Bank of Canada rate is established in the light of the current rate from week to week on Dominion of Canada treasury bills sold. The Bank of Canada rate is arrived at by adding one quarter of one per cent to the weekly rate on treasury bills. It happens that after a series of very rapid and almost startling reductions in the rate in recent weeks there was a slight reaction in the past two weeks, fractional in its nature. That was not altogether unexpected, in view of the very rapid reduction of the rate in the preceding weeks.

Mr. Robichaud: In view of the minister's reply I will amend my second question. Does the minister recall that, as recorded on page 597 of Hansard, when asked a similar question by the hon. member for Nanaimo relating to what specific steps the government intended to take to lower the interest rate he replied that that part of the question obviously related to a matter of government policy?

Mr. Fleming: I do not recall the statement. I will have a look at it. It does not seem to jibe at all with what I have been saying and the answers I have been giving to the question. The fact is that under a decision taken by the Bank of Canada well over a year ago the Bank of Canada rate follows automatically from week to week the rate on treasury bills.

Hon. James Sinclair (Coast-Capilano): I should like to ask a supplementary question. Does the minister recall that earlier this session, whenever the treasury rate fell, he stood up and proudly said that this was because he was successful in combating inflation? Would he now like to comment on the fact that the rate is rising, and apparently he is unsuccessful in his battle against inflation?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, if the hon. gentleman would only be accurate in his premises there might be some ghost of a hope of his being accurate in his conclusions. He starts out with the wrong premise again. As I pointed out—I had hoped that it might have brought satisfaction to members of the house but apparently it has not brought any satisfaction to the hon. member for Coast-Capilano—interest rates had been dropping and the drop in those interest rates in recent weeks had become very material. I observe the glee with which he greets an increase in the rate being paid in the last nine days on Dominion of Canada treasury bills, and with it the automatic results in the Bank of Canada rate. I may say whatever the government has been able to do has been exerted in the direction of seeking a reduction in interest rates, because the interest rates we found when we came into office five and a half months ago were the highest in a generation, and we think at that height they were detrimental to business in this country.

Mr. Sinclair: Amen.

Mr. Marler: Is it the minister's intention only to take credit for reductions?

Mr. Fleming: It will be the minister's intention in all fairness, I hope, to take credit where credit is due, and where we have had to assume as of June 21 the very doubtful legacy left to us by the former administration—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Fleming: —I hope to place the responsibility in that regard where it belongs.

Mr. Marler: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Harkness: You people even used to take credit for the weather when it was good.

Mr. Marler: —would the hon. member not like to have the situation back as at June 21?

An hon. Member: No, thanks.

Mr. Fleming: I could not wish—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I take it there is no question before the house that requires an answer. It seems to me this exchange is becoming more of a debate than a search for information.

[Later:]

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I was asked two questions a few moments ago by the hon. member for Gloucester. The second question which was directed to me struck me, as I said, as a little odd. I did not think his statement of the facts, as I recalled them, rang true. I have now had an opportunity of looking up page 597 in Hansard, upon which the question and the accompanying statement were based, and I see that on that date, which was October 31, 1957, I was asked a two-part question by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Cameron). The first part of the question, which was addressed to me, was as follows:

> To what actions of the previous government does he attribute the rise in interest rates, and what specific steps does his government propose to take to lower the level of the interest rates?

You, Mr. Speaker, intervened to point out that the first part of the question was out of order because the present government could not be expected to answer questions as to something done by the former government; and with respect to the second part of the question you in your ruling said it might, if the minister wished to answer it, involve a matter of policy. My answer was that the second part of the question obviously related to a matter of government policy, and I now draw attention to the fact that the second part of the question was:

> What specific steps does his government propose to take to lower the level of the interest rates?

Obviously any steps that might be taken would be a matter of government policy, but that is not the way the hon. member put his question this morning.

Mr. Marler: Is government policy a secret?

Mr. Robichaud: My question was addressed to the minister to try to find out if it was due to the policy of the government that interest rates had been lowered. According to the minister's statement, he said the second part of the question obviously refers to a matter of government policy. He took credit then for the lowering of the interest rate, and today he is trying to deny responsibility because the rates are going up again.

Mr. Fleming: There is no need to belabour this point. If my hon. friend will only look at the record at page 597 of Hansard he will see the question was about what specific steps the government would take, and any specific steps the government would take are naturally a matter of policy.

Mr. Peter Stefura (Vegreville): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Finance. He had said just a few moments ago that any steps taken would definitely be government policy. The question I have is as follows. Has the government taken any steps to have the interest rates reduced?

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, this matter has been up before, and if my hon. friend wishes a statement on the subject repeating all the things that have been said before, I would be happy to furnish it to him. I think, however, that would probably be a proper matter to be taken up in committee of supply on the estimates of the finance department.

SHIPPING

TRANSFER TO TRANSPORT DEPARTMENT OF H.M.C.S. "LABRADOR"

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Harold E. Winch (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, to get back on the rails, may I direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has H.M.C.S. Labrador been transferred from the Royal Canadian Navy to the Department of Transport? If so, is it now in the hands of shipfitters and are its oceanographic and hydrographic instruments and equipment being removed? Is the vessel being converted for icebreaking solely and, if so, what is the estimated cost of the conversion and is it being done by contract or on a cost-plus basis?

Some hon. Members: Order paper.

Mr. Winch: It is a very simple question, and I made it as short as I could.

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I wish to thank the hon. member for his courtesy in advising me of his intention to ask the question. I received it only before coming into the house, and I shall give him the answer prepared by my departmental officials, I assume in the order in which they received the questions.

The answer is that the vessel is now undergoing an extensive refit under R.C.N. direction which will take most of the winter; therefore its exact winter operational role cannot be determined as yet.

The Labrador has not yet been transferred to the Department of Transport. Transfer is expected to take place early in the new year, but the nature of any additional conversion work for civil purposes has not been finally determined. The Labrador, however, is to be used as an important unit in the substantial fleet of departmental icebreakers and Arctic convoy and supply vessels that operate in the Arctic each summer and during the winter in the gulf of St. Lawrence and Atlantic waters to aid navigation there.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): May I ask the minister in what yard the repairs to H.M.C.S. Labrador are being made, and at what cost?

Mr. Hees: I do not have that figure at my fingertips, but I will endeavour to find out.

Mr. Chevrier: Does the minister not know what yard it is?

Mr. Hees: No, I am not sure.

Mr. Winch: May I ask a supplementary question. In view of the minister's answer, will he advise the house whether his department has a continuing interest in developing the gulf of St. Lawrence for winter navigation, and if so will the Department of Transport continue the oceanograph surveys in the coming year which were initiated in 1955 by the Royal Canadian Navy and carried through by H.M.C.S. Labrador and the joint Atlantic oceanograph group of the fisheries research board?

Mr. Hees: The answer is yes. Department of Transport vessels have always been available within the limits of their operational tasks to assist other agencies, and the Labrador will be in this category.

[Later:]

Mr. Hees: Mr. Speaker, a few moments ago the hon. member for Laurier asked me a question regarding the refitting of the Labrador. I am pleased to inform him that I now have the information for which he asked. The Labrador is being refitted in the Saint John drydock and the estimated cost is $150,000. As a former minister of transport I am confident he would be pleased to know that the navy is paying the cost.

CANADIAN NATIONAL STEAMSHIPS

STATEMENT ON RETURN OF VESSELS TRANSFERRED TO FOREIGN REGISTRY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George H. Hees (Minister of Transport): I should like to take this opportunity of answering a question of which I took notice yesterday, when the hon. member for St. Antoine-Westmount asked me about the transfer of Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships' vessels to Trinidad registry. I told him I would speak to the chairman of the Canadian maritime commission about this matter and give him further information today.

The chairman of the Canadian maritime commission has advised me that as a normal part of these proceedings, since the time the application was made by Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships, Limited, for transfer of registry he has been engaged in making arrangements to provide that if at any time it should be desired to return these ships to Canadian registry, this could be done along lines similar to the special transfer arrangements which have been in force with the United Kingdom for some years.

Hon. George C. Marler (St. Antoine-Westmount): May I ask a supplementary question. I gather, though, at the time the transfer of registry took place no such arrangement had been concluded?

Mr. Hees: At the time Canadian National (West Indies) Steamships initiated the proceedings transferring the vessels, the chairman of the Canadian maritime commission started the arrangements I have just outlined.

AGRICULTURE

AGRICULTURAL PRICES SUPPORT ACT—REQUEST FOR IMMEDIATE INVOCATION OF AUTHORITY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker, the urgency of my question arises out of the plight of the farmers caused by the price-cost squeeze. I should like to direct my question to the Minister of Agriculture. Now that the government has been in power for over six months, can the minister inform the house why the government has not seen fit to invoke the authority conferred under the Agricultural Prices Support Act which says, in effect, that this act may be used to endeavour to ensure adequate and stable returns to agriculture, and to endeavour to secure a fair relationship between the returns from agriculture and those from other occupations? Can the minister state why the government has not invoked this authority, rather than waiting for future legislation?

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): At the outset may I say that the hon. member is, as usual, inaccurate, because the present government has not been in power for six months. So far as making use of the Agricultural Prices Support Act is concerned, we have made very extensive use of it. We have made very large purchases under it and have placed a number of commodities under it, thus providing support for commodities which were not under the act before. As I say, we have bought a large amount of various agricultural commodities in order to support prices, and that refers to commodities which were already under the act and the ones we have brought under the act.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Melville): Then may I ask a supplementary question. What are the products that were put under the act which were not under it before?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, there were fowl, turkeys—

Mr. Gardiner: No; fowl had been placed under the act.

Mr. Harkness: Fowl were not under it, Mr. Speaker. It had been provided that they would come under at some future time, but they were not under it at that time. Turkeys, butterfat products, particularly butter oil—

Mr. F. S. Zaplitny (Dauphin): May I ask a supplementary question of the Minister of Agriculture. Is the minister prepared to state that the prices which this government has been supporting under this act bear a fair relationship to the general level of prices in Canada?

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Speaker, whether they bear a fair relationship to the general level of prices in Canada or not—and I presume the hon. member is referring to the prices of commodities which are under price support—this is a matter which I think would be capable of a great deal of argument, and I am certainly not going to get into any long discussion on this particular matter at the present moment.

NORTHERN ALBERTA—REQUEST FOR REPORT ON INVESTIGATION INTO HARVEST

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether he could say this morning what progress has been made in getting Prairie Farm Assistance Act inspectors into the Peace river country to establish the extent of crop damage that has been caused by the unusual, tragic weather conditions in that area.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, I have no report within the last two or three days with regard to that matter. As I indicated to the hon. member, I think about a week ago now, arrangements were under way to take on between 40 and 50 inspectors in order to try to get the entire Peace river area inspected in the quickest possible time.

Mr. Low: I have a supplementary question; perhaps the minister could answer it. Judging from the reports he has already received, does he feel that the maximum benefits possible under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act will be enough to meet the minimum most urgent needs of the farmers in the stricken Peace river area?

Mr. Harkness: From the numerous letters I have received from individuals, boards of trade and so forth in the Peace river country, it would appear that there will be a relief problem there. That, of course, is the responsibility of the municipalities, and of the province of Alberta. The only provision of which I know under which we can assist with regard to this disastrous situation in the Peace river country is by Prairie Farm Assistance Act payments.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I have a supplementary question. Has the minister given any consideration to making cash advances or money available on unthreshed crops in the Peace river country, as was done by the former administration in 1951.

Mr. Harkness: I think perhaps the hon. member for Assiniboia has forgotten what I said a week ago in connection with this matter. The estimates are that no more than about 10 per cent of the grain that is left up there will ever be threshed. It is therefore hopeless to talk about making cash advances on a crop which is gone.

HOUSING

ALEXANDRA AND MOSS AREAS, TORONTO—REDEVELOPMENT PROPOSALS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Haidasz (Trinity): I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Public Works, as to whether his department or the crown company, C.M.H.C., has received any proposals from the Toronto development department asking for federal aid to redevelop the Alexandra park and Moss park areas?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, may I take this question as notice.

GRAIN

PERMITS FOR VETERANS TO QUALIFY FOR CASH ADVANCES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. H. Castleden (Yorkton): I would like to ask a question of the Minister of Veterans Affairs. Would the minister inform the house what arrangements have been made to provide veterans under the Veterans' Land Act with permits from his department which are necessary to qualify them for cash advances under present regulations?

Hon. A. J. Brooks (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I appreciate receiving notice from the hon. member of his intention to ask this question. Veterans established under the Veterans' Land Act may apply for cash advances in the same way as other producers. If the director, the Veterans' Land Act, has been shown on the permit book, the veteran forwards his completed advance payment application form to the district superintendent, Veterans' Land Act, who has been authorized to sign for the director. The form is then returned to the veteran to proceed with his application in the usual way.

Mr. Castleden: A supplementary question. Have any arrangements been made to speed up and prevent delays, because many of these veterans are in a very serious condition with regard to cash and it is necessary for them to have these permits as soon as possible. What has been done to prevent delays in this matter?

Mr. Brooks: I will look into this matter, Mr. Speaker. My information is that arrangements have been made so that no delays will occur, but I will check up on that.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REPORTED CLOSING DOWN OF HOWE SOUND COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. James Sinclair (Coast-Capilano): I would like to address a question to the Minister of Justice. Now that the management of Britannia mines has announced that the mine is to close in two weeks, would the minister tell the house what proposals, if any, the federal government made to assist in keeping this mine in operation?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): The hon. member will recall, if he will cast his mind back, that I indicated to him and the house yesterday that the information I have from the company officials in New York is to the effect that there is still a possibility that negotiations and discussions may result in partial continuation of operations. Therefore it seems to me it will be obvious to him that until we have had a chance to pursue those negotiations there is nothing I can report.

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY, WINNIPEG—STATEMENT ON REPORTED DISMISSAL FOR FAILURE TO CROSS PICKET LINE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, on November 14 the member for Winnipeg North Centre asked the following question:

> Is the minister aware that the members of a Canadian Pacific switching crew in the Winnipeg area who felt that they could not cross a picket line two days ago have been informed by the Canadian Pacific Railway that their services are no longer required?
> Will the minister look into this matter to see if there is not some protection for such employees under the national labour code, since these employees do come under federal labour jurisdiction?

My answer is as follows. I have looked into the situation, Mr. Speaker, and I am informed by the management of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company that rather than being told that their services were no longer required, the employees in question were temporarily suspended pending investigation. Following the investigation they were returned to duty.

I am informed that disciplinary action was taken and I quote from the report I received:

> Each crew member was returned to duty and assessed 15 demerit marks on the first offence and 25 demerit marks on the second offence.

I understand that such demerit marks are reduced by 20 for each subsequent year's clear service, free of discipline. Accumulation of 60 demerit marks is required for dismissal. At the moment all the men are back at work.

As to the matter of protection under the national labour code, by which term I presume the hon. member means the Industrial Relations and Disputes Investigation Act, for employees who refuse to cross picket lines, I may say that there is a provision in the act which requires the inclusion in every collective agreement of a procedure for the final settlement of grievances arising out of the alleged violation or interpretation of the provisions of the agreement.

TRADE

STATEMENT ON REQUEST FOR REPORT ON MISSION TO COMMUNIST CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, several hon. members have asked me questions with regard to the trip to China made by our trade commissioner, Mr. Forsyth-Smith. He has now returned to Hong Kong and in a preliminary report he tells us he was well received by the various members of the Chinese trading corporations. Until Mr. Forsyth-Smith has completed his studies it is not possible for him to give an accurate appraisal of the trade potential which exists in China for Canadian products. It is his first opinion, however, that there are definite opportunities in certain directions, but that the volume of business which we might expect in the near future must be limited.

As might be expected, there is in China a lack of knowledge of what Canada has to offer, so that efforts must be made by those interested in selling to China to acquaint the Chinese with those items which we wish to sell. Our trade commissioner believes that more Canadian businessmen should endeavour to pay personal visits to that country.

Amongst the products in which our trade commissioner thinks reasonably good prospects exist are wood pulp, fertilizer, aluminium, kraft paper, linseed, plastic raw materials, insulin, nylon and rayon yarn and staple fibre, cellophane, and a wide range of industrial chemicals.

I might add that the export-import business in China is exclusively in the hands of some 16 state-owned corporations, and our trade commissioner was able to have discussions with most of them.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Does the minister not think the knowledge of Canada among the Chinese would be greatly improved if we had a proper diplomatic mission there, after the recognition of the government of that country?

Mr. Churchill: I expect there are many questions on which knowledge of Canada by the Chinese might be improved.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Algoma East): Will the minister not agree that some of the commodities he has just mentioned in his report are also on the list of prohibited exports to China, and that unless that list can be changed to bring it into conformity with the list of prohibited commodities to Russia, trade in those commodities cannot take place?

Mr. Churchill: Agreed.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): I have a supplementary question. The other evening I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce, when we were debating the bill to amend the Export Credits Insurance Act, whether or not he felt that under present conditions, looking forward to trade with China, he would feel disposed to recommend to his colleagues insurance under section 21 of the act. He did not reply to my question at that time. He simply said that Canada would be glad to sell to any country including China, but he did not say specifically what his views are with respect to the opportunity for insurance.

Mr. Churchill: That is attempting to cross a bridge before you come to it. If negotiations are entered into with regard to the sale of wheat to China, or if there is an offer from China to buy our wheat and the wheat board considers that it is a good proposition, at that point we would then consider the problem raised by my hon. friend.

Mr. W. A. Tucker (Rosthern): I should like to ask the minister if it is correct that if we are ever to arrange a sale of wheat to China it will have to be arranged through Japanese sources, because there is no way in which a deal could be made with China or at least these Chinese government corporations directly by the wheat board.

Mr. Churchill: I have no knowledge of that particular matter.

FISHERIES

WEST COAST—REQUEST FOR BOUNTY OR FLOOR PRICE ON DOGFISH

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. J. Irwin (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Fisheries. I have given him notice of this question, but he may not have had ample time to prepare an answer this morning. Will the minister consider a minimum price for dogfish, to encourage destruction of this predator on the Pacific coast? Will the minister put the present bounty on both livers and carcasses of dogfish to encourage small boat owners to help in destroying this fish? Will regulations be brought down to make present bounties payable to fishermen rather than to fish companies?

Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, I want to thank the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond for his courtesy in sending me notice of this question. Unfortunately I received it just before coming into the house. I might point out to him that yesterday the hon. member for Comox-Alberni asked me a question on the same subject, which I took as notice. I am not yet in a position to answer either question, but I hope to be in a position to do so in the near future; and at such time as it is possible for me to do so I will answer both questions.

POST OFFICE DEPARTMENT

CANCELLATION OF CONTRACTS FOR RURAL MAIL DELIVERY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Auguste Maltais (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Since the publication of general order No. 125, amended thereafter by general order No. 169, could the Postmaster General tell the house if instructions have been given for the cancellation of contracts held by rural mail contractors? Is he further aware if instructions have been given that contracts are not to be terminated for no apparent reason?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I think the hon. member will find in last Wednesday's Hansard certain observations of mine about detailed questions of this nature which might well be put on the order paper.

Mr. Marler: This is not a detailed question.

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): If the hon. member will read those remarks he will perhaps place the question on the order paper, and I will be able to see to it that he receives an answer.

Mr. Maltais: As a supplementary question, may I ask the Postmaster General if there were new instructions given by himself that if cases were brought to his attention of mail contracts being terminated for no apparent reason he would take action immediately?

Mr. Hamilton (Notre Dame de Grace): Mr. Speaker, very definitely the Post Office Department is not terminating any rural mail carriers' contracts "for no apparent reason".

REQUEST FOR ISSUANCE OF SPECIAL STAMP DEPICTING ROTARY CLUBS, ETC.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. McWilliam (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Postmaster General. Will the Postmaster General consider issuing an airmail or regular postage stamp depicting Canada's Rotary clubs, members of Rotary International, the world's largest service club?

Hon. W. M. Hamilton (Postmaster General): Mr. Speaker, I will be very glad to give consideration to the hon. member's suggestion.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN

HIGHWAY BRIDGE, CHATHAM-FERRY ROAD, N.B.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. McWilliam (Northumberland-Miramichi): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Secretary of State. When may I expect an answer to my question which appeared as question No. 47 on the order paper of October 23, 52 days ago, and which was made an order for return on October 30?

Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Secretary of State): Mr. Speaker, I had expected to have this answer ready earlier this week but one of the departments concerned has not been able to reply up to now. However, I can assure the hon. member that we are trying to secure an answer to the question as quickly as possible.

Inquiries of the Ministry

UNEMPLOYMENT INSURANCE

REQUEST FOR EMERGENCY REGULATION TO COVER PACIFIC COAST FISHERMEN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. J. Irwin (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Labour, of which I sent him notice. What steps, if any, are being taken to meet the request of the united fishermen and allied workers' union in its letter of November 28, 1957, regarding unemployment insurance?

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I wish to thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his intention to ask this question. I have had representations from the united fishermen and allied workers' union requesting a special emergency regulation to permit salmon net fishermen with fewer than 14 weeks' contributions to draw the same benefits as persons with 15 stamps can now obtain under seasonal benefit regulations. As matters now stand, fishermen with 15 stamps will be eligible for seasonal benefits.

The request from the united fishermen involves a further amendment to the seasonal benefit regulations, and it is a matter which would have to be carefully investigated. I have asked the officials of the unemployment insurance commission to obtain the facts in the matter to ascertain what would be the best course to follow.

PENSIONS

SUPERANNUATED CIVIL SERVANTS—REFERENCE TO BRIEF OF OTTAWA ASSOCIATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Has the minister had an opportunity to read the brief submitted to him by the civil service association of Ottawa on November 15 regarding civil service pensions? Is the government giving consideration to the suggestions made by the association as to ways and means of restoring and maintaining the real value of the pensions of superannuated civil servants?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, all representations that come from the civil service are given consideration. I have no comment to make on this particular brief at present.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY—STATEMENT ON COMPLAINTS RESPECTING CHANGES MADE IN PLAN

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Michael Starr (Minister of Labour): Mr. Speaker, I should like to deal with a question directed to me by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre on November 28. He asked me whether I had pursued the representations made to my predecessor and to myself regarding changes made in the pension plan of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.

Before I deal with this question, Mr. Speaker, I feel I must confess to you and to the house that when the hon. member put his question I was perhaps not following the course of the debate with quite the same degree of critical attention which I normally apply to these matters. Thus when I informed the hon. member that I had not had representations made to me on the matter I was guilty of a misstatement. The misstatement was purely involuntary, and I hope the hon. member will not feel that it was made with any intention of misleading him.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): You are forgiven.

Mr. Starr: The matter of certain alleged anomalies in Canadian Pacific Railway pensions had been brought to my attention in letters from a number of individuals, and when the hon. member asked his question I was awaiting a report from my officials on the matter with regard to the course taken by my predecessor when these same representations were made to him. As I understand the matter, certain beneficial changes were made in the pension plan by the company but they applied only to employees retiring after January 1, 1953, the date when the changes became effective. Representations were made to have the new plan made retroactive.

I understand that my predecessor in this office made representations to the company requesting a study and review of the anomalies which had been the subject of complaint, and he was informed that the cost of making the new provisions retroactive to cover 12,500 employees already on pension would be prohibitive, so much so as to make it impossible to bring in the new features for employees who were due to retire in the future. As the hon. member knows, the Minister of Labour has no jurisdiction over the provisions of a pension plan concerning a private company and its employees. However, I shall certainly undertake to bring once more to the attention of the management of the Canadian Pacific Railway the latest representations which I have received in this regard.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Thank you. You have our best wishes.

BROADCASTING

MONTREAL—SPOT ADVERTISING RATES CHARGED BY LOCAL COMPANIES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. G. J. Hahn (New Westminster): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue arising out of the answer he gave me yesterday, in which he indicated that any letter he received from anyone respecting advertising over station CBM would be referred to the officials of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation for their action. In view of the fact that the C.B.C. originally set out the scale of charges to be used in determining advertising rates, would he consider making representations to that body now to see that they keep their rates on a comparative basis with those charged by private broadcasters?

Hon. G. C. Nowlan (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, I do not think that the minister simply responsible for reporting to parliament respecting the C.B.C. should attempt to interfere with the commercial policy of that corporation. I do not think it has been done. I am willing to give the matter some consideration, but as it is an independent crown corporation which is going to be seeking funds from parliament with which to carry on it would hardly appear to me, to give an off the cuff answer and without giving the matter more careful consideration, to be good policy to suggest to that corporation that it should cease obtaining commercial revenue, when I presume parliament undoubtedly will be telling it that it will perhaps have to do without as much money as it would like to get and therefore should earn more revenue.

Mr. Chevrier: You might give it a hint some day.

Mr. Hahn: I did not hear all the minister had to say and will have to read it in Hansard. However, if this practice is to continue I would ask if he would see to it that the $37 million subsidy in the estimates for the broadcasting corporation is withdrawn.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Courtemanche in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

General administration—

414. Departmental administration, $672,473.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Chairman, this is the first opportunity I have had to report to the house with regard to the general trade situation of Canada, and to deal perhaps with other matters. The Department of Trade and Commerce ranges over a very wide field and it will be impossible, without taking too much time, to deal with all the aspects of such a large department. I should like at this stage to express my appreciation to the members of the department who have given me such expert assistance during the last several months. They constitute a very highly trained and competent section of the civil service.

I thought it might be wise to refer chiefly to two main matters; first the trade commissioner service, which is so widely spread throughout the world, and second, the general state of Canadian trade and development in relation to other countries.

The trade commissioner service is responsible for the promotion of Canadian export trade and for the protection of Canadian commercial interests abroad. Hon. members are, I think, well acquainted with the trade commissioner service and the very useful work the service has done in the past. Recently I had occasion to visit a number of our posts in Europe in connection with the sale of Canadian wheat and I must say that this very close contact with our trade commissioners in the field confirmed in my mind the high reputation which these men have acquired for themselves. It also confirmed the opinion which has been expressed to me on so many occasions by our producers, manufacturers and agriculturists that our trade commissioners are making a substantial contribution to Canada's well-being in the export field.

The trade commissioner service now has 57 posts abroad. These are located at strategic centres of trade throughout the world, wherever it is considered that possibilities exist for the further development of Canadian trade. The trade commissioners are constantly on the watch for opportunities to increase Canada's export trade and to safeguard Canadian interests abroad. From these posts reports are constantly received advising of foreign commercial policies and economic trends, on conditions in the territory, and at the same time bringing to the attention of Canadian producers specific opportunities for the development of trade.

While most areas of the world are covered by these 57 posts there are still certain sections which I believe warrant more intensive consideration. We have constantly under review the need for offices in these areas. During the past year, for example, 12 posts have been opened in Hamburg, Vienna, Colombo, Los Angeles, and just recently in Accra. These new posts will aid considerably in the development of our markets in these countries. There are still, however, a number of areas where I believe we should have offices. The Middle East, in spite of troubled conditions, I think should receive better consideration than it is possible to give with our present offices. Consideration is being given also to new offices in the Far East, which is constantly growing more important to Canadian trade interests, as well as to establishing more offices in the United States.

The trade commissioner service at present comprises 127 offices. A high standard is maintained for entry into the service. Recruiting is by competitive examination held usually once during each year. Candidates must meet rigid standards as to education, physical fitness, age and general suitability, and they are drawn from all sections of Canada. Just last year 10 young men were accepted into the service. After a year's intensive training in Ottawa, during which time they are on probation, they are sent on a tour of Canada to acquaint them first hand with the Canada which they will represent commercially abroad. They are then posted abroad to work under the guidance of more experienced officers. Regular and annual recruiting into the service is essential if we are to maintain a young, virile corps of officers, and I hope nothing will be allowed to interfere with this.

I might add that from my own personal observations and meeting with these officers abroad, I have reason to believe that we are very well served in these stations. In addition to that, I have had quite a number of letters from businessmen who have been active in business interests abroad, reporting to me that they have been thoroughly served by our trade commissioners. I feel that our trade commissioners are a credit to Canada.

I thought I would continue, Mr. Chairman, with some remarks concerning Canada's present trade position. During the past year sales abroad have been subject to conflicting influences. On the one hand there have been extensive additions to capacity in the export industries, including a number of commodities relatively new in Canadian trade. On the other hand, there has been a general softening in world commodity markets and a decline in industrial output in the United States, particularly in durable goods. Renewed measures of restriction in the United Kingdom have been an important factor limiting further expansion in Canada's foreign sales, and in the case of wheat marketing difficulties have arisen from ample world supplies and have been accentuated by the surplus disposal measures of the United States.

In these circumstances the value of Canadian exports for the first ten months of 1957 amounting to $4,026 million, on the basis of preliminary October figures, have been slightly above the corresponding period for the previous year. Items showing substantial gains compared with the previous year include uranium, crude petroleum, primary steel, iron ore, nickel, aluminum and flaxseed. The principal decline occurred in wheat and flour; in lumber, which was adversely affected by less residential construction in the United States and in the early part of the year by high ocean rates; in copper, which has declined substantially in price; and in aircraft following the completion of orders.

Looking at Canada's sales to individual countries, exports to the United States are up moderately while those to the United Kingdom have declined somewhat. There have been significant increases in sales to a number of European and Latin American countries and to Japan. The value of imports into Canada for the first ten months of 1957 amounted to $4,784 million, which remains virtually the same as in the corresponding months of 1956. Examination of the sources of these imports shows a decline in the value of purchases from the United States of more than $60 million or about 2 per cent, and an increase in purchases from the United Kingdom and other commonwealth countries of $46 million, amounting in percentage terms to about 8 per cent.

With total exports up slightly and imports unchanged this year compared with last, Canada's merchandise deficit is slightly lower in the first ten months. In recent months exports have shown a firmer trend than have imports. Whereas in the early part of the year the deficit had increased compared with levels of a year ago, during the last six months it has declined. Continuation of this trend would bring a reduction in the over-all deficit in the period ahead.

Encouraging progress has thus been made toward two of the objectives of the present administration, the reduction of our large deficit on merchandise trade and the expansion of the share of our imports coming from the United Kingdom. We shall continue to pursue both these aims vigorously in the future.

I do not think any government in Canada's history has done so much in such a short time to implement its trade policies. Within a few days of assuming office the Prime Minister put before the prime ministers' conference in London a proposal for a commonwealth trade and economic conference. Then followed the meeting of commonwealth finance ministers at Mont Tremblant, where there was unanimous agreement to hold such a conference next year. Indicating the importance we attach to our trade with the United States and other non-commonwealth countries, we met with Messrs. Dulles, Benson, Weeks and Anderson of the United States cabinet in Washington in October, and in the latter part of the same month I had the honour to represent the Canadian government at the ministerial meeting of the general agreement on tariffs and trade.

We are hopeful that the commonwealth trade and economic conference next year will bring about a strengthening and broadening of our economic ties with the great family of nations to which we belong. It is not the intention of the government to interfere with the profitable trade we are carrying on with other countries. In fact we believe that the policies we are pursuing will put our relations with all trading partners on a healthier, more stable basis. In the last few years our trade with different countries has been developing in a lopsided and uneven manner. This may be good for some of the people some of the time, but it is bound to bring a reaction in the long run. An orderly and balanced growth of our trade will be beneficial to our entire economy. It will offer plenty of opportunities for other countries to do business with us.

I emphasized our interest in carrying on and increasing trade with all our trading partners when I attended the ministerial meeting of the general agreement on tariffs and trade at Geneva in October. Moreover, I assured the other members of GATT that this country would continue to operate its policies in accordance with the rules and procedures of GATT. At the same time I expressed the concern of Canadians that while Canada had, in the past, gone somewhat beyond its obligations, some of the other countries had followed policies which have had the effect of diverting a larger quantity of imports to our markets than would otherwise have been the case. Ministers were present at this meeting from many important countries, and I was most impressed by the constructive and co-operative spirit in which trade problems were discussed.

The most important matter considered at this session of the contracting parties to GATT was the European common market treaty. The members of this European treaty are at the same time important world traders and important members of GATT. It is essential to ensure that the European common market is developed in a way which will strengthen rather than weaken international trade relations. I expressed the views of the Canadian government with respect to various aspects of the common market treaty which caused us some concern, and I indicated that the Canadian delegation would participate actively and sympathetically in the detailed consultations being initiated with the six countries concerned.

This session of GATT has already been concluded, and I am sure that the countries of the European common market are now fully aware of the difficulties which could arise through restrictive application of their treaty.

It has now been arranged that the GATT countries will pursue their consultations with respect to the common market—that refers to the common market treaty of next April—and I hope it will then be possible to obtain satisfactory assurances which will provide a basis of confidence and co-operation among all concerned.

I shall conclude my remarks at this time with a brief reference to the Canadian trade mission which is now in the United Kingdom. The reports that I received from that mission yesterday and this morning indicate that it is still having great success in its tour of the British Isles and has now been in England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland. The same enthusiasm on the part of British industrialists and British exporters is still being shown as it was a few days ago when I was there, and an increasing number of British business firms are asking for the opportunity of meeting with members of our trade mission in London next week. I reported when I came back from there a few days ago that 700 firms had asked to have the privilege of meeting face to face with members of our mission. That number has now gone up.

One or two questions have been asked with regard to what are the objectives of the mission. I set them out very clearly before the mission left this country, but it might be well to repeat that the purpose of the mission is twofold. In the first instance, members of the mission—widely drawn from all parts of Canada and representing at least 20 Canadian industries—are now in the British Isles looking at the state of British industry to discover whether or not that industry is in a position to supply the demands of the Canadian market in fields in which Canadian industry is not itself engaged.

The emphasis right from the very start has been in shifting to the United Kingdom some of the purchases that we now make elsewhere. There is no intention whatsoever of doing anything to interfere with Canadian industry. There is a very wide field for expansion of the United Kingdom market in this country, and there is also a very wide field for the development of Canadian industry. When you consider that $5,700,000,000 worth of imports are brought into this country and that of that amount the United Kingdom enjoys only about 8½ per cent or 9 per cent, you can readily see that there is ample opportunity for larger imports from the United Kingdom as well as for an expansion of Canadian industry so we shall no longer have to be too dependent on sources of supply in just one country.

The second purpose of the mission, which we have been stating over and over again in the United Kingdom, is to draw to the attention of the people of that country the advantages which we see here in Canada for trade on their part. We have pointed out to them that the Canadian people now number 17 million; that their per capita buying capacity compared with that of the people of the British Isles or other countries of Europe is equivalent to the buying power of 34 million people in those areas. In other words, our buying capacity per capita is double that of individuals in the United Kingdom and in Europe. We have also pointed out to them that our population is expanding and that as the years go by, and before the turn of the century, there is reason to believe that Canada will have a population of 40 million. We have also indicated to them that we have great natural resources which require development.

So we have set before the businessmen of the United Kingdom a picture of Canada providing a great expanding market. We have said to them whereas in the past your share of imports into Canada was 18 per cent and has now declined to 8½ per cent or 9 per cent, we think you can regain your share of the market. We fully understand why you have had difficulties with the Canadian market; you made sacrifices in the war years in respect of your export trade, but now we see you have made a virtually complete recovery, and we are here to tell you that the Canadian market is available to you and we will assist you in any way possible in order that we may again create that triangular trade pattern which proved so beneficial to the United Kingdom, the United States and ourselves in the years prior to the war.

This is the purpose of the trade commission in England. It left here with the blessing of all parties in the House of Commons. The members of the mission are first class, representative Canadians, and they have entered upon their task with great seriousness. Many of them were a bit reluctant to travel abroad in the month of November with the prospect of returning just before Christmas, but when we suggested to them that this was something they might do on behalf of Canada they responded with great eagerness. Furthermore, my observation of the members of the mission while I was with them was that they are as much interested and just as keen as any member of this house in stimulating trade between the United Kingdom and Canada and re-establishing that pattern of trade I have mentioned. Looking toward the future they see that as imports from the United Kingdom in Canada increase and the dollar earning capacity of the United Kingdom is correspondingly increased, Canada in its turn will benefit, because we have many things in this country which the United Kingdom used to take from us in the past and which we are ready to supply in the future.

The mission will be in the United Kingdom for another 10 days and will then return to this country. I hope that before we leave the United Kingdom arrangements will be made to continue the work of the mission in maintaining close relationships with the members of the government of the United Kingdom, the members of the dollar export council and other businessmen who are now showing so much interest in the work of this mission. I also hope that in the course of next year representatives of British industry will come to Canada to see for themselves what Canada has to offer to energetic and progressive men such as we have met in England, Wales, Scotland and Northern Ireland.

All told, I think Canada can be proud of the representative businessmen who are putting forward in the United Kingdom the situation as they see it and are doing their level best to encourage the expansion of trade between our two countries.

Mr. Chevrier: I wonder if our spokesman, who is the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River, would allow me to ask a question at this stage.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

Mr. Chevrier: I listened with interest to the minister's last comments, and I heard him say that the mission to the United Kingdom was a success. I should like to know from him what he means by that statement. If, as I presume, by success he means the reception the delegation is getting from the United Kingdom, of that there can be no doubt; because the press gives us day to day reports on the tremendous reception the Canadian delegation is receiving.

But I should like to ask him what success, from a practical standpoint, the mission has accomplished thus far in the light of the two objectives he has just given. I should like to know whether he would be good enough to tell the house what orders, either in number or in value, have been diverted from United States purchases to United Kingdom purchases along the lines, for instance, of those announced by the chairman of the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario, who said he was purchasing $10 million worth of equipment? Are there any other such orders for commodities that are being purchased? I do not want to labour the matter at any length, but I thought perhaps this would be an appropriate occasion on which to get from the minister what is meant by the success of the mission.

Mr. Churchill: I thank the hon. member for Laurier for his comments. It is not possible at this stage to say that so many dollars' worth in orders have been placed in the United Kingdom, other than one or two which have already been announced. That news will come later. Some of the orders, of course, will not be placed this month. Business is not always done quite in that way. It depends on the type of material that is being supplied and the requirements of the country. If it is some project which is going to commence in Canada next spring, the order might be placed now or it might be deferred until January.

However, I say the mission has been a success for this reason. There was doubt in the minds of some people in Canada when the mission was proposed. There was doubt in the minds of some people in the United Kingdom when the mission was proposed. But over and above the kindly hospitality of the British people, which goes unquestioned and would be there for anyone who went over even on pleasure, the response has surpassed anything that was anticipated either on our part or on the part of those who have been responsible for the activities of the mission in the United Kingdom. The very fact that hundreds upon hundreds of British businessmen have asked to meet members of the mission surely indicates that there is a real interest in the United Kingdom in encouraging trade between our two countries.

It was not possible to estimate that interest before we left here or before the mission arrived in the United Kingdom. Quite frankly I may say that we anticipated a friendly response. You always get that in the United Kingdom. We anticipated a tour.

Mr. Chevrier: Particularly if the minister's name is Churchill.

Mr. Churchill: I beg the hon. member's pardon?

Mr. Chevrier: I say you get a good response particularly if the minister's name is Churchill.

Mr. Churchill: Thank you very much. They have been very kind to me. We anticipated doing some of these things, but nobody foresaw the intense interest that has been aroused in the British Isles. Even when we went to Edinburgh this interest was demonstrated. Granted that television, radio and the press indicated that the Canadians were coming to Edinburgh, and the officials provided what you might expect at Edinburgh, namely the bagpipes to greet us; but when 500 average people of the city of Edinburgh turn out at the station just to see a group of businessmen get off the train it startles you a bit. That type of reception has impressed us and has impressed the officials in England.

The reason I say that the mission up to this date has been successful is based on that intense interest among businessmen; and that surely is going to result in increased trade between our two countries. It cannot possibly just be dropped or fall flat. Many of the businessmen to whom I spoke say they are considering seriously sending out their representatives to Canada very soon. Some of them said, "We thought you did not want to trade with us". We said, "Some people in Canada thought you were not interested in the Canadian market".

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: I am reporting the words I heard. Now that idea has been dispelled. Here they are ready to take part. There is nothing political about it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Churchill: It is just Canadian businessmen meeting United Kingdom businessmen. I think the mission will continue to be a success.

Mr. Benidickson: We have had an interesting exposé by the minister of our position at the moment with respect to trade matters. I felt, however, that his remarks were more significant for what he refrained from telling the house than for some of the information that was provided. I think there is no dispute anywhere in the house about the admiration he expressed for the trade commissioner service that has been built up in this country. I believe all of us, particularly in recent years, have had tributes to that service indicated to us by businessmen with whom we were acquainted.

In the second place, the minister made reference to the position of exports and imports for the 10-month period of this year. I noticed particularly that he made the point that exports were slightly above those of last year. However, he is able to make an assertion of that kind only by merging the trade record of the period of the year in which the former administration conducted the business of this country with that of his own. It just happens that by a fortunate coincidence the trade information for that 10-month period was made available only this morning in the press; and contrary to the trend and situation in the first six months of 1957, it shows that we have much to fear in the declines that are obvious in recent months under the administration of my hon. friend with respect to our export trade.

This report shows that for the month of October alone our exports to the United Kingdom have declined by $12 million as compared with the trade record of the same month a year ago, and indeed for the 10-month period are down some $55 million. Our trade with respect to the United States for the month of Ocober is also down to the extent of $27 million as compared with last year.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): What paper is that?

Mr. Benidickson: The Montreal Gazette has trade information this morning for the 10-month period. Furthermore, I do not think my hon. friend is at all justified in taking, as he did, full and complete credit for something in the nature of a change in the trend of the relationship between exports and imports. I find that the trend which he took some pride in describing this morning—that is, a narrowing of the gap between exports and imports—showed up in the first two months prior to the time when I think my hon. friend could take any credit whatsoever for guiding the trade policies of this country.

The figures for the period ending in July —and I am sure my hon. friend would not think he had any influence on trade at least up to that time—indicated that our exports were not going down, as I have indicated they are now going down to our principal markets, but they in fact showed a very advantageous increase. In the two previous months described at the end of July there was a narrowing of the gap between exports and imports because imports were on the decline and exports had continued to rise.

It is perhaps trite to say that Canada lives by trade, but probably that is truer with respect to Canada than with respect to any other country in the world, because Canada's population is not large in relation to the huge international trade volume which we have in this country. I think all hon. members of this committee know from the experience of the depression years just how long it takes to recover from the effects of bad trade policies. Consequently I believe there will be considerable alarm and anxiety when we find that in recent months our export trade is showing a decline such as was indicated in October and in the examples I gave a few moments ago.

A great number of Canadians, a majority of them perhaps, depend directly or indirectly on export trade. We require exports for at least two-thirds of our normal wheat production. We depend on exports for 95 per cent of our paper production and perhaps about 80 per cent of our aluminum production, to make reference to just some of our notable exports. These are, of course, important items of external trade; but in addition to that Canadians are very concerned with elements of internal trade. While I have indicated that there is a very alarming drop in our exports in international trade, many Canadians are similarly alarmed these days about some very unpleasant differences between trade statistics and business statistics of the present time in relation to the period when the former administration left office.

I could give just a few illustrations. In June the index for stock market industrials was 303. In October, according to the Bank of Canada report, copies of which we all received the other day, that was down to 228. The wholesale price index with respect to grains in June was 171.9. It is now 168.7. The livestock index wholesale in June was 292.9 and is now 285.7. We have already had several indications of what happens when trade volume declines, and we know that the employment picture, the number of persons seeking work and who are without jobs, is also extremely alarming when one compares June with the current situation.

In respect to new orders, also an item dealt with in the Bank of Canada report to which I referred, I find that in the last available period, September of this year, new orders received amounted to $1,692 million as compared with $1,812 million a year ago, and that compares with the June figure of $1,754 million. If one goes to another important aspect of domestic trade—and I refer to the volume of industrial production—one finds that in June when this administration left office the index figure, which is also shown in the Bank of Canada report, was 296.9 and in August it had declined to 286.5. The manufacturing index in June was 296.2 and in August the last available figure showed that there had been a decline to 283.1.

Mr. Chairman, may I call it one o'clock.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

[Mr. Benidickson.]

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, in resuming the discussion of the estimates of the Minister of Trade and Commerce after the noon adjournment I simply want to say my recollection is that on general statistical information he suggested that never before had the policies of a new government made themselves evident so quickly. Well, in that respect I think I will agree with him. I want to continue with some of the statistics that I was referring to prior to our noontime adjournment. However, these statistics are, I think, ominous.

During the recess I inquired, and I found that on June 1, 1957, the average weekly wage of labour in this country in manufacturing was $65.08. On September 1, which is the latest available statistic, it was $64.60. There is thus a decline and that decline is not normally to be found from June to September. In addition, when we are speaking, as we are in committee, on trade, I cannot think of anything that is more related to the volume of trade than perhaps the figures on railway carloadings. On November 21, 1957, carloadings were 769,926. A year ago they were 837,749.

Another item that I think is very significant when we speak of trade is the average hours worked per week by our labour force. This is something that had been rising steadily prior to the advent of this administration. On September 1, 1957, the average hours worked per week were 40.5; a year ago they were 41.1. I think most hon. members will agree with me that this figure is significant. I find it so in my own riding. While as yet we have not in Kenora-Rainy River people wholly unemployed in a significant way, perhaps I do find that the take-home pay in the work week is very much reduced from what our workers had experienced previously, and that is one of the ominous features to which I have referred.

In his remarks the minister referred again to the United Kingdom trade mission. I did feel when he introduced the subject on Tuesday that anticipating these estimates, he could very well have made his remarks at this time; but, unlike his predecessors who also have some travelogues to disclose, he chose that particular time to deliver his remarks. I recall that the leader of this group was very gracious, as I think I attempted to be, in a personal phone call to the minister to wish him well on this mission, and I do not propose to quarrel in any respect with the objectives of the mission. My quarrel is simply with the double talk and with what I call the politics which are being played by the minister with respect to this particular mission.

When I refer to double talk I will give illustrations, but I think hon. members will recall a former correspondent in the press gallery who was one of the severest critics of the previous Liberal administration. He was the correspondent of the Toronto Globe and Mail, George Bain, and is now a resident correspondent in the United Kingdom. On the very day the minister was reporting to this house about the activities of this mission, Mr. Bain had this to say with respect to the tour of this Canadian mission in a dispatch to the Toronto Globe and Mail, which is unusually friendly to the Conservative party:

> This has been a busy week for the platitude.
> If the new trade resulting from the visit of this mission ever reaches the volume of the cliches which have been expended in pursuit of it, there will need to be traffic lights installed in mid-Atlantic to regulate the traffic.

Another point in connection with the mission—I am not dwelling too much upon it—is simply this. I felt the minister was very evasive this week since his return from the United Kingdom on questions raised by the hon. member for Essex West, the hon. member for Coast-Capilano and the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet and others on the types of factories that were visited by this mission. The minister was present in the United Kingdom until the end of last week. He himself, in his statements to this house, has indicated that the first portion at least of the visits arranged to these British factories was arranged by what he described as an official committee, I think a committee acting under the direction of our high commissioner to the United Kingdom, Mr. George Drew. I feel that before we leave these estimates the minister should name the factories and the types of business done in those factories that the visit was officially arranged for by this committee.

I noted with some regret in the minister's remarks on Tuesday that in reference to the portion of the delegation that represented agriculture in this country they seemingly were directed in their travel tour in Britain to visits to their trade and occupation counterparts. Now, this I think is rather a surprise. I believe certainly the agricultural representatives in the house would have expected that their tour would have been directed more to possible purchasers of the products of their trade. Anyway, this has been certainly a very unusual trade mission because, unlike any other trade mission I have ever heard of previously, it seemed to have no thought of sales in mind.

I spoke of double talk, and I am going to give some illustrations to explain why I used that term. I think it was the Toronto Star which said that in all attitudes toward United Kingdom trade the present administration seems to have—and I quote—"a miracle of exquisite timing". Hon. members will recall that just prior to the arrival of the United Kingdom delegation in September, invited here to discuss expansion of trade, the Minister of Finance referred the textile trade to the tariff board anew.

Another illustration of the double talk of which I accuse the present administration is the fact that while they are flying the flag of British trade, so to speak, most of us know that at this very moment there are representatives of the government at Geneva discussing trade with the governments associated in GATT. Those delegates of Canada are asking for increased tariffs on such things of importance to the United Kingdom as iron and steel, in which the volume of trade amounted to $50 million last year, and pipes and tubes, in which the volume of trade was some $17 million. When we discuss this question of flag waving and sentiment with respect to trade, I simply want to say that I do not think anybody would accuse the former shrewd minister of trade and commerce of anything along these lines.

On the other hand, let us look at the record of trade between this country and the United Kingdom under his regime. In 1955 we bought British—that is what hon. members opposite are always preaching, buy British—to the extent of $401 million of goods from the United Kingdom. In 1956 that figure rose to $485 million. In the first half of 1957, with which the former administration was associated, purchases amounted to $260 million. I think that without talk and without flag waving there has been a very keen recognition of the value of this type of trade, and I question whether that is continuing in any substantial way today so far as actual dollars and cents are concerned.

A conference was held at Mont Tremblant early this fall. I know some of the consequences of that conference were rather shaking and shocking to my hon. friends opposite. I believe they came to learn that there was somewhat of a difference between rhetoric and reality. In any event, I feel that the House of Commons, discussing now the trade estimates of the new government, is entitled to information that so far has been hidden from parliament with respect to the pros and cons of the proposition presented by the British delegation at Mont Tremblant. Surely the minister will be able to tell the committee as we discuss this problem just what the proposition is all about, what the merits are and what the demerits might be.

I think the people of the country generally felt very disappointed with the new administration in this respect. This conference took place some time after they assumed office. I do not think there is any member of the house who will not agree that the Financial Post is most impartial in its criticism either of the former administration or of the present administration, but this paper had the opportunity to do something that we in the opposition have not had the opportunity to do. This paper, the chief paper in the country of this type, had a very competent observer at the conference, and on October 11 the Financial Post had this to say with respect to the Canadian representation at this very important conference:

> The unfortunate fact is that the Mont Tremblant conference between Canadian and British officials was a great flop. The whole story of what went on behind the scenes is now available. The British had prepared very thoroughly for the meeting. The Canadians had not.

I think we should expect the minister to make some answer to this indictment. I wish to refer to another publication which I think we also recognize as not being local in distribution, and which has a very experienced parliamentary correspondent. I refer to Macleans magazine. Blair Fraser refers to questions very properly asked the Minister of Finance by the representatives of the press following an outline of the trade proposals at the Mont Tremblant conference from the British delegates, proposals which had very substantial possibilities. Blair Fraser asserted that the Minister of Finance had been everything but frank with the journalists of the country when interviewed with respect to the implications of the British proposal, and went on to say:

> None of his stone-walling did much good. Rightly or wrongly, everybody in the room—

He had reference to the large delegation of representatives of the press.

> —was convinced that the reason he couldn't talk about Canada's proposals was that Canada had no proposals worth talking about.

Basically discussion of trade at the moment has a relation to diversion of imports from the United States to imports from the United Kingdom. During the present session there have already been very worth-while comments from this side of the house with respect to this possibility. I recall that the hon. member for Algoma East made a very important speech. Mr. Clark Davey, a press observer who is not noted for favouring Liberal assertions made in parliament, had this to say about the speech of the hon. member for Algoma East: "A devastating attack on Conservative trade policies." With respect to diversion I am in complete agreement with the hon. member for Algoma East when he said:

> I am not so much interested in diversion of trade as I am in building up and increasing trade.

I think that is something that would be supported generally by the members of the party to which I belong. With respect to the matter of double talk, I also point to the strong evidence that the administration has been talking not bilingually but certainly in double talk when it has talked differently to London and to Washington with respect to its intentions in the matter of the diversion of 15 per cent of our purchases from the United States. There is every indication that when they went to Washington they said to the officials there in a very pious manner, "Oh, dismiss this; this is long term, nothing immediate, not something about which you should get very excited."

That brings me, of course, to the very important discussions that did take place in Washington. A major portion of our trade is with our immediate neighbour. The conduct of Canadian relations with the United States is probably the greatest problem that faces any Canadian administration. It faced the former one. United States relations dominate all economic policy and vitally affect all business, trade and finance in this country to a very important degree.

Again, I think the results of that visit by the four cabinet ministers of the new administration were much less than would have been expected, having regard to the tough talk that we all remember from them during the election campaign. I think the very high expectations are certainly mocked by the very small achievement. In this respect again I cannot, from any personal observations, make any comments as to the result outside the communique that is normally provided after these conferences. But others who were there and who are independent, certainly politically, have made some comments. I do not choose to quote anyone who is known to be unduly critical of my Conservative friends who are sitting opposite to us at this moment. I refer now to Mr. Arthur Blakely, who I think is probably among the foremost noted journalistic critics of the former Liberal administration. With respect to this conference in Washington Mr. Blakely, writing in the Montreal Gazette of October 11, had this to say:

> The four Canadian cabinet ministers who went to Washington earlier this week to negotiate with Uncle Sam for the settlement of some mutual economic problems, came back empty handed.

Then he went on to say:

> There have been other pilgrimages to Washington which could be said to have produced nothing.

But it's doubtful if there have been any which could be said to have produced less than this one.

The Chairman: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I must inform him his time has expired.

Mr. Benidickson: Yes, Mr. Chairman; there will be other opportunities.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

The Chairman: Has the hon. member unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Yes, sure.

Mr. Benidickson: I thank the committee. I should like to refer to another report from a Canadian journalist following this Washington conference. I refer to Mr. Ed. Hadley, whom I had the pleasure of meeting myself when I was in a role somewhat similar to that of this delegation when I visited the United States a year previously. Mr. Hadley reports for the Montreal Star. Mr. Hadley said that Mr. Dillon, who is a well known New York investment dealer and who at the present time is assistant to U.S. state secretary Dulles, advising Mr. Dulles on economic affairs, had this to say with respect to the Canadian visit:

There will be no change in United States wheat disposal methods beyond that which halted barter deals last summer.

May I tell the committee that the information with respect to the change in United States policy concerning barter deals was available prior to the last election. I quote further from this press report from the Montreal Star correspondent:

The general climate on the wheat problem was better at the inter-cabinet meeting here than Mr. Dillon himself found it at Ottawa when he was there just before the election.

Mr. Hadley goes on to say:

Prime Minister Diefenbaker's suggestion for a 15 per cent switch of Canadian foreign purchasing from the United States to the United Kingdom was "played down" at the meeting here.

I must conclude my remarks, because I know there will be a further opportunity to speak on the individual items. I simply want to say to the minister, as I said in the beginning, that I felt there was much lacking in the information he gave us in his opening remarks. His department, as he said, is a most important one. It has been led in the past by Mr. Howe, a very distinguished Canadian whose achievements probably make it somewhat difficult for the new minister, but I am sure the new minister will apply to the department also conscientious activity.

I am sure the committee will expect to hear from him, while these estimates are before us, something about the policies of the administration with respect to uranium and atomic energy, something that I had hoped to deal with in some detail but time has not permitted; and the gas and oil export policy of the government, particularly with respect to possible approval of new pipe lines. I think all of us are very concerned today about any governmental support that might be given to research programs, particularly the sponsorship of students in scientific fields. I feel, too, we shall have to pursue a little beyond the remarks of the minister the references to the European free trade area, particularly now that Great Britain has indicated a likelihood of joining it. I believe there has been some change of attitude in relation to Canada's contribution to the Colombo plan. I should like to see a further review of that.

Perhaps the minister at this time could give us, even on an interim basis, some indication of the public and private investment to which we might look forward in 1958. I realize that this is normally the subject of a white paper that is produced in parliament in July and February of each year, but I am sure his very able staff has already given the future some review. I thought perhaps even an off the cuff prediction relating to this very important matter might come from the minister. I thank the committee for giving me some extra time for these comments respecting trade and commerce.

Mr. Zaplitny: Mr. Chairman, I found myself in agreement with at least some of the remarks made by the hon. member who just preceded me, particularly with respect to his opinions concerning trade with the United Kingdom. I will not pursue that point at this time, but rather will make some reference to the statement the Minister of Trade and Commerce made in opening his department today. May I at this time, the first opportunity to do so, express my good wishes to the minister for success, inasmuch as he was at one time a resident of the town in which I live.

Mr. Benidickson: I should have made the same comment, being Dauphin-born.

Mr. Zaplitny: It struck me that the minister had left out a great deal. I am not saying that as any particular criticism, because we all know that this is the first occasion on which the minister has presented his estimates. But it does seem strange that the minister, in introducing the department, seemed to leave out completely one very important wing of his department. That is, he made no reference whatever that I could detect to the agricultural side of his department. It could be said that in the main, matters dealing with agriculture would come under the Minister of Agriculture. However, when it comes to the wheat board, the marketing of grain, the setting of grain prices, those things come under the jurisdiction of this minister.

I was disappointed that at a time like this, when even members on the government side have recently expressed concern over the continuing crisis in agriculture, the minister had not one word to say as to the government's policy with regard to the wheat board, marketing, agricultural surpluses, or any of these allied subjects.

I will have occasion to refer to that a little later, but first I want to make a comment or two on what the minister did say.

He started off by talking about, and in fact he took some pride in, what this government had done. I am not using his exact words, but the import is the same. He said they had done more in a short time than had been done by any other government in the way of implementing trade policy. Certainly I do not wish to take away from the minister any of his success, but when he speaks about the trade policy of this government I respectfully submit that he is talking about something which has not yet been announced. What is the government's trade policy?

We on this side of the house have been patiently waiting until the opening of this department's estimates in the hope that the Minister of Trade and Commerce would get up and state what the government's trading policy actually is. He failed to do so, but instead told us that he takes credit for having implemented such a trade policy. I hope before this debate ends the minister will take care of that great omission and let this house know what is the trade policy, because at the present time there is a grave doubt in this house and in the country as to the existence of such a thing.

I am saying this out of kindness to the minister. As a colleague from Manitoba I am really concerned about his future in the government—

Mr. Churchill: Let me worry about that.

Mr. Zaplitny: —because there is a trend going on which I think holds certain dangers for the minister. In the past his predecessor in office was referred to as the minister of everything, perhaps with some justification, because he had the Department of Defence Production to look after and he had charge of a great many branches and divisions of the government, but I notice that in the new set-up defence production has been handed over to the Minister of Public Works, and the setting of whatever has been set about trade policy so far has been done by the Minister of Finance. The conference at Mont Tremblant was left to his tender care and was handled with what can only be described as disastrous dexterity, and I am afraid that little by little the Minister of Trade and Commerce will find that his powers and responsibilities are going to be chipped away until he finds he is not going to be the minister of anything.

For this reason I think it would be very desirable for him to discover, first of all, what is the trade policy of his government, if such a thing exists, and to relate this policy to this house and then do his best to bring it into effect.

The minister made reference to the commonwealth conference which is to be held. Well, of course, we cannot debate something which has not taken place, but there has been a preview of what might take place at that conference in the Mont Tremblant conference; and there, as was pointed out by the hon. member who spoke before me, an offer was made by the government of Great Britain, through its representative, and the Canadian government absolutely ignored that offer. In fact the Minister of Finance did worse than that; he threw cold water on it before it had even been properly examined.

I know we may have differences of opinion, perhaps mainly in degree, as to what could be done and how quickly it could be done with regard to the establishment of a free trade area as between the United Kingdom and Canada, and I realize there are many considerations which must be taken into account. However, prior to June 10 the members who support the present government and the ministers of that government were most vocal across the country, and even on many occasions in this house, about the desirability—in fact almost the desperate desirability—of negotiations and trade with the United Kingdom. They had some pretty strong words to say on occasion, although I will not take the time of the committee to repeat them now since they are all on the record and easily found.

However, the impression was left in the country that the present Prime Minister, as soon as possible after the election and provided he was then Prime Minister, was going to make some sensational offer in order to increase trade between the United Kingdom and Canada. Well, the election came and went and the government sat tight, made no offer whatsoever. Then the government of the United Kingdom made its offer, which I still believe was a very statesmanlike one in all the circumstances. Instead of acting on it, instead of even giving some lead on the principle of that proposal, the government immediately started to scurry for their foxholes. Not only did they scurry for their foxholes, but they pulled the holes in after them. Since then there has been a sort of iron curtain drawn around the whole question with, once in a while, the Minister of Finance coming out with some statement or other, but no clear-cut policy and no statement of principle on this question from the Prime Minister or anyone else.

Here I thought there would be a grand opportunity—and I was sitting here in eager anticipation—for the Minister of Trade and Commerce, having just returned from Great Britain where apparently he was very well received and where he said the response to the trade mission was just out of this world, to rise in his place and place before this house the attitude of the government toward the offer. Instead of that we have a travelogue of what this trade mission was supposed to be doing in Great Britain, so I suppose we will have to confine our remarks to that phase of the matter.

What has he told us about the details of the trade mission to the United Kingdom? He has told us the mission had a twofold purpose; first, they were supposed to check on the supply or potential supply of goods which could be produced; second—and I want the hon. members of this house to mark these words, as they are of great interest—to draw attention to the possibility of trading with Canada. Now, when you compare those words with some of the thunderous phrases heard in this house and throughout this country as to how we were letting down the United Kingdom and how there was almost a question of refusing to trade with that nation, it does seem a little strange. Here we have the minister coming directly from the United Kingdom and saying that one of the purposes of the mission was to draw attention to the possibility of trade with Canada. That, Mr. Chairman, is the understatement of the year.

If all that mission was supposed to do was just draw attention to this possibility, then I respectfully submit that we could have saved a great deal of money and trouble by having the Prime Minister write a letter to the chancellor of the exchequer or the Prime Minister of Great Britain in which he could have drawn attention to it.

I believe there is a very serious omission in this whole business. The minister has repeatedly stated that the chief purpose of the mission was to arrange for purchases by Canada from the United Kingdom. Well, I have no objection to that; I would like to see a great many such purchases made, but surely the Minister of Trade and Commerce did not head this delagation simply as a sort of glorified purchasing agent for Canadian business. Surely he must have had in mind, or the government must have had in mind, that his was a department of trade and commerce, not just commerce. He must have forgotten the trade part of it. The people who are primary producers in this country, such as those engaged in agriculture, wood products, base metals and many others, certainly expected the Minister of Trade and Commerce to have made at the same time some arrangements for the export of Canadian primary products to Great Britain.

As a matter of fact when he made his report we addressed specific questions to the minister on what was being done in that field and what discussions were held by the members of the trade mission, government officials or the minister himself with respect to increasing the flow of Canadian primary products to Great Britain. His answer in every case was that the chief purpose of the mission was not to sell but to buy. Well, now, I do not think that is good enough. We have a minister and a Department of Trade and Commerce, and we expect some trade and not just commerce.

We expected that the minister should have been a trader and should have taken advantage of his visit to the United Kingdom to enter into negotiations, to have initiated at least preliminary talks about trade agreements that could be entered into—long-term bulk trade agreements—in order to assist the export of primary products from this country, which is one of the essentials in our trade picture.

Then the minister also stated—and that was the only part of his report that I thought contained any reference at all to government policy—that it was the policy of the government that they would not interfere with the trade between Canada and any other country. Of course at that point the minister was really humourous, and I am glad it was he who said that rather than the Minister of Finance. The Minister of Trade and Commerce, being a westerner, at least has a sense of humour; and certainly he must have seen the humour in that statement. When he states that it is the policy of this government, or of any Conservative government for that matter, not to interfere in trade between Canada and any other country, he is stating something that is obviously funny.

When one looks at our tariff structure; when one looks at the elaborate tariff structure that has been built up over the years, chiefly by Conservative administrations, one certainly can see that is not a policy of non-interference. Every day this government, through its actions and its tariff policy, is seriously and substantially interfering with trade between Canada and all other countries, even with respect to the United Kingdom.

That again points up the humour of the situation, or the irony of it. We send a trade mission over to Great Britain ostensibly to increase purchases in that country for export to Canada; and while the Minister of Trade and Commerce is over there promoting that phase of it, the Minister of Finance here at home is busy trying to find ways and means of preventing imports from Great Britain by making, very obviously, plans to increase tariffs against British-made goods.

Look at our tariff structure today. Are we, on the one hand, going to ask the manufacturers of Britain to send certain articles for sale here in Canada, and at the same time point out that we have a duty of 20 per cent or 25 per cent against those goods? When we are saying to them, "We want to trade with you", on the other hand the Minister of Finance is saying to them, "We are trying our best to keep your products out of Canada". That is supposed to be a policy of non-interference with trade. That is supposed to be the policy of the present administration.

I have quoted figures previously and I want to remind the house of them again. In the last 10-year period alone the consumers of Canada have paid in duties on imports coming into this country from all countries in the world just about $4 billion. That is supposed to be a policy of non-interference on the part of the government.

I believe there is a policy they could follow. I believe the policy of this parliament should be designed to remove, so far as it is possible and practical, the trade barriers between this country and the United Kingdom in the first instance; and having accomplished that, we should continue to do so with all commonwealth countries and with as many other countries in the world as we can.

In other words, as an expanding country engaged in primary production to the extent that we are engaged in it, and that being the basis and foundation of the wealth of this country, I believe our whole policy should be aimed at the removal of trade barriers. But I am very much afraid that the policy of the present government is the very opposite. Their whole proposition of, on the one hand, pretending to be expanding trade with the United Kingdom and other commonwealth countries and on the other hand of doing their best to prevent that trade through the tariff structure, is one that I think they are going to find will lead to disaster.

It is still fresh in the memories of the Canadian people that the period from 1930 to 1935, when we had the second last Conservative regime in Canada, was the time when we had possibly the highest tariff structure in the history of this country and was also the time when we had the greatest number of unemployed, the most disastrous farm prices, and the greatest depression. I am not going to lay at the doorstep of the tariff policy the whole depression, but certainly the two were very closely related.

There are those who sometimes repeat slogans rather than express opinions and who say, "We must see to it that other countries do not export their unemployment to Canada; we must have protection". We must examine slogans of that kind very carefully, because we must always remember that for every dollar's worth of imports that come into this country, eventually we can pay for it only by a dollar's worth of exports. To the extent that we are going to pay for our imports with exports, that in itself is providing employment. Certainly the last flirtation we had with high tariffs in this country in 1930 to 1935 taught us the lesson that you cannot prevent unemployment by raising your tariff structure.

What the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River pointed out in his speech—and I agree with him heartily—is that we sometimes forget about the internal trade of our country. If you will look at the figures and will look over our economic history for the last 30 or 40 years, I believe you will find that the level of employment or the level of prosperity in this country has been directly related to our internal trade. I am not discounting at all the importance of our external trade, but the level of internal activity as between Canadian and Canadian is still the basis and foundation of our full employment in this country.

I do not want to spend all my time on this particular phase of the matter, Mr. Chairman, but before I leave this question I want to point this out. When some of us in this house suggest that some steps could be taken and taken immediately to begin implementing an area of freer trade between the United Kingdom and Canada, there is a place to begin. I think I can give the minister a clue as to where he could begin to the general advantage of all Canadians, regardless of their occupation.

I should like to refer him to a statement made by the commissioner of the Combines Investigation Act when he was reporting upon his investigation into rubber products. This was in 1952, and is to be found at page 683 of that report. After having described the methods by which companies in that field of production had made use of agreements, had conspired to raise the prices of their products unfairly, and had exploited the public to the extent where they were actually breaking the law of Canada, he had this to say, and this is how it is related to our tariff policy:

> Another detrimental aspect of the arrangements is related to tariffs. There is substantial tariff protection on most of the products with which the arrangements are concerned. It was of particular significance in respect of certain mechanical rubber goods and tires and tubes. Now when domestic manufacturers are competing behind a tariff barrier, the tariff is serving its intended purpose of protecting the domestic industry against prices from without the country which the domestic industry, in spite of reasonable efficiency, cannot meet or better; and by force of such domestic competition the cost to the consuming public of the tariff protection is minimized. But when domestic prices are set, behind the tariff barrier, by arrangement, then the safeguard provided by competition is absent; the common price tends to be the largest price which the tariff will permit; the cost of the tariff protection to the consuming public is maximized; and, if it is not true that the tariff protection is higher than is actually necessary to protect the domestic industry, the companies privy to the arrangement have at least given the consuming public strong reason to believe that such is the case.

In a word that means there are certain areas of commerce in this country which have been investigated by the officials of the Combines Investigation Act, and it has been found that behind the tariff protection which has been provided for them—perhaps in some cases legitimate protection—they have used that shield of protection to set up monopolies and combines and have exploited the Canadian public through conspiracy to the point of having broken the Canadian law.

In the past the previous government and this government, when they caught up with some of these law-breakers, have taken them to court and after having found, through investigation, that as a result of their combines they have fleeced the public of several million dollars they have whipped them with a reed, fined them $10,000 and told them to go back home and carry on their conspiracy.

