OFFICIAL REPORT

Tuesday, May 6, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

COMMITTEE ON SCIENTIFIC RESEARCH.

Mr. HUME CRONYN presented the first report of the special committee appointed to consider the matter of the development in Canada of scientific research.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Report of Director of the Military Service Branch on the operation of the Military Service Act, 1917.—Hon. Mr. Meighen.

Copy of Order in Council of the 1st of May, 1919, approving of the General Housing Scheme of the province of British Columbia.—Hon. Mr. Rowell.

Radio-telegraph Regulations.—Hon. Mr. Ballantyne.

SENATE BILLS.

FIRST READING.

Bill No. 88, to amend The Migratory Birds Convention Act.—Hon. Mr. Meighen.

Bill No. 89, for the relief of Martha Campbell.—Mr. Douglas (Strathcona).

Bill No. 90, for the relief of Rosa Hirst. —Mr. Fripp.

THE WAR MEASURES ACT, 1914.

BILL TO EXTEND ORDERS IN COUNCIL NOT PROCEEDED WITH FOR THE PRESENT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Acting Minister of Justice): I wish to make a statement with regard to Order No. 26, Second Reading of Bill No. 71, to extend the operation of the Orders and Regulations passed by the Governor in Council under the War Measures Act, 1914.

This Bill was to have been gone on with earlier, but for the fact that intimation has come from the Prime Minister that the arrangements now in effect as to the Treaty of Peace are such that it is unlikely any treaty of peace will be formally ratified in such a way that a declaration ending the war might be made by His Majesty before approximately the first of August. Consequently, no object would be served by going on with the measure at the present time.

MEAT AND CANNED FOODS ACT AMENDMENT—LOBSTERS.

On motion of Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries), Bill No. 31, to amend the Meat and Canned Foods Act, was read the second time and referred to the Select Standing Committee on Marine and Fisheries.

FISHERIES ACT, 1914, AMENDMENT—BRITISH COLUMBIA LICENSES.

Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries), moved that Bill No. 39, to amend the Fisheries Act, 1914, be read the second time.

Mr. McKENZIE: Explain.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: This is a Bill regarding cannery licenses in British Columbia. The object of the Bill is to make the annual fee for such license $500, and in addition, four cents for each case of 48 one-pound cans, or the equivalent thereto, of sockeye salmon, and three cents for each case of 48 one-pound cans, or the equivalent thereto, of any other species of salmon, including Steel Head packed in such cannery during the continuance in force of the license. The said $500 shall be paid before the license is issued, and the remainder of the license fee shall be paid as the minister may from time to time by regulation prescribe.

Heretofore, the fee charged to canners in British Columbia was $50 a year, and it was felt by my department that that was altogether too low a fee in view of the privileges they receive. Therefore, the object of this Bill is to raise the fee from $50 to $500 per annum, with the additional charge of the amounts that I have just cited on the catch of fish. This matter was taken up fully with the canners who, along with the members of Parliament from British Columbia, agreed to it unanimously.

Mr. McKENZIE: A moment ago, the minister moved that Bill No. 31, to amend the Meat and Canned Foods Act, be referred to the Select Standing Committee on Marine and Fisheries. Does he intend to refer this Bill also?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: That was my intention.

Mr. McKENZIE: It has been reported to me from British Columbia that this high license fee will have the effect of driving the ordinary canner out of business altogether, and that the purpose of raising it from $50 to $500 is to create a monopoly in the fishery canning business in that province. It has been represented to me that the ordinary man doing a small business in canning salmon and possibly other fish in British Columbia cannot afford to pay this high fee, and consequently will be driven out of the trade.

Another matter which I wish to bring to the notice of the minister, so that it can be dealt with before the committee is this: It is stated that those who practically control the fisheries of British Columbia do not pay the ordinary white man in that province a white man's wage, and that in consequence practically every white man in British Columbia has left that business, and to-day the fisheries there are entirely in the hands of Japanese and Chinamen—in the hands of the Japanese, at all events; I cannot say how far that applies to Chinamen. This situation has been brought about by the fisheries of British Columbia being practically in the hands of a monopoly. If these are the conditions, I am sure the minister would like to see them remedied, and if the purpose of raising the license fee is to give further powers to those who have too much power already, it will be advisable for the committee to consider the matter very carefully, in order that everybody in British Columbia may have the privilege of going into the fishery business if he so desires.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: How many licenses are issued under the existing law?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I cannot say offhand, but I will in committee give the information to my hon. friend.

[Mr. Ballantyne.]

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

On motion of Mr. Ballantyne, the Bill was referred to the Select Standing Committee on Marine and Fisheries.

FISH INSPECTION ACT.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Ballantyne (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) Bill No. 41, to amend the Fish Inspection Act, was read the second time and referred to the Select Standing Committee on Marine and Fisheries.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAY COMPANY.

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways and Canals) moved the third reading of Bill No. 70, to incorporate Canadian National Railway Company and respecting Canadian National Railways.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): I had hoped that before we reached this the final stage of the Bill the Government would have seen their way clear to make such an amendment as would bring it into conformity with what to my mind are the very first principles of our parliamentary system of government. I regret that they have not been able to do so. I think their departure from what I regard as the sound principles of parliamentary finance is too grave a matter to be passed over lightly. I think we should have a further consideration of the subject; at all events, that we should have a deliberate and recorded vote of the House upon it.

This Bill proposes to apply to one of the largest portions of the public business certain rules and principles which are at variance, I think, with the established principles of our parliamentary system, and entirely at variance with the rules and principles which are applied to all other branches of our public service. A cardinal principle of our parliamentary system is that Parliament, and especially the House of Commons, shall retain full and unrestricted control over the appropriation of public money. That is a principle which applies under all British legislative systems; it is a principle which applies in Canada to-day; it is a principle which will apply after this Bill shall pass, if it is to pass, to all the other departments of public business in Canada. But for some strange reason, it is not to apply to the operation of this railway company.

I shall regret if the motion which I am about to make will be regarded by my hon. friends on the treasury benches as one of non-confidence. I do not think it should be so regarded, for neither in the motion itself nor in anything that I may say in connection with it will there be any justification for such an attitude. I think the question is one on which we may reasonably ask to have a free and open vote. If the motion which I shall make and the reasons accompanying it commend themselves to the judgment of hon. members of the House, I think they should feel free to vote on the merits of the question, and that the Government should be willing to accept the conclusion that they may reach.

It was suggested at an early stage of the discussion of this subject that some exceptional method was necessary in dealing with the finances of this railway company in order to avoid the evils, real or imaginary, in connection with political patronage. Now I do not think any argument can be founded on that. While, under this Bill, we shall transfer a large portion of the public business of the country to one group of gentlemen, separate and apart from the usual principles of parliamentary government, we are not going to turn everything over to them. A very considerable portion of the public business of this country will still be subject to the rules and principles to which I have referred. Each of the ministers of the Crown will still have to do some public business, and some of them much public business, and if the principle of patronage will not enter into the public business in their hands under the old order of things, why must it necessarily enter into the management of the railways if the old rules remain? Therefore, if it be contended for one moment that this departure from what I believe to be the sound principle must be taken in order to avoid the evil of political patronage, my answer is that we shall still have a large volume of public business to be conducted under the old principles; and if that business can be conducted in the old way without bringing in any question of party patronage, why cannot the business of this railway company be conducted in the same manner? So I feel that no well-founded argument can be made along that line.

When this Bill first came before the Committee it was in the form of a resolution in which, as hon. gentlemen will remember, all the clauses of the Bill had been thrown together into one single sentence, so that there was difficulty in understanding it. In consequence of that the minister in charge of the Bill expressed a desire that the discussion should not be protracted at that stage but that the matter might be more properly considered when the Bill had been brought before the Committee of the House. The point I am now making was first raised by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) who called attention to the exceptional circumstances under which the finances of this Railway Board were to be handled. The hon. Minister of Railways and Canals then said:

> But this is a matter for the consideration of the Committee, and if there is any objection to the plan proposed, or if the Committee thinks the other way is better, we can change it.

So, at that time, it did not seem that the Government were finally committed to the principle to which I am now taking exception. The minister rather intimated that it was a fair matter for consideration and could be dealt with later on. When the Bill did come before the Committee of the Whole House, the question was again raised and strong reasons, I think, were urged why this Bill should be brought into conformity with the general practice. However, the Government have not seen their way to do so and we are obliged now to consider the Bill in its present form.

On the principle of public ownership, I do not think it is necessary to say much. I think we have now advanced too far to make that an open question for debate. We have, whether we like it or not, a considerable measure of public ownership. It is unavoidable and I have no desire to quarrel with it at all. I accept it as it is. We have to accept it whether we like it or not. I am not as enthusiastic as some hon. gentlemen are in praise of the principle as applied to our railways. On the contrary, I frankly admit that this is a great experiment and I have grave doubts as to its ultimate success. But nevertheless I have no desire to oppose or to obstruct it. On the contrary, if we are to have the principle of public ownership, I should like to see the thing get a fair chance. But, it is not going to get a fair chance under this Bill.

The principle of public ownership, in so far as it is represented in this Bill, commenced with two handicaps. The first was the handicap of the closure. I cannot help thinking that it was unwise on the part of the Government to attempt to force this measure through the House by this exceptional method of procedure. I know there are circumstances under which closure may be justified, but they are very rare in our parliamentary history. The very fact that we have in our rules a system of closure tends to prevent obstruction, and it is a rare occasion when the Government is justified in using the machinery that it provides. It is a good thing to have the strength of a lion; it is not a good thing to use that strength frequently. I do not think that the circumstances justified the application of closure to this Bill. This Bill had been before the House in the form of a resolution for a very brief discussion, and when it took the shape of a Bill and came before the Committee of the Whole, it was taken up on a Wednesday; it was debated on Wednesday and Thursday, and on Friday the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) gave notice of closure, which took effect at the next sitting of the House. It was a short time to allow for the discussion of one of the most important Bills of the session. We have not been in a hurry about other legislation. We spent a month, less two days, in the discussion of the Address, a matter of importance, I grant you, but after all, a matter of form. There are Bills on the Order Paper that have been there for five or six weeks. There is no rush about them. We have been leisurely discussing the Immigration Act, a very serious matter, I acknowledge, but we are still slowly getting along with it. We have been, in an equally leisurely manner, discussing the Bankruptcy Act and there is no rush about it. Why then at a time when, although we seem to be busily occupied, when it is common rumour in many quarters not unfriendly to the Government, that the business is not being hurried but that the Government are really marking time and waiting for the Prime Minister to come home, should it have been necessary to apply closure in the case of this Bill? I do not think any good reason was given. That is the first handicap.

The second handicap is the effort to associate with public ownership the disregard of all the safeguards which have been established by the wisdom of parliamentarians in the years gone by. We are asked to associate with public ownership this disregard of a principle, which is not calculated to commend the system to the minds of thoughtful men. I have said that this Bill proposes to disregard the essential principle of the parliamentary control of public finance. There is no question but that the control of the public purse is the first and greatest duty of the House of Commons, and when we depart from that we are certainly taking a very grave step. When we are doing it in this case, and conveying to the public the idea that we must disregard all those safeguards in order to apply public ownership, we are not giving public ownership a fair chance. Instead of advancing public ownership by those methods, I am inclined to think that the members of the Government are rather giving the principle of public ownership a black eye.

This principle of parliamentary control of public moneys is, as I have said, a very vital principle in our system of government. It ought not to be necessary to argue that question at all. But, Sir, since hon. gentlemen have introduced this Bill and since they have, as I say, disregarded all those principles, I think I would be justified in calling the attention of the House to one or two authorities in point, a thing which ought not to be necessary, but the presence of this Bill makes it so. Sir Erskine May, page 56, says:—

> The most important power vested in any branch of the legislature is the right of voting money for the exigencies of the public service. The exercise of this right by the Commons is practically a law for the annual meeting of Parliament for redress of grievances; and it may also be said to give to the Commons the chief authority in the state. In all countries the public purse is one of the main instruments of political power; but with the complicated relations of finance and public credit in England, the power of giving or withholding the supplies at pleasure is one of absolute supremacy.

That power of the House of Commons of absolute supremacy over public money is to be disregarded and set aside by the Bill which is now before us. Section 16 to which I take exception reads:—

> Notwithstanding anything in the Government Railways Act or the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act, all expenses incurred in connection with the operation or management of the Canadian Government Railways, under the provisions of this Act, shall be paid out of the receipts and revenues of the Canadian Government Railways. In the event of a deficit occurring at any time during any fiscal year the amount of such deficit shall from time to time be payable by the Minister of Finance out of any unappropriated moneys in the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada, the amounts paid by the said minister under this section to be included in the Estimates submitted to Parliament at its first session following the close of such fiscal year; and in the event of a surplus existing at the close of any fiscal year such surplus shall be paid into the said fund.

Now, Sir, that presents this situation to us: That while as respects every other branch of the public service of Canada the revenue must be paid into the public treasury, and be subject to the vote of this House for its payment out of the Treasury, we are to give to a body of gentlemen in Toronto—estimable and honourable gentlemen; I do not for a moment suggest anything to the contrary—we are going to place in their hands the enormous power of handling I do not know how many millions of the public funds of this country without asking for any parliamentary appropriation. I am amazed that the Government could bring forward such a measure. The members of the Government, in their several departments, have large responsibilities. My hon. friend the Minister of Customs collects a large amount of money. He is not allowed to have at his own disposal one dollar of that money; it must go into the public treasury, and once there it cannot be got out again unless this House has made an appropriation which will cover the proposed expenditure. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works has large enterprises; he has to be subject, and will continue to be subject, to this rule of parliamentary appropriation. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance is the custodian of large sums of money which come into his hands officially from the various sources of our revenue, and these sums are larger than usual now because we are floating large loans. At one time during the present year, the hon. gentleman was the custodian of an amount which represented six hundred and more millions of dollars. Not one penny of these moneys is placed at the disposal of the Minister of Finance; these moneys are paid into the Dominion Treasury, into the consolidated revenue account, and once paid in, the Minister of Finance cannot draw out enough to pay even for cab hire until there has been an appropriation for it by this House. Now if that has to be done in the case of the Minister of Finance, and in the case of the other ministers of the Crown, why in the world do we make an exception in this case, and say that these gentlemen in Toronto who are managing these railroads are to have an entirely different rule applied to them?

While, as I say, the Prime Minister, the Minister of Finance, or any minister of the Crown, could not pay for the hire of a cab on public account unless he had an appropriation for the purpose, we are proposing to give to this body of gentlemen in Toronto an unrestricted right to handle enormous sums of money. The revenues of these railways will be very large, indeed. We appropriated last year for the expenditure on the Intercolonial, or the Government Railways, $37,000,000. With the enlargements proposed by the present Bill I shall not be surprised—I am only making a guess—if the revenues which are to be received by these gentlemen at Toronto amount to seventy, eighty, perhaps one hundred millions of dollars; and if the larger scheme of public ownership which is often suggested in this House be included—as is also provided for in the Bill,—then the revenues which will be placed in the hands of these gentlemen at Toronto may run into enormous figures—I do not think it would be too much to say $150,000,000 a year. Why in the world these gentlemen should be allowed these privileges, why we should remove all checks and guards with regard to parliamentary appropriations in the case of these and not in the case of the other departments, of the Government, I am quite unable to understand. These gentlemen are to collect these vast revenues, they are to use them, presumably for railway purposes, at their own sweet will. They do not have to come here and ask for any appropriation; and if at the end of the year this thirty, forty, fifty, sixty or one hundred millions of dollars of money, whatever it may be, proves insufficient, they can walk over to the office of the Minister of Finance and say: "Hand us out the balance." And without any further ado, or any further appropriation of money by Parliament, the Minister of Finance is bound to comply with their request. Surely, Mr. Speaker, that is a departure from all the sound principles of finance. Later on, after they have done that—after they have collected this money and have spent it without authority other than the general power conferred by this Bill—after they have collected these moneys and have spent them, and any additional sum that they get from the Finance Minister, then they are to come down and tell us what they have done; after it is all over they will come to us, we will take their statement and an estimate will be submitted to this House. I do not think, Sir, that is a sufficient recognition of the principle of parliamentary government to which I have referred.

I have given you the opinion of Sir Erskine May, a recognized English writer on the subject. Let me now quote from one of our Canadian writers who is generally regarded as an authority. Sir John Bourinot at page 404 of his work says:

The rules of the House with respect to the expenditure of public money and the imposition of burthens upon the people are in conformity with the practice of its English prototype. All the checks and guards which the wisdom of English parliamentarians has imposed in the course of centuries upon public expenditure now exist in their full force in the Parliament of the Dominion. The cardinal principle which underlies all parliamentary rules and constitutional provisions with respect to money grants and public taxes is this—when burthens are to be imposed on the people every opportunity must be given for free and frequent discussion, so that Parliament may not by sudden and hasty votes incur any expenses, or be induced to approve of measures which entail heavy and lasting burthens on the country.

In the citations which I have given we have the authority of Sir Erskine May, and we have the authority of Sir John Bourinot which we also respect in this House; so I do not think there is any room to debate the fact that I have stated the principle correctly. If I were to say that there is absolutely no precedent for what hon. gentlemen are doing, I might not be exactly correct; I think they might have a precedent. Probably they would find it by going back some seventy years, or thereabouts, and they would then discover, Sir, that the precedent in question was one under which a system had grown up such as they now approve; but that system was condemned by the British House of Commons, and ever since the year 1854 there has been no return to it. Sir Erskine May, at page 546, says:

Until 1854 estimates were not presented in respect of the revenue departments. Prior to that year the charges of collecting the revenue were deducted by each department from the gross sum collected.

That is exactly what is proposed to be done in this case.

This practice, which withdrew the full produce of the taxes and the cost of collection from the immediate control of Parliament, was condemned by a resolution of the House 30th May, 1848; and pursuant to an Act passed in the year 1854 the whole of the net revenue derived from taxation is paid into the exchequer, and the cost of the revenue departments is included in the annual estimates.

Taxation does not differ, so far as revenue is concerned, from the earning power of our public works. The money received from sale of a postage stamp is as much part of the revenue of the Government as a bill of duties collected by the Minister of Customs.

I have said, Sir, that I would like to see public ownership get a chance, and that it is not getting a fair chance by this Bill. There has been some experience in public ownership elsewhere: Public ownership is in operation in Australia and in New Zealand. I have under my hand the New Zealand Year Book. From it I learn that the receipts of the Railway Department of New Zealand are paid into the consolidated revenue fund, and the appropriations for that department are made in the same way as in the case of any other department. That is the system which we have in Canada to-day, and that is the system which I would like continued as respects these railways with which we are now dealing. Then public ownership exists in Australia also. I have here the Australian Railway Acts, or some of them, and I find that there it is distinctly provided that the receipts from passenger fares and traffic on the Australian railways must be paid into the treasury. They will be found in the consolidated revenue fund—the receipts on one side and the expenditures on the other. Indeed, in Australia the position is still stronger, for so firmly is this principle held —this principle which my hon. friends of the Government have too lightly esteemed —that it forms a part of the Australian Constitutional Act. In that Act it is distinctly declared that all receipts and revenues of the Commonwealth must be paid into the public treasury—the consolidated fund. So by the experience of other countries where public ownership obtains, and by our own experience in relation to our public affairs generally, it seems to me that we ought to have no difficulty in reaching a conclusion that it is not necessary to give to this board of directors in respect of the management of these railways any powers that we do not give to our own departments of the Government.

I think, Sir, that if the Government sincerely wish to give public ownership a fair trial they will not handicap it by disregarding the rules, the laws, and the customs which have been handed down to us by the wisdom of parliaments in the Mother Country and in all the colonies to which we can look for example. It seems to me, therefore, that it is in every way desirable that the Government should not press this Bill in its present form, and to give them an opportunity to reconsider it, I move, seconded by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster):—

That all the words after the word "be" to the end of the question be left out and that the following words:—

"—re-committed to a committee of the Whole House with power to amend the Bill by striking out section 16 and inserting the following section:

16. The receipts and expenditures of the company shall be subject to the provisions of the Consolidated Revenue and Audit Act."

be inserted instead thereof.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, the Government cannot accept the amendment proposed by the hon. member. He has made an argument which I may described as specious, and, unintentionally no doubt, somewhat unfair. He has asked: Shall Parliament hand over to a few gentlemen in Toronto—and he emphasized Toronto, I thought.

Mr. FIELDING: Are they not in Toronto?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Some of them, not all.

Mr. FIELDING: I understood the office was in Toronto. If that is a mistake I withdraw my remarks.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The office is in Toronto, but the board of directors of the Canadian National Railway system is constituted of gentlemen from all parts of Canada. Therefore it is incorrect to say that the Government is handing over to "a few gentlemen in Toronto" the control and administration of the hundred or more million dollars which my hon. friend has mentioned.

Let me put this to him—the Canadian Pacific Railway Company conducts much larger operations than the Canadian National Railway system as to-day constituted, and yet we find the shareholders of that company, comprising men of the highest business experience and standing,—many of them residing in Great Britain, and in the United States, as well as in Canada,—do not hesitate to entrust to a few gentlemen in Montreal the administration and control of the funds of that great system. I submit that the two cases are absolutely on all fours if we are to adopt the corporate principle of administration, as we are proposing to do in this Bill. I do not believe that any hon. gentleman would rise in this House—certainly not the hon. member who has spoken (Mr. Fielding)—and charge any misfeasance on the part of the board of directors of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. So far as I know they administer that great system most capably and most honestly. And what the Government is seeking to do as a matter of administration, with a view of promoting the highest efficiency and economy, is to constitute a board of directors, responsible to the Dominion Government, who will administer the affairs of the Canadian National Railway system and receive its revenue and cause to be properly paid out its expenditures in accordance with the practice which is adopted in efficient railway administration in all parts of the world.

I pointed out to the hon. member (Mr. Fielding) when he raised this question in Committee, that there were two modes of administration, either of which might be adopted by the Government, in connection with these railways which have come into our possession. We might directly administer them through the Department of Railways, which is under the direct control of the Minister of Railways, a member of the Government, as the Intercolonial Railway has been administered in the past. Those railways would then be administered precisely as the Department of Railways is administered, as the Department of Customs is administered, as the Post Office Department is administered; as all other departments of the Government are to-day administered. The other way, and the one that we have chosen—and which I shall submit is the one which we should choose in the circumstances—is by administering through the agency of a joint stock company, a holding company, which will either hold the physical property of these railway companies, or control it through the holding of the capital stock.

In the first place, it has been necessary for the Government to adopt the corporation system in connection with the administration of railway companies which have outstanding bond issues, by reason of their having been financed and administered on the corporation principle in the past. It was pointed out when we took over the Canadian Northern Railway system that if we divested it of its corporate character and took over its physical properties by expropriation, we should at once cause to become due and payable many of the trust mortgages securing issues amounting to hundreds of millions of dollars. We should thus lose the benefit of all past financing, and we should have to provide in cash an amount representing the value of the physical properties of the Canadian Northern Railway system. The same argument would apply to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway system and to the Grand Trunk Railway system of Canada should we take them over. In the case of the Intercolonial Railway Company, the Dominion Government has owned the physical properties, and if the Canadian National Railway Company should in the future take over the Intercolonial they would take over the physical properties of the road. No difficulty arises in that case as to outstanding bond issues, for there are none; the road has been owned directly by the Government of Canada and not through the intermediary or agency of a joint stock company.

There is a further reason why it is necessary that we should adopt a joint stock system in administering these great railway properties. In the public mind the idea is firmly embedded that direct Government administration and control of government-owned railways results in abuse through the exercise of political patronage. A great deal may be said for that view. Personally I have been impressed with what has been put forth by the hon. member (Mr. Fielding): That if the Government owns a railway system, whether in fee simple or by the ownership of stock, it is the proprietor and must be responsible for the administration of that system. I agree with that. If the Canadian National Railway Company, as administered by the nominees of the Government, is not a success, undoubtedly there will be a reflection upon the Government of the day. The Government of the day will be criticised for lack of success or for inefficiency of the administration of that system. That follows from the fact that the Government is the owner of the system—although the form is that of a corporation—and from the fact that its administration is in the hands of those appointed by the Government and whom the Government may, for cause, remove. But in order to prevent the exercise of patronage in connection with a system of such great importance to Canada, it has been provided that instead of direct administration by the Government, the administration shall be through a board of directors consisting of representative and capable men in whom the Government, Parliament and the country have confidence. I said the other day, and I say now, that the success of public ownership in Canada will largely depend upon the standing, ability and character of the men selected to administer. Public ownership in Canada will have public support in direct proportion to the favourable impression which is made upon the people by the nominees of the Government, who will administer for the people.

Having laid down the principle that for a system such as this it is necessary—unavoidable, if the best results are to be obtained that the mode of administration shall be through a corporation rather than direct, I come to the gist of the amendment proposed and of the argument put forward by the hon. member (Mr. Fielding). When this Bill was in Committee the hon. member directed attention to section 16. I said at the time, and I say now, that I always give great weight to any argument put forward in this House by the hon. member; and I did give his suggestion, at that time and subsequently, my best and most attentive consideration. More than that, I took it up with the responsible officers of my own department, the Auditor General's Department, and the Railway Department, with a view to seeing, so far as I could ascertain, what weight should be attached to the argument put forward and how far, if to any extent, it would be possible to meet the views of the hon. member. When the hon. member was speaking in Committee I was of the opinion that the proposal was impracticable—I do not say, impossible, but impracticable—from the standpoint of efficient, and especially of economical, administration. Adopting, as we do, the policy of administering through a corporation, to carry out my hon. friend's suggestion would mean complete duplication of the entire accounting, clerical and audit staff of the Canadian National Railway system. My hon. friend has said that we are giving public ownership a bad start. Well, we should indeed give it a bad start if we provided that, in competition, as it will be with the Canadian Pacific Railway system, it should incur a double set of costs of so important a character as those which I have indicated.

My hon. friend says it is an essential principle of Government administration that revenues shall be received into the Consolidated Revenue Fund and paid out under the safeguards afforded by the Civil Service and the Audit Office. I agree with my hon. friend with regard to the general principle; I agree that when the administration is directly that of the Government, that principle does and should apply. But where, for convenience and for efficiency of administration and in order to remove all possibility of political patronage, we deliberately adopt a commission system or a system of a board of directors whom we appoint, who engage their staffs and who are responsible for administration, then we are justified in—I shall not say a departure from the principle, but the adoption of another principle which experience has shown is safe, namely, administration with the safeguards afforded by corporate management. Take the Intercolonial Railway.

In the past the revenues of the Intercolonial railway have been received, as my hon. friend says, into the Consolidated Revenue Fund, and from the Consolidated Revenue Fund there have been checked out the salaries, wages and other expenses of the railway. From inquiries which I have made, I am able to say that the audit which the Dominion Government has made with respect to the Intercolonial has been of the most imperfect and perfunctory character—and necessarily so. Officials of the Intercolonial Railway Company have received the money into Consolidated Fund and have paid it out under letters of credit.

In other words, the officials of the Intercolonial Railway Company—that is, of the Dominion Government—have done precisely what the officials of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company do; they have received the money and paid it out under the safeguards of audit and of the other checks established by efficient administration. So that in the Intercolonial, which the Dominion Government directly owns and in respect of which the principles that my hon. friend has referred to have been in effect, we find precisely what we find in connection with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, namely, that the officers of the road receive the money and pay it out. How could we adopt, in connection with the mode of administration that we have selected, the method put forward by my hon. friend?

In the first place, in order to carry on corporation administration with regard to the receipt and payment out of moneys, there must be a large clerical staff, an accounting staff and an audit staff. Where are they? There are spread over this immense system practically from the Atlantic to the Pacific, accountants, clerks, agents for the receipt of money, travelling and other auditors. If all the money received from the Canadian National Railway system is to be paid into the Consolidated Revenue Fund and checked out by the officers of the Finance Department or under letters of credit issued to the officers of other departments and subject to the control of the Auditor General, that means a complete duplication of the services to which I have referred. Therefore, as I have said, the suggestion put forward by the hon. member is impracticable and uneconomical, impracticable because the administrative machinery of the Dominion Government to-day is not adequate, although it might be said it could be made adequate to do the work efficiently—and there is no use in doing the work in any other way than efficently—to check up all the receipts and expenditures of the Canadian National Railway system—uneconomical, because it duplicates for the Canadian National Railway system all the services that I have mentioned.

My hon. friend referred to the British system, and without knowledge of the facts, I wish to ask him this question, because he may know. The British Government administers through its various departments, as we do here, and the hon. member was quite correct, so far as I am aware, in stating that all moneys are received into the Consolidated Revenue Fund and paid out subject to the cheques of the Civil Service. Does my hon. friend know whether the accounts of the Suez Canal Company, the shares of which are owned by the British Government, are submitted in detail to the British House of Commons, whether the appropriation is voted in full, or whether that is dealt with as a separate corporation? I do not know.

Mr. FIELDING: I really could not answer the hon. gentleman. I have not had occasion to look into the matter.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend has referred to Australia, but Australia, is administering not through a corporation, but directly, as the Dominion Government administers the Intercolonial. The Australian Government own the railways, the physical property; they built them, I am told, in the first place, and consequently the Australian railway situation is on all fours with the situation which exists here respecting the administration of the several departments of the Government.

My hon. friend has spoken about turning over the administration to certain men. All administration must be turned over to certain men; indeed, we are entrusting officers of the Government here with administration of a most important character, and while the administration of the Canadian National Railway system is through a corporation every member of the staff, every clerk or every agent is, in substance and in fact, a Government employee. Further, the administration of that system can, as it will, be subjected every year in this House to the most minute scrutiny and searching investigation, because, as I stated when this Bill was in Committee, if the Dominion Government pays the deficits each year, then the Dominion Government is interested in every cent that comes in and every cent that goes out. The Government would not only expect but welcome the criticism which must be made in Parliament of the operations as disclosed by the balance sheet at the end of the fiscal year and would expect that Parliament would obtain such information in such detail as is desired with regard to the whole administration of that system. If that be not so, then suspicion will inevitably be thrown upon the administration of that railway administration.

My hon. friend made the rather startling statement that if there is a deficit, these gentlemen at Toronto will come down to the Minister of Finance and say: You pay out the amount of the deficit without regard to Parliament at all. That is true in one sense and not in another. Under section 16, if there is a deficit at the end of a fiscal year, the Dominion Government makes good that deficit; otherwise, the railway system would have to borrow money for the purpose of making it good, or if they could not borrow the money, they would have to suspend. The reason for that is that the Government is the owner of this system. If there is a deficit at the end of the fiscal year, the Minister of Finance is authorized to make good that deficit, subject to this provision that the amount paid by the Minister of Finance under this section shall be included in the Estimates submitted to Parliament at its first session following the close of such fiscal year; and in the event of a surplus existing at the close of any fiscal year such surplus shall be paid into the Consolidated Revenue Fund.

It is open to Parliament at each session to review the operations and the entire administration of the Canadian National Railway system as to deficit or as to surplus. The gist of the matter is that, although the form is a corporation, the Dominion Government owns the system, and that every one connected with it from the board of directors down to the humblest man in their employ is in reality a Government official in the sense that he must be held to strict account, first to the board of directors, and through them to the Government of Canada for his action in connection with the work entrusted to him.

My hon. friend said that we are starting this off with two handicaps, one being closure. I agree generally with the observations of the hon. gentleman as regards the inexpediency of bringing in closure unless it is clear there is obstruction, and this does not refer to my hon. friend, because the criticism which he made of the Bill was such as might not only fairly, but very properly be put forward. His argument was listened to with the greatest attention, and as I said, I took the trouble to consider it, not only at the time, but the next day, and to discuss it with the officials of my own department, of the Auditor General's Department and of the Railway Department, because I desired that it should be very fully considered. And it was my intention, if the Bill had continued in Committee, to speak further to the argument of the hon. member, because I had stated that the matter would have further consideration. But we all know what happened. There was obstruction—I will not say on the part of all hon. members opposite, because that would not be correct—but there was undoubtedly obstruction.

Mr. BUREAU: Not a bit.

Mr. McKENZIE: Where?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not desire to specify, but there was undoubtedly obstruction. I have too high a regard for the intelligence of certain hon. gentlemen opposite to believe for one moment that some of their arguments with respect to certain minor sections of the Bill were merely for the purpose of obtaining information, or of legitimate criticism.

Mr. BUREAU: What sections?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will not go into detail. The hon. member knows as well as any one else.

Mr. BUREAU: The longest speech in the discussion was made by the Acting Prime Minister.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: But he was not the most frequent speaker. I think the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) was the most frequent speaker.

Mr. BUREAU: Will my hon. friend point out one of the minor sections of the Bill on which I spoke too often?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: When my hon. friend sins he sins against the light. No man in this House has a better knowledge than he of corporation law, and when I find him putting forth trivial objections to sections I ask myself why? I do not say that my hon. friend obstructed from any improper motive, but he did obstruct, with other hon. members, and so closure was applied.

Mr. BUREAU: I may be allowed to differ.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The closure is not an unusual thing in British Parliaments, although in this House, I grant, that it may be somewhat unusual.

Mr. BUREAU: It is not unusual in connection with Canadian Northern Railway legislation.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In the British House it is the usual mode of carrying on the business of Parliament. The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) has stated that a month was taken up by the debate on the Address. Now, so far as the Government is concerned, we do not regard that as a waste of time. For the last four years, the business of administration has had the right of way in this Parliament, and the members from the different sections of the country have had comparatively little to say; not because they did not have much to say with regard to the needs of their various sections, but owing to the demands of the war and the exigencies of the situation, Government business naturally had practically a monopoly of the time of the House. That was true of the British Parliament as well. But when the war was over, it was highly desirable that hon. members should to the extent they desired have opportunity to express their views and those of the people of the different sections from which they come with regard to the public questions of the day. And one of the most useful debates we have in this House, one of the most useful in its effects upon public opinion in this country, was the debate upon the Address, which lasted some three or four weeks. There is a function of Parliament apart from the function of despatching legislation before it, and that is the function of expressing what the people throughout the country are thinking about. If you have debates in Parliament and free expression of opinion here, you are not likely to have turbulent expression of opinion outside, because the people read what their representatives are saying in Parliament and are content with the expression of their views there. Many evils in the state are avoided by free discussion by members in the House of Commons of the questions in which their various sections of the country are interested.

Before leaving the question of closure, let me say that my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition showed—I shall not say an eleventh-hour repentance, but a two-o'clock-in-the-morning repentance on the question of public ownership. At two minutes after two in the morning he said: After all, we on this side are not opposed to public ownership. That is one of the good results that followed from the application of the closure. My hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) has said that public ownership starts handicapped by the fact that closure was applied. Now it is very important that public ownership should start with the sanction of the leader of the Opposition, and one of the good effects of closure was that at two minutes after two in the morning the hon. leader of the Opposition informed the House that after all said and done the Opposition had not been opposing the principle of public ownership. So the application of closure was not altogether an evil as suggested by the hon. member, because when closure was applied the leader of the Opposition and most hon. members opposite were most anxious to impress the House and the country that in reality, notwithstanding what they had said, they were really public ownership men.

And as to statements which had been made previously by hon. gentlemen opposite on the question of public ownership when it was not an issue, in order that there may be no doubt where hon. gentlemen opposite stood on this question, I am going to read a few extracts from Hansard. I find that my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) said in 1916 (Hansard, p. 3989):

> As to the nationalization of railways I am opposed to it. I believe that we should encourage individual energy, enterprise and initiative instead of putting everything into a common pool, which tends to kill individual enterprise. We should take a leaf out of the book of the United States where there has been little nationalization.

That was his attitude in 1916. In 1917 he said (Hansard, p. 4039-40):

> I have been watching this proposition since he (Sir Thomas) introduced legislation last year for the purpose of appointing the Commission whose report we heard read in part to-day. When that resolution was proposed I said to the minister that if he wanted my opinion it was against the public ownership of railways. I did not expect my opinion to have any weight with the minister at that time. But, I am still of the same opinion that the public ownership of railways, generally speaking, is not a good thing for this country. I say that more particularly with respect to the developing of a country such as the Northwest is. If the people of the West will trust themselves as far as spreading out of the branches of any Government owned railway is concerned to Government ownership, they will find it will be a failure.

And he concluded:

I am opposed to Government ownership under these conditions.

I submit that that gives a clue to the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite on section 20 of the Bill, which was so much discussed in this House. That section provided for the revival of charters owned by the Canadian Northern Railway system, many of which authorized the construction of railways in the West, and my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition said in 1917:

If the people of the West will trust themselves as far as spreading out of the branches of any Government owned railway is concerned to Government ownership, they will find it will be a failure.

Again in 1917 he said (Hansard p. 4529):

I am not in favour of public ownership. I am against it. But if we are down to the position when we have to take over the ownership of this road, let us take it clean cut, let us take everything in connection with it that will be of benefit and service to the people.

Later in the same year he interjected into the speech of the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) this remark (Hansard p. 4533):

Sir John Macdonald was opposed to public ownership.

To which the hon. member for South York replied:

No, he was not.

In 1917 the leader of the Opposition also said (Hansard p. 5035):

While the Government ownership of railways may be all right in itself, I am not at all in favour of it. . . . . We have the example of the Canadian Pacific Railway. It is not a Government owned railway.

And he argued that if default was made we should take everything embodied in the agreement of 1914. In 1918 my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) endorsed the policy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier so far as railway building was concerned. He added (Hansard p. 1379):

There was a good deal of criticism then (1911) by newspapers supporting the Government of the railways the Government had on their hands at that time.

He went on to say that in my first Budget I had made no complaint of the financial situation, and had said, while making some criticism of the Grand Trunk Pacific, that it "was a valuable asset to the Canadian people." Coming down to the last debate, my hon. friend said:

I was never in favour of Government ownership. I am not in favour of it now, as I think private enterprise will do better in these matters. Particularly in colonization and development will private enterprise do much better than Government ownership.

I am not putting this forward by way of criticism of the hon. leader of the Opposition. He is perfectly entitled to hold the views he does, but what is essential is that it should be known where he and those whom he leads stand on this question, and I submit that the extracts I have read indicate clearly the profound distrust of the leader of the Opposition of the principle of public ownership of railways.

Mr. McCREA: Does the minister mean to say that because persons hold different views from his own they should be gagged?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: In the first place I do not admit that hon. members were gagged at all. It was the fault of hon. gentlemen opposite that closure was applied.

Mr. McCREA: The fact that a man is opposed to public ownership is no reason why he should not be allowed to speak.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I entirely agree, but it was not because hon. members were opposed to public ownership, but because the opposition to various sections of the Bill seemed to be carried beyond the proper limits of debate, that closure was applied. What has been the attitude of the first lieutenant of the leader of the Opposition (Mr. Lemieux) on the question of public ownership? During the present session the hon. member for Maisonneuve said (unrevised Hansard p. 1815):

Speaking again on this question of public ownership, it is a popular fancy at the present; but really those who favour that new fancy should take the time to read some of the best authorities on the question.

He said further, during the present session (Hansard p. 1901):

It is all very well for my hon. friend from South York to say, as he did a moment ago, and as my hon. friend from East Algoma said in the fair statement he made this evening, that Ontario and the West want Government ownership. But give to Ontario and the West a few figures as I have done this evening, and you will find that the business sense of the people of those provinces will pause and they will ponder before launching Canada upon such a venture.

The hon. member for Maisonneuve quoted from the report of a speech by Lord Shaughnessy at the Canadian National Exhibition and referring to that he said that Lord Shaughnessy is a man " who knows whereof he speaks," and added that " the words of Lord Shaughnessy were full of wisdom." Lord Shaughnessy is a very able man, but nobody could accuse him in his present position of being partial to the principles of public ownership.

Mr. LEMIEUX: As my hon. friend is giving us what he calls extracts, I would like him to quote what Lord Shaughnessy said. The statement of Lord Shaughnessy at the Canadian National Exhibition at Toronto contained the following words—I am quoting from memory:—

I would not pretend to oppose the Government ownership of railways. What I am asking is that before embarking on this new venture we should be sure of our footing.

That is what Lord Shaughnessy said.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not contradict my hon. friend. This is what is said of Lord Shaughnessy by the Toronto Globe on April 23, 1919:—

The other antagonist of railway nationalization is Lord Shaughnessy who challenges the politicians and the officials of the Government railway service. The officials he says will ultimately become politicians and he adds ironically that Cabinet ministers soon become efficient railway men.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have here the exact words spoken by Lord Shaughnessy, and I will read them so as to do no injustice to him.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What was the occasion of that speech?

Mr. LEMIEUX: He was speaking at the opening of the Canadian National Exhibition on August 26, 1918.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The reference I cited was apparently to a different occasion.

Mr. LEMIEUX: He said this:—

We shall, within the next short period, have an opportunity to learn the result of our neighbor's management of the railways of the country and probably have a little experience of our own. I do not wish to have it understood that I am taking an attitude opposed to nationalization of railways. When the Government is satisfied that the people of this country want nationalization, we are a democratic people and we shall have it. But whatever our policy, we should be very sure of our footing or it may become a very serious problem.

That is what I quoted to the House.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I was quoting the reference to a different occasion, viz., April 23, 1919, as reported by the Toronto Globe. My hon. friend further quoted Mr. Mitchell, president of the National City Company of New York. Mr. Mitchell stated that the cost was too great and that therefore in the United States the "popular fashion for Government ownership and operation has materially cooled during the past year." The hon. member for Maisonneuve also gave the views of the greatest authority on economics in Europe, according to his opinion, who was "absolutely opposed to public ownership." Having done this, he asks the members to pause before committing themselves to "this fancy" adding that "the best friends of the Government" in the city of Toronto were opposed to "this very policy." I submit that the hon. member for Maisonneuve came out as a strong opponent of public ownership. Then, we come to the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau). One thing I always like about the hon. member for Three Rivers is that he is downright outspoken; there is nothing equivocal about him. He comes out on one side or the other.

Mr. McCREA: He is always intelligent.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: His words are always intelligible and nobody will accuse the hon. member of lack of intelligence. He says:

I am against public ownership; I have stated so.

Hansard, page 1820, of the present session. At page 1822 he says again:

I happen to be against public ownership. I stated on the second reading that I was against it; that I was in favour of private ownership and public control.

Then at page 1825 he says:

I want my good friends to see that in spite of my opposition to public ownership I want to help the system as much as I can.

The hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe), who is a tower of strength in his party, said at page 1818:

Those who believe that nationalization means necessarily liberty and freedom are mistaken. In many respects it is the very opposite of liberty. Its purpose is to kill competition and erect a bureaucratic state.

I put forward these citations as representing the views of hon. gentlemen opposite because it was stated that hon. members opposite were not opposed to the principles of public ownership.

As I stated I have no objection whatever to a public man being in favour of private as opposed to public ownership. But it is essential to know what a public man's views are; and in the case of a party in this House, to know what their views are upon the subject. I submit that, from the quotations which I have read, it is perfectly clear that the leaders of hon. gentlemen opposite are opposed to the principle of public ownership.

The hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) said that the other handicap was that we had failed to associate with public ownership all the proper safeguards. I submit that I have answered that fully. I would call the attention of the hon. member to what I believe to be the fact: that the greatest example of public ownership in Canada is the Hydro-Electric Commission under the chairmanship of Sir Adam Beck. I cannot say positively because I have not made the explicit inquiry, but I believe that the commission is administered in the same manner that we propose to administer the Canadian National railway. I do not believe that there is submitted to the Legislature of Ontario an estimate of the full amount required by the Hydro-Electric Commission with every detail of expenditure as is the case with the departments of the Government.

I submit that my hon. friend is mistaken in his view that there is any departure in this Bill from the principles of sound public administration. There is a change in mode but the change is that which is imposed upon us by the necessities of corporation management and for the same reason that it is imposed upon the Canadian Pacific shareholders who entrust to a board nominated by them the administration of the company's system of which they are the owners.

Mr. BUREAU: Is the Acting Prime Minister a believer in the state ownership of railways?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, I am.

Mr. BUREAU: That is all I want to know.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will tell my hon. friend why. Take the situation in Canada at the present time. We have found that private ownership of railways, with the exception of the Canadian Pacific, has failed. I stated the other day in the House, and I state now, that private ownership plus politics have brought about the situation with which we are confronted in this country. The Government of Canada in order to save its own investments—represented by its guarantees and the guarantees of the provinces of this Dominion—and to safeguard the transportation interests, has been obliged to take over the railways that we are administering to-day, and will be obliged to take over practically all the other railways except the Canadian Pacific.

Mr. FIELDING: If my hon. friend believes as fully as he would wish us to think he does in the principle of State ownership why except the Canadian Pacific?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am a believer in a national policy of taking one sound step at a time and to the extent that it is necessary. There is another reason: The Canadian Pacific Railway Company is an admirably managed institution serving this country efficiently and well, and I think it desirable at the present time that there should be two railway systems in this country, one of which will be, so to speak, a check, in the sense of efficiency in the administration, upon the other.

An hon. MEMBER: Which one?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Well, I say to my hon. friend that looking to the farther future—I shall not refer to Canada because I do not want to be specific with regard to it—it may not be in our time, but in Great Britain and in the Overseas Dominions and in Europe, it will be found that instead of the waste of duplication and of competition which is connected with private ownership of separate railway systems, there will inevitably come public control of railway systems. I believe that is the opinion of the ablest men connected with private railway enterprises in the world to-day. In order to bring about efficient administration you must have a board, or a commission, in whom prima facie the public have the utmost confidence—more confidence even than they would have in the Government.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE: This Government, for example.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Take the Hydro-Electric Commission in Ontario. The public have confidence that it is being properly administered—

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is that the view of the Minister of Railways?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: ——and looking to the farther future, for the purpose of preventing duplication and waste there will undoubtedly be public control. I was speaking to a gentleman of high distinction from England no later than yesterday, and he told me they were reconsidering the whole railway situation in England. There was duplication of terminals, expensive duplication of tracks, all these things in this period following the war, and for the elimination of waste they are considering, and they are going to bring about, the efficient and economical use of all the railway systems of the country.

An hon. MEMBER: And the shipping.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Possibly the shipping, too, after a time, but that question does not immediately arise. Here the Government of Canada has taken over an immense railway system, and we will add to it. But let us take a pride in it, and try to make a success of it.

Mr. ANDREW ROSS McMASTER (Brome): I will not, I hope, be improperly conducting myself if I propose to bring back the minds and thoughts of the members of this House to the question under discussion, which is not one of public or private ownership, but that of Parliamentary control as distinguished from corporate control. The Acting Prime Minister has so vociferously protested his belief in public ownership that we might think he was a recent convert to the principle, because we have heard of the zeal of the apostate, and perhaps it is possible that the minister is an apostate to the principle of private ownership which he held before.

Now I would submit, in order that we may regard this matter in a calm way, that the question of public or private ownership is not one on which almost religious fervour need be displayed. Is it not rather a question of business? I think it is, and I propose to deal with it on that plane. I am always, Mr. Speaker, most interested in anything the Acting Prime Minister says. I always listen to him with the gravest and most careful attention; and I could not help discerning a strong contrast in what he said to-day as compared to what he said some time ago in connection with the proposal advanced by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding). That hon. gentleman, the other night when this Bill was under consideration in Committee, made precisely the same suggestion as he made this afternoon. And what was the attitude of the Acting Prime Minister on that occasion? Rising in his seat and turning with all that courteous graciousness with which he is endowed, he said to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding): "What you say, Sir, is worthy of the deepest consideration. I myself am afraid it is impracticable, but I will consult with the officers of the Government and see whether it would not be in the public interest to meet your views." To-day the same proposal is laid before the House, and what does the Acting Prime Minister say? He declares: This is an unfair suggestion, or an unfair speech, or an unfair argument—this is a specious argument. Why the reason for the change? The change from courtesy, the change from the most kindly consideration to somewhat abrupt negation, is due to the few words dropped by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Fielding). He, alas! said, perhaps not altogether with enthusiasm, that the conduct of these railways was going to be handed over to a group of gentlemen who live in and about Toronto. Is it an aspersion on the Acting Prime Minister that the gentlemen who form the board of management of these railways come from Toronto? I think not. But what caused the heat on the part of my hon. friend (Sir Thomas White)? I will tell the House. It is because the Acting Prime Minister saw in the words of the member for Shelburne and Queens what might be construed into a statement that what the Canadian people did not like about this Bill was that they felt afraid that it was the turning back of the Canadian Northern into the hands of the Mackenzie and Mann group. That was what caused the sudden change in the demeanour of the Acting Prime Minister. That hon. gentleman has declared, and I say, Amen to his statement, that if we are to have a successful experiment in public ownership, the control of the railways must be placed in the hands of those in whom the Canadian people have confidence. The member for Shelburne and Queens has stated that the public ownership proposal contained in this Bill suffers from two handicaps. I say that it suffers from a third handicap—the handicap that the people of Canada believe the Mackenzie and Mann interests are far too closely in touch with the present proposal.

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM (Peterborough West): What alternative to the Bill does the hon. gentleman propose?

Mr. McMASTER: I am not going to answer that question because it does not bear on the issue which is before us at present. The people of Canada have viewed with a feeling of distrust and dislike the fact that when the Acting Minister of Justice—for whom as a lawyer I have great respect—was conducting this Bill through the House he had seated beside him one of the lesser luminaries of that constellation of legal lights which clustered for years around Mackenzie and Mann. Not only that, but he told us that the Bill had been drafted by what I might call the sun of that system of legal lights, Mr. Zebulon A. Lash. These gentlemen are lawyers for whom all Canadian lawyers have great respect. But we would prefer that Government ownership of this great system started without such apparent close connection between Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann and the Government. Do you know, Mr. Speaker, that the people of Canada are not grateful to Messrs. Mackenzie and Mann for their railroad operations in this country? We find them feeling, rightly or wrongly, that the level of public life has not been raised, but rather debased by the operations of those gentlemen.

The Acting Prime Minister took considerable time in defending the corporate form of this company which is to run our railways. The hon. member for Shelburne and Queens never attacked the corporate form—so all that argument was absolutely beside the point; the hon. member asked that the control of Parliament over the moneys of the people should be retained. The Acting Prime Minister made a comparison between the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Canadian Northern Railway. He said that shareholders, widely distributed, gave the conduct of the Canadian Pacific Railway into the hands of the directors; and his argument was: Why cannot the people of Canada give the conduct of the Canadian Northern Railway just as completely into the hands of those nominated by the shareholders of this company? There is only one answer to that argument, but it is a very complete answer—that the private owners of the shares of the Canadian Pacific Railway are dealing with their own property and have the right to name whom they will as their directors; while this Government is dealing, not with its own property, but with the property of the people of Canada. And we, sitting on this side of the House, at least, say that in dealing with the property of the people of Canada there shall be thrown around that dealing all the safeguards and protection that British traditions and British experience have shown to be wise and necessary.

Another argument advanced by the Acting Prime Minister was that it would save the duplication of auditing. I really think that that is not a serious argument. No one pretends that if the audit of this railroad is carried on by the officers of the Auditor General that another audit will have to be made by the railway company's officials. One audit should be sufficient.

My hon. friend the Acting Prime Minister also brought forward the fact that after a deficit occurs Parliament will have the right to appropriate moneys to meet it. That is quite right, that is left to us. It reminds me of what a Radical member once said in the British House of Commons. "The King generally talks about 'my army' and 'my navy'; but he always talks about 'the national debt'." And our friends, the directors of this railway company, may possibly talk about "our engines and our rolling stock"; but when the deficit comes it will be "the deficit of the people of Canada."

I now come to the least enthusiastic argument of the Acting Prime Minister. He said, "I believe,—I am not sure,—that the Hydro-Electric Commission of Ontario carries on its business as regards the Parliament of the province in the same way as we propose that this commission or company should carry on its business as regards the Parliament of Canada." I know how busy the Acting Prime Minister is. I spoke in the House the other night of the inhumanity of this Government of twenty-three members allowing him to do two men's work. But really when he comes to tell us what we should do in regard to perhaps the greatest national undertaking that this country has ever assumed, he should be able to give us better arguments than his beliefs; I think we should have accurate information.

Public ownership is a matter on which honest men equally informed may hold different opinions. We have before us the great public ownership scheme in which the Government has embarked, and it is necessary that every man whatsoever his preconceived notions on public ownership may be, give that scheme all his support. But let not the Government endeavour to make political capital out of the fact that there are some men on this side of the House who are not in favour of Government ownership. I believe if we counted heads we would find among the supporters of the Government just as many who are not enthusiastic for government ownership. Government ownership is a principle that I wish I could enthusiastically support, for it seems to me in theory to be right. The idea that a railway is in essence a monopoly, that it can only be successful if it is a monopoly, and that all monopolies should be owned or at least be controlled by the people, appeals to me. But I cannot overlook the facts before me. What are they? Government ownership was tried in the United States, and it ran up tremendous deficits; government ownership was also tried in Great Britain and it ran up tremendous deficits. I know that government ownership was a great success in regard to marine insurance in Great Britain. When the war broke out ships stood in harbour, they did not dare go out because there were no insurance companies strong enough to insure their cargoes and hulls. The Government stepped in and insured them, and thus did a great service for the nation and the Allies, and it made a handsome profit out of the business. I asked the Government the other night whether they could tell me if the Government of Great Britain paid the premiums into the Consolidated Fund, but I have had no answer.

Now, we on this side of the House are prepared to give this government ownership plan, as outlined by this Bill, a fair field. We wish to see it succeed. We would have no patriotic feelings in our bosoms if we did not entertain that wish, because I do not know what will be the financial future of this country if this plan does not succeed. But what I do say is that the Government, with all the difficulties inherent in the situation, and in the light of recent experiments in public ownership, not only on this side of the Atlantic, but on the other, would be well advised to follow the sage and experienced counsel given to them by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens.

Mr. F. S. SCOTT (Waterloo South): I come from a part of the province of Ontario, Mr. Speaker, where a great majority of the people believe in the principle of public ownership, and believing as I do also in the principle, I am particularly concerned that at this time we should in discussing this measure come to a proper conclusion regarding it.

It is of the greatest possible importance that public ownership should be started on a proper basis. I have been a member of this House for some years, and I confess that from the first time that I came into the House, as I listened to the discussion of the Estimates of the Intercolonial Railway, my thought was that never could the Intercolonial Railway be carried along successfully by the method then followed. It seems to me that the first thing Parliament has to learn in connection with the public ownership of railways is that Parliament knows nothing at all about railway operation; that the running of railways should be delegated to some other body. If we were to go to the Board of Directors of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and say that they should submit their budget for each financial year to a body such as this, they would say that the idea was the height of the ridiculous. They would say that they could not hope to make a success of the Canadian Pacific railway by the adoption of such methods as have been employed by the Dominion in past years.

The amendment introduced this afternoon suggests that in the Bill which has been brought down, Parliament is taking a most radical step; that Parliament is making a departure from anything before attempted in this country, and that it is a move in the wrong direction. With that contention I most emphatically disagree. I believe that the only way in which this great undertaking can be successfully carried on is by the method adopted under this Bill. The principle may be a new one to this Parliament. We have had a very clear description of what has governed in these matters in the Motherland. However, the principle adopted by this Bill has been carried out in connection with provincial and municipal finances. While in the past it has been the governing principle that all revenue received by a municipal council shall be under the control of and shall be spent by that municipal council, nevertheless, in Ontario and throughout the Canadian West, where we have had considerable experience with public ownership, it has been found that public undertakings cannot be carried along on the old-fashioned lines. The municipal councils of Ontario and the West have adopted the very principle embodied in this Bill. They have appointed commissions in connection with their waterworks plants, their electric plants, and so on; and these public works are being administered just as it is proposed to administer this great public railway system.

If the member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) had stood up in the Legislature of Ontario fifteen or eighteen years ago and made the speech that he made in this House this afternoon, no doubt he would have received applause from both sides of the House. But conditions have changed in this country. The Ontario Legislature found that they could not carry along that great public undertaking, the hydro-electric movement, by the old methods. What did they do? They did just what the Government propose to do in this case; they placed the thing under the control of a commission. What does that commission do? Does it come to the Legislature? Do members on both sides of the legislature discuss, pro and con, all the different works and activities proposed to be entered upon by the Hydro-Electric Commission? No; this commission goes on with its work of administration, just as the directors of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company do in connection with their own undertaking. Each year the commission prepares a report and submits it to the legislature, and the legislature may see whether the operations of the commission show a deficit or a surplus. The matter is open to the fullest investigation on the part of the legislature; any kind of audit that is deemed necessary may be made. I submit that if public ownership is to be a success in Canada, it will only be by the adoption of such methods as have been found necessary in municipalities all through the country, and as have been found necessary in Ontario in connection with that most successful public undertaking which Ontario is carrying on.

I said a moment ago that in connection with public ownership Parliament had some things to learn. I believe that the only way in which we can make a success of this undertaking is by getting the right class of men. The essence of the whole thing is the selection of an efficient board of directors, and the building up of a proper executive. In this connection one thing has always occurred to me as I have followed the deliberations of this House. Perhaps I should not criticise; yet I feel that if we are to obtain the class of men necessary to make public ownership a success, this House of Commons has to learn to use such men decently, not to treat them as if they were pickpockets. What I have in mind is this: if Parliament, for instance, were to get men who have brought distinction to themselves and have made such a success of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company—men like Sir William Van Horne or Lord Shaughnessy—to take charge of the Government railways, and if these men were criticised and abused, as I have heard public servants criticised and abused in this House, you could not hope to induce men of that calibre to continue in the public service. We are all concerned about the success of this great undertaking. We may have differences of opinion as to how its operation can be made successful; as to the best way of administering it. But as Canadians we are all interested in its success, and I believe most sincerely that we can make it a success only by carrying it on according to sound business principles and by treating fairly and well the men in public employ.

There has been a good deal of criticism in this House—to-day as well as the last day that this matter came up in Committee—of the application of closure. It was not my privilege to be in the House during the first three days that the Bill was discussed in Committee. I had opportunity of studying it and hearing it explained only on one day in the committee stage, when it was considered under the closure rule. But I had not sat in the House very many hours before I had made up my mind with regard to the Bill. As to the talk about closure, it seems to me that the business of the country would be greatly facilitated and carried out in much better form if we had a little more of the application of closure.

I have seen the same thing happen on several occasions. Some of the best speeches that I have ever heard in this House were twenty minute speeches under the closure rule, and with this Bill in the Committee stage for four days, with its introduction some time before that, and with the opportunity of discussing it on this occasion, this Parliament has surely had ample time to digest and consider everything in connection with it.

Reference has been made to the Canadian Pacific, and it does not seem to be the opinion of this Parliament that this is the proper time to acquire the Canadian Pacific. The financial considerations are indeed, great, but I am convinced that this country cannot go on with one-half of its railways publicly owned and the other half privately owned. In the years to come there is bound to be conflict between the two, and consciously or unconsciously, Parliament, in the end, is not going to give a square deal to the privately owned company. Therefore, if the Canadian Pacific Railway Company were wise in their day and generation, they would say that the present is the proper time to get together with the Dominion Government and make these two great systems into one large State-owned system. That may not come at the present time, but I am satisfied it will come some time, and it will be one of the best things that could happen to the Dominion of Canada. The railway business is, like every other business, a good one. In any line of business, you will see some persons succeeding while others are doing the reverse, and the success of this undertaking will depend entirely, as I said before, on the class of men secured to handle it. If the Canadian Pacific could be taken over by the Dominion of Canada and combined with the roads acquired or about to be acquired by the Government, we would have, not only control of the railroads of Canada, but the finest organization of railroad administrators in the entire world, because, is there any reason why these men who have so successfully administered the Canadian Pacific—and we as Canadians are all proud of the way in which they have administered it—could not take over all the railroads of Canada in the public interest and administer them for the public good?

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North): Mr. Speaker, the leader of the Government (Sir Thomas White) for a while played fair with this Bill and followed it up in its real purpose. At a certain stage, however, of the proceedings in connection with it he commenced to play politics and to draw a distinction between the two sides of the House by saying that we were opposed to Government ownership of railways and that he was in favour of it, hoping thereby to get some applause from his followers and some kudos in some parts of the country where, for the present, Government ownership happens to be popular. Every hon. member who expects to enjoy public confidence should endeavour to serve the public honestly and squarely with his opinions and not trim his sails to every wind that blows over the country. No man can expect to enjoy the full confidence of the people—and whether he enjoys their confidence or not, to do what is best for the people—unless he has sound principles of his own, and is not capable of being carried away for the moment by a current of public opinion. I venture to tell the Acting Prime Minister that his history is not that of a man who favours public ownership. His history, within a few years, aye, within a few weeks, was that he was a strong supporter and advocate of private ownership. But in playing politics a few days ago he found it advisable to trim his sails to suit the breeze and he became favourable to public ownership.

That question is not before the House at all; it is not under discussion, and it was not discussed at any stage, whether public ownership was popular or not, or whether it was a proper policy or not. We have public ownership of railways, and the purport of this Bill is how best to handle the property which we have as public owners. I challenge the Acting Prime Minister to say that if the Canadian Northern Company was making a success of its business as the Canadian Pacific is he would step in and take it from them and handle it as a publicly owned enterprise. He would do nothing of the kind, and he is simply making a virtue of a necessity. We were forced into taking over the Canadian Northern and because of that we have to make the best of it. The Acting Prime Minister would, I am sure, be the last man, whether intentionally or not, to misquote any hon. member, and I wish to be generous to him and say that, inadvertently, he misquoted me to-day. He quoted me as saying, in connection with this Bill, that I was opposed to public ownership, whereas, he was reading from a statement I made over a year ago, on the first occasion that the Minister of Railways brought in his Estimates, and his report on the Government ownership of a railway which we then had, which we had been running for nearly a year, and for which he was looking for more money. In connection with the business that was before the House then, over a year ago, I made the statement which the Acting Prime Minister quoted as if I had made it the other day.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Did the hon. member or did he not quote the statement in his speech the other day?

Mr. McKENZIE: I did. I wanted to put myself absolutely right before the House and the country when the Acting Prime Minister said that I declared myself against public ownership the year before, and I quoted what I said a year ago, which is this:

> It is important for the people that we should have some conception of what we are doing. If this were a meeting of directors—

And I was talking of the Minister of Railways coming before the House with his Estimates.

> —it would not be a very cheerful one. The directors and shareholders would have discovered that we were spending away up in the millions in the development and working of the road, but that we have made no money. We are in debt. If we were ordinary directors and shareholders of a road we would have to put our hands down in our pockets to find money in order to make betterments and to run the road, and that would not be a cheerful prospect. However, we are new beginners in this enterprise. I was never in favour of Government ownership—

I said that over a year ago. I am honest about it. Life is too dear, peace too sweet, approval of my own conscience is too dear to me to bother with anything but what I believe.

> I am in favour of it now—

That is what I said a year ago.

> —as I think private enterprise will be better in these matters. Particularly in colonization and development will private enterprise and private energy do much better than Government ownership, but by the force of circumstances, we are in this net, and we must stay in it and make the most of it—that is the way I view it.

I went on to say that I hoped the minister would come back to us the next year with a statement that would compare favourably with the position of the Canadian Pacific. I said that I knew of no reason why the minister could not get just as good men to run the road as the Canadian Pacific had. Now, I have not changed my position one wit from what it was a year ago. In discussing this Bill I had no occasion to say anything about private ownership. It was merely a question of how best to handle the property that we already had, and it was not fair for the Acting Prime Minister to switch off into a discussion of private ownership, because that was not involved in the question at all. When I was addressing myself to the people of the West, not only last year but some time before, I said that if the people of the West wanted the development of railways, wanted enterprise in building lines in different parts of the West, they would be disappointed in Government ownership. Why did I say that? I said it because the province from which I come and parts of the province of Quebec had had fifty years of Government ownership of the Intercolonial, and during that time not one inch of branch line had been built in the province of Nova Scotia. I had a right therefore to say to the people of the West that it was better for them to have the energy and enterprise of private ownership. I knew what the Canadian Pacific had done in the West, and I knew what Mackenzie and Mann would do if they had the money. I knew the country would develop more rapidly under private ownership of railways.

Mr. BURNHAM: What is the hon. gentleman's alternative to this Bill?

Mr. McKENZIE: That seems to be a sort of chronic attack of my hon. friend. He is a brainy business man, and I think I will leave it to him to find the alternative. I say that we are discussing this business, and we have a right to discuss it; we have a right to stick to the real business before us, and not switch off into a discussion of public versus private ownership. We already have the road, and all we have to do is to determine what principles shall be applied in the management of it. That is the real question before us, and I cannot understand how the minister could get away from it. Why, what do we see in the very preamble of the Bill, which is the context of the Act, explaining what the Act is about? The preamble says:

> Whereas His Majesty on behalf of the Dominion of Canada has acquired control of the Canadian Northern Railway Company and of the various constituent and subsidiary companies comprising the Canadian Northern System.

The preamble says we have acquired the road. We are now simply dealing with the management of it. I have stated as clearly as I can my own position on government ownership. If the people of the West are to have government ownership, I trust that they will have a more cheerful experience than the people of the province of Nova Scotia have had, because our experience has not been good. I sincerely hope that theirs will be better, and that government ownership of railways will give them a better development than it has given to the Maritime Provinces. I was quoted by the Acting Prime Minister this afternoon as having said some years ago that that was one of the reasons why I did not think the good people of the West would be improving their position by substituting for the enterprise and energy of private ownership government ownership as we had experienced it in the East. Perhaps what was a failure with us will be a success in the West. I hope so; I hope that as years go by matters will improve in connection not only with government-owned railways, but everything else.

We were held up to contempt and obloquy the other night, and spoken of as traitors more or less to our own interests, because we were supposed to have said something in favour of the Canadian Pacific. Personally, I did not hear anybody say anything in favour of the Canadian Pacific. I did hear the Acting Prime Minister say to-day that the Canadian Pacific had served the country faithfully and well. Now, if the Canadian Pacific has served the country faithfully and well and given us a splendid service, should a public man in this House be found fault with for saying a good word on behalf of that institution, of which the Acting Prime Minister speaks so well? Obviously, no stigma can attach to any hon. member in this House who may have said something favourable to the Canadian Pacific.

The amendment before us cannot possibly have taken the Government by surprise. This Bill was founded upon a resolution, which was discussed very fully. When the resolution was before the House I told the minister that I could not agree to the principle of taking away from Parliament control of the revenue of Canada, and that I would continue to oppose that principle. I still adhere to that position. I believe that Parliament should know—whether it takes a few more clerks or not, matters nothing—how the money is coming in and where it is coming from, and at the last accounting we should have an opportunity of saying how the account shall be settled. That has been the principle that has been upheld and practised in the old land for hundreds of years, and is the principle that prevails there to-day. It has been explained to us by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) that although the principle was departed from for a short time prior to 1854, since that year the practice has been followed in the old country of not spending a single farthing of the public money until the expenditure has been approved by Parliament. I think that is a safe principle to follow. If we are going to relegate the management of our railways to an independent concern over which we have no control, what is the use of Parliament at all? It is proposed that we should put thousands of miles of railway and millions and, in time, billions of money beyond the control of Parliament. If we are to do that, why should we meet here at all? Why not let us meet one year and grant a charter to some private corporation to run the whole business of the country and then slam the door and go home, leaving that corporation to run the business? If the principle is good in one thing, it is good in another. If this proposal is the proposal par excellence that it is painted to be in connection with the handling of railways, surely the same principle holds good in other things and can be applied to every department of Government business. I submit that the Canadian people or the British people or any other well-governed people would not for a moment listen to such a proposition. It is better to stand by the old principle. Let us have absolute control over our own revenue, and let us spend it as the wisdom of Parliament may decide. If section 16 of the Act had said that the deficit would be made good after the money had been voted by Parliament, it would not be so bad; but it does not say that. It says that when a deficit occurs the manager of the company may simply walk into the office of the Finance Minister and say: "I am $10,000,000 or $20,000,000 short this year; kindly give me your cheque for that amount, under the provisions of section 16 of the Act."

If the minister should question him about it he says: "You have nothing to say about it; by virtue of this Act of Parliament I am entitled to the money, you have no further control over it; give me your cheque so that I may get the money." It is the privilege of the minister, six months afterwards when he is bringing down his Estimates to say: "We have been obliged to pay out $20,000,000." What are we going to do about it? The money is spent. It is a most ridiculous thing to say that we have any control over it at all. We have given it away in advance. We have expropriated this money out of the pockets of the people and we have passed it over to this company. Afterwards we are told that we have the opportunity of sitting down wisely together and reading that so much money was spent last year, and we have simply to pass this ex post facto legislation that will confirm the action of the minister in handing over the cheque. We believe that there should be the most minute inquiry into the proceedings of this company. Where is the machinery under this Act to furnish any such inquiry? There is not a line or a word in this Act to say that the Auditor General has anything to do about it, that the Auditor General can report upon or make any inquiry, and there is not a vestige of authority to submit these accounts to the Public Accounts Committee and let them come under the control of Parliament.

As a last word let me say that the Acting Prime Minister seemed to justify the action of the Government in putting on closure to prevent further discussion of this Bill. The very last man who made a speech of any length was himself just within three or four hours of the application of closure. The hon. gentleman spoke for about an hour and a half before closure was applied. Is it to be supposed by the Canadian people that it was necessary for the Acting Prime Minister to speak for that length of time explaining and defending the Bill before closure was applied? If a proper and useful discussion was being carried on by the Acting Prime Minister then surely there could not have been very much obstruction, because obstruction aims at keeping the House from doing things that should be done. But, within a few hours of the closure being applied it was thought necessary in order that the Bill might be properly understood by the House, that the minister should make a speech for an hour and a half. And yet, he told us to-day that closure was necessary. He told us the night before he made that speech, when the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) was speaking, that clause 16 was to stand. He said that it was a most serious objection that was taken to it and that it would receive consideration. What did the Acting Prime Minister do? He left the House after he had made his long speech and he never gave a second's consideration to this clause of the Bill. He never gave the Committee or the House an opportunity of dealing with it any more, but he applied the closure, and the section to which he had promised serious consideration was never considered, and the closure was applied without considering it. Is he going to tell the people that it was necessary to apply the closure without carrying out what he had promised?

I submit that the revenue derived from the operation of public railways should be absolutely under the control of Parliament and that the motion moved by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens embodies the only method by which this Bill should be dealt with and which brings the operation of these railways and public ownership absolutely and properly under the control of this House.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): Mr. Speaker, I am sorry to delay the House for a moment if it is waiting to divide, but I can assure you that I shall endeavour to confine what I have to say to the limits of such a speech as I have always thought should be made on the third reading of a measure. The hon. the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) has struggled manfully with a situation, which he, himself, feels to be difficult. He had every appearance of a man who was struggling with difficulties that he reared himself, started off and he said that he believed in a man who was not carried away with every breath of doctrine. I quite believe in the honesty of my hon. friend; I quite believe that he wants to think that he is such a man and I quite agree that he is nearly always such a man, but he has given evidence of having fallen a little short upon this occasion.

In regard to Government ownership, I must say that I think the whole matter does not arise on the discussion at all. But I watched the proceedings very carefully on a certain Friday night and a certain Monday night; I saw my hon. friend rise and read what he stated was his attitude in regard to Government ownership in the previous session, and my recollection is that he led the House to believe that he read it to show that he had not changed and that he was in that position still. If that be his position it is a perfectly honourable one, although I did think that on the Monday evening he showed just a little sign of wavering. I may have been wrong in my impression; I should have been glad to have believed that he had stuck to his position of Friday night. I do think at the present moment that that was still his position on Friday night, but I know his attitude did not convey the same impression to the House on Friday night that it did on Monday night. I am not impressed, nor edified, when he stands up and wants us to think of him as a man who is not carried away by new breaths of doctrine.

In regard to what my hon. friend said about the closure, and whether there was obstruction or not, I should apologise for referring to this matter in view of the debate we had on Friday night and on Monday night. But I think I can give an illustration that even my hon. friend would have difficulty in getting over as to the existence of obstruction. My hon. friend from Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) rose, with a broad smile which indicated a good deal of internal amusement at the role he was playing, and I am perfectly sure that he said ten times in not fewer than as many minutes, that he was seeking information. Well, that is a perfectly harmless remark, and the most of us might have agreed with the need for information. But when he repeated that statement ten times within ten minutes I submit to my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition that that was coming pretty near obstruction. I do not want to press the point. We all know what obstruction is. Needless repetition has been the definition which has been given to obstruction in the Parliament of Great Britain. I do not think the hon. member for Pontiac would not say that he was needlessly repeating himself when he said again and again in my hearing that he rose for information, that he had not the information and that he wanted it.

Now, with regard to the matter before the House, Mr. Speaker, I should always wish to give the utmost attention to anything that was advanced here by my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding). It may be conceded that this is a new departure or partakes of the nature of a new departure, but I cannot help thinking that that is more apparent than real. As to its being a new departure, Sir, I would just say this: That not only this country, but the world is in the midst of new departures, and we cannot help ourselves. We are in the midst of new departures, and any man who thinks that we have not to try and be prepared to deal with new departures in the present condition of this country and of the world, is in danger of rapidly finding himself a back number in any guidance he gives to the affairs of the nation.

I think that my hon. friend the Acting Prime Minister gave a most lucid, most cogent, and most forcible argument to the House, and I am bound to say, in all honesty, that it carried to me complete conviction. There were the two methods of dealing with this question after we decide upon public ownership; and even my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition is constrained to admit that such is the condition in which these roads are, we are bound to decide upon it. Then I take it, either we were to administer the Canadian National Railroad as the Intercolonial has been administered, or we were to adopt the corporation method. Now, with regard to the Intercolonial railway, I must ask hon. gentlemen opposite (who are better acquainted with it than I am, who have lived in that part of the country and watched its operations) is it not a fact that under all Governments that road has reeked and smelt with political patronage? Is not that the case? If it be the case can this Government and Parliament lightly think of adopting a method for the Canadian National railroad which has led to the wholesale use of patronage in the limited experiment that we have been making on the Intercolonial in regard to this great question of Government ownership? The Acting Prime Minister says the Government has deliberately chosen the other method. For what purpose? To get rid, if possible, of political patronage; and if the Government does not get directors who will co-operate with it in this matter, it will be brought to very strict account by the people of this country. I believe that here is the crux of the whole thing. Let the Government say to its directors: We want this railroad run upon business lines, and we want the best men put in for doing any specific work in connection with it, and we do not want politics to interfere. If the Government does less than that it will very rapidly be brought to task by the people of this country. If the Government does that, I have stated my previous faith in Canada's ability to sustain this railroad, and to build it up to a degree of wealth and efficiency equal to that of the Canadian Pacific, and the two railroads will be part of the wonder which the Canada of the future is going to be in the world. The whole thing depends upon getting the right men to carry the undertaking out—getting men in whose trustworthiness and ability you can have confidence, and Canada being behind the road it is bound to be a success. If we do not produce, and cannot produce, such men in Canada import them. Get honest, trustworthy and able men. Tell them they have got to run this, as a railway proposition, to success, and that they are not to consider political questions at all. Then I have such confidence in my country that I have faith in the future of this road.

As to the control of Parliament, I have said that this is a new departure. I think that in the case of Britain's handling of the Indian Accounts there may be a precedent for this line of action. But we do not forfeit, that I can see, any of our rights as a Parliament to look into the way the roads are being run. Something has to be done on trust in connection with such a large concern. Do the Canadian Pacific shareholders do nothing on trust in regard to their railroad, one of the biggest concerns in the world? Have the shareholders to do nothing on trust in connection with that road? Surely we can find men in Canada—or our politics and our public life are corrupt beyond description—surely we can find men to do for the nation what the directors of the Canadian Pacific are doing for the shareholders of that railway. I hope we can. I hope so from the bottom of my heart, for the sake of the future of the enterprise, for the sake of the future of the public life of Canada, for the sake of the prosperity, progress, and real welfare of this great Dominion. But I would appeal to my hon. friends opposite to take this attitude and force home from time to time—and I will help them in doing it if it is necessary—the points that I have made in my brief utterances. Force home these points, and criticise and observe all you can, but let us give Canada and her railroad a fair trial.

Mr. SPEAKER: Is the House ready for the question?

Mr. FRANK S. CAHILL (Pontiac): I was somewhat pleased with the remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Michael Clark) when he said that he had heard me repeat some ten times in as many minutes the remark that I was unable to get any information from the Government regarding the various clauses of this somewhat complicated Bill. I am glad to know, Mr. Speaker, that after having repeated ten or twelve times a plain, simple statement, it may have penetr ted the brilliant brain of the hon. gentleman. He did not tell the House that after we on this side had asked questions repeatedly the Government were not able to, or at any rate did not, answer those questions. I undoubtedly stated a dozen times that we had been asking for information that we had not got, or could not get; and when this Bill was subjected to the closure there were at least ten of the clauses in it that had not been debated in this House, many of the most important clauses in the most important piece of legislation that has perhaps been before Parliament for some years. The clause to which my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) has moved an amendment was under discussion on a Monday, the first evening of the debate. I was not present on that occasion. I must confess, Mr. Speaker, that when I heard that the Government and Mr. Lash were co-operating with the Mackenzie and Mann group it gave me such a headache I was unable to be here that evening. Had I been here I would have spoken about that clause as I did when the resolution came before the House, because there is nothing about the amendment of my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) which renders it impossible to adopt.

The Acting Prime Minister makes the statement that you will have to duplicate the staff. Nothing of the kind. Every big corporation—for instance, the Canadian Pacific Railway—employ auditors and then have an outside audit as well. The auditing staff of the Canadian National Railways could be under the jurisdiction of the Auditor General, and one audit would suffice for the company and for the country.

The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) said that I was obstructing. I heard other hon. members say the same thing. Perhaps I did not make myself clear in some instances. When we were dealing in Committee with section 17, relating to the date of the annual meeting, which is to be held in April, some hon. members thought that that was a matter of very little importance. It simply means this, Mr. Speaker, that if you have the annual meeting of this company on the second Thursday in April, instead of on the 31st of December, you will be getting a report—if you get one at all—presented to Parliament a year later; whereas if you made the statistical year end on the 31st of December you would get the report of the previous year's operations presented to Parliament during the session. As the section passed the Committee it is not likely the annual report will be presented to Parliament until the following year, and it will be so far gone then that the minister in charge will simply say: "This is last year's accounts. We have had this deficit, we have paid the money; that was a year ago, and we are doing better now." I think that the amendment I proposed was important, Mr. Speaker. The statistical year of the Dominion ends on the 31st of December. Why not make this National Railway system conform to it? No information was given me on that subject. There must be some reason why the Government want to have the annual meeting in April. Is it because it will not be convenient to bring the report of the company's operations before Parliament that session? I do not see how the amendment can bring about any hardship on the Government or on the management of the railway. If you have the Auditor General's Report, members of Parliament would be in a position to intelligently discuss the management of the people's railways; but there would be no such chance a year after payments have been made out of the treasury without the sanction of Parliament.

The adoption of my suggestion would entail practically no added expense. It is just as necessary to have an audit of the expenditures of a company, the directors of whom are appointed by the Government, as it is to have the expenditures of the people's representatives audited. The people are not satisfied to trust the Government or Parliament with the expenditure of money without any independent audit; so provision has been made for an Auditor General, who is independent of the Government. That being the case, surely it is just as essential that we should have an audit when the Government hand over the spending of money to a third party. There will be in the neighbourhood of one hundred million dollars spent on this enterprise, and so far as the Bill at present provides there is absolutely no provision made for an audit. I asked the Government when the Bill was under discussion if a report would be presented to Parliament, and that is one of the numerous questions to which I received no answer.

Now, there is not an hon. member who listened to the whole discussion on this Bill from start to finish who can tell me that the Government ever said they would bring before Parliament at any particular date a full report of the receipts and expenditures of this undertaking. I do not know whether the Government are withholding the information intentionally or not. But there are a number of things in this Bill that do not look good to me, and they do not look good to the people. When I criticised the Bill a few days ago I was not only expressing my own opinion, in a large measure I was expressing the opinion of a great many people of the country. There is no doubt, Mr. Speaker, that there is a feeling abroad that if this enterprise is to succeed we must get clear of the Mackenzie and Mann influence, lock, stock and barrel. The gentlemen selected as directors were directors of the Canadian Northern railway, and, according to the statement of the Government, they made a failure of its management. Have the Government looked around to find competent railway men, or even public ownership enthusiasts, who would assume control of this road. It seems to me it would be the simplest thing in the world to get a body of the best railway men in Canada, pay them good salaries, and relieve them as far as possible from political control. Hon. members now say that the directors are relieved from political control. Mr. Speaker, the Minister of Railways has a string on every one of the directors; he can pull them back at will, and he does not have to come to Parliament to give any explanation of his action. I made a suggestion when the Bill was in Committee that the directors should be appointed in the same way as the members of the Railway Commission. Some hon. members asked me if I wanted to have them appointed for ten years. I replied that I did not suggest that, because possibly ten years might be too long a period to keep in office some older men in an undertaking of this kind; but I suggested they could be appointed for four or five years in much the same way as are the members of the Railway Commission. The Government would not lose control; they could always add to or withdraw from the directorate. But those directors would feel that as long as they were giving good service their positions would be assured.

I also made the proposal that there should be a profit sharing arrangement. At present we have a commission sitting on a proposal for co-operation between capital and labour. If there is to be any co-operation it must be based on profit sharing of some kind or another. Here is the biggest undertaking that we will ever have directly under our own control where we can adopt a profit sharing system.

We are dealing with a road that is losing some millions of dollars. It would be a simple matter to work out a plan under which, when the road earned a certain amount, all employees of the system, the directors included, would share in the profits.

An hon. MEMBER: How about the deficits?

Mr. CAHILL: The deficits would not be affected adversely by such a plan; they might even be reduced. You could start with the deficits—with the deficit of this year, if you wanted to, or with the average deficits over a period of years—and begin to share profits even before dividends were earned on the investment. There would be nothing wrong about that. You would be getting the hearty co-operation of every man working on the road; every man interested in the enterprise would have an opportunity of sharing in its profits, and if the commission was appointed for a term of years would feel that he was free from all political control. It would be in his interest and in the interest of all the men on the road, individually and collectively, to make the road pay as far as possible. The deficit, Mr. Speaker, we must get rid of. We cannot go on multiplying these deficits indefinitely. If we do, we shall kill not only public ownership, but the reputation of Canada as well. We must get people into this country. We must get immigration.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. CAHILL: (Continuing) Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock, we were discussing the Canadian National Railway system and public ownership generally, but the latter subject is not one that should be discussed on the third reading of this Bill as we own the Canadian National Railways and public ownership of railways is a matter of fact. The only question at present before the House is the best means of obtaining for the people of Canada efficient management of the Canadian National railways. The Opposition was somewhat criticised for seeking for information from the Government in regard to this Bill, although, a number of clauses looked as if they could be amended with advantage to the people of this country and in the interest of public ownership. When the Bill was in Committee and before closure was brought in, the acting Prime Minister asked that clause 3, pertaining to the capital stock of the company, should stand, the question being whether capital stock should be held by the Minister of Finance without power to dispose of it. When I asked the Minister of the Interior, who was handling the Bill, what was the purpose of leaving this clause so that the Government might dispose of the stock, he said that there was an arrangement with some of the holders of Canadian Northern debenture stock who might wish to exchange it for stock of the company. In the first place I do not believe that the people of Canada want to divide the control of the Canadian National railways with any person. We have this railway system now; we have an opportunity of testing out public ownership of railways, and until the people of Canada decide that they cannot manage this system, the stock of the Canadian National railway company should be vested absolutely in the hands of the Government, and no part of it should be disposed of until the matter is brought before this Parliament. The acting Prime Minister the other day, in making a speech in which he intimated that there was obstruction, stated, in reply to a question, that the press of Canada was with him. He said:

> We practically have all the press now. The press of the country is above all things an intelligent press, and it is inconceivable that it should not strongly support this Union Government.

I do not know whether he meant in its every action or not, but presumably he meant in connection with the railways. I have here a clipping from the Toronto Globe and also one from the Montreal Star, two reasonably respectable journals of this country, two journals that are supporting Union Government in most of its legislation, but they are not altogether convinced that the action of the Government in connection with the National railway is the best for the country. The Toronto Globe, of April 30, says in an editorial:

> The people are restive and apprehensive when they learn that Mr. Z. A. Lash, K.C., was engaged by the Government of Canada to draft legislation for the National railways, and that although the original Mackenzie and Mann are no longer doing contracting work for the Canadian Northern railway, there are still gentlemen of the same name operating as the North ern Construction company. There would be more confidence in the intention of the Government to make a real fight for the creation of an efficient National Railway System were one or two outstanding advocates of public ownership given seats on the National Board and a conspicuously efficient member of the Grand Trunk operating staff chosen as principal assistant to Mr. Hanna. There is no reason why the officials of the defunct Canadian Northern should crowd all others off the public ownership bench. If they continue to do so, there will inevitably be bred in the public mind the suspicion that public ownership is merely camouflage for the same old crowd of promoters and contractors operating in the same old way.

[Mr. Cahill.]

The Toronto Globe is, by the way, an ardent advocate of public ownership. The Montreal Star, which is, I believe, opposed to public ownership and in favour of private ownership, says under date of April 28:

> Why the rush? Sir Thomas White, the Acting Premier of Canada (by the way, when is Sir Robert coming home?), declares that the Government is pledged unalterably to public ownership of railways and that public ownership has come to stay.

It says further on:

> Sir Thomas White and Mr. Rowell broadly insinuate that the Canadian Pacific railway's fear of public ownership is the main-spring behind all movements in opposition to their socialistic policy.
> Per contra, many men are beginning to wonder what is the pressure behind this anxious haste to involve the country in new railway obligations, at this time of financial and industrial crisis. Once it was "Cox can't wait." Who is it who is in such a hurry now?

That, I think, expresses pretty generally the sentiment of the people of this country. The Canadian people are, I believe, in favour of the nationalization of this railway; they are in favour of efficient management of this railway. Many people believe that if this railway is efficiently managed, it will be in a position in the near future, when we get more immigration into Canada to develop the land, to decrease western freight rates and freight rates generally throughout Canada.

Since this road has come into the hands of the Government the rates have been increased, and we have been spending large sums of money without any detailed information as to the purposes of the expenditure. There is no doubt that the people will get tired of this kind of thing and there is absolutely no doubt that they will hold the Government accountable—accountable to the extent that they will vote them out, perhaps at the next election. But that is not soon enough to save the railway situation for the people of Canada, and unless the Government are willing to lay all their cards on the table and give this House all the information that has been asked for there will be a suspicion in the minds of a great many people in this country that they are not treating this question fairly and honestly; and once there is that suspicion there will be inefficiency in the management and lack of co-operation among the people of this country. This undertaking has every possibility of success; it is already owned by the people and if the people are satisfied that the money they are paying in passenger and freight rates on this railroad is all going into the treasury of Canada and is being honestly expended, naturally they will want to patronize the railway in preference to the Canadian Pacific or any other road, and then it will only be a matter of time before their patronage of the National railway will make it a profitable undertaking. I think possibly my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) and myself are about the only two men in the House who hold the view that this undertaking will be profitable. I can see a great future for it in developing the western country; that is, if lines are laid down for the honest purpose of developing the country, and not for political purposes. There is no reason why this railway should have the preference over another road running into the same territory. For instance, if the Canadian Pacific can build a road into a certain territory cheaper than the National road, and can give a cheaper and better service, there should be no hesitation on the part of the Railway Committee of this House in granting the Canadian Pacific a charter to construct in that territory; let us have the competition. If, on the other hand, the Canadian National railway can develop the territory more cheaply and give a better service than the Canadian Pacific, there should be no hesitation on the part of the Railway Committee in saying that the Canadian Pacific shall not go into that territory. But we must be honest with ourselves, honest with the undertaking, and honest with the Canadian Pacific. Give both roads a chance to develop along their natural lines; let them both develop their natural territory, so that we may have cheaper rates, efficiency in management, and a development of the territory to the best advantage. When we develop the territory the traffic will be created that will make the road pay.

One of the objections I had to the renewal of these blank charters was that there are any amount of corporations in Western Canada holding large blocks of vacant land for speculative purposes, and who will use all possible pressure to get the Canadian National Railway to build in their territory and develop their lands. If the road builds in that territory the lands will be advanced in value by the people's money, and at the expense of the producer, who will go in there after the railway is built and have to pay an increased price for this land. To my mind, the main essential in our railway problem is to free the land from the speculators; get immigration into the country; get people to produce on the land, and you will make the railway profitable. Some hon. members opposite have criticised the late Administration for the cost of the National Transcontinental. It would seem, when they speak of railways, they cannot help criticising the Laurier Administration for assisting in the development of the railway policy of this country. They say that the National Transcontinental cost upwards of $200,000,000. Let me tell hon. members that if the National Transcontinental did cost $200,000,000, or in that neighbourhood, it was paid for out of revenue, and that when this Government came into power the national debt, including the Transcontinental, amounted to less than $400,000,000. I might also tell them that when the Canadian Northern wanted to build from Edmonton to the coast, through British Columbia down to Vancouver, and parallel to the Canadian Pacific, the Liberal Government at Ottawa refused to grant them a charter for that road. What did the Canadian Northern do? They got a charter from the Government of the province of British Columbia.

The Government of British Columbia—I do not wish to mix politics with railways, and no hon. member can say that I ever said that any one person was responsible for the railway situation, except perhaps when some one asked me a question—the Government of British Columbia guaranteed the bonds of that road, which duplicated the Canadian Pacific practically for 200 miles from west of Edmonton to the coast. It was the most expensive construction the Canadian Northern ever had. I do not think it is good business for the people of Canada to try to cover up our responsibility by saying that it was a Liberal or a Conservative Government that was responsible for the national railway situation to-day. We have to face the situation, and I think the solution is feasible and quite workable. But we must get the railways out of the hands of the politicians, out of the hands of the men who made a failure of them, and into the hands of railway operators.

When the question was raised here a few days ago of having representatives of labour on the board, it was objected that that would be unconstitutional and could not work. Now we are doing something that is far more unconstitutional. We are taking out of the hands of the Auditor General the supervision of the expenditure of Canada's money, and as we are going to that length, I cannot see any reason why we cannot have on the board representatives of labour. It would be the simplest thing in the world to have labour represented on the National Railway Board, and then we would get the co-operation of all the labour organizations of the country. If you get the best men possible to manage the railway, and pay them good salaries—pay them anything in reason, because they can save their salaries in a day on this undertaking—and give them a free hand, make the undertaking as free as possible from politics, and get the co-operation not only of the labour organizations and the railway employees but of everybody in the country, the undertaking will be a success instead of showing a deficit. But an audit of the expenditures should be submitted to Parliament, so that the people's representatives can see what is being done with the people's money; because if you do not show that you are honest, if you are unwilling to lay your cards on the table, you cannot expect the people of this country to have confidence in the undertaking. They would not go out of their way to patronize the road or do anything they could to further its interests because they would have the feeling that it was not the interests of the road, their own interests, they were advancing, but the interests of some private individual. Let the Government give us freely and frankly the information they have in their possession, so as to secure the co-operation of everybody.

Some hon. members have suggested that I have been obstructing more or less. Well, at the time to which the hon. member for Red Deer refers, I brought to the attention of the Committee a question which I have since seen repeated in the press, and it is this: The Minister of Railways told us that the deficit would be about $7,000,000, and that the earnings of the road above operating cost would be about $3,000,000. As I pointed out then, our liabilities in connection with this road amount to something like $470,000,000, the interest on which would be in the neighbourhood of $18,800,000. Deducting $3,000,000, the surplus earnings over operating cost, leaves a deficit of about $15,000,000. I maintain that it is unreasonable for the Government to accuse the Opposition of obstructing when they refuse to give such information as I am asking for now. The minister made that statement; when I asked him to explain, he did not refute it at all, but simply refused to answer. I might say that when I put the question, we were then under closure, and as soon as any hon. member on this side of the House asked a question the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) would say: "I move that the further consideration of this question be postponed." A number of the clauses of this Bill have never been debated in the House, and I think the Government are giving the National Railway Company a very bad start. In the first place, the Bill is being forced through under closure; the vital clauses are not being debated, and the Government will not agree to have an annual report of the undertaking submitted to Parliament.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough): I should like to draw attention to what I think was an unintentional mistake on the part of the leader of the Government, when he said that the Bill we are now discussing contains provisions similar to those contained in the Hydro-Electric Act of the province of Ontario.

I took the trouble to look up the Hydro-Electric Act and, although I have not had time to read it carefully, I find that such is not the case but that it is the exact opposite. It appears to contain every possible safeguard for the expenditure of money. In the first place, it provides for a controller who is not an officer of the Hydro-Electric Commission but of the Government and who appears to occupy a position somewhat similar to that of the Auditor General here. It is his function to countersign every cheque that is issued by the Hydro-Electric Commission and no expenditure can be made except it is countersigned by the comptroller. The comptroller is responsible to the Government and it is his duty to see that every expenditure is authorized. Provision is made in the Act for an annual statement of expenditures, similar to the provision which is made here, but it does not stop there. The Act also provides for an estimate for the coming year, something that is not contained in this Bill. In order that I may make no mistake about this, I will read one or two sections to the House. The section providing for the controller is as follows:

> The Lieutenant-Governor in Council may appoint an officer to be know as the Comptroller of the Commission who shall hold office during the pleasure of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council and shall countersign every cheque issued by the Commission, but before countersigning shall satisfy himself that the issue of the cheque is authorized.
> The Commission, through the Comptroller, shall before the 15th day of February in each year, make to the Treasurer of Ontario an annual report for the information of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, and for the information of the Assembly, and such report shall contain, among other things, clear and comprehensive statements disclosing and exhibiting—

(a) The actual condition as to the amount and character of the assets and liabilities (direct and indirect) of the undertakings conducted by it as on 31st December last preceding;

(b) The cash transactions, including receipts and disbursements for the year ending on 31st December last preceding;

(c) The revenues, income and interest earned and the amount of the costs, expenses and other items chargeable there against in connection with the operation, maintenance, administration and conduct of the undertakings controlled by it for the year ending 31st December last preceding;

Now, we come to the provision relating to the ensuing year:

(d) The amounts, with the expected sources of the same, which it is estimated will be received in cash or its equivalent and the payments, loans and advances with the purpose of the same, which it is contemplated shall be made in cash or otherwise, in the next succeeding year;

(e) The amounts and particulars of the obligations and liabilities which it is contemplated shall be incurred in the next succeeding year;

(f) The securities or evidence of indebtedness which it is contemplated shall be created, issued, sold or otherwise disposed of, together with the method of dealing with the same in the next succeeding year

You see, Mr. Speaker, that it is the duty of the Hydro-Electric Commission to provide the Legislature of Ontario with an estimate of the money that they expect to expend during the coming year. This Bill fails to do that. This Bill gives the board of directors power to expend money without any reference to Parliament at all. It provides that an accounting shall be given after the money is spent. That is what we object to. That is locking the stable door after the horse is stolen. The Hydro-Electric Commission has to give an estimate of every dollar it expects to spend in the ensuing year and it is authorized by the Legislature. Then, there is this other section:

Where the Legislature has appropriated money for the purposes of the Commission, such money shall be payable out of such appropriation to the Commission from time to time, upon the requisition of the Chairman of the Commission and the direction of the Lieutenant-Governor in Council, in such amounts and at such times as shall be stated in the requisition and direction, and this section shall have effect notwithstanding that there may be sums due from the Commission to the province and notwithstanding anything in The Audit Act contained.

