Let me also take up at this point the hon. member's statement in reference to freight rates. He quoted the rates between the years 1911 and 1918. In 1911 the lowest average was between 4.24 and 6.50 between Port Arthur and Montreal. In 1912, if I took his statement down correctly, the average rate was about 5.77, or practically the same as in 1911. In the years 1913, 1914 and 1915 the rates were practically the same. In 1916 they commenced to jump; in 1917 they again increased, and in 1918 they still farther advanced. That is one of the reasons why the hon. member argues that these vessels should be put under the Board of Railway Commissioners. If it had only been on inland waters that these rates had been increased the argument might hold good, but the rates have increased not only between Port Arthur and Montreal but between Atlantic ports and British ports where the increases were far more in proportion than they were inland.

An hon. MEMBER: Three times as much.

[Mr. J. D. Reid.]

Mr. J. D. REID: Three times as much. And every vessel that could be taken out of the inland waters, was taken out and used for the Atlantic trade for the reason that they could get much higher rates than they were getting on the inland waters.

Now, those Atlantic ocean rates were fixed by the British Government, not by the ship owners, and of course the latter got the benefit. I mention that for this reason: It has been stated that the Canada Steamship Company have made enormous profits. Of course they have. Why? I know that from fifty to seventy-five of their vessels were built in the Old Country originally to cross the ocean. When the war came those boats were taken over, and the company got these enormously high freights and were able to make the profits stated by the hon. member.

The hon. member also stated, if I understood him correctly, that if this amendment passes it will only apply to lake, river, canal and coastwise trade. The amendment reads to this effect: With respect to the traffic accommodation, classification of freights, traffic agreements, tolls and tariffs to be furnished, made, entered into and charged in connection with and by steamboats, and other vessels engaged on a regular route carrying passengers or freight or both from one port or place in Canada to another port or place in Canada, and with respect to the places along the line of route, and so on, where such steamboats and vessels shall call for traffic. If I understand that amendment aright, it would apply to all inland waters, and therefore to the Muskoka lakes, the Rideau canal, Georgian bay, and so on. Let me say, if this amendment should pass, how I think it would affect our vessels. I stated a few minutes ago that I did not believe it would have the effect of reducing freight rates between Port Arthur and Montreal. At the present time the railways own a number of vessels and they are under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners. I can speak for the Canadian National railways. When it was the Canadian Northern it had a number of vessels plying between Montreal and Port Arthur, which were under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners and any individual or company could at any time apply to the board to have those rates fixed when shipments were made by rail and lake. To-day we have some twenty or more vessels that are being constructed by the Marine and Fisheries Department for the Canadian National railway. Those vessels will ply between Port Arthur and Montreal, and shippers will have it in their power at any time, if they find the railways are not treating them right in freight rates, to apply to the Board of Railway Commissioners to have the rates regulated on traffic originating on the railways.

This is how it would effect private owners of vessels as it appears to me. At the present moment individuals and companies own boats. The rates could not possibly be fixed permanently in the same way as railway rates. Suppose, for instance, that you fix a rate of 5 cents a bushel between Port Arthur and Montreal, as the hon. member states, and compel a Canadian boat to accept that rate; then no matter what might happen, that boat could not possibly vary from it.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE: The minister stated a moment ago that if the rate charged were unsatisfactory to the public all we had to do was complain to the Board of Railway Commissioners. Is it not a fact that that board have approved the rates on the mountain scale charged by the Edmonton and Dunvegan railway, running from Edmonton to Peace River landing?

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member has asked me a question which I am quite satisfied he must know I could not answer offhand. Had he given me notice I would be prepared to answer it. I do not know whether the question has ever been brought before the Railway Commission as to the regulation of a water rate between Port Arthur and Montreal. But they have power to regulate the railway freight rates, and they have also power to regulate the rates on freight originating on a Canadian railway and carried through to destination on a vessel owned or chartered by the railway company. Supposing the Railway Commission were to fix a certain rate for vessels plying between Port Arthur and Montreal to apply to all Canadian-owned vessels, our neighbours to the south of us could take advantage of it and secure the traffic, and it would be impossible for us to interfere. Let me give you an instance. To-day when a vessel goes into Port Arthur she does not know what rate she is going to get. We will say that the rate is fixed by the Board of Railway Commissioners at 5 cents from Port Arthur to Montreal. The Canadian vessel cannot take any less than that rate.

Mr. HENDERS: Is it not the maximum rate that we are asking to have fixed?

Mr. J. D. REID: All right. At all events whatever rate is fixed, she applies for that rate. Look at the competition our vessels have to-day at Montreal. If an American vessel goes into Port Arthur—that is, assuming she can go through the canals—and she finds that she can get a higher rate by taking that grain to Montreal than by taking it to Buffalo, I will tell you what her owners will do, because I know what has been done in the past, and I have no doubt it will be done in the future.

They take a rate of three cents a bushel from Port Arthur to Ogdensburg, New York. The grain is there placed in an elevator and subsequently sent on barges to Montreal—and the American company can quote a rate which is a shade less than the rate quoted by the Canadian vessels. In other words, American vessels may carry that grain in American bottoms from one Canadian port to another Canadian port, and they cannot be interfered with. That is the competition that the Canadian bottoms have to meet to-day and will have to meet in the future. If there is any question about fixing the rates charged on Canadian vessels from Port Arthur to Buffalo, the American vessel men will simply say to the shippers in the West: ship your grain to Duluth and we will take it from Duluth to Buffalo.

We have very many people who are interested in water-borne traffic. Individuals or companies have put their money into vessels which ply on our inland waters. These enterprises are not public utilities, and to place them under the jurisdiction of the Railway Commission would, in my opinion, interfere with shipbuilding in the future. The jurisdiction which is exercised by the Railway Commission so far as through traffic is concerned would seem to cover any possible chance of the imposition of extraordinary freight rates. I have watched the steamboat business in the past with a great deal of interest. Until the war started, I venture to say, the profits of vessel men were not very high; none of them made extraordinary profits. I hardly think it is fair to take the last three or four years of the war in order to show that excess profits have been made.

The hon. member read a great many letters expressing the opinion that his amendment should be adopted and that we should bring these vessels under the jurisdiction of the Railway Commission. It would take me an hour to read all the communications I have received from individuals and Boards of Trade protesting against any such legislation. If the amendment was adopted, it would interfere in a great many ways with our other inland water transportation. Privately-owned tramp vessels running from Montreal to Port Arthur are glad to get freight for inland ports at very low rates; in fact, they take it at any rates they can possibly get. They take freight also at low rates to Port Arthur, because in doing so they are just that much ahead. Again, if this amendment is adopted it will affect the operation of motor-boats which carry passengers on our inland lakes, and other waters. On the St. Lawrence river, among the Thousand Islands and all the way between Montreal and Kingston, motor-boats carry passengers during the summer months. Under my hon. friend's proposal these boats could not carry passengers without first submitting their standard rates to the Board of Railway Commissioners.

I do not think the adoption of this amendment would be of any advantage to the shippers of the West. If I thought for a moment that such rates were being charged between Port Arthur and Montreal as were prejudicial to the people of the West I would be the first to introduce an amendment, or to bring down legislation to correct the wrong. But I am satisfied that the effect of the amendment would not be to reduce the rates. The Canadian Government owns 13,000 miles of railway—if it takes over the Grand Trunk it will own 20,000 miles. These railways operate steamboats, and the whole system is owned by the Government and controlled by Parliament. The freight rates between Port Arthur and the Georgian bay ports are subject to control; the rates between Port Arthur and Montreal can be controlled by the railways. As it has not been shown that there has been any unfairness, I think it would not be in the interest either of the public or of the mercantile marine of this country to have the Bill changed as proposed in the amendment.

Mr. ROBB: The Minister of Railways and I do not always agree, but to-night I find myself exactly in accord with the case as presented by him. The hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) may be actuated by the best motives, but I believe in all seriousness that his amendment would injure the very people whom he is hoping to help. As stated by the Minister of Railways, if the amendment moved by the hon. member were adopted, it would perhaps penalize more than any one else the men on the prairies who grow grain for export and who require to import coal to keep themselves warm in the winter time. I would go a little further than the Minister of Railways who, in my judgment, has recently, as Acting Minister of Customs, done something to increase rates on the Great Lakes. I refer particularly to the removal of the coastal privileges, to reciprocity in shipping. Every restriction that we place upon vessels operating from one Canadian port to another enables the fewer vessels remaining operating upon the Great Lakes to charge the people just a little bit higher rates. If a fixed rate might be made that would be profitable during the summer months, it would be a ruinous rate in November because a vessel cannot be operated at the same cost in November as it can during the summer when conditions of navigation are practically ideal. Rates are affected also by variation in the carrying capacity of vessels. Some vessels are able to carry grain at a lower rate than others and some vessels are able to carry coal at a lower rate than others. The speed of vessels also has an effect upon rates. A vessel that can make the round trip between the head of the lakes and Montreal in seven or eight days can operate much cheaper than the vessel that takes two weeks. If this amendment should go through it would create conditions that the Minister of Railways said would drive the business to Duluth. That was pointed out to our western friends at one time when they proposed to place certain restrictions on the inspection of grain at Fort William, and they discovered they were only driving the business over to Duluth away from Canadian trade routes. Therefore, I ask my western friends who are more particularly interested to look very carefully into this matter before giving their support to an amendment that will limit the number of vessels seeking cargoes at the head of the Great Lakes, and consequently enable the limited number of vessels to charge a higher rate. It will also discourage the building of new boats. If vessel owners charge rates which, as my hon. friend fears, may be fairly high, they will only be inviting competition and that competition will eventually regulate the rates. For these reasons I find myself in sympathy with the case as presented by the Minister of Railways, and I am compelled to vote against the amendment moved by the hon. member for East Lambton. I believe that if that amendment prevails, it will restrict the carrying capacity of vessels on the Great Lakes, and will prevent tramp vessels from going up there seeking cargoes at perhaps a lower rate, whereas the lower rate, should it prevail, will eventually go back into the pockets of the men who grow the grain.

Mr. T. J. STEWART: Coming from a city situated on one of the Great Lakes, I desire to say something on this question. I unfortunately was not present while the arguments were being put forth in the committee from time to time, as business called me away. The only arguments I have heard in favour of vessels being placed under the jurisdiction of the Railway Board are what I have heard here to-night, and no arguments from those who ship or receive goods by water have been produced to-night. Therefore, if persons who ship or receive goods by water are satisfied, I do not see why other persons should complain, and they utterly fail to produce evidence that anybody has suffered on account of the rates. The hon. member for East Lambton seems to be endeavouring to show that rail and water transportation are in the same position. They are in different positions entirely. Railways are established in certain districts and have monopolies of those districts, and if they were not under the jurisdiction of the Railway Board they could charge whatever rates they saw fit, and the Railway Board was appointed for the purpose of controlling those rates. As regards water transportation, the water is there; I can use it; you can use it; anybody who likes can use it. People can charge rates in competition with each other, and if any one is charging a higher rate than is commonly charged, competition will regulate the matter. I have not found any argument produced by the hon. member except in a circular letter that he sent out, and the argument produced there is as hopelessly weak as the argument he has made here to-night to convince any hon. member to vote in support of the amendment. The first paragraph in that circular letter goes on to show that all boats owned by the railway companies are under the Railway Board. It goes on to point out that shippers may take goods or leave them or refuse to call at certain points, or in other words, just do as they like. The hon. member has not undertaken to show that the boats referred to have ever refused to accept goods or have ever taken goods and charged an unreasonable price, but he makes a statement so broad that it would be utterly impossible to corner him so as to show that there was nothing in his argument. The next paragraph goes on to show that our coastal regulations give our vessels every advantage over foreign vessels and that as far as possible the right has been retained for the use of our vessels. This might have a tendency to increase rates instead of diminishing them, but such has not been the case. The water rates have, I consider, been very low, and I can assure the Committee that there is not in the city of Hamilton, from which I come, a firm which would not vote against the amendment. The next paragraph goes on to cite that the Government has established elevators in the West and has appointed a grain commissioner to grade the farmer's product; that they control the freight rates to Fort William, and when the grain reaches Fort William they are obliged to turn it over to a group of vessel owners who are not under any Government control whatever. The facts in connection with the case are different from what the hon. member has been endeavouring to lead the Committee to believe. The rates charged by the Canadian Pacific on wheat from Regina to Fort William is 15 cents per bushel; that is a distance of 777 miles, and when they turn this grain over to the group of vessel owners referred to, the latter carry the wheat from Fort William to Montreal, about twice the distance, for half the rate charged by the Canadian Pacific from Regina to Fort William. That practically means that the rate on the lakes is 25 per cent of what it is on the railways under the Railway Board. If that be true, and I will challenge the hon. member to contradict it, surely the hon. member does not want a vessel to carry freight for less than 25 per cent of the rate charged by the railways. If he does, he is expecting too much.

There is another clause in this circular sent out by the hon. member in which he says that he thinks the freight rates should be one-third less by water than by rail. I should like to read the last part of Mr Payne's letter on that point:

> Speaking broadly, it might be assumed with some degree of soundness that freight rates on our inland waterways are about one-third of that of the railways.

I will now read a letter from the Hamilton branch of the Canadian Manufacturers Association dated May 9, 1919, with reference to the Armstrong amendment:

> This matter has been very seriously taken up with the Transportation Dept. of the Hamilton Branch, Canadian Manufacturers' Association, and I am directed to advise you that every manufacturer of Hamilton is unalterably opposed to this proposed change.

The differential in freight rates in favour of water transportation is being taken advantage of by Hamilton shippers and has been for years and has enabled our manufacturers to develop very heavy trade especially in the North-west provinces.

The normal tonnage shipped out of Hamilton by water yearly is 125,000 tons and about 80,000 tons of this goes to the Canadian Northwest.

All of the wholesale shippers of the city, including the grocery and hardware houses, are also strongly opposed to this amendment as they also take advantage of the differential in the rates by water, and these houses are dependent largely on their trade in the Canadian Northwest, their shipments travelling as far as British Columbia.

Another letter from the same association goes pretty far to show that the regulations regarding water traffic are very different from those regarding railway traffic, so much so that it is impossible for any Railway Board—and I have every confidence in the Railway Board—to look after water freight rates in the same way that it looks after railway rates. This letter says:

Steamship companies have no monopoly. They are given no franchise eliminating competition. They receive no assistance in the way of grants or subsidies. The water routes are open to all vessels and the greater the number of vessels competing for business the lower will be the rates.

If vessels are placed under the jurisdiction of the Railway Commission they will be required to file tariffs. We submit that fixed rates for vessels are neither feasible, desirable, or necessary.

Fixed rates in the case of vessels are not feasible on account of:

1. Variation in carrying capacity.
2. Variation in speed.
3. Variation in cost of insurance.
4. Variation in cost of operation at different seasons of the year. (A fair rate in summer might be a ruinous rate in November.)
5. Variation in cost of operation because of:
   (a) Different depths of water in different years.
   (b) Different depths of water at different times in same year.
   (c) Difference in loading facilities at different elevators, wharves or ports.
   (d) Difference in unloading facilities at different elevators, wharves or ports.

Fixed rates in the case of vessels are not desirable because they would

(1) Result in an elimination of competition.

(2) Place Canadian vessels at a disadvantage in competing against U.S.A. boats whose rates in ordinary times are regulated only by the law of supply and demand.

(3) Result in vessels lying idle when set rate was unprofitable.

(4) Discourage the building of further vessels.

[Mr. T. J. Stewart.]

Fixed rates in the case of vessels are not necessary, because to get business now boats must

(1) Underbid the rail rate.

(2) Underbid or meet rate charged by boats already under Railway Commission.

(3) Offer fair rates or other boats will be built.

I also wish to read a letter from Mr. J. L. Payne, in whom the hon. member for East Lambton seems to have every confidence, and I think after listening to this letter he will be bound to admit that freight rates on the water are very reasonable as compared with freight rates on the railways:

Ottawa, 15th May, 1919.

Dear Mr. Stewart,

You have asked me to give you some comparison of railway freight rates and freight rates by water. In measuring freight rates it is the accepted practice to reduce all charges to the basis of per ton per mile. This takes into account very accurately the factor of distance. Unfortunately, we are without statistical information with respect to the general business of carriers by water; but it happens that we have for some years been getting in this department the facts with respect to the movement of wheat from the head of Lake Superior to various points eastward. This enables me to make a comparison of railway charges with vessel charges for the transportation of wheat.

The Canadian Pacific rate on wheat from Regina to Fort William is 24 cents per 100 pounds, which would be the equivalent of $4.80 per ton. The distance is 777 miles. By dividing the mileage into the freight charges per ton I find that the rate is .618 cent, or a little over six-tenths of a cent, per ton mile. By the same process, and using the same factors, the rate per ton per mile last year on water-borne wheat from Fort William to Montreal was .309. This is exactly half the railway rate. During the war, as you know, freight rates on the Great Lakes have been greatly increased. In 1915, for example, the rate to Montreal was but .132 per ton per mile. Even in 1918 it was as low as .158 from Fort William to Buffalo. Speaking broadly, it might be assumed with some degree of soundness that freight rates on our inland waterways are about one-third of the railway rates.

I think hon. gentlemen will be very much surprised when I say that on looking over the returns a couple of years ago I found that the city of Hamilton shipped by water twelve times the tonnage shipped by the city of Toronto. Toronto is five times the size of Hamilton, but, nevertheless, we shipped twelve times the tonnage they did by water. If, then, our shippers in the city of Hamilton are all satisfied with the freight rates, the Committee would surely accept evidence of that kind in preference to the evidence of an individual living at an inland point who is interested in getting the control of lake traffic in the hands of the Railway Board, with the view perhaps at some future date of depriving those who live on waterways of the cheaper rate, and putting them on the same footing as those who live at inland points. The hon. member for East Lambton very carefully avoided producing the least bit of evidence from any of the ports like Montreal, Toronto, or Hamilton that do an enormous amount of shipping, because there was no dissatisfaction amongst shippers at those places. Speaking for the city of Hamilton, I have no hesitation in saying that it would be very very much against the wishes of the people of that city that this amendment should pass.

There is one other matter I want to refer to, and that is the fixing of a minimum freight rate. That would be most objectionable, and I will give the reason why. It is a common practice for a message to come to Hamilton from boat owners that John Jones, let us say, is sailing to Hamilton with a cargo shipped on such-and-such a date and will be ready to leave Hamilton on such-and-such a date; if you can arrange to give him a return cargo he will quote a very satisfactory price. Shippers in Hamilton do get a very satisfactory price in that way. Offers like this come every two or three weeks to shippers in the city of Hamilton. There is nothing objectionable in that practice, because it gives the shipper a cheaper rate; it costs less to deliver the goods to the middleman, who can sell the goods cheaper to the consumer in consequence. So far from hurting anybody, it is a benefit to all. I will not take up the time of the House any longer, but I felt it to be my duty to protest as strongly as I could against embodying this amendment in the Railway Act.

Mr. POWER: We in Quebec are in rather a peculiar position in regard to this amendment. We have petitioned various governments in past years to increase our railroad facilities, but without result. We have therefore come to the conclusion that our future lies on the water, and that we must do everything that we possible can to develop our port if we wish Quebec to take the place that it should have amongst the cities of Canada. But we are convinced that legislation such as this will have a very restrictive effect upon the development of the coastal and inland water trade. More than that, in respect to railways we have practically no competition. We have the Canadian Pacific railway, but it controls, throttles and strangles the city of Quebec. Its only competitor would seem to be the Government National railways; but so far, we have seen very little evidence of that system achieving the object which we wish it to attain. Therefore we are forced to fall back upon the coastal trade and the inland waters. The merchants of Quebec find that they are able to get goods from Montreal and from points on the Upper Lakes far more cheaply by boat than by railway; and they fear, and I think justly, that if the inland and coastal navigation were placed under the control of the Railway Board the result would be that the transportation rates would perhaps be almost equal, and the railroads would bring such pressure to bear upon the Railway Board that the special rates which our merchants now obtain would no longer be possible. The Board of Trade of Quebec has therefore placed itself on record as being absolutely opposed to this proposal. From a communication which that body has sent to me I quote the following extract in French:

(Translation.) I hope that you will appear for the Board of Trade of Quebec and urge our views, on the 30th instant, before the Special Committee to which has been referred Mr. Armstrong's proposed enactment that the inland water trade be placed under the control of the Railway Board.

Together with all the leading Boards of Trade of the Dominion, and more particularly that of Winnipeg, we are opposed to the proposed legislation because our merchants would lose the benefit of summer competition between the inland navigation or water transportation companies and the railways. In future, the freight rates of inland navigation companies would be determined and settled by the Railway Board, and no such company would be able to grant any special rate without first being expressly authorized to do so by the Railway Board.

That is to say, the Board of Trade of Quebec fears that if the proposed legislation passes, free competition will not be possible in future, and that at any time an inland navigation company wishes to grant a special rate to the merchants of that city it will be practically impossible owing to the lack of rapid means of communication and to the tardiness with which the Board will perforce have to give a decision on this matter. I do not want to tire the patience of the Committee by reading the communications which I have received on the subject, although I have a handful of them. I have had a communication from nearly every prominent shipper in Quebec, all resolutely opposed to the passage of the proposed enactment. I am sure that nobody in the House or in the country wishes to retard the development of our city and district, and therefore the opinion of these men who know the situation thoroughly from a shipping standpoint should be respected. They have given this matter careful thought and consideration, and they find that it is absolutely impossible for the city and district of Quebec to continue in the path of progress upon which they have started if such an enactment as the one under consideration is passed. I ask the Committee to very carefully view the matter, not only from the local but from the national standpoint, and consider whether or not it is a good thing to stifle the progress and the industry of one of our national ports.

Mr. KEEFER: On behalf of the city of Port Arthur I ask the Committee to reject this amendment. The people of that city have taken a very active interest in this proposal both last year and this year. They have studied the question carefully from the standpoint of the vital effect it will have upon their interests. Port Arthur is dependent upon transportation from ship to railway, and the merchants, shippers, wholesalers, and other interests of that city, after careful consideration, are unalterably opposed to this legislation and to any interference with the vessel trade. One dislikes to differ with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Armstrong) in presenting anything to this House because of his particularly genial manner in so doing, but I think he has not the experience in this matter of those who have always been dealing in ships and in the trade connected therewith. I do not intend reflecting in any way upon the Railway Board; but one cannot help thinking that if the railways are brought into competition with public bodies before the Board on the question as to what rates are to prevail, the influence of the railroads in their endeavour to raise the rates, must necessarily affect the board. A vessel to-day will carry a cargo equal to five train loads. Necessarily the freight rate by rail between the same points must always be much higher for that reason, and it will be to the interest of the railroads to pull up the freight rate by water, and especially in the case of through rates, instead of, by virtue of the competition, pulling it down.

The point made by the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Stewart) that you cannot in the case of these vessels have fixed rates is very true. There are times on the lakes when vessels are operating that it becomes either a question of taking freight at a very low rate or taking water ballast. For years before the war during the summer time we had coal coming from Cleveland to Port Arthur at thirty cents a ton, simply because the vessel owners would rather carry coal at that rate than carry water ballast. How can you have fixed rates unless those rates are regulated each month of the year? —and then you could not fix the rates definitely for each month according to the business that was offered. Many of the wholesalers and dealers in the West bring their goods to Port Arthur and store them there—I have seen acres of barbed wire so stored—waiting to be handled west in the winter, thus taking advantage of the low summer freight rate by boat. I am perfectly satisfied that if the Railway Commission is given the power to control the rates on these vessels the result will simply be to destroy competition, to interfere with the freedom that ought to prevail, and will tend to raise the rates. If there is anything the railroads desire it is to get control of the docks and get control, if they can, of the boats, and as long as you have a man who is able to build a boat and who is willing to enter the business and get what freight he can, and can get deliverance at a dock, you need not fear any monopoly as you do in the case of the railroads. I hope the Committee will consider very carefully before it passes any of the amendments suggested.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I would like to say a few words in reference to what the Hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. J. D. Reid) and the hon. member for Quebec (Mr. Power) have said. Coming from the district of Quebec where there is a large amount of traffic being carried by small boats plying between Quebec and lower St. Lawrence ports, I have followed this discussion with a good deal of interest. At nearly every place in my county along the banks of the St. Lawrence, there are five or six of these small boats plying between Quebec and these different places. These vessels have always made such freight and passenger rates as to them seemed fit and proper according to the circumstances and in accordance with the law of supply and demand. If this amendment were put into force these people would be placed in competition with large steamboat companies and also with the railway companies which would have the immediate effect of putting nearly every one of the small vessel owners out of business. It has always been deemed wise to leave water transportation free. As far as I am aware there have never been any excessive rates charged and I do not see why this amendment should be adopted. It is not very often that I vote for the Government, but on the present occasion I find myself under the necessity of voting with the Minister of Railways.

Mr. TWEEDIE: I have noticed that the amendment has commanded a good deal of attention throughout Canada and that since its first introduction it has been followed by no class of people more closely than by the shippers on our lakes and rivers. It has been suggested to-night that almost every person who has made representations to this committee or to the House has been opposed to the amendment as brought down. I would remind the committee that the amendments that the hon. member has submitted in the past are different from the amendment which we have before us to-night and that all the arguments which have been made against the amendment seem to be based on the fact that the hon. gentleman fixed a minimum charge in connection with transporting persons and goods over these routes. It was also argued in the special railway committee the other day that should this Government assume the responsibility, through the Railway Board, of establishing rates on the lakes it might interfere with the shipment of grain from Western Canada because the determination of the price in Liverpool depends on the transportation charges. But if we fix the maximum charges we still find ourselves in the position that we have been in in the past, namely, that the transportation companies on the lakes may reduce their charges so as to meet the competitive rates for shipment to the Liverpool markets and the West will not be injured by it.

It is to be regretted that we have not before the Committee more facts on which to determine the issue in regard to the regulation of transportation rates by water. But I wish to discuss the matter on general principles. It has been said that a ship, or shipowner, does not require any franchise. If he does not require any franchise, he is that much better off. When a railway corporation gets a franchise, it is put to the expense of costly construction of railways through the length and breadth of the country but the great national highways which we have in addition to the railways are the rivers and lakes. These are highways which have been constructed by the Dominion Government. They have been dredged, canalized; they are guarded in season, they have their buoys placed in them and they have their lighthouses erected upon them. The Government has also erected, at a cost of many millions of dollars, docks for the purposes of shipping and the charges which have been collected recently are not in any way commensurate with the service which has been rendered. They start out with that great asset without the expenditure of one single dollar on the part of the men who own the ships. Is it too much, then, to ask this Government to go one step farther and say that where they have absolute jurisdiction over the railways they should have some slight jurisdiction over the boats that traverse those waters?

In the United States where there was a demand that water transportation should be reasonably checked by legislation, the same difficulties arose as had arisen in connection with land transportation. We found that they had their pernicious system of rebating. We found that one shipper could bid for the goods of different men at different prices and carry on an unfair competition. We found that they would not call at certain ports unless legislation was brought in to compel them to call at these ports. We found that in the United States, until 1916, in so far as inter-state commerce was concerned, they were an absolute law unto themselves and nobody except their own shipping jurisdiction had any authority to regulate them. It has been contended that it would do great harm and occasion a great hardship, to legislate in this matter.

But that is what was done in the United States. In 1916 they introduced in the United States a statute, not, as was suggested in the Committee when this matter was under discussion, as a war measure, but just simply for the purpose of regulating what might be termed a public utility, or what is known to everybody as a common carrier. There were subsequent amendments made to the Act, twice, in 1918, and these amendments were the branches of the law which particularly had reference to the war phase of it. The United States to-day controls its shipping on the Great Lakes, as well as its foreign shipping, under that statute. They have authority whereby they can fix their rates, examine agreements entered into between various companies and whereby they can compel the publication of tariffs of rates in reference to marine transportation. Every possible evil which arose in connection with railway transportation in the United States arose in connection with water transportation, and these matters were dealt with by the Shipping Act in 1916.

What is the position with reference to the navigation companies? There can be no question that not very long ago there were a large number of these companies owning a few small boats on the rivers and lakes. But these independent companies are being absorbed very rapidly by large corporations. We find that the principal of these are the Dominion Marine Association, the Montreal Transportation Company, the Canada Steamships lines, the Great Lakes Transportation Company, the St. Lawrence and Chicago Steam Navigation Company, and the Ottawa Transportation Company.

There is being created in this country a monopoly in connection with our inland steamship service just as a monopoly was being created in connection with our railways. Although the opposition to this amendment is so loud and so strenuous, because it is feared that the poor shippers will have to pay higher rates, no person can tell this House that when we get a combine and a monopoly of the water transportation companies, such as is growing at the present time, that combine, that monopoly, is being created for the purpose of the reduction of freight rates by water. It is said that we will lose competition, that there will be fewer boats to carry our grain from the West. But, so long as there are a hundred thousand, or a million, or a hundred million, bushels of grain to be carried from the head of the Great Lakes to Buffalo or to Montreal, just so long will there be competition among shippers to carry that grain.

A public service corporation in the form of a common carrier is just as great a public service corporation as we can have in this country, and it should be as amenable to regulation as any other public service body. We are rapidly coming to the time when it requires a great deal of money to organize these transportation bodies. When we have that money placed in them we have created a monopoly by reason of the large investment made for the purpose of carrying on its operations. And when we have such a monopoly in public service work the Government should step in and either take it over or exercise jurisdiction for control of its operations.

It seems to me that there is nothing unreasonable in the amendment, and that this Government could well take a step in a forward direction by at least adopting the amendment and proceeding to establish maximum rates of transportation charges imposed by these corporations.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I am going to support the amendment. In British Columbia we have a coastal service which is practically monopolized by the Union Steamship Company, and that company is taking advantage of the situation to discriminate against certain ports of call. I am informed that at one place called Gibson's Landing, which is about thirty miles from Vancouver, some of the residents had a misunderstanding with this company, and by way of retaliation the company cut out the call there. Now, if we had a regulating body for these steamship companies it would be impossible for them to discriminate in that manner. It seems to me that there can be no real objection to the Board of Railway Commissioners having jurisdiction over steamboat companies as well as over railway companies. If railway regulation has proved to be satisfactory—and I think every one admits that that is the case—then why should not similar regulation be satisfactory in the case of water transportation? I am in favour of this resolution.

Mr. J. F. REID: Several years ago the Council of Agriculture, on behalf of organized agriculture in the West, made representations to the Federal Government to have lake transportation regulated, and I am sorry to-night, Mr. Chairman, to see the Minister of Railways objecting to this amendment. It is a progressive movement, but our Minister of Railways sees fit to support private corporations—he sees fit to support a large monopoly, for that is what I understand the Canadian Steamship Company to be, and naturally those interested in it very much resent being brought under proper control. As the hon. member for East Lambton stated, he is not asking that the rates be controlled exactly, but that a maximum rate be set; and if steamship companies choose to carry freight at a lower rate than the maximum by all means let them do so means let them do so.

I was very glad to hear that Mr. Carruthers when he discovered what kind of a company he was in—this Canada Steamship Company—pulled out to save himself.

The effect of the excessive rates charged on the lakes for the transportation of our wheat to the seaboard has a very adverse effect on business, for it tends to stagnation, and in fact sometimes causes a blockade. When the transaction of selling wheat at Port Arthur takes place the exporter, not knowing the rates he will have to pay when his grain is shipped out, naturally charges the highest rate that has been in existence, and to make himself absolutely sure he charges a higher rate than what he would need to do if the rates were fixed. Thus this excessive rate which he is obliged to charge affects the producer and also the consumer, and thereby tends to stagnate trade. The wheat is held up in the elevators, which very often are filled to capacity, and all the available box cars are resorted to for storage, and the initial elevators are also congested, simply because the exporter has no guarantee as to the rate he will have to pay on exporting the grain. Not only does it affect the producer of the grain, but it also affects every business man in the country. It is a well known fact that if the farmer cannot sell his produce he cannot pay his debts to the business man, and if the business man does not get his money from the farmer how can he continue in business?

I hope to see this amendment carried. This is not a party government any more, we do not need to wonder what will the party think; what we need to be concerned about is what will the people think of this progressive movement? The hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon (Mr. Robb), I think, was very anxious lest the westerners freeze in the winter time, and he wanted to see them get their coal supply as cheaply as possible. I venture to say that if the rates were under control, those of us in the West who do use coal brought up to Port Arthur by boat would at least get it as cheap or cheaper than we do today.

The hon. member for West Hamilton (Mr. Stewart) remarked that the steamships on the lakes get no benefit from the Government. I think he did not mean to say that, because he surely knows that any ship plying on the lakes of Canada has the benefit of the aids to navigation provided by the Government, As has been stated by the hon. member for East Lambton, when the proposed extensions and improvements to navigation are completed they will have cost this country over $400,000,000. That enormous expenditure is for the deepening of channels and the construction of canals and locks, and our steamships plying on the lakes will have the benefit and the free use of those aids to navigation. Yet they say: We get no help from the Government; therefore our rates should not be brought under the control of the State.

This matter affects one of the most important links in our transportation system. We are approaching the time when we shall be up against the keenest competition on the wheat market at Liverpool that we have ever seen. The countries of the world that were producing wheat in the past will again turn to that production, and Western Canadian wheat must be subjected to such a very long haul both by rail and by water, that if the rates are not cut down to an equitable basis we shall not be able to compete with our wheat on the markets of the world. The Committee should be very careful in considering this proposed amendment; the matter is of vital importance not only to the farmers of Western Canada and to the businessmen as well, but to the Dominion as a whole. It is our surplus products that will eventually pay our huge debt.

Mr. BRISTOL: There have been one or two statements in connection with this discussion which, I think, in the interests of the people should be cleared up in the minds of a few hon. members. I do not think it necessary to clear them up in the minds of business men, because I do not know of any Board of Trade, any shipper, any elevator man, any grain man, or any man who is interested in the shipping of the country in a practical way and has an accurate knowledge of shipping conditions in Canada, who has either made a complaint or expressed a desire for this legislation. Therefore it is only fair to say to my hon. friend (Mr. J. F. Reid) that there are one or two facts which the people to whom I have referred know much better than I do, and which I think it is proper to present for his consideration. One of them is this. The price of the wheat of the world is fixed at Liverpool. All wheat meets there, whether it comes from the Argentine, from Canada, or from the United States. Wheat from the Canadian West has to go to Liverpool, and it is in the public interest that it get there as cheaply as possible. There are two routes which it can take: via Buffalo and New York, or via Port Colborne and Montreal. That is the first competition that is presented to every shipping company that is not controlled by a railroad corporation; and they have to beat that Buffalo-New York route if they are to ship via Montreal. Let me tell you why. The rate of freight from New York to Liverpool has always determined the rate from Montreal to Liverpool. To meet that rate the Canadian boats have to beat the Buffalo-New York rate; they have to get to Montreal cheaper if they are to pay the additional ocean rate from Montreal to Liverpool. Why is it that the ocean freight rate is higher from Montreal to Liverpool than it is from New York to Liverpool? It is a very simple matter. New York, of course, is a centre of commerce of the United States. It is on one end of the so-called Atlantic triangle. Boats go to South America, from South America to New York and from New York to Liverpool, in all cases with full cargoes; therefore they are able to carry cheaper. The other point in favour of New York is the insurance rate, which is very high on the St. Lawrence route. I have heard many shipping men say that if Canada was to do full justice to her West the Canadian Government would have to take care of this insurance question and put Montreal and Quebec on a better footing of competition with New York.

That is one of the points. The other is this: It is true that the Canada Steamship line has the largest number of ships on the Great Lakes, but it has by no means a monopoly. Mr. Playfair's line is a keen competitor of Canada Steamships, or of any other line that operates on the Great Lakes. If the money had been put into it that imagination has painted to-night there would be some orders forthcoming for the Canadian shipyards—and there are none. Nobody wants to build ships, not even the Government of Canada, in order to secure the enormous profit which has been pictured to-night, but which exists only in imagination. If profits have been made in shipping during the war it has not been on the Great Lakes, but on the high seas. When the war started Great Britain appealed to every steamship company on the Great Lakes to put as many boats as they could on the high seas, because it was absolutely necessary, in view of the submarine warfare, to do everything possible to get tonnage. Canada Steamship Company put a certain number of their ships on the high seas, spending a large amount of money to fit them out. About nine of their ships were torpedoed. The British Government commandeered some of their ships at the rate of twelve shillings a ton dead weight, and out of those ships the British Government made for the British Exchequer probably £50 a ton dead weight or more. I have always contended that that should have gone into the treasury of Canada, and I still think so. The British shipping companies during the first two years of the war made on the high seas from 200 to 1,000 per cent. Great Britain had control of the high seas, and it was fortunate that she had; otherwise the British Empire would have become bankrupt. Then the British Government took hold of the shipping on the high seas, gave the shipping companies twelve shillings a ton deadweight and made as high as $300 and $350 a ton deadweight out of these very ships. That was the situation on the high seas. But when you come to fix rates, what the shippers have always wanted is absolute flexibility of rate. That is, they want to be able to trade on the rate from hour to hour and from day to day. The railway company has a special charter. It has rights of expropriation. If it is twenty miles from any other line of railway, naturally you have to regulate the rates, because it could charge anything it thought proper; but that does not apply to vessels on the Great Lakes. Anybody can build them; anybody can own them; anybody can operate them; the lakes are free to all. On the other hand, the railway companies operate under special legislation and with special privileges. When you have that flexibility of rate you get higher rates or lower rates, as the conditions vary.

My hon. friend spoke of the rate being as high as four, six or seven cents. Let me tell you the reason. As our ports freeze up in the winter, there is tremendous competition in the matter of getting cargoes on the last boats going out of the lake, in order to avoid the enormously high rate that would have to be paid to the railways. This accounts for the rate being six, seven or eight cents at the end of the season. If you fix a maximum rate, the only one who gets the benefit is the American vessel man, who will come in and take any freight he can get. The American shipping men can pay higher rates and take the grain by an American route because they have the advantage of the New York rate. If I believed that this amendment would cheapen the rate for the West, I would vote for it as a wise measure. But I assure you that the ships have to beat the railway rate; they have to beat the New York route, and they have the competition among themselves. If you want to benefit the Canadian farmer, you will have to get a lower rate on the high seas, and build up a merchant marine such as the Minister of Marine has been advocating. You will have to get a lower rate from Montreal to Liverpool in order to beat the New York route.

Mr. HENDERS: We have reached the time in the history of Canada when public utilities are in a large measure coming under public supervision or control. So far as I can see, no valid reason has been presented to-night for not bringing shipping rates under control of the Railway Commission. Years ago it was found absolutely necessary in the interest of transportation to bring railway rates under the control of the Federal Government. Every argument that has been used here to-night against the bringing of the shipping interests under the control of the Government was used at that time against the bringing of the railways under that control. We have had years of experience with railways under government control through the board that is now operating, and we have no complaint against that control. Everybody is of the opinion, I believe, that it was a good thing in the interest of Canada that transportation by rail was brought under the supervision of the Railway Board.

Mr. ROBB: How much more does it cost to carry a bushel of grain from Fort William to Montreal than it did three years ago?

Mr. HENDERS: When I am through, the hon. member may ask his question. I want to present my argument and the hon. member has had an opportunity of presenting his. Every argument that was used in favour of bringing the railways under the jurisdiction of the Railway Board might be and has been reasonably put forward to-night why we should bring the shipping interests under some similar control. Now that we have tested out the value of control by the Railway Board, I believe we are quite safe in asking also that our water transportation mediums might be brought under similar control.

A great deal has been said to-night about fixing rates, and it was said that by fixing rates you preclude shipping companies from any right they might wish to exercise of carrying goods at a lower rate than the rate fixed. If it was a fixed rate, then the argument would hold good, but when it is not a fixed rate, but a maximum rate we are asking for, there is no argument in the statement. Ships can lower their rates as much as they see fit; all we ask is that there be a maximum rate beyond which they cannot go. Therefore, all that has been said along the line of interfering with railways reducing rates in order to get business, does not obtain here at all, and there is no argument in it.

Four years ago this matter came under consideration in the West. The interests represented by the producers of one of the most important commodities we have to ship in this country gave careful consideration to this question at the time. They passed resolutions urging that the Government of Canada should bring Canadian shipping interests under the control of some board, and a request made by a large producing interest like that should have consideration. There are two classes of people affected directly by the control of rates; one is the producer and the other is the consumer. I claim that the producing interests of Canada are practically a unit in asking for the fixing of a maximum rate. I claim further that the great consuming interests of Canada are largely behind those asking for the fixing of a maximum rate. The resolutions that have come here have come from boards of trade, from manufacturing associations and from wholesalers. These are people occupying a middle position, and it matters very little to them what attitude they take as regards fixing of rates. It affects them very little whether the rate is increased or not, because all they have to do is to add the increase to the cost of the goods and pass it on to the consumer. Both the producer and the consumer who are affected by the fixing of rates are largely if not entirely in favour of the amendment, and I therefore desire to urge as strongly as I can upon the Government the importance of giving careful consideration to this amendment. If the Government vote against this amendment, this will be another case where the statement may be made that the high cost of living is not being dealt with sympathetically by them.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: The hon. member for Toronto Centre(Mr. Bristol) put his finger on the pulse of the situation as regards the steamship companies when he said that what they wished to maintain was a flexibility in rates. If that is interpreted in another way, it means that the steamship companies wish to be in a position which will enable them to discriminate between shippers and to quote to shippers that are within the circle a rate that they will not give to those who are without. It just narrows the water-borne traffic situation down to this, that no man in business anywhere in Canada to-day can undertake to enter into a contract for the delivery of a commodity anywhere in Canada if it has to be transported by water, and know that he is going to get transportation at all or that he is going to get it within a certain radii of rates, because at the time the goods are ready to be shipped, he is absolutely at the mercy of the steamship companies. The hon. member for West Hamilton (Mr. Stewart) challenged the hon. member for East Lambton (Mr. Armstrong) to cite an instance where discrimination had taken place or where a steamship company had failed to carry out its contract. I can cite a case where a steamship company entered into a contract to transport a large volume of freight, and because, in the interim between the time the contract was signed and the time the goods were to be transported, conditions had developed that made it possible for them to get any rate they asked, they repudiated their contract notwithstanding the fact that by so doing they placed the shipper of those goods in a position that meant ultimate bankruptcy. I know perfectly well the hon. member will say that the shipper had his recourse in the courts. That is true, and the shipper took recourse and the case has been before the courts for four years, and I anticipate that in all human probability it will be before the courts for as long a time as the steamship company can keep it there. In the meantime what about the goods that have to be transported? The situation in connection with the transportation on the Upper Lakes narrows down to this, to say nothing of rates, that the shipper is at the mercy of one or two large transportation companies that will take his freight if it suits them to take it and that will leave it on the docks if it does not suit them to take it, and there is no possible means by which the shipper can get redress.

After we have spent $400,000,000 in developing a waterway for the transportation of the commerce of this country, and large sums to protect that waterway for the steamers, it is only fair to the shippers that there should be some control over the rates in order that the steamship companies should not be permitted to do just as they like. I do not intend to enter into the question of the profits that have been made, but anybody who knows conditions on the Great Lakes knows that there has been a tremendous increase in the rates on the Upper Lakes from 1914 onwards. We hear a great deal about the increase of thirty-five to forty per cent in railway rates, but I know instances where there was an increase in water rates of 200 per cent on a certain commodity within four or five months during 1915-16. I cannot see any logical reason why the amendment of the hon. member for East Lambton should not carry. I am not sufficiently expert to know whether all the details are as they should be, but the principle involved is simply this: That we have as much right to control water-borne traffic as we have to control railway traffic, and I have no doubt whatever that the Railway Commission could work out the details so as to do justice to all concerned.

[Mr. Nicholson.]

Amendment (Mr. J. E. Armstrong) negatived; yeas 36, nays 61.

Section agreed to.

On section 210—prior contracts:

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for East Edmonton (Mr. Mackie) has moved to amend this section by adding after the word "agreement" in the fifth line, the following words, "or notice thereof by caveat or otherwise."

Mr. J. D. REID: I have no objection to the amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended, agreed to.

Mr. J. D. REID: We have just one other section to consider, No. 374, which I shall ask the Committee to consider on Wednesday of next week.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY—WAYS AND MEANS—SUPPLY BILL.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Sir THOMAS WHITE moved:

Resolved, that a sum not exceeding $28,933,622.56 being one-sixth of the amount of each item set forth in the Main Estimates for the year ending 31st March, 1920, not yet adopted, be granted to His Majesty for the year ending 31st March, 1920.

Motion agreed to, resolution reported, read the first and second time, and concurred in.

The House proceeded to consider resolutions reported from Committee of Supply.

Resolutions concurred in.

On motion of Sir Thomas White, the House went into Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Sir THOMAS WHITE moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the Supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1920, the sum of $148,211,640.39 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Sir Thomas White moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 123 to provide for His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1920.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the first and second time, considered in Committee, reported, and read the third time and passed.

On the motion of Sir THOMAS WHITE the House adjourned at 11.25 p.m.

Friday, May 30, 1919

REPORT PRESENTED.

Annual report of Railway Statistics for the year ended 31st March, 1919.—Hon. Mr. Reid.

FOREST RESERVES AND PARKS ACT.

LAND FOR SOLDIERS' SETTLEMENT TO BE WITHDRAWN FROM FOREST RESERVES.

On the Order for the introduction of Bills:

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior): Mr. Speaker, with the consent of the House, I desire to introduce a Bill to amend the Forest Reserves and Parks Act. Although notice has been given, yesterday being a holiday it does not appear on the Order Paper to-day. In view of the necessity of the Act being considered at an early date in order that the reductions from the Forest Reserves for the purpose of Soldiers' settlement may be made available in the following month, I would like time to be saved to the extent of three or four days by having the introduction gone on with to-day. The purpose of the Bill is to take from certain of our forest reserves some areas that have been inspected and found fit for agricultural purposes. I therefore beg to move, with the consent of the House, for leave to introduce Bill No. 125, to amend the Dominion Forest Reserves and Parks Act.

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

HIGH COST OF LIVING.

SPECIAL COMMITTEE OF HOUSE TO INQUIRE INTO COST OF FOODSTUFFS, ETC.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance): moved:

That a Special Committee of the House consisting of Messrs. Nicholson (Algoma), Stevens, Reid (Mackenzie), Douglas (Strathcona), Davis, Hocken, Sutherland, Fielding, Davidson, Nesbitt, McCoig, Sinclair (Queens, P.E.I.), Devlin, Vien and Euler, be appointed for the purpose of inquiring forwith as to the prices charged throughout Canada for foodstuffs, clothing, fuel and other necessaries of life, and as to the rates of profit made thereon by dealers and others concerned in their production, distribution and sale; also as to rentals of dwelling houses in industrial centres of Canada and rates of return of capital invested therein, with power to send for persons, papers and records, examine witnesses under oath, engage accountants and other necessary assistants and to report to the House from time to time the result of their inquiry with any recommendations they may make with a view to effecting a reduction in such prices and rentals.

Motion agreed to.

INDUSTRIAL UNREST IN CANADA.

STATEMENT OF PRIME MINISTER ON LABOUR SITUATION IN TORONTO.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. F. S. CAHILL (Pontiac): Would the Government state if they have anything new in regard to the strike? It is important to the House. The hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) is back from Winnipeg.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): We have a very reassuring telegram this morning from Senator Robertson at Winnipeg, who reports that the condition is greatly improved there to-day. He says that the railway mail clerks, 110 in number, who went out at first, returned within the time limit given them to return, and that there are numerous applications, very largely from returned soldiers, for positions in the post office. Further, a great many of the employees of the city have returned to work; the clerical staff has returned in a body. The whole situation is so greatly improved that he purposes to leave for Ottawa to-morrow morning.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is understood that a delegation waited upon the Prime Minister yesterday. Will the right hon. gentleman tell the House if he reached any conclusion with them?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We spent nearly the whole day—from ten o'clock in the morning until seven o'clock in the evening—endeavouring to arrive at an arrangement which would compose the differences between the employees and employers, or, failing to arrive at an agreement, we strongly urged that the questions in difference should be submitted either to an investigation by a Royal Commission or to arbitration. There was an approach towards an agreement, but no agreement was finally reached. A great many proposals on one side and the other were put forward, and the final result, about seven o'clock in the evening, was that the employers made a proposal in writing which, I think, was furnished to the press, and which was to be submitted by the representatives of the labour organizations to the men in Toronto. I believe it was so presented, but the men did not see fit to accept it. The chief question under discussion yesterday was the granting of a week of forty-four hours, and it was upon that question that the employers finally decided to offer arbitration. We endeavoured to have the offer accompanied with some other conditions which possibly might have made it more acceptable, but it was presented finally in the form which has been made public. I understand that a considerable number of men have gone out on strike in Toronto to-day.

JUDGES' ACT AMENDMENT.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Meighen, Bill No. 104, to amend the Judges' Act was read a second time, and the House went into Committee on the Bill, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—One additional judge provided for in British Columbia:

Mr. BUREAU: Is it proposed to change the number of judges, or make a change in the salaries in British Columbia?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no change made in the salaries; the Bill provides for the addition of one judge to the County Court Bench of British Columbia.

Mr. STEVENS: Has the minister, since we last discussed the matter of judges' salaries, arrived at a decision to increase the salary of the county court judges of British Columbia which I think it was very fully demonstrated and agreed to on the former occasion, is altogether too small? I think the Acting Minister of Justice at that time suggested that he expected the Minister of Justice would return to Canada in time to deal with the matter; but inasmuch as there seems to be no indication of the latter's return at present, I would ask the acting minister to give that phase of the question his consideration now that we have such a Bill before us as the present one and remedy what is, without any doubt, a grave injustice to those judges.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What I stated on the occasion of the consideration of the resolution which preceded this Bill was as stated by the hon. gentleman. Since that time, during much of which intervening period I have been absent, it transpires that the Minister of Justice will not probably be back for any substantial portion at least of this session. Consequently I feel that the responsibility is on me of making a recommendation on the subject which the hon. gentleman has brought to my attention. As to what the decision of the Government will be I could not now say, but I can inform the hon. gentleman that an answer will be given him some day next week.

Mr. FULTON: I was not present when this matter was discussed in the House a week or two ago, but I would like to support the attitude of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Stevens) in regard to it. I notice that on the former occasion it was stated that there was no discrimination so far as the salaries of the county court judges throughout the Dominion are concerned. That is true as regards the salaries of county court judges under that title, but I would like to ask the Acting Minister of Justice if it is not a fact that the judges in the province of Quebec who hold a similar position to the county court judges in the other provinces are not paid higher salaries? If I am not mistaken the Superior court judges in that province hold positions equivalent to those of county court judges in the other provinces, and are paid higher salaries than those County Court judges are. I also noticed that in the debate the other day the point was made that in the other provinces the salaries of the County Court judges are augmented by the provinces themselves. That, I think, is clear proof that the salaries are not considered adequate, and I think no member of the House would for a moment urge that a stipend of $3,000 a year is by any means suitable for a County Court judge under existing conditions. I believe that British Columbia is the only province, in the West at least, that does not add to the salaries given these judges by the Dominion Government. In considering what the salary ought to be it seems to me that the Dominion Government has nothing whatever to do with additions to judicial salaries which the provinces may make. In British Columbia up to some twenty years ago the salary was enhanced by the provincial government appointing each County Court judge a stipendary magistrate, which carried with it an additional $500. That system was done away with something like twenty years ago, and there is now only one judge in the province who receives that additional salary. The change did not affect those judges who were acting as stipendary magistrates at the time, but was applied to those who have since been appointed. I would strongly urge that the question of an increase in salary for these judges be not only given consideration, but favourable consideration, by the Government.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend is under a misapprehension as regards the Superior Court judges of the province of Quebec. In that province we have the district of Montreal and the district of Quebec, where the judges of the Superior Court receive an annual salary of $7,000. Then there are rural districts where a judge of the Superior Court administers justice—not for one county, as in Ontario and the other English-speaking provinces, but for several counties forming one district—and they receive an annual stipend of $5,000 a year.

Mr. FULTON: Is the jurisdiction of those judges limited in any way?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Not at all. They have even a larger jurisdiction than the judges of the Superior Court in Montreal, because in the rural districts these judges not only hear civil cases, but also cases which in that city are passed upon by the judges of the Circuit Court. They likewise hear the Criminal Court cases which in Montreal and Quebec are dealt with by the judges of the Court of King's Bench. We have no such courts as County Courts in our province.

Mr. PARDEE: Has the Government decided to increase the salaries of the County Court judges in Ontario as it has been asked to do for some considerable time?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have just stated in reply to the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) that I would bring the subject to the attention of Council by way of recommendation in the immediate future, and will make a statement on the subject some time next week.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am glad indeed that the Acting Minister of Justice has decided to deal with this question. When it was before us on a previous occasion I tried to make clear what my own views were on the subject, and I am not going to take up the time of the Committee by repeating them now. I do not know what the views of the minister may be as to the salary that should be paid to these judges, but in view of the fact that we are granting salaries of $6,000 and $7,000 to officials in the Government service who are not doing any more important work than that which devolves upon the judges of the County Court, I would certainly suggest to the minister, if the suggestion is of any assistance to him, that the salaries of County Court judges should not be less than $5,000. The case of the judges in the province of British Columbia has been advanced, and in the representations on their behalf I absolutely concur. However, I have no special request to make for the judges of one province more than those of another; I think the County Court judges throughout the country should receive the same salary. I might say, though, that it has been brought to my notice that in the chief city of Manitoba, the province of the Acting Minister of Justice, the County Court judge only receives $3,000 a year, whereas in Halifax and St. John, and other large provincial centres, the County Court judges receive $3,500.

There is no reason why the leading County Court judge in the metropolitan city of Manitoba should get less than a County Court judge at Halifax or St. John. The minister will have in mind the leading County Court judge in Winnipeg. I am not acquainted with him and do not know his name, but no doubt the minister knows him well; I understand that he is a capable man and ranks favourably with those occupying similar positions in other leading cities of the Dominion.

I submit that the Superior Court judges in all the provinces should receive the same salary. In Nova Scotia, for instance, the Superior Court judges do not get the same salary as judges performing similar duties in Quebec and Ontario. I shall not take the comparison further west; but these judges are all in the same class; they administer the same laws and exercise the same jurisdiction, and their salaries should be uniform. The minister pointed out the other day that the difference between the salaries of some of the judges in New Brunswick and Manitoba was due to the fact that some of them were judges of the Court of Appeal. That does not apply to Nova Scotia, because our Circuit Court judges are judges of Appeal. The province has elected that for all time the judges of the Circuit Court shall be also judges of the Court of Appeal, and as these judges are satisfactorily doing the work of both courts, they should receive the same salary as the Superior Court judges in other provinces. It would bring about good feeling and harmony in all the courts if judges performing similar duties throughout Canada were all treated alike.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does my hon. friend's proposed recommendation apply to all the provinces?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No proposed recommendation is in being as yet. Now that the responsibility apparently cannot be taken by the minister himself, I intend to make a recommendation to Council in the premises and to make a statement to Parliament next week as to what the position is.

Mr. FIELDING: In the discussion that took place a day or two ago in regard to the Civil Service, an hon. member laid down the rule—which seemed to be an excellent one—that if we had fewer officials and paid them better, good results would follow. Is that not a good rule to apply to the judges? I notice that, by legislation of Ontario, there is to be a considerable reduction in the number of County Court judges in that province. In this case we are proposing to increase the number of judges in British Columbia. I have not sufficient knowledge of British Columbia to offer an opinion in the matter, but it seems odd that at a time when Ontario is cutting down the number of its judges British Columbia finds it necessary to make an increase. I know the difficulty that arises owing to the jurisdiction of the provinces in the matter of the courts and the fact that the Dominion has to provide the judges and pay the bills. I know this is a layman's view and that laymen ought not to say much about these things; but there is a wide-spread opinion that the rule of having fewer officials and paying them better is a good one to apply to the judges as well as to other branches of the public service.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am thoroughly in agreement with my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding), so much so that I addressed a communication to the attorneys general of all the provinces, British Columbia among the others, looking to provincial legislation for reduction in the provinces. A practical response has come from Ontario in very substantial reductions, indeed. This Bill, however, provides for the filling of a vacancy created by the Legislature of British Columbia. In the northern portion of the island of Vancouver a considerable settlement has grown up, particularly in the coal-bearing regions, since the previous distribution of judges was made, which cannot be adequately served by the number of judges they now have.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Mr. JACOBS: Do these judges in British Columbia receive also surrogate and other fees, as in Ontario, in order that their salary may be brought up to some kind of a living wage?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am informed that such is not the case.

Mr. MOWAT: If the minister inquired what was the opinion of the different Bars in the province on this subject, he would find that it is in favour of a substantial increase in the emolument of judges. Until twenty years ago the senior County Court judges received $2,600 a year and the junior judges $2,000 a year. That remuneration was, perhaps, good enough for the time when people were not so luxurious and so extravagant as they are now and when the incomes of merchants and millers and other people generally were low. But as the incomes of the townspeople increased it was felt that the judges should be put on a par with the persons whom they would meet in a business way, socially, or otherwise. It was not deemed proper that the judge, who had the affairs of the people in his hands for adjudication, should be thought to be a man living from hand to mouth. He should be an independent person and be able to take his place socially or any other way with the best people in the community. Accordingly, about twenty years ago the salaries were raised to $3,000. But the purchasing power of a dollar is only half what it was, and, following out the principle upon which this remuneration was fixed years ago, we must surely increase it so that it will meet the condition brought about by the decreased purchasing power of the dollar. I am glad that the minister received such a definite reply to his suggestion from Ontario. At the recent session of the Ontario Legislature they took away all the junior judges—whose remuneration has been $3,000, the same as the senior judges—except in two countries, York and Wentworth, where the judges have a great deal to do. Twenty-eight junior judgeships are done away with and the positions will not be filled; but when senior judgeships become vacant the positions will be filled from these junior judgeships. This will result in a very large saving in a few years—probably from $50,000 to $80,000. That sum might well be distributed among the seniors who are left in the different counties. A county court judge cannot at present keep up the social position which the people expect him to keep up, nor educate his family properly, nor buy the necessary books to keep up with the literary and social events of the day, unless he has a salary of at least $5,000 a year, and I sincerely trust the Government will come to the conclusion that the remuneration of judges should not be less than that sum.

Mr. McKENZIE: Has the minister made any appointments to judgeships in either Saskatchewan or Alberta lately? It has been brought to my notice by somebody, whose name I cannot recall at the moment, that certain judicial districts have been created by the legislature in one or the other or both of those provinces, but that no judges have been appointed, and that a great deal of hardship has been suffered in those districts on that account. It was stated that the judges who had to do the work lived so far away from where the court sat that it was difficult for them to get there, and when they got there, they were in a hurry to return to their own district, and that the administration of justice was suffering very much in those sections.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The cases to which the hon. member refers have been brought to my notice; indeed, they existed prior to my assuming the duties of Acting Minister of Justice. They were subsisting while the minister himself was here. I have not made a recommendation as to filling the vacancies; indeed, I have made no recommendation as to filling any judicial vacancy in Canada. It may be that concurrently with the consideration of the salary question, I shall have to give consideration also to filling these vacancies. The reason why I did not make a recommendation was this. I certainly was not convinced that the provincial Government, say of Saskatchewan, would not be able by a readjustment of judicial districts so to provide that the present bench could render efficient service. I addressed a letter accordingly to the Attorney General, but I have not been informed of any action having been taken. There is no doubt at all that the Attorney General of the province would be in a much better position than I to judge as to the feasibility of my suggestion. I fear that his attitude is unfavourable.

Mr. DEVLIN: Has the department any intention of increasing the salaries of judges of the Superior Court of Quebec? This question has been mooted for a number of years, and the excuse always given was the necessity of first adjusting the salaries of judges of the county courts of Ontario; and it was stated that when that was done the Government or the department intended to take up the question as regards Superior Court judges. Many of these judges are earning far less than civil servants and they are not able to keep up with the dignity of the position. In many instances they are barely able to make both ends meet, and that is not in accord with the positions they hold as they should be far above all possibilty of want, because they have very serious duties to perform. I hope the minister has the question under consideration.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The discussion opened with a contrast drawn by the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Fulton) between the salaries of judges in Quebec and those of judges in other provinces. He pointed out that Superior Court judges in Quebec received $5,000 while county court judges in other provinces received $3,000. There is, however, a difference in jurisdiction, but there is in Quebec really no bench corresponding in jurisdiction and certainly no bench corresponding in salary with the county, or district court bench, as it may be called, of the other provinces. I have not progressed with the subject far enough to say that I have reached any intention at all. The whole subject has to be considered as one—a Dominion wide subject.

Referring to the observations of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) as to the opinion of the Bar of Canada, I have received from members of the Bar and from Bar associations, resolutions large in number and influential in signatures, all in favour of a substantial increase to judges. That body of opinion has left no doubt in the mind of the department as to what it considers should be done. I can only add that as yet I have not received any favourable resolutions from Grain Growers' associations or from the Labour Temple.

Mr. JACOBS: May I bring to the attention of the minister a matter which arises out of the discussion this afternoon with regard to increasing judges' salaries? I trust that some of the Quebec judges—I do not know about judges in the other provinces—will see their way clear towards rendering judgment within say three or four years after a case has been placed before them for decision. This is a matter which ought to engage the attention of the Department of Justice. The delays in the matter of handing down judgments have almost approached a scandal. I confess that when I see the judgments over which some judges have been spending so much time, I am mystified as to the long delays. Within the last few years there have been made to the bench appointments of several men who probably consider that they have been placed there simply as pensioners, because little is ever done by these gentlemen to see that speedy judgments are handed down. I speak about this matter advisedly, and while probably I am somewhat out of order, I hope that bringing this matter to the attention of the Committee will make some of these judges understand that they are, after all, servants of the public, as other people in the Civil Service are, and that they must do their duty as other employees in the Government service do.

Mr. PROULX: I do not think the position of judges is as lamentable as was stated by some hon. members this afternoon and the other day. A judge, besides receiving a salary while on the bench, can, after a certain number of years, get a retiring allowance. After fifteen years, he can retire on an allowance equal to two-thirds of his salary, and after twenty or twenty-five years, on an allowance equal to his salary. If one looks through the judges' accounts, one will find that there are in this country quite a few retired judges receiving large retiring allowances, some $8,000, some $7,000 and some less. There is a provision in the law that if a judge, through physical disability becomes incapable of discharging the duties of his office he is entitled to receive a liberal allowance, amounting in some cases to two-thirds of his salary and at least to one-half. We must also take into consideration the fact that judges are not liable for income tax, while members of other professions are. Therefore, the Acting Minister of Justice should take these things into consideration when he receives recommendations to increase judges' salaries. The cost of living to-day is so high that everybody is asking for an increase in salary, but there would be no necessity for increasing salaries if the Government took measures to lower the cost of living. Some of the civil servants have been granted an increase in salary; too much, I think. The Government has appointed a commission to re-classify the Service, and should have awaited their report before raising the salaries of the deputy ministers, because if the report finds their salaries too high the Government would find it rather difficult to decrease them. I hope that the Committee which has been appointed to inquire into the cost of living will bring about a reduction in the cost of living, and if that is the result the salaries which we have paid to the judges since 1905 would then be sufficient, and the country would save the large amount involved in this proposed increase.

Mr. TOLMIE: As a layman representative from British Columbia, I wish to endorse heartily the suggestion that the salaries of the County Court and other judges be adequately increased. When we take into consideration the importance of the position which the judges occupy and the heavy responsibilities that rest on their shoulders, I think it is highly dangerous for us to allow these men to go on living from hand to mouth. I think their salaries should be so increased as to put them on a footing where they could hold their own in a social way.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have just been reminded that it was in 1905 that substantial increases were made in the salaries of the judges. I was in the House then, but I really forget whether the judges of the Supreme Court of Canada received an increase at that time. I have been informed that they did not. I think it is only fair that the minister should bear these judges in mind when dealing with salary increases.

Mr. JACOBS: I suppose there is no danger of the judges going on strike for an increase.

Mr. BURNHAM: It seems to me that the reason for this application for an increase in salary is sound, because recompense or pay is given for the purpose of allowing the recipient to maintain the struggle for existence. That being the case, it logically follows that when the struggle for existence becomes more intense the pay should increase, and that applies to every branch of industry, to the workingman and the professional man. If this is not done, we must have unrest even among the judges; if the unrest becomes acute it becomes a riot; if it becomes more acute still and the struggle more intense, it becomes a revolution. We must surely expect to observe the common logic of facts. If pay, therefore, is a reasonable recompense, the pay must be increased as the struggle for existence becomes more intense.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I understand that on several occasions the Acting Minister of Justice has had drawn to his attention the case of the King's Bench judges in the province of Manitoba, who, I am informed, are not getting the same salaries as the judges in other provinces doing the same class of work. I understand that the minister is considering their case, and I should like to ask whether action will be taken by the Government to put these judges on the same basis as judges in other provinces doing the same work.

Mr. JACOBS: In Manitoba, they rely on Royal Commissions.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No action has as yet been taken, but in the general consideration their case will have a place in the front rank.

Mr. McKENZIE: I observe that the minister from Nova Scotia (Mr. A. K. Maclean) and the Acting Minister of Justice are sitting together, and I would point out that there is a vacancy in the judiciary of district No. 6 in the province of Nova Scotia, the County Court judge having died a good many months ago. This is a large district with a good deal of work and the judge from Pictou, I think, has had to be recalled to this district. As this appointment must be made, I think the sooner it is made the better.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is one of about seven appointments that are waiting.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

INTERPRETATION ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Acting Minister of Justice) moved that the amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 81, to amend the Interpretation Act, be concurred in. He said:

The Senate merely provides that the term "Superior Court" when used with reference to British Columbia means the Court of Appeal and also the Supreme Court of that province. That point was not covered in the original Bill. Otherwise, the Bill is as before.

Motion agreed to, and amendment concurred in.

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Civil Government—Department of Agriculture—salaries, including Dairy and Cold Storage Commissioner at $5,000, Seed Commissioner at $5,000, Director of Experimental Farms at $4,000, Live Stock Commissioner at $3,600, and Dominion Entomologist at $3,600, $465,737.50.

Mr. McKENZIE: Can the minister give the Committee any sort of horoscope as to the future development of agriculture in this country, especially as regards a greater interest in farming and a desire for increased production? Does he find on the part of the people a tendency to stay on the farms or are they drifting away?

Hon. T. A. CRERAR (Minister of Agriculture): I have never been any good at casting horoscopes, and I do not care to venture into that field now. The question raised by the hon. leader of the Opposition is, of course, an important one, but I cannot give, with any degree of accuracy, the number of people that have left the farms in Canada during the past year, or the number of those who have taken up farming. At present there is some difficulty in certain parts of Canada in securing an adequate supply of farm labour. This, I think, is due perhaps to the natural unrest that has ensued from the trying experiences through which the country has passed during the last four years. Generally speaking, agricultural conditions throughout Canada are good at the present time. A brief survey of agricultural results for the past year shows that in the Western Provinces the crop has suffered from drought and frost. However, with the abundant optimism characteristic of the Prairie Provinces, the farmers have settled down to work, and according to the most reliable information I have been able to obtain, there has been planted this year a larger acreage in cereals than was the case even last year, and I am very happy to say that the crops in Western Canada this spring have been planted in better condition than for several years past. We had an abundance of moisture practically all over the Prairie Provinces, and the prospects at the time of seeding and immediately after were excellent. Of course, our final crop returns will depend almost entirely on weather conditions during June and July. There is not such a fortunate condition of affairs in Ontario. There has been a great deal of rain in this province, and there have been difficulties in getting seeding completed, so that on the whole the situation is somewhat backward. However, it is not too much to hope that we may have good returns from Ontario and Quebec. Conditions in the Maritime Provinces are very good as far as we can gather.

Mr. LEMIEUX: We largely increased our production last year in Quebec.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, that is true as regards Quebec. A fine effort was made to increase production there last year and good results were obtained. The conditions for the future are of course somewhat unsettled, as I have already stated; but there is every indication that excellent markets will be found for all our agricultural products for the next couple of years, at any rate.

Mr. JACOBS: And at fair prices?

Mr. CRERAR: At good prices. I do not know whether I have looked into the horoscope sufficiently to satisfy the leader of the Opposition, but I trust this information will be of some benefit.

Mr. McKENZIE: I was pleased to get this information from the hon. minister. We have no opportunity in the House of hearing any opinions from the Minister of Agriculture except when he comes with his Estimates, and I have always felt, as I feel now, that the prominence is not given in this House to the Agricultural Department that it is entitled to and should always have had. I put my questions not with any intention of embarrassing the minister but merely to give him an opportunity of dealing with his department and 4 p.m. giving the people to understand that its importance is duly recognized. When we have any questions before us in connection with agriculture and farmers generally we are dealing with a large and important subject which is at the very foundation of the prosperity of the country, and the more prominence we give to agriculture and the more attention it receives at our hands, the more readily will the farmer or the man who intends going on the farm be impressed with the importance of rural life and the fact that he is engaging in an industry which the members of this House realize as vital to the prosperity of the nation. This was my object in drawing out the minister as to what has been done and the prospects of agricultural life in Canada for the years to come.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I think the minister understands the necessity for greater and more scientific agricultural production in the future. All the financial and economic authorities who have lately given their views as regards present conditions in Canada have insisted on the fact that what is needed is greater production The chief industry of Canada is above all farming. This is a great farming community and the more we can attract the people to country life the more we shall do in the way of restoring the country to a basis of sound economy and prosperity. There must be more production along scientific lines. Although I am not much over the fifty-year mark, there has been in my day and generation quite a change in the method of agriculture. I shall not speak for other sections of the country, but the section with which I am most familiar. Even in the constituency of Gaspé, where the people are fishermen and farmers simultaneously, I have noticed during the last twenty years a change for the better in agricultural methods. This, I am pleased to say, is due in a large degree to the very progressive education given our farmers by the Department of Agriculture in Quebec, and also, I must say, by the officials of the Department of Agriculture at Ottawa. I do not know how the other provinces regard the lectures given to farmers, but speaking for my constituency of Gaspé I can say that the people are always pleased to meet the lecturers sent by the Department of Agriculture and that they quietly, without any great demonstration, adopt the methods suggested by the lecturers. In addition to this, the small experimental farms, not to speak of the largest, have produced the best results. If there is one expenditure to which the minister should commit himself more in the future, it is for the multiplication of these small farms.

I have in my mind especially the recommendations made by Professor Robertson in the report of the Commission on Technical Education. These latter recommendations have been published in pamphlet form and I have found them very instructive indeed. If I had any advice to offer my hon. friend it would be to try and live up to the recommendations made by Professor Robertson. I must compliment the Department of Agriculture in Ottawa upon having given to the district to which I belong politically—the district of Quebec—the magnificent experimental farm located in the constituency of my hon. friend from Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe). The agricultural school at St. Anne de la Pocatière is a Quebec institution and a very progressive one, but, since its establishment at the request of my hon. friend from Kamouraska, the Government has supplemented the work of that school by the establishment of an experimental farm and, following the establishment of the farm, there have been exhibitions every year which would be of interest even to the farmers of the other provinces of Canada.

While I am in a laudatory mood, might I not congratulate sincerely the Minister of Agriculture upon the appointment which he has made of the Deputy Minister of Agriculture. I must be frank, sincere and honest in my appreciation of the good work accomplished by the Department of Agriculture. The farmers who sit in this House and the farmers in the country—at least the farmers in our part of the country—appreciate the great work which was done some years ago by the Hon. Sydney Fisher. He changed completely the complexion of the department and gave to it a very high standing in the country. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Crerar) enjoys to a large degree the confidence of the public because, as we know, he is a farmer and he is proud of it. In the appointment of his officials he has done the right thing in making them without regard to political considerations. He has appointed Mr. Grisdale and I have noticed that in the press and on both sides of politics that appointment has been hailed as a progressive step. Mr. Grisdale has had a long experience. He is known throughout Canada. He is a modest, humble official but stern and sturdy in the discharge of his official duties. He has another great advantage which we cannot ignore. He speaks both languages fluently. How can you expect to reach the different farming communities in the different provinces if the officers of the department cannot be understood in the literature which they send out to every section of the country or in the lectures which they deliver to their farming audiences? By appointing Mr. Grisdale you have appointed the best officer in the department to a position which he will fill, we know, with great profit to the country. Besides, any farmer from my province can come to him, speak in his own language and be answered and understood as if he were speaking to one of his own fellow countrymen. I congratulate my hon. friend on this appointment. I hope that under Mr. Grisdale the department will continue the traditions established by the predecessor of my hon. friend the Hon. Sydney Fisher, who was really the friend of the farmer.

Mr. CRERAR: I quite appreciate the suggestion made by the hon. the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) respecting a survey of agricultural conditions in Canada. I might perhaps, at the risk of wearying the Committee a little bit, give some more information on that subject. The fact is patent that almost all of our agricultural produce has its price fixed in the outside markets of the world. There is scarcely any agricultural products produced in Canada that we are not exporting to some extent. I find that the total value of these exports for the year ended March 31, 1919 was almost $400,000,000. I quite believe that that amount is capable of great expansion. Unfortunately, there are many districts in Canada where there is a lack of appreciation on the part of the farmers of the value of management in their business and of quality in their production. We enjoy to-day, for instance, in the markets of Great Britain the first position in so far as our bacon exports are concerned.

Mr. McMASTER: Even better than Denmark?

Mr. CRERAR: Even better than Denmark. That is due to the type of bacon hog that is produced in Canada. We also have the premier position in Great Britain with respect to our cheese industry, the foundation of which was laid many years ago by Dr. Robertson who has done much excellent work for agriculture in Canada. I have endeavoured on all occasions to impress upon Canadian farmers the importance of quality in their production. Particularly is there need for that in regard to the quality of the beef that we export to the European market. I was surprised to learn from the representatives of the British Ministry of Food that Canadian beef was regarded as inferior to the article imported from Argentina and the United States. We have had within the past year, several conferences with representatives of the Canadian breeders and live stock men's associations. This problem with others has been discussed with them and we have taken every possible means to impress upon, and to bring home to them, the importance of this matter, and I think this has resulted in a quickened interest in it.

There is no reason why Canada, having in mind its geographical location, should not attain a very high place indeed in agriculture. We are closer to the European markets, and especially the great consuming market of the United Kingdom, than any other country outside of Europe, and the trade routes by which our produce reaches those markets traverse the temperate zone. When one considers that a vessel can make three trips from Canada to Liverpool in the time required for one trip from Melbourne to Liverpool, and two trips from Canada to Liverpool in the time consumed by a trip from Buenos Aires to Liverpool, our advantage in that respect is readily seen.

Mr. McMASTER: With reference to the conferences concerning beef production, what is the reason for the inferiority of our position as compared to the Argentine and the United States?

Mr. CRERAR: The Argentine dressed carcases of beef will probably average eight hundred to eight hundred and fifty pounds, whereas those of Canada will run from six hundred to six hundred and fifty pounds per carcass. Those from the United States are somewhere in between those figures.

Mr. McMASTER: Is there any difference in the quality of the meat?

Mr. CRERAR: The quality improves with the weight of the carcass. As I say, the matter has been receiving attention, and, as it is a question of breeding the right kind of stock, the remedy is a very simple one. I was alluding to the advantages which Canada possesses in respect to the British market; I was about to allude also to the advantages, the growing advantages, which we enjoy in regard to the market to the south of us. There is, at the present time, every evidence that the industrial expansion and development in the United States will be in a greater ratio hereafter than its agricultural development; and respecting some agricultural products it would appear that already the United States is approaching the position of being an importing country. When that time comes Canada will occupy a splendid position in respect of these markets; and I think that in the United States in the next twenty-five years —indeed even in the next ten years—we will see a great consuming market growing up for such of our agricultural products as cheese, butter, milk, honey, and meat of various kinds, and also cereals.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Provided the tariff is no bar?

Mr. CRERAR: Always provided, of course, that no unnatural barrier will be raised against our products.

Mr. McMASTER: I remember some years ago looking into the question of cheese importations by the United States. At that time, and I presume there are now, unless the war has changed the situation, tremendous importations into the republic to the South of what I think are called fancy cheeses—cheeses that come from Switzerland, Italy and other countries, and are somewhat different from the ordinary cheese. It struck me at that time that there was a tremendous field for Canadian endeavour in the manufacture and exportation to the American market of fancy cheeses, and I would like to know whether the Government has looked into this matter, and what steps, if any, it has taken to encourage the production of fancy cheeses in Canada.

Mr. CRERAR: That matter has been receiving the attention of the department. I am not much of a connoisseur in cheese, if I might apply the term to that article, but I may say that we are making, for instance, at the Central Experimental Farm in this city, one of the best fancy cheeses produced in America. The cheeses to which the hon. gentleman alludes are imported from Europe; some people have a fancy for eating Swiss, Dutch, or Canadian cheese, as the case may be. Personally, I have never been able to see very much difference between them.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend was speaking of dressed beef. Let us return to the animal itself. With reference to the embargo in Great Britain on Canadian cattle, I notice that some papers in the United Kingdom are referring to it occasionally and are asking the British authorities to lift that embargo, which has been a sort of a stigma against Canadian cattle. My hon. friend probably knows the merits of the question better than I do. He knows that for years the British authorities have ordered our cattle to be slaughtered at the landing ports in the United Kingdom, practically at Liverpool, under the pretext that they were diseased and suffering from pleuro-pneumonia. It has been established beyond a doubt, however, that our cattle are absolutely free from that disease, and if my hon. friend wants the best available evidence on the subject, I might refer him to the testimony of the late Sir Charles Tupper. I must say to the credit of the old Conservative chieftain that while he was our High Commissioner in London he waged a bonny fight for Canada on that question. He states in his memoirs how on several occasions he approached the Board of Trade in England in order to have the embargo removed, and he offered to prove beyond a shadow of a doubt that the excuse given by the British authorities for the exclusion of Canadian cattle was in the nature of a very flimsy pretext. Being a medical man himself who, in his day, was renowned as a practitioner, he even went so far as to present himself at the abattoirs in Liverpool where, removing his coat and rolling up his shirt sleeves, his hands dripping with the blood of the animal, he made tests which proved beyond contradiction that the excuse given by the British authorities for the embargo was no excuse at all. However, nothing was done to meet the wishes of Canada, and the agitation for the lifting of the embargo went on for years. Finally the question was brought up when the Imperial Conferences began to be held, and I have noticed that the question was raised on the occasion of each of these conferences in London. It was brought up first by Sir Charles Tupper, then by the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and finally, if I mistake not, by the present Prime Minister. It appears that a few months ago the enforcement of the embargo was a lively question in the Old Country, and my attention has been directed to the fact that certain of the press of the United Kingdom are now asking the British authorities to lift it. Were any steps taken during the Prime Minister's stay in London with a view to carrying out this policy, which appeals to every true Canadian and to every cattle-raiser in Canada?

Mr. CRERAR: The restriction was imposed on Canadian cattle about twenty-five years ago.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Thirty years ago.

Mr. CRERAR: The alleged reason was the existence of pleuro-pneumonia in Canadian herds. The evidence was supposed to rest upon the case of one particular animal that was said to have had the disease when it landed at Liverpool. It is very clear, however, that the disease did not exist in Canada. Nevertheless, an embargo was placed upon Canadian cattle, and it has remained in force ever since, despite the efforts that have been made to have it removed. I am not familiar with the steps that were taken to this end by the Government of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier—

Mr. LEMIEUX: By every Government.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. I am not thoroughly familiar with the steps that were taken, but I do know that at the Imperial Conference in 1917 the matter was brought up, and it was brought up again last year. Dr. Robertson went overseas last June in a representative capacity for the Department of Agriculture to look into the food situation and to gather what information he could as to future food prospects generally and as to how Canada could best co-operate in assisting the Allies. I asked him at that time to assist the Prime Minister who was then in Great Britain, to bring this matter in the proper way before the British authorities. That was done. Dr. Robertson again went over with the Prime Minister when he left Canada last year to attend the Peace Conference. We had gathered all the data and information that we could in Canada bearing upon the matter, and he has been active in taking the matter up with the British authorities since that time. In February we sent to Great Britain the Live Stock Commissioner for Canada to supply any additional information that might be required. Various breeders were interviewed and everything possible was done to remove the misconception existing in the minds of many British stockmen with regard to the probability of this disease or any other disease coming from Canada. I think we were able to convince them that Canada has a clean bill of health in regard to her live stock. I venture the assertion that there is no country in the world which guards the health of animals more carefully than Canada does. The matter is at present under consideration. All I can say is that we are hopeful that something will be done and that these markets may be opened up to us, at least in some degree, or as they were prior to the imposition of the embargo.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has my hon. friend any idea of the amount of the total export from Canada?

Mr. P. R. McGIBBON: I have been keeping in touch with the minister and his work during the year and I find that we have the right man in the right place. There is every reason to say that he has been doing good work. The experimental farms, large and small, are doing good work. There is a small one in the county which I represent; it is well situated and furnishes much useful information. The officials at that experimental farm station give instructions upon the cultivation of corn, grain and potatoes and information with regard to different kinds of soil, and so on. It is a great benefit to the county, and I wish the minister would do even a little more in the way of improving it. The farm is easy of access—a good gravel road leads to it—but we are wanting a little in equipment; we want better tools and machinery. A farm needs a lot of machinery; it is about as easy to equip a mill as it is to equip a farm with the right machinery. A great deal of the unrest that prevails in this country is due to the fact that not enough of us are on the farm. The farm will have to be made more attractive; the work will have to be made a little easier. With the assistance of the Government a great deal can be done in a few years along this line. The present minister has had two or three years' experience; he is still a young man, and I would be sorry to see him drop out. I hope that the reports in the press that he is about to resign are not true. Although we differ in politics, yet I can say that he is doing his best for the farming interests of the country. The farmers have never been attended to as they should be. This country has been throwing bouquets in the way of titles to exploiters, the railroad men, the financiers. It is true that some dropped on good soil, but some certainly dropped on stony ground. I have yet to hear of the farmer who received a title, although many farmers have richly earned them. Farmers have spent half a lifetime in securing the best seed wheat that could be produced and sending it among the farmers, thus assisting in the raising of enormous crops in three western provinces. In this part of the country men have spent a lifetime perfecting stock—horses, cattle, cows, pigs, sheep, and everything that belongs to the farm; yet I do not see that the Government has thrown titles on any of their shoulders. I am sorry that titles are cut out, so far as that goes, because I would like to see some conferred upon the farmers.

Mr. McMASTER: They do not want them.

Mr. P. R. McGIBBON: Farming is the great industry of Canada. We can go ahead with manufacturing and railroading, but farming is the backbone of any country. As the county that I represent is composed principally of farmers I hope that the Government will keep to their good course and do all they can to encourage the farming industry.

In my judgment, the high cost of produce is the principal cause of strikes in this country, because a man's salary will not buy suitable clothes, provisions and food for himself and his family. We must, therefore, reduce the price of provisions, and the only way to do that is for more of us to go on the land, to cultivate the soil and to produce. We have in Canada one of the greatest countries the sun shines on and we may be proud of the country we inherit. We have in Canada sufficient land for a hundred million people. I have been informed that in the Peace river district there is room for thousands upon thousands of people, and that one can find there the very best of farming land. Settlers can go into that district for the next fifty years and yet there will be room. It is a district that is not nearly as cold as Manitoba or some of the other western provinces. We should cut out politics and get to farming, as it is the only thing that is going to save this country.

Mr. BOYCE: I intended to say a few words before my hon. friend (Mr. P. R. McGibbon) took the floor, but he has said every thing so well and so favourably to the cause of the farmers that he has left me with very little to say. I do not know whether he is a farmer or not, but if he is a farmer, I am sure he is a good one. He is, at least, a very good speaker on the subject, and he has put our cause in a very nice form. My hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux), who, I understand, is a lawyer, has shown some familiarity with a topic of interest to farmers.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am a farmer also.

Mr. BOYCE: To hear the hon. member, I think he would be a very good one. The farming community of Canada is at the present time in a favourable position as regards the minister who now presides over the Department of Agriculture. We have a fine, practical Minister of Agriculture, and I think it would be hard to get any one to equal him. Further than that, he has a deputy who is well known throughout this Dominion and who has endeared himself to the farming community by his practical knowledge of agriculture. I refer to Professor Grisdale, a man whom I am pleased to say I have known for many years. He knows all the ins and outs of the farmers' requirements as well as, if not better than, any other man in Canada or possibly in any other country. Canada has been very fortunate in her choice of officials in regard to agriculture, and we need such officials now more than at any other time in our history. During the last few years, farmers have had difficulties like all other people, but I think we have suffered more than people of any other calling. It seems probable, moreover, that we are going to suffer some hardships this year on account of the backwardness of the season and of having so much rain that we can hardly get our crops in. But it is the duty of every one, no matter what his calling may be, to co-operate with the rest of the community and use his best efforts to make our soil produce as much as possible. Nothing but agricultural production will enable us to get rid of the tremendous burden of public debt which has accumulated. Agriculture is the backbone of this country and as one who has been a farmer all his life I have no hesitation in saying that if this country were farmed as it should be, the land at present under cultivation would produce over a hundred per cent more than it does now. If we also take into account the many millions of acres the plough has not yet touched what will be the result? Not long ago, I was out West and every four or five miles there was an elevator. Not one of these elevators was built for fun; they were built to hold grain, and when they are full the returns to this country will, I am sure, surprise every one. A year or two of good crops in this Canada of ours would nearly wipe out the national debt. The money may not go as revenue direct to the Government, but it will go to individuals. We shall have the money, and when we have the money, the country will be the richer by that amount. I am glad that we have live men at the head of the Department of Agriculture, because we require live men and men who have an interest in the work and welfare of the country and I have no doubt that those men will use their efforts to the best advantage of Canada.

Mr. TURGEON: My purpose in rising is to let it be understood that the appreciation of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Crerar) and of his deputy is not confined to the provinces of Quebec, and Ontario. Coming from New Brunswick, a province in which there are the two races and languages, I may say that the reputation of the minister is as high there as it is in Quebec. During the last few years the farmers of New Brunswick have taken new heart in their industry and have doubled their production. The deputy minister is also well known in the district from which I come, to the French Acadians as well as to the Scotch, Irish and English, and I am sure the new appointment meets with their approval and good wishes, and that it will encourage the farming community in that section of Canada.

Some years ago, just before the Liberal party went out of power, I had been in hopes of having an experimental farm established at Petit Rocher which would be a central part for all the people of northern New Brunswick, from the Matapedia district to the Miramichi.

We have along these shores shipping facilities, wharfs, breakwaters and harbours by which steamer communication would be established with the other side of Bay des Chaleurs. Besides railway connections there is in that portion of the country the best and most improved highway in the province and one that is second to none in Canada. An experimental farm of modest dimensions could be established to start with, and I am sure it could be very rapidly extended. I would ask the Minister of Agriculture to take note of my remarks and to see during the recess, whether it be short or long, what he can do in the matter in the interest of the farmers of northern New Brunswick. Farming is the basic industry of this country. In the early days of the session, I brought to the attention of the Government the necessity of readjusting the tariff so as to encourage the farming community before seeding commenced.

If that had been done, the labour situation would have been bettered and there would not be the unrest there is throughout the country to-day. To-day, again, I urge the Minister of Agriculture to take my remarks into consideration. He knows that I am with him in his desire to advance the interests of the farming industry, not only in the West but in the East as well. I can assure him that the farmers of the East are in harmony with the farmers of the West in their aspirations and in their economic views, and there is no danger of a cleavage between the people of the East and the people of the West. The only place in Canada where there is a cleavage is in Central Canada, where the unrest prevails to-day. We hope before long that unrest will be settled.

Mr. CRERAR: I appreciate very much the remarks that have been made expressing satisfaction with the appointment of the deputy minister. It was to me, personally, a source of much satisfaction that I was able to prevail on Dr. Grisdale to accept this position. I think he knows agriculture generally throughout Canada better than any other man—at all events better than any other man I have met.

With regard to the policy of the department in making appointments, we are following wherever possible the principle of promotion within the department rather than going outside for officials. I think that principle is sound in every respect and encourages those within the department, no matter what their position may be, to put forth their best efforts.

The hon. member for Argenteuil (Mr. McGibbon) dwelt on the importance of experimental farms as a means of agricultural education. I quite agree that the experimental and demonstration farms are one of the best means of bringing home to our farmers the advantages of better methods of cultivation and production generally. It must be borne in mind, however, that these farms, as their names imply, are largely experimental. We have in Canada to-day, outside of the Central Experimental Farm at Ottawa, 20 experimental farms and stations, 3 tobacco stations, 7 sub-experimental farms or substations as we call them, and 44 illustration farms. I look to the development of the illustration farm as perhaps the best means of bringing within the reach of the average farmer a knowledge of better methods of cultivation and general improvement in agricultural methods. These illustration farms are worked on the following plan. A district is selected and examined, and one of the best farmers of the district who is willing to undertake the work is asked to associate himself with the work of the experimental farms. A certain plot of his land is set apart, and he cultivates this plot under the direction and supervision of the representative of the department, who visits him at stated periods. In Western Canada last fall, in the drought-stricken area, we had one or two striking illustrations of the value of this work, particularly as to the effect of proper soil cultivation on the retention of moisture in the soil, with consequent greater production. That work is being actively carried on. The purely experimental farm is, of course, of great value, but the illustration farm can at a small expense be brought within the reach of almost every farmer.

There is another point, and a very important one. It is a conclusion I have reached as the result of my experience in the department and of the study I have been able to give the subject generally. There is expended in Canada through the Federal and Provincial Departments of Agriculture approximately $7,500,000 annually. I am convinced that from the national point of view we are not getting the results from that expenditure that might be secured. In my judgment, there should be closer co-operation and better co-ordination between the federal and provincial activities. I found on making inquiries that in many cases federal and provincial activities were overlapping—that both federal and provincial departments were in certain cases carrying on the same line of work. Now that is a waste of effort, and I might add also, a waste of money. At this particular time, when our national expenditure is mounting very rapidly, and we shall have to face in the future heavy taxation and probably difficulties in raising the necessary revenue it is of the greatest importance, not only in the field of agriculture, but in every other field, that there should be the closest co-operation and co-ordination between federal and provincial activities. I have already mentioned this matter to a few provincial ministers of agriculture, and they were quite sympathetic to the idea. This is an important matter, and I hope it will be more fully inquired into during this year.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What were the total exports of cattle last year?

Mr. CRERAR: The total exports of cattle last year, according to the figures supplied me by the Statistical Department, amounted to over 300,000 head.

Mr. McMASTER: On the hoof?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. ROBB: One of the reasons that led up to the exportation of cattle was the embargo placed on dairy products in the month of September. In the month of August the United States commandeered sixty per cent of the butter then in cold storage in that country, at a price ranging from 45 at 46 cents.

The House will bear in mind that the action of the United States was in reference to butter then in store in the cold storages throughout that country. This butter was commandeered for shipment overseas, and it is interesting to note that only a very small quantity of it ever went overseas. It was held in cold storage through lack of shipping or for some other reason, and recently some of it has come into Canada. Our Government, following the action of the United States, after inquiry discovered that there was 25,000,000 pounds of butter then in the cold storages of Canada. Did they commandeer that butter in the cold storages? No, Mr. Chairman. They allowed it to go by but commandeered the production of the farm and also the milk supply for the whole month of October and part of the month of November at a price ranging from 46 to 46½ cents, Montreal freight. I am not sure that the Minister of Agriculture is responsible, but he is a member of the Government that is responsible. The real iniquity of this matter was the fact that that policy was advised by the Produce Purchasing Commission. The chairman of the Produce Purchasing Commission was Mr. James Alexander, a produce merchant of Montreal, and another member of the commission was Mr. Robert Ballantyne of Lovell and Christmas, produce merchants of Montreal.

Mr. CRERAR: No, he was not.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Alexander was chairman, and I understood Mr. Ballantyne was on the committee in an advisory capacity. But it makes no difference. These gentlemen, taking advantage of what they knew was going to happen, wired to their agents in Western Canada and bought up all the butter held by the factories in Manitoba and Saskatchewan, and partly in Alberta, before the advance in price. Immediately in the United States prices began to go up. Milk and cream were on the free list, and the farmers along the international line and quite a distance away from the line discovered that they could sell their milk in the United States at $3.55 on a 3 per cent butter-fat basis, which worked out at about $4.05 for extra good milk per 100 pounds. As against that, the price at which it was commandeered in Canada would give them from $1.75 to $2.05 and very naturally the flow of milk started to the United States. When the Government discovered this they placed an embargo on milk and cream, going into the United States, so that this condition obtained for the month of October and part of November, and if I mistake not it was February before the embargo was totally raised. My friends from the western provinces who year in and year out have told us of the greater prices that have prevailed in the Minneapolis market for wheat can very well understand how the eastern dairyman felt when he discovered that his neighbour across the line was receiving from $1 to $1.50 per 100 pounds more for milk than he was. When the farmer discovered that he could not ship his milk or cream owing to the embargo he decided to sell his cow, and that largely explains the great increase in the exports in cattle into the United States from all parts of Canada, and explains also why the cities to-day are suffering, or at any rate did suffer all winter.

Mr. BOYCE: Does the hon. member mean to say that milk sold for $4 per 100 pounds?

Mr. ROBB: It sold at $3.55 on a 3 per cent butter-fat basis, and for better milk it ran as high as $4.05. If my hon. friend has any doubt whatever I can show him the official figures.

Mr. BOYCE: I shall be glad to see them later, because I cannot for a moment see how the price could be $4.05 for milk in Canada. That would be over $1 for butter.

Mr. ROBB: That was in the United States, and I venture to say the minister will not contradict this statement. Now Mr. Chairman, that is one way in which this Government was "encouraging" greater production and helping the farming industry. I submit to the minister that the sooner he removes all these restrictions from the products of the farm the better it will be for this country. We cannot improve farming and encourage greater production by penalizing the farmer. The farmer is just as intelligent as the man in the city, and when he reads that the produce dealers in the cities have taken advantage of the action of this Government to advance prices while his products are kept low it naturally makes him sore, and that is one of the reasons for the great unrest throughout the country at the present time. The trouble is due to one restriction or another placed on the people from time to time.

Mr. CRERAR: In reply to the hon. member, I may say that there is no country which has been engaged in the war during the last three or four years in which fewer restrictions have been imposed on the people than in Canada. In respect of the restrictions on the exportation of milk and other products to the United States, what was the situation that existed in August last, at a time when the struggle between the German armies and the Allies had reached its greatest intensity in Europe? The British people were practically face to face with a situation where butter could not be secured, and their rations were down to half an ounce per person per week. They requested the food Administrations of the United States and Canada to take some action that would relieve them in this respect. It was essential that the morale of the British and French people should be kept at its highest possible point at that time, and as a result of their request the United States Food Administration commandeered outright, if my memory is correct, 60 per cent of the butter supplies then in cold storage in the United States. Coupled with this question is also the matter of the price of the article at home. The United States commandeered supplies in stock without limitations as to prices, and the result was that within a few weeks, due to the withdrawal from consumption of this large quantity of butter, prices in the United States rapidly rose until they advanced some 12 to 18 cents per pound over what they had previously been.

Mr. McMASTER: The hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) stated that this butter that was commandeered by the American Government did not get across, or at least not all of it.

Mr. CRERAR: I have no information as to that. If it did not get across it was probably due to the fact that they were obliged to keep some at home to cope with the rapid increase in prices as a result of commandeering. In Canada, under the regulations of the Food Board, limitations of price in butter was not fixed, but the margins of profit that could be taken by dealers in butter, whether cold storage, merchants or others, were fixed definitely by regulations under the Food Board.

These dealers were obliged to produce evidence that they were selling their butter within the margin of profit that had been allowed. In devising a method of meeting the request of the British Food Ministry for supplies of butter the Canadian Food Board were faced with the problem of trying to secure that butter without abnormally increasing the price in Canada. The price of the butter in cold storage and in wholesale dealers' hands was already limited in this respect, that the margin of profit on it was limited, and since the butter had already gone into their hands at prices prevailing when they purchased, the selling price was practically established.

I want to assure the Committee, and particularly the hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon, that this question was most carefully considered by myself, by the expert officials in the department and also by the Dairy Produce Commission, of whom I shall have a word to say in a moment. After we had gathered all the facts that were available we reached the conclusion that the better method in Canada would be to commandeer the production of butter from the factories in Canada for a stated period. An order was issued to that effect. The period covered five weeks' production. The price was fixed at Montreal, if my memory serves me, at a cent or a cent and a half a pound over what the Dairy Produce Commission had been paying theretofore.

Mr. ROBB: If the first statement of the minister was correct, that they wanted the butter in the Mother Country, will he explain how they arrived at the conclusion that it would be better to take it from the farms in that way for a period extending into November than by taking it immediately out of cold storage?

Mr. CRERAR: Because we could get it as rapidly as we could fill the shipping space that was available to send it overseas. We found this situation: Due to the commandeering order in the United States and the lack of control over the margin of profit in that country, the butter price had gone up, as I have stated, from 12 to 18 cents a pound, and it was fully that much higher in the United States than in Canada. One thing obviously resulted. The Canadian farmers found a market in the United States available and they found that they could get much higher prices there for milk and cream than they could get in Canada under the commandeering order. Of course, they naturally commenced to take advantage of this. Hon. members will appreciate that if this was permitted those farmers who were so situated in Canada that they could ship their milk and cream to the United States, would be in a position of great advantage over those other farmers who could not avail themselves of that facility. Moreover, the principal purpose for which this requisition order had been issued would be to a large degree defeated. We wanted to get butter to supply Great Britain but we wanted to do it with fairness to all the interests concerned. We did not want to do it in a way that would unduly enhance the price to the Canadian consumers and we wanted to deal fairly with the farmers who were producing it. The price was fixed at one and one and a half cents a pound higher than that which hitherto had been paid and an embargo restriction was imposed on the shipment of milk and cream to the United States. It was not imposed in the absolute sense that the hon. member for Huntingdon has suggested. Those farmers who had a market, or who had their regular customers in the United States were permitted to send out the same amount of milk and cream they had hitherto been sending in order that they might retain their connections for the period of this temporary disturbance. Consequently, they continued to enjoy that right during the whole period of the embargo. Every farmer however who had not a market already established in the United States was prevented from sending his milk and cream out. That was retained in Canada for the purpose of producing butter for shipment overseas. The quantity of butter that was manufactured in these factories during this period amounted to something over 5,000,000 pounds.

The hon. member has alluded to the Dairy Produce Commission which was really the agent of the British Ministry of Food in purchasing dairy products in Canada. That commission had as its chairman, and its chief administrative officer, Mr. James Alexander of Montreal who is one of the oldest cheese dealers in the city. I want to say—and I have very intimate knowledge of the facts—that Mr. Alexander gave freely and unstintedly his time and attention to the work that he had in hand. I have had repeated evidence from the officials of the British Ministry of Food as to their satisfaction with the manner in which that work was carried on. In addition there were on that Dairy Produce Commission, Mr. Ruddick, the Dairy Commissioner of Canada, and there were also two representatives of the farmers, or milk producers, of Canada, Mr. James Donaldson, of Atwood, president of the Western Ontario Dairymen's Association, and Mr. Guerin, of Quebec. Every step in this whole proposal was considered fully by the members of the Dairy Produce Commission on which, as I have stated, there were two farmers representing the dairying interests in Canada. The commission were in entire agreement as to the policy that should be followed. It is a mistake to think that the milk and cream producers in Canada were not directly represented in that matter. They were directly represented by the two representatives of the Dairyman's associations. The Dairy Produce Commission has wound up its work. The importation of butter and dairy products into Great Britain has been decontrolled and is now back in the hands of private traders. I wish to say in conclusion that in my judgment—and I have a fair knowledge in connection with it—the Dairy Produce Commission has rendered excellent service not only to the British Ministry of Food but also to the producers of Canada.

Mr. ROBB: How many pounds of butter does the minister say the transaction represented?

Mr. CRERAR: Between five and six million pounds according to my memory. I have not the figures here and it is some months since I looked at them.

Mr. ROBB: Is it not true that, as a result of commandeering the products of the prairie factories, about 1,000,000 pounds of butter came in from New Zealand, and did not the farmers of Western Canada put up a big howl to the minister because they had lost the British Columbia market?

Mr. CRERAR: I do not think there is very much in that statement. As a matter of fact I do not recall any great howl made to the Minister of Agriculture by the dairymen or creameries of the prairies in respect to the British Columbia market.

I wish to allude to a point mentioned by the hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon (Mr. Robb), and that is the charge that private dealers in Montreal had benefited by virtue of having inside information before the commandeering order was made public. I know that charge has been made, but I want to say on my responsibility as a minister that I do not think there is any foundation for it; from the best information I have been able to get there is not. I may be mistaken in that regard, but I do not think I am.

With regard to the importation of New Zealand butter into Canada. This butter has for years been coming into the Dominion. Owing to the lack of tonnage available from New Zealand to Great Britain, large surpluses of butter have accumulated in the former country, and the vessels that occasionally traded between British Columbia and the Australian Dominions carried the commodity. To-day New Zealand butter is being laid down in British Columbia at a cheaper rate than it can be produced in the Prairie Provinces, and I expect that condition will continue for some time to come. It is a case of having a large surplus in a country that has been unable to find its usual market, and the expansion of our own dairy trade not being what we might otherwise have expected.

Mr. PROULX: Would the minister say how much Canadian butter is exported to the United States?

Mr. CRERAR: I am sorry to say that I have not any definite information on the point, but I am advised that the exports have been very slight. Recently, I believe, there have been some shipments to the United States on account of the higher prices prevailing there.

Mr. PROULX: I saw it reported in the newspapers that a large quantity of Canadian butter was exported to the United States and that it accounted for the commodity being so dear in Canada.

Mr. CRERAR: I noticed the same report in the newspapers, and I believe it is correct that within the last few weeks several carloads of butter have gone to the United States. I fancy that condition will be readjusted now that the local supplies there are being increased and marketed.

Mr. J. F. REID: I wish to congratulate the minister on the very popular appointment which he has made to the position of Deputy Minister of Agriculture. Now that the minister and his deputy are both farmers we may expect great results from the administration of this department. Heretofore it would seem to have been essential that we should have a lawyer as deputy minister. Personally, I fail to see any connection between the law and the agricultural industry. I am, therefore, glad that the Government has got away from any such policy, and that in consequence we are likely to see most beneficial results as far as the development of agriculture is concerned. For one thing I would like to see the Government establish more experimental farms. To my mind there could not be a better investment than to add to their number. Let me give a specific instance of the value of these farms. It will be recalled that the late Dr. Saunders, who in his life time was Director of Experimental Farms, after a very prolonged and tedious series of experiments produced a distinct type of wheat called Marquis Wheat. That particular variety has been of the utmost benefit to Canada, and I venture to assert has brought millions of dollars to this country. In Western Canada we are practically getting away altogether from the growing of the old Red Fife Wheat; and I understand that when the farmers of Ontario brought samples of that wheat from the West for seed purposes and tried them, they found that they could grow spring wheat through the agency of the Marquis. At present we have in Saskatchewan Mr. Seager Wheeler, who is doubtless known by reputation to many of the members of this House. Mr. Wheeler is a veritable wizard in producing and propagating different varieties of grain, and, as is well known, is the winner of the world's championship in wheat. At the present time he is experimenting with two other distinct varieties of wheat, the Kitchener and the Red Bobs. I think the Government should do something to encourage Mr. Wheeler in carrying on his work. For a long time he has spent almost all his time in experimenting along these lines, and now, I understand, his health is breaking down. Mr. Wheeler's work has been of very great value, not only to the growers but to the consumers of wheat in this country. I mention these facts so that the minister may give his careful consideration to the matter.

Another thing I would like to draw attention to is the live stock situation. If a careful survey were taken to-day of our live stock resources, principally cattle, I believe it would be found that the situation in Canada to-day is not as good as it was, say, ten years ago. I believe that is because pure-bred sires are not being imported into Canada from the Old Country where they breed the best stock in the world. I am informed that the Argentine buyers, when they go to the United Kingdom, purchase not only pure-bred sires but female stock; they buy the very best that can be found on the market. As regards Canada I do not wish to say a word against our importers of pure-bred live stock, but with them it seems to be a matter of dollars and cents and very naturally they figure on how many dollars they can make out of a transaction. I think if our Government were to import some of the best of the different types of pure-bred cattle—pure-bred sires at least and a few of the females—and then possibly let them out on some terms, or sell them to the stock raisers of the Dominion, so that we would have a continuous stream of the best pure-bred animals coming into Canada, it would be a splendid thing for our live stock industry.

Mr. J. R. WILSON: The hon. gentleman who has just spoken has mentioned a matter which I am very much interested in, and which I had intended bringing to the attention of the minister, and that is the good work which Mr. Seagar Wheeler, of Saskatchewan, has been carrying on in the development of different varieties of wheat. While he was not the discoverer of Marquis wheat, Mr. Wheeler, by a process of selection, I believe, greatly improved upon the original discovery. For the information of the Committee I would like to read certain information as evidence of what Mr. Wheeler has done. As a result of his own effort, and without any assistance whatever, he is advertising Canada as a wheat producing country more than any other man that I know of. He has done this entirely at his own expense, and mainly through exhibiting the results of his experiments at exhibitions and wheat seed fairs in the United States. Let me enumerate some of the prizes he has won in competition with the Western States as well as with various competitors from Canada.