That is how effective the Combines Investigation Act has been, but here is a method by which the government could effectively protect the public interest. Where we find that tariff protection is being used for the purpose of forming combines and monopolies and abusing that protection, there is every justification for the government to take immediate action to remove the protection and expose these law-breakers to the effect of an alternative source of supply. Here is a field in which the government could act immediately toward the building up of a free trade area.

I would now like to refer to the other phase of what I mentioned earlier. That was the complete lack of any reference in the minister's opening speech to the agricultural aspect of his department. Time will not permit me to go into complete detail on this question, and indeed it will not be necessary because several of my colleagues are more qualified than I to go into much greater detail in discussing that particular field, but I do want to draw attention to at least a few of the things that the farm organizations of this country, not only in western Canada but in eastern Canada as well, have considered important enough to have included in their briefs. They have recently sent delegations to the government to present their views to the minister and the cabinet generally. One of those was the brief submitted to the Prime Minister and members of the cabinet on August 15, 1957 by the interprovincial farm union council, which is the co-ordinating body of farm union organizations in, I believe, five provinces at the present time.

Almost the first if indeed not the very first recommendation in that brief, draws attention to the situation with regard to the price of wheat and other grains; and after pointing out that the producers of grain, as a result of the material increase in the cost of production, have not actually been receiving a price for their grain which would bring it anywhere near parity or anywhere near a fair share of the national income, the interprovincial farm union council, as will be found on page 4 of the brief, recommends the following:

> 1. (a) An immediate interim adjustment payment of 20 cents per bushel on wheat on the 1956-57 crop year deliveries—

That is to be made by the government or by parliament. The recommendation continues:

> (b) A payment on oats and barley to bring the net farm prices to producers to a level bearing the same relationship to parity as 20 cents per bushel on wheat.

In other words what they are asking is to have this parliament recognize the fact that the grain producers of this country for a considerable number of years now have been selling their product to the Canadian public and subsidizing the Canadian public by the fact that they are obtaining for their product less than the fair price relationship as between the prices of their products and all prices. They are asking this government to recommend to the house the establishment of an adjustment price or a deficiency payment of 20 cents per bushel on wheat and a proportionately relative amount on oats and barley.

This is a clear-cut proposition. This is not tied to any long-range plans with regard to any agricultural products. This does not interfere in any way with the Agricultural Prices Support Act or with the proposed resolution which is still gathering moss on the order paper and which the government once in a while brings out, dusts off and exhibits to the house and puts away in mothballs again. It has nothing to do with these things directly. This is a specific proposal and certainly I thought the Minister of Trade and Commerce, as the minister under whose jurisdiction the Canadian wheat board and therefore the policies of the wheat board come, would have had something to say in connection with this request.

This is a request which concerns many hundreds of thousands of farmers in Canada, but today not a word was said about it. Apparently the minister thought if he ignored it completely perhaps no one else would raise the question and he could quietly get himself out of an awkward spot.

Mr. Churchill: That thought never entered my head.

Mr. Zaplitny: If that was his intention I can assure him the subject will be discussed loudly and at some length by some of the hon. members who represent agricultural constituencies.

I wish now to refer to something else in the same brief which I consider to be most important and to which the minister made no reference whatsoever. That is the question of marketing boards. There has been a great deal of talk about different methods and means by which we could bring agricultural products including grain up to the level of general prices in this country, or what we generally refer to as a parity price system. One of the methods that has been suggested has been through the payment of adjustment or deficiency payments, or whatever term may be used to describe a payment from the consolidated revenue fund when the prices of farm products fall below parity.

In my opinion, and I am sure that opinion is shared by a great many hon. members in this house, the best method of administering that type of policy if parliament should adopt the parity price policy would be through a system of marketing boards, because there you would have the administrative machinery which would make it possible for this parliament or the treasury to deal with all the farmers who would be part and parcel of the marketing boards, and in that way pay a sufficient amount of money into the funds of the marketing boards when the situation required it so they could pass it on through what might be called dividends or patronage payments to the farmers who would sell their products to those boards.

In their proposal concerning this subject the interprovincial farm union council made three or four separate specific recommendations, as will be found on page 16 of their brief, all of which are extremely interesting and important. I regret that the minister had not anything to say about that particular phase of their recommendations today, and I hope he will deal with the subject before this debate is finished.

The Chairman: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I must advise him that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Proceed.

The Chairman: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the committee?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Zaplitny: Thank you. I was merely going to refer to the last recommendation in connection with the disposal of surplus agricultural products, and of course wheat looms large in that department. In order to telescope what I have to say into a much briefer period than it would otherwise require I can say only this; that the farm organizations in this country—and I agree with them—are daily expressing greater concern over the fact that this administration, with respect to the disposal of surplus agricultural products and particularly grain, seems to be acting almost exactly in the way the previous administration acted. That is to either pretend that the problem does not exist, or when they do recognize the problem to do nothing but complain about what the United States is doing.

I think the minister will agree that it is time this government found a policy of its own, a policy much more constructive and useful than merely crying about what the government of the United States is doing in the disposal of their surpluses. We may even have to eat our pride to some extent and admit that they may have been doing the right things while we have been sitting back and criticizing them. It might be a good idea to adopt some of their policies but, better still, to bring about policies of our own which would be equally effective in our own country and perhaps more successful. Thank you for the privilege you have extended to me.

Mr. Quelch: Mr. Chairman, at the outset of my remarks I would like to congratulate the minister upon taking over the Department of Trade and Commerce. I wish him every success because it is essential that he be successful; otherwise there may be serious repercussions throughout the country.

The hon. member for Dauphin expressed concern about the minister's department being whittled down. Personally I think it is a good thing that it is being whittled down. I think it should be whittled down to just trade and commerce, because I think trade and commerce are sufficiently important to justify the full time of the minister. As a matter of fact, I think it would be a good thing if grain were taken from the Department of Trade and Commerce and put under agriculture. There is too much overlapping and I would like to see grain brought under the Agricultural Prices Support Act.

When the minister took office he found wheat piled up over the country. I just want to make a few passing references to grain before going on to the general question of trade. As the minister is aware, during the past 10 years grain growers' costs have gone up by 45 per cent, while the price of grain has dropped by 20 per cent. We feel that the immediate need is for an expansion of storage, terminal and off-site, to enable the farmers to deliver more of their grain and, secondly, to have a satisfactory support price under grain because, after all, the grain grower in Canada is the only grain grower in the world who has to take world market prices for his grain. He has to compete not merely with farmers in other countries, he has actually to compete with the treasuries of other countries, and this puts the grain grower of this country in a very difficult position.

This is why I would like to see grain brought under the Agricultural Prices Support Act so that it might be protected under that general formula. If the price of grain were supported under the formula of the Agricultural Prices Support Act it would be around $2.37 today, according to the bureau of statistics; that is, using the base period 1943 to 1945.

Some of my colleagues will be dealing with this matter at greater length and, therefore, I should just like to leave the question of wheat by emphasizing the fact that the only real solution to our grain-marketing problem is the expansion of markets at fair prices. If you accomplish that practically all of the other problems relating to grain will disappear over a period of time.

We look upon the wheat situation as merely a symptom of the weaknesses in our past trade policies. So long as we had a strong sellers' market everything operated satisfactorily. But just as soon as the situation started to toughen up we ran into difficulty. We have lost many of our markets and I would say that the loss of those markets was due to the rigidity in our trade policies. We had got ourselves into a groove and we were not prepared to get out of that groove and take the action necessary to meet the changing conditions in the world. For example, we have continued the triangular pattern of trade between Great Britain, the United States and Canada. Hon. members will recall that that was outlined back in 1946 by the then minister of finance, when he said—and it can be found at page 764 of Hansard:

> We must be able to use the proceeds of our exports to the United Kingdom and the continent of Europe in paying our own bills and debts in the United States.

And that has, generally speaking, been the policy ever since. The former government was very much interested in selling Britain or Europe more goods, but they showed very little interest in bringing imports from Europe into this country. Therefore from time to time we have had protests from various ministers from Great Britain pointing out that unless Canada was prepared to achieve a greater degree of balance with that country it would not be possible for Britain to expand her imports from this country. For instance, just last year when Sir Anthony Eden was over here he is reported by the Ottawa Journal of February 7, 1956, as follows:

> Prime Minister Sir Anthony Eden told a press conference today that the imbalance in trade between Canada and the United Kingdom—two to one in favour of Canada—must be rectified if that trade is to continue growing.

Therefore, Mr. Chairman, we think it is very important to depart from that triangular pattern of trade and recognize the fact that trade is a two-way street. If we want other nations to buy from us we have to buy from them and do everything we can to establish a balance of trade. I think the present situation is one that calls for a good deal of concern. We had an adverse balance of trade with the U.S.A. last year of $1,283 million; with the world, $842 million; with the United Kingdom, a favourable balance of trade of $333 million. We used that $333 million, of course, to help pay the adverse balance of trade with the U.S.A.

There are some people who ask, why should we worry about an imbalance of trade? We have investments from the United States of America, and those investments will pay the losses suffered under the adverse balance of trade. It is interesting to remember that an increase in foreign investment invariably means an increase in your adverse balance of trade. The reason is obvious. Firms in this country, and especially firms with parent companies in the United States, obtain their funds from the United States and they invariably spend a large portion of those funds in the United States to bring goods into this country, and the more investment there is by the United States the greater will be the imbalance of trade.

I was interested in a statement made by the chairman of A. V. Roe (Canada) Limited, as quoted in the Ottawa Journal of October 25, 1957, regarding this adverse balance of trade. He said:

"You have only to glance at Canada's staggering trade deficit with the United States", Sir Roy said in an address to the Roe annual meeting, "to see where opportunities lie.

This represents a serious problem for Canada but it also offers a rare oportunity to Canadian industry.

In that vast deficit (of more than $1 billion annually) there must be many millions of dollars worth of products that can and should be made in this country.

Canada must produce more of the products which she uses and which she now imports. Your population is increasing by 1 million every 30 months—one of the highest rates of growth in the world. If this is to be maintained, and it must be if Canada is to grow, then more and more new jobs must be found".

It is interesting to note that at the very time that statement was made we had around 208,000 unemployed in Canada. I believe the figure is greater than that today.

Of course these unemployed could be used to produce many of the goods to which Sir Roy Dobson has reference in his speech.

I think it is very unfortunate that at the very time when we have this large adverse balance of trade and it is so essential that we should increase the production in Canada of goods which we import from the United States the Bank of Canada decided to impose restrictions on the expansion of credit that had the effect of reducing the rate of our production because there was never a time when we should have expanded our production more than now, at the time we have this large adverse balance of trade. There is good reason to say that we should have used the surplus labour we had to expand the production of those goods which at the present time we are importing from the United States.

I think everybody will agree that the logical solution of the problem of imbalance of trade is either to sell more to the United States or to buy less from them. It is not so easy to sell more unless the United States is willing to buy more, but on the other hand we have control over the other aspect and could buy less. We could either do that, as Sir Roy Dobson suggests, by expanding our production of those things which we are at present buying from the United States, and of course that would be the desirable thing to do, or otherwise we could buy less by purchasing certain goods we are buying from the United States from countries with which we have a favourable balance of trade.

[Mr. Quelch.]

Therefore I was very glad to see the government send a mission to the United Kingdom to try to expand our purchases in that country, and I am not going to be too critical of it being a buying mission. If we want to sell more to the United Kingdom we have got to buy more. In view of the fact that we have had a substantial favourable balance of trade for a number of years, the first thing is to rectify that by buying more and I believe, as I think the minister has suggested, that if we can create a situation where we buy enough from Britain to bring about a balance of trade then Britain will be willing to buy more from us. When Sir Anthony Eden was in Canada last year he stressed the fact that if Canada would buy more from Britain that country would buy more from us and desires to do so. Therefore I think we are doing the logical thing. We are first of all trying to balance trade with Britain by buying more from them and we have every reason to believe that if we accomplish that Britain will then buy more from us.

We have always insisted that nations should endeavour to bring about the greatest degree of balance in their trade with other nations on a bilateral basis. I recall that every time I suggested that in the house in the past the former minister of trade and commerce used to ridicule the idea. He would say that it was nonsense to suggest having a balance of trade bilaterally, that it had to be on a multilateral basis. It is a fine thing to have a balance on a multilateral basis but if you cannot the first thing to do is to try to achieve the greatest degree of balance on a bilateral basis. I recall that the former deputy minister of trade and commerce emphasized that fact back in 1947. Mr. M. W. Mackenzie in an article in the Foreign Trade magazine of October 9, 1947, had this to say:

Now that the multilateral system of payments has suffered a serious breakdown for the second time, or perhaps one should say for the third time in the last generation, Canada and all other countries that are engaged heavily in international trade are facing a difficult stage in their affairs. The balance of trade between pairs of countries—that is, the bilateral balance—has become a matter of first importance and it will remain so until the mechanism of the multilateral system has once more been placed in good order.

We were never able to convince the former minister of trade and commerce that that was an objective worth trying to achieve but the former deputy minister, who has been spoken of very highly in the house, I know, considered it advisable in these difficult times.

Times were difficult then and so far as our imbalance of trade is concerned they are even more difficult today.

So, as I say, I am very glad to see that the government at least is trying to achieve that degree of balance bilaterally in so far as the United Kingdom is concerned. If by transferring some of our purchases from the United States to Britain we are able to make it possible for Britain to achieve a balance of trade with us, it will also help us to achieve a greater degree of balance with the United States. In other words, we would be killing two birds with one stone and we would be departing from that triangular pattern of trade that in my opinion has done so much to lose us markets in the United Kingdom.

I think it is time that we raised international trade to its true purpose, the exchange of goods are services between nations of a mutually advantageous character. I think we should be prepared to accept foreign currency in payment for our exports up to the amount of our favourable balance of trade with any nation under a firm agreement to spend it on the nation's goods and services or trade the credit to another nation. Some hon. members will recall that in 1945 we had a prolonged debate on the Bretton Woods agreement. The Bretton Woods agreement gave creditor nations the right to demand payment in their own currency without any obligation whatsoever to accept goods of the importing nation. We stressed then that if that type of policy should continue one of two things was bound to happen. Either the debtor nation, the importing nation, would be forced to go farther and farther into debt to the exporting nation or they would be forced to curtail imports from the creditor nation. At that time when we were debating the bill in the banking and commerce committee I put the matter in these words as found on page 131 of the proceedings of that committee:

> What we want in the act mainly is a provision that a debtor nation in order to pay for its imports shall be recognized as paying for them when they establish a credit within their country in favour of a creditor nation and that that credit can be used to buy anything purchased within that country. Then if the creditor nation is not willing to accept goods from a nation with which it has a credit, if it desires to trade on a multilateral basis it may take the credit established on that basis for the credit of another country on a multilateral basis. So I say if the great industrialized nations are really sincere in this matter they should have shown it at this time and been willing to have an article to that effect put in the Bretton Woods agreement.

Unfortunately, however, that was not done. We continued on the basis of the triangular pattern of trade and as a consequence we have lost many of our markets in Europe, not because those nations do not desire to buy from us but because they lack the dollars for the very simple reason that we insist upon exporting more goods to them than we are willing to buy from them. Once again I say I think we are on the right track when we try to expand our purchases from the sterling area.

No one is suggesting that the Canadian exporter should have to accept sterling. We realize that the individual exporter cannot accept sterling. I should imagine the procedure would be that the exporter would draw bills in sterling on the British importer, discount them with his local bank and the bank would then discount them with the federal agency. The federal agency would then have a claim against sterling and would be able to make that sterling available to Canadian importers of British goods. We have consistently urged in the house the acceptance of inconvertible sterling. It is no good accepting ordinary sterling because if you are going to accept what is known as American account sterling it probably means you will be converting that sterling back into dollars and you might as well have taken dollars in the first place. What we think should be done is that there should be an agreement to accept sterling from Britain under the firm undertaking that that sterling will be used to buy goods of that nation. If that is done, I think we will find Britain is far more interested in our accepting inconvertible sterling than they are in our accepting American account sterling which may be converted at any time or on any day into dollars.

The former minister of trade and commerce and the former minister of finance were very much opposed to the idea of the acceptance of sterling. As a matter of fact, I remember earlier they used to try to ridicule the suggestion. They continued ridiculing the idea until the United States put into force their surplus disposal policy. They were then very critical of the United States for initiating such a program, and criticized it time and again. I understand that the present Minister of Trade and Commerce also is somewhat critical of the United States disposal policy.

I do not believe we really have any grounds for being critical of the United States in putting that policy into force. I feel it is time we broadened our policies out along somewhat similar lines. May I remind the minister of the background of United States surplus disposal programs? The minister may recall that back in 1948 or 1949 surpluses were starting to cause a great deal of concern. This matter had been referred to the Food and Agriculture Organization. The director general of the Food and Agriculture Organization then appointed a committee of six experts to draft proposals for handling surpluses, and ways and means by which those surpluses might be distributed to other nations. These experts come up with a proposal known as the international commodity clearing house.

I want to draw the minister's attention to the functions of that clearing house because what the United States is doing today is along very similar lines. It is interesting to note that these proposals were rejected by the member nations. They were advised that one of the reasons the proposals should be rejected was that each nation could put the financial proposals into force themselves without having an international commodity clearing house. Let the minister note what the functions of that international commodity clearing house would have been. Mind you, these were proposals drawn up by a committee of experts under the director general of the Food and Agriculture Organization. The functions were:

(1) Subject to provisions outlined below, the purchase of stocks of commodities that are in surplus in the country in which those stocks appear.

(2) The negotiation of sales in inconvertible currencies in order to assist in maintaining the flow of trade during periods of exchange disequilibrium; such payments being guaranteed by the buying countries against losses from exchange depreciation.

(3) The negotiation of sales at special prices below the market to countries in need, under strictly defined conditions of use; for example, for relief purposes, special nutritional programs, or for development projects.

(4) As a long run function, the holding of stocks acquired in periods of surplus as reserves to protect the interests of consumers in periods of shortage.

(5) The negotiation of bilateral or multilateral trading agreements, or exchanges of commodities on a barter basis.

The minister will note that these functions outlined for the international commodity clearing house are the very things that the United States today are doing under their disposal program. As I say, at the time this program was turned down by the member nations of FAO they had been advised of a number of reasons why it should be turned down. Under paragraph (d), we find:

That the financial functions proposed for the international commodity clearing house could be performed by the governments directly involved.

The United States was one of the governments involved. The United States are today doing the very thing they were advised could be done by member nations of the Food and Agriculture Organization. I do not feel, therefore, we are in a very good position to criticize the United States for doing what they are doing today. I would suggest that instead of criticizing the United States what we should do is adopt whatever features there are in that policy that might be advantageous to this country. I believe we could very well accept inconvertible currencies from any nation to the extent necessary to provide for balancing trade with that nation. I am not suggesting we go beyond that. If we are agreed that it should be the purpose of international trading to exchange goods and services upon a basis of mutual advantage, then surely we should be willing either to balance our trade with nations or accept their currency to the extent necessary to provide that balance. We would thus remove a lot of the annoyances that are so often created between nations.

As an alternative to accepting foreign currency or sterling, I think we should be prepared to make advances of credit through the Bank of Canada to purchasing nations for the purchase of Canadian goods. The purchasing nation would be under an obligation to give Canada a prior claim on its exportable production, but should be required only to retire the advance of credit at the rate and to the extent Canada chooses to exercise its claim against the exportable goods. In other words, Canada would not have the right to demand payment in dollars. On the other hand, she would be free to exchange the credits for goods of another nation with which the debtor nation has a favourable balance of trade. Of course, the importing nation should be prepared to guarantee the rate of exchange on their currency.

As I have already stated, I think the government is to be commended for their effort to do something about the serious imbalance of trade by reducing our purchases from the United States and expanding our purchases from the sterling area. But I think most people will agree that probably that is a very long-term program. I noticed one of the British officials says there is no reason why it would not be possible to expand British purchases to $1 billion. This would be getting along pretty close to the objective of the Prime Minister, but it was pointed out that that may take many years. I feel we could expedite this matter by being willing to accept a certain amount of inconvertible sterling.

I hope the minister will not just brush it aside like the former minister. He must realize the people of the United States are good businessmen. They look upon this as good business. They are not doing it because it is philanthropic. They are doing it because they think it is good business for themselves. Let us remember it is having this effect. It is making surplus food available to the hungry people of the world and that, in itself, is certainly a worth-while objective. At the same time, under the United States program, the farmer who produces that surplus food is getting fair prices. I hope the minister will give greater consideration to that program.

Mr. Stick: Mr. Chairman, I was very much interested this morning in the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I listened to him with a great deal of attention. I regretted that he did not give us the forecasts we used to be given by the former minister of trade and commerce when he outlined the trading position of our country and gave us his views on the expansion of industry, as well as the amount of capital that would be invested. In other words, during the presentation of the estimates of this department we had a forecast of Canadian trade for some considerable time in the future. The minister in his wisdom or otherwise neglected to do that this morning. I regretted it, and I listened with a great deal of attention to his statement. I have not found very much in it that one could take home and think about. As a matter of fact the only commendable thing I could find about this statement was that it was so brief.

There is one part of the statement by the minister with which I agree and that was his tribute paid to the staff of his department, built up I might say by years of Liberal administration. I have had experience with the staff of this department and can readily agree with the minister when he pays tribute to their earnest efforts both at home and abroad. He said in effect that the purpose of the trade commissioners' service is to advance Canadian export trade and he also paid tribute to the personnel of that service. Then if this is correct, and I believe it to be correct as I believe the minister to be sincere in his tribute, why the necessity of sending the trade mission to England since we have such an efficient staff already over there which can inform the trade of Great Britain as to our requirements.

Now I understand statements have been made by the right hon. Prime Minister and other members of the government that it is the intention to transfer 15 per cent of our imports from the United States to Great Britain. Now to be fair I think that is a commendable idea but if the policy of this government is anti-United States to that extent it also raises a great deal of fears in my mind. I have no objection to transferring 15 per cent of this trade from the United States to Great Britain if we are not killing ourselves in the process.

Let us look at this trade position from a commonsense standpoint. First of all may I say that the people of Great Britain are not going to buy from Canada or anywhere else if they can buy cheaper elsewhere. We in Newfoundland have been trading with Great Britain for hundreds of years and we understand their trading position and know how they trade. I have a situation in my riding which is rather unusual and perhaps may be of interest to the members of this house and to the people of Canada. We had an unusual ice blockade around our coast this year. This does happen once in a while, and because of this tremendous blockade our national industry was interfered with. When I refer to our national industry I mean, of course, our fisheries industry which was affected to such an extent that our lobster fishing failed in large part, our salmon fishing failed and our cod fishing, which is our main fish product, was also interfered with. This brought about a rather serious condition in the fishing industry in a large part of Newfoundland, particularly in my own riding.

Now our fishermen, who usually give up the voyage either in the months of August or September when they go, as we say, into the lumber woods and work through September, October, November and December coming home for Christmas and thereby earning sufficient to provide for their needs and those of their families during the winter, were faced with a different situation. We have been exporting thousands of cords of pulpwood to Great Britain for the last 20 years and some of us on this side of the house agreed with the Conservative party when they said we should process our own raw material in this country. We have two large paper mills in Newfoundland but we have never begrudged Great Britain buying this material from us because we wanted to help them. This year, just as our fishermen were preparing to go into the lumber woods to earn their daily bread for the winter, we were informed by one of the large paper companies —the larger of the two in Newfoundland— that they had laid off 700 men, thus adding to our rather serious unemployment situation. When they were asked why they were not exporting this pulpwood to Great Britain —let it be understood that we exported this material during the war and at other times to help the paper industry of Great Britain and have made no complaint about it—we were informed that Great Britain was buying the pulpwood elsewhere. When we asked why they were doing so we were promptly told Great Britain could get it cheaper elsewhere.

Now this illustration bears out the point I made a moment ago, that Great Britain will buy wherever she can buy cheapest.

I am very much concerned about this anti-United States trade policy which the government is pursuing and the trouble it may cause in some instances because we in Newfoundland, for example, export our fish products to the United States and in fact that country is our main market. In the past we have had great trouble with the United States in persuading them not to put up the tariff on our fish and I would like to quote now from a statement which I have received from the economic survey service, Department of Fisheries. This was given to me when I first came up here for the session so it really does not have anything to do with my preparing for this debate. The report reads as follows:

Imports of groundfish fillets, including blocks and slabs for the production of fish sticks, into the United States amounted to about 138 million pounds in 1956. Imports from Canada, as in previous years constituted the most important source, reached a total of 99.8 million pounds, an increase of about 3.4 million pounds over 1955 and accounted for approximately 72 per cent of the total imports from all sources.

During 1956, 38.9 million pounds of blocks and slabs were imported into the U.S.A., of which Canada supplied 29.6 million pounds.

The United States tariff act of 1930 imposed a duty of 2½ cents a pound on imported groundfish fillets. This was reduced under the 1939 trade agreement with Canada to 1⅞ cents per pound; this reduced rate to apply on an annual quota of either 15 million pounds or 15 per cent of the average annual domestic consumption during the preceding three years, whichever is the greater. Imports in excess of the quota remain dutiable at the rate of 2½ cents per pound. Since the advent of blocks and slabs made from groundfish fillets, this product has been included under the same tariff classification item. These tariff rates were bound under GATT in both 1948 and 1951.

In 1955, the United States imposed a duty of 20 per cent and 30 per cent on uncooked and cooked fish sticks respectively—a rate which effectively prevented Canada from shipping this type of product into the U.S.A.

Of the total quantity of groundfish fillets entitled to entry into the United States in any calendar year at the rate of 1⅞ cents per pound, not more than one-fourth are permitted during the first three months, not more than one-half during the first six months and not more than three-fourths during the first nine months of that year.

During 1956 the tariff of 1⅞ cents per pound amounted to an ad valorem duty of about 9.4 per cent and the 2½ cent tariff to a tax of 12.5 per cent.

On October 12, 1956 the United States tariff commission unanimously found that, as a result in part of the customs treatment of groundfish fillets they are being imported into the U.S.A. in such increased quantities, both actual and relative, as to cause serious injury to the domestic industry producing like or directly competitive products.

The commission also found that in order to remedy this serious injury, it is necessary that the duty on the imports that enter under the tariff quota be increased from 1⅞ cents per pound to 2.8125 cents per pound, and that the duty on the imports that enter in excess of that quota be increased from 2½ cents per pound to 3.75 cents per pound. The president rejected this proposal in December 1956.

This was the proposal which the tariff board of the United States put up to the United States government. It was a most serious proposal and would have had a most serious effect on the fishing industry of Canada, particularly on the east coast. It was so serious that the government of the day made the most strenuous efforts to have this recommendation annulled. I would ask you to remember, Mr. Chairman, that I said this was the "unanimous" proposal of the United States tariff board. Fortunately for us it was within the power of our great friend in the United States, namely President Eisenhower, to veto this proposal. It was only after the most strenuous efforts on the part of the then government and the personal intervention of the former prime minister, Mr. St. Laurent, in taking the matter up with the president himself, that the president vetoed this proposal.

We now have this situation. The presidential veto power to reject a tariff recommendation would not necessarily die or be lost to the president should the tariff agreements act lapse. Section 350 of the tariff agreements act which authorizes the president to enter into tariff negotiations with foreign countries and agree to concessions was extended for a three-year period until June, 1958.

Those of us who know the United States, are friendly toward them and know of their generosity to us in the past, feel rather concerned about this switch in trade policy of this government. We also know that there is an election coming up in the United States next year, and we know how pressure is applied to the president, when it is necessary for political purposes, by the fishing industries of the New England States to have this tariff amended and to raise the tariff on our fish. I am gravely concerned, Mr. Minister, lest your policy—your anti-American policy, if I may call it that—on trade will strengthen the hands of the fishing industry of the United States to impress on the president the necessity of increasing the tariff on our fish products. If that happens, we in Newfoundland at any rate will be in an extremely difficult position. Indeed, so serious will it be that I doubt whether our fishing industry will be able to carry on.

I consulted with one of our biggest exporters of this type of fish to the United States. He sends to the United States about $3 million worth every year, thus helping to correct the imbalance of trade which we have between the United States and ourselves. He informed me that if this extra duty is put on our fish going into the United States he will practically be compelled to close his business. He employs some 600 or 700 people. As I said before, Mr. Chairman, I am not at all against helping Great Britain, but I am very much concerned lest if we help Great Britain we will in the process hurt ourselves.

I should now like to speak with regard to this trade mission to Great Britain which I think has been very well received there. I do not wonder at that fact at all. Most of us know that most of the products that Great Britain can supply to Canada are textiles and motor cars. I do not know what will happen. We do not seem to be able to get the information just yet. Perhaps the minister will supply it later on. I do not know just what we are buying in Great Britain but I am gravely concerned that if textiles and motor cars come into Canada in larger quantities our own manufacturers of those products are going to be affected. I hope we shall be able to help trade with Great Britain but that we will not injure our own industry.

The minister is about to leave to go back to Great Britain. I wish him well in his mission. I hope he will be able to reconcile buying from Great Britain without injury to our own industry. He has told us that he has been wonderfully well received wherever he went. He has also informed us that the reception which the mission received and the eagerness of business people in Great Britain to meet the trade mission were beyond all his expectations. What could you expect, Mr. Minister? Of course they are going to meet you with a friendly hand. Of course they are going to entertain you and wine you and dine you. They have something to sell to us. Some of us who know how to trade with Great Britain know that they have gone all out to receive you with open arms; but we have not heard very much about what they are going to buy from us.

I have here a dispatch from Cardiff, Wales to bear out what I have been saying about this anti-American trade policy. Mr. Duncan, I understand, is the man who made this statement at Cardiff:

"It is only a short step between the loss of economic liberty and the loss of political liberty," James Duncan of Toronto, deputy leader of the Canadian trade mission said Tuesday night as he emphasized that Canada has a huge trading deficit with the U.S.

In this dispatch which is from Cardiff, Wales and written by Harold Morrison, a Canadian Press staff writer who is on the trade mission, it is interesting to note the following:

—Cardiff's lord mayor, while praising the mission's visit, said that Canada should follow Australia's lead and make greater use of Cardiff as a port for the movement of goods to Britain.

One can understand the lord mayor of Cardiff putting in a good word for his own port. But this part is rather interesting:

At the same time he urged greater Canadian purchases of Welsh coal.—

Welsh coal, if you please.

—noting that there has been an "alarming" drop in shipments to Canada to about 65,000 tons in 1957 from 1,000,000 tons in some previous years.

When reading statements like that, one wonders how much coal we are going to buy from Wales when we have coal in abundance ourselves for which we are trying to find a market.

Mr. Minister, you are soon leaving for Great Britain. I hope you will be successful. I hope that the mission will be successful and that we shall be able to help Great Britain. I am sure that you will receive a warm welcome when you return. Now that the Christmas season is at hand I would not be a bit surprised if you are named the No. 1 Santa Claus of Great Britain during the coming year.

(Translation):

Mr. L'Heureux: Mr. Chairman, may I take this opportunity, when the house is taking up the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, to pay particular tribute to Mr. C. D. Howe, that great economist. I can speak out of personal knowledge for when I first went into business, I scrupulously applied his wise counsels to industrialists and Canadian financiers who were promoting the development of their plants or business, either by expanding or by the purchase of equipment, thus automatically furthering the economic expansion of this country. That is why I say that I am indebted to Mr. Howe for at least part of the success I have enjoyed.

I frankly admit that I have always looked upon Mr. Howe's statements as a barometer and a guide when I was planning my course at the beginning of any particular fiscal year. I am sure that a large number of Canadian businessmen set great store by his annual forecast which incidentally, never failed to come true.

How utterly different under this new government. A curious fact is that for all their bombastic statements and confident outlook, the new ministers by no means are inspiring the same degree of confidence as did the leaders of the great Liberal party. Hence the worry, nervousness, uncertainty, restlessness and weariness that grip the people of Canada.

No more striking example of this could be found than in my own constituency where our industrialists have not only expressed concern but have protested in unequivocal fashion against the attitude of the present government.

Let me name but one large firm in my district, the Bennett Company Limited, of Chambly, which has forwarded a brief to the Department of Trade and Commerce and the Department of Finance in Ottawa setting out its worries and concern. This submission reads as follows:

(Text):

We believe that the government is making a tremendous mistake in not protecting Canadian industry.

"Free trade" cannot be considered with England or any other country when their standard of wages are not comparable with Canadian standards. It is impossible for Canadian companies to pay $1.50 an hour compared to 50 cents an hour in England and have the resulting products competitive in price.

(Translation):

The firm admits that it is all very well to say we should buy British goods but wonders whether Canada can compete with England when wages for the same classes of employment are $1.50 an hour here and 50 cents over there.

Our government must change their attitude and policy as far as our imports from England are concerned. The situation demands a very serious study on the part of Canadian authorities. As suggested by the Bennett Company, if the government want at all cost to promote the employment of Canadian labour, they must take a quite different stand and clearly side with Canadian industry.

When our manufacturers are no longer able to stand the competition of imported goods, an economic depression will set in. Our industries will shut down and our workers will be unemployed. Imported shoes, for instance, will still be available at $4 or $5 a pair, but the worker will not have the money to buy them. I would rather pay ten or twelve dollars for a pair of shoes, and have the money to buy them, and at the same time avoid a depression such as we had in the thirties, under another unlamented and Conservative government.

A further suggestion appears appropriate to me in another field. The government should co-operate with companies such as the Canadian Industries Limited in carrying out a vast program of scientific research.

After all this company, as many others of the same type, spends huge amounts each year on research aimed at finding new markets for new or better products. Those master chemists and scientists contribute to the expansion of our industries and, by their knowledge, can help solve many problems.

Let me make still another suggestion as to how the wheat problem in western Canada might be solved.

[Mr. L'Heureux.]

This $150,000,000 program put into effect by the present government in seeking to settle the acute problem of the disposal of wheat is designed to provide the western farmer with interest free cash advances.

May I say that this measure can only be a stopgap. True, the cash advances provided to the individual farmer will run as high as $3,000 but this will in no way dispose of the enormous quantities of wheat accumulated in storage.

I would like to bring my modest contribution to the solution of this problem. Why not set up an agency which would undertake research to discover new by-products of wheat? After all, if it has been found that wood can be used to manufacture paper, why should not wheat be used to manufacture new products?

As far as the constituency of Chambly-Rouville is concerned, I would like to bring to the attention of my colleagues the possibilities offered by that federal constituency.

Now don't think this is just another wholly agricultural county of our province. It is, indeed, an agricultural county, but because of its geographical position, it is a district which also occupies a strategic position in the great triangle that is developing as a consequence of the St. Lawrence Seaway project. Situated along the southern bank of our majestic river, and south of the Canadian metropolis of Montreal, the county of Chambly-Rouville is a hive of residential and industrial projects.

This brings me to point out to the Conservative government that those great projects must absolutely be continued, particularly after the Liberal government has set the foundations of unequalled economic development.

When you read the history of the United States,—and you will recall that a former Liberal leader once said that the 20th century "belongs to Canada",—you realize the tremendous development which has occurred in that great country, particularly in that corner of San Francisco which is referred to as "the Golden Gate". Well, Mr. Chairman, the district which I have the honour to represent here will be named the "Golden Triangle of Canada". The district extending from Beauharnois to St. Johns and from St. Johns to Sorel is indeed the "Golden Triangle". This will occur, of course, provided the Liberal party is brought back into power, so that it may keep on giving this country this era of prosperity which used to be ours, because at this time, the Conservative party is merely engaged in electoral overbidding, thus destroying the economy of the country, after having sabotaged national unity. It is most unfortunate that, after dealing a first nasty blow at national unity by holding that his party can manage the affairs of Canada without the help of the province of Quebec, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Churchill) should now get down to sabotaging Canadian economy by clinging to an obsolete imperialistic feeling which would alienate the friendship of the United States, whose economic contribution to our Canadian development has, up to now, been a tremendous asset.

The Canadian people can rightfully regret its old love, the Liberal party.

(Text):

Mr. Smith (Lincoln): Mr. Chairman, I did not have the opportunity to speak during the debate on the speech from the throne but I think this would be an appropriate time for me to express my opinion on matters which affect Lincoln county, the constituency which I have the honour to represent, and which in a general way affect all parts of Canada.

Canada's most unfavourable trade balance with the United States and other countries coupled with our tremendous surplus of farm produce was one of the main reasons that brought about the change of government on June 10. This condition was created by the disorderly importation into this country of manufactured goods at prices with which our factories could not compete and the dumping of surplus farm products from the United States into Canada at prices below cost. The loss of world markets for our farm products was also a very important factor in this slump in the farming industry. I fully realize that there are many problems the Minister of Trade and Commerce has to solve in order to correct some of those conditions. If we examine the records of trade and commerce we find that imports and exports between Canada and the United States represent the area wherein most of our problems lie.

I firmly believe that at least 15 per cent of our trade with the United States can be diverted to Great Britain in the purchase of heavy machinery and equipment much of which is not made in Canada at the present time. This exchange should be based on Great Britain's purchasing in return a further 15 per cent more in terms of farm products under a trade agreement which I am sure this government can easily negotiate with the British government.

Turning now to the problem that faces Canada's light industries including textiles, small tools, hardware, etc., something must be done in the very near future to offer them assistance. If action is not taken soon there will not be a textile plant left in Ontario. Our chief competitors in textiles are Japan and West Germany. Both countries purchase a considerable amount of Canadian wheat and therefore we cannot disturb that trade too much. However, their exports to Canada are increasing rapidly and our exports to those countries are not increasing at the same rate. We do not wish to discontinue trading with any country, but in these days, when every country seems to be extending its markets, we do not want to be caught short, which we have been. The only way we can possibly protect ourselves today is by trade agreements.

How can Canada compete with Japan on an almost open market like the Canadian market today? I am told that the pay of semi-skilled and skilled labour is from 50 cents to 60 cents a day. In Ontario people performing the same job are paid from $1.25 to $2.50 an hour, with compensation, unemployment insurance, holiday pay and, in most factories where they are covered by union agreements, they have sick pay, life insurance, hospitalization, Physicians' Services Incorporated and, in some cases, a guaranteed annual wage. We have them all. Most of those measures are unknown in some of those countries I have mentioned.

During the last four years of the Liberal government, Lincoln county, the county I represent, lost four good textile plants with a payroll of some 1,200 people. My opponents in the last election said, "What of it?"

An hon. Member: Oh, no, they didn't.

Mr. Smith (Lincoln): They said, "The factory buildings have been taken over by other industries." But that is not the solution of this problem. When an industry closes down and the machines are moved away it is a calamity to the community and municipality. The people lose their lifetime jobs and in many instances they find it very difficult to become re-established.

I have checked some of the records and I have found that plywood, which is something that is used a great deal in Canada today, is having a difficult time. I understand that a great many of the plywood mills in British Columbia are shut down. I have noticed in Ontario in the past few years that a great deal of Japanese plywood is being used. I checked the records in the Department of Trade and Commerce and I found that five years ago no plywood was coming into this country from Japan. Four years ago about half a million dollars worth came in and by the end of this year there will be something like $3 million worth of plywood come into Canada from Japan. I do not say that this is very wrong, but I am just citing it as a reason why we have to check into trade and commerce. Here we find the mills in British Columbia almost shut down and we are bringing plywood into this country from another country. I believe that some of the logs that are used to make plywood in Japan come from British Columbia.

I might say that I was down in the province of Quebec and visited the town of Victoriaville where we go quite often. They used to have a very fine plywood mill down there. They have two of the largest furniture factories in Canada and they used the plywood from their own mills. The last time I was down there that factory also was shut down.

Small tools is another item that affects Ontario. We have a number of plants in St. Catharines which are manufacturing small tools. We find today that in order to maintain their sales staff and keep their markets some of those plants are having their products manufactured in West Germany, brought out to this country and sold under their own brand names. That is not a good condition. I do not say that we can cure it all at once but it is just the trend of things today. We are buying too much from abroad and causing unemployment in our own country.

When we were discussing fisheries the other day it was brought out that at the present time we are importing large quantities of salmon from Japan. I checked that and I found that most of that salmon is caught just outside of territorial waters. It is processed in floating canneries and some of it never even sees Japan.

In closing, sir, I must say that our government must approach this whole problem of agriculture and light industry with a realistic and a sympathetic attitude. It must keep in mind the fact that it was Canada's trade deficit of $1,300 million and our depressed agricultural industry that brought so many new members like myself to Ottawa. I have great confidence in our new Minister of Trade and Commerce. I wish him well and I am sure that if he approaches matters, as I say, in a sympathetic and a realistic manner, we shall have success.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): Mr. Chairman, I wish at the outset to join with those who have wished the Minister of Trade and Commerce every success in his office. I think we all realize the importance of this department, since it affects the daily life of every Canadian citizen. It is unfortunate that the minister took office at a time when there is a shadow caused by the problems arising out of the international investment position. There are several suggestions which I should like to make in this regard and in other aspects dealing with the minister's department. I want to emphasize the international investment position and in doing so I am not putting any blame on the present administration; nor do I think that blame can be put on the former administration because we, as Canadians, are all to blame for allowing the situation to develop.

I would draw to the attention of hon. members a publication put out by the dominion bureau of statistics entitled, "Canada's International Investment Position, 1926-1954". It provides an analysis of the trends which have built up over the years and I think that our immediate responsibility is that of analysing those trends and determining corrective measures which will stop the trend if, in our opinion, we feel it is not in the best interests of the people of this country.

I think it is important to note that two of the measures which this government has already adopted are aimed at correcting the trend. I think the one which came into being first was the commonwealth conference, and we are hopeful that it will achieve its objective of diverting more of our trade from countries where we have an imbalance to countries where we have a credit. The present trade commission, which is currently touring the United Kingdom, can play a very valuable role and we wish it success in achieving that end.

I think it is particularly important that this be given consideration, in view of the developments which are taking place in continental Europe, such as the development of the free-trade area which will in all probability make our trading relations with those countries somewhat more difficult and adjustments must be made on our behalf.

In reference to the imbalance of our international trading position, I should like to quote from the publication to which I referred. It says:

> Non-resident ownership of Canadian manufacturing now amounts to about a half of the total capital employed and to well over a half in the case of mining, smelting and petroleum.

I think all hon. members will readily agree that it is a very dangerous trend to have foreign capital taking ownership and control of some of our basic industries. It is understandable, of course, that in the period through which Canada has gone a certain amount of risk capital should come into the country, but I am also certain that we as Canadians must put ourselves in a position to be able to exercise sufficient control over this foreign investment to ensure that in fact we do control the industries that exist in Canada. The publication goes on to state the following respecting these concerns controlled in the United States:

> These larger concerns, with an investment of $1 million or more, accounted for some 30 per cent of Canadian manufacturing production in 1953 and 21 per cent of employment in that field.

There we have an insight into the implications that have developed in the first half of this century through allowing foreign concerns to control in fact many of our Canadian industries. As foreign capital achieves greater control of industry operating in Canada, this in turn makes it more difficult for private individuals to establish themselves in the manufacturing field since they are competing against large concerns with limitless amounts of capital.

This is particularly significant in the automobile industry. Ninety-eight per cent of the Canadian automotive industry is dominated by large United States controlled enterprises. This thought went through my mind last Monday when we were discussing the plight of the industry due to lay-offs resulting from the uncertainty of buyers as to reduction of the excise tax on automobiles. It seemed to me that perhaps these United States concerns were closing down their Canadian plants in an effort to use this action as a lever against the Canadian government to reduce the tax and thus provide the industry with an advantage which they were not prepared to provide for themselves through a reduction in the price of their product.

I should point out too that the rubber industry is another that is largely controlled in the United States, as are the petroleum, iron and machinery industries. I am just mentioning them and I am not going to go into a great amount of detail because it is a very technical subject. However, I wish to draw this very serious trend to the minister's attention, a trend that exists at a time when we have an imbalance of trade with the United States. Of course, the imbalance has been covered over the years by capital inflow, both in direct and indirect investments. The deficiency last year amounted to over $1 billion, and as we continue to import more from the United States than we export to that country this situation is offset by a larger inflow of United States capital which in turn aggravates our problem by creating more and more domination of our industries by a foreign power.

I hope the minister will give these factors serious consideration and do everything possible to halt and reverse this trend. It is important that this be done because of the tremendous changes that have taken place in the whole pattern of international trade since the war. The hon. member for Acadia, in a very sensible speech as usual, remarked on the change in the trade pattern that had taken place. He pointed out that we no longer have the multilateral trade which existed from the turn of the century up to world war II when Great Britain was the clearing house and trade was channelled in a multilateral way. As an individual country we must now concentrate on unilateral and bilateral trade agreements and, again keeping the emphasis on Canada's international investment position, it will be necessary to establish import-export boards so that our trade will be in useful channels and in commodities which are in fact necessary in Canada.

It has been said many times and should be said many times that we can sell to countries only if we are prepared to buy from them. I think I should again draw attention here to the very serious omission in the opening remarks of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the complete omission of any reference to what was termed by the Prime Minister during the election campaign as Canada's No. 1 problem, our tremendous wheat surplus. It is part and parcel of the whole problem of trade. For years wheat was our major export commodity. It has dropped in recent years to second or third place but it is still of extreme importance to the people of western Canada and, in fact, all of Canada.

The fact that we have a billion bushels of wheat in public and private storage is indeed an important consideration directly related to international trade. In my opinion it is necessary to follow trade policies that will give consideration to this problem. This will require the importation from countries which are in a position to buy from us of sufficient goods to provide them with funds with which they in turn can purchase our grain. If difficulties do arise, as in fact they do, I think serious consideration should be given to barter arrangements to permit countries that do not have the required amount of dollars to make direct trades with our country.

I recall asking the minister if consideration had been given to having the trade mission currently touring Great Britain discuss this problem and he pointed out that consideration had not been given to barter arrangements because it was not found necessary. When we have a billion bushels of wheat in storage I think it is necessary to give consideration to barter arrangements. It is necessary to give consideration to long-term credit agreements so that this wheat, which is a glut on the Canadian economy, can move into foreign markets.

This will also require consideration of the acceptance of foreign currencies. Failing the adoption of these programs with respect to international trade, we then have the responsibility of launching domestic programs to take care of the existing situation. If we are not going to have trade policies that will enable our wheat to move freely into the marketing channels of the world, the responsibility must fall on the government to provide policies that will enable the farmers to exist. I know that some of my colleagues will be dealing further with this subject and I do not want to labour the point now because it will be gone into in more detail on the specific items in the minister's estimates.

But I would point out that one solution that could be adopted would be to increase the amount of grain in storage on which storage charges are paid. The previous administration introduced legislation to provide for the payment of storage charges by the federal government on all grain in excess of 178 million bushels. I am completely in the dark as to how the figure of 178 million bushels was arrived at, but I would suggest that they take that figure out and pay the storage charges on all grain which is, in fact, in storage. Consideration must be given also to the application of programs to benefit all farmers, the ones which were mentioned by my colleague the hon. member for Dauphin in the form of deficiency payments; the adoption of the two-price system and the payment of storage to farmers on farm-held grain.

I have dealt, rather hurriedly I must admit, with some of the aspects of the trade of our country. I should like now to make reference to two specific problems relative to the commerce of our country. I am quite certain that the minister will be in a position to more readily correct these problems than ones to which I referred previously. I am the father of three children, and on occasion I have been sent by my wife to buy a pair of jeans for one of the boys. I arrive at the department store and look for a size 6. When I find one that seems to be satisfactory I bring it home. Often I find that it would very easily fit my 8-year old daughter. On the other hand, I may find a similar garment, take it home and I might be lucky if it fits my 4-year old son. Apparently, Mr. Chairman, there is a complete lack of standardization in the quality and style of children's clothes. I am bringing this to the minister's attention because I have received many complaints from mothers across Canada. We can appreciate the difficulty they have in getting away to shop for their families, and I think steps should be taken to standardize the sizes of children's clothes. All garments marked "Size 6" should be the same size, and then when we hapless fathers are sent out on a shopping errand we would have more guidance in the selection of these articles.

The second item about which I should like to complain and draw to the attention of the house is this miserable practice which has been developing in recent months of pressure merchandising. The practice seems to be to stuff all kinds of toys and objects in these so-called breakfast cereals. I have been out shopping with my children and I have been coerced, cajoled, cried at and commanded to buy certain brands of breakfast cereal just for the purpose of obtaining the marble, jet airplane or toy pistol inside the package. I believe controls could be exercised to prevent this merciless pressure being put on the parents of Canada. It is very difficult for parents who are with their families to turn down the request of the children who want the toys far more than the breakfast cereal. The result is that you have dozens of boxes of breakfast cereal cluttering up the closet which the children do not want. If someone has a secret on how to say no, I wish they would let me in on it.

Equally bad, but not with the same devastating result, is the practice of placing premiums in packaged goods. The best example of this practice might be the packaged soaps. You find a huge box of soap, you buy it and find it is filled with a bath size tea towel or bath size beach towel, with a small quantity of soap at the bottom. I would not mind having a bath size tea towel, at that. I think regulations should be invoked to protect the housewives all across Canada from this type of pressure advertising. I believe that this would come under the jurisdiction of the department of commerce.

I have one final suggestion. I am making a plea on behalf of the small merchants throughout the length and breadth of Canada that we get rid of these premium coupons. This practice may be all right for the large merchants who have the capacity to deal with these coupons, but the small merchant does not have a filing system for keeping these coupons until the salesman happens to come around. What happens is that the small merchant is bearing the cost of the premium which is offered by the soap company or whatever company it may be. If the manufacturers do, in fact, want to provide an incentive, let them reduce the price of their commodity by 5 or 10 cents. In this way the individual merchant will not be saddled with these onerous responsibilities.

I see that it is very nearly five o'clock, Mr. Chairman, but I did want to make these general suggestions, both in dealing with international trade and giving consideration to the burdensome surpluses which we have. I wanted to draw the attention of the minister to these problems which are faced by the mothers, fathers and housewives throughout the length and breadth of Canada. I trust that the minister will give them serious consideration, and I am sure everyone would be grateful if action were taken.

Mr. Schneider: May I call it five o'clock, Mr. Chairman?

Item stands.

Progress reported.

PRIVATE BILLS

OTTAWA AND NEW YORK RAILWAY COMPANY

The house in committee on Bill No. 30, respecting Ottawa and New York Railway Company—Mr. McIlraith—Mr. Rea in the chair.

On clause 1—New York Central Railroad Company liable for claims, etc.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): This bill marks the end of an era. It means the final cessation of New York Central service into the nation's capital. Had the evidence and proceedings of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines been printed and made available, probably it would not have been necessary for me to ask my genial neighbour, the hon. member for Ottawa West, the questions which occur to me about this bill. Regrettably, the printed evidence of the committee is not yet available and there are one or two matters about which I should like to make some inquiry.

The first is this. Would the hon. gentleman tell the house what the New York Central Railway Company has done for its employees, on the cessation, last spring of freight operations into the city of Ottawa in accordance with the order of the board of transport commissioners?

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, I think I am rather familiar with this bill because it arises out of certain expropriations by the St. Lawrence seaway authority during the time when I was president of that corporation. I should like to preface my answer to my hon. friend with a brief statement about the manner in which the bill comes before the house. The New York Central Railway operates from Ottawa to a point near Rooseveltown in the state of New York. The plans of the St. Lawrence seaway authority and the St. Lawrence seaway development corporation, the United States entity building the seaway, provided for a loop over Cornwall island at substantial cost.

When the St. Lawrence seaway authority looked at the plans they discovered that instead of following that loop and relocating the railway they could follow a straight line and save a considerable amount of money by purchasing the line from Cornwall to Rooseveltown. It also appeared during the course of the study of these plans that the New York Central railway was considering the abandonment of the line because of the fact there was little or no freight traffic over the line. It is well known that in the last few years there has been no passenger service between either Rooseveltown or Cornwall and the city of Ottawa and just one freight service per week, but what prompted the New York Central railway to give consideration to the whole matter of sale and abandonment was the fact that two companies in the United States had invited the New York Central to give them certain freight concessions if they established themselves on the south shore of the St. Lawrence river.

In view of all the circumstances the St. Lawrence seaway authority and St. Lawrence seaway development corporation decided to purchase this railway from Rooseveltown to Cornwall and an application was then made to the board of transport commissioners. The board thereafter approved of the application to discontinue and abandon the line but not until after a similar application had been made by the New York Central railway before the inter-state commerce commission in the United States, and granted by them.

Now dealing with the question raised by my hon. friend with respect to the employees who were affected I understand that by virtue of a section of the Railway Act it is possible for employees to make certain representations to the board for compensation. The employees did this and the board, by virtue of one of the sections of the act, referred these representations to the Supreme Court of Canada. I understand that the Supreme Court of Canada made a ruling on the question to which the hon. gentleman has referred and which, I am sorry to say, was not favourable to the employees of the New York Central railway.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Does that mean then that these employees have been left without any right whatever as a result of the abandonment of this line?

Mr. Chevrier: No it does not mean that, because I understand by virtue of the agreement which they have with the New York Central railway they are entitled to certain rights. What those rights are I am not in a position to say but they did demand certain additional rights for compensation which the New York Central was not prepared to give and they appealed to the board of transport commissioners. The matter was then referred to the supreme court.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Could the hon. gentleman tell us the nature of the question before the supreme court? On exactly what grounds was this appeal made?

Mr. Chevrier: No I could not answer that question because I have not my file before me at the present time; I have to draw on my memory. When the appeal was heard I was no longer president of the seaway authority but I was when the expropriation was made, and I know that representations were made by the brotherhoods, not only to the New York Central in the United States but also to the Ottawa and New York railway here in this country. What the terms of the agreement were I am not able to say but I do know the employees had every opportunity to submit their claims and their complaints to the board and that the matter was referred, as I have said, to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Would the hon. gentleman or the sponsor of the bill tell us how many employees were affected by this ruling?

Mr. Chevrier: There were not many.

Mr. McIlraith: I regret I am unable to give specific answers to the questions of the hon. member for Carleton. We are in the position where he did not follow the usual practice of asking these questions in committee when the witness was available who could have given specific and detailed information. If I had a word of warning I would gladly have had all this information for him today. I would have been very glad to do this if I had been warned at all that he had any interest in asking this type of question.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Of course, Mr. Chairman, my genial neighbour will realize that I am not a member of that committee so there is a perfectly good reason why I did not ask the question there. I prefaced these questions by saying that it would probably have been unnecessary to make these remarks had the evidence and the proceedings of the committee been available to the house, which is not the case.

Mr. Chevrier: Well the hon. member could attend the committee, notwithstanding; he has the right to do that.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Oh yes, any hon. member may attend a committee, but I do not believe it is the right of any member to participate in examination at a committee of which he is not a member.

Mr. McIlraith: Oh yes.

Mr. Benidickson: He can ask questions.

Mr. McIlraith: Oh yes, the hon. member for Carleton is not quite right in that. A member may ask questions and I want to assure him that I would have been most happy to have had all this evidence brought out, or to have it here today for him if I had any means of knowing that he would be concerned on that point.

Mr. Green: Well now, Mr. Chairman, the hon. member for Ottawa West knows very well that a member who is not a member of a standing committee can only take part in the proceedings with the consent of the committee itself and that it is a very very unusual thing to do. The hon. member for Carleton is today exercising his rights in a proper manner—

Mr. McIlraith: Oh, quite.

Mr. Green: —by asking questions when the house is in committee of the whole.

Mr. McIlraith: Quite.

Mr. Green: And the hon. member for Ottawa West and the hon. member for Laurier should have the answers to these questions. Anyone who is sponsoring a private bill must expect to have questions of this kind asked and I do suggest that they are not helping their case very much by trying to tell the hon. member for Carleton that he should not ask questions.

Mr. Chevrier: On a point of order. No one has said the hon. gentleman has no right to ask questions. On the contrary he has a perfect right to ask any questions he likes. The point I made is this: The hon. member is entitled to attend at any committee meeting; although he may not participate without the consent of the chairman. Now I have been dealing with the railways, canals and telegraphs committee and with the railways and shipping committee for years and I know that members from the other side of the house who were not members of the committee have repeatedly come to those committees. I am just trying to draw on my memory now and I wonder if the hon. member who leads this house did not come on one occasion. However, I know that hon. members on the other side came and asked permission to be heard and if they did not they sat there and listened to the proceedings.

Mr. Green: The hon. member for Laurier has been away digging the seaway for the last four years and he has not been attending all these standing committee meetings in that time. On the other hand I have been attending far more meetings of the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines than he ever attended and I can tell him that it was on a very very rare occasion that any member of this house who was not a member of that committee appeared and asked questions. On each occasion on which it did happen that member had to get the leave of the committee itself or certainly of the chairman before he could do so. For the hon. member for Laurier to now suggest that the hon. member for Carleton is doing anything which is not strictly his right—

Mr. Chevrier: On a point of order, I have not suggested anything of the kind and the house leader has no right to say I did suggest that.

Mr. Lafontaine: He did not do that.

Mr. Chevrier: He knows far better than that. I have not made any such statement and he should not be trying to stall the passage of this bill by interjections of that kind, which are certainly not helping.

Mr. Green: I am not trying to stall anything, but when the hon. member for Laurier who has had so many years experience in this house—and the same applies to the hon. member for Ottawa West—has the presumption to lecture a new member of the house on what he can or cannot do in this house I am going to come to the defence of that member every time.

Mr. Chevrier: Let the hon. house leader come to the defence of the member as long as he states the facts correctly and let him not say that any hon. member has been trying to stop the discussion. That is not the case.

Mr. Green: The trouble with the hon. member for Laurier and the hon. member for Ottawa West is that they cannot answer these questions which are properly asked. That is their whole difficulty.

Mr. McIlraith: Far be it from me to lecture the hon. member for Carleton. I hope he did not understand my remarks in that way. I was not trying to do that: far from it. I was trying to explain why I was not able to answer his specific question. It is rarely that I am not able to answer specific questions in this house. I think I ought to put the leader of the house straight on the point he made about the committees. Members who are not members of the committee can come in, take part and ask questions. He is quite wrong. I have had occasion sometimes to sit on committees in the last few years. If he wants to digress into that subject, which I think is probably irrelevant, there are a good many examples that can be given him. I recall his participation on one occasion as a member of the committee—he was a member of the committee—when that was done at some length. Perhaps it is not relevant to pursue that subject now but I want to make it clear to the hon. member for Carleton that there has been no attempt to lecture him at all as far as I was concerned; far from it. I did not think that he took it in that way.

Mr. Green: All you have to do is answer the question.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I assure you, Mr. Chairman, that I did not take the hon. gentleman's statements as a lecture nor did I take what the house leader said as a defence. I think the hon. member for Carleton is in no need of defence, although he is a new member, and that he will present his opinion on whatever matter may be before the house without any fear whatever of being stopped, provided he keeps within the rules. The only point I was making in respect of the proceedings of a committee was simply that I could go to the committee and ask questions by leave only. With the other meetings which have been taking place, I was not aware of the date upon which this particular bill was posted. Perhaps I should have been. Perhaps, although having other duties to perform, I should have been at that meeting at that time. But I am sure that no one in this house would be more willing to answer questions than either of the hon. gentlemen opposite. Therefore, I hope I may have an opportunity of placing before them two or three more questions which I have in mind.

I observe that the preamble of the bill says that all the assets of the company have been sold. What I should like to ask the hon. member for Ottawa West is what has happened to the right of way between Cornwall and Ottawa. Has it in fact been sold. If so, to whom has it been sold and at what price?

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps I should give a short history of that matter, if I may. The right of way from Cornwall to Ottawa is, I think, somewhere in the neighbourhood of 57 or 58 miles long. When the seaway authority was faced with the new work concerning the highway bridge and concerning the railway in the international section, it approached the New York Central railway authorities with a view to purchasing the line, the intention being to turn over a portion of the line to the federal district commission and also to try to interest the province of Ontario in building a short highway from the centre of the seaway which was Cornwall to the city of Ottawa.

While I personally made no representations to the department of highways in Ontario, others in the federal government did so in an attempt to follow out a suggestion that had been made for many years that a short road be built between Cornwall and the city of Ottawa. The provincial authorities thought it of interest and decided that they would like to make a survey. After a period of some months they made the survey and reported that they were not interested in the purchase of the line either from the New York Central or from any other group. Neither were they interested in constructing a highway from Cornwall to Ottawa. That idea therefore had to be abandoned. After I left, however, I understood that the Canadian National Railways purchased the line from Cornwall to the city of Ottawa. While I am not sure whether or not it is in operation, I know that the southern extremity in the vicinity of Cornwall is being used and operated by the Canadian National Railways as, I understand, is the northern extremity into Ottawa. That part between the two I am told is being abandoned and sold for scrap.

Mr. Benidickson: I am not, I confess, speaking to the bill itself, Mr. Chairman. Probably I should say I am speaking on a point of order. I recall that when I entered the house in 1945 I was on occasion called upon, as a private member, to sponsor bills of this kind. At the time I was told that I was approached for two reasons. One was that bills of this kind require sponsorship by a member of parliament by reason of statutes, and generally it was required that a private member sponsor them; and the solicitors in Ottawa who have this work in their offices had come to believe that bills of this kind should be sponsored by someone sitting on the right of the Speaker. Certainly at that time there was no great majority of one party or the other on the right of the Speaker. I am referring to 1945.

The point I raise is this. Later than 1945 I had the honour of being made a parliamentary assistant and again was asked, because of my legal training, by friends in the profession whether I would do them this courtesy. I then said that I did not think that—although my association with the goverment was, as one understands, fairly remote—I was competent or able any longer to do that kind of thing. I know that we have in this parliament a great number of new members and they may not understand this matter of sponsorship of private bills. I can say that when I sponsored—

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Is the hon. gentleman under the impression that I am sponsoring this bill?

Mr. Benidickson: No; not at all. May I say immediately that my concern was aroused early this session because I found that one of the new parliamentary assistants, whom I have no desire to name, was sponsoring a private bill of this type during the current session. It was something that I do not think had occurred in recent sessions and certainly was something that I felt I myself should not do. I make no suggestion of wrongdoing on the part of the new member and new parliamentary assistant concerned. I am just raising this matter, on a point of order, as something that I think the house should consider for the purpose of deciding future conduct.

For the benefit of non-lawyers, may I say that when I was asked to sponsor certain of these private bills, and did so because they could not be advanced in the house otherwise, I think two or three of them were bills that involved commerce, as happens today, and that two at least did not involve commerce. One involved the incorporation of the Canadian Arctic Association and the other I think involved the incorporation of the Canadian Nurses' Association. Just to indicate the situation to new members and to the public at large may I say that—it may be coincidence or not—it so happens that I never so much as received a letter of thanks from the solicitors who were sponsoring the commercial bills to which I attached my name.

It happens I sponsored the bill with regard to the Canadian Nurses' Association and after the bill received third reading in this house I found on going to my office a beautiful bouquet of flowers awaiting me there. With respect to the Canadian Arctic Association—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I wonder if my hon. friend would somehow relate what he is saying to clause 1 of Bill No. 30 respecting the Ottawa and New York Railway Company?

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): He is busy tossing bouquets at the moment.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): The hon. member rose on a point of order.

Mr. Benidickson: The other point I wanted to make referred to the other non-commercial bill I sponsored. I am just wondering what the committee that deals with the bill would think of the propriety of parliamentary assistants sponsoring bills of this kind. Of course, that is not at issue in this particular bill.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, the hon. member has been raising some questions in connection with this bill. My hon. friend who happens to be my predecessor in the role of parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance raises a point of order which, with great respect, I submit has no relevance whatever to what has been happening here this afternoon.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): I know.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If that is the case, Mr. Chairman, why do you permit it to be discussed?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): I think hon. members will agree that the reason I allowed the hon. member to continue was that I thought perhaps the new members might learn something. I will, of course, read from part 2 of Standing Order No. 59 and this will be for the new members.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And the old.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Part 2 of Standing Order No. 59 reads:

(2) Speeches in committee of the whole house must be strictly relevant to the item or clause under consideration.

We are now considering the bill respecting the Ottawa and New York Railway Company, clause 1.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I might have an answer to the question I asked as to the price at which the right of way of the railway was sold apparently, according to the hon. member for Laurier, partly to the federal district commission and partly to the Canadian National Railways?

Mr. McIlraith: Mr. Chairman, the total price paid to the railway company was, I believe, $4.5 million but I am not clear as to what was included. I know there was more than the right of way from Cornwall to Ottawa. I know that included in that there was the undertaking of the railway south of highway No. 2 near Cornwall and there were rights on the bridge but I am in the position of not being able to isolate the price for the right of way itself.

Mr. Chevrier: Mr. Chairman, may I answer the question now? I am sorry not to have been able to answer sooner but I had to get the information from certain members of authority, I was in error in one statement I made and I would like to correct it.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Which authority was that?

Mr. McIlraith: The St. Lawrence seaway authority?

Mr. Chevrier: No, it was not the St. Lawrence seaway authority, but another authority. I would not like the committee to think that I can communicate as easily as that with the former members of the St. Lawrence seaway authority.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I just wanted to be clear.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I assume that the hon. member for Laurier is an authority himself.

Mr. MacInnis: He wishes he were.

Mr. Chevrier: I am informed that clause 1 of the bill makes it quite clear that the New York Central is liable in respect of all claims, demands, rights, securities, causes, debts or anything owing and that the employees my hon. friend has asked about are not employees of the Ottawa and New York Railway Company concerned in the bill before us but employees of the New York Central.

When the application came before the board to abandon the railway some question was raised about certain rights of compensation of the employees and a second hearing was held—I was given the date but apparently I do not have it now,—at which the question of compensation of the employees of the New York Central was considered. The compensation was for moving these employees. For instance, New York Central said it would try and re-establish some of the employees on the United States side of the line and the employees felt that they should be entitled to compensation for moving. For example, some of them resided in Cornwall and others in Ottawa and in cases where the New York Central was able to obtain work for them in Watertown, New York, for instance, the question was whether or not the New York Central would be responsible for the compensation.

The board, as I said, granted the application for abandonment and also after carefully considering for the greater part of a day the question of compensation the board decided against the claim of the brotherhood for compensation and stated the railway company was not liable to pay compensation. The brotherhood has appealed to the supreme court and I was in error when I said a decision had been handed down. The case, in fact, is going to be heard in January. I am now informed that no matter what the compensation is, if the board of transport commissioners should be overruled then the New York Central by virtue of clause 1 is obligated and prepared to pay any claim for compensation.

Mr. McIvor: Mr. Chairman, I was a member of this committee and I am very proud of that committee. I appreciate the courtesy that has always been extended to me by the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for Peterborough. In this committee I asked if the officials of this branch line were willing to co-operate and I was advised that they are most anxious to co-operate. Then I stated that according to clause 1 the New York Central will meet all obligations. The committee did not take much time in dealing with this bill as it was not necessary because everybody who has a legitimate claim against this company is protected. I think the chairman of this committee did a splendid job.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, you had reason to recognize others who have spoken with respect to this bill since the hon. member for Carleton had some remarks to make about what I had to say on a point of order. I wonder if my successor as parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Finance thinks it is likely or indeed proper that he should sponsor private bills in that role. That was the point I raised and I did not intend to cast aspersion against him.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, on a question of privilege—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): I would advise hon. members that this has nothing to do with this bill respecting the Ottawa and New York Railway Company.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a question of personal privilege. The hon. member has put a statement on the record that leaves an inference. I want to say to this committee that it has already been suggested to me on more than three occasions that I should sponsor private bills. I have declined to do so and will continue to decline to do so.

Mr. Benidickson: Mr. Chairman, also on a question of privilege, may I say that I have great admiration for the hon. member for Carleton. I had no desire to cast any aspersion. I was simply endeavouring to secure information so the committee would know the future policy.

May I also point out that I opened my remarks on this subject when the leader of the house was in the committee. He was not here at the time I concluded my remarks and therefore I was not able to ask him as I intended to do whether or not he approved of a policy of parliamentary assistants sponsoring bills of this type in the house in the future.

CANADIAN WHEAT BOARD ACT

AMENDMENT TO BRING FLAX AND RYE UNDER JURISDICTION OF BOARD

The house resumed, from Tuesday, November 5, consideration of the motion of Mr. McCullough for the second reading of Bill No. 10, to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act.

Mr. E. G. McCullough (Moose Mountain): Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Churchill: Are you closing the debate?

Mr. Speaker: I must inform the house that if the hon. member speaks now he will close the debate.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, this bill which is now before us for second reading came before the house on October 25, and was introduced by the hon. member for Moose Mountain. It is Bill No. 10, entitled, "An Act to amend the Canadian Wheat Board Act (flax and rye)". The explanatory note says:

> The purpose of this bill is to bring flax and rye within the provisions of the Canadian Wheat Board Act and thus eliminate speculation with respect to these grains.