This shows that the system that is in force with regard to the Hydro-Electric Commission in Ontario is exactly the system that is advocated by my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding). There is a provision for the accumulation of a reserve fund but that reserve fund has to be under the supervision of the comptroller and the cheques have to be signed by him. If the cheques and guards that are furnished under this Hydro-Electric Act had been contained in the Act which is now before the House, there would be no cause of complaint in regard to this matter on this side of the House and the amendment of my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queens would not be necessary. The hon. the Leader of the Government (Sir Thomas White) cannot get any comfort at all from the system adopted by the Hydro-Electric Commission in the province of Ontario.

My hon. friend stated to the House that it is impracticable to adopt the proposition of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens. But he does not tell us why it is impracticable. He has given no good reason. It has not been found impracticable in the case of the Intercolonial railway for the last forty years; in the case of the New Zealand railways, and in the case of the railways of the Commonwealth of Australia. The Commonwealth of Australia is a very large country. The transactions in connection with the railways are scattered over that vast continent; yet the system we advocate here has not been found impracticable there.

My hon. friend has said that it is impracticable, but he has not given us good ground for that statement. The difference is that in the one case we have parliamentary control, and in the other case we have not. I also object to the provision of section 26 of this Act because it enables the company, with the approval of the Governor in Council, to bond the whole line up to $75,000 a mile. There are no bonds on the Intercolonial railway at the present time, but as I understand this Bill it gives the power to the directors of this company, with the consent of the Governor in Council, to bond some eighteen hundred miles of the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island railways, up to the amount of $75,000 a mile. That would secure some $112,000,000 which they could use in building railways and railway extensions in Western Canada, or elsewhere in this country, without any consent on the part of this Parliament. The whole question is amply provided for under the existing law; we have the Audit Act which makes very careful provision in regard to the expenditure of money. The moneys paid in to the Minister of Customs, the Minister of Railways, and the Postmaster General, all become part of the consolidated revenue of Canada, and not one dollar can be paid out without Parliamentary authority. I believe in Parliamentary control of the people's money and for that reason intend to vote for the amendment.

Mr. T. E. PEDLOW (Renfrew South): There still seems to be a misunderstanding, even in the minds of several members of the Government including the Acting Prime Minister, in regard to the subject under discussion. As I read the measure I find that the Government already owns the railways for whose management we are endeavouring to draft rules and regulations. For instance, the preamble states:

> Whereas His Majesty on behalf of the Dominion of Canada has acquired control of the Canadian Northern Railway Company—

Not that the Government is about to acquire the railway, but that it has acquired it.

> —and of the various constituent and subsidiary companies comprising the Canadian Northern System, as specified in the First Schedule to this Act, and it is expedient to provide for the incorporation of a company under which the railways, works and undertakings of the companies comprised in the Canadian Northern System may be consolidated, and together with the Canadian Government Railways operated as a national railway system.

I think that very much of the discussion that has taken place is entirely beside the question. We are not discussing, and have not been—unless forced to assume the defensive on this side—the question of the public or private ownership of the railways under consideration. We are here to devise ways and means of managing the railways that we already own, or are supposed to own—there seems to be grave doubts in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite as to whether we really own these railways or not; in the one breath we are told that we do own them, and in the very next breath we are given to understand by members on the Government side that we are not the owners. But we are supposed, according to this Bill, to own these railways, and therefore public ownership, I submit, is not the question under discussion in this debate. I am surprised at the Acting Prime Minister insisting that we should put ourselves on record on this subject, when the question of public ownership, or otherwise, is not the issue. That hon. gentleman has accused members on this side, including the leader of the Opposition, of obstruction. I would like to call attention to some of the methods of so-called obstruction that have been adopted by gentlemen on this side. For instance, on Thursday, April 24th, when this Bill was up for consideration in Committee for the first time, the members on this side endeavoured to obtain some information from the Minister of Railways, and spent two full hours in the effort to do so. Can hon. gentlemen opposite accuse us of obstruction under such circumstances? The Minister of Railways absolutely refused to give us the information we demanded from him, and which we had a right to receive. And after two long hours of debate, the information was vouchsafed; and what did it amount to? The Minister of Railways was trying to withhold from us, at least he pretended that he did not know, what salary was being paid to the man who was managing the Canadian Northern railway—the trifling sum of $25,000 was not worth noticing in the estimation of the Minister of Railways —and yet this is the man to whom we intend to trust the management of the railroad system of this country under the present Bill. Then, Sir, coming to the following day, Friday, April 25th, we spent nine weary hours endeavouring to extract further information from the Government in regard to this Bill. The Acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Meighen) was leading the House on that occasion, and we endeavoured to elicit from him details respecting the right of way of the forty-four railway lines that, according to him, the Government intended to commence operations on immediately. The minister refused to give us that information, or any information whatever, as to the location of these roads, and finally, when he rose to reply to gentlemen on this side, he sneered at the idea of the House wanting information of such a character. Now, if the Government is going to start the construction of these railroads in a few weeks, it should at least have the location of the railroads in question fixed. Yet the hon. gentleman sneered at the request for information in that regard—it was a trifling thing in his opinion for the people of this country to know where these forty-four railroads were to be located. These are examples of the kind of obstruction that the House has been subjected to, and because of which the Government, forsooth, considered it absolutely necessary to introduce the closure and shut off further discussion of the terms of this Bill. I repeat that we are not opposing the Bill on its public ownership provision, but purely and simply because we wish to see proper arrangements made for the management of this gigantic proposition. The member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) this afternoon made a very sane and sensible remark, in which I heartily concur, viz.: that if we are going to frame the Bill along proper lines we should see that provision is made for having the right men placed on the management of this great public undertaking. I agree most heartily with the hon. gentleman. But, Sir, do you consider that the man who has been a failure already in connection with the operations of the Canadian Northern, and who has been losing money already in the management of our railroads—do you consider men of that type capable of managing the affairs of this great railroad system successfully? For my part, I object to it, and decline to support any proposition of the kind. A man who has already proved himself beyond doubt a failure, a man who has already lost money in railroad operations, a man who has run the Canadian Northern Railroad system to the ground, as shown by the figures quoted in this House, has no right or title to be entrusted with the management of a great system such as this.

Now, it is contended that the criticism of the Opposition has not been of any advantage. I beg to call the attention of the House to one matter wherein we succeeded in inducing the Minister of Railways to amend this Bill, and that amendment, in the years to come if not now, will be of inestimable value to this country. I refer to the amendment of Section 23. In this section as originally drawn there was no reference to authorization by Parliament of the necessary expenditure for the construction and operation of railway lines and extensions by the directorate. As a result of our criticism the Minister of Railways found it convenient to amend the section by the insertion of the following words:

in respect to the construction whereof respectively, Parliament may hereafter authorize the necessary expenditure, or the guarantee of an issue of the Company's securities.

That is an important addition to the Bill and is quite a safeguard of the country's interests. Yet we are told that the criticism by hon. members on this side of the House has been of an obstructive nature. I insist that it has been entirely in the opposite direction; it has been of a constructive nature and has greatly improved the Bill. We are told that we should fall down and worship this measure because it has been proposed by the Government and should instantly accept all its provisions without demur. But, as I have already stated, there is room for an honest difference of opinion on the question of public or private ownership, and I submit that the evidence on the subject of public management is not of the rosiest nature. Take for instance, the Intercolonial railway, which from its inception has been under Government control; has it been an unqualified success? Take the Canadian Northern railway under its present management; has it been an unqualified success? Take the telegraph and telephone systems under public management; have they been an unqualified success? I was privileged to look into a statement on that subject recently, and I find that the operating cost of our government telephones and telegraphs is in the neighbourhood of $800,000 per year, while the entire revenue is only $200,000 per year, an annual loss of $600,000. I understand, too, that the minister in charge of that department has received a report from an expert appointed to investigate the possibilities of the telephone system to the effect that he can abandon and give away enough of those lines to make a saving of between $300,000 and $400,000 a year, and still give as good a service to the public.

We have heard a good deal in this House of the success of the Australian National Railway system. In to-day's issue of the Montreal Gazette I find a statement which, with your permission, Sir, I would like to place upon Hansard, because it is of particular value at the present time:

Australian Railways.

Direct Losses More Than $11,000,000 Yearly: (Boston Commercial.)

The report of the Railway Commissioners of Australia for the year ending June 30, 1918, has lately been issued. The report shows that the losses amount to more than $11,000,000 for last year and $11,500,000 for the year 1917. The Commonwealth transcontinental line, which was opened for traffic in October, 1917, has, therefore about eight months of operation. The loss on this line and the other short lines own by the Commonwealth, amounted to $2,280,000. The length of the transcontinental line is 1,051 miles and the cost has been $33,000,000 so far, but it will require an expenditure of several millions more to put the road in fair shape.

I wish the House to mark this particularly, because it is a very important point in connection with Government operation. Notwithstanding the large loss sustained by the Commonwealth in the last three years of operation there is a further loss on taxation, which is as follows:

Thus, in round numbers, the losses in 1915-16 were $8,000,000; in 1916-17 they were $11,500,000, and in the last year they were $11,000,000. These losses do not take into account any displacement of taxes.

Up to June 30, 1918, these railways had cost a little over one billion dollars and there were 20,259 miles.

If we reckon the tax loss at $600 per mile and we tax the railways in this country $622 per mile per year, this loss would amount to $12,000,000 a year.

But more important still is the fact of high freight rates on all the Australian lines. They are nearly three times as high as in this country, taking the year 1915 as an example. Last year, the people of Australia paid $65,000,000 for their freight bill. In 1917 rates in Australia were increased by 10 per cent, but most of them were fixed at 5 per cent increase the following year.

These facts, from the official reports of the Government itself, show: Direct losses of $8,000,000 to $11,000,000 a year, loss of taxes and on high freight rates total $40,000,000 a year, or a total loss of some $50,000,000 annually, and on top of this wages averaging 30 to 40 per cent less than in this country for the railroad employees.

This is a mighty burden upon the taxpayers of Australia. The socialized telegraph and telephone lines lose $800,000 a year and there are large losses on nearly every other socialistic scheme that those states have plunged into. It is feared that the people have created a pauper state, and at any rate they have created the largest public debts in all the world.

Now, I do not wish that this country, the land of my adoption, should emulate the policy of the Commonwealth of Australia. There are some things we do not wish to excel in, and one in particular is the incurring of debt. I have much pleasure, therefore, Sir, in supporting the amendment of the hon. member (Mr. Fielding.)

Mr. S. W. JACOBS (George Etienne Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I rise to support the amendment of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens. His address was convincing, cogent and logical; it must have appealed to the good sense of this House. Section 16, if adopted in its present form, would introduce legislation of a revolutionary character, and it behooves all true Liberals to see to it that the necessary protest is made before it passes into law. When this question was originally before the House, the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) said that he could not see very much objection to the theory propounded by the member for Shelburne and Queens, but that at the moment without giving it due consideration he thought impracticable. I submit that neither he nor any of his colleagues have presented any argument to justify us on this side of the House in adopting his conclusions. The House of Commons should have full control of the funds of the country, and if this Bill is passed you abrogate one of the most important functions of Parliament.

[Mr. Pedlow.]

I listened with interest to the remarks of the member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) this afternoon, in fact, whenever he rises I listen with attention and respect, because every one in the House will, I am sure, agree that whether he adopts the views of one side or of the other—he has adopted both on various occasions—whatever he says is worth listening to. I admire his diction and his style; he is one of the most finished orators in Parliament, and is an ornament to this House. Sometimes, in my leisure moments, I read the speeches of the hon. gentleman, for information and instruction. I have a distinct recollection of a speech he delivered on April 12, 1918, on this very question, which came before the House on the following motion of the Minister of Railways (Hon. J. D. Reid):

9 p.m.

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide that the working expenses of the Canadian Government railways and of any railway under the charge, management or direction of the Minister of Railways and Canals shall be paid out of the receipts and revenues of the said railway, and in the event of a deficit occurring at any time during any fiscal year the amount of such deficit shall be payable out of any unappropriated moneys in the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada, the said deficit to be voted by Parliament at its first session following the close of such fiscal year.

The member for Red Deer spoke with his usual eloquence on that occasion. He said, as reported on page 692, Volume 1, Hansard, 1918:

I trust these railways will be so managed, and I have sufficient belief in the future of Canada to think that if they are well managed they will not show deficits, but whether there are deficits or surpluses the principles of sound finance demand that the statements in regard to them should be placed before Parliament in an annual financial statement. I very well remember listening to speeches, as well as reading all the speeches he made during my lifetime, of that great master of finance Mr. Gladstone. There was nothing he insisted on more than that the expenditures and the incomes of a country should be presented to Parliament each year and be debated by Parliament each year. If that is a sound principle—and in every constitutionally-governed country in the British Empire the principle is one of parliamentary practice—then this is a departure from the universal parliamentary practice of all the constitutionally-governed countries in the British Empire, including the Old Country herself. Before the point was raised by the hon. member (Mr. Fielding) the analogy between the Post Office and the railways occurred to my own mind, and I must say the Acting Minister of Finance was very unsuccessful from my point of view in showing the analogy was not perfect. I think all he said upon the point was really making a distinction without a difference. The analogy to my mind was as perfect as one could find. What was the analogy? The post offices form a department of the public service. In so far as the government-owned railways are concerned, they constitute a department of the public service. The analogy to that extent is surely perfect. They are both departments of the public service which one might call "carrying departments." In the one case they carry letters, and in the other case they carry goods and persons. You might compare the various stations on your railroad to the various post offices. You might compare your station-masters to your postmasters. You have public expenditure in each case, and you have public incomes in each case. The analogy is absolutely perfect from Alpha to Omega.

I cite this as the view of the hon. member for Red Deer twelve months ago;—you have heard what he said on the same question to-day when it is again brought up by the member for Shelburne and Queens. What has caused this change of attitude in such a short time? Is it that his association with the Union Government has caused deterioration of his mind? I should be very sorry to think so, because for some time the hon. gentleman has been flirting with us on this side of the House. I only hope that when he does come back he will be mentally in as good a condition as he was when we turned him over to the pre sent Government.

Mr. A. M. DECHENE (Montmagny) (Translation): Mr. Speaker, I would like to make a few remarks before this debate closes. I am particularly anxious to state my views, considering that the second reading of this Bill has been secured solely through the use of the gag; and to say where we stand on this side of the House as regards public ownership of our railways and other great services of public utility.

For many years past, this country has made several attemps in that direction, but without avail. For nearly forty years, we have managed the Intercolonial railway, covering some 1,800 miles in length, and I don't think that there can be found many statements issued by the management of that road and by the Minister of Railways up to now, showing surpluses. And yet the present Government had placed the management of that road in the hands of experienced men, to whom they were paying very large salaries, men who were borrowed from the Canadian Pacific Company and who had put into practice the ways and means in force on that system; however each year there are tremendous deficits on the Intercolonial railway. This shows clearly that it is impossible to get any return, out of the great public services, under political management.

But, Mr. Speaker, when you read carefully clause 16, which it is proposed to amend today, I think that even the mover of that clause had a doubt in his mind as to the possibility for the country to get any returns from that new road (Canadian Northern) or from any of the subsidiary companies.

As a matter of fact, if you study closely that clause, which includes some fifteen lines, you notice that it refers almost entirely to deficits and to the way such deficits should be met. In the last three or four lines, it is provided that should there be a surplus, it can be disposed of without the consent of Parliament. Therefore, is it not equivalent to an admission on the part of the Government, that they do not expect any surplus nor that the company, created by this Bill to administer the railways of this country, is likely to give any profits in the near future?

If there be any doubt that the present managers—and these managers will in all likelihood be retained—are unable to show a profit in their present undertakings, while we have before our eyes the example of what has happened in the past; that with vast subsidies being voted every year, the Government or the managers appointed by the Government were not able to gain any financial success, then there was certainly good reason for including the following proviso in section 16: "if any profits should accrue then the said profits are to be administered in such and such a way;" which amounts to this: they could be thrown back into the mill again to emerge in the form of a deficit.

But, Sir, this section, along with the others, allows the Government, allows the directors to take over the monies of the various companies and use them as they see fit. No doubt, we members of Parliament sent here by the people to look after their interests, have something to say on this matter.

I believe the country would be very anxious to know just what percentage of shares we have in the capital stock of the subsidiary companies mentioned in the schedule attached to this Bill.

My own opinion, and I believe that I am at one in this with several hon. members on this side of the House, is that our interest in several of these companies is decidedly small, although sufficient to give us control. In several of them we have, I believe, merely 51 per cent or 55 per cent of the stock. Else, how comes it that, since we have taken over the Canadian Northern and its subsidiary companies the Government has granted to some of these subsidiary companies the subsidies set forth in the report of the Minister of Railways for the current year? It is self-evident that if the present Government has seen fit to grant over three hundred thousand dollars to the Canadian Northern Pacific Railway, one of the subsidiary companies mentioned in the present schedule, we do not own all the capital stock of this company; hence we shall be forced to find the money necessary to make a success of these different companies. Where are the men who are going to come along and offer us the 40 per cent or 45 per cent of the stock that is out of our hands and that will be drawing dividends. Are they not the same men who sold us the capital stock of the present company and who were not in a position to deliver the capital stock of the various subsidiary companies?

In the presence of these facts we have the right to be sceptical and to wonder whether public ownership of these railways will be succesful.

We evidently have the right to feel dubious in this regard and we on this side of the House are really very, very doubtful.

But we own the railways, say some hon. members on the other side; we own the capital stock of the railway companies; the Acting Prime Minister himself tells us: "We own the capital stock but we do not own the real estate." Why? Because this real estate is in the hands of the same notorious speculators who sold us this worthless stock, and who to-day are waiting for us to revive it at the public's expense, so that they may get back the value of the railway bonds they never parted with.

Even before Confederation, under the Union—an administration that worked untold harm to the country—the foremost orators and the most ardent patriots of the day fought for the establishment of the Budget system so as to bring all expenditure under the control of Parliament. The fight was a hard one. Some members of Parliament, a few ministers even, had to resign their seats in the Assembly, and it was only after years of struggle that Parliament finally obtained control of all expenditures drawn from the Public Treasury.

Now, this very day, by accepting section 16 which has been brought down to the House, we will go back to those frightful days of 1840 and 1845 when the country was governed by an exclusive clique, a sort of family compact.

However, I am not surprised to find this clause here. Last session we witnessed a similar attempt to withdraw several hundred million dollars from the control of Parliament. Do you remember, Mr. Speaker, a certain resolution presented by the hon. Minister of Railways whereby he asked the House to authorize the spending of some $50,000,000 for the purchase of railway material not only for the Government railways but for those railroads also which were financially unable to help themselves, and not for one year alone but for the duration of the war? Thanks to the opposition of members on this side of the House the resolution remained on the Order Paper until the last days of the session, when the hon. Minister of Railways, realizing that he would never succeed in getting it passed, withdrew it himself.

Well, Mr. Speaker, the same attempt is being made, this year, in a more concrete form. As the hon. minister has not succeeded in the course of last session, he is trying again, this year, in a way which is far more grievous and more dangerous to the country, by entrusting to the care of his officials the management of an important part of the people's money. Therefore, I think we are now doing away with the principle which should guide all legislation, whether federal or provincial, that is the control by Parliament of all the monies spent in behalf of the country. After so many battles fought for the control of those monies, especialy in Nova Scotia previous to Confederation, I am in no way surprised at the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen (Mr. Fielding) proposing to-day an amendment to do away with such abuse. He is merely yielding, here, to the experience which he has acquired when he was himself Minister of Finance and when he saw, in his youth, the public men of his province fighting to obtain a right which we are now about to be deprived of. Those are the reasons why I shall gladly vote in favour of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Queen's and Shelburne.

The House divided on the amendment of Hon. Mr. Fielding, which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. SPEAKER: The question is now on the main motion.

Mr. A. B. COPP (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, before this Bill is finally disposed of, I desire to draw the attention of hon. members to the section providing for the amalgamation of the several railway systems. It provides that the Canadian Northern Railway company and its constituent and subsidiary companies as specified in the first schedule, together with the Canadian Government railways, shall be operated as a national railway system. My understanding is that prior to the taking over of the Canadian Northern, the lines of railway known as the Canadian Government railways comprised the Intercolonial railway, running from Montreal to Halifax, Sydney, and St. John, and the branches connected therewith; the Grand Trunk Pacific, and the Transcontinental railway.

I do not propose to take up very much time in discussing this question, but I wish to register my protest against the amalgamation of the Intercolonial railway with the Canadian Northern system. The Intercolonial railway, as every hon. member knows, was built in the early years of Confederation. As a matter of fact, it was one of the terms of Confederation that the Lower Provinces, known as the Maritime Provinces, were to be connected by railway with the other provinces forming the Confederation. That promise was never properly implemented for many years. The railway extended from the cities of Halifax, Sydney and St. John to its western terminus at Levis, in the province of Quebec. A short time after the Hon. A. G. Blair became Minister of Railways in 1896, the Intercolonial was extended to the city of Montreal by the purchase of the Drummond County railway (so called). From that time down to 1908 the road was owned and operated by the Canadian Government as a government enterprise, presided over by the Minister of Railways and Canals, the Hon. H. R. Emmerson occupying that portfolio for some time. While I am not prepared to admit that during that time the road was always run and managed as it might have been, nevertheless, after its extension to Montreal we undoubtedly had a better train service, and the roadbed was improved; in fact, the roadbed of the Intercolonial is known to be one of the finest, if not the finest, on the continent of America. The Ocean Limiteds were put on, and the service generally was improved. In the year 1908 or 1909 a change was made in the management of the road. Up to that time a gentleman named David Pottinger had been manager for many years. He had grown up with the railway and had an intimate knowledge of it from one end to the other in all its workings. Associated with him were men who had entered the railway in their younger days, and knew all there was to know about its operation. In 1908 or 1909 Mr. Pottinger was not dismissed, but arrangements were made by which a board of managers was appointed to manage the road, of which Mr. Pottinger became one. Since the appointment of that board down to the present day the Intercolonial has been bedamned and bedevilled by mismanagement and extravagance. Men have been brought in from outside at high salaries and forced upon us who did not know the conditions or understand the operation of this railway. The higher the salaries and the more officials we imported the worse the management became, so that to-day the Intercolonial is not as well operated as it was in 1907 and 1908 and the years previous thereto. Furthermore, since the Government have taken over the Canadian Northern, the Transcontinental, and the Grand Trunk Pacific, the Intercolonial has been robbed of its rolling stock, and we have not been given the train service that we had every reason to expect.

I register my protest against the Intercolonial being hooked up to the Canadian Northern Railway system and the supplanting of the Intercolonial railway employees who have spent half a lifetime on this road, know the operations and are just as capable of occupying prominent railway positions in this country and fulfilling the duties appertaining to them as any person brought in from the outside. The employees of the old Intercolonial railway throughout the Maritime Provinces are being supplanted by other employees who are not any more capable, but are, if anything, less capable, than the men who have occupied prominent positions on that road. I have no word to say against those who will manage the Canadian National Railway system or the Canadian Northern railway. I do not know what their success may be. I trust it will be of the very best. I have nothing to say against the Government for passing this measure and operating the Canadian Northern railway, as it has been forced upon them. But I do protest against the amalgamation of the Intercolonial railway with that system. It never was the intention at the time of Confederation that we should be linked up with that system. It never was the intention at the time of Confederation that we should be linked up with, and operated as, a company road. I protest as strongly as I can because of the fact, which the hon. member for Antigonish and Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) referred to a few moments ago, that under this measure the Government, or the company, have the power of bonding, or mortgaging, the Canadian National railway to the extent of $75,000 per mile. I am firmly of the belief that in carrying out the terms of Confederation we should own the Government railway. It should be operated by the Government through the department, and Minister of Railways and Canals. That was the intention of the Confederation pact and it should be carried out to the letter.

The Intercolonial railway is not in as good a position as it was years ago. The road-bed has been allowed to deteriorate, the cars are not kept in the same condition, our train service is not as prompt and regular as it was, and the more outside management there has been brought in the worse it has been for the Intercolonial railway. I do not know what other members, particularly from the Maritime Provinces can think of this matter, and it is possible that some may say that it is local. While it may be somewhat local, on the other hand, I claim that it is Dominion-wide. You cannot successfully build up the Dominion of Canada by tearing down one part and handing it over to some other part. The Intercolonial has always had its head offices at Moncton. We have magnificent shops and buildings to house and take care of the Intercolonial staff. We have upwards of 2,000 miles of railway including the Intercolonial proper and the branches that have been purchased, leased and otherwise acquired, and that is a sufficient system for a manager and his official staff to take care of. I have nothing to say against other systems of railways. What I ask is that the Government and the Minister of Railways should realize that the people of the Maritime Provinces have regarded the Intercolonial railway as one of the reasons of their coming into Confederation. The other provinces have had a quid pro quo for all we have had from the Intercolonial. They have their canals. There is no move being made to hand the canals over to any company. The Intercolonial was never intended to be a paying proposition. All that was expected was that it would pay its running expenses. I strongly believe that if the road were freed from political agitation and if the Minister of Railways would take hold of it and put practical, straightforward men who have had some experience on that railway, we would have a system by itself equal to any other system and which would be a great benefit to this country, particularly to the people of the Maritime Provinces. I would ask the minister to consider well the question of the conditions under which we are to have our produce shipped from the Maritime Provinces and whether this road should be operated as a Government proposition. I move, seconded by Mr. Sinclair (Antigonish and Guysborough):

That Bill No. 70 be not now read a third time but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole to be amended by adding, after the word "railways" in the tenth line of the preamble thereof, the following words: "save and except that portion of the Canadian Government Railways known as the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railway and the branch lines connected therewith, owned, leased or operated by the Government of Canada."

I make that motion seconded by my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair).

Mr. BUTTS: Does my hon. friend know of any greater political machine than the Intercolonial was under his Government?

Mr. COPP: I do know of several greater political machines and I fear I see now, and will in the very near future, a much greater political machine than the Intercolonial ever was.

Mr. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to prolong the debate on this Bill but I feel that I should say a few words. I could not possibly accept the amendment. What the hon. member (Mr. Copp) asks us to do is to except the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island railways from the provisions of the Bill in regard to the operation of the Canadian National railways

Before answering the hon. gentleman's references to the amendment he has moved, let me refer to a few things he has said about the Intercolonial Railway. He states that as agreed on at Confederation the Intercolonial was originally constructed between the Lower Provinces and the City of Quebec, and there is no doubt about that. I also wish to say that so far as I can remember the road was well managed under the former manager, Mr. Pottinger. Mr. Pottinger was a very fine man and had the confidence of all the people in the provinces through which this road runs. But let me say to the hon. gentleman that during the period of Mr. Pottinger's management—during the operation of the road under a commission, and under a general manager, if my memory serves me right—there was always criticism in this House and in the press that political control and political patronage prevailed, and that therefore the railway was not a success. That has been the cry from the very day the Intercolonial Railway was first constructed and operated.

Mr. COPP: That surely was not true during the time of my hon. friend's administration?

Mr. J. D. REID: It was not true of recent years for the reason that a general manager was placed in control of the railway, and its operation has been left entirely in the hands of that official and his staff, and during the last few years the road has been gradually getting away from political control.

My hon. friend states that the service given on the Intercolonial Railway and the condition of the whole road is not nearly as good as it was several years ago. If my hon. friend, when he says that, has reference to the last three or four years during which the great war was in progress, that can be explained by reason of the fact that the Intercolonial was taxed to its fullest capacity carrying troops to and from the scene of operations, and transporting the necessary war materials and equipment. Being a single track road there is no doubt that by reason of that congestion the travelling public would not enjoy as good a service as they did prior to the war on this railway. But previous to the outbreak of hostilities I believe the Intercolonial was as well operated as any other railway in the Dominion of Canada. At least that was the report which I received from the travelling public prior to the commencement of the war.

The hon. member states that if this Bill goes into effect the employees of the Intercolonial will not enjoy the same opportunity of advancement as they formerly had under separate control. I take issue at once with the hon. gentleman on that point. Already a number of the employees on the Intercolonial have received advancement by reason of its incorporation with the Canadian National Railway system which they would not have gained had the change not been made. The employees, as a whole, I think, have a better opportunity now with a system comprising ten or fifteen thousand miles of railway, than they would have if Government operation were simply limited to the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island railways. Let me explain, in proof of that, a number of promotions that have occurred. The hon. member knows that Mr. Hayes was traffic manager of the Government system between Montreal and Sydney. To-day he is traffic manager of the whole Canadian National system clear out to the Pacific. That surely is a big advancement. Mr. Smart, who formerly was merely head of the car department of the Intercolonial, is now in charge of the car department for the whole Canadian National Railway system.

Mr. COPP: Where did he come from?

Mr. J. D. REID: I think he came orignally from the Canadian Pacific railway, but he was for a number of years on the Intercolonial. There is also the case of Mr. Appleton, who was head of the engineering or mechanical department at Moncton, and who now superintends that work on the whole of the Eastern lines, I think, between Port Arthur and Sydney. Another case of promotion is that of Mr. Brady, formerly general manager of the Intercolonial, and afterwards of the Transcontinental, and who is now general manager of all Government lines from Port Arthur eastward.

Mr. COPP: He is one of the importations.

Mr. J. D. REID: He has been employed on the Government roads probably for the last fifteen years. I mention these cases to show that the staff on the Intercolonial will enjoy opportunities of promotion which would never be within their reach if the Government system were confined merely to that railway.

I take strong exception to another statement by the hon. gentleman to the effect that if the present Bill were passed the Government could issue bonds on the Intercolonial railway to the extent of $75,000 per mile. The hon. gentleman must have known that statement was not correct, because he has read clause 26, which states that the bonding powers of the company shall not apply to the Canadian Government railways.

Mr. COPP: I overlooked that feature of the Bill, and made the statement inadvertently.

Mr. J. D. REID: That is what I say, the hon. gentleman evidently made a mistake. While the Intercolonial railway is transferred for operation purposes to the Canadian National Railway system, no power is given to the company, or to the Government, to issue bonds in connection with the Intercolonial, the Prince Edward Island, or the Transcontinental railway.

Mr. H. B. MORPHY: Why is there not any such power in the Bill?

Mr. J. D. REID: We felt that if we wished to do that, we should come and ask authority from Parliament. There are no bonds on the Intercolonial railway now. In the future if we wished to remove the Intercolonial from under the operation of this system, it will be free from bonded indebtedness in any way, shape or form.

Now with respect to the operation of the Intercolonial, how could we operate that railway successfully, or extend to it the advantages that it should enjoy, without incorporating it in the whole railway system? If we left the road under the Minister of Railways, according to my hon. friend, we must keep up the same operating staff that we had in the past.

Mr. COPP: If we can operate the Intercolonial in that way why does the minister want to adopt the course that he mentioned in answer to my hon. friend just now? He said that he did not intend to bond the Intercolonial because he may want to take it out of the system.

Mr. REID: The Intercolonial Railway has no bonded indebtedness against it at all; it is free from encumbrances, and we have so left it, and if at any time in the future we wish to take it out of the system it is in exactly the same position as it was at the time of Confederation. By linking up the various roads we can operate them in the most economical manner. We have now the Transcontinental between Winnipeg and Moncton divided up in this way: the management at Winnipeg that operate part of the western lines control as far east as Cochrane; then we have the other part under the management at Montreal and that management has control of the Intercolonial. Now we have linked them together under the same management and the same staff in order to save operating expenses. When it comes to quoting freight rates, the tariff man in charge of the Canadian National Railway system must be able to figure out rates from the West clear through to the Atlantic ports. If you have this as part of one co-ordinated system, is it not fair to say that those who are operating the road to make it a success will want to route all the business they can by their own system? My idea, when the Intercolonial Railway was linked up with the Canadian National Railway system, was that it would throw so much more business down through the Lower Provinces that it would make the Intercolonial pay where it has not paid in the past. The whole trouble with the Intercolonial Railway was that it started at Sydney and ran to Montreal, but the other railways had no interest in giving it traffic, and consequently it was hard work to make it pay. Now that it is part of our national system all the traffic from the West that can be sent over the Intercolonial to Halifax, St. John and Sydney will be so routed. I cannot for the life of me see why the hon. member can suggest that the Intercolonial should be kept out of the Canadian National Railway system.

Although our national system is under a company incorporated by this Bill, still it is all subject to the control of Parliament, and if the operation is not carried on successfully, hon. members can discuss the system just the same as they were accustomed to discuss the Intercolonial in the past.

The hon. member (Mr. Copp) has emphasized the idea that the employees of the Intercolonial are not in a position to receive the advancement now that they would have received had it not been incorporated in the national system. So far as my information goes, the employees of the Intercolonial are better satisfied that it is part of the Transcontinental, for the reason that a young man starting on the Intercolonial to-day has hundreds of opportunities of getting a position on our system of fifteen thousand miles as compared with the meagre opportunities open to him on the Intercolonial alone.

In my opinion one of the reasons why the hon. member objects to the change is this. We have heard him, so long as he has been a member of this Parliament, complaining day after day bitterly of the patronage in connection with the Intercolonial Railway. He knows well enough that when it goes into this system that ends any opportunity he has of dominating the patronage. The Board of Directors are going to operate this system independent of any members of Parliament or even of members of the Government. That is where the trouble is with the hon. member; there is no doubt about that.

Mr. COPP: Judge not,—

Mr. REID: No man in this House has fought as hard for political patronage on the Intercolonial railway as has the hon. member; there is no doubt about that. He can stand up here and abuse us on this side of the House about political patronage on the Intercolonial, but he knows that when his party were in power—

An hon. MEMBER: Cochrane was the bad spot.

Mr. REID: —He was the man right on the job so far as patronage was concerned.

Mr. POWER: The Government was absolutely innocent.

Mr. REID: Now, Mr. Speaker, I have had the Intercolonial railway and the Prince Edward Island railway under the operation of the Department of Railways for a year or two, and while I believe the department did their very best to operate them as successfully as they could be operated under government control, yet I feel it is in the interest of the railways and of the public that these should be operated by an independent commission such as is being organized in connection with this Canadian National Railway system. I feel that it is also in the interest of the employees. I do not see how we can operate successfully if we continue the Intercolonial independent of the Canadian National Railway system. I am sorry the hon. member has moved the amendment, I do not think it is in the interest of any one concerned, and I hope the House will reject it.

Hon. F. B. CARVELL (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, before the vote is taken I feel it is incumbent upon me to say a word or two in as much as I am one of the ministers representing that portion of Canada traversed by the Intercolonial railway. This matter came up some months ago when the operation of the Intercolonial was transferred to the Canadian National railways by Order in Council, and it was done with my full knowledge and consent. I purpose to vote against the amendment of my hon. friend from Westmorland (Mr. Copp) and I shall do so not only with a clear conscience but with the feeling that the adoption of this amendment would really be going back to the old principle of operation of the Intercolonial as we had it in the past as long as I can remember.

There has been a great deal of discussion on this Bill regarding the virtues of public and private ownership, but for the life of me I fail to see wherein it was necessary to discuss the question at all. We have got the railways on our hands to-day—it is not a very rosy prospect I must confess—and it is the duty of Parliament and of the Government especially to try and see that they work out the problem in the best way possible. I repeat that I fail to see how the question whether or not a man is in favour of public ownership or of private ownership of a public utility is raised in connection with the Bill now before the House We have the Canadian National Railway system on our hands, we have the Canadian Northern, we have the Grand Trunk Pacific, we have the National Transcontinental, we have the Intercolonial; and it is the duty of the Government and of Parliament to devise the best possible method of making the operation of these roads a success. I am not going to hark back to what has taken place in connection with the operation and management of the Intercolonial Railway from its inception. It has been a political machine, pure and simple, and any man who stands up in this House and says that it has not been a political machine up to the last two years or so—well, he is simply talking to hear himself talk. If I thought that the Canadian National Railway system was going to be run as a political machine, as Government railways have been run in the past, I would vote and fight against the whole thing; I do not know what I would not do to prevent its going through. We have not received the service in the Maritime Provinces to which we have been entitled; and it has cost fifty per cent more money to give us the service we did get than it should have cost. In this respect one party has been just as bad as the other. Now, instead of fifteen or eighteen hundred miles of railway, as we had in the Intercolonial, we have about twelve thousand miles—and it looks as if we should have considerably over twenty thousand miles before very long. I tell you, Sir, that unless this system is run as a business proposition, Canada will be faced with a most serious problem; with something more serious even than the debt incurred by the war. Much, therefore, as I would like to see advantages given to my own part of Canada; much as I would like to see the Intercolonial Railway run for the benefit of the Maritime Provinces, I cannot as a public man agree to any proposal which will cause this or any other portion of the system to be operated as anything but a business proposition. The operation of these Government railways may not be perfect, but it will be under the control of a board of directors entirely independent of the Government, except that they are appointed by the Government. If ever a body of men had absolutely a free hand in the running of a railway, the board administering the Canadian National Railways have had a free hand up to the present time—I know what I am talking about. I can promise that so long as I remain in this Government there will be no question, so far as I know, about their having a free hand to run the National Railway system as a business proposition. Unless we do run it that way, we might as well throw up our hands and say that the whole thing is a hopeless mess. But I believe that it can be done; and because we want to run the whole thing as a business proposition I want to see the Intercolonial railway put in with the rest of it. The Minister of Railways has pointed out the impossibility of operating the Canadian National Railways down to Montreal and stopping there, not going on to Halifax and St. John. It is not in the interest of the Maritime Provinces that that should be done. The Government railways can be operated much more economically and in a much more businesslike manner if taken as a whole than they could if part of the system is run by the Canadian National Railway Company and part by the Minister of Railways.

I said in beginning that I did not intend to say very much, but I would not feel like giving a silent vote on a matter of such great importance to the Maritime Provinces. I believe that by incorporating practically the whole system of railways in the Maritime Provinces into this railway system, we are doing the Maritime Provinces the greatest possible benefit. If the operation of the national railways goes on as it has gone on during the last year and as I believe it will go in the future, it will not be many years before the people who now oppose this proposal will stand up to bless it and to say that the elimination of politics from the administration of the Government railways and the operation of those railways as a business proposition means the accomplishing of a great work for the people of Canada as a whole.

My hon. friend referred to freight rates. There may be some dislocation of freight rates; there may be cases in which we shall have to pay a little higher freight rates in the future than we have paid in the past. But there will also be cases where we shall get an efficient service, which we have been unable to get in the past. The member for Westmorland (Mr. Copp) knows the trouble he had in his own county in an effort to get service under political management. He does not believe that there is any possibility of a repetition of these things in the future if the Government railways in the Maritime Provinces are run as a business proposition.

Mr. COPP: But I have no faith in the assumption that they will be run as a business proposition.

Mr. CARVELL: That is where we disagree. Until it is proved to me that they will not be run as a business proposition, I purpose considering that they will be. My hon. friend knows that if this railway system is run as a business proposition it will do much more for the Maritime Provinces in the future than it has done in the past. For these reasons, I intend to vote against this amendment. I am satisfied that if the amendment is voted down the House or the country will never regret the incorporation of the Intercolonial railway in the great Canadian National Railway system.

Mr. PEDLOW: Would the minister inform the House why it is necessary to finance the Railway Department on a basis different from that on which the department that he controls is financed?

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I do not think that question is in order; it has been decided by the vote which has just been taken.

Amendment (Mr. Copp) negatived.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The question is on the main motion. Is it the pleasure of the House to adopt the motion?

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): I realize that the House is anxious to give a final vote on this Bill, and I shall trespass upon its time no further than to make a few brief remarks. First, I wish to correct a statement made by the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White), who represented me this afternoon as being a strong opponent of public ownership of railways. My hon. friend certainly misconstrued my words if he found in them an expression of opposition to the principle of the nationalization of railways. I merely said that nobody had the right to excommunicate from Liberalism those who were opposed to that principle. My speech was made to protest against the lectures on Liberalism which certain hon. gentlemen on the other side are prone to inflict upon us. I said then, and I repeat now, that public ownership, the nationalization of industries, is not a principle of Liberalism; it is state socialism. That does not mean that I am opposed to it. I am not afraid of words. My view is that it is a huge experiment—and I have not the same confidence in its ultimate success as some of my friends in the House seem to have. But we have no choice in the matter. We are the owners of a great system of railways, and we must try to make it the best system possible. We must, as many hon. members have said, give public ownership a fair chance.

I rise, however, for the purpose of giving my hon. friends opposite, who are so eloquent in their professions of Liberalism, an opportunity of registering their votes in favour of what I consider to be a true Liberal principle. When the House was in committee on the Bill I moved that labour be given a fair share in the management of the railway, and I purpose now moving an amendment to that effect. The Government, by the voice of the Minister of Labour in the Senate, has already recognized the soundness of that principle, and at the present time a commission is travelling throughout the country investigating industrial conditions in order to apply this principle to private industries. The Government should demonstrate its good faith and sincerity by embodying the same principle in the management of the National railways which are the very property of the state. The workingman who has, by the exercise of his franchise, a voice in the management of public affairs in this country, believes he has also a right to a voice in the management of the industries which by his work he helps to build up. He claims his industrial citizenship as well as his political citizenship. This desire comes, I believe, from a high sense of service. Most students of labour and industrial conditions in the world to-day are in favour of allowing labour a share in the management of industries. They believe that by raising the employee to a state of partnership with his employer, by acquainting him with the conditions of the undertaking or the business which is common to both, his sense of responsibility will be enhanced and much trouble will be avoided. The British Government has accepted that principle with regard to mines. Let me refer, in this connection, to the commission presided over by Mr. Justice Sankey. The commission was composed of four eminent men—Mr. Justice Sankey, Mr. A. J. Balfour, Sir Arthur Duckham, and Sir Thomas Royden. Here are a few words from the report of that commission:—

> It is in the interests of the country that the colliery worker shall have an effective voice in the direction of the mine. For a generation the colliery worker has been educated socially and technically. The result is a great national asset. Why not use it?

The British Government has accepted that report, and the principle of a share in the management of the British mines has been accepted and will be carried out. This Government should embody a similar principle in this legislation which it is endeavouring to induce the industrials of the country to accept at the present time. By so doing the Government would give effect to the first clause of the resolution adopted by the Peace Conference and proposed to be incorporated in the Peace Treaty. This resolution, which was communicated to the House yesterday by the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell), contained this principle:—

> First—the guiding principle above enunciated that labour should not be regarded merely as a commodity or article of commerce.

The best way to recognize that principle is to accept the amendment which I now purpose moving. I move, seconded by Mr. Verville:—

> That Bill No. 70 be not now read a third time, but be referred back to the Committee of the Whole House, in order that the following words be inserted at the end of clause 1 of the said Bill: "At least two of said directors shall be appointed upon the recommendation of the employees of the Canadian National railways."

Mr. ALPHONSE VERVILLE (St. Denis): Mr. Speaker, I rise to second the amendment of the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. E. Lapointe), although it seems almost unnecessary for any hon. member on either side of the House to have to move an amendment of this nature. I was not here all the time when this Bill was under discussion, but I was surprised to hear that a provision of this kind was not inserted by the Government in the Bill. Many hon. members on this side and many who were on this side prior to Union Government have, time and again whenever opportunity offered, declared that labour should, to some extent, be represented on as many commissions as possible, because the practical knowledge of the labour man was probably more effective than the technical knowledge of many men who are appointed on commissions. We have now reached a stage in the development of this country when we must, willingly or otherwise, recognize this principle that labour should be represented, and any Government, whether federal, provincial or municipal, must also recognize it and put it into operation. Any hon. member who is in business must have long ago concluded that the most valuable information he has ever received in his private business has, generally speaking, come from those who have had the most practical experience. The Minister of Labour has, time and again, and rightly so, consulted the best element of labour in the country in connection with framing legislation or Orders in Council towards a better understanding between capital and labour.

The mover of this amendment stated that the principle of the representation of labour was recognized in the Senate. I claim that it was not recognized in the Senate, because the Minister of Labour should belong to the House of Commons. I know the Minister of Labour very well, and I have great confidence in his ability as well as in his practical knowledge. If any one should be appointed on the Board of Directors apart from the great financiers of the country, or men who have experience in the management of a railway, those who have the most knowledge are surely the railwaymen of the land.

Many of them have grown up with the road from boyhood; they have served their apprenticeship and have acquired the most valuable kind of knowledge for a position of this sort. I hope that hon. members will not think that this proposal is put forward for a political purpose. I thought I heard someone laugh on the other side of the House, but I must have been mistaken. Judging by the present conditions in the labour world, I am afraid that if the Government does not grant to the labour organizations what they have a right to expect, they will take the means to get it. This may seem radical, but any one who has studied the feeling of unrest there is throughout the country must realize that there is only one way of salvation, and that is by co-operation to the fullest extent. The Government may not have said that it will not appoint labour men; I do not know whether it has or not, but I am afraid there will be influence enough brought to bear to prevent the appointment of labour men to this directorate. Ever since I have been in this House I have said that a Minister of Labour in this Government would not make a success of his department unless he was a practical man. The Government, fortunately, have seen fit to appoint a practical man to the head of that department. Now what applies to the Department of Labour surely ought to apply to one of the greatest enterprises this country has ever undertaken. The Government have everything to gain by adopting this amendment. They will find among the railway men some of the ablest men in America, and able not only for their practical knowledge; some members of the Government would no doubt be surprised at the technical qualifications of some of our railway employees, and perhaps they are more advanced in finance than some of the ministers may think. Those of them who have acquired a home of their own know exactly what a dollar is worth, and might do better in financial matters than others whom the Government may appoint to the board. I do not know of any government, federal or provincial, that has made a mistake through trying to get all classes of society represented on the commissions it appoints. Furthermore, a practical knowledge of all the great economic questions of the day will perhaps be worth more than all the technical knowledge put together. I am proud to second the amendment, and I trust the Government will accept it.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior): Among all the remarks made by the mover and the seconder of this amendment I am able to find only one with which I very cordially agree, namely, that we have at the present time in charge of the Department of Labour a gentleman of very great practical ability, of devotion to duty, and of fidelity to the cause of labour. With anything else that has been said I am afraid I must differ. In fact, I must express surprise that so strictly logical a mind as that of the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) could be brought to support the amendment now before the House. The amendment is to the effect that the Government in appointing the directorate of this board must accept at least two members chosen by the railway employees. Had the hon. gentleman really meant that the amendment should be considered as a practical step, he would have added to his amendment provisions that would have enabled the Government to ascertain what the recommendation of the railway employees would be. Without the machinery for its ascertainment, the amendment would be impossible of execution, for there would be no way in which it could be carried out.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: At the present time the employees of the Government railway vote every winter for two representatives of the Pension Board in connection with the Provident Fund.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Through what organization? There are at the present time, I am told, fifteen or seventeen different organizations of the railway employees, absolutely distinct in every way. Are these fifteen different organizations going to make their recommendations?

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend ought to know that it can be done very easily.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am quite free to remark that the method of doing it was not made clear by the mover or the seconder of the amendment, and one would have thought that would have been their duty.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: My hon. friend could easily devise a way of recording their votes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The devising of the way would be the part of the proposer of the idea. To make the amendment practical some way should be devised.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE: If my hon. friend will accept the principle I will devise the way.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will come to the principle in a moment. I am now making this point: That the law as proposed to be put into effect by the hon. member would be impracticable of execution. There would have to be machinery provided for carrying it into effect, and because the machinery is absent, the hon. gentleman cannot expect the House to accept the amendment. Presuming that there was only one organization which represented all the employees of the road, what should be done with the amendment?—and now we come to the principle of the amendment. If the principle is to be adopted, it means this: That the Government which has to appoint this directorate, and be responsible for its appointment, which has to be responsible in general for the management of the road after the appointment, is to have no say in the appointment of two of the directors. If that is the case, why should it have any say in the appointment of any? If the Government is to be responsible for the conduct of men in the selection of whom it has no voice at all, and if that applies to two of the directorate, why should it not apply to all? Why is the Government to be held responsible for the conduct of large operations by men whom it does not choose? If, in a word, the principle of Government responsibility is to stand, how can the amendment carry?

In the next place, if the amendment were to carry, it would be an admission on the part of this Parliament that while we represent, as the Parliament of Canada to which the Government is responsible, one section of the people of this country, and therefore can nominate men to represent that section on the directorate, we do not represent another section, namely, the labour element. Is Parliament prepared to take that position? Is Parliament prepared to declare that we the representatives of the people hold an altogether different relationship to the proprietary interests of Canada, as opposed to the labour interests of Canada? This Parliament, if it is a Parliament at all, represents labour in the very same sense that it represents proprietorship or capital, and must take the responsibility, in appointing members of a directorate of a great Government railway system, of seeing to it that all major sections of the community of Canada are fairly represented on that directorate so far as may be necessary for the efficient management of the system. No one who understands the English language, or who knows the attitude of the Government, would, for one moment, suggest that the Government is opposed to the appointment on this directorate of men who have peculiar knowledge of the interests of those employed upon the road. It would seem to me obvious that, other things equal, it would be of great advantage to the system that there should be on the directorate men intimate with the needs of the employees of the road and peculiarly qualified to speak for them. That is one thing, but to say that these men must be selected finally, not by the Government which is responsible for the success of the undertaking but by others who have no such responsibility, is to affirm a principle that this Parliament has never before affirmed and one which I really cannot suppose that the hon. member for Kamouraska is serious in asking us to affirm. If we were to do so, if we were to take the ground—let me repeat it in another form of words—that Parliament, or the Government, is not qualified to select in the name of labour in the same way that it selects in the name of other classes of the community, either upon the basis of language, religion, occupation or in whatever manner, then we must also assume that we are not able to select in the name of any other section of the community and any other section would be in just the same position to come to Parliament and say: What right have you to select representatives on the Board of the National Railways who are peculiarly conversant with our interests in the management of these roads, or what right have you to select them if you permit one section of the community to select its own? Were the amendment to be adopted, Parliament would be landed in an anomalous and impossible position, in a position inconsistent with the best principles of constitutional government, in a position that no parliament in a constitutionally governed country has ever before occupied.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): Mr. Speaker, I would like to support the motion of my hon. friend from Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe), so eloquently supported by my hon. friend from St. Denis (Mr. Verville), but logically I fail to see any good reason for it. I sympathize heartily with the argument that labour ought to be represented on this Board. I hope the Government will keep that in mind and see that labour is represented on the Board, and, if it be possible, labour connected with the railway itself. But there are other classes also that we would like to see represented on the Board, and I do not think it is wise to select one particular class and dictate as to their appointment. For example the hon. member for Quebec South (Mr. Power) suggested—and I like the suggestion—that among the returned soldiers of the engineer corps, there are a number of very capable men and that it might be desirable that one of this class might be found to go on the board. There is not only the consideration that we would have the benefit of his skill as an engineer, but the fact that he is a returned soldier means a good deal to us all. But I do not think that you should put it in an Act of Parliament that there must be one. This board ought to represent different interests in the community and if the Government do not see that all legitimate interests are represented, that will be a grievance for which we have a right to call them to account. But I must say that I do not see the logic of saying that as respects one particular section, we will put that in the Bill, but as respects all other elements we will not say anything about them at all. I do not think that is reasonable. I sympathize warmly with the argument that labour ought to be represented on the board, and if the Government fail to provide in some way or other for the representation of labour on that board it will be pursuing a course for which at a later stage it should be called to account in Parliament.

The House divided on the amendment of Mr. Ernest Lapointe, which was negatived on the following division:

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

STRIKES IN CANADA SINCE THE ARMISTICE.

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

1. How many workmen's strikes have occurred in Canada since the signing of the armistice?

2. How many days of labour have been lost to workmen in Canada, as a result of the said strikes, to date?

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN:

1. 70.

2. 217,913 working days.

TRANS-ATLANTIC FLIGHT.

Mr. McGIBBON (Muskoka):

What efforts, if any, are being made to enable Canadian flying boys to gain the honour of being the first to fly across the Atlantic?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL: Exactly the same privileges are accorded to Canadian airmen as to British airmen in the competition for the prize that is being offered to the first airman who flies across the Atlantic. The British admiralty has made certain provisions for the care and protection of the airmen, and these are available to Canadian as well as to British airmen.

"THE ONE BIG UNION."

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

1. Is the Department of Labour aware that an Interprovincial Labour Convention was recently held at Calgary, at which a resolution was unanimously adopted, authorizing members of Labour Unions throughout Canada to consider, by referendum, the question of recommending the enactment of a measure by which a workman's week shall consist of five days and not more than six hours' labour per day?

2. Is the Minister of Labour aware that a certain organization, "One Big Union," as it is called, are now distributing bulletins and literature throughout Canada, inviting adherents to join and effect a general strike?

3. What does the Department of Labour intend to do in the matter?

4. Are the principles and objects of "One Big Union" and the I.W.W. identical? If not, how do they differ?

5. Has the Government had any intercourse or correspondence upon this matter with the Secretary of "One Big Union," Mr. Midgley, 210 Labour Temple, Vancouver, B.C.?

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN:

1. The department has secured reports of the proceedings of a convention held at

Calgary on March 13 and the three following days, at which was passed a resolution urging the enactment of a measure providing that a workman's week shall consist of five days and not more than six hours' labour per day.

2. The Minister of Labour has received copies of various documents apparently emanating from what is termed "One Big Union" and favouring a general strike.

3. The Minister of Labour is following the matter closely and is advising with his colleagues as to action to be taken to meet any situation arising.

4. So far as the Department of Labour has learned, the principles and objects of "One Big Union" have not been yet determined. What is termed the "One Big Union" would appear to be yet in the formative stage only. The framework of a general organization does not yet exist. A central committee alone has been appointed with temporary officers. It is impossible therefore to state if the principles and objects of "One Big Union" are identical with those of the I.W.W.

5. A communication was addressed to Mr. Midgley as acting secretary of the Organization Committee of "One Big Union," requesting copies of the official reports of the proceedings at the Calgary gathering of March 13. Mr. Midgley replied promising to forward the copies as requested.

THE SALE OF SALVARSAN.

Mr. DESLAURIERS:

1. What is the date of the Order in Council authorizing the granting of licenses for the sale of salvarsan, such as "606" and "914" as it is called?
2. What commercial houses in Canada have taken out such licenses?
3. What fee is charged to a person or persons obtaining such license (a) for export trade, and (b) for domestic trade?
4. Will the Government lay upon the table of this House a copy of the said Order in Council?

Hon. Mr. MACLEAN:

1. 2nd October, 1914.

2. (1) Ernest Neil Macallum and Charles Newton Candee, jr., both of Toronto, trading there under the name of the Synthetic Drug Company, subsequently incorporated as the Synthetic Drug Company, Limited. (2) Dr. Gustave Archambault, of Montreal, transferred to the Phenarsenyl Company, Limited.

3. $10 in respect of each patent covered by the license. The license permits sale generally without referring to export or domestic trade.

4. Yes.

4. What was the cost per registrant of the registration in this constituency?
5. What remuneration was received by the registrar of the constituency of Antigonish and Guysborough, N.S., for the registration in that constituency?

2. If so, what amount is being appropriated therefor?

Hon. Mr. REID:

1. The present condition of the road between St. Zotique and River Beaudette, the causes resulting in its present condition, and the Government's liability in connection therewith, are now under investigation.
2. Answered by No. 1.

THE PEACE TREATY.

SUMMARY OF ITS TERMS READ BY HON. MR. ROWELL.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. NEWTON W. ROWELL (President of the Council): On Friday last I promised that the Government would give to the House information in reference to the terms of the Peace Treaty so soon as that information was available for publication. A summary of the Peace Treaty, consisting of some ten thousand words, was received by the Government this morning with the proviso that it might be released for publication at one o'clock to-day, and a despatch to that effect was also received from the Colonial Office. Subsequently, a despatch came from the censor stating that it should not be released to the press until to-morrow morning, but as the Government learned that it had already been published this morning in a special edition of a Montreal paper, as a cable from the London Times, and as the summary was being released to the American press at one o'clock to-day, the Government decided, as a matter of fairness to the Canadian press, to release the summary to the press at the same hour. It has therefore gone out to the press of Canada.

The House will be interested to hear a few of the most important provisions of this momentous document, which is made between the twenty-seven Allied and associated powers of the one part and Germany of the other.

The treaty does not deal with questions affecting Austria, Bulgaria, and Turkey, except in so far as binding Germany to accept any agreement reached with those former Allies.

Following the preamble and deposition of powers comes the covenant of the League of Nations as the first section of the treaty. The frontiers of Germany in Europe are defined in the second section; European political classes given in the third; and extra European political classes in the fourth.

Next are the military, naval, and air terms as the fifth section, followed by a section on prisoners of war and military graves, and a seventh on responsibilities.

Reparations, financial terms, and economic terms are covered in sections eight to ten.

Then comes the aeronautic section, ports, waterways and railways section, the Labour covenant, the section on guarantees, and the final clauses.

Germany, by the terms of the treaty, restores Alsace-Lorraine to France, accepts the internationalization of the Saar Basin temporarily and of Danzig permanently; agrees to territorial changes towards Belgium and Denmark and in East Prussia, cedes most of Upper Silesia to Poland, and renounces all territorial and political rights outside Europe, as to her own or her Allies' territories, and especially to Morocco, Egypt, Siam, Liberia, and Shantung.

She also recognizes the total independence of German-Austria, Czecho-Slovakia, and Poland.

Her army is reduced to 100,000 men, including officers.

Conscription within her territory is abolished

All forts 50 kilometers east of the Rhine are to be razed; and all importation, exportation, and nearly all production of war materials stopped.

Allied occupation of parts of Germany will continue till reparation is made, but will be reduced at the end of each of three five-year periods if Germany is fulfilling her obligations.

Any violation by Germany of the conditions as to the zone 50 kilometers east of the Rhine will be regarded as an act of war.

The German navy is reduced to six battleships, six light cruisers, and 12 torpedo boats, without submarines, and a personnel of not over 15,000.

All other vessels must be surrendered or destroyed.

Germany is forbidden to build forts controlling the Baltic, must demolish Heligoland, open the Kiel canal to all nations, and surrender her 14 submarine cables.

She may have no military or naval air forces, except 100 unarmed seaplanes until October 1 to detect mines, and may manufacture no aviation material for a six months' period.

She agrees to return to the 1914 most favoured nation tariffs without discrimination of any sort, to allow Allied and associated nationals freedom of transit through her territories and to accept highly detailed provisions as to pre-war debts, unfair competition, internationalizations of roads and rivers, and other economic and financial clauses.

She also agrees to the trial of the ex-Kaiser by an International High Court for a supreme offence against international morality, and of other nationals for violation of the laws and customs of war.

Holland is to be asked to extradite the former German Emperor and Germany being responsible for delivering the latter.

The League of Nations is accepted by the Allied and associated powers as operative and by Germany in principle but without membership.

Similarly an international labour body is brought into being with a permanent office and annual convention.

Germany accepts full responsibility for all damages caused to Allied and associated Governments and nationals. She agrees specifically to reimburse all civilian damages beginning with an initial payment of 20,000,000,000 marks, subsequent payments to be secured by bonds to be issued at the discretion of the Reparation Commission.

Germany is to pay shipping damage on a ton-for-ton basis by cession of a large part of her merchant, coasting and river fleets, and by new construction, and to devote her economic resources to the rebuilding of the devastated regions.

A great number of international bodies of different kinds and for different purposes are created, some under the League of Nations; some to execute the peace treaty. Among the former is the commission to govern the Saar Basin till a plebiscite is held fifteen years hence. A High Commissioner of Danzig, which is created into a free city under the League, and various commissions for plebiscites in Malmody, Schleswig and East Prussia. Among those to carry out the peace treaty are the Reparations, Military, Naval, Aviation, Financial and Economy Commissions; the International High Court and Military Tribunals to fix responsibilities, and a series of bodies for the control of international rivers.

Certain problems are left for solution between the Allied and associated powers, notably details of the disposition of the German fleet and cables, the former German colonies, and the values paid in reparation.

Certain other problems, such as the laws of the air and the opium, arms and liquor traffic, are either agreed to in detail or set for early internaticnal action.

The preamble names as parties of the one part the United States, the British Empire, France, Italy and Japan, described as the five allied and associated powers, and Belgium, Bolivia, Brazil, China, Cuba, Ecuador, Greece, Guatemala, Haiti, The Hedjaz, Honduras, Liberia, Nicaragua, Panama, Peru, Portugal, Roumania, Serbia, Siam, Tzecho-Slovakia and Uruguay, who with the five others are described as the Allied and Associated Powers, and on the other part Germany.

It states that: Bearing in mind, that on the request of the then Imperial German Government an Armistice was granted on November 11, 1918, by the five Allied and Associated Powers in order that a Treaty of Peace might be concluded with her, and whereas the Allied and Associated Powers being equally desirous that the war in which they were successively involved directly or indirectly and which originated in the declaration of war by Austria-Hungary on July 28, 1914, against Serbia, the declaration of war by Germany against Russia on August 1, 1914, and against France on August 3, 1914, and in the invasion of Belgium, should be replaced by a firm, just and durable peace, the plenipotentiaries (having communicated their full powers found in good and due form have agreed as follows):

"From the coming into force of the present treaty the state of war will terminate. From the moment and subject to the provisions of this Treaty official relations with Germany, and with each of the German States, will be resumed by the Allied and Associated powers."

This treaty was submitted to the German plenipotentiaries at Versailles to-day. If accepted by Germany and ratified by the Governments who are parties to it the treaty will go into effect and peace will be declared.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX: Has the minister any announcement to make as to what portion of the indemnity will be paid to Canada.

Mr. ROWELL: No.

WAR MEASURES ACT, 1914.

BILL TO EXTEND ORDERS IN COUNCIL NOT PROCEEDED WITH FOR THE PRESENT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. A. ROBB (Chateauguay-Huntingdon): Yesterday the Acting Minister of Justice made a statement which left an inference on this side of the House and in the press that he was going to withdraw Bill No. 71, to extend the operation of the Orders and regulations passed by the Governor in Council under the War Measures Act, 1914. I notice that the Bill is still on the Order Paper. Is it there by inadvertence, or did we misunderstand the minister?

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Acting Minister of Justice): I did not intimate that the Bill would be withdrawn. I said that the reason why it was not advanced was the fact that intimation had come that His Majesty's proclamation which would terminate the War Measures Act could not in all probability be made until about the first of August, and that consequently this Bill need not be gone on with because it could not with advantage be considered pending that time.

Mr. E. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska): In view of that, does the Government intend to introduce legislation to define what is to be considered the end of the war? The British Parliament has enacted that a proclamation will be issued by His Majesty in Council declaring the end of the war, such proclamation to be issued not later than the date of the ratification of the Peace Treaty. Will the Government pass similar legislation, or at least give some interpretation as to emergency measures and other war legislation?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Government has given no consideration to amending the War Measures Act which now defines when it shall cease to be effective. I would not consider that there was likely to be need for such consideration. It is purposed to review such legislation as has been passed under the authority of the Act with a view to determining what should be done in relation to each piece of legislation having regard to the fact that it goes out of effect on the termination of the war.

It may be that will involve a modification of this Bill which was intended only to tide over the present period, it having been apprehended that the war might terminate suddenly. As the war will not terminate suddenly, or at all events it does not appear likely for some time to come, we would like to have time to consider each separate piece of legislation, and determine and submit to Parliament our proposals in regard thereto.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (Cape Breton North): Are we to understand that it is possible for a state of war to continue in Canada, or in any of the British Dominions, after the war is declared to be at an end by an Imperial proclamation?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is presumed that the war will be declared to be at an end by an Imperial proclamation. That proclamation will end the war so far as Canada is concerned, and the operation of the War Measures Act will cease.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT AMENDMENT.

On the motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean (Acting Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue) Bill No. 42, to amend the Weights and Measures Act, was read a second time, and the House went into Committee thereon.

On section 1—" Inspector " defined.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will the minister please say if the amendment which is proposed here changes the territorial jurisdiction of any of the officers at present at work?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, this clause merely provides for the transfer of the administration of weights and measures from the Inland Revenue Department to the Department of Trade and Commerce, which transfer was made some months ago. Further, the clause gives a definition of the word " Inspector." I think perhaps my hon. friend's question refers to another clause.

Section agreed to.

On section 2—Contents of French foot.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: On the first reading of the Bill the object of this clause was explained very fully. The change proposed is consequent upon the recommendation of the International Bureau of Weights and Measures to secure what is expected to be a more accurate definition of the French foot. So far as Canada is concerned, the French foot is employed only in the province of Quebec, and in connection with land surveys. The French foot as at present defined contains 12·79 inches, and the correction only amounts to ·001. I understand this change is approved of by the Incorporated Society of Surveyors in the province of Quebec, and I do not think there can be any objection to it.

Mr. McMASTER: Should there be a hyphen after the word "eighty," in the fourth line of the clause? Should the figures there be seven hundred and eighty-nine thousandths, or seven hundred and eighty—nine thousandths?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The figures should be seven hundred and eighty-nine thousandths, there should be a hyphen.

Section agreed to.

On Section 3—Superintendent may be appointed.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There really is no substantial change contemplated by this clause. Under the law as it at present stands the Deputy Minister of Inland Revenue was the chief administrative officer of weights and measures. Inasmuch as this branch is being transferred to another department, the administrative work is being placed under the control of an officer, to be called the superintendent. That is the important change which the clause makes.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Is it intended to increase the number of officers engaged in this work? I see that by subsection (3) the Governor in Council is empowered to divide the country into inspection divisions, and to decide the number of officers to be appointed.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That provision was contained in one of the clauses which this Bill repeals. It is considered advisable to have the power referred to, although the departmental officers advise me that there is no intention to make additional appointments at present.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Then it is not intended at present to increase the number of officers?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—Frequency of inspections.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: How often is inspection of weights and measures and weighing and measuring machines to be made? Some dealers complain that they are greatly worried by the inspectors in that regard.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is not intended to inspect all scales annually. But there are certain scales, such as those in elevators and railway stations, which are used daily, and it is considered desirable that they at least be subject to annual inspection.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—Penalty for short weights, measure or count.

Mr. ROBB: In making the regulations I suppose the department will take into consideration natural shrinkage? Certain commodities shrink in weight while other commodities gain. For instance, butter and flour shrink slightly, oatmeal and wool gain slightly in weight.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is always considered in the inspection of goods subject to shrinkage. This is a new clause. The officers of the department think that it will facilitate the administration of the Act and will be in the public interest as well. The only penalty now for short weight delivery is under the Criminal Code, and that is rather a harsh measure to invoke. The amount of short weight delivery in Canada —and I suppose it is true of all other countries—is very substantial indeed, and one would be surprised at the great number of complaints that are made to the officers of the Weights and Measures Branch in regard to it. But when the officers attempt to prosecute offenders for fraud they encounter very serious difficulties. For instance, the proprietor of a store from which short weight delivery has been made may know nothing about it; somebody in his employment may be responsible, or the business may be carelessly managed. Experience has led our officers to ask for this legislation, for they feel that if dealers are punished in this way it will be more easy to secure convictions, and the resulting publicity will act as a deterrent. New South Wales at the present time has the same law. I think Great Britain is adopting it this year. The section appealed to me as being a pretty good way of dealing with such offences Of course, whatever similar provisions are contained in the criminal law will still prevail dealing with aggravated cases.

Mr. JACOBS: Where does the minister read into the law that the provisions of the Criminal Code will stand, notwithstanding this new provision, 61 (a)? It would seem to me that this would abrogate the section of the Criminal Code dealing with theft or obtaining money under false pretences. It is a specific instance where the law sought to be introduced would over-ride the existing law.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I consulted the law officer of the Crown, and he thought it was quite proper to have that section. I do not think it will repeal whatever is applicable in the Criminal Code. It is practically impossible to invoke the Criminal Code in these matters. I do not know whether my hon. friend has had any experience himself in the prosecution of offenders under the Act; I have not myself.

[Mr. Robb.]

Mr. JACOBS: It does seem to me that a trader who sells goods under weight should be prosecuted to the full limit of the law. He is committing theft, he is obtaining money by false representations, and the public ought to be protected against such dishonesty in the most careful manner. But I think we are simply putting a premium on crime by abrogating the provisions of our criminal law which deal in a proper way with these cases. In the poorer parts of the larger cities people of modest circumstances should be protected by legislation of a vigorous kind. As I said before, the trader will take his chances and sell goods under weight when the only risk he faces is this trifling fine of $25. It seems to me it is a dangerous departure, and as far as I am concerned I would be in favour of striking that clause from the Bill.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I agree with my hon. friend that there should be no modification of the existing law which would lessen the protection to the public. However, my hon. friend will realize that in criminal proceedings you must prove wilful intent, and if he reflects upon the matter he will realize that it is practically impossible to prove it; and that is the experience of all men engaged in administering laws of this nature. For instance, a few days ago an inspection of sugar in bags supposed to contain 24 pounds revealed a shortage in a great number of the bags, although some were above the specified weight. Take it all in all there was nothing to indicate wilful intent on the part of the manufacturer or dealer; perhaps it was due to carelesness. That state of affairs can be corrected more readily, I think, by giving the department this power to fine such persons. The officers of the department inform me that if they have this section available, a great many prosecutions will be undertaken and considerable publicity given to violations of the law. I think it is a provision that will work out all right in practice, and I should like at least to see it tried.

Mr. P. R. McGIBBON: People in farming communities sometimes trade grain, lend and exchange grain and so on. Are they obliged to have their scales tested, as traders are?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Act applies to every one who sells or deals in articles sold by weight.

Mr. MORPHY: Is this clause comprehensive enough to meet the object aimed at? "Any person who sells"—what about the agent or the servant of the man who sells? The clause should read:

Any person who, by himself, his servant or his agent, sells, delivers or causes to be sold or delivered, anything by weight, etc.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The intention is to have the law directed or levelled against the principal, not against the agent.

Mr. MORPHY: We should make the principal liable for the fraudulent act of his servant or agent. Further, what are you going to do if the fine is not paid? Does the original Act provide for further penalty in default of payment? And what jurisdiction is to determine the conviction?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Section 78 of the original Act contains a clause with regard to the recovery of penalties, and to procedure.

Mr. MORPHY: What about visiting a penalty upon the proprietor for the acts of his servants or agents?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If a sale is made by an employee, the principal would still be liable, because the sale is made by the employee on behalf of the principal.

Mr. MORPHY: But in that case the principal does not sell it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Oh, yes; the principal sells by his agent.

Mr. MORPHY: Not necessarily. The employee might do it in a fraudulent way, without the knowledge of the principal. The employee could not, perhaps, pay the fine, and might not be there to suffer punishment.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: An employee making a sale would make it on behalf of his employer, and, in law, the sale would be by the principal.

Mr. JACOBS: Is this fine exigible whether or not the selling party is aware that the goods sold are under weight?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes, if his employee or agent sells the goods by weight and does not deliver the proper weight, the selling party is responsible. His business should be so organized and conducted that the public will be protected. Of course, frequently there might be short deliveries for which nobody would be very much to blame. In such cases one would expect the officers of the department administering the Act to exercise discretion and sense.

Mr. MORPHY: In section 8, the word "knowingly" is used. Why should it not be used in this section, so that the provision would read:

Any person who knowingly sells, delivers or causes to be sold or delivered, anything by weight, measure or number short of the quantity ordered or purchased, etc.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Then the department would have to establish knowledge, and we would again be under the present disabilities of the criminal law.

Mr. JACOBS: Put the onus on the proprietor.

Mr. MORPHY: If the word "knowingly" was put in and a sub-clause added to provide that the onus should be upon the person charged, then the magistrate might use his discretion as to whether he should impose the fine or not. He could distinguish between the criminal and the innocent man who happened to send out short weight.

Mr. LOGGIE: Does this clause refer to package goods?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. LOGGIE. Some commodities which are of certain weight when packed are subject to shrinkage, and the longer they are held on the shelves of the store the greater that shrinkage is. If a clerk sold a package stated to contain one pound when packed but actually containing one ounce less than that at the time of delivery, what would be the position of the storekeeper who had bought that commodity in good faith from the manufacturer?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Inspection and Sales Act provides that such discrepancies as my hon. friend refers to— those due exclusively to different atmospheric conditions in different places, or to ordinary exposure, evaporation, absorption of water and so on—shall not exceed five per cent of the original weight when sold to the consumer.

Mr. JACOBS: There seems to be no provision in this section for second and third offences. It seems to me that when a proprietor wants to engage in the luxury of continuing the habit of selling goods under weight, he should be made to pay the price. I suggest that after the words "twenty-five dollars" at the end of the section, the following words be added:

for the first offence, and $100 for the second or any subsequent offence of the same nature.

We should not permit any one to continue this practice without bringing him to book rather sharply. A fine of $25 may be sufficient for the first offence, but if a merchant becomes an habitual offender, the law ought to reach him in a more drastic way. I would also suggest that there be inserted in the section some provision whereby it should be declared definitely and conclusively that the section in no way interferes with the provisions of the Criminal Code respecting false pretences, and I move that the section be amended to read:

61A. Notwithstanding the provisions of section 405 of the Criminal Code, any person who sells, delivers or causes to be sold or delivered anything by weight, measure or number short of the quantity ordered or purchased, shall be guilty of an offence and liable to a fine not exceeding $25 for such first offence and $100 for any subsequent offence under this section.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not know that there is any objection to the amendment moved by my hon. friend, although I very much doubt the wisdom of expecting observance of the law by the imposition of an increased penalty for second and subsequent offences. I hardly think that frequent prosecutions and the imposition of excessive penalties would bring about the desired result, but if the public know that a dealer has been fined for delivering short weight goods, those practices would, I think, very soon cease.

Mr. PEDLOW: One of the first difficulties underlying this section is the possibility of a merchant being made responsible for the carelessness of an employee. Under the common law, an employer is at present held responsible for the actions of an employee.

Mr. McKENZIE: Not criminally.

Mr. PEDLOW: But under this measure, any person may at any time be subjected to petty annoyances. An instance has been cited this afternoon of a number of bags of sugar having been weighed up and exposed for sale, the weights not all being uniform. As the human element is not as exact as some mechanical device for measuring, if some customer of a merchant purchased one of those bags and it happened to be short weight, that particular merchant would, under this measure, be liable to a penalty of $25. That is placing the merchant in a very unfair position, and it should not be the attitude of this Committee to place the mercantile community of the country in a position of this kind. I have many employees labouring for me distributing merchandise. How can I control all their actions? I employ the best help I can obtain, and I warn them to be careful in their actions as regards matters of this nature, but if they are careless, then I am not only held responsible, but subjected to the petty annoyance of being hauled up before a magistrate and exposed to the odium of being fined for their carelessness. They are not fined, but I am.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Surely the consumer who has bought the goods and has paid for something he has not received is entitled to protection.

Mr. PEDLOW: As a matter of fairness to the mercantile community, the minister should insert in the first line of this section, after the word "who" the word "knowingly." Then, if a merchant knowingly permits a careless employee to continue distributing short weight or short measure, the section would be a good one. The section is not carefully enough framed, and in a subsequent paragraph the word "knowingly" is used, thereby giving some measure of protection in matters of this kind.

Mr. MACLEAN: If the section were to be amended as the hon. member suggests, there would be very little protection for the public. If a dealer has careless employees in his store and they grow accustomed to delivering short weight or short measure, that employer should suffer the penalty. Further, I do not think those in mercantile business will object to this section, because it is for the protection of the man who is careful and honest as well, in measuring or weighing the goods which he sells to his customers. My hon. friend would be surprised if he knew of the great quantities of goods delivered in this country which are actually short weight. It would be impossible to establish knowledge on the part of the principal, and it is not a difficult matter to deliver proper weights. The delivering of short weight or short measure is due to carelessness or dishonesty against both of which the public should be protected. If short weights were delivered by any merchant and that fact came to the attention of the officers of the department, the merchant would not be prosecuted for the first offence; he would be warned and consideration would be given to his reputation in the community, the character of his staff and so on. I quite agree with my hon. friend that the section might be abused, but I do not see how the public can be protected in any other way.

Mr. JACOBS: I might come to the assistance of the minister by pointing out that under the Liquor License law, the fact that liquor was sold is sufficient to justify a conviction, whether the owner knew of the matter or not.

Mr. PEDLOW: That is a different thing altogether.

Mr. COWAN: Is there in existence now any law compelling parties putting up goods to label or stamp the can or package with the net weight of the contents? Just this morning I received a letter from one of the largest wholesale men in the West, complaining that all of the packages which came from Eastern Canadian manufacturers are short from four to six ounces, and he finds that American cans and packages all contain exactly what they are labelled to contain, the result being that he cannot sell Eastern Canadian goods to the western people. Is there any means by which that can be dealt with, or will it be dealt with under this Bill?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We have now on the Statute Books such a law covering a large number of articles, and it is my intention to introduce at this session another Bill on the subject, which Bill passed the House of Commons at the last session, but which was, for some reason or other, defeated in the Senate. When that is enacted, we shall have complete legislation requiring all containers to have on the label the exact contents of the packages.

Mr. COWAN: I am glad to hear that, because I know the eastern manufacturers are suffering greatly in the West by reason of the practice I have mentioned. If this condition continues, eastern manufacturers will lose their trade in the western market. There is no reason why they should be allowed to defraud our people, for that is what it amounts to.

Mr. PEDLOW: I think the minister is not giving this point the consideration it deserves. As the hon. member for Huntingdon has pointed out certain commodities after being carefully weighed will shrink in weight, while others will increase; it depends upon the atmosphere in which the goods are kept. Textiles for instance, will shrink in weight in a dry atmosphere, and increase in weight in a damp atmosphere. If the minister does not accept my suggestion to insert the word "knowingly" in the first line, I think this clause will be a most dangerous one, and will subject the mercantile interests of this country to a great deal of annoyance. I am informed by legal gentlemen in the House that the Criminal Code already covers the cases which this clause seeks to cover. It is impossible for any merchant to measure goods exactly at all times. How then can we possibly hold him accountable for the acts of his employees? The human element enters into the transaction; it is impossible to be always exact. If this clause passes in its present form, the proprietor of a store will be liable to be hauled before the magistrate and fined $25 because his clerk on one occasion happened to give short weight, not with any intention of defrauding, but simply because the human element entered into the transaction. Furthermore, it will cause a whole lot of trouble for the department.

Mr. MARSHALL: In putting up canned goods, we do not guarantee the quantity. We use standard cans, and we fill them. I think the hon. member is very much mistaken when he says that the cans are sometimes short in weight from four to six ounces. Speaking for the Dominion Canners, while we may have had complaints as to quality, we have had none as to quantity. All our cans of corn and peas are filled by machinery at the rate of from 70 to 100 cans a minute. At this rate, it is possible for an occasional can to be not quite as full as others, but generally they are all full. A shortage in weight is more likely to occur in canning fruits which are filled by hand. For corn, peas and tomatoes we use the standard can used, same as used in the United States. We could not get help enough to fill these cans by hand and keep up our output. I have never heard of anything relating to short weight except perhaps with regard to fruits. We buy a great deal of produce, and we used to have trouble over raspberries and strawberries, but now all our produce is bought by weight. In my opinion this Bill is along the right lines.

Mr. LEGER: I believe this clause should be amended to protect the merchant. A dissatisfied clerk who is about to leave may try to get even with his employer by giving short weight for the whole day before he leaves. Under this clause the merchant would be fined while the clerk would go scot-free. If short weight is given, I would make the merchant make good the shortage. I think that the clerk who deliberately gave short weight should be looked after, as well as the merchant.

Mr. CASSELMAN: As one who is engaged in the mercantile business and has a fairly good knowledge of the conditions, I approve of the principle of this clause. I do not think the argument that merchants will be penalized for the acts of their clerks is well founded, because if a clerk habitually gives short weight or short measure the customers will soon bring it to the attention of the proprietor, and it will then be his duty to discharge the clerk. I think it is the proprietor who should be penalized The tendency of the trade is to deal more and more in package goods. The retail merchants buy a quantity of package goods which frequently happen to be short weight. The minister referred a moment ago to packages of sugar, and I suppose he meant packages that were put up by the factories and marked, as is usual, 20 pounds. In such a case the manufacturer should suffer and not the merchant, who can hardly be expected to weigh every one of the packages and cull out those of short weight. Packages frequently come short in weight, and I think the onus should be on the manufacturer or the packer, and not on the merchant. There was a penalty imposed on merchants who sold impure maple sugar. I know of merchants who were fined for selling impure maple sugar although it was stamped "pure." They did not know that it was not pure, and simply sold it over the counter for what it purported to be. I think the Bill should be so amended as to penalize the manufacturer and not the merchant in the case of package goods.

Mr. McKENZIE: In penalizing it is always dangerous to go further than the common law, which has well considered what is criminal and what is not, and enters into the philosophy of the condition of mind of those who may be charged with crime. When we remove the safeguards provided by the common law and constitute a crime regardless of the state of mind of the individual, we are on very dangerous ground. We passed a law the other day whereby, if a lady put a pan of bread into the oven in too big a fire, and the bread should burn, she is liable to two years in the penitentiary. That is extraordinary, but it is the law to-day that if by negligence any person makes a fire which destroys property of any kind he is liable to be sent to the penitentiary. Now we are coming forward with another law by which, if a pound of tea is one-thousandth of an ounce short in weight a man may be fined $25, or, according to the amendment, $100 for a second offence. It is better to err on the side of mercy and fairness, and it is better that the responsibility should be thrown on the Crown to prove wilful intent, than to make it easy to punish people. We should not neglect the time-honoured principle of the common law that there must be criminal intent in order to render a person criminally liable, and I fully agree with the hon. member who insists that the word "wilful" should be inserted. If this word were added I would have no great fault to find. I do not think that the store-keeper could be criminally liable for a sale made by his clerk. He would be civilly liable in damages for the quality of the goods and for any shortage or inferiority. My view of the criminal law is that the master is not liable criminally unless there is criminal intent on his part. Of course, if he instructs his servant to do an illegal act he is responsible through his agent and is particeps criminis. I think the whole difficulty might be circumvented by adding the word "wilful." It is better that the department should experience some difficulty than that people should be fined and imprisoned who are not really criminally liable.

Mr. BALL: Will this apply to public scales, weighing coal, hay, cattle, etc., and to private scales that are for public use? This law should be very exact. It is the privilege of the owner of any scale to have it inspected, and I think that if all scales are properly inspected there will be adequate protection. I believe a great deal of fraud is perpetrated in the weighing of coal, cattle, etc. There is a great deal of trouble in my own town with scales that are not correct. The person who hires his scale for public use should see that it is absolutely correct. I think the public has suffered very much in this respect and should be amply protected.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am not convinced that this is not good legislation. The public must be protected. If a man goes into a store to buy a definite quantity of anything, he should receive it, and it should be no defence that the proprietor has careless or dishonest employees. Of course, the law might be abused, but I assure the Committee it will not be by the officers of the department.

My hon. friend from Dundas (Mr. Casselman) referred to package goods. That is covered by another statute, the Inspection and Sales Act. There is a toleration of error provided for in that Act up to five per cent of the original weight when sold to the consumer, and it has never been the practice to initiate a prosecution against a person who sells goods in a container just as he himself received them. Prosecution for violation of the Inspection and Sales Act, if any, in that case would be against the manufacturer.

Mr. PEDLOW: I would like to have one further opportunity of impressing my views upon the minister, who is evidently not yet quite convinced. The member for Dundas (Mr. Casselman) said a few minutes ago, that owing to the fact that there might be habitual cases of carelessness on the part of merchants or their employees this clause, in his estimation, was all right. But I submit it is not the habitual offenders that will suffer and feel the consequent exposure most, but the casual offender. The person who has really committed an offence under this clause—not intentionally, not knowingly, not wilfully, but by mere accident; you may call it negligence, a term that the Acting Minister of Justice is very fond of—will be the one to suffer, although the offence may be an accident purely and simply, I think it is the feeling of those members of the Committee who have given the matter careful consideration that there should be some safeguard provided so as to protect a merchant against such imposition as has been referred to, viz: that a dissatisfied employee might, in order to get even with his employer, act in collusion with a friend who would institute a prosecution for short measure. There are a thousand and one ways in which a merchant might not only be penalized, but exposed to the odium which such proceedings involves, although that merchant is a conscientious person who gives the public the best of service and full measure and full weight in the sales which he makes. Like my hon. friend from George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs), I am willing and desirous that the public should be protected to the last degree in a matter of this kind, and that every safeguard should be attached to purchases by the public; but you can make the penalties resulting from proceedings under the Act so irksome, irritating, and annoying to the persons interested that it will be a continual source of worry to them. From week-end to week-end, and from year to year they will always be in terror of suffering seriously by reason of a slight deviation from the exact line of measure. As I said before, in my experience in mercantile affairs, covering a period of forty years, I have found that the measures going over a counter, either in yardage or weight, vary as often one way as the other. In a hasty operation of the scale or the yard measure an employee, even with the best of care, is liable to give over measure or short measure. Now the employee who has given in one case short measure even to the extent of a hair's breadth, is liable to a penalty under this Bill. I submit that the minister will be well advised if he listens to reason, reconsiders his decision, and inserts in this clause some qualifying provision.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I had intended, when last on my feet, to state that legislation similar to this has been enacted in other countries, particularly in the United States. The states of Massachusetts and Wisconsin have enacted a law of this kind, and I think that New South Wales has likewise passed legislation on similar lines. All this indicates that in the experience of other countries it was found impossible to secure convictions without these special enactments. My hon. friend (Mr. Pedlow) appears to be apprehensive that the merchants will be harrassed by the officers of the department in the enforcement of this law. I think I can safely assure him that there will never be any attempt to punish the casual violator of the Act, because there has always been what is known technically as " a toleration of error " allowed in any cases which come under the observation of the officers. For example, the toleration of error is applied to scales to insure protection to the man who owns and uses those scales. I think the Committee may feel quite sure that the department will not institute prosecutions for what would appear to be casual offences or mistakes, or some infinitesimal shortage in weight. The principle upon which this legislation is based is that a man is entitled to get the thing for which he pays, and if he does not, it is no justification that the employer has careless or dishonest officials. I can see the merit in my hon. friend's contention that there may be unintentional short weight delivered, and in some cases overweight. At the same time the delivery of short weight is becoming, or rather, it has become, quite common, and there ought to be some means of dealing with it and giving publicity to the fact, as against some of the offenders. After all, it is in the interest of the business man or dealer, who is scrupulously careful about giving the proper weight to his customers, that some other dealer, through carelessness on his part, or on the part of his employees, should not profit to his disadvantage.

Mr. PEDLOW: I am sorry the minister fails to appreciate the point which I have been making, and which is most reasonable and fair. I can understand the merchant who has no employees, but operates entirely on his own behalf, being subjected to this clause, but it is impossible for a business with hundreds of employees to obtain mathematical accuracy in his operations.

Mr. McKENZIE: He would not be penalized unless it were provided that he should be responsible for the acts of his servants.

Mr. PEDLOW: I am not a lawyer. I am looking at the interpretation of this clause from a common sense standpoint, and there is a difference sometimes between legal interpretations and common sense. Suppose I were to introduce a Bill and it were to become law—although there is not the slightest chance of that—penalizing a lawyer for advising a client that he has got a good case in court, whereas he has not a leg to stand on. It would be just as reasonable for me, if I were Minister of Justice, to press through a Bill of that kind as it is to pass legislation of the character contemplated here. What a storm there would be in the House if I were to attempt, as a legal adviser of the Government, to pass a Bill of that nature. It is all very well to say that the officers of the department will not be unduly exacting, but under this Bill, as I read it, it will be open to the individual purchaser to institute proceedings. It does not state that it is necessary for an official of the department to prosecute. Any Tom, Dick or Harry who goes into a store and buys a package of merchandise is able to take action before the magistrate, and we all know how human are magistrates in administering justice. It all depends on the state of their liver. If they have been out late the night before and are feeling the effects, we all know what kind of a deal they are likely to hand out. As a matter of fact, I have known many magistrates decide cases before they heard the evidence.

Mr. LOGGIE: If I understand the minister, this law applies only to bulk goods, the goods that are weighed out by the store keeper. For example, if a clerk weighs out a pound of tea and gives short weight, either he or his employer is guilty under the law; but if he hands out a pound of tea that has been put up by a wholesale firm, living a thousand miles away it may be, and the net contents are not quite one pound, he is not liable. The Massachusetts law that the hon. minister read refers I fancy only to bulk goods weighed or measured out by the retailer.

Mr. MACLEAN: Yes. Another Act makes provision for goods in containers, and as a matter of fact this would largely relate to bulk goods.

Mr. LOGGIE: In view of that, I think the provision proposed would not cause undue hardship.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is no possibility of any such construction. If a man sells a package of tea which he bought from his wholesaler as containing one pound, and that package is under weight he is guilty under this measure just as much as if he put up the package himself. There is no use having any misapprehension in the matter. The minister said that the prosecutions to be instituted under this new law will likely be initiated by the officers of the department, and he repeated that statement. If that is the intention, I would be satisfied by the insertion of a provision that no prosecutions are to be instituted except by leave of the minister of the department or his deputy. Then we would have some guarantee that frivolous and unreasonable prosecutions would not be instituted. I think that is the best safeguard we could have.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I could not consent to that. I meant to say that as a matter of fact and practice prosecutions, so far as I know, have never been commenced by private individuals, but invariably by officers of the department.

Mr. PEDLOW: But they are possible, are they not?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes, they are possible.

Mr. BALDWIN: Having been connected with mercantile business for some time, this subject interests me and brings to my recollection several incidents. In the case of impure food the revenue officer enters a store and buys the commodity suspected, and if he finds any impurity the retail merchant is punished, while the wholesaler, who sold the commodity to him, goes free. Who is to determine the weights of goods? Can a customer buy goods at a store, take them home, weigh them, and return them because he claims they are short weight? If that is possible, it is going to be a very serious matter, and I would like to have that question answered before I say anything further on this measure.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is the most difficult thing in the world to establish violation of a law of this kind; in fact, it is almost impossible for a private prosecutor to do so. He has no means of testing the weight of the article which he has purchased, and the probabilities are that detections can only be made by officers of the department in their peregrinations through the country. They may have communications from individuals respecting short weights given by some particular dealer, and when visiting his store or inspecting his scales they might observe the weights of articles which were being sold, and in that way they would be able to establish any inaccuracy.

Mr.McCOIG: Will the officers work under a similar system to that of the Government officials under the Drug Stamp Act?

An hon. MEMBER: I hope not.

Mr. McCOIG: The Government officials in a number of cases caught innocent storekeepers who had small boys as clerks. In one city I have in mind an official prosecuted ten or fifteen storekeepers and they were fined $50 each, and that official got a "drag" of $25 apiece out of those fines. If the officials under this Act are going to work on the same basis, there is reason to use every precaution possible to protect the public before this Bill is passed.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not think the cases are quite comparable. Whether or not a stamp was affixed to a package of patent medicines is a fact easily established; if it was not affixed, technically the offender is guilty. I do not think there is the same opportunity for abuse in this case as there might be in the case to which my hon. friend refers. I believe I may safely repeat, that all prosecutions under this section must necessarily be initiated by the officers of the department, and I trust they will always exercise their duties with some discretion.

Mr. PEDLOW: From personal experience, I can state that that is not usually the case with officers of Government departments, and I am not now speaking of this particular department. The point raised by the hon. member for Kent is well taken, and I regret to state that officers in this connection are not always, like Caesar's wife, above reproach. I have had similar experiences to that indicated by him. I know a case where an officer of the department visited the town of Renfrew and tried his level best to induce junior employees to deliver to him packages without a stamp on them, and he knew they should have been stamped, but he endeavoured to induce the employees to commit an offence under the Stamp Act. I know that from personal experience. The same man operated in every store in that town on the same occasion along the same lines. I feel that no merchant would be any safer in the hands of an official of this department. This will be the last and final appeal from me in this regard. I have known cases where dishonest buyers tried to make believe that their measure was short. The merchant has no protection under this Bill in cases where customers take the goods home, remove a portion of them and come back to the store claiming that the weight or measure was short.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This indicates again how difficult it is to prosecute, even under this section. The Act will never be invoked unless an officer of the department knows that a certain man is habitually given to short deliveries. The evidence can only be secured after a great deal of trouble, probably by the officer of the department being in the store when the deliveries are being made.

Mr. PEDLOW: I do not see, then, why the word "knowingly" should not be inserted after the word "who" in the first line.

Mr. McCOIG: The word "knowingly" is used in section 69; why should it not be used in this?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Because a man would know whether or not his scales were being tampered with.

Mr. BALDWIN: Where will this weight be taken, or where will the account be made to ascertain whether the measure is correct—at the counter, or after the customer has taken the goods home? Some twenty years ago I had in my employ a gentleman of high standing. A customer had been annoying him with frequent complaints of short weight, and he asked me what to do. I said: Do you know that you have made no mistake? He said: Absolutely. I said: You weigh him out a pound more sugar than he asks for the next time he comes, and give him thirteen lemons or bananas instead of a dozen. He did so, and there was no complaint. I said to him then: You may go to that customer and tell him that you have proof that he is not honest, because he has not reported the extra pound of sugar or the fact that he was given thirteen instead of a dozen lemons or bananas. A man may come to a store and buy certain commodities, take them home, remove a portion of them and then call in an officer and complain that the weight or measure was short. Retail merchants have troubles enough to burden them; yet by this law you are putting them in the very clutches of dishonest people. I am also a lumberman. If I send a thousand feet of lumber out ten miles, it should be measured at the wagon; the customer should not report to me two weeks later that he did not get a thousand feet of lumber. We might as well close up business if such a law as this is on the statute-book.