1911.—New York Land Show. Won world's prize, first and sweepstakes, $1,000 in gold, offered for the best hard red spring wheat grown on the continent. Won this prize with Marquis wheat, then almost unknown.

1915.—Won sweepstakes with Marquis wheat at International Farm Congress at Denver, Colorado. Also first prize at International Irrigation Congress, Bassano, Alberta. Won highest honours for sheaf of Kitchener wheat at Denver.

1916.—Won sweepstakes for fourth time, this year at International Farm Congress at El Paso, Texas, with Kitchener wheat, discovered by Mr. Wheeler.

1917.—Mr. Wheeler was hailed out in 1916, but exhibited a sheaf of Red Bobs Wheat, which he discovered, at International Farm Congress, Peoria, Illinois, and carried off sweepstakes.

1918.—Won sweepstakes for fifth time for best bushel of hard spring wheat, winning this time against very strong competition at the International Soil Products Exposition, Kansas City. Won with Marquis wheat again. Also won first for sheaf of hard red wheat.

But Mr. Wheeler did not confine his efforts to wheat. Here are some of the prizes he won for oats:

1915.—Victory Oats. Won sweepstakes with a sheaf exhibit at International Farm Congress, Denver, Colorado.

1918.—Won first prize for sheaf exhibit at International Soil Products Exposition at Kansas City, Kansas.

He has taken up also the improvement of barley. The following are some of the prizes that he has won in this connection:

1915.—Won first prize for sheaf exhibit, International Farm Congress, Denver, Colorado.

1916.—Won first and sweepstakes at International Farm Congress, El Paso, Texas.

1918.—Won first prize, International Soil Products Exposition, Kansas City, Kansas.

This man should have some recognition from the Department of Agriculture.

An hon. MEMBER: Give him a knighthood.

Mr. J. R. WILSON: Well, I would be in favour of knighting him if we had not voted against knighthood the other day. Many men in Canada have received knighthoods who do not deserve them as much as Mr. Wheeler, on his humble farm in Saskatchewan. His services have been a real benefit to the public. No man can make two blades of grass grow where formerly there was only one without doing a great benefit to his country. I have personal knowledge of this man's work. He came to Canada from England in 1885, arriving at Moosejaw in the midst of those trying years when most people were discouraged from farming in Western Canada. From 1883 to 1887 there were almost continuous crop failures owing to the fact that, without irrigation, there was not enough moisture to produce vegetation. Wheeler, who was a young boy at the time, showed his interest in agriculture by first cultivating a garden in low-lying ground along a creek that ran through the town of Moosejaw. He carried the necessary water in a bucket and had a beautiful garden growing while no one else in the town was making any attempt to produce vegetables. He afterwards moved to the north country, and I have read you the result of his efforts along the line of the improvement of cereals. The least the Government could do is recognize this man's efforts by assisting him in some way, even if only to the extent of a grant of $1,000 or $1,500 a year, to put him beyond worry so far as his living is concerned and to enable him to devote all his thought and energy to the work in which he is specially interested and for which he is particularly well fitted, the development of our cereals. I strongly recommend that the minister give this matter his careful consideration.

Mr. BEST: One of the most important things in connection with farming is the selection of good, clean seed. The sowing of seed which contains wild seeds not only curtails the amount of the grain produced, but leaves the land in a wild state and gives rise to much additional work and trouble for years to come. As the machinery for properly cleaning grain costs a good deal of money, it is beyond the reach of the average farmer. It is up to the minister, therefore, to see that the people of Ontario are provided with an elevator at some convenient place, where they may store their grain and have it re-cleaned and dried if necessary. I think I am not going beyond the truth when I say that had we had an elevator in some convenient place in Ontario last year half of its cost would have been made up by the saving of the beans that were lost in that province because of the lack of facilities for properly cleaning them. In the eastern part of the province the condition is not so bad, because Montreal is within easy reach. But the farmers lost three or four cents a bushel on the grain shipped by rail from Toronto to Montreal; it was inspected when it arrived there and they had to take what they could get for it. I am not much in favour of everything going to the large centres, but if this grain could be re-cleaned properly, say at Toronto, where there are good railway facilities, and if there was proper elevator accommodation, with all the necessary machinery for cleaning, thousands of dollars would be saved for the people of Ontario. Some years ago much seed wheat was shipped out of Ontario to Western Canada. A good deal of that wheat was not properly cleaned and was not in proper condition when it was sent out. During the past winter thousands of bushels of oats have been shipped from Ontario to Western Canada for seed. The farmers received from sixty to seventy cents a bushel for those oats, whereas if the oats had been cleaned they could have got from seventy-five to eighty cents a bushel. The farmers were losing from five to ten cents a bushel on those oats, because cleaning would cost only a few cents a bushel. The Government has received deputations asking that an elevator be established in some convenient place in Ontario, and I hope the minister will see that we have one built for the convenience and benefit of the farmers. I believe the outlay would be paid for almost every year.

Mr. COWAN: We have in southwestern Saskatchewan and through the south end of Alberta what may be termed a semi-arid district. It is a district in which we have not up to the present had anything like sufficient moisture to satisfy the needs of farming. My opinion is that it is only a question of years when that difficulty will be overcome because, with settlement and cultivation in Western Canada, we have largely overcome that same drawback in other districts. Many Americans who have come into that district and who have previously lived in somewhat similar, and possibly worse, districts, on the American side, claim that if the Government would change the seed to suit that district and use what is termed drouth-resisting varieties of seed, the farmers there would be able to grow more grain than they are now growing, and to make a success of farming. Are there any objections or obstacles to the use of these drouth-resisting varieties in that district? Is it impossible to sell grain of that variety in this country, and would farmers have to go to the United States to find a market if they went into the raising of grain of that kind?

Mr. CRERAR: I think the hon. member is alluding to Durum wheat.

Mr. COWAN: The minister probably knows that the Western Development Company, whose president is Mr. J. H. Haslam, has been raising the greatest objection to present methods. He has informed me that he has been negotiating with the department, and I understand several others have been doing the same thing. Whatever they are asking for is what I refer to.

Mr. CRERAR: Some experiments have been carried on in our western experimental stations and farms with drouth-resisting wheats and especially Durum wheat, which is grown very largely in Southern Dakota and Minnesota.

Mr. McMASTER: It is a soft wheat.

Mr. CRERAR: It is a softer variety of wheat than we produce in Canada. Our inspection regulations do not at present provide specifically for it. While I am not certain, I believe that in the amendments proposed to be made to the Grain Act, in all likelihood at the present session of Parliament, there is one providing for this. During the last two years quite a number of farmers have been growing these varieties in a small way and the results have been satisfactory. As to the market for this wheat, while it is not as valuable a wheat as the varieties we have been growing in Western Canada, it has excellent qualities for blending and mixing purposes, and I have no doubt if we grew it here, a satisfactory market could be found for it. The matter is now engaging the attention of the officials of the department.

I want to say a word or two in respect to the proposal advanced by the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. J. F. Reid) and the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. J. R. Wilson), namely, for some recognition of the splendid work that has been done by Mr. Seager Wheeler, of Rosthern, Sask.

Mr. JACOBS: He should be knighted.

Mr. CRERAR: I know Mr. Wheeler personally, and I have known for many years of the splendid work he has been doing and the advertisement, to say the least, that his wonderful series of prize-winning achievements in international expositions has given to Western Canada. This proposal that his work should be recognized by the Federal Department of Agriculture was placed before me many months ago, and I gave considerable thought to it. There is, of course, one difficulty. In matters of Government, precedents are always dangerous to establish, and while I fully recognize the value of the work Mr. Wheeler has done, I have not been able up to the present to convince myself that that recognition should come from the Federal Department. Without in any way desiring to throw the responsibility elsewhere, I consider this a matter in which the Provincial Government might, to better advantage, give the recognition. In the realm of agriculture there are certain things that should be done by provincial departments of agriculture and certain other things that fall more naturally into the federal field Mr. Seager Wheeler has rendered excellent service to the grain growers of Western Canada; indeed, I know of no other individual farmer who has done more.

I should like to refer also to the remarks of the hon. member for Dufferin (Mr. Best) as regards the advisability and, indeed the necessity, of providing elevator facilities in Ontario. That is a matter that comes within the jurisdiction of the Department of Trade and Commerce, which has charge of grain elevators. Some time ago quite a representative delegation waited on the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. A. K. Maclean) and urged upon him the advisability of building at once at some suitably located point in Ontario an elevator that would serve the purposes and needs set out by the hon. member for Dufferin. I believe the matter is now under the consideration of that department. I am not certain, but I think the Board of Grain Commissioners have been asked to make some report upon the advisability and utility of the proposal.

Mr. McMASTER: It is always gratifying to hear a Cabinet minister lay down principles of sound economics, and the minister is to be congratulated on his desire not to create a precedent of giving money grants. But it seems to me that as this Mr. Seager Wheeler has been doing great work for the country, there should be some way in which he could be assisted in that work, and I have a suggestion to make to the minister in that connection. A little while ago the minister spoke about illustration stations which, I understand, are on farms belonging to private farmers.

Mr. J. F. REID: Demonstration stations?

Mr. McMASTER: Well, demonstration stations, but the distinction between demonstrating and illustrating how to do a thing is a distinction without very much difference. Why not make a demonstration station of the farm on which this gentleman does his experimental work and give him, for conducting this experimental or demonstration station, some adequate remuneration which will enable him, without thought for the morrow as regards his own personal fortune, to pursue his own experiments which, I understand from hon. members from the West, have been of material advantage to our country?

Mr. CRERAR: The suggestion of the hon. member will be taken into very careful consideration. I might point out, however, that the work that Mr. Wheeler has specialized in is different from that carried on at the illustration farms. His great contribution to agriculture in Western Canada has been the breeding and cross-breeding of different varieties of wheat.

Mr. LEGER: While I appreciate very much the intention of the Government to assist the farmers throughout the country, I would suggest that a little more be done for the farmers of the Maritime Provinces. In New Brunswick some years ago the production of wheat was almost nil, until the Provincial Government took the matter in hand and assisted the farmers by bonusing small grist mills and distributing wheat seed. The province had practically abandoned the growing of wheat because of the lack of mills to grind it, but now the Provincial Government bonuses any one who will build a mill, and the result is that the production of wheat has increased by 300 to 400 per cent. The mills are doing very well, but there are not enough of them throughout the province. The bonus granted by the Provincial Government is not large enough, and I would therefore suggest that the Dominion Government join hands with the Provincial Government in encouraging the building of mills. In the county where I live you can go for fifty miles without seeing a grist mill. That condition practically prohibits the raising of wheat, and the farmers might just as well take up some other work. I know a party in my own county who is willing to build a mill but has not the means, in view of the high cost of labour and materials. If the Government would bonus those who erect grist mills for grinding and cleaning the wheat, it would certainly encourage production and be of great advantage to the farmers. It is very necessary that the farmers should have clean wheat seed.

Mr. ROBB: I notice there is no item in the Estimates for exhibitions. Has that feature been dropped?

Mr. A. THOMPSON: I have a suggestion to make to the minister, and one that I have thought of more than once, in connection with the great wheat industry of Canada. I believe we can grow and mature a brand of wheat in the Yukon which would be of great value to the wheat growers on our western plains. It may be news to some hon. gentlemen to know that we do grow wheat in the Yukon.

Mr. JACOBS: Golden grain.

Mr. A. THOMPSON: It is just as golden and worth a little more than that grown on the plains.

Mr. McKENZIE: What does it cost to grow a bushel of wheat in the Yukon?

Mr. A. THOMPSON: That is a mere trifle. I have not figured it out on the bushel basis, but we have demonstrated that wheat of a very fine quality will mature in the Yukon. Recently, the Yukon Development League, an organization for the advancement of Yukon affairs, provided a dinner in Dawson and every article of food on the table was grown in the Yukon Territory.

Mr. McKENZIE: How many diners were present?

Mr. A. THOMPSON: A large number. Some years ago I brought down and laid on the table of the House a sample of our Yukon wheat, and it created considerable interest. Afterwards I sent it to the seed analyst at the Experimental Station here, and he planted one hundred grains taken at random out of the sack. He was surprised, and I was delighted, to find that every one of those grains germinated, showing the vitality of the wheat we grow in the Yukon. There is a small agricultural station at Dawson, and my suggestion is that the minister select different types of wheat and have them grown there, to see if we cannot grow a type of wheat in the Yukon which will require a shorter season than any wheat grown in Saskatchewan, Alberta or Manitoba. I make that suggestion because I think there are some potentialities. We have so much sunlight in the Yukon in the summer that grain grows very rapidly, and the number of growing days would consequently be less than on the prairies.

Mr. CRERAR: That suggestion has already been acted upon. We have in the Yukon a small experimental station that is maintained at a cost of slightly under $2,000 a year, and I am informed that we are already experimenting at that station with three or four different varieties of wheat to see if we can produce the splendid results which my hon. friend anticipates, and which I hope will be realized.

In regard to the suggestion that we should bonus grist mills in New Brunswick, I am afraid that would be of doubtful value, and I frankly state I do not think the suggestion will be acted upon. If any special assistance is required for this industry in New Brunswick I think it should be contributed by the people who are immediately to benefit from it. The grist mills of New Brunswick could not in any sense be considered a national enterprise. I have certain views on the virtues of the bonus principle generally, but I shall not trouble the Committee with them now.

Mr. JACOBS: A bonus is sometimes useful in a doubtful constituency.

Mr. ARGUE: I should like the minister to consider the advisability of having an experimental farm in that so-called arid district in the southeast part of Saskatchewan. I have lived there now for fifteen years, since the first furrows were ploughed and the first crops grown, and in that length of time we have lost two crops. I believe that if we had had an experimental farm there a good deal of expense could have been saved in connection with seed which we have been compelled for two seasons to send to that district to help the farmers. Last year the Government for this purpose withdrew a section of land that was put on the market for sale, and I would like the minister to consider the advisability of making a start in that section of the country in establishing an experimental farm. Even if it were only on a small scale it would be a great benefit.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think the first few items here might pass, but there are some things that hon. members wish to say on other phases of the very prolific and important subject we have been discussing. Perhaps the minister might agree to leave such matters as live stock commissioners and directors of experimental farms.

Mr. CRERAR: The hon. members for Chateauguay-Huntingdon requested that a certain item on which there would be general discussion might be held over. I shall be willing to do that. The general Estimates are found on page 58. We could leave No. 53 with the understanding that any general discussion could again take place, when that item came up. That would give members not in the House today an opportunity to bring forward matters they might wish to discuss.

Mr. McKENZIE: In 1913 or about that time, when the hon. Secretary of State (Mr. Burrell) was Minister of Agriculture, we used to discuss the advisability of establishing not altogether demonstration farms but small farms for the development of agriculture. The idea was that some of the $10,000,000 set apart for the development of the industry could be utilized in buying small farms in the neighbourhood of industrial centres, say, for instance, near the steel works in the county from which I come, where there are thousands of farmers' sons, and men from Ireland, England and Scotland who make marvellous developments of little bits of land about their houses. It was thought that if the Government could establish thirty or forty or even twenty small farms of between twenty-five and forty acres each, with house and barn, and give a small start in the way of developing these farms, and then sell them, men would be very anxious and willing to go in for the scheme. The idea has been developed in the West by the Canadian Pacific Railway. I understand they have built houses on certain sections of land; and they sell not only the bare land but the houses and barns and some equipment. In that way they have given a great boom to agriculture in that part of the country. We have in Nova Scotia millions of acres that are unoccupied, and it is not unusual to find a man owning four or five hundred acres and living on it with his wife, being able to scratch a bare living out of perhaps five per cent of the land. That land to which I refer could be used to great advantage if people could be found to take an interest in agriculture, and I am sure the Government would lose no money if they undertook this project. All they need is courage and enterprise, and they would find these little farms would be successful and would give a fresh impetus to agriculture. It was thought in the early days that the thing would be practicable, and there was some co-operation between the honourable gentleman (Mr. Burrell) and the Minister of Agriculture for Nova Scotia. Some start was made in the buying of old farms but the matter was not looked after properly and nothing of importance has really been done. What is absolutely essential for the development of the country is that it shall be a place in which the ordinary man can live in comfort, and the only way in which that can be achieved is to encourage the farmer to produce and enable him to sell at reasonable prices. The only advantage to the farmer is the profit he makes, and if he can make a large profit it is better for the country. He may make a fair profit on a small quantity, but if he can make a proportionate profit on large quantities of produce there is a beneficial result all round. It is absolutely necessary for the Department of Agriculture to make a departure from the rut in which we have been moving for the last twenty-five years, and to show what can be done along these lines. I have no particular line to indicate to the minister, but I have suggested what might be done in the neighbourhood of large centres. I have spoken of Cape Breton because I know men there who are ready to take hold of these little farms if they are put within their reach. They have not the means themselves to buy lands and put up houses, but if they were helped up to that stage they would jump at the proposition. The market is there and they could sell their produce, and there are young men from the Old Country who are enterprising enough to do very well if they were given a start. Another thing I might point out is the desirability of encouraging the extension of tram cars that are in touch with agricultural land so as to encourage the farmer. Companies might be encouraged to push their lines into the country. These things cost money, but the minister in charge of the department must have courage to depart from the old line and not hesitate to spend money abundantly so long as good results can be obtained. We want to make Canada produce something proportionate to its capacity for production.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In connection with the distribution of literature, I have noticed that literature is printed in both languages and when any one applies to the department he can get either French or English copies. I want to inform the minister—and this can be confirmed by the deputy minister—that the best agent of the department in my province is the curé, who is generally the honorary president and sometimes the secretary of what we call the Circles Agricoles. There is one in every county, and sometimes one in every parish, and in the pulpit on nearly every Sunday of the year in these rural districts the curé will spend a portion of his time speaking to the farmers on agricultural matters.

I would like my hon. friend to send the literature which is issued by the department in French—not all, but the most essential bulletins—to the curés of the province of Quebec, so as to secure their devotion to the cause. Because the great issue of the day is the necessity of getting our people back to the land and improving living conditions in the rural districts. I have offered these remarks now because unfortunately, I shall not be able to be present this evening.

Mr. CRERAR: I can say to the hon. gentleman that the suggestion which he has made will be acted upon.

At six o'clock the House resumed and took recess.

SUPPLY.

The House again in Committee of Supply.

Experimental Farms—maintenance of Central Farm, and establishment and maintaining of additional branch stations, $1,200,000.

Mr. CAHILL: Will the minister explain the increase in this item? I would also like him to give the Committee some information with regard to the advantage of the experimental farms and stations in different parts of the country. For instance, what advantage has the Experimental Farm at Ottawa been?

Mr. CRERAR: That matter was discussed very fully this afternoon. I believe the hon. member (Mr. Cahill) was not present. If the hon. gentleman will refer to the discussion that has already taken place, I think he will get the information he desires. The work that is carried on at the Central farm at Ottawa is very largely of an experimental character. I might illustrate that by the statement that Marquis wheat, which has been of immense value to Canada, was the product of experiments carried on at the farm at Ottawa. That is only one of many similar experiments that have been successfully carried out here.

Mr. CAHILL: Have they discovered anything since the Marquis wheat?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, and they are working on a new wheat now. Some hon. members asked as to the occasion for the increase in the vote for experimental farms. It is accounted for very largely by the increase in wages and in the cost of the materials generally that are necessary in the operation of the farm. There is also a provision for the establishment of branch farms and stations.

Mr. J. E. SINCLAIR: Where are the stations proposed to be established?

Mr. CRERAR: No definite locations have as yet been located for the new experimental farms. Provision is made so that, if it is considered advisable to extend the work in the direction of experimental stations, it can be done. There is also a considerable portion of the vote for the further development of experimental farms that are already established, such as the farm at Kapuskasing, Ontario, and some farms in Quebec.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Have you any branch stations in Ontario now?

Mr. CRERAR: We have the tobacco station at Harrow, Essex county, and the experimental farm at Kapuskasing.

Mr. SEXSMITH: How many branch stations are there in the Dominion?

Mr. CRERAR: Twenty experimental farms and experimental stations.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Are these stations for experimental purposes?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes; there is really no difference between an experimental station and an experimental farm. They practically carry on the same work.

Mr. J. E. SINCLAIR: Would the minister give us the information as to the cost of the experimental farm at Ottawa?

Mr. CRERAR: The estimate for the Central Experimental Farm for the present year is $364,000 as follows:

Animal husbandry	$40,318
Bees	2,500
Botanical branch	26,000
Cereals	29,000
Chemistry	5,000
Director's office	3,000
Fibre production	20,000
Extension and publicity	25,000
Farm expenses (farm labour)	10,000
Field husbandry	13,000
Forage plants	8,000
Horticulture	39,000
Illustration stations	28,000
Poultry	15,200
Tobacco	28,000
General expenditure in connection with Canadian Expeditionary Force	19,000
Pure bred live stock	63,000

The amount in connection with the Canadian Expeditionary Force is the amount required to make up the difference between the civil and military pay of the men who went to the front.

Mr. CAHILL: Who is the director of the farm?

Mr. CRERAR: Mr. Archibald, succeeding Dr. Grisdale, who has been made deputy minister.

Mr. J. E. SINCLAIR: Is there a permanent superintendent of the Charlottetown Experimental Farm?

Mr. CRERAR: The Superintendent of the experimental farm at Charlottetown was given leave of absence to go overseas to do special work in connection with the Khaki University. As soon as that work is completed, he will return to his post.

Mr. CAHILL: What expenditure is proposed at the Kapuskasing Farm and the Spirit Lake Farm, and what were the results of the work last year?

Mr. CRERAR: The estimate for the Kapuskasing Farm for the present year is $40,525. During last year considerable land was acquired and brought under cultivation; new buildings were erected and the equipment of the farm was generally improved in order that the work could be more effectively carried on. For the Spirit Lake farm the estimate this year is $44,500, for practically the same kind of work.

Mr. J. E. SINCLAIR: A great deal of trouble has been experienced by the farmers because of the fact that they cannot get results from the Paris green which is now being sold for use in poisoning the potato beetle. Has any investigation been made into this matter at the Central Experimental Farm or any of the branch stations, or at the laboratories?

Mr. CRERAR: I do not know that any experiments have been carried on to test the efficacy of the Paris green that has been sold. Paris green must, under the regulations of the Inland Revenue Department, come up to certain standards before it may be sold.

Mr. J. E. SINCLAIR: It is subject to inspection?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, under the Inland Revenue Act.

Mr. CAHILL: What amount of the vote for experimental farms last year was expended?

Mr. CRERAR: I am informed by the deputy that the total amount voted last year was expended.

Mr. CAHILL: Does the minister think that it will be necessary to have this extra amount this year? Does he think it is a good time to increase the expenditure? I am sorry to note that every minister is making increased expenditures; I had hoped that the democratic Minister of Agriculture would cut down expenditures, not increase them. I note also that no minister is able to explain these increased expenditures. It simply is " an item we may need some time in the future"; or it is explained that " we are making provision for something we practically do not know anything about, but we want to have enough in our estimates; in other words, we want to keep up with the other twenty or so ministers; we want to increase our expenditures regardless of whether we need the money or not." They seem to have the idea that the country is looking for increased expenditures—for full steam ahead without regard to where the money is coming from. The minister should explain to the Committee just what he thinks of the whole system of the Department of Agriculture as at present constituted, particularly of this Central Experimental Farm and the other——

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. gentleman is entering upon a subject which was discussed very fully on the Civil Government Estimates this afternoon when he was absent. I certainly cannot allow a repetition of the same arguments to-night.

Mr. CAHILL: We are considering an item of $1,200,000 for experimental farms, and I wish to ask the minister if he believes that the present system of experimental farms is the best method of bringing about the better use of seeds, the raising of better stock, and so on. This farm at Spirit Lake is in my constituency, in the far north. There is another farm at Kapuskasing, only a few miles away; one is in Quebec and the other is in Ontario. Something like $80,000 a year is being spent on these farms—an extraordinarily large amount. Moreover, the expenditure on the Experimental Farm at Ottawa seems to be entirely out of proportion to the results that are being obtained. The minister tells us that they developed a kind of wheat there some years ago. The older members of the House tell me, however, that that argument has been practically worked to death here; that seems to be the only explanation each year for increasing the expenditure. Does the minister not think that a better system might be worked out by distributing smaller farms throughout the country and doing the work on a purely business basis in the different provinces? These large farms in Ottawa and at other points are purely experimental farms. A demonstration farm is quite different from an experimental farm. A demonstration farm would show the farmers in the community how to improve their seed, their stock, and their conditions generally; the experimental farm would seem to make experiments from which the independent farmer can obtain no profit. Does not the minister think that this money could be more profitably expended on demonstration farms?

Mr. CRERAR: Had the hon. member been here this afternoon he would have obtained at least the greater part of the information he now seeks. In every country that is making any effort to secure sound agricultural development, experimental farms and stations and demonstration stations are maintained.

As to the increase which the hon. member criticises, the matter resolves itself simply into this, that if we are to pay the increased cost of operation, such as the increase in wages and the higher cost of material, due to causes over which the Department of Agriculture has no control, then, if we are to keep the vote at the same amount as last year, we shall have to cut down the efficiency of the farms, and that would not be a wise move nor justified in any way. The development of agriculture in every country in the world is becoming more and more dependent upon the application of sound, scientific methods, not only in respect to methods of cultivation as to cereals, fruits and vegetables, but in the field of animal husbandry, which is of immense importance. For instance, as was pointed out this afternoon, the beef animals produced in Canada are inferior to those produced in the Argentine and in the United States. Experiments which are being carried on at several stations and farms, demonstrate conclusively the advantages of producing higher class animals at practically the same or even slightly lower cost than inferior animals. Those facts are published, and they are also made known to those who visit the farms and personally acquaint themselves with the experiments that are being carried on. We have passed the time when the utility and advantages of experimental farms and stations can be successfully challenged. It is, perhaps, an open question as to what is the best method of carrying on the work. I said this afternoon, and I will repeat it now for the information of the hon. member, that from the information we are gathering it seems that the establishment of illustration farms will probably prove the most effective method of bringing the farmers closely and directly in touch with the advantages of the work that is being carried on.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the difference in the weights of cattle from range country and from Eastern Canada? Where do the ranchers procure the information that a certain class of cattle is better than others? For instance, are there any herds at the Ottawa Experimental Farm? What are the heavier cattle and what are the classes that are best suited to the different sections of Canada for beef and other purposes?

Mr. CRERAR: The department does not carry on any experiments on ranching farm scale, that is, where cattle run out on ranges. The experiments are conducted for instance, with dairy cattle as to what is the best type, the advantages that come from certain strains of breeding, in milk production and in the butter-fat quality of the cream that is produced. Feeding experiments in cattle have been carried out not only at the Central Experimental Farm but at branch farms, to determine what profit there is to the individual carrying on work along the same line, and some very interesting results have been found. I am safe in saying that hundreds of thousands of bulletins dealing with these various matters are distributed free to the farmers, and the increasing interest in the work is manifested by the large number of additional inquiries that are coming in all the time for this information.

Mr. CAHILL: Does the department at any of its experimental stations throughout Canada, east or west, make recommendations to the stock raiser as to what class of cattle is best adapted to certain districts? I understood the minister to say that the weight of these beef cattle had been increased; in other words, that the standard of beef throughout Canada had been raised. If that be so, in what way was it brought about by the Department of Agriculture?

Mr. CRERAR: I have already stated the work that is carried on at those farms, and I do not know that I can add anything to the information I have given.

Mr. CAHILL: Is anything done for the stock raiser?

Mr. CRERAR: Certainly, the whole thing is designed to help the stock raiser. He has the advantage of coming to the farm—as stock raisers do in large numbers—to see for himself the result of the work carried on. In addition the results of these experiments are published in pamphlet form and distributed to thousands and thousands of stock raisers throughout Canada. These pamphlets give a description of the experiments and their actual results.

Mr. MYERS: Is there included in the Estimates an amount for an experimental farm to be established at Eston, Saskatchewan? I think the minister has had some communications from that district which is quite similar to the district described by the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Argue) this afternoon.

Mr. CRERAR: We have a general appropriation for the establishment of new farms. We shall not, I am afraid, be able to go very far this year in that direction. We have, of course, on the one hand, as we had this afternoon, several hon. members urging that this work be extended and more illustration and demonstration farms established; then we have to-night the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) claiming that the brakes should be put on and the expenditure reduced. We have endeavoured to strike a fair middle course and have included in our Estimates a sum that will, we hope, enable us to establish possibly a few new experimental stations during the year, and the point to which the hon. member alludes and which has already been brought to my notice will receive consideration.

Mr. MYERS: There is no farm in that particular district, and I think, as it is in an area that has been drought-stricken for several years, a great deal of good will be derived from the establishment of an experimental farm there.

Mr. CAMPBELL: What is the policy of the Government regarding farms which the minister suggests might be established this year? Will they be established in old settled districts or in new districts, perhaps, where there are few settlers, with the idea of showing what those districts might produce?

Mr. CRERAR: These matters will all be taken into consideration before a decision is reached as to the location of any new farms that may be undertaken. I am unable to state at present where these farms will be located. The suggestion of the hon. member which has some merit in it will be carefully considered.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I should like to follow up my remarks by saying that there is a district in northern Manitoba which is generally looked upon as being not much good agriculturally, but we are quite satisfied that proper demonstration would show it to be a real agricultural district. It is not the only district in Canada which had hitherto been regarded in that light and yet has proved to be good. There are other districts which if gone after systematically could be shown to be good productive districts.

Mr. J. FERNAND FAFARD (translation): Does the minister intend to do away with the duties now levied on fertilizers?

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Order. This has nothing to do with experimental farms.

Mr. FAFARD: Mr. Chairman, I think that the question of fertilizers has much to do with experimental farms.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: The item under consideration concerns the establishment and maintenance of experimental farms, and surely it has nothing to do with fertilizers, or with duties to be paid on fertilizers. When we reach that item I shall draw the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: How many experimental farms are there in the province of Quebec?

Mr. CRERAR: Four experimental farms and stations: at Lennoxville, Ste. Anne de la Pocatiere, Kamouraska, and Spirit Lake. There is also a tobacco station at Farnham.

For the administration and enforcement of the Destructive Insect and Pest Act, $149,200.

Mr. McKENZIE: I suppose this would include what is popularly known as the potato bug?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: Has the department discovered any effective means of exterminating that visitor?

Mr. CRERAR: The department has carried out quite a variety of experiments with different insecticides used in spraying, and the results obtained conclusively show that with proper care and proper treatment the pest can be pretty well controlled, if not entirely eradicated.

Mr. McKENZIE: I can understand insecticides killing the pest for the time being, but next year they are as bad as ever. Has the department any knowledge as to whether they remain in the soil and come out again another year, or are they of a migratory character? Can you prevent reproduction of the pest?

Mr. CRERAR: The difficulty in completely eradicating the pest in any district is due mainly to the fact that all farmers will not spray. The result is that in every district certain fields remain infected. I do not quite understand the process by which the potato bug is reproduced, but experiments have demonstrated conclusively that if spraying is consistently done by all the farmers in the district the pest can be eradicated.

Mr. CAHILL: How many employees are there in this branch, and what are the salaries? I notice an increase in this item.

Mr. CRERAR: The increase is due to increases in salary and in the cost of materials for experiments. Insecticides of various kinds, as well as the appliances and equipment with which to conduct the experiments, have increased in price. Provision is also made for three additional assistants, necessitated by new lines of investigational work that are being carried out. I regard this as one of the important branches of our agricultural work, and it is really very interesting to follow the experimental work closely and see the results that can be obtained in the destruction of these pests that very greatly depreciate the value of our field crops.

Mr. CAHILL: Would wheat rust come under this head?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, we are carrying out experiments along that line.

Mr. PEDLOW: This item is for the enforcement of the Destructive Insect and Pest Act. Would the elimination of food profiteers be in order under this heading?

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The hon. member must be serious.

Mr. CRERAR: We have not yet been able to find an insecticide that will look after them.

Mr. PEDLOW: I noticed in the press that a considerable quantity of cold storage provisions was destroyed in Montreal, and I was wondering if any part of this money would be used for obviating the necessity of destroying foodstuffs.

For the development of the dairying industry, and the improvement of transportation, sale and trade in food and other products, $155,000.

Mr. CRERAR: This is the same amount as last year. Last year's vote was a little more than sufficient to meet our requirements.

Mr. CAHILL: Are experiments made in dairying at only the Central Farm, or at other farms such as Spirit Lake and Indian Head?

Mr. CRERAR: We have two experimental stations carrying on that work, one in Ontario, and another in New Brunswick. The Policy of the department for several years past has been to give assistance in the development of a refrigeration service, particularly on the railways.

Mr. McKENZIE: This item deals with the "sale and trade in food and other products." Does that imply that the department has to do with cold storage cars, for instance? Does the department furnish cold storage for the transportation of fish and other perishable products which are carried from one place to another?

This matter is of the greatest importance The fishermen along the coasts of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island complain that while there are cold storage cars they are very poorly equipped and a very large percentage of fish and other products put into cold storage become unfit for human food before they reach their destination. It is necessary that fish should be kept cool and well iced from one stage of transportation to another until it is finally disposed. It has been complained that this matter is not attended to, and that the ice which is provided when the food leaves the point of shipment melts and is not renewed, the fish being destroyed. If this item is intended to cover that particular phase of transportation and bring it within the scope of the Department of Agriculture, I would seriously press upon the minister the necessity of having the most complete system that can possibly be devised. Attention should be given not only to what forces itself upon the department, but every encouragement should be given to see that proper care is exercised in transportation with a view to obtaining the best and most profitable results. I have always thought—and I have brought the matter to the attention of the Government several times—that in addition to provision for the proper care of food on transit in cars, there should be a suitable place of reception for the cars themselves when they reach their destination, some sort of cold storage shed where the car might be kept free from contamination until the freight is finally unloaded. These cars, I understand, are sometimes allowed to stand in the yard uncared for and in many cases valuable food such as fish decays and becomes unfit for consumption, and has to be thrown away. I am not quite sure that this comes within the purview of the Department of Agriculture, but the item seems to suggest that it does. If it does, I cannot too strongly urge upon the minister, and in any event upon the department which may deal with the matter, the great importance of this phase of the transportation question.

Mr. CRERAR: This item covers only transportation of dairy products and fruits; it does not include fish, which is covered by an item in the Marine and Fisheries Department. Assistance is given to promote, and also by way of investigation to ascertain, the advantages to the producer from the use of proper refrigeration service in the transportation of these perishable commodities. I quite agree with the leader of the Opposition that the matter is one of very great importance. The advantage of cold storage and proper refrigeration, not only in rail but in ocean transportation, has not, I venture to say, been fully recognized by the producers and the people generally. To assist in this work the Government, as has already been stated in the House on previous occasions, have made provision for the erection of a public cold storage plant on the harbour front of Montreal under the control of the Board of Harbour Commissioners for that port. This is to accomplish the very purpose which the leader of the Opposition refers to, namely, that commodities may have a suitable place of storage pending their further shipment. A portion of this grant is used for cow testing in the ordinary dairy herds. We have a staff of inspectors, and farmers are encouraged to test the milk production of their various animals. Very remarkable results have been obtained, and many farmers are weeding out unprofitable animals. There is also provision for cargo inspection in the shipment of perishable commodities overseas. There is a cargo inspection not only at the port of landing but also in the United Kingdom. Self-registering thermometers are used in the storage compartments of the vessels, and complete records of temperatures are taken on the way across, which records are preserved in the files of the department. Further, there is some small provision for the drafting of plans of suitable dairy buildings. Very often inquiries are received from creameries and cheese factories and persons interested in the dairy business for suggestions as to suitable buildings to meet their requirements, and we are endeavouring to provide for these necessities. These are the matters that are mainly covered by the items included under this head. The development of our dairying industry in Canada is of great importance. Great Britain imports about 500,000,000 pounds of butter annually and Canada supplies a very small portion of that, not more than a few million pounds. Britain's annual imports in eggs are also enormous, but Canada supplies only a few millions of dozens. In order to take full advantage of that market and to hold it we have to do two or three important things. First, we must secure the best possible standard of quality in our product, and in the various activities of the department we are endeavouring to impress that fact on producers. Second,—and this is of equal importance—there must be proper facilities for shipment. If you ship a carload of butter from Montreal, Halifax or any other port and leave it standing on the wharf for a day or two in hot weather, deterioration sets in and the original quality of the butter can never be restored. Therefore, proper cold storage facilities and proper refrigeration service on vessels are of the greatest importance. The business of this branch generally is to study that field, and by experiment, investigation and inquiry, to discover the best possible methods that can be used to achieve these results.

Mr. McKENZIE: Have we succeeded in Canada in obtaining a perfectly safe refrigerator car for the transportation of perishable food such as butter or fruit? The difficulty has been that although we have been reputed to have refrigerator cars suitable for the carrying of such goods, the cars used have been altogether inadequate, and great losses have been incurred by the use of them. Is there any experiment or improvement in this matter? Are we advancing any nearer the goal of our ambition to have a perfectly good refrigerator car?

Mr. CRERAR: Experiments have been conducted with ice-cooled cars and brine-tank-cooled cars, and the result would seem to indicate that the latter is the more efficient method. These experiments have been carried on over a considerable period of time, and the results carefully noted and compared. The results that have been obtained so far, I think, prove beyond any question of doubt the great advantage there is in using proper care in the shipment of the stuff and the character of the cold storage used. You can have a refrigerator car that is ice-cooled, but if the detail of the work is not properly carried out from the time the car leaves its point of origin until it reaches its destination, your experiment will be likely to turn out badly. The whole effort of the department is directed towards ascertaining what are the best methods of carrying out the work for the purpose of getting the results desired.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Can the minister give any information about the amount of oleomargarine that has been manufactured and sold in Canada?

Mr. CRERAR: The dairy commissioner informs me that 14,000,000 pounds have been sold in Canada since the prohibition was lifted in October, 1917, of which about 8,000,000 pounds was manufactured in Canada.

Mr. SEXSMITH: What firms are manufacturing it?

Mr. CRERAR: The Harris Abattoir and Swift's are the two principal firms manufacturing it.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I suppose this oleomargarine is being sold under strict regulations?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, under strict regulations both as to manufacture and sale.

Mr. SEXSMITH: And quality?

Mr. CRERAR: And quality.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the process of acquainting the farmers and dairymen with information pointing to the desirability of testing their cows and so getting a better grade of stock? To what extent does the department encourage that sort of thing?

Mr. CRERAR: The number of cows tested last year was 27,000.

Mr. CAHILL: Where?

Mr. CRERAR: All over Canada, but mainly in the great dairying provinces of Ontario and Quebec. This work is being carried on in conjunction with cheese factories and creameries where the cheesemaker or the buttermaker has the expert knowledge necessary to carry out the test successfully.

Mr. SEXSMITH: I understand some change is being made in the system of cow testing. A year or two ago there were certain districts in charge of representatives of the department who carried on the work. Is the operation now being carried on as successfully as it was under the old system?

Mr. CRERAR: The work was carried out formerly by inspectors appointed by the department but that was abandoned and the department now is endeavouring to have the cheesemakers and buttermakers do the work of the inspectors. The department pays the cheesemaker or buttermaker a small fee per cow tested. That supplements the revenue that he gets from his work, and we find that the work can be extended to a greater degree with less cost than under the other system.

Mr. SEXSMITH: What success have you had in getting the cheesemakers to do the work?

Mr. CRERAR: First class.

Towards the encouragement of cold storage warehouses for the better preservation and handling of perishable food products, $25,000.

Mr. CAHILL: What is this item?

Mr. CRERAR: In 1908 by legislative enactment, provision was made for bonusing the building of cold storage warehouses throughout Canada. The regulations provided that the Government, where such warehouses should be built, would provide thirty per cent of the cost of construction. This was spread over several years. A total of over $650,000 had been paid out from the time of the inauguration of this policy until the commencement of the war. Since 1914 no new subsidies have been paid with the exception of a contract that had been made prior to the commencement of the war.

Mr. CAHILL: Where?

Mr. CRERAR: In Saskatoon. The matter has been under the consideration of the department and recently a decision was reached and embodied in an Order in Council, passed under a provision of the Act, that we will cease giving assistance to the development of private cold storage houses. There is a provision still that assistance may be given in the case of a municipally owned cold storage warehouse and in future the aid will be confined to such.

Mr. COWAN: Did the Government retain any control over the cold storage warehouses for the 30 per cent of the $650,000, which was given to the proprietors?

Mr. CRERAR: There was a measure of control over the storage rates charged by these warehouses. As a matter of fact, the system has not worked out very satisfactorily from the point of view of the public. Generally the persons or the companies building the storage were engaged in the business themselves and it was somewhat difficult to regulate them under the provisions of the Act. We are considering now the passage of regulations providing for the licensing of cold storage and a little closer control in so far as returns are concerned.

Mr. COWAN: I would suppose that some of this cold storage would be reserved for the public use. Could a farmer require a company to give him space or could the company sell the entire space to one or two parties?

Mr. CRERAR: Farmers or others can get space if it is available. But there is no provision that these cold storage warehouses shall keep a certain amount of space available for the public and the result is that generally the private dealer who owns the storage uses the whole of it. As long as there is space available the public can get it.

Mr. COWAN: I think in framing the regulations it would be proper to provide that a certain portion of the space should be reserved for the public. I believe that would very effectually break up the scheme that is being carried out at the present time.

Mr. CRERAR: As a rule the public get what they want, but I doubt if the Government has any such power of control as the hon. gentleman suggests should be exercised.

Mr. COWAN: I think it should have that power.

Mr. LEGER: How many cold storage warehouses are there in New Brunswick, and where are they situated?

Mr. CRERAR: There are two in New Brunswick to which we are paying a subsidy, one at Woodstock and the other at St. John.

Mr. CAHILL: The policy of giving subsidies to private cold storage plants has been abandoned, and I gather that the minister is not very much in favour of it. What is the Government's present policy now with regard to cold storage plants in Canada?

Mr. CRERAR: As I stated this afternoon, the Government has provided something over $1,000,000 for the erection of a cold storage plant on the harbour front at Montreal. As to further developments, while the Government's policy has not been definitely decided upon, my own personal view is that the plan adopted in the case of Montreal should be extended to other shipping points.

Mr. CAHILL: Do you think that it will be extended?

Mr. CRERAR: I think eventually that it will. There is great merit in the idea that it would be better from the point of view of public cold storage—at any rate so it seems to me—if municipalities would undertake the erection of municipal cold storage plants.

Mr. CRERAR: That has already been done in some Western towns. I recall New Westminster as one in particular, where the corporation of the city and the council of the adjoining municipality have combined for the erection of a municipal cold storage plant which shall be available for the merchants of the city, and the farmers from the adjacent county who want to take advantage of it.

Mr. CAHILL: Does not the minister think that if the duty were taken off cold storage plants it might facilitate the establishment of numerous plants throughout the country? Does he not think it would be an advantage to do that?

Mr. COWAN: What a question!

Mr. CRERAR: I think it might possibly help.

Mr. J. E. SINCLAIR: Do I understand that this item we are considering relates to all classes of food commodities, including fish?

Mr. CRERAR: No.

Mr. J. E. SINCLAIR: The item in the Estimates speaks of cold storage warehouses "for the better preservation and handling of food products," but has no reference to fish?

Mr. CRERAR: I stated in reply to the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) that it applied only to fruit and dairy products. Fish is provided for in the fisheries estimates.

Mr. PEDLOW: To what extent does the Government exercise supervision over cold storage plants? For instance, the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) yesterday drew the Government's attention to the large quantity, in fact tons, of foodstuffs that had been destroyed in the city of Montreal. Would not prevention be a much better plan than destruction in such cases? If the Government has the right to supervise the cold storage plants of the country, would it not be wisdom on its part to insist that the owners dispose of the products in cold storage before they become rotten and have to be destroyed?

Mr. CRERAR: The hon. gentleman raises a very broad problem. In the particular case to which he refers, I believe the goods were out of condition before they were stored. I have not the slightest hesitation in stating that if it were not for the existing cold storage plants in Canada probably the loss and deterioration of food stuffs would be very much greater than it is. Whether the Government should exercise that control over food commodities which the hon. gentleman suggests is, at any rate, a debatable question. These cold storage plants, as I understand it, are subject to municipal regulations in that respect, and personally I think it always well for the municipality to deal with such matters rather than apply Federal control to them. In other words, it is better on principle to have the municipal power invoked, wherever it can be done successfully, rather than the Federal power in a matter of that kind.

Mr. PEDLOW: I understand that under the terms of the vote we are considering, the Government exercises a certain control over these cold storage plants. Is it not a crime to allow good food stuffs to go to waste, and should not the Government step in and compel the owners of the plants to dispose of those food stuffs before they become unfit for human consumption and have to be destroyed?

Mr. CRERAR: A certain control has been exercised, but, as I have already stated, it has not been found very effective, particularly after the subsidies have been earned, for the reason that the private owner of the cold storage plant very often requires this space for himself. I think that in the main, however, the public have been very well served. As to the other point which the hon. gentleman raises, and urges upon the Government, namely that it should take the power to order the sale of commodities at certain times, it has no relation to the item under discussion, and is a question upon which I am not prepared to express an opinion.

Mr. COWAN: Under the Act under which assistance was granted towards the construction of these various cold storage plants, that aid was given to only one plant in each locality, a policy which has not met with the expectations of the Government. I would like to ask, would the existence of that one plant in a municipality be a barrier to that municipality getting the aid that will be extended under the present scheme?

Mr. CRERAR: Offhand, I would not care to give a definite answer at the moment.

Mr. COWAN: I hope the minister will take that point into consideration.

Mr. CRERAR: I shall do so.

Mr. PELLETIER: Are we to understand that in the case of publicly-owned plants the Government intends to grant subsidies as it has heretofore done in the case of private companies? For example, suppose certain municipalities want to open cold storage plants, does the Government intend to give them assistance to the extent of thirty per cent of the cost of construction, or will it assist them at any time?

Mr. CRERAR: It will be open to municipalities that desire to establish municipally-owned cold storage plants within their districts to ask for assistance. If they do, their applications will be considered, and if everything is in order a provision exists for extending aid. As I have already stated the policy of granting assistance from the public fund will be discontinued as far as the building of private cold storage plants is concerned.

Mr. CAHILL: The Government has adopted public ownership in regard to railways, and I would ask if it is intended to adopt the same policy in respect of cold storage plants. I think if the Government did that, government ownership would be much more profitable and beneficial to the public generally than it might possibly be when applied in some other directions.

Mr. CRERAR: I have already stated that the Government has commenced by providing for the erection of a public cold storage plant at Montreal. I stated also that I was not in a position to say what the general policy of the Government in the matter would be.

Mr. CAHILL: How can we ascertain the policy of the Government with respect to numerous matters that have arisen recently in the House? The ministers in charge of the Estimates are always unable to inform us in regard to the general policy of the Government. The Government seems to be largely a Government of individuals, each with his own particular department in mind and unable to say just how far that department may go. This matter of cold storage is one of the most serious questions that confront the Canadian people to-day, and the Government should have a policy with regard to it. The press would lead us to believe that the people controlling the packing and cold storage plants have been making exorbitant profits. Ministers of the Government have defended the character and business ability of some of the gentlemen who have made these exorbitant profits. Conditions in Canada to-day are not satisfactory to the labouring people; they have the impression that the cold storage plants are getting too much out of the producers and the consumers. Probably twenty-five to thirty-three and a third per cent of Canada's produce is wasted for the want of proper storage facilities. The erection of a plant at Montreal will not relieve the situation in all other parts of the country. The erection of cold storage plants in the United States or in European countries seems to be a simple matter. Having regard to our long shipping distances and to the general conditions in this country, it would be good business for the Government to find out what it would cost to build plants so that they may be able to give that information to the towns and cities of Canada. A cold storage plant is just as important as the hen-coop or pig-sty. If it is necessary to take the duty off certain articles to promote a policy of this kind the Government can do it, just as they took the duty off farm tractors. The Government should reduce the high cost of living by providing better cold storage facilities and by making the profiteers dispose of their food products before they are allowed to rot. The minister says he has no power to do these things. Why, with the War-time Elections Act and all the other various Acts which have vested power in the Government they are able to do anything. All it requires is courage, and if my hon. friend would show some courage in the direction of satisfying the common people, the poor people, the producers, rather than the profiteers, he would be in very much better grace in Canada than he is to-day. I hope that this matter will receive the serious consideration of the Minister and that he will look into the storage problem as one of the most serious problems that Canada faces.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend is scarcely consistent; he has quite reversed the position he took a few moments ago, when he criticised very sharply an additional expenditure of $100,000 or so in a vote previously under discussion and urged that we should practice economy. In fact, he impressed me quite strongly by the earnestness of his appeal. Now he suggests that we embark on a policy that would involve the expenditure of millions. If the hon. gentleman wishes my opinion as to the policy that should be adopted—in fact, so far as announcement has been made or anything has been done it is the policy that has been adopted—it is the duty of the federal administration to provide the necessary facilities for the transportation of these products and for the care of them at ocean ports and, generally, to assist in the trade and commerce of the country. If the hon. gentleman has in mind the erection of cold storage plants in every city, town, and village in Canada, the proposition would be a very large one and might better be taken up by municipal enterprise. We have already decided on the policy of giving assistance by way of bonus to municipal cold storage plants. Any town in my hon. friend's constituency, any town or city in Canada, can say to the Government: We propose to erect a municipal cold storage plant and to make it available for the public—for merchants, farmers and all who want to use it; and the Government will upon certain conditions give assistance to the extent of thirty per cent of the cost of erecting such a plant. It would be well to test this policy out for a few years and see what results come from it, rather than to embark on an expenditure that might run into millions.

Mr. CAHILL: Is the Department providing any information of these towns and municipalities that desire cold storage plants?

Mr. CRERAR: The Dairy and Cold Storage branch gathers the best information that can secured in regard to this matter, has the information on file, and is prepared to submit plans, suggestions, and expert advice as to the kind of cold storage best suited to particular localities.

Mr. TOLMIE: Is it the intention of the Government to erect a cold storage plant at Halifax or at some other suitable place in the Maritime Provinces? Such a plant would be of great assistance in building up an export trade. I understand the farmers in the Maritime Provinces are labouring under a severe handicap, as they have no cold storage plant and have to ship their products very long distances, such as to Montreal, at heavy expense, with the result, in many cases, that their live stock produces only about half as much as the same live stock would sell at on the Toronto market. If a cold storage plant were built at that point it would be a great help to the live stock industry in that part of Canada.

Mr. CRERAR: The suggestion will receive the consideration of the Government. No decision has been reached to erect a cold storage plant at Halifax or any other Atlantic port other than Montreal, where we have made a start.

Mr. LEGER: I would favour the idea of a Government-owned cold storage plant in the Maritime Provinces. With that I would urge the Government to have a good inspector to visit it frequently. If I am well informed, there are throughout Canada many cold storage warehouses full of foodstuffs which are held for higher prices. These cold storage warehouses should be visited by Government inspectors and the foodstuffs should be sold instead of being kept there to enhance prices. In that way the poor people of Canada would be benefited. These trusts or combines get together and fill up these warehouses with foodstuffs which they hold until the price goes up. As was said by an hon. member, a large quantity of foodstuffs was wasted in Montreal by being held in cold storage for higher prices. The cost of living is getting so high that it is almost impossible for the poor people to live, and the Government should take steps to cause cold storage warehouses to be emptied at a certain time of the year instead of being kept full of foodstuffs the year round, thus keeping the price up.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am glad the hon. member for Victoria city (Mr. Tolmie) has brought up the question of Government-owned cold storage warehouses at Atlantic ports. I understand the Department of Agriculture for Nova Scotia has been impressing upon the minister that some steps should be taken to erect at Halifax a cold storage plant somewhat similar to the one it is proposed to erect at Montreal. I have nothing to say against the building of a plant at Montreal, but I was told that one of the reasons why this cold storage plant was being erected at Montreal was to furnish facilities for the shipment of chilled or other beef at all seasons of the year. The minister knows well that shipping facilities at the port of Montreal are limited in season. For a considerable portion of the year that port is frozen up and vessels cannot come to or go away from it. Navigation is open in the harbour of Halifax 365 days of the year every year, and I am sure the same thing may be said of St. John, although not to the same easy extent as at Halifax. I do not know if there are any hon. members from New Brunswick here who may criticise me if I say anything about the high tide difficulties of the St. John harbour. It is, however, open all the year round and ships can come to and go from it. If the Government have decided that it is proper to spend $1,000,000 for the purpose of erecting a cold storage plant to be auxiliary to transhipment across the Atlantic, that plant should be at a place which shipping can go to and depart from at all seasons. That is, I think, a strong argument in favour of such facilities being erected at the ports of Halifax and St. John, or, if not at both, at least at one of them. In view of the fact that the Nova Scotia Department of Agriculture has put in its claim—and I have not heard that any particular claim was sent in from New Brunswick, although the one would require it just as much as the other—the minister should give some attention to the very legitimate request put forward. I understand the hon. member for Victoria city who has brought this matter to the attention of the minister is the president of a certain association that has to deal with agricultural matters throughout the province.

Mr. TOLMIE: The Canadian National Live Stock Council, made up of representatives from the Eastern and Western Live Stock Unions.

Mr. McKENZIE: My hon. friend is an authority on the question and I am glad he has brought this matter up. I should like to point out to the minister an extraordinary thing that happened in Nova Scotia last year. The farmers in several counties such as Pictou and Antigonish, the latter being exclusively a farming community, are excellent farmers. They discovered that the hay crop was not up to standard last year, and they were obliged to sell off hundreds of their live stock. They sold them to a gentleman who could do nothing with them but take them to a place where they could be slaughtered and put into cold storage. As there was no cold storage warehouse in the Maritime Provinces, those cattle were carried alive to Montreal or Toronto, slaughtered and the meat kept in cold storage all winter. The beef was then shipped back over nearly 1,500 miles of railroad to Nova Scotia and sold to our miners, lumbermen and other people. The minister can readily understand the enormous increase that must necessarily be put upon the first cost of that article on account of its being handled in that manner.

Mr. CRERAR: There are no abattoir plants in the Maritime Provinces?

Mr. McKENZIE: No, but I understand those interested in the cattle trade are quite ready to build abattoirs if cold storage facilities were provided, but it is too expensive for them to erect a cold storage plant, and they are, therefore, looking to the Government to do so. It would be a good investment and a good policy for the Government to build such a plant. Does the minister intend in connection with the cold storage plant at Montreal, to provide a place where a car could be run in?

In order to do that, the lower story of the building would have to be made something like a railway yard. If that could be provided, it would certainly save a great deal of handling and re-handling of the contents. It might be that these facilities would be made use of only once in a while, but they would certainly be a splendid thing to have. I have particularly in mind what happens to our cars of fish from the Maritime Provinces. Friday is the big fish day in cities, and Thursday or early Friday morning is the best time to sell a car of fish in Montreal or Toronto. If the car happens to get there on Monday or Tuesday and has to stand in the yard during the early part of the week, when there is not so much demand for fish, my information is, the fish deteriorates and becomes unfit for sale, often resulting in a total loss. If there was a place in the cold storage building into which a car could be run and kept until its contents were disposed of, the shippers would feel secure against waste, and it would be a great encouragement to them. If this can be brought about, and the plans are not too far advanced, I would certainly suggest that limited accommodation, at all events, of this character should be supplied in any cold storage warehouse that is to be erected.

Mr. CRERAR: The cold storage warehouse to be erected in Montreal will be under the control of the harbour commissioners. I know that they had competent engineers making inquiries, and the Dairy and Cold Storage Commissioner, Mr. Ruddick, accompanied one of the engineers to several cities in the United States to look over the most up-to-date cold storage plants to be found in them. I have no doubt that as a result of their inquiries the most modern and up-to-date plant will be built in Montreal. I do not think the proposal advanced by the leader of the Opposition that a car should be run into the building, and the whole stored as a carload, is a practicable one. In fact, I think it would be very difficult, probably impossible, to carry out his suggestion. The most up-to-date facilities, however, will be provided for taking care of fish, fruit and any other perishable commodities that are shipped.

Now a word as to why Montreal was selected. Montreal, of course, is a summer port, and it is during the summer months when temperatures are high that the need for cold storage is greatest. For that reason Montreal was selected as the initial point. There is already a cold storage plant in St. John, under the control of the Canadian Pacific Railway. Halifax is not as yet supplied with such a plant. I quite sympathize with the view expressed by the leader of the Opposition as to the necessity of proper abattoir and cold storage facilities in the province of Nova Scotia, or at any rate in one of the Maritime Provinces, and I presume Nova Scotia would be the most suitable, in order to encourage the development of the live stock industry in that part of Canada. It is quite true, as he has stated, that Nova Scotia cattle are at times shipped to Montreal for slaughter and the beef re-shipped for sale to the people of Nova Scotia. That on the face of it is an economic waste. At the request of the Provincial Department of Agriculture for Nova Scotia we have sent some of our officials to that province to make, in conjunction with the provincial officials, a survey of the whole situation with a view to ascertaining the best line of action to follow.

Mr. PEDLOW: I am sure that every hon. member of the House must have been deluged, as I was, during the early part of the session with petitions, signed by farmers throughout the province of Ontario in favour of a cold storage plant for the city of Toronto. It was requested that these petitions be presented to the Government, and I am surprised that no member for the city of Toronto has spoken tonight in favour of a cold storage plant for that city. Have those interested in the matter in the city of Toronto approached the minister, and if so, what decision has he arrived at?

Mr. CRERAR: Petitions are the easiest things in the world to secure.

Mr. PEDLOW: I did not ask for them; they were sent to me.

Mr. CRERAR: As far as I recall we have had no requests from the city of Toronto for assistance in this respect, probably due to the fact that there is already a municipal cold storage in that town, in addition to several private plants.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think the minister should withdraw that statement. Toronto would be very much offended at being spoken of as a "town."

Health of Animals, $465,000.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: I would draw the minister's attention to a very serious state of affairs which was mentioned in the Committee on Agriculture. The statement was made there that during last year tuberculosis among beef cattle had increased, I think, from three to over four per cent, and in hogs from nine to nineteen per cent. That is a most alarming state of affairs, and I would ask what steps the department is taking to check this disease.

Mr. CRERAR: Tuberculosis amongst cattle has received the consideration of the qualified officials of the department, and the whole question has been closely and attentively studied. It is my intention to submit Supplementary Estimates for $50,000 for the purpose of inaugurating a system of accredited herds for pure-bred cattle. The tuberculosis trouble exists I believe in every country in the world. The United States authorities have recently undertaken a method of handling it and last year appropriated $500,000 for the purpose. I have been informed this year according to their Estimates it was intended to increase the appropriation to $1,000,000. I do not need to deal with the technical aspect of the plan they had in view. If the Committee desires further information in regard to that matter I am quite sure the hon. member for Victoria City (Mr. Tolmie) who has made a close study of the matter will be pleased to give it. The matter is receiving the attention of qualified officials of the department. The problem is a somewhat difficult one to deal with.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: What is the cause of this rapid increase in the disease? There must be something unusual about it. Have the officials of the department endeavoured to ascertain the cause?

Mr. CRERAR: I do not know that there has been any rapid increase in the spread of the disease, and I am unable to give specific causes for any increase?

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: I would call the minister's attention to the statistics. I think there was an increase of 9 per cent in hogs.

Mr. CRERAR: What statistics?

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: They were given in the Agricultural Committee, and it is a most alarming state of affairs if there is going to be an increase in that ratio or anything like it.

Mr. CRERAR: I have no information as to that.

Mr. TOLMIE: That increase was over a period of six years. I am not sure of the exact figures given at that time, but I think that is it. I certainly would like to compliment the department on the distinct advance they are making in appropriating $50,000 for the purpose of introducing the accredited herd system. If we can hope to export cattle to the United States and hold that market, and if the embargo is removed from cattle going to Great Britain and we desire to ship cattle there, we must be sure that we send only healthy animals to those two markets; otherwise we cannot expect to retain them. The accredited herd system will give the advantage to the herd that is kept clean, and I sincerely hope that the breeders of the country will avail themselves of this opportunity to the fullest extent. I desire to congratulate the Health of animals Branch of the department on the work they have accomplished during the past few years. On several occasions we have had very serious outbreaks of infectious and contagious diseases immediately along the boundary line, and in nearly all cases none of the diseases have entered Canada. By preventing disease in that way through a close system of inspection we have been saved the loss of millions of dollars, and when we consider the small appropriation—I see there is an increase to a certain extent this year—and compare that appropriation with the enormous value of the live stock in Canada, something between one and one and a half billions of dollars, it will be recognized that a very valuable work is being accomplished by this branch of the Department of Agriculture at a nominal cost.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is there any simple process by which an ordinary farmer can detect tuberculosis in herds or in the individual cow?

Mr. CRERAR: Ouly by the tuberculin test which has proved successful.

Mr. MOLLOY: Is this grant for salaries or for compensation for animals destroyed, or for both? The amount is $465,000.

Mr. CRERAR: It includes both; $70,000 is for compensation.

For the administration and enforcement of the Meat and Canned Foods Act, $442,000.

Mr. CRERAR: The increase here is due to the general increase in wages and to enlargement of the work. Under the Act qualified veterinary inspectors along with lay inspectors are kept in every abattoir and meat packing plant and canning establishment in Canada in order to insure the purety of the foods produced therein.

Mr. CAHILL: Has it not been customary for some years to keep inspectors in packing plants?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes. I am accounting for the increase in the vote which hon. members will see amounts to $63,000. It is due to the necessity of paying higher wages and salaries and also to an extension of the work. More inspectors are required every year.

Mr. MOLLOY: What salaries are paid the inspectors?

Mr. CRERAR: The salaries, I am informed, are from $1,400 to $1,800 for veterinarians.

Mr. MOLLOY: It commences at $1,400?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. CAHILL: I suppose this vote includes the inspection of twelve-ounce pounds of lobster cans under the law which my hon. friend's colleague is passing to make twelve ounces of lobster a pound. Does it include all canned goods?

Mr. CRERAR: It does not include canned fish, which comes under the Marine and Fisheries Department. It includes all other canned goods.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does the minister know of any other class of producers who claim that twelve ounces of food make a pound avoirdupois?

Mr. CRERAR: I do not know. I might be inclined to agree with the hon. member off hand, but the matter is not in this department and I must refer him to the Department of Marine and Fisheries.

Mr. McKENZIE: There must be some canned commodities that it is intended to inspect or this amount would not be asked for. Do those who come within the jurisdiction of this department, and who engage in the canning of food other than lobster, say that twelve ounces make a pound avoirdupois?

Mr. CRERAR: I can assure the hon. gentleman that the Department of Agriculture insists on sixteen ounces to the pound.

Mr. PEDLOW: There is another industry that puts up its product in twelve ounces, and sometimes ten-ounce pounds. I refer to the manufacture of wool, which is put up in twelve-ounce and ten-ounce pounds, and even in eight-ounce pounds, according to the demands of the retail merchant.

Mr. CRERAR: It is not canned.

Publications Branch, $36,300.

Mr. McKENZIE: In this branch I think there is scope for improvement. I have been attempting to circulate the literature of the department for a great many years, and formerly I used to get a fair supply of material for distribution. The last time I applied, about two years ago, I was informed that I could get only a very limited supply, and that I would have to submit the names of my addressees to the department. Dealing with the large number of farmers to whom I would have to give literature I realized that a limited quantity would be only a source of embarrassment to me. I might select a few names and address material to them while the others would receive nothing, and from a political standpoint it would be better for me to send none at all. So that I did not send any. I do not think that members should be called upon to attend to a matter of this kind. Once the information is put into shape by the officers of the department who go to the pains of collecting their material the hardest part of the work is over, particularly when the literature is printed; and the department should see to it that this literature finds its way to the agriculturists of the country. It is a pity that tons of this material should be wasted from year to year, and I strongly urge upon the minister that the officers who have charge of this branch should acquaint themselves with the names and addresses of the farmers from coast to coast. It is a large undertaking, but they can very readily get this information by applying to the agricultural societies in the several provinces. In this way they would get at least 75 or 80 per cent of the names of the farmers and as they have no postage to pay it would be a comparatively simple matter to send literature to the farmers. I wish to impress upon the minister the desirability of seeing that this information reaches those whom it will benefit. Undoubtedly it would be useful and might stimulate the farmer to greater efforts in the way of increased production, besides giving him new ideas. At all events it would impress him with the idea that the department is taking an interest in him and has his prosperity at heart. I know that only very few farmers of Canada receive any literature from the department. I would like to see literature relating to the farm finding its way into more houses and into the hands of more farmers than at present, for it would certainly have beneficial results.

Mr. CRERAR: There are probably between 650,000 and 700,000 farmers in Canada, and the publications branch have on their files the names of 240,000 farmers who are supplied with the class of bulletin they desire. I have found in my experience of several years that the best results are always obtained when the person who desires literature makes application for it in some form or other. Very often you get names from such a source as the voters' lists, and send circulars or pamphlets to the addresses there given, with the result that a large percentage of the literature thus sent finds its way into the waste basket. The evidence of interest on the part of the person applying for literature and the best guarantee that he will make proper use of it when he gets it, is the fact that he goes to the trouble of applying for it. However, I entirely agree with the leader of the Opposition as to the importance of the matter.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not quite agree with the minister as to the way in which this matter should be attended to. Possibly his view is one way of looking at it, but it seems to suggest the argument that we should not send missionaries to the distant islands and remote parts of the earth until they have made application for some one to go and preach to them the gospel of the Nazarene. That is not the way in which the gospel is propagated. We send missionaries to the heathen and wake him up to the necessity of looking to the salvation of his soul, and in like manner we should send to the farmers, who need the information that we can give them, such literature as will be of benefit to them. If we did this we would create a desire on their part for more and more information, and applications would then be made in abundance. In many departments of life we are content to keep in the old rut, and if we do not assimilate new ideas we are apt to rest content with what was done by our grandfathers and fathers. The aim of the department should be to create a new interest in farming and they should not spare a few more dollars in putting necessary pamphlets and other useful records within the reach of the farmers if by so doing they can encourage them and stimulate an interest in rural life in Canada.

Mr. CRERAR: The missionary does not always act on his own initiative. I believe that Holy Writ records that the great St. Paul heard a call from Macedonia and proceeded thither, and I believe also that when we send missionaries to foreign lands we usually have repeated and earnest calls from those places for additional missionaries. The same applies in this matter. That is precisely the same method as we are following in the distribution of this literature. We aim to get it into the hands of the community, a desire for literature is produced and it is sent out.

Mr. McKENZIE: I must correct my hon. friend on the Pauline doctrine. The gospel was preached at Macedonia but some of the preachers went away and those of the Christian religion felt that somebody must come to them and help them along. Hence the Macedonian cry.

Mr. CRERAR: My hon. friend has raised the Macedonian cry to-night.

Mr. J. E. SINCLAIR: Is the same policy of distribution followed in regard to the Agricultural Gazette as is followed in reference to the bulletins published by the department?

Mr. CRERAR: The Agricultural Gazette has only a limited circulation. It is distributed to teachers and colleges, agricultural institutes and district representatives in the various provinces. There are also a number of subscribers who pay a small annual subscription. I am unable to state what the total circulation is.

Mr. J. E. SINCLAIR: What is the fee?

Mr. CRERAR: One dollar a year.

Mr. J. E. SINCLAIR: What does it cost the department to publish the Gazette?

Mr. CRERAR: There is an appropriation of $20,000. That covers printing, editorial work and generally the carrying on of the paper.

Mr. J. E. SINCLAIR: I understood you to say that was the appropriation. Is it all expended?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. J. E. SINCLAIR: Does that include the expenditure over and above the amount received from subscriptions?

Mr. CRERAR: The return from the subscription fees is very small indeed. Practically the whole circulation is a free circulation amongst agricultural institutes, agricultural representatives, etc.

Mr. J. E. SINCLAIR: It seems to me that the policy of keeping a paper like that going is of somewhat doubtful soundness. The spending of $20,000 a year for a publication that is simply put on the shelves of libraries and places of that kind, and which really is of no benefit to the rank and file of the agricultural community, seems scarcely to be justified. It would appear to me that the policy of keeping up a publication of that kind for the purposes outlined is hardly consistent with the objects that we should have before us in voting these expenditures.

Mr. CRERAR: I think, perhaps, the criticism of the hon. gentleman has some weight. I am not altogether convinced of the present practical value of the Gazette. There is, however, this to say, that many special articles appear in this journal. For instance, the results of some experimental work that may have been carried on by the entomological department, as an illustration, or in any particular branch, or in some other field of activity in connection with agriculture, are often recorded in articles published in the Gazette. These articles go out to the agricultural district representatives. I believe that in practically all cases they keep their files complete and the Gazette really becomes a sort of reference library to these workers. This undoubtedly has value. I am not certain that the same results, or practically as good results could not be obtained if the Gazette were published quarterly instead of monthly, and that is under consideration now.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is not this journal of recent introduction? How many years ago was it commenced?

Mr. CRERAR: About six years ago it was brought into being.

Mr. PEDLOW: I think the department would be well advised to see that their publications do get into the hands of those for whom they are intended. It is foolishness to spend money for issuing pamphlets and publications of one kind and another and allow them to lie on the shelves of the department. You have been using Scriptural authority against any extensive work of that kind. I may be permitted to quote other Scriptural authority for the benefit of my hon. friend. The sower went out to sow his seed; some fell on stony ground and did not grow; some fell among thorns and the thorns grew up and choked the seed; some seed fell in good ground and produced an abundant harvest. You cannot expect to get results from a too limited distribution of literature. You should send out these pamphlets indiscriminately if you are to get good returns, because by that process you will develop a good mailing list. I would suggest that copies of the publications that the department has for distribution be sent out and distributed freely. That is the way storekeepers do. They do not expect to get results from every person to whom they send a publication. They send them out indiscriminately. Some of them are not even taken out of the mail box. There should be a wide distribution of these pamphlets, and if they are of value the farmers will want more and will write in for them.

Mr. CRERAR: That is precisely what we are finding out. We have over 240,000 names on our mailing list, and the total number of bulletins of all kinds distributed by the Publications Branch was very close to 3,000,000 last year. They were distributed at the request of 119,000 people.

Mr. LEGER: These pamphlets should be sent out in quantity to the provincial governments. The provincial governments are in touch with agricultural societies and they know where to direct the pamphlets to produce the best results. If the provincial government shipped them direct to the agricultural societies the farmers would have the benefit of them. Otherwise the Government does not know the names of the farmers throughout the country and they cannot be reached.

Mr. FAFARD: I would ask the hon. minister if there is a French publication for the French population.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, we issue the publications in French.

International Institute of Agriculture—to assist in maintenance thereof and to provide representation thereat—$10,000.

Mr. CRERAR: This vote, I would like to explain, is to provide for our membership in the International Institute of Agriculture at Rome, with which practically all the countries of the world that are engaged to any extent in agriculture are identified. This vote is simply to cover our contributions thereto and to meet our expenses in connection therewith. The institute gathers agricultural statistics from all countries, and compiles and publishes them, and in that way seeks to disseminate accurate and complete information as to what is going on in these countries.

M. J. E. SINCLAIR: Does the vote include the expenses of sending a delegate to the meetings?

Mr. CRERAR: Yes.

Mr. J. E. SINCLAIR: How long is it since Canada sent a delegate to the meetings of the Institute?

Mr. CRERAR: I am advised that no delegate has been sent since the war broke out, but the sending of the delegate will now in all likelihood be resumed.

For the development of the live stock industry—$800,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: In connection with this vote, could the minister suggest any way by which the farmers throughout the country could obtain pure bred stock more cheaply than it is possible for them to do at present? I do not know very much about the subject, but I am told that the prices charged for pure bred animals are very high, and practically it is beyond the reach of the ordinary farmer to obtain them. I would like to know from the minister if there is any combine or corner in connection with pure bred stock? There are, of course, large farmers and wealthy people who "play the market" to some extent in connection with stock at this time. Perhaps I should not use the expression "play the market", but many such persons make a hobby of raising fine cattle and horses and selling them at fancy prices. That is very good and we ought to be thankful, doubtless, to the people whose predilections lead them in that direction; but what I would like to know is, how can pure bred stock be placed within reach of the ordinary farmers of the country without their paying such high prices as are charged? The Government may perhaps be taking some action along this line at present. I am satisfied, however, that there is not enough of it done, at all events in Nova Scotia, especially in the eastern part. There is need of further steps in this direction because I know that our cattle in many agricultural sections of the island of Cape Breton are not as good as they were twenty-five or thirty years ago. There is growing need of a revival in the matter of improved live stock, need of a better class of cattle and a better appreciation by the farmers of the advantage of having good stock rather than poor stock.

Mr. CRERAR: The point which the hon. gentleman has brought up is an important one. The federal Department of Agriculture does give specific assistance towards the promotion of the better breeding of live stock of all kinds. As far as cattle, sheep, and swine are concerned, it is given in this way: Provision is made for the supplying of pure-bred sires in each of these classes to associations of farmers that organize themselves and conform to certain regulations with which compliance is easy. The total number of sires that have been distributed in Canada is over two thousand. In other words, there were about two thousand of these associations in existence last year. Of that number, I am sorry to say, there were only twenty-nine in the province of Nova Scotia. The Department of Agriculture in that province carries on a somewhat similar work, but I am not at the moment able to give information as to the extent to which it does so, or as to the degree of success it has encountered. A very considerable portion of the expenditure contemplated by this vote is for this purpose. In the case of horses a percentage of the service fee is paid by the department, where the association is regularly formed, and its application has been regularly placed with the department. In all these cases as careful attention as possible is given to the securing of sound sires of the best quality available. There is no disguising the fact, however, that the general standard of our live stock, in cattle particularly,—in the beef types at any rate, —in Canada, is not as high as it might be. However, I believe that with the general spread of knowledge and the insistence on the need of improvement, we will make greater progress in the future than we have made in the past. We very frequently find, as every hon. member knows, farmers who are very largely indifferent to the type of animals that they have. They do not seem to realize as clearly as they should that it costs as much and even more to raise a scrub animal than it does to produce stock of a good type.

Mr. MYERS: I notice an increase in this vote of $200,000. Is the increase due to a greater number of applications for pure-bred sires?

Mr. CRERAR: Not altogether. Some of the increases are due to advances in salaries and wages that have taken place in every branch of the department's work. I may say, however, for the information of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Myers) that we reduced the Estimate last year for this purpose by $200,000 or more. The present increase is to bring the appropriation back to what the amount was previous to that time. We restricted the work as much as possible last year in order to economize, but owing to the importance of the work, the vote has been restored to the old figure.

Mr. MYERS: A number of applications from the constituency which I represent were delayed in reaching the department. I believe the money asked for here will be well spent in improving the live stock of our country, but I think a little leniency or consideration should have been given to the associations referred to. I have had my attention drawn particularly to the case of one association where the secretary was ill at the time the application should have been forwarded. I brought this fact before the department, but no consideration was given to the case. I think that was very unfair indeed. These men had formed an association at considerable cost to themselves, but owing to the fact that the secretary was ill at the time the application should have gone in, it was somewhat late in reaching the department, and it was declined. Now the intention of this vote being to help the farmers, there should have been a certain amount of leniency displayed in that particular case—in fact two instances of the kind were brought to my notice. Of course, if there are regulations governing this matter, they should be observed, but in such cases as I am referring to, the fact that delay in making the application was caused by illness should have been taken into consideration.

Mr. CRERAR: I cannot agree with the conclusion of the hon. gentleman. The reason for the delay, if I remember rightly, was the prevalence of influenza in the district concerned. But it is important that regulations, particularly in governmental administration, should be lived up to. When a department establishes a definite regulation for the governance of its work and that regulation is not adhered to, that moment the department is in difficulty. The regulation which the hon. gentleman criticises provides that these applications must be lodged with the department prior to April 1; in the case to which he refers the application came in ten days or two weeks late. Fully fifty similar applications came in after the first of April, running all the way from one to three days late up to five weeks late. If you admit one and refuse another, where are you going to draw the line? If you admit them all, what is the use of the regulation? If we violate the regulation for one, we must violate it for all, or we shall be charged with discrimination, favoritism, political pull and all the other things of a like nature. While I regret to disappoint my hon. friend, nevertheless I am sure that on reflection he will see the reasonableness of the position taken by the department in the matter.

Mr. MYERS: It would be a different matter if we had had an ordinary year, but in view of the scourge of the epidemic I still believe that some discretion would have been exercised by the department.

Mr. CRERAR: Of course, the reasons given for delay would be as numerous as the delayed applications. If the secretary of the association, as the hon. member says, was ill, the president or some other member could have written the department, and that is all that would have been necessary.

Mr. DAVIS: I happen to be interested in a similar case. I quite understand that when an inspector goes into a district it would disorganize his work if he had to go back after a fixed date. In the case to which I refer the animal was inspected last year, and it was simply a matter of the application being delayed because of the influenza epidemic. Why could there not be some relaxation of the regulation in that case so that the application might be accepted later?

Mr. CRERAR: If you violate the regulation in one case, how are you going to avoid violating it in other cases?

Mr. DAVIS: Could you not make a special exception of a case like this?

Mr. CRERAR: I have found in my brief experience that special exceptions in Governmental administration are always exceedingly dangerous. I appreciate the position of this association, but each of the fifty applicants who were late could put up just as good an argument why his case should have special consideration.

Mr. MYERS: Possibly the minister does not take into consideration the loss occasioned by not having the privilege of using a sire in a particular year.

Mr. MOLLOY: The sheep industry has taken quite a bound in Manitoba during the last year or two. What is the procedure with regard to getting pure-bred sires for the purpose of breeding sheep?

Mr. CRERAR: Provision is made for assistance in breeding in the case of sheep as well as of swine. The provision for sheep is $17,000.

Mr. MOLLOY: Are the sires sold to the breeder?

Mr. CRERAR: No, they are placed at the disposal of the association after it is regularly formed and complies with the regulations. The basis of distribution is the same as in the case of cattle.

Mr. MOLLOY: I do not understand how an association could handle the rams. One man may have twenty sheep, and another five hundred. How many sires do you send out? You cannot travel a ram around the country as you would a stallion?

Mr. JOHNSTON: Is it not the opinion of the minister that some amendment to the regulation would be in order? I have a case similar to that mentioned by the member for Neepawa (Mr. Davis) where a club that had been organized in 1918, wished to organize for 1919, using the same horse that they had used the previous year. This, Mr. Chairman, is a case where the same men wishing to use the same horse this year were refused permission by the department because they were some days late in getting their application in. I do not see why they should not have been granted the right to go ahead.

Mr. CRERAR: Why did they not get their application in on time?

Mr. JOHNSTON: They had some excuse; I do not know what it was. But it seems to me that where there is no change from the previous year, a delay of a day or two ought not to affect the case.

[Mr. Davis.]

Mr. CRERAR: I hope that the committee will not think I am taking too strong a position in this matter. The member for Last Mountain (Mr. Johnston) has brought up a case, which in his judgment deserves as much consideration as the case of my hon. friend from Kindersley (Mr. Myers). But as I have said, each of the fifty applicants would consider that they had equally good arguments to advance in favour of the acceptance of their application. I venture to say that in all fifty cases the application could have been sent in on time if more careful attention had been given to the matter by the officers or by some member of the association. I have no doubt that the difficulties of getting the applications in were not such that they could not easily have been overcome. If there is any virtue in a regulation, it ought to be lived up to; if not, we might as well throw it away.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: What particular virtue is there in the regulation?

Mr. CRERAR: The work has to be planned out; and we must set a specified date in order that we may arrange to have the inspections completed. We may have applications coming in the last week in March from a hundred associations; we have to arrange our distributions and inspections accordingly.

Mr. MOLLOY: Does the Government sell pure bred sires to the breeders or how are they handled in the community? How many would be lent to a district in which there were say 500 or 1,000 sheep? There must be some basis. How are the sheep and hogs handled? Supposing I want a pure-bred ram of a certain breed, can I get it? Do I have to pay for it or is it loaned to me, and do other people have the use of it?

Mr. CRERAR: A club must have at least ten members before a sire is alloted to it, providing they conform to the regulations which are simple. I presume if one of the members had a flock of 100 sheep, he would probably have several sires with his flock The whole purpose of this assistance is to encourage the small breeder, the farmer who has two or three or six or a dozen sheep on his farm. Those are the farmers that are in the main taking advantage of this scheme.

Mr. SHAW: Is there a limit to the price paid by the department for sires purchased and if so, what is the usual price paid?

Mr. CRERAR: We endeavour to get as good a type of animal as can be purchased, and I could not say what the average price would be. In stallions prices would run all the way from $500 to $1,000.

Mr. TOLMIE: I am very much interested in what the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) had to say about the cost of pure-bred sires. Under present conditions my experience has been, not working in this line of work as a hobby but rather as a business, that it costs at least from $150 to $200 to produce a yearling bull. If that price or even a bare advance on that may seem rather high to the purchaser of the animal, still when that animal is taken into a herd of twenty or thirty cows, the improvement in the first year, or at least by the second year, will easily pay for the initial outlay. For the man who is unable to pay out that much money for a sire, the Government has made it easy to get one through the plan which has been described to-night. Ten men can get together and secure the services of a sire. In British Columbia this has worked with great advantage, particularly in districts along the line of the Grand Trunk Pacific and other isolated places where settlers have just gone in, where they have not got their farms cleaned up and where they are too poor to pay for a sire. Under ordinary circumstances in ten years from now these men would still be breeding scrub cattle; but by being afforded an opportunity of securing the services of a pure-bred sire under this plan, in five or ten years they have a fine lot of high-grade cattle worth far more money than the scrub cattle would be, and in addition to that ten men have been educated to the value of using pure-bred sires. When they are able to buy sires in future they will prefer to buy pure-breds instead of grades. While our live stock in Canada is worth a great deal of money and while we have made certain advances, we are still in our swaddling clothes as regards possible developments. It will be generally admitted that the quality of beef in this country is inferior when compared with that of Australia or of the Argentine Republic. It has, however, been proved on one or two occasions that we are quite capable of producing beef of first-class quality. I might cite the case of one or two Ontario breeders who have been able to take steers down to the great International show in Chicago and win the sweepstakes there in competition with the whole continent. On another occasion, Mr. James D. McGregor, of Brandon, Manitoba, took down a steer one year and won the sweepstakes, and the next year he took down a full brother of the first one and won the sweepstakes again, the only occasion when that was done by a single feeder or breeder. I am credibly informed that our beef, as we produce it, is very much inferior to that of the Argentine, as I have described, and that their average run of chilled beef placed on the market in the old country is equal to the average run of our Christmas beef to be found on the markets of this country. I am also informed that in the inspected abattoirs of Canada not more than 10 per cent of beef that is passed through is fit to export to the old country in competition with beef from the other countries I have mentioned. This shows that we have a vast field for improvement which can only be made by the use of pure-bred sires, and then by proper feeding and finishing before our animals are sent to the market. The Argentine stock raisers have never hesitated to pay high prices for bulls, in fact they go into the markets of Great Britain and pay more than the stock raisers of any other country, and they have recently paid as high as $30,000 for a single animal. In that country you will fine herds of from 1,000 to 3,000 head very uniform throughout, whereas in this country you would find a few hundred really good animals and the rest would be very ordinary, showing that there is a great deal to be done in the improvement of beef cattle in Canada. How this should be done is a matter for deep consideration by the officials of our Department of Agriculture. One way to do it would be to begin at the bottom by inducing stock raisers to breed better animals and put them on the market in better condition. To do this there is no better plan that I know of than to offer liberal prizes at our fat stock shows and live stock exhibitions. This plan has been carried out for many years at Chicago, and the quality of the beef has steadily improved. In addition to this the man who has a carload of beef in better finished condition to offer for sale will receive two or three cents a pound more than the man who has his beef in an unfinished state.

Coming to dairy cattle, I cannot pass without drawing the attention of the committee to the fact that one of our Canadian breeders, Mr. I. B. Hanmer, of Norwich, Ontario, has recently bred a cow which has broken the world's record, having produced just under 52 pounds of butter in seven days. Hon. members will realize what achievement this cow has made when they take into consideration the fact that the average dairy cow of Canada would not produce more than about one pound per day, while this cow averaged between seven and eight pounds per day. We have in this country cattle that have produced over 30,000 pounds of milk in one year. The average dairy cow of Canada produces less than 4,000 pounds, showing what a splendid field for improvement there is, and this can be accomplished only by the use of pure-bred sires and also by feeding in a way such as I have described and by the dissemination of agricultural education.

Coming to sheep, I think this country is in a most disgraceful condition. We have less than 3,000,000 sheep in the whole of the Dominion as compared with 90,000,000 to 100,000,000 in Australia and about 40,000,000 in Great Britain. Here is an excellent opportunity to develop a valuable industry, an industry that will be valuable not only to the straight stock farmer but to the grain farmer of the West in keeping down weeds. Sheep are a class of live stock that can be produced very largely on the waste material that is to be found on the farm.

The condition of our pork products is very satisfactory. A report was brought back by Mr. Arkell to the effect that Canadian bacon now stands very high on the British market. The Britishers apparently did not begin to realize how good our Canadian bacon was until they had been forced to eat the fat bacon that is produced in the United States, and it behooves the Department of Agriculture to use the utmost care to see that this market is developed in every possible way and also that we send over only first-class material so that we can retain the market and build up a splendid outlet for Canadian live stock products in the future.

I think that the stimulation of the use of pure bred sires all over the country is most important. Just as long as we use scrub sires and do not care whether we improve our cattle or not, we shall be moving around in a circle and shall not get anywhere; but if an intelligent system is followed, and pushed to the fullest extent, I am sure we shall get excellent results. I commend the department for the action they are taking. I know they have a number of live officials who are working along these lines and I am sure a great deal can be accomplished by following the course I have outlined.

Mr. ARGUE: I was pleased to hear the minister a few moments ago emphatically lay down the rule that he was not going to make any exceptions. I wish to say a word about agricultural societies. We have two classes of fairs in the West, the A and the B class. Regina, Saskatoon and cities of that size are in the A class, and have been getting $5,000 a year assistance. The Regina fair last year had a surplus of about $22,000 to hand over to the city. In the B class there are some five or six different fairs, and a limit is laid down as to the amount of prize money they must pay out to participate in this grant. If no exceptions are to be made, that is all right; but once you begin to make exceptions the trouble starts. Exceptions have been made in the case of some of the fairs. Some fairs which did not comply with the regulations have been granted assistance, and others that did not comply but applied for the grant were refused assistance, or at all events, we have not been able to get any definite answer yet. I should like the minister to lay down some definite rule as to what he is going to do about these fairs. If he is not going to follow any particular rule, but give the money out indiscriminately, I think Swift Current and one or two other places should participate with the others who have got the grant.

Mr. CRERAR: Under the regulations for grants to fairs the provision was that where $4,000 of their own money was spent in utility prizes for livestock the department would assist to the extent of 75 per cent of $2,500. Prior to 1918 they secured the whole $2,500, but in order to economize and make our funds stretch as far as possible that grant was reduced last year by 25 per cent. There were, of course, a number of fairs that thought they were entitled to this grant and found difficulty in getting it. We appreciate the position the fairs are in at the present time. The hon. member for Swift Current and the hon. member for Battleford have both made strong representation upon the matter, and about a week or ten days ago I instructed the officials of the Branch to carefully survey the field again with a view to reducing the amount of expenditure that was necessary in order to participate in the grant. After careful consideration they have recommended for the present year a reduction of $400. Consequently, any fair that last year spent $3,600 or over in utility prizes will participate in the grant this year.

Mr. ROBB: Has the minister any information as to the increase or decrease in the number of cattle in Canada during the last three or four years?

Mr. CRERAR: The officials advise me there has been a considerable and steady increase in the total number of cattle. The total number of cattle in Canada now is estimated to be over 10,000,000, and the increase during the past four years has been between 2,000,000 and 3,000,000. In some of the western provinces the increase has been very noticeable.

Mr. MOLLOY: Are purebred sires ever sold outright by the Government?

Mr. CRERAR: When the department desires to get rid of a sire on account of age or some other reason he is sold outright, but not to clubs.

Mr. ARGUE: Referring again to fairs, as I stated a moment ago, the Regina fair last year had a surplus of $22,000 over and above their expenses. Now the B class fairs are doing just as much for the building up of the livestock industry as the A class fairs, and the larger cities like Regina do not need this grant of $5,000, but the smaller fairs do need assistance to carry on. I do not care whether the grant is $5 or $500, but I want all the B class fairs to be on the same footing. Yorktown and Prince Albert for instance, which did not comply with the regulations received the grant, while others did not. All I am asking for is a square deal.

Mr. CRERAR. If the fairs which the hon. member speaks for spent $3,600 last year in utility prizes they will participate in the grant this year. We have stretched the limit I think to the utmost. As to the relative merits of A and B class fairs, I dare say there are not a few hon. members in this House who would argue that the A class were more beneficial to the community than the B class. In the A class fairs the prize lists are larger, they have a bigger exhibition of livestock, and a great many more people patronize these fairs because they are held in the larger centres. The Toronto Fair, for instance, which runs for two weeks, undoubtedly attracts a great many more people than a fair in a little town of 2,000 people that runs for only three days. The policy of the Department may be open to criticism, but I am sure that the officials of the Department have studied the matter earnestly and honestly, with a view to getting the maximum of results for the money expended. I can assure the hon. member for Swift Current that it is not in the interest of any person in the department that B class fairs should be discriminated against in favour of A class.

Mr. ARGUE: As regards the reduction of $400, this was not made until after the question had been discussed several times with the minister and we pointed out to him that he had made this grant to other fairs which had not earned it, and that we thought we were entitled to the same privilege.

Mr. CRERAR: The cases to which the hon. member refers have already been alluded to. One was at Prince Albert, where they were $22 short of having spent $4,000. In considering the matter the officials of the department were of the view that this shortage of $22 was not due to their inability to get the money. The other case was Yorktown, where there was a shortage of $46 for the same reason. I have asked the hon. member for Swift Current what amount the Swift Current Board spent last year, but I have not been able to find out.

Mr. ROBB: I am not interested so much in what this contribution is given for fairs in Prince Albert and Yorktown, nor am I opposed to the grant to the Toronto Exhibition. But it is very questionable if the Toronto Exhibition would pay out in prizes to live stock in proportion to the grant received, and the Toronto Exhibition is a very profitable venture for the city of Toronto. I hold in my hand an item from a daily paper dated the 25th of December, which says:—

Toronto Fair Surplus $90,557.

Toronto, December 24.—Santa Claus, in the triple personality of T. A. Russell, president, Johnston G. Kent, manager, and Frank Brentnall, treasurer of the Canadian National Exhibition, slid down the chimney into the City Hall to-day and presented Toronto with a cheque for $90,557.74, the biggest surplus by a good margin that the exhibition has ever paid.

It is quite apparent that such an exhibition which is able to finance itself should be able to concede a little bit to the pioneer districts in Western Canada, and some of the money might profitably go there.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is being done by the department either alone or in conjunction with the Agricultural Departments in the different provinces in organizing these societies? I was very much impressed by the address to-night by the hon. member for Victoria (Mr. Tolmie), and I was thinking that if some hon. gentlemen like himself or some other person equally informed and gifted were travelling through the farming districts and telling the farmers the advantages of pure bred stock very satisfactory results would accrue. I am not aware that any organized or proper effort is being made in the part of the country from which I come either by the local Agricultural Department or by this department to bring this education home to the farmers and to invite them to organize and take advantage of the opportunities which the department offers to them.

I am sure that there are hundreds and thousands of people who are making their living as farmers to whose attention the advantage of having proper stock and the way in which they can get it has now been forcibly brought. If no effort has been made hitherto to have a proper organization along those lines and a campaign of education, I would suggest to the minister that he should have a proper arrangement with the agriculture departments of the different provinces so that this campaign of education may be carried on. There is such a thing, no doubt, as a duplicating and overlapping of effort. We have agricultural societies in Nova Scotia under the supervision and control of the local legislature which do fairly good work, but we must push this work if we are to produce the results necessary to reach the high-water mark in regard to it. I am particularly pleased with the information which the hon. member for Victoria city has given us and I trust the Department of Agriculture will be able to present this matter to the people in such a way as to reach parts of the country that have not so far taken advantage of their opportunities. I am not finding fault with the department, because they seem to be doing good work but I would like to go one step farther and press home upon the farmers the advisability of taking advantages of the opportunities which are made available to them through the department.

To enforce the Seed Act, to test seeds for farmers and seed merchants, to encourage the production and use of superior seeds, and to encourage the production of farm and garden crops, $200,000.

Mr. PEDLOW: I notice that this item is for the purpose of encouraging the production of farm and garden crops. There is another method of encouraging the production of farm and garden crops which is not indicated fully in the description as contained in this item, and that is to find a market for that which has been produced. About a month ago I took the opportunity of asking the then Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) for information regarding some correspondence I had from a citizen living in the constituency that I have the honour to represent. The Acting Prime Minister stated then that the Government had supplied altogether $80,000,000 to help in the marketing of Canadian wheat and that they were arranging, if my memory serves me aright, a credit of $90,000,000 additional for the same purpose. But he failed to explain why it was that any farmer found it difficult to find a market for his wheat and intimated that the wheat was not of proper grade. I have had since then considerable correspondence from a number of farmers in the same section, as well as a number of millers, and they all have the same story to tell, that there is a large quantity of 11 p.m. wheat, fully twenty per cent of last year's crop, still in the hands of farmers. They all say that they cannot find a market for it. It may be difficult for a man like the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) or the Minister of Agriculture to understand that, and yet that is the story that comes to me from the riding of South Renfrew. The hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) made an inquiry regarding the same subject a few days ago and the Minister of Finance informed him then that the Government were negotiating with the Greek Government for the disposal of 15,000,000 or 20,000,000 bushels of wheat. Notwithstanding this information, I am still confronted with the proposition that the farmers in South Renfrew have that quantity of wheat on their hands and are not able to dispose of it. Just a couple of days ago I received a letter from the proprietors of the Killaloe Roller Mills Company. This was sent in response to an inquiry made by me, and they informed me that there are at least ten or twelve cars of wheat within hauling distance of their mill but that owing to the fact that they are unable to find a market for their flour they cannot purchase this wheat. The consequence is that this wheat will remain on the farmers' hands. The farmers are anxious because, as I understand, the guaranteed price for wheat will be withdrawn and the farmers with 18,000 or 20,000 bushels of wheat in one little section of South Renfrew will be left with this wheat on their hands. There are other sections in the same position, and they naturally view the situation with considerable anxiety. I rise to discuss this issue on this item because it is my opinion that if the Government and department will find a market for that wheat they will certainly encourage production. These men were induced to increase their acreage during the past two years for war purposes. In the last two years they increased their production by fifty per cent. That is the opinion of the several milling concerns in the riding. A market was held out to them as an inducement and as a result of that inducement there was increased acreage and increased production. If you want farmers to increase production no better method can be adopted than to insure a market for what they produce. Here is the case as I find it not only in that one section of my constituency but in several other sections as well. They have the wheat on hand but no market. They want me to find out what the Government are going to do about this situation. I would like to know the exact attitude of the Government in regard to the disposition of wheat which is in the hands of farmers at the present time, particularly in South Renfrew, in which I am naturally most interested. Will the Government undertake to find a market for that wheat at the guaranteed price? Should not the farmers expect the Government to take action along definite lines? Will the Government undertake to purchase the wheat to fill the contracts referred to a couple of days ago by the Minister of Finance? Will the hon. gentleman say that this wheat will be purchased for that purpose?

Mr. CRERAR: How much wheat has the hon. gentleman's correspondent?

Mr. PEDLOW: One correspondent says there are twelve cars of wheat within hauling distance of his mill; another, two cars; another says that there is twenty-five per cent of the season's crop around his section, and still another tells the same story. I cannot tell what the quantity is, but there will be about 20,000 bushels in that one section of my constituency.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not wish to further interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I know that a ready market is being found for all the surplus wheat in Canada at the present time. If this wheat has not been marketed I fancy it must be due to other causes. The demand undoubtedly exists for it, and I am informed that it is being sold steadily and readily.

Mr. PEDLOW: I must say to the minister that if he entertains any doubt as to the quality of this wheat I can assure him on that score. The quality of the wheat raised in the Bonnechere Valley is equal to what is considered Manitoba No. 1 Hard. That is the reputation of the wheat raised generally in that section. And I am informed by one of the millers that the quality of the wheat sold there is first-class in every particular. I might further state that this miller wrote to the department, and I have the letter which he received in reply. It is certainly not very encouraging. With your permission, Mr. Chairman, I will read it. It is dated April the 24th, and is as follows:

> Dear Sirs,—I have your letter of April 18th, but regret to state that there is very little information I can give you, except that conditions have changed materially during the past year The great shortage of ocean steamships has led to congestion in many parts of the world. An arrangement was entered into some time ago with the British Government by which the Wheat Export Company were to take the exportable surplus of the 1918 crop on the basis of the fixed prices. The British Government, however, has been unable to purchase the quantity at first thought necessary in view of the congestion at British ports and the very large quantity of wheat in the United Kingdom, larger quantities in fact than at any time since the outbreak of war. The whole question of the marketing of the Canadian wheat and flour is now engaging the attention of the Government. It is a difficult problem, however, in view of the present world wide conditions. Apparently matters can only adjust themselves.

It will be seen that this letter suggests no way out of the difficulty, and I would like to know if it is not possible for the Governmen to assist the section of the country referred to in this respect.

Mr. CRERAR: I do not know just what form the assistance could take. I am not personally familiar with the circumstances of the case to which the hon. gentleman alludes, and I would suggest that he take it up with the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce, in whose department the transportation and marketing of grain lies. I can assure the hon. gentleman, however, that if the grain cannot be marketed, there must be some particular reason affecting it, because grain is being sold almost every day to the United Kingdom, to France, and to neutral countries in Europe just as rapidly as tonnage is available. It may be that there is no person in the district to buy the grain, or no cars available for its shipment, or something of that kind. If the ordinary machinery exists I cannot understand why it cannot find a market. I would suggest to the hon. member that he place all the facts before the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce and let him have inquiry made into the matter by the proper officials in his department.

Mr. PEDLOW: I might add for the information of the minister that the letter is signed by the Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce, and again call his attention to the concluding sentence:

Apparently matters can only adjust themselves.

It leaves the matter in a most dubious position—that is to say, the department can render these parties no assistance.

Mr. CRERAR: I would suggest that the hon. gentleman take the matter up with the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. PEDLOW: The letter came from that department.

Mr. CRERAR: Yes, but it is written by the deputy.

Item 53, a vote of $25,000 for the administration and carrying out of the provisions of the Agricultural Instruction Act, will stand with the permission of the Committee, and afford opportunity for discussion to other members of the House who are not able to be present this evening.

Pensions, European War and Active Militia—$28,000,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does the minister (Mr. Rowell) not think it is rather late to bring up such an important question, when the attendance is so slim as it is now, a question in which the whole country is interested? I certainly think it is, if the minister is to make a statement of the Government's policy in regard to pensions.

Hon. NEWTON W. ROWELL (President of the Council): If this were a statement of the Government's policy I would at once concur in my hon. friend's suggestion. But the policy of the Government with regard to pensions, as well as the policy of the Pensions Committee, will come up for consideration when the Pensions Committee's Report is presented, which report I think will be in shape for presentation next week. The Pensions Committee has practically completed its work, and its report will then come up together with a Bill which the committee is drafting for submission to the House. All questions of policy will come up for review when the Bill is being considered. This is simply a vote of the estimated amount required on the basis of the existing pension schedule. If the Pensions Committee recommends some increases, as will likely be the case, that will involve a supplementary estimate being brought down; the whole question will come up for very full consideration when we have the committee's report before us, and the Pensions Bill which will have to be considered section by section. I thought, therefore, I would make simply a very brief statement, giving an outline of the present position of affairs. This item might then be permitted to pass, and we could discuss the whole question of policy when we come to deal with the report of the Pensions Committee.

This is simply an estimate based on a certain number of estimated pensioners—taking the figures for last year, plus the estimated number of pensions for the coming year. The total casualties in the Canadian Expeditionary Force up to 8th of May of the present year, were 212,182. Of that number there were either killed or died of wounds or disease 63,347, and the total number of wounded was 148,835. That gives us the total possible pension claims up to date, and very few could subsequently arise; of course, some further claims may be presented before demobilization is completed. Taking first the killed, that is 63,347, it is estimated that no pension will be applied for in the case of approximately fifteen per cent of that number. That is there will be fifteen per cent with no dependents who would be entitled to claim any pension, and the Pension Board estimates that the total number of pensions which will probably be granted in respect of men killed in action or that have died of wounds will be 53,854—at least that is the total number in respect of which claim might be made to come within the provisions of the pension regulations. Now, so far 22,612 of these cases have come up for consideration by the Pensions Board, which is not quite one-half of the possible pension claimants in the case of those killed. Of the 22,612 claims which have come up for consideration and been dealt with, 16,959 have been allowed, and 5,653 have been refused on the ground that they did not come within the provisions of the pension regulations. That leaves 31,233 yet to be dealt with if claims are presented, and if they are disposed of on the same basis. In other words, if the percentage of claims that should be allowed is the same in the future as in the past, experience has shown it would come to 23,425 more pensions to be allowed in respect of those who have been killed in action or who have died of wounds. With that as a basis the Board of Pension Commissioners is able to estimate the total amount payable to dependents of those killed in action or who have died of wounds, and it is on that basis that that part of the present estimate is made up.

Then, take the case of disabilities. I gave the total number of wounded as 148,835. A number were wounded more than once and returned to the firing line. It is impossible, of course, until all claims are in, to ascertain accurately how many have been wounded more than once. But for the purpose of this estimate the Board of Pensions Commissioners have put down the number at five per cent of the total, or 7,441, leaving 141,394 as the number of cases or disabilities for which claims might possibly be made. Of these, 71,834, about fifty per cent, have already been dealt with, and of the 71,834, 53,876 have been allowed and 17,958 disallowed, as not coming within the provisions of the pension regulations. If the remaining applications or possible applications are disposed of on the same basis, we would have 52,170 additional pensioners on the ground of disability. This estimate is based on the assumption that we shall have that additional number and that the average amount payable in case of disability will be the same in the new cases as in the cases already allowed. On that basis, the total estimated Pension Bill of the Dominion when all cases are disposed of will be $32,814,391, assuming that no increase is made in our pension schedule and that no change is made in the regulations so as to bring in cases that are now excluded. Of that amount, it is estimated that we shall require this year the amount mentioned in the Estimate. As a number of men have not been discharged from the army and the right to pension has not yet arisen, the full amount will not be required this year; it is estimated that $28,000,000 will cover the pension bill for this year on the basis of the present schedule of disabilities. If the Pension Committee recommends and the House concurs in some increase in the pension schedules, a Supplementary Estimate will be brought down to cover that estimated increase. That, in brief, is the basis of the expenditure under this vote of $28,000,000. If any further information is desired I shall be glad to give it as we proceed.

Mr. BELAND: Are all men wounded in any way expected to make claims for disability?

Mr. ROWELL: Not unless the disability affects the earning capacity of the soldier in the general labour market.

Mr. BELAND: All the wounded are included in the 148,000?

Mr. ROWELL: All who have appeared in the casualty lists.

Mr. BELAND: But many of them may not be claims?

Mr. ROWELL: Many of them may not be claims. I may add that the Pension Committee has made a generous estimate of the number of pension claims. The actual number will certainly not exceed their estimated number of claimants. Probably it will be less, because there are many wounded whose wounds do not entail an impairment of their earning power.

Mr. MANION: I should like to put on record the case of a man who has not been given justice by the Board of Pension Commissioners and to get, if possible, the minister's assurance that he will take an interest in getting the Board to settle the case justly. I refer to the case of a private named John Taylor, whose regimental number was 439,640 and Pension Board Number 32,019. This man was wounded in France. He came home, and on the strength of having an injured arm—an arm that appeared to me to be paralyzed—he was given a pension of $5 a month. I met him quite by accident and I found that his right hand was absolutely paralyzed and his right arm out of use because of this paralysis—and he was receiving the magnificent sum of $5 a month. I took the matter up with the Board of Pensions Commissioners by wire on December 19th last, informing them that this man was getting $5 a month and that I considered it a disgrace to the country that he should be so treated. They wrote to me informing me that this man's hand was not paralyzed. They said:

> On discharge it is found that fingers could be moved passively through all the entire extent of normal movements and that the grasp was lessened. There is no sign of injury to the nerves, and it was the report of the medical examiner at Port Arthur which stated that most of the condition was due to psychic disturbance, and not to any organic injury to nerves or muscles.

Further on they said:

> The spasm of the muscles of the forearm and hand disappearing under an anaesthetic.

I communicated with them again in a letter dated December 27 objecting to their decision on the ground that even if this man's case was one of psychic paralysis, as they called it—that is, more or less imaginary—unless they cured that psychic paralysis the man had every right to a proper pension. I still adhere to that opinion. If a man loses the use of his arm through service at the front he deserves to be treated properly by his country—and this man has not been treated properly by the Board of Pensions Commissioners in receiving an allowance of $5 a month when his right arm has been put out of business. Whether the disability is psychic or organic is beside the question, to my mind; unless the paralysis is cured the man has a right to a pension. I also informed the Board that the fact that this man's fingers could be moved passively had nothing to do with the case, because to earn one's bread one had to move his fingers actively. I said further that the disappearance of the paralysis under an anaesthetic was also beside the question, as a man under an anaesthetic would find it difficult to earn a living.