This is a subject, Mr. Speaker, which has been before the House of Commons on other occasions and was before the house last year. I notice that in the introduction of the bill on October 25 the mover gave a comprehensive statement with regard to the question of orderly marketing, and the desire of the farmers of western Canada for that practice. He praised the work of the wheat board and indicated the problems confronting the farmer with regard to the subject matter of his bill, namely flax and rye.

In the course of his remarks he showed how the price trends have varied with regard to these two products, and introduced a graph indicating the prices over a period of years. Then he showed how the acreage has fluctuated for these two grains. With regard to flax, within the last 10 years or so the acreage has doubled. I am not sure whether he indicated that with regard to rye the acreage has been correspondingly reduced. The acreage for rye is about one-fifth of what it was 10 years ago.

I notice that these two crops in seeded acreage are about one-tenth of the great crops of western Canada, wheat, oats and barley, which are under the wheat board at the present time. There are other seeded crops which the hon. member who has introduced this bill might at some time or other also wish to bring under the wheat board. However, he has concentrated his attention at the present time on these two and has indicated that there is a considerable demand among the farmers of western Canada for the bringing of flax and rye under the wheat board.

However, I notice that in supporting his argument—and I quote now from page 438 of Hansard—he indicated to the house the extent of the interest of the western farmer by these words:

> I may say that I wrote to every municipality in the province of Saskatchewan and the replies I received to the question whether or not they were in favour of the inclusion of flax and rye under the jurisdiction of the Canadian wheat board were practically unanimous.

When I heard that, as I listened to the debates and when I read it again I wondered whether the hon. member could be a little more exact in his argument here in order that the argument might be stronger than it appears at the moment. He says that he wrote to every municipality. Well, we accept that. Then, he goes on to say: "The replies I received". He does not indicate whether he had two replies or 100 replies, or whether he heard from every municipality to which he wrote. He says that the replies were practically unanimous, which means that some were opposed. In any case, to whom were these questions addressed? He says he wrote to every municipality. Were they addressed to the secretaries of the municipalities? Did the questions come before the reeve and the councillors and who gave the reply? Did the reply come by way of an indication from the reeve and the council? Were the replies the personal opinions of the secretary-treasurers of the municipalities? Were the actual farmers approached in the matter? I thought that in the course of a very able speech the hon. member for Moose Mountain might have been somewhat more exact with regard to that particular matter if he wished us to accept it as a strong argument in favour of bringing flax and rye under the wheat board.

Now, I do not question for one minute the importance of this subject. But during the course of the summer two presentations were made to the cabinet, one of which was made by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture on July 31, 1957. I have read this through with care on more than one occasion and, unless my memory is failing me at the moment, I do not recall that the subject matter of flax and rye formed part of that submission of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. If it is as important to the farmers of western Canada as the hon. member for Moose Mountain suggests to us I would have thought that in the submission made to us by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture some mention would have been made of these two grains. They did deal with the subject of grain and they did deal with the question of wheat, and so on, but I do not see flax and rye mentioned.

Mr. McCullough: May I ask the minister a question?

Mr. Churchill: Yes.

Mr. McCullough: I have in my hand the annual presentation of policy by the Canadian Federation of Agriculture entitled "Farmers Meet the Cabinet", dated February 14, 1956. I should like to direct the minister's attention to the following on page 8:

> As it has done in past years, the Canadian Federation of Agriculture would also request that flax and rye be marketed through the Canadian wheat board so that these grains may benefit from the orderly marketing policies and increased price stability that board marketing provides.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, that is interesting information but it is 18 months ago. I was quoting from something that is fresh and recent, July 31, 1957.

Mr. Bryce: They still think the same.

Mr. Churchill: There is a new government in office and the farmers of western Canada presented their suggestions to us in a very able manner. During the course of the summer the interprovincial farm union council appeared before the cabinet. They made their presentation on August 15, 1957, and again I doubt very much if any mention was made of flax and rye in that submission. I am not questioning the importance of the matter which the hon. member has raised but I wonder why flax and rye were not brought to our attention in these two submissions from the organized farmers of Canada. Is it that there is a difference of opinion within the farm organizations or is it not as important to them as it appears to the hon. member? I simply draw that to his attention as an instance of the value of having the farm opinion of the country behind any argument presented in this house in relation to a bill of this nature.

Mr. McCullough: Would the minister permit one more question? Has the minister taken the opportunity to telephone the Canadian Federation of Agriculture office in this city to determine whether or not they still support this position?

Mr. Churchill: I would be quite prepared to telephone the organization on any occasion, but I would think the hon. member would do that and bring us up to date on these matters. It is hardly an obligation of mine to find out whether or not his statements in the house are backed by these organizations. Surely that is up to him. The general position with regard to flax and rye has been set out by those sponsoring the bill, and I have no quarrel with that at all. The situation is very clear. There has been a sharp fluctuation in the price of these grains and in the acreage seeded. Flax is a temperamental crop and it may well be that for reasons such as that and the size of the crops of flax and rye compared with the size of the crops of wheat, oats and barley there has not been the same intensive desire on the part of the farming community for the wheat board to undertake the marketing of these two grains, or on the part of the board itself.

I understand clearly that it was done in the past. I am not saying that it should not be done now but I do suggest that a much stronger case will have to be made out by the hon. member at this time. Much as we like to accept suggestions from those on the opposition side of the house—many of the suggestions are constructive and remind me of ones I used to make when I sat over there—

An hon. Member: How about accepting one for a change?

Mr. Churchill: —nevertheless very few of my suggestions were accepted when I was on the opposition side. I thought it was regrettable at the time. However, I am open to suggestions from members in the opposition at the present time and if their suggestions are backed up by sound argument and good support across the country naturally they will receive very serious consideration.

But let us face the facts as they are at the present time. We have a surplus situation with regard to wheat, oats and barley. We think that the time of the Canadian wheat board is rather fully employed in attempting to deal with the problems involving these grains and whether or not the wheat board would like to take on flax and rye in addition I do not know. I have not had the opportunity yet to find out. Perhaps the hon. member has consulted the wheat board in regard to the matter. But the elevator system is filled now with wheat, oats and barley and the wheat board has quite a bit to do and is successfully achieving its purpose in disposing of these grains.

I think the operation of the wheat board is impressive. It has been pursuing a policy calculated to move our grain into international channels of trade. This fall the government, recognizing the fact that deliveries would be slow, introduced a cash advance system so that farmers who are unable to deliver their grain would at least have some money to tide them over the intervening period. My hon. friends have been pressing me for statements of policy with regard to wheat marketing and things of that nature. I have answered a great many questions in the house concerning that, but actions speak louder than words and I think the policy of the government is quite clear.

If we are successful with our policy for the disposal of our surplus wheat, as I think we will be, it may well be that we could then recommend to the wheat board that flax and rye be marketed through their channels but that would only be done if farmers generally in western Canada favoured that method of marketing those grains. We have a surplus of 700 million bushels of wheat and a crop this year of approximately 350 million bushels. We anticipate that 300 million bushels will be sold in the export trade and that 150 million bushels will be consumed within the country for flour, feed and seed so that at least 100 million bushels of our surplus will be moved into trade channels and out of the country. That is at least an improvement and our hope is that with increased offers for the purchase of Canadian wheat we may exceed our objective of 300 million bushels.

The general international wheat picture is that large surpluses are being held by the United States and by Canada. The Argentine has some. Australia, with a short crop, is now in a position where she would like to have some Canadian wheat and we are quite prepared to sell to Australia. Various countries of the world have been looking at Canada's wheat surplus with interest and our cash customers are being maintained quite successfully.

England, which on the average takes 100 million bushels of Canadian wheat, will I think take about that quantity during the course of this crop year. Germany and Japan are next in order. Other countries in Europe such as Switzerland, Holland and Belgium want Canadian wheat. I have mentioned before that I visited the United Kingdom and Europe and those countries in September with representatives of the wheat board and met 200 people actively engaged in the grain trade. I received reports from them as to the situation.

One thing about which they wanted assurance was stability in wheat marketing. They hoped that Canada would not engage in a price war with regard to wheat. They assured me, without being questioned about the matter, that the top grades of Canadian wheat are at a premium and are not matched by other wheat in the world that is in a marketable position. It was indicated that they will continue to use these top grades. There was very little question about the actual price, but there was much uneasiness concerning the fluctuations of ocean freight rates which, more than price, affected the movement of grain. I feel, therefore, Canada's trading position with regard to wheat is not unsatisfactory and, with other countries than our cash customers I have mentioned putting forward inquiries to Canada with regard to the sale of our wheat, the position is encouraging.

Now some of my friends have suggested, from time to time, that if we could dispose of some of our wheat after the fashion of the United States disposal program it might be very helpful. The only part of the United States disposal program—

Mr. McCullough: On a point of order; I appreciate very much the minister's words concerning our wheat position and our export sales and so forth, but I think at this time this parliament would be more concerned with the government's attitude towards this bill which confines itself to rye and flax, and bringing them under the Canadian wheat board.

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. member is correct, and the minister was departing somewhat from the subject under discussion.

Mr. Churchill: I was following the example of the hon. member who introduced this bill. I find that he discussed quite a number of problems with regard to the Canadian wheat board that did not deal directly with flax or rye.

Mr. Olson: Would the minister permit a question? The minister just mentioned that he considered our trade position with regard to wheat satisfactory. Earlier today the minister stated that there was a decline in wheat and flour sold last year. What does he mean by "satisfactory"?

Mr. Churchill: The report I gave earlier today, of course, referred to the entire year and to date over that period there had been a decline in the sale of our wheat and flour. However, things are improving very rapidly and that is what I was referring to now.

I regret, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. member who introduced this bill is not as concerned as the rest of us with regard to Canada's general trading position with regard to wheat.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Come, come.

Mr. Churchill: If we are able to dispose of these surpluses about which we have talked, then one of the arguments that have been advanced against including flax and rye under the wheat board, namely that storage facilities were filled to the limit, would not then be of the same consequence. I was endeavouring to point out that we were moving along towards the position where we might have storage facilities available. Then, my hon. friend would be able, with greater success, to advocate bringing flax and rye under the Canadian wheat board. He would be able to say, now you have storage facilities. In years gone by, when the argument was put up that flax and rye should be brought under the wheat board, it was stated that that could not be done because of the lack of storage facilities. If the surplus were moved there would be storage facilities available and the hon. member could say that the board could deal with flax and rye.

However, if my hon. friend is not interested in the export trade—he used the phrases, Mr. Speaker—

Mr. McCullough: On a point of order; it is not that I am not interested in the export sale of wheat. I should like to ask the minister a question at this time. Is it not true that the producers of flax and rye are under a quota during the present crop season? They are restricted in their deliveries, so it is not a question of congestion in the elevators or any place else, it is one of policy. The producer now has not been able to deliver during the early part of the crop year because the government, or the Canadian wheat board, has seen fit to put flax under a quota.

Mr. Churchill: I did not understand the first part of the hon. member's question because of a little unusual noise here.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Six o'clock.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Because the minister has his eye on the clock.

Mr. Churchill: There are so many clocks here it is a little confusing. Some say six, and some do not. If the hon. member would care to repeat the first part of his question, I would answer it.

Mr. Speaker: Order. It being six o'clock, the house will revert to the business which was interrupted at five o'clock. Perhaps the minister would take the question as notice.

DEPARTMENT OF FINANCE

General administration—

119. Departmental administration, $2,157,871.

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Chairman, the Department of Finance estimates as printed in the blue book show an increase in the amount to be voted this year over last year of just over $10 million. If the details are examined, however, it will be seen that more than all this increase is covered by two kinds of grants—grants to municipalities in lieu of taxes and grants to universities. Apart from these two sets of grants we are asking parliament to vote slightly less money than was required a year ago for the administration of this department.

I should, however, in this opening statement take into consideration not only the main estimates but also the supplementaries of both years. The principal large item in this year's supplementaries is $32 million for the general salaries vote. This is more than offset however by the $50 million special vote to the superannuation account which was appropriated in last year's final supplementaries. Taking this year's main estimates and supplementaries and comparing them with last year's main estimates and supplementaries, I am asking parliament to vote the Department of Finance about $9 million less than a year ago.

While parliament is not called upon to vote the statutory items I should like to refer to them. In the Department of Finance statutory items constitute more than 95 per cent of total expenditures. In the printed record these items add up to almost $1,100 million and show an increase of $154 million over last year. Of this $154 million increase, $128 million was in increased transfer payments to the provincial governments. After the book of estimates was printed the province of Ontario decided to levy and collect its own corporation income tax. This is the principal reason why our transfer payments to the provincial governments will be $10 million less rather than $128 million more than a year ago. In total, I expect the statutory expenditures relating to the Department of Finance to be not much more than $40 million over last year and this will be wholly due to the higher cost of the public debt.

Hon. members will not be surprised if I say that the Department of Finance, which is not a large operating department, is usually able to estimate its administration expenses quite accurately and that it does not provide much place for operating economies. I shall, however, be able to move a small reduction in vote 121 when we reach that item.

Mr. Chairman, I have been asked several times in the house to give a financial statement. I welcome this opportunity of doing so and not least of all because of some of the things that are currently being said outside this house. The Globe and Mail of December 5 contains a news article from which I read the following:

> London, Ontario, December 4—Unless the Conservatives make drastic cuts in expenditures the government will end up with a deficit by the end of the fiscal year next March, former finance minister Walter Harris, predicted here today.

We shall see shortly.

The Toronto Telegram of December 5 ascribes to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre a statement made, I believe, in the city of Hamilton the previous night. The article says he accused the government of "hiding the books from parliament until after the next election." I doubt if any of the members of the audience who heard the hon. member make that statement, if he did make it, would be so gullible as to believe it. There will be an opportunity of judging shortly whether that is a responsible or an irresponsible statement.

I would like to make this comment in advance of giving to the house the details of the financial statement. When this government came into office on the 21st day of June the fiscal year was already three months advanced. The programs for the year had largely been undertaken; expenditures and commitments had been entered into. We entered upon our tasks while the government was already in midstream and that fact I think should be borne in mind as we weigh and assess what the government has been able to do.

My predecessor, in presenting the budget for the current fiscal year last March, forecast revenues of $5,170 million; expenditures of $5,018 million and a surplus of $152 million. We have now reasonably complete figures for eight months of the year and thus are able to make revised estimates which reflect both the changes in economic development and changes in government policies.

On the revenue side of the accounts I am prepared to accept the forecast which was presented to the house last March. At present it seems probable that receipts from income taxes will be somewhat above the forecast and revenues from customs duties and some commodity taxes will be somewhat below the earlier anticipations, but, on balance, I expect that the various increases and decreases will just about cancel each other out, leaving the total revenue figure unchanged at $5,170 million.

On the expenditures side of the accounts my predecessor had forecast a total of $5,018 million. Since then there have been substantial increases in expenditure arising in part out of changing economic developments and in part from new policies which we have recommended and which parliament has approved. For example, we are having to find an additional $25 million for interest and other charges on the public debt as a result of the sharp increase in interest rates which occurred during the spring and summer months. Then I am advised by the management of Canadian National Railways that reduction in the volume of rail traffic and higher costs of operation will mean that we shall have to meet a deficit in the railway's operation of about $28 million.

On the policy side, hon. members will recall that increases in public service salaries and in the defence services pay and allowances have been approved in an amount which will total about $100 million for the 11 months of the fiscal year commencing May 1, including statutory matching payments into the superannuation account. The increase in old age pensions is responsible for most of the increased deficit in the old age security fund of $50 million. Increases in our contributions to old age assistance and to the blind and disabled persons allowances will cost the federal treasury an additional $1 million this year. Increases in veterans benefits will add a further $3 million to this year's expenditures, and the recent agreement with the provinces to eliminate the "threshold" on unemployment assistance will also cost us $3 million in this fiscal year. All these increases add up to $210 million.

Against this large increase in expenditures we have been able to make substantial savings. While the increases in civil service and defence services pay and allowances will cost $100 million the departments have found it possible, by general economies, to absorb part of this increase and, in fact, only $76 million will be added to this year's expenditures out of the total of $210 million.

In addressing ourselves to the task of eliminating unnecessary expenditure we have been guided by two principles: first that there shall be no reduction in any essential public service and, second, that where items involve construction which means employment, those items are not being reduced. Furthermore, by careful scrutiny and by controlling certain expenditure programs my colleagues have been able to indicate various reductions and savings in estimated expenditure which will add up to almost exactly $40 million. In addition my colleagues have been able to curtail certain loans and advances in the amount of about $6 million.

Finally, I do not propose to adopt the practice of my predecessor to transfer large lump sums of $50 million each into what he called "the reserve against assets" and to reduce the unamortized deficit in the superannuation account. I consider it quite unnecessary to do so.

These savings and reductions in expenditures add up to the very substantial total of $164 million, leaving me with an expected expenditure of $5,064 million and an expected surplus in this fiscal year of $106 million. For the convenience of hon. members and with consent I should like to insert here a table showing the various increases and decreases in expenditure to which I have referred.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Has the Minister of Finance permission to insert this table?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

I have also been asked at different times as to what is the government's financial program. I should now like to indicate the intentions of the government in the matter of financial and fiscal changes which will be submitted to the house in due course for legislative action.

This, as hon. members do not need to be reminded, is not an ordinary or regular session. It is a session called in the fall of the year under circumstances that limited the duration of the session. Its purposes, as the Leader of the Opposition well indicated a few days ago were, first, to vote the approximately 800 items of supply which had not been voted at the time of dissolution and, second, to afford the government an opportunity of laying before parliament for action this fall that constructive program of legislative action which the electorate of Canada had approved on June 10.

One of the undertakings given to the Canadian people in that campaign by that distinguished man who is today the Prime Minister of Canada was that we would reduce taxes. I am not proposing now nor do I intend to propose at any time in this session any increases of any kind in taxation. That made it quite unnecessary to submit to the house anything resembling a budget. The budget for this year was submitted to the house last spring by the then minister of finance. There will be ample opportunity for every member of the house to express whatever opinions he chooses on any of the matters upon which I am now about to indicate the intentions of the government.

May I in passing point out, Mr. Chairman, that it has been quite impossible in the short space of time the government has been in office to take up those matters which the Minister of Finance normally reviews in preparing a budget. There has been no time in which to deal with the wide range of fiscal matters that come to the Minister of Finance apart from those that relate directly to taxation about which I shall shortly have something to say. But I wish to make it abundantly clear that never have I said that there would be that kind of budget presentation which is characteristic of a normal session of parliament. I have said that we would submit to the house such measures as are required to implement the undertakings which we gave to the public in the campaign; and that, Mr. Chairman, is precisely what we shall do.

There are several matters to which reference must be made which require some remedial legislative action. The bill which I hope to introduce will include a change in the corporate tax structure which will be, I trust, of benefit to certain small corporations.

But I wish, first of all, to deal with a specific matter affecting construction workers. This is a matter which requires an amendment to the Income Tax Act before the end of this calendar year. It is the matter of certain allowances paid to construction workers by their employers to cover expenses of the worker while he is living away from his normal place of residence for a period of time at a construction site. Hon. members will recall that this problem first was brought to public attention by the publication by the Department of National Revenue of a directive entitled "Information Bulletin No. 10" on July 10, 1956. This directive announced that construction workers must thereafter include for tax purposes certain per diem and other allowances received from their employer, whether paid in cash or in the form of free board and lodging. This matter was debated at some length this spring when income tax amendments were under consideration. Some of us then in opposition protested strongly against the effect of this directive, and finally the then minister of finance stated that the rule contained in Bulletin No. 10 would not apply to incomes in 1956 but that the allowance would be taxed commencing in 1957.

For many years it has been the practice for employers in the construction industry to provide board and lodging for workers at remote sites or to pay them an allowance over and above the going wage as reimbursement for expenses of meals and lodging where those were paid for by the worker himself. It is also customary for the construction employer to bear the expense of transporting employees to distant construction sites and bringing them back to their normal place of residence. Throughout the years this has been normal procedure in this industry, and the construction workers did not include in their income for tax purposes the value of these allowances or expenses paid on their behalf by their employer. Then with the issuance of Bulletin No. 10 in 1956 the previous government made it known that these amounts were taxable under the existing law and employers had been under instruction in 1957 to report those allowances as income of their employees.

It is my intention, Mr. Chairman, to restore the practice which prevailed prior to 1957. In order to put this matter beyond doubt I intend to introduce an appropriate amendment to the Income Tax Act effective from January 1, 1957. This amendment, which is necessarily somewhat technical, will appear in detail in the bill. Briefly it will provide that if the construction site is so distant that the worker cannot reasonably be expected to return daily to his normal place of residence where he maintains a home in which he lives with his wife or some dependent person, then the construction employee will not be required to include in his income for tax purposes the value of the free board and lodging or reasonable allowances paid to him to cover expenses of meals and lodging, or the value of travelling expenses paid by the employer in transporting him to the site and back home again.

The next matter concerns the corporation tax to be paid by certain corporations earning profits in the province of Ontario. In a normal session a bill to give tax relief measures would be the occasion for dealing with a wide variety of miscellaneous technical changes in the income tax structure. This general review of miscellaneous changes in the law will be undertaken in the course of preparation of the budget for the next session. However, I give public notice now of one particular matter which will be the subject of corrective legislation at the next session.

Under the provisions of section 40 of the Income Tax Act, federal corporation income tax is reduced by nine percentage points on profits earned in a "prescribed" province: that is, in a province that does not rent this tax field to the federal government pursuant to the Federal-Provincial Tax-Sharing Agreements Act. This tax abatement enables a province to impose its own tax up to this nine per cent level without raising the combined tax above the general federal rate.

In the five-year period prior to 1957 the federal tax abatement was only seven percentage points and Quebec was the only province imposing its own corporate tax of seven per cent. For 1957 Ontario became a prescribed province and profits earned in the province from January 1, 1957 onward accordingly became entitled to a reduction of nine percentage points in their federal tax. Inadvertently, however, the law introduced by the former government in granting this reduction for 1957 gave also to Ontario companies whose fiscal year does not coincide with the calendar year abatement in respect of that portion of their profits earned in 1956. This pattern of reduction was, of course, appropriate and necessary for profits in Quebec since Quebec was taxing profits in 1956. The result of this fault in the federal legislation is, however, that relief is given at the rate of seven percentage points for corporations earning profits in Ontario for a period when no Ontario tax was imposed at all. Obviously this error must be corrected, otherwise about $12 mililon of unintended tax relief would go to a particular group of non-calendar year companies earning profits in the province of Ontario at a time when no provincial tax was imposed upon them.

I have already reminded the committee that this government promised if elected to power to reduce taxes. It is our purpose, sir, scrupulously to fulfil this promise. I do not need to tell hon. members that it is one of the more pleasant duties of the Minister of Finance to come before the house and announce some reduction in the heavy burden of taxes that previous governments have imposed on the people of Canada.

The bill which I shall introduce will include a change in the corporate tax structure which would be particularly important for small corporations. At present the low tax rate of 20 per cent is confined to profits up to $20,000 per annum. In future, from January 1 onward, the low tax rate will extend up to profits of $25,000. Of course, every corporation with profits in excess of this figure will enjoy some benefit from this tax concession but the change will be of greatest significance to relatively small corporations. About 2,000 corporations with profits between $20,000 and $25,000 will have the tax on profits within this range reduced from 47 per cent to 20 per cent. This relief measure will cost the treasury about $12 million on a full year basis and about $1 million in the current fiscal year and I believe it will give a stimulus and incentive to business in small corporations.

Mr. Chairman, I wish to table at this point for the convenience of hon. members the table indicating the effect of increasing the bracket of corporation income tax.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Does the hon. minister wish to put it in Hansard?

Mr. Fleming: Yes.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Is this agreeable to hon. members of the committee?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming: The table is as follows:

Effect of increasing the bracket of corporation income subject to the 20% tax rate from $20,000 to $25,000

Income of corporation	Present tax	Proposed tax	Reduction in tax
$	$	$	$	%
25,000	6,350	5,000	1,350	21.3
30,000	8,700	7,350	1,350	15.5
35,000	11,050	9,700	1,350	12.2
40,000	13,400	12,050	1,350	10.1
50,000	18,100	16,750	1,350	7.5
75,000	29,850	28,500	1,350	4.5
100,000	41,600	40,250	1,350	3.2
200,000	88,600	87,250	1,350	1.5
300,000	135,600	134,250	1,350	1.0
500,000	229,600	228,250	1,350	.6

The old age security tax of 2 per cent is included in the taxes shown above.

I also have something to say concerning the Excise Tax Act. Under that act the special excise tax on automobiles is now 10 per cent. I intend to introduce an amending bill to reduce this tax to 7½ per cent. This reduction which is equivalent to 25 per cent of the tax will be effective as from midnight and it is estimated to cost the treasury about $20 million on a full-year basis and approximately $8 million for the balance of the current fiscal year.

As recently announced by my colleague the Minister of National Revenue on December 2 a refund will be given to authorized dealers and distributors in respect of tax already paid on floor stocks of new cars on hand. This will relieve them of any loss resulting from the tax decrease, and spare them a repetition of the heavy losses that they sustained the last time this tax was reduced. The government has received assurances given on behalf of all automobile manufacturers that the benefit of this reduction will immediately appear in the manufacturers' wholesale prices and suggested retail prices. The government will expect this tax reduction to be reflected at once in the price of new cars to the public.

I now have a word to say concerning personal income tax. The first measure of relief I intend to propose to personal income taxpayers is an increase of $100 in the allowance for dependents under the Income Tax Act. This means that commencing January 1, 1958, the deduction from income for children of family allowance age will be increased from $150 to $250 per annum. For all other dependents the present $400 deduction will be raised to $500. Basic personal and marital exemptions remain unchanged.

In addition to giving much deserved relief to taxpayers with dependent children and other dependents this increase in the deduction will have the effect of freeing completely from income tax about 100,000 taxpayers and will give substantial tax relief to about one and three-quarter million other taxpayers. For a full year this measure of relief will cost the treasury about $60 million. For the current fiscal year the cost in revenue loss will be about $7 million.

The second measure of tax relief for personal income taxpayers which I shall propose will, as from January 1, 1958 reduce tax rates in the first two brackets of income in the rate structure. On the first $1,000 of taxable income the present rate of 13 per cent will be reduced to 11 per cent. The 15 per cent rate on the second $1,000 of taxable income will be reduced by one point to 14 per cent. These changes in the rate structure will benefit every income taxpayer in Canada, of whom there are approximately four and one-half million persons.

There are, however, about 3 million taxpayers, or about 70 per cent of the total, who have taxable incomes—that is to say, income after exemptions—of not more than $2,000. Thus, 70 per cent of all income taxpayers affected particularly by these rate changes will enjoy a substantial percentage reduction in their income tax, just over 15 per cent in the case of taxpayers in the first $1,000 bracket and about 11 per cent in the case of those in the second $1,000 bracket. This reduction—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): I am sorry to inform the Minister of Finance that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Has he permission of the committee to proceed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming: I thank the committee for extending that courtesy to me.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman,—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Order.

Mr. Sinclair: —I would point out that the Minister of Finance chose this way to present his budget address in this committee of the whole and the rules of the house and constitutional practice apply equally to himself and they provide that a member can speak for only 30 minutes in committee.

Mr. Nowlan: That is quite right.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Order. When I asked for unanimous consent I did not hear any noes and in my opinion the committee gave unanimous consent.

Mr. Coldwell: I think the committee will give consent. What the hon. member said is perfectly correct. The minister told us that he would abide by the rules of the house. Had the minister introduced this matter in the way it should have been introduced there would be no discussion of this sort. I am not objecting, but I want to remind him that this is contravening the rules of the house.

Mr. Sinclair: That is exactly the position of the official opposition. I want to remind the minister that if he had followed the constitutional practice of doing this on a ways and means resolution he would have had unlimited time and I would have had unlimited time; but with the consent of the official opposition and of the other parties the hon. member may proceed.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Chairman, I thank the committee for the courtesy that has been extended to me and I would ask the committee to extend a similar courtesy to the hon. member for Coast-Capilano if he should require it. I hoped, Mr. Chairman, I can assure my hon. friend, to have completed my remarks within the space of 30 minutes. I shall be very brief now in coming to a conclusion.

This reduction will amount in a full year to $86 million, and, together with the increase in allowances for dependants, which I have mentioned, will mean that the personal income tax will be cut by a total of $146 million and, as I have said, 100,000 taxpayers will be freed entirely from the necessity of paying income tax.

May I, Mr. Chairman, for the information of hon. members place on Hansard at this point six tables which will illustrate the effect of the various decreases on personal income taxpayers of various income brackets.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Has the minister permission to put these tables on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming: The tables follow:

[Mr. Fleming.]

The old age security tax of 2 per cent of taxable income (maximum tax $60) is payable in addition to the taxes shown above.

In calculating the above taxes it has been assumed that everyone takes the optional standard deduction of $100 in lieu of claiming deductions for charitable donations, unusual medical expenses and union dues.

In calculating the above taxes it has also been assumed that where incomes are in excess of $30,000 that part of income which is in excess of $30,000 is subject to the 4 per cent investment surtax.

I have a word to say on the subject of estate tax. I intend forthwith to place on the order paper a resolution to permit the introduction of a new measure to repeal the Succession Duty Act and to replace it with a new estate tax act. The measure will apply the estate tax principle rather than the inheritance or succession principle. In keeping with the policy of the government it will be another tax reduction measure. It will also greatly simplify the taxation of estates. I shall reserve extended comments until I move the resolution in due course.

For the present I point out that in every tax bracket the tax payable under the new law will be less than under the present Succession Duty Act. All estates will be fully exempted up to a minimum of $50,000. No estate of lower aggregate value will pay any estate tax whatever. In the case of an estate passing to a widow there will be an exemption of $60,000 plus $10,000 for each child under 21 years of age. Thus, if a husband dies leaving a widow and one child under 21 years of age there will be no tax payable unless the value of the estate exceeds $70,000. If he leaves a widow and two children under 21 years of age no estate tax will be payable unless the aggregate value of the estate exceeds $80,000. If he leaves a widow and three children under 21 years of age no estate tax will be payable unless the aggregate value of the estate exceeds $90,000. If he leaves a widow and four children under 21 years of age no estate tax will be payable unless the aggregate value of the estate exceeds $100,000.

The annual loss of revenue to the treasury will be $6 to $8 million. About 40 per cent of this reduction will go to the smallest group of taxable estates, namely those between $50,000 and $75,000. For estates of this size the average reduction is approximately 70 per cent.

It is not intended, sir, to ask the house to advance this bill at the present session beyond first reading. It is desirable that the bill be given first reading and be circulated among hon. members and be available to the public, particularly the members of the legal and accountancy professions. Their views and suggestions on this major measure will be sought and it will be the intention of the government, with the assistance of suggestions from these sources, to ask parliament to enact the measure at the 1958 session.

May I now summarize the effect of the changes on the balance of ways and means for the present fiscal year? The tax changes I shall be proposing will benefit the car buyer immediately, but because of the time required to put new tax deduction tables into effect, the income tax reductions, although applicable to the full calendar year 1958, may not in all cases be reflected in pay envelopes and salary cheques until February; but this work will be done, I assure the committee, with all possible speed.

While the total tax reductions will add up to $178 million in a full year, the Minister of Finance's cash receipts will be affected by only some $26 million prior to March 31. May I at this point, Mr. Chairman, for the convenience of members, place on the record a table indicating the tax reductions in detail?

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Has the Minister of Finance permission to place this table on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fleming: The table follows:

Tax Reductions
(In millions of dollars)

	In a full year	In the current fiscal year
Corporate income tax	$ 12	$ 1
Personal income tax	146	17
Special excise tax	20	8
Total	$178	$26

Having previously forecast a surplus of revenue over expenditure for the year ending March 31 next of $106 million, we may now expect a surplus of $80 million after giving effect to the tax changes that I have proposed.

In conclusion, sir, may I say that the aim of the government in this program is to create more incentive by relieving the Canadian people, particularly those in the low income brackets, of a portion of the tax burden which they have been bearing. It has not been possible in this one short session and in the first 5½ months in office for the government to achieve all the measures of tax reform which it would like to put into effect. We trust that the committee will, however, recognize the boldness of the government's program and the extent to which it will contribute to confidence and prosperity.

In these arduous five and a half months since taking office on the 21st day of June the members of the government have been sustained by the example and the leadership of the Prime Minister. Those who have seen finance ministers come and go have informed me that none has faced as heavy a volume of work in the space of five and a half months as has faced this incumbent during the past five and a half months. But, Mr. Chairman, may I say very humbly that 17 to 18 hours' work per day and 100 hours' work per week are an insignificant price to pay for the high privilege of serving Canada.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Chairman, it is the custom for the financial critic of the official opposition to start his remarks by paying a few compliments in a friendly way to the finance minister. That of course will be completely unnecessary today because nothing I could say or anyone else in this country could say would cover him with quite the glory with which he has now just covered himself. Hard working he may be—he has told us so himself—but modesty is not one of his qualities.

The present situation, Mr. Chairman, shows very clearly how correct the leader of the C.C.F. party was this morning when he said this was a queer way to do business, and it certainly is unparallelled since confederation. Never before has a Canadian minister of finance, hard-working or otherwise, modest or immodest, ever tried to bring down a budget and tax proposals on item 1 of the finance estimates.

Mr. Harkness: Except by radio.

Mr. Nowlan: How about radio?

Mr. Sinclair: I am going to come to that. Just content yourselves. This, of course, is in very vivid contrast to the statement made last June 25 to the Canadian Press and the British United Press by the minister, before he put in these 17 hours a day every day that there would be a fall budget with tax reductions and pension boosts. He went on to say that he was going to reduce taxes, increase old age pensions and curb government spending in the budget which he was going to bring down. Well, right after that day a pall of silence fell on the usually very talkative and very voluble minister. The press reported that a telephone call by the Prime Minister told him to stop talking and to start working.

Mr. Fleming: I had no telephone call from the Prime Minister.

Mr. Sinclair: Since the session opened I and other members have tried our best to get him to tell us the date of this budget that he said would be presented. He did not say directly. He did not actually deny what the Canadian Press and the British United Press had reported but he left that impression in everyone's mind. He said, of course, that the constitutional practice would be followed. Then we began to suspect there was not going to be a budget so we changed our questioning from when is the budget going to be presented to will there be a budget, and finally after the minister's evasions, we had to turn to the Prime Minister to get an answer. He did answer, as found on page 1710 of Hansard, and told us that there would be no budget this session. He gave a very airy answer saying that he had studied the history of parliament since confederation and had found that in the second sessions of 1873, 1919, 1930 and 1947 no budgets had been presented.

I have checked the four precedents he offered to the house. There is no Hansard for 1873 in the library but there is a scrapbook of accounts of the debates in those days. There was one short session on the railway scandal, the famous Tory railway scandal of 1873. There were no financial proposals made other than the financial proposals made in telegrams from the Tory prime minister at that time to prominent Tories around the country.

In 1919 there was a second session called by Sir Robert Borden and in the speech from the throne only one thing was mentioned, ratification of the Versailles peace treaty which had been signed on June 28. Nobody asked for a budget because no tax measures of any significance were proposed at that session. So there was no precedent there.

Now we roll along to 1930 with a Conservative government again in power. They too pledged a fall session of parliament, and in the throne speech again there was only one subject mentioned, unemployment, a problem which our new Conservative government is certainly having to grapple with. Mr. Bennett declared it was the sole issue of the session. Twenty million dollars was voted for immediate relief and amendments were made to the dumping laws and to the tariff, not for revenue, said Mr. Bennett, but to protect the Canadian workingman. If revenue resulted from these acts the plan would fail because they would not have halted distress selling from other countries. Again no member asked for any budget discussion at that time because obviously neither budgetary nor tax measures were being considered.

I have read those debates with great interest. I was not in the country at the time of the 1930 election. I was a student in Europe. It was very interesting to read and see that that Conservative government, like the present Conservative government, came to power with a tremendous number of promises, but in fairness to Mr. Bennett I must say he ran No. 2 both in number and size of promises to the present Prime Minister. Both, however, made the promise that they would immediately call parliament to carry out their promises. Well, Mr. Bennett made a pretty good fist of that. The election was on July 28 and on September 2 parliament sat. Of course, we heard after June 10 there was going to be an immediate session of parliament but that did not take place until October 14 and today, December 6, we are still waiting for this budget which was promised by the minister last June 25.

We roll along then to 1947. There was no fall session in 1947. The 1948 parliament began in December, 1947, but in that 1947-48 session there was a regular presentation of the budget in the ordinary way. My friend, the Minister of Agriculture, mentioned budget by radio. It is quite true that on November 17 the then minister of finance went on the C.B.C. radio to announce two actions he was taking under two acts of parliament, the Foreign Exchange Control Act and the transitional powers act, in order to stop the drain of our money reserves to the United States, the so-called austerity program.

Our reserves had fallen from over $1,200 million at the beginning of the year to less than $500 million at that time. These two measures, curtailment by quotas of United States imports and an excise tax to discourage the buying of non-essential goods, were announced that night. Parliament met in December and the second order of business was parliamentary approval of these two actions. That is why the minister said then, as Mr. Bennett said in 1930, that there was no budget by radio because these two measures were not designed to increase revenue but rather to restrict the importation of United States goods.

So I say there is no precedent in Canadian parliamentary history for a new session of a new parliament not having a budget. It is especially significant at this time because never before in Canadian history was a party elected on a platform of so many expensive promises, and so many high tax cuts, promises and policies that were obviously going to have a very profound effect on the balance of ways and means. As far as other members of the House of Commons are concerned, as far as the people of the nation are concerned, the only way they will learn the impact of the new proposals made, the many new proposals we are waiting for if their promises are going to be implemented, and also the tax cuts—not the small ones mentioned tonight but the ones I am going to mention which were promised in the election—is for the people to be given an accounting and a balance sheet. In other words, they want the usual budget debate which characterizes every formal session of parliament.

What does a budget debate entail? First of all, it does entail a fair measure of warning. I looked back in Hansard and over the last 20 years there was a warning of anywhere from five days to two weeks of the actual date on which the budget was going to be produced. Then, there was a white paper produced the day before the budget. Last year it was a document of 90 pages containing many figures. In this way every member would know exactly the up to date figures on the economic state of the nation on gross national product, on trade, on the balance of payments and on the revenues from the various tax fields. We would have that before us when we listened to the minister and before we made our own speeches.

In addition, there was the courtesy extended that the hon. member for Greenwood mentioned earlier, that, as the minister began his speech, and it was generally a long speech, he sent a copy of his proposals across to the leaders of the various groups so that they could read all the figures there and be ready when he concluded his remarks to make some statements on them. Tonight we have had no such information. I understand the press gallery also has had no information. We jot down these figures as best we can as the minister speaks, and will have to wait now until these tables appear in Hansard in the morning before we really understand.

Finally, the minister stood up in his place at eight o'clock on the appointed night, with the Speaker in the chair, and moved a motion for ways and means. By our rule book he is given unlimited time, as he should have, in proposing such an essential statement for the people of this country, and the first speaker replying to him is given the same privilege. This is the constitutional practice, and is the practice which has been followed since confederation. Our new Minister of Finance, however, beat a new trail. He chose to use item 1 of his estimates to make this budget statement. I looked back over the last 12 presentations of finance estimates, which cover the period the hon. member has been in the house, and in 11 out of those 12 years there was no statement whatever made on item 1. In one year the minister of finance, in response to a request from the Social Credit party, gave a short two page statement on fiscal and monetary policy. It is quite true that other ministers in other departments sometimes choose to make a fairly extended statement on item 1 outlining the work of their department during the previous year. I, myself, when I was Minister of Fisheries followed that course.

The reason ministers of finance never have followed such a course is that traditionally they have had a very much better opportunity in the budget debate to put before parliament the whole story of the balance sheet of Canada. This, however, has been denied us by the present procedure. Let us just compare that traditional procedure with what has happened today; this queer way of doing business as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar rightly calls it. First of all, instead of five days or two weeks warning we had really no warning at all. Yesterday morning, according to Hansard, the Minister of Finance assured this house that the finance estimates would not come before parliament today. At ten o'clock last night, after prodding by the house leader of the official opposition, it was brought out that at eight o'clock tonight, despite the assertions of the Minister of Finance, we would be into finance tonight. We had, therefore, no warning.

Secondly, we have no basic material. There is no white paper produced. There was no white paper produced either by the Minister of National Defence when we started on his estimates a day or two ago, the biggest block of estimates presented to this house. Another weakness at the present time with this procedure is the failure of the minister to make a statement in the house which, in my time, Mr. Ilsley, Mr. Abbott and Mr. Harris have made, inviting members of the opposition to make full use so far as finding factual information is concerned, of the very able officers of the Department of Finance. Having spent four years as assistant to the minister of finance, I have formed a very high opinion of their services. I recall that the hon. member for Greenwood, when he was financial critic, took great advantage of that offer and that staff. These civil servants, after all, are not solely serving the government. We would not expect them to reveal policy to us in the opposition, but it would be very helpful if we could have access to them for factual information.

You might say, why did I not approach them anyhow, without invitation? We have heard statements from the Minister of Public Works and others recently about the very high value they place on the civil servants of Canada. These statements are certainly well deserved. However, we also heard rumblings from the patronage-hungry Tories rebuking the Minister of Public Works for saying there was going to be no patronage. The hon. member for Victoria returned to British Columbia after a caucus meeting of Conservative members last summer and spoke at a meeting of the Oak Bay Progressive Conservative association on September 17. I shall take this report from the Victoria Colonist because it is the Tory paper. It reads:

Civil Service "Brass" All Grits, Tories find.

The heat is on the top brass of the civil service in Ottawa, A. DeB McPhillips, Victoria MP, told the Oak Bay Progressive Conservative Association last night.

The government now is in the process of breaking down the all-Grit top echelon of the civil service, he said.

"All the top civil servants and the deputy ministers are Grits," he told the meeting.

"Don't be impatient at government action," he said. "After the next election when we have a more secure mandate, more stern action will be taken."

I certainly was not going to embarrass any of the top echelon in the finance department by going to them and asking for factual information, and having them fired.

Mr. Macdonnell: Nonsense.

Mr. Sinclair: I would certainly appreciate one of the ministers repudiating the statement which was made after the Tory caucus by the hon. member for Victoria.

Then, even in the ways and means committee, if we finally got there, there would be 48 hours notice given on each of these money resolutions. Instead this new minister chose this unique way of using item 1 of his estimates to make this extraordinarily important statement on finance. He knew that the 30-minute rule on debate applied, and that is why we drew it to his attention and the attention of the nation. He chose a field in which he, himself, would be limited in the account which he gave to the nation. It is for that reason we have had no statement from him on trade, balance of payments gross national production, or any of the many economic aspects which are usually and properly reviewed in such a budget speech.

Of course, this queer way of doing business could have been avoided if he had followed, as he said he would, the constitutional practice of the Canadian parliament; if he had gone ahead with his solemn promise of last summer that there would be a budget; even if he had changed his mind—there is nothing wrong about changing your mind, if he had told us. Today the minister who sits behind him, the Minister of Labour, got up and frankly admitted he had made a mistake. We accepted that without any criticism. We all make mistakes, that is everybody except the Minister of Finance. He would not tell the house he had changed his mind and did not intend to have a budget; he let that pass to the Prime Minister to make such an announcement.

[Mr. Sinclair.]

With that explanation of this unusual course, I want now to start touching on some of the remarks the minister just made in this abbreviated budget discussion. I start out by saying that no minister of finance in Canadian history has been quite so lucky as this minister. He has been lucky in the fact that he is blessed with extraordinary talents; he has told us so himself. He is a hard worker; he has told us so himself, and also unlike most previous ministers of finance he started with a $500 million surplus in the kitty. Most new ministers of finance, of course, come in when the exchequer is empty. This minister had a start of $500 million.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Since when? Where did that come from?

Mr. Sinclair: I shall be very happy to tell you where it came from. Last session the minister of finance did present his estimates of revenues, and he estimated that the surplus was going to be $282 million. But never once did any Tory in this house accept that. The minister himself, at page 2556 of Hansard of last session, said that by his calculations the surplus was going to be $518 million. We corrected that assertion quite often, but hon. members of the Tory party would not listen to us.

Then, they went out during the last election campaign and announced across the country, "You are overtaxed by $500 million." Here is just a sample. The hon. member for Huron probably recognizes these advertisements from the Seaforth Expositor.—"500 million surplus." The hon. member for Hamilton South will perhaps recognize this full page advertisement, "Surplus $500 million; Vote for Bob McDonald." Here is another one mentioning the $500 million surplus that the Liberals had taxed from the people. Night after night the Prime Minister made these great declarations that every Canadian family—there are over four million of them—is overtaxed by $120 and that is $500 million a year.

It is for that reason I say the minister was a lucky man to start off with this great $500 million surplus. He has another favourite figure—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He is never wrong.

Mr. Sinclair: Oh, he is never wrong, he said that himself. Another great figure we have seen across the nation in relation to these estimates—and we have books of these promises—was that in relation to essential services. He was going to trim an amount of $500 million from the estimates without affecting essential services. Well, once again he has adopted a queer way of doing business. In tabling the main estimates prepared by the former government at the beginning of the session he said he was tabling them but some of the items he did not stand behind. He was going to remove some and reduce some but did not specify and the Leader of the Opposition and others over here said "Well, give us a list of the items you do not stand behind." But he has refused to do that up to now. So, as each department has come along, we have asked "What part of the $500 million of waste and extravagance have you found in your department?" Well, my hon. friend the Minister of Transport, who is a man who will face up to things said last September he had found no waste or extravagance in his well-run department. The Secretary of State said the same thing—

Mrs. Fairclough: I never did.

Mr. Sinclair: And the minister of mines—

Mrs. Fairclough: On a point of order, I said no such thing. If the hon. member will read Hansard he will find out exactly what I did say.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Sinclair: I should of course permit the hon. lady to have the last word but if she will read Hansard she will find that her estimates were not reduced by $1—

Mrs. Fairclough: And I explained that too.

Mr. Sinclair: That is the whole point of this argument; it is not explanations but reductions that the people were led to expect. The minister of mines said the same thing and it was the same in the case of the ministers of veterans affairs and defence and external affairs. I do not know whether the Minister of Trade and Commerce was asked that same question this morning—

An hon. Member: And the Solicitor General.

Mr. Sinclair: Yes, and then today we have at last come to item 1 of the Department of Finance, the second largest department with items totalling almost $1,200 million. A lot of that is statutory, but you would think that probably in his own department that is where he would find a great part of this $500 million of waste and extravagance of which so far we have seen no evidence. He did mention a small saving which he will be able to make on item 121 but he again paid a sterling tribute to the economy and efficiency with which his department had been run so we cannot expect very much there.

Now I turn to this matter of tax cuts. I do not want to break the rules of this house by going overtime—

Mr. Harkness: First time you did not want to break them.

Mr. Sinclair: No, no, but that was the promise made. The Prime Minister again and again said there would be a great tax reduction; $120 per family or $500 million all told. The excise tax would be removed by them. I do not need to quote the Prime Minister—

Mr. Chevrier: Go ahead.

Mr. Churchill: It is worth quoting.

Mr. Sinclair: Well this figure of $500 million is so well known, and he said that these were solemn obligations which would be effectuated so we naturally expected in this debate tax cuts totalling $500 million. We expected them to be retroactive. On platform after platform he said $10 a month excess tax was being taken out of every family in Canada by the Liberal government. Well now by their failure to correct this situation after almost six months in office they have put a load of $60 extra taxation on every one of these poor families.

I say that tonight the minister groaned and produced a very small mouse in the way of income tax reductions. The 1949 Tory platform and the proposals of their financial critic, the member for Greenwood, were to raise the basic exemption from $1000 to $1,250 and from $2,000 to $2,500 for married men which would cost $140 million a year. Well the voters did not go for that so in 1953 they raised the ante and there was the Prime Minister with the Conservative platform promising that if they were elected the basic exemption would immediately be raised for the single man from $1,000 to $1,500 and for the married man $2,000 to $3,000 at a cost of $300 million a year. We do not hear anything of that tonight.

Now according to my figures when I was parliamentary assistant that would be equivalent to a cost of $300 million for the latter proposal and $140 million for the former proposal, an amount which the hon. member for Greenwood at that time characterized as a very small amount. Why then, if it is such a small amount, is it not included tonight. It is a pity it was not included for it would be a real help to the men on low incomes. A man earning less than $3,000 of course would be totally exempt from tax if these solemn promises had been honoured.

There were of course other promises made. The sales tax was one of them. The Tory whip in his ad. promised this in the Seaforth News which I guess is published in his riding.

Mr. Cardiff: By my opposition.

Mr. Sinclair: But said by you. Here are some tax items in his ad.; "under a Conservative government the income tax for a married man would be nothing on $3,000 after election". Then he goes on to mention prepaid health insurance, floor prices on farm products and then removal of all sales tax and "anyone spending $300 on clothing, shoes and so on now pays $30 and after the election"—or after he is elected—"will pay nothing".

Well we did not hear of any removal of the sales tax tonight. During the election the Prime Minister promised at Windsor to reduce the excise tax on cars, and at Oshawa to abolish the tax. Well, again, there is an awful difference between abolishing a tax and the 2½ per cent reduction in the tax which is now proposed.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): On a point of order. The Prime Minister stated here that he did not make any such suggestion and the hon. member must accept that statement.

Some hon. Members: Oh no.

Mr. Sinclair: The Prime Minister, according to press accounts said, as the hon. member will note if he actually consults Hansard, that he was going to remove the exise tax completely as it was a horse and buggy tax. Then there is my good friend over there the Minister of Transport on the corporation tax—

Mr. Green: On a point of order, Mr. Chairman. The Prime Minister said just a few days ago that he had never said he would remove that tax completely and now the hon. member for Coast-Capilano should not try to put words into his mouth.

Mr. Sinclair: Hon. members will recall that I read an actual clipping from the two Tory papers, the Toronto Telegram and the Ottawa Journal and the Ottawa Citizen, the next day which said that he had promised to abolish this tax. I said and would say that the time to deny that was then, and not six months later.

Now my hon. friend the Minister of Transport over there said he wanted a sliding scale with respect to the corporation tax. Not just a little lift of from $20,000 or $25,000 but a real sliding scale, the whole way up to give real savings, with, the reductions in the corporation taxes, to be at least one-third. He smiles now and I think he still hopes one day this solemn promise may be effectuated. Well, we have not got $500 million nor the reductions tonight as was promised last summer, and solemnly promised.

Then in the figures given in his speech tonight by the minister—and this is one of the disadvantages of not having budget papers in the ordinary way—I think he said that in a full year the tax cuts might amount to $178 million; but would amount to less than $40 million for the present year.

We have heard quite a bit about inflation this session but he does not mention that at all in his budget speech. This is another convenience he has found in choosing supply so he would have to shorten his speech so that such things as inflation and the balance of ways and means could not be covered by him. Inflation has been a very serious problem and the previous government two years ago took brave but unpopular and misunderstood actions—misunderstood mainly because of the attempts of the conservatives to mislead the public about the dangers of inflation and what was being done by the then government. Now the Minister of Finance says we have checked inflation and he went all the way down to Hollywood, Florida which I guess is a place which combines both the attractions of Florida and California, to make a speech to the United States investors apparently to tell them that he was not as mad at them as some of his speeches made in Canada might lead them to believe and on page 11 of his speech to American investors he says this:

> In recent years the Canadian economy, like that of the United States, has been pursued by the ever-increasing threat of inflation. I confidently say to you that inflation has been checked.

I would say that if it has been checked it was checked through brave action taken by Mr. Harris and the governor of the Bank of Canada over the last two years. I said, "If it has been checked"; because I am going to quote a little better financial authority than the hard-working, ever modest Minister of Finance. I have just finished reading the annual report of the Bank of Montreal, Canada's leading bank. In the president's statement this is what he has to say:

> Canada, with its network of close economic and other international ties, would be hiding its head in the sand to assume that the fight against inflation had been won.

Take your choice, the president of the Bank of Montreal speaking to Canadians, or the Minister of Finance speaking to Americans in Florida. But you do not quite have to take your choice because this morning the attention of the house was drawn to the fact that the money rate is going back up. Treasury rates are climbing and of course the Bank of Canada rate climbs as a consequence. It was very interesting, of course, to note that when the treasury rate was falling the Minister of Finance—nice modest little fellow that he is—gathered all the credit to himself. As reported at page 1564 of Hansard, when he announced a reduction in the bank rates he had this to say:

> The government will certainly claim the credit that is its due for a great many things it has done to seek to ease money, credit and interest rates, and is very gratified that its efforts in this regard have borne fruit.

That is when the interest rate goes down. But when the interest rate goes up, like Pontius Pilate he washes his hands of the affair and has nothing to do with it. Again he is such a modest little fellow.

Now I get along to the balance of ways and means. The fact that we have not a white paper makes it exceedingly difficult for any member of the opposition accurately to calculate what is the present balance between revenues and expenditures in this country. We know that some great expenditures have been promised. The Financial Post estimates that the new expenditures already effectuated to date have cost this country another $300 million. I, in my own modest way, have tried to make some calculations of what all the promises of the Tory party would total, and I find that the ones mentioned so far would add about $1,200 million to the annual budget and I am not including some projects. I see my friend the Minister of Public Works smiling at me.

Mr. Green: He is laughing, not smiling.

Mr. Sinclair: After he left Vancouver as a minister of the new government he said that the first task of this government was going to be to rebuild the Canadian merchant marine. That is going to cost $250 million at the very minimum. While he promised that, our friend over here the Minister of Transport is busy stripping off the last eight ships of the Canadian merchant navy and putting them under a foreign flag. That is why I did not include that cost in the $1,200 million of my estimate. I am a little bit confused as to which of these ministers is going to have his way in the end.

Then, of course, we have no mention of the dominion-provincial tax agreements. If there is going to be any more money for the ten provinces before the end of the fiscal year, it must be provided now by the minister. Premier Frost is a modest fellow. All he wants now is $100 million a year extra, which means $200 million extra for the other provinces, an extra total of $300 million. Premier Bennett of British Columbia is not a modest man; he is like the Minister of Finance. He wants another $960 million to be given to the provinces.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): I am sorry to advise the hon. member that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go on.

Mr. Green: Mr. Chairman, this is all very enjoyable. We should be glad to have some more.

Mr. Sinclair: The house leader knows the rules limiting speeches to thirty minutes. But a member can speak as often as he likes on this item No. 1. I shall have therefore more to say on the next time around but unlike the Minister of Finance I will observe the rules at the present time and sit down.

Mr. Coldwell: Mr. Chairman, my first word is this. There are a large number of new members in the House of Commons who are not familiar with the procedures of parliament as they have been developed over the years. Consequently I can understand that many of them think that this way of introducing tax reductions and discussing what is in effect a small budget is the usual and traditional way of doing something which is of the utmost importance to the people of Canada and by tradition one of the most important things that parliament does during the session.

This is a session of parliament; at least I understood it was. It was opened by Her Majesty the Queen as a session,—

An hon. Member: Very formally.

Mr. Coldwell: Very formally indeed, as my hon. friend reminds me. Consequently in this session of parliament we had certainly expected that the government would come before us and present the country's balance sheet, the country's budget. I say that failure to do this is something that should be regarded by this house and indeed by the country with utmost seriousness for it is something that has never happened before. Certainly we in this house did not expect that this would be undertaken by a government headed by the Prime Minister. No one in the last parliament talked more often or at greater length or talked more during the election period or at greater length about the supremacy of parliament and the necessity to restore the rights of parliament than did the present Prime Minister of Canada. Yet today we see set aside one of the parliamentary methods of reviewing the work of the government and particularly its financial affairs and the government refusing to bring in a proper balance sheet.

Tonight we had nothing about the productivity of Canada. We have had no word as to what the gross national product is likely to be. We have some word of what the government expects its receipts and expenditures may be for the year. We are told that there will be a surplus of some $80 million. But when you come to look at that surplus of $80 million, how does the hon. member obtain it? He obtains it by transferring two items of $50 million. Consequently the idea that there will be a surplus of $80 million is altogether wrong.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): It is a bookkeeping trick.

Mr. Coldwell: Yes; it is a bookkeeping trick. It is merely a bookkeeping transfer. That is all it is.

Secondly, we have heard a great deal about the expected surplus outlined by the former minister of finance. I believe that the former minister of finance, when he put before the house the suggestion that he might have a very substantial surplus, believed in his heart that that surplus would not materialize by March 31, 1958. Why? Because he expected during the current year that the federal treasury would have to do something for the health plan that had been adopted in March by this parliament. In the estimates placed before this house tonight by the Minister of Finance no mention has been made of the possibility of the federal government having to contribute to any of the six provinces that have come to agreement with this government and this parliament.

Mr. Monteith: They have not signed them yet.

Mr. Coldwell: Yet the Prime Minister has told us, when he has been twitted, that this health plan or this hospitalization plan will come into effect sooner than you think. How soon?

Mr. Monteith: And it will.

Mr. Coldwell: The minister says it will. Very well. Why did not the Minister of Finance, if it is coming in soon, tell us what it is going to cost, and how much of the $80 million will be allocated to the provinces during the next few months because there are provinces with their health plans in operation and ready and anxious to sign and properly entitled to receive the grants under the legislation that we passed in this house last March. Then again, he has told us nothing about what he is going to do for agriculture.

We are going to have an agricultural measure in this house that we hope at least will do something for the farmers of this country. We are hoping that some provision will be made for deficiency payments. We are hoping that some means will be found to give the farmers something of parity for their products. This legislation is supposed to be brought in. What is it going to cost? The Minister of Finance has had nothing to say about the cost of these worth-while additional expenditures that this parliament will be called upon to make, I hope, within the next few months. There was no mention of agriculture, no mention of a health plan and no mention of the gross national product and what we may expect during the next few months of this current financial year in that regard.

Mr. Benidickson: He is on the skids.

Mr. Coldwell: True, the statement the minister made tonight does envisage some tax reductions which will be welcome. The reduction of the excise tax from 10 per cent to 7½ per cent will be welcomed by the automobile industry and more particularly by the dealers if they are relieved of the loss that they might otherwise have sustained. The people of Canada will welcome this measure if the automobile industry passes on this saving to the people. But even that is not what was expected. We have been told that this tax is a pernicious tax and that it would be wiped out.

Mr. Sinclair: It was described as a horse and buggy tax.

Mr. Coldwell: We were told that it would be cut down to five per cent.

Some hon. Members: Told by whom?

Mr. Coldwell: Everybody expected it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There was a leak.

Mr. Coldwell: It was generally stated. My hon. friends criticized that tax in toto.

Mr. Sinclair: Horse and buggy tax.

Mr. Coldwell: Yes, a horse and buggy tax.

An hon. Member: We agree that it is.

Mr. Coldwell: The government promised it would be wiped out.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Just part of the horse now, that is all you are.

Mr. Coldwell: Members of the government electioneered about the tax and criticized it in toto. They promised if they were elected that it would be reduced more drastically than it was tonight. Why was it not reduced to a greater extent? Perhaps they did not want the people to give any credence to the leak that was generally supposed to have occurred during the past week or ten days.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Coldwell: My hon. friends can groan as they like but they are going to groan a lot more in the next few years.

Mr. McCleave: You are groaning now.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And there will be weeping and wailing and gnashing of teeth, too.

Mr. Coldwell: We have had tonight an excuse for a budget.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): A pretty good excuse.

Mr. Coldwell: The Minister of National Health and Welfare laughs—

Mr. Monteith: That is right.

Mr. Coldwell: —but let him read his Canadian history and his British history and he will find that what has been done tonight is unprecedented in two particulars. The first is that the government has refused to bring down a financial statement, a budget, into this house. The second is that this has been introduced in the house without a motion in committee of ways and means so there can be no real debate on the proposals of the minister.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): What is going on now?

Mr. Coldwell: This is not a proper debate. The hon. member for Coast-Capilano and I cannot move an amendment. We are only discussing the first item of the estimates.

Mr. Stanton: You would not debate it even if you could.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): You do not vote for your amendments.

Mr. Stewart (Winnipeg North): Oh yes we do.

Mr. Coldwell: My hon. friend mentioned the fact that the Prime Minister, last Monday, December 2, attempted to justify this kind of caricature of parliament, as he described something that occurred in the house in June, 1956, by saying that this had been done before. I want to tell you that it has never been done before. My hon. friend quoted the precedents. What were those precedents? Well, he described them to us. The first occurred in the session of 1873. What length of time did the house meet in 1873?

Mr. McIvor: That was a long time ago.

Mr. Coldwell: Eleven days. As my hon. friend already said that was the session of the infamous Pacific scandal but what he did not mention—and perhaps my hon. friend forgot to mention it—was that there were no tax changes in those eleven days so there was no need for a budget in that session.

The next example was that of 1919, a slightly longer session. Again the Prime Minister neglected to inform us last Monday that there were no changes in taxation during that short session which lasted less than a month as I recall it. I would not want to say definitely how long it lasted because my memory may be at fault in that particular.

The session of 1930 which was cited as another example lasted twelve days and was looked upon as an emergency session. Unemployment was rampant, farm prices had fallen and even some of our great banks and insurance companies were in a very uncertain position, so uncertain a position my hon. friends may remember that the government of that day passed two orders in council in 1930 or 1931 authorizing the banks and insurance companies to publish balance sheets showing their assets valued not at the end of the year when those orders in council were passed but prior to the depression.

The Hon. Mr. Power who is now in the Senate and the Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley who is now one of our respected judges told this story in the House of Commons two or three years later and you will find it in the records. I have in my files the two orders in council that were passed by the Conservative government at that time covering up the situation that threatened our financial institutions. The emergency session of 1930 lasted twelve days. This, we are told, is a full session of parliament and it was opened, as I said, by Her Majesty the Queen to do the business of the country.

The Prime Minister also referred to December, 1947 when he said there was no budget but that there were extensive fiscal changes. That is perfectly true. I remember that very well and I recall the debate when a budget was presented later in that very session. Hon. members will recall that we met and the session extended over several months and a budget was brought down later in the session. I was really surprised that the minister would quote what he criticized so severely in 1947 as a precedent for doing the thing his government has done tonight. I am equally unable to understand the Minister of Finance doing what he has done in view of his criticism at the same time.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): He is on the record, too.

Mr. Coldwell: Yes, and I think I may read the record back to him. In the budget debate of March 9, 1948 as recorded at page 2047 of Hansard of that date the present Minister of Finance said:

> The minister has invited this house, in a gesture which I say is an insult to the intelligence of the house, to believe that this was done in obedience to necessity.

I believe this has reference to an announcement made over the radio. He continued:

> How necessity is always conjured up to serve the ends of tyrants!

It is necessary that we shall not have a budget debate; the necessity is that we get this through this session without it. Indeed, how necessity is always conjured up to serve the ends of tyrants! He went on to say:

> Last week I quoted in this house the words of William Pitt: "Necessity is the plea for every infringement of human freedom. It is the argument of tyrants; it is the creed of slaves." And naturally it was necessity to which the Minister of Finance tonight ascribed the act which, in the name of the government, he embarked upon on November 17.
> Necessity! Was there necessity for over-riding the constitution,—

I am quoting the words, of course, of the Minister of Finance.

> —for over-riding settled constitutional principles centuries old, principles which have been the bulwark of the rights, not simply of a few but of all citizens?

That is what he has done tonight. I continue:

> This is not an issue that affects just a few people; this is an issue that touches every man, woman and child in Canada who values freedom, and who can see, in what this government has been doing in the past three and one-half months, steps toward oligarchical rule and the destruction of our parliamentary institutions.

Was there ever a more apt quotation turned back on the man who made it? The Prime Minister was not to be outdone on that occasion. The same day, March 9, 1948, he spoke, as recorded at page 2029 of Hansard, and he said:

> There, sir, is the picture from 1215 to 1947; and, with only one exception, never after the development of parliamentary government either in Britain or in any of the self-governing dominions has taxation been imposed as a result of the simple statement or the fiat of any one minister.

Nor, may I say, has taxation been reduced by the statement or the fiat of a single minister. That is what we have seen tonight.

Mr. Fleming: Tax reduction?

Mr. Coldwell: I could quote in support of that Durell, "On the Function of the Committee of Ways and Means", in which he points out clearly that any taxation imposed such as that would be unconstitutional, uncollectible and unjustifiable.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Imposed.

[Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre).]

Mr. Coldwell: That was the Prime Minister speaking. I know the lawyer can quibble, but I want to say that it is just exactly in the same category if a minister issues a fiat to impose or reduce or abolish taxation.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Oh, no.

Mr. Coldwell: Just a moment; it is still a ministerial announcement that is not a part of a resolution of this house. This house alone can impose and reduce taxes and yet the minister said tonight that the reduction in the excise tax would go into effect at midnight tonight, was it? There you have the reduction made. It may be said that when the budget is brought down we do precisely that. Yes, we do; we do that by custom; we do that by precedents and we do it in the proper constitutional way as part of the budget announcements, but tonight we have not a budget. The minister said that he was not going to introduce a budget. We have not a budget tonight.

I want to say, too, that one very revealing statement of the Minister of Finance tonight was this. He said that the relief, and welcome relief, in the lowest bracket—we are glad to see that relief being given—would affect 100,000 families in Canada in the $2,000 or slightly over bracket, depending on the dependants. That is something of an indictment on our Canadian economy, something of an indictment of the conditions that exist in this country when we are told by the minister that there are in effect 100,000 people in that low income tax bracket who will be relieved of taxation because they were in that bracket; in other words that they among others are living on a level far below the cost of subsistence in this country. That is the admission that we have tonight. They are living on incomes far below the cost of subsistence, and I could not help making a note of it when the Minister of Finance made the statement a short time ago.

We are disappointed that some things have been left out that should have been in. We are glad that there are some things which are going to benefit the people of Canada; but no matter how good something may be and how welcome something may be, if we do something in a manner which is the wrong way of doing it then we are creating precedents perhaps that this government or some other government following them can follow and do a great deal more than has been done tonight in the manner in which it has been done.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Will the hon. gentleman permit a question?

Mr. Coldwell: Yes.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Does the hon. gentleman know that the procedure which has been adopted tonight is in precise accord with the principles governing this type of procedure as set down in the 15th edition of Sir Erskine May's Manual of Parliamentary Procedure?

Mr. Benidickson: Give us the page.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Page 764. Will the hon. member permit me to read it, because he is one of the most fair-minded gentlemen in the house?

Mr. Coldwell: No, Mr. Chairman. My hon. friend may read this when I sit down. I shall be sitting down in a few minutes because my time is almost up.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): I do not want to interfere with the hon. member for Peace River.

Mr. Coldwell: May I say this? I understand the hon. member is going to quote May. Is that right?

Mr. Bell (Carleton): Yes.

Mr. Coldwell: May is an authority whose writings and authority are accepted by the parliament of Britain. Our procedures regarding the discussion of estimates differ significantly from the manner in which estimates are discussed in the United Kingdom or in the United States. Through the years we in Canada have made our own precedents. This is the Canadian parliament. We have created our own precedents and since our method of doing business in this house is quite distinct from that of Britain, tonight I have relied on the manner in which we have done business in this house, and neither the hon. gentleman nor the Prime Minister can quote any precedents to the contrary. The Prime Minister, as I have said, tried to quote three precedents. Not one of them holds water. Not one of them is a precedent for the present situation.

Mr. Harkness: Do you forget how often the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre quotes May?

Mr. Coldwell: When he is applicable.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Coldwell: When he is applicable to our own procedures.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Coldwell: Oh, yes. You know, sometimes a loud laugh means a very empty mind. I say that you cannot find a precedent in Canadian parliamentary history which will support what has been done tonight. Never mind what is done in Britain in another type of discussion of estimates.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Coldwell: Again that loud laugh shows that the hon. gentleman does not know what I am talking about.

An hon. Member: Temper.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If we want to do things in the way they do them in Britain, appoint a member of the opposition as chairman of the finance committee.

Mr. Coldwell: However we may welcome these changes, some things have been left out that we deplore and the manner of its doing is not in accordance with Canadian parliamentary procedure.

Mr. Low: Mr. Chairman, in the few minutes that I have before ten o'clock I should like to make a few general remarks about the most unusual exhibition that we have seen here tonight. I think the method which was taken by the Minister of Finance to announce his tax changes was nothing short of sleight-of-hand and a most unusual method, a method that will make history of a very sorry kind. I say that because unquestionably governments in the future will point to this as a precedent, will attempt to use a similar method and, as the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar has said, perhaps try to go farther and create financial chaos in the country.

I was hoping that the Minister of Finance would realize how important it is for him and his colleagues to observe meticulously the rules of parliament and to see to it that this parliament is supreme. The representatives of the people gathered in this parliament are supreme over the executive. I heard the Minister of Finance three years ago away off in East Africa in the parliament house of Nairobi give a learned discourse on the manner in which the executive branch of government was arrogating unto itself the powers of the legislative branch of government. For quite some time he inveighed against the practice and convinced a lot of people there that the Canadian parliament, in common with many other parliaments in the commonwealth, was perhaps giving over to the executive branch powers that really belong to the legislative branch of government, parliament.