Mr. PEDLOW: The measurement or weight of the merchandise should be checked at the counter by the customer, before he leaves the store. In the banks you are asked to count your change before you leave the counter; otherwise .no claim will be recognized. Under the circumstances, I move the following amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: Order. There is already an amendment before the Committee which will have to be disposed of before the hon. member may introduce another.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: With reference to what my hon. friend (Mr. Baldwin) has said, the fact would have to be determined as any other fact is determined. It would be very difficult to secure a conviction for selling short weight if the purchaser took the articles to his home and kept them there for some time.

Mr. BALDWIN: Fifteen minutes would be enough—or two minutes.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Or two seconds, for that matter; it would be very difficult to secure a conviction in that case. There need be no apprehension, therefore, about anybody being injured by this law other than the person who has clearly laid himself open for prosecution.

Mr. McKENZIE: The section of the Code referred to in the amendment of my hon. friend (Mr. Jacobs) reads:

> Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to three years' imprisonment who, with intent to defraud by any false pretence, etc.

There the intent is mentioned, as it is in every section of the Criminal Code dealing with such matters. Are we going to depart from that and give to officers of the class described a moment ago an opportunity of making money by going round the country, getting a fee from a man for seeing that his yardstick is the proper length and that his scales are in proper order, and then discovering something against him and imposing a fine on him whether he is guilty or not? That is going entirely too far. The minister has taken into his head the notion that it is proper to make criminal laws for all matters of this kind, and if in any of the ordinary transactions of life, a man is to be held criminally liable, if he happens to make a slip, that is breaking every principle I have ever known of in this country.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We wish, really and practically, to modify the criminal law which now states that if a man wilfully sells short weight goods, he is liable to imprisonment. The officials of the department state that in practice they cannot secure a conviction, and they want some legislation enabling them to punish men by the imposition of a fine for failure to furnish that which a man has paid for.

Mr. McKENZIE: If the minister will furnish to this committee any tangible proof of protest coming from the people of any city or town in Canada that they are being defrauded by their grocers, I would certainly seriously consider the matter; but if this is only because the officers who travel around the country in search of convictions, find it difficult to make them, I have no sympathy with the Bill. If any men or women in Canada who go to buy tea, pork, fish or anything else to be found in a grocery store, complain of short weight, I am very sympathetic and will respond very quickly to any remedy, but I am not satisfied that there is any such complaint, and I have heard none.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There are every year complaints by the hundreds to the department that goods are sold short in weight. On the other hand, the officers of the department believe that short weight deliveries are due, in most cases, not to fraud and deliberate intent, but to carelessness, and they want to prevent this carelessness, and if possible, by this legislation, to compel dealers to give purchasers that which they bought and which they paid for. I hope this law will assist in making men more careful about the deliveries they make.

Amendment (Mr. Jacobs) agreed to.

Mr. PEDLOW: I am still sorry that the minister is obdurate, unconvinced. He says that complaints are from time to time coming in to the department, and I have no doubt of that, but am sure, when the department investigates the basis of the complaints, it will find that in the majority of cases they are without foundation and fact, and that the actual cases of short weights and offences of that kind are infinitesimal. No business man could continue long in business if he habitually delivered short weights and measures. According to this legislation one would think that the mercantile people of this country were a crowd of thugs, robbers and criminals, and that a wall had to be built round the public for their protection, as if the public were not capable of protecting themselves. From my experience, I have no hesitation in saying that should customers be given short weights or measures they very quickly go back to the store and demand their pound of flesh, and I do not think the minister is well advised in acting the part of Shylock in asking that this section pass. It may be not only the pound of flesh, but some of the heart's blood along with it, and it was the latter to which Portia objected so well. I move:—

That section 61A be amended by inserting the word "knowingly" after the word "who" in the first line.

The principle underlying this amendment is admitted by the minister; it covers the point of carelessness, which is all that this Committee should be concerned in. If a man deliberately, habitually, commits this offence, then he should be penalized, but as the section now reads, if the action is only casual, occurring once in a while, he is liable to a penalty.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We have discussed that principle pretty thoroughly, and I hope my hon. friend does not want to press the amendment. The sense of the Committee is, I think, that the section would be absolutely of no use if the word "knowingly" were inserted.

Mr. JACOBS: If, as the hon. member suggests, we insert the word "knowingly," we come into conflict with section 405 of the Criminal Code, which states that if any person knowingly commits this offence, he is liable to three years' imprisonment, so that we shall have the curious situation that, while one section of the law says that if a man knowingly commits this offence, he is liable to three years' imprisonment, another section says that he is liable only to a fine of $25. That reduces the matter to an absurdity.

Mr. PEDLOW: This does not conflict with the section quoted by the hon. member, but is in entire harmony with it. The word "knowingly" was used in the Criminal Code, showing that the framers of it were wise in their day and generation, and we would not be well advised in departing from the phraseology of that section.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Let us give the Bill a fair chance.

Amendment (Mr. Pedlow) negatived.

Section, as amended by Mr. Jacobs, agreed to.

On section 8—penalty for using counterfeit weights, etc.

Mr. McCOIG: In case of a conviction, will the officer laying the complaint be entitled to any portion of the fine or any fee?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No.

Section agreed to.

On the preamble.

Mr. McKENZIE: On a former occasion I asked the minister about the testing of meters for measuring electric currents. In out part of the country, complaint is made that those meters are not properly inspected. The minister could not, at that time, tell me under which department the matter came. If it comes under this department, I should like to know if proper steps are being taken for the inspection of electric meters.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I remember my hon. friend putting that question to me, I think, on the first reading of the Bill. The officer of the department who is now with me is not in the electrical branch, but I shall make a point, to-morrow, before the Orders of the Day are called, to give my hon. friend an answer, and I must apologize to him for having overlooked the matter.

Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT. SEXUAL OFFENCES.

On motion of Hon. Arthur Meighen (Acting Minister of Justice) Bill No. 78, to amend the Criminal Code (sexual offences), was read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 2—seducing female employees:

Mr. PROULX: I presume that sections 1 and 2 are the sections we passed last year, but which were objected to by the Senate?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—unmarried man and woman registering as man and wife at hotel, etc.

Mr. NICKLE: Before that section is carried, I think the committee might well consider whether the contemplated legislation does not go very much further than was probably intended by those who drafted the Bill. With the exception of the province of New Brunswick, adultery, I believe, has not been a crime in Canada. It is not in Ontario, or Quebec to-day, for a man to live in an adulterous relationship with a woman. The result is that there are in this country a great number of men and women who are and have been for some time living openly together as man and wife, though unmarried. If this section should pass as it is, it would mean that if any one of those persons went to an hotel with a woman or man as the case may be, and registered as man and wife, not being legally married, an offence would be committed and the person would be liable to imprisonment. I quite appreciate the object of the Bill, to prevent hotels and lodging or boarding houses being used as houses of assignation, but I do think there is a class of public that is entitled to be protected, more particularly at the present time when there are many men returning to this country who have not gone through the form of marriage with the woman with whom they are living, and intend to live. I therefore suggest for the consideration of the minister that the section be amended by adding thereto the following clause:

No persons who have been openly living together as husband and wife shall be prosecuted for an offence under this section.

If I might press the matter somewhat further, I would direct the attention of the Committee to the fact that there are in this country cases where a man and woman are living together as man and wife where a divorce has been obtained in a foreign country, and it is very questionable if the divorce is of legal and binding force according to the laws of Canada. Are you going to say that these people who have lived together as man and wife shall be subject to criminal prosecution, not because the relationship is illegal but simply because, perchance, they registered at an hotel or boarding house? The general purport of this legislation is good, but I do think there is a class of the public that is entitled to protection along the lines I have mentioned.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I might also mention the case where a married man represents to a woman that he is unmarried and then marries her, committing bigamy. The woman who might be perfectly innocent would be liable under this section.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The amendment suggested by the hon. member for Kingston and the suggestion of the hon. member for North Grey, have come to my attention only this afternoon. With regard to the latter suggestion, from the momentary consideration I have been able to give it, it might well be that innocent persons, man or woman, might be prosecuted if the innocent one was at the time under the belief that he or she was legally married. I think the suggestion is worthy of a few moments' consideration by the Committee. The latter remark applies also to the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Kingston. The amendment, however, would be more easily accessible to abuse for the reason that it suggests no time over which the open living together as man and wife must have continued before it shall constitute relief from the penalties imposed by the Act. I would like the members to express their views particularly on the amendment and on the suggestion of the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Middlebro).

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: By putting at the end of the section the words " knowing the same to be untrue ", it would improve the section.

The CHAIRMAN: It will be necessary first to dispose of the amendment of the hon. member for Kingston.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have no sympathy with, and I do not care to afford any protection to any man and woman who are living together in open adultery in this country. It may be permitted, but certainly it is in violation of everything we regard as good citizenship and good morals. Although perhaps we have not provided any direct law to punish it, we undoubtedly should not throw any protection around it. If any man and woman coming to Canada have not yet been married, or have had no opportunity of being married, they can be married in Canada and should immediately comply with the law. I am not in sympathy with the amendment and do not think it should be accepted.

Mr. NICKLE: The matter is not as simple as the leader of the Opposition supposes. He says that people coming to Canada can be married. That is quite true, but people may not be in a position to marry. I will mention an instance that came to my attention within the last month. A Canadian went overseas leaving in Canada a wife who went off with another man. The soldier foolishly paid attention to a girl in England, and she, believing him to be single, married him, not finding out that he was a married man until a child was about to be born. She came to Canada with him but the child was born prior to their arrival. That woman is in Canada living with the man in Kingston, wife number one not desiring to live with him. It is not a legal offence for these two people to live together, and you cannot prosecute the man for bigamy because the offence was committed in England. Will it be contended that it should be an offence for this man and woman to register in a hotel as man and wife, notwithstanding the fact that they may legally live together in a private house? That would be an anomaly. I can give half a dozen instances of the same kind if necessary. I have no desire to throw protection around people of this class but I certainly think that we owe it to them not to set traps for them. That is the principle on which I advocate the amendment I propose. The endeavour apparently is to prevent a man and woman from going to a hotel and using it as a place of assignation, but it should not be held that a couple casually visiting a hotel should be treated as criminals simply because they register or otherwise conduct themselves as man and wife when they are not such in fact. There are men and women living in this country as married people who are not legally divorced from their previous husbands or wives. How unreasonable it would be to say that they should live together in private residences unmolested, but that because perchance they come to Ottawa to see the leader of the Opposition or go to Toronto to attend the opening of the legislature they should be made criminals if they register at a hotel.

Mr. EDWARDS: I can only attempt to argue this matter from the standpoint of common sense. It seems to me that the member for Kingston fails in his argument when he assumes that it is all right for these people to live together as long as they do not go to a hotel and register. I take the view that they are committing a moral offence, at all events, when they live together after discovering that they are not legally married. If they continue to live together they are committing an offence even if they do not go to a hotel and register. The leader of the Opposition has expressed the case exactly when he says that the passing of this amendment will be equivalent to this House countenancing the living together of people who have no right to do so. To take the case mentioned by my hon. friend of the English girl marrying the soldier in good faith. What course should she take on ascertaining the facts? I think she should leave him at once, and the fact that she may decide to continue living with him does not excuse either of them if they go to a hotel and register. There ought to be a law on the statute-books, if there is not, making it a criminal offence for people to live together who are not married.

Mr. NICKLE: I do not want the hon. member for Frontenac to put words into my mouth. Not for a moment did I suggest that it was all right for such people to live together. I was not discussing morals but law, and it is in that respect that my friend no doubt misunderstood me. I said that adultery, at least in Ontario and Quebec, had never been recognized as a crime. The hon. member may be quite right in saying that it should be made a criminal offence, but if we are going to make it such let us do so in a direct way and not set traps for people. What I said was that so long as the law of Canada did not recognize adultery as a crime, I thought it was unreasonable that those who were living together openly as man and wife should be made criminals simply because they went to a hotel, lodging house, or boarding house and represented themselves as being married. I object to setting traps for people who are innocently—if I may use that word without giving offence to the hon. member for Frontenac—doing something they would have a right to do under the general law of the country but which becomes an offence when they register at a hotel or boarding house, or represent themselves as having a certain status which they have not.

Mr. JACOBS: Is not this the same Bill that was before the House last year, passed the House, and was thrown out by the Senate?

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is the legislation in exactly the form in which it passed this House.

Mr. McMASTER: I have listened with a great deal of care to what the member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle) and the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) have said. I incline to the view expressed by the member for Frontenac and also that expressed by the member for Cape Breton; I am very much afraid that if we amend this clause as the member for Kingston desires us to do it may be construed as giving the endorsement of this House to these irregular relations. Now, my hon. friend from Kingston seems to think that there is something unfair to the people living in these irregular relationships in this respect: That if they are living in a private house the law does not recognize their relationship as a crime, but if they go to an hotel or boarding-house and register there it is a crime. There is a distinction to be drawn. While these people are living in their own house they are not brought into contact with other persons so nearly and so intimately as they are if they register in an hotel or in a boarding-house.

Mr. JACOBS: Brought into the same contact?

Mr. McMASTER: Not into the same contact. Let us take the case of a summer boarding-house. Two people living in this irregular relationship go into this summer boarding-house. They register as man and wife, they are accepted as such, and they may become friendly with the people—many of whom will be young persons—in that boarding-house. I think the situation is different when these people are living in their own house from what it is when they are living in a summer boarding-house, or any such establishment. I quite grant that it may be a little hard on such persons to be subject to this penalty if they go to an hotel; but after all, however we may sympathize with individual cases, or however we may in our own hearts condone their offence, nevertheless they have by their action prejudicially attacked the very basis of our society, and therefore I would think that the amendment of the member for Kingston cannot be accepted. I do not think we can accept it because I am afraid it would give the country and the world in general an improper and false idea of the attitude of this House and of the people of Canada towards sexual relationships.

Mr. HALLIDAY: We have a moral law to observe in Canada as well as a criminal law. There may be sympathy coming to the man and woman who live as man and wife before they are married, but I have not heard any reason expressed for such sympathy. The most binding law which should be observed in the world to-day is a law not enacted by this Parliament. If there is no law on the Statute Book prohibiting one of the greatest crimes that is taking place in this Dominion to-day, I think it is about time such a law was enacted. For my part I cannot let the opportunity pass without voicing my disapproval of it.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I would move that the following words be added at the end of the clause:

Knowing the same to be untrue.

The CHAIRMAN: We must first dispose of the other amendment. Shall the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Kingston be adopted?

Mr. JACOBS: Might I ask that the amendment in question be read, as I was not in the Chamber when it was proposed?

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. member for Kingston moves to add at the end of clause 4, to form part thereof, the following words:

No persons who have been openly living together as husband and wife shall be prosecuted for an offence under this section.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: My reason for moving the amendment which I am about to submit is simply this: I think the Committee will agree that in most cases of bigamy, one of the parties is usually innocent. Now under the clause as it stands to-day if, under those circumstances, a bigamous marriage was contracted, the innocent party would not only suffer from the results of that marriage, but would be liable as well to imprisonment. The operating words of the section are that either of the parties "represents or pretends" that the man is the husband or the woman is the wife. What I say is that this should not be an offence unless the person who thus represents or pretends, knows that the statement is not true. Therefore, I would move to add to the end of the section, the amendment referred to. Then in a case of that kind the innocent party to the marriage contract would be protected.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: I would agree with the hon. gentleman if his amendment did not impose on the prosecution the onus of proving a want of knowledge; I think the hon. gentleman will see the distinction there. I am not saying that his amendment does that, he has probably given more thought to the matter than I have, but if the onus of proving the want of knowledge does not rest on the person accused then we should be careful to see that it does. As my hon. friend knows, the onus must be somewhere. We want the onus placed upon the right person, because it is very hard to prove that the party accused had such knowledge in a great many cases.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I would think that before any party is held to be guilty the proof of guilt must be forthcoming.

Mr. McMASTER: I am quite in sympathy with the amendment proposed by the member for Grey, but I do not think it is necessary. In order that a person be convicted under this section, the guilty knowledge would have to be established; there would have to be mens rea, and that being so, although I am absolutely in sympathy with the object of protecting an innocent party to these irregular alliances, I cannot see the necessity for the amendment.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I will submit this illustration to my hon. friend: An innocent woman accompanies a man to the hotel and the clerk asks: "Are you married"? and she replies, "Yes, I am married to this man here." In giving that statement she fully believes that she is married to him, yet under the section she would be guilty of an offence.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not think she would be liable, because she acted in good faith.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: But the clause does not say that.

Mr. McMASTER: I submit wrongful intention would have to be established before the woman could be properly convicted under this section.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I would not want to take a chance on it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If I might present my own opinion, in a most humble way, it would be that the hon. member for Grey is right in his contention that that knowledge would not require to be brought home unless the Act specifically called for such to be done. All that needs to be done to constitute an offence under the clause as it stands now is—we will take a single case—that a man by registering, or otherwise, represents that a woman to whom he is not married is his wife.

Now, all that has to be done is to so represent that a woman to whom he is not married is his wife; that itself the statute declares to be an offence. Consequently in my judgment—which I do not put forward as final by any means—unless we add "knowing the same to be untrue," this knowledge does not require to be brought home to the accused person.

So far as the point raised by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle is concerned, I would certainly be of the opinion without reserve, that if the law were to be amended merely as asked for by the hon. member for Grey, then the guilty knowledge would require to be brought home to the accused by the prosecution. It occurs to me—although I would like more time over these matters before discussing them—that it would be better to state that the onus of proof of lack of knowledge should be on the accused. And if the hon. member (Mr. Middlebro) would so amend his amendment, then, subect to further discussion, I would be disposed to accept it.

Mr. JACOBS: What is the law in England with respect to these offences, particularly the offence under review?

Mr. MEIGHEN: So far as I know this does not constitute an offence in England.

Mr. JACOBS: Then why should we want to make it an offence in this country?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We establish our own standard of morality—

Mr. McMASTER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —on the footing of our own conscience, instead of on the standard set by Great Britain.

Mr. JACOBS: The sources of our law are from Great Britain; we follow her closely in the enactment of criminal law.

Mr. McMASTER: Not necessarily.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The principles of our law, particularly of our constitutional law, we derive from Great Britain; but our standard of morality we derive from our own conscience.

Mr. JACOBS: I am of the view that this clause is liable to produce blackmail on an unprecedented scale. This legislation is hysterical. I think the Criminal Code already sufficiently safeguards morality without the introduction of legislation of this kind.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I will withdraw my amendment and substitute therefor the following:

> The onus of proof of the absence of knowledge shall be upon the person asserting the same.

Mr. DEVLIN: While you are perfecting the section, would it not be well to insert something in reference to cohabitation? The simple fact of a man passing off a lady as his wife in a hotel is not in itself a crime.

Mr. JACOBS: How are you going to prove cohabitation?

Mr. DEVLIN: By their occupying the same room. They do not generally do so except for an illicit purpose.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am afraid that if you put in the necessity of proving intention to cohabit you would only increase the difficulty of enforcing the law, and you would not absolve any deserving case.

Amendment carried.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the section as amended carry?

Mr. JACOBS: Mr. Chairman, I move as an amendment that the clause be struck out of the Bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman's amendment is merely a negative. If he is opposed to the section as amended he is at liberty to vote accordingly.

Mr. JACOBS: This Bill was before the House last year and was considered rather hastily I am afraid. In the Senate, where perhaps, if not wiser, there are older heads than in this House, they look at matters with that detached attitude which in questions of this kind is essential, they came to the conclusion that the entire Bill was useless, that it was provocative of blackmail and other offences of that nature, and consequently they failed to pass it. In view of that I do not consider it wise to send the Bill again to the Senate this year. This Bill was, as I understand, prepared and drafted by some association for the propagation of morality generally. It is not a request coming from any well recognized body, nor is public opinion, I venture to say, in favour of it. In view of all these circumstances I do not think it should form part of our law, particularly as we have, as I said before, a sufficient number of provisions of this kind in the Criminal Code to act as a drag-net for people desirous of committing offences against morality. As a matter of fact, I think we have too many of these measures already and they are not sufficiently carried out on account of that very reason perhaps. I am against the clause as amended and intend to so vote.

Section as amended carried.

Bill reported.

MIGRATORY BIRDS CONVENTION ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. Arthur Meighen (Minister of the Interior) Bill No. 88 (from the Senate) to amend the Migratory Birds Convention Act, was read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 3—one-half fine to go to private prosecutor:

Mr. McKENZIE: This provision is something that I am opposed to on general principles.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A treaty was entered into between United States and Canada for the protection of migratory birds. That treaty was ratified by Act of Parliament, and its provisions were embodied in the Migratory Birds Convention Act. The provinces, of course, had their own game laws, and, in the main, were enforcing them; but those provincial laws did not go far enough to ensure the protection of migratory birds. The subject matter having been dealt with by international treaty, the Dominion acquires jurisdiction; but the Dominion thought—and the migratory birds legislation is based entirely upon this hypothesis—that provincial legislation would be enacted to bring the laws in each province into conformity with the several provisions of the treaty and to provide for their enforcement. That hope has, to a large extent, been realized. Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta have brought their game laws into full conformity with the Migratory Birds Convention; British Columbia, Ontario and Quebec have brought their laws into substantial conformity—for all practical purposes, into full conformity —with the provisions of the convention and are in a reasonable manner carrying out those laws. But we have not been able to secure from the Maritime Provinces the legislation desired. New Brunswick, instead of bringing its legislation up to the requirements of the Migratory Birds Convention Act, has repealed its legislation altogether and throws the whole onus on the Dominion, very much to the disappointment of those who have at heart the enforcement of our migratory bird laws. Nova Scotia has not gone so far as that. Perhaps, in order to be accurate, I had better read just what has been done in this connection:

New Brunswick has not amended its game laws to comply with the treaty, but has repealed all its laws protecting migratory birds, on the ground that that is a duty now devolving on the Dominion.

Prince Edward Island has not amended its laws to comply with the treaty, and has no warden service.

Nova Scotia has amended its game laws, but it has omitted protection for wild beasts and ducks—except black, wood and eider—and the open season for Wilson snipe and woodcock does not meet the conditions of the treaty. Moreover, Nova Scotia say they have not an adequate warden service to enforce the Act.

That being the condition of affairs in the Maritime Provinces, it becomes necessary for the Dominion, having regard to its obligations under the treaty, so to amend its Act as to enable it to enforce the law in those provinces. We must take power, therefore, to pass regulations covering minor matters of enforcement to enable us to carry out the law—it having been originally intended that these minor matters should be taken care of, as before, by the provincial authorities. That is the reason for paragraph (aa) in section 1, as to power of regulation under section 4 of the present Act. The same reasoning applies to the Bill throughout. Section 2 provides for penalties for violation and for the bringing of the goods seized to a justice of the peace who has power to order confiscation. The last clause, to which the leader of the Opposition advances his general objection, is also made necessary by the very same cause.

The laws of the various provinces which are now enforcing the Migratory Birds Convention Act, provide for the allocation of the fines. The provincial governments appoint wardens and game officers who are not under salary, but who are entitled, where they secure a conviction, to divide the fines, and in that way the enforcement of the law is secured. As, however, Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island refuse to enforce the law—and this applies especially to Nova Scotia; the others refuse chiefly to pass laws—we must provide for some division of the fines as well, in order that a system of enforcement may be put into effect, without the necessity of our employing salaried officers for the purpose. That is the reason of this section. The hon. member will find that in his own province this very same law is in effect by provincial legislation. I read from section 108 of the Nova Scotia Game Act:

> Every fine imposed and collected under the authority of this Act, shall be paid in full to the Chief Game Commissioner, who shall, except as elsewhere in this section provided, pay over the same to the Provincial Treasurer to be paid and applied to him as provided by section 104 of this Act.
> (2) When a complaint is laid and the information therefor furnished by a person other than a warden, the Chief Game Commissioner may pay one-half of the fine so collected to the complainant.
> (3) When the complaint is laid by a warden under information therefor furnished by any other person, the Chief Game Commissioner may pay one-quarter of the fine so collected to such informant.

So that the principle of the Nova Scotia statute is merely being embodied in this Bill to enable us to carry out the enforcement which apparently the province of Nova Scotia declines to carry out.

Mr. FIELDING: Has the matter been one of negotiation with the members of the Nova Scotia Government? It is very undesirable to have any conflict, and I thought perhaps, that when some of the ministers were here lately, they might have had an opportunity of discussing the matter with the minister.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have not conducted negotiations personally, but the Parks Branch has for many years been under the charge of Mr. Harkin, and I know he has been conducting negotiations, although unsuccessfully, with those three provinces. I know Mr. Harken is very grievously disappointed that he is not able to secure that provincial conformity in the Maritime Provinces that has been secured in the others, and the consequent enforcement of the law.

Mr. FIELDING: Does this mean that the Nova Scotia Government would regard this as a hostile measure, and that there would be a conflict between their laws and this?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not want to speak too certainly on the point, but I rather think their attitude is this, that it is something of a burden and, inasmuch as we have made a convention, we should wholly bear that burden. I think I am safe in saying that they are quite in accord with the Migratory Birds Convention itself.

Mr. McKENZIE: The situation in Nova Scotia is that the administration of the Game Laws is entrusted to an association called the Game Association, which comes, sometimes, to the legislature for amendments to the law. I do not know exactly what view they take, but I would be very much surprised if the Prime Minister of Nova Scotia and the other members of the Provincial Government would do anything that would not be in harmony with the general law, and whatever is done is, I suppose, the finding of this Game Association, which collects those moneys, out of which they pay the game wardens in the different parts of the province. I would suggest to the minister that it would be well to endeavour to have no conflict as to the close season for game, wild and migratory birds. The close season is now covered by the laws of the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Undoubtedly, but we are bound in honour to live up to the terms of our convention, and as I stated to the hon. member, I am satisfied that the terms of that convention were satisfactory. Naturally inasmuch as the enforcement of them bears upon citizens of the province, I presume the provincial authorities are not anxious to assume any greater share of that than they should. That is the general attitude. I realize there is no objection to this Bill; but if it passes, and if, hereafter, by the efforts of the hon. gentlemen or otherwise, the legislatures of the provinces can be induced to bring their laws into conformity and to undertake the enforcement just as the other provinces are doing that will be much more satisfactory to the department and make a much better system all round.

Mr. FIELDING: I do not anticipate any trouble, unless it be on the matter of expense, concerning which all our Provincial Governments are sensitive. I know that this class of legislation has been regarded very favourably in Nova Scotia in days gone by, and I feel quite satisfied that if an effort is made the two Governments can be brought into harmony in the matter.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

WAR EXPENDITURES—$350,000,000 VOTE.

On the motion of Sir Thomas White (Acting Prime Minister), Bill No. 68, for granting to His Majesty aid for demobilization and other purposes, was read the second time and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 2—payment of three hundred and fifty million dollars may be made:

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not want to press the objection, but I think this Bill should not come before the House until after the minister had made his Budget Speech, because it involves the giving of a very full explanation of the expenditures of Canada, particularly the war expenditures, from the commencement of the war down to the present time. I think the Committee and the House and the country would like to know how the moneys derived from the different loans have been expended in connection with the war, and how we stand generally in respect of our war and other expenditures. Possibly the minister intends to give us that information now, but I rather thought he told us not very long ago that he did not intend to divide his Budget Speech into two sections. For that reason I really think the consideration of this Bill should not be taken up until after the Budget Speech has been delivered. If the minister intends to go on with the Bill now, I trust that he will give the Committee the fullest possible explanation of our expenditure, particularly in respect of the war, the proceeds of the different loans, and what he proposes to do with the moneys which he will obtain under this Bill. It is quite true the minister may have been giving an explanation of these matters from time to time, but we have been so intent on winning the war that, speaking for myself, and I suppose that in this I am like the average Canadian citizen, I do not remember the details. Now that the war is over, I think it would be well to have a thorough reckoning of our borrowings and expenditures in connection with the war.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend will recall that when the Committee of the Whole House had under consideration the resolution which preceded this Bill, in accordance with a practice which has been followed by the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) during the years of the war, I made a statement as comprehensive as was possible of the expenditure upon the war from the war appropriation during the past year, and also placed upon Hansard in such detail as was possible an estimate of the expenditure which the Government expects to be obliged to make during the present fiscal year in connection with demobilization and for purposes arising out of the war. My hon. friend will find that statement in Hansard of this session, unrevised edition, beginning at page 1404. I do not regard it as at all necessary that the consideration of this Bill should await the bringing down of the Budget. The Budget statement deals with the expenditures for the past year and estimates the expenditure for the coming year; shows the amount of revenue received during the past year and indicates the amount which it is expected will be received for the fiscal year in which it is delivered, together with the proposals of the Government for additional taxation to meet the requirements as disclosed. I informed the hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) that I would give him as accurate a statement as I could of the war debt incurred up to the end of the last fiscal year. I indicated then that I thought it inadvisable that I should make, so to speak, two Budget statements, and I think the House will concur in the propriety of that view. It is my intention when the Budget is brought down to make as comprehensive and accurate a statement as I can with respect to the cost of the war to Canada to the end of the last fiscal year, together with an estimate, as nearly as it can be made, of the remaining expenditures which we shall have to make under the authority of this Bill for demobilization, including war gratuities and other expenditures arising out of the war, so that the House may have before it on the occasion of the Budget, as accurate a statement as possible of the total cost of the war to Canada from the beginning to the time when our accounts are practically closed out, with regard to the principle of war expenditure. There will, of course, remain the annual burden necessitated by our war debt and pensions, but I can assure my hon. friend that in the Budget I shall amplify the statement to the fullest extent with the view of disclosing to the House all the information in the possession of the Government respecting the matters which I have mentioned. While I stated that to the hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon, I also said that I would endeavour to give him the figures, so far as available, to the end of the last fiscal year in a very brief statement, which I shall now place upon Hansard:

War Expenditure.

Year.
1914-15..	$ 60,750,476.01
1915-16..	166,197,755.47
1916-17..	306,488,814.63
1917-18..	343,836,801.98
1918-19..	450,000,000.00 (Estimated.)

Net Debt Statement.

Estimated Net Debt March 31, 1919..	$1,584,000,000.00
Net Debt March 31, 1914.. ..	335,996,850.14
Increase of Net Debt..	$1,248,003,149.86

The war loans issued and outstanding aggregate $1,536,276,922.53. I stated the other day that our account with the Imperial Government showed a difference of over two hundred million dollars to the credit of Canada. I think that statement is all that I can give, or should be called upon to give, at the present time, in view of my intention, as expressed to the Committee, with respect to the Budget. If my hon. friend will turn to page 1404 of unrevised Hansard he will find the details of expenditures for the past year. They are necessarily incomplete because many expenditures have not yet been brought into account. My hon. friend is aware that many services are not brought into account of the books for some time after the end of March, and especially is that so in connection with war expenditures. On page 1405 he will find all the different items of our estimated war expenditure for the coming year, with some notes which may be useful in their consideration. The Minister of Militia is here to-night because a great part of the estimated expenditure for the year belongs to his department here and overseas.

Mr. BALDWIN: Do I understand the Acting Prime Minister to say that the accounts standing between Canada and the Imperial Government show two hundred million dollars to Canada's credit?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Mr. CAHILL: I object to the portion of the clause with reference to promoting trade and industry. I understand that something like $25,000,000 is to be loaned to Rumania. Rumania is at war with Austria-Hungary at present and her credit may not be too good. Peace has not yet been signed and it is doubtful what countries will sign the treaty. I am opposed to the principle of lending the money of the people of Canada to the manufacturers of this country, for that is practically what this amounts to. There is an offer to Rumania, an offer to Serbia and I think to other countries to lend from $25,000,000 upwards, and the question arises in the first place as to the advisability of Canada going into the business of loaning money to the factories of this country to promote trade where they are not able to go out and get trade themselves. It is a fallacy to suppose that you can promote the trade of the country by furnishing credits to other countries to buy our goods. The trade of the country is done with trade; it is a trade arrangement. We are not going to sell Rumania wheat, live stock, butter or eggs. We are not going to sell Rumania directly anything from the farm, but we are going to sell to that country manufactured goods; we are going to sell Serbia manufactured goods, and to any of the countries, apart from Great Britain, that get a loan from this Government will be sold manufactured goods. Great Britain can float a loan here at any time, and if Rumania wants a loan here she should be able to float one on whatever terms are possible.

But certainly she should not be able to come to the Government of Canada and float her debentures here at par and take in exchange manufactured goods from this country. Canada to-day is indebted to Great Britain and to the United States. There is a heavy balance of trade against us, and we are in debt to various countries. Yet in the face of that we are going out to borrow more money from the Canadian people, or the British or American people to loan to another country. In other words, we are giving credit to doubtful customers at the expense of the people to whom we owe money to-day, with the result that we are only sinking deeper all the time. The manufacturers tell us they must have protection in order to cope in Canada with outside competition. Then they come back and tell us that they are not able to compete in the outside markets unless we supply them money to buy the goods. It can easily be seen where we are going to end if we attempt to furnish capital to the manufacturers to buy goods to ship out to all the countries that are practically bankrupt in order to make trade for our factories. The argument was used, when the resolution upon which this Bill is based was before the House, that we must keep the factories going in order to create employment for labour. If the Government were to say: We will furnish this credit on the condition that all the profits that are made in these factories shall go to the employees and not to the manufacturers—then I would consider the proposal as being more sane and more justifiable. But to allow the owners of factories to fix their own prices for the goods, and their own price for labour, and then come to the Dominion Treasury for the money to carry that out, is, I think, a great mistake. If Rumania is not able to pay, what is the alternative? What are we going to do when this $25,000,000 becomes due? We must increase our taxation to pay the interest on that loan; and when our Western friends are asking for reductions in the tariff, or for the adoption of free trade, they will be met with the statement: Our responsibilities are so great that we cannot reduce or abandon the tariff. We are virtually bonusing these factories, causing a greater public debt, going out to incur what are practically certain losses that will entail increased taxation on our people. The Government is not only going to pay out this money to the manufacturers of Canada, but it is shovelling the money out to some foreign country; and the people of the Dominion will be called upon to pay. Should the loans not be liquidated, we will have to continue to pay the interest on these loans ourselves, and that will simply mean increasing the burden of taxation. I do not believe it is the duty of this Government to furnish any special industry or any special class of people with money to carry on business. If the Government has too much money on hand it would be better for it to purchase land from those who are keeping it out of use and sell it or give it to the returned soldiers, or to these factory employees, to build homes for themselves, rather than to hand it to some foreign country that in all probability will never be able to make repayment.

Mr. H. H. STEVENS: The argument of my hon. friend is a most extraordinary one to my mind. He states that we owe Great Britain, the United States, and other countries certain debts, and he deplores the fact. I wonder how in the name of common sense he expects this country is going to pay its indebtedness to Great Britain, or to any other country, except by the exportation of goods. Surely he must be aware that Rumania also owes Great Britain very large sums of money. if we send goods to Rumania and finance them in Canada we are simply going that far towards the liquidation of our debt to Great Britain. Being a man of very high intelligence the hon. gentleman must know that as a rule goods are not exactly paid for in cash to the country from which they are bought. It may be Spain, or Portugal, or France, or Great Britain, that is sending us goods; we also send goods to those countries; and the final outcome is a settlement by the process of exchange. He objects strongly to this Government establishing a credit for Rumania to buy manufactured goods in Canada. If he is sincere he must just as strongly object to the Canadian Government establishing a credit for Great Britain or any other country—

Mr. CAHILL: Not Great Britain.

Mr. STEVENS: —for the purchase of other classes of goods. Of course I understand that my hon. friend will say, for the sake of his farmer constituents, that he does not object to financing the exportation of farm products, but he does object to financing the exportation of manufactured goods. It is this everlasting baiting of the manufacturer, or other industrial person or company, that is causing sectional discord in Canada. This country is going to prosper, not merely by building up the agricultural industry—which I am interested in and most anxious to see built up—but also by building up the manufacturing and the industrial interests. Canada does not possess merely agricultural resources; it has other immense resources—minerals, timber, oil, fish, and innumerable others; —and if we are going to liquidate the future debt of Canada it will be by the development of these resources and by encouraging the manufacturer. An ordinary business concern cannot ship goods to the centre of Europe with the expectation of securing an adjustment in the ordinary banking way. That is clearly impossible, and has been impossible for months and for years but through the agency of the British Government and through the medium of our own Government and the usual governmental channels and avenues, we are enabled to establish a credit for this country, and thus to send our goods out and secure payment to our manufacturers. This is not a bonus. My hon. friend is absolutely misleading and wrong when he tries to imply that we are giving a bonus to the manufacturers; we are simply establishing a credit to enable our trade to go on.

I think there is one principle that this House should get clearly into its mind, and get there just as quickly as possible, and it is this: If we are to meet in the next few years the enormous burden that Canada has incurred we must meet it through the process of foreign trade, through the exportation, not only of agricultural products, but of every class of goods manufactured from our natural resources. Unless we do seize upon that as an elementary principle in our economics, and bend every effort to direct the policy of Canada towards the development of our resources, I fear for the future of the country. I give the Acting Prime Minister and his colleagues the greatest credit for the courageous manner in which they are grappling with this problem, and providing for a medium of exchange, for a credit, for these foreign countries—especially for the enormous credits supplied by the Minister of Finance during the last four or five years for Great Britain, and for our Allies overseas, and I would say the more the Government can arrange these credits the better it will be for this country and the sooner we will certainly be able to liquidate our public debt, and relieve ourselves from some of the burdens which are bearing so heavily upon us.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It seems to me that the demand for such an enormous amount of money as will be raised under this legislation should not be submitted to the House at this particular juncture. In my opinion we are passing holus bolus a part of the Budget which is to be brought down some time during this month, if I mistake not, by the Minister of Finance.

We are anticipating and voting piecemeal what should be presented in bulk by the hon. gentlemen. If it were a small amount I would not object so much, because I understand there are pressing needs at times which require speedy and special legislation; but here my hon. friend demands that a sum not exceeding $350,000,000 be raised, and he is surprised perhaps that we offer some objection—not obstruction—to his large appetite for money. The preamble of the Bill does not in my judgment give a clear view of the situation. It seems to me an anomaly that on the very day the Peace Terms are announced to this House by the President of the Privy Council my hon. friend should preface his Bill with these words:

> Whereas notwithstanding the armistice of the eleventh day of November last, and the extension thereof which has been granted by His Majesty and His Allies, has suspended the actual operations of the war between His Majesty and the German Emperor, the Emperor of Austria, King of Hungary, the Sultan of Turkey, and the King of the Bulgarians, it is necessary that measures should continue to be taken for the common defence and security;

Shall my hon. friend for any longer period after the present eventful one come before Parliament and, always under the pretext of winning the war, ask for the speedy voting of such large sums of money? I hope not.

My hon. friend enumerates in section 2 the purposes of this legislation. Among the purposes mentioned I find: "(a) the defence and security of Canada." I am inclined to believe that this language does not convey quite the whole truth. The defence and security of Canada has never been so well provided for as at present. We have a large standing army, and our defence and security does not require, it seems to me, any large expenditure, if we have reached the millennium that has been sought for during so many centuries—that of permanent peace. The hon. Minister of Finance does not specify the amounts that are to be voted for each of the purposes enumerated, and consequently he does not say what amount out of this $350,000,000 will be applied to the defence and security of Canada.

Canada has during this great war done wonderfully well. She has raised, equipped and sent 500,000 men overseas, an army well worthy of any great nation. But this was for the specific purpose of winning the war against autocracy. The nightmare is now over, the German Emperor and his allies have been thoroughly defeated. The people of this country made enormous sacrifices to maintain the honour and reputation of Canada. But, eager as they were to do their duty fearlessly and without questioning the heavy expenditure which was necessary, they are not in a mood—and I say it without any equivocation—to spend in the future, one quarter of the amount that has been spent annually during the last fateful four years. There is a general cry throughout the country that we should cut out the frills in the Department of Militia and Defence, that we should reduce mercilessly its expenditure and come back to normal. I hope that my statement will not be considered as anti-Canadian or anti-preparedness. I am simply voicing the feeling of the people in this matter. Before voting the amount asked for by this legislation, out of regard for the people and for Parliament, my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence should give us an outline of his peace-time policy. Hitherto all appropriations have been voted liberally and willingly in view of war times; but now we have reached peace times, and in this connection the Minister of Militia, in whose integrity and honesty of purpose I have the fullest confidence, should give to the country at the earliest moment his policy with regard to the organization of the defence and security of Canada during normal times.

With the second purpose of the Bill, "the conduct of naval and military operations in or beyond Canada and the demobilization of the Canadian forces," I am partly in agreement. Any money which is needed for the demobilization of our Canadian forces I am ready to grant immediately. But here again I require some assistance from both the Minister of Militia and the Minister of Naval Affairs. In mentioning the question of the defence and security of Canada in peace times, I had in mind our military organization on land—our military forces. But here reference is made to naval operations. I do not wish to re-open the naval debate, but might I not say here that the success attending the naval operations of Canada during this war—and those operations were successful, because our coasts were well guarded—was due entirely to the wise policy propounded by the late lamented leader of the Liberal party? Sir, what happened in 1911? The Liberal Government had passed legislation with a view to creating a naval force for Canada. That policy was combatted from two different angles. It was combatted in my own native province, because, forsooth, the defence of Canada by Canadian ships manned by Canadian officers and Canadian bluejackets was nothing less than suicidal. Canada, in the words of the opponents of that policy, was entering into the vortex of European militarism. That campaign carried some weight in the province from which I come. In Ontario the policy of a Canadian navy was combatted because, forsooth, it was too much of a Canadian policy and not sufficiently a British policy. I shall not refute both arguments at this moment, but I will say this: The Government that preceded this one came to office pledged at the first opportunity to remove from the Statute Book the blemish which the naval policy of the Liberal party was supposed to have placed upon it. But nothing of the kind was done. In 1914, when war was declared, the then Government was only too ready to use the much decried "tin-pot navy" of the Laurier Government, and Canada owes the protection of our coasts—of the Atlantic coast, at least—chiefly to the much abused Niobe and Rainbow. Subsequently the Naval Department, which had been organized under that policy, was reinforced and developed according to the provisions of that Naval Bill. It is a matter of pride for me, after so many years —eight years have elapsed since that campaign of 1911—to proclaim that, after all, Sir Wilfrid Laurier was right when he propounded that policy—a policy which, we must not forget, had been approved by the Imperial Conference of 1911 and accepted by the British Admiralty.

Mr. BURNHAM: Would the hon. gentleman object if it was proposed to lend the Niobe and the Rainbow to the British fleet?

Mr. LEMIEUX: There is a French proverb which my hon. friend may translate for himself: "A sotte question, point de réponse." We shall not be called upon to lend the Rainbow or the Niobe to the British Admiralty, which has been made much richer since the abject surrender of the German navy. But I should not be ashamed to lend to the British Admiralty, in case of emergency, the Canadian bluejackets and the Canadian officers who defended the coasts of Canada. The flag would be safe in their hands. I need not say, Sir, that I subscribe willingly and gracefully to a reasonable expenditure to make permanent the Laurier naval policy which was so bitterly opposed in 1911 by some of the hon. gentlemen whom I see before me, but which, after all, has been adopted and will remain the permanent naval policy of Canada. But we are entitled to know from our great Canadian admiral, the Minister of the Naval Service (Mr. Ballantyne) his policy for peace times, as we should know from the Minister of Militia and Defence (Major-General Mewburn)—two good Liberals, by the way, lost on the other side—

Major-General MEWBURN: Lost, but not forgotten.

Mr. LEMIEUX: —his policy for our military forces on land during peace time. Am I asking too much from the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White)? Am I obstructing in asking that? I believe not. He is asking us, in anticipation of the Budget, to vote $350,000,000, are we not entitled to know the policy of Canada for normal times as regards our land and naval forces? Clause (c) reads:

Purposes—the promoting of trade and industry and transportation facilities therefor.

I agree with the statement just made by the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill). I am not enamoured with this Rumanian venture, especially when I see that Rumanian bonds are being marketed from bucket shop to bucket shop and passing through the hands of Sir Clifford Sifton, who, by the way, has opened an office in the building rented by the Canadian Trade Mission in London. The Government, I think, should have prevented any such desecration of Rumanian bonds. If my hon. friend in asking us to vote money for the promoting of trade and industry and transportation facilities therefor is sincere and earnest, as he ought to be, I am in accord with him; but again I say if in those times of peace to which we are looking forward there is one Cabinet minister who ought to be in his seat, it is the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster). During the last few years, we have been sadly missing the presence of a Minister of Trade and Commerce. Far be it from me to say one word against this right hon. gentleman (Sir George Foster), in whose ability I believe and for whose splendid eloquence I have the utmost admiration. He has, I believe, been one of the best public servants of Canada; he is one of the Nestors of this House; but I am repeating only what I read every day in the Unionist press when I say that as Minister of Trade and Commerce he has been a great failure. He has not taken to heart his position as Minister of Trade and Commerce, a department which has been sadly lacking in force, ability and foresight to develop the trade of Canada. Canadians are often called "the lion's cubs." That means, I suppose, that we are the true sons of John Bull, who is the master merchant of the world, who for centuries has been sailing and trading on the seven seas of the globe. Not to speak of our high tariff, which is a barrier 9 p.m. to our commerce, we have done nothing to even imitate from afar what has been done by John Bull and Uncle Sam. Long before the armistice was signed—and my authority is the London Economist and some financial reviews in England and the United States—England and the United States had their trade agents in all parts of the world. Any western member will tell us that in the far Canadian West, representatives of American firms have been trading with our Canadian farmers long before our own Canadian manufacturers. I have seen that stated in the press and I have heard it from the lips of my hon. friends who represent western constituencies. Therefore, anything which will tend to promote our trade and industry, I shall willingly grant to my hon. friend, but what does he intend to do? Has he given this Committee any explanations? Is he going to establish agencies and in what parts of the world? Is he going to create new avenues of trade and commerce? He does not say. What will our new tariff be?

We are at the present moment building a fleet of steamers. Some months ago I was present at the launching of the Canadian Voyageur in Montreal, in my own constituency, at Vickers, and on that occasion I heard speeches delivered by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and some other prominent gentlemen from Montreal, and I read in the press that the Government had a very large programme of naval construction. But to my dismay, to my horror, I find that the ships we have been building in Canadian shipyards with Canadian material, are being used not for transportation facilities between Canadian and foreign ports, but by the wily Yankees between their ports and other foreign ports. This little item came to my hand the other day:

Barbados—Steamer Canadian Voyageur—Farr, J.—3,000 bags sugar.

That is the consignee.

St. Lawrence Sugar Refining Co.—11,500 bags sugar.
Armstray, L. W. and P.—8,000 bags sugar.

This was carried from Barbados to New York. Now it is strange that our ships should not find any business for Canadian ports—Quebec, Montreal, Halifax, St. John, Three Rivers or even Toronto—in the exporting of Canadian produce. Have we built those steamers to send them to United States ports, to take on cargoes there for other foreign ports?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This particular sugar shipment came from Cuba, I think, and was consigned to the St. Lawrence Sugar Refinery. At the time the shipment was made the Voyageur could not get up the St. Lawrence, I understand, because the river was frozen.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What about Halifax, St. John, and Gaspe?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The railway rate would operate against those ports.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend must confess in all humility that the interests of Halifax were not well served.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If my hon. friend had been Minister of Trade and Commerce, instead of being minister of all trades in the present Government, he would have seen that the Voyageur sailed from a Canadian port to a foreign port. I repeat, Mr. Chairman, and I am in earnest, we have done practically nothing. I know, of course, that our export trade during the war has wonderfully increased, but this was due to our war industries, and there is an end to those industries. To-day we must revert to peace trade and peace activities, and long before peace was declared an army of commercial agents from England and the United States were marching through many countries in order to capture as much as possible of their trade. I am told that Mr. Hoover himself, although his mission was to feed the Central Empires, has captured the blue ribbon for the United States, having secured enormous orders for American concerns. But Canada has done nothing at all.

Mr. BURNHAM: How did he do it? By advancing them money?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I ask my hon. friend the Minister of Finance either to secure a good sinecure for the present incumbent of the Department of Trade and Commerce —I want the best for Sir George Foster, because he deserves it—or to promote him to some other department and appoint in his stead some "live wire" so that Canada shall secure some of the world's trade in the coming peace times.

I said a moment ago that this legislation is a camouflaged Budget, and it is. In connection with this third purpose "the promoting of trade and industry, and transportation facilities therefor" the Minister of Finance owes the country an outline of the fiscal policy of the Government. Does he believe that trade and commerce and industry can be promoted if the country is kept in ignorance of the tariff changes that are to be made? Surely not. My hon. friend must know the sentiment of his followers. To use a somewhat vulgar expression, which is nevertheless in common parlance, he is between the devil and the deep sea—between the high protectionists on the one hand and the free traders of his party on the other—and he is simply marking time, awaiting the return of the Prime Minister or some heavenly inspiration. I am afraid, however, that his inspiration will come from the opposite direction.

The fourth purpose is this: "The carrying out of any measures deemed necessary or advisable by the Governor in Council in consequence of the war." Mr. Chairman, I am afraid of that purpose. I am not timid; I have some courage left in my bones, but I must confess I am really in dread of that fourth purpose. What are those measures that are deemed necessary? What are those vague measures that are deemed advisable? Should not those measures be made known to Parliament, and not left to the sweet will of the Governor in Council? Already the practice of governing by Order in Council has been too much abused, and I am really in dread of what may happen when my hon. friend is granted the powers he is seeking under this fourth purpose.

The fifth purpose is this: "Payments made on expenditure incurred during the fiscal year ending the thirty-first day of March, nineteen hundred and nineteen, for the purposes mentioned in the War Appropriation Act, 1918, and in excess of the amount authorized by the said Act." It is true that my hon. friend gave the House the other day row after row of figures running into the millions—indeed into the hundreds of millions of dollars. We must face the situation; the millions are there. As Mr. Thiers, the liberator of the French territory, once said, referring in the House of Representatives in France to the inevitable expenditure of several millions: "Saluez, Messieurs, vous ne les reverrez plus." After having seen my hon. friend marshalling his long array of millions the other day I also am inclined to repeat with Thiers, "Hats off, gentlemen; you shall never see those millions again." To be serious, I think my hon. friend should take us into his confidence a little more. Assuredly, I am not asking him to give us the inner secrets of his soul; I am not asking him to unbosom before this House, because it would be a terrible confession and I am afraid there would be no absolution for the many crimes he is guilty of. But at least he should pay the taxpayers of Canada the compliment of telling them why this enormous sum of money is needed, and to what specific purposes it is to be applied. I am afraid of being accused by my hon. friend of obstruction. I will say no more, but I again appeal to him to be a little clearer as to numbers 3 and 4, and to my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and also the Minister of Naval Affairs I would suggest that we might have an outline for the benefit of the country of their respective policies.

Major-General MEWBURN: I have listened with considerable interest to the hon. gentleman's eloquence, but I am at a loss to understand several of the statements he has made. If he will turn to Hansard of April 29th, when I had my main estimates for the Militia Department before the Committee, he will see that he was very complimentary to me on that occasion when I attempted to give a brief résumé of the future policy of the militia forces of Canada. The portion of the Bill now before the Committee does not include one item for the upkeep of the military forces of Canada after demobilization. My hon. friend will see that on page 1404 of unrevised Hansard, April 10, the Acting Prime Minister gave complete details of expenditure, particularly of the militia forces of Canada in connection with this Bill. I am sure my hon. friend is as anxious now, as he always has been, to assist in every way the prosecution of the war by paying for our soldiers overseas. I do not believe for a moment that he means now to leave those soldiers alone and not consider the complete demobilization of the troops. Every dollar of this expenditure is simply to pay the allowances of soldiers on active service to-day, including war service gratuity; deferred pay, which amounts to some $36,000,000, which is money belonging to the troops, held back in the wisdom of the Government, and now being paid them on discharge, plus interest; also assigned pay some $11,000,000; separation allowance to dependents of the troops; and subsequent items including transportation and feeding of troops until complete demobilization. Therefore, no portion of the money included in this Bill is to be utilized for the upkeep of military forces beyond the period of complete demobilization, which I am just as anxious as any one else to see carried out as early as possible.

Regarding the future policy as far as the militia is concerned. I regret that my colleague the Admiral of the Fleet (Mr. Ballantyne) is not here to give an account of the Navy, but I explained the other night as to the future policy of the military forces, that, after very careful consideration, we appointed an inter-departmental committee to consider ways and means for reorganization. The Chairman of the Committee is General Otter, who has had a very large experience in the militia of Canada; and it is also proposed to have an officer who has had distinguished service at the front, one from the permanent force, one from the active militia, and one who has never been associated with the militia until this war. The Committee are to visit the various military districts, to consider ways and means and probably at another session of the House to bring in some concrete proposal as to how far the militia should go. The duty of the committee is to consider and report how best to give effect to the proposal that with a view to preserving their traditions and identities, the several units of the C. E. F. which have served at the front should be incorporated in the Canadian Militia—this without avoidable increase of establishments, without prejudice to the divisional system of organization, and with due regard to the services which at various times, both before and during the war, the militia itself has rendered. That is practically the substance of the duties of the committee. The present idea is to endeavour to rehabilitate the militia units as well as possible. The permanent corps had a strength prior to the war of 3,000, kept up during the war for service overseas by reinforcements. Those men who come back are entitled to discharge or to go on pension. It is proposed to increase that permanent force as a temporary measure to 5,000 men throughout Canada. That will be practically all the force in Canada, and will be held in aid of the civil power if necessary. At the present time it is not proposed to train the militia which is in a disorganized state. Possibly it may be considered necessary to train a portion of the militia next fall, but no definite policy has been arrived at and I think it would be premature for us to lay down a concrete military policy just at present.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend must have in mind the very large reduction in the expenditure of the Militia Department for peace time. Can he state what he thinks approximately will be required in the future for the appropriations of the Militia Department? What amount does he expect to apply as appropriations for the Department of Militia and Defence in the future?

Major-General MEWBURN: I should say approximately from four to seven million dollars.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I wanted to know what was in my hon. friend's mind for the future in peace time. It is a relief to hear that he intends to live up to $4,000,000, but he will have to cut many frills.

Major-General MEWBURN: At present the problem of demobilization, not only bringing troops back, but clearing up all records, documents, etc., is an enormous one.

For instance, at the present time some one hundred and seventy thousand ledger sheets have been returned from overseas within the last few weeks—that is, ledger sheets of the individual troops that are coming over as the men are demobilized. The work of checking and dealing with every individual man's account is enormous. In addition, there are some five hundred tons of files being gradually returned from overseas to the Militia Department here. That includes all the records and documents that have been moved from General Headquarters in France back to England, and the records and documents from the various Record Offices in England. It takes an enormous amount of labour and some staff to complete and get all these documents into shape. Furthermore, there is the file containing documents of every individual man with the Canadian Expeditionary Force, amounting in all to over six hundred thousand files. These documents, containing the medical history of every man, it is most essential should be carefully kept so as to protect this country in the matter of claims for pensions in the future. The Pension Department requires these files, also the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment—when the men are discharged, which work has nothing to do with the Militia Department—and the Land Settlement Board in connection with soldiers' settlement. Then there is the large problem of hospitalization. We are taking care of the returned soldiers—officers, non-commissioned officers, and men—in the various hospitals throughout Canada, and we estimate that by next February we should be through with the military hospitalization, but that is only an estimate. In November, 1918, the casualties of Canadian corps were something like 45,000. The difficult problem was to estimate the number of casualties or invalids coming back to Canada. We estimated, as well as we could, on information from the medical service, that somewhere about May there would be approximately 18,000 invalids still coming back from overseas. I am glad to say that we were generous on our estimate; that the patients in the military hospitals in England are being evacuated a little quicker than we expected and becoming convalescent cases. The last figures from France, I think, showed that there were about seventeen hundred still to be evacuated from that country. The total number of patients in England and France up to a week ago was slightly under 14,000, but many of these—

Mr. LEMIEUX: How many are there in Canada?

Major-General MEWBURN: In the various hospitals in Canada close on to 14,000. A very large number of those men, if they do not require any further treatment in the military medical hospitals, will be discharged, and will come under the Department of Soldiers' Civil Re-Establishment for vocational training, and so on. Referring to the amount that is required out of this particular vote, it is purely and simply to complete the pay and allowances, and deferred pay and war gratuity for the troops that are on active service. We estimate that if we have no setbacks, our troops will be brought back from overseas by August. There may be some hospital staffs and other details remain for a further period, but by the end of this year, I have every expectation, the whole of these staffs will be cut down to the very lowest minimum, and nobody will be retained except to carry out the problems of cleaning up. I believe we shall enter upon next year with a very small staff both at Headquarters and in the military districts. I am quite satisfied of that. I think if my hon. friend would look at these items on the page referred to, he will see that they have nothing to do with the future upkeep of the militia and are not intended for military purposes in Canada beyond actual necessary cleaning-up purposes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: So the expression used here, "Defence and security of Canada", has reference only to the war situation?

Major-General MEWBURN: Only to that.

Mr. MORPHY: While we are upon this subject, I would like to draw the minister's attention to a phase of military life which has been brought out in a letter received by me to-day from a soldier's father. Speaking in regard to his son, the writer says:

> He enlisted at London, Ontario, in December 1915, went to England in January 1916, and to France in June 1916, and has been there on active service ever since, while his wife and child are with us. The Canadian Authorities in Division One, London, Ont., took the initiative in the signing up of the boys conducting their medical examination, etc. They advised them to enlist in the Imperial Mechanical Transport, as the C.E.F. at that time did not need any more recruits. They took their advice. Had my son signed up with the C.E.F., he on discharge would have been entitled to $100 per month for six months, a total of $600. Instead of that the B.E.F. will only grant $75 all told, a difference of $525.

Now since this Bill, as it is worded, refers purely to the demobilization of Canadian soldiers, I thought it would be an opportune time to ask the minister whether he intends in the expenditure of these moneys to provide to the extent of $525 for the war gratuity of a young Canadian soldier who is married and has a wife and child? If the minister intends to do nothing in that direction, will he make representations, if such may be proper, to the Imperial authorities to influence them to act equitably to this young man who was misled, according to my information, by the officers of the minister's department at London. On inquiry, I find that there are overseas many hundreds of Canadian young men who have gone to the front in some capacity or other, having either transferred to, or enlisted directly in this country in, the Imperial Forces. If the Imperial Government are doing nothing for these young men, I want the minister to tell me whether he intends to do anything for them, and whether this fund will be available for that purpose? If the minister replies in the negative, I would say that I would be rather ashamed to live in the country if such inequity should be passed out to these young men who fought for their King and country as Canadians in the Imperial Army. I take this opportunity of asking the minister whether he has considered the matter, and if he has not done so, to state, if he can, that he will consider it and that he will look favourably upon the application which I am making on behalf of these men.

Major-General MEWBURN: The subject which the hon. member has raised has certainly been given a good deal of consideration, particularly of late. The war gratuity does not apply to such a man as the hon. gentleman has referred to, but I may say that some little time ago suggestions and claims came from different soldiers regarding the war gratuity. A few of the class are Imperial army reservists, who, when the war began, left Canada and rejoined their units. The claim has been made that those men should participate in this war gratuity, or be paid the difference between what they received from the Imperial Government and what Canada is giving. There were also pensioners resident in Canada who returned to England and re-enlisted—I am speaking of British pensioners, on whose behalf application was made; likewise, men who especially enlisted in Canada in the British Army Service Corps and the Royal Engineers; men who enlisted in Canada and the United States (British subjects), and Canadians who enlisted while overseas in the Imperial Forces.

I may say for the information of my hon. friend that a committee has been working on this for the last week, and while it is not a Committee of the House, I understand, unofficially, that several hon. members who have had those matters brought before them have been meeting and are drafting a memorandum, which I believe they are giving to the Government, and I know it includes such items as those. Whether the Government can see their way to concede those or some other items, I am not prepared to say. But there are a great many hardships. A great many Canadians I know joined the Imperials, and a large number of university graduates went over to England and took commissions. I understand the Imperial Government are giving very much larger gratuities to officers than the Canadian Government, but not anything like what we are giving to the rank and file. But that matter is having our most serious consideration.

Mr. KEEFER: Will the Northwest Mounted Police who were reservists be included? I happened to travel on the same train when they were going overseas, and among them was Michael O'Leary, who later won the V.C. They were very anxious to return to Canada after the war, and hoped to have a stake in the country when they came back.

Major-General MEWBURN: That particular man, I think, is in the Canadian Expeditionary Force.

Mr. KEEFER: No.

Major-General MEWBURN: They are included in the same lot.

Mr. DUFF: I am very pleased indeed with the explanation given by the Minister of Militia as to what he intends to do regarding militia matters, and it is interesting to know that he has already appointed a committee of eminent soldiers who during the next twelve months will visit the different militia districts and get information to enable him to lay a concrete proposition before the House next session. I understood from his remarks that these three gentlemen are military men. I have no objection to their appointment, but I would suggest for his consideration that he also appoint to that committee at least one business man. It seems to me that the matter should not be left entirely in the hands of men who have served in the army or who are officers of the Militia Department.

Dealing with section 2 of this Bill, I see that a part of the $350,000,000 to be borrowed is to be spent (a) for the defence and security of Canada; and (b) for the conduct of naval and military operations in or beyond Canada and the demobilization of the Canadian forces. I do not think it is necessary to spend much time in discussing subsection (a), because the Minister of Militia, when his Estimates were being discussed recently, convinced me that it is not his intention to spend any money in the defence and security of Canada except what is absolutely necessary to continue the staff at headquarters and to provide for the upkeep of other pre-war military organizations in different parts of the country.

With regard to subsection (b), I am in hearty agreement with that portion which states that this money is to be spent for "the demobilization of the Canadian forces." I think we all agree that every effort should be made to have our Canadian boys returned from France and England at the earliest possible moment, so they may be discharged and take their place again in civil life. But with the first part of this subsection "for the conduct of naval and military operations in or beyond Canada," I am not in agreement. I do not think it is necessary to provide that one dollar should be expended in military operations during the year 1919, except as outlined by the Minister of Militia. Instead of spending money on military operations, we should strain every nerve to cut our expenditures down to the very lowest possible minimum. Let us see what we have spent for this purpose in the last four years. In 1914-15, the first year of the war, we spent $53,176,613.55; in 1915-16, $160,433,416.42; 1916-17, $298,291,030.66; 1917-18, $316,669,871.95, and in 1918-19 to March 31, $289,229,119.38, making a total expenditure of $1,117,791,051.96 to equip and send our boys overseas and maintain them there. In addition there was spent on account of military hospitals about $12,800,000, and with our other expenditures in connection with the war we spent up to March 31 of this year a total sum of $1,225,114,112.36. A great deal of criticism has been directed against the extravagant expenditure of part of this money, but so far as the Department of Militia and Defence is concerned, we have the satisfaction of knowing that while they have spent an enormous amount of money, and in some cases have spent it not as wisely as we would like to have it spent, yet they despatched at least 500,000 men overseas to fight for the Empire, and Canada to-day realizes that the splendid valour shown by our soldiers on the battlefields of Flanders and Belgium fully justifies the action of the Department of Militia and Defence. Consequently, while as I said before there may be some criticism of the manner in which portions of this large amount of money were spent, yet Canadians everywhere feel that they have received value in return for what has been disbursed.

What about the Naval Department? My good friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) thinks that the naval defence of Canada is a great deal better than it really is. Perhaps the reason for that is that "distance lends enchantment to the view," and my hon. friend, living as he does in Ottawa, does not know a great deal about naval defence on either the Atlantic or the Pacific coast. Since 1914 the enormous sum of $30,982,683.22 has been spent by the Naval Department on what is termed "strictly war expenditure;" and in addition millions of dollars have been expended in keeping up the dockyards and naval colleges at Halifax and Esquimalt and in paying the salaries of officials at Ottawa, Halifax and other places. Speaking for the moment of what is termed "strictly war expenditure," in 1914-15, $3,096,125.35 was expended; in 1915-16, $3,274,019.94; in 1916-17, $3,806,329.19; in 1917-18, $9,666,229.14; and in 1918-19 to March 31, $11,139,979.60; making, as I said before, a grand total of $30,982,683.22

I am going to show, Mr. Chairman, that this $31,000,000 was practically all wasted, that it was not spent in the interest of the taxpayers of Canada; that it was entirely unnecessary, and did not in any particular, or in any way help to defend Canada or to protect the property of her citizens.

Before trying to show the Committee exactly what has happened during the war, I think it would be well for a few moments to give the history of naval matters in Canada. In giving this short résumé of naval history, I do not intend to deal with the matter from a political standpoint.

In 1909 Sir George Foster introduced into the House of Commons a resolution, the substance of which was that Canada should proceed with the building of a Canadian navy for the protection of our own coasts. This resolution, with a slight amendment made by the leader of the Government, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, was adopted by the whole House, the members being unanimous in their decision that this was the proper course to pursue. In 1911 the Government called for tenders for the construction of cruisers of the Bristol type, and at the time they went out of power in 1911 tenders had been received from a firm in Canada which was willing to build these ships. No action was taken on these tenders by the incoming Government, and the whole matter was dropped for a year or two until Sir Robert Borden introduced a resolution to pay to Britain $35,000,000 to purchase three dreadnoughts, and, in a speech delivered by him, abandoned the Canadian navy. Some of the arguments which were used by Sir Robert Borden were that it would take fifty years for Canadian workmen to learn how to build these ships, and that we could not supply riveters. In view of the fact that for the last few years Canadian workmen have been turning out steel ships in different shipyards in Canada, the argument is refuted that we could neither build the ships nor provide the riveters. Most of the work which has been done in the last few years by Canadian workmen is second to none and will pass inspection by either Lloyds or the American Bureau of Shipping.

At the same time it will be remembered that Mr. Winston Churchill informed us that there was no land in Canada suitable for building these ships, a statement which at the time was laughed to scorn by every person but those who wished to damn the idea of a Canadian navy.

The Senate of Canada refused to sustain the vote of the House of Commons, and consequently the $35,000,000 never reached England, and the whole matter of a Canadian navy or of a contribution to the British navy died a natural death.

It is true that at this time we had at Halifax the Niobe and at Esquimalt the Rainbow, two cruisers which had been purchased by the Liberal Government. Up to 1911 the crews of these ships had been kept at full strength and had been used for training purposes so that young Canadians could take courses in naval instruction. Shortly after Hon. J. D. Hazen assumed the position of Minister of Naval Affairs the crews of these ships were disbanded, the boys sent home and only a few men kept on board to act as caretakers. It is just as well—perhaps, though it is not as well—that the gentleman who was then Minister of Marine and Fisheries is not here to-night to answer what I have to say. I may add that I do not lay any blame at the door of the hon. gentleman who to-day has charge of the Department of Naval Affairs (Hon. Mr. Ballantyne), because at the time he took charge, matters were in such a condition that it was impossible to remedy them. It is well, perhaps, that the gentleman who was in charge of naval affairs at that time now has a good, soft position in New Brunswick. A black eye was given the Canadian navy when the action of the then Minister of Naval Affairs showed that he was not in sympathy with any Canadian naval movement. Consequently, when the war broke out, the Niobe was not in fit condition to help protect the coast of Nova Scotia. Although immediately upon war being declared, orders were sent to Halifax to prepare the Niobe for sea and a part crew was sent from Esquimalt to man her, it was found that her boilers were in such condition that it would take several months to put her in a seaworthy condition. I make the statement here that if the Niobe had been ready to proceed to sea the morning that war was declared she would have succeeded in capturing prizes which would have paid the Canadian expenditure for war purposes during the first year of the war.

It was certainly humiliating for Canadians at Halifax to see this ship tied to her dock, grounded on her beef bones, weeks and weeks after hostilities had commenced and also to know that the German-Hamburg liner Willehad, with a rich cargo on board, worth millions of dollars, steamed down the gulf of St. Lawrence, proceeded along the Nova Scotia coast and sought refuge at Portland, while the Niobe was tied up with a chain at her port bow, a chain at her starboard bow, and two chains over her quarter deck so that she could not put to sea. It was also humiliating for Nova Scotians to know that the North-German-Lloyd steamer Princess Cecelia left Boston a day or two after war commenced with the most valuable cargo ever shipped from that port and with a million dollars of gold in her strong box, and that no effort could be made by the Niobe or by any Canadian cruiser to go out and capture that ship, although fishermen off Cape Sable reported seeing her steam down the Nova Scotia coast and leisurely turn back and make for Portland, Maine.

The Government awoke at last to the fact that something had to be done. They realized that the British Government required all their battleships, cruisers and destroyers to protect their own interests in the North sea and to keep the lanes of commerce open; consequently they realized that they could not purchase or arrange with Britain for any of her ships. It became necessary for them, therefore, to endeavour to provide ways and means to protect some of the ports on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, and they proceeded to waste money in the purchase of a lot of small boats which were utterly useless for defensive purposes. Orders were given to shipbuilding firms all over the country, and boats of the drifter and trawler class were contracted for and feverishly rushed to completion. A number of retired English officers were sent to this country to help organize a Canadian naval service. Naval recruits were asked for, captains and first mates were taken from the merchant marine service and held around Halifax for months drawing pay and doing nothing, for the simple reason that there was nothing for them to do. The story is a disgraceful one and should bring the blush of shame to every Canadian.

In the meantime there were being gathered at Halifax a motley collection of broken-down tug-boats, gentlemens' yachts, second-hand trawlers and drifters and the new boats which were being launched. A few of these boats were used for gate purposes at Halifax and proved more of a nuisance to the shipping interests of the country than anything else. When it was found that Halifax was full of these boats, a base was established at Sydney, and when the war came to a close some seventy-five boats of all kinds were tied up to the wharves in Sydney harbour. I have no hesitation in saying that the large expenditure of money for naval purposes at Sydney harbour was absolutely wasted; that no good resulted from having these boats in that harbour. Owing to their condition they were constantly undergoing repairs, most of them were unseaworthy and were not fit to go outside the headlands. It is true that in this way they were given something to do. Some of these little gasoline patrol boats were sent out to Low Point and held up all Canadian fishing boats or schooners that came to Sydney harbour, instead of allowing them to pass without delay on their way in and out.

One of these boats known as the T. R. 30 was ordered to sea one morning, and on account of the condition of the boat's deck, seven of the seamen refused to proceed to sea unless the deck was caulked. Water had been pouring down the decks into the bunks of these seamen for several days. They reported the matter to their officer, and he reported it to the officer in command at Sydney, who refused to have anything done. These men were court-martialed and sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment, and the mayor of Halifax protested against the sentence. I purpose putting on record the correspondence between the mayor and Mr. Desbarats, Deputy Minister of Naval Affairs. This item first appeared in the Halifax Herald:

> Major Hawkins says there were seventy-one prisoners at Rockhead on Sunday.

Rockhead is the Halifax jail or penitentiary, where these boys were incarcerated:

> He told this at the Board of Control meeting yesterday, and said further that there were there since August last a number of boys, some of them from good families and environment, who say that they complained at Sydney of unseaworthiness of a trawler on which they were serving, were tried there by court martial, brought here in irons and put in the city prison for eighteen months. The mayor said he had written the minister, Hon. Mr. Ballantyne, in reference to the matter. "Shipping laws are severe", said His Worship, "but it strikes me these boys got a raw deal from the Naval Department. They say no naval rules or regulations were read to them." His Worship was informed that the boys had refused to go to sea in the trawlers. If they had deserted, they might have got but ninety days. They were ignorant of what they were doing, he said.

This item must have come to the attention of Mr. Desbarats, Deputy Minister of Naval Affairs, and he wrote Mayor Hawkins at Halifax the following letter on January 29, 1919:

Dear Sir:

In the absence of the minister I am answering your letter of the 21st regarding seven seamen from T.R. 30 who were court-martialed and sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment for "wilful disobedience of lawful command."

I do not think there is much justification for the statement that these men were not fairly treated at their trial or were given a raw deal. The men were part of the crew of one of the trawlers doing convoy work at Sydney in protecting the vessels sailing out of that port. These men refused to take the ship out when she was ordered for duty with the convoy and the mercantile vessels sailed without the protection of this trawler. The offence was a very serious one and if the convoy had been attacked the absence of this trawler in the line might have allowed of the sinking of one or more of the convoyed ships.

That is the most ridiculous statement I ever saw put on paper by a responsible officer, and I say without hesitation there was not in Sydney a patrol boat, not to speak of the T.R. 30, which could convoy any vessel or protect any merchant or other ship. The letter continues:

There was no question as to the seaworthiness of T.R. 30. She is one of a number of similar ships which have proved to be thoroughly seaworthy and staunch. The complaint made by the men was that water leaked from the deck into their quarters and rendered them uncomfortable and insanitary. An inspection was made at the time by the Warrant Shipwright, who reported slight leaks but nothing of a serious kind.

So it is admitted there was some ground for the boys' complaint. The letter continues:

Even supposing that there had been serious leaks and that a good deal of water leaked into the men's quarters, this would have been no reason for refusing duty and for preventing the ship to take her place in the line and do her share in protecting the convoy.

The men stated that they were quite aware of the seriousness of refusing duty but notwithstanding this they took the action related above. If men on active service were allowed to refuse duty on account of uncomfortable surroundings there would be no need of any defensive or offensive warfare. The offence committed by the men was quite serious, they took the action with full knowledge of its gravity, they pleaded guilty to the charge of disobedience, they were tried in an open court and given every opportunity to present any defence which they might have, and there is no justification for a charge of unfair treatment on the part of the authorities.

These men can hardly be classed as boys, as their ages vary from eighteen to twenty-eight, with an average of twenty-three, and they are therefore quite old enough to realize their responsibilities.

It is to be regretted that it should have been necessary to sentence these men to punishment but it does not seem possible to maintain discipline in a fleet if men are to be allowed to refuse their duty on the grounds of personal discomfort especially as in this case the discomfort would hardly seem to have been of a serious nature.

I trust these explanations will show that there was good ground for punishing these men and that there was no injustice in the sentence which they received.

Yours truly,
(Signed) G. J. Desbarats,
Deputy Minister.

My understanding of the matter is that these boys were poor boys from the country who knew nothing about military or naval regulations, and if, as Mr. Desbarats says, they pleaded guilty, what else could they do when they were before the court-martial? I suppose they thought the best thing they could do was to say whatever the court wanted them to say. This letter of Mr. Desbarats did not satisfy Mayor Hawkins, and on February 1, 1919, he replied as follows to Mr. Desbarats:

10 p.m.

Dear Sir,—In answer to your letter of the 29th ultimo, it is my desire that my letter of the 21st ultimo regarding the seven seamen from the T.R. 30, who were court-martialed and sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment for "willful disobedience of lawful command," be placed before a responsible minister in the absence of the minister of your department.

There has been a good deal of feeling aroused in this community on account of the way in which these seamen were treated; the sentence imposed is looked upon as very much out of proportion, compared with other sentences of officers who have been court martialed.

The story of a certain Lieutenant Legatt, late commanding Officer of the H.M.C.S. Hochelaga, who was court martialed and honourably discharged from service for cowardice, has been mentioned in the public press. It would be interesting to know, as the court martial was held on these boys on the Hochelaga, if this officer had anything to do in passing sentence upon the offenders from the T.R. 30.

There are other instances where it would seem to show that there is a law for officers and another for seamen.

Yours trply,
(Signed) A. C. Hawkins,
Mayor.

In view of these facts, if these boys have not already been released, the acting Minister of Naval Affairs (Mr. A. K. Maclean) should draw the matter to the attention of the minister and have these boys released from jail immediately, and make proper restitution. An hon. member asked the Department of Naval Affairs for some information in regard to this trawler upon which these boys served, and it was necessary for him to ask the question several times before he could get very much information. Some of the questions asked by this member were as follows:

Was trawler No. 30 in the service of the Canadian Navy Department during the summer of 1918?

The answer was "yes."

If so, were any refits necessary to this boat during the summer of 1918?

The answer was "no." This is the summer the boys were sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment.

On what date was this boat laid up for refits?

The answer was:

Answered by No. 2.

There were no refits, said the department.

Where was trawler No. 30 on August 9, 1918?

The answer was:

At Sydney, under routine lay-up.

If there was nothing wrong with this boat, why was it lying at Sydney under routine lay-up unless that was the excuse for having all the boats tied up at the wharves at Sydney? But I have absolute information that these answers are not correct, and I say that on August 14, 1918, the Sydney Foundry Company completed the work of caulking and pitching the deck of this trawler, the amount of the account being $284. This was the boat from which these seven poor seamen were court martialed and sentenced to eighteen months' imprisonment, and yet within a fortnight after they were sentenced, this boat was laid up for refits and the deck caulked and pitched by the Sydney Foundry Company at a cost to this country of $284. Let us go a little further in this matter. Who were the gentlemen who court martialed these seven poor seamen from a fishing hamlet on the Atlantic coast? There was a steamer on naval duty called the Hochelaga, which was commanded by a certain gentleman and which was sent to sea on patrol duty. The look-out on this naval patrol boat one morning sighted a submarine; he reported the matter to the captain, and the captain, who was in charge of eight or ten small boats in addition to his own, at once put up signals to return to port, and instead of stopping and endeavouring to get that submarine or be sunk in the attempt, the captain of the Hochelaga deliberately turned tail and proceeded back to port. This captain is one of the three men who sentenced those seven poor Nova Scotia fishermen to eighteen months in the penitentiary. It is true that after the Hochelaga returned to port and the naval authorities came into possession of the fact that the captain had acted in a cowardly manner they discharged him. But why in the name of common sense was he allowed to go with an honourable discharge, while these seven poor Nova Scotian fishermen were sentenced to eighteen months at Rockhead? Is that fair play? Is that in keeping with the traditions of the British navy? No; and I say action should be taken to release these boys from Rockhead and make whatever restitution is possible.

We have endeavoured to get information from the Department of Naval Service this session with regard to some of the steamers it employs, but in nearly every case the answer has been unsatisfactory or contradictory. I think the truth of the matter is that the Government are ashamed of the whole sorry mess of bungling extravagance and mismanagement of the naval affairs of this country since the war started.

To show the uselessness of the steamers composing this so-called navy, let me give one or two illustrations. On a fine summer day in 1918 the oil-tanker Lux Blanca, having discharged her cargo at the Imperial Oil works at Dartmouth, got up steam for sea. She was an American boat manned by American sailors and captained by an American ship-master. She proceeded out of the harbour and headed westward. When thirty-five miles west of Sambro island, the lookout sighted the periscope of a submarine. Let me say at this point that previous to this date the naval authorities at Halifax and Ottawa knew there was a submarine on the Nova Scotia coast, yet nothing was done. There were no patrol boats outside the headlands of Halifax harbour. When the lookout sighted the periscope of the submarine what did the captain of this oil-tanker do? Did he turn tail as the captain of the Hochelaga did? No. He had a gun forward and another gun aft, and he had these guns manned and trained on the periscope of the submarine. He gave instructions to the wireless operator to send a message to the Halifax station that he was attacked by a submarine and to send help. He turned his ship towards Halifax harbour and fought that submarine for three hours. The message was sent to Halifax about two in the afternoon, but, Mr. Chairman, not a boat left Halifax to go to that ship's assistance, and the result was that some of the crew of that oil tanker were killed, some were wounded, the ship was sunk, and the rest of the crew had to take to the boats. I admit that there were no ships in our naval fleet that could have sunk the submarine, but they could have done this: When that S.O.S. call came the naval authorities should have sent those boats to sea. I do not blame the captains or crews of those boats or drifters; I lay the blame on the men in charge of the naval base at Halifax, most of whom do not belong to this country, but were sent over from England after their period of usefulness there had finished. Every man who knows anything about the business says that when that S.O.S. call came the naval authorities should have sent those boats out to sea because, whilst they may not have been able to sink the submarine, the minute the submarine sighted their smoke on the horizon, the good black smoke from Sydney coal, she would have disappeared and the oil tanker would have been saved. While this vessel was being sunk the naval officials at Halifax were trifling at pink teas and playing bridge whist. That is the way we were protected on the Nova Scotia coast.

Let me give another instance—I have five hundred pages here, and it will be impossible for me to give it all. The Lady Evelyn was one of the best boats in the patrol service. She had first class equipment; in fact, naval officers tell me that she was the only vessel in the fleet that could have engaged a submarine. While this submarine was off the Nova Scotia coast, the Lady Evelyn, the best equipped vessel in the fleet, was sent to the Magdalen islands to deliver six lead pencils to the wireless operator there. There were at this time some American destroyers also on our coast, and about the same day the Lady Evelyn went to the Magdalen islands to deliver the lead pencils, an American destroyer was off Cape Canso. This was twenty-four hours before the fishing vessels were sunk in those waters. This American destroyer received a call to return to Halifax. When the commander of the destroyer received the call he wired back that he had information a submarine was in his zone. Nevertheless, he was ordered back to Halifax on some paltry excuse, and when he got there he was sent out on convoy with the ship that was to take Prince Arthur of Connaught to England. Whilst the fishermen were left to row a hundred and forty miles, this American destroyer was sailing out with Prince Arthur. Is that the way to treat the people of this country? That is what actually happened.

Let me go a little further. Two German submarines came across the water last May. They operated first on the American coast. The Naval Department here knew all about them, and I might say that I sent several telegrams about the matter myself to Mr. Desbarats. These submarines sunk a number of American ships off the American coast, and gradually worked down the Bay of Fundy sinking vessels belonging to merchants of St. John, New Brunswick, some of them new vessels with valuable cargoes.

The submarines next appeared off Cape Sable, then off Shelburne and proceeded down the Nova Scotia coast. In the town of Liverpool, at the time, three large vessels were preparing for sea. There were four or five in my home town, and several in the Lahave river preparing for sea, and to proceed to foreign ports

These captains, notwithstanding the fact that they knew that the submarine was coming down the Nova Scotia coast, proceeded to sea on their voyage. They did not fear the submarine; they did not fear the Germans. No; it was the patrol boats and those others who were the ones that were making all the trouble. This submarine after destroying the Lux Blanca, proceeded down the coast off Canso. You will probably remember, Mr. Chairman, that the first ship she sank was a trawler belonging to parties in the constituency of the hon. Acting Minister of Naval Affairs (Mr. A. K. Maclean). While the American destroyer that was sent down by the United States to protect our coast was sent to Halifax to convoy a ship on which was Prince Arthur of Connaught, the submarine sank five or six Nova Scotia vessels and one American vessel, and the fishermen were ordered into their dories. Hon. members may not all know what a dory is. It is a small boat about fifteen feet long capable of containing only two men. These fishermen were given five minutes to leave the ship and take to their dories and then had to row for two days and two nights before reaching Canso. And this was the kind of protection we were receiving from the naval service of this country. The submarine proceeded down the St. Pierre banks and this is the time the Hochelaga turned tail, when the submarine was about 50 miles off Sydney harbour. As I say, she proceeded down the St. Pierre banks and several more fishing vessels anchored there were sunk. The crews had to row about 45 miles to St. Pierre and arriving there—I think there were about 110 men altogether—the Governor of St. Pierre realized that provisions were short and that it was advisable to despatch these men as quickly as possible, and cabled, I presume, to the Ottawa authorities, because shortly afterwards instructions were forwarded to Sydney to despatch one of the patrol boats to St. Pierre to bring the Lunenburg county fishermen to that port. My information is, and I believe it is correct, that on that occasion, because the boat was unseaworthy, the whole crew refused to go to sea and the captain had to get an entire new crew, except himself and the wireless operator. I do not know where he got them from, but I am informed that on the way back from St. Pierre to North Sydney, although it was not very rough, every man jack aboard the trawler was sick, except the captain and the wireless operator, and the fishing crew had to do the crew's work and help bring the patrol from St. Pierre to North Sydney. That is the kind of naval service we get in Canada.

Then they tell a story, and it is a true one, that when one of the fishing vessels was coming up in the fog off Halifax harbour the man on the lookout did not see the patrol boats, but he said he smelled ham and eggs, and shortly after the fog lifted there were about ten of these patrol boats in the shelter of Sambro Light. They did not come alongside the ship and tell them that there was a submarine in the vicinity, but allowed that vessel with twenty valuable lives to proceed on her way without notifying the captain of the danger. It seems to me that the least they might have done was to apprise him of the presence of the submarine so that the captain could put into Halifax harbour. Another method that was practiced was to get men for these ships by robbing the merchant marine. Every vessel that came to Halifax from a foreign voyage with crews that had been facing the submarine in the submarine zone in Spanish waters, in the Mediterranean and nearly every place else where the submarine was most in evidence, these men having faced these grave dangers for six, nine and twelve months, on arriving at Halifax they were arrested by the military police and put in jail. I know of one case—and I can mention more—in which the mate of a ship called the Win the War was arrested and put in jail by the military police. The mate of a vessel that arrived in Halifax one Saturday morning was arrested and put in the lockup over Sunday, taken to Aldershot and kept in custody for a week until the owners of his vessel got him out. We are supposed to emulate the example of Great Britain, and yet this condition of affairs existed in spite of the fact that Great Britain gave every encouragement to the members of the British marine. I have in my hand what is known as a notice to mariners for 1918 in which appears the following:

Maintenance of British Shipping.

Officers and Seamen of the Mercantile Marine (except Stewards on Passenger Vessels) are included in the list of certified occupations issued under the Military Service Act, 1916, as persons who are engaged in work of national importance and are entitled to exemption from Military Service. If Officers or Seamen receive notices to present themselves for military service they should return the notices to the military authorities claiming exemption.

The efficient maintenance of the Mercantile Marine is of vital national importance, and Masters, Officers and Seamen should remain with their ships, and should not leave the merchant service to join the Army.

Why was that not done in this country? Was it not necessary that we should have our merchant marine available to carry our products? I think the Government would have been well advised had they followed this clause in the British Merchant Marine Act, and not arrested our boys who were returning to see their parents for a week or two after long sea voyages. I have in mind a case in my county of a young fisherman who came home last September and who was arrested by the military police, although he says that at a public meeting held in 1917, at which an official of the Militia Department spoke and made the announcement that the fishermen and farmers would not be taken, as conscription was intended only for the province of Quebec. This man was arrested, and the reason he gave for not having obeyed the regulations of the Military Service Act was the statement that this official of the department had made that he would not be conscripted. The boy, of course, was guilty under the Military Service Act; there is no question about that. He was taken to Halifax and before a court-martial of military officers, this poor fisherman, who did not know the law and for whom there was some excuse, was sentenced to two years' hard labour in the penitentiary,—a splendid man who had supported his mother from the time he was twelve years of age. He had engaged in fishing on the Grand Banks of Newfoundland, and off the coast of Nova Scotia from the age of twelve, and had kept a widowed mother and two sisters. He certainly did not know anything about the law, and yet a court-martial consisting of three supposedly intelligent officers, deliberately sentenced him to two years' imprisonment. However, the boy had a few frieds and they certioraried his case to Judge Drysdale. I have not Judge Drysdale's decision before me at this moment, but I may say that the judge decided that the boy should be released. After his release he went to the barracks and told the officers that he wanted his clothes, which consisted of a pair of long rubber boots, stable overalls and an old cap, in which he had been arrested, handcuffed and taken to Halifax. But he demanded his clothes from the militia authorities, and putting them on he walked the streets of Halifax for three days, and to every man he met he said he would not go home until the Militia Department sent him home. He went every morning to the barracks and insisted on being sent home, and at last they were so ashamed that the officers paid his fare home.

Speaking of the purchases of ships for the so-called Canadian navy, I would like to know why the officers of the Naval Department did not adopt the suggestion of Mr. J. K. L. Ross. When the war broke out, Mr. Ross, in conversation with a certain naval officer, thought that something should be done for the defence of Canada. He went to one of the shipyards in the province of Quebec—I think it was Vickers, but I am not quite sure—and said to the manager, "How long will it take you to build five cruisers of the Bristol type?" The manager gave Mr. Ross the information, and at his own expense, he hired a special train, journeyed to Ottawa, and laid the matter before the naval authorities. He offered to pay for one of these cruisers if the Government would build the other four, but his offer was turned down and he went home in disgust. When matters were in a serious condition on the Nova Scotia coast, and we could not get any protection for our shipping from the Canadian Government, I am very pleased, indeed, to say that after an earnest telegram was sent to the Department of Naval Affairs—and I want to convey to the member for Halifax the credit for what was done after strong representations were made to him by two business men at Halifax—the Naval Department realized that they would again have to go with their hat in hand to the American naval authorities for protection, and very shortly afterwards one or more American naval destroyers were sent to the Nova Scotia coast to protect Canadian shipping. Now, whilst I am very pleased, indeed, that we had the protection of American naval vessels—we owe a debt of gratitude to the American people and the American Government for what they did for us; there is no question about it, their destroyers saved a lot of our ships because one of them went as far as the Grand Banks of Newfoundland and notified the fishing vessels to get into port—I say it is a shame that we should have had to depend upon the American navy to protect our coasts, our fishermen, and our shipping. Let me tell the Committee something else. This is a personal matter, but my reason for telling it now is that I have never been able to discover the name of the captain of the destroyer who did the good work. One Saturday night I received a telephone message from Liverpool, and the gentleman on the wire informed me that he was the captain of an American destroyer. He said that a Lunenburg vessel, a foreign-going ship, was drifting five miles off Gull Rock with a disabled rudder. He said, "I left my sister ship out there to protect her, while I came in to give you the news. The captain asked me to request you to send out a tugboat to tow him either to Liverpool or Halifax." I told him to wait for an hour until I ascertained if I could get a tugboat at Yarmouth or Halifax. I kept the telephone busy but failed to secure a tugboat. I then telephoned the captain of the American destroyer that I could not get any assistance, whereupon he said: "I will return to my ship and both of our destroyers will stand by the disabled vessel until you can send out assistance." I managed to get a towboat from Halifax the next afternoon, but by the time she arrived the American commander had commandeered an American fishing vessel, attached it to the stern of the Lunenburg ship, and fastening hawsers to their destroyers had towed the disabled vessel into Liverpool. I have never been able to find out who the captain of this destroyer was. The American Government so far have rendered no bill for the services rendered; doubtless if they intended to do so they would have done it long ago. Now I want to express my gratification to the American commanders of these destroyers for the splendid assistance which they rendered. Undoubtedly these destroyers rendered splendid aid in keeping submarines away and protecting Canadian shipping, a duty which properly devolved upon the Government of this country, which should have had proper ships in Nova Scotia waters for that purpose.

Did the Americans perform any other service for us? They certainly did. They established airplane, or seaplane, bases at Halifax and North Sydney, and were about to establish another at Shelburne when hostilities ceased. But a base was established at Halifax and on the first flight of one of the squadrons, in order to show what the seaplanes could do, the route followed was via the towns from Halifax to Yarmouth; and I had the honour, Mr. Chairman, as mayor of the town of Lunenburg, to receive the first letter, written by the Premier of Nova Scotia to me, which was ever delivered at that town by seaplane. These seaplanes went from Lunenburg to Liverpool, Lockeport, Shelburne and Yarmouth, and the people of the different towns along the coast turned out in full force to do honour to the brave American airmen who were protecting our coast and stopping the depredations of German submarines, which duty we should have performed ourselves. What a humiliating position for Canada to be placed in, to be dependent for protection on the sea and in the air to American destroyers and American airplanes.

In addition to the expenditure of $31,000,000 for naval war purposes, the Auditor General's Report sets forth that in 1918 the sum of $209,296 was spent on the dockyard and naval college at Halifax, principally for frills, furbelows, and pink teas. At Esquimalt, $244,554 was paid for gold braid and brass buttons. When I read the Auditor General's Report and saw what this amount was for I was shocked and disgusted. For clerks, stenographers, telephones and telephone operators the sum of $168,000 was spent last year at the Halifax dockyard and naval establishment. Nine thousand, seven hundred and twelve pairs of boots were purchased from Ames Holden and the Amherst Boot and Shoe Company; 5,097 silk handkerchiefs were purchased at about one dollar each. There were purchased 57,605 pounds of ordinary soap, and 3,403 pounds of Castile soap, presumably for the lime-juicers. These are some of the items appearing in the Report. It is impossible for me to give the full details of the expenditure for these purposes, but the Auditor General's Report is worth the serious perusal of every member of the Committee. Another item which appears in the Report is $665 allowance for clergy. Mr. Chairman, I regret to say that this amount was paid to Presbyterian clergymen as well as clergymen of every other denomination, and I am ashamed that Presbyterian clergymen should have taken this money. These very Presbyterian clergymen in 1917, when I was a candidate for Parliament, said that I, and others like me, were pro-German, were disloyal and traitors to the country. These were the clergymen who were going to save the country. I understand there are about forty clergymen in the city of Halifax and they are not overworked. These men who were so extremely loyal in the 1917 election should have gone out on board the Niobe and given their services free—that is the least they might have done. It seems a shame and a disgrace to me that ministers who endeavour to teach us to be patriotic should take the country's money for going on the Niobe and giving religious services to the sailors.

Then to show some of the acts of gross carelessness on the part of the Naval Department at Halifax I want to refer for a minute to the Halifax explosion. On December 6, 1917, the whole country from Halifax to Vancouver was shocked when it heard that Halifax had been blown up by an explosion and that some two thousand people had lost their lives and between twenty and thirty thousand injured. It is almost impossible to believe that so many people were injured, but it is a fact that between twenty and thirty thousand of the population of that city were more or less injured by the explosion. What happened?

The steamer Mont Blanc arrived at Halifax one fine December morning. A steamer named the Imo had received instructions the night before to proceed to sea. Orders were given to the Mont Blanc to proceed up the harbour and as the Imo was coming through the narrow channel between Dartmouth and Halifax, a collision occurred, and the high explosives on the Mont Blanc created the tremendous devastation with which we are all familiar. An investigation followed, but nothing came of it—at any rate, whatever information the Government secured it never published it. There were plenty of rumours current, one being to the effect that the collision was due to neglect on the part of one of the naval officers in charge—and it is a fact that a naval officer was discharged from the service, he having given conflicting orders. I contend that there was absolutely no necessity for the Mont Blanc to come up to the harbour, and the naval authorities had no right to allow her to come up, there being plenty of space in the eastern passage to lay, whilst awaiting orders to proceed. Not only that ship but other ships containing high explosives were allowed to come up to the middle of the city both before and after this disaster and if there had been a German spy on board he could have blown up the whole city.