I again wrote to the Board about this case and they claimed that Mr. Taylor was under treatment by the Invalided Soldiers' Commission. At the time they said he was being treated by that Commission he was working in Fort William—I admit that they were misinformed, through no fault of theirs. The most treatment the man had during the four months that he was supposed to be under the Invalided Soldiers' Commission was four days, but he received no pension during the (4) months that he was supposed to be under treatment. Later they paid him $20 for the four months. After working three months on this case. after many letters and other correspondence I succeeded in getting him re-boarded somewhere around March 5. He advised me to this effect, and he was then granted a 45 per cent pension, which would mean a pension of about $20 a month, which shows that a mistake was made in the first place when they gave him a pension of $5 a month. They were, however, not satisfied with that, and they sent him to Winnipeg to be boarded again, and the Winnipeg Board also recommended him for a 45 per cent pension, he tells me. He came back to Fort William about the middle of March, and he wrote me he was content to get this pension. But he waited another two months and after hearing no more about it he wrote to me again, and I once more drew their attention to this. They then advised him to go back to Winnipeg again for re-examination, and the man refused, and to my mind quite rightly. He had already been sent to Winnipeg twice and had been examined by neurologists in Winnipeg. Why, then, should it be necessary for this man to be put to the trouble of going to Winnipeg the third time with the possibility of losing his job? He was receiving a pension of only $5 a month and he was earning his living. Besides, this would mean putting the country to the expense of taking him all the way to Winnipeg a third time. It was some time about the middle of May that he advised me he was not going to go to Winnipeg any more, as he had to earn his living. I advised him I thought he was perfectly justified in not going, and I advised the Pension Board to that effect, because I do not think that man has received justice from the board. In reply to my letter, they advised me that they were giving the matter consideration. This is a case which has not yet been settled, although it is almost six months since I first drew the attention of the Pension Board to it, and it is high time that the board woke up to the fact that this man is being treated with absolute injustice. He was recommended for a higher pension, but they have not yet given it. I do not wish to take up any more of the time of the committee, but I wish to get an assurance from the minister that he will see that this man gets justice at the earliest possible moment.

Mr. ROWELL: I, of course, have no personal knowledge of this case. It is the Pensions Board that deals with all these matters, and the Board is the final authority in connection with them under regulations passed by this House. I understand, however, that the Pension Board states that the facts are somewhat as follows: That on 4th October the case came to the attention of the Board of Pension Commissioners and that on the fifth of October Mr. Taylor was examined and recommended for treatment, and he was granted treatment under the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment on the 7th October. For reasons which probably Mr. Taylor considered sufficient but which were not explained, he discontinued the treatment of his own volition within a few days after he was recommended for it. I should point out to the committee that those receiving treatment are on pay and allowance during the whole period of the treatment, and if a man is married his wife gets a sum similar to the separation allowance. It is quite true, as the hon. member has suggested, that there was some mistake in notifying the Pensions Board by the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, and his pension was not resumed as it should have been when he discontinued the treatment. According to the regulations while a man is receiving treatment, if he is a pensioner, he draws pay and allowance paid by the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment and his pension is discontinued. When he ceases treatment, his pension is resumed, and under the conditions there was a holding over of the pension and the man has in that sense a grievance and ground for complaint because of the mistake made in reference to notification to the Board of Pension Commissioners. I understand the situation is at present that he has been asked to go to Winnipeg for further examination, and if treatment is recommended, for treatment. Winnipeg is a neurological centre; they have there experts who can provide the treatment. The information which the Board of Pension Commissioners has is that this is a neurological case; and that treatment of that kind is necessary and that, if applied, will restore the man to health and should give him the use of his limbs, and, therefore, that man should, they think, go to Winnipeg to take the treatment. The expense to Winnipeg is paid, and if he takes the treatment he receives pay and allowance. That is the information I have received. I have, of course, no power to give the assurance for which the hon. member asks. The Government has no such power under the regulations adopted which were considered wise at the time in order to prevent any question of politics interfering. The rules adopted, recommended by the Pension Committee, expressly provide that the decision of the Board of Pension Commissioners is final. There is no appeal to the Government and the Government has no right to override their decision. I will, however, personally look into this matter to see if there appears to be a grievance or miscarriage of justice, with a view to urging the board to remedy any injury if one appears to have been inflicted. That is as far as I can go, because this is a case in which the decision of the board is final.

Mr. MANION: There are two or three points the minister makes that I wish to take up. With regard to the mistake made by the board regarding the man's being under treatment by the Invalided Soldiers' Commission I frankly admitted when I spoke that the Pensions Board were not to blame for the misunderstanding. The man says that he was not told to stay in Winnipeg and he left Winnipeg, but that was some misunderstanding. I ran across the man by accident, and it was because I found him a perfectly honest, decent chap who made no fuss, that I took up his case. I informed the Pensions Board that I was a returned medical man and knew something of this case; that I was not speaking as a layman. The minister has just told us that he has been informed that the Pensions Board advised this man to go to Winnipeg for treatment.

Mr. ROWELL: For examination and, if treatment is recommended, for treatment.

Mr. MANION: That is not what the man was informed because I happen to hold in my hand the letter written by the Pensions Board to the man, who sent it to me, and I will read it to the Committee. It is addressed to Mr. John Taylor, at his residence, and reads:

> Dear Sir:—
> Will you kindly make it convenient to call at this office as soon as possible with a view to sending you to Winnipeg for a neurological examination? Transportation and expenses will be supplied to you.

No mention is made of treatment, and as the man had already been sent to Winnipeg for examination on two occasions, I think he was perfectly right in refusing to go a third time after, for a year, getting a pension of $5 a month.

As regards the man's having a grievance, I can assure the minister that I know just as much about these cases as most of the medical boards of this country, and more than some of them, according to this case; and this man has a grievance, and I intend to see that it is rectified.

Mr. ROBB: The complaint made by the hon. member for Fort William and Rainy River (Mr. Manion), and the reply of the minister, is an indication that it is not fair to put these estimates through to-night, because there may be other complaints. It is now nearly twelve o'clock, and we might very well adjourn.

Mr. ROWELL: If my hon. friend wishes to have the item stand, I thought probably the item would go through and all these things be discussed when the report comes in; but I will not press it at this hour. This is a large sum, and an important matter. I do not know if my hon. friend was in when I stated that I expected that the report of the Pensions Committee of the House would be received next week, when all these matters would come up for review.

Mr. ROBB: Will hon. members have an opportunity of bringing in similar complaints to those presented by the hon. member (Mr. Manion) ?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes. It will be understood that we are passing a pension law which revives all questions of the law which is to govern. The action of the board in this case is taken on the basis of existing regulations which make provision for requiring treatment in neurological cases. I do not wish to press the matter, but if my hon.

friend has no objection, I should like the item to pass.

Mr. McKENZIE: If the minister says that any of these items on page 60 under the headings, "Pensions," on the report of the Committee, or on the Bill which he proposes to introduce, I have no objection to this passing.

Mr. ROWELL: I am willing to give my hon. friend that assurance.

Pension to the sisters of the late Col. Harry Baker, M.P., $700.

Mr. ROWELL: I beg to move to insert the word "unmarried" before the word "sisters."

Motion agreed to.

Progress reported.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Rowell the House adjourned at 11.42 p.m.

Monday, June 2, 1919.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Report on Export of Electricity from Canada, and Report of the Power Controller; Statistics of the Food and Drug Laboratories of the Department of Trade and Commerce for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1919; Final Report of the Fuel Controller, March 31, 1919.—Hon. A. K. Maclean.

Copy of Order in Council of 29th May, 1919, approving of the general scheme of housing of the province of Quebec.—Hon. Newton W. Rowell.

EFFICIENCY OF THE INSIDE CIVIL SERVICE.

On the motion of Mr. Michael Steele, the second report of the Special Committee appointed to consider the possibility of reducing or re-arranging the staffs of the Inside Civil Service with a view of securing greater efficiency with the minimum number of employees, was concurred in.

RED CROSS SOCIETY INCORPORATION ACT AMENDMENT.

Rt. Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 130, to amend the Act to incorporate the Canadian Red Cross Society. He said: The purpose of the Bill is merely to give the society the power in time of peace to carry on and assist in work for the improvement of health, the prevention of disease, and the mitigation of suffering, throughout the world. There was a convention of the various Red Cross societies in Geneva during the past winter, when this purpose was declared to be a desirable one, and also, as I recall, a clause has been introduced into the Peace Treaty which commends the purpose that is to be given effect to by this Bill.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SENATE BILLS.

FIRST READINGS.

Bill No. 127, respecting the Grand River Railway Company.—Mr. Euler.

Bill No. 128, respecting the Ottawa, Northern and Western Railway Company.—Mr. Devlin.

Bill No. 129, for the relief of Stanley Gordon Eversfield.—Mr. Douglas (Strathcona).

INDUSTRIAL UNREST IN CANADA.

STRIKES IN WINNIPEG AND OTHER CITIES DISCUSSED.

Mr. M. R. BLAKE (North Winnipeg) moved the adjournment of the House, under rule 39, for the purpose of discussing a matter of urgent public importance, viz.: the strikes in Winnipeg, and other Canadian cities, together with all the circumstances, conditions, and causes, near and remote, having any bearing or connection therewith.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. BLAKE: I have moved this motion, Mr. Speaker, because of the great industrial unrest which exists in this country to-day. I am somewhat surprised at the great anxiety of the Opposition to precipitate this debate to-day, instead of waiting until Wednesday, as I had planned. Of course, we must appreciate their kindly interest in the strikes in Winnipeg and elsewhere, but I wish to recall the fact that last year, when a much more serious condition, riot and bloodshed existed in Quebec City, not one of the members now so insistent, rose to support the motion of the hon. member from Simcoe to discuss those serious disturbances which existed at that time. I hope, Mr. Speaker, this discussion will be of a moderate nature and in character entirely constructive, which will have a tendency to allay the prevailing unrest and be of some assistance to the Government in its efforts to formulate a policy which will effectively deal with the situation. I hope the tariff is not unduly blamed for all the high cost of living and unrest, as I am informed that barring probably New Zealand, the cost of living is lower in Canada than it is in any other country in the world. Mackenzie King in his booklet "The Four Parties to Industry," starts out by saying the truth must be arrived at, and the truth shall set us free from fear of the future and shall aid in the enforcement of that social justice which the truth demands.

Canada stands to win more out of this war than any other nation of the world, provided we are fully united in taking the full measure of the opportunities afforded. The eyes of the world are upon Canada. Her sons have done as good fighting, and I think I might safely say the best fighting in this Great War, that has been done on any of the 37 different battle fronts. Industries must needs flock here to a country whose natural resources are so great and opportunities almost unlimited. Canada is confronted with the opportunity of developing more in the next ten years than probably she has in the last fifty years. But, that development cannot be expected to take place unless we have industrial peace.

When we see a patient we must first make a diagnosis and then proceed with the treatment. At the very bottom of this unrest lies misunderstanding and distrust and jealousy. If we define industry as King does in his little book—and I would commend its perusal to hon. members—we get this definition:

> Industry is the means by which the material resources of the world are transformed, through human intelligence and human energy, with the aid of natural powers, tools, and machines, into commodities and services available for human use. It is a vast process of transformation, itself a series of transforming processes so inter-related and numerous as to unite mankind, in this age of world-wide industrial expansion, in an enterprise that encompasses the globe.

The four parties to industry he defines as labour, capital, management and the community. We have heretofore been inclined to regard labour and capital as the two factors of industry, leaving out both management and the community. This is King's definition of the community:

> It is the community which provides the natural resources and powers that underlie all production. Individuals may acquire title by one means or another, but it is from the community, and with the consent of the community, that titles are held. It is the community, organized in various ways, which maintains government and foreign relations, secures law and order, fosters the arts and inventions, aids education, breeds opinion, and promotes, through concession or otherwise, the agencies of transportation, communication, credit, banking, and the like, without which any production, save the most primitive, would be impossible. It is the community which creates the demand for commodities and services, through which labour is provided with remunerative employment, and capital with a return upon its investment. Apart from the community, inventive genius, organizing capacity, managerial or other ability would be of little value. Turn where one may, it is the community that makes possible all the activities of industry, and helps to determine their value and scope.

Labour must fully appreciate its responsibility to capital and the State, and capital must as fully appreciate its responsibility to labour and the State. The tired feeling is abroad in this land. Nobody seems to want to work. In many industries, I am told, only 40 per cent to 60 per cent of efficiency is produced. This is not fully appreciating the responsibility to capital and the State.

The aim and object of many of the workingmen to-day seems to be to get the most possible money for the least possible expenditure of energy. The tramp says the world owes him a living, and he is going to get it. I hope we are not coming as a nation to the same status as the tramp.

One may well wonder that capital takes no more interest in labour than it is now doing. For nearly 100 years workmen and employers have been organizing, and as yet we do not find a full understanding between the four parties interested in industry. We seem to be much in need of reconstruction in our industrial life. Some people have defined reconstruction as restoration; others demolition and reconstruction from the ground up. Between these extremes stands a majority which interprets readjustment as restoration, with more or less modification, the degree of modification varying considerably, but the structure of pre-war days being in its essentials retained.

I have seen both capital and labour abuse their privileges. I had an opportunity of spending two winters in the lumber camps of Northern Ontario. During the first winter 1906-7—lumber was at a premium, prices were good, and labour was in great demand, but the labourers were not producing anything like their maximum. If the foreman said a single word to them of complaint or reprimand they would walk over to another camp of the same firm and get work. The next year there was not much demand for lumber, and one firm which had intended operating a large number of camps cut them down to three. That winter I saw them bring down labourers from Winnipeg and charge them 3 cents a mile for the trip, and also charge them high prices for their supplies, and when the company were about even with the boys they gave the latter their time and told them to hit the trail. Men who had walked twenty-five miles to lumber camps were told there was no employment for them and they might go. Both parties during those winters abused their privileges and did not show any friendly spirit towards one another.

One of the chief ways that a solution of this difficulty and ill feeling that exists between capital and labour, or rather, misunderstanding, can be blotted out, is by each appreciating more fully the interests of the other. Labour cannot go on without capital, nor capital without labour. A process of education must be entered into, and probably, as charity begins at home, we could well spend a few minutes criticising the Postal Department. As I said on the floor of this House there would have been no strike at Winnipeg had the protests of the men been paid more attention to last year by the Deputy Postmaster General. I am provided by some unknown person with a clipping from the Financial Post of Toronto. It starts off on the loose management of the post office and is a tirade--a great deal of which is justified—against the Deputy Postmaster General, who is probably doing better now, but last year he was not fully appreciating his responsibilities towards the employees. Both employers and employees must be educated as to their responsibilities to the State. Garretson, who is head of the railway conductors, says:

> An army of unemployed is being created that must in the last analysis be reckoned with and unless a remedy is found whereby incentive may be restored and recompense made apparent, society itself must pay the forfeit.

Lord Brassey in his book on Work and Wages refers to certain railway labourers whose wages were raised from 2 shillings to 2 shillings and 6 pence and then to 3 shillings a day, and he states that they produced work more cheaply at the higher wages than at the lower. The same thing occurred on the Metropolitan drainage system, London, while in India when the wages were increased, the employees lay down on the job and would only work enough to give them a living. Some courts must be established to deal with their difficulties.

The Whitley plan in England has been productive of allaying much of the unrest in that country. One of its aims was to make and consider suggestions for securing a permanent improvement in the relations between employers and workmen, to recommend means for securing that industrial conditions affecting relations between employers and workmen shall be systematically adjusted by those concerned with a view of improving conditions in the future. The circumstances at the present time are admitted on all sides to offer a great opportunity for securing a permanent improvement in the relations between employers and employees, while failure to utilize the opportunity may involve the nation in grave and great industrial difficulties. This should be a move in the right direction to improve the conditions of the working people Heretofore, as after the South African War, and during the industrial depression say of 1907-1908, people were left to hustle for themselves and make the best of the conditions which existed at that time.

The community seems to be now more alive to its responsibilities, and more care is being taken to alleviate the suffering that is bound to follow after this great crisis. The Whitley report suggests a triple organization starting in the workshops and extending into the districts and the nation. The object is to secure co-operation by granting to working people a greater share in the consideration of matters affecting the industry in which they work. This can be achieved only by keeping employers and working people in constant touch. The report aims to deal with the better utilization of the practical knowledge and experience of the work people, and to establish methods of negotiating issues arising between employers and working people, with a view both to the provisions to discuss them and to the better adjustment of them when they appear. It also aims to deal with industrial research; utilization of inventions; improvements of processes; proposed legislation affecting the industries, but above all—the fullest measure of co-operation between employers and employees. The report is very pronounced on this last, it being mentioned three or four times. It is very insistent in bringing forward the fullest measure of co-operation and in stimulating such between employer and employee. The councils in their work of promoting the interests of their own industries will have regard for the national interest. This is a point that should not be overlooked in even the smallest industry in the country.

There should be adequate organization on the part of both employers and work people. We hope that representative men in each industry, with pride in their calling and care for its place as a contributor to the national well-being, will come together in the manner here suggested and apply themselves to promoting industrial harmony and in removing the obstacles that have hitherto stood in the way. It is contemplated that agreements reached should carry with them the same application of observances as exists in the case of other agreements between employers' associations and trade unions. That point should be carefully studied. We have fought in this war for what was termed by the Germans as a scrap of paper. We have in Winnipeg an instance where civic employees had gone out on strike, as the Minister of Labour said, almost before the ink on the agreement was dry. Agreements should be binding and that proposition cannot be too emphatically laid down. There will never be a court whose decisions will please every one; yet there must be some tribunal to settle disputes, whose decisions when rendered are final. In this age and generation it should not be found necessary to strike in order to settle disputes. It has always amused me to see people strike, and then arrive at a settlement and go back to work. Probably neither side is completely satisfied. Some tribunal such as a district council or the men's own union should have settled the matter if both parties had played fair. In every particular, from welfare to wages, immediate results will depend upon the temper and degree of enlightenment of employers and employees. The old saying of employers during a depression, when many men lined up at their offices day after day seeking employment—it is our turn now—should be a thing of the past. The majority of employers, in my opinion, have a new outlook and a greater willingness to concede the existence of a viewpoint other than their own and not to regard their business an autocracy and themselves the rulers.

In New Zealand a Board of Trade has been appointed by the Government to investigate and report on conditions, trade prices, cost of living, etc., in that Dominion, and to enforce the Commercial Trusts Act of 1910. If I am correctly informed, this board had a dispute with some merchants; it took over two of the stores and ran them for one year losing one-fifth of a cent per pound on the meat. It was however, able to stabilize prices and arrive at a new basis on which the men could carry along. In dealing with the problem of the cost of living, the Board reported that the fixing of prices was a remedy that could be applied only with the greatest of care, as the supply might greatly diminish, if not cease entirely, so that prices should not be fixed except in the case of commodities of which the whole supply could be controlled from the field of production to the final consumer, the intermediary changes being limited to fair remuneration for services rendered. By such means little could be done to keep down the prices of products imported from abroad. It also recommended that steps should be taken to control the manufacture and sale of goods that might be considered as luxuries as valuable labour was expended on these which should be diverted to the production of essential commodities. In New York State a personnel of Managers' Club has been established whose objects are the methods of promoting good relations and industrial peace. They seem to be standing with reluctant feet at a point of departure from familiar paths—their faces turned in the right direction, but themselves not ready to go confidently forward.

It is a seriously debatable question how long any amount of amelioration in industrial relations with structural changes in the social edifice will suffice to keep the working people or population in a state of reasonable contentment. In Canada we have a Royal Commission investigating industrial conditions and the other day a committee was appointed to inquire into prices. When their reports are brought down, I have no doubt they will form a basis on which the Government may take action.

War has been a ferment, a tremendous power the action of which cannot yet be fully determined. Victorious people have always been a complacent people, but this war seems to have furnished a variation. People are thinking differently. It is estimated in the States there are 800,000 revolutionary union workers. The world is living in fear of a thing called Bolshevism. Force will not destroy it, no ring of armed men can stay the fusion of its subtle poison, where injustice makes misery and misery makes desperation. Employers must prove their case and their intentions to the working people and to the community. We must have justice. The text of justice must rest in its inclusiveness, it must be just to all men. Brain and brawn should each receive the full value of work done. Decent subsistence means food, shelter, clothing and opportunities for recreation—nothing extravagant, nothing luxurious, nothing lacking.

It is the belief that the employer benefits disproportionately by increased production that causes conflict. I have heard it said that men in the shop say: What do we care whether we produce more? It does not do any benefit to us because we get our pay just the same. All work is not equal in value, and the rewards should not be equal. Justice must take this course by orderly procedure with the utmost rapidity possible.

During the war we considered that co-operation between employers and employees was a national duty and privilege. The war was but a transient affair, and this feeling of national duty and privilege should be the more applied in times of peace. The National Association of Employers in the United States lays down fair dealing as a fundamental and basic principle on which relations between employers and employees should rest. Misunderstandings must be eradicated. The Golden Rule may be hard to apply in business, but it should not be impossible of application. It is quite different from the old saying "Business is business," and that justifies everything that strays from the Golden Rule. The trouble to-day with labour is that it is being misled in the West. The revolutionary and socialistic elements seem to be in the control. In Winnipeg, I am told, that only 8,000 voted for the general strike, which has recently taken place. Many men join the unions to make life more pleasant for themselves in their shop and then pay little attention to the elections and the choice of leaders.

I have here a copy of the Western Labour News, Special Strike Edition No. 5, printed on May 22, which gives a list of 58 unions that are on strike. It says that the partial vote as reported Wednesday morning showed only 8,000 in favour of the general strike and 600 against it. I will lay this paper on the table of the House so that hon. members may see that these contentions are taken from Labour's own paper. Men who are earning $70 per month in wages are out on strike in Winnipeg for men earning $160 and $170. The fact that only 8,000 voted for the general strike, while 35,000 are out on strike, backs up my contention that the labourers are not taking a proper interest in their unions and in the election of their leaders.

The heart of Labour is all right, but many of the leaders are all wrong. The Minister of Labour says he has no doubt that while the strike in Winnipeg arose over a definition of collective bargaining, it was at heart really an attempt at revolution and the establishment of a Soviet government. To use the words of the Winnipeg Citizen "it was not a strike, but plain, ugly revolution". To back up that point I lay on the table of the House the Winnipeg Citizen, which quotes as follows from the Western Labour News of April 25:

> The Russian Soviet System.
> Was worked out from the blue print from which this reproduction (the diagram) was made. The western Labour News has, it is believed, the only copy on the American continent. It will pay you to vote for the "One Big Union."

This quotation from the official organ of the Labour party at Winnipeg shows that the Minister of Labour was quite right when he said that this was not a strike but a plain, ugly revolution. Many of the leaders in Winnipeg have openly during the past year declared that they would soon take over the industries and run them themselves. On the second day of the strike, one of the leaders was reported to have proclaimed that Winnipeg was controlled by the Soviet. One alderman is reported to have said to the Mayor in the Council Chamber, "What are you giving us? We can run the city, we're running it now." The labour leaders in Winnipeg are telling the men that if this strike is lost the trade unions' cause will receive a terrible setback, which it will not recover from for many years. They have fears that the capitalistic cause will seize the opportunity of exploiting labour in its weakened condition. Government assurances that legitimate trade unions will not suffer would do much to allay the fears. If we found ourselves individually in the same position that this country is in, what would each and every one of us proceed to do? Work the very hardest we were able to do, cut out extravagances and save. Now, the people as a nation must do the same as individuals would do in the same crisis. What made France a great nation and enabled her to pay all her indemnity to Germany so rapidly after 1870? The whole nation worked and saved. In France during the earlier stages of the war it was found that the men from the Sunny South were not equal in energy and staying powers to the men of the North. To have to buck nature produces a hardy and virile race. Canadians occupying the northern half of this continent have a rigid climate to endure which has undoubtedly produced a virile race which should be second to none in industrial activity.

We come now to another class of the community which has not received very much attention, and which is suffering perhaps more than any other class; I refer to the salaried men, the "silent sufferers" as they have been called. Although the figures show that the cost of living has doubled, the salaries of this class have probably not been raised in proportion to the increases granted to the working men. To solve the difficulty, we must first control the spread between the manufacturer and the consumer. The manufacturer has been blamed almost altogether by the public for the high cost of living, but I think I am safe in saying that the middle man is more to blame than any other. I recall one instance where an article sold wholesale at $3 a box, at a profit of 30 cents, when retailed was sold for nearly three times that price.

Sedition must be stamped out. It is all very well to talk of free speech, but to talk of Bolshevism and riots and overthrowing the Government is a different thing, and I think the Sedition Act might well have been amended four years ago instead of now; but better late than never. Radical Socialist leaders must be interned or deported. As I have already said, the heart of labour is all right, but many of labour's leaders are all wrong. Free speech must be allowed where it deals with plain justice. Leaders who speak of Bolshevism or revolt must be taken in hand. In a full house at the Walker theatre at Winnipeg a few months ago, the meeting which was strongly in favour of Bolshevist rule in Russia, passed a resolution approving of the Soviet system in Russia.

Sympathetic strikes must be abandoned. The community have a great deal to say about that, and the community have shown where they stand in regard to the strike at Winnipeg. The outlook in the morning papers is good. Many of the unions are beginning to realize that they have troubles enough of their own without taking on others. The Toronto Street Railway workers have refused to go out on strike, and the same is true of many other unions.

The Government must deal with the situation with a firm hand The Criminal Code should be amended to prevent civic, provincial and federal employees joining in any sympathetic strike. These employees are employed for their service to the community and not for gain. The community is alive to their interests in industry. They are out for justice. They appreciated their position last year when the civic strike was on at Winnipeg, and they have appreciated it more keenly this year. They are going to be a bigger factor than heretofore to reckon with, both from the standpoint of labour and capital. I hope that they will pursue not only in Winnipeg but in every other large centre an aggressive campaign of education for both capital and labour. They must be reckoned with in any sympathetic strike.

I speak as a neutral. I have not a dollar invested in any industrial enterprise in the country. I work among the poor of Winnipeg. I know their troubles and I have spoken as the truth came to me.

Our men have fought nobly and well, but some of them find it hard to settle down again. They have proved themselves heroes in fighting the battles of the Empire; they are proving themselves greater heroes in fighting the much harder battle of life. The war is a thing of the past, and henceforth they will be judged by the success with which they fight the battle of life. We must not forget, first, our service to our country, our service to our fellow man, and our service to the perpetuation of Canada.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): Mr. Speaker, I think no one on this side of the House feels it necessary to offer apology for any anxiety to discuss this subject to-day. Neither will I answer the rather unkindly remark of my hon. friend at the beginning of his speech with reference to the troubles in Quebec last year—troubles which the Right Hon. the Prime Minister described in England last summer as having been greatly exaggerated by the press both of Canada and of Britain. The good old much-abused, ill-understood, wholly Canadian province of Quebec seems to be remarkably at peace at the present time, and I think I might very well confine my remarks to a discussion of the trouble where the trouble exists.

This debate is certainly of the most extreme urgency. We have been criticised for not having already discussed in the House this alarming situation. I was personally of the opinion that the hands of the Government should not be hampered and that full liberty of action ought to be accorded them in order that they might try to effect a speedy settlement, and I also thought that it was better to afford some time to the Right Hon. the Prime Minister to do something with a view to remedying a condition that is largely the result of negligence, maladministration and blunders. But, Sir, the period of blunders does not seem to have ended with the return of the Prime Minister. Indeed, every day brings forth new and terrible mistakes. The troubles are spreading to places and centres which formerly were industrially at peace, and the Government appears to be lamentably impotent and inactive. What has the Government done so far? After waiting until it was too late, it sent two ministers to Winnipeg as mediators and for the purpose of reorganizing the mail service. Later on I shall express my opinion of this mission of our two ministers. The Government has also appointed a Parliamentary Commission to investigate the high cost of living. In this connection is it not appropriate to repeat those famous words of a British statesman, uttered two years ago: "Too late! Again it is too late." Undoubtedly, the cost of living and the war profiteers have a great deal to do with the grave situation with which we are confronted. Consumers cannot readily recognize the fairness of a system or a policy which allows meat trusts, flour trusts, and other dealers in the necessaries of life to pile up their dividends and multiply their millions while the prices of bread, bacon, meat and other commodities are soaring into altitudes heretofore unknown. If my hon. friend from Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) thinks, as he expressed himself in the House the other day, that the Government is owned by Sir Joseph Flavelle, is it any wonder that so many people in Canada regard the administration as being directed and controlled by the profiteers? The workingman is told that his wages have greatly increased. But, Sir, wages are purely nominal when their increase is only made to correspond with a larger advance in the prices of articles. It is immaterial whether a man earns fifty cents an hour or two dollars an hour; the significance of his wages depends altogether on what the fifty cents or the two dollars can purchase and thereby make for proper living in his home.

But, Mr. Speaker, whatever may be the finding of the Parliamentary Commission on the high cost of living, whatever light it may throw upon the subject, the important question is: What will be done in the meantime to end the strikes which paralyse the country? What remedy will be resorted to? We cannot afford to wait. As was said on a memorable occasion: We are not confronted with a theory; we are facing a most terrible condition, and it is useless to try to mystify the public by acting a Bolshevist melodrama to cover administrative and governmental negligence. We cannot allow a chaotic policy of laissez-faire while industrial unrest is growing steadily more acute; and the apparent willingness of Parliament to let matters drift from bad to worse will but breed a dangerous intolerance among the wage-earners. We must have industrial peace in this country. Too long have suspicion and distrust prevailed between capital and labour, those two twin brothers of productive enterprise. Unless capital and labour solve their difficulties by working frankly and whole-heartedly in co-operation, Canada cannot be equipped for the coming war of commerce, and she cannot be able to devote all her energies and all her work to the expansion and betterment of her trade and national life.

A union between employer and employed is necessary to the welfare of the individual, the family, and the country, and for Canada to-day this is a question of life and death. Formerly the labour man knew only his wants, his desires, and, at times, his sufferings. But he has come to know his power, and realizes that he is an indispensable factor in the production of wealth, and he accordingly claims the right to be treated frankly as a partner, with equal rights and equal responsibilities. Unfortunately certain employers look upon their employees as cogwheels in the industrial machine, having a market value but no recognized rights as human beings. It is fortunate that the big nations of the world agreed upon some fundamental principles as to the rights of labour and that such principles are to be embodied in the Peace Treaty. Let me read the first two principles. They are:—

First. The guiding principle above enunciated that labour should not be regarded merely as a commodity or article of commerce.

Second. The right of association for all lawful purposes by the employed as well as by the employers.

When the hon. the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell) indicated to the House those two clauses as being among the principles to be included in the Peace Treaty, he said that they had been adopted on the motion of the Right Hon. the Prime Minister. I do not know whether he was right in that assertion, because I happened to read in a French newspaper that some other gentleman was the mover of the resolution, and I thought that perhaps it might have been a piece of little propaganda or impropaganda, and that my hon. friend might have received his information from his own information bureau. However, whether as mover or supporter of the labour resolutions, the hon. the Prime Minister gave his assent to them. This being so, I am at a loss to understand how the principle of collective bargaining can be resisted or objected to if the Government intends to live up to the agreement entered into at the Peace Conference.

The right of association to the employees is worthless and valueless unless it is accompanied by, and means, the right to make association or organization effective. It is apparent that the individual labourer is at a great disadvantage when bargaining with the employer. The employer is often a big corporation, a combination of capital. The labourer is poor and to make his living must rely on working in the property of other people. Having no resources to fall back upon, he cannot wait until he can obtain the best bargain from the employer. It is a case of the necessities of the labourer pitted against the resources of the employer. It is only when the labourer bargains collectively that he has bargaining power approximating equality with that of capital. I do not think there is a better definition of collective bargaining than that which is found in the report of the Commission on Industrial Relations in the United States:

> This term embodies and implies the right of employees to organize and to exercise those functions which are necessary to make organization effective, to make bargains collectively rather than individually and, most important of all, to have a definite, recognized voice, coequal with that of the employer, in determining the wages, hours and working conditions upon which their safety, health and life are dependent.

If collective bargaining is at all desirable, organized labour must be conceded the right to use the methods through which it can be secured or obtained by agreement. On Tuesday last the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) answered a question asked by the hon. member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Andrews) as follows, Hansard page 2956:

> Now one can easily see that what is called the right of collective bargaining, if interpreted in a certain way and carried to an extreme length, might have an unfortunate effect so far as the public interest is concerned. More than that, as is suggested in this public statement, it might have the effect of placing labour men and labour unions themselves in such a situation that they could not make their own bargains except with the approval of some body that might be situated thousands of miles away. Before the phrase "collective bargaining" is insisted upon, we ought to have, and we must have, an exact definition as to precisely what is intended by it and as to precisely what the results might be if that principle, so defined, should be adopted. On that point the Government will probably have suggestions or recommendations in the report of the Industrial Commission, which we hope to receive not later than the fifteenth day of next month. My hon. friend who has asked this question will realize that it would be out of place and, indeed, invidious for the Government to attempt, by way of anticipation, to pronounce upon questions which are properly within the scope of the duty imposed upon that commission.

On the following day I inquired whether some part of collective bargaining was favoured by the Government. Still the Prime Minister answered that we would have to await the report of the Industrial Commission. May I say, in the first place, with all due respect to the Prime Minister, that I was astonished at this answer of his. Surely, if he favoured at the Paris Conference, the right of association, which includes the right of collective bargaining, he

4 p.m. knew what that right meant irrespective of any meaning that the Mathers Commission could give to it. There is another consideration. The right hon. gentleman based his comment on a certain statement of Senator Robertson published in the press and reading as follows:

> The central strike committee interprets the right of collective bargaining to mean that the central body shall have the power to approve or reject any agreement that may be satisfactory to the employer or classes of employers and their employees, which, if granted, would have the result of enabling any central committee entirely outside the industry or craft affected to dictate the acceptance or rejection of any agreement. Instead of giving to the workmen in any individual plant or industry the right of collective bargaining with their employers, the present plan deprives them of the right and places them entirely in the hands of a central body, which principle, the Citizens' Committee of Winnipeg, Provincial and Federal Government, agree cannot be accepted.

Sir, this statement of Senator Robertson has been challenged by the labour leaders of Winnipeg and it is only fair that I should read their version of the case. I take it from the Montreal Star:

> We challenge absolutely this statement of the Minister of Labour. It is entirely beside the facts of the case. The Postal Federation for instance have never submitted either schedules or agreements to the Trades and Labour Council, nor have the railroads, nor have the building trades, nor has any organization at any time. The principle at stake at this time is that all workers should have the same rights of organization as have, say, the railroad workers. Senator Robertson must know this has been denied to the Metal Trades workers and because of this the strike was called.
> This is the principle at issue in this strike and the interpretation given by Senator Robertson, if he was correctly quoted, is absolutely unjustified.

The workers are on strike for the principle of collective bargaining as understood by the Trades Union Movement. Nothing more and nothing less. For Senator Robertson to misconstrue the issue seems to us absolutely uncalled for. If he is in doubt he can get the fullest information by meeting the strike committee. They have approached him and shown that they are willing to inform him of the correct nature of the struggle.

There is a vast difference between the two interpretations, but this is the interpretation given by the labour men and must be considered as being their own interpretation. They know what they mean better than does Senator Robertson. Is it unfair for the working man to claim the right of bargaining by industry instead of by craft or trade? The various trades of an industry are all links in the one chain. If one fails the others are worthless. For instance, in the metal industry, there are machinists, pattern makers, moulders and various other trades. Each one of them has its own special union. If an agreement is entered into by the employers with the machinists' union and with the patterns' union, but there is no agreement with the moulders, and there is trouble in the industry on account of that fact, the machinists and pattern makers will have to stop work as well as the moulders. It is easy to see that all the trades of the same industry have a similar and common interest in the proper carrying on of that industry. If you concede that, you must accept as fair and equitable the right of collective bargaining by all the trades in one industry.

The organization of capital has been unlimited. Powerful organizations have been formed combining many industrial establishments. It is only natural that there should be a similar evolution on the other side, on the part of labour, and that workmen in the various trades are uniting to protect their common interests.

The trade agreement, or collective bargaining, is one of the most generally accepted principles to-day in the world, and more especially in the United States and in Great Britain. I perhaps will surprise some hon. gentlemen—in view of the wild and stupid accusations of Bolshevism which are preferred against the labour movement at the present time—when I say that the advanced Socialist, such as the Independent Workers of the World, reject the collective bargaining and the trade agreement because they do not want to agree in any manner with what they call the capitalistic interest. Strange situation indeed to see the extreme Socialists, and some employers, reject the same means of settlement which evidently must be considered the fair and middle course.

I said that this principle is now accepted in United States and in Great Britain. Every hon. member can consult the Monthly Labour Review which is published by the Bureau of Labour Statistics in the United States Department of Labour. In its issue of March last you may see a list of the most important industries in the United States which have accepted the principle of collective bargaining. I might quote only two, if you will allow me, Mr. Speaker, which are perhaps better known in this country—I mean the Standard Oil Company and the Bethlehem Steel Corporation. I have here in the issue of the Labour Review of February, 1919, the agreement which was entered into by the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation and the metal trades affiliated with the American Federation of Labour. This agreement, and you will see that it is exactly what is asked for by the labour men of Winnipeg to-day, reads as follows:

Agreement made this 7th day of January 1919, between the Bethlehem Shipbuilding Corporation (Ltd), a Delaware Shipbuilding Corporation, (hereinafter called the Company), and the Metal Trades Department of the American Federation of Labour, (hereinafter called the Department).

Witnesseth: That, whereas the department is an organization composed of national and international unions, (hereinafter called the unions), affiliated with the American Federation of Labour, many of the members of the said unions being in the employ of the company in its various plants; and

Whereas the company recognizes the said unions collectively as a suitable agency to represent its employees in questions arising as to wages, hours of labour, and general working conditions and;

Whereas the department is authorized, by the express consent of each union which is a member of the department to enter into an agreement with the company providing for the relations of the unions with the company—

And then the agreement follows. To show how many trades are interested in the same industry let me tell you that the organization of the steel industry by the American Federation of Labour included twenty-four different trades.

In Great Britain the principle is admitted and recognized by the employers and by the State. We have first the recommendation of the Whitley Commission which has been accepted by the British Government, and I will read clause 23 of the first report of that Commission which has been published by our own Department of Labour:

It may be desirable to state here our considered opinion that an essential condition of securing a permanent improvement in the relations between employers and employed is that there should be adequate organization on the part of both employers and work people. The proposals outlined, for joint co-operation throughout the several industries depend for their ultimate success upon their being such organization on both sides, and such organization is necessary also to provide means whereby the arrangements and agreements made for the industry may be effectively carried out.

And in the appendix on page 30, it is said that the councils which are to be formed should be composed only of representatives of trade unions and employers' associations.

At the beginning of the present year, Great Britain was facing a critical industrial situation. The crisis came to a head when the Triple Alliance—the miners' federation, the railwaymen's union, and the transport workers — joined together and threatened a general strike if steps were not taken to meet the demands of organized labour. The Government of Great Britain answered this ultimatum by calling a national conference, composed of eight hundred members representing the employers and the workers interested equally to go into the whole industrial situation and to report upon it immediately. The conference held its first meeting on February 27, and appointed a joint committee which made a report which was unanimously approved by the eight hundred representatives of both the employers and the employees. They agreed on the following things:

(1) A National Industrial Council of 400, half capital and half labour, is to be elected by the employers and the trade unions and to be recognized by the government as the "official consultative authority on industrial relations." (2) Not only are the unions to be free from molestation, but it is ruled that workmen should accept their jurisdiction. (3) Parliament is to enact a national minimum wage law, a 48-hour week and measures raising the legal age of child labour and extending the principles of short-time work to meet the problems of unemployment. All of this programme is now before Mr. Lloyd George's Cabinet.

There was also the Sankey Report—the report of a commission which was instituted to prevent miners' strikes. The Sankey Report has been accepted by the British Government, and it not only grants the right to the miners to unite and bargain collectively but also recognizes their right to co-partnership and to share in the management of the mine.

All this shows that there is nothing very new or very revolutionary in the demands set forth by the Canadian labour men. It also shows conclusively that had our own Government acted as other governments have in the face of a situation infinitely more serious than our industrial situation, difficulties and troubles might have been avoided. While the other governments were taking speedy and effective action the Canadian Government seemed unable to read the writing on the wall, and merely buried its head, ostrich-like, in the sand of its numberless and powerless Orders in Council. Various religious bodies in America and Great Britain have endorsed and recommended the adoption of the demand of the labourer, including the right of collective bargaining.

Among the number are the National Catholic War Council, and the Federal Council of Churches in the United States, and in England the archbishops' committee on Christianity and industrial problems.

May I read to the House the following extract from the New York Nation, which appeared in its issue of March 8th?

Archbishop Patrick J. Hayes, lately appointed to succeed Cardinal Farley as head of the Archdiocese of New York, is one of the four men who formulated the striking programme of social reconstruction that has recently been made public by the National Catholic War Council and, as spiritual leader of 1,325,000 Catholics, he will play an important part in its further development. Without piety of mysticism, and with remarkable tough-mindedness, the War Council has recognized the industrial struggle as the most serious menace to the future peace of every nation. As immediate remedies, it advocates a national system of labor exchanges; the retention of the National War Labor Board; no lowering of the wages attained during the war, "even when the cost of living recedes," for, says the pamphlet, "after all, a living wage is not necessarily a full measure of justice"; the legal minimum wage; recognition of the right of labor to organize for collective bargaining; adequate housing; the establishment of co-operative stores; vocational training; abolition of child labor; heavy taxation of incomes, excess profits, and inheritances; and prevention of monopolistic control of commodities. In its more fundamental suggestions, the programme approaches syndicalism, rather than socialism—the abolition of the wage system, though not the abolition of private ownership. "Full possibilities of increased production will not be realized so long as the majority of the workers remain mere wage-earners. The majority must somehow become owners, or at least in part, of the instruments of production." The capitalist, in the meantime, "needs to learn the long forgotten truth that wealth is stewardship..... that the laborer is a human being, not merely an instrument of production; and that the laborer's right to a decent livelihood is the first moral charge upon industry." "This," concludes this remarkable programme, "is the human and Christian, in contrast to the purely commercial and pagan, ethics of industry."

I hope I have convinced you, Mr. Speaker, that, after all, there is nothing revolutionary or Bolshevistic in the demands of the workmen for collective bargaining.

I will now refer briefly to those charges of Bolshevism against those who are parties to the present labour difficulties. I do not think that any advance will be made towards a settlement of our labour troubles by the slanderous attacks which are made by the Government press against the leaders of the working men. It is not true that the labour leaders at Winnipeg or at Toronto are foreigners or Bolshevists. In both places the committees are composed almost exclusively of British-born citizens. They belong to that sturdy class of immigrants which I have often heard described in this House as being the one class needed in this country. Why, Mr. Speaker, do you think if the Winnipeg strikers were foreigners or Bolshevists that they would have succeeded in enlisting the sympathy of the returned soldiers? The employers—I beg pardon, the newspapers say—and the employers, too—that the returned soldiers are neutral. I read only yesterday that thousands of them after parading the streets of Winnipeg on Saturday, marched to the Parliament Buildings and intimated to Premier Norris that he should exercise his influence for the recognition of the principle of collective bargaining. If they were neutral, I would like to know what they would do.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: Is it not a fact that the Great War veterans of Winnipeg repudiated such action?

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: Quite true, the officers of the Great War veterans proclaimed their neutrality. But it is also true that the returned soldiers by thousands have evinced their sympathy with the strikers of Winnipeg. In order to try to show that the strikers are animated by Bolshevistic ideals, much is said of their having issued their famous licenses with the words, "By leave of the strike committee." The strikers had no right to do this, Mr. Speaker. Such a usurpation of power cannot be tolerated in any constitutional country. They made a mistake, and they seem to have realized it, because they have discontinued that course of action. But is that a sign of Bolshevism and disloyalty? The first city in any British country which gave such an example was the city of Belfast. A few months ago when the gas and electricity workers joined the strike, Belfast went without light except so far as the strike committee gave leave to relax their prohibition in that regard. Yet nobody will gainsay that Belfast is a loyal city. It is the loyal city par excellence—it is the capital of loyalism. Belfast is so deeply and profoundly British that the mere prospect of self government being given to Ireland kindled the flames of rebellion four years ago. The strikers at Belfast were wrong when they arrogated that right to themselves; so were the strikers at Winnipeg; but the latter are not more anti-British or disloyal than the former.

With regard to the action of the Government in trying to effect a settlement of the strike, it has been rather unfortunate. Senator Robertson seems to have sided with one party to the struggle, and obviously his usefulness as a mediator is gone, and I do not wonder that he is on his way back to Ottawa. His last performance in sending an appeal to Mr. Gompers, the head of the American Federation of Labour, is a most extraordinary one. Here is that despatch as I find it in the Montreal Star:

Samuel Gompers,
President of the American Federation of Labour, Washington.

May 29.—A general sympathetic strike involving some ninety-five unions was called in the City of Winnipeg for May 15, resulting in a complete tie up of all business and declaration by Strike Committee of control over civic affairs as well as interference with provincial and federal employees.

As is the case in all general strikes of this nature it has already defeated itself, but I feel it proper to say to you after being on the ground for several days that in my opinion the prestige and authority of international unions whose endeavouring to embroil their members in other cities in sympathetic strikes in support of the lost cause here, should receive the earnest and serious consideration of the executives of the various organizations concerned, particularly of what is know as the metal trades.

The underlying motive in calling the strike is undoubtedly in support of what is known as the "One Big Union," movement and which has for its purpose the destruction of the international trades unions if possible. Will you give this matter your personal attention and communicate with the executives of the various internationals as you may deem desirable.

This is an appeal, clamouring for help, by a Canadian minister of the Crown to a foreign labour leader.

More humiliating action on the part of a responsible minister in a British country has never before been witnessed, and I hope may never be witnessed again. It stands as a monument to the statesmanship and national ideals of that combine of the best brains of the country which was once gathered together in Canada by some sort of collective bargaining under the name of Union Government.

I have no hesitation in saying that the Acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Meighen) was the last man in the world who should have been selected to act as conciliator or mediator. Nobody has more admiration than I have for the ability and talent of the minister, but his temperament, mentality and training disqualify him altogether for the difficult task of mediator. He stands in Canada as the Apostle of arbitrary enactments and despotic legislation. He is the father of the closure in this House. His Italian hand may be discerned in the War-time Elections Act, that nefarious piece of legislation which is still a blot on the statute books of Canada. If there exists in some quarters of the country a feeling of distrust of Parliament and Parliamentary institutions, I believe the Acting Minister of Justice is one of those who are largely responsible for it. Be that as it may, he is so considered by quite a number of people in the country, and he will not be welcomed and trusted by those people as a fair mediator. When, a few weeks ago, I moved in this House that labour should be given representation on the Board of Directors of the Canadian National Railways, it was the Acting Minister of Justice who said in reply that I was favouring a very unsound principle. He was unable to understand that employees of a railway have an interest in the system different from and larger than the interest of the rest of the community. Yet the principle of allowing labour a share in the management of industry is accepted to-day and advocated by both employers and employees in Great Britain and the United States as the best way to enlist the whole soul and energy of the workingman in the thing he is doing. Individual employers in that respect have been ahead of legislation and universal practice. They have set an example which has, in all cases, been most successful. Why does not the Government of Canada set an example in this country? Why refuse a reasonable concession now and be forced to grant it afterwards? The Government may yet grant it so that such concession of a fair demand shall not take on the appearance of a surrender on the one side and a triumph on the other. I do not wonder that the labour men of Winnipeg could not consider my hon. friend as being able to enter into their minds sympathetically, in order to discover their ideals, aims and desires.

But the situation is becoming more serious every day, in spite of ministerial optimistic announcements we have daily at the opening of the House and the interested denials in the newspapers. Still I ask: What shall we do? What shall the Government do? The Mathers' Commission does not possess the authority or prestige that would give its report or its finding a large degree of influence. It is by no means representative. As was stated in the last issue of Maclean's Magazine by a member of the Press Gallery, it could hardly be considered as a satisfactory camouflage, and that was all it was intended to be. The commission was told in all the cities: "There is something rotten in the state of Denmark." We all knew that. Why does not the Government issue a call for a large national conference of employers and employees, as was done in England? If labour in Canada acts as labour acts in England, why should not Canadian statesmanship be able to follow the example of British statesmanship? Let such a conference be called and let labour select its own representative. When a man is selected by the Government to represent labour on a committee, or commission, or conference of some kind, that man does not properly represent labour; he represents the Government. I have the fullest confidence that the Canadian employers and employees could find a common ground and agree together as British employers and employees have succeeded in doing. In the meantime, as a token of goodwill, could not Parliament and the Government agree to have a labour representative on the Board of Directors of the Canadian National railways?

The Government states that it has no power to enact eight-hour day legislation. I admit there is grave doubt as to that, but there is no doubt that the Government can enact eight-hour day legislation as to its own public works, and such legislation would go a long way towards securing the general adoption of that reform. Something must be done quickly to endeavour to convert class struggle into class harmony, to convert retaliation into reciprocity. But Mr. Speaker, I believe the Government has already delayed too long. Something must be done now, and these are my concluding words to the Government: Do something and do it now.

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, perhaps I may be allowed to contribute a little something to what I consider in my humble way as the basis of this industrial unrest. I do not purpose indulging in personalities, nor in blaming any body for not having unearthed some solution of a problem that confronts the entire world, nor do I purpose discussing various theories which have been advanced from time to time as solutions of the problem. But I will go to what I consider the very root of the matter, namely, the ability of the workingman to maintain himself at the present rate of wages. I firmly believe that if he had the wages which would enable him to live properly and comfortably, he would be satisfied, and if he were satisfied, you could not possibly stir him into any form of unrest.

Some few days ago I asked the Acting Minister of Labour (Mr. A. K. Maclean) if he would be kind enough to answer a question regarding this. After several days he very kindly answered the question and put the answer into printed form which was served upon me to-day. It is headed: "The high cost of living and minimum wages," and it reads:

Re Mr. Burnham's Inquiry of May 28, Hansard for May 28 shows the following statement:

Mr. J. H. Burnham (Peterborough West): I would like to ask the Acting Minister of Labour (Hon. A. K. Maclean) what is the weekly budget for the average Canadian family as found by the latest report of the Department of Labour; and what is the minimum weekly wage to correspond with that weekly minimum budget?

This was the reply:

Regarding the point raised by Mr. Burnham it may be stated that the weekly family budget printed in the "Labour Gazette" is given as a typical family budget, not as a minimum family budget. The figures as printed do not vary from month to month or from year to year. The object aimed at in printing the budget is not to indicate in any way what commodities should be purchased but to facilitate an effective comparison of prices at different periods so that the relative purchasing power of money may be shown. The weekly budget printed in the "Labour Gazette" was framed by the Dominion Statistician some years ago and the foods enumerated and the quantities specified go to make up the number of calories estimated as necessary for a family of five,—husband, wife and three children; save that so far as the workman is concerned the budget is intended rather to meet the case of a man engaged in somewhat severe manual labour, the food allowance being therefore slightly larger than would be necessary if the man were engaged in clerical or other light employment. The figures printed from month to month in the "Labour Gazette" show the cost of the same quantities of the same class of commodity, the prices ranging over a number of years. The budget includes prices as to foods, fuel and rent and does not include clothing. Clothing is of course an essential part of the cost of living but the subject is one which cannot be easily reflected by statistics, the articles covering so wide a range and the conditions varying so greatly as between different families, different localities and different periods. In considering the family budget as printed in the "Labour Gazette" an addition of from twenty-five to forty per cent must be made for clothes and miscellaneous articles.

Regarding the latter part of Mr. Burnham's question re minimum weekly wage, it may be stated that just as there is no minimum budget known to the Department of Labour neither is there any weekly minimum wage known to the department, save that during the past year or two different provinces have enacted minimum wage laws as to some classes of labour. Wages are, as a rule, fixed for each calling and the minimum wage varies greatly as between one calling and another and as between one city and another. The family budget as printed in the "Labour Gazette" is, it may be added, much used by employers and employees in measuring the fluctuations of living and is therefore of material value in effecting wage agreements in different trades. Attached is a copy of the family budget as printed in the May, 1919, issue of the "Labour Gazette." Attached is memorandum showing food prices for Great Britain, United States and Canada, respectively, for the month of February.

The copy of the family budget attached for staple foods, fuel, light and rent, in terms of the average prices in 66 Canadian cities, shows the cost per week to be $21.34. That budget does not include anything for clothing, for which I have allowed only the moderate sum of $2 per week. It includes nothing for medicine and medical attendance, for which I have allowed $1 per week. It includes nothing for boots and shoes, for which I have allowed 50 cents per week; nothing for headgear, for which I have allowed 10 cents per week; nothing for religion, for which I have allowed the modest sum of 25 cents per week; nothing for amusements, for which I have allowed 25 cents a week; nothing for education, for which I have allowed 25 cents a week, (because although education is free in some provinces there are incidental expenses); nothing for insurance for which I have allowed 50 cents per week; making a total of $4.80 not allowed for. This added to the $21.34 makes a total of $26.14, or an average of $4.35 per day for six days in the week which the man engaged in severe toil must earn or he cannot meet this necessary budget. Even then nothing is allowed for the instruments of labour, the tools which the workman must have, and nothing is provided for old age. When we consider the wage the workingman is receiving at the present time, he is away behind this budget. The Government has worked very hard investigating these prices, and its figures, which are given in the most candid manner, show that $4.50 per day—$5 per day including provision for old age and tools—is the minimum wage which the labouring man in Canada should receive to-day. But he receives nothing like that, and it naturally follows that there is very great unrest. He does not know, very few of us did, that this was what the budget amounted to; but there are the figures given by the Government, in answer to my question, after several days' delay, and they show that the workingman is away behind. He is going down lower and lower in the scale, and his weekly and yearly deficit is becoming most alarming. Restlessness must follow as a matter of course. I do not think for one moment that the employer can pay more than he is paying at the present time and make things go. I do not claim that there is any inequality whatever in the scale of prices relative to each other. I am simply accounting for the unrest among the masses of the people of this country. To urge that free trade or anything of that description will remedy matters is not to argue by the book.

Mr. M. CLARK: Give it a trial.

Mr. BURNHAM: It was on trial several years ago, and the verdict was "Guilty," and free trade was thrown out. I do not purpose to try it again, because it is a well-known principle in law that when a thing has once been tried, it cannot be tried again.

I have no suggestion to make. I know the workingman says if he was getting only a dollar a day and prices were the same as when that was the current wage, he would be content. It is not that he wants fabulous wages. He simply wants to meet his obligations. Therefore, I maintain that if you can so arrange things that the workingman can live decently and meet his obligations you will allay the unrest in this country, and in no other way can you allay it.

Mr. F. J. PELLETIER (Matane): I am pleased that the Government has finally allowed the question of the present industrial unrest to come before the House for a fair discussion and a frank expression of opinion from hon. gentlemen. It is one of the most important questions with which we have to deal.

With the suspension of hostilities in Europe, with the dawn of peace bringing contentment and solace to all hearts, how is it that the country to-day is actually in a worse situation than when we were at war? How is it that the merry ringing of bells announcing the coming of peace in Europe announces at the same time a state of industrial war in Canada?

What is the cause of this industrial unrest and of the universal unsatisfactory feeling that prevails throughout the country? It is not necessary to go through a long and dreary inquiry to ascertain the cause of this trouble. It is apparent and every one realizes it at sight. It is the unbearably high cost of living and the necessity for the working classes to have better conditions, better wages, lower prices for foodstuffs, clothing, and all the necessaries of life. But it is not sufficient to find out the cause of a social evil to remedy the situation. One must see who is responsible for such conditions. Then it will be possible, if there is goodwill on the part of those responsible, to find a solution of the serious problems which must be settled if Canada is to live. The fundamental cause of all the trouble we are actually going through lies in the lack of sincerity, wisdom, foresight and Canadian patriotism on the part of the present Government. The hon. gentleman to your right, Mr. Speaker, may think that such a statement is a slander against the present Government, and it would be such if I did not have absolute proofs to substantiate the indictment. The time has come when we must look the situation boldly in the face, examine our national conscience, and set aside the rubbish of electoral parley to consider if the governing influence of Canada has really worked for the general good, or simply for the benefit of the privileged class. The time has come to put a soft pedal on the patriotic camouflage which has been the only means of putting through this House and the country all sorts of measures and thousands of Orders in Council; and to scrutinize the real motives which prompted the Government to place Canada on the verge of bankruptcy and on the threshold of revolution. Not only does serious industrial unrest manifest itself, but there are innumerable strikes in large cities And there is also a supreme contempt of the Government of the land, and an evident relish for revolutionary ideas and principles, so much so that in the city of Winnipeg there was a tentative Soviet against which the Government did not dare to take stringent measures. Had it been an ordinary industrial crisis, had the Government not been responsible for the situation, and had the people at large had the least confidence in the ministers of the Crown, the settlement would have been an easy matter because the Government would have been the high court to which the grievances would have been brought. But such is not the case. The labouring class is dissatisfied, and does not care to have the Government's assistance, believing the Government to be a party committed to the opposing forces. I do not need further proofs than the fact of the reception given in Winnipeg to the ministers just returned from the West, and the result of their peace-making mission. Let us consider for a moment how we have been brought to the unenviable position in which Canada finds itself to-day.

At the outbreak of the war, without any consultation with Parliament, my right hon. friend the Prime Minister pledged the country to England for 500,000 men. This offer was accepted, and to compel the people to accept it as granted, numbers of orators, journalists and canvassers sounded from one end of Canada to the other the note of devotion to the Motherland, to the cause of liberty and civilization, and devotion to the cause of the small countries. They declaimed upon the phantom of German tyranny as if Canada had been threatened with immediate invasion. This was done with the deliberate object in view to cover the extremely dangerous consequences, for a country as small and as poor as Canada, of assuming responsibilities beyond our means. During the long years of struggle, whilst the final victory was uncertain, and as long as the united efforts of the allied nations were necessary to keep up the morale of our soldiers, nothing was said. But now that the war is over and the Allies have been victorious, it can be said to the Government that its action was nothing short of national suicide, and we are beginning to realize the fact. For the four years of the war, we drained the country of our best young men, we crippled our industries by the multiplication of shell factories, we allowed speculators to increase the price of every necessity of life to such an extent that it became necessary to maintain the output of munitions, to increase the salaries of munition workers tenfold, while the other classes of working men were in a sorry plight. To-day they ask that these conditions be made bearable, and they are not to blame. The responsibility for these conditions lies at the door of those who have allowed them to be created. But the Government has not only been extravagant in its promises to Great Britain; it has been totally inefficient in preparing for the necessary transition from war to peace. Notwithstanding the advices given privately and publicly, the Government did not see fit even to try to do anything in that direction, all its efforts having been bent upon the prosecution of military service defaulters and the contriving of means whereby to remain in power. Instead of taking measures to fix prices, to protect the labouring men against the greed and heartlessness of speculators, the Government has simply marked time waiting for events to pass on at will, seeming unfit to foresee the crisis we are facing to-day. If this is not correct, let the hon. gentlemen to your right, Mr. Speaker, point out one single measure prompted by wisdom and a desire to assist the poor. Let them show in what direction the country was prepared to switch its energies and activities from war-time industry to peace. What did the Government do when inquiries disclosed the fact that products, foodstuffs of all kinds, were rotting in warehouses and thrown away in order to maintain famine prices? What is the Government doing to-day when prices are even higher than they ever were before? What reasons are given for such conditions? Is it admissible that a Government, appreciating the importance of its duty, would allow food to be exported to such an extent that its own people would suffer and be on the verge of starvation? Is there a country in the world that would bear with such a Government? Is there a country under the sun afflicted with such a ruling power? What is the result of such apathy, such inefficiency on the part of the Government? As long as the war lasted, as long as contracts and profitable orders were distributed, and there were men to be conscripted, this Government showed more autocracy than did the late Tzar. The whole Administration was run by Orders in Council adopted and enforced even when Parliament was sitting.

Now that the war is over, and since conscription has ceased, now that no more munition contracts can be given to heartless profiteers, the only activity displayed by the Government is as I have said before utter severity in the prosecution of defaulters who have suffered heavy fines and imprisonment.

Such a condition of affairs does not conduce to confidence in the Government, on the part of the working class, and a striking proof of this was given by the manner in which the ministers of the Crown were received by the union men in the West. We also have other striking examples of the energetic attitude of the Government in time of crisis, in the manner in which the strike activities were managed. We were sitting here discussing the abolition of titles when the city of Winnipeg was in the pangs of Bolshevism. We are here discussing minor questions when the whole country is suffering, when the entire industrial structure is shaking—we are discussing, while the soul of the Canadian people want action and not words.

The Government has suffered from want of discretion in determining Canada's share in the war; it has suffered from lack of sincerity in allowing prices of necessities of life to soar as they did; it has suffered from lack of foresight in not preparing for the after-war period.

It has suffered from lack of Canadian patriotism in sacrificing the future of the country; it has suffered from lack of wisdom in passing laws that spread discontent and distrust in all ranks of society; it has suffered from lack of ability as shown by the fact that it remained idle when it was time to act.

We are passing through a very critical period and no one knows what the results may be. Whatever the endeavours of this Government may be now I feel that it can accomplish very little, having lost the confidence and support of the people. The only wise and practical thing for the Government to do in the interest of the people, in my opinion, is to dissolve Parliament and allow the people to elect honestly representatives who have at heart the welfare of the country.

Mr. G. W. ANDREWS (Centre Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, when the election was on, a year and a half ago, it was my privilege to address an audience of Winnipeg workingmen on the subject of winning the war. The issue at that time was quite clear cut. I told them I was a candidate for the Union Government and as such stood for the conscription of men. I pointed out that this meant the particular men I was talking to. I also told them that I stood for the conscription of money, which meant their money, and for the conscription of the last dollar and the last man in Canada, if need be, to win this war. That was pretty straight talking. When I got through one of the men got up and said: "Well, we understand exactly what you mean now." I told them I would not think of going over the top with men who were not prepared to go all the way. When the 17th December came they knew exactly what it meant for the men who were going to the war. When the election was over, in spite of the fact that my opponent was the secretary of the labour union, it was found that they had voted for me in the proportion of three to one.

These are the men who, to-day, are on strike. There is certainly something wrong somewhere. In addition to those men, as good and as loyal citizens as Canada ever had, there are many of my own comrades who stood in the trenches in France; they are on strike. I say, standing in my place here, that in my opinion eighty per cent of the returned men of Winnipeg are in sympathy with the strikers and the object of this strike.

On the first of May the men of the metal trades went on strike, partly because the masters refused an eight-hour day and a larger hour wage but chiefly because of their employers' refusal to recognize their union. The building trade employees presented their schedule to the masters who frankly admitted its fairness and reasonableness, but declared their inability to meet the demand. Here we have the two vital causes of the strike (1) a living wage, and (2) the right to organize. This is the cause of the strike in my opinion after the most careful consideration and 5 p.m. after using every means in my power to find out the facts. When the ironmasters let it become known that they were going to make it a trial of endurance, the trades and labour council called for a sympathetic strike of all organized labour in the city. A vote was taken and all unions, including public utilities, came out.

As to the blame, I accuse no one, I judge no man, but the fact remains that the men are on strike and that is a fact that we must not forget. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that the labour unions in Winnipeg in all good faith, in the month of May, in the year of our Lord one thousand nine hundred and nineteen, were forced to strike for a living wage and for the right to organize. So far as the living wage is concerned, I think hon. members will agree that if ever a strike is justifiable it is for a living wage for the striker and his family. With regard to the right to organize, there was a time when a combination of employees was accounted conspiracy and treated as such, but to-day it cannot be denied to those whose saleable commodity is labour, the free right to say what terms they will sell their labour at; how much of it they will sell, and whether they will sell it for six or for twelve hours a day. The days of serfdom in Canada have passed. Nor can their right be denied to agree together as to the price at which they will sell their labour and the quantity of labour they have to sell, so long as this right is granted to any other class in the community.

The single workman is helpless against the great corporation; the individual union or craft is equally so. Collective bargaining is the logical outcome of organization and it is now too late in the day for any corporation to refuse it—that principle is embodied as one of the provisions of the charter of labour formed by the League of Nations.

The sympathetic strike is the natural and logical sequence of organization. What more natural than that men who have interests in common should stand together in an emergency? A particular union or craft in striking may be striking for a principle that is absolutely vital to every man in the industry and just as the employers can down one single man so they can down a single union unless all stand together. This is co-operation; it is brotherhood, and it is absolutely the same principle of sticking together that was employed in France. Twenty-seven allied nations had a sympathetic strike, and they won. That sympathetic strike brings one naturally to the "One Big Union," and here again I believe is an entirely logical and absolute sequence of organization. If you once permit men to organize, and by their organization to deliberately make the boss "come through" with something with which he does not agree, that is force, and there is no other word for it; and the "One Big Union" is a logical way of fighting. It took us a long time to fight it out in France, but we did fight it out eventually, and once we got "the One Big Union" and "the One Big Foch" we won the war; and in the case of labour unions that is a logical conclusion once you begin to strike. I do not believe in strikes, but we have them in Canada. Having got them, there is need for the application of intelligence in their settlement. Once you have got labour lined up on one side you find there will also line up the Bankers' Association, the Manufacturers' Association, and all the other representatives of employers, and there is likely to be a first-rate fight. A little fight has been started already, and it will be "a real proper one" if we do not have a change soon. There are only two ways of settling disputes, as far as I know, one by arbitration and the other by force; and there is no more reason for the strike that is going on in Winnipeg to-day than there is for myself and any hon. member of this House who had a difference of opinion, going out on the lawn in front of this building and settling that difference with bombs; we should both of us be regarded as criminal lunatics if we did that. I have heard some criminal lunatics advance suggestions in connection with the settlement of this strike, and the sooner those persons are in the "jug" the better it will be.

In speaking along these lines it has been my experience that in military matters you will find in every platoon, every company, every battalion, and every regiment, men that are termed "roughnecks"—fellows that if you do not run them they will run you; and it appears to me that we have some of this class at large in Canada to-day. There is no question that if we do not do something to curb them they will run this Government and the country as well. We have got farmers' organizations, soldiers' organizations, and God knows what other bodies, all lining up for a fight, and I think it is about time that the members of Parliament, the representatives of all the people in Canada, had something to say in the matter. Let us have a little constitutional government; I have heard too much about organization and that sort of thing to please me. When a man begins to organize he is preparing to fight. I stand for arbitration and not for war in industrial relations as well as international relations. The Prime Minister the other day declared that if we could not settle this little business of our own it boded ill for a League of Nations. I think it does. I would suggest, if I may, that a national industrial conference should be called at once. In the meantime this striking has got to be stopped; if it does not stop one side or the other will win. I do not know which side will be the winner, I am playing no favourites, but I do know that the work people in Winnipeg are determined to win if they can. If they do not win they will starve, they will go back to their work with a bitter feeling. There are men on strike to-day that were repulsed by the Germans three years ago, but that did not end the war. The principle at stake is one of absolute force, as far as I see it, and I would like to see that changed. It can be changed, it is being done every day. If we cannot settle the problem I think it is time we got out and let somebody else have a go. In that respect I agree with an hon. gentleman who has spoken this afternoon.

There is another point I want to touch upon for a moment or two. Twice this afternoon I have heard the term "Bolsheviks" applied to the strike leaders in Winnipeg. Gentlemen, if you apply the term to those men you apply it to me, because they are my friends. There is a man called James Winning, a good level-headed Scotchman, who has spent practically all his life working for his fellowmen. The only erratic thing he has done in this agitation has been closing down the press and participating in the strike. As to the press, I had the misfortune to hear an hon. gentleman, one of the oldest members in the chamber, state his opinion that the press was corrupt, and he was not called a " Bolshevik " for saying that. If ever a strike by workingmen in newspaper offices was justified it was in this case if the newspapers were not playing the game. There is another man called Russell in Winnipeg. Russell is a Socialist and not a man who advocates force. I know these men, and for them force would be absolutely the last resource. Russell wants a change. So does Robinson, so does Simpson, and so does Rigg. They want a change because they are not satisfied with present conditions. How many hon. gentlemen in this House are satisfied? I venture to say many of them would welcome a change of government.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ANDREWS: I feel a little that way myself, but I would like to see some further action by the Union Government first. It does seem to me, Mr. Speaker, if ever there was a time that we should get together and all take hold of one rope and pull in harmony, it is now. We talk about working six hours a day. In my opinion the time has come when we should work eighteen hours a day, and I think the fellows would do it too as long as they did not fear they would work that length of time to enable one or two men to make millions out of it. They will not do that but they are ready to work and work well, when they deem the cause is a legitimate one. As an old farmer I cannot help but realize that it does not take any more bushels of barley to feed a hog to-day than it did five years ago. Yet the hog is worth five times as much to-day, it is a good time to sell hogs when the same amount of grain would yield five times the value. It is about time that we got off our coats and worked together. I would like to see some very strong action taken with regard to the present situation. I do not like compulsion nor conscription; but I cannot help thinking that we ought to be able to establish courts of arbitration in this country that will give a just award on a dispute that is referred to them. If that is done I think there would be enough public opinion behind the award to enforce it, and in that case our troubles would be over.

It is far better than letting this strike work itself out to the bitter end, which means another fight. There are times when on principle I have as little theoretical regard for conscription as my hon. friend from Dorchester (Mr. Cannon). I do not believe in conscription, I never did; but, unlike my hon. friend, there are times when I think it is justifiable. During a prairie fire if you come across a deaf man you do not stop to argue with him, but you grab him and take him along, and when he finds you did it to save his life, he is very glad that you did not stand upon ceremony. Conscription, I think, is sometimes justifiable, and in my closing words I strongly recommend that in this instance the Government adopt it forthwith.

Mr. W. A. BUCHANAN (Lethbridge): I would like to venture into this debate, Mr. Speaker, as an employer of labour as well as a member of this House who has attempted to keep in close touch with the aspirations of organized labour. We are discussing industrial unrest largely because of the developments in Winnipeg during the last few weeks; but, to my mind there has been unrest amongst organized labour for some months past. I have attempted to ascertain the reasons for that unrest, and I would enumerate them not in the order of their importance but as I have noted them down.

First of all, I think one of the paramount reasons for the present unrest among the working classes is the high cost of living; second, I would say that what we have been calling " profiteering " since the commencement of the war is another very important reason; third, the failure to fulfil some of the promises that were given to the labouring classes during the war, that out of this war would come a new world, and that they would live under new conditions; then there is a demand, of course —and I would classify this as a fourth reason—for better living conditions; there is a universal demand for the recognition of the eight-hour day; there is also a universal demand for the recognition of unions, and, again, there is the feeling that there should be more equitable sharing by the working classes in the profits of business.

Having enumerated the reasons for the unrest which exists, I will try to point out some of the remedies that we, as the Parliament of Canada, should provide. In regard to the high cost of living, I would say that it is our duty to adopt legislation to reduce that high cost. When the Budget comes down this week it seems to me that we should deal with the tariff in such a way that the cost of living will be reduced. It is argued that if you attempt to deal with the tariff you are going to injure the industries of this country. Are not those industries being injured now on account of the unrest that is being caused by the high cost of living? If we can remove some of that unrest we are to that extent going to stabilize our industries. So I believe it is in the interest of the country as a whole that we should without any further delay remove the duties from foodstuffs and the real necessaries of life.

It has been argued that it is impossible to deal with the high cost of living; that it is too intricate a subject. I find that in New Zealand in the year 1915 the Government passed what is termed a "Cost of Living Act," in which they attempted to reduce the cost of many of the necessaries of life. I saw an article the other day dealing with the price of footwear, and stating that in New Zealand the Government regulated the cost of the leather supplied to the manufacturers, and instructed them to manufacture only certain classes of boots in order that there should be a standardization of footwear, with a view to reducing the cost to the lowest possible point. We might very well keep in mind that it is possible to introduce legislation—preceded, of course, by proper investigation—that will attempt to relieve the unrest that is due to the high cost of living.

Now, as to profiteering. I feel that one of the greatest reasons for the present unrest is the extravagant display of luxuries by people who have amassed wealth, because such display arouses dissatisfaction among those who have not the same means, and these feel that the men of wealth are getting too much profit out of the industries of this country compared with what the workers themselves are obtaining in the way of wages. That is one of the reasons for the demand by the working classes for co-operation or a share in the profits of industry. To remove the feeling against profiteering, I hope that very advanced steps will be taken this year in connection with our income taxation so that the real wealth of the country will be made to bear its share of the cost of government, and that wealthy people will be made to feel the burden as they have not felt it in the past.

The promises made during the war undoubtedly were featured by the assurance that following the war, there would be greater democracy throughout the world, and I think labour feels that that greater democracy should be realized without delay. If we are to have a new world we must have different living conditions. We must not have the housing conditions that have existed in the past; and we must attempt to look after the old and the infirm by legislation rather than leaving them to be taken care of by fraternal societies and other organizations.

As to the eight-hour day, I may say that in the business I conduct we have had the eight-hour day for some years, and as a result of that experience I am an advocate of the adoption of the eight-hour day in every line of business in this country.

Mr. NESBITT: How much does my hon. friend think that the cost of living will be reduced by adopting the eight-hour day for farming?

Mr. BUCHANAN: I am speaking of the industries of this country. I do not think that it is practicable to adopt the eight-hour day for farmers. In the summer they may be working twelve hours or more a day, and in the winter they may not work for more than four or five hours a day.

Mr. NESBITT: So far as the farmers of Ontario are concerned, they work twelve and fifteen hours a day winter and summer.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. BUCHANAN: I would like very much to be able to continue the discussion with the hon. member for North Oxford, but it is impossible under the circumstances. As to the eight-hour day, I would like to quote the views expressed by Lord Leverhulme, a member of the British House of Lords, and one of the best known business men in Great Britain. He is not only advocating a reduction in the hours of labour to eight, but he is bringing the period down to six hours. I am not going to argue in favour of the six-hour day, but I would point this out, that in a book written by him he made the statement, that in the munitions industry in Great Britain at the commencement of the war, working hours at first were about twelve hours a day, and gradually they were reduced to eight and a half hours, and that this reduction of hours resulted in a greater production of munitions per day and per week. If that was the case, there cannot be very much objection to the adoption of the eight-hour day throughout this country. Lord Leverhulme in this volume from which I am quoting made this statement:

> Government reports repeat over and over again, from definite experiments, that in a reasonable number of hours the human being turns out its maximum output. Fatigue the human being one day, let the man or woman come fatigued to work the following day, and so on, and after two or three days the output goes down, down, down, and is continually falling.

I think that is the case. I am satisfied that in my own business the production is just as good as when we had a nine-hour day.

In 1886 the output of a certain class of worker in the United Kingdom was 312 units;—

I am quoting these figures to exemplify an argument used by Lord Leverhulme to show that in the United States where they were more advanced in their legislation as regards working hours than they were in Great Britain, the production was greater.

In 1886 the output of a certain class of worker in the United Kingdom was 312 units. In 1906 it had dropped to 275; in 1912, the last recorded year before the war, it had fallen to 244—a drop of 68 units in twenty-six years. In the United States the output per worker in 1886 was 400 units; in 1906 it was 596; in 191 it was 600—a rise of 200 units. The output also rose during the same period in Australia, New Zealand, and Canada, so that Lord Leverhulme is forced to the conclusion that, of the English-speaking races all over the world.

And Lord Leverhulme reaches the conclusion that by the reduction of hours of labour, production in Great Britain will not be interfered with, but rather it will be helped.

Since industrial troubles have arisen in this country, many views have been advanced as to proper co-operation between labour and capital. Only yesterday, I read in a Canadian paper an article explaining the system adopted by the Sears-Roebuck Company of Chicago. I am going to place the two systems that I have before me on record because I think they are of considerable value in this discussion:

The Sears-Roebuck Company, a great mail-order house which employs about 20,000 men and women, have had in operation for about three years a plan of profit sharing.

In 18 months of its operation, the plan discovered the following facts:

Ninety-one per cent of the eligible employees contributed to the fund.

The employees in 18 months paid into the savings fund about $439,500. The company contributed in the same period $1,318,712, that being 5 per cent of its net profits without deduction of dividends to stockholders.

Julius Rosenwald, president of Sears-Roebuck, made the following statement:

An employee earning $25 a week would, on the basis of the past two years' record, have accumulated in 20 years' service, approximately $20,000. An employee earning $50 a week would in the same period of service have accumulated $40,000. It is estimated that this is a minimum!

I quote this merely as an instance of the possibility of developing co-operation between working classes and employers in order to bring about greater contentment and a better opportunity for living well in this world. The other view that I have here was expressed by a manufacturer from Brantford, Ontario, merely giving his idea of a scheme that might be adopted to encourage better relations between employers and employees:

1.—The payment of a fair living wage. The happiness of the workingman will not depend on whether he has an eight or nine-hour day—but on ensuring him a wage sufficient to keep his family comfortably and permit them to enjoy the good things of life.

That may be considered a contradiction of the argument I have advanced in relation to the eight-hour day, but I am giving it simply as the view of this gentleman.

(2) The organization of sick benefit associations in connection with factories, similar to the Massey-Harris plan, the benefit to amount to say, $8 per week.

(3) Every manufacturer should insure his employees, so that in case of bereavement the family will have something to carry on with.

(4) Provision for old and faithful employees in the way of pensions when they retire.

(5) The taking of the employee into partnership to the extent of each man's earnings. If he earns $1,000 he should be paid the same dividend on that amount as is paid the shareholder. It would encourage men to be faithful and to look after the interests of the business, because in so doing they would also benefit.

Having expressed these views as regards what capital should do to remove some of the grievances of labour, I would say this in regard to the position that organized labour should take. One grievance that the employer has and, I think, has justly, is that when he engages what might be termed a union man, he is not always guaranteed that the man is efficient for the work he is engaged to do. Labour should see that every man who is provided with a union card is efficient, and is entitled to earn the wage that is paid to him. It should also see that when an agreement is made with an industrial concern, that agreement is kept, not only by the union but by the employer. If we could bring about a proper understanding between labour and industry, I am satisfied that all agreements would be observed and that we could have a guarantee of efficiency.

I may be a little advanced in expressing the view that we should encourage labour representation in the House of Commons. I believe many of the problems we have to deal with to-day would be solved a good deal more easily if we had in the House a few men who represented the views of labour, and we do not have them here at the present time and we should encourage them. That would be an advantage not only to the Government, but to Parliament and the country. Probably one way in which we could bring about a proper representation of labour would be by the adoption of proportional representation in Canada.

I have listened to the remarks of the hon. member for Winnipeg Centre (Mr. Andrews), and I am inclined to think that while at the beginning the difficulty in Winnipeg may have originated with reasonable labour men, it got into the hands of unreasonable labour men and I believe the One Big Union is at the back of the movement there. I have no sympathy whatever with the One Big Union, because no organization in Canada that expresses sympathy with Bolshevism and the Spartacans in Germany could have my sympathy, and as I understand it, the One Big Union, when created in Calgary, expressed sympathy with those movements. What I want to see is a development in Canada along constitutional lines, and we should keep as much as possible in advance, but I do not think the reasonable labour people of Canada have any sympathy whatever with the movements in Russia and Germany along revolutionary lines.

I have no disagreement with the principle of collective bargaining, as I understand it in my business and as I know it exists at the present time in the Canadian Pacific. If I might be personal and explain the method adopted in dealing with the International Typographical Union, collective bargaining is simply this: The International Typographical Union, in the city of Lethbridge, represents the employees in all the printing and job offices. And when we come to negotiate an agreement with the union we negotiate it with the employees of all the offices, and representatives of the employers meet representatives of the employees. That, in my judgment, is collective bargaining; but if collective bargaining goes beyond that and means that men in the baking, or milling, or moulding business are going to decide whether an agreement in another line of business is to be accepted or not, then I disagree with collective bargaining along that line. But if it is to be bargaining between men and employers in a certain line of business, then I am quite satisfied to have it generally adopted throughout Canada.

It would be in the interest of Canada that we should remove a good deal of the suspicion that exists between employers and employees and between employees and employers. I know the employer is under the difficulty that he is suspicious of the motives of his employees, and on the other hand the employee has the same suspicion when dealing with the employer. I do not say that is always the case, but it is the case to a very great extent.

If we can get the heads of the industries of the country to trust and co-operate with the men in their employ to a greater extent than they have done in the past, I believe we shall remove a great many of the difficulties that have arisen. If I may make another reference to that book of Lord Leverhulme, one of his principles was this: "Trust labour whole-heartedly and wisely, and all will be well." Lord Leverhulme, one of the greatest employers of labour in the Mother Country, has been able to get along well with labour by co-operating with and trusting the men, and I feel that if we develop that feeling of trust in this country we shall alleviate many of the difficulties that have existed.

In conclusion, I would urge the Government to consider the organization of a permanent commission—I am not going to try and foist on the Government another commission, but I think it would be in the interest of labour and capital in this country if we had a commission somewhat of the same type as the Railway Commission to move about the country and consider difficulties that might arise, and try and solve them before they develop into a strike, when sometimes the difficulties are almost impossible of solution. There are many little differences and difficulties that occur in industries that, with a proper presentation of the case to an impartial tribunal could, I am satisfied, be solved before they had reached the stage where they are beyond solution and where a strike develops. It might be difficult to form in Canada a commission that could cover the whole country, and it might be necessary to have it divided so as to deal with East and West, because the commission would undoubtedly be kept busy meeting individuals from the Atlantic to the Pacific who had representations to make. I feel that it is our duty at this really critical period in the history of industry in Canada to get together, not only those who sit on the Opposition side but those who sit on the Government side as well, and do all that is possible to bring about a solution of these problems, in order that we may have peace and become the Canada that the men who fought and died for us in France aimed to possess when they came back to this country.

Mr. W. F. NICKLE (Kingston): I do not know whether I can usefully add anything to this discussion, as when I came to the House this afternoon I had not the slightest intention of seconding the resolution of the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Blake), but when he wanted a seconder I was very glad to lend my name so that the matter might be discussed.

In the discussion that has taken place it seems to me that we are to an extent not appreciating the changed conditions that have taken place, particularly in Winnipeg. Like the hon. member for North Winnipeg and the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Buchanan), I have endeavoured to secure as best I could a correct appreciation of the development of the facts in reference to the Winnipeg strike. I agree with what the hon. member for North Winnipeg says in this respect, that the strike was originally precipitated probably because the ironmasters were unwilling to recognize collective bargaining, that term being accepted in the ordinary sense. It means the ironmasters were not prepared to recognize the organizations within their own shops as having the right to speak and bargain for those whom they represent. There was also the question of hours and wages, but the crucial issue over which the cleavage occurred was whether or not collective bargaining should be recognized by the ironmasters, and this, as I understand it, was refused by them. But when the break took place a change came o'er the spirit of the dream. The Central Strike Committee came into existence, and as the strike continued that committee became more aggressive in the demonstration and assertion of its point of view. Collective bargaining in the narrow sense of the word gave way to a different collective bargaining as being demanded. The collective bargaining, as I understand it, that is demanded to-day is not the collective bargaining that was refused by the ironmasters, and which, I may say in passing, I think they would have been wise in granting, but it is a new collective bargaining. It is a collective bargaining that recognizes the right of a central strike committee to determine and bargain for the rate of wages and other conditions, not in respect of any particular employment, but in respect of any employment where there may be a difference. That changes the entire situation. It takes the bargaining away from the employees of a factory or craft and turns it over to a recognized outside committee, who shall have power to determine what the rate of wages and conditions shall be in any particular industry or craft. The hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) was keen in directing attention to this point. It seems to me he overlooked another fundamental point when he laid emphasis on the fact that the extreme socialistic view as represented by the Independent Workers of the World refused to recognize collective bargaining in any sense. To be consistent, the Independent Workers of the World and those who hold their views must be unwilling to accept collective bargaining in any of its phases, because they are unwilling to recognize the position of capital in industry. They are unwilling to recognize bargaining at all because, they say, there should be no such thing as capital in industry, that labour and the community are the only two parties interested in industry. In other words, that industry should not either directly or indirectly be affected by capital, but that labour, as the operators of industry, and the community that purchases the goods are the only two parties concerned, and that therefore there should be no collective bargaining because it is impossible for one party to bargain with himself. Labour is to take control of industry, and therefore labour could not bargain with itself in control. But to a very great extent that is theoretical.

Coming now to the practical, we are face to face to-day in Canada and throughout the world with conditions that have confronted belligerent nations at the conclusion of all great wars, namely, unrest and high prices of foods, but there never was a time in the history of the world when a war produced such world-wide conditions, and the problem that confronts us to-day really is this: The immensity of the task that we have just completed has practically put all the world at one, in that high prices prevail not only in the countries which took part in the war but in other countries throughout the world. If hon. members interested in this discussion will turn to the last copy of the Labour Gazette which we secured in our boxes a day or so ago they will see that the cost of staple foods in the family budget has risen from $7.34 in 1913 to $13.35 to-day, and that the grand total of the budget, as mentioned by the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Burnham), has risen from $14.02 to $21.34. But, Sir, these conditions are not confined to Canada. They are world-wide, and as I shall not be here to-night, and have but a few moments at the present time, I shall but roughly direct the attention of the House to some of the conditions one finds throughout the world. In the United States, for instance, prices have tremendously increased. The Canada Labour Gazette says:

> The index number of the retail prices of foods in the United States calculated by the Bureau of Labour Statistics showed a considerable decrease for February, being down to 172, as compared with 185 for January, 187 for December, 1918, and 183 for November, 1918, and 160 for January, 1918, and 100 for the year 1913.
> The normal price is taken as 100.
>
> In the United Kingdom the Minister of Labour reported the retail prices of food to be 113 per cent higher on April 1st than in July 1914, as compared with a level 120 per cent the month before.....
> In Norway the statistical officer reported the cost of living for a family in November, 1918, to be 155 per cent higher than in July, 1914.... In retail food prices at Rome an advance of 1.8 per cent was reported in January, the level being 159 per cent higher than before the war. In Milan the cost of living for a family in February was calculated to be 253 per cent higher than before the war, food being up 298 per cent, clothing 274 per cent, heat and light 115 per cent, while rent was unchanged.

In South Africa the increase was about 40 per cent. And thus it is throughout the whole world. The question naturally is, why is this so? And the difficulty is in obtaining the facts. If we could get all the facts, then probably we should be able to apply economic theories to them and more easily find a solution. The hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) said something which I was sorry to hear him say, because I think it only adds fuel to the fire that exists throughout the country. He directed the attention of the House and of the country to what he stated as a fact: That the food trusts, as he termed them, and the milling trusts, were responsible for the very large increase in the cost of living. He very briefly called attention to the immense profits made by these industries, and, by his speech, gave the House and the country to understand that if these tremendous profits had been swept away the result would have been a very substantial decrease in the cost of commodities supplied by these industries. Now, Sir, I read with great care the report of Mr. O'Connor when it was published, and I also read the report of the cold storage inquiry as conducted in Toronto and elsewhere; and I gave considerable attention to the report of the milling industry as prepared by Miss McKenna. If I understand the purport and finding of these reports, it was to the effect that while these industries, through the immensity of their overturn, made very large profits, yet if the profits in respect of each item of overturn were reduced to nothing it would practically have amounted to this, that the cost of foodstuffs would have been decreased by a negligible quantity. Not for a moment do I argue that these industries should be left with such large profits, but at a time like this, and such as we have experienced during the past four years, it is absolutely essential that production should be driven to the extreme, and you cannot expect men, while human nature is human nature, to conduct an industry unless it can be made profitable. Price must always be in excess of cost, if an industry is to be maintained; and if this Government had been unwise enough to put the margin of profit so low that the industries could not have been successfully operated, then the industries would have closed. But I do think that the Government should take, as it did take—and probably should continue to take by way of taxes—a very large proportion of the unusual profits earned by these companies, because it is not difficult for me to understand the unrest that pervades the labour classes of the country when they see such stock as that of the Maple Leaf Milling Company growing from below par to within 160, and stock of the Dominion Textile Company which a short time ago was 98, standing to-day somewhere in the neighbourhood of 120. What the working people of the country are asking is: Are we, after having contributed liberally of our flesh and blood to the cause of the country, to be called on at the present time to bear an unequal burden in relation to present day conditions? The hon. member for Matane (Mr. Pelletier) asked what was the cause of the unrest to-day; why were people willing to make sacrifices during the war and to-day were restive? It seems to me that the reason is this—and it is a fundamental reason—that, unless human nature changes, we will bear a great loss or suffer much in respect of a great gain that we anticipate, but will not bear the irritation of small things when we think we are being unjustly dealt with. And if I can gather the spirit of the labouring people to-day—and I may say that I have had in my riding three strikes within a year—the dissatisfaction that pervades their ranks is due to the fact that they know that increased wages have not brought them any greater comfort, and they are imbued with the idea that unusual and improper profits are being made by certain people. Now, Sir, when you consider the philosophy that underlies wages, you have to realize that money is only a medium of exchange. Price is only the declaration of value in money, and value is the ratio of exchange of goods. What happened in Canada after the war broke out? We have not forgotten that within a few months following the outbreak of war there was great depression in the country and men were willing to work for anything, for the question resolved itself into the alternatives of work or starvation. Then munitions contracts began, and the cry was "Full steam ahead, because the Allies want munitions." Competition was eliminated because the need for munitions and war supplies was so great that the cost was immaterial. They had to be had, otherwise the war could not be successfully carried on; and none of us have forgotten those days in 1915 when we thought we had almost lost because we had not the shells and other necessary impedimenta of war, and as the demand for munitions became greater the cost of living increased. There was an inflation in currency, and you may have an inflation in currency in two ways: First, because there is more money in the country than there should be, and, for a second reason, money may be circulating more rapidly. You may have a direct and an indirect inflation, and we had both in Canada. Vast amounts of money were being poured out in Canada, and money was circulating with great rapidity from the manufacturer down through to the workman and into the bank; fresh loans were made and the money went round again. Men received higher wages than they had got before, and prices rose correspondingly. We had in Canada a condition that has been experienced by every country at war. Prices were enhanced, but so long as times were good people did not complain. Wages rose, perhaps always somewhat behind prices, but there was a steady increase in wages in ratio to the increase in prices. But then peace came and the workmen were confronted with changed conditions. In all economic papers throughout the world, and in our own newspapers, articles appeared which directed the attention of the workman to the fact that in the future he must look to a reduction of wages, because it was impossible, if Britain was to carry on her export trade and if Canada expected to conduct her business and secure trade, and to undertake the payment of her debts, for wages to remain as they were. Wages must come down, it was pointed out, because, in international trade, goods would be bought from the country which could most cheaply supply them. The workmen began to look around and to consider what their condition would be. One most thoroughly conversant with labour economics and world-wide conditions and a man of extensive knowledge in my riding, said to me: "I have worked and slaved during the war and never had such wages before. But the day after the war was over I found myself no better off than before the war, and all I have earned is gone, having been swallowed up in the cost of living." As a panacea for this evil—because the high cost of living is an evil—some gentlemen in this House advocate the control of prices. It is a popular policy to shout that profiteering shall be stopped, but it all depends on how you define your term. What is profiteering? Is profiteering to be defined as a reasonable effort by a man to produce his goods at the minimum of cost and sell them at the highest reasonable price? Or is profiteering to be regarded as the securing of monopolistic control, and by that control the lessening of supplies and the securing of prices out of proportion to the value of the goods? The first is quite justifiable, and if my views are worth anything in this House today, what I would urge is increased production. But if profiteering means, according to the second definition, the controlling of supplies and the creation of a monopoly, and the taking advantage of the conditions so created to secure more than the article is worth, then profiteering should be condemned. But, Sir, the control of prices, is not as simple a matter as it appears to be. During the war France tried it and failed. According to a statement contained in Bulletin No. 27 of the Department of History and Political and Economic Science, Queen's University:

> The Food Controller of France compares himself to a game keeper surrounded by poachers and laments "that the tradespeople and middle men have invented no end of tricks to evade his prescriptions, and this he blames for his embarrassments."

The control of prices was also tried in Germany—a country whose people had been accustomed to control, who were used to paternal government and to submit without complaint to governmental regulations.

The food controller of Germany said that he had utterly failed because ways were found by which the wealthy secured supplies from those who produced them, with the result that the condition of the poorer people was worse with the control of prices than without. Mr. Hoover frankly admitted to the people of his country that price control could not be successfully operated.

In Canada conditions were such that the fishermen on the Pacific coast laid up their vessels because they were not able to make a living at the prices that were to be paid for fish. I only direct attention to this because I should be sorry to see the Government adopt a scheme that failed in other countries, and because I am satisfied that the last condition in this country would be worse than the first. The moment you adopt a food price that places the value, or the price, of a given article at less than the cost of production—because as I said at the beginning, no man will produce unless he can sell for more than it costs to produce—just so soon will the production fall off.

From the information I have been able to obtain from those who should know, and with whom I have discussed the question, it is evident that the great want in Canada to-day is agricultural production. We are an agricultural people. A great many of our young men went overseas. We have made a contribution to the war that I shall never regret. I do not agree with the hon. member for Matane (Mr. Pelletier) when he says that we impaired our national usefulness by the magnificent contribution that we made to the winning of the war. That is a contribution that our people will always be proud of and one which has placed Canada in a most enviable position in the eyes of the world. But, we would be blind to facts if we forgot that taking 450,000 or 500,000 of our men from the ordinary channels of industry has lessened the output of our industries. We would be blind to facts if we forgot that the destruction of war has robbed the world of a large part of the raw materials used by the industries of Canada and other countries in their operations. We would be blind if we overlooked the fact that for the past four or five years a great majority of the young men of the world have been engaged in destruction rather than construction. Keeping all these points in view, I suggest that the Government should be careful not to make a move in the wrong direction, because if they start out wrongly, conditions will be worse than they are to-day.

I realize that discontent exists among the working people. I realize that they are not satisfied with their status. I do not know whether or not a solution of the difficulty will be found in the Whitley report or not. It seems to me that the principle embodied in that document has reference to conditions as they are in England more particularly than to the conditions as they are in Canada. In Great Britain the various crafts and trades are more closely co-ordinated than they are in Canada. We are a more scattered people and I doubt very much if the principles of the Whitley report could apply to Canada. But I say that the status of the working people has to be improved in this country. I do feel that the time has come when the demand of the working people for an eight hour day should be recognized—eight hours for five days a week, four hours on Saturday, Saturday afternoon for recreation and Sabbath for worship. I quite realize that it is impossible for this Government, within our constitutional limitations, to prepare and pass an eight hour day law but I do believe that the legislatures ought to give serious consideration to it.

Although I seconded the motion of my hon. friend from Winnipeg (Mr. Blake) this afternoon, I would not want to be understood as agreeing with every contention that he put forward. He stated two propositions at least this afternoon in which I think he is radically wrong. One is, if I understood him correctly, that he seemed to stand for the curtailment of free speech. I believe that is a mistake. I have always been impressed with the fact that there is safety in free speech. When in London and Glasgow in 1916 I heard it on the street corners and in public places. While in Glasgow I heard things said that were much more radical than anything I had ever heard in Canada. While in Hyde Park I heard views expressed such as we are not accustomed to hear in this country. I have always felt that the free speech enjoyed in Glasgow and London was the safety valve of the people. If you give men an opportunity of voicing their views, while you may not agree with them you have an opportunity of refuting them. It is better to have views expressed in the open than in the byways and secret places.

Nor would I agree with the hon. member for Winnipeg that sympathetic strikes should be prevented by legislation. I do not believe that would get you anywhere. If you are going to recognize the right of collective bargaining as usually understood, if you are going to recognize the right of men to strike if they are not satisfied with the conditions of their employment, then you must recognize the right of those who are not satisfied with the recognition being obtained by others of their craft to strike in sympathy and legislation against sympathetic strikes would not get you anywhere. It would make confusion worse confounded. It would make the unrest greater in Canada in the future than it is to-day. The parts in respect of which the Lemieux Act has failed are not the positive portions of the Act but those parts which say "Thou shalt not." Positive legislation is what is required and while I sympathize with some of the views advanced by the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Buchanan), I want to urge the Government to be careful not to do something that will make conditions worse than they are to-day, but to do something that will bring employees and employers together, that will recognize the desire of labour for an improved status and that will bring at least harmony out of the discord that prevails in Canada. It is useless to say that this discord is mainly fomented by the foreigner. Vancouver, Victoria, and Calgary, are the homes of the strongest English-speaking groups that you have in any place in Canada and there is no place where the voice of discontent is more loudly heard than in these three cities.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CHARLES GAVIN POWER (Quebec South): For the past two weeks we of His Majesty's loyal Opposition have been content to keep silent while serious events were transpiring throughout the country. This silence of ours has been variously construed. We have been told, and have heard, that we feared to handle the situation. We have been told, too, that our silence may be attributed to our desire to allow the Government to remain embedded in the mire to which its own actions have brought it. But I think I can safely say, and in doing so I am speaking for everybody on this side, that we considered the situation too serious to attempt to inflame the minds of the public whose patience has already been stretched almost to the breaking point, and that we considered it was well to allow the Government ample time and opportunity to propose a solution and to come to a satisfactory settlement of the present unrest. We considered that it was possible for the Government to bring about, by legislation, by arbitration, or by some means, economic and industrial peace in Canada. We have waited, as I have said, two whole weeks, and what has happened? We have the spectre of revolution, which first became apparent two weeks ago, appearing like a hydra-headed monster in dozens of Canadian cities. We have in cities everywhere, from Halifax to Vancouver, with the possible exception of those in the province of Quebec, which I am glad to say are as yet untouched by the prevailing malady, industrial unrest; we have an upheaval such as this Dominion has never seen. And, if we are to believe the reports of the press, anarchy is being openly advocated, revolt is being encouraged, and grim revolution stalks unmolested through the cities of our country.

The time therefore has come for us to face the situation, and I am convinced that we will do so, not in a cowardly, vacillating fashion, but in the manner in which we have for four years faced the issue of war—as men, conscious of our duty, proud of our common heritage and steadfast in our purpose to maintain justice and advance the common welfare.

In order to come to a proper understanding of our situation, it is perhaps well to go back to those first principles which should be the mainspring of any action in the relations between man and man. These relations have become more and more complex as our civilization has advanced, and in modern times we are occasionally at a loss in our endeavours to establish a code for their proper determination; but the principles themselves are as immutable as the laws of nature, as old as the human race, as true to-day as they were when the tablets were delivered to Moses, or when the Saviour of the world delivered his sermon on the Mount.

Applying these principles to the relation of capital and labour, it is possible to enunciate certain truths which are generally admitted. These truths have found their best expression in modern days in an encyclical of His Holiness, Pope Leo XIII, from which I expect to quote at great length. These truths can be summed up somewhat as follows: The condition of the worker is primarily of the utmost concern to the State: He should not be allowed to be exploited by capital as a mere instrument for the making of money; hence it is unjust that the fruits of man's sweat and labour should not belong to him: As a rule it is quite legitimate for the worker and the capitalist to bargain; but there comes a time when, driven by fear, necessity, or otherwise, the labourer finds it impossible to make a bargain which will give him sufficient to gain a frugal, honest and honourable living: When that time comes it is the duty of the State to see that the labourer is not oppressed by the capitalist —to enable the employee to make a fair bargain with his employer: Further, the standard of living should not be the minimum at which the worker can keep body and soul together; there should be given to him a wage sufficient to provide him with comfort and recreation, to enable him to educate his family, and to provide against accident, sickness, and old age: To establish this standard, it is essential that the workers unite, for experience teaches us that man is naturally greedy, and the rich and powerful will rarely concede anything to the poor unless coercion is applied: It is the duty of the State, therefore, to foster and encourage such unions when the poor have not the same facilities for protecting themselves as the rich: It is also the duty of the State as much as possible to remove all causes of complaint between employer and employee, to prevent by remedial measures, taken beforehand, any recourse to the strike, which is invariably a great economic loss, in many cases most seriously affecting those not intimately concerned in the struggle, and always leaving rancour and bitterness in its train. It is neither justice nor humanity to grind men down and stunt their minds with labour of their bodies: Daily labour must be regulated so that it is not protracted beyond the strength of the workers. In all agreements between master and workman it is implied that proper leisure be left to the workman for rest, recuperation and recreation.

Now, having laid down these principles, let us examine the present situation. The demands of the men on strike, if I understand them rightly, are somewhat as follows: first, recognition of their unions; second, an eight hour day; third, collective bargaining.

With regard to the first, recognition of the unions, it is so generally admitted that the necessity for argument is scarcely apparent. Besides, I have an Order in Council of July, 1918, in which it is stated:

> That all employees have the right to organize in trade unions, and this right shall not be denied or interfered with in any manner whatsoever, and through their chosen representatives should be permitted and encouraged to negotiate with employers concerning working conditions, rates of pay, or other grievances.

So there is no doubt that the Government acknowledges that the unions are to be recognized.

The second point, the eight-hour day, presents, perhaps, more difficulty. But bearing in mind that the sweating of employees is a most inhuman and immoral act, we have to come to the conclusion that under the strain of modern industrial conditions a man cannot work very much more than one-third of the twenty-four hours. This fact had been scientifically proved before the war; but it became more generally admitted when a commission of the British Government on the health of munition workers found that the efficiency of the labourers was augmented and that their health was better under an eight-hour working day than under a nine-hour or ten-hour working day. Ten hours work was found over-fatiguing and incompatible with the highest efficiency. Further, since the labourer is entitled to a certain time for rest and recreation, we must at least take that time from the ordinary ten hours of work. The members of the American National War Board on July 20, 1918, issued a memorandum on the eight-hour working day, and their conclusion was as follows:

> The way to crime and chaos lies plainly in the exploitation of our men and our women as if they were coal or oil. In our free America there is to be industrial and social freedom. Out of the ferment of unrest there has already begun to come a truer sense of the human values; a better adjustment of law to those values; a keener conscience as to the treatment of those values and the conservation which shall not stop with saving water or wood, but will make its greatest and more fruitful task the conserving of our people themselves.

So that we find it generally admitted in Europe and in America that an eight-hour day increases efficiency, promotes health, and helps towards the happiness of the labourer.

Now I come to what is, perhaps, the most difficult of the demands made by the workmen—that is, collective bargaining. It is generally admitted that unions of any particular craft or trade should be recognized, and should be allowed to bargain with their employers.

But it is not generally admitted that, for instance, the employer of a metal worker can be asked to bargain with regard to the wages of that worker with a typesetter or a carpenter. This is the objection which, I understand, has been voiced by the Winnipeg Citizens' Committee, and also by the Minister of Labour. If we admit that a worker may bargain collectively in a given trade, I hardly see how we can deny him the right to bargain as a class. We have already granted different classes in this country the right to bargain as a class. Lawyers, for instance, in every province in Canada, have their bar associations or societies, and they not only bargain, but have their bargains, arrangements and fees consecrated by Acts of Parliament. The farmers—and all farmers are not the same kind of farmers, because there are different classes of farmers—are now endeavouring to bargain with the Government with regard to the tariff, although I do not know with how much success. The manufacturers —and there are many different classes of manufacturers—are also endeavouring to bargain collectively with the Government. Therefore, if one class, the farmer class, or barrister class, or manufacturing class, is allowed to bargain as a class collectively, I cannot understand why the labourer should not be allowed to do the same.

As I have already said, capital is invariably greedy of its privileges, it invariably seeks to obtain further privileges; and it can hardly obtain these further privileges except at the expense of the man who produces the capital. Therefore, if we are to remain in the present state; that is to say where one trade bargains with its employer, we might be in such a situation as this. We might find a strike of metal workers, such as we have, in which the employers would win. The strikers would be obliged to return to their work and the increase in wages and the better conditions of labour which they demanded would not be granted. I have no doubt that other capitalists, encouraged by this victory and using the military tactic of destroying one enemy after another, would be very pleased to emulate the victory of the metal men, and, one by one, our trade unions would be destroyed or rendered impotent. I, therefore, hardly think it is possible for us to admit the right of one trade, one craft to strike and not admit the right of all other labourers in the same locality or even in the same country to bargain collectively with regard to their own conditions, providing they have a common interest, and in the class which we have before us there is a common interest. There is a general demand in Canada for an eight-hour day. There is very little more to be said as regards the sympathetic strike. If we admit the principle of collective bargaining, there is absolutely no reason why we should not admit the principle of a sympathetic strike. The same arguments apply in both cases, and if we admit recognition of the unions and collective bargaining, we should admit the principle of sympathetic strikes.