I can see from his performance tonight that he did not convince himself then that his arguments were sound because he has certainly turned his back on what he said that day and has, as I said, followed a most unusual course in bringing in this budget. I think the method he used tonight can best be likened perhaps to a farmer transporting a load of hay out of a prison yard and secreting a criminal under the hay in order to get him out of jail. There is no other likeness.

Here is a method that I deplore. I think the government should be straightforward. It had every reason to be straightforward, and I cannot for the life of me understand why the minister did not go straight ahead with the declaration he made shortly after he came into office that he would present a budget. I realize that the Prime Minister was said to have taken a different view at the time and whether the Prime Minister told the Minister of Finance that he was not to bring in a budget or what nobody will know. I am not going to accuse him of interfering with the Minister of Finance in any way but I will say that once the Minister of Finance said he was going to present a budget at this session I think he should have carried it through. If he felt he was out of harmony with his leader he should have resigned and let some other person assume the post and take a course that would have been more in keeping with the wishes of the Prime Minister.

Certainly this method did not represent the views of the Minister of Finance at that time. Something happened to change his mind. I do not know what it was and I suppose we shall never know. Why no budget? There should have been a budget presented and I have said so on every occasion. I agree with those who have already spoken. The hon. member for Coast-Capilano presented, I thought, a very reasoned argument for having a budget. Certainly if at any time in Canadian history it was necessary for members of parliament to have a white paper, this is it. In all my experience of nearly 23 years in legislative chambers, this is the year when we most needed to have all the facts and figures concerning the economic affairs of the country. Certainly we should have had a balance sheet before us several days ago, even if it were necessary to work the hard-working minister 20 or 30 hours a day.

I sympathize with him in his difficulty in trying to carry the heavy duties of an office with which he was not familiar, and having had no executive experience in government it certainly must have been a terrible job for him to get accustomed to things. I appreciate that fact, but if he had said that he would produce to the very best of his ability all the facts and figures that are available and have them printed in a white paper, which would not have been a terrific job, then we could have had something before us to follow.

I should have liked to have a copy of his speech that he gave tonight. Other ministers have paid us that courtesy. Just after the budget speech was under way they have always had copies sent to us so that we could mark them and follow very carefully as they went along. That did help us considerably. Why not tonight?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There has been a change.

Mr. Low: Yes, there has been a change. I thought that when the people of Canada expressed their desire for a change on the 10th of June it was not just a change from in and out but a change in procedures and attitudes as well.

Mr. Coldwell: There has been a change in attitude.

Mr. Sinclair: From courtesy to discourtesy.

Mr. Coldwell: But for the worse.

Mr. Low: Let us say then that the people of Canada expected a change for the better.

An hon. Member: They got it.

Mr. Low: That is a good subject for debate and that is what we are debating at the moment. The fact is that this is one of the best evidences that it is a change for the worse, not for the better. Well, why no budget? That is the big question, the $64,000 question, or is it the $109 million question? Is it because the government is afraid to present a balance sheet? I suggest that a balance sheet would show a whole lot different picture from what we got in the contracted statement made by the minister tonight. For instance, doubtless it would show quite a considerable difference of fact from what we were told concerning the government's so-called or claimed favourable position financially when the Minister of Finance said that they would be able to get through this year even with all the increases they have been making in social security measures and still have a surplus.

Why no balance sheet? A balance sheet would have shown the true facts and I think one of the secrets is the $100 million, which should be shown. It was not shown. It was brought out, of course, in debate, and I think that ought to be emphasized. It looks to me as though the government has been afraid to bring out a balance sheet and I challenge them now to get busy and get one out before the Minister of Finance is finished debating his estimates. I think this house and the people of the country are entitled to it.

Another possibility, of course, as an explanation of no budget is that the government knew that it could not fulfil all its election promises for tax reduction and therefore it did not want to have too many facts and figures before the people of the country and thought it perhaps could mesmerize the people with the figures presented to us tonight involving small tax reductions in various fields. That may be so. I recall, for example, that the present Prime Minister made a speech in Toronto on April 25—and, by George, this is a very fine looking brochure—in the course of that speech he brought out some interesting things about overtaxation by the high tax party. I judge from what is printed here that he considered the Liberals to be the high tax party. I do not know about that. It could be a very serious question that could be debated. However, in the course of what he had to say he made this statement:

> In the session ended last month in Ottawa, and in the budget brought down by Mr. Harris, they made no noticeable reduction in taxes. There was no reduction in the rate of income tax; no reduction in those taxes which contribute to the high cost of goods that you and I have to buy.

Mr. Coldwell: Sales tax.

Mr. Low: Sales tax. I recall that all during the election campaign one of the things that the Prime Minister was pressing home every time he spoke to the Canadian people was that these taxes which do contribute to increases in prices ought to be the very first tackled in any reduction program. I agree with him. But what an emptiness, what a vacuum with regard to these taxes that push prices up in the announcement made by my friend the Minister of Finance tonight. There has not been a single word said about the sales tax.

Of course, mind you, it might have been that if they had brought in changes in the sales tax they would have had to bring in a budget. I do not know for certain whether or not that is true. In any event, that may have been another reason, but the fact remains that the government did not come to grips with this very important matter of taxation that does push up prices and cause inflation. I have said in this house before, and I shall repeat now, there is no more inflationary pressure on the economy of the country than that which is exerted by government when it places heavy taxes upon commodities. There is not any question about it. It is those people in the lower income brackets who are not touched by tonight's announced reductions, who would benefit by a reduction in sales taxes. There was nothing for them in these announcements.

Do not think for one moment, Mr. Chairman, that I do not appreciate the things which the Minister of Finance has done. I think we all must acknowledge that what he has done by way of tax reductions is all to the good. I believe that no one can criticize them too severely. But I do say that they are not in keeping with the promises that have been made by the Prime Minister and other speakers in government circles as they moved about the country during the election campaign and afterwards.

I have not yet got at the reason, perhaps, for the failure to produce a budget. I say that it could have been because the government was afraid to present a balance sheet; it could have been because the government could not fulfil all its election promises for tax reductions and therefore chose the unusual method of dragging in the back door these tax changes so they would not loom too large as a budget. They could declare they were not a budget but simply an announcement of tax reductions which accompanied the moving of the first item of the estimates of the finance department.

Another reason, perhaps, is this. Is it because the government wanted to prevent a full scale budget debate? I think perhaps there is a possible good reason. You see, if we had a full scale budget debate it would take about eight full days. By arrangement, I am quite sure the leader of the government could have reduced that for this particular session to about four or maybe five days, if the government had wanted to have a budget debate that did not extend too long. I am sure that by consultation with the leaders of the parties this could have been arranged, and I think should have been arranged. I believe we are reasonable people and would reasonably meet any request of that kind to facilitate the business of this country in what is supposed to be a special session.

There is no excuse for the government not having asked us; not one. It is just one more reason why I say that the biggest complaint against the government today is this flouting of parliament. This is the very thing upon which they went to the country; the very thing they claimed to the Canadian people they would have to restore. Moses coming to lead the children of Israel out of bondage; that is what they were going to do. I have not seen any evidence of it. Parliament has not been recognized during this session as they promised it would be recognized. What took place tonight is just one further example of the way parliament is being treated. I say that that is not the way to gain the confidence of the people of this country, not at all. It is certainly the best way to lead the people to demand that a change be made for the better. They will demand that sort of thing.

Perhaps as I am about to change topics, Mr. Chairman, this would be a good time to call it ten o'clock. I see it is only one minute to ten.

Mr. Green: May I suggest to Your Honour that you fail to look at the clock until the hon. member has finished?

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Coldwell: Ten o'clock. We were here at ten o'clock this morning.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Has the hon. member leave of the committee to continue?

Some hon. Members: No.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): I am sorry; it being ten o'clock, shall I rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again?

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the leader what the business is for tomorrow?

Mr. Green: Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall commence with the estimates of the Department of Trade and Commerce, then the estimates of the Department of National Revenue.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask what the business will be for Monday and Tuesday of next week?

Mr. Green: Monday will be private members' day. It has been arranged between the representatives of the four parties that on Tuesday we shall have a one day debate on a motion to go into supply, with a vote on any amendment at 8.15.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, while we are on the business of the house, I wonder if I might put a question to the house leader? Will the Minister of Finance be giving notice in the usual way of ways and means resolutions implementing some of the proposals he made tonight? The reason I ask that question is, I believe, obvious. Will the budget debate be carried on in the committee of supply on the first item of the finance estimates or will it be on resolutions in committee of ways and means? I am sure the government does not want to mix it up or have two debates, so perhaps we could be informed of the plan for further debate of these budgetary proposals.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I am sure my friend does not mean to speak of budgetary proposals. There has been no suggestion it was a budget that was presented here tonight, in the sense of the word as he used it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I certainly do.

Mr. Fleming: The rule is quite clear, and I should like to give it to my hon. friend. We have heard tonight that it is necessary to proceed by way of presentation of a budget speech on a motion to resolve the house into committee of ways and means. On the contrary, we have proceeded regularly and in accordance with the authorities on this subject. If my friend will refer to Beauchesne's third edition, citation 495, he will see the following:

> The consideration of the financial statement of the year, familiarly known as "the budget", is made when the finance minister has completed his estimates of the probable income and expenditure for the year and usually after some progress has been made in voting the main estimates laid on the table. It is usual to make the budget speech on the motion for the house to go into committee of ways and means; but finance ministers have at times found it convenient to make it on the motion for committee of supply.

I cite that to show that the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar was quite wrong in what he had to say tonight. If a further authority is required on the subject, it is set out in May. I am quoting from May's 15th edition, pages 760 and 764. The following is to be found at page 760:

> Matters which are covered by the term "charges upon the people" may be briefly summarized as (1) the imposition of taxation, including the increase in rate, or extension in incidence, of existing taxation, (2) the repeal or reduction of existing alleviations of taxation such as exemptions or drawbacks, (3) the delegation of taxing powers within the United Kingdom, (4) the granting of borrowing powers and (5) provision for the payment into the exchequer of receipts which do not arise from taxation.

Then, on page 764 we find the following:

> Provisions for the alleviation of taxation—

May I remind you, sir, there is no suggestion tonight of any increase in taxation. All that has been proposed tonight are measures to alleviate taxation. I quote:

> Provisions for the alleviation of taxation are not subject to the rules of financial procedure. The repeal or reduction of a tax, for instance, by the Finance Bill, is sometimes preceded by a specific ways and means resolution. But this procedure is neither necessary nor usual. Thus provisions for the repeal or the reduction of taxation, the granting or extension of exemptions, the creation or increase of drawbacks, etc. can be presented in bills or inserted by amendment without preliminary sanction of the committee of ways and means.

Mr. Speaker, in the face of those unchallengeable authorities and in keeping with the purpose of the government to respect the rights of parliament at all times the government will proceed in the manner indicated. There will be the fullest opportunity given any member to speak in this committee of supply as often as he wishes—I repeat, as often as he wishes—much more freely than would have been the case if a motion had been offered in the house where every member would have been confined to one speech. Again when the bills are introduced—the bill to amend the Income Tax Act, the bill to amend the Excise Tax Act—hon. members will have their full opportunity to discuss the measures, offer suggestions and move whatever amendments they choose to offer and to oppose those measures if they dare.

Mr. Sinclair: What a man.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, if the Minister of Finance is choosing to defend his course of action by pleading certain citations which he contends are unchallengeable authorities so far as the Canadian parliament is concerned, may I point out before I read one or two citations from authorities which refer to the practice of the Canadian parliament that the Minister of Finance has read from May which is a book on the practices of the parliament of the United Kingdom—

Mr. Fleming: It is a pretty good parliament.

Mr. Sinclair: You think we are still a colony; we are a nation.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): —where they have certain differences in rules, as the Minister of Finance well knows, and where they have permanent legislation governing taxation practices in between budgets. That is quite different from our situation and I submit that to quote the rules which apply at Westminster is begging the question so far as our Canadian parliament is concerned.

Mr. Fleming: There is no difference in this respect.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just a minute; I know the minister can never be wrong but let it be clear that there is a difference.

Mr. Sinclair: They have a family compact mentality.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): If the minister, in quoting citation 495 of Beauchesne's third edition, would like to know where Dr. Beauchesne got that paragraph, I can tell the minister that Beauchesne is simply repeating something that is to be found on page 429 of Bourinot's fourth edition. Bourinot was a distinguished clerk of this House of Commons and his work deals exclusively with the practices of the Canadian House of Commons. I am not going to read all the paragraph, but it tells of some of the difficulties in the first years of confederation when the ministers of finance and the House of Commons tried to sort out the way in which to present budget proposals. Bourinot says there were instances in 1870 and 1874 and one or two other early years when budget proposals were made in committee—sometimes in committee of ways and means and sometimes in committee of supply—although he says that on the occasion when the budget was presented in the committee of supply, in order to implement it, motions were moved in the committee of ways and means the next day.

However, after describing this early instance, Bourinot says in subsequent years, indeed since 1880, the budget statement has been generally made by the finance minister on the motion to go into committee of ways and means, with the Speaker in the chair. Now, Mr. Speaker, the point is that prior to 1880 there was an instance in the Canadian House of Commons of an action such as the one taken by the minister tonight and it is on that basis that Beauchesne put citation 495 in his third edition but, if you look back to the sources of Beauchesne's citation 495, which is page 429 of Bourinot, you will find that it has not happened since 1880.

May I also draw to the attention of the Minister of Finance other citations—I will not take up the time of the house to read them but I will give him the page numbers —418, 428 and 438 of Bourinot, which make it clear that all propositions—not just increases in taxation—relating to the tariff and taxation of the country must be considered in committee of ways and means. At one of the pages I have given Bourinot says that changes in taxation, whether increases, amendments, reductions or abolitions, must be dealt with in committee of ways and means.

I suggest, Mr. Speaker, that my leader was absolutely correct in what he said as to the impropriety of this way of proceeding in terms of the Canadian practice and that according to Canadian practice and according to our rules there is no question but that these income tax changes have got to be dealt with in the committee of ways and means.

It is also my view—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I think this is not the time for debate. I think the Chair has been quite lenient so far.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Chairman, a point of order was made.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: A point of order was raised but this is not the time for debate.

Mr. Nowlan: Order, sit down.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I have not had an answer to my question.

Mr. Nowlan: Sit down; you should not be standing up.

Mr. Chevrier: This debate arose because of a question asked arising out of the order of business and it was followed by a question from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre of the Minister of Finance. The minister had a perfect right to make his explanation as he understood the position and to quote certain authorities and now surely the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has a right to reply and have his reply put on the record.

An hon. Member: How long did the Minister of Finance speak?

Mr. Chevrier: I suggest he is within his rights and should not be interfered with in making his point of order.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Well, I will conclude very briefly with what I have to say. It is my view that the changes we made in our standing orders in 1955, when we separated the rules respecting ways and means from those respecting supply, involved the decision that from then on there was to be only one eight-day debate on the motion to go into committee of ways and means, but there was to be that one debate. Prior to the change in that rule it was possible in one session to have several debates on the motion to go into committee of ways and means and it was agreed in the committee on procedure that maybe that was unnecessary. The change we made in 1955 provided for incidental occasions on which we can go into committee of ways and means without question put, but for the one main budget debate of the session there must be the motion, which is subject to one amendment and one subamendment, and the debate must not exceed eight days.

An hon. Member: Those were the new rules.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): There may be some argument about the interpretation of that rule, Mr. Speaker, for the reason that it has never been tested since it was changed in 1955. I did not think the party across the way would test it. But though there could be a discussion about the requirement that there should be a debate with the Speaker in the chair before we go into committee of ways and means on proposals such as those made tonight, there is no question but that any taxation changes have to be made in committee of ways and means. I consider that our discussion on these taxation measures, taking place in committee of supply, is really out of order, for resolutions will have to be moved in committee of ways and means and it is therefore possible that all the speeches which have been made tonight may be made all over again and nobody could complain.

I submit that when the Minister of Finance and his parliamentary assistant, the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Bell), start looking to the authorities, they should look to authorities that are valid with respect to our Canadian practices.

Mr. Speaker, I repeat my question. Is the Minister of Finance giving notice of resolutions to be moved in committee of ways and means?

Mr. Fleming: My hon. friend has had his answer.

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. There has been no attempt to answer my question. Is the minister filing resolutions to be moved in committee of ways and means?

Some hon. Members: Ten o'clock.

Mr. Coldwell: I think it is rude for a minister to sit in his seat and growl some sort of answer.

It being thirteen minutes after ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

ANSWERS TO QUESTIONS

The following answers, deposited with the Clerk of the house, are printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

FISHERIES PATROL BOATS

Question No. 245—Mr. Kirk:

1. How many of the patrol boats in the protection service of the Department of Fisheries are used mainly to enforce the 12-mile fishing limit?
2. What was the date of the first order in council establishing the 12-mile limit for Canadian trawlers?

Answer by: Hon. J. A. MacLean (Minister of Fisheries):

1. No patrol boat is occupied full time in such enforcement. The work is mainly carried on by C.G.S. Cygnus. Assistance is given by six of the department's larger patrol boats.

2. April 6, 1915.

ELECTRICITY COST, NOVA SCOTIA

Question No. 248—Mr. MacEachen:

1. What is the cost of electricity generated from thermal sources to industrial users in Nova Scotia?
2. What will be the cost to same users as a result of subvention on coal for power purposes?

Questions

Answer by: Hon. Ellen L. Fairclough (Secretary of State):

1. This information is not available in the dominion bureau of statistics. A separate breakdown for industrial users is not compiled.

2. The subvention to be paid on coal for power purposes is part of agreements under negotiation with the authorities in the maritime provinces. Until the agreements are finally concluded, it is not possible to state any figures on the consequent reductions in the cost of power.

2. What is the name and former duty of each?
3. What reason was given in each case for the resignation?

Answer by: Mr. Hodgson, Parliamentary Assistant, for the Minister of Public Works:

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Saturday, December 7, 1957

The house met at eleven o'clock.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

REQUEST FOR TABLING OF BREAKDOWN OF SAVINGS CLAIMED BY MINISTER OF FINANCE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. James Sinclair (Coast-Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I would like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. When the minister next brings his estimates before the committee of supply will he table for the information of the members and the public a breakdown of the $64 million savings, economies and shortfalls claimed in his budget speech last night, the breakdown to be by departments and numbered items in the blue book of estimates?

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance): Mr. Speaker, I indicated yesterday and I think on one previous occasion the method by which this information will be given to the house. As the estimates of each department are brought before the house the minister of the department will indicate where the particular reductions are to be made. As I also mentioned, the work of review is continuing and will continue throughout the balance of the fiscal year. The figure I gave last night is the estimated saving as a result of that total effort up to March 31.

Mr. Sinclair: Mr. Speaker, I would like to point out again to the minister that he included other tables in his account last night, and this one table would be very helpful to the members of this house and the general public and would not be unnecessary work for his department. Will the minister not reconsider and agree to this very modest request?

Hon. George C. Marler (St. Antoine-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the Minister of Finance if he does not appreciate that having these figures beforehand would enable us to consider the individual items in the estimates much more easily and, I would say, much more intelligently if we had that information. The hon. gentleman from his own experience would realize the difficulties in a situation where a number of items may be subject to reduction during discussion. Does the minister not appreciate that there would be great advantage to the committee if this information were available before it?

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: I take it that it is appropriate to discuss the arrangements of the house at this period of the day. The hon. member is not asking a question but is seeking to discuss the arrangements of the house. As I said yesterday, I think it appropriate that these arrangements be discussed between the spokesmen of the parties so we do not have a general debate on arrangements. Is there any more to be said on that subject?

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. Would the Minister of Finance indicate some time soon what items in the estimates will be reduced by actual motion made by the minister?

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I thought I had already dealt with that. The opinion is that this should be done on the estimates of each department by the minister of that department.

Mr. Sinclair: We have not seen it yet in five departments.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Just to be clear, Mr. Speaker, will there be some items concerning which the present committee of supply will actually be asked to make a reduction?

Mr. Fleming: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

INQUIRY AS TO REFERENCE OF PROPOSED RULE CHANGE TO COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, because of the absence of the Prime Minister may I direct this question to the house leader. In the matter of any changes in the rules of the house, including any change in the rule which was badly abused last year, notice of which has been given, will the government have parliament follow the time-honoured tradition of referring any such change to a committee of the house to be presided over by His Honour the Speaker?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, I believe there is a notice of motion in Votes and Proceedings today which would have the effect of abolishing closure. It is not the intention to refer that motion to a committee.

SHIPPING

LASQUETI ISLAND, B.C.—REQUEST FOR PROVISION OF EMERGENCY SERVICE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. T. S. Barnett (Comox-Alberni): Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question of the Minister of Transport. In his absence I will direct my question either to his parliamentary assistant or to the Acting Prime Minister. My question is based on a telegram I received this morning, a copy of which I sent to the office of the Minister of Transport.

Will the minister act on the request of the Lasqueti island chamber of commerce that a ship be sent from Vancouver to replenish their supplies, which are now running low, in order that the inhabitants of this island may continue to exist while he completes the investigation into the possibility of restoring regular steamer service which he promised some two weeks ago?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, we will be very glad to look into this situation at once.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REPORTED CLOSING DOWN OF HOWE SOUND COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Hon. James Sinclair (Coast-Capilano): Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Justice. Can he report any progress in the matter of the Britannia mine?

Hon. E. D. Fulton (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, as I said on a previous occasion in this connection, it is necessary to receive reports and hold consultations with a number of interested people—the company management, the provincial government, and the men; and each step must be reported back to cabinet. As I explained before, this slows matters somewhat, but it is sometimes better to make haste slowly than to reach a precipitate conclusion. We are doing everything we can to find a solution to this problem, but I cannot make a report at the moment.

Mr. Sinclair: The minister says it is sometimes better to make haste slowly, but with Britannia time runs out in two weeks.

Mr. Fulton: The minister understands that perfectly.

[Mr. Green.]

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR FEDERAL ASSISTANCE IN ROAD BUILDING PROGRAM

On the orders of the day:

Mr. F. C. Christian (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources. What has the government undertaken or what does it contemplate by way of emergency federal assistance to the British Columbia government to launch a forest access and fire protection road building program to give winter work to loggers?

Hon. Alvin Hamilton (Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I was given a copy of this question just as I came into the house. All I can say at this time is that no request for assistance has been received from the British Columbia government for such a program in connection with the forest resources of the province.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, may I ask a supplementary question. If such a request is received will it receive favourable consideration?

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think the hon. member for Kootenay West knows that we do not spend time on hypothetical questions. The hon. member for Rosthern.

AGRICULTURE

INQUIRY AS TO APPOINTMENT OF ROYAL COMMISSION TO INVESTIGATE PRICE SPREADS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. A. Tucker (Rosthern): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the house leader whether the government soon will be making an announcement in regard to the proposed royal commission to investigate agricultural price spreads, which was promised quite a long time ago?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, we hope to be able to make an announcement at a very early date.

TRADE

REQUEST FOR FURTHER REPORT ON MISSION TO COMMUNIST CHINA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. A. Bryson (Humboldt-Melfort): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I wonder whether the minister is in a position to further advise the house as to the possibility of trade with China resulting from the visit of the trade mission to that country.

Hon. Gordon Churchill (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I gave all the information that was available to me when I reported to the house yesterday.

Mr. W. A. Tucker (Rosthern): May I direct a supplementary question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He indicated yesterday that the report he had received from our trade commissioner in Hong Kong on his mission to communist China was a preliminary report. Can the minister indicate to the house when the final report will be received, or when he will be able to make a statement to the house as to the possibility of increasing trade with communist China?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Speaker, some time will elapse before I am in a position to make that report. I read the preliminary report of Mr. Forsyth-Smith, and I was very much impressed with the care and attention he gave to his trip to China and his consultations with the people in charge of import and export trade in that country. After the report on each of his visits with these persons he listed a number of follow-up matters that should be attended to, and under one of them I think he listed 12 additional things that would have to be done by way of correspondence, visits or the obtaining of extra information. It is a very comprehensive outline of what he thinks needs to be done before he can make his final report. I think some time will elapse before his detailed report is available to us.

Mr. Pearson: May I ask a supplementary question. Was the trade commissioner in Hong Kong accompanied by an officer of the Department of External Affairs on this mission to Peking?

Mr. Churchill: That was the information I gave the house some considerable time ago.

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River): May I ask a supplementary question. Did the Canadian representatives when visiting China raise the question of the unpaid liabilities under part II of the Export Credits Insurance Act?

Mr. Churchill: I did not notice anything of that nature in the preliminary report.

THE CANADIAN ECONOMY

ROYAL COMMISSION ON ENERGY—INQUIRY AS TO COMMENCEMENT OF SITTINGS

On the orders of the day:

Hon. George C. Marler (St. Antoine-Westmount): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the house leader in connection with the royal commission on energy. Is the government yet in position to state when the first meeting of the committee is to be held? I might point out that I asked this question of the Prime Minister several weeks ago, and I cannot say an answer has been given to what seems to me to be a question of public interest.

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): I cannot answer that today, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Marler: I appreciate that.

Mr. Green: I will make inquiries, and if it is possible to give an answer in the course of next week I shall be glad to do so.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Algoma East): I should like to direct a supplementary question to the minister. Will the hon. gentleman make inquiries as to whether the chairman of the commission is still in Brazil?

Mr. McIlraith: He is due back next week.

Mr. Green: It seems to me that the hon. member for Algoma East already knows the answer to the question.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Never mind; answer.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

INDONESIA—REQUEST FOR REPRESENTATIONS RESPECTING REPORTED THREAT TO PEACE

On the orders of the day:

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Algoma East): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the house leader, in the absence of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, whether the government will consider making representations to the Indonesian government, perhaps through diplomatic channels, in regard to the threat to peace and security in that area involved in the action being taken in Indonesia against Netherlands nationals and Netherlands interests?

Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, as all members of the house will realize, this is a very serious and difficult situation. I will be very glad to draw the suggestion of the hon. member for Algoma East to my colleague's attention.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

MR. PEARSON—BEST WISHES ON LEAVING TO ACCEPT NOBEL PRIZE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the hon. member for Algoma East (Mr. Pearson) will leave today for Oslo to receive an honour which brings credit to him and to this country, I wonder whether it would not be appropriate for you, sir, to express on our behalf in the House of Commons, as you did in another place the other evening, the fact that he carries with him the good wishes of us all.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Speaker: I am sure the response which hon. members have made to that suggestion will convey to the hon. member for Algoma East the good wishes of the house on the occasion of his trip which we all applaud so much, and which we recognized the other day in the dinner we tendered to him. I thank the hon. member for bringing it to the attention of the house.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Algoma East): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall regret my absence from the house next week.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Rea in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF TRADE AND COMMERCE

General administration—

414. Departmental administration, $672,473.

Mr. Carter: Mr. Chairman, there are one or two observations I should like to make before this item carries. First of all I want to support fully everything that was said by my colleague the hon. member for Trinity-Conception yesterday with respect to the marketing of fresh fish.

I should like to say this word to the minister. While we commend his energy and enterprise in trying to promote increased trade with the United Kingdom and with the commonwealth, we are very much alarmed at the announced policy of diverting trade from the United States. We realize only too well that this policy is fraught with tremendous danger to our fresh fish industry, because it is supplying the powerful fish lobby in the United States with ammunition in their efforts to have our fish exports placed under quota and the tariffs against us increased. On two occasions they have almost succeeded in their attempt, and by announcing this policy of diverting trade from the United States we are cutting the ground completely from underneath the President of the United States, by whose efforts our situation has been saved on earlier occasions.

We have been awaiting the announcement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce with a great deal of interest, because in the speech from the throne we were told that the Conservative government would make every effort to expand markets for our fisheries products. I note that the list of members of the trade mission indicates that the people who have gone abroad are interested chiefly in buying and not in selling. Their main interest is in purchasing, I would gather, machinery such as could be used in the processing of fish or in the production of fish.

In this connection I should like to point out that there should be a very good field in the importation of marine diesel engines for our small fishing boats. This is one area in which the United Kingdom should be able to compete very successfully with the United States. The minister might also bear in mind that the federal government itself is quite a large purchaser of marine motors for the various patrol boats they have in operation. I can speak with some experience about the efficiency of the English-made marine diesels, because I have been using one myself for a number of months and have found it very satisfactory.

There is just one point which I think should be brought to the attention of the manufacturers, and that is that a marine diesel, however efficient and simple and however well engineered it may be, is only as reliable as the accessories. A marine diesel, however good it is, is no better than the water pump, because if that gives out then the engine is useless. I have found that there are some minor details in the accessories on these engines which could and should be improved.

We have heard a great deal in this house during this session about the marketing of wheat, and some of our colleagues from the west have put forward the claim that the wheat farmer is entitled to special consideration because his product happens to be marketed by a government agency, namely the wheat board. They have also gone on further to maintain that if the government has done a poor selling job in the marketing of that product, then the government should take the responsibility and provide special measures to protect the farmers from any resulting hardship. The measures which we have already passed this session would indicate that the government admits the validity of this argument.

I should like to take this opportunity of pointing out to my friends from the west that the wheat farmer is not unique in this respect, because the marketing of salt fish in Newfoundland is also done by a federal agency. Newfoundland Associated Fish Exporters, Limited is an organization that has the responsibility of marketing salt fish, and it is an agency that operates under the Department of Trade and Commerce and is responsible to the department for its functioning. Such strict control is exercised by this organization, which is commonly known as NAFEL, that Newfoundland salt fish cannot be shipped even from one province to another in Canada without its permission.

Some fishermen have asserted that losses have been suffered owing to this control, which forces them to accept from local buyers lower prices than they could have obtained from buyers on the mainland. Be that as it may, it is my duty on behalf of my constituents, most of whom are fishermen, to remind the government that their responsibility and obligation to the Newfoundland fishermen in respect of marketing salt fish is no less than their obligation to the prairie wheat farmers.

There has been over the years some evidence to indicate that NAFEL is not a particularly welcome child in the family of the Department of Trade and Commerce. At one time I think it was under the Department of Fisheries, and for some reason was transferred to the Department of Trade and Commerce; but it has always appeared to be somewhat of an unwelcome and unwanted child. In addition, from time to time rumours have cropped up that NAFEL's days are numbered.

In view of the promises made in the speech from the throne I was disappointed to note that the minister in his opening statement, to which I listened very carefully, had not a word to say about the marketing of fish. Nor did he say a word with regard to the status of the organization responsible for this. I hope when the minister replies he will clarify the situation and let us know exactly what the plans of his department are, whether NAFEL is going to continue or whether any changes in organization, status and functions are contemplated.

With respect to the marketing of salt fish, it would appear to me that there should be some opportunity in the British West Indies federation. That little family of colonies is now federated, and they will be faced with a hard struggle to stabilize their economy. If Canada could do something to help them, either as a Caribbean plan or as part of a minor Colombo plan, it is possible that by so doing we might indirectly be helping the marketing of our fish in that area.

I remember that prior to confederation Newfoundland had access to the Mediterranean markets because of a combination of circumstances which may be described as follows. We had in Newfoundland a surplus of dollars and we had in London a sterling debt, so we were able to sell our fish for sterling in the Mediterranean markets and use the money thus acquired to offset our sterling debt, while the government paid our Newfoundland fishermen in Newfoundland dollars.

It is possible that the West Indies may also have a sterling debt, and I am wondering whether anything could be done to see whether Canada could afford to take responsibility for part of that sterling debt and use it in the same way as the Newfoundland sterling debt was used prior to confederation. I do not know whether or not this is economically feasible, but I think it is something which should be explored.

There should be more opportunity for selling our fish in the Brazilian market. In the old days Brazil was one of our main markets for salt fish and they consumed about half a million quintals of salt fish a year. That trade has now shrunk to practically nothing, although cod is still regarded as a delicacy in that country. We know that Brazil has been having economic troubles, but here again it is possible we might be able to do something to help stabilize Brazil's economy and thereby increase the sales of salt fish in that country.

I heard some reference to a trade mission this morning. If a trade mission is already in South America it might explore this possibility. I also wonder whether the minister could not intruct part of the trade mission now in the United Kingdom to extend its tour to the Mediterranean to see what can be done about expanding our sales of fish in that area.

There is another thing which the government should do as part of an effort to expand our market for fish, and that is to assist in increasing the domestic market. This requires an expenditure on promotion and advertising which is far beyond the capacity of the individuals and individual firms engaged in the industry. The government could help in this respect either by outright grants or by making income tax concessions in respect of money spent for this purpose, in the same way it has helped the shipbuilding industry.

Although all hon. members of this house who have been here for some time have enjoyed delicious meals put up by the fisheries laboratory, the good results do not, unfortunately, become widely known in the country, and the effort does not have the advertising value it should. I think this effort would be more effective if the government would sponsor an expert cook who would travel around the country and give demonstrations in the large department stores such as the five and ten, the supermarkets, and general chain stores such as Loblaws. I believe something along this line could tremendously expand the sale of our fresh fish.

Another matter which I think might be profitably explored is the question of a freight subsidy on the Canex container, the special shipping cointainer developed by the research department of the Canadian National Railways. This is a container capable of keeping fresh fish in good condition for longer than 72 hours. As everyone knows, unfrozen fresh fish is much superior to frozen fish, and in the large domestic markets such as Montreal and Toronto unfrozen fish command the most ready sale. If we could use this container to push the unfrozen fish as far west as Winnipeg it would be greatly to the advantage of the industry, but the companies engaged in the marketing of fish have shown little or no enthusiasm about this container, though the fact that it does ensure a superior product has been demonstrated over and over again in the increased sales which have resulted at Eatons in Toronto and other places where the Canex brand product is marketed.

Finally, Mr. Chairman, I should like to speak of the use of trade as an ideological weapon. A few days ago we were discussing defence and the Soviet policy of using trade as an ideological weapon. I think we could take a leaf out of Russia's book and note how their trade is conducted so as to attain ideological objectives. For example, Russia bought rubber from southeast Asia at a price which was higher than the market price, and sold them goods at less than market price, and by doing so tied the economy of these countries to that of Soviet Russia. At the same time they earned a great deal of good will. In their trade with Egypt, Russia has managed to secure a mortgage on the cotton crop for a number of years, thereby tying the economy of Egypt to her own and at the same time posing as Egypt's best friend. There are infinite possibilities in this direction which could be used to advantage by the democratic countries in this ideological struggle, and I should like to ask the minister to make sure that every opportunity in this respect will be fully explored.

Mr. Hansell: Mr. Chairman, before the item carries I would like to say a few words with respect to this first item in the minister's estimates and offer some observations on trade which I have been able to make in the last little while, particularly since the present government took office some few months ago. I am putting on record my impressions respecting the endeavours of the government to promote foreign trade, which impressions I believe are held by a great many people in Canada.

The other day we listened to the Minister of Trade and Commerce tell us something about the 50-man trade mission that is presently in the United Kingdom. The minister headed the mission initially, and I understand he is soon to return to the United Kingdom. However, when the minister came back to the house following his first visit it was only natural for us to expect that he would make a statement as to how the mission was getting along over there. Well, I listened, as I am sure other hon. members must have listened, waiting with some interest for a report as to how Canada was actually going to benefit as a result of this trade mission. The minister made a nice little speech, a pleasant and innocuous little announcement, but what did it amount to in the end? That was what I asked myself. He told us about the wonderful reception the trade mission received from the British industrialists and the British people in general, and I told myself that was only natural. He told of the intense interest that was taken by British manufacturers and industrialists in this trade mission.

I could not help but ask myself, "Why should they not take an interest in this trade mission? After all, they have something to sell and this trade mission is visiting that country with a view to buying". I am quite certain that if any hon. member were in the market for a car there is a strong possibility that every car dealer in his community would be very congenial with him. They would fall all over themselves to give him service if he went to the garages, simply because they had something to sell.

The minister also told us that the mission had received approximately 700 letters from British firms desiring some consideration. Well, once again I had to ask myself, "Why should they not write in?" Once again, those 700 British manufacturers have something to sell, and here was a Canadian trade mission going to the United Kingdom to see what they could buy. The minister told about the marvellous recovery the British had made since the war by way of overcoming the damage that had been caused. That was a courteous observation, but I fail to see that anything was accomplished by his making that comment, because it is something we all know. He also told of the progress that had been made in industrial areas by reason of automation. That too, is general knowledge.

The minister spoke to us as though he had returned to his family and were reporting on a fine trip he had made, telling us what he had seen on his sightseeing tour. He described the wonderful apprenticeship system they have in England and about the courses that are given to managerial staffs and so on. That was all very well, but I think we awaited something different from that. He spoke of the very warm feeling there was in respect to this mission. Here again it is understandable. The British people have everything to gain from the mission being there, because they have something to sell. We are potential customers, and a warm feeling is to be expected.

All I can say with regard to the minister's report is that we had good reason to look forward to a different kind of announcement than the minister made. We should ask the minister at this time what this mission is actually going to accomplish in the long run. We are going to watch the minister very carefully in the future with high expectations, because if he does not come through with a better report than the one he gave the other day we can only conclude that somebody went over to the United Kingdom on one big joyride at the expense of the taxpayers. I say this because a great deal of publicity has been given to this 50-man trade mission.

Mr. Benidickson: The taxpayers helped to provide that, too.

Mr. Hansell: I have no doubt they did. The amount of publicity that has been given to what I would describe as these concocted schemes and excursions is even more than my imagination could have been stretched to comprehend a few months ago.

Not so long ago the Prime Minister attended a conference and blasted United States trade policy. I do not know how he expected that blast would assist in keeping us on good terms with our United States friends. When I read accounts of it in the newspapers it appeared as though he was a very courageous man, but I asked myself why he was not equally courageous a year or two ago, because the same policies have been in existence in the United States for quite some time.

After taking office the government called a conference with our United Kingdom friends who came to Canada to discuss trade, and much publicity was given to that conference. I am afraid I had to conclude it was just a lot of window dressing, because I failed to see what was accomplished in concrete terms by that conference. We are advised that there is going to be another conference next year. Well, this means more publicity and more carrots being dangled in front of the taxpayer donkey in order to hopefully lead it to believe that some day it might get a little nibble at the carrot.

Mr. MacInnis: Is that the way you regard the taxpayer of Canada?

Mr. Hansell: If the taxpayer falls for it he deserves to be called that.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): You are in trouble now.

Mr. Hansell: That is the situation as I see it, and some day or other the Canadian people are going to wake up to the fact that there has been a lot of window dressing. This trade mission and the conferences to which I have referred are big deal stuff and constitute a great show, but what we want to see is—

Mr. Cardiff: Tax reductions?

Mr. Hansell: —what volume of Canadian goods are sold as a result of these undertakings. That is what the Canadian people are looking for. A short time ago during the question period I asked the minister when we might expect him to say something about the tangible success of his trip to the United Kingdom some months ago, when he went over there to try to sell some of our wheat. He said he would be making an announcement shortly.

Well, I waited shortly; I waited a little longer than shortly, and we did not hear anything. I thought well, of course, he is going to make his announcement when his estimates come up for discussion. Well, he talked about his 50-man trade mission and gave us a few facts and figures which, of course, can always be made to look rosy if you present them in the proper way, although I do not think they were so rosy. But I expected him then to say something about the success of his trip to the United Kingdom to sell some of our wheat. What did we hear? Nary a word.

The minister owes it to the people of Canada, particularly to the three prairie provinces, to tell us something of the success of his trip to the United Kingdom some months ago when he went there to sell our wheat. After all, some of us come from wheat-growing sections of this country, and I believe it is time that we heard how successful the minister has been in the disposal of the vast surpluses of grain which we have out west.

To get back to this 50-man trade commission that is in the United Kingdom now, I say it is a lot of window dressing. I say that for this reason. It is pleasant to say that a 50-man trade commission is there. Oh, it is a big mission; it surely is. Fifty men go over there to buy something. To me that indicates that somebody has failed. We have our embassy there; we have our trade commissioner there. Even some of the provinces have offices there. They are attempting to carry on a bit of trade and to promote proper relations between our country and another.

Well, what have those trade commissioners been doing if it is necessary now to send over 50 prominent people from Canada to see what we can buy from them? Not only do we have our trade commissioners and our embassies, but we have other things as well. Very often we spend money on international trade fairs. What for? To put on a show so that people can come and see what we have to sell and we can see what they have to sell us. Some of these things have been done in the past. Industrialists and manufacturers here have their advertising matter, and people in Great Britain have their advertising matter. Frankly, I do not see why 50 men have to go over to England to discover what there is there that we can buy.

I say once again it is a great big show, big deal stuff, something to try to indicate to the people that this government is doing things. Well, we will just bide our time; we will wait for a little while and we will just see what is actually accomplished beyond the big deal, the big show stuff.

There is one thing that strikes me in respect of foreign trade that is extremely important. After all, Mr. Chairman, when you boil this foreign trade business right down to what it actually is it means nothing more or less than swapping goods because when we buy from England we give them dollars in payment. They use those dollars to buy our goods. Therefore in the end it is only an exchange of goods. Might I interject here, Mr. Chairman, that even though we buy several million dollars worth of goods from the United Kingdom and pay them in our dollars, there is no guarantee that those dollars are going to be used to buy our goods. But suppose they are used to buy our goods. In the end it is only a matter of swapping Canadian goods for British manufactured goods.

The one important thing that is necessary is whether our own people in Canada have the purchasing power to buy those goods when they arrive here. Whether it is Canadian goods or goods that come into the country, have our own people the purchasing power to buy them? That is the important thing, and that is the one thing the government will have to answer for, because today the purchasing power of the dollar is less than it has been in the past. Furthermore, because of the problems of unemployment and reduced incomes, the people have less money with which to buy those goods, whether they are British manufactured goods or Canadian manufactured goods, and that is the thing that this group is interested in. Foreign trade will very largely take care of itself if our own people have the purchasing power. In this group our whole monetary concept is that if the people themselves have the required purchasing power, the money with which to buy the goods, industry will be cared for. If there is that continual supply of purchasing power going into the hands of the consumers our standard of living can be just as high as the productive capacity of the nation can make it.

These are the very few words I wanted to say. We are reminding the minister that he will have to come before parliament again sooner or later and give an answer for the big show they are putting on at the present time. Things are not too well in Canada, Mr. Chairman. They are not too well because of the surplus of agricultural products; they are not too well because of growing unemployment and reduced incomes. What the people of Canada want is more than show. They want action that will put money in their pockets in order that they might enjoy the highest standard of living.

The government may not like the policy that has been adopted by the United States. Well, I do not know. I have never been able to bring myself to the point where I can seriously criticize the United States for their trading policy in respect of their surplus agricultural products. I have never been able to do that. The Prime Minister can criticize and let off some blasts. The Minister of Finance can go down to Florida and talk to the investment dealers there and again blast our good neighbours to the south. They can do all the blasting they wish, but what the United States has done can be summed up in two ways. They brought into existence their commodity credits corporation. They decided to take all the agricultural products that were in surplus off the hands of the farmers and pay the farmers for them.

Well, they piled up large agricultural surpluses. They had them. What were they to do with them? Well, they simply went out into the world and asked the needy nations to take them if they wanted them, take them now and talk about paying for them afterwards. That is all they did. It may not be just as orthodox as some of our own people in the government may want, but two things were done. One was that the farmer was reasonably satisfied. He was paid for his surplus products. The other thing is that somebody bought those products and some of the border-line nations were evidently the recipients of foodstuffs. There is nothing wrong with satisfying your own people and helping to feed the hungry.

You can talk about U.S. trade policies all you like; you can talk about them hurdling agreements all you like; you can talk about them taking advantage of escape clauses all you like, but two things stand out in my mind. United States farmers were reasonably cared for in the face of the surplus problem, and some of the hungry nations were fed. I do not think that would have been a bad record for any Canadian government, whether Liberal or Conservative, to have hung on it. Our farmers would be satisfied too if they were paid for their production that is in surplus, and they would be very pleased to know that those surpluses had been used to feed some of the hungry nations of the world.

I realize that the minister has his problems, and I do not want to be too harsh with him. We are going to give him time; but once again before taking my seat I say that rather than the "big show" we want to know what results are actually accomplished, and whether or not the people of Canada are going to have the purchasing power to buy that which is available.

Mr. Harrison: Mr. Chairman, it is a pleasure for me to rise in a debate that is very important not only to western Canada but to Canada generally, and discuss some of the policies being followed at the moment to generate more trade. The difference between prosperity and the reverse is our ability to trade successfully with other nations. When we are able to do that successfully we have prosperity in the country, and when we are not able to do so we have difficult times. Maybe that is why in the past we have always thought of Tory times as hard times. In years gone by the Tories have not been too successful in trading with other nations.

When I look at the program we have before us now it strikes me as very similar to some we have seen before. To summarize, as I see it, this is a five point program. First the Prime Minister went to England to a prime ministers' conference, where he indicated to the British that he wanted to increase trade with that country, and in order to do so he would naturally have to remove at least some of the barriers that exist. If you want to increase the flow of anything you take away any impediments that may be in the way, whether it is a question of rivers or trade. That was the first point.

Second, the Prime Minister invited a British delegation to Mont Tremblant to discuss these proposals and to make arrangements for a commonwealth conference next year. Third, we had the Canadian trade mission of four cabinet ministers who went to Washington to discuss trade with the United States. The fourth step was the three-week visit to Great Britain of the 50-man trade mission in order to buy British goods. Fifth, there is the commonwealth trade conference next year. We can discuss the first four because they are all completed or nearly so but the fifth, the commonwealth trade conference, we can only discuss on a crystal ball basis.

With regard to the first, the Prime Minister's trip to Great Britain, I think his speech there to the effect that he wanted to increase trade was very laudable. I am sorry that what he said there has not been backed up by what has transpired since. He said he wanted to increase trade with that nation and they took him at his word. When they came to the Mont Tremblant conference later they said that if he wanted to remove restrictions—and that is the only way you can increase trade—why not have maximum trade by removing all restrictions? There is every indication that both he and the Minister of Finance, who attended the Mont Tremblant conference, took to the woods as soon as that was mentioned. Two or three days later Mr. Thorneycroft and the other members of the British delegation came to Ottawa, and they got a very cold reception as far as that proposition was concerned.

Knowing the Conservative tradition of being a high tariff party I can understand that, but I think there has to be some revision of thinking on the other side of the house. We are entering new phases as far as trading is concerned, and one that should give them pause is the new European free trade area comprising six countries, Great Britain, West Germany, France, Holland, Italy and Belgium. I understand that their free trade agreement goes into effect on January 1, 1958, and involves a 10-year process before complete free trade is assured among them. But once this European free trade community is in operation it will mean a market of 160 million people, very similar to what we have across the border in the United States, which is regarded as the best market in all the world. Possibly the 160 million people in the European market are not as prosperous as those south of the border, but still they are prosperous indeed.

When the new concept of trading comes into effect in Europe one thing we will have to look at is the fact that the old Tory practice of increasing tariffs, for instance, against British textiles or anything else will at once affect this large free trade area and any counter measures that may be taken by them will be taken as a unit. In other words, if we take measures against West German products coming into this market we will incur the ire of Great Britain and all the other nations in that union. In one way or another these six countries have pooled their sovereign rights as far as trade is concerned, and they are going to permit goods to move freely among them.

This sets up an altogether new concept. It makes the old Conservative idea of imposing high tariffs as obsolete as Sputnik makes our military equipment. I think there has to be some revision of thinking on the other side of the house.

I come now to the Canadian trade mission to the United States, and I am not going to waste too much time on it because I think the futility that accompanied it is quite evident. However, I should like to say something about the manner in which the United States was approached. I refer to the big stick attitude of telling these people what they are going to do. The United States is Canada's best customer, and this is a strange attitude to use with a good customer. I used to be in a mercantile business myself, and I never tried to attract people into my establishment by waving a big stick and telling them what they were going to do. It must be remembered that the customer is always right, and that is something you have to keep in mind if you want your business to be satisfactory or to increase your trade.

I believe the present Minister of Trade and Commerce would be a fairly good salesman if he were not placed somewhat within a strait-jacket by the policies of his party. He has to make some display of trying to obtain some business, for instance in the United Kingdom from whom he wants to import goods, but when it comes to actually accomplishing that he runs into the policies of his own party. It is rather difficult for him to carry that attempt to any conclusion.

I would suggest that if any future mission to a nation with which we are trying to improve our trade relations includes the Minister of Finance—I do not mean this in any sense derogatory to the Minister of Finance, because I appreciate many of his good qualities —he should go in an advisory capacity. The minister's good qualities do not include those that are required of a good salesman. A good salesman must possess the ability to meet the public in an affable way and not, should I say, with the belligerent attitude the minister often displays. He would be an excellent man on one of these missions as an adviser, but he should not be allowed, in my estimation, to meet the actual customers.

The wreckage of the trade effort so far as the United States is concerned is apparent to anyone. Instead of giving us any concessions they have gone out since and bored still further into our grain markets. One of the outstanding examples of this has been the recent trip of the United States secretary of agriculture to Japan.

I come to the fourth matter, and that is the 50-man trade mission to Great Britain. I listened to the hon. member for Macleod, and I agreed with much of what he said. In fact he stole some of the things I intended to say with regard to the mission. However, if one looks at this window dressing, as the hon. member for Macleod called it, what does one find? A list of the members of this trade mission was printed as an appendix to Hansard of December 2. This list does not mean very much to me, but I find there are 14 people who say they are interested in textiles.

I find some strange people who are apparently interested in textiles. The minister told us that the purpose of this mission was to buy goods from Britain, not to sell goods. It is interesting to see the list of those who apparently show a marked interest in buying textiles. I find, for instance, that the president of Shawinigan Engineering Company in Montreal is interested in textiles. I do not know whether or not his company wishes to deal in textiles or whether he might be more likely a director of some textile organization. Perhaps there is a reasonable answer to that; I do not know.

Then going down the list we find the president of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association. I have never heard that the Canadian Manufacturers' Association advocated bringing British goods into the country. They are interested only in shutting them out. Then there is the president of Marsland Engineering Company Limited and Marsland Precision Equipment Limited. He is interested in textile manufacturing. Perhaps there is a good reason why he is interested; I do not know. However, in my opinion there is some suspicion that he may be connected with some textile mill somewhere.

I do not want to bore the committee with the details, but according to the list there are 14 people who claim to be interested in textiles. I find it difficult to believe they are interested in bringing textiles here from Great Britain. Consequently the minister has not been able to tell us one thing that was purchased as a result of this junket of 50 men over to Great Britain.

There is, however, one member included in this mission, the chairman of Ontario hydro, who would seem to be a sensible inclusion. Before he left he said he had already purchased quite a lot of electrical equipment in Great Britain for Ontario hydro, and was interested in purchasing more. People in this category are sensible inclusions in such a mission.

I understand, too, that three heads of agricultural organizations in Canada were members of the mission. This would seem to be a sensible inclusion. In making his statement to the house the other day the minister told us that these three gentlemen had been able to talk with their counterparts in Great Britain, in other words with the heads of some agricultural organizations in Great Britain. If I know the heads of Canadian agricultural organizations they would be interested in only one thing, and that would be selling some of their agricultural products. I do not know what good it would do them to talk to their counterparts in Great Britain.

The other day the hon. member for Dauphin asked the minister if he had talked with Sir David Eccles during his trip to Great Britain concerning the free trade offer. The minister said he had not talked with Sir David Eccles. In his announcement to us previously the minister said that Sir David Eccles had arranged this whole trip and, as I understood him, they had been accompanied by Sir David Eccles. If the government is really as interested in doing business with Great Britain as this window dressing would indicate, one would think the minister would discuss this free trade deal with Great Britain with Sir David Eccles at the first opportunity, since he is his British opposite and the head of the Board of Trade.

As I understand it the door is still open on that proposal. I feel that the government should take another look at getting in that door before it is closed. We have never received an offer like this before. With the possibility of this new European free trade area being established, and the fact that this may change the trade pattern, we might not be given too many opportunities to take advantage of a proposal of that nature. These events indicate that tariff walls have had their day and are a thing of the past.

I should like to mention the commonwealth trade conference that is to be held next year. As I said, this is something concerning which one would have to look into a crystal ball. The only thing by which we can judge this forecast is the fact that previous Conservative governments, on assuming office, have always held out great hopes for commonwealth trade conferences. I think the last one was a British trade conference. Forecast benefits of these conferences, however, have not materialized. It is doubtful, in view of the attitude now being shown, whether any material benefit will accrue from this proposal.

In order to get the opinion of the rank and file of the Conservative party and what they think of any proposals for actually increasing trade with Great Britain, I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Lincoln yesterday. He is the Conservative member who spoke for that party at the beginning of the discussions on trade. As reported at page 1990 of Hansard of yesterday he said in part:

> We are buying too much from abroad and causing unemployment in our own country.

Then he went on to say this:

> I have great confidence in our new Minister of Trade and Commerce. I wish him well and I am sure that if he approaches matters, as I say, in a sympathetic and realistic manner, we shall have success.

He also pointed out their road to success, namely to keep out goods from any other country.

I would suggest to you, Mr. Chairman, that as to all these items I have mentioned, this five point program that is supposed to increase our trade goes just so far and no farther in doing actual good and in doing what it proposes to do. The program is prevented from going any further by the ideas of the hon. member whom I have just quoted, and I do not doubt that those ideas are entertained by a great number of other supporters of the government. But some show must be made to the country as a whole that they are doing something. Hence you have what the hon. member for Macleod calls window dressing; and it is window dressing in some instances, such as the 50-man mission to Great Britain, which is a rather expensive facade but is not likely to do much in the line of bringing goods from Great Britain to Canada as it was sent there to do.

In his remarks the minister said—and I obtained this from Hansard—that they will assist Great Britain to attain more markets here in Canada. There is only one way by which they can attain more markets here in Canada, and that is by reducing the tariff we have against Great Britain to an even lower point. That would bring more goods into Canada.

That brings us, then, to the point of this trade switch which the Tory party thinks is a great idea. I have wondered why more people have not taken a hard look at this side of it. When you start to switch $600 million of trade from the United States, which is what the 15 per cent amounts to which the Prime Minister wants to switch and which he announced was the amount they would switch; when you superimpose that amount on the trade we are now doing with Great Britain of something over $400 million a year, you are asking Great Britain to deliver us $1 billion worth of goods in a single year.

In his remarks to us the minister told of his trip to Great Britain; that he found that Great Britain was fully recovered from the war; that business was humming along in high gear, and that there was a great advance in automation over there. He did not tell us that he saw any unemployment there. Hence we understand that every man in Great Britain is fully employed, that their industry is running along at a good clip, and that they are making all the goods they can possibly make. They have no surplus of goods at all. They have a backlog of orders at all times over there waiting to be filled.

To ask them to increase their shipments to Canada is one thing, but there must be some reason why they are not doing that now of their own accord. I would suggest that maybe the reason is that they have markets where competition is not as keen as it is in Canada, and that they are selling more beneficially as far as they are concerned possibly in some sterling areas. I suggest that this is the main reason they are not shipping more to us at the present time. They just have not the productive capacity to handle the extra trade that our Prime Minister suggests.

This is something that should be obvious even to the man in the street. Certainly it will be obvious to the man in the street in Great Britain that they are producing to the utmost at the present time. When somebody offers them $600 million more of a market, while it sounds very good, maybe they have not the goods with which to supply that market. In order to supply it they would be obliged to take trade away from some other areas where, as I said, they are already doing business on a very satisfactory basis and against less competition than we have in this country.

I think I have fairly well covered what I intended to cover, but I should like to make these further observations with regard to the minister's opening remarks yesterday. He indicated that we are suffering from a down trend in some of our trade which includes lumber, copper and aircraft, and that we have an adverse trade balance with the United States as compared with last year of $100 million. Our exports to Great Britain are down $55 million.

Before concluding I should like to ask him this question. If, as he says, he wants to assist Great Britain to gain more markets here in Canada, something which I think there is some doubt that he will be able to do for the reasons I have just given, does this mean a lowering of the tariffs against Great Britain?

[Mr. Harrison.]

I might say also that we are very much interested in uranium. I wonder what he has in mind as a forecast for the uranium industry. I know that in Great Britain it has been indicated that uranium is going to be a considerable import, as far as they are concerned, for the next generation. I wonder whether he would indicate, when he replies, just what the position of uranium is going to be, having regard to our world exports.

Mr. Montgomery: I had no intention of taking part in this debate on this item, Mr. Chairman, and I do not propose to take very long. But having listened to some of the remarks of hon. members, may I say that it sounded as though there was a great deal of frustration among many of the members who were speaking, or else they were trying to make political capital out of something at this stage which might or might not be justified.

There is another reason that I should like to say a word, and it is this. I should like to congratulate my long-time personal friend the minister and compliment him on the efforts he has been making in his new office in the short time he has occupied it. The Department of Trade and Commerce for which he is responsible is a very difficult one to administer, I am sure, and one at which the people all over Canada are looking. A great many people are ready to criticize him. A great many expect him to pull rabbits out of a hat. But having roomed with him, lived with him for a while and worked with him, I want to say that I do not know of a more sincere and honest man or a better one to be in charge of this department. I wish him all success. He is not going to have an easy road. Even from listening to the speeches made this morning I suspect it is not going to be made any easier by a great many members of this house.

I pick up a newspaper, and I should like to refer to it because it reflects my own feelings. This was written by George Bain and it is printed in the Toronto Globe and Mail of December 4. Many of the members of this trade mission did not know the minister before they started on their mission. This is what Mr. Bain says:

> To most of the businessmen in this group, the minister beforehand was largely unknown. The opinions they have formed of him in the time they have been here have been unanimously good. They like the quiet way in which he has been putting across the purposes of the mission. Mr. Churchill falls somewhat short of being a spell-binding orator, but his hosts in this country—

—referring to the old country—

> —have been impressed, and they have said so, with the good sense, sincerity and friendly good humour of his speeches.

I think that is a great compliment to a member of our government, and I am glad it was paid by the people of Great Britain to a friend of mine and to a minister of the Conservative government.

A lot has been said about this trade mission. As a matter of fact I rather liked the way in which the hon. member for Meadow Lake, who has just resumed his seat, criticized this mission. He did not speak with bitterness. He was sceptical, but at the same time his remarks did contain some suggestion of constructive criticism compared with those of the hon. member for Macleod who spoke previously, but who could think of nothing good which might come out of a trade mission sent to Great Britain or, for that matter, to any other country.

As a matter of fact one might infer from some of the speeches which have been made —speeches which, to me, cannot sound sincere —that they would like to see this government sit down and do nothing so this country might sink into a depression out of which they might make political capital and win success when the next election comes. I am sorry to say that some members of this house sound, though they may not think it themselves, as though they want to see the efforts of this mission end in disaster instead of success.

Surely it is too soon to expect the minister to be able to tell us or the country of any success which this mission may have by way of increasing trade. Though these people went on this mission primarily to investigate and to buy products made in the United Kingdom, I am sure that a significant result will be a two-way system of trade; and I believe the committee must agree that if a country is going to survive, if it is going to be prosperous, it must develop trade. We cannot close a wall around ourselves and keep quite separate from everybody else. We cannot live within ourselves and be prosperous in the world of today. We must have trade and, as the newspapers have said, this mission has been the greatest success, the greatest thing which has happened in the old country in the history of Canada, creating as it has new ties and new acquaintances. Canadian and British businessmen are getting together.

I should like to say at this point that though there has been a great deal of criticism in this house with regard to certain people who belong to certain industries in this country taking part in the mission, and though it has been suggested that they went over there with personal interests in mind to try to buy things which would put people out of employment in this country, I myself cannot think such a thing about the businessmen of Canada.

It may be true that businessmen are interested in their businesses, but I invite hon. members to look at the names of these gentlemen who have been selected across Canada. I believe they were selected because they were Canadians first, and that they are on this mission in the interests of Canada as well as in the interests of any business with which they may be connected.

I remember that the former government sent a mission to South America, I think it was. I remember that some time later there seemed to be good results from that mission. There may have been some criticism of it, but I do not think you will find in Hansard a record of any speech of mine where I have ever criticized such a mission as that. I think any government which undertakes such projects as these is doing something which is for the good of the country in the long run. If we do not undertake to do something we will never succeed in anything, and I believe that with the initiative and the youth and the energy of some of the younger members of this government, this country will receive great benefits from this trade mission.

It may be that some trade will be shifted from the United States to Britain, but is not competition the life of trade? If we continue to trade with one source all the time, even with our neighbour to the south, a monopoly begins to develop. I say that even in Canada some of these companies which have been allowed to build up and become great institutions—and I will mention the automobile industry—of which hon. members across the way were complaining bitterly a few days ago, there is evidence of this. Why should these companies need to raise their prices? I believe they could stand a little competition. I do not think they are suffering. I think competition is good, and that is why I believe that the more contacts we can make in Great Britain and in any other country, in order that competition with our neighbour to the south may be provided, the better business will become, not only with Britain but also with the United States.

The hon. member for Meadow Lake made a good statement, and one with which I am inclined to agree, when he said that in talking trade the customer is always right. All right. Who is the customer of the United States? Canada has been a customer of the United States. Then if that statement is true—and, as I say, I am inclined to agree that it is—is not Canada in a position to say to the United States that we do not think we are getting a square deal? I do not mean to be nasty, but are we not in a position to talk solid, sound business? That is what I believe our Prime Minister and the members of his government have been doing. They have not been insulting the United States or any other country, as far as I can see; they have been talking as straightforward businessmen, and I am sure this is not going to hurt the trade of either country. I would gather from some of the speeches that have been made that some hon. members feel there should not be an exchange of trade, or that this mission at best is only going to create one-way trade. I do not agree with that statement. I think the more contact we make with any country the more business we can do without hurting our own country, and the more we are likely to sell to them.

Not long ago when I was fortunate enough to spend a few days abroad I heard it said that if we would accept British currency we could do a lot of business with that country. Obviously, if this is true, they must be prepared to do business. Another way of looking at it is that if we can buy from them we can also extend trade and we should be able to sell them more.

I think there are many good prospects, and much of value can come as a result of the trade mission visiting the United Kingdom. No one should expect to see great results within the next month or two. Miracles do not occur in the business world that fast. The minister should not be expected to be one of those who pull rabbits out of a hat, and I do not believe the Canadian people expect him to do so. They do, however, expect this government to busy itself in an attempt to increase trade, which is exactly what the government is doing and in time its efforts will bring success.

If I understood him correctly the hon. member for Meadow Lake said he concluded that the new government has a five point program, although he did not think it was being implemented in the right way. I was very pleased to hear the hon. member say that in the last five months he has come to realize that the government has a five point program, because I am afraid if one were to go back over the last 15 years under the Liberal administration one would not be able to find even a one point program. Perhaps I am a little unfair in saying this; one might find a one point program under that administration, but it will be good news for the people of this country that the hon. member for Meadow Lake observes a five point program in the present administration even though he criticizes it. This government has a dynamic program which it is rapidly implementing, and that is what the Canadian people elected this government to do.

Another important aspect of trade is that in the next few years prosperous firms in Great Britain may be able to establish branches in this country. We require capital, and is not British capital just as good as United States capital? One always associates quality with British-made products, and I feel that much good will come about as a result of the contact between the business leaders of Canadian industry and those of British industry as a result of the visit of this trade mission to the United Kingdom. This could very well lead to the establishment in Canada of branch companies of some of the old country industries.

Before taking my seat I wish to speak about the maritime provinces. We have in the Atlantic region good ports which are open the year round. We are well equipped to do business with countries across the ocean. We are all interested in increasing trade with the old country. We have raw materials to ship out, and the cheapest transportation is by water. Nothing but good can come as the result of increased trade between Canada and the United Kingdom, and its effects will benefit the Atlantic provinces.

Anything that will assist in increasing the prosperity of those provinces, encourage the building up of industry there and increase the exports of the many raw materials available should receive our wholehearted support. Perhaps the trade that will result will not be as large in volume as we would like to see, but I am convinced that benefit will come from the trade mission and the contacts and exchange of information accompanying it.

I would not expect to see tangible results before Christmas, and indeed it may be several months before results are evident. Businessmen are inclined to take their time about such things. I am not a businessman, but as a lawyer I have had some indirect connection with businessmen. I have found that they proceed rather carefully and thoroughly investigate the possibilities inherent in each situation, and I am satisfied that is what will happen in this case.

I congratulate the government on undertaking to send a trade mission to the United Kingdom in an exploratory way. If they buy goods from that country they will create opportunities for sales of Canadian goods, and the trade resulting will be a two-way road which will benefit this country. I congratulate the minister as an old friend, and wish him every success in his efforts.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, I am not going to attempt to enumerate the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton or to answer them directly. His address held my attention, particularly the part of it in which he commented favourably upon those who had participated in the debate and had not introduced anything in the way of a narrow political nature into their discussion.

I thought I would not have to mention anything of that kind when the hon. member took his seat, but letting my memory drift back over the discussion that has taken place up to this point I find it somewhat difficult to remember anything that was said which was more politically narrow than the suggestion made by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton to the effect that in the 22 years the Liberals were in office they had not produced even a one point program. That seems to me the essence of narrow political comment, and I am only going to leave it with hon. members of the committee to determine how correct it is.

I do wish, however, to join the hon. member in commenting upon the appointment of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The appointment of the present minister fulfils a long-desired hope on the part of those who live in the prairie provinces. I thought we were never going to be favoured with the appointment of a minister of trade and commerce from the prairie provinces. In my time we have had ministers holding this portfolio come from every other part of Canada including British Columbia, but I do not recall one from the prairies. I want to not only congratulate the minister on his appointment but the prairies in having provided a minister of trade and commerce, because there are so many matters which come under that department that concern the people of the prairie region.

I sometimes had the feeling that because of the many things which come under the Department of Trade and Commerce it was going to be difficult to have a man from the prairie area appointed to the position, but now that we have one there are many people in western Canada who have high hopes about what will be accomplished through his performance while he is in office. I am not going to say anything today in discussing the questions which are before the committee which would be other than of some assistance to the minister in bringing about a condition that will be helpful to Canada, now that we have a minister from the prairie section in this post. I want sincerely to congratulate him on having been chosen Minister of Trade and Commerce.

The questions which have been up for discussion have raised a number of thoughts in my mind, the first one being the high level discussion between representatives of the government of the United States and representatives of the government of Canada. I recall the first such discussion which took place during the time we were in the government, and that it was suggested by the agricultural representative in Ottawa from the United States. We were discussing at that time matters which are very much in the mind of the last speaker, the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton, namely the shipment of potatoes into the United States. The chief discussion going on in the Senate in Washington was the importation of many potatoes which entered into competition with the production of United States' farmers.

Mr. Macdonnell: Will the hon. gentleman permit a question? Did I correctly understand him to say that the first negotiations between Canada and the United States on this question took place during the regime of the last government; nothing before that?

Mr. Gardiner: If I gave that impression it would be wrong, and I think that is the suggestion my hon. friend wishes to make.

Mr. Macdonnell: No, please.

Mr. Gardiner: I was not saying that, no.

Mr. Macdonnell: Please; I was asking purely as a matter of interest. I am ignorant of the matter myself and I wanted to know.

Mr. Gardiner: What I was saying was that these high level meetings between a committee of four members of the Canadian government and four members of the United States government had their origin in a discussion with regard to the potato question, and it was brought up by the agricultural representative from Washington who was stationed in Ottawa. He made the suggestion that we should have the secretary of agriculture of the United States come to Ottawa and discuss the question of potatoes with us.

Well, he came, and the minister of trade and commerce of that time and I met him. He was astonished to find the quantity of potatoes which were being shipped from the United States into this country. He did not really realize there was any such thing going on. I need only refer to the fact that it was only a short time ago that many more potatoes were coming into this country from the United States than were going from this country to the United States. At that time it was not quite in that position, but when the secretary of agriculture came here he asked us to send him back to Washington all the figures with regard to the matter, and he said, "I can assure you that when these facts are made known to the senators in the United States there will be little further discussion along that line". A result following his ideas was obtained at that time.

A year or so later there developed another question of a similar nature which we were concerned about and which the Americans were concerned about. We were shipping great quantities of oats into the United States; we were shipping them into Chicago, and at that time the state of Illinois and the other corn states around about had enormous surpluses of corn for livestock feeding. Then senators from those states rose in their places in their house and criticized the importation of these large quantities of oats right into the midst of an area where they had such great quantities of corn. Well, the discussions reached considerable heights of criticism, and then it was suggested to the Americans that it might be well for us to sit down and discuss such questions before they got to the floor either of the Senate of the United States or to the floor of this house here, and that we should understand one another's position prior to that.