What do we find about this matter? I will not give my own version, but I will quote from what a good Unionist newspaper says. This is something that happened after the explosion and after the naval authorities should have been on their job, if they were not when that disastrous collision occurred. The Halifax Herald of March 12, 1917, contained the following:

Further investigation by The Halifax Herald in shipping and pilotage circles yesterday has brought additional and conclusive evidence that there must be a shake-up of no meagre dimensions at Ottawa. The pilots' story that a steamer laden with high explosives was allowed to lay in the fairway of the harbour one day last week for seven hours, was fully confirmed, and in getting the confirmation other details of a most startling nature were disclosed.

The Halifax Herald is scrupulously careful to abide by the rules of the censorship and anything calculated to furnish information to the enemy is gladly withheld from publication. There is not a man familiar with marine affairs at this port, not a Nova Scotia captain who has gladly given his services to the work of naval patrol, not a master mariner who regularly brings in and takes out his steamer, but what has a story to tell of stupidity, of pigheadedness, of bungling in connection with the affairs of the port, and, following up these stories, the trail leads directly to Ottawa and reveals a heterogeneous bunch of incompetents who may know the ways of society, who may be able to judge aright the merits of various blends of wine, but who certainly do not know the ways of ships and are not able to judge the competence of those whom they place in charge.

In times of peace we should not have such men at the head of affairs of a maritime nature. To have them in such position in these awful days of war is evidence of a laxity on the part of our people, a laxity which has already led to fatal consequences and which should, perchance, a break be made through the British fleet, lead to awful disaster. God forbid that a change at Ottawa be withheld until such a time comes.

It took one of the greatest disasters the world has ever known, to partially arouse those in authority, but those who were in supreme authority then are still in authority.

I repeat, that is from the Halifax Herald, a paper edited by no other than one William Dennis, a member of the honourable Senate of Canada.

As far as I am personally concerned, I have watched this matter for the last four or five years, and I want to say that I do not hold the present Minister of Naval Affairs (Mr. Ballantyne) responsible in any great degree. I believe he took charge of this thing when it was in such a mess that he realized that nothing could be done by him. I do not wish to imply that all the naval officers were incompetent. There were a number of bright, young Canadian officers scattered through the fleet, and a large number of marines and bluejackets, who, if they had been given a chance, would have distinguished themselves and brought honour to Canada, but these men were not given an opportunity so to do.

The naval conditions on the Atlantic coast were of such a disgraceful nature that it was in the mouths of everybody, and I have gathered a large amount of information which it would take up too much time to place before this Committee. The matter is of such a serious nature that I consider an investigation should be held, and I here and now ask for a parliamentary committee to be appointed, and I have the proof to place before any investigating body that may be appointed. I had an opportunity, Mr. Chairman, of discussing this matter with a naval officer and a number of sailors, and I got the former to give me his opinion why the naval affairs of this country were in such a disgraceful condition. He gave me a statement, which I will now read:—

I, the undersigned Charles Otis Julian, of the city of Vancouver, in the province of British Columbia, Lieutenant Royal Naval Canadian Volunteer Reserve, hereby solemnly declare:

That the Borden Government knowing the imminent possibilities of the outbreak of war showed culpable neglect in not having the Canadian naval dockyards in Halifax and Esquimalt in a proper state of efficiency.

That the dockyards were in a deplorable state of decay and neglect, the wharves and jetties being in need of repair, the buildings and store houses being old and unsuitable, the stores depleted and the general equipment inadequate and in no way suited to carry on effective war-time operations.

That the Borden Government showed further culpable neglect before the outbreak of war in allowing the Niobe and Rainbow to remain out of commission without proper equipment in view of the threatening situation in Europe. The Niobe at the outbreak of war was moored at Halifax and would have remained an ineffectual fighting ship had she not obtained crews from the Imperial ships, Algerine and Shearwater; the Rainbow would have been in the same predicament had she not obtained sufficient ratings to man her from the Royal Naval Canadian Volunteer Reserves then in process of formation and a nucleus crew from the Atlantic station.

That the Fishery Protection Service vessels of Canada as equipped and manned were totally inadequate to offer any effective protection to our cities on the Atlantic and Pacific coasts.

That the Borden Government showed culpable neglect in not encouraging and ordering the formation of an effective Royal Navy Canadian Volunteer Reserve and that as far back as three years prior to the outbreak of war many representations had been made to the Government without result for the recognition and proper equipment of the force then struggling in process of formation; and that after this force had come into being with scarce government aid, the Director of Naval Service, acting on instructions from his Government proceeded to disband the Naval Volunteers of Canada, and that a majority of men who had joined this force with a pure volunteer spirit were encouraged to leave the force and join the

C.E.F. That in the city of Quebec, directly after the outbreak of hostilities, on instructions from the department more than one hundred naval ratings were recruited carried on drill and such duties as were allotted to them by the S.N.O. at that port. These men were without equipment of any kind. Thirty-three days after its formation this force was disbanded and discharged. That no provision was made anywhere in Canada towards naval recruiting. In Toronto private efforts succeeded in recruiting a considerable number of naval ratings who were despatched to Imperial and R.C.N. establishments. Although in the British Isles directly after the outbreak of hostilities recruiting for ratings for naval brigades was carried on, no provision was made in Canada for recruiting for the navy although repeated appeals were made to the Government to do so.

That the Borden Government showed culpable neglect at the very outbreak of hostilities when unarmed enemy merchantmen were in close proximity to our coast in not endeavouring to capture or destroy these ships. The Government were repeatedly advised of the presence of these ships but made no effort to capture them although they had suitable ships available for this purpose.

That the Borden Government showed unfair discrimination from the outbreak of hostilities to the signing of the armistice against native born Canadians in all senior appointments both ashore and afloat in the Canadian Naval Service. That in the larger ships of the Canadian Patrol Fleet only one native born Canadian has been in command. In almost every instance these ships carried in the position of Navigator or First Lieutenant eprfectly capable Canadian officers. That the records of the shore establishment show that these bases were elaborately overmanned by retired and in many cases incapable R.N. or R.N.R. English officers. The same condition prevailed at the naval headquarters at Ottawa. That the graduates of the Royal Naval College of Canada of sufficient seniority and entirely capable of taking command of Canadian patrol ships who were on loan to the R.N. were not recalled and given the opportunity to serve in the defence of their own country.

That the Borden Government's actions have occasioned a general spirit of discontent and resentment among the officers and men in the Canadian Naval Service. That promotions have been unfairly allotted and positions of trust have been given to men of unknown and questionable ability. That seniority and previous experience have been most shamefully overlooked in numerous instances and throughout the rank and file of the service a feeling of discontent, contempt and distrust has always been entertained against the authorities at Ottawa. That the department has repeatedly broken faith most shamefully with officers and men, the notable instances being in the case of the treatment of mates. In the beginning these officers were promised by the department that they would rank with, but after a sub-lieutenant R.N.C.V.R. in accordance with clause 13 relative to rank as found in the K. R. & O. After they had served some considerable period, however, and without any cause they were reduced by Order in Council two grades lower and ranked with bandmasters, masters-at-arms, boatswains, etc. That in the case of chief skippers R.C.N., these men all holding coastwise and foreign seagoing tickets were induced to join the service with the promise of a rate of pay of $3.50 per day. After serving some considerable time an order was issued reducing their pay to $3.00 per day. That in the case of W.T. operators, these officers were, without any apparent reason, unjustly denied any separation allowance. A considerable number were in the service before the Order in Council to this effect was passed, and these men were discriminated against in a most shameful manner. The pay for this branch of the service was ridiculously small considering that these officers had to bear a great part of their own expenses in the matter of messing and clothing. On the larger ships it was necessary for operators to live with wardroom officers and pay their mess bills out of their small pay. Until 1918 no proper school was established for their training, consequently many were unable to qualify as fourth class operators and were forced to remain "Learners" for an unreasonable length of time. The pay of a "Learner" was $22.50 per month.

(1) In the beginning the rate of pay in the R.N.C.V.R. was fixed much lower than that given to men in the C.E.F., and no separation allowance was granted, enlistments to the Navy were therefore reduced to a minimum and great dissatisfaction prevailed among the men in the service.

(2) That the Naval Service repeatedly made promises to men on enlistment in connection with rank, promotions, rate of pay and conditions of service which they later failed to fulfil.

(3) For more than a year and a half after the outbreak of the war men wearing the Canadian Naval uniform were not allowed reduced fares or any special privileges by the transportation companies in Canada, while at the same time such were enjoyed by the men in the C.E.F.

(4) That it would appear that the Borden Government in the manner of the treatment of the men in the Canadian Navy were pursuing a policy of deliberately creating a feeling of dissatisfaction in order to justify their pre-war contention that Canada could not man and maintain a navy of her own. The result of this policy is very apparent as such a feeling still exists.

That the Borden Government showed culpable lack of foresight since the beginning of the war in the method it pursued in chartering vessels, exorbitant rentals being paid for inferior craft, so much so that in many instances the charter money as time went on amounted to much more than the actual value of some of the crafts in question. That these crafts were supplied with coal and water, besides being kept in ship-shape condition at the expense of the Government, gun-crews and signal ratings being placed on board and utilized by the owners of the craft. And with exception of a few large harbour tugs the boats proved inadequate for the duties assigned to them.

As regards small craft, the Borden Government expended large sums of money in a ridiculous and wasteful manner in chartering or purchasing at exorbitant rates, numerous motor boats and other small craft which were to be found at the bases at Halifax and Sydney and Esquimalt. These boats were continuously out of repair, their up-keep amounting annually to large sums. These boats being used principally for the convenience of senior officers ashore and their wives and families.

Over seventy per cent of these boats could have been dispensed with had this branch of the service been conducted in an efficient manner.

The Borden Government did not pursue the policy of other Overseas Dominions in despatching naval ratings for duty overseas—until obliged to do so by pressure in the House —and then only in a half-hearted manner. Then the Deputy Minister, the Director of Naval Service and the Admiral Superintendent at Esquimalt expressed personally their displeasure and disapproval of the policy of sending any such naval ratings overseas.

That throughout the entire war no policy appears to have existed in regard to the vitally important work of patrolling and convoying off the coasts of Canada. As a result of their lack of policy and unpreparedness when the coasts of Canada were seriously menaced by submarines an appeal had to be made to the United States for the despatch of craft capable of protecting our coasts. That our large patrol vessels with one exception proved to be old, out of date vessels deficient in speed and gun power and were all out of order. In convoy work the Canadian fleet could not venture far from their bases and it is on record that not one flotilla ever despatched successfully carried out the orders assigned them.

That the Borden Government showed culpable neglect in regard to the gunnery of the patrol fleet, many of the boats being fitted for a considerable period with obsolete guns and no provision being made for the proper training of gun crews under experienced officers and it was not until the fall of 1917 that this most important branch of the service was taken in hand and a gunnery commander appointed. This officer experienced great difficulty in carrying out his work owing to reluctance of the Department to supply them with proper ordinance and gear.

That although the traffic regulations of the Port of Halifax were under the sole supervision of the Naval authorities proper orders were never promulgated and such regulations as were in effect were carried out with laxity.

That although the calamity that overtook the Port of Halifax on December 6th, 1917, was accidental nevertheless there can be no doubt that the actual cause can be traced to the inefficient and careless officers in charge of the Canadian Naval base at Halifax.

That many acts of heroism performed by Canadian Naval ratings received no recognition although officers and men from vessels of the Royal Navy then lying in the harbour performing similar acts received prompt recognition and declaration from their Government.

C. O. JULIEN,
Lieut. R.N.C.V.R.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think that under the circumstances, and having regard to what I have said, there should be a full and complete investigation into naval affairs in Canada during the last four years. Furthermore, I have no hesitation in saying that owing to the black eye which has been administered to the navy, it is too late now to endeavour to do anything to put naval affairs in Canada on a satisfactory basis. At the time of the Soudanese war, when the question of sending help to Britain was discussed in this Parliament, Sir John A. Macdonald used the expression: "Not a dollar, not a man." I repeat that statement now without any hesitation. I say in all seriousness that Canada should not spend one dollar on naval matters for the next few years at least. One reason is that our financial condition will not warrant it, and even if we wished to do so we could not vote sufficient money to build or to purchase naval boats which would be of any service in time of trouble.

Because of its inefficiency, the Naval Department at Ottawa should be closed up, the officers in charge of it should be paid off and the offices closed. Canada has nothing to lose by doing this, and a large amount of money would be saved the taxpayers.

In my opinion Parliament can do only one of two things: Appropriate $100,000,000 at least, to build and equip an efficient navy, or else not spend one dollar. I do not think that in our present financial condition we can afford to spend the large amount which I have mentioned; consequently I say that not one dollar should be spent and not one man engaged at the present time under the excuse and pretence that we are doing something for naval affairs in this country. Sell off the useless trawlers, drifters and patrol boats, clear up the mess and make the best of a bad job.

It might be said, of course, that we have the naval bases at Halifax and Esquimalt, and that they should be kept up. My answer to that is this: If the British Government require Halifax and Esquimalt for naval bases and for coaling purposes, they should take them over and operate them at their own expense. We certainly cannot do it, and I have no hesitation in asking that the whole idea be abandoned.

Mr. McKENZIE: The statements made by the hon. member (Mr. Duff) with regard to expenditures in connection with naval affairs in Canada are of such a serious character that we should at least have some explanation from the minister before this clause is adopted.

We have the statement made here by the hon. member, not as his own, but as a declared statement by an officer who was one of the men in charge at Esquimalt at the time, I believe, and who professes to make a declaration, equal to a statement on oath, as to what has been taking place in connection with the handling of the navy, not only on the coast of British Columbia, but at Halifax, Sydney and other places. We have not, so far, had a word of explanation from the Government. There may be some minister or other hon. member who can give us some explanation about this matter, but we have not had a word of explanation, and we are asked to vote $350,000,000, a large part of which is going to be paid out in connection with work of this class. While we are all anxious to get along as fast as we can with the business of this session, including the voting of money, this Committee and the House and the country are entitled to some explanation as to the charges put forward in respect to the management of this very important department of Government. It is well known, in the part of the country from which I come, which is in the same province as the constituency represented by the hon. member (Mr. Duff), that moneys were simply squandered right and left; that every sort of a boat that would float at all was either purchased or hired, and that it was the sheerest mockery the piles of ships that were in each others' way in the harbour of Sydney during the last year or two doing nothing in the world except paying out money to men who were friendly to the Government and who had craft of this kind to sell or hire. Without some departmental head here able to answer these questions, it would be useless to make any further charges than those already put before the Committee by the hon. member for Lunenburg, and I do not wish to take up time of re-stating what has been so well said by him. But it is the duty of the Government, and particularly of the minister in charge of this Bill, if he cannot give this explanation himself, to let this matter stand until the minister who is capable of giving the explanation is here and can tell us how many vessels were purchased or hired; from whom vessels were purchased or hired; what was the necessity of hiring vessels; how many vessels we still own; and what are they worth; and what the Government intends doing with them? I suggested to the Minister of Naval Affairs that such of the vessels as are equal to the kind of work, should, if possible, be converted into fishing craft. The Canadian people would get more value and better results from those vessels in that way than in any other. I do not know that this is the occasion to discuss that, but I am mentioning it in the presence of so many ministers, that they may have at least one constructive idea in connection with the handling of those boats. I am told that many of the boats can be sold to advantage to fishermen who, perhaps, may not be able to pay the whole of the money at once, but a scheme could be arranged by which the Government would be sure of obtaining its money and a fishing fleet of fine proportions, well equipped, would be established on both the Atlantic and the Pacific. If this matter is inquired into at all, we shall be able to get some information from the minister on that score.

At an early stage in the evening, the hon. member for Pontiac (Mr. Cahill) made some statements in connection with the furnishing of money for trade purposes. The hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) thought that he was making a very clever answer when he told us that we were perfectly justified in voting $25,000,000 of the people's money to Rumania, because Rumania was in debt to Great Britain and that we were in debt to Great Britain and the United States, and in order to square our bills with Great Britain and the United States, we should allow Rumania to become indebted to us. If that is a business proposition by which there shall be accorded any satisfaction in the payment of debts between Rumania and Great Britain, Great Britain and ourselves and ourselves and the United States, it is a system that I never heard of before and that I do not understand. The hon. member sat down absolutely satisfied with himself as having solved the whole problem and having justified the borrowing by Canada of $25,000,000 somewhere and passing that over to Rumania in order that Rumania might become indebted to us. If that is business, I shall be glad to have it more fully explained by the minister if he shall deem it proper to make any further observations in connection with this Bill.

There are different ways of promoting trade. When we were in power in this country we promoted trade in the usual way. We wanted to have trade with people who were willing to pay either in kind or in cash for our goods. In 1911, the situation in this country was excellent, but we wanted to make it better and we launched upon a comprehensive trade arrangement with the people of the United States and other countries where we could get proper trade and where we would have exchange of our goods for theirs or get their money for our goods. That was not good enough for the statesmen who are to-day in charge of affairs, and they turned it down. What have they given to us instead of it? They have given us an absolutely new idea in trade, namely, that we are to furnish our own money and that we are to buy our own goods, and after we have bought our goods from ourselves, we are to pass them over without any security whatever to a foreign country. Will the minister explain how it is that we are going to get wealthy in that way? Supposing a man furnishes a customer with $5 to buy a pair of boots, the man comes in to his store and buys the boots and he passes over to the merchant his own $5. The merchant has his $5 back in his till, but the boots are gone and he has nothing for them. I see many hard-headed business men sitting in front of me, and I should like them to explain how we are going to grow wealthy and expand and develop the country by such a system of trade.

The idea of a man lifting himself by his boot straps has always seemed the most ridiculous thing we could imagine, but I think such a feat is just as easily possible as the making of this country wealthy and prosperous upon the system of trade, and business generally, that is followed by this Government, and which is applauded by its supporters as a new device which will overcome all the trade ills that the state is heir to. As a matter of fact, we have not got the money to give, but we are undertaking to find it in some way, and pass it off in the manner I have mentioned. I submit to you, Mr. Chairman, that whether or not this will be a bribe to the manufacturers of this country, to the big combines, the big friends who own the Government according to the Government's own friends, it is capable of being a bribe. What is happening? The Manufacturers' Association and the men engaged in big business come to the Government and say: "We want more trade. We want more money put in circulation. What are you going to do about it?" The Government says: "If you can get anybody to buy your goods we will pay for them." That is a magnificent proposition. The manufacturer is not asked what his price is, where he will deliver the goods, or anything of that kind; he is simply told by the Government: "We care not what you produce, so long as it is a manufactured article of any kind. If you will pile it on the shore at Montreal, Halifax, St. John, or Vancouver, and get a certified account from somebody whom we will appoint at these places, we will put you in the way of getting a cheque for your goods." Is not that a magnificent layout for the manufacturers? They do not send travelling agents abroad; they are free from that expense. They do not bother about insuring their goods and sending them across the Atlantic; they do not worry about transportation or freight or anything else. All they have to do is produce the goods, and then this paternal fraternity known as the Government will furnish the cash and take full responsibility for everything. If that is not a scheme by which men who have goods to sell are capable of being bribed, I do not know what scheme you could devise that would be more capable of being used for bribery. I am not saying that that is what the scheme is for, but it is an old saying that the sight of means to do ill deeds, has ill deeds done. It would be better to let the men on this side of the Atlantic who have goods to sell do business direct with the men on the continent of Europe who want to buy their goods, instead of the Government engineering the thing so that the manufacturers can sell their goods for what they like without the purchaser having anything to say about it. When this matter was up about two weeks ago, the complaint was made that there was no proper distribution of these orders. Some person said there was no such thing at all as orders of this kind, but the hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Lalor) who, I believe, is a manufacturer or interested in manufacturing, told us all about it. He said that the orders were distributed in the best possible way, that there was no discrimination, that everybody got a share. Nevertheless, the distribution of the orders is made by a combination of manufacturers who come together and fix their own price; they divide the orders up just as they like, and then the Government undertakes all the hard work of getting the money to pay for the goods. That is not a proper or healthy way of doing business, and the sooner we get away from it the better.

I submit that we have not been given the necessary information about this money which we are going to give to foreign countries for the purpose of stimulating trade in Canada. We do not know how much we are going to give—at least I do not; we do not know how it is to be handled; we do not know how the goods are to be bought; we do not know how they are to be conveyed from this country to their destination. When we are furnishing money in this way to help out foreigners, I submit, we should know something about it. There is all the more reason for this information because of conditions to-day, when the price not only of foodstuffs but of manufactured articles is such that if the price were reduced to normal the sales of the manufacturers could be doubled and trebled and our men kept at work without sending goods out of the country at all. I think that before we accept the proposition of the manufacturers, there should be the closest possible inquiry into the conditions; and the method which evidently has been adopted by the Government should only be resorted to in the last extremity when nothing else could be done to carry on trade and keep our men employed.

The information we particularly desire is in connection with the expenditure on naval affairs. We also require a little further explanation about the money we are going to borrow and pass over to foreign countries. It might be somewhat difficult for the minister to give this information to-night, but as we are entitled to it, if no other hon. member wishes to speak, I would suggest that at this late hour the minister should let the Bill stand in Committee.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think I can give my hon. friend the information that he desires to-night as to the necessity of the constitution of credits for foreign export business for Canada, and as to the manner in which that business is placed. Before doing so, however, I think I should refer to the speech of the hon. member for Lunenburg.

He covered a very wide field. I had no notice that he would bring forward the matters he dealt with to-night. It would seem to me that they would ordinarily be brought forward when the Minister of Naval Affairs had his estimates before the Committee, but the hon. member was quite in order, because we were discussing the naval estimates for the coming year as embodied in this vote. This Bill which is now before the Committee is analogous to the Bills of last year and the previous year, only that the amount is smaller and its purpose is, as hon. members know, to provide for what we might call the remainder of our war expenditure, and particularly, as the war is in reality although not officially, over, for our demobilization expenditure and other outlays arising out of the war. The Minister of Militia has explained that so far as his portion of the vote is concerned, it is solely for demobilization purposes. I would suggest to my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition that as the Minister of Naval Affairs will be having his estimates before the House to-morrow or the next day, he might deal with the statements made by the hon. member for Lunenburg on that occasion. I would submit that delay in answering the hon. member, because the minister had no notice that these matters would be brought up to-night, is not a sufficient reason for our not passing the section of the Bill referred to.

With regard to the general question of credits, let me make a rather comprehensive statement. I should like to say, first, that there is no man in the Dominion who would rather see a return to the former and normal modes of business than I. The furnishing of credits by the Dominion of Canada for the purchase of our agricultural and manufactured products is absolutely forced upon us by the exigencies of the financial situation due to the war. Take the question of our grain; I shall come to the manufactured products later. This year I had expected to have to provide a sum not exceeding $100,000,000, for the purchase of our exportable surplus of wheat and flour, but on account of the exchange situation between Great Britain and this continent by which it is impossible for Great Britain to purchase wheat in the United States and Canada except from funds provided on this side of the Atlantic, and because no funds are available except such as we can provide in Canada, the Dominion Government has paid out up to date a sum in excess of $80,000,000, which has been loaned to the Imperial Government for the purchase of our wheat, and it has undertaken to furnish a further $90,000,000 which will be required for the purchase of the balance of the wheat and flour products of this last year's crop. My hon. friend, I am sure, would not describe that as a bribe to the farmers. If the Dominion Government did not furnish that credit of $170,000,000—I hope it may be somewhat less, because it is a very heavy burden—then it would mean that the exportable surplus of the wheat of Canada and our exportable surplus of flour could not be bought. Under the old conditions, my hon. friend knows that the Government would not have to intervene at all, and I should be perfectly delighted if the old conditions prevailed, so that the sellers of wheat and flour would simply send forward bills of exchange with the documents attached and get their money in New York exchange. If they were able to do that there would not be to-day a 3 per cent rate of exchange against Canada as between us and the United States. So much for wheat and flour. My hon. friend would not say that we were bribing the farmers and that we were doing. anything a government should not do at a time like this, in furnishing money which alone makes it possible for the Canadian farmer and the Canadian miller to sell their wheat and flour, and for the rest of the people of Canada to get the benefit that comes to them from the sale of those commodities.

Then as to manufactured goods. I am sure my hon. friend will not object if I ask the Committee to consider the situation with which we were confronted immediately upon the conclusion of the armistice in November last. It has often been said that preventive ability is never appreciated. People see results, but they are not aware of the cause. I have no hesitation in saying that if the Dominion Government had not faced with financial courage the situation which confronted us in November last, we should have a very grave and serious situation in Canada to-day. I believe there would have been thousands if not tens of thousands of people out of work, and I would not like to state what might have happened in Canada in consequence. If my hon. friend will go back to November last, he will realize that the entire community was greatly excited over what would happen once the war came to an end and all our war industries ceased. Directly and indirectly there were 200,000 people, men and women, engaged in munitions work and in the supply of other war material, and in other enterprises connected with those industries and in industries basic to them. That was the situation with which the Government was confronted. We had to find not only the credits with which our wheat and flour, our cheese and meat products were to be purchased, but we also had to face that very acute industrial situation which caused the utmost anxiety to the labouring population in Canada and to business generally, and to all the people interested in the welfare of the country and in the preservation of order in the community. Faced with that situation, and knowing the international financial conditions to which I have referred, the Government, at the instance of the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden), appointed an Overseas War Mission headed by Mr. Lloyd Harris, who did such successful work as head of the British War Mission at Washington in obtaining orders for Canada, and whose work was referred to by the President of the Privy Council in connection with his estimates the other evening. The Prime Minister went overseas himself, and accompanying him were Mr. Lloyd Harris, Mr. Frank Jones, Dr. Robertson, formerly of the Department of Agriculture, and Mr. Draper. The three important national interests, mercantile, labour, and agriculture, were represented.

Those men have been working over there most assiduously since November last, and I am surprised now to hear the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux), although he paid the absent Minister of Trade and Commerce a compliment on the personal side, find fault with the minister whose work, to my knowledge, and on the reports which I have received from men who have been over there, has been of the most efficient kind for the benefit of Canada. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has really done admirable work in connection with the important question of finding markets for Canada's grain and meat products and other supplies, and the representatives of the Western Grain Growers and the Western Grain Exchange, who went overseas last fall, paid the highest tribute to the work done by him in connection with the important matters in which they were interested.

The Prime Minister has given the closest attention to the subject of the promotion of Canada's trade overseas. I have been in constant cable communication with him, and hundreds of cables have passed relating to matters of shipping, and to the general trade of Canada and its extension to Europe at this time. The purpose of the Prime Minister in constituting that commission to London was to obtain business for Canada, and to take up the slack of the factory production which was interrupted by the cessation of the war. Hon. gentlemen can picture to themselves what effect the closing of these munition plants, on the scale that we had them in Canada, and of the allied industries immediately affected, would have, and what the result would be, unless we could replace that business by an equal, or at all events a large, volume of export trade. Remember we were manufacturing what we needed for ourselves and our productive capacity for munitions and war supplies bore relation to our export trade. Therefore, unless we could substitute export trade for what we had here, only one result could ensue, and that was that our industries could only run on partial capacity, and that tens of thousands of men would be out of work all over Canada. Mr. Lloyd Harris, as head of the Canadian Mission in London, has not only been doing his utmost to obtain trade for Canada, but has from the very first urged and insisted that Canadian industries should send their own representatives over there in order that they might not only assist him, and have the benefit of the co-operation of himself and his office, but at the same time push to the utmost for business themselves; and I understand that some two hundred representatives of practically all the industries of Canada are in London to-day on the summons of Mr. Lloyd Harris, and working in co-operation with him for the benefit of our export trade. I think it is a mistake to say that that export trade is for the benefit of a few manufacturers; it seems to me that it is not a fair statement of the situation. We often play politics in this House, but is it a fair statement to say that the promotion of the export trade of Canada is for the benefit of a few manufacturers? There are hundreds of millions of dollars—

Mr. McKENZIE: I saw the agreement that was made for Rumania, and it seems to me it is all for the manufacturers, except one-fifth.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will come to that in a moment. I make no objection to my hon. friend raising the question, because I am the last one to deny information on public affairs. This is an important Bill, and I desire to satisfy my hon. friend by making a very full statement: There are hundreds of millions of dollars invested in important manufacturing establishments in this country. They employ hundreds of thousands of men whose families are maintained by their wages, and they in turn by the expenditure of their money promote the business of the country. So that the getting of export trade for Canada for our manufactured goods, as well as for our grain and natural products, is not for the benefit of a few manufacturers, but for the welfare of the people of Canada as a whole. If, as I said before, we did not push for that trade, and if we did not get trade of that character for Canada, we should have a very grave situation on our hands to-day.

Now we come to the question of the credits which we shall extend. In the first place—and hon. gentlemen opposite I take it assent to that—we shall have to continue to make extensive loans to Great Britain for the purchase of our foodstuffs and the timber and other products which Great Britain will want from this country. In case some hon. gentlemen may not understand the situation, let me say that the burden on us this year is going to be very heavy because we are demobilizing in Canada, and consequently we have a higher expenditure in respect of our men coming upon the Treasury here than we would have if those men were overseas, and we were borrowing money from Great Britain for their maintenance in the Old Country and in France, and setting off that expenditure against the advances which we make to Great Britain here. I have explained that with respect to last year's wheat crop, we have found, or undertaken to find, no less a sum than $170,000,000, and I have no doubt that with regard to foodstuffs we shall have to make further advances to Great Britain, although I am glad to say that free markets are being established as quickly as possible with respect to all our commodities. Now we have the wheat crop of this year coming on, which we hope will be a large crop, and I do not know to what extent Europe will have to rely on us for credits for the purchase of that. But no matter what we have, we certainly must, and will, ensure the financing of the exportable surplus of the wheat crop of Canada for this year. My own view is that that should be the first demand to be satisfied, it is of such great importance to the entire country. Now we come to these other credits. There was common talk here in November of last year that Canada should strongly push for a portion of the re-construction business in Belgium, France and other devastated countries of Europe. Europe must be restored. Not only will food be required to maintain the population, but raw material and partly manufactured, and manufactured goods of various kinds, in which Canada can compete I think with any other nation, will be required on a vast scale. Now I submit that if the Government had not taken the step which it did in establishing the War Mission and providing credits, hon. gentlemen opposite, headed by my good friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) would to-night be most severely censuring the Government for not having done precisely what the Government has done. They would have very much better reason for censure in that case, because the conditions in this country, if we had not done what we did, would have been so serious that Opposition criticism would have counted very much more than it does now. Now I beg my friend the leader of the Opposition to take my word for it that we are not doing anything on the other side in the way of financing that we can avoid doing if we are to get the business.

Mr. LEMIEUX: To what other country is credit being extended besides Rumania, Belgium, and France?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Greece.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the amount of credit provided by the Canadian Government to date for France and Belgium?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I will make a complete statement as to that, and I desire to say to the leader of the Opposition, and to hon. gentlemen to your left, Mr. Chairman, that I find no fault whatever with the question being raised, because an important Bill deserves serious consideration in Committee, and it is not my custom to withhold information if I can furnish it.

I desire to say to the hon. leader of the Opposition that we are in good company in what we are doing. The United States has loaned, during the war, and is loaning now, billions of dollars to the nations of Europe to enable them during the war to conduct military operations, and since to buy the products of the United States. The United States must continue to do that through her Government and her financial institutions if she is to get trade. To put it another way, if Europe is to be supplied with foodstuffs and manufactured products from this continent Europe cannot pay for them, and this continent cannot sell them unless the money is found on this side of the Atlantic. There is no business man on this side of the House who does not know that that is so. The United States has been pushing very strongly for business, as my hon. friend says, but she has been in the powerful position of being able to offer credits. Her wheat, her meats and all her other foodstuffs of every kind she can sell to Europe, but Europe cannot sell European exchange against New York exchange to pay for them; Europe has to borrow from the United States. That borrowing will be done partly from the American Government and partly by the ordinary operations between banks, and by the sale in the United States of securities of European countries.

Great Britain for many years had the greatest money market in the world in London, and foreign governments came there and sold their securities, which were taken up by British investors, and in that way the money was furnished in London for the purchases which were made in Great Britain. Now you have this situation on the North American continent. Our people and the people of the United States are not accustomed to buying the securities of foreign governments. The United States is very slowly becoming an international money centre because her people, until this war, had not been accustomed—as were the British people—to purchasing the securities of foreign governments. Whether they will become so accustomed to doing that as to constitute New York a great international financial centre like London, in which the securities of foreign governments will be dealt in, I do not pretend to say. It will take probably a long time before that is accomplished. But the United States Government has been furnishing immense sums of money to the European countries, as I have said, in order that they might purchase foodstuffs and the goods required from the United States. I think the amount loaned to Great Britain alone is between four and five billion dollars for commodities so purchased. That was not loaned in gold and shipped overseas; it was a credit given at Washington, and Great Britain by means of that credit purchased in the United States the goods she required. She wanted the goods, and she could not buy them unless she got that credit.

With regard to Rumania, I would ask hon. gentlemen to bear in mind that she could have kept out of the war. She came into it at a very critical period and made great sacrifices for the common cause. I am not prepared to say that many thousands of Canadian lives have not been saved by the intervention of Rumania. If hon. gentlemen will look at the map of Europe they will see that Rumania is a great salient projecting into Austria-Hungary, exposed to attack on both front and flank—Bulgaria to the south, Austria-Hungary to the north and west. Rumania risked her all in coming into this war, and she lost for the time being, but she made the sacrifice. Sentimentally, therefore, I do not think we should be quick to reflect too much upon the credit of Rumania, devastated as she has been by the war, prosecuted by her in common cause with the Allies. Rumania is not so strong financially, of course, as Belgium and France, but she must be restored. Her fields have been devastated, her cattle carried off; and her people need food and clothing and agricultural implements. How are they going to get them? If they do not get food they will starve; if they do not get clothing the consequences will be serious from exposure; if they do not get agricultural implements their tillage cannot be restored. Rumania is a very rich country, rich in her fertile plains, her splendid forests and her great oil resources, and she will get upon her feet rapidly once she gets a chance. Now, who is going to supply to Rumania the wheat to feed her population, the clothing to protect them from the elements, and the agricultural implements and railway equipment required for the restoration of their tillage and their transportation facilities? There is an opportunity there for some nation. The United States have seized that opportunity. Since the armistice, to say nothing of before, the United States have loaned Rumania $25,000,000—I ascertained that from Washington—and all that money is being spent in the United States.

Now, our Trade Commission in London approached Belgium, France and the other nations of Europe requiring supplies of various kinds of food and for the restoration of their countries, and ascertained that there was a splendid opening for business in the Balkans, the business that I have mentioned, good for the time being to keep our factories going and afford employment to our artisans and work people, and good in its promise for the future. Rumania, as I have said, could not purchase supplies in Canada unless a credit were established; neither could France, nor Belgium; and I pointed out that even England could not purchase unless we gave her credit. We gave a credit of $25,000,000 to Rumania; we gave a credit of $25,000,000 to Greece, whose future is of the brightest; we gave a credit of $25,000,000 to Belgium, and I believe she will speedily recover from the effects of the war. Belgium is a very rich country, and is now assured of protection by the League of Nations and by the interest which Great Britain and France notably have in the preservation of its integrity.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And France?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: With regard to France, I may repeat to my hon. friend what I said the other night. The first country that we approached, long before the armistice and immediately after, in relation to reconstruction business was France. The matter was taken up with the French representative at Washington, and it was taken up overseas directly with the French Government by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and Mr. Lloyd Harris, and also, I may say, by the Prime Minister; and we offered her a credit of—well, we put no limit to it. What I had in mind was a credit of from $50,000,000 to $100,000,000. No question arises of France's future. We offered her such a credit as she might require for purchases in Canada. But I think the position of France is this, she has her own situation in regard to industries and employment, and very naturally she desires, to the extent of her ability, to do her own restoration through her own manufacturers and to give her own people employment. Consequently up to date she has not felt it necessary to avail herself of the offer of credit which I can again assure my hon. friend and this House it would have been a pleasure to us to extend to her for making purchases in this country. I have indicated all the credits that have been extended, with the exception of those which we have been giving to Great Britain and which we shall have to give. I assure the leader of the Opposition that no one will be more relieved than I shall when free markets are restored for wheat, flour, and all other commodities, so that men will carry on their business in the way they did in 1911. The hon. gentleman seemed to indicate that he thought we were blameable because we do not do business now as we did in 1911. But he has overlooked one very important consideration—something for which William Hohenzollern is responsible, not myself— and that is, the war. The reason why we have to do business in this way is that since 1911 we have had the war and we have not yet been able, as a country, to get back to the normal manner of doing business as my hon. friend described it. My own view is that as soon as industrial conditions permit, as soon as business can be done through the ordinary channels, the Dominion Government should not make any loans for the purpose of facilitating the sale of our products. The natural way is to have them taken care of through ordinary commercial and financial channels. What the Government has done it has done for two reasons: In the first place, to provide employment for those in Canada who would otherwise be out of work and to keep our factories going; and, in the second place, to extend the export trade of the country.

With regard to the placing of orders, a point was raised the other night about commissions. I made careful inquiry of Mr. Lloyd Harris over there; he knows nothing of any commission paid in respect of the business. I also served notice upon the Trade Commission here that it was not necessary that commissions of any kind should be paid, and that no orders should be placed with firms that were paying commissions or remunerations to any outside of their own employees or organization. This business is obtained in London. The agents of, say, the Rumanian Government know what they want. They deal there through the Canadian Trade Mission, and with the representatives of the various branches of Canadian manufacture. They bargain as to the prices to be paid, and they see the samples—our men are in competition with others who are competing for the same business—and then the order is placed through the Trade Commission here, which is officered by very capable and honourable men. It seems to me that we could not devise any better means of getting business for all the manufacturers of Canada than we have devised by the establishment of this Mission in London and of its complement, the Canadian Trade Mission here. It is easy to criticise, and it is hard to construct and create. But this organization which we have built up and which at the time of its inception had the commendation of the people of Canada—it was a very live question here—is to-day keeping thousands of people at work, is promoting the industry and the commerce of the country, and, I submit, should be commended by hon. gentlemen opposite when they get to understand it fully. At the head of our Trade Commission here is Sir Charles Gordon, a very able and honourable man, as the member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) said the other night. In London we have Mr. Lloyd Harris, who is well known, I think, to most members of this House. So far as I am aware, the Government's action is such as the Government should take at a time like this. Let us look forward to a period—I do not know how far distant; I hope not far distant—when the Dominion Government will not have to provide credits; then we shall have the benefit of all this connection that has been established with foreign countries. Our goods will get to be known, and an impetus will be given to all the industry of the country.

As to indebtedness on the part of one Government to another, that is usually a very honourable obligation of Governments and I have no doubt whatever that the advances which are being made by the Dominion Government, substantial sums as they are, will be repaid in due course, as soon as peace conditions permit these nations again to get upon their feet, and as soon as international exchange is restored.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the rate of interest charged?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We could have charged six, six and-a-half or seven per cent, but we are dealing with Governments and we did not think that it was dignified to charge an extortionate rate of interest. We charge them just the rate it costs to raise the money here—five and one-half per cent.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Most of these European countries are protective countries. Will the goods be subject to customs duties when they reach these countries?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I cannot say as to that; but these goods are being purchased by Governments, and Governments could no doubt arrange to have them go in free of duty. Our relationship is not with individuals in these countries, but with Governments. For example, we give the Belgium Government a credit of $25,000,000, and Belgium is going to send a mission out here to purchase. The Belgian Government, having borrowed the money from us, and being, as I believe, entirely responsible, will use its credit in this country to purchase to the best advantage. I think the Hudson's Bay Company has been doing some buying for the Belgian Government. I believe that Greece also will send a mission here to purchase. Of the Rumanian credit, $5,000,000 is in wheat, another $5,000,000 is in raw material—that has not yet been purchased—and the balance is in manufactured products, such as clothing, woollens, textiles, agricultural implements, and, I hope, some railway equipment; in other words, what they need in order to restore their country.

Hon. gentlemen may say that Canada is taking some risk in this matter. Well, let us assume that we are. Having regard to the situation in which the country found itself in November last, facing this collapse in its industries, Canada is abundantly justified in doing what the United States has been doing on an immense scale, and what Great Britain is doing. This war has caused so profound a dislocation in the world, in finance, commerce and industry, that if during this year, which, in a sense, is a war year, because we have the consequences of the war with us, we failed in courage or in resource, the situation would be different in Canada from what it is to-day. I do not believe hon. gentlemen, no matter how well informed they may be, quite appreciate what the Government's financing has done and is doing for this country to-day. If you take the gratuity which we gave the soldiers; if you take the payments to the soldiers that the Minister of Militia has referred to; if you take our shipbuilding programme; if you take the immense expenditures we are obliged to make for the financing of our grain purchases and our manufactured products that I have mentioned—hundreds of dollars—and then imagine the situation if the Government on November 11 had said: "Now we quit right here; the war is at an end; no more credits for wheat or meats or manufactured products; let private enterprise carry on the business itself. Well, I would be taking a ticket out of the country, because I would not desire to face the situation which would have resulted. Imagine the activities of this country, stimulated as they were during the war, keyed up to a height that none of us believed they could attain, and then everything suddenly stop. If the Government had not come to the rescue as they did, with courage and resource, and provide the credits we did, there would have been a very serious situation in Canada.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does the minister include transportation charges in the credit?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Of the $25,000,000 mentioned, there is a sum of $1,000,000, I think, for transportation. If my hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) desires that this Bill should be taken up again to-morrow afternoon or evening, I have so much respect for his request that I will agree to it, and I do not think it will take very long to finish with the Bill. As regards the observations of the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff) the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. A. K. Maclean), who was Acting Minister of Marine and Fisheries, may make a brief statement, but I will direct the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) to them in order that he may take them up when his Estimates are under consideration. This is a general Bill; it follows the lines of the previous Bills, both as to drafting and otherwise, and it is for demobilization as the others were for war; and it seems that the matters referred to to-night, especially those referred to by the hon. member for Lunenburg, might very well be taken up on the Estimates.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is no doubt the matters discussed by the hon. member for Lunenburg could be discussed on the Estimates; but I think when the Acting Prime Minister considers that he has himself admitted that the hon. member is quite in order in bringing them up on this Bill, it is on this Bill that the answer should be made, because when the minister comes along with his Estimates, it will then be necessary for the hon. member to make his speech over again and put those facts before the minister in connection with another matter. We want to avoid that and to save time.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Minister of Marine and Fisheries is going into Estimates to-morrow afternoon and intends to make a statement on shipbuilding and to take up items on his Estimates. The minister will then be able to deal with the observations of the hon. member for Lunenburg and the passing of this Bill need not be delayed because of the observations of the hon. member. On Supply or on any money Bill, it is proper for grievances of any kind to be brought forward; it is not necessary that they should be answered unless they seem to be relevant in some way to the vote, but I am quite sure the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will be glad to speak to the observations of the hon. member for Lunenburg, and in the meantime, while I should like to get this Bill through, it can stand until to-morrow afternoon when we can take it up, and, I have no doubt, finish it quickly.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister was kind enough to direct his observations very largely to myself. He has not in any way cleared his Government from the responsibility of starting this new venture of opening credits in a foreign country with which we never did any business before. We have done our share in connection with the war nobly and well, particularly as an ally of our Mother Country, and nobody is finding very much fault with any moneys that have been expended in that direction. But I say to the Acting Prime Minister that we are under no obligation to build up Rumania or any other country that might have of its own free will gone into the war and received some damage by reason of that fact. It is going too far to ask the Canadian people, who have not the money to spend, who have to borrow money for their own purposes, who cannot, by reason of the high cost of living and other matters, get all the money they require for their own purposes, to furnish this money; and the Acting Prime Minister is going too far in looking for sympathy and applause from his supporters to-night by saying that we are doing this in the generosity of our hearts and extreme loyalty in order to build up the finances of Rumania, because that country got into trouble with its neighbours and not because of any loyalty to us.

I have no fault to find with advancing credits to Great Britain, France, Italy or Belgium because, if the Acting Prime Minister had the securities of those countries in his vault, he could easily raise money on them from any bank in this country or in the United States. But the trade that we went after, by and through our Trade Mission, was the trade of a country whose securities are evidently not very good in this country, upon which securities the Acting Prime Minister cannot raise any money and which, as the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) stated, are being peddled about from bucket shop to bucket shop in London at much below par. What we should have done is to deal with Great Britain and France, and if Great Britain and France want to advance goods to those smaller powers who are under their control and who must pay for them or get into trouble, that would be good business. We could very well say to the British Government: We will give you all the credit you want; we will arrange that we send the goods to you, and you can deal with the smaller countries. We never had any dealings with those countries in the most prosperous days of Canada, and why should we now pass over the heads of France, Italy and Great Britain and seek trade with countries with which we have never dealt with before? That is the particular fault I have to find. It is stated that our Trade Mission and our Trade Ministers were so clumsy and slow and incompetent in securing trade that everything that was worth having was gone and they were glad enough at last to fall back on such trade as they could make with Rumania by offering Rumania the money. That is where the difficulty is. If our manufacturers were properly represented on the other side by live business men, they would have secured the orders that the United States manufacturers got, but we did not get them, and our representatives, in order to do something to justify their existence on the other side, had to make this masterful stroke of saying to Rumania: We will give you money if you will be kind enough to buy our goods. That is all they did for which they claim so much credit, and I do not think they have shown any great foresight or capacity because they have done that.

I want to be absolutely fair to the manufacturers. We have manufacturers in the part of the country from which I come, manufacturing rails and all kinds of structural steel. They got no help from the Government.

Mr. NICHOLSON: Will the hon. member say what means were taken to provide the Steel Company at Sydney with orders so that they could continue manufacturing steel rails?

Mr. McKENZIE: The Minister of Railways found it proper, with a view to building three or four, or ten, thousand miles of railway next summer, to secure contracts for rails at a price below war prices. That is all that was done, and I am quite satisfied that any such a contract should be made with any manufacturer in the country. The Nova Scotia Steel had to send out their own agent to London and do the best they could to make contracts for themselves. Colonel Cantley went to London representing the Nova Scotia Steel. The company got no help from any body. Some of their men had to be laid off for a couple of months because there was not enough work to keep things going; but they had good times during the war and they had to put up with the difficulties that came their way, without any help from the Government. If the Nova Scotia Steel and other concerns in the part of Canada from which I come have to forage for themselves and find a market for their product as best they can, I cannot understand why other concerns should not do the same thing.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Is the hon. gentleman aware that Colonel Cantley was unable to get any contracts in England because of the difficulty of financing over there?

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not aware of any such difficulty. I am aware that while the men were idle for a while, they have now gone back to work and everything is going on first-class. The company did not get a cent of assistance from this Government or anybody else.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Colonel Cantley was not able to get any contracts overseas.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not saying whether he was or not. I know he went over there to try and get contracts. I know that the steel works are now working on their own initiative without a dollar of assistance from this Government, and what they have done other concerns should be able to do. But no one will exert himself if the Minister of Finance is going to take the whole responsibility on himself and relieve him of all his difficulties. I am sure the Nova Scotia Steel and the Dominion Iron & Coal and other concerns in Nova Scotia would be delighted to jump at such an opportunity as that, but they had to get along by themselves, and they got along fairly well, and I think that is a more healthy way of doing business in any country. I would suggest that at this late hour the Bill should stand.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: We will take it up to-morrow.

Mr. DUFF: When the resolution on which this Bill is founded was before the House I asked the Minister of Finance when the Order in Council had been passed with reference to the Rumanian loan, and he promised to give me the information. I already knew that an Order in Council had been passed, but the Prime Minister promised to get that information. A fortnight or three weeks have passed and the information has not yet been brought down as to when that Order in Council was passed granting a credit to Rumania. I understand it was passed only four or five days before the resolution was discussed in the House, but I should like to know the exact date.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I paid so much attention to the request of my hon. friend that I laid the Order in Council on the Table the next day. The Order in Council was passed as soon as the agreement signed by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Prime Minister of Rumania came to hand. It could not be passed before that agreement had come to hand. I would not like my hon. friend to think I was guilty of any discourtesy.

Mr. DUFF: The minister must have laid it on the Table sotto voce. It is strange that the Government should pass an Order in Council granting a credit to Rumania when the people's representatives were assembled here in Parliament, and I wish to protest against any such action of the Government.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The assistant clerk calls my attention to the fact that on the 11th of April, as I stated, I laid the Order in Council on the Table.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McKENZIE: Hon. gentlemen laugh with great glee because the Order in Council was laid on the Table without the knowledge of a private member. I wish to say with reference to laying Orders in Council on the Table, that that is no proper means of communicating information to this House. I have complained about it dozens of times. Whenever an important Order in Council or any important document is to be laid on the Table, a copy of it should be put in the box of every hon. member. We cannot hear a word in this House; I can hardly hear a word myself, and it is much worse for hon. gentlemen sitting behind. An Order in Council can be laid on the Table without any one being the wiser. We cannot always be standing over the clerk to see what is being laid on the Table. I repeat, when any information is laid on the Table of which hon. members should be made aware, a copy should be placed in every member's box, just as is done with the Estimates.

Progress reported.

On the motion of Sir Thomas White, the House adjourned at 12.15 a.m., Thursday.

Thursday, May 8, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEE ON DEBATES.

Mr. R. L. RICHARDSON (Springfield), presented the second report of the Select Standing Committee appointed to supervise the official report of the debates, as follows:

The Select Standing Committee appointed to supervise the Official Report of the Debates beg leave to present the following as their Second Report.

The attention of your committee having been directed to the present system which necessitated delaying the binding of the Revised Edition of the Debates until the final completion of the index of the session's Debates thereby preventing the distribution thereof within a reasonable time after the prorogation of Parliament.

Your Committee therefore, with a view to expediting the distribution of the bound volumes in question, recommend that each volume be bound with the index for that volume, the last volume to contain a complete index.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

R. L. Richardson,
Chairman.

REPORT PRESENTED.

Report relating to Mail Subsidies and Steamship Subventions for fiscal year ending March 31, 1918, with traffic returns, etc., to December 31, 1918.—Hon. Mr. Maclean.

DISQUALIFICATION OF MILITARY DEFAULTERS.

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN (Acting Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill

No. 91 respecting disqualification of military defaulters.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Explain.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The class covered by this Bill are known generally as military defaulters. They are comprised of those who failed in their military obligations under the Military Service Act. The subclasses are specifically defined. As to those, the Bill provides that they shall be disqualified in the following respects for a period of fifteen years: from holding any office under the Crown, from being members of Parliament or members of the Senate, and from voting at any Dominion election. The Bill provides that any of that class who have satisfied any conviction properly obtained and punishment imposed by such conviction shall not be included therein, nor shall any who came in under the amnesty proclamation of August last, nor shall any one who having been apprehended actually served in the military forces after apprehension, and, any who subsequently satisfied the terms of any legal conviction thereby become relieved of the disqualification provided by the Act.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Does this include all the defaulters under both the Department of Justice and the Militia Department? There are six classes, as the minister outlined the other day. Does this include the whole six?

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SENATE BILL.

FIRST READING.

Bill No. 87, respecting the Pollution of Navigable Waters.—Hon. Mr. Reid.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks.)

LEASES FOR OIL LANDS.

Mr. PAPINEAU:

1. Have any leases for oil lands, in the western provinces, been issued since 1st January, 1917?
2. If so, under what regulations and to whom?
3. Has any application been made, lately, for special privileges on, or reservation of, oil lands in the western provinces, by any company?
4. If such privileges and reservations have been made or are to be made, under what terms and to whom?
5. Is it the intention of the Government, before granting such privileges and reservations to consult Parliament?

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

1. Yes. 2,168 such leases issued since 1st January, 1917.
2. Under the petroleum and natural gas regulations, a printed copy of which is attached. The preparation of a list of the names of the lessees would involve several days' work.
3. A great many applications have been made for such privileges on or reservation of oil lands in the western provinces.
4. No such special privileges have been granted.
5. The Government will consult Parliament in all cases except where it acts on authority already granted by Parliament.

MILITIA ACCOUNTS.

Mr. ROBB:

1. Has the Government passed an Order in Council under the War Measures Act, providing for the audit of the Militia accounts in Canada by an official of that department?
2. Has the Auditor General been asked to accept the audit by the official of the Militia Department without receiving the usual accounts and evidence of payment required by the Statutes?
3. Has the Government power under the War Measures Act to compel the Auditor General to accept an audit performed by an official over whom he has no control?
4. Who is the official appointed by the said Order in Council? How long has he been in the employ of the Militia Department, what is his salary and what was his occupation or profession prior to his being employed by the Militia?

Major-General MEWBURN:

1. P.C. 316, dated February 8, 1918, provides for the appointment of a general auditor for the Militia Department, responsible to the deputy minister. Previous to this date, the audit was carried out as a part of the work of the branch of the Accountant and Paymaster General.

2. Under P.C. 1136, dated May 22, 1918, the General Auditor of the Militia Department was removed from the jurisdiction of that department and "made responsible to and under the control of the Auditor General." This step was taken after consultation with the late Auditor General, who has initialled the original Report to Privy Council. This was done in view of the tremendous expenditure of the Department of Militia and Defence under War Appropriation, and the provisions of the said Order in Council have been accepted by the present Auditor General as a temporary measure, until such time as the Militia Department comes back to its ordinary level. Under the provisions of P.C. 1136, all accounts are audited before payment by the representative of the Auditor General, thus safeguarding public funds to the greatest extent possible. The Auditor General still receives the usual accounts and evidence of payment. Previous to the passing of P.C. 1136, these accounts were paid by the Department of Militia and Defence and post-audit carried out by the Auditor General. Under the provisions of P.C. 1136, all accounts are audited before payment by the representative of the Auditor General.

3. Yes—Answered by Nos. 1 and 2. The Auditor General was a party to the arrangement, and not compelled, as implied.

4. Lieut.-Colonel D. F. Pidgeon joined the C.E.F. on August 10, 1914, as a lieutenant; was promoted to the rank of captain and served overseas 12 months, 9 months of which in France—Salary, $4,182.50, same as General Auditor Overseas—Paid as an officer, Canadian Expeditionary Force—Previous occupation, financial and real estate broker.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and other papers regarding supplies purchased for the Yukon Telegraph Lines, during the fiscal year 1918-19, including copy of all tenders, the names of the tenderers and the amounts of each tender.

Mr. CHISHOLM:

For a copy of all telegrams, letters, petitions and other documents, exchanged between the Post Office Department and any person in Inverness county during 1918 and 1919, in any way referring to the mail contract for carrying the mails from Inverness Railway station to Margaree harbour, N.S.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

For a return showing the amounts paid for advertising, printing, etc., by the various departments of the Government during the fiscal years 1916, 1917, 1918 to the following newspapers:—The Brandford Expositor, The Woodstock Sentinel Review, The Stratford Beacon, The Kingston Whig, The Hamilton Times, The Toronto Globe, The Toronto Star, The Guelph Mercury, The Niagara Falls Review, The St. Catharines Journal, The Ingersoll Chronicle, The Orillia Times, The Belleville Ontario, The Simcoe Reformer, The Richmond Hill Liberal, The Acton Free Press, The Mitchell Recorder and the Owen Sound Sun.

THE PEACE TREATY.

QUESTION AS TO ITS RATIFICATION BY PARLIAMENT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. HUME CRONYN (London): Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the hon. the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) what procedure the Government purpose adopting for the consideration, and if necessary, for the ratification of the Peace Treaty the terms of which were brought to the attention of the House yesterday.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): The signature of the Peace Treaty is an executive Act. After signature by the parties to the Treaty, it will be submitted to Parliament for consideration and for legislative sanction. I understand that the Treaty provides for the deposit of the ratifications in Paris and that the Treaty becomes binding upon the powers as and from the date of the deposit of the ratification.

Mr. McKENZIE: In reference to the question raised by the hon. member for London (Mr. Cronyn) do I understand the Acting Prime Minister to say that this Parliament will have nothing to do with the ratification of the Treaty?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I said the precise opposite. I stated that the signing of the Treaty was an executive Act but that after the Treaty had been signed by the parties to it, it would be submitted to this Parliament, as to other Parliaments of the Powers concerned, for consideration and ratification of the executive act of signing. I stated further that there was a provision made in the Treaty for the deposit of the ratification at Paris and that each Power would be deemed to be bound by the treaty as and from the date of such deposit of the ratification.

Mr. JACOBS: May I ask what would happen should this Parliament refuse to ratify the treaty?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Considering that it would be signed by the Prime Minister and by the accredited representatives of the Government, acting as plenipotentiaries I could not conceive that Parliament would refuse to ratify it. If it did, the usual constitutional consequences would follow—but that I do not at all apprehend. The ratification by this Parliament will be in the same manner as the ratification by the Imperial Parliament of the signature of its plenipotentiaries, by the Congress of the United States, and by the other legislative bodies concerned.

Hon. W. S. FIELDING: Is the hon. gentleman correct in using the word "ratification"? Ratification is a part of the machinery without which a Treaty is not completed. I understand the hon. gentleman to say that this treaty will be completed without any ratification here. I suppose that he means that it will be submitted to this Parliament for approval or disapproval, if we so wish, but that whether it is approved or disapproved it is effective, and no ratification here is needed.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am afraid I cannot agree with my hon. friend. Let me give a case in point. An agreement was entered into by the late Government of Canada with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company and it was signed on behalf of the Government. It was afterwards submitted for the ratification to Parliament. It did not become binding upon Canada until it was ratified by Parliament. Similarly, my hon. friend negotiated a treaty at Washington in 1911. I understand that was signed by the hon. member (Mr. Fielding) and his colleagues, but it had not legislative effect until considered and approved, and it was not in that case approved by Parliament. I do not understand that the present case is different.

Mr. W. S. FIELDING: My hon. friend, I submit, is mistaken. There was no treaty signed at Washington; but there was an agreement made which was subject to Parliamentary approval—not ratification; exchange of ratifications is a part of the machinery without which a treaty does not become effective.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. We are wandering into a discussion on the Orders of the Day.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Might I ask a question of the Acting Prime Minister. If this Parliament does not ratify the treaty does the war begin again?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend is in good fettle; he might be able to start a new war.

PRICE OF OLEOMARGARINE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. B. McCOIG: Mr. Speaker, there is a matter of extraordinary importance to the consuming public that I wish to draw to the attention of the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Maclean). A report appears in yesterday's Toronto Globe in reference to the high cost of butter. An investigation was made by Dr. Hastings, medical health officer of the city of Toronto, who states that:

> The demand for export butter at 80 cents per pound governs the price to the local consumer, and this demand has recently increased particularly in the English and United States markets. On the other hand, Dr. Hastings can find no justification for the "enormously high price of oleomargarine."

In another part of the paper it states:

> Margarine, which has been selling in Great Britain at 25 cents a pound, is now 16 cents. Here the manufacturer's price is about 33 cents, with the dealers in some cases getting almost 50 cents.

And it wants to know why there should be this difference. We allow margarine to come into this country free of duty and if the manufacturers are extracting an unfair profit from the consumer an injustice is being inflicted upon the public and the matter is one that should receive the attention of the Government.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is hardly taking the proper course on the Orders of the Day. I assumed that he was going to ask a question of the Government. This would be the proper subject of a question to be placed upon the Order Paper.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce): I will endeavour to give my hon. friend (Mr. McCoig) a complete answer to-morrow. I am not in a position to give him what he might deem a satisfactory answer this afternoon. I wish to repeat a statement that he has himself made, namely, that oleomargarine is on the free list.

CANADIAN REPRESENTATIVE AT WASHINGTON.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX: I notice in this morning's paper that the question of the representation of Canada at Washington was raised yesterday in the Imperial Parliament. The following question was asked by Mr. Arthur Murray:

> Has any communication yet been received from the Canadian Government in regard to the announcement made in the Dominion House of Commons recently by the president of the Privy Council (Hon. Mr. Rowell) that a permanent Canadian representative at Washington is shortly to be appointed?
> Col. Amery, Under-Secretary for the Colonies replied, "No."
> Mr. Murray: Is the House to understand that this proposed change has been arranged without consultation between the two governments?
> Col. Amery: I do not think the House should understand that. Undoubtedly when the matter is advanced to a further stage the Government will be consulted.

As the representative in Washington will have no ambassadorial powers but will act simply as the Canadian agent, as our agent in Paris or in London acts, may I ask the Government if it intends to submit to the Imperial authorities the name of the proposed agent and will they consult with them as regards the right of Canada to appoint such a representative?

Hon. Mr. ROWELL: The Canadian representative at Washington will be very much more than the Canadian agent. His status will be very different from the status of the Canadian representative in Paris or London. Therefore, there is consultation with the Imperial Government with reference to the appointment. I stated the other evening that confidential communications had been held between the Prime Minister of Canada and the Imperial Government in reference to this matter but that these were not yet concluded and that when they were the House would be advised of the whole purport of them.

HIGHWAY BETWEEN MONK STATION AND ST. PERPETUE.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. J. FERNAND FAFARD (L'Islet) (Translation): I would like to inquire from the hon. minister of Railways whether, he proposes building a carriage road between Monk Station and the main road to St. Perpetue.

Several times I applied to the hon. gentleman for the building of that road, the last time on January 4, 1919, and I have here his answer dated February 20th, in the following terms:

(Text.)

Dear Sir,—With reference to correspondence in connection with improvements at l'Islet, I beg to advise that it is the intention of the railway officials to have this work performed during the coming session, providing satisfactory arrangements can be made.

Yours faithfully,

G. A. Bell.

(Translation) It is to the knowledge of the hon. gentleman that such roads connecting stations with a main road have been built at the expense of the Government.

It is also to the knowledge of the hon. gentleman that the land adjoining the stations of the Transcontinental railway is the property of the Government.

Mr. SPEAKER (Text): Order. The hon. gentleman, as I understand, is putting a question of a purely local character. He has the machinery for placing his question upon the Order Paper, or when the Estimates of the minister come up for consideration.

Mr. FAFARD (Translation): It is also to the knowledge. . .

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

SUPPLY.

GOVERNMENT SHIPBUILDING PROGRAMME —STATEMENT BY HON. MR. BALLANTYNE MINISTER OF MARINE.

The House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Public Works—Marine Department—Government Shipbuilding Programme:—Amount required for the construction of vessels in accordance with Government's programme—$30,000,000.

Hon. CHARLES C. BALLANTYNE (Minister of Marine): Mr. Chairman, before we take up this item in a general way, I think it would be fitting for me to give to this House all the details that I possess in regard to the Government shipbuilding programme. A year ago I had the honour of introducing the Government's merchant marine shipbuilding policy. A great many changes have taken place since the armistice has been signed, and it seems to me to be an opportune time to furnish to this House all the information that I have on the subject for which the vote is now asked.

I think it would be well for us to look for a moment at the shipping conditions of the world, and particularly as they existed in Canada when the Government deemed it wise to embark on its shipbuilding policy. Up to about February or March, 1918, the Imperial Munitions Board were occupying all the vacant steel shipyards in Canada building ships for England. I believe that the Government of Great Britain is to be congratulated for its energy and foresight in not only having ships built to the fullest capacity of the immense shipyards of the United Kingdom, but also for utilizing all the available yards in Canada.

But, Sir, when I became Minister of Marine I could not see what particular value the steel ships that were being built in Canada for England could be to our own country, and after considering the matter from every point of view I thought the time had come when Canada should have her own merchant marine. Therefore I had the honour and privilege of recommending to my colleagues in the Government that we should utilize our own yards to build up a national merchant marine, and, much as we admire the old country and desire at all times to render her every assistance possible, more particularly when she is engaged in war, I consider that we were doing not only our full duty to Canada, but also to the Empire when we took that course.

It will be remembered that there was an immense total loss of shipping at that time, about 15,000,000 gross tons, the war being at a very serious and critical stage, and the success of Great Britain and her Allies depending very largely on the extent of their merchant marine. So pressing was the need for tonnage that all Canadian ships under Canadian register and all ships plying in Canadian waters under British register were commandeered by the British Ministry of Shipping, a fact which left Canada devoid of a merchant marine.

At that time, Mr. Chairman, all of our Allies, with the exception of our neighbour to the south, were coming to me constantly to know if I would allow them to build ships in our yards—I refer particularly to France and to Italy, and also to Norway, one of the neutral powers. I had to reply to the overtures made to me that the policy of the Canadian Government was to utilize to the fullest extent our own steel shipyards, and that therefore we could not look with favour upon building ships for them. It was not so much a matter of price. Many of our Allies were willing to pay from $20 to $25 per ton more than this Government was paying for the ships it was having built under contract.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Per ton?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes, sir, The policy of the Imperial Munitions Board was to build wooden as well as steel cargo vessels. The Canadian Government did not think it good policy to have wooden ships built. Not that either I or the Government had anything to say against wooden ships, but we thought it was a sounder policy, having in view that some time peace would come, to confine our efforts to the building of steel ships only, which accounts for our not having built any wooden ships. I should add that the money for the ships that were being built by the Imperial Munitions Board for Great Britain was being loaned by the Canadian Government. As these ships were being built with Canadian money, it seemed to me to be a wise and sound policy that they should be Canadian ships, for the use of the Canadian people.

There were three reasons why the Government adopted the policy of building up a mercantile marine. The first for reasons arising out of the conditions brought about by the war, and to which I have already alluded. The second was the desirability of building up our export trade. At no time in our history have the prospects been so favourable as at present for the building up, the extending, and the expanding of our export trade. The third reason was that Canada has a vast railway system, and it was proper that the Government, in order to complete the chain of transportation and to place our railways on as favourable a footing as possible, should supply those railways with the necessary steamship service. Parliament and the people generally will, I am sure, agree as to the wisdom of the policy of having these splendid cargo-ships work in co-operation with our railways and carrying on a service somewhat similar to that operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. We hope to see our ships on the Atlantic and on the Pacific oceans plying to England, to Australia, to New Zealand, to South Africa, to South America and to all the ports with which Canada can carry on a foreign trade.

At present we have under contract forty-five steel ships, orders for which have been placed in yards from Prince Rupert to Halifax. The orders are placed as follows:

Name of Firm.	No. and Size of Vessel.	Total tonnage.
British American Shipbuilding Co., Welland, Ont.	2—4,350 tons.	8,700

The total tonnage of these forty-five ships is 264,050 net tons. We have at the present time ready to go into service the Canadian Ranger and the Canadian Pioneer, both of 8,100 tons deadweight; we have the Canadian Voyageur, 4,350 tons, which has been doing splendid service for some months; and we have the Canadian Warrior, 3,760 tons. Two more will be ready in May, five in June, three in July, two in September, four in October, seven in November, and two in December, making twenty-five ships that we expect to put into commission during the present year.

Sir Sam HUGHES: Are they fitted with cold storage?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Not yet, that matter is under consideration.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I did not hear the minister mention the Midland Shipbuilding Company.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: No orders has been placed with the Midland Shipbuilding Company—I will deal with that a little later. The value of the contracts which have been placed is, in round figures, about $52,000,000. and up to the end of the present fiscal year $20,000,000 of that will have been paid. The item that we are asking the Committee to pass is for $30,000,000, which with the $20,000,000, constitutes, in round figures, the total amount of all the contracts, $52,691,450.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is for the twenty-five ships?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: No, for the forty-five ships; all that are under contract.

I stated in the House a year ago that it was the policy of the Government to utilize only existing steel shipyards. But there existed at Prince Rupert a large ship-repairing plant and floating dry dock, and considerable pressure was brought to bear upon the Government, especially as the war was proceeding at that time in a way that did not look favourable to us, and tonnage was very badly needed, to place some orders out there. I took the ground that the Government were not investing money in shipyards, but that if any firm would come along with the necessary capital the Government would be willing to give them a share of their business. That accounts for the placing of orders for two ships of 8,100 tons at Prince Rupert

Victoria, B.C., likewise did not have a modern shipyard. The Victoria Machinery Depot had a small place there, and our Victoria friends, especially the late Premier Brewster, were very anxious that we should give the city of Victoria part of the Government business. We therefore placed an order with the Victoria Machinery Depot for two ships of 8,100 tons each Enterprising capitalists of Halifax, Captain Norcross and R. M. Wolvin, said that they were prepared to put $5,000,000 into a modern shipyard there if the Government would give them some business. I shall not weary the Committee with an account of all the interviews that I had and of the requests that these gentlemen made and which the Government could not see their way clear to grant. They wanted us to allow them to bring in free of duty what plant they required; I told them we could not agree to do that. They also wanted a very large order for ships, as their capital expenditure was great; but I told them that all we could do would be to give them an order for four ships, which we have done. When that yard is fully completed—and it will be completed shortly, because the keels of two vessels have already been laid there—it will be one of the finest and best equipped shipyards in the country.

Mr. MURPHY: What will be the cost of these four ships?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Two are 8,100 tons and two 10,500 tons. The price is $195 a ton.

Mr. DUFF: Deadweight capacity, or registered ton?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Deadweight. I will explain why we deviated from the policy announced a year ago that we were only going to keep existing yards going.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What is the speed of those ships?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The speed of the 8,100-ton ships is ten knots sea speed; that of some of the smaller ships is eight knots and of others nine, and that of the 10,500-ton three-deck ships to be built at Halifax, will be thirteen knots. As regards the type of ships, after consultation with the technical officers of my department, we decided it was wise not to build too expensive a freight ship, but at the same time to make our ships as efficient as possible. And I am proud to state to the committee that in no other country in the world, not even in the Old Country, are any ships being built better than those which our Canadian shipyards have so far turned out for the Dominion Government.

I now wish to refer to the matter of price which ranges all the way from $180 to $215 per ton dead weight, and I hope hon. members will fully realize that when the Government commenced their shipbuilding programme a year ago, everything was at its height; labour was very high, the rate of wages was constantly increasing, as was the cost of boilers, engines, and all the auxiliary equipment that goes into a ship. I am pleased to state that the forty-five ships that we have under contract for the Dominion Government are being built at a considerably lower cost than the ships on the vast programme of shipbuilding which the United States Emergency Fleet Corporation are carrying out. Their ships have cost considerably more than ours, notwithstanding the fact that they have turned out so far 555 steel ships.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is approximately the difference per ton?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I do not like to say anything but what would be pleasant about our neighbours who are our allies and who have helped us in every way possible, but according to the information I have received, their price, taking all the ships they have ordered from the various shipyards, would be at least $25 per ton higher than the forty-five contracts we have entered into in Canada.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Where do we get the steel plates?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: From the United States. The other night the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) made a statement in this House, and he never makes a statement unless he is reasonably sure of the facts. While I give him credit for sincerely believing that the statement he made was correct, if I read Hansard aright —I was not in the House at the time—he stated that the Canadian Government ships under contract cost 400 per cent more than they had any right to cost, the comparison made by the hon. gentleman being between the pre-war price in England of $50 per ton and the prices the Canadian Government have made with the various shipyards throughout the country. The correction I wish to make is that the hon. member overlooked stating that his price was a pre-war price. The most reliable information I can get from England, Ireland and Scotland is that all of their yards are busy; that they are building ships rapidly for themselves, and that they are also building a certain number of ships for their Allies in Europe. Consequently, no one can get a firm price for ships over there. If any one in Canada wanted to build a ship of any size and approached any of the Old Country yards, he would be told that they would enter into a contract with him on a cost plus basis, but that they could not give him a firm price per ton. He would also be told that they could not make deliveries before at least the spring of 1920. In this connection, I might quote a well known shipbuilder, Sir G. B. Hunter, of the firm of Swan, Hunter, a firm distinguished for its shipbuilding. Sir G. B. Hunter, in an interview which was reported in the Newcastle Journal on April 6, 1919, stated that ships cost at present three times as much to build in England and Scotland as they did before the war. Therefore, if we take the hon. member's figure of $50 per ton, and if we take the well known and reliable authority which I have quoted, namely Sir G. B. Hunter, ships built in the United Kingdom at the present time would cost $150 per ton.

Mr. McKENZIE: What I had in mind was that the Government which preceded the one of which the minister is a member, were so slow in taking up a policy of shipbuilding that prices had gone up so much to the disadvantage of Canada.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The hon. member surely does not think that at any time since war began, ships could be built for $50 per ton, either in the Old Country or Canada, and that is the point I am trying to clear up.

When the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) was making an able address in this House about shipbuilding, the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. J. H. Sinclair) made a statement similar to that made by the hon. member (Mr. McKenzie). He said that Canadian Government ships were costing four times as much as they ought to cost. Therefore I want to make it clear to this Committee and to the country that those hon. gentlemen were referring to pre-war prices in making those comparisons.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The Financial Post was my authority for making the statement that ships are being built on the Clyde for $55 per ton. The contract price in Halifax is $200 per ton dead weight, which is approximately four times as much.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: If the hon. member can give me the name of any firm on the Clyde that will build ships for $55 per ton the Canadian Government will be glad to give it a large contract. I do not know of any firm in the Old Country that would undertake to build ships at any such price, although I give the hon. member credit for making a statement which he believed was accurate at the time. I merely want to clear this point up, because I do not want the public to think that, in order to build ships in Canada, we are compelled to pay $180 to $215 per ton when they could be built in the Old Country for $50 per ton.

Mr. DUFF: Has the minister made enquiries of large shipbuilding firms, and if so what prices has he received?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I have. I sent cablegrams to four different firms in order that the information which I am now giving might be accurate and up to date. It will interest hon. members to know that one of our great allies is having thirty wooden ships built in Canada at the present time at a price of $200 per ton dead weight, so that if $200 per ton is being paid for a wooden ship I do not think the Government have paid too high a price when it pays from $180 to $215 for steel ships.

Mr. DUFF: Where are those wooden ships being built?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: At Victoria.

Mr. DUFF: We are building wooden ships in Nova Scotia for about $75 a ton dead weight.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The type of ship built at Victoria for $200 per ton would, I imagine, be entirely different from that of the ships being built in the Maritime Provinces for $75 per ton.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The ships are being built at Victoria, B.C., for the French Government?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes. I wish to explain why the Government found it necessary to pay British Columbia shipbuilders $10 per ton more than eastern shipbuilders. First of all, I endeavoured to place contracts with British Columbia shipbuilders at the eastern prices, but they pointed out that the labour cost was $7 per ton more in British Columbia than in the East, and that freight rates were very much higher. After a great many interviews, extending over some months, the Government agreed to pay the British Columbia shipbuilders $10 per ton more than the eastern price for a similar type of ship. For instance, if an 8,100-ton ship was being built by Vickers of Montreal for $180 per ton, the price for a similar ship in the British Columbia yards would be $190 per ton.

There has been some criticism of myself, especially by the British Columbia shipbuilders, because I would not allow them to take foreign contracts. When the war was on, France, Norway, and Italy were urging us to allow ships to be built here for them. I would gladly have consented had we been able to get sufficient ship plates, marine engines, boilers, and the other necessary equipment for our own needs, and at the same time have a surplus for ships to be built on foreign accounts; but unfortunately, notwithstanding the fact that we had an agreement with the United States for 80,000 tons of plate, up to the time of the signing of the armistice we had only been able to get some 6,000 tons. So I could do nothing else than say to these gentlemen that Canada could not afford to delay her own shipbuilding programme by building ships on foreign account.

With regard to the slowness of the construction of some of our ships, I admit that the yards have taken very much longer than I anticipated, but the delay has been unavoidable owing to the shortage of skilled and unskilled labour, and the great difficulty in getting shipbuilding plate from the United States, as well as engines, boilers, and other equipment. The ships are coming along more rapidly now than when the war was on. Before I leave the subject, I might say that quite recently there has been a great demand for space. Our ships are going to be operated by the Canadian Government Merchant Marine Limited, and naturally manufacturers and firms who have large orders for shipment abroad have been coming to the Marine Department to know whether or not they can get the tonnage. I have been approached, for instance, by the Dominion Coal Company, who told me that all their ships had been requisitioned by the British Minister of Shipping, and they wanted tonnage to send 1,000,000 tons of coal to Montreal. They said that unless the Canadian Government could provide the tonnage they might have to close down their mines, which would be almost a catastrophe. The steel men, the pulp men, the sugar men and the general produce merchants all want to know what tonnage the Canadian Government can provide. The British ships that are plying from Canadian ports at the present time have seventy per cent of their available cargo space reserved for the British Minister of Shipping, which leaves only thirty per cent for the Canadian export trade.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Are the Dominion Coal Company's ships on the British register?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Some of them are, and some are on the Canadian register.

Mr. MURPHY: Has the minister been able to meet the requirements of the Dominion Coal Company?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I did everything I could in that respect while I was in England last year. I have since sent many cables to the British Minister of Shipping. The Canadian High Commissioner, Sir George Foster, and Mr. Lloyd Harris have all done their very best, but I am sorry to say they have been unable to get the tonnage. To illustrate the great necessity of our having ships at the present time let me read a cable received by the Canadian Manufacturers' Association from Mr. R. J. Young of the Canadian Mission in London, under date of March 1, and which was handed to me only yesterday:

Our work here practically futile unless additional ocean space can be secured. Commercial shipments Canada to Great Britain now three times quantity space available, and rate of freight on many lines practically prohibitive, amounting in many instances to seventy-five per cent invoice value. Steamship companies in many instances charging double published rate.

He goes on to ask what assistance I can give, and concludes, addressing the Canadian Manufacturers' Association:

You may make statement that unless the matter of shipping is immediately attended to Canadian tr `e will suffer tremendous loss.

Sir SAM HUGHES: If some of the Dominion Coal Company's ships are on Canadian register, by what right can the British Admiralty requisition them?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Before a Canadian registered ship can be so requisitioned, application has to be made to the Canadian Government through the Minister of Marine. When the war was on and tonnage was required to transport munitions and foodstuffs and soldiers across the seas, the Canadian Government could not refuse to release the ships on Canadian register.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Why not get them back now?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Of course, we have no authority over the ships on the British register.

Mr. GAUTHIER: Did I understand the minister to say that we are importing all our steel plate from the United States?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: All the plate we have used on our ships to date has been imported from the United States. The plate mill at Sydney is not yet ready.

Mr. GAUTHIER: I asked the question because I was under the impression that, pursuant to the Order in Council passed in March, 1918, the Canadian Government had entered into a contract with the Dominion Steel Corporation for steel plates.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I shall come to that in a moment. I think it will interest the House to know what Australia is doing in the matter of shipbuilding. She is not only building her own merchant marine, but war ships too, so their Minister of the Naval Service, Sir Joseph Cook, informed me when I was in London. Australia has erected during the war a plate mill. Besides the ships Australia is now building, she bought ten ships in 1915 or 1916 and these have proved to be very profitable. They are now building twenty ships more. The Acting Minister of the Australian navy, Mr. Poynton, announced on April 10th that the Australian Government would remain in the shipping business and would continue its shipbuilding programme. He said that their present programme contemplated the building of twenty steel ships.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And war ships as well?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Yes. I now come to the policy of the Government for the future. I have already stated that we have forty-five ships under contract. There are at the present time certain yards in Canada that require business. Berths are becoming vacant, and many more will become vacant in the very near future. The Government has not finally decided how many additional ships they will order but I will bring down in my Supplementary Estimates the amount that the Government will think it wise to ask approval for. The sum of $30,000,000 that I am dealing with now is to complete the contracts that we have already let, but in view of the fact that there is a great demand for ships and also that we could sell some of our ships under contract at the present time if the Government deemed it wise to do so, we are not going to discontinue shipbuilding for the moment. We realize that there are 30,000 men engaged in the shipyards throughout Canada, from Prince Rupert to Halifax, and there are fully 10,000 more engaged in the industry of making engines, boilers, etc., and to cause 40,000 men to be out of employment at this time would be rather a dangerous thing to do. It is therefore not the intention of the Government to cease their shipbuilding programme now. We are going to order additional ships, at least to keep the yards that are requiring work busy throughout the balance of 1919, and probably for a few months in 1920.

Sir SAM HUGHES: What class of men are these shipbuilders? Are they British or Canadian people, or are they the foreign element that have been cursing us?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The hon. member must realize that I have no way of knowing the nationality of these 30,000 men, but I should imagine that a very large majority of them are Canadians or British subjects. I was told this morning by one shipbuilder, from the Halifax shipyards, who employs a thousand men, and will shortly be employing two thousand, that 29 per cent of his total staff are returned soldiers.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Hear, hear.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: There is such a scarcity of work that it would not be wise on the part of the Government to discontinue at once their shipbuilding programme.

Mr. LEMIEUX: As regards Vickers in Montreal, I may say that 95 per cent, if not 99 per cent, are full fledged Canadian or British subjects.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I do not want this House or the shipbuilders to think that the Government can go on forever ordering ships, because there must be a limit to the number of ships that the Canadian Government can use, and we are getting very near to that point. So that when I say that it is the intention of the Government, subject to the approval of Parliament, to order more ships, the shipbuilders must not expect that there will be many more orders to follow, and they must therefore look for orders for their shipyards in the same way as any other industry in the country would.

There is no protection whatever given to the shipbuilders in the way of duty and bonus, and when the yards of the United Kingdom are free a year and a half hence to take orders, it will be most difficult for the Canadian shipbuilder to compete unless some form of assistance is given by the Government. What that form of assistance will be has not yet been determined, but between now and the next session of the House we hope to have a policy ready to present to Parliament.

Mr. MURPHY: Will that mean more bonuses?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I said a moment ago that the Government had not decided what form of aid should be given to the shipbuilders. The matter has not been considered by the Government, but naturally when the shipyards complete the building of the ships that are ordered by the Government now, and a few more that will be ordered, it will be a problem that the Government will have to deal with, as to whether they will let these shipyards go out of existence altogether or give them a fair amount of protection the same as other Canadian industries are enjoying and have been enjoying for some years. That is all I wish to say on the shipbuilding policy and programme of the Government.

But I want to say something in reference to ship plate contracts. Over a year ago the Government entered into a contract for 250,000 tons of ship plates at $4.15 per hundred pounds based on the price of steel billets at $25.50, and as the price of steel billets would go down, so would the price of ship plates. From time to time the Government will place their auditors in the steel company's plant in order to check up their costs. The total amount of plate tonnage that we contracted for was 250,000 tons. What caused the Government to give this contract was the scarcity and the impossibility of getting ship plates from our neighbours to the south in order to carry on our shipbuilding programme. No one at that time could foresee the end of the war. It might be a year or more before the conclusion of hostilities, and when a country is at war, as Canada was, it is necessary to prepare for an indefinite continuance of war conditions. The shipyards at that time were paying for plate all the way from 4 cents a pound up to 10 cents. The ruling price in the United States, outside of the plates required for the Government ships, was from 4 to 5½ cents. I called into competition the great United States steel companies, besides inviting all the steel companies in Canada to tender, and the best price I could get was $4.15, the United States steel price being 4¼ cents per lb. Since the letting of this contract the armistice has been signed, and the price of steel plates has dropped to 2¾ cents in the United States and may possibly go lower. I therefore recently interviewed the officials of the steel company and pointed out to them that this was a war contract that we had entered into with them, and that in view of the price of steel plates having declined so much in the United States, and for other reasons, I wanted to negotiate with them for a modification of the existing contract. I met the President and the Vice-president of the Dominion Steel Corporation, who could not have met me in a more broad and patriotic spirit than they did; and while they said that they were sorry to lose such a contract if they had to, they were prepared to make any modifications that I, as a responsible minister would care to propose with the approval of the Government. These negotiations are being carried on at present, and the contract will either be modified or be entirely cancelled. The Government have not yet got the necessary information before them to decide what action they will take, but I am free to state now that we can modify the contract or, if we prefer, as they have met us in a very broad spirit, we can cancel it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is there a clause to that effect in the contract?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: No.

Mr. GAUTHIER: Did the Dominion Steel Company have all their plant erected?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The Dominion Steel Corporation have their plant partially up. There is no machinery or plant in it at all, and it is very far from completion. I understand it is only barely started.

Mr. GAUTHIER: The Order in Council of 26th March 1918, clause (j) reads:

> That all the machinery, plant and material of whatsoever nature or kind refined in the construction of the necessary mill, power facilities, steel making equipment, etc. . . . . to produce the steel plates covered by this proposal, shall be admitted into Canada free of all customs duties.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I was in negotiation with the president and the vice-president only as late as yesterday and they inform me that they have not brought any plant or machinery from the United States.

Mr. DUFF: The minister informed us earlier in his remarks that contracts had been entered into with different shipyards at from $180 to $215 a ton. I presume this price was made in view of the fact that either the shipyards or the Government would have to pay to the Dominion Steel Company or other manufacturers of steel $4.15 a hundred pounds. If, as the hon. gentleman has just told us, they make a new contract with the Dominion Steel Company, or if the steel company modifies their contract to meet American competition at $2.25, will the Government pay the shipbuilders $215 per ton dead weight for these ships?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The hon. gentleman could not have understood me correctly. As I said, the contract price was not based on the price of steel that we contracted for with the Dominion Steel Company, but on the price of steel that we contracted for with the United States Government at 3½ cents. It has really nothing to do with that price. Just before I leave this question may I say that I hope to receive the approval of the House for the $30,000,000 that I am now asking and I trust that when my Supplementary Estimates come down for the additional sum, for the reasons that I have explained this afternoon to the best of my ability, hon. members will give the Government their unanimous support. I hope they will not look upon this as a party question at all. I consider that our shipbuilding programme is a large, national question.

It has just occurred to me that I did not explain how these ships were going to be operated and if I might do so now I would say that at one time I thought I would organize a shipbuilding branch under the Department of Marine and Fisheries and engage a capable manager to operate the ships. But after careful and serious thought I could not see how I could keep the operation of these ships free from political influence, as it was desirable that we should, and therefore I thought the best policy for the Government to pursue would be to follow the good example of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which has its own steamships, while owned by the same shareholders as the railway, operated separately under the name of Ocean Services Limited. Therefore I recommended to the Government that Mr. D. B. Hanna and his board of directors should be responsible to the Government for the operation of the Government ships the same as they would be for the operation of the Government railways.

But in order that Parliament and the public would know what profits and losses these ships might make, I proposed that a steamship company be formed and it has been formed under the name of the Canadian Government Merchant Marine Limited. The operations of the ships are going to be kept separate from those of the railway. Mr. Hanna promised that he would procure one of the best stseamship managers that he could get and an efficient organization. In addition to that, as so many inquiries come into the Marine and Trade and Commerce Departments, there will be an advisory committee here that will not in any way interfere with the management of the ships by Mr. Hanna and his board of directors, but will act more in an advisory capacity

The Deputy Minister of Marine and Fisheries, Mr. Johnston, and the Deputy Minister of Trade and Commerce, Mr. O'Hara, will consult as often as necessary with the general manager of the Government ships in regard to what cargoes should be moved because there is more cargo available than the Government has ships to carry. As these ships are built for Canada alone, Mr. Hanna understands full well that they are not to be used in any foreign trade if there is business available in Canada. I am sorry to have taken up so much of the time of the House but if there is any further information that any hon. member wants I will be very glad to furnish it.

Sir HERBERT AMES: Is it the present intention of the Government to retain in its service these 45 ships and such additional ships as may be built or, inasmuch as the work is largely for the purpose of giving employment, is it intended to sell some of these ships and build others?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: That would depend altogether on the business offered. At the present time it would not be wise for the Government to sell any of their ships especially those that are ready to go into commission now. I had an offer from a New York firm to-day at $190 per ton which I have refused. It may be possible that some of the ships will not be completed until a later date and if we find the demand for ships and the volume of business falling off the Government might possibly sell some of the ships.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Some time ago the British Government, I understand, had a number of trawlers constructed in Canada which trawlers were sold. Inasmuch as the fishing business is only in its infancy in Canada might I ask the minister if he has considered the advisability of the Government, possibly not now but later on, assisting Canadian corporations in the construction of trawlers in Government yards, or under some other system, so that we may have our own fleet of trawlers engaged in the fishing industry in this country with ocean ships to convey the products to the nations of the world?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The hon. member (Sir Sam Hughes) knows as well as I do that of the trawlers and drifters built in this country only 6 were built for Canada. These trawlers and drifters were built probably more for war purposes than anything else. A large number of trawlers and drifters, which some people think belong to the Canadian Government, are at Liverpool at the present time. The British Government have sold some and they might possibly sell more. The Canadian Government have only six trawlers on hand for the time being.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Why not assist in developing that trade by encouraging a corporation here to go into the business? Would it not be well for the Government to assist them in building ships?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: There would never be any demand for trawlers except by fishermen, and I am quite sure that they would not pay the price of these expensive war trawlers. The sum they would want to pay would be so small that no one could build a similar type of trawler for it. I hope our friends in Canada will build the type of trawler that our fishermen need and at a price which they can pay.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: As the Government railways are under the control of the Railway Commission as to rates, tolls and tariff agreements, is it the intention of the Government to place the ships under the same commission in regard to rates and tolls?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: That would be a matter for Mr. D. B. Hanna and his board of directors to consider more than it would be a question for the Government. It would be a very difficult problem for any Government to undertake to control rates for ocean traffic. But if it is at all feasible, the Government would be willing to join in with the others.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: I might call the minister's attention to the fact that I received to-day from the United States Shipping Board a complete statement of all the rates that they have made for their ships going out to all foreign ports. They have hundreds of different rates and they have tariff agreements and such things in connection with shipping.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: This is a little different from the statement in a newspaper article that I have before me. I did not want to take up the time of the House, but if it will bear with me for a moment I will just refer to it. Mr. Hurley, the chairman of the United States Shipping Board, says that they have built 555 ocean-going steel ships, that they have contracts for 1,336 similar vessels yet to be built, and that when the programme is finished they will have 16,732,700 tons of shipping. Mr. Hurley's proposal, which he is going to submit to the American Congress, is that the United States Government shall sell these ships to private persons. Mr. Hurley goes so far as to say that he is willing to recommend to the American Government that they be sold, not at the cost of construction to the Government, but at the cost of construction at the time the sale was made.

He also, of course, states that he hopes the American Government will be able to control rates; but I do not see how they can very well do so. He further states that they are going to set aside the large sum of $15,000,000 for what he calls a Merchant Marine Development Fund, so that if any of their ships are on a trade route that does not prove to be profitable, the American Government will come to their aid. He also states that the United States is striving to be the leading maritime nation of the world; and consequently we must recognize the keen competition that we are going to have from the States.

Mr. GERVAIS: Has the Government any ships under construction at Sorel; and if not, why not? The yards have many facilities for ship construction; the necessary skilled workmen are available, and as the Government seems to be in a hurry to build ships, why not take advantage of the Sorel yards?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Sorel has no shipyard that could build the type of ship we have been ordering. That was the reason we could not place any orders there.

Mr. GERVAIS: Have not the Government in the past built at Sorel ships three or four hundred feet long?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The Government have not built any ships at Sorel equal to the tonnage of the ships I have just referred to.

Mr. T. FOSTER: How many orders have been placed in Toronto, and have the Polson Company been given any?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The Government have not placed any orders with any of the Toronto shipyards, for the very good reason that the two shipyards there had their berths all occupied either by ships they were building for the Norwegian Government before our ship-building programme was undertaken, or by ships they were building for Canadian register. I know they have berths vacant now, but whether the Government will be able to place any orders with them or not will depend on the amount that I bring down in my Supplementary Estimates, and the approval of the House thereto.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I would like to get information on two points. I understand from the minister that he does not intend to carry out the proposal made in the report of the Marine and Fisheries Department. In that report at page 15 I find that the Government purposed to build annually 200,000 tons of merchant shipping at an estimated cost of $40,000,000 to $50,000,000. The minister to-day does not seem to hold the same view, because, if I understand him correctly, he says that when the present orders are filled, the shipbuilders will have to look out for orders elsewhere. I would like him to explain if there is really a change in the policy of the Government in that regard. I quite understand that when this policy was inaugurated ships were very scarce and the policy was justified on account of the war. The criticism of my hon. friend (the leader of the Opposition) is quite pertinent, however, when he says that the Government were very slow, that they allowed three or four years to elapse before they did anything, and then when prices were almost as high as they ever will be and when the war was nearly over they embarked on the shipbuilding programme. When this report was issued I understand the war was over, but in it I find, as I have said, that there is a proposal to go on with this shipbuilding programme.

The minister has told us that the programme is justified in order to afford ocean freight facilities for our railway system. We are undertaking the management of an enormous railway system, and of course we hope to have a great deal of traffic for export to deliver at seaboard. But I think the minister has undertaken to build the wrong class of ships, if he expects them to make connections with the National Railway system. He mentioned that the Government were following the policy of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. That company has never embarked on the building of tramp vessels. It has built liners that make regular trips, connect with its railway system, and undertake to route goods to certain places and to deliver them on certain dates. That does not seem to be what my hon. friend is doing. He is building a large fleet of slow tramp vessels that are not suitable, and never will be suitable, for that class of work. He tells us that the speed of a certain class is 8 knots, of another class 11 knots, and of the highest class only 13 knots. Well, my hon. friend will be very far behind in competing with the Canadian Pacific Railway or any other railway system with ships of that class.

I would like the minister to explain to me how a tramp vessel owned by the Canadian Government is any better to carry freight from or to our railway terminals than a privately owned tramp vessel. If the rates are the same, the service is the same; they are exactly alike. There is no advantage to the trade of Canada to have the work done by a tramp vessel owned by the Government rather than by one owned by John Smith or anybody else. The only advantage that I can see at all although I do not advise it, would be to have regular liners to carry our mails and passengers, and which would enable the Government to say to a merchant: "We can take your freight at a certain point on a certain day, and we can deliver it at Liverpool, London, Bristol, or some other point on a certain day." Then we would be able to get trade in that way routed through our own transportation system. But I do not see for the life of me how tramp vessels are going to be any advantage to our railway system. Cargo for shipment from Montreal to London does not belong to the Canadian Government, it belongs to some merchant, and he does not care whether the Government boat or any other boat carries it. If he has cargo to ship he asks his broker to put it up on the exchange, the broker does so, and the shipowner who quotes the lowest figure gets the business, and no one asks who owns the vessel. There would be no advantages to the trader or the farmer unless the minister intends to cut rates. If he intends to do that, then the question comes up as to how he will get along. I submit that he will have a lot of trouble if he undertakes to compete for cargo at lower rates than those quoted by the ordinary tramp vessels. The first thing he knows those tramp vessels will desert the St. Lawrence river, and go where the prices are highest. If the minister attempts to quote below the market rates that is what will happen, and he will drive away all vessels not owned by the Canadian Government. He knows very well that ocean freight rates are not subject to the same rules as railway rates. A railway line has a monopoly between certain points, but the tramp vessel has no monopoly. If there is cargo to carry to any part of the world every tramp vessel is ready to compete for it. The proposal is put up on the blackboard in London or New York, and it makes no difference what the ownership of the vessel is, she will get the cargo if she will carry it at the cheapest rate.