There is a question whether or not we should admit the advisability and the possibility of a strike amongst the servants of the State. By servants of the State, I mean those who serve a Government, whether federal, provincial or municipal. The condition of the worker under the State is somewhat different from that of the worker under the private capitalist. The former is assured, first of all of a permanent position; he receives his wages, and he knows that through political action he may be able to obtain higher wages. I do not think anybody can reasonably object to his striking, but we can all reasonably object to his joining a sympathetic strike. He, after all, is the servant of the people of Canada; he, after all, is administering or operating utilities for the whole of the people of Canada. The postal clerk is delivering the mail; the fireman is putting out fires; the policeman is the bulwark of law and order. The same reasons which apply in favour of allowing a sympathetic strike in other trades apply in favour of prohibiting a strike amongst the servants of the State, because the latter can, by direct political action, increase their salaries, improve their conditions and establish a condition whereby their wishes may be met. The civil servant has not been sweated by the ordinary profiteer; he is the servant of the State, and should things not satisfy him, he has a good weapon in his hand—the ballot. Therefore, we should admit recognition of the union, the eight-hour day, collective bargaining, the right of civil servants to strike, but not the right of civil servants to join a sympathetic strike.

It would, perhaps, be well to examine a little into the causes of the present unrest. There is, I admit, a general world-wide cause. We have just been through the greatest war in history; commerce has been dislocated, and if I may say so, our population has, to a certain extent, been brutalized. We have found that might and force have been the only means whereby justice and humanity have been able to conquer, so that in spite of ourselves we have come to the conclusion that if we are right, we must fight. Therefore, amongst the people of Canada, as amongst other people throughout the world, the feeling has arisen that we should have no patience; that we should proceed at once to obtain what is ours. This feeling is general, and it is probably brought about by the conditions of the last four years. But we cannot altogether blame on the world-wide war the state of unrest into which our country has been brought. There is no doubt that some time before the war the labouring classes were in a state of ferment. We had strikes; we had threatened strikes; we had unemployment; the conditions of labour were by no means normal.

However, we have found that in the four years of the war the world has advanced probably two or three generations, and that which satisfied the people before the war will satisfy them no longer. We have also found that there has been something wrong with our economic system. To quote a newspaper which I read recently:

> The traditions of law show more respect for property than for the person—more for Capital than for the Labour that makes wealth. This is all wrong. And labour does well to try by every honourable means in its power to procure for itself equal justice. Labour has as good a right as Capital to collective bargaining. Capital is doing it all the time in spite of laws to the contrary. As well might the Kaiser have attempted to dispute the right of the Allies to make Foch their generalissimo, as for capital to dispute allied labourers right to unity of action and collective bargaining.

The world has changed, and we cannot judge men and affairs by the standards which we would have used four or five years ago. To come down to the more particular causes of the strike, we have found, to quote again the same paper, which in turn quotes from one of the Winnipeg papers, I think the Labor News:

> The Government was indifferent to it all. It appointed food controllers who did not control. It recommended titles for profiteers. It muzzled criticism, suppressed free speech, strangled independent newspapers, censored the truth and imprisoned the protesters. It let contracts to its patrons, and so by sharing in the plunder rendered itself impervious to protest and indifferent to need.

We find that the Government of this country, in disregard of our constitution and our traditions issued during some eight or nine months decrees as tyrannical and ukases as evil as ever were issued by the Bolshevik government of Russia or by its predecessor the Czar himself. Order in Council after Order in Council was issued until at last the people decided that they would no longer have any respect for them. The Government considered Parliament useless, Parliament was not summoned in any crisis whatsoever, but an Order in Council was passed; and, whether right or wrong, the result was always the same—to bring into still greater disrepute the law and constitution of our country.

The policy of the Government with regard to the labour situation has been weak and vacillating. It reminds me of nothing so much as the policy of the last king of France before the Revolution, who, when the revolutionists were crying at the gates of his palace, was one moment for granting them a National Assembly and the next, for sending the ring-leaders to the Bastille. It might be likened also to the policy of the Czar just before the revolution, when one moment he was for summoning the Duma, and the next for letting loose the most reactionary elements in that country. And so with the Government of this country. In July, 1918, a set of pious ejaculations were issued by the late lamented Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers). We were told what the relations of capital and labour ought to be. The capitalist was told to be good, the labour man was told to be good, we were all told to be good; but no solution was found for the difficulty. Still later, after a trip West of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) an Order in Council was issued on October 11, 1918, in which it was decreed:

> Any male person, employer or employee, of military age, as defined by the Military Service Act, who violates any of the regulations abovementioned shall be subject to the military law for the duration of the present war and demobilization thereafter, and shall forfeit any exemption granted him and any right to obtain exemption under the Military Service Act.

As hon. gentlemen will remember, that raised a storm of protest throughout the country, and on the 2nd of November the Order in Council was amended. Later on, when we were still in the period of demobilization, an Order in Council was issued on November 19, 1919, repealing the previous Orders in Council and providing:

> That the Government is informed that concerted movements are now under way on the part of employers and workmen respectively which aim at improved relations as between employers and workmen, and looking to the elimination, so far as may be practicable, of lockouts and strikes in connection with industrial disputes.

I am very glad the Government was informed of that, and I would have been still more glad had their hopes been well founded. Unfortunately, shortly after this pronouncement from the Government, the unrest became acute, culminating in the present strikes at Winnipeg, Vancouver and elsewhere.

We have, therefore, as one of the proximate causes of the present unrest the difficulty which the Government has found in demobilization. I do not intend to go into this question at any great length. Many theories have been advanced as to whether demobilization should proceed more rapidly or more slowly, but we have found this: The Government, despite all its agencies—its employment agencies, its land settlement scheme, its war-service gratuity scheme, and even its pension scheme—has been unable to find work for the returned soldier, and unable to provide for the dislocation of industry consequent on the armistice. The Government have been unable in any way to prevent or forestall the unrest which it was patent to any one of us would follow the conclusion of the war.

The cost of living has been going up by leaps and bounds, and there has been no attempt to prevent or control it on the part of the Government. I do not wish to tire the House by quoting the figures of the percentage of rise for all the countries in the world, but I might mention the increase that has taken place since 1914 in the following countries: United Kingdom, 120 per cent; France, 137 per cent; Sweden, 220 per cent; Canada, 84 per cent; United States, 75 per cent. One hon. gentleman stated today that in New Zealand the cost of living had gone up higher than my figures show, but if my figures are correct, and I have reason for thinking so, the cost of living in New Zealand in October, 1918, had increased only 42 per cent. So it will be seen that the increase in the cost of living in Canada has been exceeded only in European countries subject to blockade conditions. Compared with all other countries except these the increase in the cost of living in Canada is by far the highest.

It has increased considerably more than in the United States. There is twice the increase suffered by New Zealand and nearly two and-a-half times that in Australia. In one paper it is stated:

> For four years our Government has permitted and even fostered one of the most nefarious following now to become organized into a band of middlemen, which is as great a curse upon the country as the cold storage octopus. It has an army of agents running wild through the country buying up everything in and out of sight upon the farms, giving the farmers such fabulous prices that it not only unsettles and sometimes prevents them from taking advantage of the normal rise in prices, but they themselves are admitting that the produce is not worth the prices that they are being sold for in the city of Quebec.

The excuse is that there is a shortage of food in Europe. If there is a shortage of food in Europe, where there is revolution and strife, is that any reason why we should export more of our surplus and create the same labour unrest at home? Would it not be better to take the bull by the horns and bring down the high cost of living by spending millions immediately in building cold storage houses and controlling the farmers' produce, so that there may be normal prices, only charging sufficient commission to pay the working expenses of the cold storage plants? Then, again, can we not make a law to imprison the dishonest promoter and speculator by making it an offence punishable by imprisonment for middlemen to engage in speculation?

There is another reason for this general unrest. I think the Government is, to some extent at least, responsible for it. The wealthy people of Canada have not been judicious in the manner in which they have enjoyed their wealth. It is said:

> The wage-earner is measuring his income against the evidences of luxury, advertisements of ladies' dresses at prices that have to support a family for a year, and not too much of them at that. Gentlemen's neckties at from five to fifteen dollars, and all else in proportion—goods whose commendation evidently is their dearness. Daily appear such appeals to fashion luxury in the newspapers as might well be called immoral in their encouragement to ungainly waste. Meantime, the wage-earner reads with rage of millions made out of war necessities, and of one claim upon the government, that he has to support, for eighteen million dollars, which a contractor would have made had his product not been rejected. He stands aghast at such figures, and, in his corporate capacity of trades unionist, he rebels against it. Here is the way the Winnipeg worker sees it: "During all these fearful years the rich became richer and the poor poorer, and with the increase of wealth the arrogance of the wealthy increased. Their wealth did not make them more beneficent. It made them mad for still more wealth. They became more and more callous and indifferent to the needs of the masses."

I charge the Government with responsibility, even though indirect, for this condition of things, in that they allowed this profiteering. They allowed great wealth to be made in munitions and in the sale of supplies to our Allies, and people made wealthy through the instrumentality of the Government used their wealth most injudiciously. We have been told that we have in this country a very undesirable element—the Bolsheviki—and that in Winnipeg this element is in control. I am not fully apprised of all the circumstances of the strike in Winnipeg, but so far as I can see there is little on the part of the labour men except a just and legitimate claim of labour to enjoy the fruits of its labour and to enjoy better conditions. But it is becoming the habit in this country to designate every one a Bolshevist with whom we cannot agree. This is a very old failing of the Tory party. For centuries any one who opposed the Tory party was always hailed as the Bolshevist of that day. I remember having read in my history of England of Lord Russell and Sydney having been called Whigs. They were hanged for saying and, indeed, for believing, that the King was not King by divine right. They were the Bolshevists of those days. And the Roundheads, the Puritans, were the Bolshevists of the day of Charles I and Charles II, because they dared to insinuate that the immorality and the bestiality of the courts of England of that time were not conducive to the proper government of the people of England. Later on people were condemned to the dungeons for being Liberals. Then it became a byword of reproach to call a man a Radical. We have learned a lot from the early Radicals, and we have learned a lot even from our own Radicals. Had it not been for the Liberals and the Radicals of this country we should not at the present time be enjoying responsible government. Men of the Family Compact in Ontario, I presume, called William Lyon Mackenzie a Radical; and yet, were it not for William Lyon Mackenzie, I doubt whether we would be sitting here in this Parliament to-day. Again, men in Quebec who denied responsible government to the people of Quebec and Lower Canada, called Louis Joseph Papineau a Radical and drove him into exile. But had Louis Joseph Papineau and those associated with him not taken the stand which they took, I am very doubtful whether there would be responsible government in that province and whether we would be sitting here to-day. Later on still, the same attitude was held in regard to those whose views were different from the policies of the party in power, particularly the Tory party, and such persons were called Socialists. Yet we have taken a great deal from the Socialists. The present Government, Tory and all as it is, has adopted the naturalization of railways, something which thirty, forty or fifty years ago would have been considered extreme socialism. To come to our own day and to the present moment, any one who seems to oppose the Government is promptly described as a Bolshevist. Well, Mr. Speaker, if opposition to the Government, and if a desire to establish the rights of labour, and a wish to have it understood once for all that we in this country are opposed to anything which will rob labour of its dignity and nobility, is Bolshevism, then Sir, I am willing to be called a Bolshevist. But if Bolshevism means the subversion of all authority; if it means anarchy; and if it means the government of the country by one class alone; lastly, if it means, as we have been told it does in Russia, the nationalization of women and the murder of all those who are opposed to the theories held by certain sections of the people, then undoubtedly I am opposed to it. And I think you will find that in expressing this opinion I am voicing the views of most of those who have seen service at the front. The ordinary returned soldier has been a labourer, and was such before the war and during the war. I should say, without having the exact figures at my disposal, that before the war fully 20 per cent of the army consisted of wage earners; and further that 60 to 75 per cent were those who worked with their hands as day labourers. These men cannot be expected to become strike breakers. You cannot expect them to lose sympathy with their fellow workers. You cannot expect them to enter into competition with the men at present engaged in manual labour. You cannot expect them in any way to help the capitalist, whom to a large extent they blame for the late war. You cannot expect them to give up their own comrades and to put their services at the disposal of any person who has in view the victory of capital over labour.

He also knows what the promises of the Government are. He has been promised a great deal and given very little. He has his own troubles with them in connection with demobilization, pensions and gratuities and I consider that he is more apt to side with the worker than with the capitalist.

Having said all this, I think the least I should do is to suggest a remedy. A remedy would be to grant the demands of the strikers in so far as an eight-hour day and collective bargaining are concerned. In regard to the civil servants, if they do not want to go back to work, put somebody else in their places. In regard to the undesirable elements which we have in the country, or which I am told we have, if they are undesirable, if their theories and actions are such that we find that the free air of Canada does not suit them, let us deport them. Let us deport them whether they come from the slums of Warsaw, from the ghettos of Rome, or whether they be the cockney off-scourings of Whitechapel or the dock rats of Liverpool. It matters not who they are, if they are undesirable citizens; I do not care where they come from; they are not fit to remain in our country. We had been led to believe until to-day that this undesirable element in Western Canada was the foreign element. We find now that the leaders of the Winnipeg strike are not of the foreign element but are British born—the British born that we heard so much about a few years ago. If these men are not satisfied with the laws of our country as they are at present administered; if they are not satisfied with our manners and customs, deport them. I would like to quote from a little pamphlet entitled "Social Reconstruction —A General Review of the Problems and Survey of Remedies." It is signed by such a conservative body the Roman Catholic bishops of the United States. They say:

> The labourer must come to realize that he owes his employer and society an honest day's work in return for a fair wage, and that conditions cannot be substantially improved until he roots out the desire to get a maximum of return for a minimum of service. The capitalist must likewise get a new viewpoint. He needs to learn the long-forgotten truth that wealth is stewardship, that profit-making is not the basic justification of business enterprise, and that there are such things as fair profits, fair interest and fair prices. Above and before all, he must cultivate and strengthen within his mind the truth which many of his class have begun to grasp for the first time during the present war; namely, that the labourer is a human being, not merely an instrument of production; and that the labourer's right to a decent livelihood is the first moral charge upon industry. The employer has a right to get a reasonable living out of his business, but he has no right to interest on his investment until his employees have obtained at least living wages. This is the human and Christian, in contrast to the purely commercial and pagan, ethics of industry.

In conclusion, I have confidence in the Canadian workman. I have seen the Canadian workman in more difficult circumstances than those of to-day. I remember well the circumstances under which I saw the Canadian workman two years ago to-day when our trenches from Hooge to Mount Sorrel had been completely wiped out. I saw the Canadian workmen counter-attack in broad daylight and in the face of numerous machine guns they never faltered. They carried on until there was hardly a man of them left and although they did not take the position on the first day they tried again and again and within two weeks every inch of the trench lost on the 2nd of June, every gun and every trench instrument that had been taken, were once more in the hands of the Canadian workman. Bearing that in mind I have no doubt that the man who was able to do that under those circumstances will be able to make arrangements whereby he will see to it that he works for the greater prosperity and greater benefit of this country.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior): Mr. Speaker, the subject of debate does not concern directly any of the departments of the Administration for which I am just now responsible, but inasmuch as for the moment the seat of chief disturbance is in the province from which I come, and inasmuch as I had something to do with the study of the situation on the ground, I venture to intervene in the debate. The motion of my hon. friend from North Winnipeg (Mr. Blake) will have served a good end if it succeeds in throwing some light upon the age-long problem of the relations between capital and labour —and it can do no more than throw some light upon it—or if it succeeds in bringing into relief, and enabling us to study at close range, the difficult and concrete conditions under which that problem has taken acute form in Winnipeg and various cities of the country. It is wholly beyond hope that by any consideration this Parliament can give to it in any single debate, we can make any substantial progress towards a solution of the world-wide problem of labour and capital. But perhaps it is not impossible that some ideas and principles may more clearly emerge whether merely precautionary, as were those with which the excellent speech delivered by the 9 p.m. hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) was replete, or whether of constructive positive policy, of which, I fear, so far every speech has been barren. In the struggle between labour and capital the history of the past has been the advance of the cause of labour, and the history of the future will be the same. No one can read the progress of the past or the signs of the times aright who is not prepared to admit that to the labourer belongs a larger, and ever larger, share of the product of his labour. Whenever legislation interferes it must be on behalf of the man behind. But merely stating a general principle like that does not lead us far in the consideration of any specific administrative acts that we can apply to the conditions that exist in this country.

The first thing necessary is to know the conditions that do exist and the causes that brought them about—what they are, and how far any general principle can be applied thereto. A general strike was declared in the city of Winnipeg on the 15th day of last month. Previous to that on the 10th day of the same month a strike had been declared on the part of the employees of three concerns—the Dominion Bridge Company, the Manitoba Bridge and Iron Company, and the Vulcan Iron Works—of the city of Winnipeg.

The dispute between the employees of those companies and the companies was a dispute as to what part, if any, should be taken by a body of men elected by certain branches of labour known as the Metal Trades Council in the determination of the conditions of labour in the shops of those three concerns. It is commonly said in Winnipeg, and has often been repeated here, that the principle of collective bargaining was the principle upon which the two sides to that initial dispute split. In one sense that may possibly be correct, but a mere statement like that leads us nowhere, because collective bargaining in the form described by many members has never been denied, and is not claimed to have been denied, by any of the three companies who are taking part in this dispute.

Collective bargaining on the part of all three had been their practice for some time; so much so that one at all events, and I think all of them, had adopted the habit of each week consulting with shop committees of their men as to conditions in the factory, as to improvements that might be made, as to hours of labour and wages. That is to say the principle of collective bargaining had been applied, insofar as collective bargaining was constituted by the negotiations between any single concern and the employees of that concern as a body. That fact admits of no dispute.

On the other hand, however, it was contended on the part of the Metal Trades Council, which is affiliated with, or indeed a constituent part of the Trades and Labour Council of the city of Winnipeg, that a bargain made between the collective employees of a concern and that concern, should not stand as a bargain until it was ratified by the Metal Trades Council. To that the employers in each case objected. They placed their objections on the ground that the Metal Trades Council was constituted by men elected by bodies and by crafts who in large degree had no part in and had no relation to any craft engaged by them; on the further grounds that the Metal Trades Council as constituted was composed very largely of men elected by the Metal Trades of the railway companies, and that conditions that might obtain in the shops of the railway companies could not possibly apply to conditions in the competitive shops of the other companies, inasmuch as the one had to compete in the markets and the other had not. However, it will be realized at a glance that there was a margin between the two sides to the controversy. There was a "No Man's Land" between. Collective bargaining by the employees in a single concern was not accepted as collective bargaining by the Metal Trades Council, nor by the Trades and Labour Council of the city. The employers, on the other hand, refused to extend, temporarily at all events, the principle of collective bargaining. They did, however, later agree that upon the establishment of anything in the nature of an organization between the employers themselves they would then be prepared to deal collectively with the united employees of the three concerns, or with a body of craftsmen of the description of those engaged by the three concerns, though there might be included outside parties not actually engaged by those concerns themselves.

It is only fair to those who went on strike to say that at the time the strike had been declared there was, so far as I know, no concession made of the willingness of the employers to negotiate otherwise than collectively with the employees of the three concerns respectively. Now in this relation it should be known at this stage, that in the opinion of the Minister of Labour the conception of collective employment, as entertained by the employers in that case was somewhat too narrow. It was equally and very decidedly his opinion that the conception of collective employment, as contended for on the part of the Metal Trades Council, was so wide as to be impracticable and dangerous to the cause of labour itself. It is the opinion of the Minister of Labour that where there is an organization of employers, then it is the duty of that organization to deal collectively, not only with the united body of their own employees, but with at least single crafts and unions of employees, consisting not merely of their workmen but of men in the same trade or craft though employed by others.

The point at issue mainly is this, and the reason I will explain as I pass along: The employees contended that the Metal Trades Council should be supreme, that they should have the right of imprimatur and ratification of all engagements entered into by the employees of any concern with the management of that concern and the Metal Trades Council as constituted undoubtedly held within its personnel representatives of crafts that have nothing to do with the crafts engaged by the three concerns affected.

Now there are other elements in the controversy of which it is well that Parliament should have full knowledge. The Government of the province, chiefly through the spokesmanship of the Premier, had made strenuous endeavours to effect a reconciliation. In the course of its endeavours meetings were held and a proposal was made that everything in dispute, and the main thing was the principle of collective bargaining, because on the part of one at all events arrangements had really been arrived at between the employers and the employed, but had been refused ratification by the Metal Trades Council—a proposal was made that all the matters in dispute be referred to a board of arbitration, the personnel of which should be five, and all selected by the Prime Minister of the province. That was not concurred in on the part of the strikers. Then later on, and before the general strike—before the 15th day of May, when the general strike was declared—the Premier requested from the Trades and Labour Council, or the Metal Trades Council, I am not sure which and it does not make any difference—yes, he requested of the Trades and Labour Council, to know whether or not, if the principle of collective bargaining on the part of the Metal Trades Council were conceded by the employers the general strike would still take place, and to that request he received a negative reply. As to that there is no dispute, there can be no dispute. The general strike took place in the face of the denial of the president of the Trades and Labour Council—in the face rather of his assertion that it would take place whether or not collective bargaining on the part of the Metal Trades Council was acknowledged as a sound principle by the employers. Whether or not it would have been so acknowledged I cannot say, but at all events the contingency of its being acknowledged was refused on the part of the president of the Trades and Labour Council as sufficient to ward off the general strike. As a result the general strike took place. The industry of the city of Winnipeg was for the time being paralyzed; public services were placed in a state of tie-up, and Winnipeg was virtually in a condition of isolation and siege.

Now, in discussing the inner principle of a general strike, and the rightness and the soundness of the action of a sympathetic strike, it is well to consider where action of that kind is bound to lead. It led in Winnipeg, as I say, to a general paralysis of the whole industrial structure of the city. It led to a denial of the necessities of life to the people of that city, even to the strikers themselves.

And as a consequence inevitably it led to the establishment of a separate Government—or better, assertion of governmental functions on the part of those in charge of the strike itself. And why? Because it could not lead anywhere else. A general strike ties up all industries and all activities, and denies to all parts and elements of the community the service of the necessities of life, not only public service but each and every ministration, the delivery of bread, the distribution of milk, the circulation of water—indeed all things that are necessary for the protection and preservation of life. As a consequence, and in order that the strikers might themselves exist, they had to exercise control over the distribution of the necessities of life; they had to appropriate to themselves public services to which all the people had contributed; they had to declare that the public services were their property for the time being and could be used for their benefit alone. And they did so declare, and upon that declaration they acted. They had to declare, furthermore, that there should be such a distribution of water by which they themselves should be served, but by which many others should not be served at all; that there should be a distribution of the milk of the city, that whom they nominated should be provided but that the general public should be denied; they were further bound to declare that the very bread of life should be distributed to such as were named by them, but that it should be refused to all others within the compass of the city of Winnipeg.

Those pretensions are an assertion of governmental authority. But the strike leaders were driven to make them if they were to continue effectively anything in the nature of a general strike. Consequently I say it is proved by the example of Winnipeg, and indeed follows inevitably from the very logic of the situation, that a general strike to succeed or, indeed, to continue, must result in the usurpation of governmental authority on the part of those controlling the strike. It did so result in Winnipeg; it must ever so result.

When that stage was reached, when that object lesson confronted the citizenship of Winnipeg, that citizenship was aroused and became organized, and as a consequence of that organization and of the united front it presented there was a rapid retirement on the part of those controlling the strike from the position of governmental authority that they had assumed, and consequently and inevitably there was a reduction in the general strike itself, because the leaders could not continue the strike as an effective general strike without the maintenance at the same time of the exercise of the functions of Government. That is why in the last ten days the strike has not assumed the proportions and has not involved the hardship that it did in the early days of the struggle.

A sympathetic strike is, of course, essential if a general strike is to take place. A sympathetic strike is a strike on the part of a class of labour, based not upon any grievance of its own, but founded entirely upon sympathy for those involved in another quarrel. Hon. gentlemen opposite and also, I think, some hon. gentlemen on this side, have approved the principle of the sympathetic strike. Now, I do not want it to be assumed from what I shall say that there is any statutory office this Parliament can fill with regard to sympathetic strikes—at all events, any useful statutory office; there is, however, a function that any Government can exercise in this Dominion, and that is by making known where it stands on this question, and why it stands where it stands, and let that have its influence by way of conciliation, or by way of moral constraint.

Now, what I am arguing is that the sympathetic strike almost necessarily involves the violation of contracts. A union itself is based upon the principle of collective bargaining. A union cannot effect its purpose unless it can bargain as a union, and make its engagement with an employer or combination of employers. In a word, one of the principal functions of a union is to make an engagement on behalf of its constituents with the employer concerned. If, having made any such engagement it is to be free to break it by reason of the quarrels of others, then of what value is the engagement? As a result we found in the city of Winnipeg the remarkable spectacle of men in the city by the hundred, yes, I believe by the thousand, who were on strike, as they claimed, for the principle of collective bargaining, and who at the same moment were declaring that any bargain on their part had no validity at all. In one breath they were saying: A collective bargain must be acknowledged on the part of the employers in this city. In the next breath they were saying: No bargain, collective or otherwise, has any force with us at all. Indeed they themselves were violating a collective bargain which they had made in one case only some few weeks before.

Now, it must be clear to hon. members that if the principle of the sympathetic strike, resulting in a general strike, is to be sound, then there can be no such thing as the sacredness of contracts—there can be no attribute of a bargain that would make a collective bargain of any value whatsoever. Therefore, I say that the Minister of Labour is sound and right when he declares that while a strike may be just when the balance of merit is on the side of the strikers, there is nothing that can justify a sympathetic strike in breach of a bargain; and there is nothing at any time that can justify a general strike involving upon the whole innocent community, the paralysis of industry, and the denial of the necessities of life.

In that condition of affairs we found Winnipeg when we visited it last week. We found at the same time a tremendous volume of public opinion well aroused and determined that assertion of government authority on the part of the strike leaders —or on the part of any one else—as opposed to the constituted authority of the country, should be at no time acknowledged by the people of Winnipeg. And the citizens of Winnipeg in taking that position have rendered a service not only to their own city and province, but to this entire Dominion. They have shown an example to the citizens of this country that the body of sensible opinion in Canada can and will set its face decidedly and effectively against anything in the nature of a general strike—anything in the nature of a soviet or any other form of government inconsistent with constituted authority.

I do not think it is necessary for me to bring written evidence of the assumption of soviet or other irresponsible authority further than the facts that I have adduced as to the declaration of right, and indeed, the acting upon that declaration of right to control the distribution of the necessities of life. But if further evidence were needed all one has to do is to look up the columns of the Labour News of that city and read the statements of the strike leaders themselves, who openly declared that they were in control and intended to continue in control, although they said they intended to do so without bloodshed and without force. Just as if the whole principle of government of this country could be overturned without bloodshed and without force! But it is apparent from a perusal of that paper that the strike leaders for a time believed themselves to be in possession of governmental power and were determined to exercise it, but were faced by an overpowering concentration of public opinion against which they could not avail.

Furthermore, the opinion had taken permanent root in that city that the issue that had given rise to the strike on the part of the employees of the three concerns was no longer the main or the present issue to be decided; that it had been swallowed up in a far greater issue, just as if a man or a class of men, in determining that they should assert a privilege of their own, had burned a city in reaching out for that privilege. Therefore, they said: Those who are fighting here for some form of collective bargaining have, to ensure the success of their claim, taken steps that are inconsistent with constituted Government, and they have raised an issue that entirely overshadows the first issue on which they went out on strike, an issue that must be decided once and for all before we return to weighing and determining the merits of the first cause of quarrel. In that position, I submit the citizens of Winnipeg were right.

It was essential that the greater issue raised by the assumption of Soviet authority—and it was nothing less on the part of those in control of the strike in the city of Winnipeg—should be once and for all decided and be decisively beaten down before they should concern themselves with the smaller and much less important issue upon which certain men had originally gone on strike. That is the stand the citizens of Winnipeg took. That is the stand the Minister of Labour took, and I leave it to the House whether or not he acted in the interests of this country in taking that stand as determinedly as he did. In that position the matter rests to-day.

We found as well that about 450 employees of the city post office about 180 of whom were letter-carriers and the rest postal clerks, had joined in the sympathetic strike, and in violation, as we claimed and I think rightly, of their oaths of office, had deserted their posts, and as a result the postal service, a necessary public service, was out of existence. What action should have been taken under those circumstances? Inasmuch as the strike on their part was on a sympathetic footing and nothing more; inasmuch as within only a few weeks before representatives of those men had, in writing, assured the Government of the satisfactory treatment of their grievances; inasmuch as they had gone out without notice and without cause, we decided that some time should be given to them to return and that with the approval of the Government on the expiration of that time their positions should be vacant if they failed to return and they should be no longer employed in the public service. As a result of the announcement of that decision which appeared in the issue of the Morning Press of Saturday, the 24th May, there returned on the morning of the 26th, I think, 70 of those employees. On the morning of the 26th May returning employees were harangued by the Rev. Mr. Ivens on the one hand and Mr. Winning, President of the Trades and Labour Council on the other, who standing respectively in the rear and in the front of the office tried to persuade the returning men that they should hold back; that the decision of the Government was nothing more than a hoax or a bluff, and with all the force of their oratory—and it has some quality—they endeavoured to make the men hold fast against constituted authority and stand in full allegiance to the strike leaders instead of to the public of this country. Had it not been for that, I doubt not that more would have returned. The business, however, of this Government was to see to it that all desiring should have free access to the office; that no physical impediment and no threats should deter them, and that duty was fully carried out on the part of the officers of the Government. No man was deterred, no man was intimidated; all had free and full privilege of returning to work, and not doing so, the promise of the Government was implemented, and at twelve o'clock on the 26th May all who did not return, about 380 in number, lost their positions in the service of Canada and shall not be further employed.

Concurrently with the action of the Dominion Government in this regard, the Provincial Government took precisely similar action with regard to the telephone employees and their decision took effect also at exactly the same hour. The city of Winnipeg has since taken similar, although not wholly similar, action with regard to its employees. As a consequence, it is only the truth to say that the force of the general strike in the city of Winnipeg has been very largely broken; business has been restored, not to normal, but to something approaching normal level. At all events, the conditions of life are tolerable, but the attitude of mind of the citizens remains still, in my belief, adamant that nothing but defeat and complete defeat shall attend the efforts of men who dare to assert the authority of Government and who in doing so bring hardship on the whole community in order that they might win in a quarrel between certain employees and certain employers. The strike about that time and since has extended to some other cities in Canada, strikes not altogether related to that in Winnipeg, although in many cases related. Wherever in those strikes, the public service has been demoralized, the attitude taken by the Government and the policy adopted has been the same as it was in the city of Winnipeg. We have notified all concerned that if they engage in those strikes on a sympathetic basis—and there is no other—they thereby resign their posts in the public service and they are not further to be employed. That has taken effect in Calgary, and in the city of Winnipeg some 109 railway mail clerks went out on strike after I left, but all returned within the twenty-four hours' time given to them by the Minister of Labour for that purpose. They had not been warned in the same way as postal clerks in other cities, and that being the case, it was deemed fair that a reasonable time should be given to them, so they were allowed 24 hours, and all returned within the 24 hours.

We felt it necessary that the Government of the country should be well advised as to the exact facts connected with the extraordinary circumstances obtaining in that city. The telegraph was more or less denied; communication with the city was very limited; it was impossible at this distance to gauge not only what were the exact facts in dispute and the merits of the various classes that went out on strike, but the state of public opinion in that city in order to enable us to know whether or not we could supply voluntary effort to take the place of the strikers; whether or not public opinion was sufficiently aroused and seized of all the facts to back up the Government and enable it to carry out a policy of replacing those strikers by voluntary workers for the time and by permanent substitutes at the expiration of a fixed period. Consequently, it was visited by members of the Government and a survey was made of the whole situation. Men representing the strikers were taken into conference fully and at length. All they had to say, everything they had to urge, was heard sympathetically on the part of the representatives of the Government. For, let me say here: If there stands in Canada to-day a man who represents in fullest sympathy the cause of labour and labour organizations and labour unions, it is the Minister of Labour; a man who has undoubtedly the confidence of labour and labour organizations in this Dominion, and a man who, in my judgment, having had some opportunity to study closely the circumstances has to-day the confidence even of most of the strikers in the city of Winnipeg.

I have argued that the sympathetic strike cannot at all events become general, and in the main cannot take place, unless we concede the right to the violation of solemn contracts. I have argued further that the general strike cannot take place unless it is to be followed by an assumption of governmental power on the part of the leaders of the strike, who have no constituted responsible authority.

Let me carry that argument a little further, because what I want to impress upon the House is this: There is not in this dispute any question at all about the recognition of the right to labour unions; none whatsoever. No man can give a moment's thought to the circumstances and pretend to argue that the question of the recognition of labour unions is an issue in any degree at all; it is not an issue. The question as to the form of collective bargaining is in part an issue, and there may be merit on one side and merit on the other. In the opinion of the Minister of Labour there is demerit on the part of both, and some merit on the part of each, but no one can argue that the right to labour unions was involved in this strike. What shall be the form of collective bargaining was in the first place an issue. It was superseded after by a far greater, and a far graver issue that is now being fought out and decided; but for the time being it was an issue. What I want to impress upon the House is this: If collective bargaining is to be granted as a principle—and it is granted as a principle, as hon. gentlemen say, in other countries as well as in this—then there must be some unit to which the principle of collective bargaining is to apply, and beyond which it cannot go. It cannot for one moment be argued merely because collective bargaining is to be acknowledged that there shall be an unlimited and heterogeneous collection of all classes of labour that may get together ad infinitum and then say to employers or to any class of employers "You must bargain with us and cannot come to a decision unless with us." If that is to take place then not only the Metal Trades Council of the city of Winnipeg, composed of crafts that are in no way concerned or employed by the employers in the dispute, can itself bargain as to conditions and wages with many of its members, even the majority of its members, have nothing at all to do therewith, but the Trades and Labour Council of the city of Winnipeg may also do the same, and you might extend it right on and on until you would have every organization of labour in the Dominion united and all exerting their united influence in every dispute that might occur. Can any one contemplate such an event? Can anyone contemplate that such an event could possible exist concurrently with responsible government by the people? Are we to have on the one hand a concentration of employers, and on the other hand a concentration of all the labour interests of the Dominion, fighting it out for supremacy? Collective bargaining, unless you bring it down to some unit, is bound to reach that end. If you are going to have a combination of all organizations of labour in the Dominion taking part in and determining the event of every dispute as to labour conditions and wages here, there, and at any other point, why then you have the perfection of Bolshevism. It would be nothing less. You would have an organization that could hold aloft the weapon of the strike or any other weapon—could hold that weapon aloft in majesty and dictate and read out to the rest of this country the conditions of life itself. Can any one find fault with the reasoning that leads to that conclusion?

All I say in this: Collective bargaining is sound, but a unit must be found towards which the principle of collective bargaining is to apply and beyond which it must not go. Otherwise, you lead inevitably to a concentration of labour on the one hand, and of capital on the other, to a condition of dictation on the one hand and subordination on the other, whichever it may be, and to the complete elimination of governmental authority, because under those conditions it could not subsist. A general strike would then mean a paralysis of the activities of the entire Dominion, and indeed it might extend beyond the nation itself. Therefore, let me repeat, you must come to some unit, whatever it may be when you apply the principle of collective bargaining.

What should the Government have done that it has not done? I remarked early in my address that we had had nothing in the way of constructive suggestion. It is true that the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) prefaced his speech by the assertion, in language of which he is a master, that by our long career of errors and blunders and disasters this Government had brought about the terrible condition of affairs that he says now presents itself, but, no doubt out of affection for the Administration, he mercifully refrained from even mentioning any of these blunders or errors.

Mr. JACOBS: It would take too long.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would not take too long to mention one, and I am not in such a hurry that I would not give the honourable gentleman a chance to mention one just now.

Mr. JACOBS: I will in a few moments.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is the safer course I will give the honourable gentleman a chance to name them all in a few moments, and I hope he will support what he says. It is true that the honourable member from Kamouraska ended by a pitiful appeal to the Government to do something—something— he knew not what. The honourable member for South Quebec (Mr. Power) also seemed to think we could in some way reduce the high cost of living by taking the bull by the horns. Outside of these two admirable suggestions, I am afraid the afternoon has passed without any recommendation being offered, except indeed a word of practical caution on the part of the mover and of the honourable member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle).

The Government of this country is peculiarly responsible for the administration of the public service to the best advantage of the people of this country. Is there any step we could have taken with relation to the public service that we did not take? It is argued on the part of some that there was a failure to implement promises made last summer to the post office employees. There was no failure at all. I had something to do with the settlement of that strike last summer. With all my limitations, and I know they are many, I ventured to act as a conciliator, and some way or other I had some success. Every promise I made was carried out to fulfilment. I said that if they should return to work I would recommend pay while out, that all should be accepted back, and that immediately the Civil Service Commission should sit upon the determination of their grievances, but that I could not recommend an increase by way of bonus or otherwise without the authority of the Civil Service Commission. Not only were all these promises implemented, but under the special circumstances which were revealed here, a bonus was granted. Consequently, no fault can be brought home to the Administration that has the remotest relation to the strike on the part of the members of the public service that has taken place in the city of Winnipeg. Furthermore, whatever one might argue in that regard the strikers themselves by their action put any such argument by the board because they openly and frankly declared that they struck out of sympathy with the metal workers of that city, and in order, as they thought, to establish the principle of collective bargaining.

Now I am not here to argue as to what should be the change, if any, in the law with regard to strikes. That should first be considered collectively by the Administration, if any change indeed can be suggested. But I do wish to impress this upon the House: that the authority under our Federal constitution of the Dominion Government or of the Dominion Parliament with relation to the settlement of strikes is limited—very limited indeed.

Whether or not it is best that the precise division of responsibility that now constitutionally exists should have existed, or should continue to exist, I do not say. But the fact is that it does exist. It is fixed by the law and constitution of this country, and it is well that all should understand where that division is. The determination of civil rights in this Dominion is in the hands of provincial legislatures and those alone. The relations between employers and employed as to hours of labour, conditions of toil, and so forth, are relations of civil rights, and as such are beyond the jurisdiction of the Parliament of this Dominion. The habit has grown of following a plain assertion of truth of this kind by the comment that it is passing the buck to another; but the buck can never lie at the feet of those who are constitutionally incompetent to move it. Truth lies on one side or the other. Why should we not face it? I am making no complaint as to failure of any provincial authority to intervene or establish different relationships between employers and employed. That is another question altogether. On authority of the officers of the Crown, that power is not ours, and consequently we cannot exercise it, and should not be complained of for not indulging in the exercise of an authority which we have no power to make effective. We could, it is true, by constituting the employment of labour, say, beyond a certain number of hours per day, a criminal offense, assert and assume jurisdiction. But it is going pretty far to ask the Parliament of Canada, especially as respects employers and employees in private concerns, to say that a certain act on the part of these concerns is a crime, before any provincial legislature has decided that the prevention of it is a civil obligation. Laws regarding hours of labour in certain classes of workers have been passed by some, I think by all, provincial legislatures of the Dominion. Laws upon that subject generally, upon conditions of labour, child labour, women labour, hours of labour in general, have been passed by provincial legislatures almost times without number and are clearly within their jurisdiction and competency. Laws of that nature are not within our jurisdiction unless we choose to make a certain deed, which is not perhaps at all an offence against civil law, and which is not denied as a matter of civil right, a criminal offense. It would scarcely be suggested that we should take that course. Therefore, let it be clear that as respects a general law for the reduction of the hours of labour in this Dominion the problem, for the present at all events, is one for the provincial legislatures. Furthermore as to a general law setting up and enforcing the principle of collective bargaining, that itself is also a matter in regard to which the function of the Dominion Government can not be directory but conciliatory and advisory alone. We could not by specific legislation declare and make it an obligation of an employer or set of employers to adopt the principle of collective bargaining. All we can do in that regard is to say where we stand on the subject—where the Department of Labour stands and what is its advice and to press that advice by way of conciliation whereever it can do good. Having done that, our powers are exhausted so far as these subjects are concerned.

Now, in a general study of the whole problem, while I think all hon. members will agree that the whole tendency has been and will be an addition to labour of its share in the product of industry, the part that any single country can play at any one time in the solution of that problem is very limited indeed. No single nation, no single industrial national unit, can advance appreciably beyond the general line of the industry of the world. The industrial units of the single nation must compete in world trade with the industrial units of others, and handicaps cannot be put upon them which will unduly or disastrously militate against them in that competition. If such is done all will suffer—employers and employed. Subject to that consideration, it seems to me the duty of Parliament and of Governments, provincial and federal, is to see to it that labour conditions are ameliorated and that labour hours are reduced, because unquestionably with the multiplication and increased efficiency of machinery all the wants of mankind can be supplied without anything in the nature of oppressive toil. Unquestionably, by a much shorter day than has obtained in times gone by we can get along in this world and have all the legitimate wants of mankind supplied; and I say that it is the duty of legislatures and of Governments to make it possible, and indeed to make it imperative so far as lies in their and our constitutional powers, that the hours of labour be shortened and the conditions of labour be improved, so long as we do not go more rapidly than is consistent with the reasonable necessities of our industry in competition with the industry of other nations. That is the way in which I view the duty of the Parliament of Canada, and the duty of the provincial legislatures of this Dominion as a matter of general principle.

The problem is, indeed, a difficult one. These particular employers in Winnipeg have said already, " We are quite ready to go down to nine hours and we believe we can do that and compete with our competitors in Ontario and other provinces, but we say we cannot go to eight hours until they do the same." And they have said—at all events the Manitoba Bridge and Iron Works have said clearly, that just as soon as their competitors in Eastern Canada went to eight hours they were prepared to do the same and to bind themselves in writing accordingly upon that proviso. That is an illustration of the condition and the difficulties that present themselves in one province as compared to another. Consequently it might have been well—I am not arguing whether it would or not; there are difficulties the other way also—if the constitution had been framed so as to make this question a federal instead of a provincial one. But it is not worth arguing. The fact is that it is not a federal question.

The tendency is, and I hope it may be more rapid in the future than it has been in the past, to a reduction in the hours of toil, particularly on the part of the manual labourer, whose title to such reduction is sounder and more just than that of any other class of labour in the world. The tendency, I repeat, is to a reduction in the hours of labour and toward an increase in the remuneration of toil, both in the absolute and relatively, to other occupations. My only object has been to set out as clearly as I could what concrete facts present themselves in the face of the dispute that exists in the city of Winnipeg, and its reflection in many other cities in the country, to submit that those concrete facts comprised the issue in the first place were overshadowed by a subsequent larger issue, and that such larger issue must be rightly decided before the offices of this Government, or, indeed, of the provincial government can be usefully exercised towards a settlement of the initial dispute. That view I believe the provincial government share. I have also ventured to outline the general principle along which I think legislation should move in the treatment of the great struggle that has for ages long subsisted between capital anl labour and that can at best be ameliorated and not, at all events for many years, wholly removed or solved.

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (George Etienne Cartier): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) this afternoon deplored the fact that when the Government decided to send delegates to Winnipeg to endeavour to settle the unfortunate disturbances which exist there now they should have selected the hon. Acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Meighen))for that purpose. Those of us in the House who may have thought that the hon. member for Kamouraska was using language perhaps a little too harsh in regard to the hon. Acting Minister of Justice, will, I think, come to the conclusion, after having listened to the address with which he has just regaled the House, that he was quite right in his statement that it was a mistake of prime importance to send a gentleman with the cast of mind, and constituted with such a temperament as his, to endeavour to settle a strike of the magnitude we have on our hands now. One would have imagined, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman thought that he was in a court of justice and that he was pleading the case of the metal employers as against the employees. I do not know that I ever heard a finer piece of forensic special pleading in my life than that which we heard from the hon. Acting Minister of Justice to-night. Incidentally he told us that his sympathies were with labour, that at some time in the future labour would probably achieve what it had set out to achieve; in other words, that "man never is, but always to be blest."

We have a situation confronting us in Winnipeg that concerns the whole Dominion, and yet the hon. gentleman talks to us about provincial and federal rights and the encroachment of one upon the other. That is, I consider, something quite beneath the hon. gentleman. When we have our house on fire we endeavour to extinguish the flames in the best way we can with the means at hand, and in our efforts we take the best means at hand. The attitude of the hon. gentleman towards this question reminds me of the story of Mr. Squeers, of Dotheboy's Hall, in Nicholas Nickleby. He was such a kind man and his wife was such a kind woman that when the poor orphan child was dying they got out the best dictionary in the house and laid it under his head for a pillow. That is what the hon. gentleman is endeavouring to do now. He has treated us to fine words, he has given us a magnificent address; he has told us the position of the manufacturers, and he has told us that the strikers have actually been so bold as to violate a contract. He says that in going on this sympathetic strike they violated a contract. I admit they violated a contract. The Allies went to war with Germany and contracts were violated as soon as war was declared. Does not the hon. gentleman know a strike is war, that war is negation of all law and that when you are at war you do not stop to consider contracts or who is right or who is wrong while the war lasts? The discussion does not turn on the question of the contract or who is right and who is wrong, but you ask yourself the question: Why is it that the Government allowed this trouble to go so far without taking any action in the matter? We have sat here for the last four weeks talking on the legislation which has been presented by the Government. For the last four weeks we have had rumours of these strikes in the West, and particularly in Winnipeg. What has been done by the Government in the way of an attempt to see that this strike did not come about? Absolutely nothing. We have a Minister of Labour in Canada. Have any of us ever seen the Minister of Labour? We have certainly never seen him in this Chamber for the good and sufficient reason that he can not constitutionally enter this representative Chamber of the people. We have to seek for him in the rarer atmosphere of the Senate chamber. Last year we complained about the masterly inactivity of the then Minister of Labour; we charged him with being asleep when he should have been awake, but we never accused him of being awake when he should have been asleep. Now, they have changed the situation and given us a Minister of Labour who does not sit in this House. Last year we were chastised with whips, this year we are chastised with scorpions. For three weeks past questions have been asked almost daily of the Government as to what was being done about the strike, and their maid of all work, the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean), who speaks for the Minister of Labour, would get up, and in his bland manner, tell us that "the Government has the situation well in hand." They have it well in hand? They have it well on their hands now and it is for them to get rid of it. Nothing was done towards seeing if some solution of the difficulty could not be found. The Department of Labour leaves these two interests to settle their differences amongst themselves. The place for the Minister of Labour during the last four weeks was in Winnipeg attempting to bring the parties together. He did nothing of the kind, and it was only when public feeling was worked up throughout the whole Dominion that he, accompanied by the Acting Minister of Justice, went to Winnipeg. What did they do when they arrived? We find by the press that the mayor of Winnipeg, who naturally would know something about the conditions which prevailed there at the time, complained that for forty-eight hours after they arrived they never even called upon him officially or unofficially; that they never saw the mayor, in so far as I know, during the entire time they were there. The complaint was made publicly by the mayor that these gentlemen representing the Government, and particularly the Minister of Labour, never considered it worth while to go into immediate conference with the mayor and try to settle the strike.

The question of collective bargaining seems to be the difficulty between the two parties to the dispute, or it was at the beginning. As I understand it, when the strike trouble first started, the employees of certain industries demanded the right to collectively discuss with the employers matters affecting every branch of trade of that particular industry. What difficulty was there about that which the minister could not settle? There might have been some difficulty between the two contending parties, but it was the duty of the Minister of Labour to have located himself in the city of Winnipeg at that time and had he done so it would not have taken very long for him to have brought the parties together. He could have brought the parties together if he had been there but he was recreant in his duty. He never faced the situation and now the Government are trying to stand from under when they find the situation is such that they cannot handle it.

In regard to collective bargaining, it is generally recognized in the United States, it is recognized in England and it is recognized in every country where they have discussed the matter up to the present time. But judging from the remarks of the Acting Minister of Justice one would imagine that if this were to be accorded to the strikers it would mean the overturning of our constitution and the rebellion of the people of the whole country. These people were perfectly right in their demand for collective bargaining because it is only by banding together that they can obtain rights in a way corresponding to that in which the manufacturers band together for their own purposes.

When this conflagration started in Winnipeg what were we doing in this House? We were discussing soothing syrup. You will remember that we went into a very long and learned discussion upon the question of soothing syrup, not for the strikers in Winnipeg but for the infants under one year of age. The hon. member who speaks for the Minister of Labour waxed quite eloquent upon the deleterious ingredients of soothing syrup. A day or two was devoted to this question in Committee and we finally sent it to a Select Committee for further consideration. Then we discussed the question of titles. I am disposed to agree that the question of titles is one of importance and that it was right that it should have been discussed at that particular time.

The Right Hon. the Prime Minister was away at the time, and it was necessary that we should get that Bill through before he returned, or the same thing would have happened here which happened last year. I do not begrudge the fact that we did spend a day and get this matter cleared out of the way before the Prime Minister arrived. "When the cat is away, the mice will have their say." I think the last time I saw the Prime Minister it was a day or two before he left for England last year, and prior to his arrival on the other side we found that the net result of his having held up the question of titles was that his brother secured one, his private secretary secured one, and the apologist for titles in this House, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, also secured one. Perhaps if I had known titles were so easy to secure, I might myself have said a word or two in their behalf and been rewarded in the same way. I merely mention this to point out that it was necessary that titles should have been discussed before the Prime Minister's return this year.

Then we had the Sexual Offences Bill, the Fisheries Inspection Bill, and matters of that kind, and this important question, which should have been discussed three weeks ago, and ventilated in the House so that the country could know something about it, was stood aside until now, when it has got almost beyond our power. The Minister of Labour finally found his way to Winnipeg, where evidently several conferences were held with the strikers and with others. And what do you think happened afterwards, Mr. Speaker? An S.O.S. call was sent to Mr. Samuel Gompers. Just think of it. A call was sent to Mr. Samuel Gompers, advising him that the strikers had already defeated themselves, a congratulatory message, I fancy, but inasmuch as there was reason to think that possibly the intervention of Mr. Gompers might help to a certain extent, it would be advisable for him to take some action in the matter. Well, as I understand it, Mr. Gompers is not in any way connected with this movement, which started in Winnipeg, three or four weeks ago. It has got beyond the power of Mr. Gompers, and I cannot see why the Minister of Labour should have seen fit to call upon that gentleman unless it be that he wanted to return a compliment which had been paid to us some years ago when a serious strike was on in Colorado and Mr. John D. Rockefeller wired to Mr. Mackenzie King to come down and settle that strike, and inasmuch as the strike was satisfactorily settled I suppose the Minister of Labour considered it would be exceedingly courteous on his part if he were to invite Mr. Gompers to come to Canada for a similar purpose. As my hon. friend the member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) stated, it was a most humiliating thing on the part of the Minister of Labour, implicating, as he did, the Government to invite an outside gentleman to take a hand in the settlement and discussion of this matter. Had it succeeded it might have amounted to something; nothing has been heard of the summons, and, as far as I know, Mr. Gompers has not even answered the wire.

The Prime Minister is being given a great deal of credit, and rightly so, for the work which he has done in the matter of the Peace Conference at Paris. He is a past-master in the art of peacemaking; that would seem to be his métier. We have it heralded in all the government organs of the country that as a peacemaker he stands pre-eminent. Might I suggest that while he has this divine afflatus about him he find his way out to Winnipeg and see whether he cannot use some of the methods which he has so successfully tried in Paris and bring about the settlement of this strike. We know he is—at least the newspapers have told us so—one of the most intimate friends of Mr. Lloyd George, and probably, having sat at the feet of that estimable gentleman, he must have learned something of the art of peacemaking. Mr. Lloyd George undoubtedly knows something about peacemaking. Whenever a strike of any proportions whatever looms up on the horizon in England Mr. Lloyd George is on the spot and the strike is settled forthwith. Why is it, therefore, that having had the tutelage of the Prime Minister of Great Britain, the Prime Minister of Canada does not see his way to bring about a successful termination of the Winnipeg strike? He has the opportunity of his life now, and I hope he will take advantage of it as soon as possible. We have been getting along very well without the Prime Minister. I do not mean to say as well as if he were here, but we have been pottering along fairly well for the last six months, and I think that the House would be quite willing to lend his services to the city of Winnipeg for a short time to see to it that this strike is brought to a conclusion.

In connection with this matter of collective bargaining, I would like to give the House an illustration of how it is working in the city of Montreal. Hon. gentlemen are aware that some time ago credits aggregating something like $25,000,000 were granted to the kingdom of Rumania, and orders were given for the manufacture of clothing and woollen goods to different merchants in Canada. Those merchants met here and parcelled out the orders among themselves. What did they do as soon as they got those orders? They at once sent for the President of the Garment Makers' Union of America, who controls all the garment workers of this country, and they asked him to supply them with a certain number of garment workers in order to do this work. They asked for pressers, and stitchers and tailors, and so on, and made a bargain collectively with the Garment Workers of America in order to supply the necessary workmen to do this work. That is the way astute commercial men do their business. If that thing can be done in the case of Government contracts, and other Government work, why cannot it be done in the case of the strike in the city of Winnipeg? I think, Mr. Speaker, it will generally be conceded by the House and the country that the Government has woefully fallen down in its endeavour to settle this strike; that it will have to admit its bankruptcy, so far as settling matters of this kind is concerned, and it will only be a very short time when the necessary petition to force them into the bankruptcy courts will be filed by the people of this country.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN: Mr. Speaker, this afternoon the member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Blake) moved the adjournment of the House in order that he might discuss the strikes in Winnipeg, and other Canadian cities, together with all the circumstances, conditions, and causes, near and remote, having any bearing upon them or any connection therewith. I thought it might be quite fitting that I should read the motion that the hon. gentleman made this afternoon so as to remind my hon. friend (Mr. Jacobs) who has just taken his seat that he has entirely forgotten that motion, and has not directed any of his remarks to it. This is regrettable because the hon. gentleman is exceedingly able, and I am sure that the House would have welcomed any remarks which he could offer upon the very interesting subject which has been debated this afternoon—a subject which is not only interesting, but a serious one for the country. The hon. gentleman was disposed to criticise the Minister of Labour because he had not visited Winnipeg earlier. My hon. friend is apparently under the impression that the Minister of Labour had not intervened in this matter until his arrival in Winnipeg some time last week. I wish to assure him that this particular industrial strike in that city had had the personal attention of the Minister of Labour long before he visited Winnipeg, as all strikes throughout Canada from time to time have had his personal attention.

My hon. friend (Mr. Jacobs) also expressed surprise that the Minister of Labour should place himself in telegraphic communication with one of the greatest and most distinguished labour leaders of the world, Mr. Samuel Gompers. This criticism was not quite apt, because Mr. Gompers is much interested in this particular strike, many of the trades unions in the city of Winnipeg being affiliated with the international organization of which he is the head.

My hon. friend complains very bitterly and persistently that the Minister of Labour was unable to be present in this House, for reasons which he gave, and thereby was unable to inform hon. members as to the progress which was being made in the settlement of this particular strike, and as to industrial conditions generally throughout Canada. A statement appeared this morning in the press from the Minister of Labour, which was made public just prior to his departure from Winnipeg for Ottawa, and I am disposed to ask the House to listen to me for a moment while I read two or three paragraphs of that statement. I think it proper that I should do so because the minister is not here to express his views himself, His statement is as follows:

> The promoters of the general strike in Winnipeg now sit in the ashes of their folly. Something like 30,000 men and women were called out, professedly for the purpose of enforcing the recognition of the right of collective bargaining. In responding to the call, the majority violated and repudiated their obligations to their own trade union and their contract with their employers. Individually and collectively they wilfully discarded their agreements indicating that the possession of what they are contending for is of little value.
> Labor organizations which require that contracts made be fulfilled, merit and command the respect of employers, of the public and of governments. Labor leaders who advocate that only might is right, who hold that law, justice and honor should be discarded at will, merit and receive the condemnation of all good citizens.
>
> If an employer or a number of employers in a given industry deny to their workmen the right to bargain collectively for the sale of their service, the entire force of the workmen may properly be directed against the offender and the public will approve and sympathize. In a general sympathetic strike the force is directed against the whole community who are innocent of any responsibility for the offence and public indignation is immediately aroused because of the inconvenience, loss and suffering imposed upon innocent people. Therefore sympathetic strikes must always fail.
>
> In March last at Calgary the play was written. "The Winnipeg strike". Was its first rehearsal with the main performance promised for a later date? The Winnipeg rehearsal has cost approximately two million dollars in wages lost in Western Canada and has proven the play to have been badly written and unpopular with both the public and most of the performers.
> Employers must not mistake the outcome of the general sympathetic strike as a defeat to organized labor, on the contrary, labor will emerge from the conflict strengthened with the wisdom gained from its experience. Numerous strong labor organizations have by their voice and actions largely contributed to the outcome because they believe the general sympathetic strike is wrong, vicious and demoralizing, Employers should rather seek to deal justly and at this period liberally, with their workmen and assist the bona fide labour unions in their legitimate efforts to obtain a reasonable wage for all who are willing to help.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the judgment of a man who is a friend of labour, and there is none greater in this country. I cannot for one moment make myself believe that there can ever be any serious difference of opinion in this country as to the action of the Minister of Labour in connection with the Winnipeg strike. Originally there may have been some merit in the demands of the strikers, as the Minister of the Interior has already stated. That issue, however, soon passed away, and the issue became this: shall constituted authority prevail in this country, or shall a certain section of the community usurp it? That is the issue to-day, and it should end in only one way. It would be an unfortunate thing for this country if the principle asserted by the strikers were to prevail, and I am surprized that their action has received the volume of commendation that it has in this House and outside.

Now, Mr. Speaker, in connection with the unrest which prevails throughout the world to-day, what we are most interested in is to know, in the first place, what are its causes; and, secondly, what can be done to abate it. Can any remedy be prescribed? There is to-day without doubt some political, social and industrial unrest in Canada. That is true of every other country in the world, and history shows that it is a characteristic condition following all wars. I assume that every intelligent and reflective man anticipated political, social and industrial unrest following the war. And it is not at all wonderful, Sir, that these conditions are found in this country, certainly no far-seeing man could expect this country to participate in one of the greatest wars in history for a period of four and a half years and at its end find stable conditions politically, industrially and socially. We shall have more of such unrest, and it is well that our people should recognize that fact. It would be the part of folly to expect that we shall be entirely free of further industrial unrest. Other countries do not expect such to be the case. In the first place, the war is not over, and while the world cries for peace there cannot be peace until the treaty is signed, the armies are demobilized and the economic processes which prevailed in pre-war days restored. As an actual fact, the combat still goes on in Russia and in Hungary. Before 1914 the war now being waged in Russia alone would, I imagine, have been regarded as one of the greatest in history. Even if the war were over, we could not immediately grasp the results of that terrible catastrophe. Unemployment will, I fear, prevail in many countries of the world for quite a time to come, and worse than that, famine will make its appearance in many countries. I would imagine, although I do not presume to speak with accuracy, that up to the present time probably famine has reaped as great a harvest as have the contending armies. The most serious and solemn spectacle which presents itself to the world at the present moment is the fear of famine, decimating the peoples of many countries by the thousands and by the millions. So serious is the outlook that I cannot but take quite seriously the industrial situation in this and in other countries.

Our problems in Canada are largely manifested in the form of unemployment and industrial unrest. Is this a surprise? Should it not have been anticipated? Let me ask hon. gentlemen if it would be fair to expect that any Government or that organized society, could provide absolutely to meet this unemployment and this industrial unrest? The war built up large war industries; existing business expanded; the warring nations were contending for the immediate delivery of war materials and prices which would have been called insane in peace times were offered for war material. This resulted in increased prices of materials and increased wages for workers; and wholesalers and retailers, demanding some of these increased wages, raised their price to the public. Positions sought men and not men positions. Then a sudden reversion to peace necessitated the disestablishment of all the industrial works that had been established during the war, and unemployment necessarily followed. Then men were looking for positions and not positions for men. This could not be avoided in Canada nor anywhere else. These conditions prevail in every country in the world to-day, and it should be a matter of pride for Canadians at this moment that our conditions in this respect are not at all comparable with the conditions which prevail in Great Britain, in all other European countries and even in the United States.

[Mr. A. K. Maclean.]

No Whitley scheme could meet the case fully and completely. Conditions of trade are always intimately associated with industrial problems. Trade is but the exchange of goods, and if opportunities to carry on an exchange of goods are prevented or minimized by any factors, whatever they may be, then trade is hampered, and there must be industrial unrest and some unemployment. We cannot anticipate, and nobody could rationally hope for, an immediate resumption of trade conditions as they prevailed in pre-war days. In the first place, as I have already stated, peace has not yet been signed; armies have not yet been fully demobilized; capital is timid, and trade channels have been disrupted. It will be many months, I fear, before a very large part of this world will be able to resume its economic processes. Until international trade is resumed, we shall have industrial problems. We may minimize them by the granting of credits to countries which wish to become purchasers of our products but which are unable to buy the same unless we furnish the credits. This has been done to some extent. The granting of credits has been criticized, but nevertheless unless this had been done conditions in this country would have been far worse than they are at the present moment.

I refer to these conditions merely to emphasize this fact that employers and employees should recognize them. It should be conceded generally that we are confronted with conditions which we did not create and which are unavoidable, conditions which are difficult of solution, which are capable of a great deal of harm to this country and its citizens. The inevitable conclusion is that the duty devolves upon everybody, employer, employee and citizen, to contribute his part in the solution of a problem unprecedented in our history and one which unfortunately confronts almost every nation in the world. If we in Canada exhibit the spirit of patriotism and co-operation which our people exhibited during the long four and a half years of the war, we shall in the end overcome all these domestic, industrial and political difficulties which to-day confront us.

This war means a social reconstruction of this country, and, I imagine, of all countries. Representatives of all strata of society have fought, bled and died together in the same trenches to maintain a common purpose. I believe that this democratic spirit and this comradeship of the trenches will not soon perish from the earth, and that is generally conceded by men in this and other countries. The conditions of those engaged in labour prior to the war, especially in some countries, were not creditable to our civilization. That is not as true of Canada as of Great Britain and some other European countries. The war has clearly left the impression upon all thoughtful men that the amelioration of conditions of labour and improvement in the status of people engaged in labour must receive the early and sympathetic attention of all countries, and it is the duty, not merely of governments, but of members of parliament and of citizens to recognize this and to play their part in achieving this end.

The hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) this afternoon made many assertions which were, after all, pure assumptions on his part and which, as a matter of fact, are not correct.

For instance, he talked as if there was a tendency on the part of somebody to deny to labour the right of organization. That statement was unnecessary because it is quite incorrect and unfounded. Nobody in this country worth thinking about denies to labour the right of organization. It is a piece of folly on the part of any industrial head to deny to his employees the right of organization. He should welcome it, and I am sure that in saying that I am reflecting the personal judgment and wishes of every member of the Government.

There is no disposition on the part of the Government to deny the statement that the hours of labour should be shortened. Personally, I should like to see an eight-hour day in this country, and I have felt that way for a good number of years. As a matter of fact the eight-hour day prevails very largely in Canada to-day. It is being adopted gradually, and I trust that it will become common even without legislative intervention. My hon. friend from Kamouraska seemed to argue that there was a tendency on the part of the Government, or Parliament, to oppose the eight-hour day, and he also argued as if there was a tendency on the part of the employers and the Government to oppose collective bargaining. In both these respects he is in error. I know of collective bargaining taking place in my native county many years ago. Collective bargaining may have different meanings in different places; one person may ascribe to it one meaning, and another person a different meaning. But collective bargaining has obtained in this country for many, many years. I remember reading of it and hearing of it when I was quite a boy. We have instances every day of collective bargaining. We have it in four different ways: First, we have it expressed in the form of an agreement between an employer and a committee representing his employees, whether unionist or non-unionist. That form of bargaining has obtained for many years in Canada. Second, we have the agreement negotiated between an employer and a trades union acting on behalf of the members of such trade in his employ. The hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Buchanan) expressed this afternoon his approval of that form of collective bargaining. Third, we have the agreement negotiated between an employer and a union comprising all the different trades in his employ; we have that in Canada to-day. Then, lately there has been urged the new definition of collective bargaining in the form of an agreement between an employer and a confederation of trades unions such as the building or the metal trades. Even before the Winnipeg strike we had an agreement of that kind negotiated in the city of Toronto in the building trades, on the principle of the Whitley scheme. That agreement did not succeed in averting a strike, but at least there was one instance of collective bargaining in accordance with the Whitley Joint Industrial Council recommendations.

The honourable member for Kamouraska spoke as if the Whitley scheme so-called was exactly the mode of collective bargaining suggested at Winnipeg. I say it is not. The Whitley plan involves collective bargaining, but it is more conformable to the form of collective bargaining to which we have been accustomed in Canada for many years past. I should like to read two or three extracts from the report of the Whitley Committee made to the Prime Minister of Great Britain. In the final report I find this:

> Taking our first and second reports together they constitute a scheme designed to cover all the chief industries of the country and to equip each of them with a representative joint body capable of dealing with matters affecting the welfare of the industry in which employers and employed are concerned, and of caring for the progressive improvement of the industry as an integral part of the national prosperity.

On the 31st of December, 1918, in accordance with the recommendations of the Whitley Committee many joint industrial councils had been established, in the following trades, for instance:

Bobbin and shuttle making; bread baking and flour confectionery; building; china clay; furniture; gold, silver, horological and allied trade; heavy chemicals; hosiery; made-up leather goods; match manufacture; metallic bedsteads; paint, colour and varnish; pottery; rubber manufacture; saw milling; silk; vehicle building; wool textile and woollen and worsted.

Separate joint industrial councils were established in all these trades. The whole purpose of the Whitley scheme, as I understand it, is to set up a joint industrial council in which are represented the employers on the one hand, and the employees of some particular industry, and perhaps some closely allied industry, on the other. It is quite possible this scheme may have good results in Great Britain, and perhaps in other countries. I trust it will be successful wherever it is tried. Obviously, it is more capable of experimentation in Great Britain, on account of the size of the country and the ease with which the district councils may be organized. In Great Britain a few of the great trades might be organized in one industrial council covering the whole country.

I do not think I need say anything about the Winnipeg strike itself or the circumstances leading up to it, because that has been fully and ably covered by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) who had personal acquaintance with the whole issues.

I should like to say a few words as to one of the causes which is assigned for high prices of foodstuffs, which in turn is assigned as one of the primary causes of industrial unrest in this country. High prices, being world-wide, cannot afford a complete answer for the conditions which prevail in Canada to-day and which have been the subject of criticism in this debate. In almost every other country of the world prices are just as high as in Canada. Roughly speaking, you will find upon investigation that prices are exactly or very nearly one hundred per cent higher in 1919 than in 1914 in practically every country in the world. Our prices are lower on the average than they are in the United States or in Great Britain; and they are immensely lower than in many of the European countries. Now what is the cause of it? Mere criticism of the fact provides no help in the solution of the problem; and if it is capable of solution only by slow degrees and processes, it is better that we should realize the fact and frankly express that as our view of the matter; because if existing high prices are altogether attributable to governments, then we are disguising the real issue. It has been stated by some hon. member, and it is not necessary that I should elaborate the point, that the chief reasons for the high prices prevailing in the world to-day are, first, an inflation of currency, and, secondly, a lack in the supply of commodities. These, I think, are fundamentally the two reasons for the present high prices. The same causes contributed to high prices following other wars; and students of the problem have given these two reasons as fundamental factors in the case. Now, if that be true, the situation can be met only in two ways: first, by greater production, and second by a deflation of our currency, and this latter can only be accomplished by a reduction of our war debt as rapidly as our country sees fit. If these be the primary causes, still I do not wish to be understood as saying that we cannot provide some palliative, something that might minimize these higher prices. At least it is the duty of the Government and of all who hold positions of responsibility to explore, so far as they can and as constantly as they can, any avenues which might provide any solution or partial solution of the problem. Somebody has suggested a fixation of prices. I am disposed to agree with the injunction tendered us this afternoon by the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) in this regard. It may be tried; possibly it should. As a matter of fact, the fixation of prices when tried in other countries during the war has not been entirely successful, and except as regards wheat and newsprint we did not directly attempt to fix prices in this country.

So far as foodstuffs and many other commodities were concerned, the Food Board attempted to control the profits of the wholesaler and retailer, and I believe this had some good effect; and I would venture it as my opinion that that would be a better method than the direct fixation of prices. There are many difficulties in connection with an attempt to fix prices in Canada. England tried it, and with some success. But their circumstances were very different from ours. In the first place, England is an importing country; what she produced in foodstuffs was quite negligible. Every industry and establishment in England was given over to the manufacture of war material, and she was obliged to import practically all her foodstuffs, at least. More than that, she was compelled to purchase these importations of foodstuffs for her people; and thus, being obliged to import, it was not a very difficult matter to control prices as she did. In many cases the Government of Great Britain assumed part of the loss. This is particularly true as regards flour and bacon, and one or two other commodities. The portion of the cost of flour assumed by the Government of Great Britain amounted to about $5 a barrel. I do not know what it was in respect of other commodities. And in the case of New Zealand and Australia it was easier to attempt fixing prices than it would be in Canada. There, export was rendered almost impossible by lack of shipping, and it was possible, perhaps very much in the interest of producers in those dominions, to assume control of productions which could not be exported. But in Canada there are many difficulties. Some person suggested this afternoon that exportation should be prohibited or limited. I think that that would hardly be a hopeful experiment in this country unless it were carried on in a small way. This country must export foodstuffs particularly and raw material, otherwise we would be unable to carry on trade with other countries. Again, in a country of the magnitude of Canada, it would be impossible, in most cases I would say, to fix a price that would suit all sections of the country. Further, when prices are fixed they must be changed every week or every fortnight or month, and possibly every day, and this would cause endless irritation to consumers and producers. I submit, therefore, that on the whole it will be found a most difficult method of dealing with the matter of prices. During the whole period of the war, as I have already stated, the Food Board attempted to curtail the profits of the wholesaler and retailer. The Cost of Living Commission, which was a bureau of the Labour Department, throughout the war co-operated with the Food Board and other war organizations in the way of obtaining information as to production cost, and selling cost, and in this way was in a position to afford a great deal of publicity which was of considerable use. However, in connection with the high prices prevailing in this country, which I admit are regrettable and impose very great hardships upon our people, we must realize that we are in no worse position than the people of other countries. And while this is not much of consolation to those who must submit to burdensome prices to-day, yet it does indicate that the condition is one which is not local but has a world-wide application and is one of the incidents of the war, due to an inflation of money and a lack of supply to meet the demand, and which we can overcome only gradually and by a resumption of the efforts enjoined in the slogans so popular and acceptable to the people during the war, namely, more production and more thrift. Only in this way can we escape altogether from the conditions now prevailing in respect to prices which undoubtedly account very largely, or at least to some extent, for the present high prices.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North and Victoria): Mr. Speaker, the question which has been brought to the notice of the House this afternoon by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Blake) is one of the greatest possible importance. It has been very fully discussed from both sides of the House. So far I do not think it can be said that it has been approached as a party question by any person who has spoken. The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat, the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Maclean), who is speaking to-night for the Minister of Labour has made one of his usual plausible, well worded speeches but I do not think it can be said that he has given us anything definite, anything constructive or anything that will tend to alleviate the present situation the solution of which is dearest to the heart of every well-wisher of the Canadian people and of Canadian institutions. One would expect from the representative of the Minister of Labour some constructive policy on this very important question. I take it, Sir, that the hon. Acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Meighen) who was at the scene of the trouble, having spoken and having given nothing in the way of a remedy for the difficulties with which we are confronted; that the hon. the representative of the Minister of Labour having also spoken, having gone very fully over the ground, and having sat down without saying anything that would encourage the hope that there is anything forthcoming from the Government to relieve the situation and to direct us along proper paths looking to the betterment of conditions, both of these gentlemen having spoken and other representatives of the Government, men of importance and standing with the Government and the country, having spoken and having said nothing to answer the substance of the motion;—we on this side of the House have the right to suppose that this is the last word in so far as the Government is concerned and that the Government has nothing at all to offer.

I may say that if I had any function more than that of a private member to discharge in this House that function, under present conditions, would be brought, and should be brought, to the assistance of the Government if there was anything offered, or if they had anything to offer, to better the conditions with which we are now confronted. I am sure that whether or not we could take any party advantage from the situation, nothing would be further from my own thoughts or from the thoughts of any person who has spoken on this side of the House. I recognize, with hon. members who have spoken as representing the Government, that we must maintain Government in this country and that law and order and government must be respected. I recognize that this Government as constituted to-day represents the voice of the people, and that while they are the Government, and while they are occupying the seats of power that they do occupy, it is my duty, and the duty of every member of this House, to respect their position and to assist them when it comes to a crucial question such as this.

But the question is: Have they on this occasion, and on all occasions since they assumed power, done themselves justice; have they retained within themselves that power which they should have held, or have they been coquetting with and courting powers outside of the Government, powers which are supposed to be largely at the back of the Government? Have they coquetted and flirted with such bodies to such an extent that they have lost the confidence of other large bodies in this country? I fear that whether that is justified by the facts or not, we have large bodies of men in this country, representing the ordinary common people, if I might so speak, who believe—and it is just as bad to believe as if it were absolutely true—that this Government have no more will of their own, but that there are certain factions, combinations and powers which just carry them along, and that they do exactly as they are dictated to by these higher powers. That, Sir, to a great extent, is what has caused unrest. It is believed the Government have forfeited their birthright for the mess of pottage that they have received from these parties. Whether that is true or not, it is just as bad as if it were true to say that it is true. It is the old saying—a saying that is perhaps not a classic—that you might as well hang a dog as give it a bad name. If you give a government a bad name whether it deserves it or not, its usefulness, to a great extent, is gone. From the expressions of opinion which came to us from Winnipeg, Calgary and other cities in the West where strikes have been instituted, and from the men who are at the head of these unfortunate movements, it would appear that the Government had really lost that hold which the Government should have on the country.

There is nothing better understood than the responsibilities of Government in performing its own share of the contract. We talk about the sacredness of contracts and no person can have greater respect for the responsibilities of men who are parties to contracts than myself. The Government has a contract. The people of this country agree that they shall support a certain party in power, support a certain Government, or support the King if you want to go that far. They give fealty and support to the King upon the definite understanding that the King and the Government in return will give protection and service to the country. Give proper laws and see that they are enforced. There is such a thing as kings and governments losing the right which they hold under the contract by not performing their functions and doing what they should do under the contract. It is being contended now that this Government is not so much alive to its responsibilities to the people as it should be.

I think I am bound to say—I think I must say, Sir—that toryism exists to-day as it existed a thousand years ago. Men die but principles never. The principles of toryism have been handed down from generation to generation. The good, honest men who sit on the treasury benches tonight are not responsible for the heritage of toryism which has been handed down to them; they are simply carrying forward a principle for the origin of which they have nothing to do. They are merely flies on the wheel carrying forward the principles of the party to which they belong.

Can anybody find anything in Toryism, from Adam down, but adversity to labour, adversity to the poor man, adversity to democracy? And it is impossible to think that we are going to get the coloured gentleman in the fence to change his sentiments or the leopard his spots. It is the same old thing. We had eighteen years of Toryism in this country. I would ask the most genuine and orthodox Tory sitting in this House what, during those eighteen long years, was done for labour, or for the labouring classes, by Toryism. We had a commission appointed in those days. Some twelve years or so before the Tory Party went out of power in 1896 there was a commission appointed with Doctor MacLeod—I forget where he came from—at its head. He joined that commission as an active young man, but before anything was reported he died of old age, and nothing was done. The Liberal Party came into power and found nothing but the ashes of this commission, with no possible result. That is all that was done by, or that stands to the credit of, the Tory Party for labour in this country during those eighteen years. Now these things may be disagreeable, they may sound harsh, but such in the case; and, as I said, those very principles have been handed down to this Government; and while it may have been retrograde in other matters, while it may have been inconsistent in other respects, it has been faithful to the law in carrying out Tory doctrine in dealing with labour, and it was determined to do nothing until such conditions as we have now presented themselves. It is no surprise to me, Sir, to find that the same old conditions are in vogue to-day that have been in vogue for the last fifty, sixty or hundred years, as far as the dealing of this party with questions of this kind are concerned.

It has been said that the labour people should have waited, that something was going to be done. I wish to point out that in the carrying out of what I said, the same principle, the same rule, the same tactics as in past years have been followed exactly since the present Government came into power. In 1917 I and others urged in this House upon the then Minister of Labour that something should be done to allay the conditions that then existed. After some trouble, and after some sarcastic speeches had been made against us, the so-called O'Connor Commission was appointed. Mr. O'Connor made a report which if acted upon might have been of some benefit and might have inspired the labouring people with some confidence. What occurred? The men who are said to own the Government rose in their might and declared, "The O'Connor Report is absolutely false." Mr. Henderson was then appointed a Court of Appeal to deal with Mr. O'Connor. A year or so passed before we heard anything of Mr. Henderson and when we did hear from him nothing at all was done. Time passed, and even now we find that the Government is still in the dark and does not see a glimmer of light anywhere. We heard a great deal of my own "light in the window," and there was a lot of fun made of it, but it appeared that even "the light in the window" has not been seen by the Government from either the O'Connor or the Henderson Report, because, forsooth, they said, "O'Connor was a mere lawyer and Henderson was a mere lawyer. Now we must get a judge of the Supreme Court to perform the operation of trying to penetrate our six-by-eight skulls and get some knowledge and light and leading into them." A commission on which a judge of the Supreme Court sits is now travelling from coast to coast, trying to get information for the Government. It was not very long until the Government discovered that that was not enough, and the hon. gentleman who led the ministry in the absence of the Prime Minister thought at last he had struck on the remedy, the panacea, for all the ills, and he was going to appoint a Committee of this House. So that we now have a committee appointed to try and get information. We had the O'Connor Report and the Henderson Report; we are having Judge Mather's Report; and now we have the promise of a committee report, but nothing in the world has been done. Is it to be expected when the poor people whose bread is so high that they cannot get enough for their children, whose flour is beyond all reach, and everything else that comes upon the table of the poor man is getting entirely out of control, is it any wonder that they should give up all hope of this Government doing anything and should try to take matters into their own hands? This is where the Government, it seems, cannot assert its rights. As I was pointing out a little while ago, it is the duty of the Government to exercise its vigilance and display its anxiety for the poor man and the people generally and when the Government fails to do that, then to some extent—although rebellion, or trouble, or violation of the law, is never justified—a man is justified when he takes matters into his own hands and tries to do the very best he can. That, Sir, is the situation that faces us to-day, not only in Winnipeg, but in every other part of this country. Absolutely hopeless of getting any immediate action from the Government people are trying to do the best they can to bring about better conditions for themsleves by their own actions.

We are told that nothing can be done toward the cutting down of prices. That was the old doctrine of the Tory Government some twenty-three years ago. Nevertheless, this Government has done something, not in foodstuffs very much, but the principle is the same. It started out, I believe, by cutting down the price of newsprint, and it has done something to cut down the price of coal and other commodities; but as far as I know it has not done anything at all to make it easier for the poor man who has to go to his grocery store in the evening with his meagre earnings of the day to get enough to satisfy the necessities of the household wants. The Government has not done anything of that kind, and consequently we have the conditions which to-day prevail.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the chief thing is, what are we going to do? Is there nothing that can be suggested to better the existing conditions? Very shortly after the Prime Minister arrived home I took the responsibility of suggesting to him that the Government ought to have a conference of the leading men, both of labour and of capital, called to meet himself and his Government at Ottawa, and that some good results might follow the adoption of such a course. Nothing was done in that respect, and I suppose, possibly, there is not much good in talking about it now. However, I do not think it is too late, and the Government and the Prime Minister would get the credit of being in earnest if they would even now call upon the leading capitalists and the leading labour men to meet and see what can be brought about by a heart-to-heart talk in the presence of the Government and himself about matters of this kind. For the last number of years it has been in my mind, and I think I have expressed the opinion in this House more than once, that we should have in this country a court—not a commission but a court—of the highest possible class to deal with such conditions as we are now confronted with. It has been said that such courts have been a failure, but there is no use talking about it, we must have some definite, powerful, capable institution in this country to deal with matters of this kind. As far as I can see, Mr. Speaker, there is nothing to-day which this House or the Canadian people can deal with, the war being practically over, that is so pressingly important as the relations between capital and labour.

If we had a court of importance equal to that of the Supreme Court of Canada—or of more importance if you please—which would devote its attention absolutely to questions of this kind and give final judgments in them, I think that would be the only way in which such questions could be finally settled. I believe that the day will arrive when men of sound judgment will be surprised that we left the labouring people so long with no other remedy than the institution of the strike. Where can they go now for any remedy?

Mr. TWEEDIE: How would you enforce a judgment given by such court?

Mr. McKENZIE: Just as I would enforce every other judgment. If I had to deal with a company, I would deal with them by an order of the court for specific performance, and if they did not comply with that order or judgment they would suffer the consequences that follow non-compliance.

Mr. TWEEDIE: Supposing the decision was that 1,000 men should return to work in a factory at a certain hour, and they refused to obey, what would you do?

Mr. McKENZIE: The judgment of the court would have to provide penalties as against the man who would not obey, just as penalties are provided to-day for failing to obey the judgments of our courts.

Mr. TWEEDIE: What remedy would you suggest they should provide? That is what we want to get at. The workmen say, "We will not work." How would you compel them to work, or what punishment would you propose if they did not work?

Mr. McKENZIE: We have not quite reached that stage.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McKENZIE: Hon. gentlemen may laugh. But if a man to-day has a dispute over a foot of land do he and his neighbour fight for its possession? If before we had courts and got used to their judgments, a similar question might have been propounded to me had I recommended the parties to go to court to settle their boundary dispute instead of fighting to a finish: what would you do with a man who would not remove his fence after the Supreme Court said he must move it? We know what is happening now. The man will move his fence; or if he does not, he takes the consequences of the court moving it at his expense. If a prisoner to-day is told to do certain things under the criminal law, he must obey; if not he subjects himself to certain consequences. Does anybody suppose I am talking nonsense when I say that some better institution than the strike must be established in this country for the settlement of industrial disputes?

Mr. TWEEDIE: Do you advocate—

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. gentleman to submit his question through the Chair.

Mr. TWEEDIE: I would ask the hon. gentleman if he advocates taking away from the workmen of this country the right to strike?

Mr. McKENZIE: I say to my hon. friend, and to the Government, and to the country, on my responsibility as a member of this House, that if a capable court is constituted, composed perhaps of nine members, representing all the provinces, the best men that we can produce, an institution where I am satisfied that every man will be fully heard and a decision properly reached, then I say: take away the right to strike. If that is any satisfaction to my hon. friend, that is where I stand. And I so stand as the friend of the working man. I can assure my hon. friend and the House generally that such a court will not be five years in operation before every one will say: It is a great pity that we did not have this institution long ago.

I submit that such a court is well worth establishing, and I contend that it would be one of the safest methods of dealing with disputes between capital and labour. I submit that remedy. Sir, and I think that a Bill could be put through this House and through the Senate in less than a week, and that such a court in ten days could be sitting in Winnipeg to deal with the strike there. We would show our friends on both sides, capital and labour, that we are in earnest and are determined to give them an opportunity of dealing with their grievances in a proper way. The procedure can be by what is called a stated case, or by the hearing of evidence.

I may be absolutely wrong in this idea, but I am giving you, Sir, and the Government my honest opinion in the matter, an opinion which I have arrived at after several years' deliberation. For a long time I have held the belief that the only satisfactory way to settle a dispute is to settle it finally. A right of appeal might be provided for, but there must be established in this country an institution that will deal with these industrial disputes finally and settle them to the fair satisfaction of both parties. Hon. gentlemen may think that public opinion will not develop along this line. But when it is known that a court of the highest standing has deliberately heard a case and delivered judgment, that judgment appearing in the newspapers and the public being seized of the fact, I am convinced that public opinion would develop to such an extent that no man would dare oppose the judgments of such a court. But if he were so foolish, then, as we have been told by the Acting Minister of Justice tonight, he would be running against the best thought of the country, as some men in the city of Winnipeg, he says, have been running against the strong current of public opinion in that city, with results familiar to us all.

Now, Sir, I have no other remedy to suggest. I submit, however, that the Government has been too slow entirely in dealing with these questions. The Winnipeg strike was in full blast, as I understand it, before the Minister of Labour and the Acting Minister of Justice left Ottawa. It has already been pointed out that they should have gone at a very much earlier stage and should have stopped this trouble at its inception.

I may not have had very much to do with this question, but it should be pointed out to the Government that the tendency of their work for the last three or four years has been to create dissensions and divisions in this country for their own benefit, and they find now there are in Canada more dissensions and divisions, at all events, between capital and labour than they counted upon. They were willing to get power and to hold power by dividing this country, they cared not into what divisions of race and religion, one against the other. Now they find, when they are in power, they have lost that respect of the large body of the people which they would have held if they were in power by the lawful constitutional means which usually put governments into and out of power.

As I said at the begining, for my part, I am willing and anxious to respect the Government because they are the representatives of the people while they are here. At the same time, as we are all democrats and anxious to represent democracy in this House, it is only fair to point out to the people that they are capable of making grave mistakes, and that they made a great mistake when they thought they were getting a democratic government in the one that rules to-day in Canada. I trust that although we have heard nothing yet of a practical nature from the Government, the Prime Minister himself or some other hon. gentleman will, before this debate closes, tell us, and the people of Winnipeg, and the people of Canada generally, that the Government have some proposition by which the conditions of this country will be bettered and troubles of this kind will not be likely to break out in future in the violent manner in which they have broken out in Winnipeg and other places lately. I trust that better conditions will prevail, that good judgment will prevail, and that there will be no clash of any kind that will give this Canada of ours a bad name or any name of being unable or incapable of settling our disputes in a proper and constitutional way.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) has delivered a very interesting speech, part of it critical, part of it inspired certainly by an earnest desire to offer some constructive suggestion. I shall not dwell very long upon what might be called the controversial portion of his observations. When he suggests that this Government is subject to the dictation of any outside influence, or rather when he says that such is the belief, and that it may be true for all he knows, I wish to assure him of what I am sure he must be convinced in his heart, namely, that this Government is subject to no influence and no dictation outside of this Parliament and never will be so long as I am at the head of it. He has referred at some length in somewhat discursive style to inquiries that were made two years ago or thereabouts. I venture to remind him that as the result of those inquiries, the most drastic measure of taxation was imposed by Order in Council on those engaged in the packing industry in Canada that has ever been known since this war began, or before it began, for that matter, taxation far in excess of anything suggested or carried out in the United States. It was so drastic that when the Order in Council was under consideration, the companies affected came before us and implored us not to go so far. Those big interests that are supposed to dominate this Government told us that their businesses would be absolutely ruined and destroyed if we persisted in going to the length that we purposed. Notwithstanding those protests from the big interests alluded to, the Government carried out precisely what it purposed, and that remains as the law of this country from that time up to the present.

My hon. friend was distressed because of his apparent belief that the present Administration had never, from first to last, taken a single step in the interest of labour since it came into power. Let me tell him that it did what no previous Government in Canada had ever done or ever thought of doing, so far as I know; it selected a man who then was and still is a member of a labour organization in Canada, made him first a member of the Government without portfolio and afterwards made him Minister of Labour, which position he holds until this day. I need not dwell further on the controversial portion of my hon. friend's remarks.

He attributes an extreme antiquity to what he is pleased to designate as Toryism. One thousand years ago, he said it began. I have been disposed to think, and I may tell my hon. friend in the greatest confidence, that there are many people who think that he is about as good a sample of fine old crusted Toryism as is to be found anywhere in Canada.

The hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe) made a number of interesting observations, very largely of a critical nature, but I did not observe anything very constructive in his remarks from beginning to end. He made one suggestion which seemed to be hardly sensible. He said that the Government had allowed matters to drift so long that it was entirely too late to do anything, but nevertheless it was absolutely necessary that something should be done at once. The hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) took upon himself to justify, so far as I could understand, the breaking of a solemn treaty by Germany in his effort to justify the breaking of contracts which had been alluded to by the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen). These, however, are not of sufficient importance to justify me in wasting the time of the House upon them, because, after all, we come here for the purpose of taking counsel together and of endeavouring to find some suggestions, some light, some assistance in solving the difficult conditions that lie before this country at present.

Let me say to the hon. leader of the Opposition, lest I should forget it, that he is entirely mistaken in supposing that this Government has not called into conference both employers and employed in this country during the past two years. The Government has done that not once nor twice, but repeatedly, to my knowledge. I recollect that on the very last occasion that I sat in council before leaving Ottawa on the 8th November last, the Minister of Labour told me that for the first time in this country, employers and employed had come together to take counsel of each other in reasonable conference, so that they might arrive at a better understanding, have better relations and prevent interruptions by strike. It is quite possible that our anticipations at that time have not been wholly justified by subsequent results; but I know that during my absence, my colleague, the Minister of Labour, in conjunction with the other members of the Government has, from time to time, been in conference with employers and with employed. It was out of the conferences which he had with employers and employed that the idea was evolved which resulted in the appointment of the commission that is now investigating labour conditions in Canada.

So that, the reproach now put forward, that the Government has had no desire and made no attempt to assist in the solution of these problems, is wholly undeserved.

I shall now approach the conditions that prevail, not only in this country, but throughout the world, with a view to pointing out the tremendous problems that lie before all the nations, and the absolute importance that we in Canada, both employers and employed, should keep our heads and seek to work out our abundant opportunities for useful service to our country and to the world.

World conditions! Do hon. gentlemen in this House remember that the greatest financial experts in the world said that the war which has lasted for five years could not possibly last more than one year, because the resources of the world would not allow the nations to continue longer? It has lasted for five years, and during that period about 50,000,000 men have been withdrawn from productive activity. During that same period the waste which has gone on throughout the world in the endeavour of the nations on the one side and on the other to obtain a decisive victory is absolutely beyond our comprehension. We may state it in figures, but no man in the world can really comprehend or understand what it means. Would you like to have a reasonable estimate of what conditions were in Europe before this war began?—and during the past six months I have learned something of what they are to-day. A very important authority used this language in placing the situation of Europe before the British delegations at the Peace Conference:

> By far the most important task before the Allied Governments is to get production and internal and external "exchange economy" working again on something like normal lines. Before the war some 400,000,000 Europeans by working their hardest just managed to feed, clothe and house themselves and perhaps amass six months capital on which to live. That capital has vanished; the complicated machinery of internal and external production is more or less smashed; production has to a great extent ceased. The largely increasing population of Europe has only been maintained by the increasing development and inter-connection of world industry and finance. If this is not only checked, but for the time being destroyed, it is difficult to see how the population can be maintained at any rate during the very painful period of drastic readjustment. If free movement were possible and other countries could absorb it, there would inevitably be a vast emigration from Europe, until an equilibrium were established between the numbers of the population and the means of livelihood. As that is not possible this equilibrium must be reached in some other way.

Then he goes on to point out in a very graphic manner the almost insuperable difficulties that lie before the nations engaged in the task of reconstructing Europe to-day.

What does the present condition in Canada mean? We undoubtedly have very difficult problems before us but we have them in common with the rest of the world, and I fully believe that there is no country among all the nations where those problems are easier of solution than they are in Canada, if we are only true to our purpose, and have reasonable common understanding and common effort. This problem of industrial disturbance, inflation, and high prices, is not a new problem in the world's history. There has never been a war after which these phenomena did not make their appearance. It was the same a hundred years ago after the Napoleonic wars. After 1815 there were inflated prices and industrial disturbances. It was the same after the Crimean war of 1854. These are phenomena which makes their appearance inevitably after every considerable war, and after this the greatest of all wars in human history it was not only absolutely certain that these phenomena would make their appearance, but possible that they might continue for a longer period than ever before known.

It must be apparent to honourable gentlemen that in common with most thinking people in Canada, the Government foresaw there would be a very difficult period of reconstruction after the cessation of hostilities and the conclusion of peace. We sought a year, or eighteen months ago, to foresee conditions as best we could, to make such provision as is within the power of a government for conditions that were certain to arise. I hope honourable gentlemen will realize, having regard to what I alluded to a moment ago—the withdrawal from productive activity of 50,000,000 men for nearly five years, the non-production and the terrible waste during that period, and the inflation consequent upon waste and non-production—that it is not possible for the Government of Canada or the Government of the United States or the Government of the United Kingdom or for the Legislatures of any of those countries or of all the countries of the world to fully remedy or remove conditions that have been thus created. But it was the duty of the Government to foresee as best it could, and to provide for as best it could, the conditions which were certain to ensue.

What have we done? The hour is too late for me to make more than a passing allusion to measures and policies which have been undertaken by the Government. As to the men who have fought the battle of freedom beyond the seas we believed that it would take a year or possibly eighteen months to effect their demobilization, but from the time that the armistice was signed until they will all be returned to Canada I believe that a period of not more than eight months will have elapsed. In order that they may have an opportunity of establishing themselves we have provided a war gratuity more generous, I believe, than has been provided by any other country in the world.

We have arranged conditions of land settlement which we have certainly endeavoured to make both reasonable and effective. We have provided as best we could for their settlement in various vocations and for their training for that purpose. We have established reasonable conditions to enable them to obtain that training. In addition we have made permanent provision for those who are afflicted with disease as a direct result of the war, and particularly for patients who have shown themselves to be infected by the scourge of tuberculosis. These are only a few of the measures the Government has had in mind and carried out. We realized that as soon as the demand for munitions would cease there must be an earnest effort on the part of the Government to provide employment not only for the returning men, but also for those who could no longer find employment in the production of munitions. We went about that in two ways. In the first place we endeavoured to assure the working men of this country a share in the reconstruction of the devastated regions, and a share in the provision of necessary articles for those countries in Europe which have been engaged in war during the past five years. Thus we have established not less than one hundred and twenty-five, or one hundred and thirty millions of dollars of credits in order that products which give employment to the working men in Canada, shall have their proper place in the markets of the world. More than that, we have embarked upon a policy of undertaking important public works for the purpose of affording employment, although otherwise we would have preferred to postpone the undertaking of these works until a season when the finances of the country were in better condition than at present. Now some hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have spoken of blunders of the Government and some of them have referred to the alleged inaction of the Government.

Is there a single one of them who has found fault with the Government in respect of any of the matters just mentioned? And is there a single one of them who has even suggested to the House the taking of any step which the Government has not taken? The conditions of unrest throughout this country are undoubtedly serious. I say, and say it with regret, that they are still more serious in the European countries which are now awaiting reconstruction. In Europe the problems that confront governments and parliaments in the various countries are, I repeat, infinitely more serious than any that confront us. Here is the situation in Europe as outlined by a very high authority:

> (1) Destruction or disrepair of fixed plant and means of transportation, i.e., railways, canal, factories:
>
> (2) Lack of raw materials, i.e., destruction by war of all working capital:
>
> (3) Consequent loss of external purchasing power, i.e., lack of exports:
>
> (4) Depreciation of currency; often chaos of currency system:
>
> (5) Huge rise in prices, consequent loss of equilibrium between internal prices and world prices rendering export difficult:
>
> (6) Huge floating indebtedness to other countries:
>
> (7) Reduction of agricultural production owing to currency troubles and lack of purchasing power on the part of the industrial populations.
> (8) Enormous taxation, acting as almost complete deterrent to new enterprise;

We have hardly any of these difficulties. Certainly they do not exist in an accentuated form in this country. Except for differences that ought to be composed between employer and employed, there is no difficulty whatever which should prevent our country going on her way with renewed vigour and increased production, no difficulty in giving to every person capable of work an opportunity of employment which will assure him a reasonable living wage. The high cost of living is due absolutely to the world-wide conditions to which I have alluded, and over which no government and no combination of governments can exercise effective control. It is due to the enormous number of men withdrawn from productive activity, to the incredible economic waste of the past five years and to non-production at the present time. Such non-production is occasioned by the causes I have just enumerated so far as Europe is concerned. The high cost of commodities is due also to that world-wide inflation from which we cannot wholly escape. We have a duty in this Parliament, I have no doubt, to prevent as far as we possibly can undue combination and extortion, and it has been the policy and the effort of the Government during the past two years to carry out that policy. I think we have carried it out in reasonable measure. The tariff is alluded to and reductions in the tariff are advocated. They may be necessary or desirable. But, Mr. Speaker, I invite your consideration to this question. Having regard to conditions as they are in the world to-day—because the cost of living is much higher in the European countries that I have visited than it is in Canada;—having regard to conditions in the United States, where the cost of living is I believe as high as it is in Canada, is there any one of us who can say that if the tariff were not modified or lowered but absolutely wiped out root and branch to-morrow, the cost of living would be appreciably lower in this country? If we are to benefit in that way we must first find a country where the cost of living is lower than it is here. Let us consider whether the lowering or the abolition of the tariff in the United States, or France, or Canada, or any other country, could overcome the world-wide conditions to which I have directed your attention? Some corporations and companies have made great profits. There is no doubt about that, and we have endeavoured to remedy that condition by the excess profits tax. But I want you to bear in mind that Canada is not the only country that has suffered in that way. In Italy, France, Belgium, and Great Britain itself, the cry is against the enormous profits made by some people in connection with the production of munitions, and otherwise. In every country the chief remedy sought, so far as I am aware, is to bring a large proportion of such profits into the public treasury for the benefit of the whole people.

Now, coming to the immediate question of the labour disturbances which unfortunately prevail in different parts of Canada let me say, so far as the eight-hour day is concerned, that we are committed to the proposals which are embodied in the Treaty of Peace, and the Federal Government proposes to carry them out to the extent of its jurisdiction and is impressed with the duty of doing so. To quote from the terms of the treaty:

> First. The guiding principle above enunciated that labour should not be regarded merely as a commodity or article of commerce.

That stands as the first principle in the labour creed adopted by the nations which sat around the Peace table.

> Second. The right of association for all lawful purposes by the employed as well as by the employers.

We are committed to those proposals, and it is the intention, so far as the influence of the Federal Government is concerned, to carry them out. And although my hon. friend from the Cartier division of Montreal (Mr. Jacobs) seemed to consider it entirely a matter of no consequence as to whether or not we have constitutional power, surely the House will realize that we cannot invade the sphere of provincial jurisdiction merely because labour troubles at the present time are serious.

I took occasion to inform myself as to the respective powers of this Parliament and the provincial legislatures on this question and I have been advised by the law officers of the Crown that these are matters within the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures and not within the jurisdiction of the federal Parliament. I observe that in the session of 1910-11 the then Minister of Labour, Hon. Mackenzie King, speaking on a Bill introduced by Mr. Verville referred to the question of jurisdiction in these words:

> Every hon. member of this House knows that no Bill can be passed by the Parliament of Canada which will give to the working classes generally an eight hour day. They know that that is the business of the provinces primarily, that it is the duty of the provincial legislatures to fix the hours of labour governing any particular industries.

If hon. gentlemen who are interested in this question will turn to the "Labour Gazette" of May 19, page 598, they will find that every province of Canada, except Prince Edward Island, has repeatedly legislated on the conditions and hours of labour and that the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures to deal with the question is sustained not only by the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, by the opinion of the Minister of Labour in the late Government, but also by the universal practice every since Confederation under which the provincial legislatures have dealt with this subject.

As to collective bargaining, I put forward the same view, that conditions of labour and matters of that nature all come within the purview of the provincial legislatures. But in so far as our influence and example are concerned, we have encouraged collective bargaining in the sense in which we understand it. The Railway War Board, which was established by this Government about a year, or a year and a half ago is one of the most useful examples of collective bargaining in its best sense that I know of. We meet our own employees at conferences and we have repeatedly brought about conferences between the employers and their men. We have taken every possible step towards a solution of these difficulties by mediation and conciliation and we are doing our best in composing these differences.

The leader of the Opposition has made a very important suggestion as to the enactment of a statute by this Parliament which will virtually abolish strikes and compel employers and employed to submit their differences to a fixed Tribunal. I have discussed the question of the right of the men to strike on many occasions and I would suggest to my hon. friend that before we undertake so drastic a step as to take away from the labour men of Canada a right which they prize as the Magna Charta of their liberties, we should require to have a very careful conference with them unless we were prepared to make matters very much worse than they are at present. The large majority of the labouring men in Canada are, in my judg-12m. ment, disposed to look upon these questions in a reasonable way.

It would be one of the greatest mistakes that this Parliament could make to drive into what one might call the extreme wing of the labour party in Canada men who have as a whole been fair and reasonable in their attitude towards this question. At the same time I am disposed to say to-night what I have said many times to labour men, that surely, by a fair and reasonable spirit on one side and on the other, we can eventually, not by means of drastic legislation but by a better comprehension of each other's attitude, find some means more reasonable and more effective than the strike for composing differences between employers and employed. I most sincerely hope and, more than that, I believe, that the labouring men of Canada will see their way to adopt that principle in the early future.

I put the case before them, I think it was last summer, in the city of Toronto. We were discussing the question of the League of Nations and the abolition of war by means of conference discussion and publicity, with force perhaps in the background but only in the background. Take twenty-five or thirty nations speaking different languages with absolutely different ideals and at different stages of development and having a hard task in comprehending or realizing each other's outlook; if you expect these nations to unite for mutual discussion in the council of the League of Nations and thus compose their differences and if you base some reasonable hope upon the outcome of that proposal, surely the people of this country, living under the same laws and having very much the same ideals and the same point of view should be able to compose their differences at between employers and employed without resorting to the strike which has been described as little short of civil war. Indeed, a general strike carried out, as some people would desire to have it carried out, is little short of civil war.

I do hope, indeed, that the ideal which the leader of the Opposition has put before us to-night may be realized. I am not prepared to say it can be accomplished by the drastic methods which he has suggested. I rather think it must be accomplished by the better education of employers and employed, and by a realization of the new ideals which are an outcome of this war. In this connection I must express the hope—the very earnest hope—that some of the employers will give better indication of their comprehension of the new conditions and the new ideals arising out of war conditions. In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, let us have good confidence in the sound, practical common sense of the people, of the workingmen of Canada, to find a solution for our difficulties in the not distant future. And let there be not the slightest doubt that in so far as the Federal Government and Parliament are concerned, and in so far as they have the right to speak or to legislate, their aid and co-operation will not be wanting to bring about a solution of these difficulties.

Mr. G. W. ALLAN (South Winnipeg): Mr. Speaker, in the debate precipitated this afternoon by the hon. member for North Winnipeg (Mr. Blake), the discussion has taken a very wide range.

During the course of the afternoon the member for Centre Winnipeg (Mr. Andrews) gave to the House his views as regards not only the metal workers' strike, but the sympathetic strike, and although the hour is late I feel I must crave the indulgence of the House. I think it would not be inopportune if, at this stage, before the debate is closed, I should give the point of view as to these happenings, first of all of the employers, or the so-called ironmasters, and secondly of that large portion of the population of the city of Winnipeg that were—not directly at any rate, and to a very slight extent indirectly—in any way interested in the matter in dispute in the so-called metal workers' strike. I was in Winnipeg five days, returning last Thursday, so that I can speak with some confidence, having been on the spot for that period of time, as regards what the conditions produced by the metal workers' strike, and by the subsequent sympathetic strike, in that city actually were. I should like, first of all, to read a letter which was handed to me on my arrival by the assistant general manager of the Manitoba Bridge and Iron Works, Limited. I desire to state to the House that I happened to have had an early and a continuous connection with that company from the time it employed only a few men until now it has grown to be a company of some considerable proportions, employing a large number of men in Winnipeg —in fact, between it and its subsidiaries, giving employment to between six and seven hundred men. I am satisfied from the inquiries I made, and from meeting with pretty well every phase of the question, that this letter will give the very closest approximation of the actual happening with the three iron companies, and that absolutely, completely, and without any possibility of contradiction or mistake, it gives the actualities of the happenings with this particular metal company. I may say that the letter does not happen to be dated, but was handed to me on the morning of the day following my arrival in Winnipeg. The letter is as follows:

> The present situation developed, so far as our company is concerned, in the latter part of April, through the presentation of a schedule by the Metal Trades Council requiring the signing of an agreement, with that body, whereby many drastic changes would be made in our operations principally:
> (a) substitution of the 8-hour day for 10 hours.
>
> (b) An increase in wages of from 30 to 60 per cent.
>
> (c) The submission of our Shop Rules to regulation by the Metal Trades Council.
>
> (d) The payment of a uniform wage irrespective of ability.
>
> (e) The arbitrary classification of men on a Railway Shop basis.
> The officials of the company posted a notice intimating that they would be glad to discuss with the Shop Committee this, or any other matter considered to be requiring adjustment. A meeting was held and the company after some discussion offered, as had been done some weeks previously to grant a nine-hour day with ten hours pay and a minimum wage of $4 per day, or practically 45 cents per hour for common labour. We pointed out that as our business was taken in competition with Eastern Canada and the United States our hours and working conditions must be governed by the conditions prevailing there, we therefore made the proposition that should it be established that the eight-hour day was in effect in competitive plants in the East, that it should be immediately put into force here; the same pay as for ten hours being given, that is, the hourly rate would be increased 25 per cent. It was thought and stated that this investigation which would be carried on by employees and employers independently would take a month or six weeks. It was also pointed out that for the present the company was prepared to deal with its own men only. The Shop Committee agreed to consider the proposal, and the following day submitted a schedule from which the name of the Metal Trades Council had been eliminated. The company's officials repeated the offer concerning the eight hour day, and stated that rates could be discussed, also other minor conditions.
>
> On May the larger number of our workmen were called out, many of them stating that they left against their will, and since that date we have not been operating except in a limited way.
>
> On May 8th, with Messrs. Barrett and Warren, representing the Vulcan Iron Works and the Dominion Bridge Company, I was called into conference with the Mayor and we suggested to him that we were willing to submit all differences to arbitration. He stated that he would put the suggestion before the labour people. This resulted in a meeting being held in the Builders' Exchange May 9th, at which Premier Norris, Mayor Gray, Mr. Winning and other representatives of the Trades and Labour Council were present, together with Mr. Hazelton, president of the Builders' Exchange, and we three representatives of the Iron Working Shops. At this meeting the question of arbitration was barely mentioned and little was accomplished. The following day a meeting was held, Premier Norris presiding, in the Builders' Exchange, at which there were present five representatives of the Metal Trades Council, and the three representatives of the Iron Shops. The following suggestions were offered by the employers:
>
> First. The establishment of a 45-hour week on 55-hour pay.
> Second. The deferment of the matter of recognition of the union until such time as an Employers' Association as outlined before the Mathers Commission had been formed, and the necessary machinery established to make such agreements effective.