The result was, as is known, that we did have two of those conferences before this government came into office, one in Washington and one in Ottawa. The same members of the government of the United States took part in those discussions, not the same individuals but those occupying the same positions, and the same departments were represented here.

We had two of those conferences, I think two years apart, before the present government came into office. The discussions which took place with regard to oats brought out the fact that after all there was need for feed oats in the eastern part of the United States, in the state of Maine and in other states in that section of the country where the production of corn was not in competition with oats at all, and where there would be no difficulty. Out of that kind of discussion we arrived at the idea that it would be a good thing to have such discussions periodically in order to settle some of the questions outstanding or to give full information to one another with regard to some of the discussions which might take place.

Well, I remember one of the criticisms made of that kind of meeting by the now Prime Minister when he was sitting on this side of the house. He said that we left Ottawa in silence, we sat in silence in Washington, and we returned to Ottawa in silence. Well, I only wish to suggest that in regard to a matter of that kind and taking into consideration some of the reports that came out about the last discussion, our purposes would have been just as well served if that discussion had been in silence, too.

The purpose of a meeting of this kind is not to have a lot of publicity all over the country as to what happens or what might happen. The purpose is to exchange information in a meeting which is usually held behind closed doors.

I think at the previous meeting we had there was a time toward the end when it was more or less thrown open and reports were given to the press. But the discussions themselves, at a meeting of that kind, are of necessity carried on behind closed doors and the results will be better if they are.

Therefore I do not take exactly the same attitude toward some of the discussions which have taken place recently as some others who may never have taken part in them. I do think we should fully understand what that kind of meeting was intended to be for when it was first set up and govern ourselves accordingly, in order to keep the records as straight as we possibly can as between this country and the country with which we have the greatest amount of trade.

At one o'clock the committee took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The committee resumed at 2.30 p.m.

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Chairman, when the committee adjourned for lunch I had just opened a discussion of some ideas which I wish to present in connection with the estimates of trade and commerce. I suggested at that time that we in western Canada had reasons for being somewhat pleased with the fact that we have a minister of trade and commerce from the prairies. I had also referred to the fact that there had been Canadian missions to Washington and Washington missions to Ottawa for some four years prior to the coming into power of the present government and that during that period there had been two of these missions.

I did wish to say a word or two with regard to the other matter of the mission to Britain and to say what I would judge the minister already understands, that this is not the first occasion upon which missions of a similar nature have gone to Britain. I hesitate to say this because of some remarks made during other debates by one or two of the younger members of the house who seem to have some objection to going back 20, 30, or some other number of years in order to obtain illustrations as to what could happen in connection with similar missions now or anything else similar that happens at the present time. However, since I am the only member left in the house who was in the government when we came into power 22 years ago I think I should mention that we did something similar to what has been done now. The minister of trade and commerce who was at that time Senator Euler; the minister of finance, who was at that time, Mr. Dunning, and I as minister of agriculture went to Britain. Our reason for going was the fact that in 1932 there had been one of these conferences which had determined many things that had influenced our trade with Britain. We went there to discuss that matter and to try to arrive at some conclusions as to what might be done in order to overcome some of the difficulties created.

One of them affected the selling of apples in Britain, another the selling of bacon and another the selling of wheat and other products. It is sometimes forgotten that we had 298 million bushels of wheat in storage in western Canada elevators and other elevators across Canada at the time we came into power 22 years ago. In other words, this is not the first time there has been a surplus of wheat in Canada. At a later date still we had some 600 or 700 million bushels and now we have about that amount again.

But on this occasion we went over to Britain for the purpose of discussing these problems and we had some rather extended discussions which began on the 14th of August of that year. After our return we sent over a delegation of eight men. Someone has objected to the present delegation having about 50 members, but on that occasion we did send a smaller delegation. They were only dealing with the sale of agricultural products and there were only eight men. I have here a report of that mission which I am not going to read. I brought it with me, however, in order to demonstrate that there is such a report. There is a report that I made personally with regard to agricultural matters and there is a report prepared by the delegation of eight who went over there and discussed agricultural marketing at that time.

Out of that there did grow something which I am going to call to the attention of the minister because it was more or less inoperative at the time the government changed. At that time it was recommended by this group that, apart from the representatives of the Department of Trade and Commerce, there should be representatives of agriculture in Great Britain and that their special mission should be that of seeing to it that more and more agricultural products were sold in Britain. I am not going into detail with regard to it other than to say that until we came to the end of the war that policy had obtained very good results. We did sell more and more products in Britain right down to the end of the war, but at that time it became necessary for one thing to re-establish the old provisions that had been set up under the conference of 1932 which meant that bacon and many other products had to be bought in considerable quantities from countries other than Canada. That has had some influence, although it has not been the greatest influence in the matter over there.

When the gentleman who was in charge of that set-up in Britain at the end of the war and for some time after the war was superannuated no successor was appointed. He retired not so many months ago and no one has been appointed to replace him. There is provision in the estimates of the Department of Agriculture for the appointment of a head of that organization, some of which is still there. I think that organization did good work and I think it could still do good work.

But my intention at the moment is simply to draw attention to the fact that there have been delegations sent before to obtain trade, sometimes led by the minister of trade and commerce, sometimes led by others. But it has been a function which has been carried out before, and the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton referred in his remarks to the mission that went to South America. I would say that some good can come out of these missions, but I think those that were sent before were largely sent for the purpose of selling Canadian products. As was intimated a few moments ago by the hon. member for Macleod should be the case, I believe they were sent for the purpose of selling Canadian products, we always believing that it was necessary not only to buy products from other countries but to sell products to them.

I wanted to bring these two matters to the attention of the house, first, the fact that we have had conferences with the Americans before and, second, that we did have these delegations go out to sell our products before and with considerable success. I also wanted to call attention to two or three statements made by the minister yesterday. The first is to be found on page 1968 of Hansard towards the bottom of the page and is in these words:

> Encouraging progress has thus been made toward two of the objectives of the present administration, the reduction of our large deficit on merchandise trade and the expansion of the share of our imports coming from the United Kingdom. We shall continue to pursue both these aims vigorously in the future.

In the next paragraph he goes on to state:

> I do not think any government in Canada's history has done so much in such a short time to implement its trade policies. Within a few days of assuming office the Prime Minister went to London—

We go on from there, and a little farther on in the same paragraph it is stated:

Indicating the importance we attach to our trade with the United States and other non-commonwealth countries, we met with Messrs. Dulles, Benson, Weeks and Anderson of the United States cabinet in Washington in October—

I have already referred to the fact that that kind of discussion had already taken place previously, but in commenting upon these statements I wish to call attention to the fact that our Canadian trade is very considerable. I am not going back to the beginning of the 22 years to point out how low it was at that time nor am I going to say it is only the fact that there was a Liberal government for 22 years that resulted in our trade being so greatly increased over that period. Many things have happened in the world during that period of time that have had their effect upon the trade of all countries. I am only going to say that certainly while we were here we did so guide the destinies of this country in connection with matters of that kind that Canada did progress as much as any other nation in the world.

I was not able to get the tables for the last ten months for both exports and imports, and therefore there will have to be some averaging done of the figures which I am going to place on Hansard. I was only able to get the exports for the last nine months and imports for the last ten months. I think if I use round figures the figure will be close enough to be the average of these two for nine and a half months. During that period of nine months up until September, 1957 our exports to the United Kingdom amounted to $544 million—I think $545 million would be about the correct figure. The exports to commonwealth countries other than the United Kingdom amounted to $165 million; exports to the United States, $2,123 million and to all other countries, $902 million.

I want to say in this connection that it is obvious our exports to the United States are almost four times what they are to the United Kingdom. There is not any comparison between our exports to the United States and our exports to other countries. We have much more in the way of export trade with the United States than we have with any other country.

In so far as imports are concerned, we imported from the United Kingdom commodities to the value of $407 million; from commonwealth countries, $183 million; from the United States, $3,493 million, and from other countries, $881 million. Again, it will be seen that our import trade with the United States is very much greater than our imports from any other country, as a matter of fact much greater than our imports from all other countries put together. In other words, there is no question but that the United States is not only our best customer but she also sells a great deal to us.

As a result of this fact many people would have us believe that trade with the United States contains some factors which might be harmful to us. I should like to deal with that question for a moment or two, and the question of the necessity for balances in trade and what is meant when we discuss balances in trade. I want to say that when you are dealing with a country such as ours, which is comparatively young and with a small population, and when you are comparing Canada with a country that is comparatively old, like Great Britain which has a population about four times as great as ours, balances of the kind that are sometimes talked about would appear to be more or less an impossibility. Then when we are dealing with a country as great as the United States, which lies alongside of us and has a population about ten times as great as ours and which, while not an old country is a very highly developed industrial country, talking about annual balances in trade is just a waste of time. It is just a waste of time to talk about balances in trade over a period of 12 months as between our country and either of these two countries; balances of that kind are an impossibility. The United Kingdom has 60 million people, is an old country and must import many of the primary products that it converts into commodities that the nations of the world require. This is an entirely different situation from the situation we have here. If one talks about balancing trade over a 12-months period, with such a country one is just attempting to bring about a condition of stagnation in one or both of these countries.

These remarks would be even more true if we applied them to a country like the United States. By way of illustration, I might point out that when the United States was developing in the sense that we are developing now, towards the beginning of the last century and even after the middle of the last century, a great deal of capital was invested in that country from the United Kingdom and elsewhere.

Not only was capital invested there, but some of the best experts in connection with industrial development, such as Carnegie, for example, went from the United Kingdom to the United States and took a very leading part in the development of the steel industry of that country. The same thing has got to happen in this country if we are going to develop our natural resources here to the extent they should be developed. We must get capital from the outside. We must get experts from the outside. We must get technical experience from the outside, and that means bringing capital in the form of machines to this country and bringing all the expert knowledge here, to the extent it is required. I repeat that we are wasting our time when we continue to discuss the possibility of having balanced bilateral trade between two countries that are so entirely different as these countries, both in their development and in their populations.

We talk about balancing trade over a 12-month period. It will be very fortunate for this country or any other country if that trade balances over a 10-year period. It is more likely it will not balance in less than a 25-year period and, in connection with many aspects of trade, it may be even 100 years before there is a balance. In other words, the investment we are making now and the development that is taking place now will not be producing the commodities that are going to be sold for some considerable time, so I think we should keep that in mind when we are talking about these balances and when we are trying to arrive at conclusions that may be helpful.

I mentioned earlier that in the west we were somewhat pleased because we have a Minister of Trade and Commerce who is from the west. I say that because I want to call attention to the figures in connection with agriculture as they relate to these countries. The United States and Canada are located on the same continent. We are on the northern half of the continent, and the United States is on the southern half of the continent. We must, therefore, trade with one another in agricultural products and in the feed that is necessary to feed the livestock we have on this continent. If our continent were divided from north to south instead of from east to west, this type of trade would not be a necessity.

When we look at the figures we realize how important that trade is. The last year for which I was able to get figures before coming into the house shows that imports of agricultural products from the United States amounted to about $300 million and exports of Canadian products to the United States, $235 million. For most of the years one might look at they are almost in balance. We ship agricultural products to the United States to about the same value as the products the United States ships to us. We get from the United States citrus fruits and juices, cotton and that kind of thing. We get other products that we are not able to produce in this country. We send down there largely feed grains and livestock. Incidentally, their livestock enters into competition with our own livestock on American markets. We do send, too, a very considerable quantity of livestock products. The exports of feed grain amounted to $107 million and $87 million for livestock products. We have to be very careful in our discussions of matters of that kind that we do not give offence because that might result in shutting off some of that trade.

For example, the Minister of Agriculture, in replying to me yesterday, called attention to the fact that they had 360,000 cases of eggs when he took over. I did not say so in the house but I asked him outside the house if he thought I planned to turn them over to him.

As a matter of fact, I expected to head the organization that was going to sell them and I am very pleased to know that organization functioned so well even after I left the department as to sell them all before December 1 and leave us in exactly the same position as that in which we had been in the previous two years. This is not the first time we have had 360,000 cases of eggs under the control of the agricultural prices support board and on every occasion those eggs have been disposed of without giving any more difficulty than in 1957. That brings me to a remark that was made the other day by the hon. member for Lincoln. I just want to refer to that remark while I am on my feet. As reported at page 1989 of Hansard he said this:

> Canada's most unfavourable trade balance with the United States and other countries coupled with our tremendous surplus of farm produce was one of the main reasons that brought about the change of government on June 10.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member for Melville but I must advise him that his time has expired.

Mr. Gardiner: I have a little bit more to say but it would take me a minute or two to do so. I can do it later.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Is it agreeable to the committee that the hon. member should be allowed an extension of time?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Gardiner: Just to finish this one point. The statement I have just read was made. With regard to that I would say that there is a possibility—and I think a very decided possibility—that the idea people had that there were great surpluses of agricultural products was one of the reasons some members lost their seats and that others won their seats. But I want to point out that neither at that time nor at any other time in recent years has there been any troublesome surplus of these farm products in Canada at the end of any particular season during which the products were being produced and sold. The only one with regard to which there has been a troublesome surplus was wheat and it, of course, affects largely agriculture in the western part of Canada.

But as I pointed out a few moments ago, there is considerable trade between Canada and the United States in fruit products and vegetable products and other agricultural products and while they balance in total over each year there are periods of the year when, because of seasonal conditions in the two countries, the producers on this side of the line have some difficulty. We have attempted in the past to deal with that difficulty by having what we call seasonal duties. It depends on how well those are adjusted from time to time as to what effect they really have. You cannot set any definite date because the weather is not the same in different years and you have to adjust them from time to time. Some adjustments had to be made in connection with our trade with the United States just before the election. We made some of them in the early part of the spring.

I want to refer to this matter in order to answer another suggestion that was made by the Minister of Agriculture the other day. He told us that they brought in the provision that puts fowl under the Agricultural Prices Support Act. In order to be absolutely fair, I think what he intended to convey was that they really applied it. It was there before they came into office in the form of an order in council setting out the date on which it would come in as August 1.

Mr. Harkness: The fifteenth.

Mr. Gardiner: And that was marked up to the middle of July, I think. I would still maintain that that was something that was done previously, and it was done for a purpose. The reason was that we had too many grade A large eggs in Canada. Grade A large eggs are mostly laid by old hens. The older they get, the bigger the egg tends to be. That trade in fowl with the United States had developed into a position where old hens were selling in this country at higher prices than they were selling in the United States. Therefore something had to be done about the matter if we were not going to have this market flooded with United States old hens. The first thing that happened was what our soup makers in this country did. When you eat chicken soup, you may think you are eating young chicken, but you are really eating fowl or old hens. The soup makers found they could buy old hens in the United States more cheaply than they could buy them here because our price support system kept the price higher here. Therefore they bought old hens from the United States.

When our old hens were coming on the market a year ago it was found to be already supplied by United States old hens. Our old hens were left alive to lay grade A large eggs. In the spring of this year we undertook to deal with that situation. Old hens start to come on the market about August 1. So we said there was going to be a support price on Canadian old hens or fowl, that we would take them off the market and so deal with the situation as to lessen the number of grade A large eggs that were produced in this country. Apparently it has worked because it would not have been possible for all those eggs to be disposed of by December 1 if it had not worked. I therefore assume that it has worked. My hon. friend shakes his head. From that action I take it that he means there are still some of them around that are frozen; that is some of the eggs but they are not grade A large eggs. The eggs that are frozen are B grade eggs. We set a floor price on B grade eggs. It was that floor which took those eggs out of the way of the others and made it possible to sell the eggs that should go on this market.

I could go on and enumerate a number of cases of that kind but it is only to illustrate one point. We have this $235 million or more of exports of farm products to the United States annually and we import things like cotton, citrus fruit juices and so on to the extent of something between that and $300 million from year to year. One of the dangers of doing things which some people think you ought to do in connection with a matter of that kind is that you may actually kill the goose that lays the golden egg.

The biggest trade that the farmers of this country have with the United States is in cattle. What happened two or three weeks ago only goes to show how people are concerned about that trade. There has been an arrangement in connection with our cattle that has existed ever since 1947 under which cattle of 700 pounds or over can move into the United States at a duty of 1½ cents. Then when we get up to a certain number the duty goes up one cent. It went up the other day, or at least some cattle were being bought with that extra cent on and immediately every cattle producer in the country became concerned that there was going to be another cent duty on his cattle. Of course that was not the situation, as the minister explained to the house the other day. But it could very well become the situation.

Mr. Harkness: It is on now.

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, it is on now. It stays on until January 1 and then goes off, and again you have 120,000 cattle that can go down to the United States in the first quarter of the next year and in all probability there will not be any more than that go, if that many; so the dealers carry on until you get into the last quarter of the next year. If the extra amount is put on any cattle that it did not need to be put on, that money will be paid to the producer as time goes along.

All I am pointing out is that you have very important trade between the United States and this country in farm products and one of the products is cattle. Another is the lower grade of wheat, oats and barley, perhaps lower priced barley; because the barley that is used for malt does not go down for the purpose of feeding. But most of the barley that goes to the United States, most of the oats and much of the lower grades of grain go there to feed livestock. Anything that we do on this side of the line should not interfere in any way with that trade or should not give reason why the Americans may retaliate because of something that we do and bring about a condition in which that product could not be sold.

I have just one remark to make with regard to wheat. Not much has been said about wheat, but I want to say this. Our sale of wheat must be carried on, if it is going to be carried on successfully, in very much the same way as the sale of anything else is carried on. You must find somebody who wants it or needs it. You must find somebody who can pay for it, whether it be within the country or outside the country. It must be paid for if the board is going to be able to pay the producer.

But what I want to call attention to at the moment more than anything else is this: we have a system of our own of assembling our wheat. We have an elevator system, which is a costly way of storing wheat—a cent a bushel a month—and when we are paying out that much it is easy to run into a position where the highest cost to agriculture in the wheat growing country is paying storage on that grain. Two years ago we did something about this position and undertook to pay half that cost. It is an expensive way of doing things, but it is our way, and there are reasons for it.

But it is not the way in which grain is handled elsewhere except in a very few countries. And then, again, we have our own way of marketing wheat. We have a wheat board, and 90 per cent of the farmers in western Canada think that is the way in which it ought to be marketed. But I would call attention to the fact that when you get outside Canada and start selling you are dealing with customers who have not got these arrangements at all, who do not understand them, and who probably do not want to understand them.

For example, in every other country on the other side of the ocean you find men who earn their living selling grain. It is their livelihood, and if this grain is placed in such a way that these men cannot help to sell it we may find them competing with us; they are going to sell somebody's grain, because they cannot make a living without doing that. And so I think that when we send over delegations to promote sales of any commodity on the other side we should take these matters into consideration. I understand that the members of the commission now in the United Kingdom are not over there for the purpose of selling something but for the purpose of buying something, but I know that under this government or under some future government we will be sending over a mission to try to sell products, and they should take into consideration when they are doing that the methods which are used in those countries.

Belgium, Great Britain, the Scandinavian countries and other places where we sell our wheat have their own way of handling this business; we must work in with their plans in order to sell our products. So I would suggest to the minister that he should not only have commissions going overseas to buy, but have others going over to sell, and that these should always take into consideration both the methods of financing and the practices used in handling the product on the other side. I am sure the wheat board has been doing this to a very considerable extent over the years, and I am sure they should be encouraged to continue to do so, and if they continue this work we will be able to dispose of considerable quantities of our wheat.

I am not going to prophesy that all the wheat we have at present will be sold inside 12 months. I am not going to say that, although I did prophesy in 1940, when we had some hundreds of millions of bushels on hand, and when we were threatened with a total surplus of 600 million bushels, that when the war was over, or a year after, we would be 100 million bushels short. I was laughed at because of that statement; pamphlets were distributed all across Canada questioning the prophecy, but within a year after the war that is exactly the position we were in.

I will not attempt to prophesy again, because I was right that time and I might be wrong the next time. But, nevertheless, that is a situation which is going to develop from time to time, and I think if we handle the situation as it should be handled, and if the wheat board promotes the selling of our wheat in co-operation with the people we are going to deal with we will eventually be able to dispose of our crop.

But up to the present time, since the present government came to office, we have not been too lucky or, shall I say, too fortunate, in our handling of wheat. I think that as time goes on we will be able to sell greater quantities, and I think we can only do that by developing the greatest possible co-operation with the two great countries with whom we are so closely associated in trade. First, the United Kingdom. We can find the best agencies in the United Kingdom to dispose of our wheat that there are anywhere in the world. Britain is a trading nation; they must trade if they are going to exist.

With regard to the United States, there is a difficulty which I must call to the attention of the minister, and about which I hope he can do something. I tried to take some action, when I was in the government, and the former minister of trade and commerce also discussed the matter, but we did not accomplish anything. Up until the middle of the last war there was no embargo on wheat going to the United States, but since 1941 or 1942 there has been an embargo; we are not allowed to sell any wheat for human consumption in the United States or, at least, our maximum is 800,000 bushels, which goes in on the first day.

The two greatest agencies outside Canada for marketing wheat are in the United States and Great Britain, and I think we must co-operate with both in order to dispose of the quantity of wheat which we have for sale. I suggest that the next time a group of high level men goes down to Washington they should take up this question. I know it has been discussed there before, but it could be discussed there again. There are arguments on both sides, I know, but the men who produce the wheat are anxious that the government should take advantage of every opportunity there is to sell their product. And one of the opportunities, particularly in years when our wheat has a high protein content and the United States wheat has a low protein content, is that of marketing a very considerable part of our wheat through the mills of the United States—maybe not in the United States, but in other countries. At other times we should be able to market a considerable part of our wheat through the mills of the United Kingdom as flour to be sold elsewhere. We must keep these two things in mind if we are to sell the enormous quantities of wheat which we produce in the west.

I am not going to say anything further than that now. When we are discussing some of the items in the estimates of the department I may have something further to say.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I wonder if I could say a few words now with regard to what the hon. member for Melville has just said?

The Chairman: Would the hon. member for Mount Royal mind allowing the Minister of Agriculture to speak?

Mr. Macnaughton: Mr. Chairman, I was indeed interested to hear the short report the minister made, in particular the commendation of the trade commissioner service. It seems to me that the minister is lucky to be heir to a legacy left him by the former minister of trade and commerce, the Right Hon. C. D. Howe.

I should like also to take the opportunity of expressing my feeling of gratitude for the services of the trade commissioners. On many occasions during the past few years I have found it necessary to call upon them for assistance, and they always knew the proper quarters to which to refer me and others interested in trade matters. At all times they provided the highest form of service with regard to securing and developing of the foreign trade of this country. I wish to pay a personal tribute to this service, which is among the best in the world.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke of the trade mission. Some people have called it a junket to Great Britain but I will not be so unkind as to refer more than once to that. We have heard a good deal about the wonderful reception which the English people, and others in the United Kingdom gave, and are giving to the mission. That, of course, is only natural for English people are by nature extremely hospitable and receptive. Why should they not be when people are visiting them desiring to place orders for the goods they manufacture.

Be that as it may, the British are first class traders. As we know, they live by trade. I make these remarks because I should like the minister to tell us what results he hopes to obtain from this trade mission. I would also ask him to make, in due course, a full report to this house with regard to this matter. The trade mission of course is a matter of extreme interest to the British and naturally so and I think it might serve a useful purpose if I referred to the London Financial Times of November 20, 1957 under a lead editorial entitled "The Switch of Trade" which says in part:

> Within a few days of becoming Prime Minister Mr. Diefenbaker had said that he would like to switch 15 per cent of Canada's imports from the United States to Britain.
> That figure has subsequently become a source of embarrassment in Ottawa. Nevertheless, the desire to achieve an increase in trade with Britain, to offset dependence on America, is both genuine and keen. The first major proposal for implementing such a policy which the British government put forward was the Anglo-Canadian free trade area. For political reasons that went much further than Mr. Diefenbaker's administration—which is protectionist in character—could accept. Indeed the Liberal party has given it such welcome as it has had. The Canadian government has found that it could only rely on voluntary exhortation and organization to try to increase Canadian purchases in the United Kingdom. The principal means of achieving these ends has been to send a trade mission to Britain.

I suppose we all want to assist the United Kingdom. Traditionally it is the thing to do and sentimentally it conforms to the desire of all of us here; but when we are considering a potential change in general policy I think we should also consider the consequences of such a change and what those consequences could be with regard to the United States, with regard to Canadian industry, with regard to the various nations in the group called GATT and also NATO, and with regard to the United Kingdom itself.

Let us take a look first at the reasons for our tremendous volume of trade with the United States. Over the years there has been a change in consumer demand in Canada and that change has been away from the United Kingdom. The United States makes the kind of things we have and like and moreover she is able to get them to us quickly and also economically. Secondly, and perhaps even more important, there has been a great increase in United States investment in Canada during recent years. It is an economic truism that an export of capital is generally accompanied by an export of goods. Canada's industrial development since the war and the development of our natural resources would not have been nearly so impressive without that inflow of capital from the United States.

The United States has invested in our national future and as we all know that investment has paid off. Therefore we find that by virtue of geographical proximity, national buying habits and fundamental economic forces, Canada now buys the bulk of her goods and services from the United States. If we are going to attempt to divert 15 per cent of our national business, in approximately the amount of $600 million, perhaps the consequences of that diversion could be quite different from what we may anticipate.

We all know that the Americans are hardfisted traders. In fact, their trading attitude is that they will give a concession for a concession, they will give a dollar for a dollar. We know that the United States belongs to GATT and that deals made for and on behalf of the United States are subject to the approval of congress. We also know that the attitude of congress—let us state it quite frankly—is that if we are giving you a concession we will certainly demand a concession, too. We can therefore question how the minister will bring about the proposed diversion from the United States to the United Kingdom.

Perhaps there might be at least two ways. If the cost of production rises in the United States which obviously will bring an increase in the prices which Canadian manufacturers would have to pay for their imports it might be possible to divert some of the Canadian trade from the United States to the United Kingdom but I am sure the United States manufacturers will not help us in that regard. And then, of course, if Canada were to impose import licence requirements or were to increase the Canadian tariff on goods being imported into Canada that also might be a means of diverting some of the trade to the United Kingdom. But if we do that surely the same result will affect the other GATT countries who are in that trading arrangement so the net effect to the Canadian government would be no result.

I have just a few words to say concerning the situation of Canadian industry. If the Canadian government by import restrictions or increased tariffs or by a change in policy sets about to prevent United States products coming into Canada and sets about to divert other purchases to the United Kingdom, what is there to prevent the Canadian manufacturer from stepping into the breach and filling the needs of Canadian consumers? If we close the Canadian market to the United States suppliers—it is important to remember Canadians are only second to Americans in the production of general consumer goods—there is nothing to prevent Canadian manufacturers stepping into that void and filling the needs of the Canadian consumers. The net result again is that our attemps to divert some trade to the United Kingdom has failed.

Now with regard to the various nations in NATO and the GATT group it may be possible to divert $600 million a year from the United States to the United Kingdom but it would not be possible without giving the same chance to compete to the other nations in NATO and GATT, because surely to goodness we are not merely political partners in NATO. Surely we are partners in the economic sense as well.

If we were to succeed in diverting 15 per cent of our trade from the United States to the United Kingdom I suggest that it might not be the United Kingdom which would step in and supply the consumer goods that we want in this country. It might, for example, be Germany. Germany might pick up most of the business for the following reasons. The Germans do produce excellent goods and they produce them at competitive rates, probably better competitive rates than is the case with the English. Along with their sales they provide first-class service and the type of consumer goods that Canadians would perhaps prefer. If this proved to be the case the objective of the minister would again be defeated.

I think it is quite true that many years ago the United Kingdom controlled most of the Canadian market. However, since that time we have had a tremendous development in Canadian industry and United States power has come to the fore. I think it follows that observing these results Great Britain decided to divert her own trade to the more natural channels of the sterling area. The United States is dominant in the dollar group and the United Kingdom is dominant in the sterling group and I suggest that the United Kingdom would be very jealous about giving up control of the sterling group if that control were threatened to any extent.

If Canada offers $600 million to the United Kingdom in the form of trade it seems to me that the United Kingdom is faced with the problem of investing in capital goods and plant in order to produce the type of consumer goods that this country wants and I doubt very much if the United Kingdom is prepared to invest in plant and capital goods without some assurance of a secure market in Canada. Whether or not this means that the United Kingdom will demand a long-term trade agreement, I do not know, but it seems to me that their reference to opening a free trade area between the United Kingdom and Canada obviously followed from that reasoning. They must have some assurance if they are called upon to invest in capital goods and plant that they will have the opportunity to sell in this market.

The natural trading area for the United Kingdom is of course the sterling area. Sterling is the means of payment and British manufacturing capacity has been directed to supply the needs of this area. The sterling group needs are consumer needs whereas Canada's needs are capital goods. Canada belongs to the dollar group.

I wish now to make a few general observations. It occurs to me that any policy of trade diversion from the United States to the United Kingdom could easily deprive us in Canada of certain raw materials which we require to keep our factories going, and let me refer just in passing to certain metals, clays, oil, gas and coal. Again, this proposed diversion could certainly invite retaliation from the United States.

Restrictions on the imports of fish and oil from the west and iron ore from the east could very easily be imposed. Again this proposed diversion may create a lack of confidence in the foreign investor; that is to say, the rate of foreign investment in this country might perhaps slow down because if the foreign investor becomes alarmed over or afraid of the present government's financial policy or the present government's trade policy he might stop making investments in this country.

Canadian expansion has been financed to a large degree by outside capital and employment in Canada is geared to an expanding industrial economy. If we do not get the money to build the industrial expansion unemployment will obviously result. Unemployment is increasing every day and in our neck of the woods we fear that by the end of January we may have as many as 560,000 unemployed in this country.

Generally speaking, any nation that starts to restrict imports starts the trade ball rolling down the hill. None of us knows where it will stop. We had an example of that in 1929 and in the subsequent depression and I think we need to view any change in trade policy very carefully in order not to run into the same sort of thing.

I am told that a few years ago James Duncan, through a voluntary effort, tried to induce certain Canadian manufacturers to buy more from the United Kingdom. I understand that a survey was conducted among Canadian firms and they were asked to review the things which they would need and, if possible, to buy from the United Kingdom. So far as I know this effort had very little impact on the Canadian economy for the following reasons: first of all, the Canadian manufacturers would of necessity be buying in the cheapest market in order to reduce their costs. If they were not doing that at the time, then their competitors would beat them out on price. If this proposed diversion to the United Kingdom does not bring about the opportunity of buying materials at a cheaper price it may in turn increase the prices to the Canadian manufacturer and consequently limit his capacity to compete in the over-all world markets.

It seems to me that our trade with the United States has been a natural development of North American economy. It is obvious that our lines of communication with the United States are very close and very effective. Advertising of American products make us familiar with them in this country. If you look at the Bank of Canada statistics I think you will see that the big import deficit with the United States is in capital goods rather than in consumer goods. That is to say, the large American companies in their search for natural resources have been coming to this country either by way of setting up their own subsidiary corporations or by investing in Canadian corporations and have exported vast capital sums, for example, in the development of the oil industry in the west and in the development of the iron ore industry in Labrador and in Quebec. Capital goods will follow capital investment and it also follows that where you have United States engineers who are familiar with United States industrial equipment needed in the development of those natural resources they obviously will try to spend their money first in this country and, failing that, they will go to the sources of supply which they know.

The world needs our resources and this in turn gives rise to the import flow of capital goods. There is, however, a natural diversion of capital goods which could be brought about by Great Britain. If Great Britain would free more funds for investment in this country, if Great Britain would buy operating factories in Canada as, for example, the A. V. Roe Company did, or if Great Britain would build new factories in this country, it would follow that capital goods and even to a certain extent consumer goods would flow into this country and bring in their train considerable imports from the United Kingdom.

I may be slightly old-fashioned but it seems to me that the onus to sell is on the seller and not on the buyer. Our big deficit with the United States and our surplus with the United Kingdom are a natural development of our free business economy, relatively speaking, free of controls, free of government interference and free of foreign exchange control. In order to try to do something to this free development of trade the government will have to play with or change the rules, such as increasing tariffs and bringing in restrictions, and that is why I have been trying to discuss this problem in a very real way in order to get some explanation now or later from the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

The question arises, why do we have to go to Great Britain? Why can Great Britain not come to us? What will be the effect on local industry, textiles, woollens, and secondary manufacturers? Down our way businessmen and labourers are considerably disturbed by this whole project. In proof of this—although it does not come from the Montreal district—I refer the committee to the Toronto Daily Star of November 29, 1957 in which is recorded an interview given by V. W. Scully, president of Stelco. He said in part:

> "In tinplate and sheet generally, the Canadian mills have equipped themselves to meet the Canadian market situation", said V. W. Scully, president of Stelco.
> "At the present time we have more than adequate capacity and we cannot see how our economic position is going to be helped if it is going to become more and more difficult to employ that capacity."

Mr. F. A. Sherman, chairman of Dofasco's board, said:

> "We fail to understand how Ottawa could agree to cause more unemployment by importing tinplate which already is in excess supply."
> In Cardiff, Wales, yesterday, Hon. Gordon Churchill, Canadian Minister of Trade and Commerce, said Canada is a definite market for British steel and tinplate.

I ask again why should the buyer have to do the selling? We know that the whole pattern of Canadian trade is a natural pattern springing out of a multitude of hundreds of individual business decisions. If we alter this natural pattern we will be setting up new stresses and strains.

While it may be possible, by interference, to shift 15 per cent of the trade from the United States to the United Kingdom, in the long run we may lessen the over-all trade. This, Mr. Chairman, is a comparatively free economy and we have got used to this type of economy. To try arbitrarily to change the whole complexity of the trade flow could result in great damage. It could very easily result in a lessening, not in an increasing, of our over-all trade.

Mr. Harkness: Mr. Chairman, I should like to make one or two brief remarks in view of the statement made by the right hon. member for Melville in regard to the duty on cattle going into the United States. I do this so that there will be no further ambiguity in connection with this matter which has been considerably confused in the minds of cattle producers and in regard to which the situation has been somewhat ambiguous over the past two or three weeks. I cleared up the situation here on Monday of this week, I think, but since that time there has been a further change to which I should like to refer.

The United States government has announced that commencing December 4 United States customs collectors will require a $2\frac{1}{2}$ cents per pound duty on imported cattle weighing over 700 pounds per head. This is an increase of one cent per pound over the duty which has prevailed for some time and is in accordance with the United States tariff structure. There is a basic duty of 1½ cents on slaughter and feeder cattle entering the United States and weighing under 200 pounds or over 700 pounds. Those between 200 and 700 pounds pay 2½ cents a pound duty. Purebred cattle for breeding enter free of duty. Dairy cows pay 1½ cents.

I have the figures here as to what United States imports have been, particularly what exports of cattle from Canada to the United States have amounted to, and perhaps the committee might be interested in them. The figures I have are for the period from April until the end of November because the quotas imposed by the United States work on the basis of a year running from April 1 of one year to April 1 of the following year.

During the first quarter of this quota year, April, May and June, we exported 1,717 cattle. During the next quarter, July, August and September, we exported 52,215 head, and during October and November we exported 87,571 head, or a total of 141,503 head for the period from April 1 to November 30. These, of course, are slaughter and feeder cattle over 700 pounds in weight. In addition, we exported a considerable number of feeder cattle between 200 and 700 pounds, in fact, 82,074 head. We exported 11,480 head of calves under 200 pounds and we exported 27,944 head of dairy and purebred cattle, for a grand total in that period of 263,001 head of cattle.

The collection of one cent a pound extra on beef cattle at present going into the United States does not mean that the people shipping the cattle at the present time will eventually have to pay that. The recent action of the United States customs officers is in accordance with the common practice when a quota is approaching completion. Extra duty is charged, invoices are dated and refunds are made for any cattle which eventually prove to be within the quota.

The information from Washington is to the effect that on November 27 a total of 105,000 cattle had been received from all countries against the quota of 120,000 for the quarter. We believe it is likely that unless a large number of cattle come in from Mexico during the current month of December the number of cattle which will likely go from Canada to the United States will not be above the quota and therefore eventually there will not be any additional duty that exporters will have to pay on the cattle. That, of course, is just our estimate. We do not know whether or not it will prove correct. In any event, it seems quite certain that the number of beef cattle going into the United States this year on which additional duty will be paid will be very small, if there are any.

In view of the fact that the right hon. member brought up the matter and that there has been this change I though I had better make this statement in order to clarify the situation and also to reassure exporters of cattle with regard to what the situation is at the present moment.

Mr. Gardiner: May I ask a question before the minister leaves that point? I am apparently under a wrong impression myself with regard to one feature. I was under the impression that it operated on the basis of a calendar year and that while they might put on the duty now it probably would not operate after January 1. I would take it from what the minister has said that the year starts on the first of April—

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Mr. Gardiner: —and that the duty may be collected from now until then.

Mr. Harkness: The year is calculated from April 1 and there is a total quota of 400,000 head. But that again is broken down into quarters and there is a maximum in any one quarter of 120,000 head. I understand the reason for that is to prevent the whole 400,000 head being thrown on the United States market in one month, say, and disrupting their price structure. Therefore there is this provision that only 120,000 head can go in at the 1½ cent duty in any quarter. The quarter we are now in, to which the 120,000 will apply, will be up at the end of December.

Mr. Gardiner: That is the third quarter.

Mr. Harkness: That is the third quarter, and the fourth quarter will then start, taking in January, February and March. During that quarter cattle can be shipped into the United States up to 120,000 head as long as the total for the year is not over 400,000 head. As the total number of cattle over 700 pounds we have shipped in so far is 141,503 head and as I believe Mexico has shipped only somewhere between 30,000 and 40,000 head, this means that we will still have a quota of 120,000 head for the next three months, January, February and March.

Mr. Gardiner: But they will not be able to go above the 120,000 at a duty of 1½ cents even if it is below the 400,000?

Mr. Harkness: I think that is correct. That is my impression. The maximum we will be able to ship is 120,000 but as the right hon. gentleman is aware it is unlikely that during that period we will be shipping anything like the number of cattle we have shipped during the past two months, and therefore from a practical point of view I do not think that will have very much significance as far as we are concerned.

Mr. Olson: Will the minister permit a question?

Mr. Harkness: Yes.

Mr. Olson: The figure of 120,000 head per quarter is used and 400,000 head for the year. Would the minister explain why that is so because four times 120,000 is not 400,000. The two figures do not jibe.

Mr. Harkness: I think I just explained that but I will explain it again. The total number of cattle over 700 pounds, primarily beef cattle, which the United States allows to enter that country under a duty of 1½ cents a pound is 400,000 head in a year. As soon as there are more than 400,000 head the duty goes to 2½ cents a pound.

Mr. Gardiner: That is from all countries.

Mr. Harkness: That is from all countries, but at least in recent years the only countries which have exported live cattle to the United States have been Canada and Mexico. There is a further provision which I understand is to prevent the whole 400,000 head entering the United States in one bunch and thereby disorganizing their markets. That provision is that during any three month period of the specified year the maximum number which can enter that country is 120,000, and that is how the 120,000 figure comes into the picture.

Mr. Irwin: May I ask the minister a question? Suppose the full quota was filled for the first three quarters. That would amount to 360,000. That would leave a balance of 90,000 in the 400,000 maximum. Would that mean that in the fourth quarter they could export only 90,000 head at the 1½ cent rate? Furthermore, does the 400,000 head include slaughter cattle under 200 pounds?

Mr. Harkness: With regard to the first question, if there were 120,000 head in each of the first three quarters that would make a total of 360,000 head and therefore in the fourth and final quarter we could only export 40,000 head at the 1½ cent duty, not 90,000. But you can export as many as you like at the 2½ cent rate. There is no limit on the number that can be exported at the 2½ cent rate of duty. Calves under 200 pounds are not included in this quota. Just a moment, I will check on that. Yes, calves are included. There is a basic duty of 1½ cents on slaughter and feeder cattle entering the United States weighing under 200 pounds or over 700 pounds.

Now, Mr. Chairman, there were two or three other points which the hon. member for Melville brought up about which I must say I am not in agreement. I think perhaps they are matters which would more properly be discussed on the estimates of the Department of Agriculture rather than when we are dealing with the estimates of trade and commerce. The matters that he raised in connection with eggs, fowl and so forth, I shall therefore leave until a later time.

Mr. McCullough: I am sure the committee will appreciate the explanation the minister has given. I think the previous explanation he gave concerning exports of beef cattle to the United States was in answer to a question of mine. I asked the question because I appreciated the concern of exporters of cattle in western Canada. I should like to ask the minister a question now in further clarification. I believe he said that a record of the sales would be made and if there was an extra duty of 1½ cents it would be refunded to the exporter. Could the minister explain how the producer might avail himself of this rebate or what effect it might have on the farmer who has put his cattle in the hands of an exporter and has been paid. Does he have to wait for a refund?

Mr. Harkness: It would all depend on the way in which the producer disposed of his cattle. If he put them in the hands of a commission agent to ship to the United States and sell for him, of course he would get back the cent a pound duty when it was rebated. On the other hand, if he sold the cattle to a cattle dealer, he would have lost his interest in them and the cattle dealer would get whatever price he could. In some cases, of course, if the duty were charged the cattle dealer would lose money.

Mr. Lewry: Mr. Chairman, I wish to join with others in this house in extending congratulations to the minister on his appointment, and to express the hope that he will be able to do a more acceptable job of work for our western farmers in the matter of trade than has been the case in recent years. I rise mainly to suggest to the minister that he should get off his big fat surplus of wheat and sell it. I do wish to say that I was somewhat disappointed with the attitude of the minister in connection with the disposal of the wheat surplus.

Prior to the calling of this session of parliament we in the west read on more than one occasion that the new minister was going to follow an aggressive sales policy to assist the farmers in getting their proper share of the national income. One of my first questions in this house was in connection with the report that the Australian state of New South Wales had suffered a severe drought and a resultant crop failure. At that time it was suggested that Australia may have to import wheat in order to meet its commitments to other countries. I was chided, not only by some in this house but also by some western newspapers. It has now been publicized quite extensively that that condition exists, and that Australia will in all likelihood import some wheat. The news stories indicate that our sister dominion would prefer Canadian wheat. I should like to read in part a Melbourne Reuters dispatch of December 4 which states:

> The Australian wheat board has asked federal government permission to import Canadian wheat, it was reported here tonight.
> Board Chairman Sir John Teasdale said the shipments would go to New South Wales and Queensland, whose own wheat crops had been hit by drought.
> Teasdale said Canadian wheat could be shipped to New South Wales and Queensland at about the same price as western Australian wheat could be transported to those states.

When I asked the minister a few days ago whether or not he had taken any steps to sell wheat to Australia I received the offhand answer that if Australia wanted wheat we would sell it to her. Where is that aggressive policy that was mentioned only a few weeks ago? I suggest to the minister that we cannot sit around and expect customers to come to us. The United States has already announced a new disposal program, and I am afraid unless some direct, aggressive action is taken to obtain this contract for wheat sales to Australia, we may even lose that. I suggest, in all deference, that the minister who, it seems, is quite able to make trips to other parts of the world might at least send someone to Australia, if necessary, to make sure this contract is tied up right now.

The western farmers are looking to this government for the kind of action that was promised, an aggressive sales policy. The farmers have piles of wheat taking up valuable space on their farms, in their machine sheds, cattle barns and expensive granaries. Some wheat has been stored for many years. They are asking for the new kind of aggressive sales policy that was indicated would come after the change in government. When the first story appeared in the newspapers about this Australian crisis it was indicated that possibly 50 million bushels might be required. The latest story indicates that it is already too late to import that amount, so possibly we have already lost a good part of the amount we could have sent as a result of this lackadaisical attitude.

An extensive program is necessary as our farmers all across Canada are still only getting less than half of the share of the national income to which they are entitled. One out of six Canadians is a farmer, and he should get $1 out of every $6 of national income. But at the present time he is getting less than $1 out of every $15, or less than half of that to which he is entitled.

Under the former Liberal government the so-called Liberal prosperity forced 15 per cent of our farmers off their land. This applies to eastern and western farmers alike. Cattle prices have fallen in the east as well as the west, and at the same time prices of farm machinery have been increasing steadily. A few years ago a farmer could have purchased a new hay baler with the proceeds of the sale of four 1,000-pound steers. It now takes the equivalent of ten steers. In the west a medium sized tractor could have been purchased a few years ago with the money from the sale of 1,600 bushels of wheat. Today it takes 2,800 bushels to buy that same machine.

There are hundreds of farmers who have many thousands of bushels of wheat stored on their farms. Every day they see the foodstuffs required by people in other parts of the world going to waste in their barns. They were led to believe that a new policy would be implemented, but today we still have the same old procedure. It is the younger farmers in the west today who are suffering the most. It takes thousands of dollars to get a proper set-up for good farming. A few weeks ago in my own constituency I found several young farmers who had recently started in business facing virtual bankruptcy, yet they had wheat in storage. It is not their fault that the government fails to have the proper sales technique or ability to sell, yet they are forced to virtually subsidize the federal government by storing their own wheat. This policy has another discriminating feature; it is making big farms bigger and the small farmers are being forced out of business. I suggest to the minister that the farmers expect him to do his duty. They are past the stage of accepting any more promises, they want action now and they need action or they will be adding to the increasing unemployment problem across Canada.

May I say that even if this pile of wheat were all sold today, and it is the duty of the minister to sell it, the plight of the western farmer would not be relieved entirely. Depressed conditions would still exist, because those conditions are brought about by the surplus itself. We were disappointed, therefore, last evening when the Minister of Finance failed to indicate any provision was being made in the baby budget for bolstering farm income. I am sure that if the responsible government officials are aware of the present farm situation, and if they are not aware of it it is time they became fully acquainted with the problem, they would be taking steps to correct the farm price relationship. The factor that will probably cause them the greatest concern is the fear of political revolt on the part of the taxpayers when called to support the farm economy.

Therefore it becomes increasingly more important not only for the farmer but for the government as well that these surpluses be disposed of, because when the surplus is disposed of and no longer has the depressing effect on farm prices then prices will automatically be forced up by demand and the farmer will gradually work up to a parity position in the market place. Consequently, sales are still our basic problem and it will behoove the minister to be as aggressive on this problem as he was before he became the minister. The longer the surplus remains, the longer the taxpayer will have to give direct aid to the industry. Therefore it becomes politically expedient for this government to take immediate action through the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Olson: I too should like to join with the many in wishing the Minister of Trade and Commerce well as he begins to deal with the problems that go with a department as large as the Department of Trade and Commerce. As many other members have indicated, the action taken by the Department of Trade and Commerce is probably more important to the farmers in western Canada than that of any other department. I should like to deal briefly with the general situation and also with the developments that have taken place with regard to the market situation of our wheat and petroleum industry.

I am very happy to hear the minister's high praise of the officers of his department and also to hear his high praise of and favourable comments on the activities of the trade commissioners in the various parts of the world. I too think that they are doing a good job in so far as our trade policies allow.

We are also happy to hear the minister tell us of the trade mission to the United Kingdom. We are happy to hear him say how well it is being received, and to speak about the enthusiasm of the British firms in meeting with this trade mission, about the number of people who have met this trade mission, and generally the interest that has been shown. But I failed to detect in his remarks any definite or specific corrective policy or anything to indicate just what they were going to do to increase our trade. He mentioned, of course, that they were going to buy or to attempt to place larger orders in the United Kingdom; and of course it follows that that course will possibly lead to the United Kingdom's placing larger orders in Canada. I was greatly interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton, I believe it was, who suggested that they had high hopes for this mission, that they would be able possibly to increase this trade and that out of this delegation would come certain things that would in fact increase the trade.

I was, however, under the impression that this government had a trade policy before this mission went to Britain and that it was not dependent on what would come out of this mission. We know, of course, that there has been a declining market with regard to our wheat. I fail to find in his remarks anything that would have a tendency to correct that situation. I admit that this new government inherited a wheat trade problem. But whether they inherited it or not, the fact is that the problem is now theirs, and we look to them to bring about some change in trade policies that will correct it, other than trade missions. It was a declining market before this government took over and it still is a declining market. For example, I should like the members of this committee to know that the flour milling industry in my own constituency is down. Local flour mills are dependent on export markets for full production. This local production is down 50 per cent in the past three months and, according to a committee meeting that was held recently, prospects for increased production are not good.

One thing this new government has in its favour, I think, is that the wheat we have to sell now from this year's production is a more acceptable product to the European countries, particularly Great Britain. The protein content is up. I have seen press reports—although I have not one here with me—to indicate that British millers have indicated that they think this new 1957 crop should be easier to sell.

Mr. Benidickson: May I ask the hon. member a question?

Mr. Olson: Yes.

Mr. Benidickson: It is in relation to his constituency flour mill. I also have a flour mill in Keewatin. I was going to ask the hon. member if he had ever been informed that it was difficult to obtain for the domestic mill wheat of sufficiently high protein content to justify full-time milling.

Mr. Olson: Yes. I think that has been the case in the past. However, my information now is that since the new crop has come in, it has overcome this problem.

Mr. Benidickson: I was referring to past years.

Mr. Olson: One other thing we must remember is that the Canadian wheat board is the sole selling agency for the wheat in western Canada. Because of that fact I think it is only reasonable that the farmers in western Canada should expect the Canadian wheat board policies and the policies set up by this government for them to follow to be the best trade practices. Along that line I should like to make a suggestion, and it is this. All selling agencies, regardless of what they are selling, usually have stocks of their product where they are most easily accessible to the purchasers. I think that he should take into consideration storage in Europe and in other countries where our customers are. For the immediate picture, I think perhaps he could take into consideration offering our wheat on consignment to fill whatever unused storage there is in these areas at the moment. Then the customers could pay for this wheat as it is used. The hon. member for Cariboo some days ago suggested that we build some storage in England and in some other countries and I think this is a good idea. Perhaps immediately we could look into the matter and see how much unused storage there is there now and offer our wheat into that storage space until such time as perhaps we can get around these currency difficulties and so on. I think it would be a great deal better if we put this high quality food into this storage space. Whether they can get paid for it immediately or not, it would be better than to have it spoil in outdoor piles on the farms.

I should like to associate myself also with the remarks of the hon. member for Macleod to the effect that the time has come when we should stop complaining about the United States trade policy with regard to agricultural products. Frankly, Mr. Chairman, I do not believe that Mr. Benson has any intention of changing this policy. I think we should stop complaining. As long as we are going along with this horse and buggy policy we should not complain about the United States if they go by us with some new policy which is more fitted to modern requirements.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I should like to deal briefly with the gas and oil export problem. To begin with, I should like to refer to some newspaper articles to give members of this committee some idea of what our customers, or potential customers are thinking. This quotation is taken from the Fargo Forum, North Dakota, and it says:

> The Canadian government apparently has killed, at least for several years, the possibility that Fargo-Moorhead and other cities in the Red river valley will get natural gas from Canada.

The report goes on to say that the attitude of the Canadian government—> —has been interpreted as an invitation to the United States federal power commission to turn down the application of Midwestern Gas Transmission Company for permission to build a natural gas transmission line from the Canadian border.

Then the writer of this article goes on to say:

> Diefenbaker's statement was vague. He didn't actually block the export of gas from Canada, but he created conditions which put the federal power commission on the spot.
> The Winnipeg Free Press believes he was deliberately vague and left it up to the federal power commission to deliver the knock-out blow because that won't put the Canadian government on the spot with voters in Alberta.

Further on in this report it says, and I quote:

> But it doesn't appear as if North Dakota fields will serve the valley, at least for several years, because a sufficient supply has not been discovered.
> Northern Natural Gas Transmission Company of Omaha has announced future plans for serving the Red river valley with gas from the southwest.

Mr. Chairman, this delayed action policy in the eyes of the people who are most concerned, namely our customers for this gas, is no good because they are not going to wait for a year, or two years, or for whatever time may be required by this government to give the signal to go ahead. They are looking to other places for supplies of fuel and while we wait on some power commission or energy commission we are going to lose these markets.

Here is another quotation taken from the Lethbridge Herald dated Washington, November 27:

> Francis L. Hall of the federal power commission during the current hearing of an application by an American pipe line, Midwestern Gas Transportation Company, for permission to import gas from Trans-Canada.

Later, the writer says:

> Failure of the Canadian authorities to act timely and definitely may well cause the power commission to consider that the Midwestern and Tennessee applications have reached the end of the road.

Mr. Smith (Calgary South): Mr. Chairman, I rise on a point of order. I certainly have no objection to such a discussion as this. In fact, I should like to think that there would be some opportunity for a discussion on the question of gas export. But I should like to ask your ruling whether it is in order now to discuss a problem which is presently under consideration by a royal commission, and to have an assurance that if this is in order other hon. members will have an opportunity along the same lines.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): I would ask the minister if this matter of exported gas comes under his department?

Mr. Churchill: The issuing of export licences for the export of gas does come under this department.

Mr. Benidickson: Also the Pipe Line Act.

Mr. Johnston (Bow River): On a point of order, Mr. Chairman, it does not make any difference whether this matter is being heard before a royal commission or not. We are not discussing the evidence placed before a royal commission. What we are discussing here is the over-all picture of trade between Canada and the United States, and if oil or natural gas happens to come into that, the question of a royal commission would not affect the issue; it must be perfectly in order.

Mr. Benidickson: We cannot find out yet when the royal commission is going to begin its sittings.

Mr. Olson: The point I am trying to bring out with regard to gas exports is that by reason of this royal commission being set up to look into this matter we are losing our markets. I should like to read a paragraph from another news report which also appeared in the Lethbridge Herald under the date November 25. This article is headed: "The Time for Gas Export is Now." It reads:

"Canadian operators," Mr. Loughney said—

Mr. Loughney is senior vice president of British American Oil Company Limited.

—"have gone through many years of developing gas reserves in order to keep alive. Just as the farmer must sell his grain, so must the oil producer sell his production, both oil and gas—it is as simple as that."

In order to make saleable gas from wet-gas fields and solution gas, multi-million-dollar plants were being constructed or planned, and they would produce tremendous volumes of sulphur, propane, butane, natural gasoline and condensate.

High octane gasoline, raw material for synthetic rubber, explosives, synthetic yarn, fertilizer, plastics and many other things could be manufactured in petro-chemical plants.

There was already in Edmonton the nucleus of a petro-chemical industry from natural gas and, as the result of gas, new industries had been announced or were being studied.

With regard to the depressed state of the crude oil industry in Alberta, by which I mean the state of markets for this oil, I should like to read this extract taken from the Montreal Gazette of December 6, under a Calgary dateline:

K. E. Hill, vice-president of New York's Chase Manhattan Bank, said in an address to Calgary oilmen here:

Crude from western Canada cannot be laid down in Montreal at a price competitive with Venezuelan crude, he said. Canadian producers, he added, should look to the northern United States instead for new markets.

The banker said the depressed tanker rates, which are helping to restrict Canadian oil sales on both the Pacific and Atlantic seaboards will remain in effect for at least the next five years.

Mr. Chairman, I submit that if something does not happen soon to give some impetus to the gas and oil operations in western Canada to continue their development and their explorations for gas and oil we are going to find ourselves in a serious unemployment situation out there. We have a market for this gas in the United States, and we have the gas. The only stumbling block in the way is the federal government. The oil and gas industry is ready to develop. It is ready to build the pipe line, and ready to search for more gas. Prominent operators have indicated that the reserves of natural gas which have been found up to the present in Alberta are only a fraction of the total supply, that the surface has only been scratched. I think they have now reached the stage when they need some inducement to develop further.

In my opinion this royal commission is nothing more than a stumbling block in the way of that development. We have before us an application for a natural gas pipe line from Alberta to California and to many other large markets in the United States Pacific northwest but all of these opportunities apparently are going to have to be set aside while a royal commission makes its investigation. As a matter of fact, I am not quite sure what the commission is going to study but it is clear that until this government gives the green light to the export permits or at least indicates what it is going to do, the gas and oil industry of Alberta is certainly going to suffer.

Mr. Lavigne: Mr. Chairman, the reason I am taking part in this debate is because I am worried about the future of our textile industry. When I see the name of more than one of our own big textile producers going out on a buying mission abroad I feel I have good cause to concern myself with the results of this because it may have a very bad effect on many of our citizens.

I hope to make it clear that I do not wish to be too critical of this mission until we find out what they really have achieved. I believe that the obligation of the government to the people of Canada is not to sponsor buying missions abroad but rather to seek to encourage the establishment of industry in Canada and I hope that this mission may stir up sufficient interest in our markets to induce some industries to establish branches in Canada. It has happened before in our own community when Courtaulds (Canada) Limited, a British firm, finding a market for its products in Canada established itself in Cornwall and gave security and employment to many thousands of people when you consider all the people employed in supplying their raw materials and other services.

Our municipalities and provinces are spending much money in advertising and promotion in order to attract new industries to their areas. It offers no encouragement to domestic industries to establish themselves in Canada if the government is going to invite and encourage competition which Canadian industries may not be able to meet. It is a case of this government defeating the efforts of our provincial and municipal governments. Competition may be a good thing but this is true only when it is on even terms. We are enjoying a certain standard of living in Canada and I cannot believe that we are in favour of lowering this standard but if we are to meet the competition of low-wage countries we are bound to lower our standard of living which has risen considerably since the former government took office in 1935.

I remember the time when some of our textile companies were operating only 24 hours a week but today they are operating 24 hours a day, five, six or seven days a week. I hope this government will not turn us back to the condition that existed in those years when our textile industry was down to its lowest ebb by bringing in unfair competition even though it comes from a country which we would all like to help. I believe our first obligation is to our own people. If we want to encourage industries to come in from other countries of the commonwealth the first step would be to encourage them to establish themselves in Canada and use some of our Canadian raw materials.

Mr. Morris: Mr. Chairman, several of the remarks made this morning just prior to the recess by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton seem to me to require an amplification from some representative member of this house who comes from one of the great Canadian seaports.

In my constituency there is a great and growing interest in the prosperity of the Canadian trade delegation in the United Kingdom and in the results not only of its venture abroad but also of the broad trade policy of the new administration. I was interested to hear this afternoon the remarks made by the hon. member for Mount Royal who said that some people had referred to the Canadian trade mission as a junket and if I understood him correctly he went on to say that he would not be so unkind as to refer to it as such, more than once. As a new member I have been impressed throughout this session by the ferocity of Liberal attacks upon the government outside this chamber and the relative decorum with which some of the Liberal party spokesmen conduct themselves inside the house.

Whereas the hon. member for Mount Royal said he would not describe the trade mission as a junket, which is surely a term of derision, he is quoted in today's Montreal Gazette at page 23 as having said in a radio broadcast last night:

> Tory-inspired junket of Canadian businessmen touring Great Britain with the ostensible purpose of placing orders for British goods.

He then went on to say that he thought it inevitable that purchases made in Britain would be at the expense of Canadian manufacturers. I hope to show in a few moments that this is not a policy or program but merely a whine.

The water-borne cargo tonnage which passed through the port of Hailfax based on tons of 2,000 pounds or 40 cubic feet shows a slow increase in the amount of foreign waterborne traffic but an almost stationary total in domestic export traffic. In 1956 the inward water-borne cargo tonnage into the port of Halifax amounted to nearly 3 million tons and the outward to 2,300,000 tons a total of 5,183,001 tons. The domestic water-borne cargo tonnage in 1956 was 232,612 inward, 1,435,283 outward or a total of 1,667,895. While foreign water-borne cargo tonnages have nearly more than doubled since 1952 through the port of Halifax, domestic tonnage has barely increased. With the unanimous consent of the committee, Mr. Chairman, I should like to include in the Hansard record of my remarks today a table showing the water-borne cargo tonnage through the port of Halifax, both foreign and domestic, covering the period 1952 to 1956.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): May I ask what is the source of the material contained in the table?

Mr. Morris: The annual report of the national harbours board.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Has the hon. member leave to place this table in Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Morris: The table is as follows:

Port of Halifax—Waterborne Cargo Tonnage
(Basis: tons of 2,000 pounds or 40 cu. ft.)

	Inward	Outward	Total
Foreign
1956	2,907,904	2,281,097	5,183,001
1955	2,340,236	1,732,163	4,072,399
1954	2,048,550	664,666	2,713,216
1953	2,161,694	840,731	3,002,425
1952	2,171,826	823,863	2,995,689
Domestic
1956	232,612	1,435,283	1,667,895
1955	395,763	1,150,907	1,546,670
1954	306,795	949,806	1,255,881
1953	329,701	1,070,590	1,400,291
1952	406,958	1,143,355	1,550,313

(Note: Does not include non-revenue ballast, bunkers, ships' stores, mail or passengers' baggage.)

Thus while our domestic waterborne cargo tonnage through the port of Halifax is just about stationary, export tonnage is increasing. This is not opinion but fact. What is it that keeps Halifax and other great Canadian seaports alive and busy, the waterfront workers with full pay envelopes? It is surely not domestic cargo tonnage, it is export tonnage.

In Halifax we have three miles of berthing in 23 deep-sea berths and seven coastal berths. We have 18 transit sheds with 1,306,000 square feet of floor area. We have a grain elevator with a capacity of over four million bushels and a loading capacity of 75,000 bushels an hour.

We on this side of the house often hear criticism from opposition members that the government is not finding markets for Canadian produce, including wheat. How can we be criticized for not doing something the doing of which also brings us criticism?

While we have all this cargo capacity in Halifax, the number of vessel arrivals and departures in the last six years of Liberal government was steadily downward. In 1952, there were 3,122 vessel arrivals in Halfiax; in 1953, 3,076; in 1954, 2,922; in 1955, 2,946; and in 1956, 2,887, down from 3,122 in 1952. Vessel departures show a corresponding decrease. This situation has also been true of the port of Saint John. In 1956, 1,608 vessels arrived in Saint John harbour. In 1952 the corresponding figure was 1,834. Last year the tonnage of water-borne cargo handled in Saint John was just over 2½ million tons, half of that of Halifax, but the domestic water-borne tonnage in Saint John was only 507,000 tons, only one-third that of Halifax, so that Saint John has at least a corresponding interest in the development of United Kingdom import trade.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): Hear hear.

Mr. Morris: Mr. Chairman, in 1953 we in Canada imported from the United States $3,221,214,000 worth of goods. By 1955, this had risen to $3,452,178,000. In the same years we imported from the United Kingdom $453,391,000 worth of goods in 1953 and $400,531,000 worth in 1955. Thus, while our imports from the United States continued to grow the corresponding dollar total from the United Kingdom slowly declined. Our exports to the United States in 1953 were nearly $2½ billion; in 1955, just over $2½ billion. For the United Kingdom the figures are $665 million in 1953 and $769 million in 1955. The average of domestic exports, based on 1935-1939 dollars, to the United States during those years was $321 million. This has now increased more than 10 times in dollar value; but the average of 1935-1939 exports to the United Kingdom of $353 million has barely doubled. Thus while exports to the United States have multiplied eight to ten times, those to the United Kingdom have barely doubled.

What is the relationship in percentage terms of our import and export trade, Mr. Chairman? In 1886, the United Kingdom claimed 40.7 per cent of the total Canadian import dollar trade. In the same year the United States had 44.6 per cent of the Canadian import market.

In 1896, when Sir Wilfrid Laurier ascended to power, that total of the United Kingdom share of the Canadian import market declined to 31.2 per cent, while the United States percentage rose to 50.8 per cent. In 1926, by the time Mackenzie King had come to power, the United Kingdom percentage had declined still further to 16.3 per cent and the United States percentage had risen again, this time to 66.3 per cent. In 1955, the United Kingdom could claim only 8½ per cent of the Canadian import dollar total, while the United States had 73.3 per cent.

Our export results show an interesting contrast. In 1886, we exported 47.2 per cent of our dollar total to the United Kingdom and 44.1 per cent to the United States. In 1955, we exported 18 per cent to the United Kingdom and 59.8 per cent to the United States. Thus, as the United States percentage share of the Canadian import dollar total has risen to 73.3 per cent from 44.6 per cent in 1886, the export total has risen only from 44.1 per cent to 59.8 per cent.

Our trade deficit with the United States in 1949 was $601 million. By 1956 it had risen to $1,659,000,000, nearly three times in seven calendar years. In 1953, the now opposition promised Canadians that they would use every available means to maintain and expand Canada's external trade. They did not differentiate between the United States and the United Kingdom; they said they would expand trade. The sum of this promise was a minus balance of payment last year of nearly $1,400,000,000.

In the report of the Minister of National Revenue on customs and excise, individual income tax and old age security tax results for the fiscal year ended March 31 last, there are interesting possibilities of clarification of the results of the inadequacy of external trade with the United Kingdom. Under the late administration, customs and excise collections, which would include import duties, sales tax and other excise taxes, in the port of Halifax, amounted to $17,401,405.44; whereas individual income tax and old age security tax collections amounted to $19½ million, despite the fact that the then administration was collecting individual income taxes and old age security taxes in the four maritime provinces with the seventh, eighth, ninth and tenth lowest average incomes in the country at that time.

In Saint John, New Brunswick, customs and excise collections were just over $11 million; whereas individual income taxes and old age security taxes were nearly $19½ million. Compare this with Montreal where customs and excise collections were over $588 million, double the income tax and old age security tax collections of $287 million. When you arrive on the west coast you see a repetition of the east coast position. Once again customs and excise collections were below income tax and old age security tax collections; in Vancouver, $88½ million compared with $138½ million, and in Victoria, $10½ million compared with $22½ million. I ask for the unanimous consent of the committee, Mr. Chairman, to place upon Hansard a table derived from the report of the Minister of National Revenue dealing with customs, excise, individual income tax and old age security tax collections at four ports and three other ports of entry.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Has the hon. member leave to put this table on Hansard?

Mr. Marler: What is the source?

Mr. Morris: The report of the Minister of National Revenue for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1957 and it deals with customs, excise, individual income tax and old age security tax collections. It is a public document.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Is it agreed?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

[Mr. Morris.]

Mr. Morris: The table follows:

	Customs-Excise	Individual Income Tax Old Age Security Tax
Halifax	$ 17,401,405.44	$ 19,387,908.41
St. John's	8,564,864.00	14,250,227.88
Saint John	11,213,573.84	19,573,361.84
Montreal	588,066,108.19	287,422,584.58
Toronto	371,636,137.33	387,059,233.89
Windsor	79,250,615.33	28,576,485.05
Vancouver	88,712,766.97	138,540,265.30
Victoria	10,533,666.80	22,508,986.78

Customs-Excise includes imports duties, sales tax, other excise taxes, excise duties and sundry collections.

Chart for fiscal year ended March 31, 1957.

We are vitally concerned, Mr. Chairman, with the expansion of United Kingdom trade in the Atlantic provinces. We are concerned with the expansion of this trade because we are concerned with the development of our ports and the ancillary services that go in and out of those ports. An increase in United Kingdom import trade would mean more work for our docks and dockers, more work for our longshoremen and shipping companies and more work for rail and truck lines leading in and out of our great ports. We are not unmindful of the great value of neighbourliness and trading with the United States. We are concerned with the impact upon our ports and their workers of having concentrated over a long history too much of our trading dollar in one trading basket.

Mr. Tucker: Mr. Chairman, I realize that Saturday afternoon is not a very good time to indulge in discussing what I am about to deal with, but I am very glad that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is here and that he is about to return to Great Britain because I think this is a good time to talk to him particularly. In his speech he referred to the fact that it was not the intention of the present government to interfere with our profitable trade with other countries. Then he went on to indicate that our trade with the United States had grown to such a level that it made the situation rather lopsided. Then he indicated that he endorsed the idea of the Prime Minister that we should seek to switch around $600 million of our purchases in the United States to the United Kingdom and that the mission to Great Britain of which he is the head is designed to further that objective.

I take it that a fair inference from what he said is that it is the intention of the government at the present time to seek to rectify the lopsided situation about which he spoke by persuasion rather than by the method adopted by the previous Conservative government of imposing tariffs against the United States and giving preferences to commonwealth countries and that it is sought to do the same thing now by persuasion because the results of trying to do it by tariffs in the early thirties were very disastrous for this country. I doubt very much if anything like the objective the Prime Minister had in mind will be attained by persuasion under existing circumstances with the United Kingdom so busy meeting demands on it already, with that country having a condition of relatively full employment, and with a situation beginning to develop in the United States that will result in that country seeking markets even more in the days and years ahead than she has in the past and attempting to dispose of her products on the markets of the world to a greater extent than ever before.

I am quite sure that this is going to give rise to a demand that again we seek to divert trade by tarriffs, controls on imports and various other means of interfering with trade. After the experience of the world in doing this in the thirties many economists and leaders of public opinion throughout the world expressed the view that never again should we return to this business of each country trying to live by itself alone and seeking to export its unemployment because it was realized that the results of that policy had proved disastrous in the thirties. Many people are of the opinion that if it had not been for the high tariff policy of the United States, the Hawley-Smoot and Fordney-McCumber tariff policies, which prevented countries like Germany from shipping their goods into that market and buying the food products they needed, high tariffs would not have been imposed upon export of wheat and other products into the European markets and the great unemployment that arose in those European countries would not have developed.