That is one of the incidents of trade that you cannot overcome. So that when we embark upon the construction of tramp vessels we are simply putting our money unnecessarily into something that might far better be left in private hands. My hon. friends who are in favour of public ownership might justify the public ownership of a regular steamship service that would connect with our railways, but I do not see how they can justify the ownership of these tramp vessels. The minister has not had very much experience so far in running these vessels; the half dozen or so that he has, he has turned over to the Canadian Government Railways, under whose control they are operated. Members of the House who have been making inquiries about what these vessels are doing have not been able to ascertain so far that they have been developing Canadian trade. On the contrary, we find that they have been developing the trade of the United States and paying very little attention to what our railways are carrying to the seaboard. Several questions were asked about these vessels. Inquiries were made with regard to the steamer McKee, and we were frankly told by the Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid) that this Government-owned vessel was chartered by a New York concern to carry a cargo of coal from New York to Chili, and that she was going to carry back a cargo of ore. The minister was criticised for using a Government ship in developing foreign trade, and the excuse he gave was that the ship was small and he did not want to send her across the Atlantic in the winter season; he thought it was much safer to send her around Cape Horn to Chili. That is an excuse that any shipping man would laugh at, because if there is a stormy spot in the world, it is around Cape Horn. Crossing the Atlantic would be a much safer trip for any small vessel. I do not think, therefore, that the reason given is the real reason. The same thing came up in regard to the Voyageur. She was not engaged in carrying Canadian goods; at the time the inquiry was made she was carrying sugar from the West Indies to New York. I do not know what the others are doing, but so far the experience has been that these tramp vessels are not doing anything in the way of developing Canadian trade.

With regard to the price of these vessels, I think I was mistaken in the quotation I gave to-day from the article in the Financial Post. When I looked at it more closely I found that it referred to ships produced in Great Britain in pre-war days, not at the present time. I do not want to make any mistake about that; I want to get as near to the truth as I can and to assist the minister in any way that I can in this matter. I find the following article in a despatch from New York published by the Montreal Star:

"The average cost per ton to build ships in England now is about £23, or $115," said Lt.-Col. Claude Bryan, who is a director of the Palmer Shipbuilding Company, at Jarrow-on-Tyne, on his arrival here this week.

"Elimination of Germany as a factor in shipping means the restoration of the industry to a normal and practical basis. There will be no more ships built of the enormous tonnage of the Vaterland and the Aquitania. Germany tried to outdo the world in building these huge vessels, but the Cunard came back with even larger ships, but all to no good purpose financially. The German liners have been marine failures while the Cunarders, with greater and more convenient passenger accommodations, have shown a profit entirely out of proportion to their investment."

"All the shipyards of England are booked up for at least two years. Contracts are made 'time and line' or cost plus a profit of from seven and a half per cent to ten per cent to the builder."

He says that the average per ton cost to build ships in England now is about £23, or $115—not half, but approximately half the cost of producing ships in Canada. So that we are paying a very high price for the ships that we are producing.

Mr. STEVENS: The statement of the eminent authority quoted by my hon. friend is that the British yards are booked for two years and that the contracts on which they are working are on a cost plus ten per cent basis. How, therefore, can my hon. friend say in the same breath that the cost is $115 a ton?

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The hon. gentleman is quite correct. We must make that allowance. We cannot produce ships at that rate in Canada. My hon. friend is not able to show that we can logically go on with the building of ships in Canada at the price we are now paying. Of course, we may be able to do it with Government assistance; that is how we are doing it now. But we could not do it without that Government assistance.

This programme is not a shipbuilding programme at all; it is a ship-owning programme. The Government is ordering ships at practically $200 a ton and they are bound to lose part of the money by the time they get through. If the Government arrived at some policy that would enable private capital to build the ships, they would be doing something worth while for Canada; but when the Government stop pouring out their money, the shipbuilding will stop. My hon. friend hinted a while ago that the Government did not intend to go very long on this policy of building ships and that the shipbuilders would have to look out for themselves. Well, that is a very poor prospect for any person who wants to put his money in a shipyard. If the Government really want to assist shipbuilding, what they should do is not to buy tramp vessels at enormous prices, but find some means by which the Canadian investor can put his own money into shipbuilding and compete successfully in that business with the outside world.

The minister is simply buying ships at a very high price, a price that will enable any builder to build them for him, but he is not doing anything to make it possible later on for a Canadian to build ships himself and to enable the Canadian people to become maritime ship-owning people. That is really a matter that the Government ought to tackle. The shipbuilding efforts of the Government have so far not been very successful. The trawlers, about which the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) spoke a few minutes ago, were built in the yards of Vickers, and Polson's.

Mr. BUTTS: Did I understand the hon. member to say that the Canadian Pacific do not own or did not build tramp steamers?

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: No, I did not say that. I said that the Canadian Pacific were building a different line of vessels altogether that were capable of carrying their freight from their railway terminals to the markets of the world.

Mr. BUTTS: What I understood the hon. member to say was that the Canadian Pacific does not own any tramp steamer or did not build any.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The Canadian Pacific, I understand, never owned tramp steamers as such. They have some old passenger steamers which they are using for carrying freight, but they are not in the tramp steamer business.

I was referring to trawlers that were built by the present Administration in connection with the war. I have been looking over the accounts for the construction of those trawlers, which accounts any hon. member can find in the room where the Public Accounts Committee meets, and I find that the seven trawlers that were sold at Halifax recently cost $704,955.51. It would appear from the information that we get from questions answered by the minister that they all had to undergo repairs very shortly after they were built; that they were built in such a haphazard way that they were unseaworthy. According to the Public Accounts, $134,917.22 was expended in repairs. Those trawlers were sold a few weeks ago.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I do not wish to curtail the discussion in any way, but the hon. member is referring to trawlers which were built for the British Government, and which have nothing to do with the subject under consideration.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: They may have been built nominally for the British Government, but they were really built for the Canadian Government. The Canadian Government paid for them and they appear in the Canadian Government accounts which we are now examining in the Public Accounts Committee, so that I think I have a right to refer to them. I find those trawlers were sold for $270,000. They cost including repairs $839,872.73, so that they were sold at a loss to the country of $569,872.73. The extraordinary thing to me is that the minister or somebody in the Department of Marine and Fisheries did not think of utilizing those trawlers on the coast for fishing purposes. The price at which they were sold is a mere bagatelle compared with what they cost, and it would surely have been profitable for some enterprising Canadian to use them on our coasts in developing our great fishing industry. I find also that 65 per cent has been allowed Vickers by the minister for what are called overhead charges. I am not very familiar with manufacturing, and I am not going to say that that is an extortionate rate, because I am not sure, but it looks large to me. For example, I find, for labour in connection with the construction of those trawlers in Vickers' yard in Montreal, an account dated August 29, 1917, amounting to $10,790.86. The builder is allowed to add 65 per cent to that for overhead charges, or $7,014.08, making a total of $17,804.94. Sixty-five per cent looks large to me for overhead charges, and has the appearance of profiteering. But this account is certified that the prices charged are fair and just, signed by Mr. James A. Wilson, Director of Stores. Another certificate reads:

> I hereby certify that the prices are according to contract.
> (Signed) L. J. Beausoleil,
> Chief Accountant.

It appears, therefore, that the minister must have made a contract by which he allowed Vickers Limited to charge an overhead charge of 65 per cent in addition to the cost of labour. Take another account:

War appropriation vote—6 steel trawlers.
Labour	$5,491.23
Commission, 65 per cent	3,569.30
Total	$9,060.53

I should like the minister, if he does me the honour at any time of replying, to explain to the Committee if he regards that 65 per cent overhead charge as reasonable.

Last night some very serious charges were made against the Department of Naval Affairs by the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff). They were so serious that the leader of the Government (Sir Thomas White) decided that he would not go on any further with the estimate, but would give an opportunity to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) to answer the hon. member for Lunenburg.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend is not quite correct in his statement. I did not say that it was in consequence of the seriousness of the charges made by the hon. member for Lunenburg that we would not proceed further with the Bill. I stated that I would direct the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the speech of the hon. member for Lunenburg and that the minister would make a reply at a convenient time upon his estimates.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The Committee were told last night that this was a matter that would come better from the Minister of Naval Affairs, and that an opportunity would be given to-day to discuss this very important matter. I was surprised that the Minister of Naval Affairs took his seat without making any reference whatever to the serious charges brought before the Committee last night by the hon. member. There were charges of incompetence, of extravagance, of injustice in regard to the employment and handling of men, and although some of them were very serious charges no reply to them has yet come from the Minister of Naval Affairs. We were told that a certain warship called the Lady Evelyn was well equipped and well officered and was in the vicinity of a German submarine at the time the latter was sinking fishing vessels off the coast of Nova Scotia.

But instead of being employed, as she was intended to be employed, in protecting the vessels and the fishermen from the German submarine, she was sent to the Magdalen Islands with half a dozen lead pencils and some packages of paper. I believe it is true that the log of the Lady Evelyn shows that on the very day the German submarine was sinking Nova Scotia ships off Canso the Lady Evelyn was within 80 miles of the point where the submarine was operating.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: The item under discussion is a vote of $30,000,000 for the building of the Government merchant marine. I am sorry that an engagement prevented me from being in the House last night when the hon. member for Lunenburg made his long list of charges in regard to naval affairs. I have not had time to read those charges yet, but I shall do so at the first opportunity, and when the Naval Estimates are under consideration I shall reply to them. I think, Mr. Chairman, the hon. gentleman should confine his remarks to the item before us, which has to do with marine, and not with naval affairs.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I had no knowledge of the minister's intentions. I had supposed that in his speech he would deal with both naval and marine affairs. I was very much surprised that the minister made no reply at all to the charges of the hon. member for Lunenburg. When the minister interrupted, I was pointing out that the Lady Evelyn was in the vicinity at the time—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. The minister has risen to a point of order.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I had only half finished my sentence when the minister interrupted me. With regard to the shipbuilding programme of the Government, I have no doubt whatever that the ships we have built have cost us altogether too much money. Furthermore, I have no doubt that the situation is very largely due to our tariff policy, which makes it impossible for us to build ships in Canada at a price to compete with the ships built on the Clyde and other points in Great Britain. There may be other factors. The cost of labour, for instance, is a very important item, but that cost has gone up very much in Great Britain during the last year or two. I am told that it is ninety per cent higher in Great Britain than what it was two or three years ago, so the chances are that the cost of labour in Great Britain and Canada will come to be about the same. I think the Canadian workman can do just as much in a day as the British workman, and perhaps more. Our great handicap is our high protective tariff. Something could be done to relieve the situation by bounties, and bounties have been granted in other countries. Germany and France have both given bounties to shipbuilding. France, indeed, paid bounties not only on the building of ships, but on the running of the ships after they were built. French ships a few years ago, in order to help them compete with British ships built in a free trade country, were paid so much a mile for every voyage made, and we had the ridiculous situation of French captains steering the most crooked course in order to make the longest possible voyage. During all this time Great Britain has held her own, because she has acted on the principle that the cost of the material that goes into the building of the ship is the main thing, and that ships can be built cheap only in a free trade country. The difference between Great Britain and Canada in the cost of the material is enormous. The Financial Post says:

> At present, ships built in Canada are costing about double what they cost in the United Kingdom. This is due to the high cost of material which, in turn, is due to the high cost of labour mainly.
> Steel plates have been available to buiders in Great Britain at a price of approximately, fifty-five dollars a ton. Compare that with the following schedule, showing the delivered cost of steel per long ton from Pittsburg and Chicago to different points in Canada:

From Pittsburgh to	Cost per long ton.
Vancouver, Victoria and Prince Rupert	$102.25
Port Arthur	89.37
Toronto	74.84
Collingwood	80.19
Montreal	96.89
Three Rivers	81.87
Quebec	81.87
Halifax	84.67

If the man in Vancouver has to pay $102.25 a ton for the plates which the British shipbuilder can get for $55 a ton, how can his ship compete with the ship built in England? The economic law is very simple. The British and Canadian ship are both competing for the same business.

Mr. CURRIE: The hon. member quoted $55 a ton as the British price. That was the pre-war price of plates in Britain. In quoting the American prices, the hon. member gave the war price. Every one knows that during the war the cost of building plates in Britain was greater than in the United States, for Britain was buying its plates from the United States.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: My hon. friend is mistaken. These are the only figures I have. This article says that steel plates have been available to builders in Great Britain at approximately £55 a ton. If that means anything, it means they are available now to builders in Great Britain at that price.

Mr. CURRIE: A loaf of bread in London costs the workman 25 per cent less than the Ottawa workman has to pay. How does the hon. member account for that?

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I quite understand that prices vary from time to time, but they have not been going down very much so far. I admit there has been a slight decrease in United States prices. I was saying that the economic law is very simple. A ship —I am speaking of freight vessels—that is built in Halifax or Quebec at $200 a ton cannot possible compete with the ship that is built on the Clyde or the Humber at $100 a ton. If there is a cargo of wheat to carry from River Platte to Liverpool both these ships have a chance at the business, and the ship that costs the less will in the end beat the other. If the Minister of Marine intends to do anything permanent and satisfactory in the way of establishing Canada as a ship-owning country he must adopt a low tariff policy. Give the shipholder of Canada a fair chance and he will fight his way and win.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: It is rather difficult for me to follow the hon. member. He refers to the Government merchant marine ships as tramp ships. If these ships are tramp ships, then all cargo vessels that ply the various waters are also tramp ships. The hon. member goes on to say that unless a ship is a passenger ship she cannot make time from one port to another. For the life of me, I cannot see why a ship, we will say of eleven knots sea speed, leaving the port of Montreal for Liverpool should not make her schedule time just the same as a passenger ship can. My hon. friend is a business man and he realizes that cargo ships are necessarily for carrying cargoes, and that it would not be an economical policy for the Government to build palatial passenger vessels to carry the cargoes that these ships are designed to carry. He goes on to say that there is no difference between the freight ships built in the United States, in England, or in Canada. He must know that there is a vast difference in the design, speed and types of ships, just as there is in the various kinds of automobiles that are made. I cannot understand the hon. member when he classes all freight ships together, as regards cost and design. He is at a loss to know what particular use the Government are going to make of their merchant marine ships to co-operate with the railways, and suggests that instead of having these freight ships we should have passenger ships plying on the various oceans. Every one knows that a passenger ship has not as much available space for cargo as a cargo ship, and therefore the policy of the Government is a sound business policy. These ships were never designed to carry passengers at all, but were designed and are being built to carry cargoes. They are what the Canadian National Railway Company wants, because the government ships will carry freight from the Orient to Vancouver, and the Canadian National Railway System will carry the freight to whatever point in Canada it may be destined for.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Will the Canadian Government ships carry cargo at current market rates?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Rates are very high and profitable now, but as market rates drop it would not be supposed that the general manager of the steamship company for the Government would ask for higher rates than those ruling at the time. These ships are being built in order that the people of Canada and the Government may control the freight from the time that it leaves the port from which it is shipped to the time it reaches its destination in Canada, and they will carry export cargoes from mine, field, and forest, and from our industries here. The United States Government have put a ban on the export of wheat from the ports of Baltimore,New York, and Boston. What would this Government do to carry the wheat of our great western prairies if we had not the ships we had now? I really cannot follow the hon. member's reasoning at all. Cargo ships are built for the very purpose of carrying freight, and the Government shipbuilding programme does not include a passenger service. Whether we shall build passenger ships and have them ply on the Pacific and Atlantic is a subject that has not yet engaged the attention of the Government, but I may say that the ships we have built are modern up-to-date cargo ships, and I do not think they should be referred to as ordinary tramp ships. They are built for the purposes of the trade of Canada and to assist the Canadian National Railways, and I am sure the majority of the members of this House will support the Government policy.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I am sure that the Committee will agree with me unanimously when I express my own pleasure at seeing the hon. minister (Mr. Ballantyne) back in his seat after a very serious illness.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I want to say just a few words upon this part of the Government's programme and I want those words to be words of moderation. I suppose that shipbuilding in this country was undertaken under the pressure of war time, and as the war is over I trust I shall keep within the bounds of moderation when I express the hope that the Government will very carefully consider this business before they give a very wide extension to it. I was very much interested and edified by the remarks of my hon. friend from Guysborough with regard to the operation of tariffs in relation to shipbuilding. As a matter of fact this shipbuilding programme of the Government is only one more illustration of the extraordinary things which people do when they are under a protective tariff. As my hon. friend indicated, we in Canada are under a very high protective tariff—not the fault of either party. With the exception of the war-time addition to the tariff, the present tariff of Canada was a bequest to the present Government from the previous government. I do not think that is capable of successful contradiction. There has been practically no change, except for war-time additions, from the tariff which prevailed practically from 1896 to 1911. If one comes to think of it, it really seems a ridiculous thing to want to build ships and do commerce at sea under high protective tariff, because a tariff is to prevent the taking of goods into your country, and when a ship goes across the sea with a cargo from Canada, it can only do successful business by bringing back a cargo. So that there is an absolute incompatibility between high tariffs and successful shipping. They do not go on together in the world to any great extent. If you make your tariff high enough you may need penitentiaries and jails and all sorts of institutions within your country, but you will not need many ships, and if you build them you will not be able to use them. That is not only a matter of sound economic study, as my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) has indicated, but it is a matter of history.

There has only been one great shipping country in the world and that has been the United Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland under free trade. I promised to use the language of moderation and perhaps I am putting that a little too absolutely, but how near it is to the truth will be brought home to every one in this Committee when we reflect that before the war sixty per cent of the ships of the entire world were being built by and were owned by Great Britain; with her two little islands which occupy less than half the area of the province of Alberta. In the face of that single fact, I think it is scarcely the language of exaggeration to say that there has only been one great shipping country in the world. We hear sometimes about Germany being a competitor with Great Britain in shipping before the war. Before the war more work was being turned out on the Clyde than in the whole German Empire. Germany, to do the work she did do, had to adopt free trade up to a certain point because everybody knows who knows anything about this question that Germany for years was allowing in free of duty all articles entering into the building of ships. For that reason the Committee will understand why I feel that I should be just a little cautious in advising the Government to embark upon a very large shipbuilding enterprise in Canada and a little cautious about supporting them if they do.

But, as I say, this thing was done under the pressure of war time and from that point of view I should desire to make my criticism of the policy as moderate as possible, especially having regard to the fact that the minister has been suffering from a very serious illness. However, I should not be doing my duty to the Government or the country if I did not say that I do not believe that under her present system of tariffs Canada can compete for one moment with the Old Country in shipbuilding. I do not believe it is a possibility.

I am afraid the Government made a mistake in taking this work out of the hands of the Imperial Munitions Board. We are all familiar with what has been stated openly in the public press about that, and I fear that unless we have a very careful contradiction of these statements we will have to admit that the Government made a mistake in taking this shipbuilding business out of the hands of the Imperial Munitions Board, even during war time because we know that war time produced all sorts of fads, such as shipbuilding, daylight saving, and any number of other nonsensical things which will die a natural death. I do not mean that shipbuilding is a nonsensical proposal; it is only nonsensical when you attempt to make it a success under a high protective tariff. I would like to make that qualification of my statement.

It is also said that, in the work which we have done in connection with shipbuilding in Canada, we have entered into very unprofitable, if not ruinous, contracts. I do not know much about the Dominion Iron and Steel Company. I suppose we should look for light in connection with this subject from my hon. friend who leads the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie). He must know something about it, as these works are in his constituency, and he will no doubt enlighten the Committee as to the figures which have been published in the daily newspapers, as to the contract that has been entered into between the Dominion Government and the Dominion Iron and Steel Company and as to the price paid for steel plates. I am sure, from the deep interest that he takes in matters concerning his own constituency, he will give us the benefit of his information and of the accurate statistics which must be within his reach on such a question.

Mr. McKENZIE: If my hon. friend will allow me—

Mr. M. CLARK: My hon. friend will have an opportunity; I will be finished in a moment.

Mr. McKENZIE: I only want to correct my hon. friend in the statement that he has made. I would be very proud to have that industry in my constituency, but I must not take something that does not belong to me. It is not in my county.

Mr. M. CLARK: Has the steel company no connection with your county at all?

Mr. McKENZIE: No, not the Dominion Steel Company.

Mr. M. CLARK: Well, the province is not so great, and my hon. friend is always well acquainted with everything that is going on in Nova Scotia. His information about Nova Scotia is not confined to what goes on in Cape Breton. We know the encyclopædic nature of his knowledge, and I do not use the word in any sneering sense. We all admire the hard work that he does on behalf of the Opposition which he leads in this House, and we would be glad to have from him information about this contract between the Government and a company which has its main works in the province of Nova Scotia.

Mr. DUFF: Does my hon. friend not think that he could get that information more readily from the Government which made the contract with the Dominion Iron and Steel Company, seeing that he is a friend of the Government?

Mr. M. CLARK: I will take any suggestion whatsoever and be glad to co-operate with my hon. friend in getting information that this country and Parliament should have. But I would suggest to my hon. friend that it is treating the Opposition rather cheaply if he delegates to one who is supporting the Government on many subjects the duty of the Opposition. I should advise him to readjust his ideas about what the duty of the Opposition is in this House. My suggestion was not made to my hon. friend. It was made to the leader of the Opposition, who, at least, will be able to deal with my point in his own way and at his own time. There has been something said about the price of steel plates in war time, at the present time and before the war. My information, Mr. Chairman, is that the price of steel plates and the price of freights are both tumbling at the present time—tumbling fast—and it will be a good thing for the poor people of all countries if the prices of ordinary articles of use in the household tumble at the same time. I think the Government should have something to do with that "tumbling" and should do something not only to relieve the high cost of contracts but to relieve the high cost of living. That is the information we have about both freights and steel plates at the present moment and if it is correct I think that it is a very good reason why the Government should go very slowly about further extending this shipbuilding programme of theirs.

The minister has asked how we will get our wheat out unless we have ships to carry it. I should like to point out that if we are going too far along the line of high tariffs we will be landed in the situation of keeping both the wheat and the ships. We shall only be able to sell the wheat that we produce when we are up against the competition of the world again if we carry on trade in the way I believe it will be done in the very near future. We can only sell a certain amount of wheat in the world in competition with other countries that are producing it if we take the proper method of building up international trade and you cannot build up international trade or operate ships successfully unless you reduce your tariff in this country.

What is happening on the high seas of the world at the present moment? I am glad my hon. frend the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) is in his seat because I want this last breeze to reach him before he brings his Budget down which will be fateful in its effect both in regard to the political conditions in this country and to the prosperity and progress of Canada and our ability to take our proper place in the commerce of the world.

I am credibly informed that within three weeks of the armistice British ships laden with cargoes of dry goods from Lancashire and with other merchandise were heading their way, after having done nothing but war work for four years and a quarter, to South America and to other parts of the world. And I want to ask my hon. friend (the Minister of Marine) in regard to this difficulty of getting wheat out, what he thinks those ships would do when they discharged their cargoes? Why Mr. Chairman, inevitably they would load up with wheat, if it was to be had, and if not, they would load up with some other return cargoes to pay for those dry goods and other merchandise. But we have indulged in the folly of trying to foster a cotton trade in this country; which the biggest man in the cotton trade has said never should have been attempted—that this country is not adapted for it. As we refused in a large measure to take excellent Lancashire cottons—I am talking of pre-war prices—at half the price we have to pay for them in a country where there never should have been a cotton industry, naturally the vessels go elsewhere, and of course they do not take our cargoes back.

I am glad my hon. friend from Guysborough raised this question. The trade question is at the root of shipping. The instinct of shipping is in the very blood of Britons, because for centuries they have gone down to the sea in ships. And to try to build up a shipbuilding policy in this country while we maintain a high tariff, is a contradiction in economics, a contradiction to common sense, and diametrically opposed to all commercial history. I wanted to say that on general principles. I wanted to show how, and how alone in my judgment, shipbuilding can be promoted in Canada. I wanted to impress upon the minister (Mr. Ballantyne) and the Government that unless the fiscal policy of the country is changed this shipbuilding policy will be a white elephant, and all the subsidies you may grant, and all the artifices you may use to make it otherwise will fail. I do hope my hon. friend the Minister of Finance has been listening to me, because this has a most important bearing upon the reconstruction of Canada in which we are all interested, and which we wish to see taking place upon a proper basis and with every chance of this country being the country it should be amongst the nations of the world.

Mr. CURRIE: I had the idea, Mr. Chairman, that I was one of the bluest Tories in Canada, but I have at last found one hon. member whose views stick tighter than those of any other man in this country, because the views he has enunciated on free trade are the old, old story, and he remains positively the same. He has decided that we must have no industries in this country.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: What is there old about the story of vessels going to South America as soon as the armistice was concluded? That was up to date.

Mr. CURRIE: I am just going to answer that. One argument he put up was that Canada should not have a cotton trade, and he advanced cogent reasons why Lancashire occupies her premier position as the centre of the cotton trade. Of course this House knows very well that cotton is not grown in Lancashire; they import it just the same as we do. He cannot therefore argue that we should not have a cotton industry in Canada just the same as they have in Lancashire. They are able to compete in the markets of the world because they have their skilled workmen; and we can do exactly the same thing. We do not grow cotton in Canada, but we have cheaper power, and in the long run the cotton industry in this country will be in just as strong a position as it is in England, and there is just as much reason why we should have a cotton trade as there is that England should have it.

Now, there is nothing so vital before the people in this country at the present moment as this question of trade and shipbuilding. I am in touch with the shipbuilding industry, there being a large shipbuilding yard in my riding; and I am also in touch with foreign trade. This country during the war did not confine itself entirely to the manufacture of munitions. It carried on trade all over the world by ousting German goods in South America, China, Japan, India and other countries. That trade grew to vast proportions, it amounted last year to something like half a billion dollars—that is outside of munitions and foodstuffs—and that is a trade I think we should carry on. That is the condition that obtained during the war. Previous to the war it was difficult to carry on shipbuilding in Canada on account of this so-called free trade. The hon. gentleman who has spoken (Mr. Michael Clark) told the truth in that respect. We had free trade in ships. Ships that were built in Great Britain could come into Canada free, they could go up on the Great Lakes and carry on their trade as long as they were of British registry. There is no necessity of changing our policy in that respect, because protection did not touch that matter at all, and the hon. member for Guysborough knows that very well. He knows that British ships traded in Canada free. Ships from Great Britain carried on a coasting trade from town to town and from Fort William to the Lake Erie ports freely, and not a cent of tariff was paid by those ships.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: My hon. friend will perhaps admit that the size of our canals afforded some protection, because only a certain class of ships could come in?

Mr. CURRIE: The moon is made of green cheese. That is no argument. That is only a question of the length of the ships. Other nations could have brought their ships in here. The Germans, for instance, could have done so. The canals were free to any nation in the world. The question of free trade versus protection was not involved, in this subject at all. My hon. friend knows very well what is the fact to-day, that all the material entering into shipbuilding can be brought into this country free of duty. There is no duty on bars, plates, or anything of that kind, that enter shipbuilding, and for that reason shipbuilding can be carried on in this country regardless of tariff and should be encouraged.

What was the reason that we wanted to get into a shipbuilding business, and why were these contracts given for ships? We all know that with the advent of the submarine the economics of war, as I might say, underwent a great change. The world found that ship after ship was being lost, that there was a great shortage of ocean shipping, and that the goods of this country might not find their way abroad. As a matter of fact at the present moment there are millions of dollars worth of goods in the warehouses of Canada awaiting shipment to China, Japan, and other foreign countries, and we cannot get the bottoms to ship them out. The absurdity of standing up and opposing a programme that will give us a few ships to carry on this foreign trade shows to my mind the ignorance of those men who speak on topics they do not know anything about. If you go to any Canadian manufacturer to-day you will find that his warehouses are filled with goods for export to South America, China, South Africa and India, and that he cannot find any shipping for them. For New Zealand they will not take a car of stuff from any station in Ontario to-day until ships are provided, and there are no ships for the thousands of dollars worth of merchandise lying in our warehouses waiting for shipment to that country.

Hon. gentlemen who discuss questions affecting the commerce of the country should post themselves a little better in the matter. The world is moving; conditions to-day are not as they were twenty years ago. The wheat of the country should be taken out on our own ships. Every nation to-day is jealous of its shipping. At the very moment that the Government gave its first contract for the building of ships the Japanese Government established a programme, to extend over seven years, for the purpose of absorbing every pound of plate they could get in Canada or in the United States. If the Minister of Marine wants to sell his ships, he can sell them to-morrow to the Japanese Government at ten or fifteen dollars a ton more than he is paying for them. There is no lack of market for ships to-day throughout the world. The contracts were not improvident.

The hon. gentleman quoted the Financial Post as saying that plate was selling at $55 a ton. With pig iron selling at Lancaster at $50 I do not see how you can get plate at $55. The quotation given in the Post is an absurdity. Plate is really selling higher to-day in England than it is in Pittsburg; the Government absorbed the difference. If we do not have our own ships during the next five or ten years we cannot carry on business with any foreign country, because each nation has taken hold of its shipping as a national business and will not allow its ships to be used in the trade of any other nation. Great Britain has absolute control of its own shipping; a British ship cannot go to a foreign port without getting authority from the British Government to do so. During the war embargoes were placed on shipping as against foreign countries. For nearly a year foreign shipping was not allowed to go to Norway because Norway would not allow its ships to be used by the Allies, and thousands of tons of freight were lying in the harbours of New York, Boston and Montreal awaiting shipment to Norway. A short time ago the United States placed an embargo on the products of Canada going to Norway through American ports. It will be only a matter of weeks before the United States Government places an embargo on any Canadian products going out in United States ships, because they want all that trade themselves, just as every other country wants its own trade.

As to the cotton industry and the shipping industry of Great Britain and free trade, school boys who do not know anything about history might say that free trade built up the shipping trade of England. But every one knows that the shipping trade of England originated in the navigation laws of Cromwell, which were a most effective form of protection. Great Britain put the old navigation laws into force during the war, and made them more rigid than they ever were. She would not permit any foreign neutral nation to carry trade to belligerent ports. Is that free trade? That is the condition we ourselves are up against; we want our own ships to carry our own cargoes. I will give an illustration of how Great Britain desires to curtail the trade of the world. A Canadian firm had a cargo of goods for consignment to Calcutta. The goods had been manufactured in Canada and had remained in stock a considerable time awaiting shipment. The man who manufactured the goods asked the Canadian Pacific Railway Company if they would give him a freight rate to Calcutta, and they did, quoting him a rate of something like say $70 a ton via the Pacific. The manufacturer tendered this rate to the British firm which had the goods here, and they said that the goods had to go via London, and that the freight to London was over $60 a ton and only $7 or $8 a ton from London to Calcutta. This shows what steps are taken by the British Government to control traffic to and from British ports. If you are going to build up this country; if you are going to make Canada a country which does business all over the world, you must start out in a proper way. Before the war Great Britain's most prominent competitor was Germany. How did Germany carry on her foreign trade? How was it that she went into the foreign market and took one-third of the trade away from Great Britain inside of fifteen years? The reason is simple. She bonused her ships and shipbuilding. It is absurd to say that the plates and material that entered into the manufacture of German ships were made in Great Britain and taken over to Germany and fabricated. That is not so. When the war came Germany had more plants manufacturing steel plate than Great Britain had. Moreover, they had purchased many of the steel manufacturing industries of Great Britain and moved them over to Germany. When the war broke out not one firm in Great Britain was manufacturing cold rolled shafting, because they had been accustomed to get it cheaper from Germany. During the great pageant at Quebec I had the pleasure of visiting one of the greatest ships of the British fleet, and when I set foot on the deck of that warship I saw that the plate on the side was stamped "Krupp steel," presumably made in Germany. That indicate what the condition of affairs was before the war; and that is the condition of affairs that an adoption of the policies advocated by free traders would bring to any country. Free traders would bring about a condition in which the nation would be only a jobbing nation, not a manufacturing or producing nation. That might do for Great Britain, but not for Canada.

Germany built up her maritime and foreign trade by subsidized shipbuilding and encouraging shipyards. Before the war, when the shipbuilders had gone on strike in Great Britain, the emissaries of Germany were at the Clyde, at Newcastle and other places in Great Britain, offering these skilled workmen big inducements to go to work in Germany. Many of them went over, and a shipbuilding industry was established in Germany such as we are trying to establish in Canada with the same class of men. The greatest ships of the world were built in these German shipyards previous to the war. The supremacy of speed on the ocean was successfully contested by German shipbuilders as against British shipbuilders. Now, what was at the bottom of all this shipbuilding? There was a desire on the part of Germany to get the trade of the world. You cannot get the trade of the world by simply making the stuff; the secret of getting the trade of the world is to provide the necessary transportation. If we left it to the people of the United States to build up our railways in the West, how far would our West have gone? It is the old story of the lark and her young ones; if you want to do anything properly you must do it yourself and then you will know that it is done, and as you want it to be done. If you want to carry on foreign trade you must provide the transportation for it; otherwise you are at the mercy of all foreign nations and traders, who will absorb your profits. Germany realized that. She established lines of trading ships between German ports and all the leading ports of the world. Moreover, she provided that all inland manufacturers in Germany should have the benefit of the same rate to any of the ports of the world as that paid by the manufacturers on the seacoast. In other words, a manufacturer in Leipsic could get the same rate from Leipsic to Smyrna as a manufacturer in Hamburg could get. All manufacturers were on the same footing in that respect. The same policy should be adopted by our National Steamship Company so that manufacturers in all parts of Canada will have the same freight rate to all parts of the world. The Germans established a freight rate from Germany to other countries which was fully one-third less than the freight rate from Great Britain to other countries; and they made a profit on the return trade. For instance, the freight rate to-day from New York city to Calcutta, as established by the United States Government, is $20 a ton. The United States control their shipping, and a United States ship may not carry a cargo to a foreign port without a license or charge more than this rate. That is what we are going to be up against, and if we have no ships of our own we shall not be able to get a pound of any commodity out of this country unless we pay exorbitant freight rates. If this country could give a freight rate of $18 per ton to Calcutta, we could secure the business, so closely is international business mixed up. With ocean rates the freight rate is the controlling element. That is the whole question in a nutshell, and if I had my way —I do not know whether my voice will be heard in the councils here any more than that of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) —I would suggest this. We as a young country must make up our mind that we have to take up our task as Empire builders. We have all the raw material for Empire building; we have the farms, the fields; we have the power; we have the workmen; we have the finest men in the world to undertake the task, men who have gone through the war and acquired discipline and training. If we are to be a great country, we must put our shoulder to the wheel and make up our minds that we are to be Empire builders. Germany was a protectionist nation, and was the one nation in the world that successfully contested the supremacy of England in matters of foreign trade, and we can remain a protectionist nation and we can follow out a similar policy. We must establish a number of steamship lines. We must establish a steamship line from here to the East Indies, where there is a very profitable trade, where we can send manufactured goods of our own and bring back in return tea, jute and other articles that are brought in to this country now in foreign ships, and that might very well be brought back as a return cargo in our own ships. Before the war this enormous trade with India went to Germany. Besides we are going to get an Imperial preference. We must not, because the war is over, lie down and go back to our little five acre lot and say: Oh, well, we are done with the war, we want to revert into our shell again. We have taken a place in the sun and we must now stay in the sun. We should have a line of steamers to Australia and New Zealand. At the present time the New York manufacturers and traders are lying awake in bed at nights wondering what preference we shall have with Australia and New Zealand. They are all wanting to open branch offices in the cities here in order to see if they cannot get a share of that trade. There are many things we could bring back from New Zealand. We could bring back a return cargo of hides and wool to Great Britain, and then we could bring back from Great Britain a cargo of other things which we need. The hon. member for Red Deer may wonder what we require from Great Britain, but there are many things which we need which Great Britain could supply just now, but she cannot furnish ships to send them here. There is no lack of demand in this country for British goods; the only thing we really lack is shipping.

In South America there is a market for all the goods we manufacture, such as hardware, furniture, clothing of various kinds, cottons, goods of all descriptions, and we could bring back coffee and hides. "Oh," but the hon. member for Red Deer says, "That is a contradiction to your policy of being a protectionist. Why should you bring back hides? Your policy is to produce hides here." That's true, but we can get only hides for fully fifty per cent of the leather we turn out in this country. We are large manufacturers and exporters of finished leather, and if we endeavour to get hides from South America via the port of New York, as we do now, we are liable to be tied up by the United States Government. They will say: We will allow you only so many hides, as if we were an "adjunct." Therefore, if we had our own ships, we would not be under the necessity of looking to them for favours. We could bring the hides back here in our own ships, so that the New York merchants would have no control over our trade and would not be able to milk the profit out of it as against the Canadian manufacturer.

In these countries we have traded with during the war and established a market for our goods, and we did not have to furnish a national credit. They have plenty of gold. Unless steps are taken to establish lines of shipping from Canada to these various countries we shall have lost all the advantage of trade during the war, and Great Britain, France and the United States will have gone into these countries and secured the business which we had.

The hon. member for Red Deer spoke the truth when he said that the ink was not dry on the armistice when English ships were going out laden with goods to capture the trade of the world. Before the ink on the armistice was dry Canada should have been ready, too. In fact, we were doing a large amount of that trade which Great Britain could not do before the war. But, knowing a certain phase of trade from the ground up as I do know it, I would say to the minister that the worst thing that this country ever did in the matter of shipbuilding was when it lent money to Great Britain to build ships for the so-called Imperial Munitions Board, in order that those ships might go into competition with the ships we own ourselves. There was no necessity for that, and all those ships should have been held by us, so that we could control our own shipping and trade, and do something to adjust matters that the freight rates on our Western wheat would not be so great and would not bear so unequally on the man who lives in the shadow of the Rockies, so that he would have an equal chance in the markets abroad. These ships were built for the Imperial Munitions Board; Canada lent the money to Great Britain for them, and no sooner were they launched into the waves and sailing out on the sea than the fleet was turned over to the Cunard and other lines that have been milking this country for many years on the Atlantic. If we had those ships, they would have assisted us in carrying on our foreign trade, and I make this prediction that before four years are over this country will realize it has not enough ships to carry on its business.

Let me say a word in reference to the price of steel plate. Everybody knows the price of plate and other steel commodities was very high, and when the minister made the contract for the steel plate for ships it was almost impossible to get plate for any work whatsoever. Shipping was all under control and the whole world was tied up, and I think the contract that the minister made was a very easy contract at that time, because, comparatively speaking, the price was low, and it would have been a good thing for this country if, during the war, we had had two or three firms making plates, as there was a great shortage of plates in the world. But the economic war is not over yet and I am going to make another prediction, namely, that before many years are over the minister will find that he has not made a bad bargain in the matter of plate mill. The shelves of the world are empty so far as iron is concerned, and while at present there is a halt in the purchase of such goods, the fact will very soon be realized that there is not sufficient of these goods available and prices will rise accordingly.

The Saar valley, which was a great mining field where the Germans got their iron ore and which furnished forty per cent of the steel materials that went into the foreign trade of their country, has been put under international control. Germany has lost the Saar valley where all her great iron mines were. Her furnaces and steel mills are in Westphalia where her coal mines are, but where there is very little iron, and it looks as if the products of those mines are going to be out of the market for the next three or four years until France can build blast furnaces that will take that iron and smelt it and roll it. The result is that there will be a shortage of steel, while the trade of the world which has languished during the war will, within a few months after the Peace Treaty is signed, increase by leaps and bounds and be far greater than it ever was before, because people are trading and doing business abroad who never did any trade of any description before.

As to the influence on shipbuilding of free trade or protection, I trust that the minister and the Government will realize that there is nothing in that story; it does not affect shipbuilding to the extent of a five-cent piece. Every hon. gentleman knows that the materials that enter into the building of a ship come into this country free of duty; at all events, the duty is rebated. We could not build ships unless that was the case, as the British ships would simply be brought in here. I think that when war broke out there were on the Great Lakes ninety large cargo carriers which had been brought here from Great Britain. All of them went to sea when war broke out, and possibly sixty or seventy per cent of them were destroyed by submarines, and many of the crews gave up their lives in the service of the Empire. The officers and men of the merchant marine of Canada have no need to be ashamed of their record during the war. I trust that the people of this country will support those who are endeavouring to keep alive the maritime traditions of our race. I can assure the minister that the manufacturers of this country and the farmers who need the ships to carry their products abroad will support him in any measures that he may take for seeing that this country is not divorced from shipping as it likely will be within six months or a year if we do not have shipping of our own. Trade will expand so rapidly and the scarcity of shipping will become so acute that foreign countries will control their ships just as the United States and Great Britain are doing now. The United States has fixed the freight rates between New York and every foreign port. Great Britain is controlling her ships in the same way, and Canada's voice is very small in the counsels of these nations when our trade comes into competition with theirs. If we are to compete in foreign markets we must have ships of our own, and we would not be progressive if we did not adopt this policy of establishing a merchant marine.

LT.-COLONEL GEORGE HAROLD BAKER, M.P.—PROPOSED MEMORIAL.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate informing this House that the Hon. Messrs. Bradbury, Casgrain, Foster and Pope, have been appointed a special committee to confer and act with the committee of the Senate and the House of Commons, who have in charge the building and arrangement of the new Parliament Building, in order that there may be erected therein a suitable memorial of the late Lt.-Colonel George Harold Baker, M. P. for Brome, he being the only member of Parliament who lost his life on the field of battle, and inviting this House to appoint a like committee to act jointly with the committee appointed by the Senate.

[Mr. Currie.]

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Mr. Speaker, with reference to the message that has just been read from the hon. the Senate, I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Reid—the consent of the House being necessary—

That Sir Sam Hughes, Sir Herbert Ames, Messrs. Boivin and Kay, be appointed a Special Committtee on behalf of the House of Commons, to confer and act with the Committee of the Senate and House of Commons, who have in charge the building and arrangement of the new Parliament Building, in order that there may be erected therein a suitable memorial of the late Lt.-Colonel George Harold Baker, M.P., for Brome, he being the only member of Parliament who lost his life on the field of battle; and that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honours therewith.

Motion agreed to.

WAR EXPENDITURE—$350,000,000 VOTE.

House again in Committee on Bill No. 68, for granting to His Majesty aid for demobilization and other purposes, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 2—payment of three hundred and fifty million dollars may be made:

Mr. McKENZIE: I wish to bring to the notice of the Acting Prime Minister a communication which I have received from Halifax concerning the men engaged in the naval service during and since the war. The largest number of men engaged there did not much exceed 3,000, and there are still, I understand, 900 men on the pay roll, about 2,000 having been demobilized. The cry among those who are still on is that demobilization is proceeding too slowly and that there is no occasion for keeping them there. They are doing nothing, and in letters I have received they assert that they are simply kept there by the officers as an excuse for the latter to retain themselves in office. The statement is broadly made both in the newspapers in Halifax and in the communications that were sent to me, that all the officers on the Niobe, in the higher ranks at all events, are English naval officers who were loaned to the Canadian Government for this service, and that when they came to this country they were promoted in rank from what might be regarded as petty officers to a higher grade, with a consequent increase in wages, and, as it is remarked in these letters, promotion in social standing, and so on. It is asserted that they are having an excellent time and good pay and are just keeping it going in order that their salaries may be continued. The men appear to be highly dissatisfied and write me that they believe their time will be up on the 11th of this month, that is, six months after the termination of hostilities, when they are entitled to leave. I was anxious to bring this matter to the notice of the authorities to-day so that we would avoid if possible the disagreeableness and, to some extent, the disgrace of having any trouble among our men, and in order that the most effective and speedy action should be taken by the Government to meet any brewing difficulties among them. They have sent me a copy of a general order issued by W. Oswald Story, Admiral Superintendent of that service at Halifax. It reads:—

In view of the misunderstanding which appears to exist, with regard to demobilization, attention is called to the fact that all officers and men are liable to serve for a period of six months after cessation of hostilities. As some officers and men will be required volunteers were called for, in order that, so far as possible, those retained might be volunteers, but it must be understood that others will also be required, if insufficient volunteer, and will be retained as necessary.

Those who do not volunteer to continue to serve will be demobilized after cessation of hostilities as their services can be spared.

W. Oswald Story,
Admiral Superintendent.

November 23, 1918.

The men in the service interpret this Order to mean that hostilities ceased on the 11th day of November. They had a contract to stay in the service until the cessation of hostilities and for six months thereafter. When the armistice was signed on the 11th of November, these men, it appears from the tenor of this Order, wanted to get away at once, and this Order was made then to make their position clear. They understood by it that those who volunteered were bound to remain for six months after the cessation of hostilities, or up to the 11th of this month, and they want to get away at that date. I have here copies of newspapers that are friendly to the Government—the Halifax Herald and the Halifax Evening Mail, both of them strong supporters of the Government, speaking editorially—I shall not take up the time of the Committee reading it—they sustain exactly what I have said. They put forth the same theory, that these officers are unnecessarily prolonging the time of demobilization. The Mail is just an evening edition of the Herald, both being owned by the same people, and both issues set forth, as an argument to show the unreasonableness of the time that is taken in dealing with these men, that 150,000 men have been brought home from England and disbanded and dealt with by the authorities in the military service.

While this has been done there are only 2,000 demobilized altogether and about 1,000 on the hands of the officers doing nothing, according to the report that comes to me. I think it is quite proper for me to read a letter I received to-day:

Halifax, N.S., May 4, 1919.

Dear Sir:—I have been delegated on behalf of the Boys from the Lower Deck to direct a letter to you, asking you, if you would take up our case which is stated below, in the House of Commons.

We men have resolved, on or about the 11th of May to discontinue our services in the "Canadian Navy" and demand that we be demobilized forthwith, on the grounds, that our contract as far as the Canadian Navy and Government is concerned, is completed, observing, that we have carried out our duties 6 months after the cessation of hostilities. We further base our claim on the General Order, which I enclose, dated November 23, 1918, ...

That is the general order that I read—

—and signed by Admiral Storey. Will you, on our behalf ask in the House of Commons the following question: "What date, after November 11, 1918, do the contracts, signed by the Canadian Naval Ratings become void? In the event of the men refusing duty after the 11th of May, what stand will be taken by the Government?"

The letters which I enclose, published by the Halifax Herald express the feeling of every Canadian sailor in the service. We have stood everything during the war, and when war ended, to our great surprise the Government had no policy formed, as to dealing with our demobilization. We have waited our six months, and even to-day they have not declared themselves in regard to the ultimate date of our demobilization. We are all anxious to get back into civilian life as soon as possible, in order to get re-established in our civilian occupations.

That is the substance of the complaint made by these men, together with what I have already stated. I think that it is not necessary to keep them there, and that the officers are simply making jobs for themselves. That is not my language; it is what is communicated to me by these men, and I think it is my duty to represent the matter to the Government so that such action may be taken as will prevent any difficulty between these men and their officers. I trust that immediate action will be taken upon these facts, as I believe them to be facts. I would have some hesitation perhaps if I did not have exactly the same story in the form of an editorial signed by the editor of the Evening Mail. He puts his own name to the statements which appear in his paper, and I feel confident that a paper of the standing of the Evening Mail would not give its countenance to these statements by publishing them if the editor did not believe they were true.

Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE (Minister of the Naval Service): The other day, when this matter was brought to the attention of the House, I stated that the total number demobilized amounted to 3,490 out of a total establishment of 5,468. I can quite understand these naval men who are probably tired of the service and anxious to get back to civilian life, all writing that they have nothing to do. But I can assure the hon. member (Mr. McKenzie) that they would not be kept in the Naval Service if they had nothing to do. There has been a great deal of talk in regard to the Niobe. We have altogether a total down there of 779 men; on the Niobe 231, guards in the dockyard, etc., 99; troops in reserve 206; on vessels at Liverpool, Nova Scotia, 40; in hospital 80; to be demobilized this week, 123. The Naval Department cannot let every man in the service go until we can enlist enough civilians to perform the duties that are necessary on board the Niobe. Seamen returned from overseas, boys from the Niobe and members of the accounting staff are kept busy with the details of keeping accounts, discharge, etc., and it is necessary to accommodate on the Niobe both Canadian and Imperial naval men who are returning to Canada. Then, we have to keep men with the large number of drifters and trawlers owned by the Imperial Government, and until such time as we can enlist a sufficient number of civilians to take charge of these vessels we could not allow every man to go. Allow me to assure the hon. member that energetic steps are being taken constantly to demobilize these men and to see that this week alone we have demobilized 123. I hope that before long they will all be demobilized. Whoever wrote that letter considered that he was free from service six months after hostilities ceased. I do not claim to be a naval authority, but I know that no man is free from the Canadian Expeditionary Force, and no man is free from the navy, until six months after the war, which means six months after peace has been finally declared. While we do not want to hold these men unnecessarily, it would be very ill-advised, indeed, for any one to be absent without leave on May 11 because I hold that the men are not free until six months after the war. But, in any event, I am as anxious as any one else to have them demobilized as rapidly as possible. I am urging it every day. Just as soon as I can get civilians to take the places of these ratings I will do so. I will have something more to say upon the navy when I answer the hon. member for Lunenburg (Mr. Duff), but I regret to note that there always seems to be a tendency to malign our little navy and to say that our men are not doing anything when as a matter of fact they are doing good work and have performed very satisfactory service for King and country.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am pleased to find that the minister is taking every reasonable step to meet the views of these men. I do not profess to be a military or a naval man, I am only an ordinary lawyer; but if this document were dealing with ordinary commercial business, I would have to say that it dates from the signing of the armistice, because hostilities did end on that date. Whether the man who drafted it meant that or not, that is the language of the Order. I understand that the contracts that men sign in the infantry contain the expression " six months after the end of the war." "The end of the war" and "the cessation of hostilities" are separate and distinct things. There have been no hostilities since the armistice was signed, and, unless there is some peculiar interpretation of naval and military contracts, those men have the right to believe that their six months commenced to run from the 11th of November last and will expire on the 11th of this month. Those men are Canadians and are deserving of our best attention. They are not rebellious. They interpret their contract in a certain way, and it is quite possible that they got the opinion of some legal gentleman in Halifax in regard to it. I would like the minister to take positive action, so that those men will see that they are not treated as if they were nobody, that "they can mutiny if they like and they will see where they are going to land." I do not want them to have that idea; I want them to feel that the minister is concerned about their welfare and will see that they are properly treated. If they do hear something from the department before the 11th recognizing their position, I presume they will be pleased and there will be no trouble; whereas if they are ignored, if nothing is done beyond the stereotyped reply that the minister makes to me across the floor, we may have another Kinmel situation on our hands. We do not want anything of that kind; rather we desire our naval as well as the rest of our military operations to end properly, for we may want those men again. That was mentioned in one of the letters addressed to me, that naval and military men may be required at other critical stages of our national life, and it is well not to leave any stings or heartburnings in connection with their demobilization. I hope such action will be taken that those men will realize that they are treated as Canadians who have rendered good service to their native country and in whom the Government feel a deep interest.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Last night I offered a few observations on the different matters which are covered by section 2. I do not intend to repeat what I said then, except perhaps to emphasize one point only in connection with transportation and the promotion of trade and industry. I listened this afternoon with a great deal of pleasure to the statement made by my hon. friend, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne), and as I told last night to my hon. friend the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) to promote to some other department the present incumbent of the Department of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), might I not suggest to him at the same time that my friend, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is exactly the "live wire" I would like to see in the Department of Trade and Commerce?

I do not offer any criticism of the contract between the Naval Department and the Dominion Steel Company which was mentioned this afternoon. I have not seen that contract, and I have the word of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that it may be altered or even dropped. I do not purpose to let politics interfere with my views on the questions of trade and transportation, for I am a Canadian, first, last and always, and I sincerely approve of the policy of any Government which will promote our shipbuilding and improve our transportation facilities. I happen to reside in Montreal during several months of the year, where I represent one of the constituencies most interested in shipbuilding. The county of Maisonneuve has within its boundaries the establishment of Canadian Vickers Limited, and I think it is to the credit of the Laurier administration that we have that great shipbuilding plant. Canadian Vickers Limited employ thousands of men, and they have been able to build up an industry which some years ago was considered as only a dream and impossible of realization. I cannot forget that in 1912 when the question of a Canadian navy was being debated in this House doubts were expressed as regards the practicability of that policy. The Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) himself stated, in a now famous speech, that not in twenty-five, or even fifty years perhaps, could we expect to build a Canadian navy. And we had the candid advice of Mr. Churchill, who told us—with some ingenuousness I should say—that we could not find riveters in Canada, and there were so many swamps that we could hardly lay keels for the proposed Canadian navy. Sir, let us not refer to that debate, because really it is enough to make us lose confidence in some of the statesmen of the Mother Country. We have passed the period when the British Government could at their own sweet will thus impose their views on credulous colonials. We have had the satisfaction since that time of establishing shipyards on the Pacific and Atlantic coasts, on the river St. Lawrence, and on the Upper Lakes, and the British Commissioners who were appointed some years ago to study the trade conditions of the British Empire, reported that Canada was fully equipped for shipbuilding and had nothing to fear from competitors. I have under my hand the report of those commissioners, published in February, 1917, from which I read the following:

> Before leaving the subject of the overseas communications of Canada we may allude very briefly to the capacity which the Dominion has for shipbuilding. We visited yards for ship construction and ship repairing both on the Pacific coast and at Montreal and we were struck with the activity generally prevailing at all places. There is also considerable shipbuilding work on the upper lakes.

I do not know what the commissioners would say if they came back to Canada today. Had they come last year they would have seen how our shipyards kept the wheels of industry running at full speed during a very crucial period. But Canada must not be satisfied with her war industries only. During the war Canada established her ability to do things; she must go on now and adapt herself to peace conditions, profiting by the development which has taken place during the war.

The member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) spoke this afternoon of British shipbuilding as compared with Canadian shipbuilding. If we are satisfied always to look upon John Bull as the privileged one who should take care of our shipping interests we shall never make any progress along that line. Let us learn from the old gentleman. During the last century—indeed, since Waterloo—John Bull, much to his credit, has been able to take toll in the way of trade from every nation in the world. We Canadians, members of the great Empire, should get our share of that business which John Bull has taken unto himself. I stand for a moderate and wise policy of shipbuilding for Canada, and if the Acting Prime Minister, under section 2 of the Bill, intends to apply some of that money for the promotion of shipbuilding and the improvement and development of our Canadian transportation facilities, I shall vote for the amount which is being asked this evening.

Nothing, in my judgment, has proved more adequately the ability of the Canadian people to do things than the enormous development which has taken place in our shipyards during the last three or four years. It is urged that the Minister of Naval Affairs (Mr. Ballantyne) took away from the Imperial Munitions Board a business which that board was carrying on at our Canadian yards. It seems to me that the answer given by the hon. gentleman is a common-sense one. During the war Canada gave to the Mother Country the exclusive use of her shipyards, in which ships were built of British registry. Our ships were also commandeered. Of course, it was for the common cause. But the moment war ceased, the moment we come to peace activities, it is only common sense that Canada should take control of these shipyards and build her own ships with her own men and her own money, with a view of improving her shipping and transportation facilities.

While on this question of shipping and shipbuilding—because all this is more or less implied by the word "transportation" —may I refer once more to the report of the Dominions Royal Commission? The report is a very interesting one, containing data on a variety of subjects. It is from reports prepared by people who do not live in your country that sometimes you can learn the most about your country, and I would ask my fellow members to glance over this report at times, because it contains most interesting information about Canada and about the possibilities of trade development in this country. Speaking about trade through Canadian ports, the commissioners use the following language:

> When we turn to the question of the general development of Canadian trade routes it is somewhat disappointing to find, in view of the excellence of the harbours of the Dominion, that much of its overseas trade is still carried on through the ports of the United States. It is estimated that in 1913 two-thirds of the Canadian export wheat was shipped through United States ports, and though quantities and proportions differ no doubt in different years, considerable diversion from Canadian ports appears to be a normal condition.

[Mr. Lemieux.]

> No doubt a partial explanation is found in the fact that the St. Lawrence ports (and Montreal especially) are not available for five months in the year, during which time there is a shorter haul from Canadian centres to New York and other United States ports than to the Canadian Atlantic ports open throughout the winter. But it seems worth while to examine the position and to set out briefly
> (1) What appears to be the main hindrances to the use of existing routes; and
> (2) What other alternative routes could be created or developed.

I wish to refer especially to the hindrances referred to in this report. The first is the "depth of the St. Lawrence channel between Montreal and Quebec, and the present rates of marine insurance in respect of Canadian eastern ports." I understand that the Minister of Marine has a relatively large amount in the Estimates this year to enable him to proceed with the further deepening of the St. Lawrence channel, and that the port of Montreal will receive fair treatment at his hands. I understand that the terminal facilities of the harbour of Montreal are to be considerably improved. But the main hindrance to the development of Canadian transportation—Canadian shipping, Canadian business overseas—it seems to me that this should attract the attention of the Acting Prime Minister—is the, shall I say, conspiracy?—yes, a conspiracy, of the marine insurance companies in the Old Country. Here is what the commissioners say in this respect:

> It was also represented to us that a difficulty in the way of more extended use of Canadian Eastern ports lies in the heavy insurance rates now charged—
> (a) on cargoes carried to and from those ports,
> (b) on the hulls of vessels using them.
> We were told that these rates are unduly high in comparison with those in force at the Atlantic ports of the United States, and in particular—
> (1) that underwriters charge an extra premium on hulls of tramp steamers for one or more voyages to the St. Lawrence during the summer season,
> (2) that this extra premium is further increased for voyages during the last two months before the close of navigation.

I believe we are being very seriously discriminated against by the marine insurance companies. It is admitted to-day that our Atlantic ports are safe and that the St. Lawrence route has been so considerably improved, so well buoyed and lighted, and the channel so well deepened, that it offers practically no element of danger. Why is it, then, that the marine insurance companies of England are so drastic in their terms to shipping companies? That is something which is not clear to my mind and which somewhat prejudices me against those British marine insurance companies. It was suggested some years ago that the Canadian Government should itself assume responsibility on account of the St. Lawrence risks for a period of, say, five years. It is contended that in the course of this period the Government would ascertain exactly the extent of the additional risk involved and that in the meantime extra shipping would be attracted to St. Lawrence ports. If we are going to improve our transportation facilities, we should strike at once at the root of the whole trouble. Doubtless, the high insurance rates against the St. Lawrence route will always be the main hindrance to Canadian transportation interests, and I would ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who is a keen business man and who knows the St. Lawrence route just as thoroughly as an old sea captain, to put another feather in his cap by settling the question one way or the other. He knows that business men and shipping interests not only in Montreal, but all over Canada, are up in arms against Lloyd's, and that a solution must be found now that we have reached peace times. We must improve our transportation facilities in order to develop our trade, because, as I stated last evening, we cannot expect to have a favourable balance of trade now that we have passed the war period. Foreign trade is the trade that we must look after, and our country should be, above all things, a big exporting country. We have all the raw materials, and we have the whole world to which to export our raw materials, wheat, pulp, the products of our forests, our mines and our fisheries—which last is an industry which has hardly begun to exploit the foreign market. The Canadian Government ought to have trade agents in various countries of the world and to advertise our products and our industries, and by means of a safe transportation ensure that those products are sent overseas. Unfortunately, in the past, we have overlooked our interests, but when we know that Canada's prosperity depends upon a favourable balance of trade, a reasonable expenditure should be made in order to promote the trade of Canada in foreign markets. In 1913, Canada exported $1,216,000,000 worth of in 1914, $432,000,000 worth; in 1916, $741,000,000 worth—in which year we had for the first time a favourable balance of trade amounting to $233,000,000. In 1918, Canada exported $1,540,000,000 worth of goods, with a favourable balance of trade of $577,000,000. For the twelve months ended February, 1919, Canada exported $1,216,000,000 worth of goods, with a favourable balance of trade of $284,000,000. But now the war is over; we have reached peace times and we must, if possible, maintain a favourable balance of trade. We cannot hope to reach the same high figures as during the last three or four years; but if the Government is an up-to-date, alert administration, it will see to it that our products are advertised broadcast and that our transportation facilities are bettered, so that our export trade may give our people the means of paying the enormous war debt which we have contracted.

Once more, subject to the criticism that I offered last night, I say to the Acting Prime Minister that I will vote with pleasure for the development of our transportation facilities, but this implies the development of our trade, and with all due respect to the ability of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster), I do not believe he is the right man in the right place. I would put in that department an active young man, who has new visions of things and who would transform that musty department into a business one. With these few remarks, I shall resume my seat, and I wish God-speed to my hon. friend in the administration of this enormous sum of money. I am afraid that my hon. friend has become colour blind in money matters. A dollar, a hundred dollars, a thousand dollars—there is no difference between them to my hon. friend. He has been rolling in millions and billions since the beginning of the war, and I am afraid he has lost his sense of proportion. Whether he speaks of one million or one billion, it is all the same to him. Perhaps it is due to the fact that he is an optimist; but there are limits to optimism. My hon. friend should not forget that Canada has a population of barely eight million, that we have a war debt of two billion dollars, and that although the resources of the country are immense, it may not be an easy thing in this general bankruptcy of the world to develop our resources. To develop our resources we shall need the aid of foreign capital, and in order to obtain the aid of foreign capital we must certainly maintain our credit on the safety line, but I am afraid my hon. friend has long since left the safety line. However, I am willing to give him another chance. I suppose when the Budget comes down he will outline such a policy that we may soon expect the millenium for Canada.

Mr. BRISTOL: Coming from a city which is very much interested in the trade and commerce of Canada and also in shipbuilding, I am very glad indeed to find myself so much in accord with my hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux). This country is passing through what might be called a transition stage; that is since the cessation of the manufacture, on an enormous scale, of munitions, normal conditions of trade have not yet been resumed, and, in the ordinary course, probably will not be resumed for some months to come. Under these circumstances the Government, as I understand it, have felt called upon to consider in the national interest the expenditure of sums of money for the purposes referred to in the second section of this Bill, to stimulate trade and industry and improve our transportation facilities.

I was very much interested in the statement presented this afternoon to the House by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries on the ship-building policy of this Government. I want to say in answer to the criticism that the Government did not start on this policy quite soon enough, that as a matter of fact it was in 1917 that the British Government became thoroughly convinced of the necessity of building ships all over the world and endeavouring both in the United States and Canada to supplement their building in the British Isles by building ships wherever possible. As a result of that policy, in the spring of 1917 the Imperial Munitions Board undertook the building of ships, and a large number of contracts were let in this country for the building of ships of various kinds. In 1918 the Government of Canada who had been financing the expenditures of the British Government in this country in connection with shipbuilding thought that if it was in the interests of Great Britain to build ships in this country with Canadian assistance, it certainly would be in the interests of Canada to build those ships herself and own them for her own benefit. I do not think anybody would seriously argue that that was anything but a good policy for the Dominion of Canada. It is perfectly obvious that if Great Britain, which at the outbreak of the war had some 18,000,000 tons of the 40,000,000 tons of shipping which the world possessed, thought it necessary to pay from $185 to $210 for a ton deadweight for ships in Canada, it would certainly be in the interests of this country to follow that lead. As a matter of fact in 1918, although the price of labour was undoubtedly higher, and that of material somewhat higher, the average price paid by this Government for Canadian shipping was, I should think, about $5 a ton less than the price for which Great Britain had let contracts in this country. That certainly was the case in the Vickers' yard at Montreal; I cannot say as to the other yards. The price therefore for which the Government were getting the ships constructed was reasonable from every aspect.

The minister told us to-day that the United States has built about 3,000,000 tons of shipping, and is contemplating building 13,000,000 tons more. I have a fairly accurate knowledge of the cost of American shipping during the war and the best information got from the shipyards themselves is that American shipping cost from $250 to $350 a ton deadweight, which is largely in excess of the price paid either by the British or Canadian Government for their shipping. The policy of the American Government to-day is practically to write this enormous war loss off, just as if it was an expenditure for dreadnoughts which would be no good for commercial purposes.

What I consider the essential reason why this country should continue to build ships, not merely 260,000 tons which the minister has spoken of to-day, but a very much larger tonnage, is this: If Canada wishes to have the certainty of getting her products to other countries she must own her own shipping. The shipping of Great Britain is perfectly willing to handle any business that Great Britain wishes it to handle. The shipping of the United States will look after the interests of the United States first; so if Canada is to be a great exporting country, as we know she will be, she must own a certain amount of her own shipping to ensure the country getting proper attention along those lines. For that reason, if for no other, it is a national safeguard for the Government to build not only 260,000 tons of shipping, but a considerably larger tonnage.

Looking at the matter from a national standpoint, the Government have taken over certain railway systems. Controlling those railway systems and controlling ocean transportation, this Government can route everything on their own lines and on their own boats to any country we wish to export our goods to, and get a profit from one end to the other. That is one of the greatest national assets you could possibly have. The control of both railways and steamships will make for national wealth, and will improve freight rates between our West and the ports of other countries to which our exports are to be shipped.

It has been suggested by some hon. gentlemen that the Railway Board should fix the rates on these Canadian ships. Imagine, Mr. Chairman—50,000,000 tons of world shipping, and 300,000 tons of Canadian shipping which is quite inadequate to handle the needs of our own country. If you want other ships to come here, you must pay the rate; otherwise, they will not come. If you wish to attract shipping to this country so that we can export our goods, you must pay the current rate, and I am sorry to say that so far as Canada is concerned we shall have to pay more than the current rate because of the reasons given by my hon. friend from Maisonneuve. If a boat comes from London, England, to South America, from South America to New York, and from New York to London, on what is called the Atlantic triangle, its gets a load at every place, and the result is a cheaper rate. When a boat goes from Montreal to Liverpool it has a cargo for Liverpool, but what cargo is it going to bring back to Montreal? That is a very important factor in the rate from Montreal or any other port in Canada. On top of that, is the insurance on the St. Lawrence. It therefore seems to me that we should have a certain number of ships which the Government of this country can control, so that shipping for the transportation of Canadian products will be available, so far as the Government can make that possible.

The hon. member for Red Deer, for whom I have a deep affection and esteem, was arguing to-day that with the protective tariff we could not have shipbuilding in Canada, that shipbuilding and protection were incongruous, that imports would not come into this country if we had protection on the one hand and built ships on the other. Yet before the war, for years under protection, our imports exceeded our exports. Take the example of the United States. Twenty-five years ago England practically had control of the iron and steel trade of the world, but under a protective tariff the United Statets to-day is unquestionably supreme in that regard. Take Germany forty years ago. Under Bismarck they started a protective tariff. The country was poor and they had no shipping, but in practically forty years they built themselves up by aid of a protective tariff to be practically the second shipping country of the world. Free trade may be an ideal thing, but if you do not protect your own people and your own markets and manufacturers you certainly cannot expect other countries to do it for you. Coming to the question of shipbuilding in this country, the difference between the cost of shipbuilding in Canada and in England is practically the cost of labour and material. So far as steel is concerned, places like Toronto and Montreal that get their steel from Pittsburg or wherever it may come from, are going to be able to get their steel plates practically as cheap as they do in England. The enormous manufacture of steel in the United States is constantly reducing the price just as it reduced the price of steel rails below the price in England. As to the question of cost of labour, I am dealing with it as a pure matter of competition, and I have as high an authority as Colonel Carnegie, who represented the Imperial Government on the Munitions Board with reference to Canadian labour. After inspecting the two yards at Toronto, especially the Dominion Shipbuilding yard, he said: "Mr. Bristol, in the Dominion Shipbuilding yard at Toronto, owing to your splendid facilities and the efficiency of Canadian labour, you are going to manufacture just as cheaply as they do in England." I hope the prediction is true. When people talk about ships for $100 a ton dead weight in England it is absolute nonsense. You cannot possibly get contracts of that kind. The best contract you can possibly get is a cost plus 10 per cent. From the best information I have been able to get on the subject, I have not found any man in the United States or Canada who wanted to buy a ship in England, and who could get a contract price of $175 a ton dead weight, or who was satisfied if he let the contract in England that he could ever get a price that would work out at $175 per ton dead weight or get delivery of his ships before 1922. The importance of shipbuilding in this country is absolutely paramount. The objection has been made to the smaller boats of 3,700 tons built on the lakes as distinct from the 8,100 and 10,500 ton boats built in Montreal. Any man engaged in shipping will tell you that the most useful boat on the Atlantic has been for years and is to-day the 3,500 and 4,000 tonner. The reason is a simple one. It is easy to pick up a cargo of 3,000 or 4,000 tons, but for a boat of 8,000 tons you practically have to take a cargo of grain or a through cargo from Montreal to Liverpool, and the question is, what will you fill that 8,000 or 10,000 ton boat with when you come back? The same thing applies as regards trade between Montreal and South America, or Montreal and South Africa, with which countries we are opening up trade all the time and would open up still further if we had ships. The same applies to the West Indies. A friend told me to-day that in the Seven Islands, near Quebec, they had a great deal of pulp to ship. There was a 10,000 ton boat offered them, but they could not load more than 3,000 tons because they had not facilities. The Acting Prime Minister and the Government will be justified not merely in the programme that they have so far announced, but in the programme that has been foreshadowed to-day by the Minister of Marine in the spending of a very considerably larger sum in shipbuilding in this country, and I hope that this consideration will weight in the minds of hon. members.

We are passing through a period of unrest, when the industries of the country have not been able to resume full swing. It is in the interests of the country that the labouring classes should be kept occupied, and I submit that it is important that all shipyards, at all events during the present year, should be kept going at full capacity so that the 30,000 or 40,000 labourers referred to to-day may be kept at work.

Mr. McKENZIE: My hon. friend (Mr. Bristol) thinks that the Government just started at the right time to build ships. I do not agree with him in that. I think any person starting in a new enterprise would naturally watch for the time when labour was fairly cheap and material fairly reasonable, so that he might invest his money to the best possible advantage. In 1910 the Government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier formulated a policy on the question of the Canadian navy, which incidentally carried with it shipbuilding in this country. The naval and shipbuilding policy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier at that time was agreed to by hon. gentlemen on the other side, and if it had been carried out we would have had 1910, 1911, 1912, 1913 and the best part of 1914 to our credit in our shipbuilding before the war broke out, and even in the first years of the war, being fairly under way, we would have been able to handle our business before prices went sky high. For that reason I have made the statement several times that we started our naval and shipbuilding policy at a time when the prices were four hundred per cent higher than they were when we could and should have started, and at a time when the productiveness and usefulness of these ships will be three hundred per cent less than they would have been if we had had them at the commencement of the war. I say three hundred per cent less, because by the time we get into the commerce of the world with our ships things will be getting normal and we shall have to accept the same rates as other people who had their ships built in normal times and who are therefore able to go back to normal rates. We will have to go into the market to compete with those who built at ordinary prices. We are too slow. If we were spending these large sums in shipbuilding for the purposes of the war we fail of our purpose, for the war is over and the ships are not yet available. My hon. friend's very clever and well-delivered address does not give any good reason why we did not launch upon a policy of shipbuilding at the time it was properly formulated some eight or nine years ago. As he knows very well, the reason was that the present Government would not admit that anything good could come out of Nazareth —they would have nothing to do with any policy formulated by the Laurier Government for fear it would carry any credit to that policy and to the Liberal party. They would rather let everything drop, hoping that some day in the future they would formulate a policy of their own for which they would have the whole credit.

The day came when they formulated a policy of their own, but they do not seem to be able to get very much glory out of it. It is not a policy at all; it is a sort of a driving of the scapegoat into the wilderness. The leader of the Government knows what the scapegoat was? The sins of the people were put on its head, it was blind-folded, driven out into the wilderness and left there in a place from which it would never come back. The policy of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in so far as these manufacturers is concerned, is a policy of starting them out. He makes them invest their money in providing the plant necessary for shipbuilding, he is going to take them out beyond the three-mile limit and then say: "Now gentlemen, I have got you under way, and this is as far as I propose to go; you can either continue to go to sea, or turn back; I am through." That is the policy that he has given to us to-day. He says that he is going to spend a certain amount of money, to build a certain number of ships, and then he is going to tell the people: "You can provide your own money; it is none of my affair. I have given you a start, induced you to go into this business believing that I had a fixed, permanent policy, but I have not. You can go on or turn back, or do what you please." Does any person call that a policy? I do not believe it is. A policy that is permanent would be based upon some principle, whatever else it might be. We had a fair sample when, from the Conservative side of the House, they launched the National Policy in Canada. That was a permanent policy in so far as that party was concerned, and they look upon it as their policy down to the present day. But when we do not know whether it will last for a day or a week or six months nobody would call it a policy; it is only an expedient for the time being and they are likely to drop it at any minute. Really, the Government have no policy at all in regard to shipbuilding, and no policy in regard to naval protection. The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bristol) came to the aid of the Government with some of the product of his brain, saying that he would lead them in the way they should go.

This section points out that some of the money is to be used for " the defence and security of Canada." If any of that money is to be used for the purpose of securing us against extravagance, recklessness and expenditures that are wrongfully proposed and badly conducted, I should say that it would be well spent. I think that is the only security we really need at the present time. Then, provision is to be made for—

> The conduct of naval and military operations in or beyond Canada and the demobilization

I have already said to-night all I intend to say about demobilization. Another provision is:

> The promoting of trade and industry, and transportation facilities therefor.

I wish to take advantage of the fact that we have a gathering of the ministers here to-night that we do not very often have to say a few words on this subject. I do not know what is in the air, but we had a masterful array of talent a few minutes ago and there are still quite a number of ministers present. I wish to direct the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to the importance of doing something to promote the fishing industry in this country. There is no other industry in Canada that has such magnificent possibilities as the fishing industry both on the Atlantic and on the Pacific coast. We have only been gathering the pebbles on the beach compared with the ocean of development that is open before the Canadian people. I trust the minister will take that into his serious consideration and that he will come down to the House with a well-considered scheme for the development of the fisheries and will ask Parliament for enough money to carry out that scheme. It will involve the establishment of storage for bait in convenient places along the Atlantic and Pacific coasts, and the proper looking after of these bait storages so that they can gather the bait at the time it is available and so that the fishermen may be able to get it when it is required. The condition in Cape Breton to-day is that very often, when fish is running along the shore in hundreds of thousands of tons and within easy reach of the fishermen, they have no bait. In September and October you find people simply sitting on the banks and doing nothing because they cannot get any bait. The fishermen, as a rule, are poor, they have no cold storage facilities, they cannot preserve the bait and although it is to be found by schooner loads around the shores, they cannot get it. If the Government would provide proper facilities for storing away that bait and selling it to the fishermen at the time it is needed the catch of fish would be quadrupled in many places. Together with that, there must be the necessary cold storage on the railway for carrying the fish to the market centres. The people are beginning to realize what a magnificent life-giving, strength-producing food the codfish, herring and salmon of Nova Scotia and British Columbia are.

Mr. BUTTS: And a brain producer.

Mr. McKENZIE: Yes, and it is needed most strenuously.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. McKENZIE: I had no reference to my hon. friend. My good friend from Cape Breton (Mr. Butts) knows me too well to think that I would say that he had no brains. That is not the worst part of the business. I wish to take the opportunity that this Bill gives me of placing before the minister and the Government the suggestion that they should devote some time, thought and energy to the development of the fish trade of this country. Perhaps on some other occasion I shall have a better opportunity of quoting data that will show the importance of this trade, but I hope—particularly in view of the observations made by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was a " live wire " and that he would like to see him in charge of the Department of Trade and Commerce—that he will give particular attention to this subject. This is the business of which he has charge at the present time, but according to the Scripture those who are faithful and useful in small things shall be put in charge of greater things and shall enter into the joy of their Lord.

I hope that he will show in the apprenticeship that is assigned to him in the Fisheries Department such ability as will justify the next Prime Minister—who will, of course, be the hon. gentleman who is now leading the Government—promoting him to the Department of Trade and Commerce, where it is suggested his energetic personality will find fuller scope.

I wish to bring to the attention of the Minister of Militia and of the Acting Prime Minister where some of his money that is to be expended in connection with war gratuities and demobilization should go. An Order in Council was passed by the Government some time after the 11th November (when the armistice was signed) giving gratuities to certain military men who were in the service on that date, but not to those who had served their country at least equally as well but had been already demobilized. Here is a concrete case in my own town. The 94th Highlanders, a regiment of militia, was ordered to camp at North Sydney in the early stages of the war. It was put on home service and formed a sort of nucleus to which recruits were sent, trained to some extent, and as rapidly as possibly moved overseas. I am told that something like 1,200 men passed through the 94th to the front, and that the 94th itself would have gone had it been given the opportunity. A short time before the 11th of November the 94th was demobilized to a very great extent and a new establishment was set up in which the military authorities retained a very small group of those men. The colonel, the captain, and a great many soldiers were sent home as being no longer required. Those men would certainly have been in camp on the 11th of November had it been left to their own volition and would be entitled to the gratuity. I submit to the Minister of Militia and to the Committee that that is not a fair deal, that those who for nearly four years rendered good and faithful service are equally entitled to the gratuity although they were obliged to leave the regiment before the 11th of November. This phase of the subject has been strenuously presented to the Government and to the minister already from several quarters and I need not elaborate it further. I have not heard what the decision of the Government is, but I trust they will so amend the Order in Council that those who were demobilized before the day of the armistice will be treated as well as those who happened to be retained in the service.

There is another point I must bring to the notice of the Minister of Militia in connection with the 94th. When that regiment was called out first the colonel—Colonel J. D. McRae—was obliged to hire a house in the city of Sydney while proper barrack accommodation was being prepared for the officers. When the regiment went into camp under canvas the house was given up; and I am very much surprised that the department up to this date has refused to reimburse the rent paid by the colonel. I have not had an opportunity of bringing this matter to the notice of the minister himself, although I have had it up with the department and have been turned down. I had practically given the case up as hopeless, but seeing that this vote covers money to be paid out in connection with matters of this kind I wish once more, with the greatest possible confidence, to ask the minister that this rent —it is only $75, a very small amount indeed for the department, but too much for a poor officer to pay out—be reimbursed to Colonel McRae.

Major-General MEWBURN: I am very glad that the hon. member has brought these two matters to my attention. With regard to the war gratuity, I can assure him that personally it will have my sympathetic attention. It is in the hands of a committee, and I hope the situation will be satisfactorily dealt with. With regard to Colonel McRae, I think my hon. friend should not be tired in well doing. He says that he has already brought it to the attention of the department and been refused; but I can assure him that I will see what the trouble is.

Mr. BUTTS: I would not have been inclined to speak at all to-night were it not for what I might almost describe as the discourteous manner in which I was treated by the hon. member for Guysborough and the hon. member for Maisonneuve. I attempted to ask my hon. friend from Maisonneuve whether or not there was any difference at Lloyds between the Atlantic seaboard of Canada and the British Islands in respect to the rates for marine risks. My hon. friend did not see fit to allow me to ask the question. I do not think there is any difference in the rates. I intended to ask my hon. friend (Mr: J. H. Sinclair) whether it was not true that much British shipping in Canada is put under Norwegian register in order that it may be operated more cheaply. My hon. friend would not allow me the question. The Storstad, when she rammed the Empress of Ireland in the Gulf of St. Lawrence, was a British ship, but under Norwegian register. Nearly every ship that has carried coal from Sydney Harbour to Montreal, Three Rivers and Sorel during the last twenty years has been a British ship under Norwegian register.

Mr. BUREAU: How could that be?

Mr. BUTTS: I do not know, but it is so. They were British ships under Norwegian register.

Mr. BUREAU: It could not be.

Mr. BUTTS: It is true. Now, a Government ship was sent from Canada to the West Indies under special conditions and my hon. friend (Mr. J. H. Sinclair) complains that the ship came back from the West Indies to New York with a cargo. Did he want her to come back empty. The hon. gentleman is a shipping man; he owned three of the poorest ships that ever crossed the Atlantic. My hon. friend criticises the Government for taking up shipbuilding. Are we to wait until the time when shipbuilding will pay? Was the building of the Canadian Pacific railway delayed until every one was sure that it would pay? No, we built it in order that it would bring returns to the country and afford transportation facilities, and that is the policy I hope the Government will carry out in respect to shipbuilding. There are many reasons for believing that at Sydney Harbour we can procure the cheapest pig iron in the world; why, therefore, can we not produce the cheapest ships in the world? The only advantage that the Old Country has over us in the matter of shipbuilding is the advantage of wages—and surely we do not wish to curse this Dominion with cheap labour. About twenty years ago we built a ship at Three Rivers—it was either the Montcalm or that other little ice-breaker we have down there—and it did not cost so very much more than it would have cost to build it in the Old Country; the difference was simply the higher wages, which is the cost of labour, I repeat that we do not want to curse this country with cheap labour.

We have at Sydney Harbour blast-furnaces, open-hearth furnace and a plate mill in course of construction. We have a rail mill that has sent from Sydney Harbour around the Horn to British Columbia rails at a lower price than that at which you could send them by rail from the Sault. We have opportunities for the greatest shipbuilding in the world. Even if within a decade, even if within our lifetime, it should cost a little more to build ships, why should we not be anxious to develop the shipbuilding industry. The member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) and the member for Antigonish and Guysborough (Mr. J. H. Sinclair) are simply trying to stand in the light of this country and to stamp out an industry that represents one of Canada's greatest possibilities. We have our coal; we have our coke; we have our iron; we have our steel; we have our blast furnaces; we have our open-hearth furnaces; we have plate mills in course of construction; we have a rail mill from which rails have been shipped in competition with England to be used in railway construction in the north of Ireland, right in Belfast. In view of these facts it is too bad that prominent public men should try to throw cold water upon Canada's greatness. All we want is more people, more money, and more development, and the sooner we get it the sooner shall we see in Canada ships built as cheaply as they are built on the Clyde or at Belfast.

The only insurance that it in any way high in Canada is the insurance applicable to the upper reaches of the St. Lawrence, and that is quite natural. It is a large inland waterway that must be piloted for six or seven hundred miles, where ships without skilful pilots are in danger of being run ashore. But we do not know of any heavy insurance in respect of the ocean ports of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick or Prince Edward Island. When you come to run six or seven hundred miles on the upper St. Lawrence or to the upper reaches of lake Superior, which is 2,500 or 3,000 miles inland, what can you expect? Insurance must be heavy; pilotage must be heavy. From the time you leave Cabot strait, between Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, you must have two, three, four or five pilots on each ship. Shipping in Canada is one of the big questions, and the sooner we give encouragement to a Government that is prepared to go ahead with a bold policy in the matter, the sooner we shall become a shipbuilding country.

It is not many years ago; it is within the lifetime of almost every man in this Chamber that Nova Scotia built the County of Yarmouth, the largest wooden ship that ever floated on the seven seas of the world. I can remember when she ran ashore on a ledge in Sydney harbour. Is there any reason for believing that Nova Scotia cannot build the largest steel ship in the world, when she has the men and the coal, when she has the steel and every other commodity that enter into the building of a ship? That is the situation, and I say: All power to the Government that goes ahead with a real, good, strong, forcible shipbuilding policy, and let the Government give us the largest plant in Sydney harbour it possibly can.

Mr. COPP: I desire to direct the attention of the Minister of Militia (Mr. Mewburn) to a matter that is important in the passing of this measure, because a certain portion of the money that we are voting in this Bill is to be expended in demobilizing the different military depots throughout Canada. Since the armistice was signed, there have been kept in military district No. 7 at St. John, N.B., some two or three or four hundred men. Some have been released from duty at different times so that I cannot say exactly how many men are at present engaged in this garrison duty, whatever that may imply, at this military depot. Quite a large number of these men are farmers' sons who have been kept there during the winter months when they were much needed at home to look after the farm work and provide wood and other fuel for the winter as is always customary in country districts. Some of them whom I know well, are married men with farms of their own. I have given this particular matter a great deal of consideration; I have visited the place on several occasions; I have talked with the officers, and, in my judgment, there is no reason for keeping two or three hundred men at St. John doing garrison duty when they do not want to remain there. If they were returned men waiting to be discharged who wanted to remain there, then I am prepared to say that they are entitled to recieve their per diem allowance and whatever is necessary to keep them there. But these were men who were called for duty to St. John after the armistice was signed and who have been kept there ever since at the expense of this country. They are doing no good either to this country or to themselves; they are absolutely idle around this military garrison or depot or headquarters, or whatever may be the correct military term, and I would suggest to the minister that these men should be allowed to return to their homes, thus saving the country the expense of keeping them there and permitting them to render valuable service on the farms, as is demanded by the men who own farms and by the fathers of those who are not farming for themselves. It has been suggested to me by one of the men and one of the officers that the only good reason for keeping these men at St. John is because the officers who are there must have some excuse for remaining. I asked an officer whom I know very well what they were doing at St. John and why it was necessary to keep these men there. I had been down there and examined the situation, and the men were apparently not doing anything. This officer turned round to me and said: "Copp, what do you expect us to do?" Hon. members can draw their own conclusions. I have not the slightest objection if the officers who are there are returned men and it is necessary to keep them there in the pay of the Government. If that be the case I hold up both hands and say: Do so. But it is not necessary to keep two or three hundred men at St. John who do not want to stay for that purpose. I have had communications; I have had correspondence with the officers in regard to the matter, and this is a mere case of keeping men there against their will; it is doing the state no good; it is an expense to the country, and it is causing a hardship to the farmers, because the men ought to be engaged in the work of greater production. I would, therefore, urge the Minister of Militia as strongly as I can to look into this matter and release these men from further service.

Major-General MEWBURN: There are eleven military districts in Canada. The hon. gentleman refers to Military District No. 7, St. John, New Brunswick, where we have maintained a very small garrison unit which is considered, from a military standpoint, absolutely necessary for a certain period during demobilization. We gave the men who have seen service at the front the first privilege of discharge, and some men were retained there, but after the armistice was signed nobody was taken there except some men who volunteered. The men are being released as rapidly as possible, and I am glad to inform my hon. friend that, on account of the opening of navigation in the St. Lawrence, very few troops now disembark at St. John and most of that unit will be demobilized within a few weeks.

Mr. COPP: If the minister will say: "Within a few days," that will be of great importance to the district.

Major-General MEWBURN: If, as my hon. friend apparently thinks, the demobilization of these men were simply a matter of walking out and locking the door, I would be very glad to have it done, but there is a little more required in the way of cleaning up matters than the hon. member would imagine.

Mr. COPP: The minister no doubt desires to give correct information, but when he tells me that it was necessary to keep these men at St. John doing garrison duty I doubt it. I do not profess to be a military expert, but I visited the camp, or drill hall, or armoury, or whatever it may be called on several occasions; I inquired of military men and I have never yet found a military genius, so far as we have them in the province of New Brunswick, who could give me the slightest reason or excuse for keeping the men in the city of St. John for any length of time they have been kept. The minister says the garrison will be demobilized in the next few weeks.

Major-General MEWBURN: Possibly sooner.

Mr. COPP: The few weeks between now and the first of June are the very three weeks in which the people of the province of New Brunswick will suffer for lack of farm help. I know of three cases almost within a stone's throw of my own office. I know the farms from which these men come, I know all the conditions, and when I asked the officer commanding at St. John to have these men released he wrote me that an investigation had been held and gave me what he said were the facts. But the so-called facts were as absolutely unfounded as anything could possibly be. I say that because I know the facts. These are the things which bring military affairs into disrepute in this country. So long as the war was on, I never said a word to stop a man from going into the training camps, but since the armistice was signed I have on different occasions written to the officers about certain cases, but have never received the slightest satisfaction. In one case I tried on different occasions by personal request and correspondence to get a married man home because his wife was lying sick in bed. I went down and saw him at St. John. He was performing no military service at all; he was not doing twenty minutes work a day; he had never had any training, and there was no need for any training. After some three or four weeks I had the slight satisfaction of securing five days' leave for him so that he could go home and look after his wife and family. Now this is not reasonable, it is not just. The minister may say that it was necessary to have the men there for garrison duty. However that may be, I say it was not necessary to keep a married man there who was required at home to look after and protect his sick wife and family.

Mr. ROBB: I wish to support what the hon. member for Westmorland has said as to the demand from all over the country, not only from Western Canada but from Eastern Canada as well, for the release as soon as possible of the men who are required on the farms and in the industries of this country.

I rose more particularly to refer to the statement made by the Acting Prime Minister last evening as to the accounts of Canada. He gave a very complete account of our war expenditure, but did not give the statement that I more particularly required as to the exact financial position of the country. However, as we are led to believe that the Budget will be brought down shortly, I suppose that the Minister of Finance intends to give that statement then.

The Committee is no doubt aware that the vote of $350,000,000 now under consideration represents a sum greater than the total debt of Canada prior to 1914. The Government at this session are asking for enormous credits, and I am not sure that the country fully realizes the magnitude of these credits. The Estimates that have already been brought down provide for an expenditure of $437,000,000 odd; this item is $350,000,000; the level crossing Bill calls for an expenditure of $200,000; highways about $20,000,000, and housing $25,000,000. A total of $832,000,000 is asked for, and we are yet to have Supplementary Estimates, judging from the statements made by the different ministers. Hon. gentlemen on this side of the House do not intend to criticize this vote so far is it relates to defence and demobilization. We have supported during the war all the votes the Government has taken for war purposes.

Last evening as I listened to the Acting Prime Minister I could not help thinking that he was setting up a man of straw for the purpose of knocking him down. He was trying to make the country believe that we on this side of the House were not in favour of encouraging the manufacturing industries of this country. The facts are quite to the contrary. The Liberal party has never discouraged the manufacturing industries of this country. In fact, the manufacturers as well as the farmers of this country enjoyed their greatest prosperity during the fifteen years of the late Liberal administration. It never was, and is not to-day, the policy of the Liberal party to do anything to injure the manufacturing industries of this country. We wish to help them, and we believe that the best way to help them is by removing certain restrictions which to-day are an incubus upon them, as well as being very harmful to the agricultural interests of this country. We believe that the larger and the wider the market we can obtain for our agricultural products, the better it will be for the manufacturing interests of this country.

Last evening the Acting Prime Minister laid great stress upon the rate of exchange and the adverse trade balance against Canada. I wish to say to him that he and his Government are in some measure responsible for the adverse trade balance against Canada at the present time. I would remind him, so that he may deal with the matter when he brings down his Budget, that his action in connection with the pulp and paper industry in this country did very much to create an adverse trade balance against us. Had he treated properly the pulp and paper industries of this country, had he allowed them greater freedom in exporting their product, it would have been better for Canada and better for that industry. If that had been the policy of the minister, instead of the trade being curtailed, it would have expanded.

Now let me give a case in connection with agricultural products. No later than last fall this Government put an embargo on dairy products going out of this country. They fixed the price on the products of butter and cheese factories. The farmers all along the international line—the embargo did not apply for the whole length of the international line because deputations came here from Manitoba and Saskatchewan protesting against the embargo —these farmers, when the price of butter and cheese was fixed began to ship their milk and cream to the United States. So the Government put an embargo against dairy products entering the United States. When we buy corn from the United States for our dairy herds, we are ready to pay for it with butter and cheese. Otherwise, we must pay in money. That is another reason why we have an adverse trade balance, and this Government have largely contributed in bringing it about.

The hon. member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bristol), whose voice I regret we do not hear oftener in this House, referred to a condition that prevailed on the lower St. Lawrence in connection with some ship at Seven Islands. He made the statement that a mill at Seven Islands had been offered a 10,000-ton ship which they could not use, but that had they been able to get a ship of lesser tonnage they would have been able to avail themselves of it. That reminded me that the Government, who boast that they are trying to do so much for Canadian industry, have again come in and crippled a Canadian industry in Ontario. That story of the Seven Islands brought to my mind the fact that there is at Thorold a very large paper mill, which I understand is controlled by the Chicago Tribune. They manufacture pulp at Seven Islands. This company own their own vessels which for several years have been carrying pulp from Seven Islands to Thorold, and which are under American register. Sometime early this spring the American Lake Shippers' Association convinced their board at Washington that it would be a good thing to cancel the reciprocity in trade that existed between the United States and Canadian vessels on the Upper Lakes, and the Canadian Government retaliated. The result is that boats of Canadian register are not now allowed to trade from one United States port to another, and our Government have brought in regulations preventing boats of United States register from trading between two Canadian ports. This mill is unable to get boats to carry pulp from Seven Islands to the mill at Thorold, and no later than last Saturday a representative of that company, whom I accidentally met at the Chateau Laurier, told me that unless they could obtain vessels somewhere the mills at Thorold were going to be closed down. This is one example of what our Government are doing to "assist" Canadian industry—assist in crippling it. Let that same condition be protracted until the fall, and when we commence moving our grain and wheat crop from the head of the Great Lakes the farmers of Western Canada will be at the mercy of a combine of shipowners in Canada. These shipowners will fix the rates and the western farmer will have to pay the piper. But he will not have much reason to complain because his representatives in this Parliament support a Government that is responsible for these conditions.

Last evening the hon. Acting Prime Minister made much of the important duties that Mr. Lloyd Harris was discharging—what he had done for Canada at Washington and was now doing at London. I could not help thinking of the position that Mr. Lloyd Harris occupies. Mr. Lloyd Harris, a very good personal friend of mine, left the Liberal party because that party wanted to obtain wider markets and trade with the United States. That was his only reason. Now how can we hope to get extended business for this country when we send as a representative a man who only a few years ago was absolutely opposed to export trade, and whose policy was the home market and only the home market? If my information is correct, we in Canada are suffering from an unfortunate condition of affairs in England. I am making this statement publicly, so that the ministers may interest themselves in it, because the matter to which I am about to refer is common gossip in London, England, and in Canada. The statement is that in London the secretary or some of the officials in the High Commissioner's office and some of the officials in the Trade Commission are not on speaking terms, and that when communications from Canada, intended for certain of these officials in London, go to the other officials, instead of being mailed directly to those in London for whom they are intended, they are sent back to Canada and have to be re-mailed to the proper parties. The sooner that sort of thing is straightened out the better it will be for Canada. These conditions prevail, not amongst the men higher up—I have no fault to find with Sir George Perley or Sir Edward Kemp; they are suffering from the incompetence of understrappers who are running the office over there to the detriment of Canada—and the sooner this Government instruct their representatives over there to get rid of these understrappers who are causing injury to the trade of this country, the better it will be for Canada.