Third. The submission to a board of arbitration to be appointed wholly by the Premier of all points at issue.

The first suggestion was not unfavourably received, the second not discussed but the Labour representatives stated they would submit the third to their meeting the following morning. Premier Norris then proposed the Board as follows, and gave the names to the meeting:

T. J. Murray, Solicitor for the Trades and Labour Council.

R. B. Russell, Secretary of the Machinists' Union.

R. F. McWilliams, Solicitor.

H. B. Lyall, Manufacturer.

The following morning the Premier named Mr. R. D. Waugh, Chairman, and advised those who had been present at the meeting accordingly. Late that day, on making inquiry, he was informed by Secretary Robinson of the Trades and Labour Council, that it was not an acceptable solution. In the meantime before the hour set by the committee who represented the Labour organization before Premier Norris, for the consideration of his proposal, the notices calling a general strike were being delivered. Since the general strike has been called the Iron Shops, at the request of the Citizens' Committee have agreed to enter into no negotiations or make no settlement until the sympathetic strike has been abandoned, and conditions have become normal again in Winnipeg.

The cause of the strike is the alleged refusal of the Iron Companies to recognize "Collective bargaining," which the strikers interpret to mean the signing of agreements with the Metal Trades Council, a local federation of Metal Tradesmen of different crafts. Incidentally it may be pointed out that the Metal Trades Council is not generally recognized by the railways who have agreements with different crafts only. The term "Collective bargaining" is susceptible apparently of different interpretations. In the report of the Mathers Commission of 1918 signed by ex-President Tipping of the Trades and Labour Council, the system then in vogue with at least two of the companies and their employees, whereby they met committees of their own men, and arranged matters pertaining to the individual shops is referred to as "Collective bargaining." This system of arranging the settlement of all differences and co-operating with employees by committees in regular conferences with them is as effective a method of "bargaining collectively" as can be conceived. True it does not recognize the Business Agent of the Union as it is assumed that he not having knowledge of the conditions in our shops, and not being on our pay-roll should not exercise any authority in our plant; nor does it contemplate the signing of agreements with any but our own men.

On the other hand under the system no distinction is made between men belonging to the union, and those who do not, and our Shop Rules distinctly provide that we recognize the right of men to organize in any way and to be members of unions. For some months past we have had weekly meetings with Shop Committees at which all conditions were fully and freely discussed with very gratifying results.

[Mr. Allan.]

Our reasons for objecting to becoming parties to an agreement with the Metal Trades Council at Winnipeg are briefly these:

First. Fully 80 per cent of our business is secured in competition with shops in Eastern Canada, and the United States, and our very existence depends upon conditions being no more onerous in our shops than in competitive plants. No shops in Canada or in the United States, to our knowledge, with whom we compete, operate under restrictive union conditions. We are a relatively small factory in the manufacturing field and cannot take the initiative in inaugurating new conditions.

Second. Winnipeg being a railway centre, probably eighty-five per cent of the metal workers of the city are employed in railway shops. The proposal is that we should sign an agreement putting into force railway shop conditions in our plant. These conditions are notoriously unadaptable to competitive business through restrictions on output, and imposition of rules respecting use of machines, classes of work which certain men shall do, etc. The preponderance of railway employees in such unions would inevitably lead to the domination of our shops by men who have no understanding of the necessities of competitive business.

Third. Any agreement made with the Metal Trades' Council of Winnipeg as at present constituted would, in our opinion, be participation in a plan to place industry in Canada under the control of interests which do not truly represent labour, but which have other aims in view than the betterment of social conditions in this country.

Fourth. Until the principle of the sympathetic strike is discarded the signing of an agreement which may be broken the next day on account of a disagreement in some other plant is useless, and would render contract business impossible.

I beg, however, to call your attention to the proposed plan placed before the Mather Commission on Industrial Relations, when it was sitting in Winnipeg this month, by Winnipeg Manufacturers. This plan is an adaptation of the Whitley, Rockfeller, and other systems now in successful operation, and provides for the making of agreements between responsible organizations of Employers and Employees with Councils, Local, Provincial, and Federal, through which adjustment of any difficulties can be had. To this plan we can give our hearty assent believing it will solve our particular trouble, and it is the earnest hope of Metal Trades Manufacturers that it may be adopted in some form or another.

Yours very truly,

H B. B. Lyall.

I now wish to say a few words as to what results the sympathetic strike produced upon that very large portion of the population of Winnipeg that had no special interest in and was in no way connected with the metal workers or the metal employers. The sympathetic strike took the people by surprise as it came so quickly, very much after the fashion of the war and due to the difficulty we experienced in believing that it would be suddenly precipitated upon us in so comprehensive a manner. I for one, having lived in Winnipeg practically all my life—forty years this month—would not have believed it if any one had put it up to me six weeks ago—although I had followed fairly closely the events in that city and mixed freely with all classes of our people—that for a brief period, the Government of the city could have been taken over by the so called " Big Five " or council of five. But the fact was that practically out of the blue the city of Winnipeg was closed up about as tight as a box. The post office facilities came abruptly to an end and also the telegraphic facilities. The going out on sympathetic strike of the employees of the Federal Government, the Provincial Government, and the Civic Government, and the suspension of many services and many businesses produced the most drastic discomfort, at any rate for a short period, and this discomfort still subsists to a very considerable extent. The police voted to go out on sympathetic strike, but remained at their duty at the request of the Strike Committee. What degree of reliance could be placed upon them, I think, can very well be appraised under such conditions. The firemen went out. Then the water supply, the removal of garbage—all those services which are necessary for the comfort of the city with a population of approximately 200,000 people, were impaired or were suddenly brought to an end. The water supply as controlled, was absolutely inadequate for the purposes of protection against fire; and for a time the city was practically helpless in this particular. The pressure was such that no water could go beyond the ground floor of any building. To a very large extent, in common with all western cities, Winnipeg has a markedly large number of apartment houses, and it can be easily imagined, without my labouring the subject, what that meant so far as discomfort is concerned, and also what the cutting off of bread and milk meant, particularly to the patients in the hospitals and to babies. Those conditions in which seemingly for a time there was partially usurped the Federal, the Provincial and the Civic authority passed away very soon, and there is no doubt what precipitated prompt organization on the part of all citizens who were not participating in the strike was produced by the practical tie up of the city, and the attempt to usurp governmental control. What was produced there was a banding together with extraordinary solidarity, which I have absolute confidence will remain to the end, of all those who felt that their property, the lives of their families and the ordinary comforts and protections to which they were entitled demanded their attention and care. They felt that they should, to the full extent of their ability do what the Federal authorities required of them. To voluntarily assist wherever the public service was affected, which meant that when the 400-odd employees of the post office went out, the Citizens' Committee were prepared promptly to give whatever number of voluntary assistants could be taken charge of by some fourteen men who remained in the service of the post office. The statement was made: We will replace either the number that have gone out of the service of the post office on strike, or we will give you a larger number, or we will give you any number that you can handle and will increase that from time to time promptly on your demand. I may say that in the choice of those whom they turned over as volunteers to this Government, they gave the men most capable of according effective service. Among others sorting letters in the Winnipeg Post Office were Mr. C. P. Wilson, K.C., leader of the Manitoba Bar, and Mr. P. A. Macdonald, Utilities Commissioner of the Province of Manitoba. I saw man after man the heads of large concerns and others holding important positions in the city so occupied during the first period in which voluntary relief was accorded to the postal service.

To the province similarly the Citizens' Committee accorded volunteer assistance through their daughters and wives to the telephone exchanges to take the place of sympathetically striking telephone operators. Their offer was accepted by the Provincial Government and was of great advantage during the period that I was in Winnipeg. Of fourteen firehalls in Winnipeg, thirteen were fully manned by volunteers offered promptly by the Citizens' Committee to the civil authorities. There was not, on the part of the people in the district surrounding one firehall in Weston, which happens to be a suburb near the Canadian Pacific shops, seemingly a desire to have volunteer assistance, and that is the only firehall out of fourteen that I was informed was not fully manned. During my visit a fire that had often been dreaded in Winnipeg, and which might have had the most serious results, started next to the Hudson Bay departmental store on Main street, skipped, owing to the wind being in the east, over the entire Hudson Bay store, a city block beyond, and caught fire on the roof of the Auditorium rink, which has, since its erection, been a recognized menace and has been, as I was informed, with all insurance men "K.O." or keep off. This building caught fire in many places on the roof, and if it had not been successfully fought, what had always been feared would doubtless have taken place, namely a very large conflagration in the Hudson Bay Reserve section of the city of Winnipeg, but that volunteer fire force in about two and a half hours' fighting extinguished the fire.

It was clearly ascertained on my arrival in Winnipeg that the sole objective of the Citizens' Committee was to afford the assistance that I have just set forth to the federal, provincial and civic authorities to protect property, and to render conditions in the city normal as rapidly as possible. I think I omitted to say that to General Ketchen they offered to fulfill any requirements he might have as regards men. The offer was that if he wanted anything up to 10,000 men they would be forthcoming immediately, and if I remember aright, he promptly enrolled some 4,000 men, and he has in barracks to-day over 1,000 men, who have signed up under the Militia Act for the prescribed period of service.

I wish to say just one thing in connection with the people of Winnipeg generally. I am profoundly convinced that the heart of the great bulk of labour in Winnipeg is absolutely sound. I feel that their loyalty to the constituted government of this country is beyond all possible suspicion. I believe it will be shown, before these troublesome times which are apparently upon us now are brought to an end, that loyalty to constitutional government will be displayed by the great bulk of labour from one end of Canada to the other. I must frankly state that, although the hon. member for Winnipeg Centre (Mr. Andrews), if I understood him correctly, expressed feelings that "the big five" were all that they should be, I do not and cannot share his views. I regret this, because I would much rather that those men were of a character that could carry all men's confidences, but I feel very strongly that there are in Winnipeg many thousands of people that share the view which I am forced to express in that particular. I do not wish to dwell upon it except to say that labour in Winnipeg has, I believe, during the last two or three years, got into troublous times as regards its leaders owing to the supplanting of the labour leaders of a few years ago, men like Puttee, Ward, Rigg and Tipping, president of the Trades and Labour Council, who, the moment he signed that unanimous report of the Mathers' Commission last year and said that when he accepted that position he felt it was a quasi-judicial position and he would have to decide according to the evidence, was dismissed from his position. I think those who have replaced him and those into whose hands the real power has latterly fallen are men in whom the general public has no confidence, and I believe there is a daily, and, indeed, an hourly growing want of confidence in them on the part of the broad ranks of labour in Winnipeg. The trend of the strike in Winnipeg to-day has taken the sting out of the sympathetic strikes in other western cities. The fundamental mistakes that they indulged in at the start have not been repeated in Calgary, Edmonton and other western points, and I believe will not be repeated anywhere else in Canada. If there is one thing which is calculated to deprive strikers absolutely and completely of the sympathy of the public it is such action as took place in Winnipeg in the early days of the sympathetic strike. I have every confidence that the sympathetic strike in the city of Winnipeg will be brought to an end at no distant date, and I believe it will be brought to an end without violence; but if violence should unfortunately occur I believe that the military forces and the Mounted Police would be equal promptly and effectually to cope with any eventualities. I sincerely trust, and my belief is, that there will be no necessity for them to intervene. I have been a resident of the city of Winnipeg all my life, and my fond hope is that at the conclusion of this strike the action not only of the citizens of Winnipeg, of the Citizens' Committee, but of all employers as well, will be such as not to embitter the situation. I believe that the attitude of the employers generally will be to try to avoid imposing hardships on their employees because of their misguided action in going out on this sympathetic strike. I believe that when this strike is brought to an end, justice, fairness, and a complete absence of bombast, which we do not tolerate in the West, no matter who may be the upper dog, will prevail in the city of Winnipeg. I firmly believe that when the sympathetic strike is brought to an end the metal workers strike will be settled very readily, and on absolutely just and absolutely fair lines as between employers and employees. Having regard to all the conditions affecting these three metal shops of comparatively small size, stowed away in the middle of the continent, and having regard also to the large competitors of these three shops in the East and in the United States, I believe that what is reasonable and just in the premises will be done.

A statement was made this afternoon by one hon. member that thousands of returned soldiers in Winnipeg were indulging in something of a disturbing or riotous nature. My ears were naturally pricked up during the course of the afternoon and evening, not that I had a chip on my shoulder, but I am sensitive where my own city is concerned, and I wish to say in closing that I do not believe there ever was a strike of the proportions of this strike in a population of 200,000 souls in which there was such a complete absence of violence of any kind.

As I have already said what I believe about labour, I wish to say that I believe it is the intention of the great mass of the people who have formed the Citizens' Committee not to become in any way partisans in the dispute between the so-called iron masters and their employees. The necessities of the case demanded that they should organize and give unremitting and unselfish service. Furthermore, to my mind nothing could exceed the absolute propriety of what you might call the neutrality of the returned soldiers. After due deliberation they determined to stand apart and not participate in the dispute in any way, either in the original strike of the metal workers, or in the sympathetic strike. To suggest for one moment that the great body of returned soldiers in the city of Winnipeg, exceeding 15,000 men, have been guilty of any misconduct from the commencement of the original strike down to the present moment is most unfair and most unjust, because it is absolutely untrue. To accentuate what I have said about the returned soldier, let me say that on Tuesday last I left Winnipeg to come to Ottawa, and on the previous Sunday the 27th Battalion returned to Winnipeg. The 27th had been in France in General Ketchen's brigade. When this body of seasoned troops just back from the front returned to Winnipeg what happened? Was there a moment's hesitation about demobilizing them? Was it suggested that they should be kept in arms for one solitary moment longer than was necessary to demobilize them? No, they were welcomed by the people of the city of Winnipeg, and after General Ketchen had taken the salute the battalion was demobilized and went to their homes—all except 280 who belonged to the city of Winnipeg. These men of Winnipeg gathered around General Ketchen to say good-bye, and their last words to him were: "Well, General, we will be here in Winnipeg, and you will know where to find us if you want us."

Motion (Mr. Blake) to adjourn the House negatived.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister) moved: That when this House adjourns this day, it stand adjourned until Wednesday, 4th June.

Motion agreed to.

On the motion of Sir Robert Borden the House adjourned at 12.50 a.m.

Wednesday, June 4, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

VOTES AND PROCEEDINGS AND JOURNALS.

Mr. W. F. NICKLE (Kingston) presented the first report of the committee, as follows:

The Special Committee appointed to consider the question of consolidating the Votes and Proceedings and Journals of the House of Commons with a view to economy, beg leave to present the following as their report:

Your committee having carefully considered the matter recommend that the distribution of the bound copies of the Votes and Proceedings be dispensed with.

As the Journals in their present form show a great deal of unnecessary repetition and redundancy and the Votes and Proceedings as being at present compiled with the adoption of certain forms used in the Journals, give a complete and accurate report of the proceedings of the House, your committee are of the opinion that, a change would be advantageous both as regards efficiency and economy and recommend that the record used at present as the Votes and Proceedings be substituted for that of the Journals, thus obviating the necessity of resetting the type for the Journals.

SENATE BILL.

FIRST READING.

Bill No. 126, respecting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company.—Mr. Redman.

QUESTIONS.

TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY.

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

1. What were the gross receipts, per month, in 1918, of each station of the Transcontinental Railway?

2. How many cars were received and despatched, per month, at each of said stations, in 1918?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. It is not in the interest of the Canadian National Railways System that information as to the business done at each station, either by way of receipts or cars despatched, should be given to competing systems.

2. Answered by No. 1.

ALLEYN TASCHEREAU.

Mr. MORPHY:

1. Was Alleyn Taschereau an officer of the Justice Department at the city of Quebec in connection with the Military Service Act?

2. Was his conduct as such called in question as respects his handling of public moneys?

3. Were instructions given for his prosecution?

4. If so, why has he not been prosecuted?

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

1. Yes.

2. Yes.

3. Yes.

4. A warrant was applied for by representatives of the Department of Justice. An inquiry was held by the magistrate at Quebec, who refused to issue a warrant. All information was sent to the Attorney-General of the province of Quebec, calling attention to the matter and asking him to take such steps as might be necessary in the interests of justice.

BOARD OF PENSION COMMISSIONERS.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka):

1. How many members are there on the Board of Pension Commissioners of Canada?

2. What are their names, and the dates of their respective appointments?

3. Who is the Secretary of the Board?

4. What is his overseas military record, if any?

5. Is it a fact that there are medical, legal or other officials employed by the Board who have had no overseas military service?

6. If so, what are their names, and what remuneration are they receiving?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL:

1. There are at present two members on the Board of Pension Commissioners, one commissionership being vacant.

2. Lt.-Col. J. T. C. Thompson, D.S.O., who was appointed the 9th December, 1918, and Major Stanley B. Coristine, who was appointed the 17th February, 1919.

3. The position of secretary is vacant at present. The duties of the position are, however, being temporarily performed by the former secretary, Major Stanley B. Coristine, in addition to his other duties.

4. Answered by No. 3.

5. Yes.

6. Mr. K. Archibald, $4,800 per annum; Mr. F. C. Baker, $2,200; Mr. R. R. Belanger, $1,700; Dr. W. D. M. Bell, $3,500; Col. C. W. Belton, $5,000; Col. J. S. Dunbar, $4,700; Capt. W. L. In addition to the foregoing, Mr. M. E. Bailey, consulting mechanical and efficiency engineer, was employed temporarily by Commander J. K. L. Ross at a rate of $833.32 per month. This employment will cease on the 18th August, 1919.

HIS HONOUR JUDGE CLEMENS.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT:

1. Which Royal Commissioner held an investigation relating to His Honour Judge Clemens, of British Columbia, and when was the said investigation held?

2. What amount has been paid by the Government to the said Royal Commissioner therefor?

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

1. The Government is not aware of the appointment of such a commissioner.

2. Answered by No. 1.

NOVA SCOTIA CARRIAGES LTD.

*Mr. DUFF:

1. What amount of rental has been paid by the Government to the Nova Scotia Carriages, Limited, or the liquidators or bondholders thereof, for the use by the Militia Department of the carriage factory building at Amherst, Nova Scotia, and to whom were such payments made?

2. What use is being made of the building at the present time?

3. When does the contract for occupation terminate?

Hon. Mr. BURRELL:

Department of Public Works—

1. $3,500 to 25th March, 1919; (b) paid to Percy C. Black of Amherst, and John W. Regan of Halifax, N.S., as liquidators of Nova Scotia Carriages, Limited.

Department of Militia and Defence—

3. 25th March, 1920.

COL. F. W. MARLOW.

*Hon. Mr. MURPHY:

1. Was Colonel F. W. Marlow instructed to investigate the Canadian Army Medical Service in Canada?

2. If so, did Colonel Marlow conduct such an investigation and later submit a report giving the results of his inquiry?

3. If so, when was such report received?

4. Will the said report be laid on the table of the House?

5. If not, why not?

Major-General MEWBURN:

1. Under instructions issued by the Adjutant General, dated August 14, 1916, Colonel Frederick William Marlow was detailed by the General Officer Commanding, Military District No. 2, for the duty as Principal Medical Inspector to make a special report on the Medical Services in connection with the Overseas Services in Canada.

2. Colonel Marlow completed such inspection on October 16, 1916.

3. Completed and forwarded his report on October 20, 1916, to the General Officer Commanding, Military District No. 2, who in turn, under date October 23, 1916, forwarded the same to the secretary, Militia Council, Ottawa. Practically all of the recommendations in the report have been put into effect.

4. Yes, if asked for.

5. Answered by No. 4.

LIEUTENANT R. BATEMAN ET AL.

*Mr. DESAULNIERS:

1. What were the places of enlistment in Canada of Lieutenant R. Bateman, Lieutenant J. Sanders, Major W. J. Hamilton, Corporal Richard William Morsdale, No. 410667, and Corporal George Sweeney, No. 410632, who went overseas with the Canadian Expeditionary Forces?

2. Where are these persons at present?

Major-General MEWBURN:

1 and 2.

PUGWASH SPUR.

Mr. COPP:

1. What has been the cost of the railway spur from the main line of the Government Railway to the brick works at Pugwash, Nova Scotia, and when was the work completed?

2. Are there any outstanding accounts in connection therewith?

3. What have been the total receipts from said spur?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. $92,452.67. Work was completed August 28, 1918.

2. Yes—there are four portions of right of way not paid for:—From Vickery Estate 2,700 sq. ft. of land and boat landing shut off by embankment, estimated value, $44. Estate Daniel Rogers, right of way 2,700 sq. ft., estimated value, $82.50. In both these cases title not clear. From Estate Edgar Bent, area 2,098 sq. ft., value, $50. Mr. Bent has just returned from overseas and is willing to accept this amount. Estate John Tucker, right of way 12,632 sq. ft., estimated value, $19.14., also two borrow pits outside right of way, area 1.78 acres, value, $257 total amount. Tucker Estate, $286.14. This was refused by Colonel Tucker, but heirs now willing to accept.

3. The same freight rates apply on traffic from and to the Nova Scotia Clay Works Spur as from Pugwash proper, except on shipments of oil on which there is a switching charge of one cent per 100 lbs. The total receipts from such switching charges to the end of March, 1919, amounted to $82.40. The total tonnage handled over spur from same date, opened in August to end of March, 1919, was 2,479 tons and the total Canadian Government Railways' earnings from originating point to destination on such shipments were $5,167.63. In connection with this spur the Nova Scotia Clay Works Limited is to pay an annual rental of $1,700 for 15 years.

LAKE ST. JOSEPH HOTEL.

Mr. POWER:

1. Is the Lake St. Joseph Hotel, Lake St. Joseph, Quebec, the property of the Canadian National Railway?

2. If so, does the Canadian National Railway intend leasing this property to the Canadian Pacific Railway?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. The Lake St. Joseph Hotel is owned by the Quebec and Lake St. John Railway Company, the stock of which is 88.5 per cent owned by the Canadian Northern Railway Company, which forms part of the Canadian National Railways.

2. No.

FOREST PRODUCTS LABORATORIES.

Mr. POWER:

1. Has the Government received any complaints with regard to the Forest Products Laboratories of the Department of the Interior?

2. Have certain of the leading officials of these laboratories left, and are others about to leave, owing to the fact that wholly inadequate salaries are being paid?

3. Is it the intention of the Government to increase the salaries of trained experts in this department in order that its value to the lumbermen and paper makers of Canada may be increased?

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

1. Representations have been made that a higher scale of salaries should be paid to the technical staff.

2. Certain officials have resigned intimating that better opportunities were offered outside.

3. The matter of salaries is being dealt with by the Civil Service Commission in connection with the re-classification of the Civil Service.

MAJOR ARGUE.

Mr. POWER:

1. Is Major Argue the officer commanding the Sanford Fleming Home, Ottawa?

2. Has this officer been overseas?

3. If so, how long?

4. With what units?

5. If not, what are his particular qualifications for the position he now holds?

6. What is his pay?

7. What are his allowances?

8. How long has he been in charge of this hospital?

Major-General MEWBURN:

1. No. It is presumed that this inquiry refers to Lt.-Col. J. Fenton Argue, Ottawa.

2. No.

3. Answered by No. 2.

4. Answered by No. 2.

5. Lt.-Col. Argue is President of the Standing Medical Board, Ottawa, and has shown throughout many years of service the highest degree of professional and military efficiency in the discharge of duty.

6. Pay of his rank, $7 per day (as officer in charge of medical boards).

7. $1.25 per day field allowance.

8. Answered by No. 1.

3. Yes. Order in Council dated 16th October, 1886.

4. Yes.

5. Section 24, Civil Service Amendment Act, 1908.

6. $2,900. Full charge and control over the purchasing and contracting for all articles of mail equipment and supplies generally under the supervision of the War Purchasing Commission, and also in charge of the distribution of the said articles and supplies except those obtained through the Department of Public Printing and Stationery.

SOCIAL HYGIENE CONFERENCE.

Mr. BROUILLARD:

1. Was a Social Hygiene Conference held lately in Ottawa?

2. Did the Government call the conference or assist in calling it? If so, at whose suggestion or request?

3. Were the invitations to attend the conference sent out by the Government? If so, how, and by whom, were the persons selected to whom such invitations were sent?

4. Which member of the Government was charged with the duty of sending out the invitations and through what department were they sent out?

5. Has the Government paid or is it the intention of the Government to pay the whole or part of the expense of holding the convention? If so, what will be the total amount?

6. Out of what fund or vote will the money for the said payment be taken?

Sir THOMAS WHITE:

1. Yes.

2. Yes. At the request of the health authorities of the Federal and Provincial Governments embodied in a resolution passed at a conference of these authorities held in Ottawa on the 3rd day of February, 1919.

3. Yes. The persons invited consisted of the health authorities of the Federal and Provincial Governments and representatives of the social organizations or agencies interested in the subject matter of the conference. A list of those to be invited was submitted to the Government by Mr. C. V. Massey, who was secretary of the Conference of the Federal and Provincial Health Authorities which requested the calling of the Social Hygiene Conference, and Captain Gordon Bates, who was secretary of the Social Hygiene Conference.

4. The invitations were sent out by Sir Thomas White as Acting Prime Minister. The arrangements and detailed work in connection with sending out the invitations were in charge of Mr. C. V. Massey.

5. The Government has not paid any expenses so far, and does not expect to pay any expenses of representatives of provincial health authorities attending the conference, but will pay the other expenses of the conference.

6. Out of the item of contingencies for the Department of Health, which will appear in the Supplementary Estimates for the year 1919-1920.

QUESTIONS PASSED AS ORDERS FOR RETURNS.

Mr. GAUTHIER:

1. What amount of goods, free of duty, has been imported by the Dominion Steel Corporation, Limited, into Canada pursuant to contract based on Order in Council, P.C. 758?
2. What was the nature of these goods?
3. Were they raw material or manufactured goods?

Mr. MURPHY:

1. Referring to page 459 of the Report of the Ministry Overseas Military Forces of Canada, 1918, and to paragraph (c) Topical Films; what was the total amount paid for the films in question?
2. Was such payment made by or through the Canadian War Records Office in London? If not, by whom was such payment made?
3. To whom was such payment made?
4. Were the said films, or moving pictures, exhibited in Canada and elsewhere? If so, in what countries have they been exhibited?
5. Was an admission fee charged at each of such exhibitions? If so, what was the total cash proceeds, and to whom was the money paid?
6. Has the Canadian Government received the whole, or any part of the said cash proceeds? If not, what action, if any, has been taken to recover the money?
7. Were the said films given, sold, leased, or otherwise disposed of to a private company? If so, on what terms and what are the names of the members of such company?
8. Is it true, as alleged in certain English papers, that the cost of the Canadian War Paintings which were exhibited in England, was defrayed out of the proceeds of the exhibition of the said films, or moving pictures? If so, who had the custody of the funds if they were not turned over to the Government?
9. Had the Famous Players Film Company any connection with any of the matters hereinbefore inquired about? If so, what and on what terms?

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough):

1. What was the initial cost of the thirty-six drifters known as the "C.D's" referred to by the Honourable Minister of Naval Affairs on page 2916 of Unrevised Hansard?
2. How much was expended in repairing these vessels from date of purchase to November 11, 1918?
3. Who, on behalf of the Government, looked after the building of these vessels?
4. Who accepted these vessels from the builders?
5. Is he still in the service?

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Mr. GAUVREAU:

For a copy of the report made by Mr. Décarie, local superintendent of the Department of Public Works, relating to the wharf at Cacouna East; also copy of the petition showing the names of the persons who signed requesting the construction of said wharf; also copy of the reports, letters, petitions and requests received from J. A. Tremblay respecting said wharf.

PROPORTIONAL REPRESENTATION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): May I be permitted to put to the Prime Minister a question which he can answer at his leisure? If there be any truth in the newspaper rumour that the questions raised by the Franchise Bill are to be postponed until a later period of the year, will he consider the advisability of taking up with the Cabinet the question of having a Speaker's Conference during the recess to look into the matter of proportional representation? I am quite sure that such an inquiry would meet a very large amount of really earnest public sentiment.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I can say at once to my hon. friend that, with my colleagues, I shall give very attentive consideration to the suggestion he has put forward.

INDUSTRIAL UNREST IN CANADA.

THE WINNIPEG STRIKE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): May I ask the Prime Minister if he has any further information to give to the House with regard to the settlement of the strikes in Western Canada?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not think there is anything of importance beyond what has already appeared in the public press. The Minister of Labour (Hon. G. D. Robertson) returned from Winnipeg yesterday and gave us an account of the events which have taken place there. There is nothing I can usefully add to the very lucid statement which was given in the House the other evening by the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Arthur Meighen), who was with the Minister of Labour in Winnipeg. We receive a good many communications on this subject from day to day; I have not thought it worth while to burden the House by reading them. If any communication of an exceptionally important character is received, I should, of course, feel it my duty to communicate it to the House.

Mr. McKENZIE: We see in the papers from day to day references to some railway committee or body of railway men who are acting as intermediaries in the Winnipeg strike. Is that really going on?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think it is quite true that the six great international railway organizations have offered their services as mediators and that they are now engaged in the task of endeavouring to bring the parties together and to reach a common agreement.

AIDS TO NAVIGATION ON VANCOUVER –SKAGWAY ROUTE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. ALFRED THOMPSON (Yukon): May I ask the Minister of Marine whether negotiations are proceding with the United States Government regarding further aids to navigation on the route between Vancouver and Skagway, Alaska? I have in mind the wreck of the Princess Sophia off the Lynn canal last October.

Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE: No negotiations are going on at the present time between the Canadian Government and the Government of the United States with regard to that part of the coast on which the United States have to provide the necessary aids to navigation. The unfortunate accident to the Princess Sophia on the Vanderbilt Ledge occurred on a part of the coast which is under the control of the United States Government; Canada has no jurisdiction over it. The Canadian coast line extends northward to the entrance to Portland canal, near Port Simpson; follows the Portland canal to the head, and thence proceeds in a northwesterly direction inland. South of the International boundary the inland waterway is well marked; indeed there are very few representations in that regard from shipping interests that remain unsatisfied. Every reasonable endeavour is made to meet requirements as they arise. Northward of Port Simpson the inland waterway lies in United States territory, the point where the Princess Sophia was lost being about 350 miles up the coast north of the International boundary.

DOMINION FOREST RESERVES AND PARKS ACT AMENDMENT.

On the motion of Hon. Arthur Meighen (Minister of the Interior), Bill No. 125, to amend the Dominion Forest Reserves and Parks' Act, was read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—Long Lake Forest Reserve:

Mr. CAHILL: Will the minister explain this?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The clauses of the Bill are all in principle alike. All the Bill does is to take certain areas out of forest reserves as at present established by Statute. The purpose of taking these portions out is to make them available for soldier settlement. All the portions have been examined and in every case where possible representatives of the Forestry Department have been engaged in the examination.

Mr. CAHILL: Are these changes to be made only in specific cases, or are you taking power to make similar changes in respect of all forest reserves?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Bill specifies in each case the exact area to be taken out of these reserves. We are asking no powers for the Governor in Council.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—Larch Hills forest reserve:

Mr. ROSS: What is the total acreage made available for settlement in all these forest reserves?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not made up the total. In the last line of each paragraph the exact acreage that is being taken up in each case is given.

On section 6—Riding Mountain forest reserve:

Mr. CAMPBELL: Are any copies of this Bill available for distribution?

The CHAIRMAN: The Bill has already been distributed and should be on the files of hon. members; they can be obtained at the Distribution Office.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I assume that the hon. gentleman is interested in the application of the Bill to the Porcupine and Riding Mountain reserves. This Bill takes a very considerable area out of No. 2 Porcupine reserve—that is, that portion of the Porcupine reserve that is in Saskatchewan. The area taken out is defined in the Bill, and I have the maps here showing the area. I naturally cannot make the map available to all at once, and except by laying the map on the table, which I am ready to do, I cannot give any explanation other than what is in the Bill.

Mr. CAMPBELL: I understand that it is the intention of the minister to take out of the reserve a certain number of townships now and later on a further area. Is that correct?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I should not like to make a statement as to the taking out of any further area. The area taken out now is quite a substantial one.

Section agreed to.

On section 8—Porcupine Forest Reserve No. 1:

Mr. CAMPBELL: Just what area is being taken out of this Reserve?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Porcupine Reserve in the province of Manitoba covers an area of 777·5 square miles, and we are taking out of that 2·5 square miles. Out of the Porcupine Reserve in Saskatchewan we are taking 376·5 square miles which will reduce the present area of the reserve in Saskatchewan from 3,246·75 to 2,870·25.

Mr. CAHILL: How far from a railway will settlement be permitted in these reserves?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have not adopted any rigid rule in that regard. While the reserve remains as such, there is necessarily no railway penetration, there being no need for railway service; but when these areas are taken out and settled, there will be need of railway service. Portions of the area we are taking out will doubtless be a considerable distance from a railway. The river—I forget its name—has to be traversed, and doubtless bridges will have to be built. The soldiers are very anxious to settle on this area and take their chances of a railway going in. I think the hon. member for Dauphin or the hon. member for Nelson could give the distance from the railway better than I could.

Mr. CAMPBELL: As I understand it, in the area that is being taken out, the shortest distance to the railway will 6 or 7 miles, running from 15 to 20 miles, and perhaps more, in other portions.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: Are the lots being taken out in a solid block or being selected because of their suitability for agricultural purposes? My reason for asking is that where areas are selected through a forest reserve, and settlement is created within the reserve, there is very great danger of the reserve being entirely wiped out by fire.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Areas are not being taken out in any regular blocks. The first principle followed is this: The land must be reasonably fit for agricultural purposes or mixed farming. It must be found to be so, and we have tried to be very careful in that regard, because this reserve was first created on the assumption that it was more fit for forestry than anything else. We have had to exercise considerable caution not to be over-influenced by those anxious to settle on forest reserves, because very frequently they hastily come to the conclusion that it is agricultural land when really it is not. However, after the most careful survey we could make of this Porcupine reserve, which is the principal one we are dealing with in this Bill, we came to the conclusion that we could not justify retaining this area. What we are taking out is in two pieces. I cannot describe it better than by showing it to the hon. member on the map. The portion to the west is oblong in shape and about two townships wide, varying somewhat on the northern limit. The other portion is almost square in shape, situated more to the east, and is about twenty miles from the eastern boundary of the province of Saskatchewan.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I chance to be familiar with that part of the country. The area which is being taken out in Saskatchewan is south of the lower Red Deer river and southeast of Etomami Junction. It at one time formed the famous reserve owned by one of our worthy senators. It was covered with magnificent spruce, but in 1886 the reserve was burnt, and a second fire cleaned the timber right off. There is now no timber on it, and nearly every foot of it is fit for farming.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I can more fully answer my hon. friend from Pontiac now. The large portion taken out of the Porcupine reserve runs in an oblong shape east and west. The Canadian Northern railway runs east and west along the north part of it, distant about seven or eight miles from the northern extremity of the excepted area. The excepted area is, generally speaking, about twelve miles deep. Very little of the land that is being taken out of the reserve is more than nineteen miles distant from a railway, and the average would be about twelve or thirteen miles.

Section agreed to.

On section 9—Saskatchewan—Pines Forest Reserve:

Mr. CAHILL: What is the size of this reserve and of the area being taken out?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The total withdrawn from the Pines Forest reserve was only one and one-half quarter-section. Speaking from memory, I do not think that is for soldiers' settlement but was land granted to individual squatters upon which they had rights prior to the organization of reserves.

On section 10—Porcupine Forest No. 2:

Mr. CAHILL: What is the size of this reservation?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The amount taken out of Porcupine Reserve No. 2 in Saskatchewan is 376·5 square miles. In No. 1, which is in Manitoba, only 2½ square miles have been taken out. The 2,305·5 at the end does not mean that so many miles have been taken out; it is merely descriptive.

On section 11—Alberta: The Rocky Mountain Forest Reserve:

Mr. MEIGHEN: The total area of that reserve is 20,805. It will be 20,804 after this, as only one square mile will be taken out for soldiers' settlement. It is at the extremity of the reserve and will not affect the consistency or shape of the reserve in any way.

Mr. CAHILL: Approximately, how far is it from the railway?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is some distance, but the land was located on before the reserve was established and therefore we are not concerned particularly with the distance. It is not for soldiers' settlement.

On section 12—British Columbia: Nicola Forest Reserve:

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is three square miles.

On section 13—Fly Hill Forest Reserve:

Mr. MEIGHEN: About four square miles are taken out of this reserve for soldiers' settlement.

Mr. MOLLOY: Is this land to be thrown open to soldiers for home settlement?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The method we have under consideration, and which I think will be carried out, will be to permit only soldier entry in the reserve. That is to say no one except a soldier can go in, and the soldier cannot get a homestead; all he can get is soldier entry, or the soldier homestead. The right to his other homestead will still remain intact. What we contemplate is to enable the soldier to take soldier entry of 160 acres in that reserve, and reserve 80 acres that adjoins in each case, so that if he makes good in the quarter-section we will subsequently let him have the 80 acres, probably by sale. It will possibly not be at full value but on terms that will be afterwards made known. In the meantime it is intended to make some provision by which he will have the use of that 80 acres. That is what the Soldiers' Settlement Board now have in mind. The scheme may be modified if it is deemed wise but at present we contemplate giving him a soldier entry there and reserving 80 acres for his use. Subsequently the land can be owned by him if he shows success as a farmer.

Sir SAM HUGHES: This will be quite a distance from the railway, and it would be only fair to have a branch of the Thunder Bay line serving this district. It is not reasonable to put soldiers twenty or thirty miles from a railway.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A railway is projected reaching from Priestville, Saskatchewan, and running northwesterly through this district and up to Hudson's Bay Junction. It is that road that is expected to serve the district.

Sir SAM HUGHES: That will still leave a lot east and west.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It might, unless the line ran pretty well east and west.

Mr. CAHILL: What will be the basis of priority as regards settlement?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is a difficult problem. In homesteading, so far the first man has always got entry. There are the gravest possible objections to that system, particularly in its application to soldiers, because in its ultimate operation in regard to soldiers it means that a man physically incapacitated by service is at a serious disadvantage. That is its fatal objection as applicable to soldiers and the board is considering, and will have power in the matter if the Soldiers' Settlement Act which is now before the House is passed, the adopting of another method, that of granting entry by lot. I do not particularly like that method, but I really am not able to think of anything better. There is no way by which any priority can be given on the part of the board which would be considered fair or acceptable, and the board is of the opinion that the matter will have to be worked out on the lot principle in some way.

Mr. CAMPBELL: While I recognize the difficulty that the minister points out, I may say that this matter was brought to the attention of the Government largely through the efforts of certain returned soldiers who were particularly familiar with that district. The returned soldiers who went from the Dauphin district, and who had been up there and gone through the district on several occasions, brought this matter to the attention of the board. The father of one of these soldiers had been a squatter for some years. The point I wish to bring to the attention of the minister is this: Considering the work done by these soldiers, and the efforts made by them resulting in the whole of the land being thrown open, it is a question whether some consideration should not be given to them. They have done work which should be recognized in some way, and if they are just given the same terms and conditions as others it would hardly seem fair or right. I recognize the difficulty there is, but I desire to make a plea for these particular people.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I should be glad if the hon. member would formulate his views in the shape of a letter or memorandum, so that I could take them up with the Soldiers' Settlement Board.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

House again in Committee on Bill No. 19, to consolidate and amend the Railway Act—Mr. Boivin in the Chair. (Resumed from May 28).

On section 374—consent of municipality for transmission lines upon highways, etc.:

Mr. H. M. MOWAT (Parkdale): I have an amendment to move to subsection 5 of section 374 by striking out that subsection and making a substitution which I will explain as I proceed. The Senate has seen fit to alter the Bill as it left this House in 1917 so as to favour a particular group of electrical companies. They favour one company but really they favour a group of interlocking companies. The result of the amendment which appears in the Bill now before the Committee is that the special legislative bargain made in 1902, when the private Act of the Toronto Niagara Power Company was passed by this House, is annulled and has no effect. For these reasons I wish to take the opinion of the Committee as to restoring the course agreed upon by the House in 1917.

The matter has now been before members for some weeks; in fact, I might say for some years and in a case of this kind where definitely the rights of the public, as represented by the municipalities, come into collision with the private, corporate rights of those in a certain business, it must, and always does, follow that the case of the municipalities, being so widely distributed and the interests so general, does not receive the attention which is given to the other side of the case by large corporations who keep a close watch on legislation as a matter of business. The public has little or no machinery by which to use its persuasive powers on members of Parliament or otherwise, but fortunately there have always been in this House a number of members quick to discern what is in the interest of the public as against a special or private interest and to see that the public interest is protected. Members of Parliament have always been careful to study enactments proposed in order to see that public rights shall not be surrendered. Ordinary vigilance really is the price of liberty where great monetary interests are concerned and here we have, as I shall show in a minute or two, a charter which is to be given by this special clause contained in the amendment of the Senate which will be worth many millions of dollars—one cannot help saying that—and which will allow one company, or group of companies, to extend their operations not only in Ontario where they at present are but throughout the whole Dominion. It will be a charter which will allow exploitation in every province of the Dominion. While the companies concerned are now only operating in one province, yet the advantage gained by this amendment would be so obvious that they would have little difficulty in getting capital to proceed with operations in other provinces.

It might be thought that it is not necessary to go into the details of this matter because it has been so much discussed, but I find that in this discussion it is wonderful how some members only get the point of view of one person with whom they discussed the case, while another member only gets some other point of view. These views are disjointed, and in the committee of which I was a member and which reported this Bill as it is, there were a number of members who said that they thought they understood the question before the committee and that they never imagined that so many arguments could be advanced on the side which they had made up their minds did not have the best of it. However, I have come to a conclusion upon the rights and wrongs of the parties opposed to each other in connection with this Bill without regard to the advocacy of any interest, and I deem it my duty to give the committee the benefit of the reasons which assisted me in reaching that conclusion. Late last session, for the purpose of getting at the bottom of it, I looked into the matter very carefully, I have come to a certain conclusion as the result of that investigation and I think it only proper, for the benefit of those who have not studied the matter closely, to give the House a short history of the matter and to point out the importance of the principle involved in this legislation.

The whole trouble arose really from a slip in the drafting of the statute. Our law clerk drew the statute in 1902 which formed the charter of the Toronto and Niagara Power company. So far so good, but our law clerk, when this statute came to be revised in 1903, forgot, or erred, in not looking after the rights of the public which were secured in the charter of the company. Lay members, of course, probably as well as lawyers, must know that from time to time the statutes of Canada, as of every other country, must, for public convenience, be revised and consolidated. Constant amendments are being made. It is very difficult, not only for the ordinary citizen, but for the practitioner, to go through all the statute-books and ascertain exactly what the law is.

So that at certain periods—it has been at intervals of twenty years in the Dominion, and at shorter intervals in the provinces—the public statutes have been revised and consolidated to make them more readable and more convenient for reference. So with the Railway Act which was known as the Railway Act of 1888 but which in 1903 was revised under the Railway Act of that year. The reason I say that our law clerk made a slip in legislation which, if we allow it to pass and to go uncorrected, will mean taking a great public right away from those to whom it was promised, is, that he neglected to carry into the Railway Act of 1903 the provisions of the special charter of the company taken from the Railway Act of 1899. So we come to this state of affairs: That Parliament passed in 1902 this charter which was satisfactory to both parties; then in 1903, the Railway Act being about to be consolidated, the draftsman, as is usual in these cases, inserted a clause that all previous Railway Acts should be repealed. Well, that was all very well, that was good enough if there had been brought forward into the new Consolidated Railway Act all the rights given to persons by the Act which had been repealed. I have no doubt that the law clerk thought he did so, but it might have been well if, at the time he was drawing the Consolidated Act in 1903, which repealed all previous Acts, the parties concerned, at any rate the public, had been represented, and that when he drew the clause to repeal the Act of 1899, under which the public rights were granted, the public guardian had said: Stay your hand; remember that under the Act of 1899 the public were given great privileges; be careful that you do not so consolidate the new Act and repeal the old Act as to take those rights away. If that had been done this contest would never have occurred. But unfortunately it did not occur to the law clerk that by repealing the former Railway Act of 1899 any such effect was being brought about. Such is the situation, however, and it is now being declared that the Act of 1899 does not control the Toronto, and Niagara Power Company.

Before I continue this branch of the subject let me say that we are not asking in the amendment to do anything which is unprecedented, or to take away rights which have been granted; we are only asking that the will of Parliament, clearly expressed in 1902, seventeen years ago, should obtain and be declared so as to govern the parties to this controversy at the present time. It is said that other interests and rights have intervened since that time which changed the condition of affairs. Let me say that Parliament has never been guided by any such principle at all, but has seemed anxious in the passing of corporate legislation to do what was right as between the corporations and the public that they serve. An instance of that is to be found in the amendment to the Bell Telephone Act of 1906. The Bell Telephone Company, it will be remembered, enjoyed great rights at first. The telephone was a new thing, and the public were anxious to have it in their shops and homes, and they did not know exactly what would be the result of a telephone company suddenly descending upon a town and doing its own will on the streets of that community without regard to the convenience of the people, or the rights of the council, or of a city or town engineer, to control those streets. So sure were the Bell Telephone Company of their rights in this respect that they started to do work in the city of Toronto, interfering with the general rights of the public over their streets. Litigation ensued, the case went to the Privy Council, and that tribunal held that the Bell Telephone Company under its charter, had the right to do what it was doing without asking the consent of the municipal authorities. This made all the more acute the feeling on the part of the municipal authorities throughout Canada, and their champions in Parliament, and rendered it all the more imperative that everything must be done to guard municipal rights in regard to these big utility corporations. The consequence was that when the Bell Telephone Company came to Parliament in 1906 for an amendment to its charter, and to ask that the capital should be increased —not a very great desideratum, one would think—Parliament immediately took the opportunity to make a condition that the very same provision that had been inserted in the Act of the Toronto and Niagara Power Company should be embodied in the Bell Telephone Act of 1906. Now it is undoubted that Parliament, by putting into the Bell Telephone Act the provision that the company must obtain the consent of the municipal authorities before they entered a town, to that extent interfered with the vested rights of that particular company. It cut down those rights in a very considerable degree, and at the same time declared the rights of other telephone companies who desired, or might desire hereafter, to deal with the municipalities. It must have had that effect, nevertheless the Bell Telephone Company apparently submitted. I notice by reading Hansard of 1906 that the Bell Telephone Company Bill was in charge of the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) and it was evidently intended to wangle the Bill through without this particular clause; but in the end the champions of public rights in Parliament, one of whom was Mr. Justice Lennox, then the representative for South Simcoe, and another Mr. W. F. Maclean, member for South York, sturdily opposed the passage of the Bill, until it was made perfectly clear that the Railway Act should apply to the Bell Telephone Company. The clause which was inserted at that time into the Bell Telephone Company Act is as follows:

Chapter 61, Acts of 1906:

This Act and the Bell Telephone Company of Canada shall be subject to the provisions of the Railway Act 1903, and amendments thereto.

Here we have this well studied and deliberately determined upon precedent, that the rights of the public are to be considered and that vested rights cannot prevail against them. That is the principle that I ask the Committee to-day to re-adopt.

Taking the particular case in which we are interested to-day, it is that of the Toronto-Niagara Power Company which came to Parliament in 1902 and obtained corporate powers which were conceded by its advocates before the special committee on the Railway Bill, and which in fact, it is not disputed, are very generous and very ample. Those powers are very wide powers, largely no doubt owing to the fact that the people who obtained this Act were pioneers in the transmission of electric energy from Niagara Falls, and it was not then manifest what their attitude towards the public might be. The very fact that such full, generous, and ample powers were granted under this charter should make us, it seems to me, all the more careful that the rights of this company should be confined and restricted to the statute which was then passed, and which should not be departed from

If they got so much sweet out of the bargain, they must take what they consider is the sour part, for that is the only way in which justice can be done. I argue that the Act was the result of a distinct and special legislative bargain. Legislative bargains between Parliament and the promoters of a Bill have always been noticed by the courts. In fact, in this very Bell Telephone case that I have spoken of, reported in 1905 Appeal Cases, it will be seen that Lord Macnachten in discussing the Bill mentions the fact that the legislation was alleged to have been of the nature of a bargain; the Telephone Company asked for something, and conceded something, in order to get what is asked for; but he finds that there was not sufficient evidence of that to allow him to decide the point. Apparently he is quite of the opinion—I only quote this as one of many cases—that if a legislative bargain was made plain to the court, the court would not enforce any law which was abhorrent to that bargain.

I assert that this special Act was passed on the express understanding—more than that, on the express undertaking of the promoters—that the Railway Act of 1899—which gave very special privileges of control to municipalities—should be incorporated in it. Let me for a moment direct the attention of the Committee to section 21 of the Company's Act, which provides that section 90 and sections 136 to 169, and so on, of the Railway Act are to apply to the company and its undertakings, "in so far as the said sections are not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act, and subject to the following: Wherever in the said sections of the Railway Act the word 'company' occurs, it shall mean the power company hereby incorporated."

I emphasize that because of the reason that since this slip in the draftmanship which I mentioned, it has been held that the clauses which were referred to related only to railway companies, and not to a power company such as this, although it is quite clear here that Parliament said expressly that "power company" was what it meant when it provided that the clauses of the 1899 Railway Act should apply and control and restrict this particular company.

What were the clauses of the Act of 1899 which were at the time incorporated in this clear language? They were very much as you find them in section 373 of this Bill which is before you as applicable to telephone companies, and rather than repeat them in section 374—the clause we are now considering—the draftsman in subsection 3 refers to section 373. And that was the reason for not setting out in the particular Act of 1902 all the clauses of the Railway Act which were meant to apply, it being more convenient to refer to the clauses.

When this company got its charter it got two things: a restriction in favour of the municipalities as to control of their streets, and also another thing that vastly outweighed that in importance, namely, the power to expropriate property. That was a very important clause, and I wonder if, when it is contended here that the Railway Act of 1899, incorporated by this clause 21, is gone by reason of bad draftsmanship as regards the restrictive rights of the municipalities, it will be conceded that the expropriation rights of the company are also gone. I do not think so. You will find that a company of this kind will fight to retain what is advantageous in its Act, and it will fight to exclude everything that it thinks is disadvantageous.

One would imagine that the fairest way of dealing with the whole thing would be to cut out the expropriation clauses granted by this particular charter, as it has been decided by the highest court that bad draftsmanship has eliminated the restrictive clauses. If they are to be relieved of the restrictions they ought to give up the benefits. But, of course, we cannot expect the company to do so, and it would not be business policy on their part.

Supposing clauses 136 to 169 inclusive had been actually set out, that would have taken up several pages of the statute book. and have made the charter very long. Therefore, it was generally felt at the time that it would be perfectly adequate for the purpose that the sections themselves should be simply referred to instead of being set out in extenso. I notice that in 1901—and I must give these things because I want to be absolutely fair—the Ottawa and Hull Power Company was incorporated, and there the very same language was used, namely, that:

> Section 90 of the Railway Act shall apply to the company, but no other provisions of the said Act shall apply thereto.

That is to say, they should have no expropriation rights such as this Niagara Power Company got. In the same year the St. Lawrence Power Company was incorporated, and the clause of the Railway Act was actually copied into the Special Act. If that had been done in this case we would not be here at all discussing this matter. But simply because of the peculiar algebraic way in which the legislation was affected by reference to an Act which was afterwards repealed, it has been held that with the repeal of the Act—inadvertently, as I say—the whole restriction is gone.

I now come to the point as to whether there was a legislative bargain. In 1902 two members of the House of Commons, who were either specially deputed by the municipalities or were so of their own choice, were the champions of public rights. One of these was Edward F. Clarke, one of the members for Toronto, a man with whom I had the closest intimacy and business associations, because when he was mayor of Toronto—and a better mayor Toronto never had—I happened to be one of the city solicitors and it was my privilege to meet Mr Clarke many and many a time.

I was impressed with the extraordinary interest and zeal that he showed in connection with one piece of legislation after another in favour of the rights of municipalities. He was the champion; he was the man who saw where some power could come in and destroy the well-earned or well bought liberties of municipalities. Mr. Clarke was associated with Mr. E. B. Osler, now Sir Edmund Osler, who was a little bit alarmed about section 90 when this Act went through; it was not his idea that section 90 should be mentioned as being included in the Act. But Mr. Clarke said: Will it do any harm to set out in this charter exactly what the restrictive powers are in favour of the city engineer or the city or town council? But the very persons who insisted that this reference to the Railway Act was sufficient were the promoters of the Act; that is the important point to be kept in mind. It was not the clause of the municipalities; it was the clause of the promoters of this Act. Mr. Pringle, then the member for Stormont, who was in charge of the Bill and handled it with a great deal of ability, pointed out that the clause of the Railway Act was all-sufficient; that there was no necessity for spreading it out on the statute. Mr. Osler said, column 3629 of Hansard, 1902:

> Would it do any harm to put in this simple clause stating that this charter shall be subject to all Acts that may be passed by this House referring to electrical companies of this kind?
> The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Sutherland): There can be no doubt that it is.
> Mr. Osler: . . . If it is in the clause already, why not insert this and make it without any doubt?

Then Mr. M. K. Cowan, who was chairman of the special committee which considered this Bill, said:

> When this committee goes to erect poles or wires across the streets of Toronto it can only do so with the consent of the Municipal Council of that city, or of other municipalities in which it operates.

It is clear, therefore, that two members of the House, who were willing to take the word of lawyers in the committee—eminent counsel in charge of the Bill, and ministers of the Crown—thought that that was fair ground for letting the thing go through as it was. But in addition to that, Mr. Pringle after some discussion and some objections by Mr. Clarke, goes on to say, at column 3634:

> Will the hon. gentleman allow me to put a question to him? The question I wish to put is: How this section 90 of the Railway Act, as amended in 1899, affects this question?
> The amendment is as follows:
>
> "When any company has power by any Act of Parliament to construct and maintain lines of telegraph or telephone or lines for the conveyance of light, heat, power or electricity, such company may with the consent of the municipal council or other authority having jurisdiction over any highway, square or other public place, enter thereon," etc.
> I rather gather, from what the hon. gentleman says, that the section of the Act does not mean what it purports. Well, I understand that it means just what it expresses. All companies have to obtain consent of a municipality before passing through it. And I want to ask, what is the effect on this question of section 90 of the Railway Act, as amended in 1899?

So that this section of the Act of 1899, which, we say, contained safeguards of the rights of the public, was put in there at the instance of the very company which is now seeking to destroy it by reason of a chance interpretation of the statute by the courts. But Parliament is above all courts. Parliament may express itself in a way to which the courts may seem inadequate, obscure, or in some other way objectionable. If so, all the courts have to do is direct attention to the matter. But to say that the Parliamen of Canada should be subject to the opinions of the courts is, to my mind, absurd; we are the law-makers here, and all the courts have to do is to interpret the laws that we make. If, as a matter of law, the courts say that we have not said what we meant to say, or that we have left out something that should have been put in, we are willing to remedy the matter. But I utterly repudiate the suggestion that our action as law-makers is to be controlled by the courts. So that on the whole we have here a distinct legislative bargain. This Bill went through despite the objections of these two champions of the rights of the public, because they were assured that section 90 of the Railway Act applied. And everybody thought that it did apply—the promoters of the Act more than anybody else, because it was they who fathered the clause.

This company, under section 12 of its Act, have the right to distribute electricity, to become a merchant in that commodity to sell it to users of electricity, and they had also the right to shove their trunk lines through municipalities without distributing electricity to the people of those municipalities. They had these two rights and they never for a moment objected to the restrictive powers that were inserted in the statute of 1902.

Then comes along the revision of 1903, repealing the Act of 1899. I may inform the laymen of the House, who may, perhaps, not be aware of it—I speak, of course, with reference to lawyers, because they know all about it—that the law is this: There is in every volume of revised or consolidated statutes a clause which says that the provisions of the repealed Act shall be carried on into the revised Act unless the contrary is expressed. Our last revision of the statutes was in 1906, and the way it is expressed in the interpretation clause of the revised statutes of Canada, 1906, section 1, is as follows:—

Whenever any Act is repealed or other provisions are substituted by way of consolidation, any reference in any unrepealed Act—

That is, this charter.

—to such repealed Act—

That is, the Railway Act of 1899.

—as regards any subsequent transaction shall be held and construed to a reference to the provisions of the substituted Act relating to the same subject matter as such repealed Act.

That is plain enough, is it not? One would have thought that when the Court of Appeal of Ontario—the Appellate Division, composed of five judges: Chief Justice Moss, Mr. Justice Garrow, Mr. Justice Magee, Mr. Justice Meredith, and Mr. Justice McLaren—held that it was plain enough that the revised statute did apply, the case would go no further; but it did. It went to the Privy Council, and it is because of the decision of the Privy Council, which was the luckiest decision any litigant ever got in this world, that this aggregation of companies now comes here and puts their case in this way, as it seems to me: We got a statute in 1902 which said that we must get the consent of municipalities before we could put down our poles; we accepted that interpretation until 1911, and then we began litigation as the only thing to do; the little town of North Toronto, some four miles north of Toronto, objected to our running transmission lines along certain streets, and started to cut down our poles; we commenced litigation and we won twice; we got a decision in our favour, which now gives us vested rights.

I shall have to detain the Committee for a moment while we see what there is in that contention. When this aggregation of companies say that they have vested rights by the decision of the highest court in the realm, one would naturally suppose that that meant that both parties had come before the highest court of the realm and put the merits of their respective cases before that court. You would naturally suppose that that was the case; that by the decision of the highest court of the realm the case of one of the parties was declared to be predominant upon its merits and upon the law. But was that the case? Very far from it; in fact, it is just the contrary. What this aggregation of companies won in the Privy Council decision was nothing more than a judicial decision on statutes and words used by our law clerk; that is all. It was alleged that it was highly important that this company, which was a pioneer in the transmission of Niagara power to the municipalities of Ontario, should not be impeded by having to ask the consent of municipalities through which they wanted to bring their lines, because some municipality, some miserable township it might be, might hold the company up by refusing to give consent, and the enterprise would be ruined. That was put before the Privy Council. On the other hand, the case of the municipalities was put before the Privy Council, to the effect that it was more important in the interests of this Dominion that municipalities should have the right to make mistakes if they wanted to and refuse, if they desired, consent to this power company going through their territory. They might be very foolish and very backward in doing that, but they had the right to refuse consent, and the right to make that mistake, if mistake it was. What does the Privy Council say on these two contrary placings of the merits of the case before them. It says this (page 840):

Lord Haldane: If the powers conferred by this section (section 90) displaced the less restricted powers of entering without any consent conferred by the Act of Incorporation, the appellants (the power company) are in the wrong.

Your lordships have, therefore, to determine this question. They have to bear in mind that a court of justice is not entitled to speculate as to which of two conflicting policies was intended to prevail, but must confine itself to the construction of the language of the relevant statutes read as a whole.

So that utterly precludes this aggregation of power companies from now saying that the decision of the Privy Council is in favour of their case on its merits. Because the Privy Council distinctly say: "We will not decide that; we will simply decide on the statutes." Any layman can see what an exceedingly narrow decision it was, and how it might just as well have been the other way. As it happened, the decision after running along the top of the fence, turned over to the corporate side. The decision was simply this. Their lordships said that while in this charter the Railway Act of 1899 is to apply, and wherever the word "company" occurs in the Railway Act it shall mean the power company, yet that Act was repealed, so there was nothing for them to do but to look to the Act of 1903 which repealed it, and that Act of 1903, unfortunately, defined "company" not as a power company, but as a railway company. That is the whole basis of the decision of the Privy Council, and is the result of ineffective legislation of ours here in this House, and of our law clerk not being alert to save the rights given Parliament. The precautions we took to say that "company" meant power company are wasted, because the Railway Act of 1903 the Consolidating Act, says that "company" means only railway company. Therefore, as this power company is not a railway company it is free of the restrictions we imposed in 1902.

So it seems to me obvious that we must go back and place ourselves in the position of our predecessors in 1902, who meant to do a certain thing, who were commissioned by the public to protect their rights, and who did protect their rights by certain legislation. We should have no hesitation whatever, no matter what vested rights have occurred, in going back and doing what was done in 1902, and doing what was done by this House in 1917. Personally, I very much doubt whether there are any very great vested interests which would be affected. How can any interests be affected by a change in this section simply making effective the legislation of 1902? This corporation got its charter in 1902, and we never heard a word of this dispute until 1911. They agreed right up to that time that they had to get the consent of the municipality, and not only the consent, but a lot of other things set out in the statute of 1899. Older members of the House may remember how in the old days the Montreal Telegraph Company and the Dominion Telegraph Company, now consolidated, and the Bell Telephone Company, could put their poles through any town and do almost anything that they liked. There was absolutely no power to restrict them except that in one case they were obliged to paint the poles. But that is a small thing. We all remember that particularly in one of the best streets in the city they erected poles with wires on them which were so low that a man on top of a team load of hay could not pass under them. They would put up double lines of poles on one street and would so construct the poles that the firemen could not get their ladders from the street to a burning building, and in many other ways they became a menace to the life of the public. From the time that the first power company was incorporated by this Parliament in 1895, twenty-four years ago, there constantly grew a feeling on the part of Parliament that the rights of municipalities were supreme. So that in all legislation following that, and in the Railway Act, it is provided that they must consult the municipalities, and traffic must not be obstructed. Wires must be of a certain height and poles must be perpendicular. In addition, there must be the right to cut down poles and wires in case of fire without any obligation to pay compensation, and trees must not be injured. My hon. friend from Gaspé told us in the Committee that one of the companies went into his place and cut down a beautiful tree and there was no recourse against them. I hope the hon. member will bear that in mind when he comes to vote on the amendment. It was also provided that the work on any street or square should be done under the city engineer, and that the workmen should wear badges and not go into private houses without authority, and that temporary removal of wires and poles should be made if necessary. Twelve sub-clauses protecting the rights of the municipalities are now absolutely swept away by this Senate amendment unless it is rejected by this House. I do not think that the cry of vested rights should swerve us from our duty in respect of this amendment. In 1902 the company got the power to go anywhere in Canada and issue bonds. They are now in Ontario, but the franchise is so valuable that if they win here we may expect them in the near future to be in every province where there is any water-power at all. As I say, they got the power to go into any province and issue bonds to the extent of $1,500,000, and they did. In 1903, after they were incorporated by this charter, they sold out to another company, the Electrical Development Company, situate at Niagara Falls. That company took all their bonds of $1,500,000. So that so far as this company goes, its bonds are not affected because they are not in the stock markets. They claim that that does not matter so long as they are linked up with some other company. However, the Electrical Company got their bonds and was able to use the transmission company. They worked together, and afterwards there was a company formed, another company which held no physical assets. They had no property, but held all the stock of the Electrical Company, the Toronto Niagara Power Company, and, I think, the Toronto Electric Light Company. This combination was called the Toronto Power Company. The Toronto Power Company in 1911 issued a mortgage on all the assets of all the companies of naminally $25,000,000, of which they issued $18,000,000. But before this question of the rights of municipalities and their intervention had come up at all, the aggregation of these power companies had issued bonds to the extent of $7,800,000, or nearly half the whole amount of bonds issued. One would say that if they had issued, in round numbers, $8,000,000 of bonds on this charter, which everyone believed gave the municipalities their rights, they could not have got very much more after they got a decision of the Privy Council in 1912. They now say: We have certain rivals. There is a semi-public utility in Ontario called the Hydro-Electric Company, and they have become our rivals, and this question of consent means a great deal more than it did then, for the municipalities may link up with the Hydro and may not give consent. But that could not have occurred in 1911 when they issued these bonds. When a company wants to sell its bonds it employs a well-read, expert counsel, a lawyer who is accustomed to commercial law. Without his opinion that under the statutes the basis of the bonds is good, they cannot possibly enter the stock market. But, suppose they asked Mr. Lash or any other good corporate lawyer for an opinion as to their bonds preparatory to going into the stock market, what would Mr. Lash have found? He would have found, if it was previous to 1912, when they got this decision as to bad draftmanship, that the very charter under which they were acting incorporated the Railway Act, which said that they had to get the consent of the municipalities. So that the public, who only look to the opinion of eminent counsel, would have only that information, and would have the right to say: "We gave you that charter only on condition that the municipalities had rights." But the answer is made: What does the public know about what occurred in Hansard and what Mr. Clark bargained for, or what Mr. Osler and Mr. Pringle said? They do not read Hansard and do not know anything about it. Well, the public may not read Hansard, but Mr. Lash knew all about the matter, because he and his friends had it put forward in Parliament, providing that the municipalities should have power to consent. Mr. Lash must therefore have known about it. Anyway, there it stares counsel in the face. He will argue: If I advise them to sell bonds on the assurance that they are good I am doing so knowing that they must get the consent of the municipalities. They say, that was very well up to 1912, but after 1912 conditions differed altogether. The Privy Council, the highest court in the land, decided in our favour. They do not tell the public that the decision of the Privy Council is based on mere words and not on merits. They say that alters the case. But does any expert counsel in Ontario or Montreal to whom they went not know that you cannot find out a gross error in legislation like this as a result of getting a decision of the Privy Council and have it rest at that and the whole thing put to sleep? No. The municipalities at once become alert, and every practical man knows that the fight only begins with the Privy Council's decision. They must have known and it was not contradicted, that the very next year, after 1912, the city council of Toronto through Mr. Geary sent down a memorandum calling for this very amendment, or one in practically the same terms. So the question has been before Parliament since the session of 1913. Every corporation lawyer and every bondholder must have known that this was a matter of most acute controversy and that it was not going to be allowed to pass simply because Parliament had been defeated of its will by reason of the inefficiency of a law clerk. Therefore, I do not think they are entitled to use that word "vested rights" with the unction with which they attempt to use it. I admit that there is a strong argument that no one wants to interfere with vested rights, because, in the first place, we are a borrowing nation and if we announce that we are going to interfere with vested rights it will interfere with our credit, a thing which we do not desire and we want to do the honest thing; we do not want to interfere with rights that have once been given. But vested rights mean rights that have been earned and interference with vested rights means legislation passed for an improper and dishonest purpose. If it is legislation passed only to right a wrong which has been inadvertently done, there is no interference with vested rights. In the Committee we—particularly the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Tweedie)—endeavoured to find out—what it ought to have been very easy to find out—where these bonds went. We had general statements made to the effect that they went to France, America, Britain and Canada. I venture to say that most of them were sold in Canada and that the persons who bought them were the same crowd that is in these amalgamated companies. I may be mistaken as to that but I have as much right to suppose and to suggest that as they have to assert the other thing because they did not show where the bonds had gone which they could very easily have done as the records would disclose it.

We had the benefit of the views of an eminent counsel from the city of New York. It was a great pleasure to hear him because he is not only a charming speaker but he is a very clever and highly intellectual man. That was Mr. James Beck and Mr. Beck said that he represented some bond company in the state of Wisconsin but he did not say the amount of bonds that they owned, nor did he say who they were. We were without definite information as to whether any body was fooled or misled in parting with his money by reason of this fortuitous end to the litigation in the Privy Council. I am inclined to think that that is not the real trouble but that is the best argument to use with the ordinary member of Parliament. Every one of us hesitates to vote for anything that interferes with vested rights and a great deal has been said in the last year or two about doing anything that will interfere with the credit of Canada. This eminent counsel from New York undertook to give us a lesson in commercial and legislative honesty. While he could give us lectures on commercial ethics, he confined his remarks to the bondholders and utterly ignored a discussion of what would be thought in his country of making a definite legislative bargain and then trying to repudiate it the moment they saw a little law in their favour. He confined his remarks absolutely to the poor, belated bondholders but if you are going to drag in the morality of the case then I say that it ill becomes any company or amalgamation of interlocking companies, to charge interference with vested rights or legislative immorality when they themselves are actually undertaking to sell to the public a security which they know is not the one that they got from Parliament because the clause which was put in was put in to protect a certain interest and put in at its behest.

Now, we must answer the great question: "What is the most important thing for us legislators to do under the circumstances? Is this a case which will hurt vested interests and interfere with the credit of Canada? Is it more important to say: "Walk slowly and safely; it is far better to let it go rather than to have it said in other countries that we had changed our legislation?" Is that to be our sole object, or is it more important to try to protect certain rights and interests? Twenty-five years ago a well-defined movement took place in this country and was brought to the attention of this Parliament. Public opinion demanded an assurance that groups of capitalists and exploiters would be prevented from using the streets of municipalities without the consent of those municipalities. Parliament gave that assurance. Are we now to say that we will break faith with the people in every little municipality in the country who have no time to come down to Parliament to present their case, because it is alleged by this corporation that they have a decision from the Privy Council in their favour, that this is the highest court in the land, and that therefore we must accept the situation? Does any member suppose that when he goes back to his little town, he is going to be able to make an argument of that kind to the people on the streets? His constituents would say to him: Are you going, by legislation, to do a thing of that kind; are you going to set up any such man of straw as that and to say that, because your law clerk misdrew your enactment you have not the power to re-enact it in order to carry out what we sent you to Parliament to do? That must be so. That is not only the argument that will be heard in Ontario, where these industries are being carried on, but that is the argument in every province in this Dominion. We made a distinct bargain with our people. You have on the one side the public unprotected except by more or less insignificant associations on the one side, you have the monetary interests on the other side, which is disadvantageous to the public interest. It is for us to say what we are going to do. Is it more important to break the bargain which we are said to have made, or to try and amend the bargain which we really made with these corporate interests? To me the question has but one answer, and it is that we must act as the representatives of the public, not as the representatives of the corporate interests, re-enact what we did in 1902, and put this matter really in the same position that it was in when it left this House in 1917.

Now, I come to the amendment. Referring to the present clause as adopted by the Senate, subsection 5, it is apparent that the Senate has brought in a cleverly drawn provision. Subsection 5 says:

> Any specific powers inconsistent with the provisions of this section—

With subsections 1, 2, 3, and 4 to which the muncipalities agree:

> —and conferred on any company—

That is the Toronto Niagara Power Company.

> —by any special—

That is their charter or authority as interpreted by the Privy Council.

—by any special or other Act or authority of the Parliament of Canada or of any province shall not be affected by the provisions of this section,—

That is cut out as regards the Toronto Niagara Power Company. But here they have a sort of parenthesis and they pretend to give the municipalities some rights. They say:

—but if any municipality complain to the Board—

That is the Railway Board.

—that any company—

That is this company.

—whether incorporated by special or other Act or authority of the Parliament of Canada is exercising its powers oppressively or in bad faith the Board may hear such complaint, and if it sees fit supervise the exercise of such powers.

Now it is perfectly obvious that these words "oppressively, or in bad faith" seem to give some rights to the municipality. In reality they do not give one particle of right, because the mere fact of putting a pole on a street, or putting it on both sides of the street, or putting it at a certain height, is something that is not done oppressively, and is certainly not done in bad faith. It is done in pursuance of the rights conferred by the charter, and such a thing could not possibly be said to be done in bad faith or oppressively. Therefore, if a particular municipality claims that the poles are crooked, or that they are so low as to interfere with firemen getting to a fire, that the poles were not painted, that they were not put down on a proper foundation and might fall, or that they were put down without the previous consent of the municipality's engineer—if any of these things are said and the municipality goes to the Railway Board with the request "We want an appeal from this?" the Railway Board would say, first of all, "You have got to show that these things were done oppressively or in bad faith." The municipality could not do so, because there would be no oppression and there would be no bad faith, and so these words amount to nothing, and should be cut out. They seem to be in favour of the municipalities, and I dare say the hope was entertained that municipalities that were not alert might accept them; but municipalities that are alert will not accept something that means nothing. Therefore we want these words out. I move:

[Mr. Mowat.]

To amend clause 374 by striking out subclause 5 thereof and replacing same by the following:

"(5) The provisions of the last preceding sub-section shall apply to and restrict the powers of any company heretofore incorporated by Special Act, or other authority of the Parliament of Canada, notwithstanding that such provisions may be inconsistent with the provisions of such Special Act or other authority, and notwithstanding the provisions of Section three of this Act.

(6) If any company heretofore incorporated by Special Act or other authority of the Parliament of Canada has acquired, or shall acquire assets or any part thereof, or the right to the possession or use of the assets or any part thereof, of any company or person operating a system for the distribution of light, heat, power or electricity, in any town, city, village or township, then in every such case the company so acquiring such assets shall carry out with the municipality all the obligations, in respect to the said assets whether arising under contract or in any other manner, of the company from which the said assets have been or shall be acquired."

The municipalities do not wish to give up any right they now have. That is natural, and the law since 1903 is that while a trunk line can be shoved through a municipality in the case of a transmission line, application must first of all be made for the municipality's consent, and if that consent is withheld the company can go to the Railway Board. But if this power company wants to sell electricity they cannot do it at all without the consent of the city or town, and there is no appeal to the Railway Board. We want to retain, and adhere to, the rights we have had since 1903. Let it be remembered, however, that the rights we had in 1902, under this charter, were that there was no appeal to the Railway Board at all either in case of power transmission or power selling by the company. In 1903 the Railway Act was passed, and now if the company wants the right to go into any municipality, and if the local authorities will not consent, there is the right of appeal to the Board; but so far as selling electricity in a municipality is concerned, we still want the right to say no. That is a right which we have enjoyed all these years. For the reasons which I have given—and I have taken too much time in my statement, not knowing we were going to have a temperature of ninety-four in the shade when I prepared my memoranda on the subject—I leave the matter to the decision of the committee, hoping that they will rule in favour of the municipalities.

Mr. STEVENS: I have listened to the lengthy statement of the hon. gentleman with a feeling of appreciation for the tremendous amount of labour that he must have undergone in preparing his lengthy and technical argument on this subject. I feel somewhat modest in daring to raise my voice on the subject at all, in view of the oft-repeated references to "the simplicity of the average layman." Fortunately, or unfortunately, I do not happen to be a lawyer, and therefore I suppose, as a "layman" I am to be regarded as totally incapacitated from contributing anything to the discussion of this matter. However, as one who has followed the development of this question during the last two or three months with a great deal of interest and detailed attention, I wish briefly to state my views in regard to it and my reasons for casting my vote in the way I intend to do when the time comes.

At the outset I desire to resent, and resent very strongly, the inference that any one who ventures to differ from a gentleman who is advocating what he chooses to call public rights is thereby a special pleader for moneyed interests and corporations. We have heard altogether too much of that sort of argument. As far as I am concerned my record is very clear along those lines; but there is an element of fair dealing and of common sense in all questions, and I claim the right to express my opinions without being subjected to such an aspersion. What we are asked to do is to introduce into a general Act which might be termed the most important civil statute we have on the statute books of Canada, the Railway Act, applying to all railways and to all telephone and telegraph companies, a special provision to deal with an alleged improvident power given to a company some fifteen years ago, thus enabling us by special language introduced into the general Act to remedy what is alleged to be a wrong.

Mr. FRIPP: Will the hon. gentleman kindly summarize for the benefit of those of us who were not able to be present at the sittings of the special committee just what the points in dispute are between the city of Toronto and the power company?

Mr. STEVENS: If my hon. friend has followed the argument—

Mr. FRIPP: I could not follow the argument of the hon. member for Parkdale, and I have not yet learned what is the crucial point in dispute.

Mr. STEVENS: It was my intention to keep away from private disputes and not to be led into a discussion of them. The dispute in this case is between the city of Toronto and the Toronto, Niagara Power Company, and allied companies. The point I wish to make is that this Parliament is not concerned with a private dispute. It is now making a law which is applicable to all railway, power, telephone and telegraph companies, and therefore—

Mr. TWEEDIE: I must be permitted to take exception to that statement right from the start. This is not a dispute between the city of Toronto—

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Vancouver has the floor and cannot be interrupted except with his consent.

Mr. STEVENS: I was saying that I was not going to discuss the question of any private rights, or any private disputes. I was going on to state that we are now passing legislation dealing with all companies of the character mentioned. Now we are asked—I am sure the laboured arguments of my hon. friend from Parkdale will permit me at least to make this reference without interruption—to introduce a provision to remedy an alleged wrong perpetrated in the Act of the Toronto, Niagara Power Company. What are the facts, as far as the framing of the Act we are now dealing with is concerned? The facts are that the disputed case was carried through the courts, the proper place to deal with it. It was dealt with in the court of Chancellor Boyd, who gave a certain decision which I am not going to discuss. On appeal to the Ontario Appellate Court that decision was reversed. An appeal was then taken to the Privy Council, which sustained the ruling of the trial judge. As far as I am concerned I take this stand on the merits of the case: the judgment of the trial judge and the Privy Council is sufficient for me.

The next point I wish to make is that for the past two months at least a special committee of this House sat and heard hour after hour and day after day an exhaustive discussion by the most learned counsel in Canada on behalf of both sides in relation to this case. After hearing them at great length the Committee came to a given decision which decision is contained in the reported Bill at present upon the table of the House. Now, Mr. Chairman, the question is brought up in this Committee—and I admit, it is perfectly proper to do so,—and we are asked to go through that whole process again of arguing this particular point.

If it is the intention of this Parliament to review powers given years ago in a special Act, it ought to be done only after an expert investigation has been held. Then, with the report following such expert investigation in the hands of the members, we should deal with the Act that it is alleged gave these improvident powers. I wish particularly to emphasize that point. I will repeat it in a slightly different form. If an improvident power was given to the Toronto and Niagara Power Company, and if by virtue of that power they are interfering with municipal rights wrongfully or oppressively or contrary to public interest, then I claim, Sir, that the way to remedy the evil is by special Act of Parliament limiting or amending or changng or restricting such power. I think I am on sound and safe ground when I make that statement. I do not think it is wise to attempt to deal with the matter as is proposed by the amendment.

The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) used an illustration as an argument for sustaining his process. He argued at great length that the Bell Telephone case is analogous to this case. But I would suggest to him, Mr. Chairman, that the Act of the Bell Telephone Company was a private Act, it was an amendment to their original statute, and that is exactly what I am asking this Committee to consider at this moment. The hon. member for Parkdale has provided me with the strongest possible argument for the position I am assuming, namely, that it should be by an amendment to the powers contained in the original charter of the company itself, and not in the general Act. And if the procedure regarding the Bell Telephone Company is worthy of the consideration that my hon. friend suggests then we must inevitably come to the conclusion that it is the proper procedure to follow in this case.

I suggest, Sir, and hold that it is a bad precedent to establish to redress an alleged wrong in a special private Act by amending a general Act. My hon. friend suggests that we are granting enlarged powers to the company. We are not doing anything of the kind and that ought to be made perfectly clear to the minds of hon. gentlemen who had not the privilege of sitting on the Special Committee. We are dealing with all companies in a general way in a general Act; which disposes of that argument at once.

Another point my hon. friend laid emphasis on was that the Senate had amended the Bill we had sent to them. I would remind him that this is a new Bill entirely. True, a similar Bill was before the House in 1917; but that has no relation whatever to this particular Bill. This is the Bill we are dealing with, and we are dealing with it on its merits.

The amendment of my hon. hon. friend reads in this way:

> The provisions of the last preceding subsection shall apply to and restrict the powers of any company heretofore incorporated by Special Act or other authority of the Parliament of Canada, notwithstanding that such provisions may be inconsistent with the provisions of such Special Act or other authority,

And further, and I wish the Committee to particularly mark this point—> —and notwithstanding the provisions of section 3 of this Act.

Mr. NESBITT: Read section 4 in connection with it.

Mr. STEVENS: Section 3 of this general Act—which we have already adopted, by the way—is in this form:

> where the provisions of this Act and of any Special Act passed by the Parliament of Canada relate to the same subject-matter the provisions of the Special Act shall, in so far as is necessary to give effect to such Special Act, be taken to over-ride the provisions of this Act.

We are asked to introduce into the Bill another clause which says that notwithstanding that clause we shall disregard the powers given in the special Act. In other words, in one clause we assert a certain principle, and in another clause we reverse that principle. I submit that that is a very unwise proceeding.

It should also be borne in mind that we do not know what other Acts will be affected. We say in this proffered amendment that it shall apply to all special Acts. During the past fifty years, or since Confederation, hundreds of bona fide Acts have been passed granting powers to telephone companies, electric power companies, telegraph companies, and such like, and yet this committee is asked—and I wish the committee to give this special consideration—to adopt a clause which will disregard all the powers given to private companies up to the present time. And we are asked to disregard them without knowing what powers we are disregarding. I submit that if we are to be consistent at all, if we are going to amend powers given in private Acts, we ought to have at least some knowledge of the Acts we are amending and the powers we are restricting.

I have not the statutes before me, but I will illustrate the point by referring to a couple of companies that I am familiar with. We have in the city of Vancouver a harbour commission incorporated by a special Act of this Parliament. That Act gives to the commission power to bring electricity into the city of Vancouver for the service of power to the harbour, and in the near future the commission are expecting to exercise that power. Now we are asking that that commission shall not have the right to exercise that power, although it was given to them in perfect good faith six years ago. In other words, we are asked to take away or amend or restrict that power as given by the special Act. Then I refer to two large companies we have in British Columbia carrying on street railway and electric power enterprises. These two companies are incorporated by special Acts of Parliament. I do not know of any complaint that they have exercised their powers unwisely, unjustly or without due consideration of public rights. As far as I am aware, except for a few local disputes which must necessarily occur, the Western Canada Power Company and the British Columbia Electric Railway Company are both acting in a fairly harmonious manner with the municipalities which they serve, and yet we are asking this Parliament to restrict the powers given to those companies so that they will be subject absolutely to the municipalities.

Mr. TWEEDIE: What powers will be restricted?

Mr. STEVENS: As I said a moment ago, I cannot cite the powers. I am merely giving the case of these two companies, of which I have personal knowledge; there must be seventy-five or a hundred other such companies in Canada. Without examining the charters of these companies, should we unreasonably and unduly restrict any powers they may have?

Mr. TWEEDIE: Can my hon. friend name one single provision in the charter of the Western Canada Power Company, or of the British Columbia Electric Railway Company, which will be restricted by this proposed amendment?

Mr. STEVENS: In his question, my hon. friend provides the answer. The House is not cognizant at this time of what powers these many companies have; nor can they be without examining each charter—which I am sure I do not propose to do, and I am sure members of the committee do not propose to do.

Mr. TWEEDIE: Can my hon. friend name one single provision in the charters of these companies which will be restricted or affected by this legislation?

Mr. STEVENS: I cannot speak from memory in regard to any one. I did cite the case—had my hon. friend chosen to listen, he would have heard me mention it —of the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners, who are empowered to bring in and distribute power to their harbour works. As they have, for instance, reclaimed areas where they rent or lease lands for factory purposes, and so on, this right is a very important one. Under this amendment, the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners would be made absolutely subject to municipal control. I am not saying for a moment that the Vancouver Harbour Commissioners intend or desire to do anything against the interests of the municipalities. But my hon. friend is drawing me entirely away from the point which I wish to make. We are asked ignorantly to restrict—I will put it that way —the powers of private companies by this amendment. Such legislation I allege to be very wrong and very poor, and a dangerour precedent for us to set up in this House.

I wish very briefly to direct the attention of the Committee to that portion of the clause which we are asked to delete. The Committee must get this point into its mind: We are not, under the Bill as it stands, depriving Parliament of any power it may wish to exercise regarding the Toronto and Niagara Power Company. Any time we choose to do so, we can amend that charter; we can do anything we choose with it. We are asked to delete subsection 5 of section 374, the clause which protects the public in what I consider to be a very reasonable manner. It provides that if a company incorporated under the authority of Parliament exercises its powers oppressively or in bad faith, the Board of Railway Commissioners may hear any complaint in that regard and, if it sees fit, supervise the exercise of those powers. The member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) contended that in this clause we were using language which made it impossible to deal with the problem. He said that if a municipality went before the Railway Board, complained that this company was exercising its powers unreasonably and asked that its powers be restricted, the Board would insist upon some hair-splitting evidence or proof of oppressiveness. Now, the record of the Board of Railway Commissioners ever since its organization is before this country; it stands out as the one court in the land which ignores matters of hair-splitting evidence and the like. The farmer, the worker, the private citizen may appear before the Board and get a hearing as good as, if not preferable to, that which he could get before the highest council in the land. I have been before the Railway Board many times, and I know that they particularly care for the interests of municipalities. Municipalities which make representations to the Board receive the most courteous and sympathetic attention. That is the record of the Board; that is what it is there for. It is not a court of law; it is a court of equity, a court created to protect the public interest, to administer this Act, and to see that its provisions are properly observed. What provision could be fairer than that if a company clothed with certain powers exercises them in any sense oppressively, the municipality—in fact, any person—may bring the matter before the Board of Railway Commissioners? The section provides that the Board may, if it sees fit, " supervise the exercise of such powers ". What does " supervise " mean? It means, direct exactly how a thing shall be done. Our legal friends who have such a profound contempt for the laymen of this House may advance technical arguments with regard to the meaning of words, but every experienced member of the House knows that the Railway Board acts fairly in these matters.

So that there are two points that I particularly wish to make: First, it is bad legislation to introduce into a general Act a remedy for an alleged wrong committed by a private company. If a case has been made and a remedy is required, that remedy should be provided by special Act and by amendment of the charter of the company. Second, I submit that the clause as it now stands affords adequate protection to municipalities, to private companies and to private citizens, by enabling this easy appeal to the Railway Board.

I resent the suggestion that any member who dares to raise his voice in opposition to a peculiar view held by our friends from Toronto on this question is derelict to his duty to the public. That is an imputation that should not be allowed to pass, because there are men in this House who are loyal and true to the interests of the public besides the hon. members who happen to sit for the great and holy city of Toronto.

For the reasons which I have stated, I propose to support the Bill as it comes from the special Committee appointed to consider this matter.

[Mr. Stevens.]

Mr. W. D. EULER (Waterloo, North): Although I listened carefully to the address of the member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat), I could not entirely follow him; despite that fact, I am still in favour of the amendment. While the point taken by the member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) may have some value, it seems to me that in its nature it is more academic than practical. I cannot get past the fact that if this clause passes in its present form, the Toronto and Niagara Power Company will continue to have the power to invade the streets of any municipality in Canada—more particularly of any municipality in Ontario—without first obtaining the consent of the people of that municipality.

I think the mere enunciation of that proposition condemns it. I think it is a monstrous thing that any private company, no matter how it obtained its privileges, should be allowed to erect its poles and string its wires and carry on its other activities on the streets of any municipality without the consent of that municipality having first been obtained. I do not concern myself particularly about the interpretation of the law under which this company is working. The contention is made that if this amendment is carried Parliament will be interfering with vested rights. Surely, if vested rights perpetuate an injustice, it is not to be suggested that Parliament should not legislate in order to remove that injustice. If a law has been passed in days gone by on any subject that does an injustice to any section of the people or to any person, surely it is within the right of this Parliament to enact legislation that will remedy that injustice. Even the interpretation of the law is debatable apparently. The Toronto and Niagara Power Company, as I understand it, received its original charter in 1902 and the debates of that session make it perfectly clear that it was the intention of Parliament that the company should not have the right to go on the streets of municipalities without the consent of those municipalities. The case came before Chancellor Boyd and was decided in favour of the company. It was then carried to the Appeal Court of Ontario and was decided in favour of the municipalities. The Privy Council reversed that decision, and sustained the decision of Chancellor Boyd.

In passing, might I make this remark, which may not meet with the approval of the House? The President of the Privy Council has repeatedly stated in this House that Canada is now a nation. If that is the case, I think the time has come when Canadian courts ought to give a final settlement of all disputes that arise in Canada, and cases should not have to be carried to the Privy Council overseas, no matter how fair their lordships may be. It seems to me that a Canadian court, being right on the spot, is in a better position to give a fair interpretation and a fair decision than any other court outside this country to which the case might be referred.

In this particular case, whatever the law may be, if the rights of the municipality are disregarded, this Parliament is the proper body to protect those rights. Toronto is merely a case in point, and I am very sorry to say that I believe there are members of this House who are prejudiced because they believe this is simply a case of the city of Toronto versus the Toronto and Niagara Power Company. I believe that unless this clause is amended the company will have the same rights with regard to the streets of any other municipality in the province of Ontario or in the Dominion that it now exercises in the city of Toronto. The company may have no intention of exercising those rights elsewhere, but it is not at all unlikely that it may do so. It may be that the company in the expansion of its business might see fit to go on the streets of Kitchener, Guelph, Stratford or any other municipality which now controls its own streets and has its own distributing system for Hydro-Electric power.

Mr. MORPHY: How do the municipalities of Ontario control their own streets? I submit that they are controlled by the Hydro-Electric Commission.

Mr. EULER: To some extent that is true. I am also of the opinion that the powers that are sometimes exercised by the Hydro-Electric Commission of Ontario are just a little greater than they ought to be, but that is by the way. Unless this clause is amended we shall be subtracting still further from the rights of the municipalities.

If as a result of this amendment being carried certain interests will be prejudiced and the bonds of innocent bondholders may depreciate, I do not think that is a sufficient reason why this Parliament should consent to perpetuate an injustice and a wrong, if the injustice and the wrong exist. While I believe it would be difficult to prove that any such depreciation would occur in the bonds that have been issued by this company, I would go so far as to say that if it can be shown that loss has been sustained by reason of the fact that a previous Parliament did not properly protect the rights of the municipalities, it would become the duty of this Parliament to assess and pay the damages incurred rather than perpetuate an injustice that will affect, so far as we know, all the municipalities of the whole Dominion for all time to come.

Mr. W. F. COCKSHUTT: This question has improperly been regarded as one that concerns the municipality of Toronto alone. As I understand it, it is a question of vital importance to every municipality throughout the Dominion. While on some occasions I have been accused of standing inordinately for vested rights, I must say that on this occasion I have a perfectly clear conscience in standing for what I conceive to be the rights of the people with regard to municipal control of their streets as against any kind of company that can be chartered by the Dominion Parliament. This is not a new question, and it is one that has been debated by business men as well as lawyers, but in very much shorter terms. It may be that I have not the understanding of the question that some of our legal friends have. I felt this afternoon as if I were being taken on a long route march, and nearly fell out by the way. I shall endeavour to say what I have to say within fifteen minutes. This company got very special rights which it was not the intention of Parliament, at the time it got them, it should receive. I may be wrong, but I believe that it was not the intention of Parliament to allow the Toronto and Niagara Power Company to go wherever they liked in the city of Toronto or any other city in Ontario or the Dominion. Otherwise, a private company would have the right to travel all over this country regardless of the wishes of the people and trample upon property that this House, and this Dominion—and I say this advisedly—does not own in the true sense of the term, because I look upon a municipal street as the absolute property of the municipality in which it exists. Municipal rights as against all comers are to be first considered.

Was that done in this case? Not at all. This company apparently was enabled to ride rough shod over the wishes of the city of Toronto or of any other municipality in which they chose to plant their wires and poles. Now, what we sometimes term vested rights are really, in the final analysis, vested wrongs, and I say that this is absolutely one of those. It is a vested wrong; for it gave to a company, either wittingly or unwittingly, property which the giver did not own or control. That is my point. I am trying to make it very clear that in my judgment the Dominion of Canada did not own those streets and had no right to trample upon the wishes of any municipality. The municipality laid out those streets and probably paid for them. It held the deeds of possession from some one giving it the authority to take those streets for the uses of the municipality, and its uses alone. But it was not so much in this that the Parliament of Canada went astray, as it was to declare an Act to be for the general advantage of Canada while it was in reality an Act for the general disadvantage of the municipality concerned. That is what the Act did. It was an Act for the general disadvantage of the municipality and would have been better to characterize it in such terms than to say that it was for the general advantage of Canada. I know it will be asked in this House: How are you going to build railways if you do not allow them to expropriate the land through which they are going? Well, the railway when it expropriates land has to pay to the last farthing every one whom it ruins. I do not find that this power company did anything of the kind. They are on the streets and purpose to remain there absolutely forevermore against the wishes of the municipality. Not only are they on the streets at present occupied, but they propose to go on further streets and to expand indefinitely for all time to come. I cannot conceive of any Parliament ever contemplating giving such rights as this to any private company. It has been said, it is true, that this objection has arisen simply because the Hydro-Electric Power Company is now in the field to distribute power. I do not think for a moment that that is the case. If I thought that that was the only thing at the back of it, I certainly would have nothing to do with it, though I am a hearty supporter of Hydro power. But I do not believe in giving supreme powers of this kind over streets or lanes or, for that matter, over highways in any municipality in the country. I think they should be obtained by proper authority, and in my conception of it, proper authority in this respect is not within the province of this House. Those who want to use the streets should go to the municipality that owns the deeds as against all comers, and where this House made the mistake was to declare that this Act was for the general advantage of Canada when, as I contend, it was distinctly to the general disadvantage of every municipality into which this or any other company might go.

Mr. BURNHAM: Would the hon. member modify his remarks in regard to transmission?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Transmission of electric power? I would not be disposed to give to the Hydro-Electric Power Company of Ontario any rights against the wishes of the municipality that I would not give to another private company.

Mr. BURNHAM: I understand the hon. member to say that he would make the municipality supreme How about transmission? Does he modify his remarks in regard to transmission?

Mr. COCKSHUTT. A transmission line, according to my judgment, would be allowed to go through by every reasonable municipality, but only on such streets as they felt they could afford to give for the purpose. Unfortunately for us in the city of Brantford, just as well as in Toronto, though we are a much smaller burg, we have a crying injustice with regard to telephone and telegraph transmission. We have a narrow public street like Sparks street in Ottawa, and the firemen complain that they cannot raise a ladder to fight any fires throughout the whole length of the street, because Parliament about fifty or sixty years ago, gave a private company powers which they should never have conveyed. A ladder cannot be raised now on Colborne street, Brantford, because the Great North Western Telegraph Company and the Bell Telephone Company, in spite of local remonstrances, continue to occupy the street with their poles and wires, to the detriment of the municipality. I say that when transmission is going through the city it should take only those streets that the municipality itself feels it can spare. And further, I would concede that only under limitations. A municipality to-day being a village of about 100 persons and consisting of a blacksmith shop, two or three general stores, a church or two, a hotel or some other institutions might be looking forward with hope to becoming a big city some time in the future. But suppose in the meantime they tell all comers that they are welcome. Suppose they say: Here is our street; take the best you can; help yourself to any part of the street you like. Well, in twenty-five or fifty years you might find that this little village had become a city of 25,000, 50,000 or 100,000 people. Will any one contend that because a company got in there when there was a handful of people they should be given rights for all time upon what is really the property of the city? I cannot conceive of that. Whether this amendment of my hon. friend from Parkdale, which he had beclouded with considerable legal verbiage I do not comprehend, will accomplish all he wishes, I do not know. But I am willing for once to place myself in the hands of a lawyer. I do not like doing so and do it only under strong stress. But in this case I feel that having no better leadership than the hon. member for Parkdale, who has carefully drafted the amendment and assures me that he believes it will accomplish the purpose in view, I intend to vote for it. In my judgment, this House effected this purpose two years ago, and why should we take anything back? I cannot understand what inspired that special committee that they should have brought down what I conceive to be a stultification of the position we took in this House two years ago, that municipalities should be able to control their own streets, on which companies could go only by their leave, which will always be given in a reasonable way if it is to the advantage of the municipality that the company should be allowed to go there.

Mr. BURNHAM: I was not on that Committee, and I am merely anxious to get some information. The hon. member lays down the unqualified proposition that the municipalities are supreme, and then I understand him to modify his remarks in regard to transmission lines.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I say that the municipality should have absolute control of its own streets, lanes and highways, and that only by their permission or under the regulations which they enact should companies be allowed to go ruthlessly through any city, town or village. In other words, they must confine themselves to what the municipality is pleased to give them, and not to be told by this House that it is to the general advantage of Canada that they should go where they like, consequently choosing the best street in the city, to the great detriment for all time, of every one who uses the street. I hope I make it clear to the hon. member that I do not believe the municipality would deny any reasonable requests. A few years ago I happened to be on the committee dealing with the question that arose when the Bell Telephone Company appealed to the Privy Council as to what rights the city of Toronto—I think it was Toronto—had to tell them anything about where they should plant their poles. What do you think was the decision on that occasion? It was almost as remarkable as the one we have under our hands to-day with regard to this matter. The city of Toronto was told by the Privy Council that while the Act said they had the right of supervision with regard to poles, it meant that they could supervise the digging of the holes but had no right to say where the holes should be dug. A beautiful situation certainly! I think that that is legal interpretation run wild—absolutely wild. The intention of this House was to tell the Bell Telephone Company where they should put their poles, and where to dig the holes.

An. hon. MEMBER: Why didn't they say so?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: They trusted to the lawyers. But they expressed it in verbiage that obscured the comprehension of the ordinary layman. The laymen who were in the House at that time would say that the intention was to give them the right to dig a hole only where the municipalities permitted. But these men went ahead and dug where they wanted to, dug in the middle of the pavements and the sidewalks with a perfect disregard of the wishes of the people. I have exceeded my fifteen minutes and I do not believe that I have covered all the points I intended to. I want to recapitulate, and in the first place I say that this Parliament never intended to do what is held to be the meaning of the Act. In the second place it is untenable to say that an open franchise of this kind should exist for all time and without limit. There is the question of overhead wires. Does any hon. gentleman believe that if this company is allowed to erect its poles on the streets of towns and cities any private company competing with it would be able to go underground which would cost five times as much as the overhead system? How are you ever going to have the wires placed underground if one company with a capital of $30,000,000 is going to have the exclusive right to string its wires in the air? How did this company get a blanket charter? It must have been while some of our legislators were asleep at the switch, while others had no knowledge of what was going on. I was not on the special committee and I am sorry I was not able to attend many of its meetings. But I heard part of the special pleading of Mr. Beck of New York.

I was carried away with his eloquence but he only touched the corner of the situation, and that was that when the Government of Canada declared that this was a work for the general advantge of Canada there was taken away from all the municipalities throughout the Dominion the control of their streets, walks and highways. I cannot conceive of such a thing as that. I want to say to our lay brothers who are as ignorant of the law as I am, that I believe they will take a practical view of this matter and say that no private company should be allowed to go on the streets, sidewalks, lands and highways of a municipality against the wishes of that municipality, because this undertaking has been declared by Parliament to be a work for the general advantage of Canada. I am reminded that the municipality has recourse to the Railway Board. I think it is provided in the Act that either the company or the municipality may have recourse to the Railway Board. The clause says:

> But if any municipality complains to the Board that any company whether incorporated by Special or other Act or authority of the Parliament of Canada is exercising its powers oppressively or in bad faith the Board may hear such complaint and if it sees fit supervise the exercise of such powers.

That, to my mind, is holding out a very small straw for the municipalities to grasp at. It says that the Railway Board "may" hear complaints if it sees fit and it "may" exercise some power. But if the Railway Board does not see it in that light there will be no recourse and there will be nothing to do further than that; it costs money to appeal to Ottawa. It costs money for municipalities to come down at their own cost with special lawyers and put up a fight before the Railway Board. That provision is a very unsatisfactory one, and I trust this House, before it stultifies itself—as I think it will if it passes this Act in its present form—will take into full consideration the right of the municipalities to control their own streets, walks, lanes and highways. If this House does that in the spirit in which it was originally intended, I feel sure that this amendment, or an amendment directed towards the same purpose, should be incorporated in the Bill. I have much pleasure in supporting the hon. member (Mr. Mowat) in the position which he has taken in regard to this question.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have not had the privilege of being on the special committee that dealt with this question, but I have listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens), and I must do him the honour and credit of saying that I always thought he was a lawyer. I have, for the years that he has been in this House, followed the hon. member for Vancouver Centre in the discussions in which he has taken part, and although I had no proof of it, I was always led to the conclusion that the hon. member belonged to that learned profession. I must say for his consolation to-day, that he discussed a principle that is well known to and recognized by the courts of the country, and that principle is that there must be a direct, instead of a lateral, attack upon any point. He argued, and I think conclusively, that if there is anything the matter with the charter of this company there should be a direct and immediate limit to the provisions of the charter, and not a lateral attack upon the company. Our courts, up to the Privy Council, have for years recognized the principle that you cannot laterally—that is by some side issue—attack a right which a person may have, but that you must make an attack direct. If that direct attack is made upon the rights of this company to-day you can, if necessary, give the remedy to Toronto or to any other city that has complained of certain conditions. If Toronto, which is particularly before our minds at present, although this condition might apply elsewhere, is complaining that undue powers have been given to this Toronto, Niagara Power Company, then it has the right to come before this House and say that this power must be cut out, and it is open to the House to say that that shall be done. But the power having been granted to this company, they had a perfect right to its exercise. The Privy Council held that the company interpreted the Act properly. Chancellor Boyd, a very distinguished judge of Ontario, has said that the company understood the Act properly. Chancellor Boyd held that they understood their rights; the Privy Council also held that they are merely exercising the powers which the Parliament of Canada gave them. We may have made a mistake in granting these powers, but they were properly understood, they were properly exercised, and if they are to be taken away it is for us to see that nobody shall suffer by reason of any mistake having been made.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Will my hon. friend say what he thinks in regard to the opinion expressed by our High Court? He mentions Chancellor Boyd and the Privy Council, but he omits to mention the third party to the judgment.

Mr. McKENZIE: That does not count; that was wiped out by the Privy Council, and so it is not necessary for me to say anything about it, as it is absolutely ineffective. The Privy Council said the judgment of the Appellate Court was wrong, and they restored the decision of Chancellor Boyd, and it is that decision which we have to deal with so far as the construction of the law is concerned. I therefore submit that Chancellor Boyd having said those men had properly used their rights, the Privy Council having said so and confirmed Chancellor Boyd's decision, the Senate of Canada having said that the Bill as presented to us is all right and a committee of this House having done what it considered fair and right with this Bill after having given a proper hearing to everybody who wished to come before them, it is rather late for us—who have not heard the facts, and who have not heard counsel except through the very learned and helpful discussion that took place this afternoon—and rather dangerous for us to interfere with the Bill as presented to us after all the consideration which it has received. I would say to my hon. friend from Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) and to those who support him, in the first place, that I think they have slept on their rights, although that should not weigh with Parliament. This Act was passed in 1902, giving this company the powers they have been exercising down to the present, and it is only within a recent period that anything has been brought before Parliament in regard to it. I submit, on the principle so well advanced by my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens), that the attacks should be made directly upon the spot where the mistake took place, and that it should not be sought to secure a remedy by a general Act of this kind, which may do far more harm than the remedy which it is hoped to produce, and which may strike a dozen companies that it is not intended to strike. If it is necessary to provide a proper remedy for the city of Toronto against this power company let the matter come straight before Parliament on its own merits, supported by the essential facts, and then Parliament should be able to deal with it. As far as I am concerned, I cannot see that I would be on safe ground in departing from the conclusions which have been reached by the courts which dealt with the matter, as also by the Senate, and by a special committee of this House.

At six o'clock the Committee took recess.

After Recess.

The Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ROSS: It is not my intention, Mr. Chairman, to go into a detailed argument in regard to this matter; I prefer rather to pursue the course adopted by the hon. member for North Waterloo (Mr. Euler). I wish to reply to some extent to the remarks made by the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens). As I understood the hon. gentleman, he said that he thought this House should to a great extent be bound by the finding of the Special Committee appointed to consider the Railway Act. If that had been the only finding, there might be some force in his contention. But I would remind him that at a previous session not only did the Railway Committee of this House, but this House itself, pass an amendment to the Railway Act which was much more radical than the amendment introduced by the hon. member for Parkdale.

I am not going to review the history of the legislation; it has been done so often that the subject is now threadbare. But it seems to me that there are only two or three points of importance in connection with the whole matter. In the first place, we must start out with the primary rights not only of the municipalities of the province of Ontario but of the municipalities of the whole Dominion. These rights were granted to the municipalities as a matter of course long before this special Act incorporating this company was ever thought of, and the municipalities should be given first consideration in any decision this House may come to.

I think no hon. gentleman will dispute the fact that the municipalities have always been accorded the privilege of controlling their own streets, their own highways, their own public squares, and their own lanes, and I do not think that any person will wish to gainsay them that right. It is a form of local self-government that is not only good liberalism, but is good government. It seems to me that this special Act passed in 1902 was a direct violation of those municipal rights. The opponents of this amendment may argue that Parliament has by a special Act given this company the right to interfere with the streets and highways of the municipalities, and that that right should not be restricted. But I think, Sir, it has been abundantly proved by hon. members who have preceded me that it was far from the intention of Parliament to grant the extraordinary privilege of going upon the streets and roads of the municipalities without their consent. Therefore on that account alone we are in a position to review the action of Parliament in 1902, and to pass what at this time is practically a declaratory law—which has been done on many occasions by all parliaments within the British Empire—that it was not the intention of Parliament at that time to enact what the company now claims, and that the law is and should be as this amendment tends to make it.