It is believed that there was a time when the popularity of Hitler before he came to power was beginning to decrease but because of the tremendous rise in unemployment in Germany Hitler, with his appeal to narrow nationalism, became chancellor of Germany, and that the narrow nationalistic attitude taken by the most powerful country in the world had contributed to the rise of Hitler to power and so ultimately to the second world war. I think it was because of some realization of that that the nations of the world agreed to set up the general agreement on tariffs and trade and to take the attitude that in the future they would try to avoid the mistakes of the thirties.

I can see that as we go into a period of levelling off in economic activity following the great demand for goods which was part of the aftermath of the war there is going to be a demand that we repeat all over again the mistakes that were made in the early thirties. There is going to be a demand for tariff protection in the various countries of the world and particularly there is going to be a demand for tariff protection with respect to the vast areas of the Far East.

I think it is axiomatic and accepted that if trade does not cross frontiers armies ultimately will, and if we have not learned that lesson from the costly experience of the past it is a most unfortunate thing because surely the attitude of all western governments today should be devoted towards promoting more and more trade which will advance not only the economic well-being of the peoples of the world but contribute to world peace.

One thing I was very sorry to see happen was that when our Prime Minister made his suggestion about diverting trade the United Kingdom government, realizing that no amount of persuasion, no amount of good will or no amount of anything of that sort would necessarily prevail to operate against, and to offset, economic factors, suggested that Canada consider entering into a free trade arrangement with the United Kingdom looking towards ultimate free trade with that country over a period of 12 to 15 years. If the government of Canada had really wanted to promote trade with Great Britain in a way that would be effective, it seems to me they would have immediately said that their attitude was that they thought this proposal was a very constructive one and they would have set up a group whose business it would have been to look into this question with a view to seeing what could be done about it.

When I think of the situation in the Atlantic community today, it reminds me very much of the situation that faced the American colonies before they formed the United States of America. The various colonies had competing interests and the suggestion was that if they went together it would interfere with their individual economic well-being. I think everybody in the house today will admit that if they had taken a narrow attitude and not joined together to ultimately set up the greatest free trade area in the world, the United States would not have had the great development she has had. One great advantage she has had has been that within the United States she has the greatest consuming area of any nation in the world. On the basis of this she has been able to build up the great industrial and economic strength she has today. If the tariff barriers between the various colonies had not been removed by the formation of the United States, I do not think anyone would believe they would have had the development they have had.

Some time ago the North Atlantic Treaty Organization was formed. It was designed to form an Atlantic community in the western world. We recognized the possibility and necessity, through the formation of this organization, for co-operation amongst the free nations. The member nations of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization agreed, under article 2, as follows:

> The parties will contribute toward the further development of peaceful and friendly international relations by strengthening their free institutions, by bringing about a better understanding of the principles upon which these institutions are founded, and by promoting conditions of stability and well-being. They will seek to eliminate conflict in their international economic policies and will encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them.

It seems to me that pursuant to that definite agreement between the North Atlantic Treaty nations we should impress every member with the importance of promoting economic collaboration between all members of the organization, including the United States and the United Kingdom. The importance of such co-operation is recognized now in Europe. In spite of all their past rivalries, in spite of all their past troubles, the peoples of Europe are moving towards free trade between themselves. Most people would have thought it impossible that these people, with the background of their history, could have thought of having a common market between them. It seems to many observers that they are moving steadily and surely towards a common market for the peoples of western Europe.

What is Canada's response going to be in this matter? We have not the great consuming area the United States has. Here is a possibility of entering such an area. If a great economic free trade area in Europe is set up and we enter into some agreement with the United Kingdom, ultimately we would share in the benefits of the great consuming area of western Europe. It would put us in a position to make possible industrial and other development.

I suggest to the Minister of Trade and Commerce that there comes a time when people have either got to go forward into the future or back and go through the difficulties of the past. We are now moving out of the period we went through during and following the second world war. Are we going to benefit by this experience? If we realize we have to live together as nations we should move towards freer trade, otherwise we are going to make the same mistakes all over again.

It seems to me this government should have followed the role that has been followed by the Canadian government over the last 20 years. We were one of the main proponents and originators of GATT, the general agreement on tariffs and trade. It was our government that was one of the originators of NATO. Our government has always tried to stand for an extension of trade, for the opening up of markets. This, of course was the basis upon which we could hope for real development.

I do hope that when the Minister of Trade and Commerce goes back to Great Britain he will realize that if he is going to do what he should do as a representative of the Canadian government in the matter of trade he has to do more than go around trying to place orders with British industries. He has to take a constructive attitude towards this most imaginative proposal of the British government. If he does that, then we are taking a step forward by which there is some real hope for the western world and for us.

I wish to say a word or two about our wheat situation. I suggest that this is all part of the same picture. Undoubtedly the United States is following a policy of getting rid of her billion bushel surplus of wheat by any means necessary. Some of the members may have seen a series of articles written by Jack Stepler of the Herald's London bureau published in the Calgary Herald. He says in one of these articles that he has discussed the situation as he found it on a trip around western Europe with the Minister of Trade and Commerce. I believe most members would find these articles very informative and very interesting. He went over there to find out what the situation was with regard to our disposal of wheat. One of the things he says, and I think most of us will agree, is that there is nothing wrong with our marketing machinery. Wherever he went he saw evidence of the good work being done by the wheat board, the good work being done by our trade commissioners and by everybody concerned with disposing of Canadian wheat. The trouble they were running into was the subsidies and the various policies of the United States government which was determined, at all costs, to get rid of its surplus wheat. In the article which appeared in the Calgary Herald of November 20, he says this:

> A remark by the official in charge of Polish grain imports, made at a cocktail party in Warsaw, was a sharp and cogent introduction to the chief problem facing Canadian wheat exports to Europe.
> "We buy from the United States because they sell cheapest and give us 20 to 25 years to pay."
>
> Long-term U.S. credits, barters, price-slashing, subsidized sales and "gifts" linked with international power politics—coupled with strong pressure of the Washington wheat lobby to get rid of U.S. surplus stocks at any cost—are methods by which the United States has upset the world wheat market to the detriment of Canadian farmers and has invaded in recent years markets which have been traditionally Canadian.
> The policy has been one which has been costly, because while the U.S. has maintained a high price to the U.S. farmer it has sold abroad at considerably lower prices. The U.S. taxpayer has footed the bill.

He goes on to say:

They admit the Canadian farmer has been the sufferer. But they commend Canadian determination to avert the chaos which would result from a Canadian move to undercut the U.S.

They have bought U.S. wheat at lower prices, on credits and in barter deals because even nations cannot afford to look gift horses in the mouth. But lower prices have brought the U.S. lower prestige in world markets and with them fear of the consequences of a price war spreading.

It has been said by the previous government and by this government that we cannot enter into competition with the United States, with their great economic power, in these give-away policies. The United States, apparently encouraged by that attitude that we cannot undertake to compete with them successfully, are following a policy designed simply to get rid of their surplus, regardless of its effects upon their closest ally, Canada.

I have an article which appeared in the Financial Post of November 23 and which indicates that because it was said that the barter deals were the most effective way in which to get rid of wheat, there is now a real pressure on in the United States to have a policy of barter deals again. One official in Washington apparently told the Financial Post:

If your people in Canada had not talked so much about getting rid of the barter deals, there wouldn't have been all this trouble now.

It is forecast that legislation will be brought in at this coming session of congress to reintroduce barter deals. What does this mean to our Canadian farmer? He is in competition today not with other producers of wheat but with the treasuries of the various countries where is he trying to sell his wheat through subsidized competition within the consuming and subsidized exports by the United States.

Mr. Blackmore: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Tucker: When I am through, if you do not mind. Mr. Graham Spry agent-general for Saskatchewan in the United Kingdom is, I think, an acknowledged expert in these matters. He said this recently when he was visiting in Saskatchewan:

Subsidized agricultural exports are universal. The world wheat market is a taxpayers' market and the subsidy on competing wheats, in some instances, is higher than the average price per bushel to the farmer at his elevator point in western Canada.

Then he goes on to say this:

The United States, under barter arrangement, exports significant amounts of grain to countries to which Canada normally exports wheat. As important as the price-squeeze on prairie net farm income, is the squeeze through trade barriers erected by importing countries and subsidized sales by exporting countries. The problem of surplus disposal is not just a matter of salesmanship; it is much more a matter of negotiations between governments. Almost three-quarters of United States' exports last year came under provisions of public law 480 but, even in ordinary commercial transactions for the balance, prices to importers were subsidized. Dark and northern spring wheats had a subsidy of about eighty cents per bushel. France, Sweden, Turkey and Argentina all sold wheat in the world market at subsidized prices. The Canadian farmer and the Canadian wheat board are, as a result, competing with taxpayers in other countries, rather than competing with the producers.

If we get the Canadian farmer in the position where he is obliged to compete with people who are subsidized to the extent of as much as eighty cents a bushel, the question every Canadian, regardless of party, must be asking this government is this: "What are you going to do about it?" We are told that the actual net income of Saskatchewan farmers this year will be down 50 per cent from that of last year. I ask anybody who thinks about these matters what would happen if you were to say to the labouring force of Canada, "Your income is going to be cut by 50 per cent"?

Mr. Hahn: What are you dealing with?

Mr. Tucker: I am dealing with the situation as it is today. I deplore this idea of trying to play politics with this most important matter.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Cardiff: Imagine that remark coming from you.

Mr. Tucker: Maybe so, but I will tell you this. The people of Canada are not going to be satisfied with politics being played in this matter. They are going to want really constructive action and that is what I am trying to bring forward.

Mr. Bell (Carleton): That is why you are sitting over there.

Mr. Tucker: Yes; and it is probably why you will be sitting right outside of the house if you do not do something about it.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): We will be here long after you are gone.

Mr. Tucker: You people were elected on promises to deal with this problem and to solve it. We should like to see some evidence that you are going to do something about it. What have you done to date about this matter in addition to what was being done previously? You say that we cannot compete with the United States. Take, for example, what probably our farmers today, on the average, will get for their 1956-57 crop. They will receive about $1.29 on an average. If you put that in terms of dollar purchasing power of 20 years ago, that is less than 65 cents a bushel. No amount of bickering back and forth politically is going to do anything about this problem. It is a matter that the government of Canada, with the support of Canadians, must do something about.

An hon. Member: What do you suggest?

Mr. Tucker: What I am going to suggest is this. I suggest going back to the principles of the North Atlantic Treaty Organization. As Mr. Spry says, it is something that must be dealt with by government. There is no use in sending delegations to Washington to talk to officials there and persuade them that we are being mistreated, that the wrong steps are being taken when Congress will immediately turn around and say, "We are responsible only to our constituents. If it is a good thing for us to subsidize them to the extent of seventy cents or eighty cents a bushel and to dump our wheat on the markets of the world, we will do it. After all, let the Canadian government look after its people."

This is the sort of thing that goes contrary to the agreement laid down by NATO. What I am suggesting to the government of the day is that the time has come when the western world must realize that it must stick together economically as well as in a military sense. They cannot begin to say to Canada, "We expect you to support us 100 per cent if it is a matter of fighting but not in anything else; if we take steps whereby your whole economy is disrupted, that is not of interest to us". I suggest that the time has come when the members of the Atlantic community must realize that they must work together economically as well as militarily. I suggest that the time has come when our Canadian government must say to the United States government particularly, "Here is the treaty which you signed, we want you to pay more than lip service to this treaty; we want you to live up to it; we want you to take the necessary steps to see to it that, in the words of this treaty, you are doing what you can to eliminate conflict in international economic policies and to encourage economic collaboration between any or all of them."

If we have not the economic strength to keep our producers from being driven to a position where they cannot get along at all and the United States, because of their great economic strength, are doing that, it seems to me it is time that the government says to the United States government: we have taken the attitude up to now that we cannot engage in any price war with you. We, in effect are maintaining the world price for wheat under which, by your policies, you are managing to sell a good deal more wheat than you had in previous years. But this cannot go on indefinitely. If you are not prepared to come to some agreement whereby this matter is dealt with in a fair way between nations we shall be forced, economically and financially weak comparatively as we are, to embark on some similar policy. They know that if ever Canada takes that attitude it will bring about complete and utter chaos in the marketing of wheat in the world. Then perhaps the United States government, realizing that we mean business, will act accordingly.

The situation is the same as that with regard to the St. Lawrence seaway where we took the attitude, "We want you to come in with us". But nothing happened until we said to the United States government, "Whether you come in with us or not, we are going to build it". Then they came in with us.

I think the time has come, Mr. Chairman, when we have got to tell the United States government that we must protect our own consumers; that, if necessary we are going to do something about it. They will know that if we did as they are doing this would introduce chaos into world wheat markets as far as the allies of the United States are concerned, and if this happens with regard to wheat, what will happen with regard to meat products and all the rest of it? If the United States cares anything about the economy and the well-being of the western world they will listen to suggestions that we are bound to take action if they do not agree to a fair policy toward us.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): You should have said that before June 10. It is too late now.

Mr. Tucker: I hope it is not too late. It is a serious indictment of your own government that you do not think you can do anything about it.

Mr. Bell (Saint John-Albert): You should have made that speech a year ago.

Mr. Tucker: I was asked by a member on the other side what I suggest we should do. I see, by now, that you are not doing anything to solve the terrible situation affecting the purchasing power of our western Canadian farmers. As far as I can see, absolutely nothing has been done. All you have done is make big promises, but I do not see anything on the order paper which means anything but window dressing, and it looks to me as if a lot of people in Canada are beginning to think that you want to go to the country before the people realize that it is window dressing and only words.

An hon. Member: Your party would not have allowed you to make a speech like that a year ago.

Mr. Tucker: The time comes when a government has to act or else let things go entirely to pieces, and surely the situation in this regard has developed into a crisis more acute than at any time in the past. We have had promises and assurances from the United States that they would not do anything to interfere with our markets, but what action have they taken? Now we have the right to ask them to live up to these assurances. We have the right to ask this under the NATO treaty which they signed, and if they do not live up to these undertakings we will have to take steps to protect our own people, and they in the United States will know what that means. We can tell them we will be forced to take action under which their policy will not work nearly as well when we are not holding an umbrella over the situation.

If they know that we are obliged to act, and that we will act then, I think, they would follow, and as happened in the case of the St. Lawrence waterway they will decide to get together with us in the spirit of the great North Atlantic Treaty Organization treaty and do something to help solve this problem as allies, neighbours and friends who have the future of freedom in their hands and who will be responsible either for seeing that action will be taken to preserve what is left of freedom in the world, or that each nation will follow a separate, selfish policy and endanger the solidarity upon which alone the future of the western world and freedom can be preserved.

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, there may be others who would like to speak on the first item of these estimates, but I think that in view of the time element and the fact that I may be away for a few days I should say something from this side and answer some of the questions which have been raised.

Eighteen members have already spoken, so there has been a fairly extensive debate, but I do not wish to curtail the discussion in any way whatsoever. I should like to thank those who have spoken up to this point. Many of the speeches have been quite complimentary, and I have accepted the bouquets and also the brickbats, which I am not going to hurl back. I sat long enough in the opposition to know that it is the function of the opposition to offer criticism of the government, and the function of the government to offer a defence. That is parliamentary practice as I understand it, and a great deal of what has been said today, and of what was said yesterday, has been in the nature of constructive criticism and I accept it as such. Some of the criticism has been founded on misconceptions, but nevertheless it is the function of the opposition to offer suggestions and criticism and I believe the government has a good defence with regard to the criticism that has been put forward.

Just by way of a preliminary—and I do not propose to deal with each hon. member who spoke because there were so many—the hon. member for Trinity-Conception lamented the fact that I had not given a forecast of Canada's trading position as done by my predecessor when he introduced the estimates of his department. But the hon. member for Trinity-Conception failed to look back in Hansard at the report of this debate last year or he would have discovered that no forecast was made at that time. Other hon. members said my remarks were too brief. They, too, omitted to look back at Hansard of a year ago in which they would see that the remarks of my predecessor occupied only five and a half columns whereas my remarks occupy eight and a half.

Mr. Benidickson: Surely the minister will recognize that when his predecessor introduced these estimates he pointed out that it was the end of a long session and that he had already made a long speech on trade and trade prospects.

Mr. Churchill: Nevertheless, it follows that he did not mention all the subjects which come under the Department of Trade and Commerce. Some hon. members did mention subjects which come under the department, and pointed out that I had not dealt with them. There was particular reference to an omission with regard to the wheat problem. Nothing with regard to wheat was discussed last year, and some hon. members who spoke at length on the wheat problem today did not open their mouths with regard to it last year. However, that does not concern me in the least. I would willingly discuss any of these subjects, I am quite prepared to discuss the wheat problem, and will say something about it this afternoon just as I did yesterday afternoon during the private members' hour.

Some members have suggested that I have not stated the policy of this government with regard to trade. There has not been an opportunity for me to make all the statements here that some members would like to have heard. This has been a fall session. We thought it was going to be a short session, but it may be a rather lengthy one. However, the opportunity to make these statements has not presented itself. Nevertheless I think the policy should be fairly clearly understood. This government is in favour of increasing Canada's trade. There is no doubt about that. This government—and I stated this at Geneva —favours remaining within the general agreement on tariffs and trade. We think that has been a good agreement and we are subscribing to it at the present time. With regard to other matters, this government thinks that steps should be taken toward increasing our trade within the commonwealth and diverting some of our purchases from the United States to the United Kingdom.

That, surely, is a distinct indication of the policy of this government. We do not want to see any restriction on trade. The hon. member for Rosthern was quoting from my statement just a few minutes ago in which I said we were not intending to interfere with trade with any country—again, a statement of policy—and he very fairly said this must mean that we are not intending to raise high tariff barriers.

With regard to increasing trade within the commonwealth several steps have already been taken. At the conference of prime ministers in London our Prime Minister raised the question concerning a commonwealth trade and economic conference. As a result of that imaginative point of view the finance ministers of the commonwealth assembled at Mont Tremblant to discuss whether or not there should be a trade and economic conference. That was the purpose of that gathering. There were some who doubted that agreement would be reached on that particular subject but by the time the conference was nearing its end there was unanimous agreement that a commonwealth trade and economic conference should be held next year. It is our hope that the conference may be held in Canada. Some of the preliminary steps for that conference will be undertaken early in the new year. That, I think, is an achievement with regard to fulfilling the statement of government policy.

There has been some misunderstanding with regard to the Mont Tremblant conference. I regret that my friend the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River and my friend the hon. member for Dauphin should have fallen into error with regard to this question but both of them have fallen into error. As reported at page 1974 of Hansard, the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River mentioned the trade proposal of the Mont Tremblant conference from the British delegates and the hon. member for Dauphin in speaking of the Mont Tremblant conference, as reported at page 1976 of Hansard, said:

> —an offer was made by the government of Great Britain through its representative, and the Canadian government absolutely ignored that offer.

There were various press comments in which it was said that the representatives of Great Britain had come fully prepared and that the Canadians had not done their homework. Of course, all of this is just utter nonsense. The Mont Tremblant conference was called for the express purpose of determining whether or not there should be a commonwealth trade and economic conference. That was the matter under discussion and it was decided upon. No offer was made by the British representatives at Mont Tremblant. A press conference was held and questions were asked of a distinguished visitor from Great Britain and answers were given that related to a free trade area as between the United Kingdom and Canada.

Mr. Benidickson: With our Minister of Finance present, I believe.

Mr. Churchill: The Minister of Finance was there; I was not. Had I been at the press conference and had those questions been asked of me I would have been compelled to say in truth that I had no knowledge of any such offer. The rumour goes around that this offer was made, the Canadians were unprepared for it and consequently it was rejected. I say that is utter and complete nonsense.

There was also a conference held at Wasnington and four of the cabinet ministers from Canada attended there. We had a two-day meeting of frank and free discussion and although there were many problems bothering the members of the United States cabinet at that particular time they stayed throughout the two-day conference. Again in this case we have had statements to the effect that nothing was accomplished there yet anyone who understands the different constitutions of Canada and the United States would know that documents could not be signed under the circumstances. However assurances could be given and were given and the one in which I was chiefly interested and on which I still place reliance was the assurance that the United States in its surplus disposal program would not continue its barter deals which interfered so much with the sale of Canadian wheat last year.

Mr. Stick: Mr. Chairman, I do not want to interrupt the minister but he spoke about assurances that were given in Washington. Does the minister have those assurances in writing or were they just verbal assurances?

Mr. Churchill: Verbal assurance was given but it also appeared in the communique and it was the first public assurance that was given as to the restrictive measures placed on the former barter disposal program.

I have not at any time objected to the United States disposal program other than in that field and also with regard to the heavy subsidization of flour. I think the United States deserves credit in its surplus disposal program for its generous treatment with regard to a great number of countries in this world which require food. I can see no objection whatsoever to the gifts that the United States has made to India, Pakistan, Ceylon and other countries throughout the world that are in need of food. There has been no interference there with the normal marketing of Canadian wheat.

The thing to which we raised an objection and which we will naturally watch closely was the barter deal for strategic materials and those barter deals occurred within those countries that are normally cash customers for Canadian wheat. The barter deals of a year ago resulted in the sale of United States wheat to normal cash customers for Canadian wheat in the amount of approximately 92 million bushels and we lost our fair share of that market for 92 million bushels of wheat. Certainly 22 million bushels of wheat would have been bought from Canadian sources by Great Britain had it not been for this type of barter deal. Of the 92 million bushels we might have had at least 50 million bushels and that would have brought our sale of Canadian wheat up to 300 million bushels which is the figure we would like to maintain over the years.

That is the situation with regard to the Washington conference and the barter and surplus disposal programs of the United States. I think it is wrong to say that we are objecting to the generous disposal program of the United States that is designed to aid people in need throughout the world.

Mr. McCullough: Would the minister permit a question? Is there any disagreement between the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Finance in regard to the United States disposal program?

Mr. Churchill: No disagreement at all. We understand this problem quite thoroughly. I am simply stating in perhaps more specific terms than appeared in some of the press reports the portion of the United States disposal program to which we raised objection and I have in my turn raised objection to their surplus disposal of flour under a subsidization scheme which has seriously interfered with the sale of Canadian flour in markets that had long been open to Canadian flour. Other than that I have not raised any objection.

Mr. Marler: Would the minister answer this question, Mr. Chairman? It seems to me that frequently during the election campaign the leader of the Conservative party asserted that the United States surplus disposal programs were a direct contravention of the general agreement on tariffs and trade. The attitude which the minister is adopting this afternoon is seemingly just the reverse of the attitude taken by his leader and I am wondering what distinction there is to be made between the very general assertions of the Prime Minister and these less positive assertions of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Do the surplus disposal programs contravene GATT or do they not?

Mr. Churchill: Mr. Chairman, we think that there has been some difficulty there with regard to GATT and when I was at the Geneva conference I mentioned our objection to the United States disposal program and particularly drew attention to the fact that commercial markets open to Canada for wheat had been interfered with by their methods. While I was at that conference the representatives of several other countries made similar remarks with regard to the United States program and the general impression was that the spirit, if not the letter, of GATT was interfered with.

Mr. Marler: It really was not a contravention?

Mr. Churchill: I have not pinned it down to an actual contravention of some particular article. I did not say so in my speech but I think the general spirit of GATT was contravened.

While I am speaking with regard to wheat may I say that the wheat program of the Canadian government has I think been made clear in answer to questions in this house and elsewhere. I think that some hon. members are overlooking the fact that the sale of our Canadian wheat is in the hands of the Canadian wheat board and is not the sole responsibility of whoever happens to be the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Benidickson: That is not what was said during the election campaign.

Mr. Churchill: The wheat board has certainly the direction of the sale of our wheat. Now, I think that a good vigorous selling campaign is under way. I went with representatives of the Canadian wheat board to the United Kingdom and to Europe in September and met with over 200 representatives of the grain trade in the countries there. They wanted one thing. In the first instance they wanted an assurance and this was what was mentioned by the hon. member for Rosthern, who has a good knowledge of these matters—that there would be no price war. They were holding back on their orders to see whether or not Canada was going to enter into a price war with the United States. I assured them that it was not our intention to enter into any such price war. We thought that stability in the trading in wheat internationally was the desirable factor. A price war is a matter of experience of the past, and when there was a price war in the sale of wheat on the international markets what happened? The price of wheat dropped to disastrous levels and the consumption of wheat over the world declined and nobody benefited. Therefore, I assured them on that point and since then things have been improving.

We discussed other matters during the course of that visit and I was assured by the representatives of the grain trade and by officials of the various governments that they wanted Canadian wheat. They are interested in the higher protein quality of our wheat of this year's crop. They wanted to deal with Canada and continue their dealings with Canada. All told it was a useful visit to the United Kingdom and to Europe.

At the time that we went there in September there was a pessimistic outlook with regard to our prospects of disposing of Canadian wheat. The situation has changed. As of December there is a feeling of optimism that we shall reach and perhaps surpass the objective that was mutually agreed upon, I would say, by the wheat board and myself in general discussions, an objective of 300 million bushels for export. The internal consumption, as I have said before, of feed, seed, and so on, amounts to 150 million bushels. The crop this year was about 350 million bushels, so we do dispose of 100 million bushels of the surplus that has been in the elevators during the course of this year.

Some hon. members will say that that is not enough, that we must sell it all at once which, of course, we cannot do. It just cannot be consumed all at once and it cannot be shipped all at once. The hon. member for Melville, who has had a long experience in this regard, said so this afternoon and he speaks with years of experience behind him. You can dispose of a certain amount of wheat but there has been a limit over the years in the amount of wheat that the world has consumed. As certain populations acquire a liking for flour more wheat may be consumed. In the more advanced countries there is a decline in the consumption of flour, therefore it begins to balance out. You cannot immediately dispose of the large surplus that is here in Canada; but an aggressive sales policy is being carried on and I am very hopeful that we shall exceed the objective of the export of 300 million bushels of wheat. That does not solve—

Mr. Quelch: What size of quota will this target permit?

Mr. Churchill: We raised that during the discussion of cash advances. It is certainly six, and it may be more.

What I am drawing attention to is the fact that there is an aggressive sales program going on. Hon. members have suggested that we accept local currencies for wheat. Well, that is equivalent to a loan. Actually, I do not see any difference between making a loan to a foreign country and accepting its local currency. If that appears to be a suitable method of disposing of wheat it might be adopted. Whether or not Canada considers that it should be done is a matter for consideration. The hon. member for Acadia, who makes very thoughtful speeches in this house I think quite properly said that if we are going to dispose of surplus production in this country we must make it possible for other countries less well endowed with wealth to purchase our surplus products. How else can we dispose of them? This brings you back, then, to his suggestion of a loan or accepting the local currencies. All these things I think should be very seriously considered because we are in this position. We have a surplus of wheat. There are countries in the world which are unable to buy our wheat and we have no desire to hold it back and have people go hungry. If ways and means can be found of transferring this Canadian wheat to hungry populations I do not know of anyone who will object.

Mr. Tucker: Mr. Chairman, I wonder whether the minister would deal a little further with the point that he made that the United States is subsidizing the export of their flour and what he said the other day, namely that we have had to cut our prices to meet that competition to our wheat by eight cents or nine cents a bushel. To what extent should the country bear the cost of meeting the subsidization by the United States treasury instead of leaving the burden on the farmers?

Mr. Churchill: It should not be a burden upon the producer, that is the farmer. I think there is an instance where a government, facing that type of competition from another government, must assist. I do not think the farmer should be the one who should carry that load when the circumstances are completely beyond his control. The same thing is true with regard to the storage problem. We have not objected to the policy introduced some years ago and which the hon. member for Melville mentioned this afternoon. There again the farmer should not be called upon to carry the entire burden.

Now that you have drawn my attention to it, may I comment on certain remarks made in the house by the hon. member for Assiniboia who unfortunately is absent. He referred to a press report in which I was reported to have said that the western farmer did not need a subsidy. I never did say anything like that at all. What I did say on that occasion was that it was to the credit of the western agriculturist that over all these years he has managed without being subsidized, and I said that fact was not understood by a great many people in this country. Well, I was reported in the other way and the matter was played up in a rather cheap political fashion.

Mr. Johnson (Kindersley): Does the minister mean that in all those years the farmers have in fact managed without a subsidy? Their financial position is a very critical one and is a reflection of their experience in previous years.

Mr. Churchill: The hon. member is trying to twist it again. I was paying a tribute to the individual initiative and citizenship of the western farmer. I was trying to point out that in other parts of Canada that was not fully appreciated. I think that agriculture requires assistance at the present time. The government has stated that fact time and time again and the introduction of the cash advance legislation this fall was an indication of our concern over the plight of the western farmer. Strangely enough that passed without notice by some of my hon. friends who were criticizing our policy the other day and today.

May I say a word or two now with regard to trade with the United States and then mention the trade mission now in the United Kingdom and the relationship between the two. We have been talking about diversion of purchases from the United States to the United Kingdom. It is not anti-Americanism and is not so designed. The trade between our two countries will always continue to be very large. We cannot move Canada off this continent, nor do we wish to set up any barrier against our friendly neighbours. But there is no need for us to have our entire trade with the United States, and that is the point we are rapidly reaching. With 73 per cent of our imports coming from one country there is an imbalance and we think that imbalance can be corrected in a natural way and without government interference.

We thought the natural way would be to encourage greater imports from the United Kingdom. It is a two-way street. Canada will benefit just as the United Kingdom will, and to my knowledge no one who lives in western Canada has raised any serious objection to the Canadian trade mission which has gone to the United Kingdom because we who live in that part of the country know so well that the more dollars that are earned by the United Kingdom the more opportunity there is for us to maintain our best market for Canadian wheat. The export of 100 million bushels a year over the years is the most stabilizing factor in our wheat economy, and there is the market, the United Kingdom. If dollars are available to the United Kingdom—

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Order. I am sorry to have to tell the Minister of Trade and Commerce that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Go ahead.

The Acting Chairman (Mr. Rea): Is it the wish of the committee that the minister continue?

Mr. Tucker: I will ask the minister a question and then he can go on for another 30 minutes. Before he concludes I hope he will say a word on how much money has been paid out under the cash advance policy. I do not want to interfere with what he is saying now but I would ask him to do that before he concludes.

Mr. Churchill: I do not have the figures with me for that but I think that can be answered when we come to the special item in the estimates with regard to the grain commissioners. I was saying that as the United Kingdom earns dollars there is a greater chance for the sale of Canadian surplus products in the United Kingdom. We want to regain our market there for lumber, fish, apples and other things which we used to sell to the United Kingdom in days gone by. The difficulty with the imbalance of our trade with the United States is simply that the United States does not require those very products in the way that the United Kingdom does because they grow their own. For so many years the United Kingdom was our best customer for wheat, lumber, apples and so on.

The mission to the United Kingdom has as its purpose the correction of this imbalance in our trade. There have been some misconceptions with regard to the mission. Some people think they are over there to interfere in some way with Canadian industry. That is not so. The members of the mission are sound and serious businessmen who are concerned with the future of Canada. The mission is interested in attempting to find in Great Britain those products which can be brought into Canada and take the place of things we are now buying from non-commonwealth countries. That is what they are doing. They are not there to see what can be imported from the United Kingdom in direct competition with the Canadian manufacturing industry or Canadian producers.

Mr. Benidickson: What will they do if they find such an item?

Mr. Churchill: On the other hand, trade is competitive and I suppose there may be—there has been, of course—competition between United Kingdom manufacturers and producers and Canadian manufacturers and producers. But the prime purpose of the mission is not that and it is incorrect to attempt to place emphasis on that.

Let me give hon. members a view from the United Kingdom itself with regard to the mission. Some hon. members have made a little fun of statements I have made with regard to the Canadian trade mission in the United Kingdom. That is all right. It is good parliamentary practice. I have indulged in it myself and I may again because I like a little political infighting from time to time. But at the present moment I will just give this comment rather than any of my own. I have here an article which appeared in the Globe and Mail of December 6. It is a Canadian Press dispatch from London which summarizes articles in the Manchester Guardian and reads in part as follows:

> The Guardian, in a leading editorial, says the mission's tour of British industrial centres, now in its second week, "has been approached by both sides with an enthusiasm and imagination that neither country, perhaps, really expected."
> In past editorials, the newspaper expressed doubts as to the purpose and possible results of the mission, fearing that the Canadians were more interested in selling their own products than in buying British goods. It had also taken a pessimistic attitude towards Britain's ability to satisfy Canadian customers with prompt deliveries and adequate servicing. But the Guardian now says there never was much doubt that Canadians would be glad to buy British goods, "provided they knew that we had the goods they wanted at the right price and at the right time."
> It urges British businessmen to follow up the Canadian visit by sending missions of similar calibre to Canada and to counter U.S. salesmanship with a more vigorous selling program of their own.

Now that, Mr. Chairman, is a more objective view of the purpose of the mission and the success it is achieving than I am able to give the house because I was there with the mission, and hope to return to it, and you may naturally think my views are a bit biased. The Manchester Guardian, which started out by being pessimistic with regard to the mission, has now changed its opinion and is urging British businessmen to take a greater interest in Canada. When people ask me what are the results of this mission I think they may be seen there in the comments of the Manchester Guardian. We will have an increase in trade between the United Kingdom and Canada, and without any doubt I think we will see British trade missions coming over to this country to see what they can buy from us, to see what they can establish in this country in the way of branch industries and so on. They are being better informed with regard to the methods of operating in the Canadian market.

Some people have said that if you send a mission that indicates there has been a failure on the part of your commercial representatives abroad. I do not think the hon. member for Melville would agree with that because he drew our attention to missions in the past which were also successful. The purpose of this trade mission is to raise the thing a little above the level of ordinary commercial dealings, to stir up enthusiasm, build up morale and create greater interest. I think that will be the result of this trade mission, just as it was the result of the ones mentioned by the hon. member for Melville in the course of his speech.

I have endeavoured, Mr. Chairman, to deal with some of the major points that were mentioned this afternoon. I have not intentionally omitted comments on any other matters that were raised. If any member of the committee wants me to comment on some particular point, I am quite prepared to do so. I thought at this stage I would deal with these major matters that have been the subject of discussion during the course of our meeting this afternoon.

Mr. Quelch: I should like to ask the minister a question. He referred to the fact that selling wheat is the responsibility of the wheat board, and not so much his. He has referred also to the fact that other countries are subsidizing their wheat producers. I am wondering if the government is giving any consideration to supporting the price of wheat so that the Canadian farmer will not, in the future, have to compete with the treasuries of other nations, but will have the Canadian treasury behind him in the same way the wheat producers of other nations have the treasury behind them. In other words, is the government giving any consideration to meeting the request of the farm union that a deficiency payment be made on wheat for the crop year 1956-57?

Mr. Churchill: I have been giving a great deal of my time to these problems that affect the wheat grower. This question of a deficiency payment is one to which I have been devoting as much spare time as I have had available. When I was at a meeting at Regina some time in November, I was asked to give—it was one of those neat little questions—my definition of deficiency payments. Two hundred farmers sat there waiting to see what I would say, but they did agree I had defined the thing pretty well by the time I was finished.

I am interested in that. The government has declared that it is interested in trying to correct this difficulty that has faced agriculture right across this country, not only in the western provinces. The first question my hon. friend asked me, or the comment he made, was about my not having responsibility for the sale of our wheat. I am not attempting to dodge my responsibility in this regard. All I am attempting to point out is that I, alone, am not responsible for the sale of Canadian wheat. The wheat board meets every day during the working week and discusses the sales program. I cannot sit in at those daily meetings and determine whether or not a cargo of grain should go from Vancouver or Montreal or should go to this country or that. In so far as the government has a responsibility, along with the wheat board, for the sale of our products, we are accepting that responsibility.

Mr. Zaplitny: I should like the minister to clear up one particular matter to which he referred this afternoon. I refer to the objections that were raised by his government at the conference that was held with representatives of the United States government concerning the surplus disposal program of the United States. I think the minister set out today what could be regarded in the United States, as well as in other countries, as a very important statement of policy. Certainly, it was at variance with the statement made recently by the Minister of Finance on the same subject. It was for that reason my colleague, the hon. member for Moose Mountain, immediately asked whether or not the Minister of Trade and Commerce agreed with the Minister of Finance on this question.

Today the minister stated, without any reservation, that he has no objection to the United States disposal program, with two exceptions; one, barter deals, and the other the subsidization of flour. Since he is speaking on behalf of the government in this matter he may be sure that the statement will be widely publicized in the United States. Certainly, the Minister of Finance was not taking the same view. As recently as November 6—I will quote the exact words of the Minister of Finance on that question as found on page 814 of Hansard for November 6, 1957—in reply to a question put to him by the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort, the Minister of Finance said this:

> That assurance, or at least the particular undertaking given by the United States secretaries, was confined to the barter feature of the program, as I pointed out in my report to the house; but the Canadian government has made no attempt to disguise the fact that with regard to all features of the surplus disposal program of the United States administration, it regards that program as being very damaging to Canada's interests in reference to the marketing of wheat; and on any occasion we propose to put forward that strong point of view of the Canadian government.

Now, when you read that statement alongside of what the minister stated today I am afraid it is going to give rise to some serious misunderstanding. Obviously on November 6 the Minister of Finance was speaking for the government. He was not expressing his own opinion only because he set forth the point of view of the Canadian government that the whole disposal program of the United States was very damaging to the disposal of Canadian wheat. The Minister of Trade and Commerce informed not only the house but the world that he has no objection to the United States disposal program, with the two exceptions that he specified, barter deals and subsidization. This leaves a wide field between the views of the Minister of Finance, speaking for the government on November 6, and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, speaking again for the government, on this date. Unless that matter is cleared up, I am afraid the statement of the minister today, taken alongside of the statement of the Minister of Finance is going to create a great deal of confusion in the minds of the United States government and of the people in Canada and elsewhere in the world.

Mr. Churchill: I thank the hon. member for drawing my attention to that statement. When the Minister of Finance was making that statement I think he was considering the effect of the United States surplus disposal program on what you might call the normal commercial markets. I think it would be helpful if I put on the record the statement I made at the conference at Geneva where I said this:

> I wish now, Mr. Chairman, to refer to a particular problem of concern, not only to Canada, but also to many other countries. It arises from the United States program of surplus disposal, particularly of wheat and other grains. This program has grown enormously in recent years, with increasingly adverse effects upon Canada. The Canadian government has always made clear that it does not object to genuine aid programs. Indeed, within the limits of our country's own capabilities, Canada has done its share and I hope will continue to do so. Our concern is rather with programs for dumping surpluses abroad in such a way as to destroy normal markets.
> Our main objection is that, in one way or another, by the payment of subsidies, by barter, and by sales for local currency, the United States has been disposing of its wheat on world markets in such volume that great damage is being caused to commercial markets for Canadian wheat and flour.

It is that interference with commercial markets to which objection is taken. I mentioned particularly their barter deals. I have not had any instances of their local currency arrangements which have seriously damaged Canadian sales of wheat. But if those local currency arrangements are made in normal commercial markets, naturally that is damaging to Canadian sales; and also long term loans, as I say, of the 40-year variety and so on. What I intended to emphasize was that the barter deal and the heavy subsidization of flour were the two things with which I was most urgently concerned. Any program of aid to the less well endowed countries of the world by the United States could not raise any objection on the part of Canada. For greater clarity I perhaps should have dealt with the subject of long term loans and the acceptance of local currencies. But as I say, at the moment I am not aware of any of those projects interfering seriously with Canadian sales. So long as the normal commercial markets are not interfered with, we cannot object to a generous United States surplus disposal program.

Mr. Zaplitny: In order to clear the matter up may I say this. I consider this to be of great importance. I do not wish to be unkind to the minister at all but it seems to me that he is dragging something in by the ears at this point. His statement was fairly categorical, that he had no objection to the surplus disposal program of the United States, with two exceptions which he specified. Now he is dragging in long term loans. Are we to understand that that would be his third specific objection?

Mr. Churchill: That will be a third objection, if they interfere with normal commercial markets by that practice. But as I say, at the moment I have no knowledge of any interference along that line.

Mr. Zaplitny: I am afraid the minister, with his much greater command of vocabulary, can get away with what he is now saying because he qualified his statement by saying "If it interferes with normal commercial patterns or practices". I think the minister will admit that every form of competition in trade interferes in one way or another with commercial transactions. That is a qualification which hardly meets the definition of what he is objecting to. Let me put my question in this way. Let us forget what the Minister of Finance said the other day. He says many things that are better forgotten anyway. Let us forget that and let us start from today. As of today, do we understand that the policy of the government now is that with the exception of barter deals, the flour subsidy, long term loans and acceptance of local currencies, it has no objection to the surplus disposal program of the United States?

Mr. Churchill: In fairness to the United States may I say this. I think it is sometimes overlooked that a great part of their surplus disposal program has been for the advantage of countries in the Far East. If we talk about and criticize their surplus disposal program without some qualification, quite obviously we are saying that that is wrong. We do not say it is wrong to assist India, Pakistan, Ceylon, Malaya or any of those countries in the Far East.

I do not know whether it is worth while to continue discussion along that line but, as far as I am concerned, it is perfectly clear in my mind that if there is no interference with the normal commercial market for Canadian wheat, that is the United Kingdom and those countries in Europe such as Holland, Belgium and Switzerland; and our market in Japan and other areas in which we have done great trade in flour over the years, there is no objection. If there is no interference with those traditional normal commercial markets how can you possibly object to an aid program to underdeveloped countries?

Mr. Quelch: Let me put a specific example to the minister. Suppose a country in Asia wanted to buy wheat from the United States and that country did not possess the dollars with which to pay for that wheat. Suppose the United States then agrees to accept that country's local currency or to make a long term loan. You would not have any objection to that particular deal?

Mr. Churchill: That would be a country with which we had no trade at all with Canadian wheat. There would be no objection.

Mr. Hahn: I was interested in the minister's statement with reference to the acceptance of sterling. I was going to ask him this question. Did the question arise in the trade mission as to whether or not we were prepared to accept sterling? Did any discussion take place with regard to that matter.

Mr. Churchill: It has been difficult to have many discussions yet. During the course of this coming week opportunities will arise for discussions and it is quite possible that subject will come up.

Some hon. Members: Six o'clock.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: I presume that Monday will be private members' day, as agreed?

Mr. Green: Yes. The program will be as I announced last evening; Monday private members' day and Tuesday a one-day motion to go into supply.

Mr. Chevrier: Is there to be any indication now as to what we shall be taking up on Wednesday?

Mr. Green: No. I am very sorry but I am unable to say this evening.

At six o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to the order of the house passed on December 2, 1957.

Question

ANSWER TO QUESTION

The following answer, deposited with the Clerk of the house, is printed in the official report of debates pursuant to standing order 39:

OKANAGAN VALLEY FRUIT TREES—FROST DAMAGE

Question No. 258—Mr. Christian:

1. During each of the years 1949 to 1956, both inclusive, what information is on record as to the number and varieties of fruit trees in the Okanagan valley, British Columbia, that have suffered from frost damage or winter kill?

2. What has been done by the government to compensate fruit growers of the Okanagan valley for such damage?

Answer by: Hon. D. S. Harkness (Minister of Agriculture):

1. During the years 1949 to 1956, both inclusive, there were two periods of serious frost damage or winter kill in the Okanagan valley of British Columbia, one during the winter of 1949-50 and the other in November, 1955.

According to information provided by the British Columbia department of agriculture, mortality as a result of the severe winter of 1949-50 was as follows:—

	1950 tree survey trees	Mortality trees
Apples	1,117,215	107,028
Peaches	343,534	111,313
Apricots	186,364	37,981
Cherries	100,039	18,446
Pears	333,807	22,720
Plums	16,149	5,149
Prunes	200,200	33,973
	2,297,308	336,610

Mortality as a result of the November, 1955, freeze was as follows:—

	1955 tree survey trees	Mortality trees
Apples	1,067,850	126,162
Peaches	344,579	28,041
Apricots	201,190	17,759
Cherries	149,208	60,272
Pears	383,235	5,092
Plums & Prunes	177,951	34,722
	2,324,013	272,048

2. No financial assistance was provided by the government of Canada to compensate the fruit growers of the Okanagan valley for such damage.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, December 9, 1957

The house met at 2.30 p.m.

PRIVILEGE

MR. CHRISTIAN—OPPORTUNITY OF MEMBERS TO SPEND CHRISTMAS WITH FAMILIES

Mr. F. C. Christian (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I rise on a question of privilege. This question of privilege involves the right of members to see and be with their families at Christmas, to meet with their constituents and become better acquainted with their problems, and to exercise the privileges which are within the grasp of certain Ontario and Quebec members. The question I wish to ask of the Prime Minister is this. In view of the statement by the house leader—

Mr. Speaker: Order. Will the hon. member defer his question until we come to the question period. If he has a question of privilege he wishes to raise he may do it now, but I understand he is about to put a question.

Mr. Christian: As a question of privilege may I put the question?

Mr. Speaker: If it is a question of privilege the hon. member has the opportunity to state it.

Mr. Christian: I have stated the question of privilege already, Mr. Speaker.

In view of the statement by the house leader that we were elected not to run home for long holidays but to do the business of the country, and in view of the statement in the Globe and Mail of December 9, 1957, that there may be difficulty in finishing the business of the session before January 14, 1958, should the members of parliament cancel their plans to return home for Christmas?

Right Hon. J. G. Diefenbaker (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, with the leave of the house, the right hon. Leader of the Opposition spoke to me earlier and I told him I would make a statement on this question tomorrow. I could have made it today, but under all the circumstances I think tomorrow will be sufficiently early. However, the hon. member may be assured of one thing. There is going to be nothing in the nature of denial to hon. members of their opportunity to spend their Christmas holidays at their homes and in their constituencies.

EXCISE TAX ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 231, to amend the Excise Tax Act.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, on a point of order, may I ask Your Honour at what point in the proceedings one should ask a question as to whether or not it is appropriate to introduce a bill amending tax legislation without the matter first being considered in committee of ways and means?

Mr. Speaker: If there is a question of order with respect to this matter it should be raised as soon as I have put the question. Is it the pleasure of the house that the hon. minister shall have leave to introduce the said bill?

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to consider the point of order that it is not appropriate to ask parliament to amend any tax legislation without the matter first being considered by the committee of ways and means. We had something to say about this matter on Friday evening, and I will not take the time of the house to repeat what was said on either side of the issue at that time except to point out that I read from passages in Bourinot to the effect that in the Canadian House of Commons any change in taxation measures must first be dealt with in the committee of ways and means.

I offer today in the main just one other piece of evidence. It is difficult to find many instances in the past where bills amending taxation statutes have done nothing else but reduce taxes or provide alleviation. However, there were three such examples in April of this very year. At that time, when Hon. Mr. Harris, the former minister of finance, brought his budget before the house, he presented measures amending the Excise Act, the Excise Tax Act and the Income Tax Act. I have carefully compared the provisions of chapters 25, 26 and 29 of the statutes of this year with the resolutions which were introduced prior to the introduction of those bills. I find that there is nothing in the bills except reduction or alleviation of taxes. I find that every point of reduction, every point of alleviation indicated in the bills is covered in the resolutions.

I am just as sure as I am certain that I am standing here that last spring, when the former government was trying to get as much business through as possible so we could get out on the hustings, Mr. Harris would not have brought in those resolutions preceding those bills if it had not been made clear to him that such was absolutely necessary. There are a few other examples in history, but these are the most recent ones, making it clear that even when there is nothing in a bill but the reduction of taxes it is still a matter that should be considered in committee of ways and means.

There is a good deal of language in the authorities about upsetting the balance of ways and means. When private members seek to move changes in taxation, even by way of alleviation, that language is thrown at them; that we cannot upset the balance of ways and means. I would also point out that if it is in order for the minister, without a prior resolution, to introduce a bill amending the Excise Tax Act, the purpose of which is to reduce a certain tax from 10 per cent to 7½ per cent, what is to prevent me from introducing a bill reducing it from 7½ per cent to zero? If it is in order for the Minister of Finance to introduce a bill amending the Income Tax Act, without a prior resolution, providing for an increase in the exemption for dependants under the Income Tax Act to the extent of $100, what is to prevent me, without a prior resolution, from introducing a bill raising that exemption to a much higher figure?

The whole basis of ways and means resolutions is to keep authority for the balance of ways and means, authority for financial policy, in the hands of the executive subject to approval by parliament. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that this is a serious departure from our practice which the minister is asking parliament to follow.

It is surely not necessary for me to say, but perhaps I had better do so before the minister speaks, that this is not a case of questioning the substance of this or any other bill that may be introduced regarding taxation. But even when measures are placed before parliament which parliament may welcome and pass unanimously, it seems to me it is still desirable that they be dealt with by parliament according to the rules and practices of the house.

I say again, Mr. Speaker, that all of us recognize that if it had not been necessary to have ways and means resolutions prior to tax reduction bills, Mr. Harris would not have had the house take up the time on ways and means resolutions as was the case last April. Therefore it is my contention that whatever welcome the house may be prepared to give to this legislation, it should be preceded by consideration in committee of ways and means.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, if I may speak to the point of order for a moment, there was some brief discussion of this matter on Friday night, and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has now put it forward formally by way of a point of order at this stage. I think, therefore, it is essential that we dispose at once of the suggestion made inferentially now and made very definitely on Friday night that somehow or other the procedure now being followed by the government is an abuse of the rights of parliament because, of course, it is no such thing.

This house is not being denied any opportunity which it should have to discuss these proposals. I quite understand that perhaps it might be unwelcome to some hon. members opposite that they have to discuss these proposals, because in spite of what they have said it is obvious that whatever may be the merits of the proposals, every opportunity is sought by them to oppose progress on these measures simply for the sake of opposing.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am amazed at that statement coming from my hon. friend.

Mr. Fulton: The hon. member has referred to what took place on the budget last spring. As I shall have occasion to point out in the course of my remarks in somewhat greater detail, the reason the bills for reductions of taxation in the spring budget were preceded by resolutions in committee of ways and means was precisely because at that time we were considering a budget, the annual financial presentation of the Minister of Finance, and discussion of the whole financial picture of the country was before the house, as it is required to be.

Our rules provide most clearly that that discussion, which takes place once a year, is made on the motion for committee of ways and means. It is for that reason that that committee was set up at that time, to pass the resolutions which were preparatory to the introduction of the bills arising out of the budget. But here we are faced with an entirely different situation. This is not a budget. We are working within the confines of the budget proposals made to parliament and approved by parliament last spring. This is not an annual financial presentation and therefore a resolution for committee of ways and means is not required.

I should like to elaborate a little on the two aspects of this motion. First not only is what is being done now strictly within the rules of parliament, but also there is absolutely no attempt being made, nor will the result be, to deny parliament any of its opportunities for full discussion of what is proposed.

As I have said, this is not a budget; the budget was delivered last spring. The proposals of the Minister of Finance outlined on Friday and now being laid before the house in the two bills, introduction of which is asked today, are operating within the scope of that budget. Bourinot and Beauchesne are both authorities for the proposition that there shall be an annual financial statement made by the Minister of Finance. That is the budget. Rule 58 makes it clear that such budget should be delivered on the motion for committee of ways and means.

Now, that fact makes it clear, and the wording of the rule and the authorities—

Mr. Speaker: Order. If the hon. member would permit me to interrupt him I think that the neat point of order is whether or not the introduction of this bill should be preceded by a resolution. I am not concerned with an inquiry into whether or not there is a budget or a budget debate. As I understand the point of order, and perhaps the hon. member would shorten the discussion by confining himself to it, it is the question of whether a resolution is needed before this bill can be introduced.

Mr. Fulton: I think the point I am making now is relevant to that matter, because if you have such a resolution you can only have it in committee of ways and means. That requires that a motion to go into committee of ways and means must have been made. My point is that the motion for the committee of ways and means is only called for in this context when and if the Minister of Finance is presenting his budget. But there is here no budget—because we are operating within the limits of the general financial structure which was before parliament and approved by parliament last spring—there is now nothing before the house, nothing presented by the Minister of Finance, which calls for the setting up of a committee of ways and means for consideration of the annual financial statement and of the resolutions that arise out of it. What the Minister of Finance has done here is simply to report that within the limits of the budget presented last spring it is possible to reduce certain taxes, and the reductions he proposes in those taxes will accordingly be laid before the house in the two bills which he is seeking to introduce this afternoon.

It is therefore absurd to suggest that parliament is being denied any opportunity which is appropriate to it simply because we do not have a full annual budget, a resolution and a discussion in the committee of ways and means. There will be the fullest opportunity to discuss the merits of the proposals during debate on the bills which will be introduced by the Minister of Finance—if hon. members will permit us to introduce them—and it will be very interesting to hear what the opposition has to say because—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: I did not check the hon. member before, but he is definitely out of order in introducing political arguments into this discussion, and I hope he will not proceed in that vein in discussing the point of order.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I would point out that this aspect was introduced into consideration of the subject on Friday night. However, to continue now on the question of the resolution itself: my second submission is that it is not necessary to have a ways and means resolution—which can only come out of a committee of ways and means—when the proposal, and the only proposal before parliament, is a proposal to reduce taxation. I should like to repeat the reference made on Friday night to Erskine May, 15th edition, at page 764 where it is stated:

> Provisions for the alleviation of taxation are not subject to the rules of financial procedure. The repeal or reduction of taxes, for instance, by the finance bill, is sometimes preceded by a specific ways and means resolution but this procedure is neither necessary nor usual. Thus, provisions for the repeal or reduction of taxation, the granting or extention of exemptions, the creation or increase of drawbacks, etc., may be presented in bills or inserted by amendment without the preliminary sanction of a ways and means committee.

These two bills, the bills which it is proposed to introduce today, propose only reductions in taxation, as has been made clear, so the citation in May is clearly applicable. And here, of course, I join issue with the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), who suggested on Friday that May was not applicable to procedure in the Canadian house. I make no comment as to why it should be that suddenly on this occasion May, who so often in the past has been relied upon in that quarter, should be disowned; but if the hon. gentleman does not wish to accept the authority of an English text book we can rely on a Canadian authority which fully supports the position stated in May.

You do not need a committee of ways and means or a resolution of the ways and means committee when the only proposal is to reduce taxation. Authority for that statement is to be found in Bourinot, 4th edition, page

431, where, discussing the functions of the committee of ways and means he says, at the bottom of that page:

> It is the function of this committee to impose rather than repeal taxes.

The bills here are for a reduction, which is to that extent a repeal of taxation, and therefore they come within the scope of that citation.

Bourinot then discusses the function of the committee of ways and means and the rule that a new tax must be imposed in that committee. In the course of the discussion he makes it clear that the requirement for a ways and means resolution preceding a taxation bill exists only when the bill or the proposal is to increase taxation or to impose new taxes or to bring a new group or class of taxpayers within the liability for existing taxes. Quite clearly, in accordance with the outline given by the Minister of Finance on Friday night, none of those results would follow from these bills. I refer Your Honour and my hon. friends opposite particularly to Bourinot's discussion of this matter on pages 505 and 506, where he discusses the type of case in which it is not necessary to have a resolution of the ways and means committee before introducing such a bill. For instance, at the top of page 506 he says:

> A bill merely declaratory in its nature, and involving no new charge, need not originate in committee of the whole.

And of course the committee of ways and means is a committee of the whole. He continues:

> Neither is a committee necessary in the case of bills authorizing the levy or application of rates for local purposes by local authorities acting in behalf of the ratepayers.

Then he goes on with a list of the exceptions, and about half way down the paragraph he says:

> Nor does the rule apply to bills imposing charges upon any particular class of persons for their own use and benefit.
> Nor to bills indemnifying members for penalties they may have incurred for violation of an act.

And then this is the particular sentence in point:

> Nor to bills having for their object the diminution or repeal of any public tax provided such bills do not affect trade;

And of course these bills do not affect trade; they are specifically for the repeal or reduction of a public tax, the income tax on the one hand and the excise tax on the other.

Mr. Martin (Essex East): Will the hon. gentleman give us the reference which he has just made?

[Mr. Fulton.]

Mr. Fulton: Page 506, Bourinot's fourth edition. Then if there were any further question—if there was any doubt left that the only time you need a ways and means resolution is when you propose to increase a tax, Bourinot points out at page 507:

> Bills consolidating and amending statutes are frequently brought into the house with clauses containing charges on the public revenue, but it is only when these clauses impose new burthens that it is necessary to consider them first in a committee of the whole.

Now, Mr. Speaker, on the basis of those authorities, both English and Canadian, it is my submission that the course proposed to be followed here is both strictly within the rules of the house, and not only within the rules of the house, but designed to present to the house every opportunity which the house should have to discuss the taxation proposals being made by the Minister of Finance.

It is only if the Minister of Finance were to be introducing a budget which varies or enlarges the financial scheme laid before parliament and approved by parliament last spring, that it would require a committee of ways and means and a resolution in that committee. Where, however, as in this case, the minister has made it perfectly clear that he is operating within the limits of the budget already approved by parliament, and merely seeks to reduce taxes in certain particulars—and can do so and still meet the requirements also approved by parliament—then in such a case, and that is the present case, no resolution or committee of ways and means is necessary.

I therefore suggest to my hon. friends, Mr. Speaker, in all seriousness, that they withdraw their objections and allow the house to proceed with the bills before it so the public may at the earliest possible moment obtain the benefit of the reductions proposed in taxes.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Might I ask a question of the hon. minister, Mr. Speaker. Perhaps I should be fair and say I have two questions.

First of all, if the minister contends that the Minister of Finance is not introducing a budget but is merely working within the framework of the budget brought down last spring by Mr. Harris—and I do not go along with this premise, but if this is his premise—does it not then follow that the proposals of the present Minister of Finance are upsetting the balance of ways and means established by Mr. Harris' budget last spring? On that basis is it not therefore necessary that we go into committee of ways and means?

My second question relates to the quotation the minister read from page 506 of Bourinot's fourth edition. The minister of course knows that Bourinot on other pages, such as page 418, makes it clear that all propositions relating to the tariff and taxation of the country must be considered in committee, and on page 438 he makes it clear that even reductions must be considered in committee of ways and means. Is it not also true that the quotation the minister read from page 506, if he had continued to read it, would have defeated his case? It says:

> Nor to bills having for their object the diminution or repeal of any public tax;—

There is a footnote there, footnote (q), which brings our attention to the only case in Canada, which was in 1882, of a bill to repeal duties on promissory notes. On that page Bourinot goes on to say:

> —provided such bills do not affect trade; and then they come under the special rule on that subject.

Well, the Minister of Finance certainly claims that this bill does affect trade. Let us read the next sentence or two:

> As an illustration of the strictness with which the Canadian commons observe the rules respecting trade, it may be mentioned that in the session of 1871, the house went into committee on resolutions to exempt paraffine wax, lubricating oil, and other articles from excise duty, and to reduce that duty on certain articles in the province of Manitoba. When the house had agreed to these resolutions, a bill was brought in; but before it had gone through committee, it was considered advisable by the government to reduce the duty on certain spirits manufactured from molasses in bond; and accordingly resolutions were passed in committee, and when adopted by the house, referred to the committee on the foregoing bill.

Does the minister not think that by taking that one sentence or two out of the context of the paragraph he missed the whole point? There was this one exception in 1882 having to do with the duties on promissory notes, which it was felt did not affect trade; but the point of the whole paragraph is that the Canadian commons is strict with regard to these matters in insisting that they be dealt with in committee of ways and means.

I confess, Mr. Speaker, that my two questions have become a short speech, but perhaps the minister will answer them. First, if it is not a budget, is it not upsetting the balance of ways and means of the budget brought down by Mr. Harris? Second, does not the quotation from Bourinot which he read when read in full, support our contention that this matter should go to the committee of ways and means?

Mr. Fulton: No, Mr. Speaker, I do not agree with that at all. To deal with the second point first, I did read the line referred to by the hon. member. I read the full sentence, as follows:

> Nor to bills having for their object the diminution or repeal of any public tax; provided such bills do not affect trade;—

I stopped there because I thought even the hon. gentleman would understand the sense in which the word "trade" is used there; but in case he did not it should have been made clear to him by the rest of the paragraph which he did read, which made it clear that on the occasion when the Canadian commons did insist on a resolution to go into ways and means on a bill to reduce duties it did so because they affected trade—that was the argument put forward at that time —it did so because clearly the proposition then before the house related to a matter of a differential in duties between products originating in certain provinces. It is obviously referring to trade in the specific sense of trade between provinces, trade within or outside Canada, that the words "provided such bills do not affect trade" are used to suggest that a bill proposing to reduce a special excise tax which was placed on automobiles for war purposes and was placed on automobiles generally, regardless of where they originate in Canada and without reference to any special concession to one province or another—to argue that the reduction of such an excise tax is a bill affecting trade seems to me to be stretching a point even beyond the extent to which the hon. member usually goes. There is nothing in the argument he has put forward on that point.

Mr. Coldwell: I am surprised at the Minister of Justice, who spent many hours in the room of my hon. friend from Winnipeg North Centre learning procedure from him.

Mr. Fulton: The other point he raises, that it upsets the balance of ways and means, can hardly be supported either. The fact that there is a reduction in taxes will, it is true, reduce the revenue; but the whole proposition is within the scale and framework of the financial proposals outlined by the previous minister of finance. It seems to me that the bills lay before the house a simple proposition. Does the house agree with the government in its wish to reduce certain specific taxes? It does not ask the house nor is it necessary to ask parliament to discuss the whole ambit of the fiscal and financial position of the country to arrive at the simple decision: do you want a reduction of specific taxes or not? That is the whole question before the house, however much the hon. member may try to depict it otherwise.

Mr. Tucker: Mr. Speaker, I am rather surprised that the Minister of Justice should have dismissed the argument of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre when it was the intention of the Prime Minister to offer him a certain position. However, I would draw your attention to section 54 of the British North America Act which is, after all, what governs the Canadian parliament more than any citation from May or anything of the sort which is based on the unwritten constitution of the British parliament. I would cite section 54 to Your Honour, having every confidence that you will give full weight to a citation from our own constitution. Section 54 of the British North America Act reads:

> It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address, or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to that house by message of the Governor General in the session in which such vote, resolution, address, or bill is proposed.

In other words the recommendation must be in the session in which the matter is proposed, and I submit to Your Honour that this was written into the British North America Act to preserve the responsibility of the whole government for any interference with a tax or any interference in the expenditure of public moneys. It is not enough for a minister to introduce a bill; he must be in a position to say that the governor in council, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this interference with taxation, recommends it to the house. This, I submit, is a fundamental part of our constitution. It cannot be changed by any rules or any citations from May or similar sources, because it is fundamental. If it be argued that a tax can be done away with in part without the government taking the responsibility for it, it can equally be argued that if one tax can be done away with in part the whole taxation system of our country could be done away with. This would strike at the very basis of responsible government as it has been set up under the British North America Act.

This very point has come before the house on previous occasions and I would cite to Your Honour, for example, citation 562 of Beauchesne's second edition, which reads:

> It shall not be lawful for the House of Commons to adopt or pass any vote, resolution, address or bill for the appropriation of any part of the public revenue, or of any tax or impost, to any purpose that has not been first recommended to that house by message of the governor general in the session in which such vote, resolution, address or bill is proposed.

Section 54 of the British North America Act is cited as the authority. Citation 566 of Beauchesne's second edition reads:

> This house will not receive any petition for compounding any sum of money owing to the crown, upon any branch of the revenue, without a certificate from the proper officer or officers annexed to the said petition, stating the debt, what prosecutions have been made for the recovery of such debt, and setting forth how much the petitioner and his security are able to satisfy thereof.

Futher citations in this part of Beauchesne with which I will not burden Your Honour go to the point that it is necessary to introduce anything having to do with governmental revenue or the expenditure on a statement by the Minister of Finance that the government itself assumes the responsibility for it by the formula that it is recommended by the governor in council.

In Beauchesne's Parliamentary Rules and Forms, third edition, similar reasoning is set forth, and it is emphasized in paragraphs 436, 437 and 438 that such legislation must originate by recommendation of the governor in council. That can only be given, Your Honour, if the matter originates in a committee of the whole house. If it be held otherwise, as has been pointed out by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, then there is nothing to prevent anybody introducing a bill to do away with taxation. This would strike at the very foundation of responsible government as set out in the British North America Act.

My hon. friend, in introducing this resolution, was not able to say and did not say that the governor in council recommended it to the house; and that must be said, I submit, when a money resolution is introduced. The Minister of Justice referred to Bourinot in regard to the matter, and I think it is quite clear that the very citation he gave proves exactly the opposite to what he said. At page 505 of Bourinot's Parliamentary Procedure I find this:

> The recommendation of the crown and a committee of the whole are necessary in the case of a bill granting a drawback on imports.

Clearly that is based upon the British North America Act. If it requires a resolution and the governor general's recommendation to grant a drawback on imports, clearly the same reasoning applies to any reduction of the excise tax, because they are both the reduction of a tax. I continue with the quotation:

> In 1900 the same proceedings were followed in the case of a bill extending contracts providing cold storage on steamships beyond the provision made in previous legislation. A bill merely declaratory in its nature, and involving no new charge, need not originate in committee of the whole.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Read that again.

Mr. Tucker: Because there is no charge in it. The citation goes on:

> Neither is a committee necessary in the case of bills authorizing the levy or application of rates for local purposes by local authorities acting in behalf of the ratepayers.

It goes on to say that it does not apply to bills imposing charges upon any particular class of persons for their own use and benefit. I find farther on the following:

> As an illustration of the strictness with which the Canadian commons observe the rules respecting trade, it may be mentioned that in the session of 1871, the house went into committee on resolutions to exempt paraffine wax, lubricating oil, and other articles from excise duty—

This proposed bill is a move to liberate the taxpayer from excise duties, and this is the very citation given by the Minister of Justice; and it is an illustration of how Speakers in the past have scrupulously observed the terms of our constitution as laid down in the British North America Act. Here is what it says:

> The house went into committee on resolutions to exempt paraffine wax, lubricating oil, and other articles from excise duty, and to reduce that duty on certain articles in the province of Manitoba.

I draw this to Your Honour's attention:

> When the house had agreed to these resolutions, a bill was brought in; but before it had gone through committee, it was considered advisable by the government to reduce the duty on certain spirits manufactured from molasses in bond; and accordingly resolutions were passed in committee, and when adopted by the house, referred to the committee on the foregoing bill.

I cite that to Your Honour to show that even where it was a bill to reduce taxation, when it was designed to expand the application of that bill it was found necessary to go into committee in the same way. Therefore I submit, Your Honour, that in this matter you should very strictly apply the British North America Act, because this again is tied up with the rights of the commons.

Section 53 of the British North America Act sets it out very carefully that bills appropriating any part of the public revenue or imposing any tax or impost shall originate in the House of Commons. Clearly this section would apply as this is a money bill, and surely if it is held that this bill can be introduced as an amending bill without any resolution, without any recommendation of the governor in council, then I submit we are getting into the position where it can be held that bills such as this can be introduced in the Senate without any recommendation of the governor in council at all. In other words, I submit a ruling along the lines asked for by the Minister of Justice would be against the whole spirit of the British North America Act, which has been applied over and over again.

I would draw Your Honour's attention to the fact that I wish to make it quite clear that we are not opposing the purpose of the bill; but in accordance with what the Prime Minister stated over and over again in the last two years before he became Prime Minister of this country—

Mr. Speaker: Order. The hon. member is about to depart from the point of order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am all ready to answer.

Mr. Speaker: I warn him that while I welcome his argument on the point of order I think it is inappropriate to go beyond that. I see the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond.

Mr. Irwin: Mr. Speaker, I have listened to the profundities of Mr. Bourinot, Mr. Beauchesne and Sir Erskine May as inscribed by Lord Campion and, so far as they guide this house, they are very useful; but the fact remains that this house itself has its own rules, and it is not necessary to proceed to a study of those various authorities so long as the rules themselves will govern us in what we do.

I have listened to the specious argument of the Minister of Justice, and I refer to his argument as being somewhat specious for the reason that he says the house is not going to be deprived of any opportunity to discuss these matters. The fact remains that while we are not being denied an opportunity to discuss them, they will obviously come up after the bills are presented to the house, which they should not be in their present form. The fact also remains that we would not be acting properly if we discussed them under the present circumstances, and that is the matter that is at issue at the present time.

I wish to draw your attention to Votes and Proceedings of Monday, October 14. There you will find two motions. One reads as follows:

> That this house will, at its next sitting, resolve itself into a committee to consider of the supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

That motion has been called on several occasions. The next motion reads:

> That this house will, at its next sitting, resolve itself into a committee to consider of the ways and means for raising the supply to be granted to Her Majesty.