I am sorry I have taken up so much time. I do not intend delaying the passage of this Bill, but there is another matter to which I wish to draw the attention of the Acting Prime Minister so that he may be in a position to make a statement in regard to it when he brings down the Budget. Or perhaps the Minister of Railways (Mr. Reid) may deal with it when he has his estimates before us. During the past few years we sold a great many rails which had been ripped up from the railways throughout Canada. Those rails were sent overseas, and I have never seen in any of the printed statements any account of them. I think the people would like to know who owes us for those rails and if we are to be paid for them, or if they are taken into consideration in the accounts that will be filed of the indebtedness to us by Germany and those who owe us.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The question as to the value of the rails which were removed from the tracks of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and, I think partly from the National Transcontinental and some other lines, is under adjustment at present between the Dominion Government and the Imperial Government. My hon. friend will understand that after a war of such long duration there must necessarily be a number of items subject to adjustment, and it will take considerable time before the transactions can be closed up. I said last night that I would make as comprehensive a statement as possible upon the occasion of the Budget speech with reference to the national debt of Canada, especially its increase during the war, and our estimated expenditures for the coming year, our borrowings of last year, and our proposed borrowings for the present year, and would aim generally to lay as fully before Parliament as I could the facts relating to our financial position, in which, I know, all members of the House and citizens of the country are specially interested at this time.

My hon. friend has referred to the state of exchange between Canada and the United States. It is quite unfavourable to Canada, almost to the extent of 3 per cent. The hon. gentleman is a business man and will not have failed to observe that exchange between Great Britain and the United States is still more unfavourable to Great Britain, approximating 5 per cent. It is not correct that we have an adverse balance of trade to-day, as stated by the hon. member. Our balance of trade is favourable and has been exceedingly so during the last two or three years of the war. All the products that Canada is selling to-day outside of our own borders are being paid for by outside money, that is to say, by what we call technically, exchange. To ascertain a country's real exchange position the whole world position must be taken into account.

I stated last night that one reason why exchange was unfavourable was that by having to provide so much money here in Canada to pay for our products which, in normal times, would find outside money and thus redress our exchange, we neutralized for exchange purposes that amount of our exports. If Great Britain was able to find exchange outside of Canada, that is to say credits in New York, or if she could buy in London exchange for our wheat, flour and other products which she purchased, our New York exchange would speedily rectify itself.

My hon. friend referred to a matter that I do not desire to enter upon at any length to-night, but which has been discussed on more than one occasion in this House, and that is the action taken by the Dominion Government in regard to newsprint. He drew the inference that on account of that action our exchange was not as favourable as it might otherwise have been in the United States. My hon. friend is no doubt aware that the amount of newsprint consumed in Canada by Canadian publishers is only about eleven per cent of our entire output. and therefore, I submit that the regulation of the price in Canada with respect to that eleven per cent has not any vital bearing upon the question of exchange between Canada and the United States.

The action of the Government was taken, as my hon. friend knows, for the purpose of providing, in a very critical time, newsprint at reasonable rates to the Canadian publishers who were very hard hit by the war, especially during the first three years. I am quite satisfied that when the matter comes up for more extended discussion, as my hon. friend indicates that it may, I shall be able to carry the judgment of the House and the country in favour of the proposition that the action of the Government was well advised and in the national interest at the time it was taken. The control of newsprint has continued down to the present time; it will continue until the end of the war, and until, I think also, the Paper Tribunal, which has been created by the Government for the purpose of hearing an appeal from the Newsprint Commissioner, renders its decision. There was submitted to it the question of the price of newsprint for the period since—I am speaking from recollection—July 1 of last year. No Government likes to take, even in war time, any action by way of restriction. It is a very unpleasant thing to do. It is done only from considerations of national duty and the national interest, and these were the motives inducing the Government, in connection with newsprint, to put into effect the Orders in Council and regulations referred to by my hon. friend.

The action of the Government is not singular in that regard. I believe that in Norway, which was a neutral country, such action was taken quite early in the war. In the United States, which takes the largest portion of our newsprint production, there was regulation, as my hon. friend knows, of the price of newsprint. There is regulation in that country to-day. I think my hon. friend is scarcely fair in his criticism of the Government for taking that, what we regard, very necessary action. My hon. friend also referred to the regulations which were in effect some little time ago prohibiting the export of butter.

Mr. ROBB: The embargo.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend knows that no Government would think of taking action of that kind, which is quite unpopular among the farming community, the most influential part of our population, without there being grave reasons in the national interest. It was taken in war time and as a war measure. It was a necessary war measure at a time when it was hard for our Allies to obtain the needed supply of fats. I can assure my hon. friend that that action especially was not taken by the Government on its own initiative without its being convinced of its necessity from the standpoint of the allied cause and of the proper feeding of the armies and the people of the allied countries.

I shall not enter into a discussion of the question of reciprocity. I shall also not follow my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie) in what he said as to the naval policy. I had so many all night sessions in 1913 in respect to that interesting and important subject that I have not quite got back my sleep yet. I therefore hesitate to embark upon the discussion of so highly controversial a question. I had the view and I think I said so on more than one occasion, that the country could have stood both a Canadian navy and the contribution of three dreadnaughts. Sometimes a combination policy is a very good one. We have found that out since the war, but those were the days in which, quite properly, I think, we scrutinized expenditures very carefully and an undertaking of that kind seemed to be formidable.

I am not unmindful of what has been said by hon. friend from Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) in regard to the desirability of the Government considering carefully the question of expenditures and I take in good part what he said as to a minister who has gone through the war probably becoming accustomed to expenditures of large sums without realizing their full significance. But, I endeavour to check myself up from time to time and I may say to my hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, who also referred to the subject, that I do not in the least minimize to the House and to myself the extreme gravity of these large expenditures.

The expenditures which we made during the war were imposed upon us by military exigency. Canada did not count the cost during the war. She put forth her maximum effort and if the war had continued as long as this or until a year from now, instead of diminishing, we should have been increasing our efforts. Expenditure during war is, I will not say beyond the control of the Government, but in many respects it is practically so. The nation is doing its utmost to win the war. Every effort is being put forward, every energy strained, the public are in no mood to accept the excuse of financial considerations standing in the way of anything that appears necessary to promote the national effort in the struggle; consequently the position of the Finance Minister during the war is one largely of finding money for huge military expenditures. He endeavours to exercise a certain measure of control but after he has done his best, while the war is on, there is a vast amount of expenditure that is uncontrollable and it is his duty to find the money.

Now, the war is over, but, as I pointed out last night this is a war year.

We had the situation confronting us, when the armistice was declared, which I mentioned last night, and which threatened to throw out of employment some 200,000 people; we had the prospect of so many of our men returning, and returning quickly, to be reabsorbed into civil life. It is a time of great unrest all over the world, we are not exempt from that unrest, and with every desire to keep our expenditures down I am satisfied that the policy for this year is to make expenditures upon a large scale for productive undertakings in order to furnish as much work as possible. Our people have suffered, as people all over the world have suffered; the cost of living is very high, and the combination of unemployment and high cost of living is one which leads to serious situations wherever it occurs.

With regard to that, may I put forward a suggestion which has occurred to me on more than one occasion? The concomitants of war are always plague and famine. The world has had plague in the shape of influenza, and to-day, if the world is considered as a whole, there is famine. There is no famine in Canada, for we are a food-producing and food-exporting country. But if we take into account central, southern and southeastern Europe, parts of Belgium and France, and especially Russia, we realize that agriculture on that continent has been partially destroyed by the war. Millions of men have been withdrawn from tillage, cattle have been killed, herds necessarily have been allowed to run down, horses have been taken for the use of the armies, implements have been destroyed on a vast scale, particularly in Russia during the agrarian risings throughout that great republic, and if we take the vast tract of desolate occupied territory, it is not too much to say that the world is suffering to some extent from famine. Now, that makes a great world demand for foodstuffs; that in turn causes high prices, and, as I stated, we have here, as we have in all other countries, high prices for the commodities that are essential to life. If we should have also unemployment on an extensive scale throughout this country the consequences would be quite serious.

The Government has endeavoured to do its best to meet that situation. I do not say that every action of the Government has been the wisest possible; I am only speaking of the average of what we have done since the armistice in November last. I desire again to assure the House that I realize the enormous liabilities that have accumulated as the result of the war, and that I am very vitally seized of the importance of not engaging in any expenditures that are not productive or are not necessary to keep our industries going to the extent of furnishing employment to those of our population who may be in danger of unemployment and who have rendered such patriotic service during the war.

I think I have covered nearly all the points adverted to by hon. members opposite. It was not my intention last night to reflect on hon. gentlemen of the Opposition as to their attitude towards manufacturing industries. I was simply answering the argument which was put forward, as my hon. friend will see on perusing Hansard.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would like to ask my hon. friend to be a little more explicit about the purpose of subsection (d):

—the carrying out of any measures deemed necessary or advisable by the Governor in Council in consequence of the war;

Could he give me a concrete case?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is really put in to meet a case which could not well be foreseen, but which might arise. My hon. friend will find that precise section in the first and second War Appropriation Acts. I remember, it was drafted in my office by Mr. Ross, who was Assistant Deputy Minister at the time, and I think I suggested the word "deemed." During the war cases arose from time to time which could not have been foreseen, and which were clearly cases where the Government was justified in deeming the expenditures necessary to be war expenditures because they arose out of the war. I am afraid I cannot give a concrete case to my hon. friend without having time to look into our expenditures. But it has not been drawn to my attention that the clause has been abused, and I do not think it is likely to be abused.

Mr. FIELDING: Perhaps my hon. friend might approach the question from the other side. Would he tell us what could not be done under that clause? I think that under it they could get an Order in Council to hang you, Mr. Chairman. I really do not see any limitation to the power of the Governor in Council under the clause. I am not opposing it, because it has been in previous Acts and no harm has come of it; but it strikes me that that is a very broad power indeed, and I cannot imagine anything done by the Governor in Council under it that would not be deemed legal.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am inclined to think my hon. friend is right. I would point out to him that, in 1914, when the war commenced, Parliament passed the War Measures Act, which practically devolved upon the Government the legislative powers of Parliament. It was an extraordinary power, implying great confidence, and I have always felt that the Government should exercise that power keeping that fact in mind. Speaking generally with regard to the War Measures Act, I believe that almost more than any other single thing except the patriotism and courage of our soldiers, that Act enabled Canada to achieve the degree of success in the war which she did achieve. I have heard men in the United States—where the system was not nearly so flexible until they had been in the war for some time, when the entire executive and, I think, legislative power was vested in the President—refer to this War Measures Act and the extraordinary power that it gave to the Government to deal quickly with questions as they arose. It would be quite impossible to provide in Estimates, or by legislation in advance, for all the multitudinous cases arising during the war; and this War Measures Act, while it did give the Government extraordinary power and was concurred in by the Opposition, and, as I say, implied the reposing of great confidence in the Government—which for my part I have always recognized and gladly acknowledged—enabled this country to do what it could by no means otherwise have attempted to do in the carrying on of the war. I wish to say that, and I would like to draw my hon. friend's attention to the powers devolved upon the Government by that Act—powers which would never have been given, and never should have been given, except in war time.

The War Appropriation Acts of the past two years and this War Demobilization Act are intended to give the Government power to deal, as to expenditure, with all matters arising out of the war. It is very wide, I admit. I am a strong believer in the Government bringing down estimates in detail rather than in blanket votes, showing as far as possible the purpose for which the expenditure is to be made. That is a sound principle, in ordinary times at least. This year I took up in my office the question of what amount we should provide in this Demobilization Bill. The instructions I gave were that the estimates of my own department and of all other departments to which the request was transmitted should contain practically all the items we could specify, and that the Demobilization Bill should cover only the war gratuity, demobilization expenditure, and other items that could not be specified with accuracy in an estimate. I do not know how far we have succeeded in doing that, but we appreciate the confidence expressed in the vote and will endeavour to administer it as trustees should.

Mr. FIELDING: I cordially agree with the hon. gentleman that the War Measures Act was a necessary and proper Act. During the war, owing to the patriotic feeling of the country, people were not critical; you could get pretty nearly anything that was asked for in the name of the war or for the purposes of the war. But the time has arrived when the people will be more critical, and if we continue war measures at a time when there is no longer any war, there will be keener inquiry and more criticism. I do not object to the passing of the Act, but I think it is just as well that we should begin to adapt ourselves to the condition of peace which is happily upon us.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I entirely agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Could the Government, for instance, buy the wheat crop under this provision of the Bill?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Well, I suppose if the Government stated that it was deemed to be a war purpose, the Government's discretion would not be questioned, let us say, by a court. But it is not the intention of the Government to use this vote for that purpose, although a great part of it may be used for financing the wheat crop in the way that I intimated last evening.

Mr. VIEN: There are some questions that we want to put to the Minister of Militia in regard to the $5,000,000 voted last year which, I fancy, would naturally come under this item. If we have the assurance that when the Supplementary Estimates of the Department of Militia are before the Committee we may put any question to the minister as to the expenditure during the war and the accounts of the Department of Militia Overseas, I shall not insist upon receiving further information at this stage.

Major-General MEWBURN: I shall be very glad to endeavour to answer any questions on the Supplementary Estimates of the Department of Militia.

Mr. VIEN: The Minister of Marine told us to-day that he was asking Parliament to vote $30,000,000 to meet his shipbuilding programme of last year, and that a further amount would be required for the programme that he is to lay before the House on a future day. What amount of the $350,000,000 is to be expended upon transportation facilities, and in what way? Is the expenditure to be for the building or the purchase of ships?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is a general clause to enable the Government to take such action as may be necessitated by conditions to provide transportation for our troops or for our commerce.

Mr. VIEN: It could hardly be understood as being for the transportation of troops, because it is for " the promotion of trade and industry and the transportation facilities therefor." We could hardly be expected to provide for transportation facilities outside of the building, buying or chartering of ships. How could we expend money under this Bill for the promotion of transportation facilities except through the Department of Marine and Fisheries or Naval Affairs?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: A part of this money could be used for shipbuilding. I requested that the estimate for shipbuilding for 1919-20 should be in the Supplementary Estimates for this year, but down to March 31 the expenditure for shipbuilding would come out of last year's vote, if that vote were sufficient for all purposes for which it was voted, including this. If there should be a shortage there, this vote, I think, would enable us to take it up. The wording of section 2 practically follows the wording of the corresponding section in last year's war vote, with the changes which, in the opinion of Council, were necessitated by the altered conditions. We wanted to have it wide enough, with the remainder of the vote of last year, to meet any expenditures in excess of the war vote of last year, if there should be such, as well as expenditures of this year. So far as I know, no specific expenditure is in view under this clause.

Mr. VIEN: I do not believe that in the clause in the Act appropriating $500,000,000 there was any specific amount mentioned under the title that we now find in subsection (c) of section 2. I do not remember that last year we voted any amount of money for the promoting of trade and industry and transportation facilities therefor. This is entirely new, and if the term " transportation facilities " is not to be construed as meaning shipbuilding, I hardly see how we could be called upon to give to the Government the right to facilitate transport and expend any money for that purpose unless the items are brought down in the Estimates of some department. The Acting Prime Minister does not appear to know much more on the subject than I do. This is not for shipbuilding; it is not for the chartering of ships. The demobilization of our troops is covered by other sections, and this is not for carrying war materials back to this country. If it is not for the building of ships, how should we be called upon to vote any money for the payment of transportation of our goods or for bringing into Canada the goods we buy? I fail entirely to see any purpose which would commend itself to this Committee for which we would give to the Government a blanket authorization to spend any portion of the $350,000,000, if it does not come under the title of shipbuilding. I would, therefore, suggest that the words "transportation facilities" be struck out.

Mr. CANNON: Clause (d) of section 2 says:

The carrying out of any measures deemed necessary or advisable by the Governor in consequence of the war.

Is this a revival or extension of the War Measures Act?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This is a vote of money, and it can be availed of by the Government for the carrying out of any measures deemed necessary by the Governor in Council in consequence of the war; that is to say, in connection with any measures relating to demobilization, or to many questions which might arise. I am sure it does not extend the powers of the Government under the War Measures Act beyond the limitations imposed by Parliament in that Act.

Mr. CANNON: I think it does.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Carried.

Mr. CANNON: Hon. members need not be in such a hurry. The section will be carried when we are through with it, and not before. Some hon. members do not seem to appreciate the importance of this clause, and we shall discuss it as long as we deem it necessary to do so. I am not quite satisfied with the explanation given by the Acting Prime Minister. The scope of this clause is very wide. This is for carrying out any measures deemed necessary in consequence of the war, not for the prosecution of the war, because the war is over. How far will it go? Where will the Government stop? Now that the war is over, are we, by this Bill, going to have government by Order in Council, just as during the past five years? I do not think the people of this country would be satisfied with such a condition of things.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Section 2 authorizes the paying out of a sum not exceeding $350,000,000 for the purposes mentioned, amongst others, for the carrying out of any measures deemed necessary or advisable by the Governor in Council in consequence of the war. The purpose of this is to place the Government in funds to carry out measures which it is lawfully authorized to carry out. This is not a measure like the War Measures Act, authorizing the Government to do specific things.

Mr. FIELDING: I understand from the Acting Prime Minister that these words were taken from similar Bills of previous years?

[Mr. Vien.]

Sir THOMAS WHITE: With certain changes to meet altered conditions.

Mr. FIELDING: I have in my hand the $500,000,000 loan resolution of 1917, and I do not find these words in it. I have not looked at the others.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Which words does my hon. friend refer to?

Mr. FIELDING: Clause (d).

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think they are in the Act of 1918.

Mr. FIELDING: If the minister says that they are in the previous resolution, I am content.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am not sure; I will send up for the Act.

Mr. McKENZIE: If the words of clause (d) were used in the Act of 1918, that could be very readily understood, and it would be quite proper, because the war was on and unforeseen conditions would have to be provided for. The minister, however, may see when he gets the Act. There are so many things in connection with this very comprehensive clause, it is difficult to exhaust them all. Is the $70,000,000 for which the Government have made the country liable by Order in Council, included in this appropriation of $350,000,000? I refer to the $20,000,000 for roads in the provinces, $25,000,000 for housing, and $25,000,000 for trade with Rumania?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The first two would not be. The Highways resolution is on the Order Paper, and it would provide for payment out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. The vote for Housing is in the Estimates, and it will also provide for payment out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund. The credits which I mentioned last night would be payable, partly out of this appropriation and partly out of any balance from the last vote.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Did the War Appropriation Act not provide for an expenditure of $500,000,000?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I think the minister stated some time ago that a large portion of that appropriation was still unexpended.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Why, then, do we say in clause (e), "For the purposes mentioned in the War Appropriation Act, 1918, and in excess of the amount authorized by the said Act?"

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If any excess. I am not able to state precisely what the expenditure on war account would be for the last year. This provision was in the War Appropriation Act, 1918, and it was found necessary to take care of an expenditure in excess of the amount authorized for the previous year. The corresponding clauses in last year's Act are as follows:

(a) the defence and security of Canada;
(b) the conduct of naval and military operations in or beyond Canada;
(c) promoting the continuance of trade industry and business communications, whether by means of insurance or indemnity against war risk or otherwise;
(d) the carrying out of any measures deemed necessary or advisable by the Governor in Council in consequence of the existence of a state of war; and,
(e) payments made for the said purposes during the fiscal year ending the thirty-first day of March, nineteen hundred and eighteen, in excess of the amount authorized by The War Appropriation Act, 1917.

Now the Government deemed shipbuilding to be a war measure, and payments were made up to the end of the last fiscal year, and I think have been made since, on that account out of the War Appropriation. The paragraph to which my hon. friend has referred would undoubtedly authorize an expenditure upon shipbuilding, for instance, to the extent that is necessary.

Mr. FIELDING: May I add in explanation that I sent for the Journals of 1914, and I find that in the original resolution the words to which exception has been taken are to be found exactly as they have been read by the minister for the year 1918. It so happened that the Act of 1917 did not contain them.

Mr. VIEN: Last night the Acting Prime Minister stated that the net debt on March 31, 1919, was $1,584,000,000. What was the gross debt on the same date?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Unless I could at the same time inform the House as to the assets on the other side of the account, especially the liquid assets, the information would not be of value in reaching a conclusion as to the financial position of Canada. It is the net debt that conveys the information which the hon. member for Chateauguay-Huntingdon (Mr. Robb) asked me to obtain for him. My hon. friend knows that part of the gross debt would be the currency, although it might be secured by gold, by liabilities of banks in respect of loans, and by other assets.

Mr. VIEN: At a later date would the minister state what the gross debt is, and how the net debt is arrived at?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes; perhaps when the Estimates of the Finance Department are up.

Mr. McKENZIE: How does the minister propose to borrow this money?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is not always wise to state precisely how one intends to raise money, but I think I said in the House a short time ago that it would be necessary to have a domestic loan this coming fall, possibly in September. We have some borrowing to do in New York between now and August next, but the borrowing under this Bill will be by way of a domestic loan. I shall not state to what amount we shall borrow, because I am unable to state that accurately. It might be that we would borrow temporarily from the banks and make a loan for the remaining amount. I say that because interest rates are pretty high, and it is advisable to limit the amount of the loan to as low an amount as possible, in order that we may not have to pay a high rate of interest over a period of years.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—loans authorized:

Mr. McKENZIE: This section empowers the Governor in Council to borrow "such sum or sums of money, less any amount borrowed in excess of the amounts authorized by any war appropriation Act." What is the exact amount that the minister proposes to borrow under the powers given him by this Act?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: This is to ensure that when this amount is raised we shall not have borrowed more than we were authorized by Parliament to borrow. For example, the amount we were authorized to borrow last year was $500,000,000, speaking from memory, and we received $670,000,000 by the Victory Loan. We took practically all that money, and I am not sure that the Dominion has not slightly exceeded the borrowing powers it had. The purpose of this section is to correct that so that when this money is borrowed it will be borrowed in accordance with legislation.

Mr. McKENZIE: You have $150,000,000 more than was authorized last year?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, but there might have been some borrowing power in respect to the previous year. The hon.

gentleman knows that in connection with the Appropriation Bill every year when the general estimates are passed there is a provision that the borrowing power of the Dominion is so much. Sometimes that is rather arbitrary, but it is put in just to ensure that the Dominion has the borrowing power necessary to raise the money provided in the Appropriation Bill. That is a point that has to be watched by the Finance Department. I asked my deputy to give attention to that in connection with this Bill so that we should not find ourselves without legislative authority in respect to all the amounts which we might have raised by loan in excess of actual borrowing powers at the time. It would not happen in ordinary times, but during the war it did happen that we slightly overborrowed.

Mr. McKENZIE: We had power last year to borrow $500,000,000. That loan brought to the Treasury $650,000,000. There is therefore $150,000,000 for which we have no authority under the former Act. Is that to be regarded as part of this $350,000,000, or are we going to borrow out-and-out $350,000,000 under this Act together with the $150,000,000 standing over from last year?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It will enable us to get this $350,000,000 in accordance with existing legislation. If there were not some such clause as this, when we came to borrow notwithstanding the vote of $350,000,000 we would find ourselves in the position of being able to borrow only, say, $300,000,000. The situation with regard to the last loan was not quite as described by the hon. member. Let us assume that for 1917-18 we had a war vote of $500,000,000 and expended $350,000,000. Then if, the next year, we had a vote of $500,000,000 and raised a loan of $650,000,000 the previous authority would apply to the excess on the second Bill. The intention is to enable us to raise $350,000,000 notwithstanding that we may have raised some moneys voted by Parliament but in excess of borrowing powers then existing.

Mr. VIEN: Is it the intention of the Acting Prime Minister to have these war bonds which are to be issued on that loan tax-free, or are they to be subject to taxation?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am unable to make a statement with regard to that because I don't know what conditions we shall be confronted with when we float this loan. If we could float a taxable loan at a rate of interest which would compare favourably with the rate which we should obtain on tax-free issue, and having regard to the amount of income tax we would receive if the loan were taxable, I would be strongly in favour of issuing bonds not tax-free. My hon. friend is no doubt aware that when you come to face a market you have to pay a much higher rate of interest, even upon Government loans, where your securities are issued subject to taxation, than you do where the securities are tax-free. I am speaking only from memory, because it did not occur to me that the question would arise to-night. In the United States I think there is a point difference between tax-free securities and taxable securities, and on a large loan the annual difference in interest which you have to pay as between tax-free and taxable issue is very large, and if one looked at it purely from the business standpoint he would calculate as to what revenue would likely be received from a taxable loan, and in that connection he would have to consider the exemption granted under our Income Tax Act. In this country he would, I am sure, reach the conclusion that the tax-free issue gives a better result in an annual budget than a taxable issue, because the amount which would be received by way of interest on a taxable bond would not be as great as the annual amount which the Government would have to pay in excess interest upon the taxable issue. There is another aspect of the matter to which attention must be given. Under an income tax graduated as ours is, there is reached a point at which there is a decided advantage to those of large incomes in buying the tax-free bonds. That is unfortunate. To some extent the issue of tax-free bonds is inconsistent with a steeply graduated income tax. One must consider market conditions, and whether outstanding issues which are in competition with him in his loan are tax-free or not, and be guided by the situation with which he is confronted. It is very difficult to say in advance what one will do until the time is reached. When we put out our first loan in New York and the second loan in 1917 the very first point that arose was that the bonds must be tax-free. You could not sell an issue at that time in the United States on taxable bonds for the reason that Canada was at war. They did not know but what they might be taxed at their source here, and you could not sell an issue of taxable bonds in the United States at that time. You could not sell a taxable issue of Canadian bonds in the United States to-day. I raised the question as to whether these bonds might not be taxable to parties not resident in Canada, but on account of the proximity of Canada to the United States, parties in the United States want the benefit of the markets both of Canada and of the United States, and the result was that our bonds in our issues there had to be tax-free. Our bonds being tax-free there, people in Canada desiring to buy bonds, by reason of the exemption given in respect of income tax, could buy them in New York. All the securities we issue here are in competition with all the securities outstanding here and in New York. It is a matter to which I have given a great deal of anxious thought, and there are two sides to the question I frankly admit. It is a question of calculation as to what will give the best results to the Dominion. There will always be a certain dissatisfaction if parties of large incomes can buy tax-free bonds and thus escape to some extent from income taxation. But, on the other hand, we must consider what the rate of interest would be as between a tax-free and a taxable bond and endeavour to do the best we can with the situation.

Mr. VIEN: On the Victory Loans that have been floated in Canada the Government has fixed the rate of interest. Does the Acting Prime Minister believe that with the rate of interest fixed at 5 and 5½ per cent the last domestic loans floated in Canada would not have been subscribed as cheerfully if they had been taxable?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Most certainly not. We should have got a substantial subscription but nothing like the amount we did get. I can say that positively because I went into the matter most carefully. Take, for example, financial institutions which are purchasers of bonds that are offered on the open market; they would have purchased a certain amount but nothing like the amount they did purchase. They could go on the open market and buy. Take the situation in the United States last year. Large insurance companies there which have to earn a certain rate of interest upon their investments in order to make a slight profit, or to carry their liabilities, can take a certain amount of taxable loan at a lower rate of interest than the market rate, but if they had all their surplus funds invested in that and found that these bonds went down five to ten points it would be a very serious thing for them. The rate of interest in the market is determined by supply and demand the same as the price of any other commodity and it is a most extraordinary thing that at the end of this war in which the finance of all countries has been disturbed and dislocated, in many cases shattered, we find ourselves with our securities during the war standing at par and above. Over a million and a half of the people of this country invested in the Victory Loan, and there is a much better feeling in this country among the people who subscribed to this loan that their securities are standing at par and over and that they can realize, if they want to, the amount they paid for them. If these securities were down five or ten points and if we put out another loan on a 5 per cent basis, or on a 5½ per cent basis, only one thing would happen and that would be that we would have to count on a discount. If the previous loan had gone to a discount, when it came to the floating of the next loan, the fact of that discount would have an important bearing.

I feel that our war financing has been very successful, even if I do say it myself. I felt that we should pay a reasonable rate of interest upon our borrowings. I do not mean to say that the Canadian public might not have taken once or twice a loan at a rate below the market rate, but I do not believe that is a wise policy especially in connection with a long war. When you offer securities to the public the best factor you can have is a lot of pleased subscribers to the previous loan. From the beginning of the war we were in competition with Great Britain's securities in New York and when I offered some of my loans in New York and some of the loans in Canada British securities were selling as low as on a 7 or 8 per cent basis in New York. So were the securities of France as well as other securities of the highest grade. In our financing during the war we had to take conditions as we found them and deal in New York or here as best we could.

In the war loans we engaged the interest of all sections of the community; and I want to pay my tribute here and now, as I have on every platform on which I spoke, to the members of this House on both sides, and to the Canadian people without distinction of class, race and creed, who assisted me to the utmost of their ability in floating these loans. Otherwise we could not have done it. There was co-operative effort on the part of everyone. I have heard no complaint from the time the first loan was floated down to the present, of there being any favouritism, or discrimination, or political influence, or patronage, in reference to the flotation of our Canadian war loans.

Mr. VIEN: As the clause gives the Government power to determine under what conditions the loan is going to the floated, I think it is proper to draw the attention of the Government to the bitter criticism which has circulated among the public against the floating of tax-exempt loans. There is, it is true, the question of dollars and cents to be kept in view,—whether the discount that you will lose on the taxable bond will be equalized by the amount that the public exchequer will receive from the taxation on this bond. But there is also something else than the dollars and cents aspect of the question, there is a question of principle; and I say it is not democratic to have bonds floated which are tax exempt. There is a great deal of criticism of the action of the Government in floating tax exempt bonds. It allows those who have made a lot of money during the war, by profiteering or otherwise, and financial and banking institutions which have a lot of money to dispose of, to place that money in tax-exempt bonds. They were either as patriotic as they pretended and boasted they were during the floating of these Victory Loans, in which case they would have subscribed as freely whether the bonds were tax exempt or not, or else some of the feathers should be taken off their caps—and I think the Acting Prime Minister has done that to-night in stating that in his opinion the last loan would not have been as freely subscribed had it not been exempt from taxation; we would have received a certain amount but not have quite as much as we have received by issuing tax-exempt bonds. I had some knowledge of the floating of the last Victory Loan in the district of Quebec, and in that district the exemption did not influence very much the people who subscribed to that loan. They subscribed because an appeal was made to them to do so on the ground that it was necessary, for the successful prosecution of the war, to help our industries and to help the Government to carry on, to accomplish the task which they had on their hands. I believe that if a proper appeal had been made to the people of Canada at large the response would have been equally as good whether the bonds were taxable or exempt. There is a great deal of unrest and criticism among the labour classes at the present time. I have heard a lot of it in Montreal, Toronto and Quebec. The labouring classes contend that we owe great sums of money as a result of our domestic loans.

[Sir Thomas White.]

To whom do we owe them? We owe them to those who have made money during the war either by war contracts or by profiteering on the necessaries of life—and we have examples high up. They contend that not only do we owe the capital of our domestic loan to those people who made their money sometimes by the sweat of the working classes, but that those people have taken care that the interest they are going to derive from the money they have loaned to the Government will be tax exempt, and that it will be the wage earner and the small man who will have to pay the greatest part of the amount which the Government has to raise to meet our expenditures and our liabilities. And thereby we invite to a great extent the criticism which is now so prevalent throughout the country. I believe the better practice would have been even to pay a higher rate of interest or a discount on the floating of our bonds. The true democratic principle is that every one should pay his proper share of the country's expenditure, and if I might be at liberty to offer a little advice to the Government it would be this, that in future when floating loans they should not make them exempt from taxation.

Mr. FIELDING: I am not sure that I correctly caught the answer of the minister to the question of the leader of the Opposition as to the amount he is at liberty to borrow under this clause. Am I right in understanding that the object is to raise a new loan of $350,000,000?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, $350,000,000, and to any amount for which we have not borrowing power, but which we have borrowed.

Mr. FIELDING: If I read the resolution aright, the maximum the hon. minister could borrow under the Bill would be $350,000,000; but from that he must deduct the $150,000,000 which he says was over-borrowed last year. If that is correct, he will only borrow under this Bill $200,000,000. I would just draw the hon. gentleman's attention to that.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I shall be glad to have the clause examined by the Department of Justice. It seems a little complicated, but it was settled by my department for the purpose of insuring that we had borrowing power necessary to raise $350,000,000.

Mr. FIELDING: It is not within this Bill, if the hon. gentleman over-borrowed $150,000,000 last year.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I merely used that as an illustration. I do not know what amount was over-borrowed last year—at least, I have not accurate information. I stated to my hon. friend that if we raised, as we did, $670,000,000 by the Victory Loan of last year, and had a war appropriation of only $500,000,000, and if we had a surplus from the previous year, and had not borrowed the amount we were authorized to borrow the previous year, that unused borrowing power would apply in respect of the surplus expenditure. I will look at this section, but I do not think it should pass because it was settled, as I say, with that in view.

Mr. CANNON: How much of the $670,000,000 of the 1918 loan was subscribed as cash, and how much by way of conversion of previous loans?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: If we had taken into account the amount of conversions the last loan would have been very much in excess of $670,000,000. That amount represents cash subscriptions.

Section agreed to.

On section 5—power to re-issue, sell or pledge securities:

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not aware that legislation of this sort has ever been passed before by this House. Is not this a rather extraordinary power? If there is to be any further borrowing should not Parliament have something to say about it?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: As to section 4, I have looked at it more closely since my hon. friend (Mr. Fielding) spoke, and I would direct his attention to this:

> The Governor in Council may, in addition to the sums now remaining unborrowed. . . . raise by way of loan, ... such sum or sums of money, less any amount borrowed in excess of the amounts authorized by any war appropriation Act, as are required for the purpose of making any payment authorized by this Act.

Does my hon. friend see the force of the last few words there? That is to say, this section authorizes us to borrow in any event the amount required for making any expenditure if authorized by this Act. That is the way I would construe those last words:

Mr. FIELDING: That is the way the money raised would have to be applied; but I do not think it creates power to raise money. I can understand the possibility that, as respects the war loan particularly, there was overborrowing of over $150,000,000; but if there were other borrowing powers unused, some portion of that $150,000,000, possibly the whole of it, might be covered by such other unused powers, and in that way there would not be overborrowing. But if there was actual overborrowing, meaning something in excess of what you have power to borrow, then clearly that must be deducted from the $350,000,000. However, it is enough to call my hon. friend's attention to it, and his solicitor no doubt will look into it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes. I will have the Department of Justice consider the section, and if any change is necessary to effectuate the purpose we have in mind I will have the matter attended to on the third reading. My hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, asked a question about section 5.

Mr. McKENZIE: Section 5 states that after those securities or bonds are paid and called in they can be re-issued and re-sold without any reference to Parliament. I think that is rather unusual.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is a frequent clause in company legislation and arises out of a decision—some of the lawyers in the House will recall it—under which it was held that if securities had been pledged, and the amount of the loan paid off and the securities got back again, they could not then be sold, that they became extinguished by virtue of their redemption; hence this clause, which, I believe, is usually inserted. Supposing the Dominion had issued bonds with the intention of selling them outright but in the meantime had borrowed against them from the bank—which the Dominion now seldom does—and paid off the loan to the bank, and then desired to sell the securities, it is advisable that they should be able to sell them without getting fresh borrowing powers; in other words, that they should not be deemed to be extinguished. Frequently loans are effected for the purpose of carrying securities which it is intended to sell and repay the loan from the proceeds so obtained.

Mr. FIELDING: I think the clause had its origin in reference to a railway company, and the principle having been laid down by the courts it was thought as respects all Government loans that the same precaution should be taken.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes, that is right.

Section agreed to.

On the Preamble:

Mr. McKENZIE: I would like to ask the minister in connection with the many borrowings and bonds of the Government that are outstanding, has the Government any power to recall those bonds at any time, or must they remain outstanding for a set period of years? We are paying very heavy interest; that we can readily understand, having regard to the nature of the period through which we have been passing. But we hope that some day we shall get back to normal times, when money can be borrowed much cheaper than it can be borrowed now. If the Government had power to call in these bonds, pay them off, and convert them into new securities at a smaller rate of interest, it would be very much in the interest of the country. Will the minister retain to himself such powers in connection with future borrowings if he has to pay a very high rate of interest?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: With regard to future borrowings, the policy should be to borrow for shorter terms. No one can foresee what interest rates will be. My own view is that they are not likely to drop materially for a considerable time; I do not see how they can. What I have said is subject to this: in putting out loans one has to consider the financing that has already been done and not have his loans in large amounts too close to the present time. Let me illustrate. Suppose the Dominion Government during the war had been fearful of the comparatively high interest rates and had resorted to short-date borrowing, which is all right for comparatively small amounts in times of high interest rates. And suppose the Minister of Finance had to face within the next five years, let us say, the raising of five, seven or ten hundred million dollars; that would be a very serious matter. The amounts expended in this war, the debt of Canada and the debts of all nations, are so vast that funding is not possible as it would be in normal times. One of the advantages of our situation is that our loans are distributed over five, ten, fifteen and twenty years. I know precisely what my hon. friend has in mind—that we shall have to pay high interest rates over a period of fifteen and twenty years. That is true in respect of certain of our loans. But I do not see what advantage it would be to us within the next five or ten years, having regard to the loans we have to meet before ten years are over, to be in a position to recall the other bonds, because the financial operations would not be possible to enable us to retire them and replace them with further issues at lower rates; it seems to me that the transactions are too great. I do not like, any more than my hon. friends, the idea that the Dominion has to pay that rate of interest over so long a period. But short-date borrowing is almost fatal in war time, because you get accumulations of debt ahead of you and when you need fresh money you are confronted with maturities coming due, and a very serious situation results.

Bill reported.

On motion of Sir Thomas White, the House adjourned at 11.45 p.m.

Friday, May 9, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

MILITARY SERVICE ACT DEFAULTERS.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. C. A. GAUVREAU (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, now that we have a Bill for the disqualification of defaulters under the Military Service Act, may I ask the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) if he will be good enough to bring pressure on the hon. the Acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Meighen) to grant relief to the farmers' sons now in goal, or to be apprehended, especially in Quebec, on account of the fact that their services are so badly needed on the farms, because of the lateness of the season caused by bad weather?

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): I shall be glad to bring my hon. friend's request to the attention of the Acting Minister of Justice.

CASE OF ESDRAS BERUBE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. GAUVREAU: Now that the hon. Solicitor General (Mr. Guthrie) is in his seat, may I be permitted to ask that he will recommend to the clemency of His Excellency the Governor General the case of a young farmer of Temiscouata, Esdras Bérubé—who was shot and wounded and spent two months—

Mr. SPEAKER: This is a request which should be conveyed in the ordinary course by letter. It is not a matter of policy and should not be brought up on the Orders of the Day.

Mr. GAUVREAU: It is such a bad case that I shall insist on putting my question if allowed.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. gentleman's request must take the course I suggest.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

SUPPLY.

The House again in Committee of Supply —Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Government shipbuilding programme—amount required for the construction of vessels in accordance with the Government programme, $30,000,000.

Mr. MURPHY: In the discussion yesterday, the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) was good enough to give the Committee certain information with regard to the carrying out of the obligations assumed by the Dominion Steel Company in connection with the contract that was referred to. May I now inquire if the hon. gentleman will tell the Committee how much money was expended by the Steel Company in fulfilling their obligations under the contract up to the most recent date in regard to which the hon. gentleman has information?

Mr. BALLANTYNE (Minister of Marine): I am sorry I cannot give my hon. friend (Mr. Murphy) the information that he has asked for. The buildings are only partially up and I have asked the Dominion Steel Corporation to let me know how much money they have expended. For the moment I have not the information, but it cannot be a very large sum.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I would like to know positively from the hon. gentleman if, in any of the pourparlers which he has had of late with the representatives of the company, these gentlemen have agreed to have the terms of the contract altered if need be.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I thought I made that quite clear yesterday in answer to the hon. member (Mr. Lemieux). Last week the President and the Vice-president of the company met me in a very broad and generous spirit. If we do not modify the contract in conformity with the present price of steel in the United States the Government are at liberty to cancel it. The matter is not yet settled, the negotiations are still going on, but when they are finished I will be glad to give the particulars to the House.

Mr. McKENZIE: In so far as this mill is concerned, I would certainly urge upon the minister the desirability of seeing that it is erected and put into operation. I think every Canadian will say that we should have a plate-producing mill in Canada somewhere, and if we are to have it at all I think we should have it in connection with one of the big institutions of that class. The biggest steel-producing plant in Canada to-day is the Dominion Steel Corporation. There may be bigger ones later on, but at the present moment that is the largest in Canada producing steel of the very best class, as has been shown by what they were supplying during the war and what they have been doing in rail production. I think the Dominion Steel Company have produced as good a rail as is produced anywhere on the American continent. It was well understood last year, and I think it is still understood, that the Government were to build that plate mill and that arrangements had been completed for that purpose. The mere fact that a difference has arisen in price one way or the other is not a sufficient reason to disturb the policy agreed upon by the Government, considering that the production of steel plates within our own borders is such an important matter to the whole country. These plates are to be produced at tide water. The mill will be within a stone's throw of tide water of Sydney harbour, from where both coasts and inland by rail can be supplied. The ships are to be built in Halifax, and by steamers from the shores of Sydney harbour to Halifax the transportation of these plates is not a difficult proposition. It would be better, one would think, if both were going on at the same place, and the natural place for shipbuilding would be Sydney harbour, but the Government have decided otherwise, and they having so decided, I have no criticism to offer. But I certainly think it would be a retrograde movement to abandon the idea of producing these plates, and I trust the minister will determinedly carry forward the policy upon which he launched in connection with the erection of a mill. I am glad to find that Mr. Workman, president of the company, has met him in a conciliatory and businesslike spirit on that point, and I hope that nothing will interfere with an advanced programme in connection with shipbuilding and the furnishing of facilities for producing plate within our own country.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Would the minister be good enough to state what he estimates the price of the plates will be to the Government at Sydney under the contract?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am very glad indeed to hear from the leader of the Opposition the words of commendation that he has been good enough to utter in regard to the contract made between the Government and the Dominion Steel Corporation to manufacture two hundred and fifty thousand tons of ship's plate. The best price for the Government that could be agreed upon over a year ago was $4.15 per hundred pounds, based upon the price at which steel billets were selling at that time, viz: $25.50 per ton. Hon. members no doubt are aware that ship's plates are made from steel billets, and in talking with the president of the company I learned that steel billets would not in any event decline in price more than $10 a ton. When the Government entered into that contract with the steel corporation it was as a war project; as I stated in the House yesterday you could not get steel from the United States; and notwithstanding the fact that we had placed an eighty thousand ton contract there, we were only able to obtain six thousand tons. Other countries at war, such as Britain and France were depending on the United States for steel, and Japan was also getting steel from that country. The United States, having a huge mercantile marine programme themselves to carry out, naturally were going to serve their own necessities first before they supplied the needs of others; therefore, to make shipbuilding a self-contained industry in Canada, and to enable this country to get ships during the period of the war, it seemed to the Government that there was no other course open but to enter into the best contract we could to have the steel plates made here. It is greatly to the credit of the steel corporation that they were able to place before the Government a more favourable proposal than we could get from the United States. Another thing in its favour, and which is gratifying from a patriotic point of view, is that the ore used by the steel company to make the pig iron originates in British territory, and comes from Newfoundland, so that all the materials used in production are obtained on British soil. But after the armistice had been signed, the price of ship's plates being 2¾ cents in the States, against possibly a minimum price of $3.75 under the Dominion Steel Company's contract and the Government being obligated to take no less than fifty thousand tons per year for a period of five years, making two hundred and fifty thousand tons in all, it seemed to my colleagues and to me that we could not very well afford to pay that price. The arrangement looked very favourable a year ago when plates were selling at from four to ten cents a pound, but it does not look so favourable now.

I quite agree with the leader of the Opposition that to make Canada's shipbuilding programme permanent, the industry must be on a self-contained basis in this country, and that we ought to make our own ship's plates. I am quite satisfied that the Dominion Steel Corporation could carry out the contract, and I am also well satisfied that Sydney is a very good point at which to make these plates. No definite conclusion has yet been arrived at, but the company fairly stated that if they had completed their plant and installed the machinery necessary it would have been at a capital cost of $5,000,000. Therefore, if they are to meet the American price it would take them many years before they could do so, and possibly they might never be able to write off the initial cost of the plant, or a portion of it. If the Steel Company would give us a more favourable price, the Government would be more inclined to go on with the proposition than it is to cancel it. If, however, the company cannot see their way clear to modify the price, I think it is in the best interests of the country to cancel the contract.

Mr. DUFF: The minister has told us that the Government has only received delivery so far of six thousand tons out of the eighty thousand tons contracted for. I understood him to say yesterday that the contract with the United States was based on a price of 3¼ or 3½ cents per pound?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: 3¼ cents.

Mr. DUFF: Hansard gives the price as 3½ cents, but I understood the minister yesterday to say 3¼ cents. I would like to know if the Government has to take delivery at 3¼ of the other seventy-four thousand tons, and if so if the price it is paying ship builders for ships is based on 3¼ cents per pound, or on the contract price of $4.15 per hundred pounds which it made with the Dominion Iron & Steel Company? Another thing as to which I would like the minister to inform the Committee, if he would kindly do so, is this: An Order in Council was passed when the contract was made with the Dominion Iron & Steel Company, one clause of which states that the company shall be permitted to import into Canada free of duty all goods or machinery necessary to build their plant. I would like to know what amount of goods or machinery the company have imported into this country under the Order in Council in question, also the amount of duty which Canada has lost by the importation of American goods instead of such goods being purchased in the Dominion?

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Replying to the hon. member yesterday, I had the privilege of informing him, in regard to the forty-five ships under contract for the Dominion Government, that the prices were based, not on the contract made with the Dominion Iron & Steel Company, but on the agreement made with the United States at 3¼ cents per pound. I also stated yesterday that the Steel Corporation had not imported any of the required machinery at all. All they have done so far has been to partially erect the building; it contains no plant in the way of machinery, engines, and boilers.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer): It is possible to take another view of the question which has been touched on by the minister and by the leader of the Opposition as to the wisdom of importing steel plates if the object is to build ships successfully and profitably. I remember hearing Mr. Lloyd George address a very enthusiastic audience in the Old Country and he was meeting the argument that had been advanced at that time, which was some years before the war, that free trade was hurting Britain because certain steel plates had been imported from Germany to Barrow-in-Furness. I am sure this Committee would listen to Mr. Lloyd George upon such a question with interest, and possibly with instruction. Mr. Lloyd George said that the person who complained of those steel plates coming to Barrow-in-Furness didn't know quite enough about his subject, and he pointed out that Sir Hugh Bell, one of the greatest iron-masters in the north of England, had taken the trouble to trace the history of the steel plates after they arrived from Germany at Barrow-in-Furness. It is quite true, said the great statesman, that those steel plates came to Barrow-in-Furness from Germany, but Sir Hugh Bell traced what happened to them, and it was extremely interesting, Mr. Chairman, as showing how the Old Country succeeded in shipbuilding. He said those steel plates came from Germany, and they enabled a firm of ship builders to take a contract for shipbuilding at Barrow-in-Furness against the world's competition. They converted Germany's steel plates, which they bought cheaply, into ships, and sold the steel plates in the form of ships back to Germany at a handsome profit. Well, that didn't seem a bad transaction—to employ the highly paid shipbuilding industry of Great Britain at Barrow-in-Furness upon the half finished articles of the less well-paid artisans of Germany, put them into ships and sell them, against the world's competition, back to the country that had sold to Britain the cheap steel plates. I merely mention this incident to show that it is possible to take a contrary view to that which has been expressed by my hon. friends on opposite sides of the House. It is possible to take that contrary view and to hold it very strongly if we look to the interests of Canada instead of to some provincial interests which may be helped by the spending of money locally.

Mr. BURNHAM: There is a disposition in this country to urge provincial interests, but I think national interests and wide economic interests should be more especially regarded. It will suit a particular case sometimes in order with considerable cunning to draw a general conclusion, but it is a practice that must be guarded against. We are not here for the purpose of being beguiled by any such form of reasoning. The fact of the matter is that if you lay down the proposition that has just been outlined, you must also lay down the proposition that cheap products and cheap labour shall have free access to this country. The result would be that you would ruin production and reduce the producer to the level of the foreigner. That is the true general conclusion to be drawn from such a statement. In the particular instance which has just been developed it may quite reasonably have occurred just as outlined; but, as I say, to draw a general conclusion from it is both dangerous and harmful.

We cannot do anything of the sort, if we wish to develop Canada. I might say in particular that if you put a Chinese wall seven hundred feet high around this country and balanced consumption and production, you might well raise this country to the highest possible degree of economic equilibrium, which any man who knows anything about the science of economy is aware is quite possible. But he would also know that if you reduce that wall, if you disturb the equilibrium and destroy the balance of your own resourceful country by admitting cheap labour and cheap labour's products, you must ultimately reduce the country and the people to the level of China and the Chinese coolie.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: How does my hon. friend propose to get his ships over his seven hundred foot wall?

Mr. BURNHAM: I might answer my hon. friend by saying that in the case I supposed we would not need to get them over the seven hundred foot wall. That is just where the error of such reasoning as my hon. friend's comes in. We would have the ships employed within our own country; they would get all the employment they required. We would have the farmer raising no more than was necessary for the sustenance of the people, and we would have the manufacturer making no more than was necessary for their requirements, and we would have the administration employing its arts for preserving the admirable balance of trade in this country. Then we would have such complete immunity from confusion that there would be plenty of time to study economic subjects and bring into this House better conclusions than we have just heard announced.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is no doubt that there are two sides to every question. I have no doubt that in order to build up any country its resources should be developed first to the fullest possible extent, and if we can have further expansion to permit of export, so much the better. But my good friend from Red Deer has been telling me lately that he is devoting a great deal of his attention to the reading of the Holy Writ, and I am sure in that sphere of study he will find no writer more congenial to his close reasoning than the Apostle Paul. He talks to me about provincialism and sectionalism. But if he will read Paul he will find that the Apostle tells us that we are members one of another. Paul says, "Will the eye say to the nose, 'I am not of the body because I am not the nose'? Will the hand say to the foot, 'I am not of the body because I am not the foot'?" Paul reasons that out and concludes that we are members one of another, and of the one body. That magnificent philosopher of former days has many points in common with my good friend from Red Deer and yet sufficient divergency of view to be distinguished from him, and I am sure we will be safe in following Paul's reasoning. And when I advocate the manufacturing of plate at Sydney Harbour it is not because Sydney Harbour happens to be close to my home town in the Gem of Canada, the province of Nova Scotia. I had nothing to do with the placing of that contract, I was not consulted; the Government of this country—and among the many things of which I accuse them I do not include sectionalism—in their wisdom selected Sydney as the place where those plates should be manufactured. All I am asking is that they shall continue to implement their decision.

While I am not a very high protectionist, I am not in favour of the tremendous wall that my friend from Peterborough would like to build; but I cannot help knowing that protection of certain industries has done much for this country. I cannot help knowing that in connection with this very plate industry we are talking about and the institution of the steel works at Sydney those steel works have furnished a market for our Nova Scotia coal and employment for thousands of colliers who to-day would not be employed were it not for the assistance which the Government in the early stages gave to the development of our steel and iron industry.

Now, if there is to be a further development of that industry and of the coal industry by the manufacture of plate and the building of ships in this country, I think that it is a wise move. I do not think any one is preaching any political hearsay when he advocates the development of whatever resources we have within our own country and making ourselves as far as possible self sustaining and independent. I have no doubt the day is not far distant when we shall have a navy of our own, and I want this country to be able to build its own warships, from stem to stern, with what we can ourselves produce. That is the policy I wish to advocate. As I said, I am not a high protectionist, but I am prepared to deal with facts and circumstances and not with any theory which may suit somewhere but not elsewhere.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: I despair of ever getting the last word with my hon. friend, but as we are in Committee perhaps I may be allowed to say that I do not think the fact he has produced to us is very strong evidence in support of his theory.

I do not know the exact number of the inhabitants of Sydney. I hope they are numerous, and I should like to see the population of that town grow, but I should like to see it grow by a reasonable interpretation of the Apostle Paul's language and not by an unreasonable interpretation of it. Of course, I do not believe in a body which does not look after both the hand and the foot. What I object to is a body that would be so unreasonable as to endeavour to clothe its foot with the glove of the hand. That is what protection does, and it is not very successful in the operation. I come from a part of Canada where we have some larger towns than Sydney. Winnipeg, for instance, is quite a city compared with Sydney; it has grown in a shorter time, and it has grown on products raised by people who are men enough to raise them against the competition of the world and who want no protection. The same is true of Calgary, Edmonton, Regina, and the other numerous cities of the West which will go on to be larger cities than Sydney is to-day. Pap-feeding never made a man and it never made a province. It is with men as with nations—people who stand on their own feet are in the end always the strongest, and I should like my hon. friend to take a leaf out of this book of economic sense and not confine his studies absolutely to the scriptures; because, after all, the scriptures were not made to teach either political economy or astronomy. The hon. member knows they get very far wrong on astronomy.

Mr. J. E. ARMSTRONG: Would the minister take into consideration, when he is building these ships, the wisdom of establishing a few of them on our Upper lakes in order that we may be able to control freight rates. In 1909, wheat was brought from Port Arthur to Montreal for 2½ cents a bushel, while last year, steamships on our Upper lakes charged eleven cents for carrying wheat between those two ports, and the rates are constantly increasing, despite the fact that since 1909 we have been spending millions of dollars on our waterways.

Would the minister also take into consideration the fact that the Canada Steamships Company, a company that is now capitalized at $30,000,000, went in a merger in 1912 whereby six or seven companies merged together, and they invested only some $6,000,000 or $7,000,000 of actual capital, but they floated that company with $12,000,000 of watered stock, $12,000,000 of preferred stock and $6,000,000 of bonds. What has happened? That company have increased the rates and have practically a monopoly of traffic on our inland waters, and they are in this position to-day that not only are they paying seven per cent on their preferred stock and bonds, but this year they started to pay four per cent on their $12,000,000 of common stock. In addition to that, they have set aside $5,000,000 of a surplus. This merely goes to show the need of some effort to control the rates, tolls and tariff agreements in connection with our boats on our inland waters. Therefore, when the minister is taking into consideration the building of ships entirely, as I understand, for ocean traffic, which is badly in need of regulation as well, I hope he will consider the advisability of building ships to be placed on our inland waters in order that we may be able to control freight rates there.

Mr. McMASTER: I should not like the debate on this Estimate to proceed further without saying a few words as to the principle on which I think shipbuilding and shipping interests may be successful in this country. If there is one interest in the world which has to meet the competition of the world, it is the shipping interest, and the fact that Great Britain, prior to the war, was earning, through the services rendered by her ships something like £100,000,000 to £120,000,000 a year, was because a ship could be built more cheaply in Great Britain than anywhere else in the world, and that it could be maintained and operated as cheaply, except as regards the personnel, because in Norway and Sweden, Norwegian and Swedish sailors were paid less than British sailors. But the fact that Great Britain was able to find her ships in everything that ships required, such as food, coal, wire and hemp rope, and everything of that sort at the world's cheapest price, gave Great Britain and Ireland their predominance on the seas. I say this with all solemnity, that we in Canada cannot hope to establish a shipbuilding or a shipping business on an artificial basis, and there is no interest in the country that can be served by attempting to do it. Let us look at what has happened in the United States. If I may be pardoned a personal reference, my father, who was a sea-faring man, told me that when he was a young officer at the time of the American Civil war, the Stars and Stripes floated in every harbour in the world. Why was that? Because before the Civil war the United States had a low tariff and at that time were carrying 50 per cent of its own exports and imports in its own bottoms. After the Civil war came on, heavy duties were imposed upon imports into the United States for the purpose of raising revenue, and at first those were also counter-balanced by very heavy excise duty imposed upon goods manufactured within the country, the latter duty being also, of course, for the purpose of raising revenue. After the war was over, the manufacturing interests of the United States—manufacturing interests there as elsewhere are usually wide-awake to their own interest—saw that the excise duties were taken off, but they left the import duties on. What was the effect on merchant shipping in the United States? In a comparatively few years after the Civil war, the United States did not carry 10 per cent of its own exports and imports in its own bottoms. Let me give another practical illustration. We, who believe in the principle of freedom of commerce, are always being attacked as having splendid ideas but as not being practical folk. In the few years before the war our enemy, Germany, had succeeded in building up a very substantial mercantile marine. How did she do it? By building her ships under free trade conditions. The German Government arranged their fiscal policy in such a fashion that everything that went into a ship built in Germany, although Germany was a highly protected country, went in free, and on no other basis could Germany have challenged Great Britain as the mistress of the seas.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Did not Germany, in addition to that, subsidize shipbuilding in order that ships might be built more cheaply than in England?

Mr. McMASTER: Possibly. I am not prepared to say "yes" or "no" to that question, but no subsidy that Germany could have given could have offset the handicap German shipbuilders would have been under, had they had to build ships under protectionist conditions.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Does the hon. member not admit that a subsidy is the highest and worst form of protection?

Mr. McMASTER: No, a subsidy is not the worst form of protection. Subsidies are honest and tell the people what they are paying in order to assist some special interest in the country. One of my great objections to granting special privileges to some classes of the community at the expense of the whole is that the people do not know in that case what they are paying, while under the bonus or subsidy system they have some idea what is being paid out. I would respectfully submit to the minister that nothing less than disaster will meet any plan of shipbuilding, ship-owning or ship-operating if it is not upon a basis to meet competition from all over the world. I know the minister will listen to what I say with courteous attention, and I only trust that he will follow my suggestions.

[Mr. McMaster.]

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Answering, first, the hon. member (Mr. G. E. Armstrong), who asked if it was the policy of the Government to have ships on the Great Lakes, I am happy to say that that is a part of our policy. We intend to have ships, not only on the Pacific and the Atlantic, but on all the principal trade routes, and certainly on the Great Lakes, so that our transportation chain will be complete.

In answer to the hon. member for Brome, I would have been disappointed if he had made any different speech from that which he did make. We both come from the same city, we are both very good friends, each of us respects the views of the other, but on this question we are certainly very far apart. He would have Canadians simply hewers of wood and drawers of water. Canadians have demonstrated that with the very moderate protection we have had in this country for a number of years they can hold their own with the people of any other country in the world. I am sorry the hon. member was not in his seat yesterday, when I explained to the Committee that Canadian yards have turned out ships equal in design and efficiency, and in every other respect to ships built in any part of the world. A few years ago some people in this country thought that ships could not be built in Canada, but it has been amply demonstrated during the last two years that ships can be built here successfully. If my hon. friend had been here yesterday he would have learned that, according to the opinion of Sir George Hunter, of the famous shipbuilding firm of Swan & Hunter, ships built in England, Ireland and Scotland at the present time are costing three times as much as ships built in pre-war times. No one believes for a moment that wages in the United Kingdom will ever reach again the low level prevailing before the war. Both skilled and unskilled labourers in the Old country are asking for a higher rate of wages, and I think they are perfectly justified in doing so. In view of the marvellous development that has taken place in Canada during the last few years, and the skill which Canadians have exhibited in turning out ships equal to similar ships turned out in the yards of the United Kingdom, I take issue with my hon. friend when he says that Canada will not be able to compete with the United Kingdom and other shipbuilding nations. As I stated yesterday, between now and the next session we are going to consider if it will be necessary to render any aid to our shipbuilders when the days of keen competition arrive, and there will be plenty of time to deal with this matter at the next session of Parliament.

My hon. friend has referred to the United States and apparently he has not kept abreast of the times. The United States has constructed 555 steel ships of various kinds and tonnage. Chairman Hurley, of the United States Shipping Board, states that they are going to build 1,136 more ships, and that when their entire mercantile marine programme has been completed they will have the enormous tonnage of 16,000,000 tons. The United States Government are going to aid that vast mercantile fleet. With a fleet like that next door to us, my hon. friend's advice to the Government is that we should sit down with folded arms and go out of the shipbuilding business. That is not the policy of this Government.

Mr. McMASTER: I never said that the Government should go out of or continue in the business. I laid down as a principle that you could not have a successful shipbuilding or ship operating business except on a basis that would meet competition from all the world.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I accept my hon. friend's correction. I think I am correct in inferring from his remarks that he did not think Canada would be able to compete with other countries. I take issue with him there. When the time comes I think Canada, probably with some small assistance from the Government, will be able to compete with all other countries.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: At the risk of wearying the Committee, I should like to supplement the very interesting reference of my hon. friend from Brome to the case of the United States by a single figure. In the year 1861 the shipping tonnage of the United States was two-and-a-half millions, and the tonnage of Great Britain and Ireland four-and-a-quarter millions. At that time, as my hon. friend has very correctly said, Americans were very generally crossing the seas in American bottoms, and American shipping bade fair to become the greatest in the world. In 1910, after fifty years of free trade in Great Britain and fifty years of protection in the United States, the two-and-a-half million tons of the United States had sunk to one-and-a-half million tons, and the four-and-a-quarter million tons of Great Britain had risen to nearly twelve million tons. I think those figures are a perfect demonstration of the truth of the argument of my hon. friend from Brome.

The minister is still extremely enthusiastic about this shipbuilding programme, and I should like to add just one word more from practical experience to induce him to be cautious about going too far in this business. What happens to shipping in war time is no guide whatsoever as to the safety of a shipping policy in times of peace. I was indirectly interested in shipping in Great Britain during the Boer war, and ships about which I had complete knowledge, from my indirect interest, were paying dividends of twenty per cent. Within a very few years of that war, and during some period of it, the ships that were before paying twenty per cent were paying only a nominal dividend, of one to one-and-a-half per cent. I think those facts —and they are facts—about the United States on the one hand, and drawn, on the other, from my own personal experience of British shipping in and after the Boer war ought to make the minister cautious.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I have no desire to enter into a discussion of the respective merits of protection and free trade, but I can scarcely forbear to say a word or two on behalf of the policy that the Minister of Marine has introduced. I am very strongly in favour of supporting all the industries of Canada, and as we used to be a great maritime nation I see no reason why we should not in the near future resume the high position we held forty or fifty years ago as compared with the other nations of the world. Some three or four years ago I waited on the then Minister of Naval Service and begged him to embark on a policy such as my hon. friend brought forward yesterday and has before us to-day. At that time my appeal fell on deaf ears. Had the policy been inaugurated three or four years ago, and had we ships afloat during the last two years of the war, if those ships had made two or three successful trips across the Atlantic they would have paid for all that they would have cost at that time. In my judgment, we did not embark on that policy early enough, but because the policy is a little tardy in coming that is no reason why we should not now endorse it.

One compensation has come to me this afternoon in the splendid tribute paid to this policy by the leader of the Opposition. I feel sure that the Maritime Provinces cannot go back on the shipbuilding industry. No one who has been in the House during the last three or four years and heard the appeals of the present Lieutenant-Governor of New Brunswick (the Hon. William Pugsley), will fail to remember that day in and day out for weeks at a time he reiterated the desirability of embarking on just such a policy as the Minister of Marine has now introduced. Canada is largely a maritime nation. The Great Lakes are the greatest body of fresh water in the world, and the tonnage that passes through the Sault Canal is probably the heaviest that passes through any canal in the world. Is not that a strong reason why we should have ships of our own on the Upper lakes to take care of the wheat traffic from the West, and to furnish the necessary competition to railways? Our western farmers cannot get wheat to market unless they have cheap shipping on the lakes. It is an absolute necessity of the situation that we should have competition between boats and railways to get the best effect on freight, and that leads to a profit to the farmer of the West of several cents a bushel more than he would receive if his wheat had to depend upon our railways to bring it out. That is the point I desire our western friends to consider in looking at this naval programme. I am rather sorry for the hon. member for Brome, because he is an exceedingly decent fellow. He has told us that his father was a seafaring man. Well, I cannot accuse my hon. friend of any seafaring propensities, but I may tell him that in his tariff and trade ideas he has been at sea ever since he entered public life. I think he will appreciate that remark, because if the policy he proposes were followed, not only would we have no shipbuilding, but we would have no other industries to speak of in this country. As I said, I do not want to be drawn into an argument with regard to free trade and protection, but I want to tell my friend that it behooves him to prepare for the Budget debate which will come on in the near future, and in the meantime I will give him a problem as suggested by Abraham Lincoln, who was one of the fathers of protection in his day and generation, now fifty years ago. I would like my hon. friend to make a note of this problem and bring in a solution when he comes to discuss the question on the Budget. Abraham Lincoln made this statement: "If you want a ton of pig iron and you buy it from a foreign nation, you have got your ton of iron but you have parted with your money. But if"—

4 p.m.

Mr. McMASTER: Of course—

[Mr. Cockshutt.]

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Hold on; let me state the whole problem. "But if you dig that iron from the ground and produce it in your own country you have your ton of pig iron and you have your money." If my hon. friend can overthrow that doctrine I hope he will bring us the solution when the Budget debate comes up. In the meantime, I say both hands up for this shipbuilding policy. It means work and high wages for the labouring men of Canada, and I can tell my hon. friend (Mr. McMaster) that he has done very well to-day in informing us he is not opposed to all manner of encouragement to industry. The light will burn better in the window for his having made that statement, I am sure. I may say, and this I know to be true, that I have lying on my desk in my office in this Parliament building petitions from 3,800 working men of the city of Brantford in favour of a protective policy and no serious changes in tariff, and what I have is only a sample of what is coming to others. The workingmen know that their bread and butter is bound up in sustaining the industries of Canada, and this is really a basic industry which the minister proposes. While it is true that prices on shipping are high at the present time, and while perhaps we cannot compete with Great Britain, I know the minister is very near the mark when he says that Britain is not going to build more ships in the near future at such prices as have obtained in the past. This is a good time for us to get in. The war has sunk about twelve to fifteen million tons of shipping and the question naturally is, who will make that up? The nations of the world will replace that shipping, and why should not Canada take its part in this work? Now is the time to embark on a shipbuilding policy so that Canada may step into the breach, and with her ability as she has shown in the war, I feel absolutely certain that Canada can put ships on the water that will make as good speed and carry cargoes just as cheaply and safely as any other nation in the world. She may not be able to do it quite as cheaply at the outset as she will later on, but once establish the yards, get skilled men into them and get the engine producing factories and all the other necessary appliances, and a nation like Canada that has produced more than half the shrapnel fired by the British armies in the war need have no fear that the same energy, intelligence and good policy that have been pursued in the past will lead to a triumph in shipbuilding, and that we will have a fleet on the waters both inland and on the oceans to carry our traffic to all the nations.

Mr. MANION: I do not intend to enter into a controversy as to the advisability of either protection or free trade, but there is one point favourable to shipbuilding in Canada to-day which I think has not been brought out properly and which it is worth while to bring to the attention of hon. members. I refer to the matter of selling the wheat crop of Canada next year. The hon. member who has just taken his seat, mentioned traffic on the lakes. I wish to take up a different point and one that is important at the present time to the wheat growers of the West. The United States has fixed the price of wheat for this year in that country. For that reason they are going to have probably the biggest wheat crop in the history of the United States and the United States will also probably lose a great deal of money by paying these prices to the farmers. For the same reason she will make her greatest effort to unload that wheat upon the grain markets of the world which are European markets, particularly British. She will endeavour to sell that wheat in the European markets. in the past few years export Canadian wheat has been shipped to Europe and 65 per cent of it, or two-thirds of the wheat we have exported has been exported through American ports. Suppose the United States this year came to the conclusion that they had plenty of wheat to supply the markets in Europe. They are expecting to have four to five hundred million bushels for export. Suppose they say that having plenty of wheat to ship and having fixed the price of wheat they are going to oppose any Canadian wheat going through the American ports; in other words they would block the export of 65 per cent probably of our wheat unless we are able to supply shipping to export it. In view of that situation, it seems to me that this point is one of the most important that should be taken into consideration in a shipbuilding programme. There is no doubt that these ships will cost a great deal, perhaps much more than they would cost in the British shipbuilding plants, but I believe we should take into account, in considering this matter, the possibility of exporting the wheat of Canada. I may be asked the question, will these ships be built in time to handle this year's crop? One year's crop is usually shipped the following year, or a very great deal of it. I desired to bring this matter to the attention of the Committee because I did not hear it mentioned before. I believe the Minister of Marine referred to it but he did not elaborate it sufficiently to explain the point I wish to make.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Cargo vessels of the United States are privately owned, with the exception of a few that have been built by the Government within the last year or two. All these ships that have been built by the Government are now to fall into private hands. It has never been the policy of the United States except for war vessels to have a fleet of cargo vessels belonging to the United States Government in so far as I can learn and, if it is true that the ships in the United States are to be placed in the hands of private owners, my hon. friend if he will give half a cent a bushel more than market rate for carrying the wheat of Canada to the markets of the world will get the whole fleet of the United States to carry it. They will take the wheat without caring whether it was grown on the prairies of Western Canada or of the United States. They are looking for freight for their ships and they will go wherever the freight is best. The fact that the Canadian Government own their ships will not help the western farmers because the western farmer will have to pay the market price for carrying his wheat and there are always ships to carry wheat in normal times. In fact, there were so many of them that before the war they were carrying wheat for nothing. Wheat was going over as ballast because the rates were so low. That happened then; will happen again. Rates go up and down like anything else. The time will come when there will be enough cargo vessels to do the world's business and they will cut prices. That is only one of the laws of economics.

I do not think that the fact that the Government owns the ships will help very much. It is not helping at the present time. Attention has been called to the fact that the few vessels that we now have, owned by the Government, are not developing Canadian trade. They are developing the trade of the United States. A cargo vessel has to take business where it can get it. An illustration was given of the case of the Voyageur. The Voyageur took a cargo from Halifax to the West India islands. When she reached the West India islands I suppose she found that there was no cargo suitable to bring back to Halifax. But she got a cargo of sugar for New York.

She loaded the sugar and took it to New York. I am not complaining about that but I am pointing out to my hon. friend and the minister the absurdity of expecting to run these cargo vessels in the way that it is proposed that they shall be run as Government vessels and expecting that the western farmer will reap a benefit from their operation.

Mr. MANION: There are two points against the argument which the hon. gentleman has advanced. In the first place, as the hon. gentleman states, while vessels may be privately owned in the United States, the United States will control these vessels and make them sail as they like. That is the first point. In the second place, the hon. gentleman says that half a cent a bushel difference on wheat will bring the ships where we wish to bring them. I do not think that is correct. Ships go to United States ports for the reason that they have western bound cargoes. There is much more traffic from Europe to the United States than to Canada and that has been the great reason in the past why Canadian wheat has been shipped by United States ports. The fact that they could get cargoes at half a cent a bushel more would not draw these ships to Canadian ports for the reason that they would have to come light. Therefore, the ships owned by the Government would be used under the circumstances.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Guysborough): If my hon. friend's ship is in Boston or New York it would not be very far to move her back to a Canadian port. There is no necessity, because she sailed from a Canadian port, of her coming back to a Canadian port. That is not the way shipping is carried on. I was going to refer to the contract with the Dominion Steel Company. I have not any particular or definite views on that contract because I have not studied it. But I have seen it stated that it is somewhat improvident. I do not say that a contract of that kind could not be justified on the ground that we are starting a new industry. I think that, as a free trader, I might take that ground. We had a very good illustration in the steel business. Some time ago we had no steel business in Canada. The Government was very anxious that something should be done to establish the steel business in Canada and the solution was a bounty. A bounty was paid to the steel industries for a number of years, decreasing year after year. That bounty was granted in order to establish the steel industry at Sydney, Hamilton and various other places. It cost us about $20,000,000. That was regarded, at that date, as a very large sum of money. It is only regarded as a bagatelle to-day. But I suppose there are very few men in Canada to-day who would want to go back to the old condition of no steel industry in Canada and get back the $20,000,000. They thought it was a good, progressive move and it has paid the country. On the same ground I would suggest that we might establish a plate-mill in Sydney by giving a certain amount of help. I agree with my hon. friend from Brome (Mr. McMaster) that a bounty of that kind, when we know what we are paying, is far less objectionable than a protective duty. We understand that we are going to put up so much money and that is why I asked the minister to tell us just what we were expected to pay. I suppose that he is able to make a calculation that if we carry out this contract that has been made with the Dominion Steel Company, it would cost us a certain amount of money and it would be satisfactory to know how much it is going to cost us.

But the main point in regard to the shipbuilding industry is that we must make it attractive to private capital. Although the Dominion Government is going into shipbuilding and ship owning, if Canada is going to find a place on the sea it must be as a result of the investment of private capital. The Government can usurp certain things. The Government if it chooses to pay the price can own a certain number of ships, but the Government cannot build up a great shipbuilding industry unless the people will invest their money in it and become interested in it. It is only a makeshift for the Government to go in for the owning of cargo vessels. I am not a prophet but I would not be afraid to prophesy that the Government will not stay very long in the business. I would not be surprised if in ten years the Dominion Government were out of the business although the people of the Dominion of Canada will not be out of it. The people of Canada will go into the business and stay in it. Has the Government any plan to remedy the handicap that every one admits exists? Man after man has spoken in this debate and every one has stated the same thing; that we cannot build vessels in Canada to compete with vessels built in Great Britain. For this condition of affairs has the Government a solution? I would like to know what the minister intends to do to remove that handicap and to enable private enterprise in Canada to go into this business, make it a success, and compete with the rest of the world.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: Of course the Government believes that shipbuilding will be a permanent industry in this country. I may say that if the House passes the Supplementary Estimates that I shall bring down in the very near future to have a limited number of ships constructed in addition to the forty-five we have under contract, for the reasons that I gave to the Committee yesterday, the cost of these ships will be very materially less than the cost of the forty-five that are under contract at the present time. I have not had any firm offers because I have not yet received the authority of this House to order any more ships, and I will not have such authority until the Supplementary Estimate is approved. But, I firmly believe that I can buy an 8,000 ton ship for $160 a ton, and probably less.

I explained to the House yesterday that for a year and a half to come no ships could be purchased from any of the yards in the United Kingdom. In answer to the hon. member's question as to a comparison today between the price for a ship built in Canada and a similar ship built in England, the authority being cited of Sir George Hunter that there is only a difference of ten dollars a ton, it may be when I start negotiations with the Canadian yards we may be able to build ships in this country at as low a rate as they are able to in any of the yards of the United Kingdom. However, I do not want to be too optimistic, and I can assure my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) that all business men are trained to be most cautious, especially when they have the responsibility of office, such as I have. In respect to whatever further outlays are required on shipbuilding, the money will be expended on a thoroughly conservative and business-like basis.

Mr. MYERS: I think there is one fact that the hon. gentleman (Mr. J. H. Sinclair) has not taken into consideration in connection with shipments of wheat. It is that the United States have fixed a price for their crop of wheat this year of $2.26 per bushel. There is a great deal of apprehension and concern in Canada to-day, especially in the western part of the Dominion, in regard to the position we shall be in this year with respect to shipping our grain. In regard to those shipments in the past, as the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. Manion) stated, fifty or sixty per cent of our grain has gone through United States ports. There is no doubt in my mind of the necessity of some action on the part of this Government in regard to the fixation of the price of wheat, or in some manner controlling the situation, because I fear our wheat will not be allowed to go through United States ports this year. There will be an embargo placed on it, and the probability of that is greatly strengthened when we take into consideration that the United States will this year have the largest possible crop, according to the estimates made. The last one which I remember reading spoke of there being possibly a surplus of four hundred and fifty million bushels of wheat in the United States this year. When we consider that likelihood there will not be much opportunity for Canada to utilize United States ports for its wheat shipments. Therefore, when the minister states that he is going to take action with respect to a shipbuilding programme which will provide steamships for the Great Lakes and also facilitate the transportation of our wheat this year, I think that action should receive the earnest and hearty support of every member of the House.

Mr. JAMES R. WILSON: While on the subject of wheat transportation, I may say that I read a couple of days ago in a trade paper, a statement by Mr. A. E. Hunter, a member of the Wheat and Flour Millers' Control Commission of the United Kingdom. That gentleman told the National Association of British and Irish Millers that they were now up against a shortage of wheat imports, caused mainly through the diversion to India of a large amount of wheat from Australia, which was intended for the United Kingdom. India has usually exported wheat, but it is now a wheat importing country. As the previous speaker has mentioned, there is great apprehension among the farmers in Western Canada as to the possible profitable marketing of this year's wheat crop. The whole fabric of transportation, international finance, and exchange of commerce throughout the country, particularly with Overseas countries, has broken down as a result of the war, and the carrying on of commerce and transportation therefore becomes a Government undertaking. It is beyond the power of private individuals to cope with the situation as efficiently as can be done through Government agencies, and I think the policy which has been inaugurated by the Minister of Marine to develop our shipping is a splendid one. We are a little late in undertaking it, but it is most necessary and it will be a source of great wealth to Canada to control its own shipping, particularly so now that we have gone into the business of operating railways. These railways can be used to supply the ships, and the ships can be used to a certain extent to furnish the railways with return cargoes, so that I think it is vitally in the interest of Canada to extend our shipbuilding facilities as much as possible. Most business men have been looking forward to the development of a large trade with Overseas countries, but it will not be possible to secure that development without ships. Therefore, I have much pleasure in supporting the programme which has been outlined by the minister.

Mr. DUFF: I asked the minister a question in reference to the American contract, but he had so many other questions to answer that he forgot to reply to me on that point. A few moments ago I asked him if we had to take delivery of the balance of the seventy-four thousand tons of steel plates which had been undelivered. While on my feet I desire to make one or two other observations. I would ask the minister first if we have to take delivery of the seventy-four thousand tons of steel plates at 3¼ cents per pound, or if we have to construct our ships of plates costing $4.15 per hundred pounds. In view of the fact that the price of plates in the United States has dropped from 3¼ to about 2½ cents per pound, the construction of ships in Canada is going to cost a great deal more money than the construction of ships in the United States. I do not see how we are going to do it and compete, when the construction of ships in Canada will cost $200 a ton as compared with $110 or $115 in the United States. We will have to pay the overhead charges on a $200 investment, whereas the United States will only have to pay those charges on a much smaller investment, consequently we will be unable to compete successfully with our neighbours to the South. The minister says he has information from the old country that at the present time the construction of ships there is costing three times as much as it did in normal times. I have before me, Mr. Chairman, a despatch from New York which appears in the Montreal Star of Wednesday, May 7th, and which is as follows:

New York, May 3.—"The average per ton cost to build ships in England now is about £23, or $115," said Lt.-Col. Claude Bryan, who is a director of the Palmer Shipbuilding Co., at Jarrow-on-Tyne, on his arrival here this week.

Then this gentleman goes on to say:

"All the shipyards of England are booked up for at least two years. Contracts are made 'time and line' or cost plus a profit of from 7½ per cent to 10 per cent to the builder. Labour conditions are unsettled and prices of materials unsteady. In this state of affairs there can be no fixed charge per ton, but the present cost will not exceed £23."

I am quite willing, Mr. Chairman, to do anything in the world to help shipbuilding in this country, but I cannot see if you are going to pay $200 a ton to build ships in this country from now on for the next few years—and to use up two hundred and fifty thousand tons of steel plates will take four or five years before the ships that those plates are going into are built—how you are going to compete with ships built in England or in the United States at about $115. We should face the issue squarely. This shipbuilding programme is said to be necessary in order to help the labouring people of this country over the hard times which it is thought are coming. I have more faith in this country than to think we are going to have hard times.

If necessary I would approve giving shipbuilding plants in this country a certain amount of encouragement, but not protect them in this way. The hon. member for Brantford (Mr. Cockshutt) said we had to have protection. We are building ships in the Maritime Provinces and paying duty on the materials we import from England, anchors, chains, and everything else, and we are building those ships with private capital. We do not need protection from this or any other Government. I think there should be sufficient private capital in this country to invest in the shipbuilding industry without our having to take the people's money for the purpose. The Minister of Naval Affairs is asking for $30,000,000 in addition to the $20,000,000 which was voted last year; but while I am not going to object to this $30,000,000, I say that this thing should not go too far, and when the Supplementary Estimates are brought down I as one of the members of this House am going to protest that it is not fair to the taxpayers of this country.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I am sorry I overlooked the hon. gentleman's inquiry in reference to the 80,000 tons of steel contracted for in the United States. I am happy to inform him that we do not need to take the balance of the contract unless we desire to. So that disposes of that part of the hon. member's argument. I thought I made it abundantly clear in Committee yseterday that this country has nothing to fear in shipbuilding competition from our neighbours to the south. I made a very conservative statement yesterday when I said that the ships built by the Emergency Fleet Corporation cost at least $25 a ton more than the 45 ships which the Canadian Government have under construction at the present time. The hon. member talks about building ships at $200 per ton. In the plainest language possible I stated yesterday that our contracts ranged from $180 to $215 a ton. So far as we have gone with our shipbuilding programme, our prices compare favourably with those paid by the United States Government, which has built a vastly greater number of ships than we have contracted for. I have stated over and over again that when it comes to competition with the United Kingdom you cannot get a fixed price there, that everything is on a plus cost basis, as the hon. member has just mentioned. The information I obtained from England is that $150 a ton would be the cost, provided you could get your ships built there now; but it is quite impossible to get any built for a year and a half, and I have given as my authority the well-known shipbuilder, Sir George Hunter, of Swan and Hunter. Why the hon. gentleman wants to make it appear that the cost of a Canadian-built ship is so much more than that of a ship built in the United States, and is basing on that supposition his argument that we can get ships built in the United Kingdom at the present time, is more than I am able to follow.

Mr. DUFF: What about the gentleman I mentioned who said that contracts were made on the Tyne for ships at $115 a ton? That is not $200 a ton.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I do not know anything about the gentleman you refer to.

Mr. DUFF: Neither do I.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: I took the precaution of communicating with several of the leading shipbuilding firms in England before I came to this House to ask for approval of the $30,000,000 vote, and I submit that the information I gave to the Committee yesterday and to-day is certainly based on facts. I suppose the hon. member noticed in the press some weeks ago that the famous firm of Yarrow and Co., said that they were going to establish a shipyard in British Columbia, and they gave as their reason for leaving the Old Land, so famed for shipbuilding, that the cost of labour, material and everything else had gone up so high that they could build ships in British Columbia at a price to compete with the rest of the world.

Mr. DUFF: Hear, hear.

Mr. BALLANTYNE: In view of that statement from such eminent authority, I do not see why we should feel so very uneasy about Canadians being able to build ships in competition with the world when the competition gets keener than it is now.

Progress reported.

BANKRUPTCY ACT.

House again in Committee on Bill No. 18 respecting Bankruptcy.—Mr. Guthrie.

The CHAIRMAN: When the Committee last considered this Bill we had reached section 43. Shall section 43 carry?

Mr. BUREAU: The hon. member for Chambly and Vercheres (Mr. Archambault) who left this afternoon, desired me to ask the Solicitor General to defer consideration of this Bill. He told me that a meeting of business men had appointed Mr. Lafleur and Mr. Geoffrion of Montreal to examine the Bill and consult with the Solicitor General about certain points. I told my hon. friend that I would submit his request to the Solicitor General when the Bill came up. He says there are important provisions which they want to discuss, not with the object of blocking the Bill, but in order to make it as faultless as possible.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I saw the hon. member for Chambly and Vercheres at three o'clock to-day and discussed the matter with him. He asked that certain clauses be allowed to stand, to which I agreed, and I assume that before they are considered the representatives of the Quebec Bar will have an opportunity of discussing them. So I do not quite understand this request.

Mr. BUREAU: Yes, I apologize. I did not know that the hon. member for Chambly and Vercheres (Mr. Archambault) had seen the Solicitor General.

Section agreed to.

On section 45—proof of debts.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is this the same as the English section?

Mr. GUTHRIE: With one or two modifications, yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will the Solicitor General state briefly the method of proving the debt?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The ordinary method, which has been adopted in the various provinces of Canada, is that of proof by statutory declaration, and that is maintained in this Bill. A debt must be proved by the claimant sending to the trustee through the post, by registered letter, a statutory declaration verifying the debt made before an authorized person. The declaration shall contain a statement of the account, shall specify the vouchers, if any, held by the creditor, and shall state whether the creditor is or is not a secured creditor. That is the prima facie proof that is required.

Mr. McKENZIE: In the provincial Acts there is a provision by which a person disputing a claim can have it proven in court

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is in this Bill in a subsequent section.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is a very expensive procedure. A very simply provision, if there is not already one in the Bill, would be that a person filing a claim could, if it was so desired, be brought before the trustee or the judge who has charge of the estate for cross-examination on his account. I do not know that we have any provision of that kind. What I mean is something like the right that now exists of calling upon a man who files an affidavit in court. One can go to a judge and ask for leave to bring the man before the court for cross-examination. If the provision is simply that the claimant must file an account with a declaration on it, in many cases the declaration is a slipshod thing; very often the claimant does not make a declaration at all, but gets somebody to sign the paper as if it were sworn to, although it is not sworn to at all. Before the Bill is finally passed, the minister might consider some simple machinery of the kind I have mentioned by which a party could be brought before the trustee, the inspector or preferably the court, and cross-examined on his account. If parties knew that such a system was available, that would have the effect of making people careful as to the kind of account they would file.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Where it is thought by the creditors or the trustee that an account should be disputed, reduced or rejected altogether, proceedings are taken under section 53, but it is not contemplated that a creditor will have to bring an action.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

When a claim is disallowed the section provides that:

> Such disallowance shall be final and conclusive unless within thirty days after the service or mailing of the said notice or such further time as the court may on application made within thirty days allow, the claimant appeals to the court in accordance with General Rules from the trustee's decision.

It is proposed in these general rules to arrange procedure for a summary application to the court in order that a claim may be speedily and inexpensively dealt with. Just how that rule will be framed, I am not at present able to state as those rules will require a good deal of consideration. There may be something in the suggestion of my hon. friend that power should be given to the trustee or the creditors to cross-examine the claimant upon his declaration proving his claim. The result of such cross-examination might be that the claim might be rejected or accepted, and further proceedings might be avoided. I shall be glad to consider the question of an amendment for that purpose.

Mr. JACOBS: I do not think it would be wise to have any provision to the effect that a trustee or an inspector should cross-examine a claimant. That matter should be in the hands of the registrar of the court.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The claim does not go to the registrar of the court. The creditor proves his claim to the trustee; the trustee submits it to the creditors, and if they are not satisfied that the claim is a bona fide one, it might be wise to allow them to cross-examine him on the claim at a meeting of creditors.

Mr. JACOBS: The creditors have no right to examine a claimant on their own account. That should be the duty of the court. At the present time a claim of that kind is contested, and the trustee becomes the petitioning party to ask that it be disallowed and it is thereupon tested before the court. But to give the creditors the right to cross-examine is not the best method of procedure, nor is it according to the rule which we now have in the court.

Mr. GUTHRIE: My hon. friend does not quite understand the practice that is laid down in this Bill. If a trustee rejects a claim he serves notice upon the claimant.

Mr. JACOBS: What right has the trustee to reject it?

Mr. GUTHRIE: He may have information that it is not a bona fide claim.

Mr. JACOBS: Then he should send it to the court.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The other process is the one adopted in England and in the provinces. Notice is served upon the claimant that the creditors are not satisfied with the claim and the creditor must establish his claim within thirty days after notice is served.

Mr. JACOBS: Is the affidavit not prima facie proof that a claim is correct?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is all it is, prima facie proof. That is the English law, and it has been the Ontario law for thirty years.

Mr. JACOBS: It is not the Quebec law. The opposite is the rule. In Quebec the trustee, or curator as he is called, is obliged to contest the claim and the matter is then brought before the court.

Mr. GUTHRIE: He contests it under this section, but merely by serving notice. Then the creditor must proceed.

Section agreed to.

On section 46—proof by secured creditors.

Mr. GUTHRIE: A representative of the Bankers' Association has made a suggestion that another subsection should be added to this section, to make it clear that a creditor by valuing a security does nothing to release his surety. I do not think under this section there would be any release of a surety, but I see no objection to making the matter clear. The amendment suggested is as subsection 12 in the following words:—

Anything done by a secured creditor in compliance with the provisions of this section shall in no way affect, prejudice or vary any right or remedy such creditor may have against any other person or under any security.

Mr. McMASTER: Is not that the ordinary law? Is it not a mistake to put in a clause like this, because it might give ground for the argument that in some other place where the clause is not inserted, the opposite was the effect? I think it is very dangerous to lay down a well known legal principle which follows as a matter of course in a clause of this kind.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I said I would mention the proposed amendment to the Committee. I quite agree that it is an unnecessary provision.

Amendment negatived.

Section agreed to.

On section 48—postponement of husband's claim:

Mr. JACOBS: This clause is somewhat contentious. Has the minister received a request that it stand for further consideration?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No.

Mr. JACOBS: May I request that it be allowed to stand?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is not retroactive in effect, applying only to future transactions. That is the only difference between this and the corresponding section in the English Act.

Mr. JACOBS: I understand that the council of the bar of the province of Quebec desire to discuss this section further with the Solicitor General, as it infringes on the civil law of the province.

Section stands.

On section 50—debts payable at a future time:

Mr. McMASTER: Why do we say six per cent? Is not the legal rate five per cent?

Mr. GUTHRIE: We made it six because that is the provincial rate on debts and judgments.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think it would be well for the sake of uniformity to have five per cent in all Dominion legislation.

The CHAIRMAN: Why not say the legal rate?

Mr. McMASTER: The Chairman has made a valuable suggestion. If we say the legal rate, then when the legal rate changes, this will change too.

Mr. McKENZIE: But in some of the provinces six per cent is the legal rate, and although this is in a general way Dominion legislation, in its operation it will be provincial. The legal rate in Nova Scotia on debts and judgments is six per cent. I think if we said five per cent, that would be more definite than saying the legal rate.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not think it amounts to much one way or the other.

Section agreed to.

On section 51—priority of claims:

Mr. JACOBS: I would suggest that this and the following section stand for further consideration for the reason I gave with respect to section 48.

Section stands.

On section 55—arrest of debtors under certain circumstances:

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Paragraph (a) says that if there is reason for believing that the debtor has absconded or is about to abscond " with a view of avoiding payment of the debt in respect of which the bankruptcy petition was filed." Why limit it to the particular debt in respect of which the bankruptcy petition is filed? A bankruptcy petition may be filed for $200, and the debtor might abscond in order to evade another debt of $5,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: The provincial law allows you to arrest a debtor if he is about to abscond. You would have to fall back on that.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: The $200 debt would be the only one that was proved. I do not see why it should be limited to the particular debt in respect of which the bankruptcy proceedings are taken. If he owes several debts it is more likely that he will abscond to avoid payment of the largest. I think we should make it read: "With a view of avoiding payment of the debt in respect of which the bankruptcy petition was filed, or any other proved debt."

Mr. GUTHRIE: The creditor of the larger amount might not want the man to be arrested, he might desire to be lenient. There is nothing to deprive any other creditor from taking proceedings in respect of his debt but we have made this provision to give some particular individual a positive right to do so.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: He would not have the right to arrest him unless he absconded for the purpose of evading that particular debt.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Not under this Act.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: That might be only one debt out of probably fifteen.

Mr. GUTHRIE: You have your own laws in each province. Under this Act only one creditor is entitled to do it.

Mr. JACOBS: There is nothing in the section to indicate that the trustee would have the right to cause the warrant to issue. Section 55 says:

> The court may, by warrant addressed to any constable or prescribed officer of the court, cause a debtor to be arrested.

It does not say whether the trustee would have that right.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The English Act does not limit it and I do not see why we should be too precise in the matter. The court will act on the application of some party interested. An ordinary stranger could not go to the court; it would have to be either a creditor or a trustee. They are the only two parties I know.

Mr. JACOBS: There ought to be some clearer expression as to the meaning of the word " absconding." Under our system at present in the law of capias it has to be declared in the affidavit that the debtor is about to leave the provinces of Quebec and Ontario. If it cannot be shown that he is about to leave Quebec and Ontario he could not be capiased. Suppose a man were leaving Quebec to go to Ontario, or Nova Scotia or New Brunswick, would he be considered to be absconding? Or does it mean leaving the Dominion of Canada?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The word "absconding" has a very wide application. Hiding is absconding; so also is keeping house, under the English Act. The word in our Act is "absconding," going from his usual place of residence to some place of retirement unknown to his creditors. "Keeping house" is a term taken from the English Act in section 3, subsection (f): "If he departs from his dwelling house or otherwise absents himself, or begins to keep house." It means leaving his ordinary place of business and secreting or hiding himself.

Mr. JACOBS: Suppose a resident of Montreal did not leave Montreal at all but simply kept in hiding, would he be absconding when he really did not leave his domicile?

Mr. GUTHRIE: If he is in hiding, I think so.

Mr. McMASTER: To make it perfectly clear something should be added to this clause. In the jurisdiction in which I practise, absconding means clearing out of the country. As our law of capias comes from the time of the united provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, it means getting out of Quebec and Ontario. It would be wise and would avoid any possibility of useless litigation if the clause were made somewhat clearer in regard to the meaning of "absconding."

Mr. GUTHRIE: Would you say, absents himself from Canada, or from any particular province?

Mr. McMASTER: As this is a federal Act I should think "absconding" would mean leaving the Dominion.

Mr. JACOBS: If we say, absconding from the province in which he carries on his business that would be satisfactory.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Departs out of the province, or being out of the province remains out of it?

Mr. JACOBS: Yes, out of the province in which he had his domicile or carried on his business.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: That would not do, because it is not wrong for a man to depart from the province.

Mr. JACOBS: That is qualified by the words immediately following: "with a view of avoiding payment," etc.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Suppose a man owes $10,000 in debts and is insolvent and a creditor for $300 presents his petition, and the man skips out, not with a view to avoiding payment of the $300, but to get clear of the $9,700, and the only man that can prosecute him is the $300 creditor. That creditor might come to an arrangement with the debtor and say, "If you do not pay me I will prosecute you, and I am the only man that can 5 p.m. prosecute you." It seems to me that the provision is either good or bad, and it should be as good for one as for the other. I would suggest that there be added the words "or any proved debt."

Mr. JACOBS: Is that clause similar to the clause in the English Act?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, our section is drawn from the section in the English Act. The English law has been in force so long that every section has been judicially interpreted and if we start changing the wording we change the meaning of the authority. It has been so carefully reviewed, amended and interpreted that it would be wise for us to take the benefit of their experience rather than make changes. Unless there is some good reason for a change I would rather not make it.

Mr. JACOBS: I notice the reference at the end of section 55 says:

(Part Eng. Sec. 23 modified.)

What part of that has been modified?

Mr. GUTHRIE: We have inserted here a provision about assignment that we have not in the English Act. Subsection (a) of the Act reads:

(a) If, after a bankruptcy notice has been issued under this Act, or after presentation of a bankruptcy petition by or against him, it appears to the court that there is probable reason for believing that he has absconded, or is about to abscond, with a view of avoiding payment of the debt in respect of which the bankruptcy notice was issued, or of avoiding service of a bankruptcy petition, or of avoiding appearance to any such petition, or of avoiding examination in respect of his affairs, or of otherwise avoiding delaying or embarrassing proceedings in bankruptcy against him.