All the arguments not only in the Special Committee but in this House seem to come down to one question—that of vested rights. No one seems to dispute as a general principle the right of the municipalities to control their own streets. The opponents of this amendment say that on account of the decision of the Privy Council in 1911—after this Act had been in force for some time—investors were induced to put their money into the bonds of this company and those affiliated companies, and that on that account we should not now interfere with the rights given by Parliament in 1902. It seems to me that that contention cannot be sustained, and I think that the hon. member for West Calgary completely annihilated it before the Special Committee.

These people came to us with a charter and they say that they have certain rights—rights decided by the Privy Council to be so and so. But they do not tell us, Sir, that in that very charter, which they allege as the foundation of their rights, their bond issue is limited to $1,500,000. I understand that is the fact. It does not seem to me that, because of their having affiliated with the other companies which have larger bond issues, their claim should be allowed that their charter—Magna Charta, as it were, of their rights—shall not be controlled by the limitations embodied in the charter itself.

It seems to me that they cannot claim the privileges and the rights which their charter appears to give them—although unintentionally—and not at the same time be willing to be bound by the limitations that that charter imposes upon them.

As I understand the matter this company has invested some eight or nine million dollars of its money and therefore it is more than able to take care of all the bonds that have been issued by the officers against its assets. Consequently I do not think it lies with the investors to come before this House and say that the vested interests of this company are going to be interfered with by the action of this Parliament if this amendment is passed. As I see it, they have no further rights beyond the $1,500,000 which is the limit of the company's bonding powers under its charter.

An effort has been made to arouse prejudice. Some people in the lobbies and some hon. gentlemen—probably not intentionally—in the special committee and before this House have, as I see it, tried to induce hon. members to believe that this is a question between the city of Toronto and the Toronto and Niagara Transmission Company. For my own part, speaking on behalf of the many municipalities in the county of Middlesex, I wish to say that this is not a struggle between the city of Toronto, acting in conjunction with the Hydro Electric Commission of Ontario and the said company; but that if this Bill is allowed to stand in its present form the privileges of every municipality, particularly in the western part of the province of Ontario, are in danger.

I am not an intimate or personal friend of Sir Adam Beck, but I wish to say for him and for his commission that he has done good work in the province. I can speak from the experience of my home town of Strathroy, and I can candidly say that since the Hydro Electric Commission has taken charge of the distribution of electrical energy and electric light in that town the rates have greatly decreased, and I believe that is the experience of every other town in western Ontario.

Without going further into the argument, because I do not think it is necessary, as others better acquainted with the facts and the law will deal with the matter, I just want to say, that for the reasons I have given I am heartily in favour of the amendment

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER (York, East): I have made up my mind to support the amendment of the member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat). I think it is a move in the right direction; and it is in the interests of the people of this country and against the interests of great promoting companies. The organization behind this company are the greatest promoters of franchises that can be found in Canada. Not only do they receive a large number of franchises; they are exploiters as well. Some twenty-eight years ago this company succeeded in getting the franchise of the Toronto Street Railway. Every one is familiar with this company, the Mackenzie & Mann Company; there is no greater promoting or exploiting company in the Dominion. They paid some $2,500,000 to the city of Toronto for that street railway franchise, which is one of the best franchises ever given to a company in this country. Within a year or two they issued securities to the extent of about $6,500,000. They then secured the Toronto Electric Light Company. The city was to have the first opportunity of securing the benefits of the franchise of the Incandescent Light Company, which was operating at that time, but apparently Toronto was asleep at the switch because this promoting company stepped in and acquired a majority of the stock. A short time after that these promoters undertook to secure what was called the Niagara Development Company. That company has a franchise from the provincial government and supplies power to the Toronto Railway Company and to North Toronto. The franchise of two of these companies expires within the next six months. It was Toronto's intention to secure these two or three companies by arbitration, so they gave a year's notice that they intended to take them over. But at a special meeting of the Toronto city council held a few months ago it was decided to cancel that arrangement and to forego the taking over of these franchises; they decided to allow them to continue for another twenty-one years. The city was quite justified in the attitude which it took. When they gave the notice they felt that they were free to purchase these companies at arbitrated value, but they discovered that the Niagara Power Company had a franchise which permitted them to transmit and retail electric power to consumers in Toronto. Why then, should the city undertake to buy, at a possible cost of eight or nine millions, the companies at present established there, having regard to the fact that if they did they would be subject to such strong competition? I think they were wise in taking the course that they did, leaving themselves free to meet the competition of the Niagara Power Company if that company chose to enter upon a policy of dealing in power, as their franchise entitles them to do.

It was thought in 1902 by Mr. Osler, Mr. Clarke and Mr. Pringle that the municipalities were well protected. They put up a splendid fight, but they discovered, after some appeals had been made to the Privy Council, that instead of getting something substantial in the interests of the people, they were handed a gold brick. The Toronto Street Railway Company was an excellent company, having regard to its earnings and the value of its stock. But this promoting company was not content to treat the people as they should be treated; they commenced to exploit the revenues and the earnings of the Toronto Railway Company, and there has been continuous litigation in an effort to get some rights for the people. We thought that the agreement which we had with the company in this case was an excellent one. We knew that we had to be extra careful in dealing with this franchise. We had a splendid mayor at the time, Mr. Clarke, who was always prepared to look after the interests of the people, and he assisted in the effort to get a good agreement from that company. We secured what we thought was the best legal talent in Toronto; some $50,000 was spent in the preparation of the agreement; we thought that it would stand any test in our courts or even before the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. But to our surprise, as soon as this company got the franchise, they watered the stock, started litigation, went to various courts, appealed to the Privy Council, tied up actions there for months—and invariably the city seemed to get the worst of it; there was some legal point that gave the company the advantage over the people. Instead of extending the street railway system into congested and newly developed parts of the city, they continued to operate on the old lines and refused to extend. The result was that the city was forced to spend millions to give accommodation to the people who needed it. There was nothing but a continuous jamming of people into the cars, in order that the promoters might get the largest possible earnings out of the system. Into a car of a capacity of say one hundred people, two hundred or two hundred and fifty people would be jammed. The way the women and girls of Toronto were jammed into those cars was a shame and a disgrace. It shows what these promoting and exploiting companies will do to take all they can out of the people and give nothing in return.

It is said that we are hard on these large corporations; that they have vested rights, and that we should be more sympathetic. Of course they get vested rights, and whenever they get them they begin to exploit them. It is said that in this case $29,000,000 have been invested; that money has been brought here from England, France and United States, to say nothing of what has come from our own country. Well, the people in those various countries have been exploited to the extent of almost $30,000,000. This shows the cleverness of these exploiters when they get a franchise; they are prepared to go to various countries and get the money in some way in order that they may continue their exploitation and get other franchises.

This legislation was before this House in 1917 when the Consolidated Railway Act was revised. It was thought that we had framed an Act that was reasonable and in the interest of the people, but when it got to the Senate it was rejected and all the good work done by members of this House was undone. The Act was so amended by the Senate that it was impossible for this House to accept it. Last session the Act was not before this House at all; it was tied up for months, but was sent here this session from the Senate and referred to a Special Committee. We are up against a body of people in the Senate not responsible to the electors. If they were responsible, it would be quite different, but when this House has passed an Act it goes to a body that is responsible to nobody. I have come to the conclusion, and I think thousands of people throughout this Dominion also believe, that it is time the Senate was reformed, either elected by the people—or Oslerized.

In competition with the private-owned electric system we have in Ontario the Hydro, supplying light, heat and power. It has come to the rescue of the people of the province, and I believe other provinces will follow Ontario's example. Hon. gentlemen may have seen the report that was issued a few days ago of what the Hydro has done for the province of Ontario. It has saved in a year to the people of the province some 400,000 or 500,000 tons of coal, representing a money saving of some $5,000,000 a year. Since the inception of the system—and it is only in its inception, the system is going to be immense eventually, and will be one of the greatest public utilities controlled by the people—there has been saved to the people of the province of Ontario $12,500,000 in the last seven or eight years. I think that is a wonderful record. Not only has there been a rebate given in connection with the lighting of the city, amounting to $22,000, but a rebate has also been given of from $8 to $7 per lamp, representing a saving of $45,000 per year to the city in lighting its streets. If this system, which is only in its infancy, has already saved the people between $12,000,000 and $13,000,000, and is saving them over $5,000,000 a year, what will it save when we have a full development of the water-power of the province? It will mean the saving of millions of dollars and of hundreds of thousands of tons of coal. We shall be independent of the United States, because we shall be able to generate our own power, and light and heat every house and factory throughout the whole province and Dominion, and light our streets as well. Surely such an enterprise should be encouraged, not discouraged.

The Toronto and Niagara Power Company are not satisfied with getting into Toronto, but are manipulating to get into other municipalities. Toronto has been a gold mine for them in the past, and will be in the future if this amendment is not carried. The people have some rights. We are always preaching that the masses should have some consideration, as against the great corporations. Others argue that you should protect the corporations. I say we need not worry about the corporations, because they are quite capable at all times of looking after their own interests. This company which has made millions of dollars out of its franchise, and given no accommodation to the people who have given it this great franchise, is treating the people worse than a drover or a stockman is permitted to treat his stock. A drover shipping a carload of horses, sheep, hogs or cattle to the stock yards is prosecuted if he overcrowds a car, and there is not a day in Toronto that does not see a prosecution and a penalty imposed for this offence; but the Toronto Street Railway can jam as much humanity as they like into their street cars, loading them from 100 to 150 per cent above their capacity, without being prosecuted, and yet hon. members sympathize with this poor company, and say it has certain vested rights which should be protected. I say we should protect the masses of this country first, last, and all the time, and let the corporations look after themselves because they are quite capable of doing it. This is not the only promoting company in this Dominion. There are a number of them, and if you mix amongst the people you will find that the cause of the unrest prevailing to-day is the big corporations which are hoarding and storing up instead of handing out to the people what has been produced by the people. Corporations are making millions of dollars out of what they have hoarded up for speculative purposes, and I think it is time we should call a halt and should legislate in the interests of the masses. I think the hon. member for Parkdale and the hon. member for Calgary have taken a step in the right direction in bringing this amendment before the House, and I trust that every hon. member who wants to do what is right and have a clear conscience, who wants to vote as he preaches most of the time, will support the amendment.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I am going to support the amendment at the request of the city council of New Westminster, who have wired me to support it as a municipal amendment. I understand that this amendment has received the approval of the Union of Canadian Municipalities. Personally, I am not interested in any dispute between the companies which have been referred to. As a matter of fact, I do not know their names. I am looking at the question from the viewpoint of the municipalities, and it seems to me the question involved in this amendment is whether or not the rights of the people as represented by the municipalities shall be superseded by the rights or privileges of the big corporations. I think it is wrong in principle to allow a great corporation, electric or any other kind, to construct poles and wires on the streets of any municipality without the consent of the people of that municipality. It is admitted that such a privilege should not be granted in the future to any company seeking it.

I take it from the wording of this section that all companies which have not, by their charters obtained special powers permitting them to go on the streets of municipalities without consent, are required to obtain that consent. I think it is quite clear to everyone that a great many of the special powers contained in Acts of Parliament are obtained without the knowledge of Parliament that they are being conferred. Later on to-night, if I have an opportunity to do so, I shall refer to a case which occurred in this particular session of Parliament in which a very important section of this Railway Act was put through the special committee practically without discussion, and put through this Committee as a non-contentious section. It seems to me that where a thing of that kind happens and where the fact is brought to the attention of the House, it is for Parliament to rectify the condition. It is pointed out that when a company has received these special powers and has obtained what are called vested rights, it is unfair to take these rights away and to require them to get consent, as in the case of the city of Toronto, and it is suggested that the city of Toronto is trying to hold up this particular company. Now, I think that if this House is shown on a future occasion that the city of Toronto or any other city or municipality is holding up a public corporation, it will very soon pass legislation to meet the situation.

Mr. FIELDING: It has been said several times during this debate that this whole trouble which has disturbed and obstructed our legislation for three years, is due to the bungling of legal gentlemen who were entrusted with the drafting of these statutes some years ago. If that be true, then there is some excuse for those of us who are not lawyers but just ordinary laymen who are taking some part in the discussion. I have not been able to follow the whole matter as closely as some gentlemen, and therefore any opinions I have to offer should be expressed with hesitation and some reserve. I think, however, that I have heard enough of the discussion to grasp the real question that is at issue. I was much impressed by the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) as to the unfortunate position in which we are placed when we are asked to use the machinery of a very important general Act for the purpose of making an attack upon the chartered rights of a private company. I think that his argument, that if we wanted to attack the rights of that company we should do it directly and squarely, was an excellent one. However, we must deal with the question in the form in which it is now presented to us.

This is really a fight between vested rights and modern views concerning such rights. I am afraid there is a growing lack of that reverence which existed in olden times for vested rights, and on the other hand that there is a tendency to go a little too far in the other direction. There is much to be said in favour of the old-fashioned idea that a bargain is a bargain and a contract a contract, and that all who make it should be prepared to stand by it; and I have a great respect for those who still stand firmly on that view. But there is a strong modern contention that even vested rights must at times be challenged and set aside where they seem to be at variance with public interest. In this case the company has a charter the character of which has been discussed very much here to-day, and, I think, in a manner which perhaps is hardly appropriate. It will not profit us to discuss what was the intention of Parliament when that charter was passed. My legal friends know, better than do we laymen, that the intention of an Act of Parliament must be gathered from the Act itself, and not from what any one says or thinks about it. In this case, the quality of the company's charter was attacked. They have been able to defend it before the Privy Council, and it stands before us now as a contract which the company say should be observed. But the Senate, sedate and conservative body as it is, and our Committee of this House which has confirmed the Senate's view, have come to the conclusion that even vested rights may in some degree be questioned, and so the Senate has endeavoured to propose something that looks like a compromise. The Senate has virtually said to the company: True, you have these vested rights and we do not want to take them away from you, for we respect vested rights, and so on, but we want to be assured that you will exercise them with discretion; and so we include in this Bill a clause which says that if the company in any case—take the case of Toronto, which is very much in evidence—if the company shall attempt to exercise these rights oppressively and in bad faith, then there shall be an appeal to the Railway Board.

Let us dwell on that for a moment. It is a great departure from the old-time doctrine. It means the raising of a question as to these vested rights, and is an admission that, in the modern view of things, even vested rights may be challenged. But if the Senate—I speak of the Senate because the motion was initiated by them, although it is now before us as a report of a Committee of this House—desired to grant an appeal to the Railway Commission under certain conditions, they might very well have made the appeal more effective. I think the form in which the appeal comes to us is better than what is presented to us by the hon. member for Parkdale, whose amendment does not commend itself to my judgment. I would rather have the appeal in the form in which we have it now than accept his amendment. But while I think that the intention of the Senate in that respect was good, I am of the opinion that if they wanted to give an appeal they should make it a more effective appeal. They say that if the company go into Toronto, say, and dig up the streets and erect poles and create trouble generally, the Toronto City Council may claim that this is acting oppressively and not in good faith, and may raise an issue before the Railway Commissioners. It seems to me that if that is a good policy, a better one would be to raise the issue before they dig up the streets or put up the poles, before they exercise any powers at all. My suggestion therefore would be, not to deny the rights of the company, but to provide that if they want to exercise those rights within Toronto or any other city they must first make application to the council of the municipality and see if they cannot come to an understanding with them. I have cast my thoughts into the form of a roughly-drafted amendment, which I shall read in order that the Committee may have clearly before it what I am contending. It will not be in order at this moment, but possibly after the motion of my friend from Parkdale is disposed of I may find it convenient to move it. In the meantime I may read it to inform the Committee of what seems to me to be a fairly good solution of the difficulty:

> But when any such company desires to exercise its powers on, in, over, or under any street in any city, town, village or township, it shall be subject to the following conditions:
> (a) The company, when intending to so exercise its powers or any of them, shall give notice in writing to the municipality of such intention and shall, with such notice, furnish plans and specifications of the work proposed to be done.
>
> (b) If within ten days of the giving of such notice the municipality fail to give notice in writing to the company of objections to the proposed operations the company may proceed to carry on the work in accordance with the plans and specifications.
>
> (c) If within such ten days the municipality propose to the company in writing changes in the said plans and specifications the adoption of which will remove the municipality's objections, the company shall carefully consider such proposed changes and shall approve them if they are deemed fair and reasonable, and thereupon the company may proceed to carry on the work in accordance with the plans and specifications as thus modified.
> (d) If the company are unable to approve of the changes of plans and specifications proposed by the municipality, the company may appeal to the Board and the Board, after hearing both parties, may make such order as it may deem expedient, having due regard to the rights of the company and to the public interests affected.

The substance of it is that instead of waiting for Toronto to make a complaint, instead of waiting until the company dig up the streets, put up their poles and raise the devil generally, as the first step notice shall be given to the municipality that they intend to do this. It is hardly an application for permission—the company have a right to do it subject to certain conditions—but before they do it, they shall notify the municipality and give the municipality a chance to make representations. They may be able to agree. Failing in that they shall then go to the board. The difference between that and the provision in the Bill is that while in the Bill as it now stands you would first allow action to be taken, putting up the poles, digging up the street, etc., and then go before the Board of Railway Commissioners and ask them to determine whether this action was oppressive or taken in bad faith, you would have the company first go to the municipality and endeavour to come to an understanding. If they failed they would then proceed to bring the matter before the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. CARVELL: Mr. Chairman, the very logical remarks of my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) emphasizes the importance of the statement made by my hon. friend from Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) at the beginning of this debate. That is that an Act referring to what is purely a local matter within one municipality or a number of municipalities ought not to be incorporated in the general Railway Bill of Canada. I think that if my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queens had been on the sub-committee and had followed the debate, as I am quite sure he would have had he been there, he would have different views from those which he presented to-night. It only shows that when you try to provide for a specific case in a general Act you are sure to land in trouble. There is no set of lawyers in the world who can under such conditions draft a scheme which will not mean trouble in the end. I profess to know something about this question because I was a member of the sub-committee in 1917 which had this matter under consideration, and we spent, I think, five or six weeks over the whole Railway Bill and some days over this particular clause. Also I was here when the matter was discussed in Committee of the Whole House, and while I was in the minority on that occasion still I had very pronounced views on the whole question, and I have the same views to-night. I was a member also of the subcommittee appointed a few weeks ago to consider the Railway Bill and spent two or three days over this particular case. We had evidence brought by all the parties, and I believe the subcommittee which dealt with this matter had every particle of evidence which it was possible to obtain or necessary to an intelligent decision. Whether or not the majority gave an intelligent decision is a question for each individual member's opinion. But it certainly is the fact that the vote was more than two to one in favour of the Bill as it came from the Senate. It is so much like an ordinary lawsuit, so much special evidence bearing upon this point or upon that point, it is such a localized affair, that one would require to have gone through all the phases of the matter to appreciate the whole position.

My hon. friend from Shelburne and Queens has put up to-day practically the proposition I put up two years ago in principle, but I did not get very far until I saw that there were difficulties ahead, that there were lions in the path. My hon. friend talks about going to a municipality—mind you, I am talking about this particular case; on the general case I agree with him at once; I do not think that any corporation should receive the right to go upon the streets and public squares of any municipality without the consent of that municipality; in the light of our experience I doubt if there is a man in the House of Commons or the Senate who would advocate that we should give a charter to-day such as was given in 1902. But my hon. friend was discussing this matter from a general standpoint and from the general standpoint he is absolutely logical. He says that before anything is done the corporation should give notice to the municipality of their desires accompanied by plans and specifications of the works and ask if the municipality is prepared to consent; if they do not object in ten days, go on with the work, if they do object, go to the board. But my hon. friend fails to realize and—I say this in no offensive way—fails to understand that a municipality in the province of Ontario has nothing to say about it, absolutely nothing. I know my hon. friend will hardly believe that statement——

Mr. FIELDING: I think I do.

Mr. CARVELL: —but I want to read to him the law of Ontario to-day. A municipality has no control over its streets when it comes to the question of erecting poles for the transmission of electricity. By an Act passed in 1914 it is provided that:

> Notwithstanding anything in any Act contained a municipal corporation shall not hereafter enter into any agreement with any such company or pass any by-law in relation to any public utility which has been declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada, or which is not within the legislative control of Ontario, until the Lieutenant-Governor in Council approved of such agreement or by-law, and every agreement entered into and by-law passed in violation of this section shall be utterly void and of no effect.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is that Ontario law?

Mr. CARVELL: That is Ontario law.

Mr. FIELDING: My hon. friend will find in the suggestion I offered that there was nothing about making an agreement with the municipal council. What I suggested was that the municipal council should be afforded an opportunity of accepting or of stating their objections. I thought I succeeded in steering clear of the trouble to which my hon. friend refers.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not want to steer clear of it; I want to face it; let us try to face it and see if we can get legislation passed which will be equitable and will meet the situation. There is nothing here about any notice to the municipality, and you have the right to erect poles on any one of their streets without the municipality having anything to say about it.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not propose that they shall ask for the right. I say, on the contrary, that the company have the right, but it is a question as to the manner in which they shall exercise it. I do not propose that they shall go to Toronto and ask them for the privilege, but that they shall go to Toronto and say: We have the privilege; we come to say that we will exercise that privilege in the way we think best, but we want to afford you an opportunity of filing objections.

Mr. BRISTOL: Has not the municipality a perfect right to pass a by-law? But the opinion of the minister is that the Government of Ontario would never consent to its enforcement.

Mr. CARVELL: I will read that over again. First, I will answer my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's and then my hon. friend from Centre Toronto (Mr. Bristol). This subsection that I have read was framed by a man who evidently knew what he was doing, because they do not apply this to all corporations, but to corporations which have been declared works for the general advantage of Canada—which means the Toronto Niagara Power company and allied interests. It uses the word "agreement." If the suggestion of my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queen's were carried out, if an application were made to the municipality and if the company said: We want to erect these poles and build this line under certain conditions; and if no objections were made, that would be an agreement. I think it comes within the purview of the amendment and therefore I would add here to my former statement that the municipality is absolutely powerless. Now, to answer the hon. member for Centre Toronto, this law specially declares that:—

—and every agreement entered into and by-law passed in violation of this section shall be utterly void and of no effect.

Mr. BRISTOL: That is the point I make: They can pass this by-law, but it is no good without the sanction of the provincial government.

Mr. CARVELL: Exactly, it is only a scrap of paper, and the whole legislation was framed in order to prevent the Toronto and Niagara Power Company from doing business. I want now to discuss for a moment or two the general question involved.

Mr. McKENZIE: Before the minister leaves that subject, there is a point that I do not quite follow. If the company created, or incorporated, by this House is given certain rights in any province of Canada, does the minister think those rights can be taken away by a provincial enactment?

Mr. CARVELL: No, but I have no doubt that the province of Ontario is quite right in saying that a contract made by one of its municipalities with this corporation would be void. I think they are right in that and that is what they have done. They have not said that the Toronto and Niagara Power Company cannot do certain things, but they have said that no municipality can pass a by-law agreeing that anything shall be done by this corporation without its being null and void.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is not that an indirect way of doing the same thng?

Mr. CARVELL: It may be, but I believe that under the British North America Act they have those rights; I believe their powers go that far.

Mr. FIELDING: Suppose the Toronto and Niagara Company notify the city council of Toronto that they intend to carry on certain work, under certain plans and specifications, and want to know if the council have any objection, and the council say they have no objection, does my hon. friend say that is a by-law?

Mr. CARVELL: I think it is, and I will go as far as to say this: If I were representing the province of Ontario, or the Hydro-Electric Commission, I would not hesitate a moment to take the case to the courts and should expect to get a decision, because they have used the word "agreement," as well as "by-law." "Every agreement entered into, and by-law passed, in violation of this section shall be utterly void and of no effect." I think my hon. friend will find that the man who drew this section knew what he was doing. He knew he was aiming especially at the Toronto and Niagara Power Company, and he was determined that that company should not be able to do any business in competition with their own company. Now I have no fault to find with the province of Ontario in its Hydro-Electric proposition. I agree with my hon. friend from West Middlesex (Mr. Ross) that the Hydro-Electric Commission in Ontario has done a great work, and I believe is destined to do still greater work in the near future. I am somewhat of an admirer of the commission for the way in which they have carried the work on. I do not believe they are getting as cheap power as they think they are, because they have to pay certain taxes; but there is no doubt in the world that the householder is getting cheap electricty. More than that he is getting a sufficient supply in ordinary times, which, after all, is more than the question of price. Therefore I have nothing but kind words for the Hydro-Electric Commission; and if it be the wish of the people of Ontario that that commission shall be the only corporation generating, transmitting, and distributing electricity in Ontario, that is their affair also; if they want to adopt that policy I do not think the Parliament of Canada should find any fault with it. But I do lay down this doctrine: That they have no right to ruthlessly step in and destroy other men's labours and destroy the capital which other men have put into these schemes before the Hydro-Electric was an entity at all. When we practically got through with the hearing of the evidence before the special committee I asked a series of questions of the gentlemen present. In a sense it was like a series of questions which a judge would propound to a jury in court, but the answers were given by both parties to the dispute. I am going to read to the committee the questions, and the answers, and therefore the committee can accept these as being the facts of the case as produced in the evidence before the special committee:

1. Q. When did the Toronto and Niagara, or subsidiaries, first deliver electricity in Toronto?—A. 1907.

2. Q. When did the Hydro-Electric Commission first deliver electricity in Toronto?—A. 1910.

3. Q. Has the city of Toronto the right to purchase the overhead system of the Toronto Electric Light Company?—A. Yes.

4. Q. Have they decided not to exercise the option?—A. Yes.

5. Q. Has the city the right to acquire the Toronto Electric Railway Company? If so, when?—A. Yes, in 1921.

6. Q. Does the Hydro-Electric maintain overhead wires for both transmission and distribution?—A. Yes.

I want the Committee to pay special attention to this question and answer.

Mr. McMASTER: What company is that?

Mr. CARVELL: That is the Hydro Electric Commission, or in other words, the province of Ontario.

Mr. CAHILL: Is not that the municipal company in Toronto?

Mr. CARVELL: No, it is the Hydro Electric Commission. I did not ask the details, but I presume a company—that is, the city of Toronto—is working with the Hydro-Electric Commission in buying electricity and distributing it, but that means a company in competition with the Toronto and Niagara.

Mr. SHEARD: Toronto is a customer of the Hydro Electric Commission?

Mr. CARVELL: Certainly, Toronto is a customer and the Hydro-Electric Commission is distributing electricity through the city for lighting purposes by overhead wires. That is admitted by everybody, and you will see why I asked that question a little later on.

7. Q: Can the Toronto Electric Light Company feed its underground system without using overhead lines in the city of Toronto? A: No.

8. Q: Has the Toronto and Niagara Company agreed to sell their whole scheme to the Hydro? A: Yes.

And furthermore, Mr. Fleming, the general manager of the railway company, said they would be willing to allow the price of the whole scheme to be decided as a going concern by any independent tribunal. Those are the facts which were submitted by all parties at the hearing of the special committee.

The further facts that I did not incorporate in these questions were these: The Toronto and Niagara Company was the parent company, and they say have a right of bond issue only to the extent of a million and a half of dollars, and 9 p.m. an argument was made before the special committee that there are plenty of assets, no matter what happens, to pay for this million and a half of bonds. I must say that while I have the very greatest respect for my hon. friend from West Middlesex (Mr. Ross), who put forth that argument, I do not think he will consider I am unfair to him when I say the argument will not hold water when you apply business principles to it. In order to have a successful hydro-electric proposition you must have three things: First, a generating plant; second, a transmission line; and third, a distribution plant. Destroy any of these three branches and you destroy the whole system. The Toronto and Niagara Power Company have obtained legislation from this Parliament giving them the right to transmit and distribute electricity. As I said before, the powers are very broad—broader I think, in fact broader I know—than this Parliament gives to-day, and broader than they should have got.

Mr. SHEARD: Was there ever a promise, or an implied promise, on the part of the city of Toronto that they should furnish the Toronto and Niagara Power Company with a perpetual market for their product?

Mr. CARVELL: No.

Mr. SHEARD: Is not that the brunt of your argument?

Mr. CARVELL: No. I think before I get through my hon. friend will see that I have some other ideas in the back of my head on the subject besides that.

Mr. McMASTER: In a memorandum which was distributed among the members in the House the statement is made that when this charter was granted to the Toronto and Niagara Power Company it was thoroughly understood that the company obtained the right to go into Toronto subject to the approval of the municipality. I would like to hear the minister on that point, as it appears to me to be important.

Mr. CARVELL: I was not a member of Parliament at that time, and therefore I have no personal knowledge of the matter. However, from reading Hansard of that day there is no doubt that the matter was discussed, and I think that very many people believed that they would not have the right to invade the streets of any city without the consent of the municipality.

But my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) in his usual logical fashion has, I think, answered that question. It is not a question of what he or I or some other member of Parliament may have thought; Parliament acts as a whole, and the combined wisdom of the whole Parliament finally incorporates certain ideas into law; and from that day forth it is a question for the courts to decide what Parliament did intend to do. And the Privy Council has said that Parliament intended that the company should have the right to go on the streets of every municipality in the province of Ontario.

Mr. McMASTER: The House of Lords decided that all the property of the Presbyterian Church was to go to the "Wee Frees," and legislation had to be passed to correct such an absurdity.

Mr. CARVELL: My friend is a better authority on that then I am, and therefore I will not be drawn into that discussion,—theology is not my strong point. When I was interrupted I was stating that it takes three things to make a successful hydro-electric scheme after the parent company was formed—and without the parent company the scheme was never possible, because unless they had the right to transmit and distribute energy they never would have spent a dollar. Therefore, all the corporations that have been built up around this company were built up because of the rights and powers granted to the parent company by Parliament in 1902. They got these three things going and spent about $35,000,000. It is in evidence, and not denied, that there are $29,000,000 worth of bonds now outstanding against the scheme, and $9,000,000 of those bonds have actually been absorbed by the purchasing public since the decision of the Privy Council in 1912. I think it is a fair assumption that the people who bought those bonds since 1912 bought them on the strength of the law as interpreted by the Privy Council—that this company had the right to distribute electricity through the municipalities of Ontario or anywhere else that they might be able to go to.

In pursuance of those rights the company built a transmission line from the Falls to the city of Toronto. Then they had a contract with the city of Toronto by which they were given the right to erect certain poles in the city for the purpose of lighting the streets. The contract extended down to 1915 or 1916—I have forgotten the actual date. The Privy Council decided that the company had no further right to maintain those poles on the streets of Toronto—that is the Toronto and Niagara syndicate now—because they got the right up to a certain date for the specific purpose of transmitting electricity for street lighting, and when that contract expired the right to maintain the poles expired with it; and that is where the matter stands to-day. It is also a fact that the Toronto Electric Light Company, which is a part of this scheme, has a very extensive underground system in the centre or congested portions of the city.

Mr. McCOIG: Is not the question of having overhead wires entirely one for the municipalities? What right have we to interfere? And if the municipality is going to allow the Hydro-Electric to distribute their power in that way, why should we interfere?

Mr. CARVELL: Not at all.

Mr. McCOIG: Then why make a point of it?

Mr. CARVELL: I am pointing out that the city of Toronto have no objection to overhead wires in their streets, because they have allowed the Hydro-Electric to distribute everywhere they want to by an overhead system; but when it comes to a competing company the city say to them: "No, you must not distribute your electricity by overhead wires." As I said before, the Toronto Electric Light Company have a very extensive underground system in the centre of the city, and that underground system is fed by overhead wires, and if this company is not allowed the right to use overhead wires in conjunction with their underground system, then that underground system is no good except as junk. Because, they might have the most elaborate distribution system in the world, but if they cannot get current to it it is only junk. If this amendment were passed —let there be no misunderstanding about it—the Toronto and Niagara Company cannot maintain a single wire in the city of Toronto, they cannot get a watt of electricity through their underground system, and their underground system becomes absolute junk and is only worth junk value.

Mr. CAHILL: I understood the Toronto officials to say they would allow the company to transmit power on the overhead lines to the underground.

Mr. CARVELL: My friend is usually more astute, and it is a confession that I did not expect him to make this evening, because that question was thrashed out in the special committee for hours, and he was there. I framed these questions based upon that very statement of facts: I asked:

Q. Does the Hydro-Electric maintain overhead wires for both transmission and distribution?—A. Yes.

Q. Can the Toronto Electric Light Company feed its underground system without using overhead lines in the city of Toronto?—A. No.

That was admitted by everybody.

Mr. CAHILL: Who answered that?

Mr. CARVELL: Mr. Fleming was there from one side, and Mr. Kilmer from the other.

Mr. CAHILL: Mr. Kilmer did not answer in that way.

Mr. MORPHY: No objection was taken to it.

Mr. CARVELL: I rather resent that statement from my friend (Mr. Cahill) and I say so frankly. I am not coming before this Committee to state what are not the facts. As my friend from Perth (Mr. Morphy) tells me, they stated the underground system was scattered over different parts of the city, and it would be a physical impossibility to dig a tunnel from the outskirts of the city to connect with that scattered system. There was no question about the matter at all; everybody admitted the facts were that without the overhead distribution system you could never feed the underground. I would not come here and misstate the facts. I have been at the bar too long to attempt such misrepresentation.

Let us see the result. My friend says, "Well, but they are going to allow them to distribute overhead." What does the amendment provide? Subsection 5 is as follows:

> The provisions of the last preceding subsection shall apply to and restrict the powers of any company heretofore incorporated by special Act or other authority of the Parliament of Canada, notwithstanding that such provisions may be inconsistent with the provisions of such special Act or other authority, and notwithstanding the provisions of section 3 of this Act.

Section 3 provides that if they are not satisfied with the arrangements for distribution, if the conditions imposed are too onerous or unfair, they can apply to the board. Notwithstanding everything, if this amendment passes, then the Toronto and Niagara Company are absolutely barred from getting electricity for their underground system in Toronto. There you have the facts of the case put as plainly and concisely as I am able to express them. It is also admitted that their principal consumers are two corporations in Toronto: first, the Toronto Electric Light Company, which the city of Toronto have the right to purchase up to the month of November next, but the city has now notified the officials of the company that they do not intend to purchase the system. If the amendment passes, the Toronto and Niagara Company cannot feed their underground system, and therefore that system is only junk.

It is also admitted that in 1921 the city has the right to take their next greatest customer, that is, the Toronto Railway Company. You take away from the Toronto and Niagara Power Company the Toronto Railway Company, and you put the Transmission Company where they cannot dispose of their power. What, then, are they going to do with their output? What is the value of their output in Toronto? What is the value of their transmission line? What is the value of their generating plant, if they are not allowed to transmit electricity to the United States? If this amendment passes I have no hesitation in saying that two years from now their bonds would not be worth 50, because the physical assets of the company that would be left to them would not realize more than fifty per cent on the value of the bonds. If the Parliament of Canada is absolutely to commandeer or destroy a corporation such as that, which has been built up on the basis of legislation passed by this Parliament in good faith, then it is for them to say so; but I want to see the members of this House vote to do that before I believe it is possible that the representatives of the people have reached the point where they will confiscate property which represents money invested in good faith at a time when the undertaking seemed very much of an experiment. I believe I am safe in saying that when this company decided to transmit electricity from Niagara Falls to Toronto it was the longest transmission line in existence in the world—nearly one hundred miles. They were pioneers in what became one of the greatest assets of the civilized world. They got a charter which, I admit, looking backward on it now, is a very favourable one; but they got it in good faith and invested their money in good faith. And if this amendment is adopted, the earning capacity of this property is absolutely gone; it can only be sold as junk.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is the section as it now stands in the Bill just as it was passed in the committee?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes. The Bill before the House now is exactly as passed by the committee and by the Senate.

Mr. BRISTOL: Assuming that the right of the company to go on the streets of Montreal or any other city without the leave of the municipalities be taken away, on what does my hon. friend base the idea that these assets are worth only fifty cents on the dollar?

Mr. CARVELL: I thought I made that plain.

Mr. BRISTOL: They are developing 250,000 horse-power at Niagara Falls now.

Mr. CARVELL: We are dealing with a specific case, not with a general law. We have a case which ought not to be here at all, or which, if here at all, ought to be in the form of an amendment to the charter of the Toronto and Niagara Power Company. But I will go over the ground again. The Toronto and Niagara Power Company have only two principal consumers of their product, first, the Toronto Street railway, which the city of Toronto will take over two years from now and which will be entirely operated by hydro-electric current;—my hon. friend will agree to that?

Mr. BRISTOL: Yes, but when they made that contract with the Toronto Railway Company they charged them $45 per horsepower and got the Toronto Railway Company to guarantee their bonds. It was that fact that caused Toronto and the whole of Ontario to look aghast on the whole situation.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend is introducing local politics into the matter; I do not propose to drag such considerations into it at all. I do not care what their contract was in Toronto; I am dealing with the facts of the case as revealed in the Committee.

Mr. BRISTOL: But, pardon me; the franchise of the Toronto Street Railway Company expires in two years, anyway.

Mr. CARVELL: I know that; I am not so dense as not to realize all these things. I know that in two years from now they are going to lose the right to sell electricity to the Toronto Railway Company. Toronto has the right to abrogate that contract and take over the Toronto Electric Railway Company.

Mr. McMASTER: We should like to have the benefit of the whole of this discussion. We can hear the minister, but we cannot hear the member for Toronto Centre (Mr. Bristol).

The CHAIRMAN: The Minister of Public Works has the floor.

Mr. CARVELL: I have no objections whatever to interruptions; I am glad to argue the matter from every possible standpoint. I am not at all afraid of my premises; therefore I welcome any questions the member for Toronto Centre wants to put to me. Now, I will finish my answer to him. In the next place the greatest consumer of current from this company is the Toronto Electric Light Company. The city of Toronto has the right to buy that company out also. That right expires in November of this year and the city have now notified the company that they will not buy them out. I have pointed out that if this amendment carries there is no earthly possibility of the Toronto Electric Light Company getting their current to their underground system, because they cannot maintain one pole in Toronto, and if the Toronto and Niagara Power Company cannot get current to any part of that system, what earthly good is the Toronto Electric Light Company to them? It is absolutely useless; it is a dead horse to them, and they might as well sell it for ten per cent of what it cost them. I know something about this business; I have been in it for fifteen years, and I know what it means if you have a dead line and cannot get electricity to it. All you can do is to sell it as old copper; you can take the expensive switch-boards and sell them at twenty-five cents on the dollar. If the city of Toronto, or whoever the competing powers are, want to be fair, they will say: We will buy you out—and if they will buy them out, that is all right.

Now, I think I have answered my hon. friend. If you take from this company their two principal customers in Toronto you render the whole scheme absolutely useless, unless they are allowed to export electricity to the United States. But what is the position? We have the chairman of the Hydro-Electric demanding that we prohibit the export of electricity to the United States. Just as sure as this Bill went through, in the next week a demand would come up on behalf of certain people in Ontario that this Government prohibit the exportation to the United States of one watt of electricity generated by this company. If my premises are at all correct, I want the member for Toronto Centre, when he replies to me, as I assume he will, to show me where in the world this company is going to get the money to pay their bonds.

But the amendment goes further than that. The hon. member for Parkdale wants Parliament to say, in substance—it is very doubtful whether it could be said, under our constitution—that if the Toronto Electric Light Company has sold any part of its plant or assets to the Toronto and Niagara Power Company, the arrangement shall be void. In all my experience in Parliament, extending over a long period here and in New Brunswick, I have never heard a proposal to confiscate moneys put up in good faith, on the faith of legislation granted by Parliament. It may be good morals in Ontario, but I can tell you that in the part of Canada from which I have the honour to come, it would be considered mighty bad morals.

Now, owing to the manner in which we have discussed this thing, I have taken more time than I intended to take, but I wanted to lay before the committee the facts of the case as I view them. I hope that the Parliament of Canada will not stultify itself by adopting the amendment proposed by the member for Parkdale. I use the word advisedly; I know it is a strong one, but I have no other word in my vocabulary which correctly interprets my views on this matter. Something else might be done. Something might be done to limit the powers. The company might be limited territorially; they might be allowed only to proceed in certain portions of Canada; I am not so much concerned about that. But to say that the company shall not have the right to continue doing business, shall not have the right to carry on the business which Parliament gave it the right to carry on, is a doctrine which I do not think this Parliament will accept.

Mr. McKENZIE: I did not have the privilege of hearing this matter discussed before the committee. Provided the rights of the city of Toronto are safeguarded in respect to the use of their streets, is there any special objection to the presence of this company doing business in the city?

Mr. CARVEVLL: I do not want to draw conclusions; I certainly do not want to impute motives, but you must remember that this company has just one competitor, and that is the province of Ontario, and you must remember that this company cannot make a contract with any municipality except with the consent and approval of its competitor. Now if this amendment passes, this company cannot do any business in the city of Toronto because the city of Toronto is its competitor. That is the reason why the city of Toronto will not buy out the Toronto Electric Light Company. We have heard it stated very plainly—I do not know that I can bring a man here as a witness to swear to it—that the city of Toronto have refused to buy out the company because they say: "We can squeeze them out by refusing to feed their underground system, and if they cannot get their underground system fed we will take the company over as a junk proposition."

Mr. CAHILL: Does the minister believe that it was the intention of Parliament at that time to grant such wide powers? Does he believe that the company thought when they got this charter that they had a right to go on any street in any city in Canada and distribute power?

Mr. CARVELL: I can only answer that from the evidence. I believe that Mr. Clarke and Mr. Osler were satisfied that the company did not have the powers which it turned out they had. I think that probably Mr. Pringle and Mr. Cowan were two members of Parliament who at that time did not believe the company had the powers which it turns out they had. As to what the rest of Parliament believed I do not know, because the other two hundred and twenty members were silent on the question, and I have no way of going back seventeen years and divining their thoughts. There was no secret about it, because the very year Mr. Urquhart, mayor of Toronto, brought the matter to the attention of the city council and pointed out that the company had acquired the exact powers which the Privy Council says they got. That was told in the city council in 1903, and yet the city allowed this company to occupy their streets and do practically what they had a mind to with them for years and years, and it was not until 1914 or 1915, I believe, that the city raised a protest. So, no matter what may have been the views of four or five members of Parliament, the people of Toronto knew what powers this company had, and allowed them to exercise them without protest for ten or twelve years.

Mr. CHAPLIN: The minister stated that the city of Toronto wanted to squeeze out this company. Is it not true that the city of Toronto offered to buy out the company at 135?

Mr. CARVELL: I have been told that that is true, and that the stock was then worth about 160 and the company refused to sell. This is only hearsay, and I have no way of proving it. It was not mentioned in the sub-committee. No evidence was given to that effect; I am only giving hearsay.

Mr. NICKLE: If all the members of the House viewed this matter from the same point of view as the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) there would be no discussion here and no difference of opinion, but I think that to get a true conception of the position of the Toronto and Niagara Power Company and of this legislation it is necessary that we should go back, although it may take a little time, to the inception of things. In 1902 application was made by certain gentlemen for the incorporation of a company to be known as the Toronto and Niagara Power Company. Section 12 of the Bill empowered the company:

> —to acquire, construct, maintain and operate works for the production, sale, and distribution of electricity and power for any purpose for which such electricity or power can be used.

It also gave them power to:

> —construct, maintain and operate lines of wire, poles, tunnels, conduits and other works in the manner and to the extent required for the corporate purposes of the Company.

Section 13 gave them power to erect poles, construct trenches or conduits and do all other things necessary for the transmission of power, light, heat, and so on. Section 21 incorporated sections 40 to 61, both inclusive, section 90, sections 93 to 98 both inclusive, and sections 136 to 169 both inclusive, of the Railway Act, and says that these sections:

> shall apply to the Company and its undertakings in so far as the said sections are not inconsistent with the provisions of this Act—subject to certain conditions thereafter enumerated. Now the Minister of Public Works was asked a question as to what was the intention of Parliament when that Act was obtained, and he said he could not state what the intention of Parliament was, although he was aware what the position and opinions of certain gentlemen were. If you will turn to Hansard of 1902, page 3629, you will see that Mr. Osler, then a member of this House, asked this question:

> The Minister of Marine and Fisheries: There can be no doubt that it is.

Mr. Pringle, who was the promoter of the Bill, said:

> I cannot see the necessity for adding that clause. Parliament is supreme in these matters, and it can at any time pass a general Bill which will govern matters of this sort.

At page 3630, Mr. Cowan, who was the Chairman of the then Railway Committee, said:

When this Company goes to erect poles or wires across the streets of Toronto it can only do so with the consent of the municipal council of that city.

At page 3633, Mr. Clarke, who was a member for one of the Torontos, said:

If the hon. gentlemen opposite who are objecting to these amendments will provide in this Bill that this Company cannot enter into the city of Toronto or exercise the powers asked for under this Bill without the consent of the municipality, we shall be prepared to withdraw all these amendments.

To this Mr. Pringle replied—(page 3634):

Will the hon. gentleman allow me to put a question to him? The question I wish to put is: How this section 90 of the Railway Act, as amended in 1899, affects this question? The amendment is as follows:

When any Company has power by any Act of Parliament to construct and maintain lines of telegraph or telephone or lines for the conveyance of light, heat, power or electricity, su Company may with the consent of the municipal council or other authority having jurisdiction over any highway, square or other public place, enter thereon, etc.

—subject to certain provisions. And the following provisions refer to damages, compensation, and so on. Mr. Pringle said further:

I understand that it (the section of the Act) means just what it expresses. All companies have to obtain the consent of a municipality before passing through it.

So that it is not difficult to argue, in fact it is absolutely impossible to take a contrary position, that at the time that debate took place in the House of Commons in 1902, Mr. Osler and Mr. Clarke, members for Toronto, were endeavouring to have inserted in the Bill a provision that would put beyond the possibility of misunderstanding what they thought should be in the Bill. These gentlemen were not lawyers, and Mr. Cowan the Chairman of the Railway Committee, and Mr. Pringle, the sponsor of the Bill, made it abundantly clear that in their opinion these amendments were not necessary because they were covered by section 90 of the Railway Act, which was incorporated in the Bill. Now the Minister of Public Works says he does not know what Parliament intended when that Bill was before the House for consideration. I would draw his attention to this fact: If section 90 was incorporated in the Bill—and it certainly was, and if any gentleman doubts my word he has only to look at section 21—it was inserted for the reason that something was intended by that incorporation, and what was intended by that incorporation was this: That this company should not have the right either for transmission or distribution purposes to enter on the streets of any municipality without they first obtained the consent of that municipality. And in the face of section 90 being incorporated in the legislation embodied in section 21, and in view of the discussions to which I have referred, I am utterly at a loss to see how the Minister of Public Works arrives at the conclusion that Parliament was not of the intention, and did not believe, that the rights of the company should be restricted according to section 90.

But, you will say to me, if that was the intention of Parliament, how is it that when the Act reached the Privy Council it was differently construed? When the Act got to the Privy Council for construction the construction was not on the broad basis of the rights of this Parliament to consider conditions in existence when this Act was passed, but on the narrow basis that determines and limits the right of a court in construing an Act of Parliament. The Lords of the Privy Council in their decision made it abundantly clear to those who argued the case and those who care to read it, that they were not in a position to endeavour to interpret the meaning of the Act by going outside its four corners. We as a Parliament, when this measure is before us for consideration, are within our parliamentary rights and discharge our parliamentary duties when we endeavour to secure the meaning of an Act of Parliament by looking over the conditions under which that Act was passed and reviewing the discussions which took place in Committee and in the House. But the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, when the matter was before them, said that they were guided and influenced and determined by totally different considerations. Those who represented the municipality of North Toronto before the Privy Council argued that the members of the House of Lords were within their rights in giving consideration to what transpired in the House and before the Committee of that day. But the Privy Council in giving their decision said:

They have to bear in mind that a court of justice is not entitled to speculate as to which of two conflicting policies was intended to prevail, but must confine itself to the construction of the language of the relevant statutes read as a whole.

In other words, the Lords of the Privy Council said, in the interpretation of this Act, that they could not read nor consider anything that might have been done or said when the matter was before this House, but had to determine the Act purely within the four corners of the statute. The Minister of Public Works, if I am correctly advised,—it may be that I am not—is wrong in his contention that from 1902 to 1911 this company went on and exercised its rights ruthlessly and without regard for the municipalities. If I am correctly informed, this company bought its right of way for its transmission line from Niagara to Toronto and did not force itself through municipalities but worked itself along as a transmission line by purchase or with the consent of the municipalities through which it passed.

Mr. CARVELL: Will the hon. member pardon me. I do not think I said "ruthlessly," and certainly I did not intend to say so. I said they went on and developed under the powers given them by Parliament. I have never heard that they have done anything but carry on a straight business proposition, and I would be the last man to say that they ruthlessly invaded any rights. I did not say so.

Mr. NICKLE: As I understand the minister now he says the company went on and exercised its statutory rights.

Mr. CARVELL: That is right.

Mr. NICKLE: Let us see how they exercised those rights. From 1902 to 1911 they did not presume to erect poles or wires either for transmission or distribution in any municipality without the consent of the municipality. But in 1911 there was a change of policy. In that year they entered the streets of a suburban district of Toronto known as North Toronto, and without obtaining the consent of that municipality, proceeded to erect poles and wires for the purpose at least of transmission, and, I think, also of distribution. An action was launched by the town of North Toronto and was first heard by Mr. Justice Boyd of the Supreme Court of Ontario who gave a decision to the effect that they had a right to erect those poles and wires provided they did not incommode the people of that municipality. But in so far as the reading of that case leads one to a conclusion, the attention of the Chancellor was not directed to the fact that section 90 of the Railway Act was incorporated in the Act of the Toronto and Niagara Power Company. From the decision of the Chancellor an appeal was taken to the Court of Appeal by the municipality of North Toronto, and the Court of Appeal unanimously was of the opinion that the Toronto and Niagara Power Company had not the right to erect poles and wires in that or any other municipality without obtaining the consent of the municipality. They were of the opinion that section 90, incorporated in the act of incorporation of the Toronto and Niagara Power Company by section 21 of that Act, was not inconsistent with the powers given by sections 12 and 13, but simply qualified those sections, and that the consent of the municipality had to be obtained before poles or wires either for transmission or distribution could be erected. An appeal was then taken by the Toronto and Niagara Power Company to the Privy Council, with the result that the Privy Council, relying on the principle of law which I enunciated a few moments ago, that they could not go outside the four corners of the statute, reached the conclusion and gave a decision that section 90 had no application to the charter of the Toronto and Niagara Power Company, and for the first time the residents of the province of Ontario, to say nothing of the people of Canada, woke up to the fact that the Toronto and Niagara Power Company had a right that enabled them to go on the streets of any municipality either for the purpose of transmission or for the purpose of distribution, and that there was no municipal power in Canada that could say them nay. Not only had they this right for a limited period of time, but they had a perpetual charter extending not only in the province of Ontario but from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Now, let us understand exactly what the rights of this company are as claimed to-day and what rights we, as members of this House, are asked to confer by passing the legislation as it comes to us from the Senate. Hon. gentlemen present in this House to-night are being asked to say that the Toronto and Niagara Power Company have the right to erect distribution poles and wires in any municipality in Canada without getting the consent of that municipality. Now, Sir, had it not been that representations were made to the Committee in 1902 and again to the House in the same year to the effect that these rights should not be exercised except with the consent of the municipality, I am inclined to the opinion that I would find myself in the same quandary in which the Minister of Public Works is placed to-night. The difference between us lies in this: He does not view the matter in such a way as to feel justified in going beyond the four corners of the Act; I view the matter in a broader way, or perhaps I should say, in a more extended way, I think that we as a high court of Parliament have the right to go beyond the Act and to study and give consideration to, and to have our decision influenced by, the conditions and representations under which that Act was obtained. I say that it is a sound principle of law that if A represents as a fact to B something upon which B relies as a fact and acts thereon, A is estopped from contending as to the truth of the representations made. Applying that principle of law to the charter that is before the Committee to-night for consideration indirectly, I say that in my opinion this House has the right to say that if the promoters of this legislation in 1902 represented to this Parliament that they were only getting a limited franchise, when they either knew they were getting a more extended franchise or were ignorant of the fact that they were getting a more extended franchise, we as a House of Commons have the right to say: You are bound by the representations you made in 1902 and have no greater privileges and rights than you protested and led the House of Commons to believe you had. It is on that principle that the Minister of Public Works and I differ. He takes—if I may use the expression without being considered offensive—the narrow legalistic position that might be taken by a judge. On the other hand, I take what I consider to be the more extended position, that as a member of Parliament I have the right to review the conditions under which any legislation is obtained. It is a question on which men of different minds may reach different conclusions, and different conclusions may be honestly reached. But in my judgment there is no anomaly in this Parliament saying, by the legislation that is proposed by the hon. member for Toronto, we are going to bind this company to the same principles that they were prepared to accept in 1902.

The hon. member for Centre Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) this afternoon raised the contention that we were doing an unusual and ridiculous thing in trying by a general Act to curtail the powers given the company by its special Act. But is not that what was attempted to be done in 1902 when section 90 of the General Railway Act was incorporated into a private Act? All that is being asked here to-night is that section 374, which is, if I may use the figure, the legitimate descendant of section 90, shall be so amended that it will carry out in letter, in spirit and in effect the very principles that the Parliament of 1902 designed to enact, as made plain by the discussion in this House at that date. That was thought to be binding on the Toronto and Niagara Power Company.

Let us see what this wide charter means —because this is not a fight between Toronto and the Toronto and Niagara Power Company, as was said by the hon. member for Centre Vancouver. It is not even a fight between the Toronto Niagara Power Company and the Hydro-Electric; it is the determination of a principle which will affect every municipality from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Pass this legislation as it comes from the Senate and the Toronto Niagara Power Company have the right, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, to erect distribution lines in each municipality and no municipal power can say them nay. They have the right to enter every municipality in the country, to erect poles in that municipality, and no municipality can prevent them. Since 1899 the principle has been recognized that municipalities should have control of their streets. If, in 1902, when the Toronto-Niagara Power Company obtained their charter, there was an evasion of that principle, it was an evasion that was obtained through Parliament being made to think that the principle was not being renounced.

The Minister of Public Works dealt at some length with the conditions as they are in Toronto to-day, and perhaps it would not be unreasonable if I should follow him into the arena into which he has led us. Let us see what the condition in Toronto is. The Toronto Electric Light Company had the right, under a charter which has expired, to erect poles in Toronto for the purpose of lighting the streets. The right to maintain those poles by the Toronto Electric Light Company on the streets of Toronto has expired. Action was taken by Toronto for a judicial interpretation of those rights and that action was taken not only before the Supreme Court of Ontario and the Court of Appeal, but it was taken to the Privy Council. The Privy Council determined that the poles of the Toronto Electric Light Company had no right to remain on the streets of Toronto, that they should be removed and that their continuance there was a trespass. We have heard considerable to-night from the Minister of Public Works regarding the sacredness of contracts. He says that contracts should be respected and that a decision of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council is something to which we must all bow. I agree with him in the soundness of his law. When the Privy Council makes an enunciation as to a principle of law, that is the law until the Privy Council changes its view, and there is no power than can change that law except the power of Parliament. When the Privy Council says that the poles of the Toronto Electric Light Company are on the streets of Toronto as trespassing poles and should be removed, is it right or just that Toronto should be obliged to permit these poles to remain on its streets because the Toronto Niagara Power Company have bought them? They claim that under their statute of 1902 although these poles would have had to be removed had they remained the property of the Toronto Electric Light Company, the fact that they have passed from the Toronto Electric Light Company to the Toronto Niagara Power Company gives the Toronto Niagara Power Company the right to insist that these poles must remain on the streets of Toronto, not because the Toronto Electric Light Company have any right to maintain them there but because the Toronto Niagara Power Company under the "rights" they obtained by this charter, have the right, through the acquisition of the Toronto Electric Light Company assets, to insist that the poles shall remain on the streets of Toronto.

Mr. CARVELL: Is it not a fact that subsection 6 of the proposed amendment aims to prevent the transfer of these poles from the Toronto Electric Light Company to the Toronto Niagara Power Company?

Mr. NICKLE: Not as I read that section. Section 6 to which the minister directs our attention says:

If any company heretofore incorporated by Special Act or other authority of the Parliament of Canada has acquired, or shall acquire the assets or any part thereof, or the right to the possession or use of the assets or any part thereof, of any company or person operating a system for the distribution of light, heat, power, or electricity, in any city, town, village, or township, then and in every such case, the company so acquiring such assets shall carry out with the municipality all the obligations in respect of the said assets, whether arising under contract or in any other manner, of the company from which the said assets shall be or have been acquired.

Does the minister give me to understand that that section has been incorporated?

Mr. CARVELL: It is incorporated in the proposed amendment.

[Mr. Nickle.]

Mr. NICKLE: No.

Mr. CARVELL: Well that is what has been handed to me by the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. J. D. Reid) as the proposed amendment.

Mr. NICKLE: Then, it is something that we have not heard.

Mr. CARVELL: I got it from the Minister of Railways.

Mr. J. D. REID: They have changed it.

Mr. CARVELL: I was not aware of it.

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment which has been handed to the Chairman certainly contains two new paragraphs—5 and 6.

Mr. CARVELL: Had we not better have the amendment read? Possibly I have been discussing something that was not germane to the issue at all.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Mowat moves to amend section 374 by striking out subclause 5 thereof and replacing it by the following sub-clause:

The provisions of the last preceding subsection shall apply to and restrict the powers of any company heretofore incorporated by Special Act, or other authority of the Parliament of Canada, notwithstanding that such provisions may be inconsistent with the provisions of such special Act or other authority, and notwithstanding the provision of section 3 of this Act.

And that all the words after the word "provided" in the sub-clause should be replaced by a new paragraph (6) as follows:

6. If any company heretofore incorporated by Special Act or other authority of the Parliament of Canada has acquired, or shall acquire the assets or any part thereof, or the right to the possession or use of the assets or any part thereof, of any company or person operating a system for the distribution of light, heat, power, or electricity, in any city, town, village, or township, than and in every such case, the company so acquiring such asset shall carry out with the municipality all the obligations in respect of the said assets, whether arising under contract or in any other manner, of the company from which the said assets shall be or have been acquired.

Mr. CARVELL: Exactly.

Mr. NICKLE: That amendment is not before the House.

The CHAIRMAN: It is handed to me and was proposed by Mr. Mowat in concluding his remarks.

Mr. MORPHY: Who moved that amendment?

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Mowat, this afternoon.

Mr. MOWAT: I moved subsection 5 in order to get the section before the House and this is the amendment to subsection 6 which the Chairman has read. I did intend subsequently to submit the amendment which the Chairman has read, but I did not read it. I gave a copy of it to the Chairman and I intended to move it in due course.

Mr. NICKLE: It is the first I have heard of that amendment.

Mr. MORPHY: May I ask the Chairman if the two clauses constitute one amendment?

Mr. MOWAT: Two amendments.

Mr. MORPHY: Is it all one?

The CHAIRMAN: There cannot be more than one amendment to a clause at the same time.

Mr. MORPHY: Exactly.

The CHAIRMAN: The entire subsection is proposed to be stricken out according to the two amendments, which were pinned together and handed to me this afternoon when the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) concluded his speech.

Mr. CAHILL: The whole clause?

The CHAIRMAN: No, subsection 5.

Mr. CARVELL: And a new 5 and a new 6 added?

The CHAIRMAN: Yes.

Mr. MORPHY: In view of the fact that this debate is likely to be a lengthy one, might I suggest that the amendments be copied and distributed among members?

Mr. NICKLE: I was in the House this afternoon when the member for Parkdale moved his amendment, which was to the following effect:

That all the words in the first ten lines of subsection 5 of section 374 down to and inclusive of the word "powers" be struck out, and the following be substituted therefor:

5. The provisions of the last preceding subsection shall apply to and restrict the powers of any company heretofore incorporated by special Act, or other authority of the Parliament of Canada notwithstanding that such provisions may be inconsistent with the provisions of such Special Act, or other authority, and notwithstanding the provisions of section 3 of this Act.

Now, as the Minister of Public Works asked me the question, and so that this matter be represented correctly, I might say that if subsection 6 to which he just now directed my attention was adopted by this House the adoption of the word "obligations", which is very much broader than the word "rights" appearing in the Bill as it comes to us from the Senate, would, in all probability, compel the Toronto and Niagara Power Company to be bound in reference to the removal of the poles of that company since acquired from the Toronto Electric Light Company. But when I was discussing the matter with the Minister of Public Works, subsection 6 was not, and is not now, I understand, before the Committee for consideration and decision.

The hon. member for Centre Vancouver said this afternoon that the Railway Board would give courteous and sympathetic consideration to any application that was made to them under section 5 of the Act as it comes to us from the Senate. But let us see what the language of that section is:

Any specific powers inconsistent with the provisions of this section and conferred on any company by any special or other Act or authority of the Parliament of Canada or of any province, shall not be affected by the provisions of this section, but if any municipality complains to the Board that any company, whether incorporated by special or other act or authority of the Parliament of Canada, is exercising its powers oppressively or in bad faith, the Board may hear such complaint, and, if it sees fit, supervise the exercise of such powers.

Now the Railway Commission may be animated with the best intentions in the world, but, as the hon. gentleman knows, their power in respect of any matter that comes before them for consideration are determined and limited by the language that gives them that power. Indeed the language of subsection 5, as it appears in the Act simply gives the Railway Commission power to supervise when the powers are oppressively or in bad faith exercised. Now that practically means nothing; they can simply supervise, they cannot prohibit. I would think that the extent that would permit them to go would be thus far: If the Toronto and Niagara Power Company determined that they would erect a very unsightly and unseemly class of poles on a certain thoroughfare through which the use of that street would be greatly encumbered and the people greatly irritated, and in such event all the Railway Commission could say would be: "You must use a different style of poles and you must locate them somewhat differently on the street"; I do not believe the Railway Commission would have the right to say to the company, "You shall not go through that municipality." I do not think there is a gentleman in the House to-night—certainly not those of us who are advocating the amendment as brought forward by the member for Parkdale—who wants a single member to vote in the dark, not knowing what the amendment means. The amendment means that those of us who are supporting it desire the principle incorporated in the Railway Act that no company shall have the right, no matter whether they have special powers or otherwise, to go through the streets of any municipality for the purpose of distributing electricity without the consent of that municipality.

Mr. BURNHAM: That principle no doubt must be conceded. Now then we want to know how you are going to protect the shareholders of the Toronto and Niagara Power Company?

Mr. NICKLE: I will answer the hon. gentleman's question in a moment. Now, in regard to the matter of transmission, the principle is accepted and recognized that a transmission line may be built through a municipality with its consent; but if the municipality is not willing that that transmission line shall be built then there shall be an appeal to the Railway Commission and the decision of the commission shall be final. Now hon. gentlemen ask me why the occasion for the difference? Why do you make one law as to transmission and another law as to distribution? The difference in principle is this: It is absolutely essential that a company shall have the right to put a transmission line through a municipality for the purpose of reaching other municipalities, and it would be ridiculous to say that any municipality should have the right to obstruct a great work simply by saying "You shall not put a few poles down the municipal township highway, or down the sideline road." But distribution, that is the selling of power to the people who live in the municipality, is distinct from transmission. Then we ask that the principle that has governed this Parliament since 1899 be made effective; and Parliament says that no municipality, for distribution purposes, shall be compelled to accept the distribution lines of any company without its consent. Now the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) asked a question, and if I understood the question it was this: How do you propose to protect the bondholders of the Toronto and Niagara Power Company?

Mr. BURNHAM: Shareholders.

Mr. NICKLE: Here is my understanding of the situation—I will only give a part of the financial meanderings of the various companies, but sufficient to give the House an understanding of the situation as I see it.

Mr. McMASTER: I would like to direct the hon. member's attention to an argument which was advanced by the Minister of Public Works and which impressed me very much. He said that the Privy Council had decided that this company had the right to go into the streets of Toronto, or the streets of any other city, town, or municipality, and that the company in question had sold millions of dollars of bonds which the minister believed were bought by the purchasers because the Privy Council had declared that the company had that right. If that be a fact how does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Nickle) propose to protect the interest of people who in good faith, and relying upon the judgment of the highest court of the British Empire, invested their money in these bonds?

Mr. NICKLE: If what the Minister of Public Works says is a fact—I have no knowledge of it as a fact, and I do not think it is a fact; although not for one moment do I allege that he is stating what is not the fact as he understands it—the contention would be difficult to refute. But my understanding is that the Toronto and Niagara Power Company have issued only $1,500,000 worth of bonds and $700,000 worth of stock, and that all of it was issued about 1903 to the Electrical Development Company—that no bonds or stock were issued by that company after the decision of the Privy Council. I remember that in the Railway Committee—I was only there a few minutes—Mr. McDougall (I think that is the gentleman's name) made the statement that the issue of $1,500,000 worth of bonds and $700,000 worth of stock of the Toronto and Niagara Power Company were sold because the Toronto and Niagara Power Company had contracts with the Toronto Electric Light Company and the Toronto Street Railway Company, and that those contracts were the earning capacity that warranted the sale of the bonds about 1903, before the Privy Council made the decision to which the Minister of Public Works has directed the attention of the House.

Mr. McMASTER: Does not that go to the very heart of the question? The members of this House are sitting more or less as judges in this matter. If two opposing counsel made the statements which the member for Kingston and the Minister of Public Works have made to-night, would not the judge say, " Gentlemen, please turn up the evidence and show me which of you is right?"

Mr. NICKLE: And I think the counsel would say, " We have not the evidence."

Mr. McMASTER: You should have the evidence.

Mr. NICKLE: I quite admit that the member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) has directed the attention of the House to a very salient point, and it is a point upon which I have from time to time indirectly attempted to get information. I always wanted to know how many bonds were issued by the Toronto and Niagara Power Company subsequent to the decision of the Privy Council, but I was never able to obtain that information, nor do I know where it can be obtained. I have never seen any prospectus; I do not think that any gentleman present will say that any such evidence was ever produced before the Committee.

The Toronto and Niagara Power Company was incorporated in 1902. In 1903, Messrs. Mackenzie, Nicholls and Pellatt made an agreement with the Ontario Victoria Park Commission for the right to develop a certain number of horse-power. Later the Electrical Development Company was incorporated under an Ontario Act, and subsequently an agreement was made by that company with Messrs. Mackenzie, Nicholls and Pellatt for the assignment by these gentlemen to the Electrical Development Company of the rights and privileges secured from the Park Commission. The Electrical Development Company gave a bond mortgage for $10,000,000. The money was probably used for developing power. The Toronto and Niagara Power Company between 1903 and 1905 issued the $1,500,000 worth of bonds, to which I have just directed the attention of the House, and $700,000 worth of stock, all of which were sold to the Electrical Development Company. The Toronto Power Company was formed in 1908 under the Ontario Companies' Act, and they owned $2,000,000 of the $10,000,000 bonds of the Electrical Development, and $3,000,000 of the capital stock of the Electrical Development Company—all of the voting capital stock.

Then an agreement was made, I understand, by Mackenzie, Nicholls and Pellatt to buy out the Toronto Electric Light Company's stock of $4,000,000, at $135 per share. I would just like to say in passing that the Minister of Public Works in his argument failed to draw the attention of the House to the fact that the city of Toronto offered the Light Company $135 per share for the stock of that company. The Toronto Electric Light Company refused to sell to the city of Toronto, but subsequently sold to the Mackenzie group—and I do not use the word " group " in an offensive sense—who subsequently transferred to the Toronto and Niagara Power Company, and in that way " revived " the Light Company's rights to maintain the poles, if I may use that expression.

I hold no brief for the city of Toronto. I am not a resident of the city. As far as I know the Toronto and Niagara Power Company will never touch the streets of Kingston, in which city I reside and which I have the honour to represent. But I do say, in fairness to the city of Toronto, that attention should be drawn to the fact that the city of Toronto endeavoured to buy the stock of the Toronto Electric Light Company, but were not able to do so, apparently for the reason that the Toronto Electric Light Company—which was under the control of the same group that owned the Electrical Development Company and the Toronto and Niagara Power Company—was desirous of selling these assets to the Toronto and Niagara Power Company, for the purpose of holding in perpetuity a grip on the streets of the city of Toronto; and I think it is only right that this House should give relief to the city of Toronto. The Toronto Electric Light Company's $4,000,000 stock was bought at $135 a share. All the capital stock of the Toronto Power Company is owned by the Toronto Street Railway Company. In other words, the grip on the situation is with the Toronto Street Railway Company, whose charter on the streets of the city of Toronto expires in 1921.

The Minister of Public Works made the statement that Mr. Fleming told him in the Committee that he was quite prepared, speaking on behalf of the various companies he represented, to sell to the city of Toronto all the assets of the various companies as a going concern. We lawyers know what that means. "As a going concern" means that you would have to value the assets of the Toronto Electric Light Company,—these poles that are on the streets of the city of Toronto as trespass poles, not as poles valued as junk, but as poles with a value which could be computed on the cost of erection. You would not say, "What is the value of pole A?" deducting from that value the cost of removing it from the streets? but you would say, "What is the value of pole A after it has been erected in the street?" You would not deduct from its value the cost of its removal, but you would add to its value the cost of its erection. Of course, Mr. Fleming in speaking to the minister said he was willing to sell those assets in the city of Toronto as a going concern, because he knew that if sold as a going concern there would be increased value in it for somebody. But why should the city of Toronto be asked to buy the poles of the Toronto Electric Light Company and add to their value the cost of their erection when the Toronto Electric Light Company were and are trespassers in having those poles on the streets of the city? Why should the city of Toronto be asked to value and take over the Toronto Street Railway Company as a going concern, when in about two years' time the city will have the right to take it over, not as a going concern, as I understand the agreement—and if I am wrong any hon. gentleman may correct me,—but as a defunct concern at a junk value? It would be madness on the part of the city of Toronto to enter into any such arrangement, and they would be simply throwing away the taxpayers' money.

It may be that the Minister of Public Works is right, but I am differently advised in regard to the underground system. I am advised that while it is quite true that the underground system in the city of Toronto, which is owned by the Mackenzie group, cannot at the present moment be operated without the use of these overhead poles, yet it is not a matter of tremendous expense to connect up that underground system with the transmission lines at the outskirts of the city, and that no such great financial burden would be thrown on the company as the minister represents.

Mr. CARVELL: The evidence before the committee was quite to the contrary. It was that that is practically a commercial impossibility to-day.

[Mr. Nickle.]

Mr. NICKLE: I am furnished by Mr. Geary, solicitor for the city of Toronto, with the following statement:

> Mr. Carvell's statement that the Toronto Electric underground will be cut off is inaccurate. A comparatively short length of underground conduit will be sufficient to make the connection—

Mr. MORPHY: What length?

Mr. NICKLE: "Comparatively short."

> —even if their transmission overhead were cut off, which latter does not seem to be in danger, as a transmission line. Also the whole underground of the Toronto Electric Light is compact and not scattered, with the exception of two small districts.

That was my authority. I am glad that the Minister of Public Works directed my attention to the report; it gave me an opportunity of reading the memorandum.

Mr. CARVELL: Mr. Geary was present in the Committee when I put the question and he made no such statement as the hon. member has given here to-night.

Mr. NICKLE: Well, I have read a note that just came from Mr. Geary.

Mr. CARVELL: It would have been much better if Mr. Geary had made the statement in the Committee, where he could be contradicted if necessary; but he failed to do so.

Mr. NICKLE: Let us assume that the Minister of Public Works is correct in his contention—I want to be quite frank with the minister. I was in the Committee the day he asked that question, and Mr. Fleming, representing the Toronto interests, gave the answer to which the minister has directed the attention of the Committee to-night. Mr. Fleming did make the statement that it would be a financial impossibility to operate the underground system of the Toronto Electric Light Company without the use of the overhead poles that the city of Toronto are now asking to be removed from the streets.

Mr. BRISTOL: Was it known that these questions were going to be asked of the city, and were they so informed in order that they might have the time and the opportunity to answer such important questions?

Mr. NICKLE: I could not give my hon. friend any information on that point. I had the misfortune to drop into the Committee—it is hot to-night; therefore I use the word " misfortune"—just while this discussion was taking place. It interested me, and impressed itself on my memory. But there was one other point that impressed me that afternoon, and I want to direct attention to it now. Although I was not on the special committee, I requested leave to ask Mr. Fleming one question. I quote from the evidence:

> Mr. Nickle: Do I understand you to say that your Company is prepared to have your area restricted to those areas in which you are now engaged?
> Mr. Fleming: I would like to say—
>
> Mr. Nickle: I desire an answer, yes or no?
> Mr. Fleming: No.

Now, what does that mean? That means that the autonomy of every municipality in Canada is jeopardized. That takes this quarrel outside of Toronto, outside the province of Ontario. It means that if the rights asked, and granted by this Act as sent to us from the Senate, are granted by this House, these people have the right to erect a distributing plant in any municipality in Ontario, not only this year, but for the next ten years and so long as time runs—or until an outraged public rise in their might and restrict the rights. I say it is unreasonable to ask Parliament to confer a charter that was obtained, if I might use the expression, by a misapprehension on the part of the members of the rights that were being given—a charter not only in perpetuity, but the application of which extends from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

I do not view this matter as it is viewed by the member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) or the Minister of Public Works. As I view the matter, the question resolves itself to this: Is this Parliament prepared to enunciate the principle that if a charter is obtained by representation of facts or by representation as to the construction of an Act that is not correct in fact, Parliament is forever estopped from rectifying a wrong that was inadvertently done, and that the people must for all time submit to what in the light of the history of this country during the last twelve years so far as legislation of this House goes, is and will be construed as an iniquity?

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways): I do not like to give a silent vote on this important matter; therefore I would like to say a few words before the vote is taken. This Bill has been before the committee for several weeks—yes, it has been before the House for some three years. It is in the interest of the country that the Bill should go through the House during the present session, and I hope that the House will arrive at some decision which will enable us to pass the Bill. I think every member of the House wishes to do what is fair and right not only with the municipality, but with this company or any other company that has been incorporated by this or any other Parliament. Some hon. members have suggested that if this charter was brought before the House to-day for approval it would not pass; that we would not grant any such conditions as were granted when this charter was given. But Parliament has granted many charters in the past that would not be granted to-day. I can refer to one. A number of years ago the House of Commons granted a charter to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company; if that charter was before the House to-day, there is no doubt that it would not pass now in the form in which it passed then. In connection with the charters which were granted in those times certain vested interests have arisen, and I think we should look at the situation in the light of all the circumstances connected with the charter.

So far as I am concerned, I feel this way. The rights of municipalities should be protected if any danger threatens them. It has been stated by many that the rights of municipalities are in danger in connection with this charter. But I wish to point out that since this charter was granted the Ontario Government has passed an Act which has changed the whole condition of affairs for the municipalities. When the charter was granted the municipalities had, in their own right, the power to allow this or any other company to enter that municipality on the basis of a by-law or agreement. But in 1914 Ontario passed an Act, which has been mentioned this afternoon, taking out of the hands of the municipalities the right that they had at that time to allow this or any other company to enter those municipalities. If the Bill passes there is no doubt that this company or any other company can enter into any municipality without the consent of that municipality.

That may be all right in many other parts of the Dominion, but so far as the province of Ontario is concerned the consent of the Ontario Government has to be obtained. That being the case this company cannot do any business between the city of Toronto and its power plant if a municipality should refuse to allow it to pass through, and if the company is prevented from transmitting power in that way it must go on the scrap heap. I think it is quite proper to protect the interests of the municipalities, but we should also do something to protect the money that has been invested in this company.

This legislation has been before the House for several years. I will tell the Committee what I think should have been done some years ago, and what should be done yet. The province of Ontario practically decided that power would be supplied to the people of the province by the Ontario Government. That policy has turned out to be a good thing for the people of the province; we all agree that the Hydro-Electric Commission has done good work. But when they decide to supply all the power to the people of the province of Ontario, I think they should take over the power plants in the province of Ontario and not make them junk, which would involve a loss of the money invested in those plants. It would only be fair for the Ontario Government to tell these power companies at Niagara Falls that they were going to take over these plants at a price fixed by arbitration; then get the arbitrators to determine the value, and let the Ontario Government take over the plants and have the power for the people of the province. The Toronto and Niagara Power Company is not the only one at Niagara Falls developing power. There is another company there developing 100,000 horsepower, all of which will be required by the people of the province. Both are up-to-date plants, they have their transmission lines, and I cannot understand why the province of Ontario does not adopt that policy, with respect to the plants not only at Niagara Falls but also at other places where electric plants owned by companies are in operation. I think men could be found to arbitrate on the value of these plants and decide what was a fair price. I am sure the people of the province of Ontario would be willing to do what was fair with regard to this or any other company in the province that might be arbitrated upon.

But that does not seem to be their policy, and therefore we in this House are placed in this position. Here we have been for three long years trying to enact a law that is absolutely necessary in the public interest, which is necessary for the protection of the travelling public and for the lives of the railway employees, and yet we cannot get the Bill through on account of this quarrel between the power companies and other interests in the province of Ontario. I am satisfied that if this amendment is carried it will not pass the Senate, because it has already been before the Senate; it was before the Senate this year, it was before the Senate last year, and the year before that. The Senate have refused to pass an amendment such as has been made by the hon. member for Parkdale, and if the amendment is carried to-night it practically means this Bill must go by the board for the present session. Now I do not think it is right that this Bill should be prevented from passing this session, and I am willing to go a certain length in making a compromise which in my opinion would be a protection not only for the municipalities but for the company as well. I say frankly I would hesitate to give a vote that might have the effect of placing this company on the junk heap, or of forcing them to accept an amount that would not be fair and right. Perhaps the Senate would accept an amendment on the lines proposed by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens. I would make the amendment a little shorter, but it would have the same effect. The words that are not satisfactory to the municipality are these:

> If any municipality complains to the Board that any company whether incorporated by special or other Act or authority of the Parliament of Canada is exercising its powers oppressively or in bad faith the Board may hear such complaint and if it sees fit supervise the exercise of such powers.

Some hon. members who have spoken, including, I think, the hon. member for Parkdale, have argued that the words "oppressively or in bad faith" mean practically nothing. I would suggest that subsection 5 be amended to read as follows:

> (5) Any specific powers inconsistent with the provisions of this section and conferred on any company by any special or other Act or authority of the Parliament of Canada or of any province shall not be affected by the provisions of this section; no such power shall be exercised except in accordance with terms of an order made by the Board after a hearing, at which hearing the municipality shall have the right to be heard: Provided always that whenever any company incorporated by special Act of the Parliament of Canada acquires the assets——and so on. That would mean that before this company could enter a municipality it would have to apply to the Board of Railway Commissioners and get permission to enter that municipality. The clause as drafted by the Senate only provides for the company applying to the board if the municipality thinks it is acting oppressively or in bad faith.

My amendment goes further and says that they must go to the Board of Railway Commissioners and obtain a permit before entering a municipality. I believe that protects every municipality in the Dominion, and it also protects the company who will have to go before the board, which is an independent tribunal, not selected from the province of Ontario particularly, or any other province. When the matter comes before it, the tribunal will decide whether this company must go on the junk heap and the shareholders or bondholders must accept the amount they would receive from the company as a result of the decision of the board; or the municipality, if it acts unfairly, must accept the board's decision. This is a provincial matter and I think Ontario should settle it. I come from that province and desire to do what is right and fair by the province of Ontario. But now that the province has decided to supply power to the people of Ontario—with which policy I am in accord—I do not think it is right for the Ontario Government to pass an Act that will throw into the junk heap private capital that has been invested in any enterprise. Cannot we in this House make some compromise? As has been stated, the company may have larger rights than it was intended that they should have. But we have a tribunal in the Board of Railway Commissioners, in whose hands we should leave the whole matter. Let us trust them to do what is right and fair, and if we find that they do not fulfil that expectation this Parliament meets every year and can remedy any erroneous decisions that they might make in connection with these matters. I appeal to the members of this House to assist me in some way to get the Bill through during the present session. Hon. members can make any amendments they like, but I have suggested what I consider to be a fair compromise. If my suggestion does not meet with approval, then let us have some amendment or compromise that will be fair and just not only to the municipalities, but to the company or companies that may be affected. But let us get the Bill through during this session.

Mr. McKENZIE: The amendment proposed by the minister deals with companies entering municipalities, and I am satisfied with the idea. But does it provide for the extension of the work of the company in a municipality in which it is now operating?

Mr. J. D. REID: The company has the right by its charter to go into any municipality without going to the board. This Parliament gave them that right. Now, if they want to go into some new municipality, which will be new work, they will have to go to the board and obtain its approval of their entry into the municipality.

Mr. McKENZIE: They are now in the city of Toronto doing business. But suppose they wish to extend into areas in the city of Toronto in which they are not now working?

Mr. J. D. REID: According to the amendment of the hon. member for Parkdale as I understand the position, they cannot do any more now in Toronto without the consent of the municipality, and that means the Ontario Government. If my amendment goes through, they will not be able to do any more work or extend their work in Toronto without the permission of the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. CAHILL: If I understand the minister, this will not in any way affect the present standing of the companies in Toronto provided they do not wish to extend operations. It will not in any way affect the standing of the Toronto and Niagara Power Company?

Mr. J. D. REID: My amendment does not affect the rights of the companies as they now stand. The bondholders at present have certain rights which are not affected. Nothing can be done to prejudice those rights in any shape or form, but if the company operate in some manner which the city of Toronto might consider contrary to the provisions of their charter an appeal could be made to the Board of Railway Commissioners to prevent the work being carried out. This company, it is claimed, have now the right, independent of any tribunal, to go into any municipality, and I am trying by my amendment to place the company under the jurisdiction of the commissioners in this respect from now on.

Mr. CAHILL: The minister evidently is willing to throw Toronto to the wolves. Provided this amendment that is moved by the hon. member for Parkdale does not apply to Toronto, he would be willing to accept it. As I understand this question, after listening to the debates in the Special Railway Committee, this company in 1902 got a charter from the Parliament of Canada. It was distinctly and well understood that they had no right to distribute power in any city without the city's consent. There is absolutely no question about that. Hansard shows it. Every member who spoke on the subject, and the minister in charge of the Bill, agreed that they were only getting the same power as other companies had been getting in the last year or two previous to that time. It was not understood that they had any special privileges other than the rights of transmission. If any municipality objected to their going through with their power line they could appeal to the Railway Commission, but there never was any intention on the part of Parliament or any one else concerned that they should have the right to go into any municipality and distribute power at will. There was no thought at that time, nor is there now—and I doubt very much whether you could get a mover and seconder to-day in this Parliament to a resolution for the purpose—to grant a perpetual franchise to a private corporation to go into any city in Canada and operate without the consent of that municipality. It seems preposterous, and undoubtedly it was not the intention of Parliament at the time that they should have these powers. On the strength of the right which they had to develop power at Niagara Falls, transmit it to Toronto and other points, and sell it in Toronto to any one who had the franchise to distribute power, they contracted with the Toronto Light Company to furnish them power in Toronto at a certain price. The Toronto Electric Light Company had right to distribute power in the city for a limited number of years.

On the strength of the limited franchises of the Toronto Electric Light Company and the Toronto Street Railway Company, this company sold stocks and bonds, developed power and delivered it. They delivered it on the distinct understanding that they were selling it to two companies whose franchises would expire. They should therefore—I do not know whether they did or not—have put aside a sufficient amount out of their earnings to have redeemed the bonds at the termination of the franchises of the companies to which they were selling power. If they did not do that they should have done so. If they did not do that and the bondholders suffer any loss by the cancellation of this contract the shareholders who took dividends out of the company should pay them back into the company and that money should revert to the bondholders. The bondholders passed their money over in good faith with the knowledge that this company was selling power to the two Toronto companies each with a franchise which would terminate. There is no question in anybody's mind but that a wrong has been done to the municipality. Every person is willing to right that wrong provided it does not hurt somebody else. We had eminent counsel here from all over the country talking on behalf of the bondholder. The bondholder, it was said, would lose if this amendment should carry. But there was not one of them who said what the bondholder would actually lose. When Mr. Beck was here in the interest of a million dollars worth of bonds, he made a very eloquent speech. When he started I asked him whom he represented and he said the bondholders. When he got through I asked him if he thought the interests of the bondholders were in any danger should this amendment pass and he said that he did not think so but that he was only speaking on the general principles of international investment. The opposition has all been on the ground of vested interests. Vested interests: I have very little respect for them if they do not represent honest investment, and honest service to the community. I have no respect for the vested interest that is represented by the stock of this company. The interest that is represented by the bonds in the company should be protected by the stockholders. I think the bondholder could make the stockholder take out of his pocket and return the dividends that he took out of that company knowing the franchise would expire.

The Minister of Public Works states that the company are not in a position to deliver power to the underground system; yet, my distinct recollection of the statement of the solicitor of the city of Toronto was they had the power to deliver to the underground system but not to distribute on the streets. The whole question resolves itself into this, that the company got a charter from the Dominion Parliament which was construed to mean that they could go upon any street or highway in any municipality in Canada. It was clearly not the intention of Parliament that they should have any such right. On the strength of that, they claimed, they afterwards sold the bonds. I asked some of the gentlemen who appeared before the Committee for the prospectus on which they sold the bonds and my impression is they did not say they were selling bonds on the strength of the decision of the Privy Council. The city of Toronto did make the company an offer but the company refused to accept it.

Mr. CARVELL: Is it not a fact that in the offer made by Toronto to purchase the stock of the Toronto Electric Light Compay there was a clause that the electrical current in the future would not be supplied by the Toronto and Niagara Power Company but by the Hydro-Electric Company?

Mr. CAHILL: I do not know as to that. When they talk of confiscation let me remind the Committee that Toronto offered 135 for the stock of this company and, that being the fact, it seems to me that there is a sufficient asset to take care of the bondholders. I say again that the bondholder is the only man in whom I have any interest. I do not believe we should sacrifice municipal rights even for the bondholders. I do not believe we should sacrifice municipal rights for any number of millions. If a mistake was made by this Parliament, it is the duty of Parliament to right that mistake and to give back to Toronto and all other municipalities the rights which belong to them. What happened is that a certain company had a franchise that had terminated. They had the right to sell electricity to consumers and to light the city streets. When their contract terminated this company stepped in and took over the assets and the terminated contract. The Toronto Electric Light Company must have had sufficiently high rates from Toronto to pay off all their liabilities because they knew that their franchise would only run for ten years. The Privy Council determined that they had no more rights under that contract but this company, with a charter from the Dominion Parliament, steps in, takes over this defunct franchise and we are asked to vote against this amendment in order to give these Toronto interests the right to make this franchise perpetual in the city of Toronto. There is no doubt that if they carry their point here to-night they will be asking for the same right in other places in Canada within a few days. The Minister of Public Works said that if this amendment carried the Ontario Government were going to do something. That seems to me to be anticipating a good deal. I would wait until they do it first. If the Ontario Government undertake to confiscate anybody's property it will be time enough for us to step in and forbid it. In the meantime let us right the wrong this Parliament did, and vote for the amendment.

Mr. SHEARD: A good deal has been said about securing the bondholders and the interests of the Toronto Niagara Power Company. The Toronto Niagara Power Company is essentially a transmission line. The bonds were issued to the world at large on the strength of it being a transmission line and nothing more. It had no right to distribute. At the day that these bonds were sold it had no terminal market in the city of Toronto. True it was coupled up with two main customers. the Toronto Electric Light Company and the Toronto Street Railway Company. The Toronto Electric Light Company was distributing light and power in Toronto and was connected up with it. The Toronto Niagara Power Company was supplying the Toronto Street Railway Company and that was its market for power. Those who bought the bonds in the Toronto Niagara Power Company knew perfectly well that both of these companies held terminable franchises and that when these franchises expired the market of the Toronto Niagara Power Company would be at an end. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) makes the argument that if you cut off one of this trinity of heads the balance would be only junk.

The one end of it never was connected with the company now under discussion; it never belonged to it, but to the transmission company under the conditions under which the bonds were sold, and the bonds stated in the charter were for one million and a half dollars—nothing more. But this company was part of an interlocking directorate—at least the owners of the company were—and this interlocking directorate was a very complicated financial machine. It was one of the creations of Sir William Mackenzie and his colleagues; and I can assure the House that no one in Canada is better able to create an intricate and far-reaching scheme of interlocking directorates, whose tentacles will touch the uttermost parts of this Dominion, than the same gentleman whose interests are being defended upon the floor of this House to-night in the opposition to this amendment. I want to say a word in reference to what this interlocking directorate means. They originally started with a transmission company, which had a capitalization of a million and a half dollars. That was all the power that was given in the original charter, nothing more. But they grafted upon that other companies. They grafted upon it the Electrical Development Company which was to manufacture power at Niagara Falls, and which had a capitalization under its original charter, I believe, of $10,000,000. In addition they have the Toronto Electric Light Company, the purchase price of which was around $4,000,000 when it became part of this interlocking directorate. They had the old Electric Light Company of the city of Toronto which had a capitalization of about a million; and they had, in addition to that, a new issue of bonds about that time, amounting to something like $6,000,000; which with additional bonds issued by the Toronto Power Company represented an increase from a million and a half up to $25,000,000. The Hon. James Beck, of New York city, probably one of the highest-priced counsel for defending interlocking directorates in the State of New York, and one who is known by every financial institution in the United States, was brought here and addressed the Committee in the company's behalf. I had the pleasure of hearing his magnificent address—because I am very partial to fine speeches. I knew Mr. Beck's capabilities as an after-dinner speaker, and I expected that he would have an electrifying effect upon the Committee, and apparently he did. I listened very attentively to the burden of Mr. Beck's song. He pleaded earnestly, eloquently and hard to save the million and a half of capital, and doubtless had in mind the bondholders of the Toronto interlocking directorate with their capitalization which he stated was something like $35,000,000; but when asked who the bondholders were, and where the bonds were, he was entirely at sea and he knew nothing at all about it; he relied upon the broad, general moral principle which he felt sure would appeal to a nation like Canada, that once a bargain always a bargain, and where vested interests were concerned it should stand immortal. That was pretty much the Hon. James Beck's argument to the Committee. He lost sight of the fact, however, that he was arguing for principally that great financial magnate of Canada, Sir William Mackenzie; but he could not come from New York without knowing the reputation of that gentleman in all the financial centres of the United States at least; and to argue that any repudiation of the obligation in bonds put up by his company was going to menace and threaten the financial standing of this Dominion was utterly and wholly absurd. Because I venture to say that there is not a large financier in the whole of New York State but has been importuned by the same outfit to loan every dollar of funds available for some scheme or other put forward by these same magnates, and we know what the history has been all along the line. We can commence at the Gulf of Mexico and go up almost to the North Pole, and we see a trail of financial misadventure along the whole route. The Mexican Light, Heat and Power Company was floated in the city of Toronto; and I was told by a prominent bond house of the enormous number of millions that had gone into that enterprise. It was only a very few years ago that the revolution broke out in Mexico and the whole thing was on the rocks. We come along up and we know perfectly well where the Brazilian enterprise landed. Why it was the grandest financial success of the age. Men in the street, in the midst of the summer heat, were buying the stock which was advancing by leaps and bounds. All of a sudden there was an interlocking directorate there, there was a fusion of interests; and to the amazement of every body the dividend day was passed. Then when we come farther north we have another great enterprise of this great interlocking directorate—the Winnipeg Street Railway. I remember in the city of Toronto, not many years ago, when this stock was at two hundred and thirty-five. There was a delay in paying dividends, and finally that stock also passed its dividend. When an explanation was asked for, the explanation vouchsafed was that although they had a permanent franchise for light, heat and power, the jitneys had knocked them out in the progressive city of Winnipeg.

Mr. JACOBS: The hon. gentleman seems to forget that Sir William Mackenzie was knighted by His Majesty.

Mr. SHEARD: I do not know who was responsible for that, but I am willing, if I am not out of order, to say that it is no credit to Canada that he was so knighted, in my humble judgment. But to keep to what I am saying, that is the amount of fear and menace there is, in the repudiation of bonds to the amount of a million and a half in one of these enterprises. We come up to the larger conception of this great financial mind—the Canadian Northern Railway, the railway from coast to coast, whose contractors were Mackenzie & Mann, and whose owners were the same, but whose ultimate owners, these men knew perfectly well, would be the Dominion of Canada. They knew that the people would be left with the baby on the step, and as the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) said in this House, what a miserable, ill-thrived, almost offensive-smelling baby, it was. Now the tentacles of this corporation have been loosed from the throat of the Dominion, and being thus disengaged for the moment, are going to be wrapped around the neck of every municipality in this country. Make no mistake about it. They know it perfectly well, and when I say "they" I mean the men who are behind this Senate's clause in the proposed Act. The Parliament of 1917 studied this Act, and they introduced such a proviso as is being proposed in the amendment to the present Bill as amended by the Senate. The Bill was sent to the Senate with that proviso but the Senate amended it. The Senate put the joker in the pack and the Bill came back with it, and the intention was for this House to swallow it holus bolus. Oh, it meant much to the interlocking directorates, it meant much to the Mackenzie & Mann interests to get that Act through last session. I came as a young, green member to this House. I thought there was some great power in the independence of Parliament which would uphold and stand for public rights and public interests. The moment I stepped off the train at the station I saw the great financial magnate talking to a crowd. I saw him as I went to put my bag in the Chateau, surrounded by the incoming members, with some of whom he appeared to be on very intimate and friendly terms. I saw his galaxy of legal representatives, whom I knew as coming from Toronto, and many of them I knew personally. They were there from the first day the House opened until the 24th of May, when the House closed. I went home, and they went on the same train. They never let up in the vigilance of their watch. And when the House resumed this year, they were there, and they have been there constantly ever since—and I can name them. They have not been there by ones and twos, they have been there by the dozens—men whose fees would be enormous. They are the men sitting in this gallery to-night listening to these words, men who have been here in the same interests from the first hour this Parliament opened.

Mr. McKENZIE: I would sit in the gallery myself to hear this speech.

Mr. SHEARD: Well, I should hope the hon. member would sit in a different part from that to which my ideas are related just now. The question before the House and the country is: How far is the Parliament of Canada going to stand for public rights of all municipalities? Or is it going to stand for the vested interests which are behind these concerns? The hon. Minister of Public Works has made a strong appeal to the majesty of the law and to the respect which is owing to the Privy Council. I was in the service of the city of Toronto when part of this transaction occurred. The city gave to the Toronto Electric Light Company, which has an underground distribution, a contract to light their streets. That contract was for five years or under, and it gave the company the privilege for that period to put lighting poles on the streets. When the city could make other arrangements they terminated their contract with the company and ordered them to remove their poles. But the company would not obey. So the city of Toronto proceeded through the courts until finally judgment was given in the Privy Council that the company were trespassers, as the hon. member for Kingston has explained. To an ordinary individual, such a judgment would be sufficient. Not so to this company. The Toronto Electric Light Company immediately transferred their assets to the Toronto and Niagara Power Company—whose sensibilities so many of us are defending to-night—and then the Toronto and Niagara Power Company said: "Oh, well, we now own these poles; we have the right to plant them there, and there they will stay." And there they stayed to this day. That is how much the Toronto and Niagara Power Company are prepared to respect a judgment of the Privy Council, set forth by the hon. Minister of Public Works as a thing so to be respected and obeyed.

I do not wish to argue that two wrongs are going to make a right; but I do say that the whole idea—and there is but one idea in it—is to weave into this Railway Act a power for the Mackenzie interests which will give them the right to go into any municipality from the Atlantic to the Pacific and revive any latent charter that may be lingering in the murky pigeon holes of any municipal office and bring it into action as a competitor against any municipal power and lighting scheme, to be operated against such scheme to its detriment, no matter what is the result.

For that reason, Mr. Chairman, I am going to support the amendment as moved by the hon. member for Parkdale. I am going to at least put myself upon the side of those who believe that in voting for that amendment they are supporting the rights of the people. It is not the city of Toronto's battle; the battle affects every municipality in the Dominion of Canada from ocean to ocean. All along from the Niagara Power plant, we have the company's line passing through the city of St. Catherines, the city of Welland, the city of Hamilton, the town of Oakville, the town of Mimico and the city of Toronto —the whole line there already, and we have the possibilities of these competing distributing plants being extended not only in every municipality in Ontario, but in every municipality in the whole Dominion. The vested interests may talk about the Hydro Electric in Ontario, but that undertaking was the outcome of the oppressive measures of the Toronto and Niagara Power Company hitched up with the Toronto Electric Light Company, because they were in the position where they could supply or deny light and power to any firm they pleased; they could supply one factory with power, and the next factory in opposition to them would have to depend upon steam. Undoubtedly the Toronto and Niagara Power Company looked for a permanent market not only in the Toronto Electric Light Company but in the Toronto Street Railway Company—and that is the real milk in the cocoanut, gentlemen. They expect to compel the city of Toronto to renew the franchise for the Toronto Street Railway. And the argument of the hon. Minister of Public Works will hold good when they come back next year or the year afterwards and say, "Here, you gave them a charter under this Act, you discussed it fully, and you made provision for these powers. What is the use of giving them these powers when you are going to permit the city of Toronto to take over and operate their principal customer, the Toronto Street Railway? You must maintain the rights of the Toronto Electric Light Company and its companion concern, the Toronto Street Railway Company, and you must maintain a market in the city of Toronto in perpetuity"—that is practically the language of the Minister of Public Works—in order to make complete the operation and the carrying out of the trinity linked up in that way.

Mr. CARVELL: Did the hon. gentleman understand me to say that I thought Parliament had any power to interfere with the contract between the Toronto and Niagara Power Company and the street railway or the Toronto Electric Light Company? because I want to tell him that I know too much about the constitution of this country to make such a statement. It is not true.

Mr. SHEARD: I understood the Minister of Public Works to say that the whole thing was coupled up in this way; the producing of power on the banks of the Niagara river, the transmission of that power, and its distribution to the Toronto Electric Light Company and the street railway company.

Mr. CARVELL: Certainly I said that.

Mr. SHEARD: Very well; and that one part of the trinity was useless without the others.

Mr. CARVELL: I said that.

Mr. SHEARD: Now, as one of the great customers, the Street Railway Company is the remaining end of the circle, the selling end. If that is essential to the maintenance and operation as a going concern of the Toronto and Niagara Power Company, is it not a fair inference that the suggestion is that they shall still continue to draw their power from that source?

Mr. CARVELL: No; because this Parliament has absolutely no jurisdiction over the matter whatever.

Mr. SHEARD: That is the way the hon. minister put it as justification for giving them this power, as I understood him.

Mr. TWEEDIE: Mr. Chairman, I do not propose to detain the House at any great length at this hour. From the trend of the discussion one might gather the impression that the city of Toronto was the only municipality in the Dominion interested in this matter. But I can assure the House that I have no particular interest in the city of Toronto. However, I am interested generally in the municipalities throughout the Dominion of Canada. The question at issue is that of dealing with the rights of these municipalities, the jurisdiction which they exercise over their streets, and the power of the Dominion of Canada to invade those rights. It seems to me that we should examine first the attitude of the Federal Government towards municipalities so far as transmission companies are concerned. That has been referred to several times to-night, but I ask the patience of the Committee while I refer to it again in order that we may see exactly what the stand of the Government has been on this question in the past.

There is no doubt that the legislation, from the earliest days down, admitted that the jurisdiction over the streets rested in some body other than the Dominion Government, whether the municipality, the province, or, as in the case of Ontario, the Hydro-Electric Commission. When that is conceded we must look at the attitude of the Dominion Government in its legislation dealing with this question. About the first clause of this kind we find is in an Act passed in 1899. I will read the clause:

> When any company has power by any Act of the Parliament of Canada to construct and maintain lines of telegraph or telephone or lines for the conveyance of light, heat, power or electricity, such company may with the consent of the municipal council or other authority having jurisdiction over any highway, square or other public place, enter thereon for the purpose of exercising the said power, and as often as the company thinks proper may break up or open any highway, etc.

In that year they were required, whether they were corporations for the transmission of power or corporations for the sale and distribution of power in any municipality, to obtain the consent of the municipal council or other authority. That continued to be the law until 1903. The member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) pointed out that the law at that time resolved itself into two branches, one governing the question of the transmission of power and the other governing the question of sale. The transmission of power was subject to the consent of the municipality, and if they refused, to the consent of the Board of Railway Commissioners. But when it came to the question of the sale of power, this Parliament was very jealous of the rights of municipalities and said that no company could go in unless they obtained the consent of the municipality by by-law, which is the most formal manner of obtaining that consent. That provision was subsequently re-enacted and continued down to 1917, when the Railway Act was revised. Now, the intention of Parliament is absolutely clear: That the rights of the municipalities are sacred and should not be encroached upon by any corporation without the consent of the municipality by by-law. In 1902 this company was incorporated. That an error was made is evident from the discussion which took place at that time. I quote from the remarks of Mr. Pringle:—

> I understand that it means just what it expresses. All companies have to obtain the consent of a municipality before passing through it.

There is not the slightest thing in the discussion which took place on that occasion to show that the intention of Parliament was to grant to this corporation any greater rights or any greater benefits than could be enjoyed by any other corporation in Canada. When they seek to establish that Parliament intended to give them greater rights I submit that the burden of proof is on them to show clearly that that was the intention of Parliament. So far as the legislation of this House was concerned, it remained practically in that position until 1917, when the Railway Act was revised by a special committee, passed by the House of Commons and sent to the Senate.

I take issue with the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Carvell), who cast some reflection on the members of Parliament who saw fit to say that these rights should be restored to municipalities. I have the greatest respect for his honour, his integrity and his judgment; I believe that he is absolutely sincere when he says that these rights should not be interfered with. But I assure the hon. gentleman that while I have that high respect for him and that high estimate of him, I have just as great a respect for myself and just as high an estimate of myself and for my judgment and my action in voting in support of the amendment.

Hon. gentlemen talk about vested rights. Well, put it on the ground of vested rights, if you will, for the sake of argument. We will eliminate all question of dispute between the city of Toronto, the Toronto and Niagara Power Company and the Hydro-Electric. Under the Act the vested rights may be in the Toronto and Niagara Power Company, but the first vested rights in regard to the streets of these municipalities was either in the province or the municipality, or, in Ontario, in the Hydro-Electric Commission. I ask the minister, does he stand here and say that it is dishonourable for Parliament to restore to municipalities rights which were deliberately taken from them without their knowledge, without their consent, without any consultation with them? When that Act was passed no doubt Parliament believed that they could exercise jurisdiction if any mistake was made. But I stand broadly on the principle that when the conflict comes between the eight million people in Canada and the Toronto and Niagara Power Company, if there must be sacrifice on the part of either, that sacrifice must be on the part of the corporation, not of the people who own and control the streets in the municipalities of this country.

But, Mr. Chairman, when we put it on that narrow ground of vested rights, I do not believe that we are placing it upon the ground upon which it should be placed. When we talk of vested rights, about legislating away the rights this corporation got under the Act of 1902, we are overlooking the fundamental principle which should govern our action in this connection. It is not a matter of depriving a company of vested rights; it is not a matter of taking anything away from them. It is a matter of putting them in the class of public utilities in which all these transmission companies must come; and it is then for us to say whether as a Parliament we can exercise jurisdiction by controlling them. It is simply a question of control over a public utility corporation. Those people who argue that these contracts are very sacred must realize that during the last fifteen or twenty years one of the objects of Federal legislation has been to exercise control over public utilities and common carriers. Will any hon. gentlman in this Committee argue that because a railway company received a charter some years ago before any Railway Act was in force, we must not apply the Railway Act to that corporation? It is true that had the Act not been put in force the company might have had the privilege of charging double or treble the rates which are at present fixed by law. But we realized that these corporations, these utilities, are servants of the public, and notwithstanding any great concessions which they may have received in their original Act of incorporation they must be bound by the general laws of the country even though those laws may cut down the rates which they may charge for transportation, even though they may cut down the rates of a telephone company, or telegraph charges, which have already been cut down. We must realize that Parliament is supreme, and that when an injustice is being done to the public by these corporations in the legal exercise of their rights, Parliament must step in and the public must be protected. All we are asking in this case is simply that the Dominion Parliament shall exercise its proper functions, that it shall perform its duty to the public and step in so far as this public utility is concerned, just as it proposes to step in under the other clauses of the Act. All we ask is that Parliament shall say to this company: "Notwithstanding you received your charter in 1902, you must be subject to the general laws of this country. We are going to control your rights to enter streets, but we are not going to take away your rights to sell and distribute power throughout the province of Ontario or the Dominion of Canada." Is there anything in this amendment which takes away from the company any specific rights which were granted to them under their charter? Is there even any suggestion of that in this amendment? Was there any suggestion of it in the Bill which was passed in 1917? I submit that the question to be answered by every man in this Committee, either on one alternative or the other, is, in the first place: Must the vested rights of the municipalities give way to the vested rights of private corporations which have been procured through error or misunderstanding? On the other alternative, you must ask yourself the question: Are we going to except one corporation in this country from control which can be justly exercised over it by Parliament? I think there is not a man in this House who asks himself that question honestly and conscientiously who can do otherwise than come to the conclusion that Parliament is supreme, and that this corporation must submit to the control of Parliament, no matter what the ultimate outcome may be, so long as the public interests are served.