That motion, sir, has never been called. That motion has been carried on the routine proceedings of this house from day to day, showing in effect that this house has gone into committee of ways and means yet the motion has never been called. Here we are being asked to consider doing certain things to the revenue of this country, and we are not bringing it up under the appropriate conditions laid down by our own house in rule No. 58. I am going to move, in view of the fact that we got off the rails on Friday night, seconded by the hon. member for Okanagan Boundary (Mr. Christian):

That, as from eight p.m. to the adjournment of this house on Friday, December 6, 1957, all the proceedings of this house be expunged from the records of the house and that this house do return to normal proceedings as laid down by the rules.

Mr. Pickersgill: Black Friday, all right.

Mr. Speaker: While we are discussing a point of order I think it would be improper to interrupt that discussion by entertaining any motion. Is there anyone else who wishes to assist the Speaker in coming to a conclusion? If not, I think I am prepared to deal with the matter.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: I may tell my hon. friend that he can save his breath, because as I am at present disposed I am going to rule on the side on which he will be arguing. If anyone wishes to speak further in support of the point of order I will be glad to hear them, but at the present time I have come to the conclusion that the point of order cannot be sustained.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Maybe that is the side the hon. member for York West was on.

Mr. Speaker: If so, I will be glad to hear him.

Mr. Sinclair: He is no trained seal.

Mr. Speaker: I want to thank hon. members for the full discussion of this point. It is perhaps a novel point, and perhaps one that would not have arisen under normal circumstances; but here we have a budget and estimates before the house which arose not in this session and not even in this parliament. We are faced with circumstances that perhaps do not often arise.

I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre has considered the matter very fully, as has the Minister of Justice, and that they have referred to all the authorities, including many which I have considered myself. I have read the discussion of last Friday night and I, with the assistance of the Clerk and the legal adviser of the house, have spent some time on this matter.

I think it is quite clear what is required when there is a bill to raise money, to impose a levy or a tax, is covered in that section 54 of the British North America Act to which the hon. member for Rosthern referred. We have our own standing order No. 61 which presumably reinforces the section of the British North America Act which says that parliament shall not raise money except by the procedure of a resolution and discussion in a committee of the whole house. That is the safeguard of the people that taxes will not be raised lightly, and only after opportunity of discussion, indeed after repeated opportunity of discussion of the tax that is to be raised.

This question before us, however, is quite different from that. It is a question of a bill which on its face—and we have the bill here—is not a bill to raise money but a bill to reduce taxation. Without going through the citations again in Bourinot, Beauchesne and May, I think I can indicate very briefly to the house the opinion I accept. It is set out in May, fifteenth edition, at page 764. There you have a statement under the heading "Alleviation of Taxation", and it is in these words:

Provisions for the alleviation of taxation are not subject to the rules of financial procedure. The repeal or reduction of taxes, for instance, by the finance bill, is sometimes preceded by a specific ways and means resolution but this procedure is neither necessary nor usual.

I find that in this parliament the same thing has happened on occasion. A measure to reduce taxation has been preceded by a resolution, as was pointed out by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, and sometimes it has not. There are quite a number of instances where bills to reduce taxation have been introduced without being preceded by a resolution and the necessity of the procedure which was argued for by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre.

I will not read any more of that citation. The only question in my own mind was whether that British practice might be applicable in this parliament, and I find that both Bourinot and Beauchesne assume that it does and, in fact, say so in citations which I have here. Therefore I am satisfied that we are following a correct procedure in permitting this bill to be introduced without a resolution.

There was another point raised by the two hon. members which rather concerned me. I think it is answered by this citation from May, eleventh edition, page 572:

. . . a bill for diminishing or repealing a tax or other public burthen, unless the imposition of a new tax is proposed by way of substitution, needs no royal recommendation or preliminary committee stage . . .

I was a little concerned about the argument that perhaps the crown's recommendation was necessary and that otherwise it might be open to any member of the house to move such a bill. However, that is something I do not have to decide today. When a private member does introduce a bill to abolish the income tax or wipe out the proceedings of the last 24 hours we shall meet that when it arises. In the meantime, with due deference to the opinions that have been stated, I must rule that in my opinion this motion is now properly before the house.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

INCOME TAX ACT

Hon. Donald M. Fleming (Minister of Finance) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 232, to amend the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, as you will expect, I hold the same view with respect to the introduction of this bill without a prior resolution, but in view of the ruling you made on the previous bill I will not press the point at this time.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has had his objection noted. I have not had the opportunity to read this bill, but I take it from statements made in the house that it does not impose any new tax but is simply a bill to reduce taxation and therefore—

Mr. Fleming: That is the fact.

Mr. Speaker: —comes within the opinion I have already expressed on the other bill.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

CLOSURE OF DEBATE

MOTION TO REPEAL STANDING ORDER 33 TRANSFERRED TO GOVERNMENT ORDERS

On the order:

That standing order 33 of the standing orders of the House of Commons be repealed.—The Prime Minister.

Mr. Speaker: By the standing orders this matter is automatically transferred to government orders and needs no other action of the house at this time. I refer the house to standing order 21, subsection 2, which provides for the automatic transfer of the motion to government orders.

MOTIONS FOR PAPERS

CALGARY CITIZENSHIP COUNCIL

Motion No. 44—Mr. Pickersgill:

For a copy of all correspondence exchanged since July 1, 1954, between the minister or any official in Ottawa of the Department of Citizenship and Immigration, on the one hand, and any of the officers of the Calgary citizenship council, on the other, respecting the citizenship reception centre.

Motion agreed to.

COLUMBIA RIVER—PROPOSALS FOR HYDROELECTRIC DEVELOPMENT

Motion No. 45—Mr. Hahn:

For a copy of the preliminary report entitled proposals for the hydroelectric development of the Columbia river system in Canada.

Hon. D. S. Harkness (Acting Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources): Mr. Speaker, I must oppose this motion. Hon. members will perhaps recall that there was a considerable amount of discussion in the house last week with regard to the particular document in question. It was indicated at that time that we did not consider it in the public interest to table this document at the moment, at least, and I should like to state that there are really two grounds on which I would oppose the motion being adopted.

First, it is a departmental document of a type which is not normally tabled. Second, and more important, negotiations with the United States in regard to the Columbia river system and the development of hydroelectric power on that system have been going on and will probably continue for some time. We do not consider it in the public interest that this document should be made public during the time these negotiations are in progress.

Mr. Hahn: The reason for putting the motion before the house is that I am desirous of getting this particular information. The hon. member will recall that on Thursday last the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet (Mr. Lesage) had this document in the house. On that occasion, as recorded on page 1890 of Hansard, the minister read from the documents proposals for the hydroelectric development of the Columbia river system in Canada. I am not taking particular issue with the fact that the minister says this is a confidential document or an interdepartmental document, but my plea is based on citation 277 of Beauchesne's third edition, page 110, which says:

A minister of the crown is not at liberty to read or quote from a dispatch or other state paper not before the house, unless he be prepared to lay it upon the table.

I am fully aware, sir, that the minister did not have this document in the first instance, and did not bring it into the house. Apparently the hon. member for Montmagny-L'Islet did. However, I say the minister should not have read from the document, but since he did the house should have access to it.

Mr. Harkness: On that particular point, I would remind the house that I did not read from the document. All I did was to read the title of the document in order to identify it, but I read absolutely nothing from the document.

Mr. Speaker: That is my recollection, that the document was not quoted except to identify it. This is not a debatable motion. The minister has explained his objection to complying with the order, and all that remains now is to dispose of the motion. Those in favour will please say yea.

Some hon. Members: Yea.

Mr. Speaker: Those opposed will please say nay.

Some hon. Members: Nay.

Mr. Speaker: In my opinion the nays have it. I declare the motion lost.

CANADIAN CENTENNIAL

MOTION TO ESTABLISH COMMITTEE TO PLAN ECONOMIC AND SOCIAL DEVELOPMENT IN CELEBRATION

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved:

That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to the advisability of the establishment of a 100th anniversary committee, with provision for federal and provincial representation, for the purpose of planning the economic and social development of this country on a vast scale, including inter alia housing and slum clearance, conservation, irrigation and power projects, improvements in transportation, highway construction, the elimination of grade crossings, the building of hospitals, assistance to municipal projects and other public works, and also for the purpose of planning ways and means to strengthen the economy of every section of this country; and that consideration should be given to the advisability of such a program being launched immediately and being pursued vigorously year by year so that on July 1, 1967, the people of Canada will be in a position to celebrate this nation's 100th birthday not only with fireworks and speeches but by the achievement of a land of health and abundance for all our people.

He said: Mr. Speaker, the resolution which I have the honour to present to the house pretty well speaks for itself.

Mr. Byrne: It certainly does.

Mr. Pickersgill: We will take it as read.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I am sure all of us in Canada realize that this nation owes a great debt of gratitude to some of those who have gone before us, and who dreamed dreams of a great country on this northern half of the North American continent. None of us can deny the debt that we owe to Sir John A. Macdonald, that great statesman who dreamed of Canada as a separate country within the British family without whose dream we would not be sitting here today as the members of the parliament of a sovereign nation. I am sure it is also agreed that we owe a great debt to Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who at the turn of the present century uttered those famous words, "The twentieth century belongs to Canada." He, like that other great leader, dreamed of the greatness in store for this nation.

There are others to whom Canada is greatly indebted. I believe those of the two larger parties in this house who have applauded the sentiments I have just expressed will agree with me that this generation of Canadians also owes a debt to my predecessor, the late J. S. Woodsworth, who for many years was the member for Winnipeg North Centre, and I welcome the applause given to his name. He too was a great Canadian, a man who dreamed of Canada as a country not only great in expanse and in terms of economic progress but a country where there might be social security and a high standard of living for all the ordinary people of this nation. Because that great man dreamed dreams and had visions of a better day, many people in Canada now enjoy a better life.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that it is appropriate for us from time to time to lift ourselves out of the matters that concern us for the moment and plan boldly for the future of this Canada. It is for that reason I offer the suggestion that we seize upon the fact that in ten years we will be celebrating the 100th anniversay of confederation as an opportunity to plan still further for the development of this nation and for the achievement of a land in which, as my motion suggests, there will be health and abundance for all our people.

The resolution which Your Honour read out in my name a few minutes ago has been on the order paper for three or four sessions, although this is the first time it has been reached for debate. When I filed it in previous sessions I was conscious of the fact that probably it would not be reached. But I felt that perhaps it was a good idea to let the resolution reach the light of day and be seen for two or three years so that our people might get used to the thought of beginning to plan now for the centenary of the founding of this country.

It is true that there have been debates on other matters during which the ideas contained in this resolution have been put forward, notably in the debate on March 2, 1955, when the present Secretary of State (Mrs. Fairclough) moved an amendment on the motion to go into supply having to do with the unemployment situation which obtained at that time. In the course of that debate some of us urged that we should make a real attack on this problem of unemployment by instituting a long range development program. That approach was supported by hon. members now on the government side of the house.

I should like to mention, before going any further, that the idea of beginning well in advance to set up a committee and plan for our 100th anniversary was first suggested to me by my good friend of this city, Mr. Walter Mann. As a matter of fact he made the suggestion at a convention of our party in the province of Ontario seven years ago. To some it seemed somewhat far-fetched, at that time, to be proposing that we plan for an anniversary 17 years in advance, but seven of these years have already gone by, and as others, whose names I will quote in a moment, have suggested, there are times when plans ought to be made well in advance.

It is on that basis, bearing in mind the debt we owe to the dreamers of the past, bearing in mind the great potentialities of this country, and bearing in mind also the fact that things do not get done unless they are planned, planned boldly and planned well in advance, that I ask this house to consider seriously the suggestion contained in the resolution that the government take whatever steps are necessary to set up now a 100th anniversary committee, with provision for federal and provincial representation in the membership and work of such a committee.

I was interested in the support given to this idea over a year ago, in a very interesting article which appeared on the editorial page of the Ottawa Journal for Thursday, March 8, 1956. The article appeared under the well-known picture of the founders of confederation. It was entitled "Looking towards confederation's birthday" and was written by Mr. I. Norman Smith. I was interested in the fact that Mr. Smith, as he pointed out, wrote this article because he had had a discussion about Canada's 100th birthday with his friend Mr. Jules Leger, the under secretary of state for external affairs.

In this very interesting article Mr. Smith, on his own behalf and on behalf of his friend Mr. Leger, urges that we should begin now to plan for Canada's anniversary. He makes some interesting suggestions, among them that the Queen should come to Canada that year and perhaps be here on Dominion day and grace a special session of parliament; that NATO, or any successor organization, should hold its meetings in Canada that year; that the commonwealth prime ministers should meet here, and so on. Mr. Smith says that the full session of the United Nations could not be held in Canada because of lack of facilities, but a two weeks' plenary session could be held here, leaving the administration in New York.

Further down the page in this article Mr. Smith says:

> Another approach to making ourselves felt internationally might be to invite the British empire games for that year, or even the olympic games.

Then there are other suggestions; a scouts' jamboree, certain festivals, and so on, and then we come to a very interesting paragraph to which attention might be paid:

> By 1967, surely, we should have agreed on a Canadian flag: and to get this agreement not all of the stubborn people live in Quebec province. Is not a country 100 years old expected to have a flag which if seen in Pakistan or Peru says "Canada" without mistake?

The whole article is full of interesting suggestions, and full of the challenging thought that if we are not careful, when July 1, 1967, comes along all we will have will be the fireworks and the speeches. We will have those; there is no doubt about that. But if we are wise and far-sighted, and if we begin planning now, we will be able to have celebrations really worthy of such a great occasion.

I like the last paragraph or two of Mr. Smith's article, in which he says that a celebration such as we would like to have in 1967 must be planned on many levels, federal, provincial, municipal and institutional; and that we, the people, must do the planning. At the end of his article Mr. Smith says:

> Finally, it must be planned now, and by men with a vivid sense of history and future, men unafraid to be called dreamers. Put such men at work now for even three weeks and they would come up with a blueprint of something that could easily prove the best thing that has happened to this country since confederation.

Well, Mr. Speaker, Mr. Smith and Mr. Leger are not alone in their interest in Canada's 100th birthday. I have on my desk a number of newspaper clippings referring to a very interesting speech which the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. St. Laurent), who was then prime minister, made at Hamilton, Ontario, in March of this year. I was interested in the fact that most of the newspapers in this country covered the speech and gave it a good press, and this seemed to me to indicate that the challenge of the then prime minister to Canadians to think about the beginning of our second century struck a responsive chord in the hearts of our people. I could read any of the dispatches I have, but the one I have picked up is from the Toronto Daily Star of Thursday, March 21, 1957. The heading is, "Courage to take chance advocated by St. Laurent". The story is written by Mr. Bruce Macdonald, a staff correspondent, and it reads in part:

> Borrowing a line from Browning, Prime Minister St. Laurent last month invited those present to the celebration of his 75th birthday to "grow old along with me. The best is yet to be."
> In a speech in Hamilton earlier this week, the prime minister reaffirmed his conviction that for Canada the best years are ahead, but he did it in forceful, vigorous and imaginative terms which belie his age.
> His speech amounted to a challenge—a challenge to Canadians to seize the future which can be theirs with work, planning and the courage to take a chance.
> "But for the balance of Canada's first century as a nation—and throughout the shining story of her second century—this, more than any other in the world, will be the land of opportunity," the prime minister declared.
> But the future "won't just drop like a ripe plum into our hands," he warned. "We have to go after it with renewed energy, with new ideas, and with the confidence that what we are blueprinting can in fact be built."
> It is perhaps half a century since a Canadian prime minister sounded such a challenge. Then it was his famous predecessor, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who declared in the House of Commons: "To those who urge upon us the policy of tomorrow and tomorrow and tomorrow, to those who tell us wait, wait, wait; to those who advise us to pause, to consider, to reflect, to calculate and to inquire, our answer is: No, this is not time for deliberation, this is a time for action. The floodtide is upon us that leads on to fortune; if we let it pass, the voyage of our national life, bright as it is today, will be bound in shallows—"

And so the report of the speech of the present Leader of the Opposition goes on, ending up with this paragraph:

> Mr. St. Laurent gave no hint of the kind of projects he had in mind, but disclosed that he intended on another occasion to "suggest for my fellow citizens some way of setting up challenging and adventurous goals" for Canada's centenary.

Well that makes three or four of us now; Mr. I. Norman Smith, Mr. Leger and the present Leader of the Opposition. But I call another witness, the present Prime Minister, who is very proud of what is referred to as his party's national development policy. In this document which the Conservatives put out in the last election campaign, and which I confess we quote sometimes in a different vein, there is this opening paragraph:

> Can anyone doubt that Canada stands at the crossroads in her history? This is a time for greatness in planning for her future. Unity requires it—freedom demands it—vision now will ensure it.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the present Prime Minister is a good witness. His words make it unanimous; we all agree that Canada has a great future. As put by Sir Winston Churchill when he was in Ottawa in 1952:

> Upon the whole surface of the globe there is no more spacious and splendid domain open to the activities and genius of free men.

Those were the words Sir Winston Churchill used to describe the Canada he was visiting at that time. We are agreed; we are unanimous as to the possibilities of the future so far as this country is concerned, but we are also agreed, in the words of the present Prime Minister, that it takes vision now to ensure the greatness of that future. This is the reason, Mr. Speaker, why I join with Mr. Norman Smith, with the Leader of the Opposition and others in urging upon the government that these matters be not left until eight, nine or nine and a half years from now, but that without delay steps be taken to set up a committee to plan the various matters which are suggested in my motion. There were a few smiles when that motion was read, as though it seemed to cover everything. It covers a lot, but there are still other matters. The point is that we should start now to plan for progress on a broad scale.

Let me just mention a few of the items set out in my resolution. I shall do so quickly and in passing. It will be fine to have fireworks and speeches on July 1, 1967; how much finer it will be if we have the Canadian people well housed. We can do it. It would be better, instead of just talking of the South Saskatchewan dam and other conservation and irrigation projects, if we really have them. We can have these projects and more, if we start planning for them now. We can do the same thing in the fields of transportation, highways, railway crossings, municipal projects, the building of hospitals, and so on. The field is tremendous; the opportunity is there to build the kind of Canada so that on July 1, 1967, we will really have something to celebrate.

Let us hope that we are not celebrating our 100th birthday with unemployment around us; let us hope by that time we will have introduced sufficient social and economic planning to get rid of unemployment completely; let us hope we will have got rid of exploitation of man by man within our country, and that we will have achieved the kind of life in which we are all participants in a co-operative and common endeavour. Let us strengthen our economy by 1967, so that every section of this nation will abound in material and social progress; so that social security will be guaranteed to all our people, and so that we will be able to play our part in helping the rest of the world to rise out of conditions of hunger, squalor and misery and thus remove the causes of war and achieve peace for all mankind.

The opportunities are tremendous. The challenge is put to us by Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Wilfrid Laurier, by my late leader Mr. J. S. Woodsworth, by Mr. I. Norman Smith, by the present Leader of the Opposition and by the present Prime Minister. The future which is our destiny will not drop into our laps. All who have thought about these matters will agree that we have to dream and plan for that future and that now is the time to take action along these lines.

Mr. Speaker, on July 1, 1967, we will have the fireworks and we will have the speeches; let us hope we will have something more.

Mr. John B. Hamilton (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration): Mr. Speaker, I would not want the house to feel that I am taking the hon. member's resolution lightly, but as I looked over page 4 in our program for today and read all the items he has set down there, I could not help but get a glimpse of him in his library back in Winnipeg, while he contemplated the coming session. I could see him enumerating the items—minimum wages, annual vacations with pay, statutory holidays, industrial relations, the Canada Elections Act, the Income Tax Act.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): And health insurance.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): Then I caught a glimpse of him as he donned his dark cloak and took off on his broomstick out over the barrens and, in a scene reminiscent of Macbeth, he hatched this resolution from the witches' cauldron. Then of course in the cozy library again, when everything appeared to be covered, I see once again consternation and the hon. member rushing to the long distance telephone to Rosetown-Biggar; the crackling of the wires and a voice coming over: "M.J.—M.J., have you got human rights covered?" Mr. Speaker, there is very little left—

Mr. Byrne: That was the telephone call that offered him the speakership.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): —that is not covered in this resolution, and if there were only the items which the hon. member has talked about today—the Queen visiting Canada, the scouts' jamboree, the British empire games, the paintings and the music—then of course we could all stand up in unison and say "This is a resolution we are all able to support."

Mr. Winch: Why can't you?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): But it seems to me there is a great deal more to this resolution than just the phrases we have heard read out today by the hon. member. As a matter of fact, for the period I have been in this house he has filled the time almost completely by calling witnesses in many other parties.

Mr. Winch: Except you, since you changed your policy.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): They were pretty good witnesses.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I think what we should consider is the background in connection with this resolution and the time in history which we are approaching. It is easy enough to say that the twentieth century belongs to Canada; as a matter of fact speakers all over the country indulge in that very generous phrase, but I think the twentieth century will only belong to Canada if we are prepared to put into it the really hard work necessary to achieve this goal.

When we in government consider this I believe it is necessary for us to also consider what role we shall play in preparing for 1967. I cannot help but go back to the performance of governments over the years. I think we can divide the governmental history of this country into two major phases, the first from 1867 down to the end of the first world war, a period of 53 years, 33 of which saw a Conservative administration in office in Ottawa, and the second phase from the end of the first world war to date, a period of approximately 37 years, 31 of which saw a Liberal administration in power in Ottawa.

During the first phase this country went through a tremendous period of development. There were vast developmental demands including railway transportation, the opening up of new territories, encouragement for new methods of production and the finding of new markets. It was clearly a period when dynamic action was required on the part of government. It fell to the government to support, inspire and often to initiate long-term projects of economic development and I would say that during this period the Conservative administrations were not found lacking in the courage and vision necessary to carry out these projects. These administrations can be given credit for uniting this country from one end to the other.

Some may say that during this period social planning was not up to the mark but we have to remember that during those days the demands of the population were not great. Almost every person at that time was a handyman capable of building his own home and a large proportion of the population owned the homes they built. During this period Conservative governments played an active part in the long-term economic development planning of the country.

Canadian Centennial

Throughout the period from the end of the first world war to date we have seen a continuing laissez-faire attitude on the part of Liberal administrations. There has been no leadership, no inspiration, no active role played in the development of our natural resources and the other things that are required to produce in 1967 the celebration which the hon. member seeks in this resolution. From administration to administration the government in this period thought it was carrying out its function when it doled out from time to time on a piecemeal basis some welfare benefits but it lacked the vision and the daring that was evident during the period of Sir John A. Macdonald's administration in this country. I might use these words:

> I don't think that free enterprise requires the government do nothing about economic conditions. Governments can—and I believe governments should —pursue fiscal and commercial policies which will encourage and stimulate enterprise and wise government policies can do a lot to maintain the rig.. kind of economic climate.

If my last two sentences should sound familiar to the hon. Leader of the Opposition (Mr. St. Laurent) I can only say that they are his words spoken at the annual convention of the Canadian Lumbermen's Association in Montreal on February 9, 1953. It is unfortunate that the last administration did not take these words to heart and do something about them. It is increasingly apparent that with vast new worlds being opened before us by science leadership is required in government and I can only say that it is just as well for this country that the results of the election on June 10 turned out as they did.

The tremendous head start which this country had because of its resources of oil, gas and coal and those materials upon which a highly industrialized nation bases its whole economy may no longer be the determining factor in maintaining our relative position among the nations of the world. As the Red Queen said to Alice, "It takes all the running you can do to keep in the same place and if you want to get somewhere else you must run at least twice as fast."

Can we honestly say that the solution to our problems is the establishment of a 100th anniversary committee which has been proposed by the hon. member? It seems to me that if we are prepared to agree to this type of resolution then in fact we are abdicating our position as the government of this country. The references it contains to housing, slum clearance, conservation, irrigation and highway construction are matters which the government of Canada must take upon itself to deal with in the proper manner either through legislative process or in conjunction with other levels of government.

I must confess that when I see the word "planning" contained in a resolution sponsored by a C.C.F. member I can only assume that socialist planning is intended and until such time as I have a clearer picture of the aims of that party I find it impossible to accept its type of economic and social planning for Canada.

As I have said before, I feel that the government faces a very crucial and complex task in the next ten years of Canada's history. It is going to require a high degree of responsibility, constant co-operation with all levels of government and co-operation on the part of the government with the people of the country in order to ensure that when 1967 is reached we can truly celebrate our 100th anniversary.

I am sure that the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) of this country is fully aware of those responsibilities. As I said in the debate in reply to the speech from the throne he intends to maintain a constant liaison with the people. He will see that the urgent social requirements of the people are realized. There is every indication that all of the items listed in the resolution will be dealt with in their turn as we meet them in the house. I notice that one of the first things mentioned is housing. I do not think we need to worry too much about what can be done by this administration in connection with housing. Only last week we heard the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Green) outline the program of the government to ensure that a greater number of people in the lower income group will have housing priced within their reach.

As a matter of fact, sir, there is evidence already of what has been accomplished. I hold in my hand the Globe and Mail of just this morning, indicating that house-building shows a 63 per cent gain in November. The article reads in part:

> House-building, after lagging severely in Canada last winter, has picked up smartly and in November was a thumping 63 per cent greater than in the same month of 1956.
> This increase was the second straight monthly gain, figures of MacLean Building Reports show. The result was that for October and November combined, house-building awards were up 44 per cent over the same 1956 period.
> Big reason for the improvement, notes the statistical agency, was the additional $150 million of mortgage money made available for lower-cost housing under the National Housing Act.

It seems to me, sir, we have adequate proof that we have no need to abdicate our position in connection with housing to a special committee. We can go on with other items. The resolution refers to public works programs. Why, sir, I have a list here of 31 projects which are under way in Canada right now, ranging in value anywhere from $1 million to $13 million or $14 million. The resolution refers to highway construction. Well, in highway construction, under the responsibility of this administration, the trans-Canada highway, we will spend $24,805,000 this year. It also refers to hospitals. My hon. friend in the Department of National Health and Welfare tells me that $53,452,200 will be spent in connection with hospital construction and other items dealing with hospitals. There is hardly an item mentioned here which does not come within the responsibility of this house. Why should we have a committee, sir? I notice that it covers other items such as conservation.

Mr. Haidasz: Conservation group in Toronto.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): For the information of the hon. member for Trinity, I may say that I have the report of the group in Toronto charged with conservation, the metropolitan Toronto region conservation authority, setting out the aims and objects of the group, indicating the plans and the hopes of this group and also indicating that in the actual physical planning required to be done on that level of government the people are well aware that it is within their ability to assess and provide the plans for such a program. As a matter of fact, sir, I cannot help but recall that during the time I have been here brief after brief was presented on behalf of those people without success. I say only this to you, sir, the attitude that has been shown by this administration in connection with its dealing with the provinces indicates that such items as this as well can be taken care of in the future. But, of course, this was the right time was it not, for this resolution? This was the time when, with a government in office only five months, the hon. member could line up a whole list of projects.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Will the hon. member permit a question? Is he aware of the fact that a resolution in exactly these same words has been on the order paper in three previous sessions?

Mr. Hamilton (York West): I am quite aware of that fact, sir, but it does not change my observation one bit. This was the time to have such a resolution, to confront a government that has been in office for five months and say: Oh, look at all these things that have to be done. When the hon. member stood up and spoke to his resolution there was never a word that these are items that might have been dealt with during the tenure of the last administration. There was no reference of that kind at all. Look at the situation now. A period of only five months has gone by, and already he is saying: Let us get on with the job.

It is the intention of this administration, Mr. Speaker, to take care of these matters to the point that when 1967 comes around all that will be necessary will be the fireworks. That is all we will need when the other things are done. The 20th century, the future belongs to Canada; yes, it does. This is the country of the young in heart, it does not matter how old you are. This is the country of the adventurous spirit. It is the country of all those who are prepared to work, firm in the knowledge that what we are creating is for Canadians, security for those who are here and boundless opportunities for succeeding generations. That is the vision and challenge and this government will meet it right down the line.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Laurier): Mr. Speaker, I am happy to take part in this debate on the resolution which is on the order paper in the name of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and to deal with it not in the manner which perhaps he would expect me to but in another manner which I shall mention in a moment. However, before going on to that let me say to the hon. member for York West (Mr. Hamilton) that I am a bit surprised at the attitude he has taken with reference to this resolution. I say that because when one reads it carefully he finds that after all the only thing which the hon. member asks is that consideration be given to the establishment of a centennial committee for the purpose of dealing with the economic development of this country. I remember the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) replying to a question which was asked him in the house concerning a matter of like nature and saying: "Yes, we are willing to consider anything". All that the resolution asks is the consideration of the establishment of a committee to deal with the things mentioned therein. That is why I have no difficulty in finding myself in support of this resolution.

The only doubt I may have had relating to it was in respect of that part which deals with the building of hospitals, to assist municipal projects and other public works, because I believe those are all of a provincial nature for the most part. But nonetheless, the hon. member has seen fit to suggest that on the committee there should be both provincial and federal representation. Be that as it may, that does not prevent me from believing that the motion is a good one, because I think that it will meet some of the needs that the house is unable to attend to during the time extending from now until the 100th anniversary of the birth of our country.

Canadian Centennial

I regret that the hon. member for York West has seen fit to interject a political note in his discussion of this resolution. I would have thought that following the lead of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre who because of the national character of the committee felt that he should cite prominent persons, who are neither of one political faith nor the other, in support of his resolution, the hon. member for York West would find himself in agreement with this resolution.

In any event, I want to take advantage of this opportunity to deal with another matter that has been engaging the attention of the country for some time, a project of national and international importance, a project which has contributed greatly to the social and economic development of our country. I refer, of course, to the great lakes-St. Lawrence seaway. I think the resolution now before the house is an opportune time to deal with it, first, because it took almost a century before it was possible to obtain approval of this great project and, next, because I am sure, and I hope the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) will agree with me, that it may be some time before it will be possible for me to discuss a matter of this nature on his estimates. They are not yet before the house and it may be some little time before they are. Let me say at once that I am pleased the minister saw fit to be in his seat while I participated in this discussion.

It seems to me, sir, that arising out of this resolution are some suggestions that I could profitably make. I should like to make to the Minister of Transport and to the government eight suggestions which are offered in no critical sense but in a constructive sense, eight suggestions which I believe will enhance the value of the project now under construction and which too will be of benefit to the country at large. But perhaps, sir, I may be allowed first of all to say something of a general nature about the project itself.

The St. Lawrence seaway is first and foremost a great engineering project. It is a great engineering project because dams are being built across rapids, power structures are being built many feet below the bed of the river, channels are being excavated through islands in the St. Lawrence and the whole regimen of the river in an area comprising 50 miles in length by three or four miles in width is being changed. It is also a great social achievement because in the area that I mentioned we have communities that are being inundated, two towns and six villages, churches, cemeteries, schools, whole communities that are being wiped out. I believe 23,000 acres are being flooded and about 6,500 people have to be moved. But it is significant that on a new shoreline on both sides of the international boundary line are arising new towns, new communities, modern and up to date in every sense and, what is equal to that, parks and parkways are being built on both sides of the international boundary line.

But the seaway is still more than that, sir. It is an international project. It is one thing for governments to get together and decide upon a course of conduct but it is another thing to put that governmental decision into execution. In order to do that, there are no less than four and perhaps more international bodies composed of an equal number of Canadians and Americans that are working in co-operation and collaboration with each other to put the decision of government into effect. There is the St. Lawrence river joint board of engineers which has jurisdiction over the construction phase of the power development. Their duties involve the approval prior to construction and supervision during construction of all works proposed to be constructed by the Hydro Electric Power Commission of Ontario and the power authority of the state of New York.

There is the international St. Lawrence river board of control whose objectives have been defined in the order of approval of the international joint commission and whose duties relate to water levels, the flow of water in the international rapids section and the regulation of the discharge of water from lake Ontario.

There is also the international lake Ontario board of engineers, appointed by the international joint commission, to study the level of the water. They have recommended a rather technical and complicated plan but one which I believe is being put into effect successfully.

Lastly, there is the international joint commission, a body that has been dealing with boundary water problems of this character for over 40 years, and it was, therefore, only logical that Canada and the United States should finally decide as they did that this was the proper medium through which to launch the power and seaway projects.

I mention these four boards which are putting into effect the decision of the Canadian and United States governments because it gives one an example of the co-operation and good will which can exist between two nations when they want a project of this nature approved. May I say just one word about the benefits which I believe will enure to the Canadian economy before I come to the suggestions. The first benefit is power; 2,200,000 horsepower of electrical energy in the international section is about to be developed. That represents close to 13 billion kilowatt hours of electricity per year.

When it is realized that this is the last area that the Ontario Hydro Electric Power Commission has for development in southern Ontario, one realizes what it means to the economy of the province of Ontario. Ontario has been forced on several occasions, and even recently, to the development of steam plants from coal, and we all know how costly those are. But here in the international section of the river is this large block of power, three times cheaper than the coal to generate, which unquestionably will have the effect, not only on our side of the line but also on the United States side, of developing and bringing industry to those areas.

Then there is the removal of the 112 mile 14-foot bottleneck that exists between Montreal and the foot of lake Ontario. The removal of this bottleneck will have the advantage of allowing 25-foot craft to move up the St. Lawrence to the ports of the great lakes, and for the first time it will permit lake vessels to go down the lakes to the port of Montreal and other St. Lawrence river ports. In earlier reports made by economists it has been estimated that the savings in transportation would amount to $48 million per year because of this benefit.

Then, of course, there is iron ore. I believe it is iron ore more than anything else that tilted the balance in favour of the development of this project. We always knew that it was a tremendous advantage to develop power but there was some hesitation on both sides of the line in an earlier stage in so far as the navigational aspects were concerned until such time as deposits of iron ore were discovered in Labrador and the Ungava region of northern Quebec.

It is hoped by many economists that, in the same way as the Mesabi ore came to the coal of Pennsylvania and brought about the existence of the great steel industry in the United States so also will the iron ore of Labrador and Quebec coming as it will up the St. Lawrence find a meeting point with power either in Ontario or Quebec—I believe more so in Quebec because of the greater power advantages that exist there—and thus establish a steel industry in that province.

Then, the fourth effect is that arising out of export and import trade. It has been said that until after the second world war there was little export or import trade on the St. Lawrence. After the war, because of the pioneering of Norwegian and Scandinavian interests, this trade, which is also known as great lakes overseas trade, began to take existence. In 1955 that trade amounted to about $760,000 per year but by 1956 it had gone over the million and it is believed by Canadian and United States economists that a few years after the seaway is opened this trade will be multiplied by three and within a short time by 25. It is this trade, therefore, which I believe has the greatest significance from the point of view of the ports along the seaway route, both on the great lakes and the St. Lawrence river.

Then, of course, there is the regard northward that it is hoped will be turned by industry and the general public of the mid-west states and of the eight states bordering on the seaway. There are eight states along the St. Lawrence route, the population of which represents about 35 per cent of that of the United States. These states have been turning their backs on the St. Lawrence. I do not say that in any derogatory sense, but geographically that has been the case. They have been looking toward the Erie canal and the Hudson river to move their traffic to New York city, and they have been looking to the Mississippi and the Illinois to take part of the trade down towards the ports of the gulf of Mexico. As I will indicate in a moment, it is hoped with every degree of assurance that that trade will now move by the St. Lawrence.

Finally, there is the industralization that is taking place along the seaway route, from the eastern extremity right up to the head of the lakes today. A measure of the success of the seaway is already apparent in the volume of investment that private industry has decided to make in order to take full advantage of one of the most revolutionary developments of our economy today. It has been said that more money is being spent by private industry in taking advantage of the present and future position of the seaway than in the building of both the power and navigation aspects of the project. I felt, sir, that before I made these suggestions that I am now about to make, I should preface my remarks by a statement of the effects of the seaway on the economy of Canada.

The first suggestion I should like to make is that an economic survey be made of the effect of the seaway upon the various regions of Canada; upon the ports and harbours along the seaway route, with particular reference to large concentrations of population such as the metropolitan area of Montreal and the area of Toronto and Hamilton. I make that suggestion because I believe the benefits of the seaway, as I have outlined them, will reflect upon all of the regions of Canada. Nonetheless, I think that survey should be made to ascertain what are the advantages to the central provinces; what are the advantages to the Atlantic provinces; what to the prairies, what to British Columbia, and, last but not least, what to that great area which lies to the north, the precambrian shield, because already tremendous mineral and metal development is beginning to take advantage of the seaway route.

I believe the survey should study and include something of the effect upon the ports extending from Rimouski, Seven Islands, Quebec, Three Rivers, Sorel—I jump over Montreal for the time being—Cornwall, Brockville, Kingston and Windsor—I pass over Toronto and Hamilton for the time being—to Sarnia and the lakehead. It seems to me that while the measure which the minister introduced concerning the port of Hamilton was a good one, and I felt I should support it because of the knowledge I had of conditions there, he will be getting requests from ports all across Canada for similar assistance. He already has a request of this nature from the lakehead. He, I believe with the Minister of Mines and Technical Surveys (Mr. Comtois) and others, went to Three Rivers and received representations there. Until a survey has been made of all these ports as to what kind of traffic will be most likely to go to one port of the seaway rather than the other, it seems to me that without an over-all policy of planning as that recommended here, disorder will follow.

Finally, it strikes me that the survey should have particular reference to the Metropolitan area of Montreal within a radius around that city of 100 miles, and similarly around metropolitan Toronto as far as Hamilton. I deal now particularly with Montreal because I represent a constituency in that city. I believe that the area of the city of Montreal within a radius of 100 miles will be tremendously affected by this development. The reason I suggest an economic study is that we have no such survey at the moment, other than the one which was prepared by the economic research division of the Department of Trade and Commerce in 1951 which was good at that time. It is seven years old, and much of it is based upon information which is out of date. I used it in the introduction of the legislation in the House of Commons in 1951, and I think conditions have changed so much that a great deal of this information is obsolete.

Then, may I draw to the attention of the house that the St. Lawrence seaway development corporation, the U.S. entity building the seaway had a United States economist, Dr. Hazard, prepare a survey in 1955 or 1956, I am not too sure—having to do with the effect of the seaway upon the economy of the United States. Then, I hold in my hand something which I believe is novel, but it is one of the finest studies I have ever read of the effects of the St. Lawrence seaway on grain movements. It was prepared by Joseph R. Hartley in conjunction with the Indiana University school of business and in co-operation with the Chigaco board of trade. It is one of the finest surveys on the movement of grain in the St. Lawrence, and I commend it to the minister's attention. I wish I had time to take six or seven excerpts from it which I have marked out, but I will take only one because I think the house will perhaps not have realized just what, in the eyes of this United States group, the seaway means to them. Dealing with grain, one of the recommendations says:

> The large volume of Canadian grain which already moves on the St. Lawrence canals will be extended somewhat by diversion from other routes. The relative changes will be much less than for United States grain. Total Canadian seaway exports will range 200 million bushels. The combined Canadian-American volume will be in the neighbourhood of 350 to 400 million bushels by the mid-1960's.

That is something we did not take into consideration when we were considering the project back in 1951. This survey says there will be no less than 200 million bushels of American grain going down the seaway. I quote from page two.

> By 1966, the seaway will be carrying from 150 million bushels to 200 million bushels of United States grain exports, assuming present levels of international grain trading will be sustained.

That is why I say all these ports along the route are bound to be affected if this statement is accurate, and there is no reason why it should not be so. I may, perhaps, be asked this question: why did not you have a survey done when you were in government? Well, we started, and we asked a prominent transportation economist of considerable renown in this country to prepare an economic survey of the effects of the seaway on the various parts of Canada. He proceeded with this work, but unfortunately he was interrupted in his task because his services were required with the royal commission on economic prospects, and when that was over and he was prepared to continue his research we appointed him to the tolls committee to discuss the question of tolls with a similar committee in the United States. My understanding is that a large portion of this work has already been done, and that it would not take too much time to complete it. It would be of tremendous use, to the minister and to his department and to the country at large.

The second suggestion I should like to make is that the 1947 board of engineers' report on the Lachine section be reviewed in the light of present events. This was a report tabled in the house in 1948. It dealt with the development of the Lachine section. It was hoped at that time it would be possible to develop Lachine jointly for power and navigation purposes. When I was with the seaway authority I made several trips to the office of the premier of Quebec. I was, of course, always cordially received, but I was not successful in convincing the premier of Quebec that power should be developed jointly with navigation in the Lachine section. The engineers whom we consulted felt at the time that it would mean a saving of some $25 million if this were done.

The suggestion I would make now is that while this report was prepared in part in co-operation with the Quebec Hydro Electric Power Commission it should be reviewed, and it seems to me that the minister or the government, should see whether something could not be salvaged from this report and whether it is not too late to develop power along with navigation on that section. Because if this were done I am sure there would be substantial savings not only to the province of Quebec but also to the federal government.

The third suggestion I have to make is that the St. Lawrence ship channel and Montreal harbour committee report of 1950 should be brought up to date. This, may I suggest to the house and to the minister particularly, is an extremely important report. The committee was set up in 1950 with four terms of reference. One dealt with the Saguenay river; another dealt with the general development of the ship channel at the time; still another with the improvement of the ship channel over a three or four year period; and a fourth term of reference had to do with the progressive development of the Montreal harbour after the completion of the seaway and power development in the Lachine section. The committee had, as its main purpose, to co-ordinate the work and responsibilities of the main groups in the area; the national harbours board, the Department of Transport, the Lachine canal and the St. Lawrence ship channel which is a division of the Department of Transport.

That committee submitted a general plan for a project to accomplish this co-ordination. It was fearful that low water levels in the port of Montreal might affect navigation in that port, and made certain recommendations. The recommendation which it made is contained under "main features" of the conclusions dealing with Montreal harbour, and perhaps I may quote the main features of that plan.

> The main features of the project are a dam with locks in the vicinity of Pointe aux Thembles and the maintenance of the low water level in the reach above the dam to an elevation approximately six feet above the extreme low water of 1934. The project will also entail the enlargement of the cross-sectional area of the river above the dam in order to reduce the cost of future harbour development on the south shore and to provide adequate depth for access both to this future development and to industrial areas that may be developed in that vicinity.

This report is dated 1950. It was prepared and made before the seaway construction had begun, and it was also made after the report of the board of engineers. I should like to draw the attention of the house to some of its features. The report is based upon the assumption that the power development in the Lachine section will be undertaken in one stage. It is also based on the assumption that the navigation channel would go into the La Prairie basin pool on the south side of the river at St. Catherine's bay, the area opposite Montreal, but would pass through the Victoria bridge at the north side of the river, with one lock immediately above the bridges and another slightly below the Victoria bridge. And, also, it was based on the assumption that the present Victoria bridge was to be abandoned for railway purposes and a new railway crossing constructed immediately above the present bridge and located partly on the dam and partly on the bridge structure.

To my mind this is perhaps the most important document dealing with the future development of the port of Montreal which has so far been published, and that is why I suggest that this report, which is still extremely important but which is somewhat out of date because of the fact that the ship channel is now on the south side of the river, should be brought up to date in the light of what has happened.

The fourth recommendation or suggestion is that the national harbours board should take immediate jurisdiction over the south shore area from the Indian lands at Caughnawaga to the present limits of the port of Montreal on both shores. As the minister knows, a great deal of land has been reclaimed by the seaway authority from above Jacques Cartier bridge to well below Longueuil. These areas are capable of industrial development and some industries are considering locating there at the present time.

Then there is the whole south shore from above Victoria bridge to the Indian lands of Caughnawaga, better known as the La Prairie basin, which are quite capable of development as a south shore harbour and industrial frontage, all directly accessible to rail as well as deep water transportation. Indeed, this area is today developing at a fast rate. I wish I had time to go into the amount of expenditure already made by industries which have been establishing themselves in this area. To mention but a few, there is a titanium industry, a number of trans-shipment docks, an ammonia industry and a new town called Candiac which has received a charter from the province of Quebec and which proposes to develop 2,500 acres of land with a population of 50,000 people. I spoke earlier of the steel industry where I understand land has been optioned by certain steel interests for the possible development of a metallurgical industry in that area.

Mr. McIvor: Would the hon. member allow a question? I understand that this seaway would never have been built and it very nearly did go wrong, but the Right Hon. C. D. Howe, meeting with United States officials said: "We appreciate your co-operation, but whether you co-operate or not, we are going ahead". When the hon. member is speaking of great men in Canada he should give honour to whom honour is due.

An hon. Member: What about Premier Frost?

Mr. Chevrier: I did not have notice of this question,—

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Put it on the order paper.

Mr. Chevrier: —but I think perhaps I could read from this survey which would deal with the hon. member's question. The survey was made by Joseph R. Hartley and is entitled "The Effects of the St. Lawrence Seaway on Grain Movements". He states in one of the recommendations as follows:

> Finally in 1951 Canada announced that she would build the seaway with or without our co-operation. This ultimatum had more effect upon congress than all the economic and political arguments that had ever been marshalled and congress speedily voted to go ahead.

This strong attitude was taken by the present Leader of the Opposition (Mr. St. Laurent) and the former minister of trade and commerce, both of whom played a most important part in advancing this project before our neighbours to the south.

Now if I may go on with my suggestion? What I want to see is an orderly completion of the seaway. It is possible to visualize an industrial zone identified with direct and common paths of power and transportation which will extend from the head of the international section at Prescott on the west, through the remade seaway valley of the river, eastward through Cornwall, Valleyfield, Beauharnois to Montreal, Longueuil, Boucherville, Varennes, Vercheres, and Sorel to Nicolet at the foot of lake Saint Pierre. This will be Eastern Canada's industrial "Gold Coast" and may be expected ultimately to be a prime centre of rail traffic in the St. Lawrence valley. That is why, since most of this zone will be in the La Prairie section, it becomes of utmost importance to see that the area is properly controlled and planned for future development. Furthermore, unless some body takes it over there is bound to be chaos. A committee has already been established comprised of various groups of people to deal with this very proposal and I hope one of the recommendations which it will make is that the national harbours board should take over that area. I hope the board will take it over, because industry which is now coming into that area will at least be able to know what it may expect in the future.

The fifth suggestion I have to make is that the seaway authority should be given title to the Beauharnois and Welland canals. After all, as my hon. friend the Minister of Transport knows, if tolls are to be collected there must be title in the authority collecting them. As it is now, I believe title to both the Beauharnois canal and the Welland canal is today vested in the Department of Transport. While under the act the authority would, I think, have in equity the right nonetheless to collect tolls, in my opinion it would be in the interests of good administration that the seaway authority be given title to these canals so that when the question of tolls arises they will not have someone raise the point, legal or technical, that they are not authorized to collect tolls on those two canals.

As the house knows, the seaway authority has title in the rest of the seaway because it received it through expropriations both in the La Prairie section and at Iroquois where that lock was opened recently.

The sixth suggestion I make is that a new bridge should be erected by the federal government between Montreal and the south shore, downstream from the Jacques Cartier bridge. The house will remember that when these matters were being discussed by the last parliament it was felt that the transportation facilities across the island of Montreal—at least from the island of Montreal to the south shore—were not sufficient at that time to meet traffic conditions. Giving heed to these suggestions, the federal government decided to build a bridge from Verdun across Nuns' island to the south shore. From the information I have been able to obtain the bridges as they now are and after they have been repaired, will have a traffic capacity of 7,500 motor cars per hour in each direction. This means 15,000 cars per hour and I am told what is required today is several times that amount. For that reason I believe another bridge, which was in fact recommended in the report of 1950 with which I dealt earlier, should be built downstream from the present Jacques Cartier bridge.

The seventh suggestion is that representations should be made to the province of Quebec to construct another bridge alongside the Mercier bridge. The Mercier bridge which links the island of Montreal with the south shore of Caughnawaga is the property of the province of Quebec and the seaway authority has already spent many millions of dollars in building new approaches to that bridge. As a matter of fact it was indicated to the seaway authority at the time they negotiated contracts with the provincial authorities and afterwards for the approaches that it was the intention of the Quebec government to build another bridge at some future time and that therefore we should make, not two approaches but several in case a decision of that nature should be made by the province. This we have done. Well, giving effect to these intentions and thinking of the announcement made by the provincial government that a new, fast, modern and up to date highway would be built from Montreal to the Laurentians, we did provide the funds for these new and up-to-date approaches to the Mercier bridge and the approaches, when completed, will be ready for another bridge should the province decide to take such a step. Representations should be made accordingly by the present government.

That is why I think the minister and others representing the government should approach the provincial authorities with a view to getting an additional bridge built alongside the Mercier bridge so that it will form a trunk in the highway going to the Laurentians. While I am on this question of bridges may I add that the national harbours board will, I am sure, want to give consideration to the addition of another lane to the Jacques Cartier bridge. There is room there for one such lane, and its construction should not be much longer delayed.

Mr. Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member but I must inform him his time has expired.

Mr. Chevrier: I have one more suggestion if I could add it—

Some hon. Members: Proceed.

Mr. Chevrier: The final suggestion is that immediate consideration should be given to the construction of additional tunnels or overhead bridges on the Lachine canal. I have just one word and I will resume my seat sir. The Lachine canal, very much like the Welland canal, is in a bad way from the point of view of traffic. One has only to go there during the peak hours such as noon or five o'clock to realize what a bottleneck there is over the Lachine canal which is clustered with industry on both sides.

The former government built two tunnels, one at St. Remi and the other at Atwater, in co-operation with the city of Montreal which made pretty substantial contributions to them. It seems to me that tunnels or overhead bridges over the Lachine canal to remove the traffic bottlenecks should be given serious consideration. These are the suggestions which I wanted to make. They are made, as the house can see, in an attempt to be helpful. They are made in a constructive way and I hope the minister and his officials will find it possible to give effect to them.

Mr. Charles Yuill (Jasper-Edson): Mr. Speaker, I listened with a great deal of interest to the discussion thus far and I would like to place myself in the position of being in support of this resolution. I think the resolution is an excellent one because it deals with many phases of our social and economic development. Most of the problems that are embraced in the resolution are national in scope but although some appear to be national problems they seem to take on a local complexion because of their nature and there are some that could best be served by the joint action of the federal and provincial governments.

I have in my hand a copy of an article taken from Maclean's magazine of December 7, 1957, at page 1 entitled, "1967 Birthday Party—A Preview of Our Plans". The article reads:

> It is only ten years until we celebrate our 100th birthday. What kind of party will we have? Here are some guesses by F. A. Hamilton, Minister of Northern Affairs and National Resources who is planning at long range Confederation Year—1967.
> It will last a whole year, not just the weekend we now devote to Dominion Day. "The emphasis on Dominion Day in the past has been too much on baseball and not enough on national background," says Hamilton. "We want mass participation in the centennial. We want a rededication of the Canadian people—a resurgence of the national conscience."

The minister is quoted as having indicated:

> With the trans-Canada highway completed, Canada will open a new one—or series of highways—to the Arctic—
> Municipalities and provinces will be urged to plan and complete major works so that they come to fruition and can be dedicated in confederation year.

This is the sentence that particularly appeals to me because it is pertinent to what I expect to say. It reads:

> A re-examination of Canadian history at every level—down to the smallest backwoods community—will be encouraged with the idea of bringing every Canadian closer to his origin.

The minister's statement gives me some ground for hope that what I have to say will not fall on deaf ears in spite of the attitude displayed by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Hamilton). I think the minister's statement is indicative of the fact that he senses that we have problems and in his capacity he is willing to come to grips with them and I wish to congratulate him on that score.

With regard to the subject of highways mentioned in the resolution I would like to command to the government's consideration a very necessary addition to our trans-Canada highway system, namely the Yellowhead route. This is the shortest possible route between Vancouver and Winnipeg and I think it could be described as the missing link in the program of the trans-Canada highway. Certainly it serves the best interests of thousands of people in northern British Columbia and Alberta and Saskatchewan as well. At the present time the route has been practically all built, particularly in Alberta from Jasper, to the east gate of Jasper park and from there to the Saskatchewan border, where there is a standard highway second to none. With very few exceptions you will find the same condition in Saskatchewan. In Manitoba you will also find a condition that lends itself very generously to this route. The only part that is left for the attention of the federal government is a stretch approximately 17 miles in length that lies within Jasper national park between the town of Jasper and the west gate known as Yellowhead.

To a very large degree the government of the province of British Columbia has carried out its commitments in the building of the highway from that point to Kamloops. When this road is built it is estimated that there will be an additional 400,000 cars passing through Jasper national park. If that is so it is indicative of the services that will normally be rendered to the people in the northern part of British Columbia and Alberta particularly. I think if one examines it a little more closely one would have to agree that there will be a considerable source of revenue accruing from that additional tourist trade. If one considers only, the $2 licence fee that is paid for entering the park one would find it would go a long way towards meeting the cost of building the short link within the park.

The increased volume of tourists passing through the park points up something that appears to me to have been neglected within the Jasper national park and the town of Jasper in particular. I refer to the public relations that should exist between the authorities and the people of the town of Jasper. This should bring home forcibly to the park administration the need for the fullest understanding and co-operation between the people of Jasper and those charged with the responsibilities of administering to their needs. There are many problems in public relations existing in the town of Jasper at the present time and these will be accentuated as the volume of tourist trade grows. Some towns within the national parks are considered children of necessity not convenience and I think this is true of Jasper.

I know a little bit about Jasper national park because I lived there at the end of the first war. At that time it had little or no appeal as a tourist attraction. The only way you could get there was by railroad and the only tourists to whom it would likely appeal would be those who were prepared to go in by train and then hire guides with saddle or pack horses who would go into the wilds and enjoy nature in the rough. When our provincial government saw fit to build a road at a cost of several million dollars it changed the picture. There is no problem now as far as traffic is concerned and one of the finest highways in Canada runs right to the park gate. For that reason, of course, tourist trade has grown by leaps and bounds.

If we are to celebrate the centennial in the right way, some of the things which are so necessary and so important to the people who are charged with the responsibility of making the tourist's visit a pleasant one should be given some consideration by the government. There should be a desire to understand their problems a little better and, if and when possible, to apply the milk of human kindness to the administration.

In the town of Jasper they have many problems that must have some consideration. As the tourist trade grew naturally it posed additional problems for the people of the town of Jasper. It is true that the parks authorities had their own responsibilities with respect to providing better roads, better accommodation for the tourists, and so on, but without the co-operation of the people of the town of Jasper the tourist trade would of necessity lose its appeal overnight. If it were not for the people and for the all-out effort they put in as good-will ambassadors the park would not be the success it is today.

When the people moved into Jasper they were, as the minister suggested, there more or less on sufferance. Perhaps there is an element of truth in that, but without these people, as I have said before, the tourist appeal certainly would not be there. Because of the peculiar regulations that obtain in the parks, when people move into the town of Jasper they are forfeiting in reality their Canadian freedom because they have no voice at all in the management of the local affairs. They have no voice in the amount of taxes levied or in the disposition of the tax money. There are gross inequalities in land rental; there are obvious penalties to those assessed on a percentage of gross income as compared with those who are not. There are obviously injustices all the way down the line.

I know of a case where a man built a fully modern home but because he was just outside the town limits of the town of Jasper he was denied the right to live in his own home for five months of the year. That is something that could be easily adjusted. Those in Jasper who have their own homes and businesses have no security of land tenancy. They are dependent upon the whims of the department in respect of rental of ground leases. It depends upon whether they have a lease or are there on licence. The maximum time is 60 days in the case of a licence and a maximum of 42 years in the case of land rental lease. It puts these people in a pretty precarious position when, regardless of their contribution to the community, they are subject at all times to the peculiar whims of those concerned. If you dare bring the wrath of the executive down on your head you are a marked man and as a consequence you must move out.

The existing difficulties under which the citizens in the national parks now live could be corrected and eliminated by a little closer liaison between the policy-making officials and the residents of the national parks. One way to do that would be to appoint a western supervisor, a man who lives in that country and knows what conditions are. Rather than sending the problems 2,500 miles away to be dealt with by people who never even saw Jasper park and know nothing about the conditions prevailing at the local level, it would be fitting and very desirable to appoint a western supervisor who would have authority to correct the injustices and inadequacies that prevail.

The citizens of Jasper have submitted a request to the minister in the form of a resolution that they be given the right to set up within their park or within their town a municipal system that would give them some measure of autonomy. It would give them the right to have some voice in the spending of the tax money that is taken from them. I know the minister does not see it as I do, but I believe there is still room for reconciliation when you get down to brass tacks.

I have a copy of the reply that was sent in answer to the request, and it deals with the points that I have brought up. I do not want to delve into this too much at this time but there is a certain amount of misunderstanding prevailing and I think this is the feeling of the people of Jasper park. I would gather from the minister's letter that he is of the opinion that they will take over the management of the park, but I do not see it that way at all. All they want at any time is to have a voice in the management of their own affairs. I think it is a reasonable request. Whether or not it would be necessary to go to the extreme of setting up an independent municipality within Jasper national park I cannot say. I do not think it is necessary. I think that by a proper understanding, by a more kindly and humane attitude on the part of the authorities, many of the problems that are very serious so far as the people are concerned could be adjusted and rectified to the point where we would have a much higher standard of public relations.

I am hoping that the minister will make it a point to go out to Jasper, as he has promised to do. He will meet some of the finest people in the world, people who are not grabbing for everything for themselves. All they want today is to get a square deal and have the right to live as Canadian citizens, not as third-grade citizens. So far as their own destiny is concerned, they are actually worse off than the Indians on the reserves. No consideration is shown them so far as their freedom of movement is concerned.

Mr. Winch: What has this to do with resolution No. 3?

Mr. Yuill: I think it has a lot to do with it. I think this glorious centennial presents an opportunity to deal with some of the problems which are prevalent and which should be taken care of in a humanitarian way. I think it is relevant, but I am going to leave the matter at that point. I know that when the minister visits the area and has some of these problems brought to his attention on the local level he will be willing and ready to take a new look.

Mr. Alexander Best (Halton): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in the debate on the resolution now before us, and to speak for the first time in the house I should like to congratulate you, rather tardily I admit, on the high office and time-honoured traditions to which you have succeeded. Through you, Mr. Deputy Speaker, I should like to congratulate the Speaker as well on the fine exercise of his powers, his great discretion and his very considerable humour and wide and human tolerance in the past eight weeks. Through you, sir, I would extend to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the gratitude of all members of the house for the vigour and dispatch with which they carried out their duties.

I could not talk further without referring to my predecessor in this house, Marion Sybil Bennett, member for Halton from August 10, 1953 until her death on November 12 just a year ago. Many of you knew her, valued her keen ability, her warm personality and glimpsed the unsurpassable bravery with which she faced her long and terrible illness. If I can bring to you only a fraction of her insight and her dedication to the affairs of this house, I will indeed be grateful and content.

I would suggest, sir, that the resolution before us today is somewhat deceptive in its implications. I have read it, and examined it a number of times. I have listened with considerable interest to the remarks of the various members who have spoken on it this afternoon. We have just heard the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Yuill) and before him the hon. member for Laurier (Mr. Chevrier) who discussed various St. Lawrence seaway problems of considerable interest and made a number of suggestions, largely based on fact, which I would say contained much of interest. I would add, however, and I think hon. members on the government side of the house would certainly agree, that the statement of the hon. member for Laurier, that only consideration is required for this resolution, has in it a somewhat interesting meaning.

I can quite understand the reference by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Hamilton) to the abdication of our position of responsibility if we are prepared to accept the resolution. I feel that is just what we would be doing, and I noted the rather pious references to political considerations by the hon. member for Laurier when commenting on these suggestions. I would say that the resolution expresses the sentiments of all of us, but in large part sentiments, and not ideas based on hard, sound thinking and constructive practice having regard to the way the resolution is couched at the present time.

The sentiments of our party are, that we could not support the idea of a committee which would take over in a rather vast and amorphous form functions of the house, the special committees, and of the cabinet, and to deal with all the matters that come within the breadth of this omnibus resolution. It has much of interest in it, but, as the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) said in speaking of other things the other day, it would make a caricature of parliament if we were to support it at this time.

I was interested in the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) when introducing the resolution. The debt of all of us in this country to Sir John Alexander Macdonald is one that is well remembered. The hon. member mentioned that the resolution has been on the order paper for the past three or four sessions and quoted certain newspaper articles at some length. For instance, he referred to an article in the Ottawa Journal by Mr. Norman Smith in support of his contention that consideration should now be given. But I would draw to the attention of all hon. members that Mr. Norman Smith's article had to do with a plan for Canada's birthday and concerned planning for a specific occasion, for the observation of this anniversary, and not for a vast host of projects which come rightly within the responsibility of the government, the cabinet, and parliament working each day and each year in the next ten years.

That, to my mind, is the obvious and very conclusive difference in our thinking. This great omnibus resolution has tremendous sentimental appeal, but is put in such a manner that we could not possibly agree with it. I would be quite willing to say that we should have the Queen here, which would be a wonderful thing, that we should have the Olympic games, a NATO meeting and music festivals, but these are not the things mentioned in the resolution before us at the moment. The things to which I have referred should be matters for consideration by a definitely established anniversary committee.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre referred to a speech by the former prime minister at Hamilton, Ontario, last March and the somewhat, shall we say, coloured words of the Toronto Daily Star. But here again we are dealing with generalities and nothing but generalities and sentiments, which are common, of course, to Canadians all across the country. Reference was made also to the words of the present Prime Minister in the blue and white election document which we have seen waved in the house from time to time. Surely all Canadians agree that Canada has a great future, but this resolution is not the proper means by which to bring it about. We have seen this fine document put out by our party on many occasions. I believe the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Murphy) has read from it from time to time. In view of his dedication to the document and the useful knowledge that he must have gained from reading it, we sometimes wonder why he does not cross the floor of the house. Let us, however, look at the problem in more detail.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Have you read it yourself?

Mr. Best: Oh, very much so. The eight weeks that have passed since the historic opening of parliament by Her Majesty the Queen have been most heartening and fruitful. From the wording of the resolution one would perhaps think not.

Mr. Winch: I understand now why it has taken you two months to get to your feet.

Mr. Hamilton (York West): That is uncalled for.

Mr. Best: It seems to me that in the past the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. Winch) has said that he is a socialist and therefore, he is practical. I would say, sir, that this resolution is the greatest example of impracticality that I have seen in my short time in the house.

Mr. Winch: I hope you will be here when I speak.

An hon. Member: Sit down.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): All that is wrong with it is that the Conservatives did not move it.

Mr. Best: Under the leadership of the Prime Minister and the members of his cabinet, we have seen the unveiling of a program of wise and constructive policies long since due. We would hope, Mr. Speaker, that this is only a beginning, that vigorous and far-reaching projects will be planned for the future and that the heavy burdens of cabinet responsibility and administration will not paralyse initiative and vision as they have for so many years past.

Let us look at this resolution in a more specific way. The county of Halton, which I have the honour to represent, is an old and historic riding, unchanged since confederation these last 90 years. Within its boundaries, it contains almost every conceivable variety of occupation and outlook. It is, in many respects, a detailed cross section of eastern Canada. The effects of the St. Lawrence seaway, of the automobile and aircraft industries, of agriculture, of construction, the vast problems of roads and services and above all of education, are brought together and felt more keenly, perhaps, in my riding than in most others.

For many years the population growth of our country, and my riding, for they are identical, has been the largest in Ontario, closely followed by that of Peel, whose hon. member has recently led our NATO delegation to Paris. Together our ridings stretch from Toronto to Hamilton, from the shores of lake Ontario to the higher land miles to the north. Halton is the home of the giant Ford assembly plant, as well as the location of a host of smaller industries; the residence of thousands of workers commuting to the aircraft factories at Malton and the employees in the Hamilton and Toronto areas. Through our lands pass the major arteries of transportation, superhighways and many lines of both major railway companies. The vast and rapid growth of population has brought with it numerous problems of servicing and safety. The extension of postal deliveries and the improvement and gradual elimination of level crossings are matters which demand close attention.

We may be more aware than most of the necessity for change and planning that this resolution indicates. As a matter of fact, I would feel that the greatest anniversary committee—possibly I am prejudiced in this—could be, and will be, the same Conservative government that is sitting here now, giving leadership, unity, ideals and action, as it did 100 years before in the heroic days of Macdonald and Cartier.

If I may be pardoned for a few moments, sir. I have always felt, as I have strolled in the years past and now down that sort of philosopher's walk past the statue of Macdonald, a feeling of reverence and history, and in the light and the glow of that great picture hanging in the west end of this building, the confidence in Canada that must have been his. How came it to such a man, troubled and trialed by personal problems and great burdens, to take into his hands time and time again the task of uniting this far-flung land. We are now dedicated to do the same thing.

The government may be congratulated, I feel, on a return to a policy of national unity. The measures outlined in the throne speech, and gradually implemented in succeeding weeks convey the sincerity of this approach. I think we can now see that the fascinating array, this furious play within a play from time to time on benches opposite, can be dismissed as mere auditions for a January spectacle. All parts of the country alike must share in the prosperity of Canada, and through a broad and unbiased national outlook this will be achieved. The proposed resolution and suggested committee are in exact agreement with the very things we are at present doing. The very opening day of this session, in the words of Her Majesty, this government gave notice of its intention of correcting much of the economic imbalance inherited from the previous administration. The bill we have passed effecting cash advances for farm-stored grain will go some distance in aiding the static and reduced economy of the prairie farmer. It will affect my county and bring timely employment and increased business right across the nation, but it will take some years to change, in more basic fashion, the neglectful loss of markets and the subsidized competition from neighbour countries we have experienced from time to time.

We know, sir, that bills will soon be brought down to aid the mixed agricultural areas of the east, where the farmer has not yet quite resigned himself to the position of an often forgotten figure. The notice of legislation to ensure permanent floor prices is welcomed indeed, and we know that the details will be rapidly worked out and put into effect. One of the earliest actions of this government was to take steps to regulate the importation of turkeys and fowl from the United States. This measure has been of great value to the poultry industry, and many people engaged in it in my county. Halton lays claim to some of the richest mixed farming land in eastern Canada. Our livestock industry, predominantly dairy, serves millions of people in the nearby urban centres. Choice fruit and market garden land in considerable acreage predominates the southern end of our county. For years, the dumping of United States products has worked great hardship on these people, and it is our sincere hope that some changes will soon be forthcoming. As mentioned in the throne speech, farmers must be assured of a fair share of the national income and means that will be brought about to provide greater price stability are awaited with keen interest.

There is another matter which might be added to the general planning program and policies which the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre makes in his resolution. In the great meeting place of producers and consumers of agricultural products in the Toronto-Hamilton area, and the counties of Halton and Peel, there has been a long and growing demand for changes in our livestock processing methods. The humane slaughter of food animals has become general in most civilized countries of the world, but Canada and the United States lag far behind. I would call on the federal government at this time, Mr. Speaker, to enact or enforce legislation, to co-operate in every way with the provincial governments whose chief responsibility it is, to remedy this difficult and unnecessary situation. I realize a study of this matter is now taking place, and we can only hope that it will be effective in the near future.

The proposed resolution mentions the need for planning in the fields of conservation, irrigation and power projects. These have long been objectives of the Conservative party as well, and definite steps have been taken to put these plans into practice. It is hoped that the royal commission on energy will give us long-range recommendations for charting our future plans. The announcement of financial assistance for the maritimes through aid for construction of the Beechwood project in New Brunswick, and the intention to proceed as soon as possible, as the Prime Minister has said from time to time, with the Columbia river and South Saskatchewan dam projects, all show the intent and broad planning of this government.

My hon. friend mentioned the need for both federal and provincial representatives on the proposed committee. There has been, perhaps, no more important move of the present government than the calling of the dominion-provincial conference which met just two weeks ago today. There was seen in that two-day meeting I would suggest, sir, under that great map of Canada and that long, greying picture of the fathers of confederation, a spirit of co-operation and mutual interest that had not been displayed for a long, long time. This government listened; it did not tell. This was just the beginning—

Mr. Pickersgill: That is quite true.

Mr. Best: Yes, it listened; it did not tell.

Mr. Pickersgill: No one learned anything.

Mr. Best: This was just the beginning of a fairer and more just plan for each and every province, a beginning of a more unified and unitedly prosperous country. This, then, is the beginning once again, through practical and sensible channels, of the intention and spirit of that part of my hon. friend's resolution. This government, working with the provinces in normal and tested channels, is already carrying out its plans and policies.

The hon. member's resolution mentions the economic development of this country. Throughout the past year, unnecessary hardship has been caused by the so-called tight money policy. This measure brought on supposedly to curb inflation and regulate the rapid expansion of this country almost crushed many sections of our economy and has caused great hardship in my own riding. Almost overnight, the former government restricted and curbed, above all else, small businessmen, an additional burden being added to the already heavy load that these people have shouldered. I am confident that the raising of the lowest tax bracket for small businessmen from 20 to 25 thousand announced by the Minister of Finance last Friday evening, is a step in the right direction, and should greatly encourage the 2,000 odd enterprises which will be affected.