(b) If, after presentation of a bankruptcy petition by or against him, it appears to the court that there is probable cause for believing that he is about to remove his goods with a view of preventing or delaying possession being taken of them by the official receiver or trustee, or that there is probable ground for believing that he has concealed or is about to conceal or destroy any of his goods, or any books, documents or writings which might be of use to his creditors in the course of his bankruptcy.

(c) If, after service of a bankurptcy petition on him, or after a receiving order is made against him, he removes any goods in his possession above the value of five pounds, without the leave of the official receiver or trustee.

(d) If, without good cause shown, he fails to attend any examination ordered by the court:

Mr. McMASTER: I see that "five pounds" is translated here as $20. That is the old Halifax currency. I think it would be better if we tried to specify something that would be more closely commensurate with £5. I would say $50.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We discussed that in the Committee and at the instance of the representative of the retail merchants it was fixed at $20. They thought that if a man took $10 or $15 to provide for his family he would not be committing very much of an offence. We might make it $25.

Mr. JACOBS: I suggest that we make it $25. Give the poor debtor a show. I move "to amend clause 55 by striking out the word "twenty" at the end of the thirty-second line of page forty-four and replacing the same with the words "twenty-five."

Mr. McMASTER: If you are going to make any change at all, make it $50.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. McKENZIE: Have we settled what constitutes absconding?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not see in the interpretation of the clause any definition of the word "abscond."

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is a dictionary word and is not defined in the English Act.

Mr. McKENZIE: Absconding means going beyond the jurisdiction of the court. Absconding with a view to escape arrest must be going beyond the jurisidiction of the court. You cannot arrest a man unless you have reason to believe that he is going beyond the jurisdiction of the court.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not think that "abscond" has anything to do with the jurisdiction of the court.

Mr. McKENZIE: If a man remains within the jurisdiction of the court, and is going to remain, you have no business under our law to arrest him. The moment he comes before the court and proves that he had no intention of going beyond the jurisdiction you must release him. There is no justification to arrest a man unless he is going beyond the jurisdiction of the court.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The word "abscond" has no reference to any court.

Mr. McKENZIE: It applies when a man is going to run away beyond the jurisdiction of the court where you cannot deal with him. How far must he run before you can arrest him? The idea of this is that he is going beyond the power of any process of the court. Therefore, you must arrest him and keep him within the jurisdiction of the court.

Mr. JACOBS: I do not see any reference to bail being given by the debtor after his arrest under section 55. If a debtor gives bail he ought to be permitted his provisional liberty.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Will not that be a matter for the rules of practice?

Mr. JACOBS: That may be, but I suggest that it be kept in mind when these rules of practice are being framed because otherwise there is no provision to permit to the debtor his provisional liberty. He could not come before the criminal courts, and, as there is no provision for bail on going before the Federal judge, he would have to remain in jail until the matter was disposed of finally.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think that should not be left to the rule. In our civil and criminal procedure there is immediately, with the authority to arrest, provision to give bail. There should be power under this Act to grant bail.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The section says:—

> The court may by warrant addressed to any constable or prescribed officer of the court, cause a debtor to be arrested, and any books, papers, money and goods in his possession to be seized, and him and them to be safely kept as prescribed.

The word " prescribed " means, according to the interpretation clause " prescribed by general rules within the meaning of this Act." I would think that these rules would be the proper place to state as to where he should be kept and on what terms he should be released. I notice the English Act provides for no bail but bail is granted there by the court.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 63—Court's jurisdiction.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am going to move an amendment to this clause to meet an objection that has been urged by certain interested parties that it should be made clear that the Bankruptcy Court is a Federal Court. My own view is that the court becomes a Federal Court as soon as this Bill is passed, just as it is under the Winding-Up Act. But that view has been challenged, and therefore I have to ask that the following words be inserted in the clause at line 35:

> and such courts are hereby declared to be additional courts for the better administration of the laws of Canada, under section 101 of the British North America Act.

It has been suggested that a declaration of this kind will place it beyond peradventure that the Bankruptcy Court is a Federal Court. I therefore beg leave to move that the section be amended as stated.

Mr. McKENZIE: If the Solicitor General does not think it is necessary, unless the law officers of the Crown hold a contrary opinion, I do not think these words should be added to satisfy any fancy that somebody else might have. If you make a judge of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia a Federal judge for the purposes of this Act he is a judge for British Columbia as well as for Nova Scotia, is he not? He is a Federal judge which means that he has jurisdiction all over Canada. That is not the general intent of legislation. Where you specify your courts you say, "The court shall be in Alberta the Supreme Court of Alberta;" you go through the different provinces specifying the courts in that way. Now if these courts are converted into Federal Courts I cannot understand how the jurisdiction would be limited, or as to how it would apply except as to the whole of the country, as in the case of the Exchequer Court. The Exchequer Court of Canada has jurisdiction as a Federal Court extending over every creek and corner of the country from coast to coast. But in the case of a Federal judge, which implies Federal jurisdiction, you must be very specific in your statement as to where he can act.

Mr. JACOBS: The section says so.

Mr. McKENZIE: But I am referring to the drafting of a law dealing with judges of the different provinces. Here we have a section being so understood as to deal with a judge that has Federal jurisdiction. I do not myself think there is anything in the objection, or any necessity for creating these judges Federal judges. For example, when the Scott Act was passed all that it said was that the magistrates in the different counties should have jurisdiction. The Scott Act was a Federal Act and violations of its provisions were heard by different magistrates; it was not necessary, or ever suggested, that those magistrates should have Federal jurisdiction. My own opinion—although I do not want anything to hinge upon it—is that the amendment is not necessary, and it is going to create endless confusion if you give a judge of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia jurisdiction in Manitoba, and vice versa.

Mr. GUTHRIE: But we do that under this Bill, and that is the reason the amendment has been urged. I put a case of this kind to my hon. friend: An assignment takes place, or a bankruptcy petition is presented, in the province of Nova Scotia, and some assets of the debtor are in the province of Manitoba. The judge in Nova Scotia has jurisdiction over those assets in Manitoba.

Mr. McKENZIE: To some extent.

Mr. GUTHRIE: And to that extent it is argued that it is necessary to clothe him with Federal authority. When the Bill passed the special committee last year, I must say I thought this clause was correct, but some eminent legal authority in Toronto has pointed out that the objection might be raised that the judge had not been clothed with Federal authority to deal with the assets of a debtor in another province. I cannot see any objection to the proposed amendment. I do not altogether see that it is going to help the enactment, but I think it will remove some doubt that might otherwise be cast upon it.

Mr. JACOBS: It is not pretended, for instance, that a judge, sitting as a judge of bankruptcy in the province of Quebec would have power to sit in the province of Nova Scotia?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, his jurisdiction is limited by this section to the matters that are prescribed therein.

Mr. McKENZIE: What extra thing can he do by reason of the fact that he is declared to be a Federal judge? He is now clothed with jurisdiction to act within his province. A judge of the Supreme Court of Ontario has, under this Bill, jurisdiction within that province, without adding this amendment at all. What can he do by reason of the amendment that he could not otherwise do?

Mr. GUTHRIE: I will repeat the illustration for my hon. friend's benefit. Suppose there is a petition in bankruptcy in Nova Scotia, and some of the assets of the debtor are in Manitoba. An order is made by a judge of the court in Nova Scotia. Has that judge any jurisdiction with respect of assets lying in the province of Manitoba? It is argued that unless the judge making such order is clothed with federal authority he has no such jurisdiction.

Mr. McKENZIE: The practice in this country, and in all countries has been that the judges are ancillary and auxiliary; and if a judge in the province of Nova Scotia makes an order in connection with goods in British Columbia, and if there is any difficulty about it, application is made to a judge in British Columbia and an order is obtained from him to enforce the directions of the Nova Scotia judge. That is why the courts have been made ancillary. Otherwise there is no sense in making all the courts of Canada ancillary or auxiliary one to the other.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not quite agree with my hon. friend's statement as to the practice. Suppose I got a judgment in a court of Nova Scotia and seek to enforce it in British Columbia?

Mr. McKENZIE. That is an entirely different thing. Under this Bill the moment an assignment is made the property is vested in the trustee absolutely, and what a judge will do with a part of that property in British Columbia is a mere detail. By the operation of this Bill the property is vested in the trustees. Some of it happens to be in the province in which the trustee resides, some of it happens to be in another province, but the title is vested in the trustee, and all that has to be done by a judge outside of that province is the necessary proceedings to get possession of that outside property or to sell it. A judge in Ontario could issue an order that property in Manitoba be sold; he has that jurisdiction. If there is any trouble about it you go with that order to a Manitoba judge, and he confirms it and directs what is to be done. That is the function of a court ancillary to another. If the order of a judge in Ontario is absolute and final in British Columbia, why do we have ancillary judges?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It has been suggested also as a reason for the amendment that section 71 relates to the enforcement of orders of courts throughout Canada and provides that courts are to be auxiliary to each other, and that we would not have power to enact section 71 unless we make the declaration which I now move as an amendment to section 63. I stated that as an additional reason.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have never heard it stated in any court that the judges could not act ancillary one to the other under the Receivership Act, and there is no language in the Winding-Up Act to the effect that the court dealing with property in different provinces in receivership proceedings must be a federal court. That is the practice and the legislation which is in point. A receiver in England immediately becomes vested with property in Canada. That has been decided in some bank case, the name of which I forget for the moment. It was thought that although a receiver was appointed in England the property here was still free, but the courts held that the moment the judge in England appointed a receiver under the English Act any property in Canada or elsewhere became vested in him; and all that our judges held on this side was that they were carrying out the order of the English judge in connection with the property. I suppose the language of this Act will be just as far reaching, and the analogy between the two situations is so strong and close that any cases they could find on receivership law would be regarded as authority in the enforcement of this Act. I think there is plenty of precedent to show that what I have stated has been the practice up to the present.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I am quite free to confess that my view is the same as my hon. friend's, that this section as drawn is sufficient; but a very strong opinion has been offered against my view and the amendment has been suggested. I cannot see that any complication is likely to arise hereafter by reason of the amendment, and if it serves the purpose of clearing up doubts I think we should adopt it.

Mr. McKENZIE: Coming to hard and fast rules, we have no power to create a Federal court by this Bill. Under the British North America Act we can create only such Federal courts as are therein mentioned, the Exchequer Court and the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If my hon. friend's contention is correct, I certainly think the amendment is very much out of place. Is that a considered opinion of his?

Mr. McKENZIE: No, I am just giving it on the spot; the whole thing is new to me. I think my hon. friend will find that that is the law, that the only courts we can create are those specified in the British North America Act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Section 101 of the British North America Act is so plain to me that I do not think an objection of that kind should be seriously taken into account in respect to a Bill of this kind. That section provides:

> The Parliament of Canada may, notwithstanding anything in this Act, from time to time provide for the constitution, maintenance and organization of a general court of appeal for Canada and for the establishment of any additional courts—
> Additional courts
> —for the better administration of the laws of Canada.

If there is any ground for supposing that that is limited to the Exchequer Court of Canada, by all means let us know it now. But I thought the section was so plain that there could be no doubt about it.

Mr. McKENZIE: Very good; create all the confusion that is possible.

Mr. JACOBS: Under the Bankruptcy Act of 1875 the courts created were Federal courts.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There was some declaration of that kind in the Act, I am not sure what it was.

Section as amended carried.

On section 76—application to limited partnerships.

Mr. McMASTER: Has the minister considered the fact that in Quebec there is a certain type of limited partnership, where the limited partners have merely invested their money in the enterprise and have no dealings with the business of the enterprise at all, indeed, are precluded by law from having any?

Mr. GUTHRIE: We have, I think, practically the same statute in Ontario.

Mr. JACOBS: I would suggest that this section be allowed to stand over with the others.

Section stands.

On section 88—bankruptcy offences.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That side-note is a mistake.

Mr. McMASTER: Perhaps it is not so improper. " Bankruptcy offences "—restricting the rights and privileges conferred on banks.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The heading should be " rights of banks."

Section agreed to.

On section 89—fraudulent debtors.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think all the clauses from clause 89 on are taken from the Criminal Code or the English Act. They have just been incorporated in this Bill.

Section agreed to.

On section 90—undischarged bankrupt obtaining credit.

Mr. McMASTER: Is it wise to say: " liable to a fine of $500 and to one year's imprisonment?" If there is such a heavy fine as that, will there not be a disposition on the part of the courts not to find a man guilty?

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is a maximum.

Mr. McMASTER: It would be if the words " not exceeding " were inserted.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There are a number of decisions on that point. That is a maximum amount and anything up to that amount is permitted. In the Criminal Code that is certainly the case. " To a term of two years ' means ' up to two years."

Mr. McMASTER: Is it the intention that a man shall be liable to a fine of $500 and to one year's imprisonment, or to a fine of $500 or one year's imprisonment?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Fine or imprisonment or both.

Mr. McMASTER: Then that ought to be so stated.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The word "liable" is what saves such people. This is drawn in accordance with the best draughtsmanship and is in exact accord with the English Act.

Mr. McMASTER: I remember having a principle of draughtsmanship once taught me, namely, that it was good draughtsmanship to draught a section in such English that only the intention intended to be conveyed would be conveyed.

Mr. JACOBS: As the section now stands, a party convicted would be liable to a fine plus imprisonment, if even for one hour. It has been held that he must be imprisoned for some particular time.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The section says "liable to" not "must be."

Mr. JACOBS: "Liable to a fine of $500 and to one year's imprisonment." That would mean that the fine and the imprisonment must take place together. I have a case in mind where a party was fined $1,000 and one hour's imprisonment, because the court held it was obliged to impose a penalty of imprisonment. That was held by no less a judge than the Chief Justice of our Court of Appeal.

Mr. CHAIRMAN: Section 89 reads:

Liable to a fine not exceeding $1,000 or to a term not exceeding two years' imprisonment or to both such fine and such imprisonment.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I beg to move that section 89 after the word "and" in the twelfth line be amended to read:

Liable to a fine not exceeding $500 or to a term not exceeding one years' imprisonment, or to both such fine and such imprisonment.

That will make the language the same as that of section 89.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 92—false claim, etc.:

Mr. JACOBS: I notice that this section does not provide for a fine.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If he made a false declaration, he would be liable for perjury.

Mr. JACOBS: If he can be proceeded against under the Criminal Code, what is the necessity of this section?

Mr. GUTHRIE: We want to make it an offence under this Act as well.

Section agreed to.

On section 92—order by court for prosecution on report of trustee:

Mr. McKENZIE: Is this to take the place of the Grand Jury?

Mr. GUTHRIE: No, the prosecution would come before the Grand Jury in the usual course.

Mr. McKENZIE: I understood that you could prosecute a criminal under the order of a judge or court. The minister seems to regard any opinions I express as being of very little worth. I have not read the section, but if it means the usurping the functions of the Grand Jury I would be opposed to it.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I understand the judge has always power to direct the Grand Jury to find a Bill.

Mr. McKENZIE: Not at all.

Mr. GUTHRIE: He will not have power under this Act to do more than make that direction. The section says "the court shall, if it appears to the court that there is a reasonable probability that the debtor will be convicted, order that the debtor be prosecuted for such offence." That would be a matter that would come before the Grand Jury, who would decide whether to find a Bill or not.

Section agreed to.

On section 96—pretending to be trustee:

Mr. GUTHRIE: I beg to amend this section by adding after the word "Act," in the twenty-ninth line, the words "or who fails duly to observe or perform any act or duty which he may be ordered to do, observe or perform by the court pursuant to any of the provisions of this Act." There are certain sections of the Act under which the court may order the trustee to do certain things, failure to do which involves a penalty. It is for the purpose of imposing a penalty that this amendment is proposed.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 97—malicious proceedings:

Mr. JACOBS: I am opposed to the inclusion of this section in the Bill. It reads:

> Any person who maliciously institutes or carries on against any person who has not done or suffered any act of bankruptcy any proceeding in bankruptcy under this Act shall be guilty of an indictable offence and liable to a fine not exceeding one thousand dollars or to a term not exceeding two years' imprisonment, or to both such fine and such imprisonment.

Now the common law provides for that. Cases constantly come before our courts where parties are sued for maliciously instituting actions of this kind. The civil courts decide these cases and award damages where they think a case has been made out, or dismiss the case. I think this section would interfere with the jurisdiction of our civil courts, and I do not see why it should be included in the Act, which is a bankruptcy Act pure and simple for certain purposes.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The origin of this section is this: Some of the members of the Retail Merchants' Association, representing a very large body of our traders, seem to fear that the wholesale or manufacturing associations or the larger financial interests will in some way take advantage of this Act and make it oppressive in its operation. They think that for the protection of the smaller dealer against malicious prosecution by some designing creditor this section is necessary.

I agree that the question of malicious proceedings is a matter which ordinarily should be dealt with by the civil courts, but the Committee, after hearing the case of the Retail Merchants Association, decided that it would afford them protection, and the association thought it would. So far as honest wholesalers or manufacturers are concerned, they need not be under any apprehension that they will be visited with the penalties of this section. If there be dishonest ones, they should take the consequences. I do not see any great objection to leaving the section as it is.

Mr. JACOBS: I have two reasons for objecting to it. First, it infringes upon our civil law, and secondly, it is an encroachment on the jurisdiction of other courts. We have courts regularly established to take care of just such cases as malicious prosecutions, etc., and I do not see why we should attempt to introduce further legislation. I would move that this section be struck out.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The Committee took a very strong view on that question. There are offences which now come before both our civil and our criminal courts. In the case of libel, you have civil and criminal action. If a man maliciously institutes bankruptcy proceedings against another he certainly incurs civil liability, and is there any objection to adding a criminal liability for the same offence?

Mr. McMASTER: I think there is. I can arrest a man who has libeled me, or take civil action against him; both those recources are open to me. But if I fail in either of those, the man whom I have arrested for libel has no right to have me arrested because I improperly caused his arrest. If I lay an information that a man has committed murder, and do so maliciously, he has a civil action of damages against me, but he has no right to arrest me. It is absurd that we should place upon the statute book, for the purpose of preventing malicious proceedings under this Act, a sanction which is not found in respect to other malicious proceedings of a much graver character.

Mr. JACOBS: I move that it be struck out.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We have two or three pages of this Bill providing penalties against the unfortunate debtor, whom we have surrounded pretty well. If any one should maliciously impose upon him, we say: Go to the civil courts and get damages. But the man who imposes upon him may not be worth a dollar. No man in good standing will maliciously launch bankruptcy proceedings, although a man in bad standing might; and the smaller retail men of the country thought it was some protection to them to provide that no one should maliciously annoy or threaten them with bankruptcy proceedings, and the Committee thought it reasonable.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not say it is unreasonable, but the process of reasoning used by the Solicitor General in support of the retention of this clause could be used in respect to any similar unfounded or malicious proceedings taken in other spheres of action. A improperly and maliciously accuses B of theft. What is B's recourse? He can take a civil action against A for unjustifiable arrest. But under this law, if A, instead of laying an information against B for theft, says that B is a bankrupt, and puts him under bankruptcy proceedings, B will have the right to have A arrested and have him fined. I do not say that is an unfair provision, but I say it is illogical to give a man who suffers as a victim of malicious prosecution in bankruptcy a relief which, had he been maliciously arrested for theft, he would not have had.

Mr. GUTHRIE: This fact must be borne in mind: A man who maliciously files a bankruptcy petition against another may ruin the credit of that man and do him incalculable damage, and if—

Mr. McMASTER: The same is true if he has him arrested for theft.

Mr. GUTHRIE: If this will prevent such a condition it will justify its existence.

Mr. JACOBS: In the whole of the Criminal Code—

Mr. GUTHRIE: Whose rights is the hon. gentleman trying to protect—the man who will maliciously institute proceedings?

Mr. JACOBS: I am merely discussing the section before the Committee. I think it is subversive of all the rules of law to insert a clause of this kind in this Bill. Take the Criminal Code. There is not a single instance in which a provision of this kind in the way of relief is given to the party who has suffered at the hands of another. Consider the case of murder as suggested by my hon. friend from Brome. This serious charge is brought against a man at the instance of another who acts with malice. The accused is discharged and yet he has no recourse whatever against the accusing party except as to damages. In this case, however, you make an exception and say that the party who has maliciously instituted bankruptcy proceedings against another is liable to a fine of $1,000 and two years' imprisonment.

BANKRUPTCY ACT.

The House resumed consideration in Committee of Bill No. 18, respecting Bankruptcy, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 97—malicious proceedings.

Mr. McKENZIE: Some hon. members on this side of the House were trying to convince the Solicitor General (Mr. Guthrie) that this was an innovation and an unnecessary clause. If a person should institute proceedings against any merchant or trader with a view to bringing him under the operations of this Act, and do it in good faith, it is open to any person to lay an information against him for having done it maliciously, and have him arrested and tried. I suppose he would not be convicted if he could show that he had no malicious intent. But it subjects a person to be arrested the moment he institutes proceedings under this Act. The act of instituting a malicious prosecution has been known to the law for centuries, and the only punishment that could be inflicted for it was this one with damages, in the Supreme Court, but never before was it thought to constitute such a thing a criminal offence. The Solicitor General makes it an indictable offence under this Bill. It is thought that should not be done, but that the remedy of common law should be left as the only recourse for one who may think that a malicious prosecution has been brought against him. Malicious prosecution and malicious or wrongful arrest have always been left in the same category. They are pretty much akin and run into each other pretty much; it is difficult to distinguish between the one and the other; but in either case it was never thought to be a criminal offence. The Solicitor General says that in some parts of the country it is necessary to prevent such proceedings under this Bill. In this part of Canada, however, it is not known, and I think therefore it would be a pity to make a general law that is going to be troublesome and mischievous chiefly to meet circumstances that may possibly only take place in some section of the country. I would like to impress upon the Solicitor General the desirability of leaving the law as it is, and has been for so many years.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not wish to repeat what I said this afternoon, but I think the minister is trying to provide against the possible abuse of this Bill. Would it not be just as well to wait until the abuse occurs before providing against it? What you are doing here is providing safeguards against the abuse of this Bill different from those established by the ordinary law against similar abuses. It is a wrongful thing to start a malicious proceeding under this Bill. But it is also a wrongful thing to start a malicious proceeding for theft; it is a wrongful thing to accuse any person of doing anything wrong; a false accuser is a very undesirable citizen. But under our law as it is now the false accuser can be attacked in the civil courts, and that is the only remedy that is open. By this section you put malicious proceedings under this Bill in a different category from the malicious starting of any other proceedings; it appears to me it is not logical.

Mr. GUTHRIE: There is just this difference in the case of a malicious prosecution: The accused is brought to trial and if innocent is acquitted and that is the end of it. In the case of a man who maliciously starts bankruptcy proceedings against another man, perhaps a competitor, the very institution of those proceedings getting into the lists of a mercantile agency and going throughout the country may bring on a real bankruptcy from some other quarter, which might not otherwise have taken place. It may injure the man's credit, it may do untold damage, and at the same time the person who instituted the proceedings may be a straw man against whom civil redress cannot be enforced. What is proposed is merely a safeguard against any proceedings of that kind. As I said before six o'clock, the demand for this clause came from the small trader, from the Retail Merchants' Association, and as a matter of fact from that branch of the association in the West. They seemed to fear that there might be something in this Bill which would permit an abuse to grow up whereby, for malicious reasons or purposes, proceedings might be started against some of them that might practically result in their ruin. The Committee who heard their representations thought there was reason in their request, and the result is the insertion of this clause. I cannot see that it will operate to the injury of anybody, and it may protect some person. Therefore, to my mind, it should not be removed.

Mr. MOWAT: I feel like supporting the clause on very much the same lines as the Solicitor General has indicated. The retail merchants appeared before the special committee on many occasions, and apparently they are looking forward to the passing of this Bill with a certain amount of trepidation. There is no doubt that the measure is chiefly supported by credit men, or the wholesale houses, and yet the retail merchants have been most reasonable in their requests, and, I think, will heartily support the Bill, although it is they who, perhaps, will feel its effects the most. Now, it seems to me, in view of the attitude of the retail merchants who were so reasonable, it is a small thing to grant this request, and to guard against their names suddenly and improperly getting into Bradstreet's or Dun's at the instance of some spiteful person. The remedy in case of malicious arrest or malicious prosecution is one within the jurisdiction of the provincial law, and it consists in setting in motion the criminal law. But the going into insolvency does not relate to the criminal law, and I do not see that there would be any remedy against an aggrieved person under the provincial statute. Therefore, it seems proper to me that we should protect the person who is spitefully or maliciously brought into insolvency proceedings by enacting the clause proposed. It will do no harm, it will satisfy all classes that their rights have been looked after and protected, and it will start off this Bill, to whose provisions people have not been accustomed for many years, with the idea that it extends equal justice to, and protects the rights of, all concerned.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am afraid my hon. friend (Mr. Mowat) has not given very much thought to this subject. If a person, in the very best of judgment and feeling, starts proceedings under this Bill to place under its operation a person who is a trader, there must be a hearing before a court somewhere at which it can be shown that the proceedings have been initiated without proper authority. The person bringing the proceedings must go before the court, must he not? He moves before a judge, and surely we can trust the judges not to give an order to any person, or put anybody into the insolvency court, without some satisfactory proof. I cannot conceive of any person coming before one of the judges of the Supreme Court, and on some haphazard affidavit, being able to endanger the business of a reputable citizen.

Suppose the other man, who ought to be put in insolvency, turns round and says, "I will teach my boy a lesson; I will go to Mr. Smith, the magistrate, and lay an information against him that he is doing this thing maliciously and will have him arrested." The man is lodged in jail, perhaps twenty-five or thirty miles away, awaiting a preliminary inquiry. That inquiry takes place within perhaps a week or ten days, and then the friendly magistrate sends him up to the Supreme Court for trial. In some parts of this country—in the city of Hull, for instance—the criminal court sits only once a year. It is quite possible that the man may not be able to get bail and may languish in jail for a year before trial, when it is open to him to prove there was no malice in his heart, and he gets off. That is the kind of practice this Bill is introducing. Such a procedure is absolutely new, it is entirely unknown to our law. It does not obtain in English law; and we are following the English Act. I am sure my hon. friend has great respect for English law and practice. Are we so much worse than the English people that while we can adopt every part of the English Act that is useful and good and that has stood the test of time, we must add this criminal clause to it? Is that showing very much respect for the people of this country? It is a civil law dealing with property and civil rights, but we are going to convert it into a criminal code because our people cannot be trusted to do things in a business and proper way. I have not drawn an imaginary picture; that is what can be done. We are getting along famously with criminal law this session. This is the third criminal Bill to be introduced. A few days ago we passed a Bill which subjects a woman to two years in the penitentiary if she happens to put too big a fire in her stove and her house is burned down; that is No. 1. I think yesterday the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce, in his innocence and good nature, introduced a Bill imposing fine and imprisonment upon a person who happens to sell one of brother Loggie's lobster cans supposed to contain a pound of food, whereas in fact it may only contain fourteen ounces; that is No. 2. And the Solicitor General, not to be outdone in this criminal business, introduces this clause, whereby if a man institutes civil proceedings against a debtor, which he has a perfect right to do, without first examining himself—as it is presumed every one does before taking such a step,—he is subject to the fines and penalties prescribed. Why should we be doing these things? This is a free country and every man is presumed to be honest until the contrary is proved. There is no necessity for these innovations, and I must protest with all the energy that is in me against creating these criminal possibilities. I am not going to say anything further, I leave the entire responsibility not only upon the Solicitor General, but upon the Government.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend, as usual, has very greatly exaggerated the facts. It is nothing unusual to have penal clauses in a Bill. During every session we pass Bills in which provision is made for fine and imprisonment for violations of the law, and my hon. friend could make precisely the same argument against those measures. What is the result of all such legislation? Are there cases of men languishing for weeks and months in jail? My hon. friend knows that nothing of the kind happens. In the first place, before a man can be consigned to jail and suffer in the manner my hon. friend has indicated, he is brought before a magistrate and there is a preliminary hearing. That in itself is a safeguard. If he elects to be tried by a jury at the next court of competent jurisdiction, he is able to obtain bail. My hon. friend has magnified the effect of criminal provisions in statutory enactments. I have not taken much interest in this Bill, but I happened to be in the House a little before six o'clock and I heard him putting forward an argument which on the face of it seems plausible. He says that there is no penalty under the Criminal Code for malicious laying of an information under that Code. That is true, I think. But, I submit, there is a real difference between the case of a malicious prosecution for an offence under the Criminal Code or common law, and malicious laying of an information under this Bankruptcy Bill. It would seldom happen that a man's business interest would be advantaged by laying an information under the Criminal Code for any offence contained therein. One could hardly imagine a retail dealer seeking to ruin a rival by laying an information against him maliciously for, let us say, theft. But in this case where a trader would have an interest in ruining a rival—and many cases of that kind occur almost daily—I can imagine his taking advantage of this law very successfully from his own standpoint.

The leader of the Opposition has dwelt upon the fact that a judge of the high court must give judgment upon the petition. But the damage is done before the judge gives his decision. The mere filing of a petition in bankruptcy against a solvent trader is ruinous to that man's credit, and that is the reason why some 25,000 small retail dealers throughout Canada desire, as I understand it, to be safeguarded under this Bill. In other words, a man may have a direct, immediate business interest in filing a petition in bankruptcy against a rival trader. In Toronto, I have frequently been in the civil courts as a spectator, and I have seen numerous cases of business disputes in which action had been taken, founded upon the most obviously malicious motives and declared by the judge to be so. If any one doubts me, let him go to a division court where the smaller cases are tried and where traders of a certain type sue and are sued, and he will realize the danger there is in allowing a small, irresponsible and malicious trader to file a petition in bankruptcy against a rival. What remedy has his rival in the civil courts? The leader of the Opposition says that for malicious prosecution there is the remedy in tort at common law, a civil remedy, for which the only penalty is damages. Let us take the case of a trader who is bailiff-proof and who determines to ruin a rival. He acquires a claim against his rival, or he has a straw man take an assignment of a claim and file a petition in bankruptcy against the man against whom his animosity and cupidity are directed. The petition is filed, and that man's credit is gone. He may be ruined if it proceeds no further; even if the judge, before whom the matter comes, decides in favour of the party against whom the proceedings are taken, the man's credit is gone.

My hon. friend has stated that the Government has been very free this year with legislation applying the criminal law. Does he realize what we are doing in this Bill? As regards the present situation, which we have had for many years in Canada and under which men have traded here, we have no provision whereby men may be thrown into bankruptcy under a proceeding such as is provided for by this Bill. This Bill changes all that; it provides that any creditor, no matter what his motives may be, may file a petition, the effect of which may be to ruin some solvent trader, because a man may be solvent although trading on a very small margin. Without some safeguard to such trader, there is nothing the Government has brought down this session more objectionable than this Bill if, as is the attitude of my hon. friend, it leaves traders without any safeguard against proceedings which may be taken by malicious creditors. That is the distinction between this case and the case put forward by the hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster),—that for malicious prosecution under the Criminal Code there is only civil remedy. It is almost impossible to imagine a case in which there is the direct element of personal advantage in laying a charge of theft. Not only that, a charge of theft has to be established by much stronger, much more clear, cogent and convincing evidence than the argument by which a man would seek to justify a petition in bankruptcy. Up to date, it has not been brought to my attention, although it may have happened, that a business trader seeking to outrival a competitor has searched the Criminal Code to find upon what offence he can most conveniently lay an information against his rival. But this places the machinery right in his hand, and I have read of dozens of cases in the reports of division court hearings in Toronto where the element of malice was undoubtedly present for the purpose of injuring a trade rival. This machinery would be at once available in such a case. The remedy in damages cannot be adequate because the man who brings the proceedings or causes them to be brought may be in a position, so far as civil proceedings are concerned, to snap his fingers at a prosecutor, and yet as soon as he has filed the petition, he has practically ruined his competitor. If we are bringing into this House legislation that changes the situation under which business has been carried on in Canada for many years, it is incumbent upon the House to the utmost of its power to protect from abuse of proceedings under that measure those who are to be subjected to its provisions. I have not had an opportunity of listening to previous discussions on this Bill; but, listening to the arguments put forward here this afternoon, though feeling that I am not in many ways as competent to pronounce upon the merits of the provision as many who have spoken, I believe the House should lean towards protecting that man against whom proceedings may be taken under this measure.

Mr. McKENZIE: The Acting Prime Minister is, no doubt, a good financier, but he has made it abundantly clear that he is not a good criminal lawyer. He has told us that when a man comes up on a preliminary investigation before a magistrate, he may choose right off whether he is to be tried before a jury or not.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It depends on the legislation.

Mr. McKENZIE: That is absolutely wrong; there is no such precedent, law or power. Therefore, the Acting Prime Minister started out wrong with his criminal law, and the rest of his criminal law argument was of about the same value. He says that we find penal clauses in many statutes. That is perfectly correct, but in what kind of statutes? We find statutes imposing certain duties upon individuals who are told: If you do not do that, you are to be subjected to certain criminal responsibilities and results. If the Acting Prime Minister will point to a line in this Bill which says that if a man does not do such and such he is subject to some criminal offence and to be dealt with criminally, I will withdraw my objection. But there is not in this Bill one line which justifies this section. This is a sort of thing that is thrown out to prevent something that may possibly happen in another way altogether. I do not want any better argument than that we have nothing in this Bill but the old English law, and that the English people for years and years have found this law good enough without inserting this section which is new to the English law, new to the English courts and new to the Canadian people. The Acting Prime Minister waxes eloquent over a crime that was never committed in this country. There is no such thing known to any British country as ex post facto criminal law.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: What is the application of the reference to ex post facto criminal law?

Mr. McKENZIE: Providing in advance for some crime hitherto unknown to the law.

Mr. MOWAT: That is not "post."

Mr. McKENZIE: I meant to say, legislation providing for some crime that is not known to the law. I challenge the Acting Prime Minister and the Solicitor General to produce a single case of the kind they are dealing with that ever happened in Canada. I have had a longer connection in Canada with legal proceedings in all their phases than either the Solicitor General or the Acting Prime Minister, and in all my experience I never heard of a merchant trying to ruin another by maliciously proceeding against him.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Why, then, are these retail men so desirous of being safeguarded against this very thing?

Mr. McKENZIE: Because they have some unfounded suspicion about something they had never any occasion to be afraid of. There has never been such a law in this country since 1875. I do not remember the days of 1875 and the few years before that during which the old Act was in force, but I challenge my hon. friend to produce a single case where anybody maliciously laid an information under that Act or took proceedings against his neighbour to ruin him. I never heard of such a thing.

I base my argument entirely upon this fact: When we made our Criminal Code in 1892 we simply took the English law as it then stood, and our own Statutes; we were perfectly satisfied with the English criminal law as we found it, and with the judicial interpretations by the courts of Great Britain. Here we are not taking the English law, but are adding new provisions to it, creating a condition that will put in the hands of one person the power of putting his neighbour in jail, without any justification whatever, and keeping him there indefinitely when there may be no more malice in his heart than there is in the heart of the Acting Prime Minister. We are putting this power in the hands of somebody who may or may not use it. Would it not be time enough to provide such a law when a case of this kind arises? I promise the Acting Prime Minister and the Solicitor General that if advantage is taken of this Act to do anything improper within three or six months after it passes this House, I shall hasten to their side to pass legislation preventing any such thing. But I am not in favour of putting unnecessary criminal laws on the statute book under which a man may, without any justification, send his neighbour to jail while his children are left to suffer cold and hunger. But the responsibility is not mine, the responsibility rests with the Government, more particularly as I have presented my views and, I think, those of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House.

Mr. McMASTER: I would not impose on the time of the Committee had not the Acting Prime Minister directed some of his remarks to answering an argument I had brought forward. His argument was this: We are introducing new legislation, unusual legislation; this unusual legislation is open to the possibility of abuse; in order to discourage the possibility of abuse, we are going to make it a penal offence to abuse the Act.

First of all, let me say that the province of Quebec has had laws upon its statute book for many decades past, whereby any creditor who had a claim of $200 against a man who had generally stopped making payments, could file what amounted to a petition of bankruptcy against him; that is, he could make what we call a demand of abandonment, which would be supported by affidavit and then filed in court. This is a very summary way of bringing a man into insolvency and forcing him to distribute his property among his creditors. I have not been practicing for a great number of years, but I have never in the course of my experience known of an action instituted by a man who had been put into insolvency by a competitor in which the insolvent claimed that his competitor had wilfully and maliciously used the machinery of the law for the purpose of damaging him. Therefore, I think the Government in placing this section 97 on the statute book are trying to guard against something which is not likely to happen. It has not happened, as far as my experience goes, in a province in which for a generation and a half, creditors have had the powers which are given under this Bill.

The second argument of the Acting Prime Minister was this: He first of all said: I admit that generally the abuse of legal process of a criminal nature is guarded against merely by the right of the injured innocent party to take an action in damages either for false arrest or for the laying of false information against him; but, he added, under this Act, there will be greater opportunities given to a man in commercial life to do something wrongful against his neighbour. I do not agree with my hon. friend. Take this case for instance: An information is laid against a high-class solicitor for embezzling the funds of his clients. Now that would enormously hurt the solicitor, even if the charge were dismissed. Or again, suppose a false and malicious accusation is made against a man occupying a high professional position, or a respectable merchant, charging him with some hideous crime. His reputation may be hurt, his business may be damaged, and financial loss may be sustained just the same as in a case of malicious proceedings under this Bankruptcy Act in regard to an ordinary merchant. That being so, why put upon the statute book this ususual provision. Why has the English law given to the wronged party merely an action in damages in all these cases? There is some good reason, and it is this, that the policy of the law has not been to frighten the innocent and legitimate complainant. It is often difficult enough for a complainant who has a perfectly justified complaint against a fellow citizen to urge that complaint before the court; the tradition of the British law has been that the courts are open to him, and if he uses them maliciously he is liable in damages. I believe that our laws should proceed on broad general principles and that we should have as few exceptions as possible. For these reasons I believe that this legislation is unsound and unnecessary. It is difficult for me, having glanced at section 4 of the Act, to see how a malicious institution of proceedings can take place. The man who has a claim against a debtor is not able to put that debtor into bankruptcy before he goes before a court and justifies that claim as a proper and well-founded one. On the whole I believe that this proposed legislation is both unnecessary and undesirable.

On Section 98—Commencement.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I move that this clause as printed be struck out and the following substituted:

This Act shall come into force at a date to be named by proclamation of the Governor in Council.

It will be necessary after the Act is passed to prepare rules and forms and to see that a suitable number of trustees are appointed throughout the country, all of which will take time. It is a new experience and nobody knows exactly how long it will take. I think, therefore, the Act should not come into force until proclamation is made by the Governor in Council.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is sometimes difficult for a country barrister to know when a proclamation of this kind goes forth, and it would be very much better, I think, if the Solicitor General would take plenty of time so that he would be sure to have these regulations made, and to say that at such a definite date the Act shall come into force. It is only in the Official Gazette that these proclamations appear and only a few people get the Official Gazette. Though I can hardly call myself a country practioner—I live in a town where there are available statutes of the kind—often I am at a great disadvantage to know whether a certain measure has come into force or not. There should be some provision by which everybody who has to do with the law, magistrates and lawyers, would know positively without any difficulty when a statute came into force.

Section as amended agreed to.

On Section 55—Arrest of debtors under certain circumstances.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would like the Committee to return to section 55 which we discussed this afternoon. Under clause (a) of that section the question came up as to the meaning of the word "abscond," and whether our clause was appropriate, notwithstanding that it is copied from the English Act. On looking at the dictionary, I find that one of the definitions given by the leader of the Opposition is exact. To abscond is given as "to leave the jurisdiction of the court, or to hide from one's creditors." In the English Act they simply use the broad term "abscond," which in Great Britain, would mean to go beyond the United Kingdom; but I think we should have a more limited definition of the term in this country. I am going to move that clause (a) of section 55 be amended by inserting after the word "abscond," in the tenth line, the following words: "from the province in which he had his ordinary domicile."

Mr. McMASTER: Do you not think "his ordinary place of business" would be better?

Mr. GUTHRIE: A man might have his domicile in one province and his place of business in another.

Mr. McMASTER: Suppose a man carries on his business in Ottawa and lives in Hull, and getting into difficulties he makes for the wilds of Saguenay in order to evade his creditors. According to your definition "from the province where he had his domicile," he would not have absconded. If, however, we make it "where he has his place of business," where his creditors would look to find him to get their accounts settled, then he would have absconded.

Mr. MORPHY: Why not use both—domicile or place of business?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It might be different provinces.

Mr. MORPHY: Well, if you put both in you would get him under either.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Why not use the technical word "locality?" The locality of a debtor is described in the Bill as:

the place within a bankruptcy division or district whereat the debtor has carried on business for the longest period during the six months immediately preceding the date of the presentation against him of a bankruptcy petition,—

I would suggest that we say "from the province in which the locality of the debtor is situate."

Mr. McMASTER: That is not nice English.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: The word "locality" is used in the Bill in the interpretation section.

Mr. PROULX: I prefer the general term. It may be just as difficult for a man's creditors to get at him when he hides in the province in which he does business as when he departs from the province. As the Solicitor General says, the dictionary meaning is plain, that he absconds from the jurisdiction of the court. I understand that the different provinces will have jurisdiction, and if a man in Ontario absconds it will mean that he leaves the jurisdiction of the Supreme Court of Ontario.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think there is a good deal of force in what my hon. friend says. Perhaps it might be as well to leave the section as it was. With the leave of the Committee I will withdraw my amendment and let the section stand. If, when the Bill comes up in the future, there should be a further amendment, we can consider it then.

Mr. McKENZIE: This arises in connection with the right of arrest, does it not?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: That arrest will not take place until proceedings in bankruptcy are commenced?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Until after the presentation of the bankruptcy petition.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think you could well say "abscond from the province after the proceedings of bankruptcy are taken." That would cover the ground.

Amendment of Mr. Guthrie withdrawn.

On section 8—application of part one.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I move that the following words be added to the section:

That the provisions of this part of the Act shall not apply in respect to any act or omission of a debtor, nor in respect to any debt contracted by a debtor, or judgment covered, or execution or other process issued against the debtor, prior to the passage of this Act.

Mr. McMASTER: Prior to the coming in force of this Act.

Mr. GUTHRIE: "Prior to the coming in force of this Act," we will make it. The object of this amendment is that the Act may have no retroactive effect in so far as part one is concerned, part one being the part of the Act which contains the provisions for involuntary bankruptcy. In other words a man cannot be placed in bankruptcy for any debt heretofore contracted, or any judgment heretofore recovered or execution heretofore issued.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT.

House again in Committee on Bill 52, to amend the Immigration Act, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 3—Prohibited classes, and the following amendment proposed by Mr. Cronyn:

That section 3 be amended by adding thereto the following as subsection (u):

3. (u) the following persons, unless otherwise permitted by existing treaties, shall also be prohibited, for a period of five years from the first day of July, one thousand nine hundred and nineteen, from entering or landing in Canada:—

(i) Aliens from the Continent of Europe whose domicile is situate south or east of a line drawn from the Atlantic Ocean east along the forty-second parallel of latitude to the fifteenth meridian of longitude thence north along said fifteenth meridian to the fifty-fifth parallel thence east along said fifty-fifth parallel to the twentieth meridian thence north along said twentieth meridian to the sixtieth parallel thence east along said sixtieth parallel to the thirtieth meridian and thence north along said thirtieth meridian to the Arctic Ocean.

(ii) Aliens from the North American Continent of European birth who are not citizens of the United States of America and whose domicile in Europe was situate south or east of the above described line.

Mr. CALDER: At the last sitting of the Committee when this proposal of the member for London (Mr. Cronyn) was submitted I asked that it should stand over until I had time to consider it. In the meantime I have taken the resolution up with the officials of the department and they are inclined to the view that if it were adopted it would give rise to a good deal of trouble and difficulty. Therefore, unless the hon. gentleman is anxious to press his amendment, I would suggest that he withdraw it.

Mr. CRONYN: I have no special desire to press the amendment at this session. It was perhaps too drastic a step to take now involving as it does so marked a change in what has been the accepted policy of the country ever since the question of immigration was first considered. I shall therefore ask leave of the Committee to withdraw the resolution.

Might I, before resuming my seat, express the hope that after due reflection the department may see fit at another session to adopt some plan whereby we may escape the ungracious and delicate duty of refusing admission to our country to some particular race or nation. Something has been said of contemplated legislation by the United States which will greatly restrict, if it does not wholly prohibit, immigration into that country for a period of years. At least two Bills proposing such action were introduced at the last sitting of Congress and were referred to the Select Standing Committee of the House of Representatives on Immigration and Colonization. Those hon. members who have read the evidence adduced before that Committee, and the report presented on the 29th of January last to the House of Representatives, cannot fail to be struck by the strong and wide-spread opinion which exists throughout the United States in favour of some such measure. If I may be permitted I should like to read a part of the final clause of the report of the majority of that Committee expressing their view of this matter:

> The far-famed melting pot has proven to a great degree a delusion and a snare. We feel that it is now time that we were beginning to look after those of our own household, rather than to open our ports to many who know nothing of our laws, our customs, our standards of living, and never intend to learn of them.

It is true there was also a minority report presented to the House by two members thereof, Representatives A. J. Sabath, of Illinois, and Isaac Siegel, of New York. The minority report, as was only natural, dwelt with pride upon the record on the field of battle of many who had been immigrants, or the descendants of immigrants, but despite the eloquent character of that minority report, a general opinion prevailed that the House would have passed a Bill to further restrict immigration had the opportunity been afforded. It is a matter of record, however, and is known doubtless to many of the members of this House, that there was an almost continuous filibuster maintained during the session, and these Bills, with many others, fell by the wayside as unfinished business. Now, if the United States does, in the immediate future, pass any such law—and undoubtedly the attempt will be made at the next session of Congress—it will result in increasing pressure on Canada by immigrants from the south-eastern part of Europe to obtain entry to this country. It therefore seems to me to be the duty of this House to safeguard our country in such way as we can to prevent too great a flood of those who may not prove best fitted to become future citizens.

I have to confess to a want of faith in the efficacy of section 13 of this Bill, to which the minister has made reference. It is an extension, and, perhaps, a wise extension, of the powers contained in section 38 of the old Act, and undoubtedly under those powers the Government of the day could exclude any person, any race, any nationality. But let us assume for a moment—a violent assumption perhaps—that this Government goes out of power and that a Government of the ordinary type which formerly administered the affairs of Canada is in control. If the then Minister of Immigration undertook, under the powers conferred by this section, to bar the people of some particular nation from entering into Canada, imagine what would result. In the first place we would have all the families in Canada from that nation protesting against the refusal to allow their relatives to join them. Indeed, we would have every member of that interdicted nation in Canada making common cause against the ruling; because it is a striking feature of the immigration movement that a successful immigrant is the keenest person to have his fellow-countryman, whether related or not, share in his good fortune. It is an exceedingly difficult matter to persuade him that too free a movement of this kind may eventually result in damage to himself and others. In the second place, if the proposed immigrants were a good type of untrained labour you would have the large employers of the country protesting, and they would bring weighty arguments against the enforcement of an Order in Council calling for exclusion. A few nights ago I had a short talk with one of the largest employers of this class of labour in Canada. We were discussing one of the nations in Southeastern Europe—I prefer not to be more definite in that regard—when he said quite frankly: "Yes, they are excellent workmen, they are vigorous, they are untiring, but you will never make citizens of them. In truth, their ideal is against such a destiny; they are at best but temporary sojourners in this country."

Added to the pressure from immigrants and employers, you would have, of course, great clamour from steamship and transportation companies, and labour agencies. I do not believe any Government would withstand the pressure thus brought to bear. We would then be back again in exactly the position in which we have always been, and subject perhaps to a flood of less desirable people, a flood which, by its very volume, would divert the lesser currents from Northern Europe, the record of whose people, as I have tried to point out, is that they become tillers of our soil and assimilate with the present population.

Some comment has been made as to the purport of the proposed amendment, the suggestion being made that it was aimed to exclude certain nationalities or religions. As one witty member of the press gallery remarked, I was apparently trying to exclude the Pope and include the Kaiser. I do not think I need assure the House that no such idea entered my head. As I explained, the lines suggested were rough-and-ready boundaries, not intended to be accepted as final; indeed they were only used to try to illustrate the principles that I was endeavouring to bring before the House. These principles were based on the results disclosed by official records. If those records can be attacked—and they have not as yet been assailed—much of my argument would go for naught. The restrictions suggested are thus founded on what is known of certain ethnic and sociological characteristics, largely due to racial origin and climatic conditions and indelibly fixed during the course of many centuries.

Perhaps I owe a word of apology to the Committee for again occupying its attention. As was natural, hon. members from Western Canada were more particularly interested in this question, and they were able to bring to the problem the great value of their personal experience. I come from old Ontario where, although there are many thousands of acres ready for intensive cultivation, we could not expect to get any large proportion of new immigration. As a matter of fact, I approached the problem with a feeling that nothing should be done to bar any immigrant. All reasons, financial and otherwise, pointed that way. It was only after making such study as I could of what had happened in the neighbouring Republic, and to a lesser extent in our own country, that I came to the conclusion that we should take a very strong stand, for a time at any rate, against allowing too free an entry.

Perhaps some explanation of the interest I have in this subject is due to the fact that for the past twelve years it has been my duty and my privilege to make an annual visit to the Western Provinces, and the result of those trips has been to confirm my optimistic belief in our country; in fact, to raise it almost to a state of religious fervour. Do I need, then, any excuse for striving to the poor best of my ability to so shape the future of our race in this one particular that it may prove worthy of a great heritage?

Mr. McKENZIE: I am certainly in favour of the very best class of immigrants we can get. But can we very logically compare ourselves to-day with the United States? We have the same area of habitable land, but while they have 120,000,000 of people we have scarcely 8,000,000. Does the hon. member (Mr. Cronyn) think that we are in a position to apply the same rigid laws to immigration as the United States are applying, situated as they are?

Mr. CRONYN: I think, Mr. Chairman, financially, and, perhaps, from the point of view of the need of population, we are hardly in a position to do so. If we did apply as rigid rules as I suggest it would undoubtedly delay the material progress of the country. But I think there is something greater than mere material progress, and I am one of those who fear the United States may have built up its wonderful prosperity at the risk of the future well-being of the race. We are not yet able to judge what the result of the "melting pot" will be. I suppose there is none living to-day who will see the full fruition of the policy adopted by that country. I would rather that we bent our backs further and sweated more freely in the effort to carry our present burden than imperil what future generations should inherit.

Amendment (Mr. Cronyn) withdrawn.

Mr. CALDER: I have three amendments to submit to the Committee. The first has reference to the carrying of concealed weapons by immigrants seeking to enter Canada. I would suggest that a new section be added to the Bill as 43 (A) to this effect:

16 (a). The said Act is amended by inserting the following heading and section immediately after section forty-three:—

"Concealed Weapons."

"43A. No immigrant shall bring into Canada any pistol, sheath knife, dagger, stiletto, or other offensive weapon that can be concealed upon the person, and any officer who has reason to suspect that any immigrant has any such weapon in his possession may search the person and baggage of such immigrant, and may seize any such weapon, which shall thereupon be confiscated to His Majesty, and disposed of as the minister may direct; provided, that in any such case the immigrant may appeal to the minister, and the minister may give such directions for the return or other disposal of such weapon, as he deems just and proper."

The officers of the department think it very desirable that there should be a provision of this kind in the Bill. As a matter of fact, they have been acting without this authority for several years, and the number of weapons they have collected from certain classes of immigrants is very large.

Mr. JACOBS: I would point out that this clause is already covered by the section of the Criminal Code which says that no one shall carry on his person concealed weapons.

Mr. CALDER: No person in Canada.

Mr. JACOBS: Yes.

Mr. CALDER: We meet the immigrants at the border.

Mr. JACOBS: That is supposed to be Canada. If they come into the country with these weapons they have already committed an offence; and that being so, it seems to me there is no utility in having this section in the Bill.

Mr. CALDER: It cannot do any harm.

Mr. McMASTER: That is a bad principle.

Mr. JACOBS: I wish to point out that it is already covered.

Mr. McKENZIE: Why say that "weapon that can be concealed upon the person?" Immigrants may have weapons in their trunks or travelling bags that they could not conceal upon their persons. Why not say that they are not to bring them in, any way?

Mr. CALDER: I do not suppose there would be any objection. Take immigrants coming in as settlers, they very often bring their shot guns and rifles, there is no particular objection to those weapons. What we are aiming at is concealed weapons.

Mr. McKENZIE: If the minister wishes to say to an immigrant that he may bring in his arms, his gun or his musket or his rifle, it would be better to state so, because guns are now made that can be taken apart into pieces not more than a foot in length, and if one wants to conceal them on one's person he can do so; and so a thing that is not intended to be made a crime might be made a crime under this Bill. I suppose it is no offence for a man to bring a gun into this country, but the moment he tries to conceal it under his coat he becomes a criminal.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. CALDER: I move to insert as a new section after section 14 of the present Bill the following:

14. (A) Section forty-one of the said Act is repealed and the following is substituted therefor:—

"41. Whenever any person other than a Canadian citizen advocates in Canada the overthrow by force or violence of the government of Great Britain or Canada, or other British dominion, colony, possession or dependency, or the overthrow by force or violence of constituted law and authority, or the assassination of any official of the Government of Great Britain or Canada or other British dominion, colony, possession or dependency, or of any foreign government, or advocates or teaches the unlawful destruction of property, or shall by word or act create or attempt to create riot or public disorder in Canada, or shall by common repute belong to or be suspected of belonging to any secret society or organization which extorts money from, or in any way attempts to control any resident of Canada by force or threat of bodily harm, or by blackmail, or who is a member of or affiliated with any organization extertaining or teaching disbelief in or opposition to organized government; such person for the purposes of this Act shall be considered as belonging to the prohibited or undesirable classes, and shall be liable to deportation, and it shall be the duty of any officer becoming cognizant thereof, and the duty of the clerk, secretary or other official of any municipality in Canada wherein such person may be, to forthwith send a written complaint thereof to the minister giving full particulars."

This section is practically the same as the section in the old law, with this exception, that we have included in the prohibited class, such persons as those who advocate the overthrow of government by force or violence and the unlawful destruction of property. We have amended this section merely to bring it into conformity with the other section in the Bill.

Mr. JACOBS: I should like to have some information from the minister with respect to this passage in the section:

Or shall by common repute belong to or be suspected of belonging to any secret society or organization which extorts money from, or in any way attempts to control any resident of Canada by force or threat of bodily harm, or by blackmail.

Mr. CALDER: That is part of the old law. I understand that there were in Canada some years ago certain societies constituted of foreign-born people who carried on a good deal of work of that kind, and the department at that time found it necessary to put this provision in the Bill. I think one of them was a Chinese society called the "Black Hand Society" which operated in that direction.

Mr. JACOBS: The section says further that among those prohibited from coming into Canada are those who are members of or affiliated with "any organization entertaining or teaching disbelief in or opposition to organized government." We know that Great Britain has been a harbour of refuge to all classes of people who teach all kinds of political beliefs. They knew they would have sanctuary in England, and were always permitted by law to come there. As I understand it, Scotland Yard and other institutions of that kind were able to keep proper tab on them by knowing just where they were to be found in England. If I remember aright, the famous Russian nihilist, Stepniak and several of his followers lived in England for many years and taught their doctrines with more or less success, always under the protection of the British authorities. If we adopt this section, we shall be restricting the right of residence in this country to a greater degree than is done in England, which surely ought to be the country that we should follow in matters of this knid.

Mr. CALDER: I am not so sure, but that on account of conditions that have existed during the last year or two, we shall find the English Government changing its law in this regard.

Mr. JACOBS: By Order in Council, and only for the period of the war.

Mr. CALDER: I am not so certain of that; I think we shall find some very stringent provisions placed by the British Parliament before very long. The question is whether or not we should permit to enter Canada or to remain in Canada people who openly and violently advocate the overthrow of constitutional government as we understand it. This suggests that we should not do so, and I think we should have a provision of this kind in our law.

Mr. JACOBS: Might I point out this instance to the minister? The Bolshevist Government is the de facto Government in Russia to-day, and for various reasons, which I need not relate to the Committee, the Bolshevist Government is not very popular in this country and in some other countries. Supposing a society was formed for the purpose of overthrowing, by violence, the Government of Messrs. Lenine and Trotsky, do I understand that any person who advocates a view of that kind would be prohibited from entering Canada or if here would he be ordered to be deported from this country?

Mr. CALDER: I think the hon. member would have to take the whole section. The first part of the section reads:

Whenever any person other than a Canadian citizen advocates in Canada the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of Great Britain or Canada, or other British Dominion, colony, possession or dependency or the overthrow by force or violence of constituted law and authority.

I would think that would be in Canada. We are not particularly concerned with what the people do, say in the heart of Russia.

Mr. JACOBS: I am referring to Canada. If any person in Canada advocates the overthrow of the Bolshevik Government, what would happen?

Mr. CALDER: I doubt very much if that person would come within the scope of this section, and it is not intended that he should. It is intended to cover only those who would advocate the violent overthrow of constituted Government in this country.

Mr. JACOBS: I think the clause says otherwise:

Or the overthrow by force or violence of constituted law and authority, or the assassination of any official of the Government of Great Britain or Canada or other British Dominion, colony, possession or dependency, or of any foreign Government.

That is the part I object to.

Mr. CALDER: It is taken from the old Act, the corresponding section of which reads:—

Whenever any person other than a Canadian citizen advocates in Canada the overthrow by force or violence of the Government of Great Britain or Canada or other British dominion, colony, possession or dependency, or the overthrow by force or violence of constituted law and authority, or the assassination of any official of the Government of Great Britain or Canada or other British dominion, colony, possession or dependency or of any foreign government—

The draftsman has simply included the provisions of the old law. I cannot see any very great necessity for retaining the words "or of any foreign government."

Mr. JACOBS: No. I think that ought to be struck out. We should not forget Tennyson's words that England is a land "where girt by friend or foe a man may speak the thing he will." He ought to be satisfied if we safeguard the British Empire. Foreign governments ought to look after themselves.

Mr. BURRELL: I do not think my hon. friend's quotation was a very happy one with regard to England. It is quite understandable that England can afford to be fairly lax and fairly generous in regard to the shelter of any particular class of people even if they go to violent extremes in speech, for the reason that the British are a homogeneous people and the foreign born are not in sufficient numbers to constitute any real danger to the state. But the situation in this country, especially in Western Canada, is fundamentally different. We have immense numbers of foreigners here who are easily misled, and it is quite manifest that the doctrines of those who openly preach sedition and advocate the overthrow of organized governments by force exercise a much more dangerous influence in an atmosphere such as ours than they would in England. Therefore, I think that the first part of the section is absolutely necessary. With regard to the other part, my hon. friend asked whether it would apply to a man, for instance, who advocated the overthrow of the Lenine and Trotsky government—whether he would be allowed to come into this country. I read all through the section the words "constituted government" and I maintain, and I think my hon. friend will be compelled to agree with me, that the Lenine and Trotsky Government is not a constituted government because they obtained power by refusing to let the constituent assembly meet, and took the country by force.

Mr. JACOBS: That is the way most governments obtain power.

Mr. BURRELL: Not by force of arms—brute force—but by moral force. In this case the constituent assembly was on the point of meeting, but Lenine and Trotsky absolutely refused to let it meet, and they seized power by force of arms. I would not regard that as a constitutional form of government.

Mr. JACOBS: It is the de facto government.

Mr. BURRELL: De facto by sheer force of arms, but certainly not de jure.

Mr. JACOBS: Does my hon. friend consider that Oliver Cromwell's government was a constitutional government, when Cromwell seized power?

Mr. BURRELL: Whatever opinions I may hold in regard to Oliver Cromwell—and I cherish pretty strong ones—I think he is a long way ahead of Lenine and Trotsky.

Mr. JACOBS: As regards the manner in which he seized power, his case was on all fours with Lenine and Trotsky's.

Mr. CALDER: The suggestion of my hon. friend, as I understand it, is this: That we should not pay any attention to any person who in this country advocates the assassination of an official in South America, let us say. I am quite willing to leave it to the judgment of the Committee whether we should allow such a man to remain in Canada or not.

Mr. McMASTER: I think the minister did not quite understand what my hon. friend intended to convey. His idea, as I understood it, was that there might be some persons living in Canada, inhabitants, say, of a South American republic, who had been displaced from power perhaps by a revolution and, while in Canada, were plotting a counter-revolution to regain power.

Mr. CALDER: My hon. friend will pardon me. The section explains itself. It reads: "Whenever any person other than a Canadian citizen advocates in Canada. . . the assassination of any official of the Government of Great Britain or Canada. . . or of any foreign Government." That is, any person in Canada shall be liable to deportation who advocates the assassination of any official of any foreign Government.

Mr. JACOBS: Perhaps I might give the Secretary of State another instance: One of our Allies, King Peter of Serbia, obtained power by the murder of his predecessor, King Alexander. I have no doubt that if King Peter came to Canada he would be received in the way in which all high dignitaries are received here.

New section as proposed agreed to.

On the motion of Mr. Calder, the Committee reverted to the consideration of section 2—domicile:

Mr. CALDER: I beg to move that clause 2 be amended by inserting the following proviso after paragraph (1):

Provided further that no person who belongs to the prohibited or undesirable classes within the meaning of section forty-one of this Act shall be capable of acquiring Canadian domicile.

The effect of the amendment will be briefly this: The persons we have just been speaking of, who advocate the destruction of property and the violent overthrow of constitutional governments, if they are not Canadian citizens, will not be allowed to acquire Canadian domicile so far as our right to deport them is concerned. Under the law as it now stands, once a man lives in Canada for a period of five years and acquires a domicile, whether or not he becomes a Canadian citizen, he cannot be deported.

The effect of this will be that as regards this class they shall be deportable whenever they are found, so long as they have not become Canadian citizens. If they became Canadian citizens in the ordinary way by naturalization, the only way they could be got at afterwards would be under the Criminal Code.

Bill as amended reported.

FERTILIZERS ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce) Bill No. 74, to amend the Fertilizers Act, 1909, was read the second time and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On Section 1, subsection (c)—fertilizer.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I move that the words "or lime, as carbonate, hydrate or oxide" be struck out. It has been represented by those who manufacture lime for treatment of the soil that this amendment should be made on the ground that lime is not a fertilizer, and the technical officers of the department so instruct me.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: How does the minister class slag?

[Mr. Jacobs.]

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Slag contains fertilizing ingredients while lime does not. Lime is used for treating certain soils, such as acid soil and what is termed "sour" land, but it furnishes no fertilizing ingredients to the soil. Slag, of course, contains phosphorous which is released and enriches the soil.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Is it intended that slag shall be subject to inspection and analysis under this Act?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes. I have some further amendments to offer. In the last line of subsection (c) I move to insert after the word "ordinary" the word "untreated," so that it will read "ordinary untreated stable manure."

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I think this Act is hardly applicable to fertilizer like slag, which is not put up in factories but is carried in shiploads and in large quantities in carloads to various parts of the country. This Bill provides that every package of manure shall be subject to a stamp tax. I do not see how it can apply to material that is sold in the way slag is sold.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Slag is a fertilizer. The purchasing public must have some protection and must be assured that the slag is worth purchasing, and it is not within the power of the ordinary consumer of fertilizer to ascertain for himself whether certain slag contains fertilizing ingredients. It must be inspected. In this Bill, while it is provided that a label must be attached, it is also provided that when the fertilizer is sold in bulk the information which would ordinarily be attached to the label shall be given in the invoice.

10 p.m.

Mr. J. E. SINCLAIR: Will the definition given here of fertilizer include such fertilizers as mussel mud and shell mud, which are both used largely in eastern Canada?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No.

Mr. J. E. SINCLAIR: The clause, as I read it, seems to indicate that it would.

Mr. DUFF: Will it include sea manure and kelp? A good deal of that is used in my county for manure, and it would be very cumbrous and inconvenient to have to put stamps on an ox load of sea manure or kelp going from the seashore to the farm.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Fish offal and lobster shells are other material commonly used for manure.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It will be found that this can only refer to fertilizer which is manufactured. If natural manure were sold in any form it would not be manufactured and the requirements of the Act would not apply. I think the section should remain as it is because the purpose of the Act is to protect the consumer or the producer. If a dealer presumes to sell fertilizer in the ordinary way it would be necessary to have it examined or inspected so that the public would know what they were getting. Kelp or any natural fertilizer might be very easily imitated and the public should be protected.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Would it not be absurd to have an analyst inspect kelp, or lobster shells which were being sold by some person to a neighbour to put on his land? The difficulty does not come in there. It has reference to the manufactured manures. It does not apply to these natural manures like mussel mud, lobster shells, fish offal and various other things that are used by the farmers. Fraud takes place where manures are manufactured.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: As a matter of fact these things are not sold.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: They are sometimes.

Mr. DUFF: I know of a number of cases where men who own ox teams go to the shore, load up with kelp or sea manure, and sell it to poor widows. It would be a foolish thing to stop a man half way to his destination and weigh his load. I think the insertion of the word "manufactured" would cover it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not differ from hon. gentlemen opposite but I want the section to be effective. The suggestion made is really unnecessary as the commodities to which they refer are not dealt in.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Why not strike out the word "natural" and substitute the word "manufactured"?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I would rather insert after the word "natural" the word "manufactured."

Mr. McMASTER: How could you have a natural manufactured manure?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It might be very easily manufactured by the application of some chemical. The process of manufacture might be so slight that it would hardly be recognized.

Mr. J. E. SINCLAIR: I agree with the minister in regard to the need of the inspection of fertilizers to protect the farmers and consumers. But in this definition of fertilizer you would include mussel mud which is a natural fertilizer and we have many people in Prince Edward Island who take it out of rivers and sell it to farmers in lots of from a ton to a carload. Unless the word "manufactured" were inserted it would include all fertilizers of this kind. While it may be necessary to have manufactured fertilizers inspected to see if they are up to the standard, it is going very far to say that this sea manure shall be made subject to the provisions of this Act. It contains all the ingredients, phosphoric acid, nitrogen and potash, and if you have to put a stamp on every hundred pounds sold by the vendor to the consumer it would be simply ridiculous. I would like the minister to consider that point.

Mr. McMASTER: I would suggest that the word "natural" be struck out and the word "manufactured" substituted.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If you struck out the word "natural," that would be sufficient in itself, because the word "artificial" implies manufacture. I would therefore move that the words "natural or" be struck out; that the words "or lime as carbonate, hydrate or oxide" in the seventeenth line be struck out, and that there be inserted, after the word "ordinary" in the eighteenth line, the word "untreated." The paragraph will now read:

(c) "fertilizer" includes every artificial manure containing phosphoric acid or nitrogen or potash, except ordinary, untreated stable manure.

Mr. DUFF: Now that you are going to cut out the words "natural or" in the fifteenth line, to make the paragraph read correctly, you will have to cut out the words "except ordinary untreated stable manure."

Mr. McMASTER: If treated it becomes artificial.

Mr. DUFF: Cut that out altogether.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes, that is correct. I beg to move:

That the words "except ordinary stable manure" be struck out.

The clause will now read:

The word "fertilizer" includes every artificial manure containing phosphoric acid or nitrogen or potash.

Paragraph as amended, agreed to.

On paragraph (d)—guaranteed analysis:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I move:

That paragraph (d) be amended by striking out the word "nitrogen" at the end of the twenty-first line and inserting the words "ammonia and"; also by striking out the words "and lime."

The paragraph will then read:

—must be stated in terms of phosphoric acid, ammonia and potash.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Why is "nitrogen" removed?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: "Ammonia" is a better known term.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Is not nitrogen an important ingredient?

Mr. CHISHOLM: You do not mean to say that ammonia and nitrogen are similar?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is the same thing, and to speak of ammonia is another way of speaking of nitrogen.

Mr. McMASTER: It is a long time since I studied chemistry, but what the minister says has a strange sound in my ears.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am giving the hon. gentleman the information the officer gives me.

Paragraph as amended, agreed to.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I wish to add as subsection (h) a definition of the word "available:"

"Available" as applied to the phosphoric acid, the ammonia, or the potash stated in the guaranteed analysis, means that quantum of the total phosphoric acid, or ammonia, or potash present which is available for plant use within one year of its application to the soil.

Mr. McMASTER: Would not the word "content" be better than the word "present" in the second to last line?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think the word "present" is the one ordinarily used. You may have a great deal of phosphoric acid in a fertilizer which would not be released for a long time, consequently the fertilizer would have no immediate value. The value of the fertilizer largely depends upon the rapidity with which the fertilizing ingredients are released, and it was considered desirable to have this definition.

Mr. McKENZIE: Is it not very difficult to tell the time within which the ingredients, or the fertilizing properties, of any manure will be communicated to the soil? Do not the release of the fertilizing ingredients depend largely upon weather conditions—the amount of moisture, and so on?

[Mr. A. K. Maclean.]

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It has to be determined by experiments conducted by scientific men.

Mr. McMASTER: I notice that in the next clause the word "content" is used. Does that mean the same thing as "present" in the clause under consideration? If it does it is always wiser, as matter of drafting to employ the same terms.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 2—How phosphoric acid contents to be stated.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I propose to amend this section and I have sent to hon. gentlemen opposite two copies of the contemplated amendment. Since the first reading of this Bill the officers of the department have been in communication with the manufacturers of fertilizer and the representatives of farmers, and they have gone over the different clauses. I move that section 2A of the present Bill be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

Every person before selling or offering for sale in Canada any fertilizer, shall either mark upon each package of fertilizer, the following particulars, or attach a label to each such package containing such particulars, or when the fertilizer is sold in bulk shall set out such particulars on the invoice, namely:—

1. Brand name and trade mark, if any.
2. Registration number.
3. Guaranteed analysis, stating separately: Minimum percentage only.
   (a) The percentage of ammonia.
   (b) The percentage of available phosphoric acid and the total phosphoric acid.
   (c) The percentage of potash soluble in water.
4. The name and address of the manufacturer or seller.

In the case of bone meal, tankage or other organic products, and basic slag, the phosphoric acid shall be stated as total phosphoric acid also. When leather in any form, wool, waste, hair, or any inert organic nitrogenous material, forms part of any fertilizer, the percentage of such ingredients must be mentioned in the guaranteed analysis, unless by processing the nitrogen has been made available in such materials. When potash is derived from sulphate of potash or carbonate of potash it may be so stated in the guaranteed analysis.

Mr. DUFF: Where will the manufacturer obtain the registered number?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: From the department.

Mr. DUFF: Every time he has a new brand he must send it to Ottawa to have it registered?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes. I should like to have the assistance of the Committee in suitably wording this amendment. For instance, I am not too well satisfied with the wording of the first part:

Every person before selling or offering for sale in Canada any fertilizer—

—shall do so and so. In many places fertilizer is frequently sold, particularly to owners of gardens, in very small packages. It is not intended that the Bill shall apply to such sales, and possibly there might in the present wording of the amendment be some limitation.

Mr. DUFF: Should not the word "manufactured" be inserted in the second line after the word "any." That is to say:

Every person before selling or offering for sale in Canada any manufactured fertilizer—and so on.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Fertilizer is already properly defined.

Mr. J. E. SINCLAIR: In sub-paragraph 4 of the amendment the expression "manufacturer or seller" occurs. Does "seller" have the same meaning as "agent," which is referred to in paragraph (a) of section 1, or has it the same meaning as the word "vendor" in section 9?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I move to substitute the word "agent" for the word "seller" in sub-paragraph 4 of the amendment.

Mr. McMASTER: It seems to me that the word "agent" hardly connotes the idea that is intended to be conveyed. I would imagine that there are a number of merchants who deal in fertilizers but who are not agents for any special manufacturer. Is it the intention to call all such merchants agents?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The word "agent" there really has a definition in this Act.

Mr. McMASTER: I know. That is just what I am finding fault with, if I may do so without disrespect.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is so.

Mr. McMASTER: It does seem to me a great mistake to give to a word a meaning that is different from its ordinary meaning. It is bad draftsmanship, I think, to call a man an agent who is trading on his own account.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I was going to suggest that the first part of that clause be amended to say:

Every manufacturer, importer or dealer.

I should like to have the sense of the committee on that amendment. It might protect a very small seller of fertilizers in the event of some violation of the Act by him.

Mr. DUFF: I do not see why you want the word "dealer" there. A dealer is a retailer.

Mr. McMASTER: I suppose the idea is that the ultimate consumer shall have protection of real value.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes. I hesitate to amend the section. I am satisfied that it will be all right. I know the objection, which I suggested myself, can very validly be raised. On the whole I would prefer leaving the section as it is.

Mr. McMASTER: Could not a covering clause be put at the end, saying that this shall not have application to sales of, say, 25 lb. and under? That would cover the case where the owner of a garden went to his florist or grocer and bought some of this stuff; he would then be relying upon the reputation of the person from whom he was buying.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: After all, the administration of the Act is in the hands of officials of the department, and any prosecutions would have to be conducted by them. I would ask the Committee to let the section stand.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Departmental officials are sometimes very meddlesome. I know that prosecutions are going on in my constituency at the present time at the instance of an official who is going through the little stores and inducing people to sell a twenty-five cent package of talcum powder, or something of that kind, without affixing the necessary stamp. A case occurred the other day where a constable went into a small country store and induced the little girl who was in charge to sell him a package of talcum powder without the stamp on it. The proprietor was not present. The first he knew of it was through a summons. This is the way the Inland Revenue Department is prosecuting people through officials whose sense of duty is aroused by the prospect of pocketing a portion of the fines that may be imposed on unwitting offenders.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think revenue laws must be rigidly enforced. The cases are not analogous.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The law should be enforced by responsible officers.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

Mr. McMASTER: May I ask the minister if he has many more amendments?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There are several.

Mr. McMASTER: Really I feel that I have not done justice to the clause that has just been passed. I am not satisfied with it; neither, I think, is the minister. If we have to consider a number of clauses of the same nature I do not think we should attempt it to-night. We want to pass a Bill which satisfies us, and I do not like the principle that we can pass more or less slip-shod legislation and depend upon the good sense of the officers of the Crown to use with discretion the weapon placed in their hands. As a rule I presume they do use discretion, but not always; they are frail men like ourselves. It is our duty to pass the best legislation we can, and it is the duty of the officers of the Crown to put that into effect to the best of their ability. It seems to me that it would be better to have this Bill reprinted and distributed.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I must confess that I feel it is in a sense unfair to the Committee to offer so many lengthy amendments without their having had an opportunity to consider them. That was my feeling at the beginning, and as the hon. gentleman has expressed a desire that the Bill be reprinted before proceeding further, I do not feel that I can refuse his request. So I move that we rise and report progress.

Progress reported.

WEIGHTS AND MEASURES ACT AMENDMENT.

On the order: Third reading of Bill No. 42, to amend the Weights and Measures Act:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Mr. Chairman, this Bill, it will be remembered, was considered yesterday and we had quite a lengthy discussion on section 7, which provides a money penalty for short weight delivery. The leader of the Opposition suggested the possibility or probability of malicious proceedings being taken against merchants or dealers selling short weight. As I explained yesterday, it is not possible to secure a conviction except through officers of the department being in a store and establishing, right at the moment of sale or immediately afterwards, the fact of the article being short in weight. If an article is purchased and is taken home, and then brought back to the store, and the purchaser asks to be relieved of his purchase upon the ground of short weight, it could never be established in any court. However, after hearing the remarks made by the leader of the Opposition and the member for South Renfrew (Mr. Pedlow), I concluded that possibly the Act might be open to abuse, and I wish to amend the clause by adding these words:—

No proceedings shall be taken under the provisions of this section except with the consent of the minister.

The hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) yesterday amended this clause by providing penalties for second and subsequent offences, and in the drafting of it he used figures, and I should like to have those expressed in extenso. I move:

That the order for the third reading of Bill No. 42, to amend the Weights and Measures Act, be now discharged and that the said Bill be referred back to the Committee of the Whole with power to amend the same by striking out clause 7 of the said Bill and substituting therefor the following clause:

"7. The following section is inserted immediately after section sixty-one of the said Act:—

"61. (a) Notwithstanding any of the provisions of the Criminal Code, any person who sells, delivers or causes to be sold or delivered, anything by weight, measure or number, short of the quantity ordered purchased, shall be guilty of an offence and liable to a fine not exceeding twenty-five dollars for the first offence and to a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars for any subsequent offence. No proceedings shall be taken under the provisions of this section except with the consent of the minister."

Motion agreed to, and the House thereupon went into Committee, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I move to amend clause 7 of the Bill by striking out all the words after the word "Act" in the second line of the said clause and substituting the following:

61. (a) Notwithstanding any of the provisions of the Criminal Code, any person who sells, delivers or causes to be sold or delivered, anything by weight, measure or number, short of the quantity ordered purchased, shall be guilty of an offence and liable to a fine not exceeding twenty-five dollars for the first offence and to a fine not exceeding one hundred dollars for any subsequent offence. No proceedings shall be taken under the provisions of this section except with the consent of the minister.

Mr. McKENZIE: I wish further to support my objection to this Bill. I am very glad that the minister is making it considerably better by throwing this safeguard around it, that a responsible minister will have to give his consent; and I suppose he will be satisfied with nothing short of substantial evidence before he will give his authority to the proceedings. The minister states that the person who gets the short weight is expected to come back to the store and deliver up the goods and say that they are short weight. There is nothing in the Bill to that effect.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No.

Mr. McKENZIE: What would happen in many cases is an entirely different proceeding. The minister is measuring the capacity of some magistrates of this country by his own honest idea of things and thinks that what he would not do himself will not be done by a magistrate. Magistrates will do the most extraordinary things. Let me point out to the minister what might happen in many cases and what will happen under this Bill if magistrates get the authority. Mr. A is dealing with a grocery where he gets his groceries from day to day, and he has a little scale in his house with which he weighs everything he buys. He runs into debt to the merchant, and one day his little girl goes to the store for, say, ten pounds of sugar and a pound of tea and the merchant says: I will not give it to you because I am tired of giving your father goods, as he is not paying for what he gets. She goes home and immediately they discover that the last pound of tea and the last pound of sugar were short in weight, and they at once proceed to lay an information against that man before some stupid magistrate who is quite willing to accept their evidence as against that of the merchant. The merchant will say: I do not remember, but according to the custom of the trade and my custom I believe I gave that girl one pound of tea and one pound of sugar; but they will swear positively with spite and malice against that man who refused to give them goods. Even if the magistrate were fairly disposed to be honest, as I will give him credit for being, what has he before him? He has the sworn testimony, perhaps of a whole family, that the weight was short, while the merchant can do nothing except depend upon the custom of the trade and his custom in dealing with people. That is the position into which this section is putting every honest man who is doing business.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I hope my amendment will prevent that.

Amendment agreed to.

Bill, as amended reported and read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY.

The House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I understand that the rules of the House compel us to go back into Supply. I do not purpose asking the Committee to pass any Supply tonight.

Progress reported.

On the motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean the House adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

Monday, May 12, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

REPORTS AND PAPERS.

Return of all correspondence, telegrams and other documents in connection with the application of the Shell Transport and Trading Company for the grant of certain oil lands.—Hon. Mr. Meighen.

Report of Overseas Military Forces of Canada for the year 1918.—Sir Edward Kemp.

DOMINION WATER-POWERS.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Minister of the Interior) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 94, respecting Dominion Water-powers. He said:

The purpose of this Bill is to make a statutory foundation for the administration of Canadian water-powers in so far as those water-powers are the assets of the Dominion, and for co-operation with the provinces in the administration of water-powers that belong to them.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SETTLEMENT OF RETURNED SOLDIERS UPON THE LAND.

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 95, to assist returned soldiers in settling upon the land. He said:

This proposed legislation, as its name implies, is designed to assist returned soldiers in becoming settlers on land in Canada. In 1917 the Dominion Parliament passed the Soldiers' Settlement Act of that year which had the same general object in view, but the scope of whose operations was confined to lands owned by the Dominion. That is to say, the Bill did not make provision for the assistance of land settlement by soldiers, save to the extent that it provided an additional quarter-section for each soldier, as a soldier's grant over and above his homestead rights, and to the further extent that it enabled assistance to be given to soldiers owning land by way of a loan upon those lands on the ordinary loan basis. The main purpose of the present legislation, in so far as it is additional to and beyond the Bill of 1917, is to provide a means of acquiring lands now held privately or by corporations, or indeed by governments, for the purpose of disposing of those lands to returned soldiers. A foundation for the work we are now doing under the Soldiers' Settlement Board was first laid on the 11th February last by an Order in Council which in its provisions is similar to the corresponding provisions of the Bill now introduced. However, beyond the powers which were taken by the Order in Council referred to, this Bill provides a system and machinery whereby lands may be acquired other than by agreement or purchase, viz: compulsorily and by expropriation. These expropriatory clauses contain means whereby, under a settlement area scheme, the lands that are being retarded from cultivation are set aside as settlement areas, and are thereby made subject to the compulsory provisions of the Bill. I have gone far enough to show that the measure is most comprehensive, and indeed progressive, in its character. It is, I think, the most extended and progressive federal land settlement scheme that has yet been brought to my attention. It is a Bill of considerable length and will demand much of the attention of Parliament.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SS. AQUITANIA'S PORT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. LUCIEN CANNON (Dorchester): I desire to call the attention of the Government, and of the Minister of Marine in particular, to a piece of news which appeared in the press last week to the effect that the SS. Aquitania would land troops in Halifax, but would not go up the St. Lawrence river as far as Quebec on account of the very heavy marine insurance rates. I would like to know if the Government intend taking any measures to remedy such a condition of things?

Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE (Minister of Marine): I have not seen anything in the press of what the hon. member has just referred to, nor has the matter been brought to my attention. I will be very glad to look into it, and let my hon. friend know as soon as possible. I am under the impression that the Aquitania draws too much water to go to Quebec, but I am not certain of that until I have made inquiry.

RE-CLASSIFICATION OF CIVIL SERVICE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. CHARLES SHEARD (Toronto South): Is the Government in a position to state definitely to the House when the report of the Civil Service Commission on the subject on the re-classification of the service will be laid upon the Table?

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN: I am glad the hon. gentleman has asked the question, as I intended to make a very brief statement upon the matter. I received this morning a telegram from the Secretary of the Postal Letter Carriers' Association, Mr. A. McMordie, of Toronto. I shall read that telegram and my reply thereto, which I think is quite comprehensive and fully covers the ground.

I might say that rumours have lately appeared in the press to the effect that a promise was given that the re-classification would be laid upon the table of the House, or introduced into Parliament, about the first of May. That is probably true; I think I made a statement myself to that effect. When I made that statement I was firmly of the opinion that the work of the Civil Service Commission would have been so far advanced that the classification report would be in the hands of Parliament by this time. However, that work up to the present moment was not fully completed, and it was therefore an utter impossibility for the Government to present the classification report to Parliament. Other statements have appeared in the press during the week to the effect that the classification would not be presented to Parliament during the present session of Parliament, but that it would be taken up at an adjourned session in the coming autumn, or at another session. This rumour, of course, is not correct; it is proposed that the classification shall be proceeded with during the present session. The telegram from Mr. McMordie to which I referred a moment ago reads as follows:

> Much dissatisfaction amongst letter carriers, that the expectations of the Government as to Civil Service Commission report not materializing during the first week in May as promised. It is important that you give us definite statement now as to when this report will be submitted to the House of Commons.

To which I replied on May 12, as follows:

Your telegram eleventh received to-day. The work of classification by the Civil Service Commission is proceeding as rapidly as is humanly possible and nothing is being neglected to expedite this work. Classification work has taken a long time but it involved a stupendous task. The actual work is now about completed and a substantial proportion of schedules is printed. The printing is in two languages which involves also a translation but I think the printing will be wholly completed within fourteen days. On completion of printing a Bill to enact the classification will promptly be introduced into Parliament and advanced with all possible speed. I beg to assure your association that the work has been carried out with great earnestness since August last and it was not possible by any means to have had the work further advanced than it is although I was hopeful of its completion before this but I am satisfied no one is to blame for any delay. I hope your association will realize the importance and comprehensiveness of the task and await the completion of the work which is now so nearly in sight.

I would like to say further, Mr. Speaker, that at the present moment the schedules are completed in the sense that all the preliminary work is done, and all that remains to be done prior to the introduction of the measure which will enact the classification, is the translation of the schedules and the printing. As a matter of fact, a very substantial proportion of the English translation is in print now, and also a very substantial proportion of the French translation is completed; and I am hopeful, as I have already stated, that within two weeks from to-day I shall be able to introduce a Bill providing for some amendments to the Civil Service Act and for the validation of the schedules.

Now, I wish to point out to the House—because this is a subject of recent comment in the press and in some sections of the Civil Service—that the classification of the Inside and Outside Services is in all respects a stupendous task. It is the most comprehensive work of its character ever attempted by any country, and when it is finished it may well be regarded as the greatest accomplishment in this direction by any country.

The personnel of our Civil Service amounts to at least 50,000, and that is without taking into consideration the army and navy, our railway employees, the judiciary and some other branches of the public service. The classification work involved the making of 1,600 schedules, in the printing each page will take on the average about two and one half schedules, and when wholly printed it will mean a publication of six or seven hundred pages, which is quite a substantial volume. I wish also to point out that a limited staff only could be employed in this work. I think it will be quite obvious that this work could not have been assigned to an unlimited number of men without substantial variations in principle being incorporated in the work, which would be very undesirable in settling the classification.

By way of comparison I might point out that some time ago the city of New York made a classification of its Civil Service. The number of its employees was 60,000, slightly more than that of the Government of Canada, but I would imagine the work would be less complicated than our own. It took four years to complete that work, and it cost the city a great deal of money. As a further comparison I might mention the fact that a short time ago the state of New York made a classification of its Civil Service, which comprises 17,000 persons, and that took over two years. The Civil Service Commission of Canada have been employed since the first of August last in carrying out the directions given by Parliament in the Civil Service Act of last year, and I am sure every possible effort has been made and is being made to complete the work at an early date, and present it to Parliament for its consideration and, I hope, approval. With some slight knowledge of the vast deal of work which the commission has had to perform in connection with the classification I can confidently say that no complaint can fairly be made by the public or by any section of the Civil Service in regard to the time taken by the commission. However, as I stated a moment ago, I do expect that within two weeks I shall be able to present the report upon the classification of the Civil Service to Parliament and ask for approval of the same.

Before I sit down let me further point this out: When the classification with the schedules of salaries is approved by Parliament it will relate back to the beginning of the fiscal year; and if it happens that any members of the service are entitled under that classification to promotion in rank or in salary, the same will date back to the 1st of April last, and in that way no substantial wrong can be done to the personnel of the Civil Service in the monetary sense by reason of an unexpected delay of a few weeks in the completion of the work.

MILITARY SERVICE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. McKENZIE: Mr. Speaker, I notice that Bill No. 91, respecting the disqualification of military defaulters, is marked on the Orders of the Day as printed in English and French, but on sending out for the Bill I find it is not available. I wish to bring to the notice of the Acting Minister of Justice that it is desirable to have the Bill distributed as early as possible.

There is another matter I wish to draw the minister's attention to. I understand that the Military Service Act has been amended to some extent by Orders in Council. Those orders may be available to hon. members, but at all events I have not got any of them, and in considering this Bill it would be well to have the amendments so made printed and distributed for the use of members.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no desire to go on with the Bill in question until hon. members have an ample opportunity to study it. I will see that it is printed and distributed before we go on. Furthermore, the Orders in Council to which the hon. member refers are already bound with the Military Service Act, and I do not think there will be any difficulty in having them, as bound, distributed.

QUEBEC OFFICER CHARGED WITH EMBEZZLEMENT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. H. B. MORPHY (North Perth): I should like to know from the Acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Meighen) whether a certain officer in Quebec, who was charged with embezzling about five or six thousand dollars of the public money, was prosecuted and what disposition was made of the case?

Mr. SPEAKER: I must ask the hon. member to put his question on the Order Paper. It is not a question involving policy nor affecting the country at large.

Mr. MORPHY: I might have prefaced my remark by saying that the matter is one of extreme urgent importance and one affecting the country at large, as I believe it to be.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. gentleman should put his question on the Order Paper.

OVERSEAS FORCES.

FORTHCOMING STATEMENT BY SIR EDWARD KEMP.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir EDWARD KEMP (Minister of Overseas Military Forces): I have had the honour of laying on the table of the House to-day a report of the Overseas Military Forces of Canada for the year 1918. The report is available in the post office for members, and it is also, I believe, available for senators. I should like to absent myself from the House for about ten days or a little longer, more particularly for personal reasons, but on my return I shall be prepared to make a statement to the House with reference to the administration and operations of the Overseas Military Forces of Canada, and to touch upon those points which are of greatest public interest at the present moment.

LT.-COL. JENKINS' REPORT.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): Might I ask the Overseas Minister of Militia if the Jenkins report will be laid on the table of the House?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I do not know to what my hon. friend refers. I have no such report.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Did not Col. Jenkins, Medical Officer, submit to the Overseas Minister of Militia a report on the medical service overseas, and did he not go over one of the copies with the minister himself?

Sir EDWARD KEMP: I would say "No" to both questions. Now that a little more light has been thrown on the matter, I might say that I appointed a committee to look into the accounting and other systems employed in the different branches of the service overseas. This committee was to advise me regarding the economies which might be introduced as regards system in the pay office, record office and various other branches of the service. The committee contemplated looking into the accounting system, etc., in connection with the medical services, and for that purpose it employed a young medical officer to make certain preliminary investigations on its behalf. Col. Jenkins, to whom reference is made by my hon. friend from Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes), was not a member of the committee. The committee spoke to me of different matters which it had under its consideration as regards different branches of the service, and about the month of December the members of the committee informed me that they found it impossible to look into the accounting system, etc., in connection with the medical service, because one of its members was leaving for Canada at that time, and also more particularly because the war was over and the hospitals were being demobilized. And consequently no report was made by the committee.

PRIVATE BILLS.

CANADIAN WHOLESALE GROCERS' ASSOCIATION.

House again in Committee on Bill No. 45, to incorporate the National Wholesale Grocers' Association, and recommending that the title of said Bill be changed to "An Act to incorporate the Canadian Wholesale Grocers' Association."—(Mr. Sheard)—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 12—Committees of Inquiry:

Mr. MEIGHEN: I understand that when the Bill was last before the Committee, the leader of the Opposition called attention to clause 11 as being undesirable, and suggested it should not have been allowed to pass by the Department of Justice. He also objected to certain features of clause 12. Upon inquiry, I find that clause 11 was struck out before the Private Bills Committee, and clause 12 was amended by striking out the words:

Upon oath (which oath any member of said committee is hereby empowered to administer).

—in the 37th and 38th lines. With that omission, which was made at the suggestion of the parliamentary counsel of the Private Bills Committee, I see no objection to the Bill from the standpoint of the Department of Justice.

Mr. McKENZIE: The objection which I took when the Bill previously was before the Committee was that it was an unusual departure to permit any private corporation doing business to establish a roving committee to travel through Canada with power to put people on oath and inquire about the particular business the corporation is concerned in.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is taken out. The Committee cannot take evidence on oath at all. Not only is the portion in brackets struck out, but the words "upon oath" which precede that are also struck out.

Mr. McKENZIE: How will the section read as amended?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It will read:

Such committees may examine any party who appears before them, and the evidence so taken may be used to assist the association in arriving at a decision with reference to the matter under consideration.

As the evidence is not taken upon oath, I see very little value in the clause, because any body of men in Canada may ask questions and make notes of the evidence they get on asking the questions. As long as power to take evidence upon oath is not given, they are not accorded any power beyond that which the ordinary citizen of Canada has.

Mr. McKENZIE: What struck me as unusual was that a roving committee of that kind should have the right to put people on oath and then examine them. But if this does not give them any power to swear a witness, I suppose they could send a committee around and get statutory evidence without any power at all.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly.

Mr. McKENZIE: With that power taken out, I suppose there is no objection to the clause.

Mr. SHEARD: As the Bill stands in my name, I might say that, according to my advice, the idea of this clause was only for the association to secure information regarding the trade, and in asking that the information be sworn to, they simply desired that it should be reliable. I have no objection to the amendment announced by the Acting Minister of Justice. The purpose will, I think, be solved by the association getting the information, their desire being only to secure reliable and accurate information.

Section as amended agreed to.

DOMINION FOREST RESERVES AND PARKS ACT AMENDMENT.

On the motion of Hon. Arthur Meighen (Minister of the Interior), Bill No. 79, to amend The Dominion Forest Reserves and Parks Act was read the second time and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

On section 1—Ss. 2 of s. 15 amended by making outfit and equipment subject to forfeiture, and giving magistrates power to forfeit:

Mr. MEIGHEN: I have redrafted this section so as to repeal the original section. I think this is a better system of drafting where the amendment is so extensive. The amendment I beg to move is as follows:—

That section 1 be rescinded and that the following be substituted therefor:

"1. Subsection two of section fifteen of the Dominion Forest Reserves and Parks Act, chapter ten of the Statutes of 1911, is hereby repealed and the following is substituted therefor:—

"2. Any forest officer may seize, whether within a reserve or elsewhere, all timber, trees and hay cut or removed, all mineral or other products removed, all animals, birds and fish captured or killed, and within a reserve may seize all firearms, ammunition, explosives, spears, traps, nets, rods, lines, tackle and appliances used or found in the possession of any person without lawful authority or in contravention of any provision of this Act or of any regulation made thereunder, and may seize the outfit and all equipment used or found in the possession of any person or persons arrested for capturing or killing any animal, bird or fish."

Mr. McKENZIE: I suppose that any prosecutions under this Act would be summary?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: I would merely suggest that in case of an appeal—and there is always the possibility, and, indeed, strong probability of an appeal from a summary conviction—although the appellant may win his case he may find his boat or his nets or fishing gear destroyed, unless we make some provision that in the event of an appeal no destruction of property shall take place until the case is finally disposed of.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Act as it formerly stood placed the power of confiscation in the hands of the game official. That is deemed too wide a power to be placed in his hands, and the amendment places it in the hands of a justice of the peace. Now, inasmuch as he has the power over the goods confiscated, he could, if notified of an appeal on the day of trial or at any time before actual confiscation took place, defer the disposition of the goods until the appeal was taken and heard. There are many clauses in various Acts similar to this as it will be when amended, and the head of the branch having to do with this has never encountered the difficulty the hon. member suggests. I would not like to delay the Bill. If I could consider the question without delaying the Bill I would be glad to do so.

Section agreed to.