The Minister of Public Works said what a bad lot of people we would be in this House if we passed this amendment, but on looking over the report of the special committee that was appointed in 1917 to consolidate and amend the Railway Act, I find that it was composed as follows: Messieurs Ames (Sir Herbert), Armstrong (Lambton), Bennett (Calgary), Blain, Carvell, Cochrane, Cromwell, Donaldson, Graham, Green, Lapointe (Kamouraska), Lemieux, Macdonell, Meighen, Nesbitt, Oliver, Pugsley, Rainville, Sinclair and Turriff. Was that committee dishonourable? Did they do anything to damage the credit of the Dominion of Canada? Were they disloyal to the trust which was reposed in them by the people when they passed the amendment which was submitted to this House and later went up to the Senate? Was the House of Commons in 1917, when it passed the section which we ask to have inserted in this Bill, dishonourable? I think that they could hold their heads as high, so far as business integrity and business morality is concerned, as this or any other Parliament in the history of Canada.

It is complained that we may have difficulty in getting this Bill through this session unless we very materially consent to the amendment of the Senate. But I submit this proposition: The House of Commons is the elective body representing the people of the Dominion of Canada; the Senate is the body which has been appointed for life; and when it comes to a question of their judging on the morality of the House of Commons, I must say that I think the morality of the House of Commons will compare favourably with theirs. If legislation is being impeded in this coun try, it is not by the House of Commons, but by the autocratic body of the Senate which is not responsible to anybody and which looks better after the interests of private corporations than of the people whom we are elected to represent. I have very strong feelings upon this subject. Those men who passed that Act in 1917 had free and full discussion on it. They realized their duties and their obligations. Are we to pass judgment on them and say "You did something which was immoral so far as business obligations are concerned and you must accept the reprimand which has been delivered to you by the Senate of Canada"? So far as I am concerned I do not care to accept any reprimand which may have been handed by the Senate to the last Parliament. If we pass this amendment, I submit, it is the duty of the Senate to accept the Bill as we pass it, and if they do not accept it, then, I submit, it is the duty of the Government to bring down some restrictive legislation so that the will of the people cannot be thwarted by a body which is not responsible to the people.

Mr. PARDEE: I do not intend at this late hour to go into the legal aspects of the case now before the Committee, as that has already been done very ably by several speakers who have preceded me. There is one thing I should like to say, however, and which I think this Committee ought to keep in mind all the time, and that is with respect to the argument that has been presented in favour of vested rights. We have heard it declaimed both in the Special Committee and in this House time and again that there were certain vested rights in regard to the bondholder. That may be very true; there are certain vested rights there. But I submit that although the bondholders may have vested rights, the first and only thing that we, as representatives of the people, ought to consider are the vested rights of the people. There has been much sympathy expressed for the bondholder. He has been held up time and again as having put his money into this venture, and now, forsooth, because certain things may happen in a legislative way, he may not get back his money. As far as the hondholder is concerned, he has a right to be looked after by this Committee and by this House, if he has not already looked after himself, but the peculiar circumstances of this case must all be taken into consideration.

We have here four companies, all mixed up. They are under different names and under different heads, but, nevertheless, these four companies are under one control. There is not one of them that is not subservient to one set of men. True it is, the Toronto and Niagara Power Company were pioneers, but from what I gathered in the Committee and here, that pioneer work amounted to this: The Toronto and Niagara Power Company issued $1,500,000 worth of bonds, and $700,000 worth of stock, and there they stopped; that was the end of it, so far as the issuing of stock and bonds under that charter was concerned. That charter was granted by this House under certain very exceptional conditions, contions, I believe, which have never obtained in this or any other House before. The Minister of Railways has asked what we would do if the Canadian Pacific or some other company was in the same situation. In answer to that argument, I would say that nobody can read the debate that took place upon the granting of this charter and come to any other conclusion but this:

These men left this House knowing and being absolutely satisfied in their own minds that they were coming under the Railway Act and had no greater rights than that Act gave them. Under these circumstances, what happened? They went on and sold $1,500,000 bonds, and issued $700,000 worth of stock. Some one then, looking over the Act, lawyer-like, I will admit, said there is a flaw; here is a chance where we may go on and carry out our undertaking; that undertaking may be carried out irrespective of the clauses of the Railway Act and consequently irrespective of the rights of the municipalities. The case was taken to the lower court and decided in favour of the company, then to the Court of Appeal who upset the judgment of the lower court. They took it to the Privy Council and again the judgment of the lower court was upheld. The Privy Council held that the company had the right to go on and across the streets of the municipalities. It appears to me to be a most significant thing that during the course of the various states of litigation that took place in the lower court, in the Court of Appeal and in the Privy Council, bonds were sold.

We have been told by the Minister of Public Works that they were sold to the extent of thirty or forty million dollars. Certain it is though, by all the evidence that could be adduced before that committee, that there were certain bonds issued but never sold until after certain decisions were given. I will admit that the bonds were sold, but under what conditions were they sold? They were sold under these conditions—and this is where I say the bondholder is not entitled to one jot or tittle of sympathy. What did he do? No bondholder or set of bondholders will take up several million dollars' worth of bonds without going to the bottom of the whole affair and ascertaining whereon the authority of the company to issue the bonds rests. Very properly they found out, and what did the bondholders say? This conversation occurred as surely as the night follows the day. They said: Show us your charter; show us the proceedings upon which your charter was founded. And they did. They knew of the litigation and knew that there was a doubt whether or not they had the right to exercise the rights that the court upheld. They recognized the fact, as we do here to-night, that the rights given to this company were purely a piece of judicial legislation which has always taken place, and which judicial legislation is nine times out of ten not in the minds of those who pass it. They said: We will take your bonds; but they did not take them without the guarantee of the four companies. They said: We will take these bonds provided the four companies—the Electrical Development Company, the Toronto Street Railway, the Toronto and Niagara Power Company and the Toronto Electric Light Company—guarantee them. And they did. Are the bondholders hurt? The hon. Minister of Public Works said: If you pass this legislation to right a wrong that was never intended by this Parliament these bonds will not be worth fifty cents in the dollar. With the guarantee that these bondholders hold, they are worth dollar for dollar, and the company and the bondholders know it right well. Therefore I think I might ask in all fairness, why should we by our vote give to this company the right to walk into any municipality in the Dominion and say: We may go here, there and everywhere, and the wishes or the rights of this municipality amount to absolutely nothing as against the powers that Parliament gave to us inadvertently, but which we intend to take advantage of. I say, Sir, that if you have not local autonomy in your Dominion, provincial and municipal affairs, and if we here, the people of the Dominion of Canada in our various spheres, are not allowed to exercise that autonomy in the way that seems best to us as communities, then the sooner we make up our minds to hand over the Dominion of Canada to companies who may desire to do as they please with us without any reference whatever to the will of the people, the better. It is a plain statement of facts. There has been much camouflage, and a great many red herrings have been drawn across the trail, but the matter is plain. And when I listened to the Hon. James Beck the other day in this Chamber I thought that as a speech, and in touching only the high spots, it was an absolute classic. He stood before the members of that committee and I will admit he played upon their feelings, and he played upon mine. But the one burden of that speech, and the sole tune of that song was: Take care, oh do take care of the down-trodden bondholder. There is no down-trodden bondholder, and there is no repudiation of the contract of this Parliament in the slightest degree. That charter was granted on a distinct understanding, the persons who got it well knowing that their powers were confined within certain terms. They went on and completed their works, and as my hon. friend from Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) so well said, they were supplying only two customers, and knew that the lives of those two customers were limited. Why, as prudent business men, did they not establish a sinking fund? They did not do so, but traded upon a judicial interpretation of statutes never intended, and consequently find themselves in the cul de sac in which they are to-day. So far as I am personally concerned, I am here representing the people and not the corporations, and I believe that this is one of the times when the House of Commons should stand absolutely by the rights of the people without fear or favour.

Mr. BRISTOL: I do not purpose to speak at any great length on this matter because I think it is unnecessary, but I think it would be well if we got before us clearly what it is that the hon. member for Parkdale asks us to vote upon. It seems to me to be a very simple matter, and I really do not see why it should call for so much argument. The proposition of the hon. member for Parkdale is this: Are you going to put all the electric power companies of Canada under one class of legislation, or are you going to leave one to run at large?

That is the proposition clearly and concisely put. In the interests of the municipalities and of the people of the country, what ever may have been the rights given in 1902 to the Toronto and Niagara Power Company the time has come when there should be one class of legislation governing all companies of this kind. Section 374 provides for electric companies in this country to have through transmission lines for power and transmission. In the case of refusal by the municipality to allow transmission through the municipality, there is provision for application to the Railway Board, and in the case of distribution they must apply to the municipality, and if the municipality refuses, the matter there ends. That is the legislation which it is proposed to apply to all companies at present in existence. It has been suggested by my hon. friend from Vancouver, that there may be other companies in the same line as the Toronto and Niagara Power Company. What I most strongly urge is this:

If there are any such—which I do not believe, because this matter has been under discussion by Parliament for practically three years and it has received a great deal of newspaper notoriety—and if there are any others, we would have heard of them. But assuming that there are, is that not all the more reason for making this legislation apply to every company in this country and not allowing these companies at large to exercise their rights when and wherever they may desire as against the rights of the municipalities? It is suggested that this is not the proper place to deal with this matter but somebody should take it upon himself to apply to Parliament to ask to have the Toronto and Niagara Power Company's charter amended at some other time and on some other occasion. In view of the fact that the Toronto and Niagara Power Company took their charter with, what every member of this House admits, the full knowledge and belief that the Railway Act of that day applied to the charter, we are doing them no harm now, they having been allowed to run free for a few years, and having got rights that they never expected, by putting them under the same legislation as every other power company in this country.

It is suggested by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) that the province of Ontario has passed improper legislation in that regard because it does not allow municipalities to pass bylaws without the consent of the Lieutenant Governor in Council. It does not seen to me it is the duty of this House to sit in review on the legislation of the province of Ontario. That is a matter for the people of Ontario to deal with just as it is a matter for the people of Quebec or for any of the other provinces to deal with matters that come within their jurisdiction. We are not here as a court of review to sit in judgment upon the province of Ontario or any other province but we are here to pass legislation in the interest of the people of Canada and we should leave them to fight out their own provincial rights in their own provinces.

The only other matter that has been raised for our consideration is the question of the rights of bondholders. I fancy that the picture of two of our ministers weeping over the rights of these bondholders will go down in history because I do not believe that the rights of the bondholders will be affected very much. The suggestion made by Mr. Beck was that in so far as he knew no bondholder would be affected. I do not believe there is one particle of doubt that these bonds are all amply secured. We are told that this company has a 250,000 horse-power development at Niagara Falls. We are told that they were the pioneers in electrical development and we are asked to sympathize with their pioneer efforts. The pioneers in the development of electrical power, and the people who spent large sums of money, were the Niagara Falls Power Company. They were at it for ten years on the American side and they spent millions in perfecting the machinery which enabled Niagara's power to be chained up. The next power company was the Ontario Power Company, an American concern. The Toronto Niagara Power Company were the third set of people to go into that line of business and when they began the development of electrical power it was fairly well known and understood. But there was something that was not known in 1902 and that was the extent to which electricity was going to be developed and the vital importance that it was going to be to the people. We had very scant knowledge as to the protection that should be given to the people in connection with a matter of that kind. Every effort was made at that time that reasonably could be made, both by the late Mr. Clarke and Mr. (now Sir Edmund) Osler, to see that proper protection was given to the municipalities. As my hon. friends who support the amendment have said, it is perfectly and obviously clear that the gentlemen who got this charter, and who are here to-night, knew perfectly well that they received that charter subject to the rights of municipalities in connection with their own interests.

Is Parliament supreme in matters of this kind? What are the rights of franchise holders as compared with the rights of the people? A franchise is merely a part of a public right given by Parliament to certain people to administer. It may be changed and altered. It is not a vested right; it is simply a permission to certain people to exercise definite public powers that belong to Parliament and to that extent these powers must be absolutely subject to the legislative control of Parliament. I am satisfied that hon. members will find that when they go back home to their constituents in the different municipalities, towns and cities, they will find it hard to explain why they voted for alleged vested rights and financial interests as against the rights and interests of the municipalities of their own constituents.

Mr. HOCKEN: Mr. Chairman, this question has been so fully, ably and comprehensively dealt with from the legal standpoint by the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) and others that I do not feel called upon to say very much. I have not very much sympathy with the bondholders. They are a class of people who, as was said by the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Pardee) are well able to take care of themselves, and in this case they evidently did. What has impressed me is that there is not a man here to-night who will say that the legislation which gave this company the powers it enjoys is legislation that would be adopted at the present time. This House made a very serious mistake in 1902 and the effect of that mistake is to deprive the city of Toronto, and all the municipalities concerned, of the control of their streets. That was recognized at the time this legislation was before the House. I remember very distinctly that the Canadian union of municipalities, representing every municipality from the Atlantic to the Pacific, sent their representatives down here to voice their opposition to the measure. They did everything in their power at that time to resist the attempt of this company to get the rights which they sought. In addition to all that has been quoted as to the understanding of Parliament in regard to the application of the general Railway Act to this company, I am informed that the chairman of the Railway Committee of that day, Mr. Mahlon Cowan, wrote a letter to one of the mayors of a western town declaring that the company that was being chartered would come under the general Act. That being the case and the first offence being to deprive the municipalities of their vested rights, that initial fault ought to be corrected by this House to-night. The amendment proposed by my hon. friend from Parkdale makes that correction and I submit that this Committee ought to adopt that amendment and put all the electrical companies in the same position in regard to the Act.

Mr. BOYS: Mr. Chairman, were it not for the fact that I was a member of the Select Committee I would not at this late hour, and in this sweltering heat, venture to take up any more of the time of this Committee. But I should like, before casting my vote on the amendment of the hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) to state the position I took in the committee. I could not see my way clear to vote for the Senate amendment because I did not think that amendment afforded the protection or regulation which the municipalities were entitled to. It provides for a remedy in connection with oppression or bad faith but that is more or less of a joker. I do not think that any case of oppression or bad faith could be cited for which a remedy could not be found in the courts without any special legislation. It simply means that this company can go upon the streets of any municipality so long as they do not obstruct private ways or interfere with the course of traffic or do something extreme.

For that reason I could not support it. On the other hand I felt compelled to vote against the amendment moved in committee by the member for Parkdale because I could not see my way clear, by adopting that amendment, to abrogate the powers given to this company in 1902 by the statute, chapter 107, of that year. I notice that last week that position was supported to some extent by a well known publication in the city of Toronto. The Toronto Saturday Night of May 31, places my position in that regard better than I could do it myself. It says:

> The recent attempt to have the Railway Act so amended that it would, in effect, have made the charter of the Toronto and Niagara Power Company valueless, and would, at the same time, have betrayed the investors who, in good faith, placed their money in this undertaking, met with its just deserts, at the hands of a Committee of the House of Commons. Such attempts at confiscatory legislation are not being overlooked in England, whose moneyed men furnished so much of the capital which went to build up just such enterprises in Canada.

It did seem to me that while the charter of this company should not be taken away, that during the lapse of years some regulation might well be provided by the committee, and I moved in the committee an amendment which accords in many respects with the suggestion made by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) and in some respects with the amendment suggested by the Minister of Railways. What I suggested was this, and I must ask the committee to bear with me while we take a glance at the Act as it reaches the House and see what it provides for. Under subsection 2 of section 374, we find:

> The company shall not, except as in this section provided, acquire, construct, maintain or operate any works, machinery, plant, line, pole, tunnel, conduit or other device upon, along, across, or under any highway, square or other public place within the limits of any city, town, village or township, without the consent of the municipality.

That is essential where they want to construct and maintain a transmission line. Subsection 3 then goes on to provide that if that consent cannot be obtained, or cannot be obtained on terms satisfactory to the company, they shall then apply to the Board of Railway Commissioners. Subsection 4 provides that in the case of distribution systems the consent of the municipality must be obtained, and if that consent cannot be obtained nothing further can be done. Now, what I thought would be reasonable would be something along this line, and I do not propose at this moment to move it. I desire that those supporting the amendment of the member for Parkdale should have every opportunity of voting upon that, and upon that alone, so far as I am concerned, and if, perchance, that amendment is defeated it is my intention to move this. I would provide in subsection 2 that the consent of the municipality be first required. If it cannot be got then subsection 3 would read as follows: —

> If the company cannot obtain such consent or cannot obtain such consent otherwise than subject to conditions not acceptable to the company, the company may apply to the Board for leave to exercise its powers upon such highway, square or public place.

Now, this is the new part.

> And upon such application the Board may refuse or grant the same in whole or in part and upon such terms and conditions as the Board may see proper.

I would then amend subsection 5 as it comes to us from the Senate as follows:—

> Any specific powers inconsistent with the provisions of this section and conferred on any company by any special or other Act or authority of the Parliament of Canada, or of any province, shall not be affected by the provisions of the last preceding subsection 4; but any such company shall hereafter be governed by the provisions of subsection 2 and 3 of this section.

In other words, applying it to the company that we have been discussing, and taking the case of Toronto—not that I am arguing for a moment that this is a question which only affects Toronto, although I think it mainly affects that city—the company, if this amendment carried, would have to go to the city of Toronto and ask for consent. If the consent is refused they would then go to the board, which could refuse the application if they saw fit, or grant it upon such terms and conditions as they thought proper. I am not overlooking what the Minister of Public Works has stated. He quoted from the Act respecting corporations operating certain public utilities. Let me read the definition of a " public utility " as mentioned in that Act. Subsection 2 declares:—

> " Public utility " shall mean and include a water works, gas works, electric heat, light power works, telegraph and telephone lines, railways however, operated, street railways and works for the transmission of gas, oil, water, or electrical power or energy, or any similar works supplying the general public with necessaries or conveniences.

Now subsection 4 of the same Act says:

> Notwithstanding anything in any Act contained a municipal corporation shall not hereafter enter into any agreement with any such company or pass any by-law in relation to any Public Utility which has been declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada, or which is not within the legislative control of Ontario, until the Lieutenant-Governor in Council has approved of such agreement or by-law, and every agreement entered into and by-law passed in violation of this section shall be utterly void and of no effect.

As I understand the minister, he argued that under that if we obtained consent either by agreement or by-law it would be void. If that argument is sound, I think we would then have to amend other provisions of this Railway Act of ours which have already received consent. If we turn to section 373, which deals with telegraph and telephone lines, both of which are within the definition of public utilities, as I read it from subsection 2 of the Ontario Act, we find these clauses. Subsection 2:

> Notwithstanding anything in any Act of the Parliament of Canada or of the legislature of any province, or any power or authority heretofore or hereafter conferred thereby or derived therefrom, no telegraph or telephone line, within the legislative authority of the Parliament of Canada, shall, except as hereinafter in this section provided, be constructed, operated or maintained by any company upon, along, or across any highway, square or other public place, without the consent of the municipality having jurisdiction over such highway, square, or public place.

Subsection 3 then provides, exactly as I do in my proposed amendment, that if that consent is withheld the Railway Board shall then decide the terms upon which the permission shall be granted. Now, if the Act, known as the Act Respecting Corporations Operating Certain Public Utilities, makes invalid a by-law or an agreement respecting this power company, it will also make it invalid respecting tele-

12 p.m. graph and telephone companies; yet our Act as drafted at the present time distinctly provides for obtaining the consent of the municipality in that very manner, so if it is good in the one case it ought to be good in the other. As far as I am concerned, I do not think that the Ontario statute would stand in the way. If this company had not a franchise at the present time I quite appreciate that no by-law or agreement made by a municipality could give any company the right to use those streets for a period of more than one year, as I understand the law of Ontario, or for more than five years upon a vote of the people without, at all events, it having the sanction of either an Act of the legislature or the approval of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council. But if we say in our Act of this company, which now has the right to use the streets of municipalities: "You must first ask consent, and if you fail to get that consent then go to the Railway Board," surely we can, if we wish, define the manner in which that consent is to be obtained; and so long as it is obtained in accordance with our legislation it seems to me it makes very little difference what the province of Ontario does in that connection. So I think that by an amendment of this kind the company is reasonably protected and so is the municipality.

For my part, I cannot bring myself to think that it is proper, notwithstanding all that has been said, that when this charter has been granted and when over $30,000,000 have been spent in the undertaking—the statement has never been challenged, it was made over and over again in the select committee and nobody challenged it, and I think we may fairly say that it is certain there is in this undertaking over $30,000,000 —that we should jeopardize, or, as has been suggested by the editor of Saturday Night, confiscate that property. I cannot bring myself to do that; at all events not if there is any reasonable way of protecting the municipality and at the same time the company.

Reference has been made to bondholders, and to the million and a half dollars' worth of bonds. It would seem to me that it was hardly necessary to argue that proposition. It is said that this particular company issued bonds to the extent of only $1,500,000. But surely when we understand that it forms an important part of three distinct systems, namely, the generating plant at the Falls, the transmission plant, and the distribution plant, we must realize that to take any one of those away would render the balance worthless. If you say to this company or to any other company, "You cannot enter any municipality without consent, which consent may be withheld without any reason whatever," you surely make useless the whole undertaking. And that is what we are asked to do.

If I was now being called upon to cast a vote as to whether or not I would support a charter such as was granted in 1902, it goes without saying that I would not think of doing so. But the position to-day is very different from the position then. It was only in 1899 that the idea of obtaining consent of the municipalities was first determined upon by Parliament, and the very idea of obtaining consent was fresh in the minds of the members of Parliament in 1902. Therefore if it was thought proper to make this company get the consent of every municipality before proceeding with its undertaking, surely Parliament would have said so in plain English. It seems to me we are casting a serious reflection upon the members of Parliament of 1902 when we quietly sit down to amend their work, because from a word or two that was dropped from three of four members we suggest the other members did not know what they were doing. In 1899 that policy of consent was adopted, it was everybody's mind, and there was no such provision put in the Special Act. In 1903 in the consolidation it was again inserted, but there was no saving clause put in the legislation then, and in the year after this charter went through, and they knew of that mistake, why do we not find in the consolidation some saving clause indicating that so far as this company was concerned the rights obtained by this charter—which I admit is an omnibus, wide open, perpetual charter—were granted under misapprehension? Why did we not on the first opportunity the year after take occasion to correct the mistake made? It was not done, it was not dealt with in any subsequent consolidations and amendments. It is said that as a matter of fact this was raised as far back as 1912, and that because of the war and of the fact that the Railway Bill did not go through in 1917, the matter has been dragging along ever since. But there is no doubt that this very charter was used in the floatation of some $9,000,000 worth of bonds—at all events, that is the uncontradicted evidence before the Committee—after the decision of the Privy Council, and how any one can argue or suggest that a bondholder would then be purchasing bonds with any doubt as to the position of the company is beyond my comprehension. We had the court of last resort outlining the powers of that company, and there was no chance of varying those powers unless Parliament itself was to abrogate what it did in 1902. Consequently on the strength of that charter $9,000,000 worth further bonds were sold. Are we to abrogate those rights entirely? Surely not.

The suggestion I have to make later, if this amendment is defeated, it seems to me would protect the company and the municipalities; and I do not think that any municipalities outside, we will say, two or three hundred miles of the Niagara plant need have any fear of invasion by this company so far as their streets are concerned. Without a shadow of doubt the company was originally incorporated for the purpose of generating and transmitting electricity from Niagara to Toronto. I have not much doubt that it was formed for the purpose of supplying current to the street railway and the electric light company, which was a convenient way of disposing of the current, much more so than setting up their own poles.

If the company wanted to go along a street where there were already telephone poles, street railway poles, and hydro poles, the board could say to them, "No, if you wish to tap the locality that is reached by this street you must go up to a further cross street where there are no poles and find a way there." In that way I think we would do away with the greatest evil, the placing along the street of endless poles.

Mr. MORPHY: Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the indulgence of the House for a few moments to put on record something that I do not think has been made very clear in connection with the charter under discussion and the judgment of the Privy Council. Lawyers are probably prone to take a stronger view of the decisions of the higher courts than laymen. In this case I am going to address the Committee upon the amendments that are before the House and to point out that in the first place on the 24th of July, 1912, this case came before the Privy Council. There were present at the hearing the Lord Chancellor, Lord McNaughton, Lord Dunedin, Lord Atkinson, and Sir Charles Fitzpatrick. Judgment was given after the court had considered Chancellor Boyd's decision and the decision of the Court of Appeal of Ontario reversing the Chancellor. The most salient paragraph in the judgment is that dealing with the charter under discussion:

> The Act shows that the Parliament of Canada treated the company,—the works of which were expressly declared to be for the general advantage of Canada, and so brought within section 91 of the British North America Act,—as proper to be entrusted with freedom to interfere with municipal and private rights. For this there may well have been on the balance of advantages good reason, the purpose of the company being to bring electric power from Niagara Falls to parts of Canada, to reach which its lines would have to pass through a series of municipal areas. To make its power of entry subject to the veto of each municipality might mean failure to achieve its purpose. It is therefore not suprising that a pioneer company such as this should have been given large powers.

It is stated authoritatively that this company with its auxiliary companies, the Electrictal Development Company and the Toronto Power Company, have invested $34,000,000 and upwards in the joint enterprise founded upon the powers given in this charter, and that some $9,000,000 was raised by sales of bonds to investors in England, France, Canada and the United States after the judgment of the Privy Council was delivered. The presumption, therefore, Mr. Chairman, is irrebuttable and conclusive that the men who bought those bonds would have put before them the judgment delivered by the Privy Council, for they would seek to know the rights and powers of the company issuing the bonds, and it goes without saying that they would be told, and would let their money go upon the express knowledge, that the highest court in the realm had not only recognized but confirmed the rights of this company and of the auxiliary companies which were attacked. Naturally investors with that full knowledge before them would invest their money in the company's bonds.

The hon. member for Parkdale has brought in a resolution by way of amendment that would, to my mind, as has been stated by others, amount to confiscation of practically fifty per cent at least of the value of this company's assets.

The bonds to that extent would suffer. When we are settling the rights and powers and privileges of this company, I cannot, as a member of this House, having regard to the judgment of the Chancellor of Ontario and of the Privy Council of England, lightly ignore a position of that kind and vote for the confiscation of the money of any body, whether he lives in Canada, England, United States, or France. I am not sure that this House has been serious enough in viewing this question. I might quote in addition to what the member for South Simcoe (Mr. Boys) quoted, from an article published in Toronto quoting the London Saturday Review:

> The recent attempt to have the Railway Act so amended that it would, in effect, have made the charter of the Toronto and Niagara Power Company valueless, and would, at the same time, have betrayed the investors who, in good faith, placed their money in this undertaking, met with its just deserts at the hands of a Committee of the House of Commons. Such attempts at confiscatory legislation are not being overlooked in England, whose moneyed men furnished so much of the capital which went to build up just such enterprises in Canada. For instance, a recent issue of the London Saturday Review had this to say:
> "Canadian and Australian Governments have taken to an ugly and dishonest trick of recent years, which, unless abandoned, will effectually cut off the inflow of British capital. It is this. A syndicate or company of shareholders, as a rule British, are given powers by the local legislature to build and equip some great undertaking, such as a railway, or an electrical power plant. When it has been completed and found to be running at a profit, the Colonial Legislature arms the State with powers to run a rival undertaking, which, owing to Government patronage ruins the private concern. This is practically what the Government of Western Australia has done to the Midland Railway. This is apparently what the Government of Ontario is trying to do to the Electric Development Company of Ontario, which has brought an action against the Attorney-General and the Hydro-Electric Power Commission of Ontario. The Lieutenant-Governor of Ontario has done his best to defeat the Development Company by a legal technicality, which the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has very properly disallowed."

Let me ask, is there any truth in what the Privy Council said? Was this Toronto and Niagara Power Company a pioneer? The member for South Toronto (Mr. Sheard) says they were not. In return, I assert that no company established on the United States side of the Niagara Falls had transmitted electricity any distance beyond the city of Buffalo—a matter of far less than half a hundred miles. At that time the electrical experts of the world were in doubt as to the possibility of the commercial transport of electricity at a profit. Nikola Tesla said one thing and Edison said another. This company had the courage and the nerve which made the Privy Council say it was a pioneer; therefore, it got wide powers. I freely concur in what has been stated here, that on the floor of this House there was a discussion as to whether or not the powers were so wide. But the company interpreted its own statute; the company's solicitors undertook at a certain stage to say what those powers were. Having taken the Act and studied it and found out what their powers were, they, as they had the right to do, went on and issued $9,000,000 worth more bonds. Why, it is said that when this company first got into Toronto, the city was ablaze with glory and joy because a real, splendid new enterprise had been brought to their door and they were going to be flooded with electric light. They were pleased with it and they continued to be pleased with it for many years. Not until the Hydro-Electric, a provincial utility, came into the field, was any objection raised or antipathy shown to this particular company. Now, I am rather inclined to view the Hydro-Electric Commission as one of the greatest public utilities that Ontario has. So much do I think of it that I am inclined to belittle the arguments of hon. gentlemen who fear the competition of this company against the Hydro Electric, which has the public purse, the public pulse and the public generally behind it; which is carrying on business in Ontario not for profit, but for the benefit of the people. When men speak of this small company fighting its way on its own money—borrowed, it is true, most of it—against one of the greatest provinces in this Dominion, with its purse outpouring to the splendid Hydro Electric utility, I say it is rather stretching an argument to assert that the public right is being interfered with. I do not believe that any public right is going to be hurt by this company. The Hydro Electric is in nearly every part of western Ontario to-day; there is no need of another company coming in. In the course of time, when the Hydro Electric is fully developed, it can take up a further field in eastern Ontario. I do not see why they cannot compete with an overflowing purse behind them.

Let it be remembered just here that the Hydro, in spite of all its good and of all its usefulness to the public, has never yet developed a single horsepower; it has bought its power from companies like this, and others. It is not a pioneer, and I decline to accept the argument that to support the law as found by the Chancellor of Ontario and the Privy Council in England is plain treason to the Hydro Electric Commission and to the people of Ontario. I do not believe that the people of Ontario will accept such an argument. They are as fair and as broad-spirited and as equitable and as manly as any people in the Dominion. I do not think that their view is so narrow and restricted as the view represented by some arguments that have been offered here to-day. The Hydro has a splendid body of engineers to regulate it, and they are taking up large developments. It cost $15,000,000 to develop Chippewa creek, I hear a whisper, "$30,000,000"; be careful that it is not $50,000,000. In any case, they are prepared to go into the field, and that any Act of this Parliament should be passed that would operate as confiscation is to say the least, unreasonable. No sensible man can deny that there would be a loss. In two years the Toronto Electric Railway Company goes over to the city of Toronto, and they will use Hydro-Electric, provincial power. There is 40,000 horse-power gone at one swoop. It may be that there are worse things in the world than a little competition, even for a publicly-owned utility. Every one in the country is not buoyed up with the assurance of the final and ultimate success of our National railways under federal ownership, or of Hydro-Electric under provincial ownership. We all hope they will succeed, for the interest and the benefit of the people, but no man knows. Consequently, to put our eggs all in one basket might be the worst thing that ever happened.

Let me point out one thing to the committee. This Toronto and Niagara Power Company has 27,000 customers in Toronto, notwithstanding the fact that it charges more for its service than the Hydro-Electric charges. Their argument is that the people pay more because their system is better and more efficient, and the service consequently better. Charging more against a big corporation like the Hydro, yet holding 27,000 subscribers—that is not competition in the ordinary sense. That is not bidding down to make Hydro go lower. Only last week the Hydro knocked 20 per cent off all municipal charges in the province of Ontario, and they can easily do it. I cannot support the amendment of the hon. member for Parkdale. I believe it would be confiscation. I feel that the temper of the House compels me to support the amendment proposed by the minister, because he has left some remnant of this company intact, as I understand it. If I am wrong, it may be said hereafter that that was the understanding I had. I do not know that it is wise for us to accept what was said in debate in preference to the deliberate judgment of the highest court in the realm. The Act is the thing. It stands there to be scrutinized, and I think we should hesitate before creating a precedent here to-day upon data that is not quite sufficient to warrant the precedent being established. Mention has been made of the hon. Mr. Beck of New York. Hon. gentlemen may not remember everything he said, but one thing that impressed itself very strongly upon me was this sentence: "Canada must be a borrowing public. The United States is a lending public." England may not be a lending public for many years to come, and we may in the future require to raise money on the public credit. To raise money, the public credit must stand high, and the public credit springs from the fount of Parliament here. If this Parliament enacts legislation that goes to foreign lands with the hall mark of shame upon it, so that the credit of Canada is impaired, then if the amendment of the hon. member for Parkdale carries we may regret for many years to come that Parliament took that stand, probably without mature consideration and in the heat of a summer evening.

Mr. NESBITT: As a member of the Special Committee on this Bill I wish to say a few words. I have listened to all the arguments on this question pro and con of the most capable lawyers probably in this country for four times, and they have all amounted to practically the same thing each time. Going back to the granting of the franchise to this company in 1902, we were told this afternoon, and have been told time and again before, that the Railway Committee of that day did not know what they were doing. I do not think we have any right to assume that any more than we have a right to assume that the Railway Committee of this day does not know what it is doing. As a matter of fact, a good deal of reference has been made to some of the objections raised by Mr. Osler and Mr. Clarke at that time, and yet the Committee passed the Bill in spite of these gentlemen's objections. That looks to me as if the Railway Committee of that day knew exactly what they were doing. I can construe it in no other way. The objections were made, and still the Railway Committee of that day passed the Bill. Furthermore, the mayor of Toronto at that time, Mr. Urquhart, wrote a letter to the Toronto City Council and the Controllers pointing out that the Mackenzie and Mann people had been given exactly the powers which the Privy Council decided had been given to them. There was no objection from the Toronto City Council that we ever heard of in the Railway Committee.

As far as the bonds are concerned, it has been said that $1,500,000 of bonds were issued by the transmission company, which was the first company formed, I understand. These were never sold, but were taken up by the development company. Afterwards, the development company built the transmission line to Toronto. The Committee never heard of any objection to that from any of the municipalities. The lines were built without any trouble until they invaded North Toronto. In the meantime the development company had sold some $7,000,000 of bonds. There was a question before the special committee as to whether value was received for the bonds, but there was no objection made before the special committee by the solicitors for the city of Toronto that the money was not properly expended. Some $34,000,000 or $35,000,000 was expended and $27,000,000 of bonds were issued altogether, I understand. When the trouble did arise there was an appeal to Chancellor Boyd, who was one of the most capable judges in the province of Ontario. He gave a decision in favour of the company. The first bonds had been sold previous to that decision. After that decision more bonds were issued, but they were held over until the appeal had been heard by the Privy Council, and when the Privy Council, the court of last resort in the Empire, gave their decision these bonds that had been issued, $9,000,000 worth, were sold. Nobody can tell me that the solicitors who were engaged to investigate the title that was to be the security for these bonds did not take the franchise as the main security, because anybody who has ever tried to sell public utility bonds know that you cannot sell them unless you have a proper franchise. The two franchises that hon. gentlemen say were the security for these bonds were both limited franchises, and I do not believe that the purchasers of the bonds would have bought them except for the fact that the franchise was behind the bonds. That may be disputed, but I have listened to all the arguments four times now, and I have never heard any reason given to change my mind that that was the main source of credit for the sale of these bonds.

The hon. member for Parkdale this afternoon made an argument I have never heard before on this question. He said that it was a mistake of the law clerk that was responsible for the franchise being granted. I have sat on the Railway Committee since I have been a member of Parliament, and I know that the Committee always look carefully over the Bill to see that the law clerk has drawn it properly before they vote on it.

That has been my experience in any Railway Committee on which I have sat, and I believe that the Railway Committee of that day knew what they were doing just as much as the Railway Committee of this day does. It is said, quite truly, that we would not grant a franchise of that kind to-day, but you must not think of it for to-day. You must go back seventeen years ago when the distribution or the transmission of power was in its infancy. A power company had been established at Niagara Falls before that time, but as my hon. friend from North Perth said, the furthest transmission that had taken place up to that time was to Buffalo, by the International Power Company, which I believe has since changed its name. There is no doubt that, whatever faults there might have been in the franchise at that time, the city council were then glad to get this company to transmit power to Toronto. It has been said that these people have got their poles on the streets of Toronto contrary to the order of the Privy Council that they should be removed. These poles were ordered to be removed, and why has the city of Toronto not enforced that order of the Privy Council? Because, as the member for North Perth says, there are 27,000 people using this power in the city of Toronto, and I do not think they would be in favour of having these poles removed. That must be the reason why the city has not ordered their removal before now. They have stopped this company from lighting the streets of Toronto, but private people of Toronto still patronize the company. I shall not dwell on this phase of the subject further, but what strikes me forcibly is this: These people got the franchise and proceeded to sell bonds, and my experience has been that if a private individual breaks a contract—at least if any man breaks a contract with me—he is not trusted any more by me. A man may break a contract with me once, but never a second time, because I will not trust him, and I believe that that is the case with businessmen throughout the length and breadth of this land. What has built up the trade of the British Empire more than the fact that the people with whom she traded could depend on the goods which they received being according to representation? If a man lies to me about any particular thing, he may deceive me once, but it is my fault if he deceives me twice. Some one, I think the hon. member for Parkdale, talked this afternoon about our being honest, and I could not help thinking when I heard him whether it was the intention that this Parliament of Canada, the representatives of the people of this country, should be asked to break a solemn contract and discredit us in the eyes of the financial world. There can be no other interpretation than that, no matter how you may camouflage the legal aspect of the case. We have had a considerable lot of legal talk and for four years I have listened to it. But so far as I am personally concerned I look at the matter from one standpoint. If we pass the amendment as moved by the hon. member for Parkdale we practically confiscate these people's interests. There is no question about that. The bonds may or may not be good, but we have no right to confiscate any proper interests that have been built up with the legal endorsation of the Parliament of this country. And if all the lawyers in the United States and Canada were to talk to me about the legal aspects of the question, I could not consider it from any other standpoint than that we have no right to break a contract once it is made, and that we should stand by it even though it costs us something. I am as perfectly willing as any man to protect the municipalities, and I think the amendment suggested by the Minister of Railways fully protects the municipalities where these people have not entered into business; and it fully protects the municipality of Toronto as regards the future. It has been said that this company has Dominion-wide power and that from Halifax to Vancouver they can go into any municipality and occupy the streets. But after all we must give credit to the company for having some common sense. There would be no object in going into any municipality unless the proposition would pay. If the city could not get power for less than they were being supplied by the existing corporation, there is no fear, in my judgment, of this or any other company going into any municipality. I do not know of any municipality that would not welcome any corporation that could sell them power cheaper than they are getting at the present day. That is true of any municipality as it is in the case of individuals. The fact is, no matter with what legal phraseology it is surrounded: These people were granted the franchise and sold bonds. Some one said this afternoon that there was no proof that any of the bonds were sold out of Canada. But suppose that to be the case, is that any reason why we should confiscate the interests of the people of Canada? As a matter of fact, it was stated before the special committee time and again that these bonds were sold in England, France and the United States. The great majority of them were sold there, but even if they were not, is there any justification in our confiscating their value? By all means no. If they were sold in Canada, that is all the more reason why we should protect the interests of the people who hold them. I am perfectly willing to see either the minister's clause inserted to protect the municipalities where these people are not now operating, or to accept the proposed amendment of my hon. friend from South Simcoe. But let us not confiscate the rights of any one and have the people of the world say that they cannot invest money in this country without running the risk of confiscation.

The Committee divided on the amendment of Mr. Mowat.

Amendment agreed to, yeas 56, nays 52.

Mr. J. F. REID: I was paired with the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie), otherwise I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. McMASTER: I should not have voted, Mr. Chairman; I was paired.

Mr. MOWAT: I did not want to make two mouthfulls of this but the next amendment is to the latter part of subclause 5. The Senate understood that this company was to buy out the Toronto Electric Light Company. Now it seems to me that that is not so. I propose to move an amendment to change the latter part of the subclause and this will be subclause 6: I therefore beg to move:

That subsection 5 of section 374 be amended by striking out all the words in the last eleven lines from, and inclusive of, the word "provided" to the end of the section and substituting the following as a new subsection 6:

(6) If any company heretofore incorporated by Special Act or other authority of the Parliament of Canada has acquired, or shall acquire assets or any part thereof, or the right to the possession or use of the assets or any part thereof, of any company or person operating a system for the distribution of light, heat, power or electricity, in any town, city, village or township, then in every such case the company so acquiring such assets shall carry out with the municipality all the obligations, in respect to the said assets whether arising under contract or in any other manner, of the company from which the said assets have been or shall be acquired.

Section as amended, agreed to.

Mr. J. D. REID: I think that completes all the clauses of the Bill. However, I would like to ask the committee to take up clauses 25 and 27 and make the changes in them that I shall propose. These are two clauses in reference to the employees of the Board of Railway Commissioners who are not now under the Civil Service Act. This will bring them under the Act. I therefore beg to move the reconsideration of section 25.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. J. D. REID: I beg to move:

That section 25 be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

Such other officers, clerks, and employees as are necessary for the proper conduct of the business of the Board may be appointed in accordance with the provisions of the Civil Service Act 1918, and of any Acts in amendment thereof.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. J. D. REID moved the reconsideration of section 27.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. J. D. REID: I beg to move that section 27 be struck out and the following substituted therefor:

27. The officers, clerks and employees attached to the Board may be paid out of such money as may be appropriated by Parliament for the purpose.

Mr. FIELDING: The minister says "such other officers." That evidently excepts some. Who are those that are excepted?

Mr. J. D. REID: Section 25 excepted all officers employed by the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. FIELDING: The amendment says "such other officers," meaning that there are some who will be appointed by the Civil Service Commission and others who will not be?

[Mr. Mowat.]

Mr. J. D. REID: There are some officers such as Mr. Spencer. He is a special officer or inspector. They must all come under the Civil Service Commission, the same as the special officers in any other department.

Amendment agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall I report the Bill?

Mr. McQUARRIE: Before you leave the Chair, Mr. Chairman, I would like to refer again to section 325.

The CHAIRMAN: Before referring to section 325 it will be necessary for the hon. gentleman to have the unanimous consent of the Committee. Is it the unanimous will of the Committee that the hon. member be allowed to revert to section 325 of the Bill?

Mr. McQUARRIE: I can go on with it now or wait until the third reading. It will take me a few minutes to explain it, but if the Committee do not wish me to go on to-night I shall defer what I have to say until the third reading. The amendment to section 325 has the effect of practically wiping out all agreements made between municipalities and the railway companies fixing rates in those municipalities. It also has the effect of wiping out an appeal which is now pending to the Supreme Court. I want to explain these things to the Committee, but if you would prefer me to do it on the third reading I should be glad to postpone what I have to say. It is so late now that I do not like to keep the Committee, but if you wish me to go ahead I am prepared to do so.

Mr. J. D. REID: I have no objection, but I do not like to ask the Committee to remain.

Mr. McQUARRIE: That is the way I feel, too.

Mr. J. D. REID: Does the hon. member wish to have the clause opened up again?

Mr. McQUARRIE: Yes.

Mr. J. D. REID: I would not like to have the clause opened up again. Rather than have the clause opened I would prefer that you bring it up on the third reading.

Mr. McQUARRIE: I will take it up on the third reading, then.

Bill reported.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Reid the House adjourned at 1 a. m. Thursday.

Thursday, June 5, 1919.

QUESTIONS.

Mr. D'ANJOU:

1. Has Captain Alban Laferrière been a member of the Canadian Overseas Expeditionary Force? If so, (a) when did he enlist, and in what battalion did he serve; (b) how long was he in service in Canada, England, and in France; (c) when and for what reason was he returned to Canada?

2. Is the said Captain Laferrière at present a member of the Canadian Militia? If so, (a) to what Unit is he attached and what is his military rank; (b) On whose recommendation did he obtain his present military position?

3. Who is the Officer Commanding the 70th Battalion?

4. When did Colonel Allard cease to be the Officer Commanding said Battalion, and for what reasons was he retired?

5. Did Captain Alban Laferrière resign his commission in the Canadian Overseas Expeditionary Force? If so, when, and for what reason?

6. Was the said Captain Laferrière arraigned before a court martial during his service overseas? If so, when, and what was the judgment of the court?

7. Is the Government aware that the said Captain Laferrière is in charge of a canteen established for the accommodation of returned soldiers in the city of Hull? If so, is the said canteen authorized by the Department of Militia, and will the Government order it to be closed?

Major-General MEWBURN:

1. Yes. (a) 8th January, 1916—57th Battalion. Served in 57th Battalion, 69th Battalion and 10th Reserve Battalion. (b) In Canada, 8 months; in England, 11 months; in France, 2 weeks (tour of instruction). (c) 12th May, 1917—unfit for General Service.

2. Yes. (a) 70th Regiment—Lieutenant. (b) Lieut.-Colonel W. L. Allard.

3. Lieut.-Colonel W. L. Allard.

4. Answered by No. 3.

5. No.

6. No.

7. No, but inquiry is being made.

QUESTION PASSED AS ORDER FOR RETURN.

Hon. Mr. MURPHY:

1. Referring to page 381 of the Report of the Ministry Overseas Military Forces of Canada 1918, and to the chapter entitled, "Canadian Army Medical Corps." was Lieutenant-Colonel Jenkins named by Sir Edward Kemp and the Sub. Militia Council, or by either of them, under Order No. 31, to investigate and report upon the financial or other dealings of the Canadian Army Medical Service in Europe?

2. Did the said Lieutenant-Colonel Jenkins make progress reports from time to time? If so, were such progress reports sent to Sir Edward Kemp's London Office?

3. Did the said Jenkins, (a) Make a full and final report to Sir Edward Kemp, and (b) was the said and final report received by the minister in or about the month of November, 1918?

4. If so, after receiving the said final report, did Sir Edward Kemp have an interview with the said Colonel Jenkins at which a copy of the said report was produced, and after discussion retained by Sir Edward Kemp?

5. Did the said report disclose incompetence, neglect, and the wasting of large sums of money in the Canadian Army Medical Service Overseas?

6. Will the said Order No. 31 and the final report of Colonel Jenkins be laid on the table of the House? If so, when?

7. Is there any objection to the said Order or Report being produced? If so, what is the objection?

THE BUDGET.

ANNUAL FINANCIAL STATEMENT OF THE MINISTER OF FINANCE.

On the Order being called:

House again in Committee of Ways and Means.—The Minister of Finance.

Mr. SPEAKER: Under the provisions of Rule 17C, when this Order is called on Thursday the Chair is vacated without question put, but by arrangement, and for the convenience of hon. members, it has been found best to submit the motion on Thursday. I make reference to the fact in order that this circumstance may not be construed as a precedent.

Hon. Sir THOMAS WHITE (Minister of Finance) moved:

That the Speaker do now leave the Chair for the House to go into Committee of Ways and Means.

He said: This motion affords me the opportunity of presenting the Budget for the consideration of the House. It is usual in such presentation to deal with the important topics of the financial position of the Dominion, the condition of our trade, domestic and foreign, the state of our revenues and expenditures for the past and, so far as can be estimated, for the coming year, and to submit the fiscal measures which the Government deems essential having regard to the situation disclosed.

This is the general course along which my remarks of to-day will proceed, but in view of the special circumstances in which Canada in common with the rest of the world finds herself, I hope I may be pardoned if I dwell upon the various subjects which I have mentioned at somewhat greater length, and in more detail, than has been my custom in previous Budgets which I have had the honour to present to Parliament.

The war is over and all nations are engaged in counting the cost, estimating the condition in which their finance and trade have been left after the fiery tempest which has passed over the world, and devising ways and means to repair the ruin which has been wrought.

It seems to me that what the House and the people of Canada will first desire to learn from the Budget speech will be what has been the cost of the war to Canada, what is our present financial position, what it will be when demobilization has taken place and our war expenditure is completely at an end, and what are the additional annual charges which must be met as the result of the war.

To these topics I shall first address myself. The fiscal year of the Dominion closes on March 31. According to our system some time is required for the completion of the services and bringing into account of all items attributable to the year closed on that date, but a fairly accurate forecast may be given of what the completed accounts will reveal.

With regard to the cost of the war to the Dominion, the books of the Finance Department show as of March 31 last a total principal war expenditure of $1,327,273,848. The portions incurred in respect of the several years during the continuance of the war are as follows:

$306,488,814	for	1916-17
$450,000,000	for	1918-19

Over the same fiscal period, namely from April 1, 1914, to March 31, 1919, the total expenditure upon ordinary account, that is to say, the current outlays of the Dominion in respect of its various services aggregated $832,757,589. The expenditure upon capital and other accounts for which by the practice of all our Governments provision might properly be made by borrowing, and for which assets of equivalent value were created for the permanent benefit of the people of Canada, amounted during the five years in question to $180,277,873.

Leaving capital expenditure aside and applying the surplus available from our revenues over and above the amount required to meet current outlays it will appear that we have met the principal cost of the war from taxation to a total aggregate amount of $275,943,977. If we take into account the amount contributed during the five year period for interest upon war debt and for pension charges the total paid from revenue on account of the war to March 31, 1919, is $438,293,248.

Now let us approach the subject from another angle. Aside from the cost of the war and how that cost was met, the vital question before us to-day is what is the amount of the total net national debt of Canada and how does it compare with the net debt at the end of the fiscal year immediately preceding the war.

On March 31, 1914, the net national debt was $335,996,850. On March 31, 1919, the net national debt was $1,584,000,000.

There remains to be considered what further increase in the national debt will be made during the present fiscal year which will end on March 31, 1920.

The war, so far as actual fighting is concerned, was terminated by the armistice of November 11 last; but the expenditures connected with the maintenance of the Canadian Corps in Continental Europe, their gradual return, first to England, and then to Canada, their demobilization here, and the provision made by the Government by way of war gratuity to enable members of the Canadian Expeditionary Force to bridge over the period of their re-absorption into civil life have still continued, and will continue over the greater part of the year.

In reality the present year is, so far as expenditure is concerned, a war year. It is impossible to estimate accurately what our demobilization expenditure for 1919-20 will be, but we may be sure that it will not be materially less than $300,000,000.

There is a further important item of our war expenditure which must be taken into account but which at present it is not possible to estimate with accuracy. I mean the additional cost to Canada of our share of the increased expenditure for ammunition at the front from September 1, 1917, to the close of the war.

Assuming that we shall not be able, in view of the magnitude of our reconstruction programme, to pay any substantial part of our demobilization expenditure from revenue, we may calculate that when demobilization is complete and no further outlays are necessary on what I may call the principal of our war expenditure the total net debt of Canada will stand at not less than $1,950,000,000, or in round figures $2,000,000,000. This contrasts with $335,996,850, the net debt of Canada at the end of the fiscal year 1914. The increase during the five year war period is thus shown in round figures at $1,614,000,000.

This then is the financial position so far as relates to the national debt. While the amount is large and averages over $220 per head of the population of Canada it will be remembered that Canada was in the war from the first day and that by comparison with the present net national debts of European governments including Great Britain, who were similarly participants in the conflict during its entire length, our position having regard to relation of debt, to number of population, and to national resources must be regarded as distinctly more favourable.

Mr. Speaker, I do not in the least desire to minimize the gravity of so great a debt as now confronts us on the threshold of the new era upon which we are entering. It will constitute a burden upon the people of Canada for generations to come. Fighting for the principles for which we stood we could not and did not count the money cost which is really the least part of our sacrifices in the war. The realization that at the greatest crisis in all history when the fate of world freedom was trembling in the scale of destiny, this gallant country of eight million people put its all to the hazard in the mightiest of conflicts for the cause of truth and justice, will be the lofty inspiration to greater effort which will enable Canada to carry and ultimately extinguish the heavy obligations entailed by the war.

What portion of this indebtedness and of the obligations we have incurred with respect to pensions and other services arising out of the war we shall be able, under the peace settlement, to obtain by way of indemnity from Germany and her Allies I am unable to say, but it would be imprudent to treat expectation in this regard as an asset upon which we may with certainty depend. It is better to face our debt and other war liabilities as they stand and assume that we must be prepared to bear their full burden by our own strength and from our own resources.

In considering the subject of our national debt an important aspect from the viewpoint of its bearing upon our financial standing and credit is whether it is owed to our own people or abroad. While national debt, no matter where owed, is debt, it makes a great difference to national strength whether it is held within the country itself, that is to say, whether the people regarded in the aggregate owe it to individual members of the community holding their own Government's securities, or whether it is owed to citizens of other nations. From the national standpoint a public debt owed to a nation's own people is not nearly so serious an obligation as if owed abroad. The interest paid upon it is disbursed at home and remains part of the national resources. When the principal is paid there is a transfer of wealth from the Government to its own citizens which still remains an asset of the community viewed as a national unit. But if the debt is held abroad, every interest and principal payment diminishes the resources of the debtor nation and increases those of the creditor nation. In this respect and bearing especially in mind the fact that before the war Canada's borrowing for federal, provincial, municipal and business purposes was principally in Britain and the United States and not in Canada, the situation as to our national debt may be regarded with satisfaction.

In round figures the total outstanding securities of the Dominion Government are held as follows: in Great Britain, $326,700,000; in the United States, $150,873,000; in Canada, $1,510,000,000.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is another gratifying feature of our finance to which I feel I should refer, and that is the dates of maturity of our outstanding obligations. Disregarding any debt in Britain, which is funded over long periods and will present no difficulty as to renewals, the position of our principal maturities in Canada is as follows:

War Savings Certificates maturing 1920-21..	.. ..	$ 11,604,338
5% Debenture Stock maturing 1st Oct. 1919..	.. ..	896,500
5½% Debenture Stock maturing June 1st, 1919	.. .. $2,133,300
maturing June 1st, 1920..	 391,700
maturing June 1st, 1921..	 376,700
		2,901,700
1st War Loan maturing 1925..	.. ..	43,933,900
2nd War Loan maturing 1931..	.. ..	54,689,900
3rd War Loan maturing 1937..	.. ..	92,652,800
4th War Loan maturing 1922..	.. .. $206,256,250
" " " 1927..	 65,724,550
" " " 1937..	 246,413,000
		518,393,800

5th War Loan maturing 1923	$218,346,000
" " " 1933	477,400,000
		695,746,000
3½% bond loan maturing 1925-28	$12,404,678
4½% bond loan maturing 1925-45	95,207,351
		107,612,029

From this statement the House will see how necessary it was to issue long date securities even at war rates of interest. If we had to face the maturity of so vast a principal amount as is represented by our war borrowings in Canada within a period of five or ten years after the war, I may frankly say that the solution of such a problem would tax to the utmost the resource of any Minister of Finance. But with the various maturities spread over so long a period of years, ample time is afforded to adopt whatever measures may be needed to meet the redemption of each loan as it matures.

In the United States our maturities are as follows:

August 1st, 1919	$75,000,000
April 1st, 1921	25,000,000
April 1st, 1926	25,000,000
April 1st, 1931	25,000,000
August 1st, 1935	873,000

As of March 31 last other short date Treasury Bills payable in Canada were outstanding with maturities as follows:

October 1, 1919	24,605,000
October 15, 1919	49,215,000

On the same date our financial resources were as follows:

In Canadian banks	$135,000,000
In Bank of Montreal, London	10,000,000
In Bank of Montreal, New York	4,414,047
Amount to be received on account of last Victory Loan	55,000,000
Total	$204,414,047

On account of this being, as respects expenditure, a war year, we shall have to float at least one further loan in Canada for purposes connected with the war and demobilization. Any necessary external financing to meet loans maturing outside of Canada will receive timely attention.

As the aggregate of our war issues exceeds our net war expenditure it is to be pointed out that during the war we were enabled to make advances to Great Britain for her purchases in Canada to a greater extent than we availed ourselves of advances from the Imperial Government to meet our war expenditure in England and on the continent. The result is that there is owing to us by the Imperial Government a balance, after making the necessary set-offs, of about two hundred and thirty million dollars. This is subject to reduction by the unascertained amount which we shall pay in respect of increased charges for ammunition at the front since September 1, 1917. An inquiry is now being made for the purpose of adjusting this charge.

The following information will be of interest to the House as to Dominion note issues at the close of the war:

Total Dominion Notes outstanding March 31, 1919 $298,058,697.67 of which $153,630,697.67 is secured to the amount of $116,014,654.37 in gold reserve and $144,428,000 by securities.

Our gold is thus 38.92 per cent of the total issue of $298,058,697.67, and 75·52 per cent of the $153,630,697.67 against which no securities other than gold are held.

A comparison with the note issues of Great Britain and the other Allies, including United States which was less than two years in the war, is such as to cause satisfaction to Canada with respect to the post-war condition of our currency.

The policy will be to gradually restore our note issue to the statutory condition, which requires us to hold in gold 25 per cent up to fifty million dollars of note issue and dollar for dollar for any further issue. This can be done by buying gold on the one hand, or on the other by retiring outstanding notes from time to time from the proceeds of loans or from revenue. It will be a long time before the currency inflation of the world will be abated.

The figures which I have given show the increase in the national debt of Canada due to the war. Interest must, of course, be paid annually upon this debt, and I have had a careful estimate made as to the yearly burden which this will entail.

Assuming the total debt of Canada on March 31, 1920, to be $1,950,000,000, the estimated annual interest charge will be approximately $115,000,000. This compares with $12,893,504, which was the interest charge upon the national debt as of the fiscal year ended March 31, 1914.

But the added annual burden due to the war does not rest there. There is the further responsibility for pensions to our soldiers and their dependents. For the past fiscal year the amount paid on this account was $17,460,000. For the present fiscal year it may reach $30,000,000. For a generation or more to come we may look forward to providing, say, $35,000,000 to $40,000,000 per annum for pensions. In addition there will be the annual expense for maintenance of hospitals, convalescent homes, and other services established for the aid and comfort of our soldiers. No national expenditures will, I am sure, be more gladly borne than these by the people of Canada, who will never fail to appreciate the sacrifices made on their behalf by those who fought for Canada in the great war.

Having indicated the extent of the financial burden which the war has imposed upon us, it seems advisable to pause to inquire how that burden is to be met. What are the resources upon which Canada must depend to carry this huge national debt and the annual charge for pensions and other services which I have mentioned? We are to-day a prosperous community of high average productivity. I am not prepared to say that even without extraordinary effort we should not be able to merely carry along the extra financial burden imposed by the war. But its magnitude must not be minimized, and it is for us to consider and put into effect such policies as may be appropriate to counteract the disadvantage under which we shall labour in this regard and to insure the continued prosperity of our people, notwithstanding this great national handicap upon their exertions. In this connection we should undoubtedly have in mind the gradual extinction over a long course of years of the debt by a sinking fund provision to be put into effect as soon as possible after the conclusion of the present year. With this I do not intend to deal further for the present.

What are our resources, actual and potential, from which we can carry the interest, pensions, and other war charges, and gradually extinguish our indebtedness due to the war?

We have a country of almost unlimited natural assets, vast stretches of cultivable lands, magnificent forests, regions abounding in mineral wealth, and fisheries the most valuable in the world. We have a highly intelligent, energetic, enterprising people of great stability of character and ardent aspiration for national and individual success. To develop our natural resources there is required the application of enterprise, capital, and labour. To sell our products we require markets, domestic and foreign.

Let us for a moment consider some of the policies which are essential for the realization of the development I have outlined. Our ability to meet and retire our war obligations will depend upon our power to increase our production of natural and manufactured commodities and to economize individually so as to bring about each year substantial increase in domestic wealth and savings and a more favourable balance in our international trade. In other words, the motto for the future, as it was for the war, must be "Produce and Save."

As evidencing what can be done by Canada in the way of national saving, I can not do better than give the following statistics of deposits, demand and notice, in our chartered banks for the years 1913 to 1919, inclusive:—

Mch. 31.	Demand Deposits	Withdrawable on notice	Total.
1913	$357,756,659	$ 630,434,708	$ 988,191,367
1914	350,884,153	665,994,852	1,016,879,005
1915	406,735,171	714,219,286	1,120,954,457
1916	459,277,454	836,593,269	1,295,870,723
1917	538,869,362	1,008,657,874	1,547,527,236
1919	566,797,268	1,037,851,766	1,604,649,034

The bank deposits in Canada almost doubled in the six-year period from 1913 to 1919. In connection with these figures, there should also be taken into account the subscription by the Canadian people to the war loans floated in Canada and paid for by withdrawal of their deposits in our chartered banks and other financial institutions.

To greatly increase our production we need more population and particularly that class which will engage in our basic industries. Our immigration policy is therefore of prime importance. We must fill up our vacant cultivable lands. In the past we have not been sufficiently selective in our immigration. We are so amending our laws as to ensure that the destinies of this country will always be controlled by those who may be depended upon as loyal and patriotic citizens of Canada, ready at all times to take up arms in her defence no matter from what source aggression may come. It is interesting to note that during the war immigration, likely to result in increased production, continued, although on a comparatively small scale. The figures are as follows:

"	" 1916-17	75,374

Since March 31 last immigrants to the number of 12,000 have entered Canada.

As a great food-producing country Canada is bound always to enjoy agricultural prosperity. The war has caused the death of millions of the rural workers of Europe, devastated vast tracts of cultivated lands, consumed the horses, cattle and other domestic animals, and destroyed the implements of tillage.

It must be many years before Europe is able to recover agriculturally from the effects of the war. In the meantime the hungry millions must be fed and it would seem certain that Canada's agriculture will not lack for profitable markets for all it can produce.

The yearly exportable surplus of the Dominion's grain and foodstuffs should go far towards ensuring most favourable trade balances for the future. For the reconstruction work in Europe our raw materials and their products must also be in demand. Every effort must be made to develop and expand our export trade in manufactured articles as well as in the immediate products of our fields, forests, and mines. The more highly finished the commodity the greater the price which it will bring to the Dominion. Our policy should be directed to ensuring so far as practicable the completion within Canada, in Canadian shops and mills, of manufacturing processes in order that we may obtain the benefit of the greater value of finished products as compared with that of raw materials or partly manufactured articles.

No doubt we shall be subject in this to the keenest international competition, and to succeed we shall require to avail ourselves of every assistance which can be legitimately afforded by the Government in obtaining information respecting, and access to, foreign markets, as well as transportation and financial facilities.

One most important asset which we possess as a result of the war is the increased capability of industrial production which was turned during the war to such remarkable purpose in the manufacture of munitions and other materials. In all departments of our national activity—agricultural, industrial, commercial and financial—the war discovered to the people of Canada a capacity in themselves for achievement which they would not have dreamed they possessed had not the pressure of emergency called forth their latent genius for organization, administration and efficiency. This higher capability among all classes should prove of the greatest value in enabling us to deal with our after-war problems and burdens.

As illustrating the vast strides made by our foreign trade during the war, the following statistical information is submitted.

In 1913 the balance of trade against us was $300,000,000. In 1914 our total international trade was $1,073,000,000, of which $618,000,000 was in imports and $455,000,000 in exports. For 1918 the total was $2,550,000,000, of which $962,000,000 was imports and $1,586,000,000 exports. For 1919 the unrevised figures show a total of $2,169,000,000, of which $916,000,000 was imports and $1,253,000,000 exports. It will thus appear that from an adverse balance of $300,000,000 in 1913 and of $160,000,000 in 1914, we had attained a favourable balance of over $600,000,000 in 1918 and of $340,000,000 for 1919. At the end of the five-year period from 1914 to 1919 our total trade had doubled, while for the year 1918, which marked the highest point, it aggregated 2½ times the trade of 1914.

It must be kept in mind respecting these figures that the higher prices of our grain, foodstuffs and other exports, and of the goods which we imported, is a most important factor for consideration, and further that of our exports for 1918 and 1919 the estimated amount of ammunition, explosives and other war materials aggregated $418,000,000 and $260,000,000 respectively. The cessation of the manufacture of these articles and any fall in the price of commodities generally are bound to make serious changes in our trade aggregates unless offset by increased production. For the information of the House I here place upon Hansard the statistical details of our total trade, also details of our trade with the United Kingdom, with the United States, and of exports (by classes) of Canadian produce for the past six years; also of imports from and to the United Kingdom and the overseas Dominions, and the principal foreign nations with whom we traded for the past two years.

During the war the condition of our foreign trade has been greatly changed. The outstanding feature has been the increase in total to which I have referred and the reversal of the unfavourable to a most favourable balance. The trend of our trade for the war period may be observed from the following summary:

United Kingdom.

The imports from the United Kingdom have decreased from the fiscal year 1913-14 to the year 1918-19 from $132,000,000 to $73,000,000 and our exports (domestic produce) have increased from $215,000,000 during the year just preceding the war to $532,000,000 during the year 1918-19.

Other Parts of the British Empire.

Our imports from other parts of the British Empire increased from $22,000,000 during the fiscal year 1913-14 to $50,000,000 during the fiscal year 1918-19, and exports (domestic produce) increased from $23,000,000 to $64,000,000 during the same period.

United States.

The trade with the United States has greatly increased during the war period. The imports from this country in 1913-14 were $395,000,000 and in 1918-19 were nearly $747,000,000, while the exports (domestic) increased from $163,000,000 to $454,000,000.

France.

The imports from France have decreased from $14,000,000 in 1913-14 to $3,600,000 in 1918-19, while the exports increased from $3,600,000 to $92,000,000 during the same period. The exports were largely munitions and other war supplies..

Italy.

The imports from Italy during the war period decreased from $2,000,000 to $550,000 and the exports increased from $500,000 in 1913-14 to over $13,000,000 in 1918-19. In the year 1917-18 the principal exports were asbestos, canned salmon, canned meats, wheat, oats, oatmeal and explosives.

Japan.

The imports from Japan during the year 1913-14 were $2,600,000 and increased to $13,600,000 in the year 1918-19. The principal goods included in the increase would appear to be of a class formerly imported from Germany and Austria-Hungary. Our exports (domestic) to Japan in 1913-14 were $1,500,000 which increased to nearly $12,000,000 in 1918-19.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will the minister state whether our largest customer is Great Britain or the United States?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Our total trade with Great Britain including imports and exports in 1918-19 was $605,000,000. Our total trade with the United States was $1,201,000,000.

Now, Mr. Speaker, having dealt with the financial and commercial position of the Dominion, I now proceed to the consideration of the important problem of our estimated expenditure for the present fiscal year 1919-20 and the fiscal proposals which the Government has to make in connection therewith.

It will be advantageous in assisting us to reach a conclusion with respect to these matters if I first briefly review the result of the last fiscal year which ended on March 31, 1919. During that year the expenditure of the Dominion upon account of the ordinary services of the Government amounted to $240,000,000. The outlay upon capital account aggregated $22,000,000. For war, the total expenditure for the year is estimated at $450,000,000 (that is the last fiscal year). On the other side of the account we estimate a total revenue for the year 1918-19 of $310,000,000. As emphasizing the importance of this figure, I may point out that for the fiscal year before the war the total revenue was $163,174,394. For the fiscal year which ended on March 31, 1909, the revenue was only $85,093,404. Of this total of $310,000,000 (the revenue for the last fiscal year), $147,000,000 was received from customs; $30,000,000 from excise; $21,000,000 from post office; $33,000,000 from taxation under the Business Profits War Tax Act; $10,000,000 from the Income War Tax Act; $14,000,000 from other war taxation; and $55,000,000 from other miscellaneous sources, including $38,000,000 from railways.

If we follow the practice which has been hitherto adopted in treating as surplus the amount of revenue received in excess of the ordinary expenditure, it will appear that for the past fiscal year the Government had a surplus of $70,000,000, which was devoted to war expenditure. If, on the other hand, we first appropriated our revenue to the payment of both ordinary and capital expenditure, the surplus which was used for war expenditure was $48,000,000.

I have already stated the estimated war expenditure for the past year to have been $450,000,000. Of this expenditure, therefore, $48,000,000 was paid out of revenue after meeting all other outlays on the part of the Government, including capital expenditure.

In connection with our expenditures during the past year and generally throughout the period of the war, I may observe with respect to both ordinary and capital outlays that they have been kept well in hand, and that the increased expenditure under this heading is attributable principally to interest upon our war debt and pensions.

I now proceed to estimate the revenue and outlay of the present year. Main estimates totalling $437,000,000 have been laid before the House, with Supplementary estimates still to be brought down. Embraced in these estimates are certain considerable amounts representing investments. I refer particularly to the estimate of $25,000,000 appropriated for the purpose of soldiers' land settlement; $35,000,000 loan to Canadian Northern Railway Company; $35,000,000 for railway equipment purposes; and $25,000,000 to be advanced by way of loans to the several Provincial Governments for promoting better housing conditions. The estimate for expenditure on ordinary account for the coming year is $270,000,000. Of this the sum of $102,000,000 represents interest on the national debt. This figure contrasts with $12,893,000 representing interest charges upon the national debt before the war. It includes also the sum of $30,000,000 for estimated pension expenditure for the year. It is these two items of interest and pensions which will particularly constitute the burden of the war upon the taxpayers of the country for a great many years to come; until, in fact, the national debt is materially reduced and pensions gradually run their course. The estimated expenditure on capital account for the year we place at $50,000,000.

This is a war year and it is necessary also to add the estimated expenditure which has been and will be incurred on account of demobilization. This will aggregate the large sum of $300,000,000, including $92,000,000 for war gratuity. The entire estimated expenditure, therefore, of the year on ordinary account, capital account, and for demobilization will reach the large total of $620,000,000.

Assuming that we maintained, without change, existing fiscal legislation, and that the yield of the various services would be upon the same basis as for 1918-19, our estimate of revenue for the present year would be as follows:

Customs	$145,000,000
Excise	30,000,000
Post Office	18,000,000
Business Profits War Tax	35,000,000
Income Tax	20,000,000
Other War Taxation	14,000,000
Miscellaneous sources	18,000,000
	$280,000,000

In this estimate we have, owing to the change to be made, commencing with this year, in the mode of financial administration of the Intercolonial and other Government railways, omitted $30,000,000 of revenue from that source. That revenue will henceforth be received by the Canadian National Railway Company and applied directly against its working expenditure. In our estimate of ordinary expenditure for the year we have allowed for a corresponding reduction.

While from the statement which I have just made it will appear that our total estimated expenditure, ordinary and capital accounts, and for demobilization, will amount to $620,000,000, our estimated revenue on the present basis will reach only $280,000,000. Putting it another way, our revenue would enable us to pay only our ordinary expenditure and leave a small amount to be applied to other purposes.

The question which now arises is what shall be our policy in the matter of taxation for the present year. It is a year of great industrial instability and business uncertainty. If the war were still continuing it would be necessary to recommend heavily increased taxation in order that we might pay a substantial portion of the principal of our war expenditure. If it were not for special circumstances arising out of this transitional period from war to peace that course should be adopted, notwithstanding the ending of the war, because we shall have this year so heavy a volume of what is really war expenditure, that is to say, our outlay for demobilization and all that it involves. We must, however, bear specially in mind the anxieties and burdens of the general public at a time of dislocation, unrest and high prices, and endeavour to wisely bridge over this troubled period by giving such measure of relief as may be practicable, having regard to the heavy financial obligations devolving upon us and our national credit in the eyes of the outside world.

The cost of living in Canada has, in common with all other countries, gradually increased during the war and is causing hardship to a large portion of our population, especially those of limited means and slender incomes. I am of opinion that for this transitional period we are justified in adopting the policy of meeting only our ordinary expenditure and borrowing for our capital and demobilization expenditure.

In considering the question of reductions and increases in indirect taxation most careful attention must be given to their effect upon established industry and the employment of operatives dependent upon its success for the maintenance of themselves and their families, and upon the domestic trade and commerce which it supports.

Having fully considered all aspects of the subject the Government submits the following proposals:

Under the Customs Tariff War Revenue Act, 1915, a British preferential tariff rate of five per cent and an intermediate and general tariff rate of seven and a half per cent were imposed upon, with certain exceptions, all imported goods.

We propose to wholly repeal this British preferential tariff rate of five per cent. Further, we propose to partially repeal the intermediate and general tariff rate of seven and one-half per cent at present in effect under the Customs Tariff War Revenue Act referred to by making it no longer applicable to the following classes of articles, namely:—

Foodstuffs, linen and cotton clothing, woollen clothing, boots and shoes, fur caps and fur clothing, hats, caps, hoods and bonnets, gloves and mitts, collars and cuffs, hides, skins, leather, harness and saddlery, agricultural implements, petroleum oils, mining machinery, and bituminous coal.

Those classes embrace a very large variety of individual articles which will be disclosed in the resolution.

So much for the reductions from the tariff rates established by the Customs Tariff War Revenue Act, 1915. We have now certain other reductions and modifications to propose in respect of the ordinary tariff rates, that is to say, the tariff rates established under the tariff of 1907 and amendments thereto. I call them, for the purpose of distinguishing them from the special customs war duties, the ordinary tariff rates. The resolutions presented in this regard will provide for a reduction of five cents per pound in the British preferential, intermediate and general tariff rates on roasted or ground coffee and three cents per pound under the British preferential tariff on British grown teas. This latter reduction gives a substantial Empire preference where no preference at present exists.

We shall provide for the free importation into Canada of wheat, wheat flour and potatoes from countries which do not impose a customs duty on such articles grown or produced in Canada.

We shall also provide for an alteration in the rates on soda ash from five per cent under the British preferential tariff and seven and a half per cent under the general tariff to one-fifth of a cent a pound under the British preferential tariff and three-tenths of a cent per pound under the general tariff.

We shall provide further for specific instead of ad valorem rates of duty upon pig-lead, zinc spelter, and copper in-4 p.m. gots. On certain products made from these materials there will be an increase in duties.

I come now to the consideration of agricultural implements. I have stated that we propose to take off the Customs war revenue duties. But for an arrangement we have been able to make for the equalization of Canadian freight rates with those enjoyed by American competitors of our industries engaged in the manufacture of these implements, it would not have been practicable to make any reductions in the ordinary tariff schedule covering these articles. Under the ordinary tariff, rates of duty upon manufactured products are closely related to duties upon raw material, coal, machinery, and other equipment used in their manufacture, and any reduction except upon an occasion of general revision when the tariff as a whole can be dealt with would necessarily lead to most serious consequences.

Desirous as we were of providing for as low a duty as might be practicable upon these implements of agricultural production so essential to Canada at this time, the problem before us was how to make it possible to reduce the ordinary tariff rates.

The business of manufacturing agricultural implements is almost wholly confined to Eastern Canada. So far as concerns their great market in the West, Canadian firms and companies engaged in this industry have been handicapped as against their American competitors by higher freight rates. The freights charged by Canadian railway companies upon shipments from eastern points to Winnipeg, Brandon, Regina, Saskatoon, Calgary, Edmonton and other western points have been higher than the rates from Chicago to the same points. This has been caused by the fact that the manufacturing centres of the eastern provinces are separated by great distances from the consuming and distributing centres of the West. The American manufacturer of agricultural implements is not only closer to the American consumer and American distributing points but he is also nearer to the western distributing points of Canada.

In view of these circumstances it appeared to us that we should seek assistance in freight reduction to enable us to reduce the ordinary tariff upon these implements. The plan was not free of difficulty. In so far as railway rates, as such, are concerned, the railway rates in Canada, although recently raised, are certainly not more than sufficient to make a carrying return on the value of the properties used for transportation. Indeed, having regard to railway investment, railway returns, owing to the very great increases in the cost of operation, may well be described as low. In view of this, it is, of course, impossible to expect a reduction in railway rates to be ordered by the Railway Commission.

As a rate-making proposition, reductions at the present time are impossible. We have, however, approached the railway companies with a view of overcoming the difficulty of distance to the greatest extent possible, and of doing so without unduly injuring railway revenues and credits. At the present time railways, which are the largest consumers of bituminous coal, pay a war duty of seven and a half per cent on the value of the imported commodity. As this duty is an addition to the specific tax upon this coal, a heavy resultant charge has been thrown upon the operating railways, whose fuel costs, in view of the advanced price of coal alone, have been greatly increased.

The proposal which we made to the rail carriers was that they should reduce their rates from the eastern manufacturing points of production of agricultural implements, Montreal, and east of the Great Lakes, to prairie points, to the rates charged by the American lines with shorter mileages, from Chicago to the similar western destinations, stating that if the railway companies could see their way to do this they would be assisted to the extent that relief would be afforded them by the abolition of the seven and a half per cent war duty on bituminous coal.

In the first instance, the railway companies claimed that, in view of their financial obligations, it was entirely impossible for them to sacrifice any revenue whatever, but that their existing revenues were, as a matter of fact, insufficient.

The question, however, was not allowed to stand, but other representations were made to the companies, such as the national necessity of making farming operations in the West more profitable, of increasing the population of the West, and the resultant interest that the companies themselves would have from the traffic which a larger and more prosperous population would afford, and also the fact that such conditions would render more saleable the railway lands owned by companies in the West, an argument which appealed with special force to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which company has perhaps as much interest in the proper development and prosperity of the West as any other interest can possibly have.

I am very glad to be able to say that the railway companies have recognized the large overlying national interest, and have consented to put in tariffs as asked. The new tariffs will give the Chicago rate on agricultural implements from producing centres in the East, west of Montreal and east of the Great Lakes, to prairie points, for carlot movements, loaded to a minimum of 24,000 pounds. This reduction is a substantial concession made by the railways, as the following statement of present rates will indicate:

Movement. From.	To.	Mileage.	Rate.
Toronto-Winnipeg		1,233	82½ cents
Chicago-Winnipeg		876	67½ "

[Sir Thomas White.]

The rates to Edmonton are the same from both points as those to Calgary.

The reduction will be appreciated when it is recognized that, for example, to Regina, the Canadian haul of 1,590 miles equalizes the haul from American territory of 1,069 miles, while to Medicine Hat the Canadian movement is 520 miles longer than the American movement, although the rate will become the same.

It must also be borne in mind that although, as the above schedule indicates, the rates for equivalent distances in the United States are higher than in Canada, notwithstanding a greater density and diversity of traffic, combined with a lower fuel cost, the United States operations, as indicated by the reports made by the United States Railroad Administration, are now being carried on at an operating loss.

The companies made these concessions then, not on any rate basis, nor for any railway advantage, and without regard to rates on other articles or railway returns or necessities—simply to meet a situation of national importance. The companies state that their action thus taken must not in any way be regarded as a measure for profitable transportation, and that it is absolutely impossible that railway revenues can be further affected by any rate reductions on any other commodities.

In view of the arrangement for freight reduction made with the railway companies, we are enabled to make the following proposals for reductions in customs duties upon agricultural implements.

Mr. ROBB: Has the minister any statement as to the difference between the new rate and the Canadian rate in force prior to 1912?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have no information before me as to that.

Including the 7½ per cent war duty reduction to which I have already referred, our proposals if adopted by the House will provide for a total reduction under the general tariff from 27½ per cent to 15 per cent on cultivators, harrows, horse-rakes, seed-drills, manure spreaders, and weeders, and complete parts thereof, and from 27½ per cent to 17½ per cent on ploughs and complete parts thereof, windmills and complete parts thereof, portable engines and traction engines for farm purposes, horse powers and threshing machine separators and appliances therefor.

On hay-loaders, potato diggers, fodder or feed cutters, grain crushers, fanning mills, hay tedders, farm, road or field rollers, post-hole diggers, snaiths and other agricultural implements, the resolutions will provide for a total reduction in the rate from 32½ per cent to 20 per cent, and a similar reduction on farm wagons.

In the case of cement, the war customs duty will be repealed and the general tariff rate will be reduced to 8 cents per hundred pounds. This is a reduction of 2 cents from the present general tariff rate.

The total estimated loss in revenue from the tariff reductions which we have proposed aggregates seventeen million dollars. Owing to estimated reduction in the total volume of imports into Canada due to diminished purchasing power during the current year and probable decline in prices as well, we may expect that, including the loss due to the reductions now proposed, we shall sustain a total loss in customs revenue for the present fiscal year of at least twenty-five million dollars. To partially offset this loss and close the gap of the deficit of fifteen million dollars between revenue and current expenditure which it would cause, we propose a heavy increase in income taxation.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Under the proposed changes mentioned by the minister a moment ago, does the Order in Council which was passed two years ago concerning wheat, now become permanent? In other words, are we to have free wheat between the United States and Canada?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We have had free wheat ever since the Order in Council was passed. I presented to the House the opinion of the Minister of Justice that the provision was on as permanent a basis as if it had been placed in a statute. But if my hon. friend has any doubt on the question, it would now be removed by the fact that we are providing, by the resolution which we shall lay before the House, for placing wheat, wheat flour, and semolina upon the free list to countries which do not impose duties upon those articles coming from Canada.

I was referring to our proposals with regard to income tax. We propose that all corporations shall pay ten per cent on their net income in excess of two thousand dollars. The present tax is six per cent. Shareholders shall be given credit for the normal tax to which they are liable upon dividends received from companies subject to this taxation. That is the same principle as applies to the present income tax.

In the case of individuals, we propose that the normal rate of four per cent shall be levied upon all incomes exceeding one thousand dollars, but not exceeding six thousand dollars, in the case of unmarried persons and widows or widowers without dependent children, and upon all incomes exceeding two thousand dollars but not exceeding six thousand dollars in the case of all other persons.

We propose a normal tax of eight per cent upon all incomes exceeding six thousand dollars.

We propose that the surtax shall commence from five thousand dollars instead of from six thousand dollars as at present, and shall increase by graduation, applying firstly to incomes between five thousand dollars and six thousand dollars, and to every two thousand dollars between six thousand dollars and one hundred thousand dollars.

Upon incomes in excess of one hundred thousand dollars, materially increased rates are levied.

The following compilation shows in detail what is proposed:

In addition to the normal tax rates which I have mentioned payable on incomes in excess of $1,000 in respect to unmarried persons and widows and widowers without dependent children and $2,000 in respect to all other persons a surtax will be payable as follows:

1 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $5,000 and does not exceed $6,000.

2 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $6,000 and does not exceed $8,000.

3 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $8,000 and does not exceed $10,000.

4 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $10,000 and does not exceed $12,000.

5 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $12,000 and does not exceed $14,000.

6 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $14,000 and does not exceed $16,000.

7 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $16,000 and does not exceed $18,000.

8 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $18,000 and does not exceed $20,000.

9 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $20,000 and does not exceed $22,000.

10 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $22,000 and does not exceed $24,000.

11 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $24,000 and does not exceed $26,000.

12 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $26,000 and does not exceed $28,000.

13 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $28,000 and does not exceed $30,000.

14 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $30,000 and does not exceed $32,000.

15 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $32,000 and does not exceed $34,000.

16 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $34,000 and does not exceed $36,000.

17 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $36,000 and does not exceed $38,000.

18 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $38,000 and does not exceed $40,000.

19 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $40,000 and does not exceed $42,000.

20 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $42,000 and does not exceed $44,000.

21 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $44,000 and does not exceed $46,000.

22 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $46,000 and does not exceed $48,000.

23 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $48,000 and does not exceed $50,000.

24 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $50,000 and does not exceed $52,000.

25 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $52,000 and does not exceed $54,000.

26 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $54,000 and does not exceed $56,000.

27 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $56,000 and does not exceed $58,000.

28 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $58,000 and does not exceed $60,000.

29 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $60,000 and does not exceed $62,000.

30 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $62,000 and does not exceed $64,000.

[Sir Thomas White.]

31 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $64,000 and does not exceed $66,000.

32 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $66,000 and does not exceed $68,000.

33 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $68,000 and does not exceed $70,000.

34 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $70,000 and does not exceed $72,000.

35 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $72,000 and does not exceed $74,000.

36 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $74,000 and does not exceed $76,000.

37 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $76,000 and does not exceed $78,000.

38 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $78,000 and does not exceed $80,000.

39 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $80,000 and does not exceed $82,000.

40 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $82,000 and does not exceed $84,000.

41 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $84,000 and does not exceed $86,000.

42 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $86,000 and does not exceed $88,000.

43 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $88,000 and does not exceed $90,000.

44 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $90,000 and does not exceed $92,000.

45 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $92,000 and does not exceed $94,000.

46 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $94,000 and does not exceed $96,000.

47 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $96,000 and does not exceed $98,000.

48 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $98,000 and does not exceed $100,000.

52 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $100,000 and does not exceed $150,000.

56 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $150,000 and does not exceed $200,000.

60 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $200,000 and does not exceed $300,000.

63 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $300,000 and does not exceed $500,000.

64 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $500,000 and does not exceed $1,000,000.

65 per centum of the amount by which the net income exceeds $1,000,000.

The following table furnishes a comparison of present and proposed taxation in respect of incomes ranging from $3,000 to $1,000,000 and over in respect of married persons and widows and widowers having dependent children:

Several amendments which the administration of the Income Tax Act has shown to be desirable will be submitted. The question of double taxation has given considerable difficulty. In view of the time which would be required to make international agreements respecting the matter we have thought it advisable to take the lead and provide for a deduction from the sum payable by a resident of Canada under our income tax legislation of the amount paid by him elsewhere in the British Empire upon income thence derived. We shall also provide for a similar deduction in respect of income derived from a foreign country extending similar exemption upon income derived from Canadian sources.

As this is a war year so far as public expenditures are concerned, and it is most desirable that we should maintain so far as possible our revenues, the Business Profits War Tax Act will be renewed for the current calendar year so as to make it apply to accounting periods ending on or before 31st December, 1919. The rates of the Business Profits War Tax Act which we are thus extending are as follows:

Businesses having a capital of $25,000 and over but less than $50,000, profits in excess of 10 per cent to be taxable—rate 25 per cent thereof.

Businesses having a capital of $50,000 and over (exemption for incorporated companies, 7 per cent; other than incorporated companies, 10 per cent); profits in excess of exemptions but not exceeding 15 per cent, rate of taxation 25 per cent; profits from 15 per cent to 20 per cent inclusive—rate of taxation 50 per cent; profits in excess of 20 per cent, rate of taxation 75 per cent.

In connection with both income and business profits taxation, I feel I should again call the attention of the House to certain considerations to which regard should, I think, be had in the general national interest. Canada is a country inviting immigration for settlement and capital and business enterprise for investment and development. We must be careful that our taxation of income and profits is not such as to place a barrier against either. In some provinces of Canada there are at present three sets of income taxes, municipal, provincial and federal. The result in these provinces is exceedingly heavy taxation upon individuals and business enterprise. Our business profits taxation, unless repealed as soon as war conditions terminate, must have an adverse influence upon the investment of money in business enterprise in Canada. At present there is a widespread tendency throughout the world to severely tax profits. Within bounds such a policy is not open to criticism, but carried beyond a reasonable point it can only defeat its purpose, with consequences detrimental to capital, labour and the community as a whole.

Tariff Revision.

Now, Mr. Speaker, having laid before the House the fiscal proposals which we have to make at this time, I feel the occasion opportune to make a statement respecting the important subject of general tariff revision.

The sound policy in this regard and the one which has been followed by all Administrations in Canada is that at certain periods, separated by intervals of eight or ten years, there should be a deliberate reconsideration and revision of the entire tariff schedules.

Such general revision becomes necessary in the national interest from time to time in order to adjust the tariff to the changed conditions which have arisen. In the intervals between general revisions the policy has been to make as few changes as possible in order that the business of the country which has adapted itself to existing tariff conditions may not be disturbed by sudden and unexpected change which always makes for uncertainty and lack of confidence. In 1897 there was a general tariff revision such as I have mentioned. In 1904 there was a revision of duties relating to a limited list of commodities embracing oils, glass, and woollen goods and provision was made for a special so-called dumping duty. This was not a general but a partial tariff revision. In 1907 there was a general revision, and in 1914 there was a partial revision. Had the war not occurred there would have been a general revision in 1916 or at the latest in 1917. The world-wide disturbance and unsettlement caused by the war and the organization of all production and business generally upon a war basis rendered such general revision out of the question for the time being. For the purpose of increasing the revenues of the Dominion and enabling us to defray in part our heavy war expenditure special war duties of 7½ per cent and 5 per cent were in 1915 added to the general and British preferential tariff rates respectively upon, with certain exceptions, all imports. The revenue received from this special war tariff has been as follows:

When it is considered that for this year we are budgeting to raise barely the amount of our current expenditure and shall be obliged to borrow for our capital and demobilization expenditure, it will be seen how necessary it is to maintain in greater part at least this war tax upon imports.

It would not be practicable at this time to make a sound general revision of the tariff. International trade is most unsettled, still hampered by war restrictions and prohibitions and by exchange conditions, which are and may long continue to be subject to violent fluctuations. Prices are unstable, and labour conditions, internationally speaking, most uncertain. Until peace is restored and the world is upon a more stable basis with respect to capital, labour, prices, markets, and exchange, the tariff cannot be revised intelligently.

It is my hope that within a year conditions will have become so stabilized as to permit of a general revision of the tariff, which is long, but, owing to the war, unavoidably overdue. Preceding such revision there should be a thorough inquiry conducted by the Minister of Finance and two or more of his colleagues representing the different geographical sections of Canada. Such inquiry should afford all interests, agricultural, industrial, fishing, lumbering, mining, commercial, and financial, producers and consumers alike, an opportunity of expressing their views and opinions and urging their particular needs and requirements. The result of such inquiry should be a body of information which will enable the Government to effect a general revision of the tariff fair to all parts of the community, and effectually promoting the national welfare of Canada. This inquiry should proceed with its work just as soon as conditions are sufficiently stabilized to permit. My own view is that it might well be commenced about autumn of this year.

Before closing my remarks I feel I should make some general observations as to economic conditions prevailing in Canada today. An outstanding feature of the business situation is the fact that a great part of our business activity is due to the continued heavy expenditure of public money.

The policy of the Government for the so-called reconstruction period of transition from war to peace basis as illustrated in its programme with respect to shipbuilding, better housing, railway betterments and extensions, public works, and other national undertakings, together with its contribution of war gratuities to soldiers and the creation of credits for the promotion of our external trade with Britain and other European countries is a vital factor in maintaining our commerce, domestic and foreign, keeping the wheels of Canadian industry turning and affording employment to hundreds of thousands of our people. The funds from which these activities and credits are financed and which aggregate many hundreds of millions of dollars are borrowed money. This being a war year—a year of dislocation and of readjustment, of business and industrial uncertainty, of general unrest and of high prices for the necessities of life, of demobilization and of re-absorption into civil life and occupation of our army, the Government is undoubtedly justified in the policy which it has adopted. To have pursued a timid or hesitating course with respect to making provision so far as possible for employment and for the promotion through public finance of our export trade in agricultural and manufactured products would have invited most serious conditions throughout Canada. During the unsettled period following the war Governments must do many things outside their function in ordinary times, which private enterprise through lack of resource or from apprehension as to the risk involved is not able or willing to undertake. It must, however, be pointed out that the continuation of such a policy is subject to strict limitation and that we must look forward and prepare for a time when the artificial support of employment and public financing of trade must be greatly reduced or discontinued and the industry and business of the country be re-established upon the normal basis of peace conditions. The sooner this can be accomplished the better it will be for the community as a whole.

In the meantime while the Government is, through the instrumentality of the public credit and otherwise, using every endeavour to alleviate conditions which have inevitably arisen out of the war and overcome the effects of the sudden cessation of the activities which it created it is the clear duty of all citizens to earnestly co-operate with the Government and with one another to the end that with the exercise of patience, goodwill, and high patriotic spirit we may tide over successfully this most trying and critical period in the national life of the Dominion.

I shall now read the resolutions:

Business Profits War Tax.

Resolved,

1. That it is expedient to amend The Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, as amended by chapter six of the statutes of 1917 and by chapter ten of the statutes of 1918, and to provide that the provisions of Section three of the said Act shall not continue in force after the thirty-first day of December, one thousand nine hundred and nineteen;

2. That with respect to every business liable to taxation under the said Act the period for which the returns shall be made and during which it shall be liable for assessment shall be at least sixty months, commencing with the beginning of the first accounting period ending after the thirty-first day of December, one thousand nine hundred and fourteen, or for such less period as the business may have been carried on from the beginning of the said accounting period to the end of the period for which the said tax may be levied under this Act;

3. That the word "commencing" be replaced by the word "ending" in the proviso to section twenty-six as enacted by chapter ten of the statutes of 1918.

Income Tax.

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the provisions of The Income War Tax Act, 1917, as amended by chapter 25 of the statutes of 1918, and to provide,—

1. That income liable to taxation shall include the salaries, indemnities or other remuneration of members of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada and officers thereof, of members of Provincial Legislative Councils and Assemblies, of Municipal Councils, Commissions and Boards of Management, of any Judge of any Dominion or Provincial Court appointed after the passing of this Act, and of all other persons, including those whose salaries, indemnities or other remuneration are paid by His Majesty in respect of His Government of the Dominion of Canada, or of any Province; excepting therefrom the income of the Governor General of Canada.

2. That the exemptions and deductions allowed from taxable income by paragraph (a) of subsection one of section three of The Income War Tax Act, 1917, be amended to provide for such reasonable allowance as may be granted by the minister, in his absolute discretion for depreciation; by striking out the exemption for any expenditure of a capital nature for renewals or for the development of a business; and by adding the provision that the minister when determining the income derived from timber limits shall make an allowance for their exhaustion.

3. That the allowance of two hundred dollars for each child under sixteen years of age who is dependent upon the taxpayer for support as enacted in paragraph (b) of subsection one of section three of The Income War Tax Act, 1917, as amended by chapter 25 of the statutes of 1918 be allowed for the purposes of the normal tax only.

4. That in lieu of the provisions of paragraph (d) of subsection one of section three of The Income War Tax Act, 1917, it be enacted that dividends received by or credited to shareholders of a corporation which is liable to taxation under the provisions of the said Act shall not be liable to normal tax in the hands of the shareholders but shall be liable to the supertax and surtax provisions of the said Act and to the surtax provisions of these resolutions. The amount of the exemption from normal tax to the shareholders shall not exceed the net amount of such dividends after the deduction of the interest or carrying charges, if any, in respect of such dividends. Provided, however,

(a) that in determining the income no deduction shall be allowed in respect of personal and living expenses, and in cases in which personal and living expenses form part of the profit, gain or remuneration of the taxpayer, the same shall be assessed as income for the purposes of this Act;

(b) that deficits or losses sustained in transactions entered into for profit but not connected with the chief business, trade, profession or occupation of the taxpayer may not be deducted from income derived from the chief business, trade, profession or occupation of the taxpayer in determining his taxable income.

5. That it be enacted in lieu of the provisions of subsection four of section three of The Income War Tax Act, 1917, that the share of a taxpayer in the undivided or undistributed gains and profits of a corporation shall not be deemed to be taxable income of the taxpayer unless the minister is of opinion that the accumulation of such undivided and undistributed gains and profits is made for the purpose of evading the tax and is in excess of what is reasonably required for the purposes of the business.

6. That dividends or shareholders' bonuses paid or credited to its shareholders by a corporation on or after January 1st, 1917, shall be taxable as income of the shareholder in the year in which the same are received or credited unless paid exclusively out of a surplus or accumulated profits on hand prior to the 1st January, 1917. No dividend or shareholders' bonus shall be deemed to be paid or credited out of surplus or accumulated profits on hand prior to the 1st January, 1917, if the earnings of the corporation since the beginning of the accounting period which ended in 1917 are sufficient to provide for the said dividend and other taxable dividends paid or credited since the said date.

(a) Income of a beneficiary of an estate shall be deemed to include the amount accruing during each taxation year to which he, his heirs or assigns are entitled from the income of the estate whether distributed or not.

(b) Any part of the remuneration of a taxpayer retained by his employer in connection with insurance, sick benefit superannuation, pension fund or plan shall be allowed as an exemption or deduction from the income of the taxpayer for income tax purposes, and any payment to an employee out of such fund or plan shall be included as taxable income of the employee.

7. That there shall be assessed, levied and paid upon the income during the preceding year of every person residing or ordinarily resident in Canada or employed in Canada or carrying on any business in Canada except corporations and joint stock companies, the following taxes:

(a) Four per centum upon all income exceeding one thousand dollars but not exceeding six thousand dollars in the case of unmarried persons and widows or widowers without dependent children, and exceeding two thousand dollars but not exceeding six thousand dollars in the case of all other persons;

Eight per centum upon all income exceeding six thousand dollars in the case of all persons.

And in addition thereto the following surtax:

(b) One per centum upon the amount by which the income exceeds five thousand dollars and does not exceed six thousand dollars;

Two per centum upon the amount by which the income exceeds six thousand dollars and does not exceed eight thousand dollars;

Three per centum upon the amount by which the income exceeds eight thousand dollars and does not exceed ten thousand dollars;

Four per centum upon the amount by which the income exceeds ten thousand dollars and does not exceed twelve thousand dollars;

Sixty-five per centum upon the amount by which the income exceeds one million dollars.

8. That in lieu of the provisions of subsection two of section four of The Income War Tax Act, 1917, as amended by section three of chapter 25 of the statutes of 1918, it be enacted that corporations and joint stock companies, no matter how created or organized, shall pay ten per centum upon income exceeding two thousand dollars, but shall not be liable to pay the surtax; any corporation or joint stock company the fiscal year of which is not the calendar year shall make a return and have the tax payable by it computed upon its income for its fiscal year ending within the calendar year for which the return is being made.

9. That any persons carrying on business in partnership shall be liable for the income tax only in their individual capacity. Provided, however, that a husband and wife carrying on business together shall be deemed to be partners for any purpose under The Income War Tax Act. 1917.

10. That a member of a partnership or proprietor of a business whose fiscal year is other than the calendar year shall make a return of his income from the business, and his tax shall be computed upon the basis of his income from the business for the fiscal period ending within the calendar year for which the return is being made.

11. That it be enacted in lieu of the provisions of subsection five of section four of The Income War Tax Act, 1917, that taxpayers shall be entitled to the following deductions from the amount that would otherwise be payable by them for taxes under the provisions of the said Act:—

(a) The amount paid by such taxpayer under the provisions of Part 1 of The Special War Revenue Act, 1915, and any amendments thereto or The Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, and any amendments thereto: Provided that in computing the taxable income hereunder, the taxpayer shall not include any taxes paid under the said Acts in the expenses of his business, and the minister shall have power to determine any questions that may arise in consequence of any difference in the several periods for which the taxes under the said Acts and under the proposed legislation respectively are payable, and the decision of the minister thereon shall be final and conclusive. In the case of a partnership each partner shall be entitled to deduct such portion of the tax paid by the partnership under The Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, and any amendments thereto as may correspond to his interest in the income of the partnership, provided that such deduction shall not affect the liability of the taxpayer to tax hereunder in respect of any income which does not form part of the profits assessed under The Business Profits War Tax Act, 1916, but such incomes shall be assessed for income tax purposes, in the same manner as if it were the only income of the taxpayer.

(b) The amount paid to Great Britain or any of its self-governing colonies or dependencies for income tax in respect of the income of the taxpayer derived from sources therein and the amount paid to any foreign country for income tax in respect of the income of the taxpayer derived from sources therein, if, and only if, such foreign country in imposing such tax allows a similar credit to persons in receipt of income derived from sources within Canada; provided, that such deduction shall not at any time exceed the amount of tax which would otherwise be payable under the provisions of section three of chapter 25 of the statutes of 1918, or these resolutions, in respect of the said income derived from sources within Great Britain or any of its self-governing colonies or dependencies or any foreign country; and further provided, that the said deduction shall be allowed only if the taxpayer furnishes evidence satisfactory to the minister showing the amount and other particulars of income derived from sources within Great Britain or any of its self-governing colonies or dependencies or any foreign country.

12. That in lieu of the provisions of paragraph (i) of section five of The Income War Tax Act, 1917, it be enacted that the net income derived from any bonds or other securities of the Dominion of Canada, issued exempt from any income tax imposed in pursuance of any legislation by the Parliament of Canada, after the deduction of the interest or carrying charges, if any, an respect of such income, shall not be liable to taxation thereunder.

13. That every person required to make a return of his income under subsection one of section seven of The Income War Tax Act, 1917, who fails to make a return within the time limited therefor shall be subject to a penalty of twenty-five per centum of the amount of the tax payable, and every other person who is required to make a return under the provisions of the said section who fails to do so within the time limited therefor will be subject to a penalty of ten dollars for each day during which the default continues, and all such penalties shall be assessed and collected from the person liable to make the return in the same manner in which taxes are assessed and collected. Provided that the minister may on application extend the time for making a return in such circumstances as he may approve.

14. That the date of assessment fixed by subsection one of section ten be changed from the thirtieth day of April to the thirty-first day of October, and in default payment within one month from the date of the mailing of the assessment notice, a penalty of five per centum of the amount of such tax shall be added thereto, and thereafter a further penalty of one per centum per month shall be added for each additional month or portion thereof during which the said tax and penalty remain unpaid.

15. That the minister may refund any tax or penalty wrongfully or illegally assessed and collected but no refund shall be allowed because of any alleged error in the assessment unless application therefor is made within twelve months of the date of the payment of the tax or penalty.

16. That any chartered bank of Canada shall receive for deposit without any charge for discount or commission any cheque made payable to the Receiver General of Canada in payment of tax or penalty imposed by this proposed legislation, whether drawn on the bank receiving the cheque or on any other chartered bank in Canada.

17. That excepting such provisions as are applicable to income tax returns and assessments of income for the year 1919, and accounting periods ending in 1919 and subsequently, and as are applicable to income tax return and assessments of income for the year 1918, and accounting periods ending in 1918, and subsequently, all other provisions of the proposed legislation shall, for the purpose of administration, be deemed and construed as having force and effect as from the date on which The Income War Tax Act, 1917, came into force.

Mr. SPEAKER: Does the House consent that the hon. gentleman shall have permission to withdraw his motion?

Mr. McMASTER: I am quite willing to withdraw the motion in order to give hon. gentlemen an opportunity of asking questions.

Mr. SPEAKER: There being objection I must put the motion.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

THIRD READING.

Bill No. 19 to consolidate and amend the Railway Act.—Hon. J. D. Reid.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT AMENDMENT.

PILOTAGE AND HARBOUR MASTERS.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Ballantyne Bill No. 122 to amend the Canada Shipping Act (Pilotage and Harbour Masters) was read the second time and the House went into Committee on the Bill, Mr. J. M. Douglas in the Chair.

On section 1—Minister may be appointed pilotage authority by Governor in Council:

Mr. BALLANTYNE: When the resolution was before the Committee some days ago I explained the object of this Bill. First, it is to enable the Governor in Council to take over the pilotage system in accordance with the recommendation made by the Royal Commission appointed about a year ago. I refer to the ports of Halifax, Sydney, St. John, N.B., Victoria, Vancouver and Nanaimo. The object of the introduction of this Bill is to very much increase the efficiency of the pilotage system, something that is greatly needed at the present time. Secondly, it is to increase the dues on ships of over 1,000 registered tons from $5 to $7, in order that the harbour masters in certain ports instead of only being able to draw a maximum of $600 a year, providing that the fees reach that amount, will be enabled to draw $1,200, provided the fees reach that amount.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is that not the same Bill that came up the other day?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: No, this is a different Bill.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is there a modification?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The Bill that the hon. member refers to dealt with the case of the harbour masters at the port of Halifax. This applies to the harbour masters of other ports.

Mr. VIEN: Do I understand the minister to say that this clause, 432, will authorize the minister to supersede the pilotage corporations in various districts?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: No, it does not do that. The pilotage systems of Quebec and Montreal have been under the Minister of Marine and Fisheries for twelve or thirteen years. It in no way interferes with the local pilotage authorities. It simply takes jurisdiction out of the local pilotage commissions at the ports I name and vests that authority in the Governor in Council, or with reference to these ports, in the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the same as it is in regard to the ports of Quebec and Montreal.

On section 3—Harbour masters' salaries increased from $600 to $1,200:

Mr. McKENZIE: In the harbour of Sydney there are no dues or charges against ships coming in. Does this Act provide for a new schedule of charges against ships coming into that port?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: At North Sydney the dues levied against ships in the year 1918 amounted to $839.50. The harbour-master there draws a remuneration of $600. If the dues on ships amount to $1,000 his salary will be $1,000, but in any event it will not exceed the maximum amount of $1,200. The object of this Bill is to increase the tonnage dues on ships over 1,000 tons from $5 to $7 in order that these underpaid harbour-masters may draw a maximum salary of $1,200 each providing the dues reach that amount.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Has the minister appointed a harbour-master at the port of Canso yet?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am sorry I cannot answer the hon. gentleman now, but I shall inquire. I noticed his question on the Order Paper and I hope to be able to give him the information in the course of a day or so.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The harbour-master at Canso died some months ago, and I was informed that the Civil Service Commission was to make the appointment. I have not heard that an appointment has been made. I would like to know if the appointment has been made and who the officer is.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I will be very glad to look into that and let the hon. member know at the earliest possible moment. Unfortunately, I was ill for four months, and I was not able to keep up to date with all these things that transpired during my absence.