We have noticed in recent weeks that the gradual and general downward trend of interest rates is continuing, and we hope this bill will be even more noticeable in the future. The tight money policy, child as it was of the previous government, has meant a much reduced rate of home building in my riding, tremendous difficulties for our municipalities, and considerable unemployment. Let the hon. gentlemen opposite consider, as they stir their dark cauldrons of fear and foreboding that they spawned these troubles of unemployment, and that the linkage is direct and unmistakable.

The mortgage money made available by our government on two occasions has helped, and will help, the housing situation very considerably. The resolution before us talks of housing and slum clearance, and we intend to go forward and face these problems. The government's decisions to lower down payment requirements on new low cost homes, and ease income restrictions, were indeed wise. We hope that further moves and reorganizations in the field of low cost housing are planned for the future. This will all be part of the national development policy that we have promised the people of this country, and which will bring increased employment and a thorough development of our country's resources by, and for, Canadians. This policy is now beginning to unfold, and makes unnecessary, by its very action and practicability, the intent of the hon. member's resolution.

The social development of Canada, as observed in the resolution before us, is of great importance. Our party believes in social benefits of a just and reasonable nature, and we have taken certain preliminary steps to change and modify our present methods.

Increased pensions for senior citizens will greatly aid our older people a well as their children, who are in many cases responsible for young families, to gain a foothold themselves, and support their parents as well. The reduction of the residence requirement from 20 to 10 years partially removes a serious discrimination against our new Canadians. We have in Halton some 7,000 of these people who have come to Canada in the last few years, bringing with them specialized skills and knowledge, and whose development, in a material sense, has not cost us the inevitable subsidization in education, health and other fields, which most of us have experienced. These measures are a step in the right direction, a prelude to what we hope will be a comprehensive and thorough reassessment of our social security measures.

The increased war veterans allowances are merely the due of men who saved our country in many times past, and a credit to the Canadian Legion, which plays a large and constructive role in our various communities.

The recent difficult and courageous decision by the cabinet to continue the CF-105 production program at Malton has aided the economy of my county a good deal—and I note that sectional economy is mentioned in the resolution. There is every evidence that an extension of conventional aircraft and general military development will be necessary for some years to come. Utterances from Russia, to the effect that missiles will present the only solutions to offensive or defensive operations, are not borne out, even by the Russians themselves. Their large build-up of submarines and other conventional military material indicates a very definite balance or reliance on their part, on both the new strategy of missiles, and the older methods which have been used up to now.

I wonder, from time to time, Mr. Speaker, just why it is that we have not been further ahead in various military fields, and why we should face recurrent and convulsive shocks in our employment and working program at Malton, several thousand of whose workers live in my own county. I hope it will not be written that we were too late, and that the former government's neglect both of diversification in the economic sense and lack of vision in the military field at Malton and its allied industries was a measure of our loss of leadership and freewill.

Possibly, but improbably, Mr. Speaker, the Liberal party opposite is planning a new national development policy in accordance with this resolution. The two chief exponents of that party, one to the left and one to the right, equally placed about their leader, are faring forth these days in search of plunder.

One to the east, and one to the west a curious set of twins, the remnant of the brass put out to grass, and the farther they go, it seems, the greener it gets.

Somewhere along the road, Mr. Speaker, the Liberal party lost its small 'l' liberalism and ended up as a large "L" Liberal shell with nothing much inside. So, Mr. Speaker,—

Mr. Byrne: You haven't done anything.

Mr. Carter: You have read all your speech.

Mr. Best: I should like to refer to this week's issue of Weekend magazine, the issue dated November 30, because it contains some interesting questions, and answers by the hon. member for Algoma East (Mr. Pearson).

Mr. Dupuis: Get back to the resolution.

Mr. Best: I see that this article has been read by some hon. members opposite, but it provides some interesting quotations on the history of the Liberal party.

Mr. Winch: Have you been offered the Nobel prize yet?

Mr. Best: Liberalism means, to the hon. member for Algoma East, change, reform, and improvement. These, he says, are the essentials of Liberalism. Again I quote:

> I would like to think that over the years the Liberal party with a capital "L" has been the best embodiment of that liberal philosophy with a small "l".

I would submit, Mr. Speaker,—the hon. member for Bonavista-Twillingate (Mr. Pickersgill) to the contrary—that something must have gone wrong along the road, and that the party with the small "l" liberalism, in its best sense, is the party that represents progress, future and vision in this country, today sitting on your right hand.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pickersgill: Perhaps the hon. member would permit me to ask him a question—

Mr. Hees: Go back to your fish nets. Sit down.

Mr. Pickersgill: —I would like to ask him a question since he has taken—

Mr. Hodgson: This is his first speech, what is wrong with you? Just cannot take it, eh?

Mr. Pickersgill: No, no, but I am just asking if he will permit a question. If the hon. gentleman who is speaking wishes me to sit down I will.

Mr. Best: I will certainly permit a question.

Mr. Pickersgill: I think those of us on this side of the house who have listened with interest to the hon. gentleman's speech upon which I congratulate him—I think he has caught the ear of the house and even my rather deaf ear—but I think most of us would be a great deal more interested in the hon. gentleman's own definition of conservatism than in hearing repeated the excellent definition of liberalism of my colleague from Algoma East.

Mr. Best: I will be delighted, Mr. Speaker, to reply to the hon. gentleman's question. The definition of conservatism, as I see it today, is in the actions and programs that this government in the last five months has brought before this house.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Hees: You asked for it. You asked for it.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Plus rising unemployment.

An hon. Member: That is all you can talk about.

Mr. Best: That is a problem, definitely a problem and, as I have said, a legacy which comes from the other side of the house. We believe in a just system of social security, of helping people to help themselves, in the form of tax reductions, particularly for those younger families with children and—as we saw the other evening—the aid of small businessmen, and greater unification of all Canada through the encouragement of economic projects in various distressed areas. All this I call economic reform, which is a great and far change from the colourless and inert policies of the previous administration.

Mr. Pickersgill: Just the same policies.

Mr. Best: And let us look at the side other than the economic standpoint. We are a party of reform because we have, and intend to still further, return to the individual in this country those rights and privileges which have gradually slipped away, and to return to parliament, the elected voice of the people, the rights and privileges which have so largely disappeared in the last few years.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Pickersgill: Like the right to have a budget.

Mr. Best: I think the hon. gentleman knows quite well what I mean. The record is clear.

Mr. Byrne: It is; it is very clear.

Mr. Best: There is a matter which is a very great problem, and is indeed most serious. This possibly was discussed too much just a week ago, and it has to do with the situation in the automobile industry. We realize the situation is a rather serious one. The Ford Motor Company which has its general assembly plant in my riding in the town of Oakville has laid off some 2,400 workers, 1,400 of those being employed at the Oakville plant.

Mr. Byrne: Do not say they are laid off; temporarily retired would be a better way of describing them.

Mr. Best: Well, temporarily retired. The hon. gentleman opposite might be in a rather difficult position, and I would suggest that he use some caution in the next few months when he may find himself permanently retired.

Mr. Hees: You have got someone a little bit too tough for you here.

Mr. Best: However, this situation at Ford is somewhat different from the other two automobile companies. Chrysler Corporation and General Motors announced a complete cessation or suspension of production for several days last week due to newspaper reports which were not founded on any official statement whatsoever from this government. The situation is, if my memory serves me correctly, that General Motors shut its whole plant on Monday and Tuesday of last week and Chrysler Corporation on Monday, Tuesday, Wednesday and Thursday of last week and, I believe, for the same four days of this present week. We felt that these two companies were using somewhat of a big stick technique on the present government and this distressed us very considerably. The situation of course at Ford, which has a plant in my own riding, has been somewhat different. Their announcement of a layoff of 2,400 workers was made prior to any problem with respect to this so-called newspaper rumour, and it was, as they had indicated at that time, due to a definite shrinkage in the buying market here in Canada. They have, in my opinion, acted with much more responsibility.

I would say that the measure announced in the cutting of the excise tax the other evening by the hon. the Minister of Finance was a very definite help to the industry. I hope it will be larger in the future, I must admit, but one point I would like to bring out in this chamber is that the announcement of the Minister of National Revenue (Mr Nowlan) just a week ago this Monday night, was an unprecedented step which was most welcome to the whole automobile industry. This government set a new pattern in stating that tax reductions, if they were made, would be reflected by the industry and that the various dealers involved would not be penalized for having purchased new cars before the time of the announcement. That to my mind was a tremendously important step, a wholly new step in the concept of taxation.

Mr. Speaker, may I call it six o'clock at this time?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. C. W. Carter (Burin-Burgeo): Mr. Speaker, the list of improved services mentioned by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) together with his cheerful little quotation from Browning that "the best is yet to be" and the further quotation which I believe originated with the leader of our party to the effect that we should be looking forward to "challenging and adventurous goals"—I think those were his words—have encouraged me to take this opportunity to make one suggestion to the government as an implementation of this resolution. I am sorry that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Hees) is not in his seat at the present time because the suggestion I am about to make concerns his department and a government agency which reports to parliament through him.

My suggestion is that the cattle boat the M/V Burin operated by the Canadian National Railways to carry passengers and mail in that section of my riding known as Placentia Bay be replaced by a more suitable vessel somewhat more in keeping with human dignity and the age in which we live. This boat was built as a cargo boat. It has life-saving equipment for only 34 persons and when the number of passengers and crew exceed that total the remainder have to be left behind. There are eight beds on the ship which are usually allocated to women and children and in addition to that there are eight bunks which are allocated to male travellers. The rest of the passengers must sit up and find a place to park themselves wherever they can. In the main this consists of sitting crouched on a narrow bench in the dining room and if that room happens to be filled they must crouch on their luggage in the narrow corridor. Those who cannot find accommodation there have to stand up outside on the deck exposed to the elements. I have personally seen passengers—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I have been looking at the resolution we are debating trying to discover how the hon. member relates his remarks to the establishment of a 100th anniversary committee. I hope he will come to that without too much delay.

Mr. Carter: I am relating it, Mr. Speaker, to a suggested improvement in services. We had a discussion on the St. Lawrence seaway which is a means of communication and the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre himself listed a number of services which he would like to see improved. I think he emphasized the fact that in connection with this celebration we should do something more concrete than merely setting off a lot of firecrackers and our efforts should be directed toward and take the form of an improvement in the standard of living, communications and all of the fields affecting our fellow men. It is with that in mind that I present this suggestion to the government at this time.

The hardships which my constituents in this area have to undergo are really indescribable. I have seen people standing up all night exposed to rain and the elements with no shelter whatever. I heard of a man who had to wash his child's face in the morning with a handkerchief dipped in salt water. The accommodation on this ship is really a disgrace not only to the Canadian National Railways but also to this government and to Canada itself. If we are going to make any progress towards improving the service one requirement will be a change in the Canada Shipping Act in order to set up minimum standards of accommodation on ships that carry overnight passengers.

What I have said up to this point is no reflection whatever upon the captain or the crew of that ship. There are no better seamen in the world and it would be difficult to find kindlier individuals. I know from personal experience the tremendous handicaps they have to undergo. I have seen them give up their beds in the night to accommodate women and children who had no other shelter. I have known from personal experience that the captain has not gone to bed from the time he left port on Monday morning until the following Wednesday and I have seen him leave port on Wednesday night and not get to bed again until Friday. There is no ship in the Canadian National Railways service travelling more continuously than the particular ship to which I am referring at this time.

Some time ago I asked a question in this house of the Minister of Transport as to when we might expect some improvement in the service given by this ship and he was good enough to reply some time later that he had discussed the matter with the management of the Canadian National Railways and they were hoping to improve the service in the near future. Shortly after that this old tub ran aground and we hoped this would be the end of her career as a passenger ship but I see from recent press reports that she is now undergoing repairs and the intention is to reinstate her in that service. The continued use of this boat in that particular service is a prime example of man's inhumanity to man.

It has reduced my constituents not to second-class citizens but to tenth-class citizens. Such a service is not given by the Canadian National Railways in any other part of Newfoundland, nor in any other part of Canada. It would not be tolerated in any other part of Canada. I doubt whether there is any service to parallel this one in the degradation of human beings to be found anywhere else in the civilized world. For the past eight years I have protested directly to the Canadian National Railways in the railway committee room and in this house against this discrimination but all to no avail.

I may say, Mr. Speaker, there is no excuse for the Canadian National Railways refusing to improve this service. I have been looking back over the files and I found that as far back as March 30, 1950, when I was a member of the railway committee and a bit of a greenhorn around this place, I submitted a brief to the railway committee which was printed as appendix B, pages 270 to 275, of the proceedings of that day. I should like to read the last paragraph of the statement which preceded the list of questions which I put to the management of the railway. It reads as follows:

> Either the top management of the Canadian National Railways are not sufficiently conversant with the nature of the problems and difficulties and the special requirements that are needed to effect an improvement, or else they are not sufficiently sympathetic. We all know that reorganization and improvement take time, but a year has already passed and the conditions described above have not been alleviated, and it is necessary to start at once in order to achieve improvement in two or three years time. It is for the express purpose of bringing to the attention of the Minister of Transport and the top management of Canadian National Railways the special needs and requirements of our Newfoundland province, as well as to ascertain what progress has already been made in meeting these requirements, that I now table the attached questions.

Then followed the whole list of questions requesting information about the service. Then, again, on April 20, 1951, when I made what was supposed to have been my maiden speech in this house, I touched on the matter again. Hon. members will recall that my first efforts on the floor of this house were in support of my then colleague, Mr. Gordon Higgins, who represented St. John's East, and sat just about in this place on this side at that time. He introduced a bill about turrs, a seabird with which we were concerned at the time, and I rose in my place and supported his request, but that happened to precede my prepared effort which followed on April 20, and I should like to read now what I said then:

> The urgent need of at least three small passenger and cargo boats is apparent when it is realized that the Canadian National Railways in Newfoundland not only do not have sufficient passenger boats to take care of present traffic, but they have no spare boat in reserve in case of accident or emergency. Should one of the present ships be lost, the whole coastal service would collapse. To make matters worse, one of the ships now in service is over 50 years old and is due to be retired;—

I may say that that ship is not yet retired. She has been taken out of the passenger service and is still being used to carry cargo.

Mr. Stick: It is time she was pensioned.

Mr. Carter: This was a brief warning that I issued about the famous William Carson:

> We are all very pleased that a new ferry is being provided for the gulf service, but there is serious doubt of the wisdom of building at this time such a large ship as contemplated, requiring such extensive terminal facilities, harbour installations and improvements. Experienced captains and navigators have expressed serious doubts as to whether such a large ship can be safely manoeuvred during bad weather in the small space available in the terminal port.

This, Mr. Speaker, may be found at page 2236 of Hansard of April 20, 1951. Further along I said this:

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not want to limit unduly any member who wishes to speak on this resolution, and I can see that it is appropriate to refer to matters by way of example; but it seems to me the hon. member is devoting his entire address to one instance. There may be members in the house who want to speak more particularly to the resolution, which, if I may remind the hon. member, provides for consideration of a committee for the purpose of planning the economic and social development of this country on a vast scale. Therefore, while it is appropriate to give illustrations of improvements in transportation, I think the hon. member has gone to the limit on that subject and unless he wants to relate the matter to the committee, I must ask him to give way to members who may wish to speak on the resolution.

Mr. Carter: I want to relate my remarks to the resolution in one respect, Mr. Speaker. My constituents have been victimized for the past eight years and this resolution looks forward 10 years in the future. I am urging the Minister of Transport to take the matter up with the authorities of the Canadian National Railways so that the hardship and indignity of the past eight years will not be extended beyond 1967.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the principle, the purpose and the spirit of this resolution which asks the government to give consideration to this committee with federal and provincial representatives on it, and to planning our development and so on, so that we shall have reached a certain target or objective on the 100th anniversary of the inauguration of confederation. Before going further I must refer to the remarks of the hon. member for Hamilton West who opened the debate on the government side of the house.

An hon. Member: York West.

Mr. Herridge: I am mixing the name of the hon. member with the constituency. It is so easy to get mixed up in that direction. I recall that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) said that he did not want just fireworks and things of that sort at the end of the 100 years; he wanted achievements. So far as the Progressive Conservative party contribution to this debate by the hon. member for York West (Mr. Hamilton) is concerned, he did not start off with fireworks, he started off with a damp squib, and I must say that he entirely overlooked the spirit of the resolution.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre avoided any reference to political parties or how this objective would be achieved. He offered us a broad objective and a target. His remarks were couched in language to which people should respond in a spirit of unity, but the hon. gentleman saw fit to ridicule the resolution which I thought was a very shallow approach to a very serious matter.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre gave credit to the achievements of Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the very well-known late J. S. Woodsworth. He treated them, I think, in a very statesmanlike way. Well, we can well understand government members talking this resolution out and not being willing to support it in full, but I would have expected from the government benches assurance of support in principle and speeches containing suggestions as to the difficulties of doing this or as to the need for amendment, and so on.

But I thought the speech of the hon. member for York West, in response to this appeal from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre was rather below his normal average. I heard the hon. member for Halton (Mr. Best) speak for the first time this afternoon. I congratulate him on his facility with language and the ease with which he spoke in the house at this time. I know it is not very easy but the gentlemen of the legal profession usually find it much easier than those who live in some cases in the back woods.

In any event, he said there were deceptive implications in the resolution. I do not know why these suspicions should arise because the resolution is on the highest possible plane, having a noble objective, and I could not understand why he thought there were deceptive implications. Then he said that for the government to accept such a resolution would be an abdication of responsibility. Members on the government side of the house use the word "abdication" as if they had some particular connection with royalty. They are always talking about abdicating this and abdicating that. They are simply government members of the House of Commons and I think they should use language that corresponds with their present importance, which may be much less in a few months.

The point of the resolution is that it asks for a committee to make recommendations over a ten year period with respect to the proposals contained in the resolution. We all know that these recommendations would have to be approved by parliament and by the provincial legislature concerned. But the resolution is a challenging conception. It is an appeal to the imagination. I have always had great admiration for Conservatives as being good, solid citizens.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear!

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): They are solid all right.

Mr. Herridge: But I have always noticed that they have a tendency to lack imagination. This afternoon the hon. member for Halton said that the resolution was not a practical one. You know, Mr. Speaker, when the members of this group brought up the question of family allowances it was not a practical suggestion. When they brought up the question of old age pensions it was not practical. When they brought up the question of floor prices and things of that sort, even before the bill was introduced, it was not practical. But the present members on the government side of the house have to some extent learned from experience. After 22 years in the wilderness they realize that they must adjust their thinking to some extent to the thinking of the people as a whole so as a result, shall I say, of their recognition of what the people wish, require and demand they have passed some legislation which we have all been very willing to support. But it is a bits and bobs affair. They always fail to see the need for over-all planning, for an over-all approach, because it requires an imagination that they lack the capacity to exercise.

I must get on, Mr. Speaker, or else I will not be able to proceed very far with my subject, and I am going to relate my remarks very closely to the resolution. The hon. member for Halton said that the resolution was not a practical one. We are the most practical of people. In dealing with this resolution we arranged that different members would speak on different topics, members who can not only talk about their subject but whose life experience qualifies them to speak about it.

If there were time this evening the hon. member for Humboldt-Melfort (Mr. Bryson) would speak about irrigation and water usage because he has spent a lifetime as a farmer concerned with irrigation, the development of water resources and things of that sort. Another hon. member who is a very learned gentleman, a librarian and a sportsman was going to speak on the sports aspect. Another was going to speak on mining because he has worked in the mines. We are all practical people in this group. They were going to take a practical approach in support of an imaginative resolution.

I am going to speak on a subject tonight about which I have some knowledge. I refer to conservation and conservation is one of the major objectives in the resolution. I have spent 50 years in the practice of forest conservation so I want to say a few words in that connection. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that you will not rule me out of order. I saw you looking at me. Anyway, members of the house know that for some years we have been urging the necessity of the federal government taking action by calling a dominion-provincial conference and utilizing the committee that would be formed to develop a national conservation policy for forest, land, soil, water, wild life and so on.

The committee proposed here could undertake the same thing. If it were endorsed by the house and established by the government it would possibly have several subcommittees dealing with various problems but all working toward the one objective. That is why I am going to take this opportunity to suggest that we need dominion-provincial co-operation in the development of a national conservation policy. I continue my advocacy of the necessity of such a policy because many organizations and persons know that action on all levels of government is necessary to prevent the exploitation of natural resources and to establish nationwide methods of use in perpetuity.

I want to say that a future based on exploitation and wasting of natural resources rather than on conservation is the sure road to disaster regardless of how luxuriant our prosperity may be in the meantime. This is one aspect of the resolution that I do think should receive very serious consideration along with the others by the members on the government side of the house. Action along this line has been taken by people on a voluntary and nationwide basis, and I willingly give full credit to the constructive work of successive federal governments, prodded along by the relatively small number of people in the country who are interested in the conservation of our natural resources, their utilization and their proper development for the future.

I realize that the government has inaugurated taxation policies to this end. Our transportation policy has tended in this direction, particularly with the subsidization of the railroad bridge between east and west through northern Ontario. Then there has been government co-operation by agreement with the provinces for the taking of forest inventories, reforestation and last year fire protection, which is a very important step indeed. We in this group realize the important work done under the Canada Water Conservation Act, the eastern Rockies conservation board, the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, the Maritime Marshland Rehabilitation Act and grants for the control of the spruce budworm in New Brunswick.

We recognize the work done in connection with research into these problems by the agricultural science service, the forest branch, the forest products laboratory, the water resources branch, the bureau of mines and the national research council. We recognize that this total of undertakings by the federal government, in some cases in co-operation with provincial governments, represents a considerable contribution towards the development of conservation of natural resources in this country.

Before proceeding further, I want to pay a tribute to the work that has been undertaken by voluntary organizations in Canada. Once again I pay tribute to the Canadian forestry association which is doing some excellent work with respect to programs for schools, lectures and things of that sort; also the work undertaken by the Canadian forestry institute and the agricultural institute of Canada which has dealt primarily with the conservation of land, soil and water resources; the provincial conservation council of Ontario which has done great work; and the British Columbia natural resources conference which was established in 1948. I was very pleased, Mr. Speaker, to have the opportunity to peruse the ninth report which was published quite recently. I want to quote from that report because it deals with the objectives of that organization which, on a provincial level, is doing great work in this connection.

The British Columbia natural resources conference is an organization representing industry, university, government, both provincial and federal. The conference is concerned with the conservation, from the viewpoint of the full utilization, of all the natural resources of British Columbia. Through its inter-agency membership there is an annual meeting of the conference, the prime purpose of which is to promote integration and co-ordination of resource development in this province.

I want to mention also the work that has been undertaken by the conservation league of B.C., which has been sponsored by the Honourable H. H. Stevens, who was once a cabinet minister in this house, and the work undertaken by the pulp and paper industry in Canada generally, particularly in British Columbia; by groups organized to represent rod and gun clubs, universities and many local groups which have sort of stoked the fires of the provincial and larger organizations. In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, this voluntary association and organization work and activity provides a splendid basis for government and rank and file action on which to build a nation-wide acceptance of the principles of resources development, and a splendid opportunity for a committee such as this to appoint a subcommittee to deal with this particular aspect of this resolution.

Now, there has always been objection to getting dominion-provincial co-operation established perhaps along these lines because there is supposed to be a possible suggestion that there is transgression on provincial rights. We have a conference between Canada and the United States coming up, to which we look forward to reaching an agreement on an equitable basis for the development of the Columbia basin. We are awaiting the minister's announcement with a great deal of interest in connection with these important matters.

Then, there are conferences with other governments with regard to conservation of fisheries which have resulted in some satisfactory treaties. There has been good work in that direction, resulting in co-operation between governments. Then, the minister and the federal officials attend international conferences on resource development and this co-operation has produced excellent results. Yet we often see, even now, members of the federal government protesting that if you try to do anything along these lines in a dominion-provincial conference dealing with this particular subject, this aspect of the resolution, we would be accused of trespassing on provincial jurisdiction and rights.

I noticed that the former minister of northern affairs and national resources attended the 19th North American wild life conference on March 8, 9 and 10, 1954. He is reported to have said:

> We must work as a team. We shall have to make mutual adjustments to develop mutual strength. We may well have to compromise on practical details in order to establish more firmly our hold on basic principles.
> It is an excellent thing that we, who have so many different responsibilities, can meet here to discuss our varied problems in this friendly atmosphere. Each of us aims at the best development of the resources in his own field, and at the same time is prepared to listen to the views of workers in other fields, to examine methods of co-operation, to compromise if necessary, and to work always for the general good and not for sectional advantage.
> It is of particularly happy augury that this is, once again, an international conference. In this great central city, we have come together from Mexico and Canada as well as from all quarters of the United States of America for a neighbourly discussion of problems which are not limited by man-made boundaries. Speaking as a Canadian, I deeply appreciate the friendly co-operative spirit of which this gathering is symbolic. I am proud and happy to be able to reaffirm Canada's desire to continue to work with her sister nations of the North American continent for our common welfare and prosperity.

This is a conference dealing with natural resources. We can meet with other nations. The minister and senior officials can attend conferences of that sort and work out programs to the advantage of us all. Yet when something is suggested that will result in a conference of federal-provincial governments we allow provincial objections, on occasion, to limit our actions in this respect.

Then again, in 1955, at the 20th North American wild life conference on March 14, 15 and 16, 1955, the former minister of northern affairs and national resources had this to say:

> Friendly co-operation is, indeed, the keynote of relations between the United States and Canada in all wildlife matters. This conference itself is one illustration of that. In the field, the annual joint survey of breeding waterfowl is perhaps the world's greatest example of regularly repeated scientific teamwork by a large number of experts of two countries.

We want that scientific teamwork to be organized, yet a committee such as this, dealing with our natural resources, between the federal and provincial governments is objected to by some people. In addition to that, Dr. Trueman, the national film commissioner, and other officials attend these conferences on behalf of the federal government. The federal government sends representatives every year to the B.C. natural resources conference. The government calls a dominion-provincial agricultural conference; it calls dominion-provincial conferences on fiscal and taxation matters; dominion-provincial conferences on health insurance, and finally we have the former government recognizing the need for consideration of conservation of our land and water resources by the establishment last session of a Senate committee. This committee is continuing this session its very interesting study of land use in Canada and carrying out that study with commendable vigour.

In a multitude of activities the government has recognized the need for dominion-provincial conferences and co-operation. Regardless of precedent and practice, the need for a dominion-provincial conference to establish principles of conservation, somewhat along the lines suggested by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, goes unrecognized and repeated requests for the same in and outside our parliament are denied. For years this conference has been requested by numerous organizations who recognize its urgency and importance. Such a conference has been requested by the agricultural institute of Canada; the Canadian forestry association and others. I might give a summary of the forestry objectives presented at the resources conference, Ottawa, Friday, April 23, 1954.

> The recommendations of the conference may be summarized briefly as follows:
> 1. That a national forest policy be developed and adequate provision made to implement it.

This can only be achieved as a result of co-operation with the provinces. The Canadian Federation of Agriculture, December 3, 1956, passed the following resolution:

> Several times in recent years the C.F.A. has asked that a national conservation policy and program be instituted in this country. In its submission to the royal commission on Canada's economic prospects it said:
> "Another matter of great importance to the future of this country is the planned use and conservation of its agricultural resources. At the present time the prairie farm rehabilitation and marshland rehabilitation programs are doing some excellent work along these lines. What is very badly needed is a comprehensive land use classification, and a national program of soil and water conservation and development that would cover all the agricultural area of Canada. Families which are trying to farm land which is declared sub-marginal for farming should be assisted to retire from farming or else be re-located in better farming areas.

If the government would only accept the principle of the resolution moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre—I am not saying move exactly in the direction of the resolution, but accept the principle, purpose and spirit—when it came time to celebrate the 100th anniversary of confederation we would have a rich and very worthwhile target. Provincial organizations have urged this means. Local organizations still hope for action. Editorials in newspapers and periodicals all across this country emphasize the necessity for action along the lines I have suggested. The need is urgent. The demand for action by the federal government is increasing on the part of thinking and interested people.

I propose that two courses of action are necessary to meet this problem effectively. First, that the federal government should forge the necessary link in the chain of responsibility by calling a dominion-provincial conference to deal with this question, to deal with the other questions I have mentioned, and to establish nationwide principles of soil, forest and water conservation and management in Canada. Second, the fashioning of common objectives in the application of this principle, such as a land use survey of Canada which would comprise the survey of our wildlife and water resources as a basis for national planning. Such a survey might be of great value in planning future industrial development. We have undertaken surveys such as this in Ceylon and Pakistan under the Colombo plan, and rightly so. Surely we could apply this common-sense approach to the solution of our own problems.

Next I come to development and co-ordination of research. This very important phase of research has been a great deal improved in recent years, but it still lags far behind the research required to make a proper survey of our natural resources possible. Certain research is going on at the present time under federal jurisdiction, particularly with respect to forestry and there is applied research in the province of British Columbia and in some of the other provinces. What is required is the co-ordination of all these activities, because, as indicated in this resolution, we are facing one target. We should have co-ordinated educational programs, and a division of financial responsibility with regard to cost, overall planning to avoid duplication of effort and also the necessary publicity, which is to some extent lacking at the present time and which the former minister of northern affairs and national resources has complained about on a number of occasions. These things are all necessary if we are going to make any definite progress.

My second main proposal is that federal-provincial leadership should be supported by voluntary action in the form of a national conservation league or council. A co-ordination of voluntary effort is as necessary as co-ordination of activities by governments. I believe that government action is much more effective when supported by voluntary action by an informed citizenry. The urge for the wide use of renewable natural resources generated by such a voluntary organization will forge a link between governments and the people. Such a link, as the years go by, will in my opinion, develop into a nationwide, democratic endeavour to repair the ravages of the past, raise the real living standards of the present and protect the rights of generations unborn. The philosophy of life that springs from a reverence for all creations is the foundation upon which all civilization and cultures are built. Also, in this respect, I think we have a great opportunity if we can get this co-ordination between the work of our government and of voluntary groups in this country—an opportunity for persuading our youth of the wonderful opportunity with which we are now presented in the development of our country.

In conclusion, I will say this: in my opinion federal-provincial co-operation and leadership supported by a nationwide voluntary organization opens up a new vista of human relations, in which the differences between government, regions and communities are forgotten and a new fraternity is inspired by a noble objective—the mobilization of all our human resources behind one purpose, namely the wise use of our renewable natural resources in perpetuity.

I have dealt particularly with the conservation aspect of the resolution moved by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre. I would ask hon. members to consider the purpose and spirit in which the resolution is moved. These things are not easy. You must have a target; you must have imagination to reach these objectives, and you must do some planning years ahead. In conclusion, I ask for support of this resolution as a worth-while proposal worthy of the consideration of this house, and for action in the days to come.

Mr. W. H. A. Thomas (Middlesex West): Mr. Speaker, I am very glad to have the opportunity of adding a word to this debate. The hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge) has suggested that possibly the Conservative members of this house—the members of the Progressive Conservative party—lack imagination. Coming as he does from a beautiful part of the country in southern British Columbia, that land of lovely fruit orchards, deep lakes, beautiful mountains—the land or the great Ogopogo, that dream creature several hundreds of feet long which swims along the beautiful Okanagan lake with its head 20 feet above the water—when he talks to us about imagination we know that we are listening to an expert.

We are accused of approaching this resolution with—how was it said?—a shallow attitude. Of course we must be careful in dealing with resolutions of this length and magnitude to make sure we do not get entangled in its meshes. Therefore I am approaching the resolution with some caution, trying to protect both flanks. The reader has to go along carefully since there is some imagination used in drawing up the resolution.

In so far as the resolution contains any element of lack of confidence in the present government, I am strongly opposed to it. I do not think it is necessary to set up a committee to usurp the functions of government. We have a wonderful government led by the Prime Minister (Mr. Diefenbaker) who enjoys the confidence of the people of Canada probably to a greater extent than any prime minister has enjoyed the confidence of our people for a long time—

Mr. Byrne: That is a conservation speech.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): —surrounded by a wonderful cabinet, and I should like to express my personal confidence in that government.

Mr. Argue: Afraid of the next nomination?

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): And I am sure that this government can undertake the duties of government in as fine a manner and with as great an ability as any commission which could be set up.

However, in so far as this resolution is intended as a genuine contribution to the future planning of our country I would give it at least qualified support. Planning is necessary, whether on an individual level, on a corporate level or at the level of government. We cannot get along without planning and I could conceive circumstances in which were we to have an overall planning commission it could serve as something in the nature of a continuing royal commission, set up at least in part in the same manner, and charged with the responsibilities of inquiring into those different features and aspects and phases of our economy and social life which come up for consideration at frequent intervals.

We have just appointed a royal commission to inquire into our power resources and to make recommendations concerning them and if we had a royal commission or a planning committee set up in the same way to which could be referred questions of all kinds which affect our economy or our social life—not for legislative or administrative action but for review and report—I can see where benefit could be derived for the people of this country.

Now before I get lost here—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Argue: No imagination.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): —I know I can get some of our farming problems into this resolution somewhere without being out of order. I would say if we had such a planning committee at the present time to which we could refer such matters as the sugar beet problem which is troubling a great many people in four different areas of Canada it would be a very good thing.

Mr. Byrne: Better talk to your government about that problem.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): These areas include southern Manitoba, southwestern Ontario and southern Alberta in addition to certain parts of the province of Quebec. We import in the form of raw sugar approximately 80 per cent of our requirements in Canada. We produce through our sugar beet industry approximately 18 per cent and the other approximately 2 per cent, during the last three or four years only, has been imported in the form of refined sugar. Now it is that 2 per cent, coming in in the form of refined sugar, which is causing trouble to our sugar beet growers inasmuch as virtually that whole quantity of refined sugar is being imported into the Hamilton area in southwestern Ontario and is being used to undersell our beet sugar produced in the Chatham-Wallaceburg area.

The importation of refined sugar was stopped by the Bennett administration back in 1932, during the depression.

Mr. Byrne: A lot of things were stopped then.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): It did not bother Canada again until 1952. For 20 years the effect of the Bennett action on the sugar question had lasted to the benefit of Canadian producers and then, in 1952, refined sugar began to be imported from Cuba.

Mr. Byrne: Taking candy from the kiddies.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): It was, through negotiation, stopped again and as far as Cuba is concerned is still stopped, but other nations are now beginning to unload, particularly Mexico and some other Central American countries, who are exporting quantities of refined sugar into Canada.

The sugar beet growers are asking for a support price of $14 per ton under sugar and part of the idea behind that request is the feeling that if we had support prices, under the general agreement on tariffs and trade, the Canadian government would then be justified in placing refined sugar on a quota basis and preventing its importation to undercut our sugar beet growers in this country.

Now I may say that the planning committee, if such were set up, could take this whole matter under consideration and would probably agree that the sugar beet industry of Canada was well worth saving. During two world wars this sugar beet industry served a great purpose in Canada but, aside from saving the industry as a possible means of home supply in case of emergency, the sugar beet industry is furnishing jobs to a great many people, especially to new Canadians who, when they are first brought to this country, work in the sugar beet and tobacco fields for a couple of seasons and are thus able to save enough money to make a down payment on a farm of their own.

The sugar beet industry in Ontario and these other areas furnishes large amounts of work for local truckers such as the man who owns his own truck and makes a living by doing local haulage work. There is also a great investment in the sugar refineries themselves and in all the equipment which is used. Furthermore, as far as southern Ontario is concerned, if some inducement were given to the growing of sugar beets, the 20,000 acres now producing crops could, in round figures, be increased to nearly 40,000 acres. That would mean 20,000 acres could be taken out of soybeans and corn and other cash crops which are now in surplus in this country. I should not say that soybeans are in surplus but corn and wheat are presenting some difficulties with respect to prices.

I must not take too long on this topic, but I am sure that a planning committee could also take a good look at the plight of the soybean growers in southwestern Ontario and try to find ways and means of doing something to help the production of soybeans. We now grow about 5 million bushels of soybeans in Canada but we import twice that many, approximately 10 million bushels. Therefore, the 250,000 acres which we use for the production of soybeans in southwestern Ontario could be trebled and again that would take a very great deal of pressure off winter wheat and corn, both of which we have in abundant supply.

Our soybeans have a two cents a pound tariff against them going into the United States. In other words, if we undertake to ship a bushel of soybeans into the United States it would cost $1.20 for the tariff but soybeans are permitted to come from the United States into Canada subject to no duty at all. There is a small amount of duty payable on soybean oil coming from the United States to Canada but there is no duty on soybeans. The suggestion has been made that the tariff should be adjusted to put us on an equal footing with the United States.

Another difficulty in the agricultural picture in southwestern Ontario is the matter of the price of corn. Four years ago the price of corn was approximately $1.75 or $1.80 a bushel. The cost of raising corn has gone up. It costs more today to raise a bushel of corn than it did four years ago but the price of corn has dropped today and the farmers in my area are getting only about 90 cents a bushel, almost half the price corn commanded four years ago.

This illustrates what the farmers of this country are up against. It is admitted that the farmers are having a tough time and I am sure a planning commission could take these matters into consideration and if necessary make recommendations to the government. However, a planning commission is not really necessary in this respect because as is already indicated on the order paper the government within a very few days will bring legislation before parliament seeking to grant relief to the hard-pressed farmers. I am sure it is a matter of joy and pride to every hon. member of this house that we have a government which has the interests of the farmers so much at heart.

Mr. Castleden: There is no resolution yet.

Mr. Argue: Six weeks too late.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): Dealing further with the matter of a planning commission, although I do not come from southern British Columbia or even from Winnipeg North Centre, I can still use my imagination as to what such a body could accomplish.

Mr. Fisher: What about tobacco?

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): All joking aside, this country is faced with many problems that require a great deal of thought and study. I am reminded of the time about 25 years ago when Canada faced a great crisis in the form of the depression. At that time we were also blessed with a government with great vision and imagination and the best of intentions.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): Some of our friends laugh but I will deal with them in a moment. I wish now to remind hon. members of some of the good planning that was done by the Conservative government of that day. It brought in the Natural Products Marketing Act. That act is the basis of most of our provincial legislation today dealing with the marketing of farm products. That act was passed in 1934. The Farmers' Creditors Arrangement Act was also passed which helped the hard-pressed farmers out of the difficulties in which they found themselves at that time. It was a bankruptcy act passed for the benefit of farmers and incidentally it was the only one of all the Bennett new deal legislation that stood under the scrutiny of the privy council. The government of that day also passed the Employment and Social Security Act, the Fair Wages and Hours of Labour Act—

An hon. Member: The Bennett buggy act.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): —and the Minimum Wages Act. When some of our friends in other parties undertake to tell us that all the credit for these various pieces of legislation should go to other parties and that we are only building on the foundation previously laid by them, let me remind hon. members that the foundation for all these acts was laid back in the early thirties. Although they lay dormant for many years and were revived by the late Liberal government the fact remains that the foundation for these acts was laid by a Conservative government even before the Conservatives were "progressive".

In 1935 the Conservative government passed an act much like the one envisaged and advocated by our friend the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), an act to establish an economic council being chapter 19 of the Statutes of Canada, 1935. This reads:

> His Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:
> (1) This act may be cited as the Economic Council of Canada Act, 1935.

After setting out definitions in section 2 the act provides.

> (3) There shall be an honorary advisory council on social and economic questions which shall be known as the economic council of Canada.
> (4) (1) The council shall consist of the minister, who shall be the chairman, and 15 members who shall be appointed by the governor in council.
> (2) The members of the council shall be selected from,
> (a) officers of the public service of Canada, not exceeding seven in number, whose administrative duties require consideration of social or economic problems;
> (b) representatives of organized bodies of a social or economic character, not exceeding five in number;
> (c) other persons having special experience or knowledge in connection with social or economic problems not exceeding three in number.

Section 5 (1) provides:

> The dominion statistician shall be the secretary of the council.

The duties of the council are enumerated in section 6 which reads:

> The duties of the council shall be to discharge such duties of an advisory character as the chairman may request them to undertake and particularly, without limiting the generality of the foregoing,
> (a) to study, investigate, report and advise upon questions relating to the general trend of social or economic conditions or to any social or economic problem of Canada, and to authorize the investigations in that behalf as hereinafter provided;
> (b) to make recommendations to promote and co-ordinate social and economic research within Canada;
>
> (c) to make recommendations to co-ordinate the activities of a social or economic character of the several departments of the government of Canada;
> (d) to make recommendations as to the organization of statistics as the basic data required for social and economic investigations;
> (e) to publish such reports and findings as may be considered to be in the public interest.

I feel I have quoted enough to demonstrate that the heart of the Conservative government has always been in the right place in terms of the forward look in matters affecting administration of the affairs of the country. I do not suggest that this form of organization is what is required today. As a matter of fact I do not think it is. If an advisory council were set up I think it should be something like a royal commission. Rather than the Prime Minister serving as chairman it should have a judge as its chairman, one who would be entirely independent of political pressure. I can visualize much good that would be accomplished by such a council if it were composed of members who carried sufficient prestige in the country that their opinions would be accepted by a large segment of the population.

I am going to tie it to only one idea at this moment.

Let us consider the problem of inflation today. There might be some argument as to what inflation is, but I think most will agree on a general definition. We know that our dollar today has the purchasing power of approximately 49 cents in relation to living costs just at the close of the last war, or up to 1939, at any rate. We know that, and we can agree that inflation has taken place. From all inquiries I have been able to make and from all reading that I have been able to do I find that we are now subject to what is called creeping inflation. I am going to be careful here. Some are inclined to lay the blame for this creeping inflation at the door of labour; others blame the tycoons of finance.

Mr. McCullough: You are very close.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): But wherever we lay the blame we are inclined to look upon it as it affects ourselves. It is like a story I heard. Are we allowed to tell stories here?

Mr. Fulton: It depends on what kind they are.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): It reminds me of an Irishman and his friend. They were talking about socialism. Pat said to Mike: "Explain this socialism". Mike said: "Well, we share everything equally". Pat said: "Fine. You mean if you have $100, you would give me $50?" Mike said: "Yes". Pat said: "If you had $50, would you give me $25?" Mike said: "That is right." Pat said: "If you had $10, would you give me $5?" Mike said: "Oh, go on, you know I have $10". Therefore, we are inclined to look at income tax and at other economic matters from our own particular point of view and we like to keep our sharing just above what we have but to take in what the other fellow has.

In this country we have no standard; we have no body to tell us what an hour of labour is worth, or what a bushel of wheat is worth, or what any other commodity is worth. I think it is generally admitted that the law of supply and demand is too harsh an arbiter of the matter of prices. For instance, if we were to allow our labour market rates to be controlled by the law of supply and demand it would mean that every so often we would have to allow somebody to suffer privation or starve so as to force people to work and force wages down. We are past that in this country. If we are to wait for the law of supply and demand to weed out all of the inefficient farmers and put individual farmers off the land so that there would be no surplus of food we would reach the point some day where there would not be enough food to go around and then the price of food would go up, all right, but our last state would be worse than our first. I say that the law of supply and demand is too harsh an arbiter.

If we had a planning commission or a royal commission with sufficient prestige—I emphasize that—so that the labour unions would be willing to pay attention if the commission said that an hour of labour in Canada should be worth so and so and on the basis of the value of that hour of labour a bushel of wheat should carry a value of about so much, or a bushel of corn, or a bushel of soybeans or a gas stove or an automobile, it might be something. If we had some authority to set objectives that we could aim at, it might give us a little bit of an anchor in time of storm or it might serve as a helm to guide our ship of state.

I am sure the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre would agree that that is imaginative enough.

Mr. Cardiff: He is full of imagination.

Mr. Thomas (Middlesex West): It is a subject that could stand investigation and honest consideration.

Mr. F. C. Christian (Okanagan Boundary): Mr. Speaker, I should like to speak in support of this resolution. I think it is important that in the setting up of a committee of the character mentioned in the resolution there be on it men who have vision and experience and men who are also practical and who are capable of doing good planning. I think one criticism of a lot of our public bodies and governments in the country today is that they cannot see sufficiently far ahead in the economic and social development of the country. In other words, many of our governing bodies in Canada have a shortsighted policy.

This particular resolution has a lot of merit in it, but I cannot necessarily agree with planning for only 10 years. I believe that in planning in our country we should give consideration to planning for many years ahead. What I am particularly concerned about is one very important aspect of public works. One that should be pursued with vigour is the development of breakwaters in some parts of our country. There should be an over-all development of Canada as far as possible. One part of the country should not be favoured over some other part of it.

I should like to refer particularly to the breakwater situation in the Okanagan valley. The hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. Thomas) referred to the Ogopogo land from which hailed the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge). I should like to say that that particular area is the area which I represent. It is a great tourist area and is gradually becoming more important all the time.

As hon. members are well aware, British Columbia is one of the finest and one of the richest provinces in Canada. The Okanagan lake is approximately 65 miles or so long and is situated in the central southern part of British Columbia. As that province becomes developed as the years go by the workers of British Columbia are going to need a place where they can go for a holiday and very little expense will be required to get there. It is a tourist area which can play a great part in helping to develop our own people and keep them healthy.

The Okanagan valley is known to be the playground of the province of British Columbia at the present time. I have brought this to the attention of our own government. What is needed is consideration given to the establishment of more breakwaters in the Okanagan lake. For example, in the Okanagan valley the province of British Columbia has developed a campsite on the side of the lake. I have not seen a finer campsite anywhere I have travelled and I have travelled quite extensively. On the side of the hill they have approximately 250 campsites laid out and ready for people to camp for the night when they come to that place. The government of British Columbia has done a great deal for people who do not have too much money and has assisted them to have an enjoyable holiday. The development there cost a considerable amount of money. As the province is developing and as the Okanagan valley is becoming a great tourist area something should be done to assist in building breakwaters in that particular area.

Past federal governments have accepted responsibility for the construction of breakwaters. There is one at Kelowna, one at Naramata and one at Penticton. The breakwater at Penticton needs a certain amount of work done on it. At Summerland there is no breakwater at all and since the government has established already a policy of constructing breakwaters it seems to me that one should be provided for the municipality of Summerland. The former member for Okanagan Boundary fought very hard to try to get a breakwater for the municipality. The battle has been going on since 1946, and I hope the Conservative government does not wait 22 years to build a breakwater in that particular area.

The municipal council and the board of trade have been doing what they can to have a breakwater built. Actually there is an economic necessity for it. At the present time there are no facilities whatsoever for small craft or for launching. I urge the minister to do what he can in that connection. Certainly if this committee is set up it should pursue vigorously a policy of establishing breakwaters wherever necessary throughout the Dominion of Canada.

I wish next to deal with the matter of irrigation districts. On December 4 I had occasion to speak in the house in this connection with reference to the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. In the province of British Columbia, and no doubt throughout other parts of Canada, we have irrigation districts. In the Okanagan valley where I reside many orchardists are having an exceedingly difficult time to sell their products. This year there are many thousands of boxes of apples that cannot be sold. The irrigation districts are being pressed very hard financially. For example, in the Kaleden area a survey has been made and it is going to cost approximately $151,000 to rebuild their irrigation system. That money is required over the next ten years.

[Mr. Christian.]

Furthermore, I should like to point out that the income to the district from tolls and taxes does not meet the annual expenses in respect to the orchard lands. Hon. members can see the difficulty that many of the farmers in the Okanagan valley are having at the present time.

Naramata has a scheme to provide for the rehabilitation of the irrigation and domestic water system. It is a $300,000 project and the federal government does not assume any responsibility whatsoever in connection with the rehabilitation of that system. The result is that a small irrigation district has to assume responsibility for $100,000 out of the total amount of $300,000 and the British Columbia government has already assumed responsibility for paying the remaining $200,000. Personally I think it is unfair that the province of British Columbia should have to assume payment of the $200,000. I think there should be participation in an equitable way by the federal government towards the cost of that work. This is another matter that the present government does not do anything about. It is a matter to which this committee could give consideration.

I should like to deal with the important question of housing. I know one particular municipality in British Columbia that has a problem with respect to building a boarding house under the National Housing Act. They wish to sponsor the construction of a home for elder citizens but under the National Housing Act they are not able to do so at the present time. The municipality wishes to provide accommodation in the building for 24 persons in eight double rooms and eight single rooms. The financial history of the municipality is good. Its sinking fund is ahead of schedule and its bylaw payments have been made.

Apparently the existing situation under the National Housing Act is that a limited dividend company has the privilege of going ahead and constructing hostels and boarding houses but that right is being denied at the present time to municipalities, particularly in the province of British Columbia. I believe that at the present time limited dividend companies put up 10 per cent of the total amount of money required, the province of British Columbia puts up one-third and the balance of approximately 56⅔ per cent is supplied under the National Housing Act.

For the information of the appropriate minister I should like to read certain remarks made by the reeve of the municipality of Summerland. In a letter to me he says:

—when a municipal corporation wishes to undertake the construction of a boarding home type of senior citizen housing . . . it should be entitled to the same treatment as a limited dividend company organized from local people to provide low rental housing.

I mention this matter because it is something that should come under the heading of planning by an appropriate committee. So far as our elder citizens are concerned, consideration should be given to municipalities in the construction of boarding homes. Furthermore, if the government does not act in the matter, I think this committee could give consideration to the making of loans to municipalities throughout Canada. Under the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act it is impossible at the present time for municipalities to obtain moneys for necessary work. I should like to read to the house a few remarks made by the reeve of the municipality of Summerland in his letter to me. He says:

> Numerous efforts have been made by the Canadian federation of mayors and municipalities to have the Municipal Improvements Assistance Act unfrozen and a larger fund made available. When money was available from this act, in the late 1930's Summerland borrowed nearly a quarter of a million at 2 per cent which was used to instal the cast iron domestic water system. This has been a tremendous help to the district. We do not expect to borrow money at 2 per cent if this act is unfrozen but we would expect to be able to borrow money at close to the rate that the federal government can borrow money.

As far as I am concerned, if this committee should be set up I think it should be a very impartial and capable committee as far as possible. On that committee there should be men who have vision and intelligence and who can pursue a proper policy in the development of this nation. We have many problems that need attention and I should like to endorse the resolution.

(Translation):

Mr. Pierre Gauthier (Portneuf): Mr. Speaker, I have no intention of speaking at any length, I only wish to make a few brief remarks on the resolution now under consideration. I wish first of all to congratulate the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) for putting that resolution on the order paper. He deserves credit for being interested in preparing public opinion to celebrate worthily the 100th anniversary of this Canadian confederation of ours. I have no intention of opposing the motion.

Mr. Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Hear! hear!

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): However, I believe that his motion should have inspired speeches of a far more serious nature than those I have heard here this afternoon, which were almost exclusively of a political nature. I have no intention of following suit. In any event the only impression that has remained with me after hearing these speeches on such a worthy resolution is that which reminded me of an old song which I used to enjoy playing on my phonograph: "I am forever blowing bubbles".

The proposed resolution reads as follows:

> That in the opinion of this house . . .

Mr. Speaker, intending to speak French I wish to point out that it is regrettable that we do not yet have a system of simultaneous interpretation. However, and I speak most sincerely when I say this, I hope that under your chairmanship the committee which has been entrusted with the study of this matter will progress in such a way that, when the time comes to celebrate the anniversary of the Canadian confederation, we will be in a position to say that simultaneous translation, as set up in the House of Commons, is one way to celebrate this anniversary, to strengthen national unity and to say to the whole world that because of the growing interest shown by hon. members in learning another language than their own, whatever it be, confederation has not been a failure but, on the contrary, has served to bring closer together those who speak the two principal languages of this country.

Unquestionably, to make anything firmer, stronger, it must first be understood and the road to good understanding between the various races that make up the Canadian nation lies in the direction of a proper understanding of each other's language. When people understand each other's language, they get along well.

And now, coming back to the proposed resolution, here is how it reads:

> That, in the opinion of this house, the government should give consideration to the advisability of the establishment of the 100th anniversary committee, with provision for federal and provincial representation—

I heartily endorse the wording of the beginning of this resolution.

> —for the purpose of planning the economic and social development of this country on a vast scale—

Mr. Speaker, in an economy such as ours and at the rate Canada has been developing, can this development be speeded up even more by the establishment of even larger undertakings, and even faster economic development than that which Canada has known for years under all governments? I said I would not indulge in petty politics in the course of my remarks.

I realize that often one has to leave the country, visit other countries, and meet with the nationals of other countries,—I use this word "nationals" in the true sense of the word, meaning the inhabitants of other countries,—that one has only to meet people outside our country to see how much our country is envied.

Whether one travels in Europe, Asia, Africa or in the United States, one realizes that Canada is the cynosure of all eyes; everyone wonders why this country has such a buoyant economy, and is progressing so fast with its vast development programs.

I can very well remember that, during the African tour of the Commonwealth Parliamentary Association, we were often asked: "Well, tell us about the Ungava mines, about the St. Lawrence seaway". We also were asked, at that time: "Tell us about your Prime Minister". You could sense how interested those people were in Canada's economic position, and in Canada's spectacular progress in the last few years.

Therefore, Mr. Speaker, I think that, in view of our still flourishing economy, we will have no difficulty in bringing our people fittingly to celebrate the 100th birthday of the Canadian Confederation, but the motion concludes as follows:

> . . . so that . . . the people of Canada will be in a position to celebrate this nation's 100th birthday not only with fireworks and speeches, but by the achievement of a land of health and abundance for all our people.

I very well understand what the hon. member had in mind. I am quite familiar with his political philosophy, and, indeed, I may tell him that all hon. members of this house and, in fact, all Canadians, want health and abundance for all our people.

Nevertheless, Mr. Speaker, I believe that, to strengthen our system, and to develop our Canadian confederation, there are not only the physical factors of health and abundance to be considered; there are also spiritual factors, the heart and the soul. All this must frequently be expressed by speeches, more so by examples, and above all, I think, by sacrifice. Recently the whole world was surprised to learn that the Russians had managed to shoot a satellite towards the moon and stars, and that it kept circling around the earth for several days. While I am of course in no position to say that the Russians must have made several attempts before they succeeded in launching it, I do think I can say that that must have been the case and that there should be no cause for undue concern on the part of the Western nations.

Where the democracies were at fault was in talking too much about their own satellite before making a successful launching.

I have spoken, Mr. Speaker, about sacrifices; there is no doubt that these people are making tremendous sacrifices, whether voluntary or not. I believe that a country such as ours which has been created and developed by the devotion and sacrifices of its inhabitants must accomplish still more, in order to be better able to wage a victorious struggle against those who undertake or accept sacrifices to crush other nations. We must avoid any action which might divide us.

I therefore believe, Mr. Speaker, that the best way to nobly celebrate the anniversary of the Canadian nation is to continue to make sacrifices and at the same time to provide well-being and plenty for all; we should not, however, forget the intellectual well-being of our fellow citizens. We should stop our criticisms when we know that our governments are taking action to develop the arts in this country. I remember,—and I am not concerned with any electoral motives at the moment,—that when the Canada Council was instituted, there were rather strong criticisms. Nevertheless, I believe that the council came at the right time, that it was necessary because it happens very often,—more often than we seem to think,—that our artists are among our best ambassadors in foreign countries. We must therefore help them; we must find and develop new talents in order to train artists who do not copy others but are typically Canadian in the expression of their arts. I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that we can develop something much better than futurism or some other modern art which is so difficult to understand that the artists themselves have to explain their own works to the layman. I have no doubt that the Canada Council will bring encouragement and precious assistance to our artists, and this will help the country to celebrate the anniversary of the Canadian confederation in a fitting manner.

Now, before celebrating confederation, we should begin by amending ourselves. I think we should get rid of a certain regional turn of mind which too often exists in some of our people. We have created a confederation, and we have a central power over the ten provinces. This reminds me of the story of Menenius Agrippa who saved Rome.

The young people were dissatisfied with the administration of ancient Rome and they had gone, by the thousands, to live on a hill nearby; they refused to do any work and to contribute their spirit of enterprise and neophyte zeal to the good administration of Rome. Menenius Agrippa told these young people about the legend of the limbs revolting against the stomach.

Well, Mr. Speaker, it often happens that certain members of the Canadian confederation are inclined, not to revolt perhaps, but to indulge in severe criticism which is liable to weaken the central power, in other words, the stomach of our confederation. It is for this reason that I say we should get rid of a certain regional turn of mind, which is based on a shaky principle.

I also remember, because of a certain analogy, the story of Cato the Censor. Whenever he spoke in the forum he invariably ended his speeches by these words: "Hoc censeo", meaning I so decide and "delenda est Carthago", meaning, Carthage must be destroyed. So, I believe that we should avoid adopting the spirit of Cato the Censor and strive to keep the stomach of the nation, the central power, solid and strong, without giving up the idea that we must preserve the strength of the provinces. However, there must be a certain equilibrium. I believe that if the members refuse to supply the Canadian stomach with the required food, the stomach will not be able to distribute what is required for the strength of the limbs and the limbs will find themselves in a dire predicament. They will be weakened because of the loss of strength of the stomach.

Mr. Speaker, the central government must be maintained. We should not try to destroy it by accusing it of overly centralizing tendencies and by repeating statements which sound like medicine taken out of a drawer, not only in the federal field, but in the provincial field as well. We should get rid of that parochial mentality which weakens and hurts us, not only at home but abroad.

We should get rid of that parochial outlook, not only so that we will be able to celebrate in a glorious fashion this confederation centennial, but also to maintain our association in strength and hardiness until the end of time.

Mr. Speaker, there are many other things which could maintain the strength of confederation. Among other things, the satisfaction from the intellectual and sentimental point of view as well as from the point of view of the soul of its inhabitants. The Canadian nation is made up of many races whose number will increase. The more they learn to understand one another the more they shall agree among themselves and the more they understand one another the stronger will that community become. Each one of the races which make up the Canadian community has its traditions which must be safeguarded, which must be maintained so that each may remain strong and preserve its identity.

In the province of Quebec, we have traditions which unfortunately we often neglect. I heard some one the other day speak about men meeting for combined work to help out a neighbour making a "bee". Well, that is a tradition that we French Canadians must preserve. There is also the "guignolée", a group of people who go out to collect donations. And I come finally to the tradition which is perhaps the most significant, the oldest, and in any case the holiest of all, that of the paternal blessing on New Year's day. If I mention that one, it is because I feel that the house might very well be sitting until New Year's eve. The families of the province of Quebec wish to maintain this tradition and are looking forward to receiving the paternal blessing; so, how will they react to the absence of the father at the time of this most important ceremony which we are anxious to maintain among French Canadian families?

There is some reason for concern, for us and certainly also for our people. I do not want to criticize at this time, but I hope that we French Canadians may again this year go home and give our blessing to our children, as has been the custom of our forefathers since Canada has been Canada.

I shall stop now, Mr. Speaker. Other hon. members may want to speak now. I wanted to strike another note in discussing the motion of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, whom I shall commend again. I wanted to strike another note, because I thought the motion was much more serious. If we go on at the present speed with our industrial, labour, agricultural and professional improvements, there might be no reason for accelerating. However, I believe we should call our people's attention to the intellectual, spiritual and moral aspects of the matter. The more we strengthen our confederation, the stronger we shall be to fight any outside enemy.

We must also keep on making sacrifices and show devotion to duty, in order to be stronger intellectually and morally.

I am sure that everything that has been done until today—and I refer in particular to our Canada Council—is bound to instil in our people a genuinely Canadian character, to stimulate our artists, those whom I have called our ambassadors a moment ago, and to help our people realize that the best way of celebrating the Canadian confederation is to prefer one's intellectual development to one's material well-being.

(Text):

Mr. Robert Simpson (Churchill): Mr. Speaker, in discussing the aspects of the resolution which is presently before the house I should like to point out first of all that if this resolution had suggested that a committee be set up, possibly on a federal-provincial basis, specifically to plan the 100th anniversary celebrations then I would say it would certainly be worthy of support. However, it seems to me that although it appears to have the welfare of the nation at heart it is taking away most of the obligations of the hon. members of this house. I feel that we are asking the people of Canada to pay with a good deal of duplication, for something for which, I believe, they are already paying; something which they are entitled to get and for which they are at present receiving value.

Now in dealing with the following subjects I might point out that most of these problems and subjects under discussion in this resolution have already been studied and are continuously being studied by many competent committees and groups. I also think the resolution which is before us might well be construed as a measure of no confidence in most of the groups already so established. By that I mean that we have many groups in operation, independent of government, in the way of agricultural and labour organizations, chambers of commerce and many others.

Hon. members of this house from various parties of the opposition have stated that they are in full support of this resolution as it stands; they are quite willing to set up committees despite the fact, as I have already pointed out, in my opinion such committees are now in operation and they are competent committees.

I think that in the short space of time—in fact a period of less than six months—in which this government has been in office and the period of less than two months in which this house has been in session the present government has shown ample evidence and has proved conclusively that they are, not only eager and able to deal with these recognized groups who are doing such a good job in their various localities but are also capable of sitting down and discussing with those groups their problems and bringing such problems to a successful conclusion.

In regard to agriculture, for instance, we have many capable groups working on this important question. I say important because up until now and I imagine for all time to come agriculture has been and will be, rightly so, the backbone of our nation. But what has happened to agriculture during the past few years? Agriculture has been allowed to go down to a point where the farm family is fast becoming a rarity. Families are leaving the farm areas because of today's high cost of production; due entirely to the high cost of equipment as compared to the inequitable returns to the farmer for his products; the slow process of selling his grain, plus of course the tight money situation faced until a short time ago. The farmer is unable to keep his head above water.

Now these remarks apply generally to agricultural people all across Canada but are particularly applicable to the young farmer—the type of a farmer who, until now, I have not heard mentioned in this house—and the young farmer certainly has a multitude of problems. In many many cases he returned from overseas at the conclusion of the last world conflict and had very little opportunity to get himself re-established in time to avail himself of any of the benefits from the short period of boom which agriculture may have enjoyed during the latter 1940's. Consequently he found himself sadly trapped in the terrible cost-price squeeze which has since developed.

This was one time when the old maxim of there being safety in numbers certainly did not apply, because there was small consolation to such a young farmer in the fact that he had lots of company. He had his land and he had some equipment, both partially paid for, and he could produce crops because most of them were good farmers and willing to work. He could not however pay his debts with farm-stored grain. Later on, measures were introduced whereby he was allowed to borrow money on his farm-stored grain at 5 per cent interest, so he found himself paying that 5 per cent interest and at the same time earning about 2 per cent interest or less on his capital investment.

So what did the young farmer do? In many cases he found himself in the position where, if he was fortunate enough to find employment elsewhere, he went into industry and was better off financially by investing only his physical and mental capacity in that industry as against a fairly large monetary investment in agriculture. He had more cash by working with his two hands than he could possibly get with all his land and equipment, but he did not want to be in industry. He wanted to be a farmer and Canada indeed needed him in agriculture.

Now this situation was brought to the attention of the former government, but nothing was done about it. Solutions to these problems are going to take time, I know, but I am very happy to see that a full review of the agricultural problems and the tight money situation is now in progress with a view to solving them as quickly and fairly as possible in order to give the farmer his fair share of the national revenue.

There are many aspects relating to agriculture with which I hope to be able to deal as they come before the house, but I see time is getting short this evening. I would like to say that, come July 1, 1967, I sincerely hope through the efforts of this government that this great country of ours will be in the enviable position of being justifiably proud of the fact that all our citizens will have available to them, not only a high standard of living which will include social security, hospital and medical services, a housing program, which will allow the people the benefits of the housing to which they are entitled and of which the people of Canada can be proud, but also an employment situation which will provide full-scale employment for every employable person in our dominion.

May I call it ten o'clock.

Business of the House

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask the house leader what is the business for tomorrow?

Mr. Green: Tomorrow we shall have a supply motion and then the resolution which is No. 147 on today's order paper with respect to a measure to establish a system of guaranteed prices for certain agricultural commodities, followed by the amendments to the Excise Tax Act and the Income Tax Act. When we get through with those, we will take the bill which is No. 136 on today's order paper dealing with the Canadian and British Insurance Companies Act and then the resolution on Beechwood.

Mr. Chevrier: I commend the leader for his optimism. Is he in a position to say what will take place on Wednesday?

Mr. Green: I think we will be continuing in that order on Wednesday.

Mr. Chevrier: May I ask an additional question, Mr. Speaker. In view of the remarks made by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier) can the leader give us assurance that we will not sit on the day before and the day after New Year's?

Mr. Green: I cannot give any such assurance, Mr. Speaker.

At ten o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

LOW COST HOUSING—LUMBERMEN'S BRIEF

Question No. 236—Mr. Robichaud:

1. Has the Minister of Public Works received a brief submitted by the national retail lumbermen's council of Canada suggesting certain amendments to the regulations or requirements of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation having to do with the construction of low cost houses?

2. If so, what actions have been taken by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation to implement the recommendations or suggestions contained in the said brief?

Answer by: Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works):

1. Yes.

2. The brief submitted by the national retail lumbermen's council of Canada offered four proposals relating to the financing of low cost housing. Three of these proposals conform with the corporation's present lending policy and the suggested techniques are now used where circumstances are appropriate. The fourth proposal would involve a new principle generally known as the open end mortgage. This technique has been tried outside of Canada and has not met with any degree of success. The proposal would require an amendment to the National Housing Act, 1954, and possible amendments to provincial legislation. The type of mortgage proposed involves the approval of a higher loan than that required during the first construction stage. This technique is difficult of implementation because lenders are reluctant to make future commitments at current interest rates. The open end mortgage technique has been considered, and is still being studied.

CENTRAL MORTGAGE AND HOUSING CORPORATION

Question No. 251—Mr. Holowach:

1. Since its inception, what moneys have been borrowed or appropriated for the operation of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation?

2. Has the corporation repaid any of these amounts?

3. If so, to what source and how much in (a) principal; (b) interest?

4. What were administrative expenditures of Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation since its period of operation?

5. Are operational costs borne by insurance premiums on loans?

6. What were the total of mortgage loans approved (a) by provinces; (b) in Vancouver, Calgary, Edmonton, Regina, Winnipeg, Toronto, Montreal, Ottawa?

7. Were grants made to any of the above cities for housing development? If so, in which city and in what amount?

8. What construction of dwelling units were completed during 1954, 1955, 1956 and to date in 1957?

9. What reserves and cash assets have piled up during years of operation?

10. How many Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation insured mortgages have been foreclosed?

11. What were combined losses on these foreclosures (a) homes; (b) rentals?

Answer by: Hon. Howard C. Green (Minister of Public Works):

1. Since its inception, January 1, 1946, to November 30, 1957, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has borrowed the following amounts from the government of Canada, under statutory or parliamentary appropriations.

For lending under the housing acts section 22, C.M.H.C. act	$431,000,000.00

For the construction of housing projects for veterans and others, section 37, N.H.A. 54	175,000,000.00
Total	$652,500,000.00

2. Of these amounts the corporation has repaid .... $ 94,905,517.43
The unpaid balance is secured by C.M.H.C. debentures maturing at various future dates.

3. The following amounts of principal and interest have been paid to the Receiver General of Canada.

4. Administration expenditures of C.M.H.C. from January 1, 1946, to October 31, 1957, amounted to ..... $ 62,529,928.60

5. Operational costs are not borne by insurance premiums on loans. Such premiums are paid into the mortgage insurance fund in accordance with section 10 of the National Housing Act, 1954.

Questions

9. Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has accumulated the maximum reserve of $5,000,000 as authorized by section 30 of the Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation Act. No cash other than that which is required for current operations is held by Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation. The requirements in this respect approximate $2,000,000, which amount is distributed amongst all disbursing offices of the corporation. This amount varies according to circumstances and is part of the $5,000,000 quoted above.

10. Foreclosures of insured mortgage loans fall into two categories:

(a) Cases where the lender elects to claim on the insurance fund;

(b) Cases where the lender makes no claim on the fund and elects to retain the foreclosed property.

As at December 1, 1957, there have been—
6 foreclosures of category (a).

As at December 31, 1956, there have been—
2 foreclosures of category (b).

In addition, Central Mortgage and Housing Corporation has knowledge of 3 foreclosures in 1957, not yet classified as (a) or (b), but this figure may be increased when the final reports are received from lenders, effective December 31, 1957.

11. (a) Of the 6 properties acquired by the insurance fund, 3 have been sold and 3 available for sale. There have been no actual losses in connection with insured mortgages which have been foreclosed to date in respect of which claims have been made against the insurance fund, but as the 3 sold have been sold on instalment payment plans, the question of whether there will be an eventual profit or loss cannot be determined at this time.

(b) For the remaining cases, those where the lender elected to retain the properties, the lenders are not required to furnish details of profits and losses on property sales.

There have been no foreclosures of rental property.