On the preamble:

Mr. VIEN: Might I ask the minister what he understands by the provision that he shall supersede the existing pilotage authority?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Outside of the ports of Montreal and Quebec they have local pilotage commissions and they give their services voluntarily. The object of this Bill is to do away with the local pilotage commissions, and to invest the Minister of Marine with the same authority that he now enjoys as regards the ports of Quebec and Montreal—we want to put all the ports of Canada on the same footing.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is there any general provision under this Act for the pensioning of pilots? I understand that in the case of the river St. Lawrence pilots there is an arrangement under which a retiring pilot receives a pension. The minister will find, after administering the pilotage branch of his department for a short time, that there will be a great deal of dissatisfaction unless a uniform system of pensions for pilots is adopted. Is there any provision whereby the same practice which prevails in regard to the St. Lawrence pilots will be applied to the pilots of Halifax, Sydney, and other ports, which the minister is bringing under the control of the department?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The hon. gentleman's point is very well taken. Unless we have uniformity as regards pensions there certainly will not be satisfaction in the case of the pilotage systems throughout Canada that are now coming under the control of the Minister of Marine. The only pilots that receive a pension at the present time are those in the Quebec district. In 1906, when the Hon. Mr. Brodeur was Minister of Marine, there were one hundred and sixteen pilots in that district, which was deemed too many, and in order to reduce the number to seventy-five—there are only sixty-one at present—it was agreed by Order in Council at that time that when a Quebec pilot reached the age of sixty-five he should be retired on a pension of $300. The amount required for paying the Quebec pensions has to be voted by Parliament each year, but the hon. gentleman is quite right in his statement that the pension should not be restricted to Quebec pilots. Therefore I hope, providing it meets with the approval of the Government, to introduce legislation at the next session of Parliament, to either discontinue the pensions to the Quebec pilots, or to grant a reasonable pension to the pilots generally. I am very much in favour of the latter course, because the pilotage examination is now very strict. I have in mind one pilot in the Quebec district, a young man of only thirty-eight years of age, who was not able to pass the eyesight test this year. When pilots have to go through a long apprenticeship and serve a number of years as branch pilots, and then fail to pass the necessary examination, which is a strict one and takes place annually, there should be some provision made for them in the way of a pension.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I understand the earnings of the Quebec pilots are pooled, and the amount divided at the end of the year, each pilot receiving the same sum. Am I correct in that? If so, what were the average earnings of those pilots last year?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: All the pilots in the Quebec district do not receive the pension of $300 annually voted by Parliament, but only those who were in the service at the time the Order in Council referred to was passed. When those pilots reach the age of sixty-five they are retired on a pension of $300—the pilots that entered the service subsequent to the passing of that Order in Council do not receive a pension from Parliament, but draw a pension from the pilotage pension fund, to which the hon. gentleman has just referred. The gross earnings of the Quebec pilotage district amounted last year to $125,000.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: How much did that yield to each pilot?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I understand the pilots have a very large fund amounting to something like $90,000, and they give each pilot $300 a year, but the fund is administered by the pilots themselves.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The minister does not mean that the total earnings of a pilot for a year would only amount to $300?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: No.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I want to ascertain how much each pilot earned during the year out of the business?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: That would depend a great deal upon the number of trips that each pilot would make. Some pilots earn $1,200 a year, the maximum earnings being about $1,800. The steamship companies sometimes prefer to have a certain pilot always pilot their boats, and therefore some favoured pilots make more money than others.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I am not certain that I correctly apprehend the situation with respect to pensions from the statement of the minister. I understood from the discussion which took place the other evening, that pensions were paid to retired pilots, but were not paid to pilots in active service. Am I correct in that understanding? I can see no ground why a pilot earning from $1,200 to $1,800 should get any pension from the Government, but there is very good reason for pensioning a pilot who has spent his life in the service and becomes incapacitated for duty if there is a pension system for that purpose. Do I understand that the active pilots who earn a certain amount each year also receive a pension?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Two systems of pensions apply to the Quebec pilots. Under the one, pilots that were in the service in 1906 are retired when they reach the age of sixty-five and are given a pension of $300, which is annually voted by Parliament. Under the other system, pilots that might not possibly pass the pilotage examination, from poor eyesight or other causes, receive a pension from the Pilots' Pension Fund.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Then some pilots that were in the service in 1906, and are still pursuing their calling and earning a certain amount every year, also receive a pension?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: They will not receive a pension while they are in the service, but when they attain the age of sixty-five years they will be retired on a pension of $300 a year. The Order in Council passed in 1906 is very specific in its terms that the pilots referred to are to receive such pension, and I felt that we could not ignore its provisions. However, at the next session of Parliament I think it would be well to adopt a pension system, as the leader of the Opposition has suggested, applicable to all the pilots throughout Canada, and not merely to those in the Quebec district.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Does the Government provide boats for the pilots?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What does that cost the country?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: That would depend upon the port to which the hon. gentleman has reference. I have not got the details of the information here, but the department does provide pilot boat at all the leading ports.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I understand that the pilots of Halifax, St. John and other ports along the Atlantic coast, supply their own boats. When they go out to meet steamships they do so in their own boats and pay the expenses of those boats. In the case of the St. Lawrence pilots, however, it seems that the Government furnishes them with boats. My question is: How many boats is the Government operating at Quebec or Rimouski, and what is the annual cost of maintenance?

[Mr. Sinclair.]

Mr. BALLANTYNE: We have only one steamer. I am sorry I did not anticipate that question being asked. I will certainly try to get the information for the hon. member. In as far as the ports of Halifax and St. John are concerned, they did provide their own boats, and if we took over those pilotage systems I think it would be only right that we should provide boats for the pilots. All the pilots ought to be treated in the same way.

Mr. PELLETIER: For the information of the hon. member for Guysborough, I may say that the only boat furnished by the Government is at Father Point. At the time the Government made the change from Bic to Father Point the pilots had their own schooner to go from the wharf to the steamers coming up there. The change involved an added distance of 18 miles, and it was understood then that the department would supply the pilots with a boat. They have only one boat at Father Point to take the pilots from the wharf to the steamers and from the steamers to the wharf.

Mr. McKENZIE: The pilots of the harbour of Sydney have an Act of incorporation and have been conducting their business entirely under their own control. They have officials of the organization and also of the pilotage commission. The dues are collected, I think, at the customs house at North Sydney and Sydney and then passed over to the secretary of the association, who divides the money among the pilots. Now I understand some new machinery will be created by which the pilotage business will be conducted under the control of the department. I mentioned to the minister the other day that there are some officials connected with that work who will likely be put out of office altogether, and I would like to know if he has anything in contemplation as to what he is going to do with them. It is pretty hard lines to deprive men altogether of their means of livelihood. The secretary of the pilotage commission and the chairman are on salary, and also the secretary-treasurer of the association. I think it is rather the custom of the Government, when a radical change of this kind takes place, to look after, in some degree at all events, the old officials, as no doubt the changes are made in the general advantage of the country. It was no doubt for that reason that the pension system was adopted by the department in 1906 in connection with the change made in the St. Lawrence pilotage system. Now that this change is taking place I would like to know if the minister has any well defined policy as to what he is going to substitute for the machinery that is now looking after the pilotage systems in such places as St. John, Halifax and Sydney Harbour, and also on the Pacific coast, where there must be some pilotage companies of the same class and character.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: It is not our intention to interfere with any of the permanent officials. There is at Sydney a secretary by the name of Mr. Kimber, and it is not our intention, so far as I know, to replace him. Of course the local pilotage commissions will disappear. I understand there are four pilotage commissioners there drawing a very small remuneration, but as a rule these commissioners give their services gratuitously. That will be the only change, with the exception that we will appoint a local superintendent of pilots there who has had seafaring experience and holds a master mariner's certificate. In all other respects the pilotage system will remain the same, except that the regulations will be carried out a little more strictly, and, I hope, a little more efficiently.

Mr. McKENZIE: Has the minister determined what kind of a man he wants as superintendent of pilots? I notice that there is an age limit as to the pilots themselves. Has the minister thought of any age limit or any particular qualifications for the superintendent that he proposes to appoint?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I have not set any particular age, but I would like to get a man somewhere around forty or forty-five, or in any event not older than fifty,—a seafaring man who holds a master mariner's certificate and thoroughly understands navigation, in order that he can keep the pilotage system under his charge in the highest possible state of efficiency. We have not definitely fixed what his remuneration will be, but we hope to make it fair and reasonable. Such appointments would have to be made by the Civil Service Commission on the recommendation of the Department of Marine.

Mr. McKENZIE: I understand the minister to say that there is to be no change of officials that are really necessary for the carrying on of the work now. At the present time there are two men in connection with the pilotage commission in Sydney, a treasurer and paymaster and a secretary. The latter is Mr. Kimber; I forget the name of the paymaster. I understand that those officials are to be continued, and that the same system of collecting dues from the ships will obtain just as it does now.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I will qualify my answer by stating that it is not our intention to disturb the local conditions at all. The dues will be levied and collected in the usual way, and we hope to retain all of the officials there. But if the local superintendent should report to the department that it will not be necessary to have a secretary and also a treasurer—I do not know that he will so report—some action might have to be taken. It is hard to anticipate what recommendations will be made; but generally speaking it is not my intention or that of the department to interfere in any way with those old efficient officials.

Mr. McKENZIE: Under present conditions the pilotage commissioners meet twice a year to receive applications for the positions of pilots and pilot apprentices. If a pilot dies or gets too old, some one must be appointed to take his place. How is that class of work to be carried on now, and how are apprentices to be obtained and appointed? How are pilots to be appointed, say, in Sydney harbour?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: If a vacancy occurred in the pilotage system at Sydney or if apprentice pilots were required, the local superintendent of pilots would make the necessary recommendation to the general superintendent of pilots whom I hope to have at Ottawa in charge of all local superintendents. In that way we get the necessary information. We are guided very largely by the advice of the local pilotage man and of the general superintendent of pilots here.

Mr. McKENZIE: The shipping at Sydney Harbour is very large indeed; it must rank third among the shipping lists of Canada. The maintaining of the pilotage system there at a first-class standard is very important to shipowners and to the good name of the port. I fear that the minister will find it difficult to maintain an efficient system by depending entirely upon some one individual who has exclusive jurisdiction in the selection of apprentices and pilots. I understood the minister to say the other day that some form of examination would be prescribed for these pilots. Will this examination be held at local points? It would be inconvenient for men at St. John, Halifax or Sydney to be obliged to go to Ottawa for examination. Moreover, persons concerned in these examinations would like to know as soon as possible what kind of examination they will have to pass.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The Quebec district has 62 pilots and 10 apprentice pilots; the Montreal district has 51 pilots; Sydney has 33 pilots and 7 apprentice pilots. We have found the system under the Minister of Marine and a competent local superintendent to work admirably in the Montreal and Quebec districts. The examinations would, of course, be held locally. Here is just a line or two from the recommendations of the Royal Commission which was appointed to inquire into the conditions in these pilotage districts:

> That the tests for the eyesight and hearing of the pilots, and present apprentices, be conducted on a standard basis, the same system applying in the various districts.

The basis for examination will be the same in all the ports. They go on to say:

> That such tests should be held annually in the cases of pilots and apprentices under the age of 65, and semi-annually in the case of pilots between the ages of 65 and 70.

They further recommend that pilots and apprentice pilots undergo each year an examination as regards eyesight, colour-blindness and hearing, before a medical officer and an officer of the Department of Marine, both selected by the minister; and that sight tests shall be the same as those passed by candidates for masters' and mates' examinations. I assure hon. members that my only object in asking the Committee to pass this Bill is that of improving the standard of the pilotage system of Canada. The shipping people are asking for this legislation; the Royal Commission strongly recommends it. Our experience in Montreal and Quebec districts has been so eminently satisfactory that I have no hesitation in recommending the adoption of the Bill.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

RED CROSS SOCIETY INCORPORATION ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden (Prime Minister), Bill No. 130, to amend an Act to incorporate The Canadian Red Cross Society, was read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. J. M. Douglas in the Chair.

On section 1—Purposes of the society extended to include work in times of peace.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The section which is proposed to be amended, section 2 of chapter 68 of the statutes of 1909, reads as follows:—

> The purposes of the society shall be,—
> 1. To furnish volunteer aid to the sick and wounded of armies in time of war, in accordance with the spirit and conditions of the conference of Geneva of October, 1863, and also of the treaty of the Red Cross or the treaty of Geneva of August twenty-second, 1864, to which Great Britain has given its adhesion;
> 2. To perform all the duties devolved upon a national society by each nation which has acceded to said treaty, but in affiliation with the said British Red Cross Society;
> 3. To succeed to and take over al the rights and property heretofore or now held and enjoyed by, and all the duties heretofore performed by, the unincorporated association known as the Canadian Red Cross Society.

It is proposed by this Bill to add to that section as subsection 4, the following:—

> "(4) In time of peace to carry on and assist in work for the improvement of health, the prevention of disease and the mitigation of suffering throughout the world."

When the Bill was introduced, I explained that there had been held at Geneva a convention at which a number of the Red Cross societies of the world were represented, and at which a conclusion was reached that the Red Cross societies should undertake work of this kind in time of peace. The idea impressed itself very much upon the representatives of the different nations assembled at the Peace Conference at Paris, and when the Covenant of the League of Nations was finally presented and accepted, it included this clause:

> The members of the League agree to encourage and promote the establishment and co-operation of duly authorized voluntary national Red Cross organizations having as purposes the improvement of health, the prevention of disease and the mitigation of suffering throughout the world.

President Wilson when he presented the final draft of the League of Nations' Covenant at a plenary session of the Peace Conference held on the 28th April, last, spoke of this article as follows:

> Article XXV specifically mentions the Red Cross as one of the international organizations which are to connect and work with the work of the League.

The purpose of this Bill is merely to empower the Canadian Red Cross Society, in connection with other societies of a similar character throughout the world, to continue to carry on its work in time of peace as well as in time of war.

Mr. ALFRED THOMPSON: Representatives of the Red Cross organization, the St. John Ambulance Association, the St. John Ambulance Brigade and the Victorian Order of Nurses met in Ottawa about two or three months ago with the idea and for the purpose of uniting these four organizations into one organization for work in Canada. At that meeting it was generally understood that an amalgamation of these four organizations would take place. Later on something happened whereby the Red Cross Society changed its attitude towards the suggested movement. I might say, in explanation, that the Red Cross Society has up to this time been an organization which functions only during times of war. The St. John Ambulance Association has been functioning during times of peace and carrying on a rather extensive teaching programme which has resulted in turning out first aid assistants to physicians and others in need of that kind of work. The St. John Ambulance Brigade is an organization which employed these trained students and administered that particular part of the work. The Victorian Order of Nurses, as every hon. member knows, is a nurses' organization, the ramifications of which pretty well cover Canada. It seemed to the representatives of these four organizations that, to prevent over-lapping and also to prevent these different organizations from so-to-speak, ploughing the same field for funds to carry on their work, it would be a good thing to combine them. I was, therefore, somewhat surprised the other day to find the Prime Minister bringing in this amendment to the Act to incorporate the Canadian Red Cross Society. I am not yet quite sure as to why the Red Cross Society, a war organization, is now desirous of carrying on the same work in times of peace, in view of the fact that there are in this country other organizations already organized for that work, including a teaching staff to turn out these voluntary aid nurses, an organization to administer them and the Victorian Order of Nurses as well. I am not particularly criticising this amendment; I am speaking rather with the idea of getting a little more information upon the policy of the Red Cross Society now since it intends entering an entirely new field, that is to say, to function during times of peace.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not know that I can give my hon. friend very much more information than I have given already. I did not know anything about the meeting to which he alludes, and I think it would be most desirable that there should be a working arrangement between the organizations in question. But I should like to point out to him that there cannot be this working arrangement until this society receives the power which it is asking for now, and I should not imagine there would be any possible objection to giving to a society which has done such wonderful work in every country throughout the world during the war an opportunity of continuing and extending its usefulness during times of peace. It is to be hoped that those who are entrusted with the management of the different organizations in question will not be led astray by any feeling of jealously or rivalry, but that they will unite in a common and concerted action and co-operation for the purpose of doing the most good that they can. But it is quite impossible for this society to engage in any work of the kind until it receives the power which by this amendment it is proposed to give it.

Mr. COWAN: I am very much pleased to hear the words of the Prime Minister, because they are words with which I thoroughly agree. I was present at the meeting referred to by the hon. member (Mr. A. Thompson), and I know the attitude that was taken there. The purpose was not to amalgamate all these organizations; the purpose was to have a working arrangement between them. It would be most undesirable at the present time to have two or more large bodies, well recognized and all holding good positions in the life of our people, engaged in similar work. We want to prevent everything in the shape of overlapping, so that the interest of the people will be best served at the least possible cost. For that reason we are desirous of having a working arrangement between all these organizations, and I hope the Prime Minister will render all assistance possible in seeing that that arrangement is brought about.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I certainly shall use all my influence towards that end, because I entirely agree with what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Cowan) has said. In speaking of the excellent service that has been given by the Red Cross, I hope I shall not be understood as lacking in appreciation of the splendid work done by all the other organizations which have been spoken of this afternoon.

Section agreed to.

Bill reported, read the third time, and passed.

TECHNICAL EDUCATION.

RESOLUTION TO PROVIDE $10,000,000 FOR THE PROVINCES IN AID OF TECHNICAL EDUCATION.

On motion of Hon. J. A. Calder (Minister of Immigration) the House went into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution, Mr. J. M. Douglas (Strathcona) in the Chair:

1. To bring in a measure for the promotion of Technical Education in Canada.

2. That for the purpose of promoting and assisting technical education in Canada, the following sums, aggregating ten million dollars, shall be appropriated and made available for payment out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada, during each fiscal year for the period of ten years beginning with the year ending the thirty-first day of March, one thousand nine hundred and twenty, namely:—

(a) During the fiscal year ending the thirty-first day of March, one thousand nine hundred and twenty, the sum of seven hundred thousand dollars;

(b) During the fiscal year ending the thirty-first day of March, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-one, the sum of eight hundred thousand dollars;

(c) During the fiscal year ending the thirty-first day of March, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-two, the sum of nine hundred thousand dollars;

(d) During the fiscal year ending the thirty-first day of March, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-three, the sum of one million dollars;

(e) During the fiscal year ending he thirty-first day of March, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-four, the sum of one million, one hundred thousand dallars; and the like sum of one million, one hundred thousand dollars during each of the succeeding fiscal years until the expiration of the fiscal year ending the thirty-first day of March, one thousand nine hundred and twenty-nine.

Such sums, subject to the conditions of the proposed legislation, shall be allotted and shall be paid quarterly as grants to the governments of the several provinces in proportion to the population of the said provinces respectively as determined by the last federal census.

[Mr. Cowan.]

3. That the grant payable to any province in any year shall not exceed the amount provided for each province by the foregoing resolutions, nor shall it exceed an amount equivalent to that which the Provincial Government shall expend on technical education within such year.

4. That in determining the grant payable to any province annually, no acount shall be taken of any liability or expenditure incurred by the province for the acquiring of land, the erection or improvement of any buildings, or the supplying of furnishings or equipment for any technical education institution established in the province prior to the first day of April, 1919.

5. That the payment of the grants hereinbefore authorized shall be made subject to the following terms and conditions:—

(a) All payments shall be applied and used for technical education in the manner agreed upon by the minister and the government of each province; every such agreement shall be approved by the Governor in Council;

(b) No portion of any grant shall be used in whole or in part in meeting any liability or expenditure of any kind whatsoever incurred in any province prior to the first day of July, 1919, for lands, buildings, furnishings, or equipment secured or provided for technical education purposes;

(c) Not more than twenty-five per centum of the annual grant payable to any province shall be applied for acquiring land, erecting, extending or improving buildings or supplying furnishings and equipment;

(d) There shall be forwarded to the minister annually by each province taking advantage of the provisions of the proposed legislation a report setting forth the work done in such province in promoting technical education, containing such details and information as may be prescribed by the minister;

(e) The minister shall be the sole judge of all questions and differences that may arise under the proposed legislation or under any agreement made in pursuance of the proposed legislation;

(f) Every province receiving a grant shall furnish the minister with such evidence as he may require to show that the grants paid hereunder are expended for technical education as provided by the proposed legislation.

6. That any portion of any appropriation authorized under this proposed legislation which may remain unexpended at the expiration of any of the said fiscal years, shall be carried forward and remain available according to its apportionment for the purposes of this proposed legislation during any one or more of the succeeding years; provided that not more than twenty-five per centum of any annual appropriation shall be so carried forward and remain available without the approval of the minister.

7. This proposed legislation shall not apply to any province until the Government thereof has by Order in Council approved its provisions and signified its desire to take advantage thereof.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will the minister please explain the principle of the resolution?

Mr. CALDER: Probably a brief general statement from me at the present time will expedite the work of the Committee before we get down to consideration of the clauses in detail. It will not be necessary for me at this stage to make any extended remarks with reference to the desirability of providing for technical education throughout Canada. That is a matter that has been discussed in the House time and again in the course of the past ten years, and as I understand the situation, there has practically been unanimity in the view that some action in this regard should be taken. If I mistake not, the last time the subject was before the House was in 1915, on a motion introduced by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), and there was at that time a very full discussion of the whole subject. At the conclusion of the debate the Hon. Mr. Rogers, then Minister of Public Works, intimated to the House that it might be expected that the Federal Government would at an early session bring down a measure providing for federal assistance to the cause of technical education.

The resolution before the Committee sets forth the conditions under which the Federal Government now purposes to give assistance to the provinces in the carrying on of technical education work. It will be remembered that in 1910 a Royal Commission was appointed to investigate this whole subject. The commission consisted of seven members, with Dr. James Robertson as chairman. The commissioners were gentlemen eminently qualified to carry on that investigation, and a very large number of meetings were held throughout Canada in about a hundred different places. Considerable evidence was taken, some 1,400 or 1,500 witnesses having been called.

The whole situation in Canada was very carefully and exhaustively reviewed, and in addition to their work in the Dominion the commission went abroad, conducting investigations in England, Scotland, Ireland, France, Germany, Switzerland, and the United States, with a view to ascertaining what these countries had done in the way of providing for vocational and technical education. As a result of all these inquiries held in Canada and abroad, the commission prepared an exhaustive and elaborate report, which was submitted to Parliament in 1913. Any member of the Committee who desires to make himself thoroughly acquainted with conditions that existed at that time in Canada and in the foreign countries which the commission visited will find that report a veritable storehouse of useful and interesting information. Indeed, the report of that commission is regarded as one of the best treatises that can be found anywhere on the subject of technical education, and any member interested in the questions involved in the subject will find a perusal of the report profitable. The report recommended that the Parliament of Canada should set aside annually a sum of $3,350,000 for a period of ten years to assist the provinces in carrying on vocational work and technical education. The Government has not seen its way clear to adopt the recommendations of the commissioners in that respect. The investigations and report were made prior to the war, the report having been submitted in 1913, and every member of the Committee will realize that conditions in Canada to-day are not what they were in 1913.

The statement made to-day by the hon. Minister of Finance clearly indicates the obligations that have been cast upon the Dominion Government as a result of the war. I have no hesitation in saying that in my judgment the provinces are at present in equally as good a financial position as the Dominion, if not better, and consequently there is not the necessity now for rendering assistance to the provinces to the same extent as there was in 1913 or prior to that date. At any rate, the Government, after a careful consideration of the entire situation, has come to the conclusion that for the present at least we should not attempt to provide the amount of federal assistance that was suggested by the commission. The purpose of this resolution is to provide for this work, covering a period of ten years, grants aggregating $10,000,000 for distribution among the provinces, the grants to begin this year at $700,000 and to be increased annually by $100,000, until a maximum total appropriation of $1,100,000 is made available; and that to continue until the end of the ten-year period. In adopting this scale we have followed the plan that was adopted in the case of grants under the Agricultural Aids Act passed by parliament some years ago. In other words, the grants under the proposed Bill for technical education will be on all fours with those that are payable under the Agricultural Aids Act, and the distribution in the main is along practically the same lines, although there is a slight variation which I do not think is necessary in this case. I think probably it might save time if I should leave the details of the scheme for consideration when we come to each clause.

Broadly speaking, it is proposed that we should, by agreement with the provinces, undertake to expend for technical education purposes a sum beginning with $700,000 to be increased gradually up to $1,100,000, the whole to be spread over a period of ten years, and the total amount expended at the end of that time to be $10,000,000. Last year this subject was brought up at the Provincial Conference held in Ottawa,—the largest conference, I think, that has ever been held here. The subject was very fully discussed and at the conclusion there was practically a unanimity of opinion that there would be no difficulty in carrying out a plan of this kind. In previous debates in this House a good deal of attention was given to the question of jurisdiction. In the debate which occured in 1916 on the motion of the hon. member for Maisonneuve, probably the greater portion of the discussion centered around this question, and while that point may be to a certain extent at issue, we were assured at the conference held last fall by all the provinces that they did not anticipate any serious difficulty in this direction. It was rightly pointed out that under the Agricultural Aids Act they have experienced very little if any difficulty. The Minister of Agriculture here, and the Ministers of Agriculture in the provincial Governments, have readily been able to arrive at an agreement whereby the moneys provided by that Act should be expended.

All the provincial prime ministers who were present at the conference held last fall assured the Federal Government that they did not anticipate the slightest difficulty in that regard. They also assured us that, to make certain that these moneys were properly and legitimately expended they would not put any difficulty in the way of the Federal Government going into these institutions and seeing that the money was expended for the purpose for which it had been provided. If the measure is approved by the Committee and the House I think we may anticipate no trouble in that connection.

It seems to me that it is not necessary at this time to say anything as to the advisability of having work of this kind done. While many of our provinces have established technical educational institutions, while they are carrying on vocational training in its various branches, and while many are conducting industrial night schools, I think we will all agree that the amount of work of that kind which is being done in Canada is not as extensive as it should be. There is an actual need for an advance in this respect. We all know what the condition is throughout the world. There is going to be keen competition in the industrial field and, if Canada is going to play her part in the struggle that we must expect for some years to come, it seems to me that it is absolutely necessary that we should take a forward step in the direction of fitting the workmen engaged in our industries, and also in training the youth of the land, so that we may become supreme in our various industries. Work has been done in this direction in most of the provinces and every credit must be given for what has been accomplished in that direction. We have some splendid technical institutions in Canada now. The number is not as large as it should be. These institutions are very costly as regards capital expenditure and maintenance. I think all will agree with me that everything that can be done by the Federal Government in rendering assistance in order that this work may be extended throughout Canada will be very generously approved not only by Parliament, but by the people of Canada as well.

Mr. McKENZIE: Mr. Chairman, I am sure that we entirely agree with the minister in the statement that he has made that no argumentative persuasion is necessary to convince this Committee that technical education is a prime necessity in this country. That is one of the subjects upon which we are all agreed. It was in 1910 that the commission, with Dr. Robertson at its head, was appointed in connection with technical education. I had the pleasure of attending some of the sittings in different parts of the country, and I was pleased to see that they were going so thoroughly into the subject. Although I never had the opportunity of reading their report, I believe it is a first-class accumulation of useful information and direction along the lines for which the commission was appointed. I also agree with the minister that at this stage in the life of Canada, when it is so absolutely necessary that we should take a first position in all productive efforts, it is essential that our manufactures should be of the first order and that everything that is turned out in competition with keen producers in other parts of the world should be of the finest quality and the best workmanship. When we consider all these things it is to be understood at once how necessary it is for us that our workmen and women should have the proper training and education to compete with producers all over the world.

We have in Nova Scotia a very excellent technical college. That college was established at a great deal of expense, possibly an amount of money that might be regarded as a little beyond the capacity of the province at the time. Nevertheless, the people have approved of the expenditure and many of our young people have received more benefit from it perhaps than from the expenditure on any other educational institution in the province. There is a working arrangement between the different universities and the college by which two years of training in any one of the universities counts for attendance at college, and in two years more students can get their degrees in the particular lines in which they seek to graduate, such as engineering or whatever else they might set out to study. It is well to make this technical education as practical, and to bring it as close to the people, as possible. In Nova Scotia we get the benefit of the larger training and the wider knowledge that is acquired at that college through several smaller schools all over the province principally in connection with our coal mines. We have small branches established here and there in which classes are trained so as to enable them to pass for the different grades of officers in connection with the coal mines. They take the courses for underground manager, manager, and other positions, all of which call for an examination, and candidates have succeeded in passing most creditable examinations by attending these schools, which are usually night schools. I would suggest that, in co-operation with the local authorities all over the Dominion, the minister should encourage the improvement of these local schools. They are now working under disabilities. The teacher can only be given a small salary and he is usually a man who has to work for his living during the day, giving perhaps three or four nights in the week to the work of teaching in these schools. The schools have done excellent work in encouraging our young men. It is to be stated with pride that, whereas twenty or thirty years ago we have very few of our own young men acting as mine managers in Nova Scotia, and we had to get managers from Scotland, England and Wales, the condition is entirely reversed now. Although we have ten times as many managers now as then, we have scarcely any person in charge of our works except our own men who have received their education in our own schools and colleges. I hope the minister will find it convenient and possible to extend this line of education to all the industries in the country.

In large manufacturing centres it is highly desirable that technical education should be introduced among the workmen, and matters so arranged that it would be an advantage to any person engaged in any class of manufacturing in this country that he or she shall have passed a course of training in some one of these schools.

I wish to point out to the minister on thing in connection with shipbuilding in Canada. Some forty years ago Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island carried on a great deal of shipbuilding, largely wooden ships, but it had rather gone out of vogue and comparatively very few people were paying any attention to it. Since the war there has been a revival in shipbuilding on our Pacific and Atlantic coasts, but the sad part of it is that in many cases it was extremely difficult to find anybody who knew anything about the building of a ship. I know of an instance in my own county where men grouped themselves together, formed a company, and started to build ships, but they found it very difficult indeed to acquire the services of an experienced shipbuilder. I think they ultimately found in Newfoundland a man who possessed the necessary qualifications. Now seeing that wooden shipbuilding and iron and steel building are pretty much along the same lines, I would suggest to the minister that broader fields of this kind should be considered and the expenditure of this money should not be confined to any narrow limits. Rather the greatest possible expansion should be given to our ideas in this direction, and thus put Canada on the highway to prosperity in all the lines of commercial enterprise, productiveness, and development generally, for which we are so well fitted and which the resources of the country render us so capable of undertaking.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I must congratulate the minister on taking this step and I am very pleased indeed that something is now being done to promote the spread of technical education. I have been a member of this House for some fifteen years and the subject has been discussed on several occasions, but we have been very slow in the matter of accomplishment. If there is a criticism to make it is that the resolution does not apply to the current year.

Mr. CALDER: It applies to the current year.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Then I withdrew my criticism in that regard. Another point I wish to make is that the Federal Government should not tie up the provinces in matters affecting technical education where the business can better be conducted by a Provincial Government and the whole responsibility thrown upon it. The present administration seems to be working out a policy by which the local legislatures will be tied up to the Federal authority. That would appear to be evident in connection with the housing and road-building policies and the present technical education scheme. I think it would be more in the interest of the country if, when there is money that can be spared for local purposes, that money should be given at once in the form of a subsidy to the local Government and the responsibility thrown upon it of making the expenditure in the best interest of the province.

In regard to the proposal which we are now considering, a good deal will depend upon the administration. In the province from which I come domestic science and manual training are taught in the main public schools; and in the mining districts as my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) has said, we have had for a good many years schools for training miners in the technical part of their education. Then in the industrial centres there are night schools and other schools where boys can take a course in technical education. The question I want to raise is whether the money expended in various directions on technical schools by a province will be counted in the total estimate of the amount to be contributed by it? Do I understand that the proposition we are considering means that if $100,000 is contributed by the Federal Government to a province, the latter must put up an equal amount? If I am correct in that, then, for example, in the province of Nova Scotia, where some of the schools giving instruction in manual training, domestic science, and so forth, are supported by the town or municipality, will the money so furnished be counted in the $100,000 that will be contributed by the province? As I say a good deal depends on the administration, and if the minister insists that the money contributed by the province shall be devoted entirely to what is called in a narrow sense technical education, it will make a great difference in the administration of the Act.

Mr. CALDER: It will be noticed from the resolution that in determining the grant payable to any province no account shall be taken of any liabilities or expenditure incurred by the province for the acquiring of land, the erection or improvement of any buildings or the supplying of furnishings or equipment for any technical educational institution established in the province prior to the first of April, 1919. That is, no account shall be taken of capital expenditures heretofore incurred by the province.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I am not referring to capital expenditures.

Mr. CALDER: I am just coming to the point which was raised by the hon. gentleman. In so far as the scheme generally is concerned it is not proposed that the Federal Government should grant any assistance to the provinces for carrying on domestic science, vocational training, nature study, manual training, or any of that class of work in our elementary schools. Courses in such subjects are now given by the various provinces of Canada in all the elementary schools; that instruction is going on throughout the country. For example, in the rural schools of Saskatchewan they are now teaching cooking and sewing, and the farm boys are taught manual training and kindred subjects. Some reports were furnished me the other day by one of our inspectors who looks after certain foreign-speaking districts in the province, and the class of work that is carried on even amongst our foreign-born people in the rural portions of Saskatchewan, and the success which has been achieved, is really amazing. Practically the the same sort of instruction is being carried on in all the urban centres of Canada; and the provinces have come to recognize their responsibility for these new forms of elementary school work. So it is not intended, under this resolution, or under the Bill to be founded upon it, to take into account at all whatever expenditures are made by the provinces in that direction.

I am speaking of the education that is given to the boys and girls in the ordinary elementary schools, or even in the ordinary high schools, because certain phases of that work are carried on in the high schools as well.

There is another branch of what is referred to by the leader of the Opposition; that is, certain industrial classes that are held not for teaching youths or children, but young men who are actually working in industries, and some of the provinces have embarked on a very large programme in that regard. This Bill will be administered by the Minister of Labour. I have had a good many conversations with him, and he has in mind that that is one of the most important features of the work to be done. While we must have our technical educational institutions, that is, the large institutions thoroughly equipped in order to give the technical training associated with those institutions, we cannot bring that type of institution to everybody, and his idea is that wherever it is possible to give workmen who are in their ordinary employment the benefit of technical education by bringing instructors to them in order to increase their efficiency, that should be done. Because, after all, the results that can be secured under measures of this kind are not entirely attributable to large buildings and costly equipment. More, in my judgment, depends upon the instructor than upon anything else, and as far as possible the moneys provided by means of these grants should be used for the purpose of securing proper instructors and training them. In the United States —where they have given a great deal of attention to the subject, more so than we have here, and where they have made far greater advances than we have—under, I think, the Smith-Hughes Act of 1917, they provide for a co-operative scheme with the States, and the grants are payable entirely for the purpose of providing salaries for instructors and for training them, because they realize, as I am sure we realize more and more every day, that that is really the heart of the whole situation. We must have the men who can give proper instruction in the various classes of subjects to be taught. I do not know whether I have met the hon. gentleman's point or not.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: With regard to the mixed system which we have in our province, part of the money that supports those technical schools is contributed by the provincial governmeent and part by the towns. Will that money count in the total for the province? I see no reason why it should not.

Mr. CALDER: It is not proposed that any contribution made by a municipality for the establishment or maintenance of one of these institutions shall be taken into account. That is a matter of arrangement betweeen the provincial Government and the local authorities. It is proposed that our grant shall equal the amount that is expended by the province. What arrangement it cares to make with the municipality is a matter of its own concern.

Mr. FIELDING: I would ask the minister whether the exact terms of these resolutions have been the subject of discussion with the provincial governments; and, if so, whether they are acceptable to those governments. Of course, I know the scheme can only apply to any province after the Governor in Council has approved of the agreement entered into with the province. But sometimes we may propose something, which, however good its intention, the provincial governments may not be able to take advantage of. I am afraid there is something of that in our efforts to aid highways. But in this case my question is whether the provincial governments have been made aware of these resolutions and have intimated that they will be satisfactory.

I would like to emphasize the point raised by my hon. friend (Mr. J. H. Sinclair). I was about to ask the same question—whether the department here would insist upon limiting the expenditure to the sum paid by the Government of the province directly, or whether it might be expended under the educational system of the province, perhaps not by the provincial government but by the municipalities. The mere fact that the work is done by the municipalities does not condemn it if it is technical education. I suppose when we have the Bill before us my hon. friend will give us a better definition of what he considers is technical education under the Act, and perhaps until the Bill is brought down it will be just as well to reserve criticism. But it will be necessary to have a definite understanding on these two points: first, as to what is the technical education to which this money may be applied; and, second, if technical education is carried on in any province by arrangement between the provincial government and the municipalities why should not that count in. I only ask my hon. friend to give it consideration in framing the Bill. I have in mind the mining schools in Nova Scotia to which my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition referred. They have been doing good work in that province and they are strictly technical institutions. I have no doubt that it will be possible to adapt this measure to the conditions existing in the different provinces.

At six o'clock the Committee took recess.

After Recess.

The Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. O. TURGEON: Mr. Chairman, it has long been expected that some action would be taken in the matter dealt with by this resolution. Some time ago a commission of inquiry went fully into the subject of technical education and industrial training, and the report which it submitted received the admiration of all countries. At last the recommendations of this report are being put into effect. In New Brunswick we have been very much in need of technical education in all its branches, and I have no doubt that the Provincial Government will co-operate in every possible way to make this measure a success.

Such matters as technical education, highways, and so on may be dealt with by the Dominion Government in such a way as to constitute an infringement of provincial rights. I have always been an advocate of provincial rights, and I believe that there is no stronger or more sincere advocate of provincial rights than the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Calder) who presents this resolution. I remember that in 1913, when a Highways Bill was proposed which would have curtailed provincial rights, no Provincial Government was more pronounced in its opposition to that proposed infringement of provincial rights than the Government of which my hon. friend was a member at that time. My hon. friend from Alberta (Mr. Sifton) was also a strong advocate of provincial rights. The provinces of Canada are all examples of just and progressive administration of provincial affairs. Nova Scotia has certainly been a worthy example of the proper administration of provincial matters. Quebec is noted all over the Dominion as a province which is strong in its administration of local affairs. Ontario is also strong and determined in its provincial administration, and the provinces of the West have been properly administering the matters which come under their jurisdiction. I have always contended that the subsidies paid to the provinces by the Dominion are insufficient. Last autumn when the provincial Premiers met in conference at Ottawa a demand was made for an increase of the subsidies paid to the provinces. I would have been pleased had that increase been granted, and the provinces thus been put in a better position to look after such things as housing and highways and technical education. The provinces have not been able to make progress in these matters because of the lack of means. Some of the provinces have taken these matters up, however, and have dealt with them to the extent of their ability to do so. In Quebec there are a great many technical institutions which are a credit to the province and would be a credit to any province.

I congratulate the minister upon bringing forward such a measure as this; he has done one good thing in this Government, if he has done nothing else. I hope that with the knowledge that he has of the ability of the provinces to conduct their own affairs; with the confidence that he has in the men administering the affairs of the provinces, and with his solicitude for the maintenance of provincial rights, he will be able to impose his will upon his colleagues in the same direction in the future. I hope that the Government will not bring forward any further measure which may have a tendency to infringe upon provincial rights. Had the provinces the means to do so, they would deal with these matters according to their own judgment and with all the ardour which they have displayed in other matters. It is time the attention of the Government was directed to the tendency of the Federal authority to encroach upon provincial rights. The Minister of Immigration, as I have said, was certainly a great "provincial righter" when he was in the Provincial Government, and his transfer to the Federal Government certainly has not changed his principles in that regard.

Mr. CALDER: The question which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Turgeon) has just raised is a very large one; it goes very much beyond the provisions of this resolution or of the Bill to be founded upon it. I thoroughly concur in the view that he expresses. It is very unfortunate that the relationship between the Federal Government and the provinces has not been so established that the provinces can carry on the work assigned to them under our constitution. For many years they have been pleading lack of funds, and in my judgment there is a great deal to be said in favour of that plea. As to matters of education, highways, and things of that character, there is no doubt in my mind that the provinces should be left to carry on the work which, under the British North America Act, they were evidently intended to carry on. However, the question of the adjustment of the subsidies paid to the provinces is a very large one; probably it will be some years before it is definitely settled. One or two slight adjustments have been made since Confederation. I think all the provinces to-day take the ground that the arrangement is a very unsatisfactory one from their point of view, having regard to the many changes that have taken place since 1867.

The hon. member is not quite right when he says that at the conference of provincial premiers and representatives last autumn, a general request was made for enlarged provincial subsidies. At that conference the question of the transfer to the Western Provinces of their natural resources came up for consideration, and in connection with that matter it was suggested that if the Western Provinces received their natural resources, the other provinces should receive increased subsidies.

I am not going to debate the question now, but generally speaking, I thoroughly concur in the view set forth by my hon. friend that if an arrangement could be made whereby the provinces could receive larger subsidies it would be an advantage if they were allowed to carry on and administer those local matters which it was intended by the British North America Act they should carry on. But I think it will be some time before an agreement is reached between the federal and the provincial authorities on this subject.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have listened with a great deal of interest to my hon. friend, and I think his remarks are quite timely. Yet I do not believe, as the minister has stated, that in the resolution there is any infringement of provincial rights. As I have on two occasions moved resolutions praying the Government to give effect to the report published by the commissioners on technical education, without, however, carrying conviction, I am rather pleased to see that to-day the Government is giving effect in part to that very able report. Of course, when the subject of education is brought before the federal House grave problems are found to be involved. But in those debates to which I have referred I endeavoured to draw a distinction between technical education as such and education in the sense in which it is understood generally and which makes between this Parliament and the local legislatures such a cleavage of opinion. Constitutionally, of course, the Federal Parliament cannot deal with matters of education.

As regards technical education, it would be playing on words to suggest that the question as it presents itself constitutes an infringement on the provincial powers with regard to the larger issue of education, because we have already in this Parliament provided, for instance, by the erection of the military college at Kingston, education in connection with military matters, which are under Dominion jurisdiction. We have in another sense provided education in matters of agriculture, which is a question which comes concurrently under both provincial and Dominion jurisdiction. I was always of opinion that in connection with trade and industry this Parliament was justified in promoting the cause of technical education. Although some of the provinces have, during the last twenty-five or thirty years, taken quite a lead, yet all credit must be given to the little province by the sea, Nova Scotia, which many years ago was the pioneer in matters of technical education. That is the reason why the men from Nova Scotia have so distinguished themselves not only in the political field, but in the industrial and educational lines throughout the Dominion. It is because in that little province, there is a thorough and most effective system of education, and technical education is not the least feature of the larger system. I am proud to say that Ontario has gone pretty far in matters of technical education, and of late the province from which I come has accomplished considerably in that field. We have in Quebec at present what I consider the banner institution as regards technical education. Those who have visited in Montreal the technical school on Sherbrooke street will not hesitate to say that it is the finest institution of the kind in Canada and one of the finest in America. I have not the statistics at hand, but I know from the report of the Provincial Secretary that the establishment of that school in our province has produced very satisfactory results.

I will give only a solitary instance of what has been accomplished by that school. Four years ago I met at Drummondville a farmer's son who had just received his degree at the Technical Institute at Montreal. It was at the time when young men were asked to help towards the production of munitions, and technical experts were needed in various establishments to promote that production. That young French Canadian, having received a letter of introduction from your humble servant, went to one of the munition manufacturers in Montreal, and inside of six weeks he was at the head of that establishment. He was not more than twenty-one years old and was already receiving a very large salary. There I had a concrete example of what technical education can accomplish.

I know that, as a rule, speaking for my province, while the men of Quebec have an ingrained intelligence for industrial work, they have lacked that last finishing touch which technical education will develop. In the last five years there has been quite a change in this connection, and our young men have become leaders of industry. I have that from no less an authority than Lord Shaughnessy himself. The Canadian Pacific, as hon. members are aware, employs a large number of technical experts in its shops throughout Canada, and I know that in the district of Montreal, the young men who have passed through the technical school are now getting large salaries and steady employment from our railway companies and large industrial firms. Therefore, I see with pleasure the determination of the Government to do something practical towards promoting the cause of technical education throughout Canada. We all know that the success of Germany notably, and also of the United States, and of the Mother Country, in industrial fields, is due chiefly to the high technical education which has been spread throughout the industrial districts of those countries.

Now that this unfortunate war is over, and now that, as we were told this afternoon, our country must produce not only in the field of agriculture, which is the basic industry of Canada, but also in the industrial lines, the more we spend wisely on technical education the greater will be the part that our production will play in the commerce of the world.

There is only one thing I regret, and it is the fact that this legislation comes so late. In connection with this matter and others too, the Government should have started its programme during the war. Its present measure seems to be rather tardy. However, "better late than never," and I shall vote with pleasure to carry on this policy. I said a moment ago that I appreciated the remarks made by my hon. friend from Gloucester (Mr. Turgeon) in regard to provincial autonomy. But I believe that there are safeguards in the legislation which is being promoted by the hon. Minister of Immigration and Colonization. Subsection (f) of the resolution provides that every province receiving a grant shall furnish the minister with the necessary evidence to show that the grants paid are expended for technical education as provided by the proposed legislation. This is a safeguard for both the province and the Dominion. The Dominion Government has the right to see that such moneys as are advanced are spent for the object intended, and that object alone the same as in the case of the moneys given to the provinces for the promotion of agriculture. A grant is made yearly to the various provinces and the Federal authorities exercise a moderate control of the same nature as that now proposed. I am quite sure that my hon. friend (Mr. Calder), knowing the several provinces as he does, will have no difficulty in coming to an understanding with the provincial authorities, and that there will be between the Provincial Governments and the Dominion Government an entente cordiale on this particular subject. As I said a moment ago, I do not wish to delay the Committee, but I desire to express my sincere approval of this policy of promoting technical education in the various provinces of the Dominion. The report of the commission appointed in 1910 to investigate the question, and which was tabled many sessions ago, is a most interesting one. Indeed, it is creditable to Canada that such a report should have been published. The report itself is too bulky to be properly read with any expedition. It needs to be studied and inwardly digested, and to do it adequate justice would take time. But Professor Robertson has prepared a synopsis which ought to be read by every member of the Committee. He goes much further than the question of technical education in industrial and trade matters. He wants technical institutes for the fishermen and the farmers, and I suppose the day will come when the Government will give effect to the views expressed by Professor Robertson and thus implement the conclusions arrived at by the Commissioners who prepared that highly interesting report.

Mr. CALDER: The hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) said he thought there would be no difficulty in coming to an agreement with the several provinces. When the Bill is before the House it will be seen that it is so worded as to be quite elastic in that respect, and I think that is only proper. In a country such as Canada, where varying conditions exist and with the many industries that we have, it was felt that the law should not be too rigid, and that the question as to the manner in which these moneys should be used should largely be made the subject of an agreement between the federal and the provincial authorities. Personally, I think that principle is a sound one and I have not the slightest doubt, from the discussions that took place at the conference last fall, that there will be no difficulty whatever in coming to a proper working arrangement with each of the provinces. We shall have an opportunity of considering all the details of the Bill in Committee, and unless there is some other matter in connection with this resolution requiring explanation, I would suggest that the resolution be allowed to go through, with the opportunity for further discussion in view.

Mr. McKENZIE: Before the resolution is passed, I would call the attention of the minister to the system of distribution of this money as here set forth. Before six o'clock, when I was speaking on the matter, I had not an opportunity of carefully reading the resolution. Since then I have read it, and I submit to the minister that the method by which he proposes to distribute the money to the provinces is not in harmony with the system of free school education which has been established in nearly every province. In the old days poor children could not be educated because their fathers could not pay for their education. We largely surmounted that difficulty by establishing free schools, and perhaps our own province was the pioneer in this respect. There is in the smaller and perhaps poorer provinces just as much talent, ingenuity and ambition among the young people as in the larger and more wealthy and populous provinces. Now, if there is a poor province that cannot put up money for technical education it will receive none of this grant, and in any case it will not get any more than dollar for dollar on what it contributes. I ask the minister seriously to consider the question of making some proper provision in this respect. The idea is to help the genius of our people in the way of technical education, and there should be nothing to prevent the minister from distributing this money in such a manner as will effect that purpose. If a province has no money and cannot contribute for technical education $10,000, $20,000 or $30,000, or whatever amount may be sufficient to inaugurate the system, its people will not be helped at all. That was not the method in connection with the road grants. Twenty million dollars is supposed to be distributed to the provinces for good roads. I understand that a lump sum is granted each province and the balance of the vote is divided among the provinces according to population. In that case the small province benefits fairly well with others that are more wealthy and populous.

In this case, the province will not get more than it puts up. Take a small province like Prince Edward Island with its very excellent talent. There is no province in Canada that has better men along technical, industrial and educational lines than the little province of Prince Edward Island. But when it comes to putting up thousands of dollars for the purpose of education, I am afraid it has not the revenue. The same thing to a great extent is true of the newer provinces such as British Columbia, and the result is that the bulk of this money will go to the two big, wealthy provinces of Ontario and Quebec. They are very much better off and better equipped for carrying out technical education without any help than the smaller provinces. I wish seriously to remind the minister and the Government of this particular part of the scheme and to urge them to see that nothing is allowed to happen that will defeat the purpose of the vote.

Mr. CALDER: If this resolution is adopted I think we might take it for granted that the principle that the hon. gentleman has referred to might be left for further consideration. Both in regards to agricultural aid and highways there is a provision whereby some of the provinces get a special grant. That is not done in this case but it is worth considering whether or not the same principle should be applied here. If the resolution is agreed to I think we could have an understanding that when the Bill is before us that principle is still open for discussion.

Mr. LEMIEUX That is, that a minimum will be fixed?

Mr. CALDER: Yes.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I hope the minister will not forget the suggestion I made in relation to industrial towns. There are industrial towns that are very anxious to have technical schools and they have levied a tax of a certain amount to establish and maintain these schools. If the province is not in a position to furnish the money, I see no reason why the towns should not be allowed to assess themselves to assist the province in establishing technical schools or why the money contributed should not count in the amount contributed by the province.

Mr. CALDER: I will bear that point in mind. I think it is well worth consideration. Let me put it in concrete form. In the city of Peterborough, for instance, they are desirous of establishing a technical school. They are prepared to put up the necessary building, provide the equipment, and so on. The provincial government may not feel justified in giving a grant towards this institution but the local people are prepared to put up the money to take care of the capital expenditure and maintenance. Under the law, no grant would be available for that institution unless the province contributed to it. It is worth while to consider whether or not this grant should be made available if the municipalities, instead of the province, are prepared to assist a scheme of this kind.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: To my mind there is a possibility of this money being practically all consumed by large cities like Toronto and Hamilton and that towns even as large as Peterborough will not participate in it to any great degree. Technical education, like education of any kind, is something that should be scattered broadcast throughout the country and it should be made possible for boys and girls in every part of the province to attend these schools if they so desire. It does not seem to me that there are any arrangements made whereby that can be worked out.

Mr. CALDER: The question as to where these institutions shall be established and what money shall be expended in connection with them is all a matter of agreement between the provincial government and the Minister of Labour.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: I quite understand that but the point I desired to make was that under the present provincial system that is practically what happens. When the Dominion Government is stepping into the field and giving $10,000,000, I think there should be some guarantee that this money shall not be concentrated in the large cities, because they only supply a small percentage of the people.

Mr. PEDLOW: What are the reasons for the provisions in paragraph 4 and paragraph 5, subsections (b) and (c)? If the Dominion is prepared to make the grant that is provided for by this resolution it will be well to consider carefully the provisions that these paragraphs seem to make. Take a municipality like the town of Renfrew. They are considering the advisability of erecting a new collegiate institute in conjunction with which there is to be a technical school. They have arrived at a difficult point in their consideration of the proposal. The difficulty is that, whereas the municipality pays the entire cost of constructing the building, the pupils coming from outside the municipality pay nothing towards the cost. Over 55 per cent of the pupils come from outside the municipality, and it is considered very unfair that the municipality should provide the building and equipment for the education of pupils who come from the outside. Therefore, it is contended they should receive assistance towards the building and equipment of the institution that provides education facilities for children who are not in the municipality. They have made application to the Provincial Government for assistance towards the erection of that building. I would like to know if it is the intention of this Government to allow a part of the grant, if this resolution is carried, for a specific case of that kind or must it be used only for the maintenance of the institution, no part of the money to be provided being used for the erection of the building?

Mr. CALDER: Under clause 3 of section 5 provision is made to the effect that not more than 25 per cent of the grant payable to any province may be used for capital expenditure. Just where and how these moneys shall be used for capital expenditure will be a matter of agreement between the province and the Federal Government.

Mr. PEDLOW: Why make an exception in applying a part of the grant to institutions which are already in existence? For instance, I understand, there is in Montreal a splendid institution in operation and doing excellent work. Why not provide in section 4 that part of this money shall be applied towards the improvement or extension of that institution? As I read the section in its present form that cannot be done.

Mr. CALDER: As I explained this afternoon, the purpose of this grant is to provide for new work, not to take care of old expenditure. The whole amount would be eaten up by past expenditures if we were to adopt the hon. gentleman's suggestion.

What we want to do is to provide for new technical institutions and not take care of expenditures which have been already made.

Mr. PEDLOW: But suppose in the case of the institution referred to it is desired to extend the building?

Mr. CALDER: There is nothing here that will prevent a grant being made providing it is to be applied to an extension. This provision only prohibits using these grants for past expenditures and does not relate to new outlays.

Mr. PEDLOW: Then the Bill to be founded on this resolution will make provision for that?

Mr. CALDER: Yes.

Resolution reported, read the first and second time and concurred in.

Mr. Calder thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill 131, for the promotion of Technical Education in Canada.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. J. A. CALDER (Minister of Immigration) moved that the amendment made by the Senate to Bill No. 52, to amend the Immigration Act, be now considered, and that Rule No. 29 in relation thereto be suspended.

Mr. SPEAKER: This motion, of course, can only be entertained by unanimous consent.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into Committee on the amendment, Mr. J. M. Douglas in the Chair.

Mr. CALDER: Section 2, paragraph (II) of the Bill as it left the House provides that:

> Canadian domicile is lost, for the purposes of this Act, by a person voluntarily residing out of Canada not for a mere special or temporary purpose, but with the present intention of making his permanent home out of Canada.

The Senate proposes that these words be added to the paragraph:

> That his Canadian domicile be lost of a person temporarily residing out of Canada, or by any person belonging to the prohibited or undesirable classes within the meaning of section 41 of this Act. Section 41 enumerates the prohibited classes, and the paragraph in question is so amended that any person belonging to these prohibited classes shall not be considered as obtaining Canadian domicile.

Motion agreed to.

Senate amendment reported and concurred in.

SUPPLY.

The House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. J. M. Douglas in the Chair.

Department of Railways and Canals.

> Compassionate allowance to Mrs. G. Peterkin, mother of late Herve Bazinet, who was drowned in discharge of his duty while in the employ of this Department on the Lachine Canal, on May 9, 1918, $2,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I draw the minister's attention to an accident which took place about the month of June last on the Intercolonial between St. Pacôme and Rivière Ouelle, as a result of which one man was killed. I think the cause was a collision between two engines. The hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) and myself happened to be on the spot and saw the victim of the accident. Compassionate allowances have been given to the relatives of other victims, and I do not see why the same provision should not be made in this case.

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways and Canals): Does the hon. gentleman know whether the victim was an employee of the Government or not?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes, he was an employee of the Government.

Mr. J. D. REID: Then he would come under the Workmen's Compensation Act. The hon. member will recollect that we passed a Workmen's Compensation Act last session under which in cases of accident or death the employee or his representative is compensated.

> Canals—Staff and Repairs and Statistical Officers, $1,842,500.

Mr. J. D. REID: That is the same amount as last year, with the exception of the increase for the permanent staff.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What are the increases covered by the $200,000?

Mr. J. D. REID: It is the increases to the lock men and the repair men on the canals.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does the minister find that he has any applications from returned soldiers for the positions of lock men?

Mr. J. D. REID: All appointments of employees on these canals are made by the Civil Service Commission, and so far as I know only returned soldiers are appointed. I have insisted that in every case where returned soldiers are available, and can fill the positions, they are to be appointed. Up to the present time there has been no trouble in filling these positions with returned soldiers. The positions are suitable for returned men who have been wounded and are only capable of light outside work. It is only when a vessel locks through the canals that the men really are employed, and it is not hard work. So far the men have appreciated it.

Mr. McKENZIE: In the case of three or four applicants for one vacancy, is there any system by which the department makes its selections from returned men?

Mr. J. D. REID: The chief engineer makes application and the appointments are made by the Civil Service Commission. I have never interfered. But I did suggest to the engineer—at least, I have asked for it in my own constituency, and I think it is a good policy to follow—that he select men in this way: The man that should have the first opportunity of taking the position should be a wounded man who is married and has a family; the second choice should be a married man who has served overseas for a certain length of time and has not been wounded; the next a single man who has been wounded at the front; the fourth a single man who has fought at the front and has not been wounded. The Commission have been able to find men who have families, and I think a man who left his family of small children and went overseas and then returns wounded should have the first choice of any position we can give him.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think the system of selection set forth by the minister is fair. If there is no other way of selection, I would even suggest that the length of service should count. In the case of two men one with three years' service at the front in the trenches and another with only a year's service, all other things being equal, I would give the preference to the man with the longer service. In this part of the country where the canals are close to the department I suppose there is closer supervision than is possible in remote districts. In the case of the St. Peter's canal—the only canal we have, as far as I remember, in the Maritime Provinces—I have heard complaints that the selection of men to fill vacancies was made by the lockmaster rather in a partisan way, and of course that is not the intention of the minister—

9 p.m.

Mr. J. D. REID: Oh, no.

Mr. McKENZIE:—nor of the department. I have received letters from that part of the country saying that the lockmaster was prevailed upon to make appointments which were not consistent with the merits of the applicants.

Mr. J. D. REID: I understand that the Civil Service Commission advertise in almost every case. Possibly they may have asked the lockmaster for information as to the qualifications of applicants. I do not know what means they take for obtaining such information. The main point I wish to emphasize is that I asked the chief engineer when he is making the applications, that if there are men in that particular locality who have been at the front and have been wounded and probably are not able to do any hard work, such men should get the preference. It is not a question of politics; I would not stand for that for one minute. A man might be overseas for four years and not get wounded, while another man might be over for only two years and come back wounded and incapable of doing other work. In that case I would feel that the man who is really unable to perform other work, but would be able to fill one of these positions, should be appointed. I have had them hold positions open in my own constituency until the men came back. I remember a case of a returned man with a wife and three children who was shot through the arm, rendering the limb stiff so that he could not do any hard work, but he was quite qualified for one of these canal positions. Of course, in a case like that he would get the preference over returned men who were not wounded, and were capable of undertaking any kind of work.

At all events, we are employing only returned soldiers. If others have slipped in, it is without my knowledge. Further, we have been making places for returned soldiers by letting out men who have other means and are able to get along without doing this work.

Mr. McKENZIE: What I meant was that, other things being equal, there being no other means of differentiating between two men who were applying, I suppose the question of military service would come in.

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member will understand that we do not know anything about the man who has the position until he comes with his certificate from the Civil Service Commission. There was a case in my own county where a married man with a family and a single man were applicants for a position, and the single man got the certificate. All we can do in a case of that kind is to bring the matter to the attention of the Civil Service Commission, in which case the commission might reconsider it.

Mr. McKENZIE: I must say that I have heard no complaint in this regard except the one I have mentioned. I suggest that the minister cause an inquiry to be made as to how many men were put on the St. Peter's canal, and how they were selected, or by whom they were recomended.

Mr. J. D. REID: I shall be glad to do that.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: How is a returned soldier to apply for a position, say, on the Intercolonial railway? Suppose he wants to be a cleaner in a roundhouse, or a brakeman, to whom is he to make application?

Mr. J. D. REID: To the superintendent of the division. As my hon. friend knows, the Government railways do not come under the Civil Service Commission. The President, Mr. Hanna, thoroughly understands the policy to be followed in that regard; returned soldiers must have the preference in all cases where they can be obtained. Of course, the selections must be made a little more carefully for a railway than, perhaps, for other branches of the public service. The position to be filled might be one of responsibility, where life was at stake. But now that the soldiers are practically all home you can get a returned man for almost any position. So far, I have been able to do so.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I understood that there was a mechanical officer at Moncton who looked after all applications for positions in the mechanical department in the whole of the eastern division.

Mr. J. D. REID: Of course, the superintendent may hand the application over to the head of the particular department in which the man wishes to be employed, and there his application would be considered. Many applications come to me from persons who do not understand that the department has nothing to do with these appointments. These applications are forwarded to Mr. Hanna, who has them sent to the proper officials.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I have been asked whether returned soldiers take precedence in the matter of appointments to others holding temporary positions on the railway, and I could not give a definite answer. Let us assume that in one of the roundhouses, or on a particular section of the road, a number of men are temporarily employed and a returned soldier is anxious to get one of these positions; is it the policy of the Government to make room for the returned soldier by letting one of those men off?

Mr. J. D. REID: The policy is this: Wherever a new man is taken on a returned soldier must have the preference. But the brotherhoods insist upon their men being promoted; they will not allow a man to be dismissed to make room for some one else.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Then you make a distinction between permanent employees and temporary employees in that matter?

Mr. J. D. REID: Well, I could not say as to that; I would have to take that up with the officials. But all men must be employed temporarily at first, no matter what the positions are. The hon. member probably refers to men who are taken on for a month or two months. In all cases, whether the position is one to be filled for a day, a week, or two or three weeks, the returned soldier has the preference. But if there is a vacancy in a roundhouse, and if there is a man below who belongs to the union, he would be promoted to the position vacated, and his position would, in turn, be filled by a returned soldier. But you have to follow out the rules of the union; you cannot deprive a man of his promotion.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Then I understand that if there are some temporary employees in a roundhouse and a returned soldier asks for one of the positions, if those men desire to stay there the minister will not interfere with them, but when there is a vacancy a position may be given to the returned soldier? That is not doing very much for the soldier.

Mr. PEDLOW: Part of this item is $42,500 for statistical officers. I understood that when the Dominion Bureau of Statistics was organized the collection of statistics by the different departments was to be abandoned. If I am correct in that, why the provision for these statistical officers?

Mr. J. D. REID: That item has been there for a good many years. The statistics are forwarded to the Board of Railway Commissioners and to the Bureau of Statistics, which is under the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Some years ago these men used to be called collectors of canal tolls, and now that canal tolls are abolished, the men are called statistical officers. On the Rideau canal, for instance, we have a man here who issues passes for vessels going from Ottawa to Kingston, and there is another man at Kingston. Vessels have to have passes to go through the canals. In getting a pass the captain of a vessel has to give these men a report as to the cargo, whether it is light or heavy, the name of the vessel, and other information. This appropriation is to pay these men and others. Our statistics branch has practically disappeared, there remaining only four or five of the officials, and no more statistics will be printed and circulated by the Department of Railways and Canals.

Mr. PEDLOW: The same amount of money was appropriated last year for the same purpose, and I understood then that, if not all, at least a major portion of the work would be done by this new Bureau of Statistics. Such work as the minister has referred to should be done by the local men at the port of entry. These men should be capable of doing the work as well as the collecting, thus dispensing with the appointment of statistical officers for that particular work. The work cannot be very exacting, and any man of ordinary business capacity should be able to keep a record of vessels going through the canals, the tonnage and so forth, and forward it to the Bureau of Statistics,

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member is hardly right. In some cases the lockmaster does that work. For instance, at Kingston, St. Peters, and on the Trent canal, the lockmaster does that work; but in Montreal, where vessels are passing all the time, the lockmaster has to be on hand to watch the lock gates, to see that the lock work is carried on properly, because vessels entering the locks on the Lachine canal in many instances require almost the full capacity of the lock, there being scarcely six inches to spare. While a vessel like that is being locked through, the lockmaster watches the whole performance, and the purser or clerk of the vessel goes into the canal office where the statistical officer is, and it generally takes the whole time the vessel is going through to get the pass made out and the statistics recorded in detail. Then the hydraulic rents have to be collected and so on. The only place where anything will be saved as regards statistics is in Ottawa, where formerly every department had a statistical branch, whereas now they are all organized under the Bureau of Statistics.

Mr. PEDLOW: How many officers are employed in this service; what salary is paid each man and at what points are they employed?

Mr. J. D. REID: There are four on the St. Lawrence canal, four on the Rideau canal, seven on the Trent canal, eight on the Welland canal, eleven on the Lachine canal, eight of them being at Montreal and two at Lachine; four on the Chambly canal, two at Chambly and two at St. John. The salaries range as follows: At St. Peters, the salary is $200 a year. At Cornwall, one man has $1,200 a year with a bonus of $100. Another man has $840, and another one $100. At Ottawa the officer has a salary of $1,500, with $100 of a bonus. Then we have an officer at $360 on the Rideau.

Mr. PEDLOW: There are two men at Smiths Falls.

Mr. J. D. REID: At Smiths Falls there is only one, Mr. J. H. Foster, at $400 a year. At Kingston the lockmaster has a salary of $400 a year. On the Trent canal one man has a salary of $200 and one has $120. The highest salaries seem to be paid on the Lachine canal. One man has $2,100, another $1,200, another $1 200, and another $1,100.

Mr. PEDLOW: One man on the Lachine canal gets $2,100?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Mr. PEDLOW: The other night we were discussing the Estimates of Marine and Fisheries, and it was stated that the harbourmaster at Halifax was getting only $1,800 a year. Does it seem reasonable that a man on the Lachine canal should get $2,100 and the harbourmaster at Halifax only $1,800?

Mr. J. D. REID: The man on the Lachine canal collects $200,000 to $250,000 a year, and a salary of $2,100 is not unreasonable for a man holding such a responsible position and living in Montreal.

Mr. GAUVREAU: It is not enough.

Mr. PEDLOW: If $2,100 is not enough for the work on the Lachine canal how can it be argued that $1,800 is enough for the harbourmaster at Halifax, handling the enormous business that passes in and out of that city?

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not know anything about Halifax. It strikes me that the salaries at Montreal are not unreasonable, considering the high cost of living.

Mr. McKENZIE: Do I understand that the man on the St. Peter's canal is paid only $200?

Mr. J. D. REID: He is a lock master and gets that in addition to his salary.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is his fixed salary?

Mr. J. D. REID: He received $65 a month as lock master and $200 extra.

Mr. McKENZIE: And how are the men paid who work under him?

Mr. J. D. REID: They get about the same. Of course, they get the bonus as well. The lock master works the year round and the others only in the season.

Mr. PEDLOW: I understand that a number of men are employed on the Montreal end of the Lachine canal. What is the total amount of salaries paid these men for the collection of the $250,000? The man in charge who gets $2,100 plus $100 is not doing all the work?

Mr. J. D. REID: He has quite a staff, for the reason that there must be a day staff and a night staff, just as there are lock masters and lock labourers on the Lachine canal where vessels pass night and day. On the Rideau canal they have only a day staff.

Mr. PEDLOW: The cost of collection is about 5 per cent.

Welland Ship Canal, construction, $3,500,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: There were some serious requests for information in regard to the new colony which has been established on the canal.

Mr. J. D. REID: Where?

Mr. McKENZIE: On the Welland canal. It is said that the work was started for the purpose of giving employment to men on the peninsula, and it was contended that they were mostly foreigners. I think the minister was supposed to give us some idea as to who really are the people employed there and where they come from.

Mr. J. D. REID: I was asked about returned soldiers employed there. Take the four sections on which contracts were started in order to give employment to returned men. First, the engineering staff. Of 63 appointed the total number of returned soldiers was 57, or 90 per cent. The staff has since been increased by a large addition of returned soldiers. Contractors' employees of all classes of labour total 1,109. The number of returned soldiers was 228 or 19 per cent. There is a lot of this labour which returned soldiers would not undertake. In regard to skilled labour, contractors' employees number 681, of whom 219 are returned soldiers, or 32 per cent. All the contractors report that it is impossible to obtain returned soldiers to work as labourers although every effort was made to that end.

Mr. PEDLOW: Has the minister the particulars as to the nationalities of these labourers employed on the canal?

Mr. J. D. REID: I have not that information.

Mr. McKENZIE: There are only about 67 technical officers engaged?

Mr. J. D. REID: This statement was prepared up to 2nd May, early in the work. Since then the number of employees has been increased, practically all being returned soldiers.

Mr. McKENZIE: I quite understand what the minister means. He gives us the percentage of departmental officials in this work, but I am not quite clear as to the number of returned soldiers employed altogether.

Mr. J. D. REID: Perhaps I have not made myself quite clear. The Government has a certain staff of office men and engineers numbering 63 to see that the work is carried out. Of this number 57 are returned soldiers. On May 2 there were employed—a great many more having been engaged since—1,109 men of all classes of labour. Of this number, 228 were returned soldiers. Of the 1,109, 681 were skilled labourers, and of that 681, 219 were returned soldiers. It will be seen therefore that only nine returned soldiers are doing the work of labourers.

Mr. McKENZIE: I was reading somewhere the other day of an inquiry in which a former member of this House, Mr. German, I think, gave his opinion as to the enlargement of this canal.

I do not know whether the minister saw the interview or statement it was to the effect that the money expended upon the enlargement of this canal to a capacity much greater than the navigable capacity at each end of the canal was really money expended to no purpose, that the department is now deepening the canal to 22 feet on the sills, that for miles and miles at either end there is only sufficient depth of water to accommodate a vessel with a draught of 8 or 9 feet at the outside, and that it may be many years before there can be any return to the country for this large expenditure upon a certain section in the middle of the system. This is like a man who forges a chain 100 feet in length; he makes a certain section of the links very strong and stout and the rest of the links very weak. The old saying is that the strength of the chain is the strength of the weakest link. Will the minister explain what good purpose that enlarged section serves when the rest of the waterway from Montreal to Kingston is not sufficiently deep to carry a vessel of the size for which he is providing in the enlargement of the Welland canal?

Mr. J. D. REID: I did not see the interview with Mr. German but perhaps I might explain what I think he refers to. In the first place, in order to construct this canal from lake Ontario to lake Erie, it was divided into eight sections. For four of them the contract was given out some years ago. These are right in the middle of the canal. They are lock work. The building of the locks will take twice as long as the other work. The intention was to commence the other sections when this work was about half through so that all would be completed at the same time. Probably Mr. German was expressing the view that when this work in the middle of the canal was completed it would be no use because the ends had not been completed. If the work at the ends were going on now all the work would be completed at the same time, so that a vessel could go right through to Montreal. The other work to be done is more like dredging, and it will have to be completed when times get normal and when we get down to prices which are fairly reasonable. The prices of material and labour are so high that I think we should go as slowly as possible. It is only to give employment to people who are out of work that we are proceeding with this work at the present time. There is another point that the hon. member may have referred to. Perhaps Mr. German said that we were making this 30 feet in depth when probably the waterway above has a less depth of water. I do not know whether that is the fact or not but I want to point out that in constructing this canal we are making the depth greater than that of the St. Lawrence canals at the present time. We are making it 25 or 30 feet so that a vessel can go to Kingston or Prescott. She could not go on to Montreal because there is only a depth of 14 feet on the sills in the St. Lawrence canals. Still people may say that you would not want a greater depth for many years. When the Welland canal was built first it was a 9-foot canal and the reports of the department said that they expected it would last for thirty years. Just about the time the work was completed they were in the same position as when they started out, for larger vessels had been constructed. They then deepened the canal to 12 feet. The records of the department will show that Mr. Page, who was then the chief engineer of the department, stated that a 12-foot canal was good for thirty years. Before they got through with that 12-foot canal they found they were in about the same position as before,—ten-thousand-ton vessels are operating on these western lakes. In the early days the vessels that ran between Chicago, Kingston and Montreal were vessels of 1,000 or 1,500 tons. Then they got up to 2,500 or 3,000 tons, and they have been increasing until now the vessels that operate from Lake Superior down to Buffalo are 10,000 or 12,000-ton vessels, capable of carrying 400,000 bushels of wheat. The intention is that these same vessels shall go through the canal and on to Kingston at least. Port Colborne, which is at the head of the Welland canal, is only a few miles from Buffalo. These vessels operate from Lake Superior to Buffalo. There is no reason why they should not go through this canal and on to Kingston. If the canalizing of the St. Lawrence river to Montreal should be proceeded with, and completed, 10,000 or 12,000-ton vessels can go from Port Arthur to Montreal and—yes, —right across the ocean.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will the minister explain what depth of water we have now from Montreal to the eastern end of the Welland canal?

Mr. J. D. REID: We have 14 feet of water in the canal and, of course, that is what we must go by. A vessel plying between the Welland canal and Montreal can load from the Welland canal to Kingston or to Prescott to a 30-foot draught, but it can only have a 14-foot draught from Prescott on. With the damming of the St. Lawrence, which will really be the canalizing of it, a vessel can load to any draught. A 10,000-ton vessel could go right down to Montreal without any trouble whatever, and it would only have to pass through five or six locks instead of 28 or 30.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The ground is taken by a number of people who are well posted on this matter that the Welland canal should not be proceeded with. The minister has not dealt with that question. I do not know what amount of money has been spent up to date, But by the time the work is completed it will have cost at least $50,000,000. If that is an improvident expenditure it should be decided at once whether we will go on with the work or not. I was very much impressed with the speech of the Finance Minister this afternoon regarding the financial condition of the country, which everybody admits is very serious. We are now proposing to undertake a new work, which is estimated to cost $50,000,000, and prominent men in the vicinity who have studied the question are of the opinion that it should not be proceeded with at all, but that the present equipment will sufficiently satisfy present needs. But the minister has not dealt with that phase of it at all. I suppose the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) in his remarks was referring to a circular letter a copy of which I have received, and which left a great impression on my mind. This letter is from a gentleman named Charles B. Watts. I do not know him, but having made inquiry I find he is the secretary of the Dominion Millers' Association, that he is a very substantial man, that he is interested in transportation on the Great Lakes, and that he should know as much about this subject as any man in that vicinity. I will read an extract from Mr. Watts' letter, so as to put the minister in possession of the facts as they appear to that gentleman. The letter is addressed from the Royal Bank building, Toronto, is dated May 28, 1919, and in it Mr. Watts says:

Mr. German Says "Spending $50,000,000 on Welland Canal Wasteful." The interest Alone Would Carry Grain Free, Fort William To Montreal.

Dear Sir:

The postponing of the completion of the Welland Canal, under present conditions, should not be treated as a party question, involving as it does, an expenditure of over $50,000,000, and with the labourers striking for higher pay, probably over $60,000,000, from which no revenue will be derived but the yearly cost of operation and maintenance will have to be provided by Canada.

All parties should combine to conserve Canada's resources.

Wasteful Expenditure: Mr. German, ex-M.P. for Welland, stated before the Associated Boards of Trade, in Toronto, a few weeks ago, "that vessel men themselves, would consider the spending of $50,000,000 on the Welland Canal, a wasteful expenditure, unless Canada's system was carried through to tidewater."

This, he estimated, would cost over $300,000,000 additional.

Mr. German said "that he had been told that big freighters would prefer to discharge cargoes at Port Colborne (as now) than to discharge at Prescott or Brockville" as they could get return cargoes just across the lake.

This means only the smaller boats would run through the enlarged canal till the St. Lawrence Canals were also deepened as above.

Joint Development: The Greater Waterways Deputation to Washington, a short time ago, advocated the U.S. paying half the cost of opening a deep water channel from the Great Lakes to the ocean.

The Minister of Railways is negotiating with the U.S. for international development of water power on the St. Lawrence for electrical purposes.

The deepening of the waterways should also be done jointly.

Canada cannot find capital under present conditions to provide waterways free for U.S. traffic and maintain and operate the same. Over half the traffic through the present canal is U.S. tonnage and no tolls are charged.

Carry Grain Free: The interest on less than $50,000,000 would pay more than the whole freight from Fort William to Montreal at rates prevailing in 1914 and 1915, on all the Canadian grain which passed through the Welland Canal to Montreal in 1914, which was the largest quantity ever shipped through the Welland Canal to Montreal.

See Canal Statistics for 1916, pages 19, 20 and 48.

By ceasing expenditure, as it will no doubt take over $50,000,000 to complete the canal under present conditions, Canada would save the whole capital expenditure and if desirable to use the interest, could pay the whole of the freight as above and thus have the grain carried for nothing from Fort William to Montreal.

If this statement is true it is extraordinary that we should go headlong into an expenditure of $50,000,000, with the prospect of spending $300,000,000 more before we can reach tide-water at Montreal; and it looks to me as if the minister would have to make out a stronger case than he has yet shown for this very large expenditure. If I understand the statement made by this gentleman, the canal is not absolutely required at the present time; and he says that if it were discontinued the interest will pay the whole charges on the grain to be shipped through the canal in any one year. We should have our $50,000,000 in the treasury, and the interest that would accrue from that amount let out at interest would give the grain men of the West free transportation for their products from Fort William to Montreal. It would be a fine thing to have free grain from Fort William to Montreal; and I would ask the minister to answer this gentleman's statement and tell the committee, if he can, how he justifies this enormous expenditure.

Mr. J. D. REID: I would be surprised to learn that Mr. German ever made any such statement as that which is attributed to him in the circular which has been just read. Let me say that we are not starting a new work; the sum of $16,000,000 has already been expended on the project. It was commenced several years ago, but operations were suspended owing to the war. The enlargement of the Welland canal is not a new undertaking; the commencement of the canal dates back to fifty or sixty years ago, beginning first with a depth of nine feet, then twelve feet, and now an even deeper waterway is proposed. Reference has been made to the amount of grain that passed through the canal in the course of a year. We are not dealing with a canal capable merely of carrying the quantity of grain that passes through it in one year; this canal is being constructed to take care of the grain and the products originating in the West for many years to come. The grain from Western Canada that is transported to Liverpool to-day goes in large 10,000-ton vessels, by the American route to Buffalo, then through the Erie canal to New York. That is the route our grain is taking instead of through Canadian channels to Canadian ports. Even by the United States routes the cost per bushel is more than it would be if the canals now under way were constructed through to Montreal. I venture to say that when that is done the cost of the grain carried to Montreal will be so much less that the farmers and grain growers of the Western Provinces will receive more for their products; in fact, the saving in a few years would probably pay for the cost of the Welland canal. There is no question about it, a very large saving in transportation charges will be effected by the improvement of our system of canals. When the Welland canal is enlarged it will be possible for the large 10,000-ton steamers to go to Kingston and discharge grain there.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: In place of Port Colborne?

Mr. J. D. REID: In place of Port Colborne.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What is the advantage of that?

Mr. J. D. REID: The 10,000-ton vessel will carry grain from Port Arthur or Fort William to Kingston for practically the same amount as to Buffalo; there will be a very small margin of difference. The trip is probably twenty-four hours longer from Port Colborne to Kingston, and they may charge a small amount for that extra day's operation of the steamer. At Kingston they are within about fifteen or eighteen hours of Montreal, and they carry large cargoes to Montreal. The 10,000-ton vessels will come to Kingston, but if they can go no further than to Port Colborne, as at the present, then vessels carrying only about 60,000 or 65,000 bushels would continue to operate between Port Colborne and Montreal, a distance of probably four hundred miles.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: How far is it from Port Colborne to Kingston?

Mr. J. D. REID: Probably 300 miles. The traffic for that 300 miles would be carried in 10,000-ton vessels; that is the difference. As to the canalizing of the St. Lawrence river, that is a big question and has not yet been brought before this House. But the American Government are deeply interested in it and are taking it up with great energy with a view of routing their traffic to Montreal or to the Atlantic instead of having to transhipit at Buffalo for conveyance to New York. The advantage to the American side of the river, if they canalize the St. Lawrence, would be that these 10,000-ton or 8,000-ton vessels—and the latter is quite a large tonnage now—crossing the Atlantic will load at Liverpool or at any other port and return straight to Chicago, Duluth or Buffalo. That is why the Western States are urging that this work be undertaken, and, of course, the American Government recognize the great advantages that would accrue, no matter what the cost might be. The hon. member's figures are very much higher in every way than those of our own engineers. But the American Government realize that if they do take part in this work they will have an interest in the power on account of its being international water, and if 300,000 to 600,000 horsepower were generated they would be entitled to their share—quite an asset.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: They are not getting that?

Mr. J. D. REID: No; it is only on the canalizing of the St. Lawrence that this water-power would be developed. At present the St. Lawrence river canals are built along the shore just where the rapids are. This proposal would mean that at the particular rapids a dam would be thrown across the whole river—I think there are some five rapids between Prescott and Montreal—and there would be a tremendous water-power at each one of those dams.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The benefit would accrue to the big freighters; there would be no benefit to the small freighters, because the present accommodation is sufficient for them. The statement is made by this gentleman, who knows the grain trade intimately, that the big freighters prefer to discharge their cargo at Port Col-
10 p.m. borne because they can get a return cargo. How is the minister going to get over that? If he cannot get the big freighters to come down to Kingston, then his big canal will be no good to any body.

Mr. J. D. REID: Here is another advantage of boats coming to Kingston instead of Port Colborne. When the Soo canal was constructed on the same lines as the Welland and other canals—as it originally was—a vessel carrying about 65,000 bushels was the largest that could proceed from Port Arthur or Fort William to Buffalo, and the rate was about five cents a bushel. Immediately the Soo canal became available for boats of 10,000 tons, the rates were cut down to one and-a-half to two cents a bushel. That was a great advantage to those who were selling their grain in the West. The same thing applies on a vessel now from Port Colborne to Montreal. A vessel would probably get two or three cents a bushel between those points, whereas the rate from Kingston to Montreal is one and-a-half cents—they would probably charge three and-a-half cents a bushel; whereas the large freighter of 10,000 tons would probably bring that cargo from Port Colborne to Kingston at half a cent a bushel on account of the large quantity and the time taken—only one day. The hon. member has stated that the advantage to the large freighters at Port Colborne is that they get a return cargo. But when the vessels come to Kingston the return cargo they get ninety-nine times out of a hundred is a cargo of coal. They do not get it at Port Colborne; they have to run over to Ashtabula for the coal, and then they take it up to Fort William. The only difference in the case of Kingston is that they get the cargo exactly the same, but they run from Kingston up to Ashtabula likewise, and they can afford to do that having received freight down to Kingston. I think there is no doubt that if we want to hold our traffic for our own ports through our own country, the only possible water route is through the Welland canal and the St. Lawrence river. Then again, if we want to give to the people of the West the advantages of getting cheap transportation between Port Arthur or Fort William and Montreal so that they will get that much more for their grain, the only way is through the Welland canal and the St. Lawrence river to Montreal. I have always lived on the St. Lawrence and know everything in connection with the water route between Port Arthur and Montreal, and I understand thoroughly what I am talking about when I discuss this matter.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I have no doubt of that. But at the same time I make a proposition to the minister by which the Western grain men would get their grain to Montreal absolutely free. If he would save this $50,000,000 and put it out at 5 per cent he would have two and a half million dollars a year, and that would pay all the freight on grain from Fort William to Montreal, and we would keep our $50,000,000 for future investment. That is the proposition made to the minister, and I do not think he has met it.

Mr. J. D. REID: Does my hon. friend mean that the grain would be shipped by rail from Port Arthur to Montreal?

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: No, by water. I understand this gentleman to mean that the freight on the grain shipped by water from Fort William to Montreal could be paid with the interest on this money that we are spending on the building of canals.

Mr. J. D. REID: That may be all right if the hon. member argues the point on the basis of the same amount of grain being carried after this canal is constructed as was carried two or three years ago. But we would not have proceeded with this work if that was all the grain we expected over that route. I hope, and I think every member of the Committee believes, that our great Northwest will be filled up in the years to come, and we want facilities to carry the grain between these points at the cheapest possible rates. The hon. member knows the quantity of Canadian grain that goes through via Buffalo and New York, because he put a question in the House with regard to that matter. That grain went via Buffalo and New York because the waterway between those points has been enlarged, and the rate is so much cheaper than it is between Port Colburne and Montreal. As soon as we get the water route between Port Colborne and Montreal in the same condition as the route between Buffalo and New York so that larger quantities of grain may be carried, then even the American grain will go to Montreal, because we can carry it cheaper from Port Colborne to Montreal than it can be carried from Buffalo to New York, and in a shorter time. If we had the new Welland canal constructed and the St. Lawrence route improved you could go from Port Colborne to Montreal in twenty-four hours, whereas you could not go from Buffalo to New York in less than three days. That is an advantage that I think is worthy of consideration.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am not, in principle, opposed to the deepening of the Welland canal, although this vast expenditure was entered upon at a time when it was said to be good policy to forego the construction of a real, national waterway, the Georgian Bay canal. All the western legislatures and all the western interests favoured the Georgian Bay canal, but for a reason which I shall not disclose it was thought better to enter upon the expenditure which is now confronting us. This Dominion has launched into many important ventures during the last twenty-five or thirty years. We sunk millions in the Trent Valley canal, and got very little return. However, the Trent Valley canal is completed. And now we are undertaking this vast expenditure on the Welland canal, without any policy, so to speak. The explanations given by the minister are very vague and not to the point of the able memorandum that has been distributed broadcast by the secretary of the Dominion Millers' Association. But whether the deepening of the Welland canal is good policy or not does not matter at the present moment. Having regard to the revelations made this afternoon by the Minister of Finance, the Government ought to be very chary about involving the Dominion in this expenditure of $3,500,000 and perhaps hundreds of millions of dollars in the future. Sensible as the project may be, good as it may be, does my hon. friend believe that it should be entered upon now? In view of our enormous commitments—the interest charges on our war debt, the pension charges, and so on—does not he consider that it would be wise to drop even very valuable and very sensible projects? The Minister of Finance this afternoon advised Parliament to practise very strict economy. Well, is this practising economy? In view of our financial situation; in view of the fact that we shall have to make new borrowings during the present fiscal year in order to make both ends meet, is it sound and wise policy to go on with an expenditure which might well wait for a few years? When normal conditions come in a few years, Canada, being a progressive country, will not begrudge the expenditure of such amounts as are being asked this evening. But under present circumstances, with the unrest that prevails, with the fear that financial authorities have as to the future, and with the appalling debt that is staring us in the face surely my hon. friend should postpone this work. The section of Ontario that is most interested in this work is too patriotic, too intelligent, not to realize that sacrifices have to be made. The West has made the sacrifice as regards the Georgian Bay canal. I remember some years ago reading in the House resolutions adopted unanimously by the Grain Growers' Associations of the West urging upon the Government the necessity of commencing work on the Georgian Bay canal. The West has made that sacrifice. We have made it in our own province, although for many years the construction of that work has been promised. This enormous expenditure will affect seriously the credit of our country. As was stated this afternoon by the Minister of Finance the credit of Canada must be maintained unimpaired for the commitments of the future. The minister does not treat this matter with his usual sagacity. Parliament is already committed to very large expenditure in connection with our railway problem. By the way, the Government is expressing itself strongly in favour of Government ownership.

The other day in the other branch of this Parliament the Government, represented there by my good friend Sir James Lougheed, was not going as far as his colleagues are in this Chamber. But that is not the question and this is only an aside. What I am aiming at is this: The Government will have to spend millions and millions, not much less than $50,000,000 on the National railways for equipment to provide for deficit. Are we not experimenting enough for such a financial year as the one we are entering upon? Why should we enter upon this enormous expenditure when we can well afford to pause and wait? This is not a normal year.

Mr. J. D. REID: As regards the Welland canal, the hon. member practically states that we are just commencing this work. This work was originated by the Government of which he was a member, and that policy was the right one to adopt.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What was the national debt of Canada then?

Mr. J. D. REID; I am coming to that. There was no objection to that policy, and we proceeded with the work in normal times. The work was closed down when the war commenced. As I stated the other evening, we did not want to commence this work at present. Immediately the armistice was signed thousands of men in the Welland canal district were thrown out of employment, and there were returning from overseas thousands of men who wanted employment. What the hon. member is finding fault with now is that when the works were closed down, the Government, in order to provide work for men thrown out of employment and for soldiers returning from overseas, decided to proceed with the work. The hon. gentleman to-night objects to the Government having arranged to find work for those men whose families require food to keep them alive. The hon. member might also censure the Government for proceeding with other works. Why should we have proceeded with certain works in Montreal? In that city the locomotive works and the car works wanted employment for their men. Those industries were manufacturing munitions, and when the armistice was signed, locomotive and car work had to be proceeded with in order to give employment to those thrown out of employment so as to prevent unrest. The hon. member states that in the West they were willing to forego the construction of the Georgian Bay canal. I do not think any member in this House and especially any member from the West expected that we would proceed with work on the Georgian Bay canal for years to come. But what have we done in the West in order to provide employment? The Government is proceeding with the construction of railways in the West, constructing branch lines, paying large prices for rails and ties, and doing everything possible to find employment for returned soldiers and others. The Canadian Pacific railway are not proceeding with construction in the West as the Government are, and president Beattie will say that the reason is that they do not want to pay the price that must be paid at present for rails and other material. We are also proceeding with the construction of railways in order to keep the rail plant going at Sault Ste. Marie. The Government gave contracts there for 100,000 tons, and only yesterday we gave another small contract to keep the plant going. A deputation of employees from Sault Ste. Marie came to Ottawa and told me the condition they would be in if that plant was closed down. We gave the plant an order for rails for the purpose of providing employment and not because we really wanted the rails. We could have done without them at that time, as we need not have proceeded with the work. Yet the hon. member to-night would censure this Government for trying to keep the Sault Ste. Marie plant going in order to keep these men and their families in food until orders which were expected very shortly were received from overseas. The same is true at Sydney where we gave the Dominion Iron and Steel Company work in manufacturing steel rails until somewhere around the first of July in order to keep their employees going. That is the reason why we have been giving these orders and why the Welland canal is being proceeded with at present. If the men who are employed on this Welland ship canal can get employment in any other way in that district, which has always been their home, from which they left to go overseas and fight for this country and to which they have returned, I am willing to close down the work at any time, but just as long as returned soldiers are walking the streets and wanting employment and have families to provide for, I am willing to put an amount in the Estimates for this work, and I believe the people of Canada will stand by me in my endeavour to provide work for them.

Mr. McCREA: I doubt very much if the minister has any returned soldiers on this work. How many returned soldiers are there on it?

Mr. J. D. REID: The hon. member was not in when I gave the figures which are those of May 2. As I stated, the work was commenced particularly for returned soldiers, but of course there are certain kinds of this work that you cannot get and I would not ask returned soldiers to do. For that reason, returned soldiers cannot be altogether employed. We are not trying to rush the work; we are trying simply to keep the men, who are really in need of work, and who have families to provide for, going until times have become normal again. The intention is to close that work down just as soon as possible provided that these men can get work elsewhere.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the rate of wages per diem paid to returned soldiers? I am not speaking of engineers.

Mr. J. D. REID: Common labour, 40 cents an hour. When we started this work the Minister of Labour sent one of his best men up there to ascertain what the prevailing rates were and we paid those rates.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The minister says this work is to be stopped as soon as there is a return of normal conditions.

Mr. J. D. REID: We gave it on a percentage basis not to extend longer than 31st December next. I thought that by that time conditions would be normal again and we would decide on what was to be done in the future. But we can close the work down at any time.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is not continuous work then? The minister does not intend to complete that work?

Mr. J. D. REID: If things become normal and the financial situation is such that it would be advisable to go on with the work, we intend calling for tenders. But that is a matter for future decision.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Is there not some productive work on which these men could be put that would be better than what they are doing? What percentage are the contractors paid on labour?

Mr. J. D. REID: Eight per cent, out of which overhead charges have to be taken.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Is that the total percentage?

Mr. J. D. REID: That is the total, but they do not get it on material we supply ourselves.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: That seems to be a small percentage compared with what the Minister of Naval Service was paying at Montreal. I understood he was paying 65 per cent on the total amount of labour and 10 per cent on top of that, on labour and material combined. If the Minister of Railways is able to make a bargain at 8 per cent out of which overhead charges have to be paid, he has done much better than his colleague.

Mr. J. D. REID: That may be for some large plant or machinery or something of that nature. We pay 8 per cent and have our own plant and the contractor has his own overhead charges.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the extent of the work—how many miles?

Mr. J. D. REID: About seven miles altogether is under contract.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Between what points?

Mr. J. D. REID: Port Weller and Thorold, and also at Allanburg.

Mr. McKENZIE: A matter of great national importance occurs to me in connection with this work. My conception of ideal transportation has always been that our grain should be carried direct by rail from the point of shipment to tide water. I suppose it can be done cheaper the other way, but it seems to me that there is considerable difficulty in handling grain when it is shifted from one kind of conveyance to another. The Minister of Railways is also the Minister of Canals and he is competing with himself. He is working up a system of canals to take traffic from his system of railways. Would it not be well to bring these two departments together and try to strike a middle course and see if the Minister of Canals could not agree with the Minister of Railways on some system by which we might have the magnificent condition in this country that a car of grain loaded at Port Arthur, or Winnipeg, or anywhere in the West could go direct to Montreal, Halifax, or St. John and be dumped straight into the ship? We are willing to spend millions and hundreds of millions of dollars on this new railroad, the Transcontinental railway. We have built a grade of railway hitherto unknown in this country for large trains to carry freight cheaper than before. It is well worth while for the minister and all of us to consider if it is not possible, even at a small loss, when we own the railroads ourselves, to carry freight by rail from point of shipment straight to the city of Montreal, say, at tidewater?

Mr. J. D. REID: It has been a recognized fact that the carrying of grain or any freight by water can always be done more cheaply than by rail. The very fact that the Canadian Pacific railway, which is in opposition to the Canadian Government railway, carry their grain from Port Arthur to Midland or Port McNicoll on the Georgian bay and then transfer it to the rail is proof of the economy of water transportation. They take every bushel they can by vessel, and, if I remember rightly, in normal times the very best the Canadian Pacific railway could carry grain from Port Arthur to Montreal for—and they did not claim that they were making money—was 12½ cents per bushel. That was at a low rate; in winter it is 22 or 22½ cents. By vessel from Port Arthur to Montreal at the same time the rates were 5 or 6 cents a bushel, or at most one-half. During the season of navigation practically no grain leaves Port Arthur or Fort Williiam over rails. The Canadian Pacific railway carry their traffic in a most economical way, and it is quite evident that when they carry freight of all kinds to and from the west by vessel, from Port Arthur and Fort William to Georgian Bay ports, and then by rail to Montreal, the reason must be that they cannot possibly compete or carry traffic on as economic a basis by rail as by water. If they could, they would not go to the expense of unloading into elevator at Port Arthur and lifting it out of the vessel at Port McNicoll and putting it on cars again. I have taken up this matter with the railway officials, who have no doubt they can prove in a very short time that there could be no successful competition in this direction. When the hon. member for Timiskaming (Mr. Cochrane) was Minister of Railways he gave a rate of 6 cents per bushel from Armstrong, I think, or the station opposite Fort William, through to Quebec. The steamer could take the freight at Port Arthur or Fort William and take it through to Quebec at 6 cents a bushel and make money, while on every bushel of grain we carried from Armstrong to Quebec at the same time by rail we lost money.

We could not possibly compete. That was the experience we had in operating both services. I do not know that I could give any better evidence than that, but there would not be any trouble in convincing the leader of the Opposition from evidence that could be got from the Canadian Pacific, the Canadian Northern and Grand Trunk Railway Companies, which have had actual experience both by water and rail. All of these companies have their own traffic steamers.

Canals—Capital—Trent canal—construction and betterments, $1,000,000.

Towards construction of a high level bridge over the Otonabee river at Hunter street, Peterboro, Ont., $50,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is that in connection with the canal?

Mr. J. D. REID: This is for carrying on the work that is in progress there. There are several contracts that are going on.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What were your returns from the Trent canal last year?

Mr. J. D. REID: The only items in connection with the contract work are on the Severn division of the Trent canal. The canal has been opened through from Trenton to Orillia. Two hundred thousand dollars is asked for contracts that were started when the war broke out, and we are just starting them again to keep men employed in that district. The rest is for works along the canal, including the Gilmour's siding bridge, four works on the four divisions to cost $11,000, $7 000, $16,000, $2,000; Grand Trunk high level bridge, $5,278; Rice lake, $14,000, etc.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will the hon. gentleman give me any idea of the movement of ships through the Trent canal last year, the salaries paid the officials, and the returns?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Trent canal is free of tolls. It was only opened about a year ago and it is used by small craft.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How many ships passed through the canal last year?

Mr. J. D. REID: I have not the record here. I had been under the impression that the building of the canal was really throwing money away.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Say that a little louder, please.

Mr. J. D. REID: I say I was under that impression until I went through it last year. We spent $16,000 000 on the Trent Valley canal.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Sunk it?

Mr. J. D. REID: We did not sink it, and I will tell the hon. gentleman why. There is quite a lot of traffic on that canal in which small craft take part, but in addition there is 150,000 horsepower of electrical energy developed and the people of the locality get the benefit of it. All the power used between Toronto and Kingston is supplied from the Trent river that never would otherwise have been supplied, and if you can get 150,000 horsepower with a capital investment of $16,000,000 you are getting it cheaply. Then, we have the waterway besides.

Mr. McKENZIE: Do we sell power?

Mr. J. D. REID: We get a rental from the plant of the Seymour Power Company. We get the same rental that the company got, and we have quite a large revenue from that.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: How much do we get?

Mr. J. D. REID: Two dollars per horsepower at the dam. There is an electrical plant there that produces 150,000 horsepower, and there will be more produced when the canal is completed to Georgian bay, and for all we will get $2 per horsepower. We might get more than $2 but the idea is to give the people power at the cheapest rate.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: How many horsepower did we sell last year?

Mr. J. D. REID: We sold 30,000 or 40,000 horsepower. There is a building there ready to put additional machinery in. But on account of the war during the last five years people would not put in plants.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Are there any expenditures made on account of transmission lines?

Mr. J. D. REID: A power house and transmission line would have to be put in by us. The Seymour Power Company have put in their own power house and we simply rent them the water-power.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is a vote of $50,000 for a bridge. Would the minister tell us something about that?

Mr. J. D. REID: That is a bridge over the canal in the city of Peterborough. The bridge will cost not less than $300,000. If we built our own small bridge it would cost $50,000 or $60,000. The city wanted a high-level bridge, they proposed to spend $300,000 or $350,000 and of that amount we will pay $50,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: How many lift locks are there on the canal?

Mr. J. D. REID: Two; one at Peterborough and the other at Kirkfield.

Mr. McKENZIE: I would like to understand the policy of the Government in connection with this bridge. Does the department maintain the bridge across the St. Peter's canal?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes, but we do not do so in this case because this is a permanent, high level bridge. There will be no after-expense. We simply pay $50,000 and we are through. The mayor told me that the contract would be about $350,000, and we agreed to pay $50,000 on a cost of $300,000 or over.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister mentioned that it was only last year that the Trent canal was opened to traffic?

Mr. J. D. REID: It has been open for some years, but not right out into lake Ontario; it is from Orillia down through Peterborough, but that is inland. Now the intention is to open it from lake Ontario to Georgian bay. At present you can go almost through that entire stretch, but there are yet one or two small sections to be completed which when finished will enable a steamer to travel from Montreal to Georgian bay. At the present time the steamer can only go as far as Orillia.

Mr. McKENZIE: This $1,000,000 is partly for the extension of the canal ?

Mr. J. D. REID: It is for the completion of the canal to the western end.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Who are the contractors?

Mr. J. D. REID: Randolph Macdonald, or rather the York Construction Company.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is an old name.

Mr. J. D. REID: The old gentleman is dead; I think very likely the present contractor is his son.

Lachine Canal, Dredging—$25,000.

Mr. J. D. REID: This is for the upper end of the Lachine canal.

Soulanges Canal, Improvements—$152,000.

Mr. J. D. REID: The sum of $75,000 in this vote is for a road along the canal. We cut off the farmers' thoroughfare by building the canal, and we now have to build this road for them.

Trent Canal, Improvements—$329,000.

Mr. J. D. REID: This is for repairs at Bobcaygeon. The sum of $150,000 is for the construction of a new lock there on account of the dilapidated condition of the present structure. On account of the outbreak of the war the work was temporarily abandoned. I was on the spot myself last year, and the lock will really not stand any longer. Something has got to be done right away.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the nature of the work?

Mr. J. D. REID: The construction of a new lock to replace the present structure which has been in existence for probably sixty years.

Welland Canal, Improvements—$25,000.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: When will the Trent canal be finished ?

Mr. J. D. REID: There are just two small sections on the Severn river. We have not got through with either of them, but it will only take one season if we go at the work energetically.

Miscellaneous—Arbitration and Award—$20,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I want to again bring to the minister's attention the claim of an old gentleman whose name is Paradis, which means in English " Paradise." Let me remind the minister that my old friend and his old friend, Mr. Paradis, is getting on in years. He has a just claim against the Crown, which has been examined and re-examined, investigated and re-investigated, and it seems to me that it is time a decision was arrived at. The property of the dear old gentleman was destroyed by the Intercolonial many years ago, and his claim has been before the Exchequer Court and before the department. I understand there is only a question of a few thousand dollars as between Mr. Paradis and the minister. My hon. friend is convinced, I believe, that Paradis is an honest man. He has already one foot in the grave, and he would not deprive the Government of a red cent to which he was not legally entitled. Cannot the minister, who is a young man compared with Mr. Paradis, help this old gentleman to close his eyes in peace and allow his family to receive the amount which belongs to him?

Mr. J. D. REID: This claim came up before my predecessor and he was prepared to recommend a payment of $7,500. The amount was afterwards increased to $12,000, and the last time I took the matter up, in order to try and effect a settlement, I was prepared to recommend $15,000. Mr. Paradis, however, is asking for $80,000 or $90,000. He has been to see me very often, and I would like to see his claim settled, although he is not legally entitled to any such amount as he asks. The last I heard of it, Mr. Paradis was asking for $30,000 or $35,000, with interest for a certain period, which would bring the claim up to $40,000. The hon. gentleman will therefore see there is quite a difference of opinion between us. I will have to get the authority of Council before I can settle the matter, but the difference between the amount asked for by the claimant and that deemed proper by the department is a little too much.

I sympathize with the old gentleman, but I am afraid I could hardly settle with him on what he is willing to accept, although he claims that if he did settle for that it would not be one-third of what he lost. I promised the old gentleman to bring it up before a subcommittee of the Privy Council to see if we can come to terms.

Mr. LEMIEUX: During the present session?

Mr. J. D. REID: I have been promising to do it, as a matter of fact, for the last couple of months, but it has been very hard to get members of the Council together. It is really my fault, and I will try to see if I cannot get it attended to before the end of the session.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will the hon. member appoint me to the committee? As a member of the Privy Council I might be helpful.

Mr. J. D. REID: I am afraid the hon. member might be partial.

Railways—Canadian Government Railways—Construction and Betterments, $11,121,681.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think we had better leave the Canadian Government railways for another time.

Mr. J. D. REID: What about the Hudson Bay railway item?

Mr. McKENZIE: Then there is item, No. 108, miscellaneous, which I think will require some explanation. It is now eleven o'clock and such an awfully hot night that I think we might better leave them over.

Mr. McISAAC: I would like to ask the minister regarding a matter which is very dear to the hearts of the people of Prince Edward Island; that is, the progress that the Government hope to make in the near future in broadening the gauge of the Prince Edward Island railway. Could the hon. minister gfve me some information as to the earliest possible date on which the work will be completed, as to the portion of the work he hopes to do this year, and next year, and so on; what sections of the road will be taken up in turn; and, in general, what the ideas and hopes of the Government are regarding the early completion of this work, which is so important to the people of the province from which I come.

Mr. J. D. REID: Last year we decided to standardize the line between Port Borden and Summerside, so that cars could be loaded between those points and be brought over the main line. That work was started and proceeded with as rapidly as possible last year. My information is that if we can get the labour next month we will be operating into Summerside and Charlottetown with standard cars. We do not intend standardizing the line any further than Charlottetown or Summerside during the present year. After the rails are laid there will be a lot of work to do in putting the road in shape, and we feel that under present financial conditions we would not be justified in proceeding further during the present year.

Mr. McISAAC: It is understood, I suppose, that next year the work will be proceeded with?

Mr. J. D. REID: It is the intention, of course, that this road should be standardized all through. I could not say how much will be done next year. But the matter will be taken up and considered with the Estimates of next year with a view of proceeding with the work when financial conditions permit.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: Are details available as to how this large amount of money is going to be expended on the Canadian National railways, both with regard to construction and betterments and equipment?

Mr. J. D. REID: I have the details of item 3, $11,121,681. This is the summary: Lines east of Quebec, $6,004,140; Transcontinental west of Fort William, $993,208; Halifax terminals, $1,600,000; 11 p.m. branch lines, New Brunswick, $500,000; mechanical department, $524,333; general appropriations, constructions and betterments, $1,500,000. I have the further details somewhere if the hon. member wishes to hear them.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think we might as well let this item stand. I know some members of the House would like to say something on the items to which I have referred, and as the minister has made very good progress to-night, perhaps we might defer further consideration of these items.

Mr. MANION: Before the request of the leader of the Opposition is granted I wish to bring a matter to the minister's attention. I have a communication from the municipality signed by the reeve, Mr. A. A. McGillivray, and sent to me by Mr. J. McK. Hunt, with regard to changing the name of a small station on the Canadian National railway, and I would like to have an assurance from the minister that he will try once again to get this done, as the directors do not think it convenient to take any action. As a matter of fact, the village of Slate River is some miles from the station of that name, whereas the village of Rosslyn is right there.

Mr. J. D. REID: I did take that up with the management, and my recollection is that they claim there is another station of a similar name. However, I will take the matter up with them again.

Progress reported.

Hon. Mr. Reid moved the adjournment of the House, and the House adjourned at 11.09 p.m.