On Section 2—Amendment to authorize granting of surface rights in certain cases in connection with mineral claims.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I move that subsection 3 of section 2 be amended by rescinding the words "in the holders thereof" in lines 21 and 22, and substituting therefor the following: "in the Crown in the right of the Province of British Columbia." In justice to the Committee I think the clause might be explained. As every one knows, the Privy Council decided many years ago that the royal minerals, that is gold and silver, belonged to the province of British Columbia, while the baser metals belonged to the Dominion. An arrangement was arrived at by Order in Council for the working of the baser metals by means of sale to the province of those metals. The Order in Council of 1890—for Orders in Council are as old as that—provided that the baser metals might be sold, and that any one entering, in accordance with the law of the province for mining rights in the railway belt, would have a right to a lease of sufficient of the surface to enable his mine to be worked. Then, when the forest reserves and parks were established, the difficulty immediately arose that if surface rights were alienated there, it would mean a very considerable interference with the use of the forest reserves and parks. Consequently it was provided that in the case of forest reserves and parks only a lease should be given subject to terms and conditions set down. This Bill provides for the continuance of that system, but provides also that wherever men acquired rights from the province of British Columbia prior to the establishment of the forest reserves and parks, then they might get a sale, because they would, under the previous law, be entitled to that sale of the surface rights and of the subsoil rights. Certain cases arose and were dealt with by Order in Council referred to in subsection 3, where men entered for mining rights prior to the establishment of forest reserves and at a time when they were entitled to the subsoil and surface rights by sale. This amendment enables us to do the same in future wherever men acquired their rights prior to the establishment of reserves, and ratifies the action taken in the three individual cases.

Mr. McKENZIE: What minerals are now vested in the right of the province, and what minerals are vested in the right of the Dominion? It might make the matter a little clearer if we knew what we were dealing with by these Orders in Council.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The precious metals are the property of the province, and the baser meals belong to the Dominion. I cannot name in detail the precious metals, but undoubtedly they comprise gold, silver and copper. The main mineral that is ours is the coal, with which this Bill has to do chiefly. I am not certain as to iron, but I am of opinion that iron is a baser metal.

Mr. VIEN: Why was Order in Council No. 2156 passed vesting the mineral rights in the owners of the I. O. U., the O. K. and the Apex Mineral Claims, and what were the conditions of that vesting?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The owners of those claims, had it not been for the establishment of the forest reserves, would have been entitled under the legislation of 1890 to surface rights granted by Order in Council. But after the forest reserves were established the Justice Department decided that the legislation of 1890 applied only to lands that were held by the Crown in the right of Canada, and not the lands reserved for sale. These lands were held for sale at the time the rights were acquired,—the time the entries were made in accordance with the legislation of British Columbia,—and consequently it was only right that men who had acquired such rights should not be dispossessed of them by the subsequent establishment of forest reserves. The legislation does not apply to any one acquiring rights after that. Circumstances arose that made it necessary to take action. I do not remember the exact circumstances, but I think there was an issue of bonds or something of that nature. The hon. member for Caribou (Mr. Fulton) could tell more definitely about that than I. It was necessary that the rights of these people to which they were entitled at the time of acquirement, should be confirmed, and this legislation confirms the action taken.

Mr. VIEN: Why is it necessary to have that Order in Council ratified by Act of Parliament?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think it is legally necessary at all, but it is good constitutional practice to come to Parliament and say what was necessary to be done and have Parliament confirm it.

Mr. VIEN: Order in Council No. 2156 must have been passed under some provision of the law authorizing the Governor in Council to pass it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is right.

Mr. VIEN: That being so, I fail to see why it should be necessary to ratify it.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Order in Council appointing the receiver for the Grand Trunk Pacific was passed under statutory legislation. The Governor in Council had authority to pass it; nevertheless—

Mr. McKENZIE: That is a question.

Mr. MEIGHEN: —as soon as it was passed it came back to Parliament for ratification as a matter of constitutional practice. This Order in Council is in exactly the same position. It is not a legal necessity at all. Any continuing effect of the Order in Council passed under the War Measures Act has practically in law to cease upon the termination of the Act, which is upon the termination of the war. In order that its continuing effect may exist, it should be ratified by legislation. But in this case, as the effect is not in the nature of a continuing effect but rather something done, I do not think there is any legal necessity. It however is well to do it as a matter of constitutional practice.

Mr. VIEN: If I understand the minister, that Order in Council, No. 2156, was passed in virtue of the War Measures Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not quite certain of the Act. It is usual to name as many Acts as you can when you pass an Order in Council. It is very probable that it was passed under the Dominion Lands Act or the War Measures Act and any other which would be opportune. That is good practice that I commend to my hon. friend when he becomes a member of a Government.

Mr. VIEN: I think that is an eventuality that may never materialize, but before that time comes I would like to go into this matter a little farther. If, for the enactment of this Order in Council a basis had to be found in the provisions of the War Measures Act, I think this House should go more carefully into it and ascertain what is the opinion of the Minister of Justice as to the right of the owners of these mineral claims. I would like, before we pass this clause, that the opinion of the Minister of Justice on the rights of these owners be laid on the table of the House so that we may examine the matter more carefully.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There has been no written opinion given, but I have no hesitation in giving the opinion, which will now go on Hansard, that their rights are quite secure.

Mr. VIEN: The opinion of the Acting Minister of Justice that the rights of the owners of these claims are quite secure is not an answer to my question. I am now asking whether these claimants had really a right to receive from the Crown the grant of the title to these mineral claims. The minister said that they had some vested rights, and that it was only just and fair that the Crown should remit those vested rights in the surface and the minerals in the claims. It not having been provided by law that the Government should have such a right, the minister tells us now that it had probably been found necessary—without being absolutely sure of the point—to revert to the War Measures Act to find authority to pass an Order in Council with reference to the rights of the owners of these claims. I believe we should very carefully go into the question and ascertain what their rights are. The minister said that they had a right to these claims but I would like to see what their title is. I would like to know if they had a clear title to these claims and in what way their title takes priority to the title of the Government.

4 p.m.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I thought I explained that. These people entered their claims prior to the establishment of the reserve.

Mr. VIEN: When?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Prior to the establishment of the reserve. That is the only point of any importance. When the law of 1890 applied, it gave to the entrant of these claims, who complied with the British Columbia regulations, the right to the acquirement of the surface to the extent necessary to work the claims. That right was intact. But it had not been granted as they had not made proof and we knew nothing about it. Subsequently this Parliament establishes a reserve; that statute takes away the right, in the opinion of the Justice Department, because the law of 1890 did not apply to land unless it was held for sale. These claimants find themselves in that position when they come to apply. I do not think anything could be clearer than that it is our duty to put them in the position they were in prior to the establishment of the reserve. Is that clear to the hon. gentleman?

Mr. VIEN: Was there any provision in the Dominion Forest Reserves and Parks Act to give to the Government authority so to do?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, that is why this legislation is necessary. It was not known at the time that there were any rights there. It only becomes known afterwards when these people apply and say that they come under the British Columbia law.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think the point made by my hon. friend (Mr. Vien) as to the passage of this Order in Council is about right. The Acting Minister of Justice is usually very strong and clear in his reasoning on matters of law but I did not think he was very strong in saying that he could get a little authority here and a little there, go back to as many statutes as he liked and get an accumulation of authority, in order to pass an Order in Council. I do not think that is good law or reasoning. That is something that the courts guard against in this country. They say that your authority must be absolutely good before an Order in Council stands. It is not good in itself unless it is based on the authority of some statute. When a statute is passed giving the Governor in Council authority to pass an Order in Council in order to implement that statute, that authority is clear and is the mind of Parliament as expressed in that statute. An Order in Council cannot issue under another statute. I am sure that the Acting Minister of Justice would not say that you could travel from that statute to some other statute and get supplementary authority from it to authorize the issue of an Order in Council. Every Order in Council must be based on some statutory authority and upon that statutory authority alone. I think we should all understand that the courts and constitution of the country, as well as the English courts for as far back as we have any records, have zealously protected the rights of Parliament and the people as against overreaching authority by Order in Council. The courts have always quashed proceedings under an Order in Council unless it was solidly based upon some parliamentary authority as expressed in the statute. If the minister says that these Orders in Council in connection with the coal and mineral lands in the Northwest were based upon the War Measures Act, I would certainly say tnat the authority was not good, and that it was straining the Act beyond any conceivable understanding Parliament had when it passed it to say that it was good enough to use as a basis for making Orders in Council with respect to mineral lands in the Northwest. I hope there is some other and better authority which enabled the minister to pass that Order in Council. If he is entirely without authority, it would be better to come here with a clause in this Bill enabling the Government to pass this title to the people who have a right to get it than to tell us that there is an Order in Council to confirm something that we know nothing about. I suppose this is all right. At the same time the minister must not presume too much upon our confidence in him, and in the Government, in seeking to pass legislation without giving the proper information.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If my hon. friend's doctrine is thoroughly sound an Order in Council is without value unless rooted, and very clearly rooted, in the authority of a statute. I hope the hon. gentleman will continue to preach that doctrine to his followers from all parts of the country. But what I said was this: That an Order might rest upon one statute, or, indeed, might rest upon two, and if, to make the Order, in the body of it two statutes are invoked, then if either one is found to authorize it the Order stands; that is all I said. Consequently, those entrusted with the responsibility of drafting recommendations and Orders in Council usually adopt the practice of invoking any authority that may be of assistance to support the Order intended. Therefore, it is possible that more than one statute was invoked in this case. The material before me, however, does not indicate that the War Measures Act was used, but would rather denote that it was passed under the regulatory power of the Forest Reserves and Parks Act. The War Measures Act might have been used; if it were I fancy it would be held to be a valid statute. But anyway the question does not arise now because the question before Parliament is, should these rights be granted, and should they be granted in a future case of a like character, because this legislation will confirm in any event?

Mr. VIEN: The minister told us that the Order in Council had not been passed under the Dominion Forest Reserves and Parks Act.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think so.

Mr. VIEN: I understood him to say so a minute ago. If the minister now corrects me on that point I am ready to accept his correction.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the hon. gentleman is wrong.

Mr. VIEN: I asked the minister whether the Dominion Forest Reserves and Parks Act gave the Government authority to pass the Order in Council of which we are now speaking. He answered me in the negative, and that is why, it seems, legislation is now required.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Forest Reserves and Parks Act does not provide at all for the class of cases—this is what I have in mind and maybe the hon. gentleman misunderstood me—covered by this section. That is a class of cases that have arisen since the passing of the Act, viz: It has been discovered that there are certain other rights acquired before the passing of the Act which were not known to exist. The Bill does not exempt them from the provisions of the Bill providing for the creation of a park, but it is quite possible that the power of regulation comprised in the measure would enable the Governor in Council to do so. I do not say that it does not—it is quite possible it does—but whether it does or does not this legislation confirms what was done. And Parliament should consider is this: Is it proper that men who, prior to the establishment of the park, had acquired certain definite rights, should have those rights now confirmed? I do not know whether there are any other cases than the three already dealt with, but there may be others, and in my humble judgment, there is no question about the propriety of confirming the rights in those cases. It seems to me that it would be simply legislating rights away to refuse to do so.

Mr. VIEN: I quite agree, if the facts are as stated, that the owners of the mineral rights in these claims should receive back those rights. But outside of that question of fact there is a question of principle of which the leader of the Opposition was speaking a minute ago, and that is the question of the Government passing an Order in Council with no legal authority to do so, except that embodied in the War Measures Act. It is customary for the Government, when it passes an Order in Council, to recite in that Order the legislation on which it is based. Has the minister the Order in Council in this case before him?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No. I have a memorandum with respect to it, but it is not definite in its terms.

Mr. VIEN: The minister has not the Order in Council before him? Then it might be enlightening to read that Order in Council in order to determine on what authority it is based. If there is no statutory authority outside of the War Measures Act to justify such an Order in Council I think it is proper for hon. gentlemen on this side to bring to the attention of the Government the fact that it should not pass an Order in Council before having the necessary legislation. The remedy which was sought by the passing of Order in Council No. 2156, could easily have waited until the Government had submitted the necessary legislation to Parliament. I think it is a sound principle of British government to say that instead of passing an Order in Council without authority under the law, the Government should apply to Parliament for that authority. The Order in Council in this case is not valid, if it is not based on statutory authority, until it is ratified by Parliament. It seems to me that instead of passing an Order in Council, without any authority for so doing, it would be a more logical policy for the Government to come to the House and ask for an enactment that would provide the necessary remedy. In that way they would avoid having recourse to an illegal Order in Council. Surely, those who consented to the War Measures Act never thought that it would be taken advantage of for the passing of such an Order in Council as the one we are now called upon to ratify.

Section as amended, agreed to.

On section 3—power given to expropriate lands for park purposes:

Mr. HAY: With respect to the expropriation of Indian lands. As I understand it, the Indians hold these lands at the present time by virtue of a treaty with the Government, and under the present Bill the minister is taking the right to expropriate Indian lands for park purposes, or other purposes if necessary. I would like to ask if the Government has a right to do that without the consent of the Indians?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There could be no question, I think, as to the right of Parliament to do that generally speaking. As to the expediency of such a course, I should give an opinion in the negative. That is to say, Parliament would be very careful indeed not to adopt any general policy of expropriation as to Indian reserves. Under the present law it is necessary to establish expropriatory powers for Indian reserves. For railroad or public works purposes, or even for roads, that power exists to-day; the only question that arises is, should the power be extended to cover the case of necessary additions to parks? There is a case in point at the present time: An island in the St. Lawrence near the town of Morrisburg in which a certain Indian tribe acquired rights about a hundred years ago. My information may be wrong and I hope the hon. member for Dundas (Mr. Casselman) is present, but I understand that no one has been living on that island for years; it has been used by some company, although I do not wish to speak with too great certainty. However, it is very desirable in the public interest that it be acquired for park purposes. I think I am safe in saying that any title the Indians may have is rather cloudy, but whatever interest they may have they will be amply compensated for and there will be no loss to the tribe. There is a very strong desire on the part of the Parks Branch and on the part of the public most nearly concerned that this island be acquired and made a bird sanctuary and park. That is most clearly the purpose it should be used for, but unless the amendment is made wide enough to cover it no action can be taken to that end.

I wish to assure the hon. member and the House generally that in my judgment

Parliament should be very cautious, indeed, in passing expropriatory legislation applicable to Indian Reserves. I have had occasion to give some thought to the question in relation to another measure, and where the expropriation is for merely general purposes—farming and the like—I question very much whether Parliament should pass such legislation; but inasmuch as this is not of a general character, and cannot be said to be an invasion of Indian Reserves in any substantial sense at all, I do not think we should hesitate to enact the legislation.

Mr. CANNON: How many Dominion parks are there now?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not prepared to say how many there are. There are a considerable number in the various provinces, and there is an intention to increase the number. The value to the country of these parks is becoming more and more obvious as years go by. The amount of money left in the country because of their existence runs now into millions of dollars annually.

Mr. VIEN: The Government is now asking for power to expropriate. Has the Government any definite policy as to the lands that it will expropriate in the near future?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The only case touching Indian lands is this island. It is a small island in the St. Lawrence—I do not know just the size of it. That is the only case we have in mind at the present time.

Mr. VIEN: Would it not be better for the Government to specify the land and to come before Parliament each time it wants to expropriate? The matter is never of such an urgent character that we could not wait until the next session of Parliament before such power is granted, and then the House and the country at large would have an opportunity to give their reasons why such expropriation should not take place in the ordinary course.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Parliament will have that opportunity. If the power is right, that is a question of principle; but the particular appropriation would be decided when the Estimate for it is before the House. Even though this Bill pass, the question of expropriating this particular island will come up when the item for its expropriation is before the Committee in the Estimates. Therefore each individual case must necessarily come before Parliament.

Mr. VIEN: I submit that the remedy would be insufficient. We give the minister, by this section, the right to expropriate. As soon as he takes the land it will come under the Expropriation Act. What are the provisions of the Expropriation Act? As soon as the Government has deposited a plan of the land it is desired to expropriate, the title becomes vested in the Crown. It is not a question of payment; that question comes up later on. It is true that when the time shall have come to pay for such expropriation the minister will introduce his Estimates and will ask for the necessary amount; but the expropriation will have taken place in virtue of the present section. I do not believe that the Committee should agree to give the Government the power to expropriate right and left any land that it may desire for the purpose of Dominion parks, particularly Indian reserves and the Crown lands of the various provinces. This section gives expropriatory powers over lands in the possession of His Majesty in the right of the provinces. I do not think that such wide jurisdiction should be given to the Government, but rather that it should submit at every session its programme for park development. Hon. members will then have an opportunity to state their objections against such a policy, and I hope that on many occasions they will be able to convince the Government of the inadvisability of many of these expropriations. For my part I would strike that clause out.

Mr. CANNON: For what purpose are those Dominion parks established?

Mr. MEIGHEN: For Dominion parks.

Mr. CANNON: What is the purpose of a Dominion park?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not know that any words could do other than obscure the very plain meaning of the term "Dominion parks."

Mr. CANNON: We have a Dominion Park in Montreal, for instance; that is for amusement purposes. I suppose the minister is not establishing parks for amusement purposes?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I really think the hon. member understands what a park is for as well as I do. I hope he does not question me as if I were the father of something that is improper. These Dominion parks were established many years ago, virtually all that are established now, under a Government to which the hon. member was not at all unfriendly. But our Dominion parks are for the purpose of instruction, amusement and recreation, for the purpose of attracting tourists, for sightseeing, and all such purposes. For example, we have one park where there are now between three and four thousand buffalo—the only herd of wild buffalo in the world. I do not know that one could say that it is purely an amusement to watch our wild buffalo; it is instructive and highly interesting.

Mr. CANNON: It is also dangerous.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then we have our Rocky Mountain parks where tourists gather. A golf course has been established and is being very much improved. A vast amount of money is being collected from those best able to pay it. With reference to what the hon. member has said, every expropriation is just on the same footing as this. For instance, under our Expropriation Act now, for any building we wish to erect, we can expropriate, but no one would ever suggest that we must come to Parliament and have a Bill passed enabling us to expropriate each lot that we may want in each town in Canada. No one knows better than the hon. member how much time is taken in getting Bills through Parliament and how much time is wasted. I do not think Parliament would ever get through its work if for every piece of land the Government wanted, it had to come to Parliament with a Bill. We take the general power and then each case must be passed upon by Parliament in the Estimates. That has been the practice for decades, and there is no variation here.

Mr. PARENT: Are there any such parks in Quebec, or Nova Scotia, or New Brunswick?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think I am safe in saying that there are Dominion parks in all of the provinces named. I cannot say that I am familiar with each case. I know that at present we have in contemplation the establishment of a park at Annapolis Royal in Nova Scotia. I think that last session a Bill was brought down that had to do with the establishment of a bird sanctuary on the St. Lawrence in Quebec. That is of course, a park.

Mr. LEMIEUX: On Bonaventure Island.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The park at Annapolis Royal is a very small one; it is just a bit of historic ground near the town of Annapolis. If the minister is going into the park business, there are in Nova Scotia places where it would be of great advantage to have a public reservation of land for that purpose. These lands in western Nova Scotia and also in eastern Nova Scotia belong to the provincial Government. There is not very much timber on some of them, but there are lakes and streams and many beautiful spots are to be found. I do not see why Nova Scotia should not, as well as the Western Provinces, participate to some extent in this expenditure on parks. I could show my hon. friend a place in western Nova Scotia where a large block of land could be expropriated from the province at a very small price, for a Dominion park. In my constituency, there is a tract of 20,000 acres of hardwood, such as birch, maple and beech, not valuable as timber at all, but the whole area is dotted with lakes and streams and would be a magnificent place for recreation and fishing and for the preservation of game. I should like the minister to look into this matter. I am in favour of public parks. I think the reservations we have made at Banff and other places in Western Canada are an advantage to us all, and we are very proud of them. At the same time, I think Eastern Canada should, to some extent, participate in that expenditure, and as the minister has taken power to expropriate lands belonging to the provinces, it would be quite possible to take this strip under this Bill.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member is quite right that it would be to the advantage, not only of Nova Scotia, but of the Dominion, if in his province any property more suitable for park purposes than any other were made a park. I just happened to mention Annapolis Royal because only this afternoon the subject was brought to my attention. This, however, must be kept in mind, that while the establishment of parks has gone on with to a considerable degree in the West, that is attributable chiefly to the fact that the Dominion owned these lands in the West and did not need to acquire them. Consequently, the cost of establishment of parks was not so great. My province of Manitoba, although we owned the lands, has no Dominion parks, nor, I believe, has Saskatchewan. Alberta has, and quite a large area of that province is set aside, and very properly so, for Dominion parks. British Columbia, which owns its resources, has acquired property for a park on Vancouver island, and a provincial Government which owns its own resources could give great assistance to the establishment of parks by making provision for the land. I do not attach very great importance to the clause giving us power to expropriate provincial Crown lands. I presume it is intended for small pieces of land perhaps essential as an addition to a present park. Certainly, I would hesitate before utilizing this power as applied to provincial Crown lands.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Might I suggest to the minister that this clause appears more drastic than it is in reality after the explanation given by him? As regards bird sanctuaries, I have a personal knowledge of what took place during last year regarding legislation on that subject which was brought down at a former session. In that case, the Dominion Government sent one of the officers of the Department of the Interior, Mr. Hewitt, to Quebec, and by making arrangements with the Department of Crown Lands, he obtained, without any expropriation taking place, the control of Bird Rock and part of Bonaventure Island and also Perce Rock, as bird sanctuaries. If the minister leaves in the Bill this expropriatory power he may create the impression that he may really expropriate what belongs to a province, when it is a matter of arrangement between this Government and the provincial Government. The minister should, therefore, find other phraseology which would cover the point. I understand that, as regards the Indians, the Government proceeds by way of expropriation, and in that case the Government is proceeding against its own wards, but with the provinces the matter is different. I am not referring to the western provinces, where the lands belong to the Dominion, but to the provinces where the lands belong to the provinces, as with the Crown lands in Quebec, Ontario, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick.

Mr. CANNON: The Federal Government has no right to expropriate provincial property. In the British North America Act property belonging to the Federal Government is enumerated, and property belonging to the provincial governments is enumerated. His Majesty, as representing the provinces, owns what is enumerated in that list. and I do not think the Federal Government could take expropriation proceedings against the provinces. I think the minister will admit that the Federal Government, in the name of His Majesty, certainly could not take proceedings against His Majesty as represented by a provincial Government. The minister said he did not want to be suspected of any evil designs or of being the father of a very bad scheme. Personally I have never suspected him of anything of that kind, for he is above suspicion, and always has been. He has never given the Opposition any reason to suspect him. This Bill is very important in a way. In the province of Quebec, for instance, parks have already been established by the Provincial Government; there is the park in the county of Charlevoix. Suppose that under this section the Federal Government decided to establish a national park where this provincial park now is, would the minister claim that this section gave him the right to expropriate? It would lead at once to a clash between the Federal and Provincial Governments. I have noticed a general tendency in all legislation brought down by the minister to infringe upon provincial rights, and this certainly would be such an infringement. I submit, this section is absolutely unconstitutional, because it gives the Federal Government the right to expropriate the property of the provinces.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I would not like to subscribe to the hon. gentleman's law. It seems to me that expropriatory power now exists with regard to provincial lands, with relation to a railway, for instance. But as a matter of general principle, not of law, but of practice, I am in accord with the hon. member. My attention had not been specially drawn to these words in the Bill previously. I rather apprehend that the province of Ontario may also have some interest in the island in the St. Lawrence to which I referred, that interest being mixed with or added to the interest of the Indians, and it is likely that that was in the mind of the draftsman of the Bill. I would not like to exercise the power of expropriation so far as the interests of the province are concerned, but I do not think it could be said to be interfering with provincial rights to the alarming extent the hon. member would have us believe; for you may depend upon it that any province in the Dominion would be very glad for us to expropriate lands in the province for the purpose of a Dominion park. At the same time, I do not think we are going to suffer by leaving out the clause providing for the expropriation of provincial lands, and I therefore move in amendment:

That the words "whether it be that of His Majesty in the right of any province, or of the Indians" be deleted and the words "including the lands of Indians" be substituted therefor.

Then, if we cannot make an arrangement with the province there will be no park.

Mr. LEMIEUX: You can always make an arrangement with a province in a matter of public interest. The minister has referred to an island that is in dispute as between the Indian reserve and the province.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Indians have some right in it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: We have a similar case in the province of Quebec. There is a small island in front of the Caughnawaga reserve which is claimed by the Indians as part of the reserve, and which is claimed also by the provincial Government. There has been quite a dispute over it, and I am not quite sure but that a judgment concerning it was given recently.

On motion of Hon. Arthur Meighen (Acting Minister of Justice) Bill No. 78, to amend the Criminal Code (Sexual offences) was read the third time and passed.

MIGRATORY BIRDS CONVENTION ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. Arthur Meighen (Minister of the Interior) Bill No. 88 (from the Senate), to amend the Migratory Birds Convention Act, was read the third time and passed.

IMMIGRATION ACT AMENDMENT.

On the motion of Hon. J. A. Calder (Minister of Immigration and Colonization) Bill No. 52, to amend the Immigration Act, was read the third time and passed.

JUDGES' ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. Arthur Meighen (Acting Minister of Justice), the House went into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to amend the Judges' Act to provide for the salary of an additional judge of the County Courts of British Columbia at $3,000 per annum.

Mr. STEVENS: I would like to bring to the attention of the minister and the Government the altogether inadequate salaries paid to judges not only of the County Court but also of the Supreme Court of British Columbia. Speaking at present particularly in reference to the County Court judges, this is a matter that has been brought to the attention of the Minister of Justice on many occasions, and we have frequently had promises of consideration and expressions of much sympathy, but very little action. I should be pleased to have an expression of opinion from the Acting Minister of Justice on the subject, and also a statement as to the possibility before the conclusion of the session of an increase in salary of the County Court judges. The County Court judges in the city of Vancouver sit constantly and do considerable work, and I remember having given to the Minister of Justice a statement showing that 365 cases were being handled by two judges in the course of a Fall session. That is an exceptionally heavy list, including some highly important cases, the money involved in some cases amounting to a good many thousand dollars and much higher than in cases tried in some of the other courts in Canada. A salary of $3,000 is not sufficient for a County Court judge, and I would like the minister to give us some idea as to the intention of the Government in this regard.

Mr. McISAAC: I wish to say a word on this point with regard to the judges of Prince Edward Island. The Supreme Court judges there are receiving $300 a year less than similar judges in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. The duties of a judge in Prince Edward Island are just as important and require just as much intelligence, application, and every other qualification demanded of like judges in the other provinces. In Prince Edward Island there are only three judges while in the other provinces there is a much larger number, and because there are fewer judges in the Island they have just as much work and probably more. At the same time there exists this anomaly, that the County Court judges are receiving the same amount of salary in Prince Edward Island as those in New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and other provinces. Why should the Supreme Court judges be penalized? I just wish to bring this matter to the attention of the minister as perhaps he might consider an increase in the salaries of these judges.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: The hon. member (Mr. Stevens) spoke of 365 cases. That is an exception and might not occur again in several years. The question is, what is the average? As regards the proposal to increase these judges salaries, I understand the judges pay no income tax. Surely a judge receiving $5,000 to $7,000 should have sufficient interest in the State to pay an income tax.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member for centre Vancouver (Mr. Stevens), supported by the hon. member for Kings, P.E.I., (Mr. McIsaac) urges the wisdom of increasing the salaries of County Court judges. The necessity of an increase of salary to County Court judges has been impressed upon the Government ever since I assumed the office of Acting Minister of Justice, and doubtless some time before that event, which is now six months old. The question is not confined to County Court judges. If there is any class of judges in Canada for whose cause there are not ardent advocates for an increase of salary, I have yet to learn what bench it is. Every bench in the Dominion, I think, has had its case advanced and urged, deputation after deputation having waited upon myself and other ministers, and the subject generally has been canvassed most thoroughly in recent months. There are several features of the problem that might be brought to the attention of the Committee. In the case of County Court judges the income now received for their duties is not uniform by any means. The senior judge is entitled to certain emoluments and the junior judge also in a somewhat lesser scale. So that while $3,000 is the nominal salary, there are cases where even that salary is increased, those cases being chiefly in large cities.

Mr. STEVENS: I do not think that applies to the County Court of British Columbia. That is the peculiar position they are in.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are cases where that is not the nominal salary, but in nearly all cases, I think in all, the emolument is raised above the nominal salary by Surrogate Court and other fees.

Mr. STEVENS: Not in Vancouver.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think it is. That is worth inquiry on the part of the hon. member. Perhaps I am wrong. But generally, if not universally speaking, it is, and the total emolument is brought to something within the range of $4,000, and in some cases even somewhat beyond that. When I considered the question this fact presented itself to my mind, that by reason of the system which the British North America Act laid down—constitution of the office by the province, and appointment and salary made and paid by the Dominion—there had grown up a condition by which there were far too many judges, particularly of our county courts and district courts. I addressed a communication to the Attorneys General of the several provinces, intimating that such was the case and asking that they give attention to the question of so rearranging the judiciary as to provide for an ultimate reduction of the number of County Court judges. The province of Ontario has responded, and I believe a statute is now in force by which the junior judges will be almost entirely done away with upon retirement or death of the present holders of those offices.

Other provinces have now under consideration—whether it will be favourable or not I cannot say—something along the same line. I am in hopes that the process will become more and more all Canadian before it ceases, because, if it becomes general enough, the problem of judicial salaries will be more easily solved. As a consequence of my convicion that there were too many judges, particularly on that bench, I have not felt it my duty as acting minister to recommend the filling of certain vacancies that now exist. Furthermore, coming to the other bench, the King's Bench, as it is usually called, the Supreme and superior courts in other provinces, a condition of affairs obtains that has caused considerable irritation. In the Maritime and Western Provinces the salaries of judges in these courts are something less than they are in Ontario and Quebec. That condition is accentuated in the province of Prince Edward Island. Whether or not there was originally justification for that discrimination may be open to question. It would appear to be arguable that there was. But, at all events, the reason for that discrimination has, in my opinion, become progressively less as these other provinces have developed and as the litigation that comes before the judges of these provinces has become more and more technical, more considerable in amount and more varied as to the questions of law presented. That is a matter that hon. members will have to keep in mind in discussing the problem. It appeared to me to be my duty to collect all the facts available, to put them into presentable, terse and tangible form, and to leave the problem in general for the consideration of the minister of the department (Mr. Doherty) upon his return. It has not been known until now—it is not known now—when that return will be possible, but there is no reason to fear that it will be so long deferred as to put it out of his power to deal with this question favourably or unfavourably this session. If his opinion on his return is that he cannot deal with the question this session, as he may be advised, then I do not think I should enter upon its consideration in a practical way because it seems to me to be one that eminently is for the consideration of the minister himself. Should it transpire that he will not be able to return for the subsequent portion of this session, then it will be for the Government to decide whether or not the problem should be dealt with on the recommendation of the acting minister.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: Do not the county judges, in addition to their salaries, earn considerable emoluments from commissions and special investigations which would in themselves average a pretty good salary?

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is what I referred to in my remarks. I do not think much is made out of commissions or investigations. The extra amount which I referred to was that which they actually received from Surrogate Court fees. The hon. member for Centre Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) says that that does not apply in his province. He may be correct but, generally speaking, it does apply.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: Do they not act as commissioners, or conduct special investigations, and do they not earn something in that way?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There have been Superior and county court judges, I suppose, who have acted in that way, but the earnings of a single judge from that source would not do very much for the other men who had not been favoured with these investigations.

Mr. ARGUE: Will this resolution apply to the appointment of judges in Saskatchewan? There are several vacancies, and some of them should be filled.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No, this resolution refers only to the province of British Columbia and follows the provincial enactment which constitutes the judicial district of Nanaimo. It appears that the extent of territory there is such that it cannot be attended to by one judge, particularly in view of the very great increase in population and the development of coal mining in the northern part of the district. This resolution does not refer to Saskatchwan. Letters were addressed to the various provinces asking them to consider the question of reduction. I am in hopes that these letters will still be fruitful in the case of Saskatchewan to enable the present judges appointed to be so distributed as to take care of the vacancies to which the hon. member refers.

Mr. TWEEDIE: I would like to call the attention of the Acting Minister of Justice to the discrepancy between the salaries paid to Superior Court judges in the western provinces and those paid in the East. Whatever ground there may have been for that distinction when it was created I cannot see that there is any reason for it now. The western provinces are provinces. The standard of the legal profession in the West will compare very favourably with that of the other provinces. It seems to me that the questions involved in litigation are just as important in the West as they are elsewhere. It is not altogether a question of the amount of time that the judges devote to the performance of their duties in the various provinces. Once these men are appointed they cannot or should not engage in any other business. They are absolutely deprived of the right of practising their profession. In short, the whole of their time must be devoted to carrying on the business of their positions as justices of the Superior court. On behalf of the western bench, I submit that this difference in salary which has existed for some time should be straightened out at once and that all the judges of the superior court throughout the Dominion of Canada, irrespective of province, should be placed upon the same footing. I would like very much if the acting minister would take this matter into his earnest and careful consideration this session and see if he cannot remedy that discrimination and put all these judges on an equal footing. I am sure that all the members of this House would be very glad to have the acting minister review the situation in regard to judges' salaries throughout Canada.

Mr. McKENZIE: I wish once more to bring to the notice of the acting minister what we have been advocating here for a number of years. I remember in the old days of the Laurier Government we used to talk about this subject just as much as we do now, and we used to advocate an increase, particularly in the salaries of the county court judges. Within the last few years we have often brought this matter to the attention of the present Minister of Justice.

I can readily understand that the Acting Minister of Justice would hesitate before starting a new policy as to the increase of salaries; but I think the minister himself (Mr. Doherty) was several times inclined seriously to the advancement of the salaries of the County Court judges, and I think last year he was very much disposed to augment those salaries. The reason now given by the acting minister for not adopting such a course is that there is a tendency to a re-organization of the districts and of the courts, and to have a smaller number of judges. That re-organization may come about, but it may be a very slow process, and it may result in great hardship to those judges who have been struggling along for a great many years on small salaries. The high cost of living affects a judge just as much as anybody else. Civil servants have been granted an increase, those engaged in the ordinary industries of the country are getting their salaries raised; nearly everybody in fact has had his stipend raised. Ordinarily speaking, men can engage in other branches of work in order to add to their salaries; but under our laws the judge is told that he cannot and must not engage in any other pursuit. He is not even allowed to be a director of a board where he can be paid $20 a month, or something of that kind; he is not allowed to engage in anything except the administration of the law. That is as it should be, but when we cut off every other source of supply to a man and demand his entire attention and the whole of his powers in the administration of the law, the responsibility devolves upon us of giving him a sufficient salary, we should see to it that he is placed beyond necessity and beyond poverty. Now we have not added a cent to the salary of the judge, although the purchasing power of a dollar has been cut in two. It is therefore a matter of serious consideration for the Government, and particularly for the Minister of Justice, to see that these judges are properly provided for. I need not tell the Acting Minister of Justice, or the Committee, what a serious and important thing it is that our judges should be put beyond covetousness, or the temptation of looking for money elsewhere. We can say the same thing for our judges in every part of Canada that we can say about our own judges in Nova Scotia, that not a shadow of impropriety has crept in in connection with the administration of justice. We have always been proud of our judges in Nova Scotia, who are absolutely beyond suspicion, and I am sure the same thing is true of the judges of every other province. We should provide for the continuance of that condition as far as we can, by giving a proper salary. Would it not be possible for the Department of Justice for the present to relieve the situation by adding to the salaries of these judges, and then, under any policy of re-construction those Judges who are superfluous might go out, such arrangements being made for them as might meet the necessities of the case? If we wait for re-organization too long a period may elapse before a remedy is provided, and a great deal of unnecessary hardship may have been suffered by these gentlemen. I trust that the department—when the minister returns to this country, or even before that— will be able to meet the need in these very important cases.

As regards my own province it contains eighteen counties and there are only seven county court judges, so that I do not think there would be very much chance for reducing the number of judges in Nova Scotia. There may be, but I think all the judges are pretty well employed. The county court judge in my own locality, that is district No. 7, is a very busy man, working continuously and without any let-up at all. Every day there is some case being tried before him, and yet he only receives the very meagre salary of $3,000. He is obliged to live in the city of Sydney, where living is just as expensive as in Toronto, Montreal, or any of the large centres, and hon. gentlemen can readily understand how difficult it is for a man to live in a city where everything is dear on a salary of $3,000, and yet be obliged to live in the style, and with the surroundings for himself and his family that a judge must maintain in order to do credit to the position which he occupies. I do not know very much about the conditions in other provinces, but as to the Nova Scotia judges supplementing their earnings from any other source, that is not possible; they get nothing out of probate business, and no other income besides their bare salaries. The Acting Minister of Justice is aware that there is an agitation in respect of the Supreme Court judges as well as the County Court judges in Nova Scotia. We in Nova Scotia pride ourselves on being a very old province, and one which has been noted for the very high status of the judges in our Supreme Court. They are men very highly versed in the science of the law, and we have a Bench to-day that is the equal, man for man, with any other set of judges in the country. I say that without the desire to cast the slightest reflection on any other court.

I am sorry to know that the judges of Nova Scotia are not paid the same salaries, for example, as the judges of Manitoba. Now we are a very much older province and of equal importance in every respect—not any more, but just as important—and I cannot very well see why a judge of the Supreme Court of Manitoba should be receiving a larger salary than a judge of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the judges in the Maritime Provinces and in the Western Provinces should receive the same salary.

Mr. McKENZIE: The Chief Justice of Manitoba receives $8,000 a year—

Mr. MEIGHEN: He is the Chief Justice of the Court of Appeal.

Mr. McKENZIE:—and the puisne judges receive $7,000 a year. Of course, there are two courts in Manitoba, whereas in Nova Scotia there is but one. That is to say our Supreme Court in Nova Scotia does the work which two courts do in Manitoba; we have only the one set of judges for the Court of Appeal and for the Circuit Court. In New Brunswick, and in the other provinces, there is a Circuit Court and a Court of Appeal; in Nova Scotia the judges do the Circuit Court work, and also constitute themselves a Court of Appeal. I think that is a reason why they should be paid a higher salary. The minister will see, if he compares Manitoba with Nova Scotia, that the population is about the same; I think ours is a little more; and if he will inquire into the amount of legal business, I think he will find that there is more of it in Nova Scotia. As to the expense of the administration of justice, the minister will find that if he makes inquiry that the same work is costing at least about thirty per cent more in Manitoba than it is costing in Nova Scotia. I think our judges should be put upon the same footing as the judges of the Superior Court of Quebec and the Superior Court of Ontario, and be paid the same salary. I know of no justification at all for the difference. The laws are about the same throughout the whole Dominion —certainly the criminal laws are exactly the same, and commercial law is about the same—and if the amount involved in the cases that come into court is to be taken into consideration the biggest case that was ever tried in Canada was heard in the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia. That was the famous lawsuit between the Dominion Steel Company and the Dominion Coal Company before they amalgamated. I do not know how many millions of money were involved in the suit, but it is the largest case that was ever tried in the Dominion. Large cases of that kind come up all the time and require the very best legal talent that we can produce in the province.

I think the minister will approve my statement that the province of Nova Scotia has produced some very excellent lawyers—in fact, this House will bear me out. Sir John Thompson, at one time Minister of Justice and Prime Minister, was one of our judges of whom we have good reason to be proud, and our present Prime Minister, who is a very excellent lawyer, is also a native of Nova Scotia. The judges of our Supreme Court are men of the highest possible eminence in their profession, and I do not think they should look upon themselves as being inferior to other judges serving the same Government and doing similar work in the other provinces. There is no other way of looking at it—the clear implication is that the Government thinks they are not deserving of the same salary, otherwise they would receive it. I am not aware if the minister has any scheme in view for dealing with the salaries of Supreme Court judges throughout the country as well as with those of the County Court judges, but I think he should hasten to see that there is no disparity in their salaries and so remove any ground for complaint in that regard. I am sure that as long as our people find the administration of justice as pure and capable as it is now they will not begrudge the payment of proper salaries to their Supreme Court judges.

Mr. STEVENS: I would like to correct a mistaken impression of the Acting Minister of Justice. The County Court judges of British Columbia—in fact, all the judges—receive no Surrogate Court fees. Their position is not only unfair in comparison with the salaries paid to judges in other provinces, but the difference is accentuated, and I desire to impress it as strongly as possible upon the attention of the minister. I would also remind him of the fact that the benchers of the Law Society of British Columbia recently filed a very strong indorsement of the suggested increase of salary, and I hope the matter will not be left over another session, even if the Minister of Justice should not return during this session.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Committee should not get the impression that because the judges in certain provinces do not get surrogate court fees there is on that account discrimination against them; that is far from the case. The Dominion fees are the same everywhere. But if the province of Ontario decides, for example, that instead of having other officials appointed at salary to do surrogate court work they will appoint a Supreme Court judge to do it and pay him a thousand dollars a year, that adds that much to his salary; if British Columbia, as against that decides to appoint separate officials, that is British Columbia's own affair.

Mr. STEVENS: That is scarcely a good argument. For this reason: The Dominion pays the Supreme Court judges for services rendered; the time of those judges is fully occupied in their court work and they have no time for outside work now, if one of those judges gives a portion of his time to the province in return for a salary provided by the province, and the rest of his time to the Dominion, the minister cannot argue that the other judges have only themselves to blame if they do not receive additional pay. Their time is fully occupied in court work—more than occupied in many cases. But in Ontario and some of the other provinces the Supreme Court judges give a portion of their time to other duties.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Surrogate court work is court work just the same as any other similar work is court work. No case has been brought to my attention where the Dominion has refused to appoint sufficient judges to take care of the work. It is the province's own affair if it gives to other people work that is properly judges' work; and that province cannot be heard then to complain that its judges are not treated fairly by the Dominion because we do not give more salary to them, for the same salary is paid to all Supreme Court judges.

Mr. STEVENS: My hon. friend still argues that they get surrogate court fees, we must not run away with the idea that they are getting more than $3,000. I say that our British Columbia judges get $3,000 and no more, and that that salary is inadequate.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That may be, but that is entirely aside from the point of discrimination. There is no discrimination whatsoever; we pay all our Supreme Court judges the same salary.

Mr. STEVENS: It is not discrimination if the Dominion gives them a good salary.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is another ground altogether. We pay them all the same salary. If the province does not add to their salaries for additional court work, but appoints other persons for the purpose, then that province cannot be heard to complain against the Dominion that we discriminate against its judges. There is no ground for any allegation of discrimination. I am not saying that there is no ground for an allegation of inadequate salary.

Mr. VIEN: Does the minister think it sound policy to allow Federal judges to discharge other duties than those the law has fixed for them, such as surrogate work on account of the province? It seems to me that the judges appointed by the Federal Government should be limited in their functions as described by the statute, and should not be allowed to exercise any other functions and receive therefor emoluments from the provinces. As a policy it seems to me it should commend itself to the minister.

Mr. MEIGHEN: A judge is appointed to do such work, necessarily of a legal or judicial character, as may be assigned to him by the Dominion or by the province. If the province assigns to him certain work, it is his duty under the Act to perform it. To say that he should not do anything except what the Dominion gives him to do—I scarcely understand those terms.

Mr. VIEN: I will explain them. Jurisdiction in the organization of the various tribunals is vested in the local legislatures. When the organization of a tribunal is effected by a provincial Act, the Federal Government appoints the judges. We fix the salary and we pay it. We should pay judges such salaries as will make them independent of any other influence and allow them to live without having to exercise any other functions for which they would receive pay from the provinces.

Mr. PROULX: My hon. friend is not familiar with the practice in Ontario. In Ontario, the judges are well qualified to deal with Surrogate Court work, and in most counties the fees would not be large enough to warrant the appointment of a separate judge for that particular work. As the Acting Minister of Justice said, Ontario amended the County Court Judges' Act last year, and in future County Court judges will receive $1,000 from the province as compensation for their services in doing Surrogate Court work and work under other statutes. There are certain large counties, such as York, Carleton and Wentworth, in which the judges will receive more than $1,000. I am not familiar with the position of County Court judges in other provinces, but in Ontario, after the junior judges are done away with, County Court judges will receive from the province at least $1,000, which will increase their salary by so much.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Making $4,000 all together.

Mr. ARGUE: If the minister finds it impossible to make an arrangement with the Saskatchewan Government to redistribute the judges to cover the vacancies, will he recommend the appointment of judges for those vacancies? There are, in the southwestern part of the province, two new districts, and Cypress, which is the seat of a district a hundred miles square, has only two terms of the court per annum. People are compelled to come into the town and stay for weeks waiting for trials, and on the other hand Judge Smith, who goes over from Swift Current, has more than ninety miles to travel by auto, and if the roads are bad in the winter, he has to travel 270 miles to get around by train. Therefore, I do not think the Government are saving any money and these people are being greatly inconvenienced by not having a resident judge in that district.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It would be useless on my part to make a promise, because it is probable I shall not be acting in this capacity at the time for its fulfilment. I am not sure, at all events, whether Saskatchewan will be able to make the redistribution which has been suggested to me, although I have some reason to hope it will. But if it should not, there is an alternative. A subjudicial district might be named which would give the district affected, if in an outlying part, such an organization, with perhaps only one officer, as would enable it to secure a more prompt and less expensive service of process and so on. That has been suggested as likely to take place in at least one province, thereby overcoming much of the difficulty. If that should be done in Saskatchewan, the hon. member's point will be met, but if no other way—and this Government is not by any means sole dictator of the situation—is opened up by the province whereby this can be taken care of without appointing new judges, and if a district needs a judge, certainly a recommendation will be made. I understand there is very considerable inconvenience now which might be avoided by a better redistribution of the judges by the creation of a subjudicial district, but if that is not done, then it seems that a recommendation will have to be made.

Mr. McKENZIE: Have the districts to which the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Argue) refers been created by the local legislature?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: This year?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There have been two vacancies for a year or two which we have not filled because we felt there were sufficient judges.

Mr. PROULX: Has a new district been created in British Columbia?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The district is created already by the province.

Mr. MOWAT: I am glad to hear the Acting Minister of Justice say that one province at least has responded to his suggestion that there should be co-ordination with a view of getting more efficiency in judicial work, and I am glad that province is Ontario, of the Bar of which I am a member. I think I can say on behalf of the members of the Bar that they entirely approve of the new Act of the Ontario Legislature by which junior judges are to be absorbed as vacancies occur. As the case stands now, the two judges in a county, senior and junior, get $6,000, and it would be far better if the senior judge were paid $5,000 so as to give him a decent income rather than that the work should be divided as it is now, because in many counties, we all know, there is not enough work to keep one man, who is industrious and has any system, thoroughly busy, much less is there sufficient for two judges to do. When the minister is considering the whole question, I would ask him to make a further suggestion that districts should be made for the smaller counties so that one judge could attend to one or two, or perhaps three counties. I know of three counties which one judge could very well attend to, and he could be given a large proportion of the remuneration of the three judges who are now supposed to do that work. It is essential, if the laws are to be well administered, that judges have the respect of the people, and they should be paid adequate salaries, or else the best members of the Bar will not be willing to accept such positions. The County Court judges have very important work to do. In Ontario, a County Court judge, on account of increased jurisdiction given him by the province, can deal with many cases which formerly took up the time of a Supreme Court judge travelling at assizes. Even with all this extra work, many of them would be better off and happier if they had more work to do, but they should be paid far more than they receive at present, and I hope an ascending scale will be adopted so that these judges will not feel the high cost of living as acutely as they do now. They cannot keep up their position with the merchants and wealthy men of the towns in which they live, and that should not be the case. The idea of judicial remuneration is that a judge should not be thought to be inferior to the best class of citizens in the town in which he is. That is impossible at present with a judge getting only $3,000 a year, even if he gets something more for surrogate court work. The surrogate judge is not appointed by the Dominion but by the province, and the whole judicial work is distributed by the province. Therefore, the Dominion, apart from its good offices here, in asking for co-ordination, has nothing to do with the particular work of a judge, because, according to the British North America Act, all the Dominion Government has to deal with in this regard is the appointment of the judge; the rest is left to the province. I am glad Ontario is leading as regards the work of co-ordination and the saving of judicial effort, and I hope the other provinces will follow suit.

Mr. TWEEDIE: I agree that these judges are underpaid and that they should receive a substantial increase in salary, but under this resolution I do not see that we can get very much relief for them. I should like to inquire whether, in the event of legislation being introduced in regard to the judges of the superior, county, and district courts, an increase in their salaries will be one of the matters taken into consideration.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes, it certainly will be.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I should like to say a word for the judges of the rural districts of the province of Quebec, who occupy a similar position to that of the county court judges in the province of Ontario, except that they have a little higher salary. A rural district judge in the province of Quebec receives $5,000 a year. Under the new system which has been adopted, these judges are called to Montreal, Quebec, Three Rivers, and even Sherbrooke, to help in the administration of justice in those congested districts, and I do not see why they should not be put on a footing of equality with the judges of the superior court of Montreal and Quebec. These judges are certainly handicapped by the high cost of living. I am glad to hear that the acting minister has considered the whole question and that it will be dealt with on the return of the minister (Mr. Doherty) from Europe. The hon. member for Parkdale (Mr. Mowat) has spoken of the legislation recently adopted by the Ontario Legislature. He might have added that many years ago, under the Mowat government, I think, the Ontario government finding the salaries of the judges of the higher courts in Ontario to be inadequate, supplemented their salaries by a yearly vote of $1,000. This vote is still taken yearly, so that a superior court judge in the province of Ontario receives $1,000 more than he would receive in the province of Quebec. This shows that the people of Ontario have been more liberal to the judiciary than other provinces, and it seems to me the Dominion Government should do what this one province has done. This additional $1,000 was granted under the pretext—because it was only a pretext—that in addition to their official functions they had to administer the Controverted Elections Act. The real reason was that the salaries of the judges were inadequate. I have not seen the memorandum addressed to the Acting Minister of Justice by the judiciary, but I know that it has been in circulation of late, and in view of the position the judges occupy in society, and having regard also to the independence of the judiciary, for my part I would look favourably upon a reasonable increase in their salaries.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. Meighen thereupon moved to introduce Bill No. 104, founded on the resolution.

Resolution agreed to and Bill read a first time.

INTERPRETATION ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Acting Minister of Justice) moved the second reading of Bill No. 81, to amend the Interpretation Act.

Mr. McKENZIE: Explain.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Since the Interpretation Act was passed the names of certain courts have been changed by the Provincial Legislatures, and this Bill merely changes the definition to correspond with the names now given to these courts.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the second time, considered in Committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY.

House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Civil Government—Royal Northwest Mounted Police—Salaries, including Deputy Minister and Comptroller at $6,000, and Assistant Comptroller and Accountant at $3,300—$26,625.

Mr. McKENZIE: This is an item dealing with salaries. There may not be an item before the House at any time that will go specifically to the point I wish to bring to the notice of the President of the Council, and I may mention the matter now. This is part of the Civil Service Estimates and these men, I suppose, are within the zone of the Civil Service. For that reason I do not think I transgress any rule in referring to another branch of the service in connection with this item. The question of a bonus to civil servants has been before the House once or twice this session, and I understand that the bonus was given by way of an increase in salary pending the legislation about which the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Maclean) spoke to-day. I suppose that that legislation of the Civil Service, will possibly end in an increase of salaries to at least the inside service, and I hope it will cover all servants, whether inside or outside as far as may be necessary. This bonus, as I am informed, was paid to keep matters in equilibrium until the general Act was passed, and if one person gets the benefit of it I submit that all in the service should get it. We have officers in this House working around the different parts of the building who must be here during the session. It is true that during a few months of the year they are not here, but they are men who have been in attendance here for several years, as long as twenty and twenty-five years, and who have become in every way adapted to this sort of work. They have no other employment and I submit that this bonus that was paid to other civil servants should also be paid to them. There are not very many of them and they should be fairly dealt with. I think the President of the Council should immediately take steps to ascertain who they are and what should fall to them, and gladden their hearts by giving them what they should receive. There should be no discrimination or distinction simply because these persons are sessional clerks or people who attend during the session. They are to all intents and purposes civil servants, who have been here for many years and who will, I suppose, be here for the rest of their natural lives.

Mr. ROWELL: The point raised by the hon. member hardly arises upon the estimate now before the committee.

Mr. McKENZIE: I admit that.

Mr. ROWELL: But out of respect to my hon. friend's suggestion I may say that the bonuses were granted under two limitations, one being that they applied only to those receiving salaries of $1,800 or less, because—and I am speaking now of the bonus given by Order in Council—it was felt that the high cost of living bore more severely on those receiving smaller salaries than on those who were in receipt of higher salaries. Another limitation was that it applied only to those continually in the service. I presume that is the point my hon. friend has in mind in referring to the sessional clerks, who are not paid on a basis of yearly allowance. I do not know whether they were in view when the form of Order in Council was determined upon. I shall bring my hon. friend's representation in this matter to the attention of my colleagues. It was considered that those who worked for the Government two or three months in the year but were not in Government employ longer should hardly be paid a bonus on the same basis as those in the Government employ the whole time. I may say that the whole matter, so far as the future is concerned, will come up for review when the re-classification of which the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke to-day, comes before the House for consideration.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am not bringing this matter up for the mere sake of talking about it. I want something done for these people, and hope the President of the Council will take it seriously into consideration and bring it before his colleagues. I trust that no mere lack of covering this point by Order in Council will stand in the way of doing justice to these people who are very excellent servants of the Government, because the Order in Council can be amended, or extended, or a new Order in Council passed. It would not take long to do it. My hon. friend has a very expert knowledge of how these things are done, and can just put his foot on the wheel at any time and grind one out in very short order. So that the lack of power to do it through want of legislation is no excuse for the President of the Council or the Government.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Mr. CANNON: There is an increase of fifteen hundred odd dollars. What does it consist of?

Mr. ROWELL: It consists of $1,000 additional amount payable to deputy minister and comptroller, just the same increase as is given to all other deputies. The other increases, I believe, are statutory increases.

Mr. McKENZIE: What relations, if any, exist between provincial governments and this Government in regard to the services of the Mounted Police? I understood there was to be a change by which in some provinces they were to come within the jurisdiction of the province, more especially since governments have been established in different parts of the West and the jurisdiction of ordinary civil and criminal administration of justice has come largely within the purview of the provinces. Are we keeping up the same staff or number of Mounted Police as in the old days, for instance, before 1906, when autonomy was granted to Saskatchewan and Alberta? It was thought then that we would not require as many mounted police after that as we had had before.

Mr. ROWELL: It is only right that the committee should have a statement showing the present position of the Mounted Police and their relation to the different provinces. I shall be glad to make such a statement after recess.

At six o'clock the Committee took recess.

After Recess.

The Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ROWELL: When the Committee rose at six o'clock I promised the leader of the Opposition that I would make a statement with reference to the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, and the relation of that Force to the Western Provinces. I had intended to speak on this particular aspect of the matter when we came to the next item, but probably it is just as well to give the information on this item relating to civil government, as any matter connected with the Force can properly be discussed under it.

As my hon. friend will recall, Parliament established the Force in 1873. Up to the creation of the Western Provinces the Mounted Police had exercised police jurisdiction in Western Canada, other than British Columbia, and had been the only police force performing general police duty in that western land. When the new provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan were formed, agreements were entered into between the Federal Government and these Provincial Governments under which the Royal Northwest Mounted Police continued to perform police duties within these provinces, the provinces paying a certain annual subvention to the Federal Government in return for such services. That situation continued without change, the agreement being renewed from time to time until the autumn of 1916, when, owing to the conditions which had developed through the war, it was considered desirable by the Federal Government that the Mounted Police should be relieved from further ordinary police duties in the provinces. I should have added that the Mounted Police were performing certain police duties in Manitoba also under an agreement with the Government of that province. In the fall of 1916, as I say, the Federal Government came to the conclusion that it was in the public interest that the Royal Northwest Mounted Police should be relieved of further duties under these agreements with the Provincial Governments so that they might be free to devote themselves wholly to their duties under the Dominion authorities. One of the main reasons which led to that conclusion was the situation which existed in the United States at that time, the country to the south not having entered the war and a great deal of unrest existing there. Certain investigations had been conducted by the American police which showed a good deal of pro-German activity in certain sections of the United States. We had a large alien population in Western Canada, and it was deemed necessary that the Mounted Police should be free to carefully patrol the international boundary and protect us against such pro-German activities; to supervise all matters connected with the administration of the law relating to aliens in Western Canada, and generally to exercise police supervision in those matters over which the Federal Government had jurisdiction throughout the western provinces. Therefore on the 29th of November, 1916, after a conference with each of the provincial governments, an understanding was arrived at, whereby the then existing agreements were terminated, and from that date the Royal Northwest Mounted Police have not been performing any police duties under any general agreement with the provincial governments. When the United States entered the war, the situation in reference to pro-German activities in the United States, and possible troubles in Canada arising therefrom, was completely changed, and the Royal Northwest Mounted Police expressed a desire to be allowed to serve overseas—in fact from the very outbreak of the war they had been desirous of going to the front as a unit, but owing to the view which the Government entertained as to the importance of maintaining a strong force in Western Canada, it did not feel free to grant their request. That request was renewed in 1917, and again in 1918. In the summer of 1917 an offer was made to the Imperial Government of a cavalry unit from the Mounted Police, but at that time the authorities in England did not desire such a unit. The offer was renewed in the following winter or the spring of 1918, with practically the same result. However, in the great German offensive of March and April, 1918, our Canadian cavalry brigade suffered very serious casualties, and in the month of April the Overseas Minister of Militia cabled out to Canada for a substantial number of cavalry reinforcements. Knowing that the Royal Northwest Mounted Police had been anxious to serve at the front as a cavalry regiment, the offer was made to them to provide the necessary reinforcements to be sent overseas to strengthen our cavalry brigade. Subsequently the plans were changed so as to provide reinforcements for the cavalry brigade, and at the same time furnish a squadron of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police to add to the existing corps cavalry. I am glad to say that when the announcement was made to the Police that they could volunteer for overseas service, notwithstanding the critical condition that then existed on the Western Front and the serious casualties that our cavalry brigade had sustained, every man of military age in the force, and many not of military age, volunteered for service overseas. Only those that were physically fit could be taken, but although only some five hundred men were asked for we secured reinforcements at that time to the number of twelve officers and seven hundred and thirty-six of other ranks, including ex-members of the force and other volunteers, and they proceeded overseas on the 14th of June. The force completed their training at Shorncliffe, where I had the opportunity of inspecting them, and I have never seen a finer body of men. At Shorncliffe they divided, one squadron proceeding to France in the month of October where they were first attached to the Canadian Light Horse. Subsequently they were attached to and formed part of the corps cavalry, and acted as despatch riders and patrols for the several divisions. As soon as the armistice was signed a squadron was pushed over to Namur, Belgium, and one troop under Lieutenant Acland, was sent into Germany with the Army of Occupation. The others who formed the balance of the force that went overseas, were divided and seven non-commissioned officers and two hundred and thirty-six of other ranks were formed part of a tank unit for service in France. The balance of the original force were utilized as reinforcements for our cavalry brigade in France. The majority of those that went overseas have already returned or are now returning. Major Jennings, who was in command of the unit, is, I believe, now on the ocean on his way back with some one hundred and seventy-five men, and when they have reached Canada the greater number of those who went overseas will have returned.

While on this subject, let me add that, when the Government decided to send certain troops to Siberia, the Royal Northwest Mounted Police was asked to provide a cavalry squadron. The request came on the 17th of August, 1918. We immediately complied and the squadron was completely mobilized on the 9th September, consisting of six officers and one hundred and eighty-one of other ranks, and proceeded overseas to Siberia. As the members of the Committee are aware, those troops are now being returned from that country; a few of the Mounted Police are back, but the majority have not yet returned.

I mention these details in connection with the service overseas, because I think it is only fair to the force that one should point out how anxious they were to serve during the whole period of the war, and how quickly they responded when the opportunity was afforded them. Although those who went to France did not see much of the actual fighting, except as despatch riders, and serving in a similar capacity, it was not because they were not anxious to do so. In speaking of their services overseas, I think I should mention the fact that, while the Government was not able to let the force go over as a unit, large numbers of the Police resigned their positions, or purchased their discharge as they were entitled to do in order that they might proceed to Europe and serve at the front.

I am advised by the commissioner that during the period from the outbreak of the war up to the time we mobilized the seven or eight hundred men for service in France, probably not less than 1,000 men had resigned from the Northwest Mounted Police in order to serve overseas, and those men have won distinction on all the fields where they fought. I wish I had time to tell the House of some of the deeds of those gallant men. I will only mention two. The famous Michael O'Leary, V.C., was one of the Northwest Mounted Police, and he set a standard for courage and bravery during the early days of the war which many other gallant soldiers have since emulated. The other, a constable in the ranks for two years—Constable Parkes, a young man now twenty-seven years of age. In 1915 he purchased his discharge to go to the front; he rose to the command of the 116th Battalion, C.E.F., and won the V. C., the D. S. O., and La Croix de Guerre. He proved himself an officer of the highest efficiency, and has been selected by the Canadian Corps to attend the staff college. I might mention other members of the force and the gallant service they have rendered, but time does not permit. I should also mention that ex-members of the force—that is men who had served in the force—provided our Canadian army overseas with two major generals, four brigadier generals, and colonels, majors and captains by the score. It shows the type of men who are serving in our Royal Northwest Mounted Police. All the sons, of military age, of the present and past officers have served overseas, and no less than ten officers' sons died on the battlefield. The son of the first man who joined the force in 1873 is an hon. and gallant member of this House—Brigadier-General Griesbach, who has rendered such distinguished service in this war. He is one of the many gallant officers' sons of members of the force who have served overseas.

Now, my hon. friend has asked about the relations of the force to the provinces, and what is the future of the force? The agreements with the provinces having expired, and the provinces having established their own police forces, and so large a percentage of the force having enlisted for overseas service, the question very naturally arose in the minds of the members of the force and of the people of Western Canada: What is to be the future of the force? Has it served its purpose? Shall we let the provinces look after their own police duties and discontinue the force which has existed for so many years? One of the principal reasons why I visited Western Canada last year was to look into the situation on the ground in order to decide as to the future of the Northwest Mounted Police.

And I must say that wherever I went I found but one opinion—the force should be continued, that it would be a calamity to discontinue this magnificent force, which rendered such conspicuous service to Western Canada ever since it was organized in 1873.

If it was to be continued what should be its future? There were two possible courses open: Either that it should form the nucleus of a permanent Federal police force for the Dominion; or that it should constitute one of the cavalry units in our permanent military force. That was a question which we felt we were not in a position to decide at the time, and therefore we deemed it advisable to continue the force as a police force in the meantime, leaving the question of what its final character should be to be determined according to circumstances at a later date. But we did determine, and it was necessary we should determine in order to preserve the morale of the force, that the force should not be discontinued, but that the force with its splendid record should be preserved as a national asset for the Dominion.

We concluded that for the time being, at least, there were many important duties which a Federal mounted police force should continue to discharge, and that it was our duty to maintain it for the performance of those duties. Therefore when my hon. friend asks about the relations of the provinces to the Northwest Mounted Police, I would say that this force at the present time does not take the place of the provincial or municipal police in any of the provinces in the ordinary administration of the law. It does not supersede them; it supplements their work when required. But its primary duties are in connection with the enforcement of legislation in which the Federal Government is particularly interested. It will appear in the Estimates—the next item to which I referred in opening—that we are proposing that the force should be recruited up to the full authorized strength of 1,200. As the force was only some 600 strong last year, I only presented estimates for its then existing strength, and as it has been decided to recruit it up to the full authorized strength, the estimates this year are necessarily correspondingly increased.

For some time past the force has been responsible for the enforcement of the Military Service Act; and the various Acts in reference to aliens; the policing of the Dominion Government parks—that is done under an arrangement with the provincial governments, whereby the force looks after the whole police work in those parks;—it is performing certain duties for the Department of Immigration in administering the immigration laws; in fact, it has, throughout the war been performing very important duties in seeing that men of undesirable character should not cross the international boundary contrary to the provisions of the immigration laws. It is also performing certain important duties in connection with the Department of Indian Affairs; it is looking after the patrol of the international boundary and the enforcement of the customs laws; it is also looking after the enforcement of the inland revenue laws in these Western Provinces—all matters in which the Federal Government is particularly interested ; and in addition it provides an important force, available at the call of the provincial governments, for the maintenance of law and order throughout those western territories. In addition it has important duties to perform in the Northwest Territories which I shall mention in a minute or two. I should add that when we decided to continue the force we also decided to extend its jurisdiction to British Columbia and to certain portions of Ontario. It will come to the easterly limit of Military District No. 10, the headquarters of which is in the city of Winnipeg. The distribution of the proposed force of 1,200 men is as follows:—

	Men.
For Manitoba, including that portion of Western Ontario	250
For Saskatchewan	370
For Alberta	250
For British Columbia	250
For the Yukon Territory	50
For the Northwest Territories	30
Total	1,200

Let me say a word or two with reference to the Northwest Territories. The Royal Northwest Mounted Police is the only police force looking after the administration of justice and the preservation of law and order in the Northwest Territories, and it has similar duties in the Yukon. Probably there is nothing finer in the whole history of the force than the work it is doing in those extreme northern portions of the continent. There are three posts within the Arctic circle, Herschell Island, in the Arctic ocean, Fort McPherson and Barnard Harbour, which is right on the Arctic ocean. When the report of the Mounted Police for this year is printed and particularly when the Supplementary Report which gives an account of the Baker Lake patrol is printed, I hope the members of the House will read both these documents, because the latter records one of the finest incidents in the whole history of the force. I stop to mention it because it is just such a fine example of courage and achievement as is disclosed in that report which gives the Royal Northwest Mounted Police its splendid reputation and which makes it such a powerful factor in the preservation of law and order. It shows the respect which the people of the country have for the men who compose the force and it illustrates the manner in which law is enforced and justice administered under the British Crown.

In 1913, two American explorers, Messrs. Street and Radford were murdered by some Eskimo tribes at Bathurst inlet on the Arctic ocean, and this was reported to the Mounted Police. It became their duty to endeavour to hunt up the murderers. It was not possible to send the Mounted Police in 1913 as we had none in that district in 1913. A patrol had to be carefully organized and properly equipped, and that was done in 1914. This patrol set out from Halifax on July 31, 1914, for Chesterfield Inlet on the Northwest side of Hudson's Bay. The intention was to establish a base at the east end of Baker lake lying west of Chesterfield Inlet but owing to adverse weather conditions it was not possible to reach Baker lake in 1914 and so the expedition proceeded to Port Nelson. In 1915 the base was established at Baker Lake and during the winter 1915-16 threw out an advance depot on Thelon river. They had to put in caches ahead to provide provisions and supplies. In 1917 Inspector French took charge and the patrol set out in March, Sergeant-Major Caulkin accompanying Inspector French. They travelled, to go in, 2,483 miles and almost a corresponding distance to come out, the total patrol being not less than 4,500 miles over a territory hitherto untrodden by white men, with the possible exception of one explorer. They had to carry a certain amount of provisions, and for the rest they had to depend upon shooting musk ox and other animals of the country. On their way out their provisions were exhausted; their dogs were impoverished, and they had to keep some of their dogs alive by killing the others and feeding the meat to the dogs. Inspector French and his companions were compelled for three days to live on soup made partially by boiling their moccasins, and then they had to tramp on hour after hour in order to reach their goal. They reached their objective; they made the investigation; they ascertained the facts; they brought back and presented a full and complete report. It is such courage and devotion to duty upon the part of our Northwest Mounted Police that give them their unique place in the hearts and affections of the people of Western Canada—a place that nothing can imperil or destroy.

Let me mention one other incident before I leave this point. An Eskimo woman was murdered at Bathurst inlet, and the report of this murder reached the Mounted Police in 1917. One Mounted Policeman, Corporal Conway, started out in August, 1917, to travel across country into the Arctic circle to endeavour to locate the murderers. That one Mounted Policeman went into the Arctic circle, hunted up the murderers and he arrested them though he was surrounded by hostile Eskimo, and brought them out, and they were tried at Fort McPherson in December, 1918. He was absent from August, 1917 to December, 1918, in those Arctic wilds—one man amongst all the Eskimo people. This shows the respect in which the Mounted Police are held by all people in that north country. The people know that if a crime is committed, the Mounted Police will hunt it out, follow up the criminal, and that those who are guilty will be punished. It is because we have such a splendid force so valuable for the preservation of law and order that the Dominion Government has decided for the time being that the force should be maintained to the full authorized strength of 1,200 men, for the purposes I have mentioned

Mr. W. H. WHITE: I am sure all the Western members and, indeed, all members, were pleased to hear the tribute paid to the Royal Northwest Mounted Police by the President of the Privy Council. The service rendered by that force is well known throughout Canada. The minister mentioned, amongst other things, that the first Victoria Cross gained during this great war was gained by a member or an ex-member of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. The first Victoria Cross that was granted in the South African War went also to a member of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, namely, Sergeant A. H. Richardson. I am pleased to note that the minister appreciates this fact because he is in a position to do something to remedy a grievance of long standing which I am not going to mention, but which was given into the hands of an hon. member on the other side, and which, I have no doubt, will be brought up this evening. We are all glad to know that the force instead of being decreased is to be increased and brought up to full strength. That is right. For the few years during which they were not actively engaged, the law of the country was not as well administered and every one felt the effect thereof. The minister, in telling what the intention of the Government was, failed to tell us what is the pay received by the men, non-commissioned officers and officers. That would be of interest, because we in this House might then judge whether they were getting adequate pay for the services rendered.

Mr. ROWELL: The pay was increased last autumn by fifty cents per day to all the constables and non-commissioned officers of the force.

Mr. W. H. WHITE: What is the total pay?

Mr. ROWELL: A junior constable starts in at $1.50 a day. A married man gets double rations, which would be equivalent to about $3 a day.

Mr. W. H. WHITE: I must say that for the services rendered the pay does not seem to be very large, and it must be very difficult for the members of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police to raise a family on that wage, especially when we consider that labourers to-day are striking for $3.50 to $4 a day. The Royal Northwest Mounted Police under the present Administration—I do not know the reason, and I am not going to criticise at the moment—find it harder to get along to-day than they did a few years ago. Perhaps the minister will tell the House why a change in policy was made, as a result of which the men are to-day centered at headquarters in the large cities, where the cost of living is so much greater, instead of being distributed throughout the country as they were formerly. Travelling on the trains I meet a great many of these boys, and the complaint I hear is that it is almost impossible for them to live. If the reason for the change in policy is that more efficient service can be rendered by the men being centered in the large cities, the reason is a good one, but I cannot understand the change being made for any other reason, and it undoubtedly causes great hardship to the men. I am told that part of their duty in the city of Edmonton is to exercise their horses. In my time in the Mounted Police the trouble was to make our horses last; we sometimes used to have spare horses. The Government has mentioned some of the duties of the Mounted Police in connection with inland revenue and looking after alien enemies. Under the present system the Government is put to the extra expense of sending the men, perhaps, a hundred miles down the line to where their services may be needed, and livery or automobiles have to be engaged to take them to their place of duty. Under the old system that expense was avoided, and the men could get to where they were required very much quicker when the call for their services came. They would have their horses right there and could render quicker and better service. There was also the advantage I have mentioned of cheaper living in the small towns. I really cannot understand how a married man, even with double rations, can live in the city of Edmonton on $1.50 a day. It does not seem to be fair, considering the cost of living, and the services these men are rendering the country, and the minister himself has told us what really splendid service it is. The Royal Northwest Mounted Police should be dealt with a little more generously, and it should be made as easy as possible for them to live and bring up a family. Rent in Edmonton to-day is very high, and the cost of living is just as high as in the city of Ottawa. I repeat, I really cannot see how these men can bring up their families on such a wage. I do not think there would be the least objection throughout the country; indeed, I think it would only be fair to the men who are giving such splendid service if the pay started at $2 or $2.50, with the regular good-conduct pay after that.

The CHAIRMAN: Before this discussion goes any further, I must draw the attention of the Committee to the fact that the item under consideraion is No. 11, which relates only to salaries here at the head office. The discussion has been very interesting, and I do not want to interrupt it any way, but I think we should either pass the item now under consideration, or hold this discussion over until we consider item 254, which provides for the pay of the force, subsistence, billeting, etc.

Northwest Territories, Yukon Territory, Province of Alberta, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, British Columbia and part of Western Ontario—Pay of force, $1,007,984.90—Subsistence, billeting, forage and dog feed, fuel and light, clothing, repairs and renewals, horses, arms and ammunition, stationery, medical stores, transport, water service, building repairs and contingencies, $1,236,520.18—To compensate members of the Royal Nortwest Mounted Police for injuries received while in the discharge of duty, $5,000—$2,249,505.08.

Mr. COWAN: It has been my pleasure for some thirty-two years to live within two miles of the headquarters of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, and during that period I have had the pleasure of following very closely the work that has been done by this excellent body of men. I have been able to see how their administration of the law was accepted by the people of that part of the country, and I fully agree with the President of the Privy Council that when it was decided a few years ago to discontinue the services of the force, the people of Western Canada objected very much. Wherever I heard the people discussing the matter, and I did hear them very often, invariably they expressed exceeding regret that they were to lose the services of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. It was fully recognized by our people that the provinces had the right to administer the law, and that they were within their rights in asserting themselves, but notwithstanding that, our people did not want to lose the Royal Northwest Mounted Police because they knew that the "red coat" as he was familiarly known carried with him a prestige which no provincial body of men, no matter how good they might be or how free from political influence, could possibly build up for many years to come. After watching this force all these years and seeing what the result of their enforcement of the law has been, I have no hesitation in saying that their administration of the law in the Northwest Territories, and subsequently in the provinces for a period of several years, was the sanest administration of the law that this world has ever seen. A police force can create trouble just about as easily as it can allay it. If given to irritating methods in their administration of the law, to spying or resorting to trickery, or "stool pigeons," or anything of that kind, a police force can in a very short time stir up an animosity which will do more harm than can be outweighed by any good that they may do. But no such administration was known under the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. As a matter of fact, ever since I first knew the force it has been composed entirely of picked men; men of low type were not accepted. After the men had been picked and taken in the force, they received a training not only in the law itself, but in the administration of the law, which made it possible for them to give that administration which has been so acceptable to the people of that part of the country. It is not necessary to multiply instances in proof of the fact that in the opinion of the people of Western Canada the Royal Northwest Mounted Police has no superior. Such being the case, we are exceedingly desirous that the force shall be continued in our country, and we were just as pleased to learn a year or so ago that the force was to be re-established as we had been regretful to hear some time previously that it was to be disbanded. To-day we are told that the Royal Northwest Mounted Police are to be given practically new duties—naturally their duties will not be the same as they were before, for now we have provincial police forces in all the provinces which will have their own jurisdiction. These new duties will absorb a great deal of the time and attention of the Mounted Police, and will require a very strong force. Among other things, we are told, they are to administer the law made by this Parliament in regard to aliens. I suppose somebody will at once say that probably that means that our alien population in Western Canada requires severe policing. Such is not the case. I know whereof I speak, for I have no less an authority than Commissioner Perry himself,—and he can contradict me any time he sees fit, for he is not very far away—when I say that since the outbreak of the war our alien population in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta (and we have over 300,000 aliens in Saskatchewan) have not given us any trouble at all. There has been no rioting, and they have caused no disturbance. The Royal Northwest Mounted Police have so sanely administered the law and have dealt with them in such a just and generous manner that they have never felt in any way called upon to resort to violence. The aliens to-day, at any rate wherever I have met them, have shown that they know that the Royal Northwest Mounted Police will not tolerate any nonsense. They recognize that the police will administer the law with a smile and will not resort to trickery or anything of that kind, and that they will give to the aliens exactly the same protection as is afforded other people, all that is expected of them being that they shall respect the law. The aliens in that part of the country to-day are just as willing and anxious as any one else to have the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, for they know that they will be given protection as long as they obey the law. That is exactly the conditions that we want to see prevailing in Western Canada. We do not want any aliens to feel that they have to be kept there by force; they must be made to realize that the law is their law, as much for their protection as for that of any other citizens. I doubt very much if there is any other police body that could deal with these aliens at the present time as can the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. There is, it must be admitted, some excitement in Canada today, and a certain amount of ill-feeling on the part of a portion of the population towards some aliens, and it would not do to choose any number of policemen from amongst that type of men to enforce the law against these aliens or to deal with them in any shape or form, because if we do so we shall create instead of allaying trouble. On the other hand, the Mounted Police, from their experience in dealing with this class of people, can go amongst them, as they have done for years and years, and so conduct matters as to give us law and order without any clash at all. We do not want clash between any two sets of people, and I am satisfied that the Royal Mounted Police can effect that condition better than any other body. The matter of pay was referred to by the hon. member for Victoria, Alberta (Mr. White), who, I believe, was himself a member of the Royal Mounted Police, and whom we are pleased to recognize as such. As far as pay is concerned, I believe that the men are not getting sufficient. Indeed, for many years they have not been getting enough, and I do not believe they were ever paid an adequate salary. We should remember that these are picked men, who have the ability to command high pay in any walk of life, and men of their type should not be asked to serve the country for lower pay than they can get elsewhere. I therefore support the suggestion that their pay be made such as will retain to our country the services of men who have had experience and training and know precisely how to handle the situation as it exists to-day. I sincerely hope that in this new arrangement the Government will see fit to make use of the large body of men who have served in the Mounted Police and who are now following other occupations. There is a great reserve body which can be made use of in the capacity that is required, and I hope the Government will take them into consideration in this new arrangement, and adapt their policy to that end.

Mr. STEVENS: I did not hear all the minister had to say, but the portion of his remarks that I did hear I very gladly endorse, especially his eulogies of this splendid body of men and his views in regard to their excellent record. I shall not discuss the points raised by the other speakers regarding higher pay and other matters connected with the force at present. I wish, however, to bring to the attention of the House a matter which I believe should be considered by the Government, and I think that if there is a favourable expression of opinion by the House to-night, the Government will perhaps be inclined to give it consideration.

It is a matter of long standing and perhaps may be considered somewhat out of date, but in view of the very eulogistic terms in which the minister spoke of the service and the record of this force, I think this is an opportune time to look back for a few years and consider whether we have dealt justly with these men in the past. To quote the minister's words, they have a splendid reputation and record, and, added the minister, there have seldom been such exhibitions of courage and heroism as we see constantly manifested throughout the years by this splendid force. Indeed, this is a matter of history, and with these sentiments the people of the country generally are in accord, especially those who have lived in the West for a great many years, who have learned not only to respect and honour these men, but to admire them in the highest degree. The force has been particularly fortunate in the splendid leaders it has had in the past, and the sanity of its administration has been largely due to that leadership and the discipline and excellent record of the men individually. At the time of the Northwest Rebellion, I suppose that of all the forces engaged in that rebellion the Royal Northwest Mounted Police can very properly be accorded one of the highest places, if not the highest place. These men gave their services at that time, and although it is true they were simply doing their plain duty, they did splendid work. After the rebellion was over the militia and other forces were granted scrip in recognition of their services. It was not very valuable, but still it was a recognition. They were given a medal and scrip and for many years the Northwest Mounted Police were unable even to get the medal in recognition of their splendid services during that rebellion. I cannot understand why there should have been the delay there was, but after a great many years, and after the matter had been brought to the attention of the successive Governments of the times during which it was in abeyance, a medal was finally granted to them, but no scrip was ever given to the veterans of the Northwest Mounted Police. This matter has been dealt with at various times without success, and I am going to take the liberty, with the indulgence of the Committee, of reading a letter placed in my hands and a resolution by the Royal Northwest Mounted Police Veterans' Association. This association numbers about 400 members who have served in this splendid body and have retired. A great many of them are now well on in years, having spent most of their life in the police service, and some of them are none too well off. The letter is as follows:

Royal North-West Mounted Police Veterans' Association.

Sir,—At a meeting of the R.N.W.M. Police Veterans' Association held on the 25th day of March last, the matter of long-standing injustice to those members of the force who served during the Riel Rebellion in the year 1885 was discussed.

For several years after the rebellion both the medal and the land scrip were withheld from the members of this force, but both the medal and scrip were issued to other units, both regulars (A and B battery) and volunteers, taking part. After years of long and continued insistence, the medals were issued to members of this force but not the land scrip. Why the discrimination in favour of other bodies taking part in the rebellion, against the North-West Mounted Police has never been explained. That the N.W.M. Police did their duty equally with the other units engaged, was in a measure acknowledged (though late) by the issue of the medal, therefore if it be admitted that the medal was rightly issued, why is the scrip withheld?

Therefore, it is unanimously resolved:—"That this Association one more petition the Government of Canada to do justice to those members of the R.N.W.M. Police who took part in the Rebellion, that the scrip be issued, thereby removing the stigma and injustice to those who gave their loyal and faithful service. That the Government be reminded that members of this force, have, on many occasions since, performed valuable service to this country, and more especially have many of them brought honour to Canada in the South African War and in the last great war, also that the members who took part in the 1885 rebellion, and who we strongly believe are entitled to the land scrip, are now getting up in years, and the issue of the scrip at this time, would enable many of them to end their days with some degree of comfort, together with the satisfaction of the knowledge of the recognition of their loyal and faithful service for the Dominion of Canada and Empire."

C. R. Filtness,
Secy.

In answer to that it has been stated and argued that this matter has been considered by the governments of Sir John Macdonald, Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Sir Robert Borden, and that the present Government feel that the decision arrived at by previous governments should be sustained. That decision was that inasmuch as the Royal Northwest Mounted Police were simply doing their duty in putting down the rebellion, they were not entitled to this scrip, that they were not on a parity with the volunteers and that the scrip was for volunteers only. In answer to that contention, there are certain arguments which I think I should bring to the attention of the House. You will note that I referred to the fact that A and B Batteries which, I think came from Kingston, were engaged. They were regular soldiers doing their duty in exactly the same way as the Mounted Police. Yet A and B Batteries received the privilege of taking land scrip just the same as the militia units. I do not wish to suggest that there was any prejudice but I must confess that, after looking through this matter with a considerable degree of care, I am inclined to think that perhaps at the time of the rebellion, and shortly afterwards, there was indeed some slight degree of prejudice against the men of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police and that the militia units, and the commanders of the militia units, may have considered that their special duty was to look after the volunteer forces and not the regulars, that the Mounted Police should take care of themselves in any case, being regular soldiers, and that therefore they did not merit any special attention. I do not look at the matter in that light at all.

It seems that this is a very opportune time to consider the case of the members of this force in view of the statement made by the hon. member for Regina (Mr. Cowan) to the effect that there is some difficulty in retaining the services of some of the most efficient men by reason of the fact that the encouragement is very slight and is probably not sufficient. I am not going to discuss that but I will say that the men of this gallant force, at the conclusion of a certain period of service, should be entitled to recognition, whether land scrip or something else, that would be an encouragement for them.

There is no body of men in existence to-day, nor has there been in all history, even taking the illustration given by the minister himself, which has performed such valiant service in opening up to the world that new country. We may talk about explorers and about the records of the members of the geological survey and other survey parties, but these pioneers who, in performance of their duty, launched forth into the wilderness away up into the Arctic circle, and who were often away from civilization for two or three years at a time, learned to know all about those regions, and from them and from the very minute and intelligent reports they gave to their officers and to the department, we know a great deal about the hinterland of Canada. Unquestionably, many of these men would gladly settle in some region where they have spent the greater portion of their lives as civilization and city life have little attraction for them. But we give them absolutely no encouragement. We give them the small pay of the regular force. I do not know that they have complained very much about that, but why should not we not only recognize the services of these men in the Northwest Rebellion of 1885, but also give a gratuity of some kind to which the members of the force might look forward?

Another point I have to make is this: It is not a very important point, but I am led to make it because apparently it is necessary to make every possible argument in favour of these men to enable them to get any consideration at all. It was argued that these men were not on the same basis as the volunteers. The answer to that is that they were under the command of the volunteer militia of Canada. You may say that is quibbling, you may say it is too fine an argument, but if you are going to tell these men that they are not going to receive this gratuity because they are simply regulars, I answer that I will quibble as well, if you like to call it that, and I will say that at that time they were under exactly the same commanders as the militia force of Canada and in my judgment one argument has equal force with the other.

It is also stated that there was too great a delay, that the matter should have been brought to the notice of the Government before. It has been brought to the attention of the House on many occasions. It has been brought to the attention of the Government over and over again from the time of Sir John Macdonald upwards. But there is a reason for that delay in recent years, and it is that many members of the police force serving in 1885 remained on the strength of the force for a certain time and during that time it would have been a serious breach of discipline on the part of the members to urge their claim for land scrip. That is obvious. That is not a narrow or stringent argument, it is a fair statement of the case. We know that these men have been under the strictest discipline. None know better than the Government or the Government officials that had these men, while they were still members of the force, brought any particular pressure to bear upon the Government to induce them to grant this scrip, they would have been very severely disciplined for doing so, and, it may be wisely so—that is a point that I am not disputing. Now that they are out of the force, after long years of service, they have, like other bodies, grouped themselves together in this Veterans' Association, and they come to the Government and say: Now, give us justice.

Sir, I consider that a grave injustice has been done these men, not only in not giving them their medals after so many years' service, but in not giving them this scrip. It may be argued that it is late, but that is no argument or real reason why we should hesitate to make good the discrepancy now. I think if it is recognized, and I am sure the Committee will be prompt to recognize it, that an injustice has been perpetrated in this case, we should agree at once that the injustice should be remedied forthwith. There is another reason why delay has occurred. The question was raised in 1913, but shortly after that the war broke out, and it was not desirable to press the matter while hostilities were in progress. That is perfectly clear. This House was occupied during almost the last five years in the consideration of the most momentous questions. To have brought this matter up during that period would have looked rather trifling, and therefore it was not brought forward. Now that the war is over, and we are able to give some sort of cleaning to the slate, as it were, I think we might very well clean this matter off. The feeling has arisen in the minds of these men that they have been discriminated against, and I must confess that after talking to a large number of them, and finding them not only intelligent, but intensely loyal and splendid fellows in every respect, I was impressed with the fact that they were suffering under discrimination, that there was no fair, logical reason that could be advanced why they should not have received this scrip long ago, and I see no fair, logical reason why it should not be given them to-day. There is no argument so far as I can see, that can be advanced against doing what is requested here, except that it is not wanted to be done. Now, Sir, I put it to the minister personally, and as strongly as I can, that he recognize the courage and the heroism of these men, that he recognize the services that they have performed in the past by admitting their just claim—a claim unanimously advanced by this association, numbering about four hundred; not a very large number, in fact a comparatively small one—and give to them the privilege of taking up scrip somewhere in the Government lands in the West, just as the Militia Force of Canada at that time were rewarded with scrip. I am not going to argue as to the type of scrip to be granted; I do not care, nor do they, what reasonable restrictions are imposed. In any case, give to these men in the closing years of life, the satisfaction of knowing that they have at last been fully recognized, and remove from their minds all thought or suspicion that the country does not recognize that they have well performed their duty.

Mr. TWEEDIE: This is probably one of the most important items in the expenditure affecting Canada, more particularly the Western Provinces, although the amount involved is not large. I agree with all the words of praise which have been uttered on behalf of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, and if every member in this House to-night were to utter similar praise I do not believe that we would overstate the case on behalf of these valiant men. They have rendered a service to Western Canada which could not have been performed by any other body of men; and the difference between the pioneer days in our country beyond the Great Lakes, and those in the Western States—a difference in which Canada compares very favourably with the pioneer period of any other country in the world—is due to the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, and the traditions which have been established in connection with that magnificent body of men. The red tunics of the police as they rode over the plains of the West created an impression upon the minds of the man who came in there, whether as a genuine settler or as an outlaw, that the affairs of this Dominion were administered in accordance with the principles of law and on the basis of justice and equity for all. It was impossible in those early days for any mischievous doctrines such as now appear to be in order to make any headway in that Western country, and I am very glad that the Government has seen fit to re-establish this fine force in connection with the administration of law in the West. I must confess that I was somewhat surprised when I heard the minister announce that the force was to be increased to the extent of only twelve hundred men, and that it was to exercise jurisdiction over the Northwest Territories, the Yukon Territory, the provinces of British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan, and Manitoba, and part of Western Ontario. I submit, Mr. Chairman, that if the force had been increased to some three thousand men instead of twelve hundred, the Government would not be providing any stronger force than is necessary to administer law in Western Canada. We might just as well face the facts as they exist. We know that the conditions that prevail throughout the civilized world—whether it be in Europe, or in Great Britain, or in the United States, or in Canada—are vastly different from those which previously existed at any time in the world's history. We know that in the past days men have gone through Canadian cities preaching their doctrines from soap boxes at street corners, and little heed or attention was paid to them. We know throughout the United States and throughout Canada at the present time, however, there are many disciples of anarchy, and men who are advocating secretly, and in some cases openly, the subversion of law and order by means of physical force. We cannot close our eyes to this serious condition, and it is the duty of this Government to establish a body of police to so administer our law that any man who comes from a land where they have trampled the government under foot and resisted all law shall be taught that he cannot come and preach that doctrine in Canada with impunity, but must be bound by the law and observe order here. I believe, Mr. Chairman, that if there is any fault to be found with this Government in connection with that question, it is that it has not taken the reins of justice in its hands as firmly as it should have done. I believe the Government has been too lenient with a certain class of people who are going throughout the country sowing the seed of anarchy and destruction. The men to whom I allude urge the overthrow of the Government not by means of argument or reason, or process of evolution; they advocate that all governments in the world shall be overthrown by physical force and violence. It is the duty of the force, to whose maintenance we are voting money to-night to go throughout the length and breadth of the territory confined to their care and where they find men—I care not whether they come from Germany, or Russia, or Austria, or any other country—who preach the doctrine that the Government of Canada should be overthrown by violence and force, and that the laws on our statute books should be resisted by physical force, they should gather those men in and ship them back to the country where such principles are in force.

The Northwest Mounted Police may have had a great work on their hands in pioneer days, but I believe that they have a far greater work on their hands at the present time. As has been pointed out by the member for Regina, they have succeeded in enforcing observance of the law and commanding order in this country, not by violence themselves, but by the great care and tact they have shown in the performance of their duties. We want that same class of man now to exercise those same qualities, to uphold the dignity of the law as they upheld it in the pioneer days of the west, and if they do that they will render the greatest service to this country that can possibly be rendered by any police body.

Now, if we ask 1,200 men to perform those duties, are we not placing upon them a greater burden than they can bear and perform their duties efficiently? Their jurisdiction will extend from the remote parts of the Yukon Territory to the remote parts of western Ontario—1,200 men scattered over that vast area. I submit that their duties cannot be performed with justice to this country. I submit, Mr. Chairman, through you to the Minister that he should reconsider his decision to increase this body to 1,200 men, and should have anywhere from three to five thousand men. It might involve an expenditure of $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 instead of $2,000,000 or $3,000,000. But would it not be better to spend that larger sum and rid our country of men who are a menace, men who are the opponents of law and order and justice? Would we not save much for the future? I care not about any man in this country who may hold views of government which are different from those held by the majority. Any man has the right to perfect freedom of speech, he can argue for any form of government he pleases as long as he proceeds by constitutional methods to arrive at that destination; but the line of demarcation is between that class of men—who are welcome in this country—and the class who come here or who are living here and who say: We know no law, we know no government; we are going to upset governments, we are going to resist laws by the utmost physical force and by the violence which we command. We do not want that class.

I want to point out to the Government that when the Northwest Mounted Police have come in contact with those men, and meted out speedy justice to them, as they must, their hands must be upheld, there must be no political interference, there must be no sympathy shown, the law must be supreme and they should be backed to the limit. We want to rid our country of lawless agitators, and the sooner we put this machinery in operation and rid ourselves of that revolutionary element the better for the Dominion of Canada and the better for her lawful citizens.

Mr. MANION: It seems almost superfluous after all the praise that has been lavished upon the Northwest Mounted Police for any one to add to that praise. However, the speakers who have preceded me are all from the Western Provinces, Manitoba, Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia, and as the jurisdiction of the force is to be extended to the head of the lakes, I wish to commend the Government for having reached that decision. I have heard nothing but praise of that action, for the reason that every one in Western Ontario is glad to have a body of such noble traditions placed in charge of the enforcement of law and order in their territory. I have heard on one or two occasions very slight criticism, but it was from those who thought perhaps law and order should not be preserved.

The hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Tweedie) has advocated strengthening the Northwest Mounted Police Force for the purpose of preserving law and order. I believe the Government has studied very carefully the possibilities of strengthening the Force and I thoroughly agree that they should at least be recruited up to 1,200 men as is proposed. If the strengthening of the Force is for the purpose of keeping down Bolshevism and revolution in this country, I believe the Government is well advised in the course it has taken. No one wishes this country to get in the chaotic condition which has overtaken Russia. Bolshevism means lawlessness, it means hunger and starvation, it means disruption, and we do not wish those conditions to extend to Canada.

I would like, if one might suggest to the Government what has been suggested to them a number of times recently by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark), that they do something more than they have already done—and I know they have deeply considered the subject—regarding the control of the high cost of living. I hope this is not out of order, Mr. Chairman, inasmuch as I believe that the two things go together: the strengthening of the Northwest Mounted Police, and the control as far as possible of the high cost of living, for the reason that Bolshevism is simply another name for revolution; and hunger is the legitimate mother of revolution. People do not revolt when they are happy, contented and well fed; they revolt when the high cost of living is beyond their reach—and to-day in this country the cost of living is beyond the reach of a great many people, perhaps not to the extent of starvation, but to the extent of forcing them to deny themselves many of those things that they had previously considered to be the necessaries of life.

The reason I mention this matter is that I hold in my hand a letter from Mr. R. J. McFall to the City Clerk of Fort William bearing on this question. He takes up a number of cases—I will not read the letter—of violations of the law by the cold storage warehouses in the neighbourhood. He names four cold storage warehouses, and he gives instances of violations of the law, totalling altogether 40, in regard to selling the necessaries of life to the people of this country, in other words, meat and eggs. To my mind, one of the reasons why we should extend the power of the Northwest Mounted Police is because the high cost of living is due to the profiteering of such corporations, and that is why I wish to put this matter before the House. It possibly is stretching the order point a little in bringing it in here—

The CHAIRMAN: I am very sorry, but it is stretching it altogether too far. The hon. gentleman cannot be allowed to do so.

Mr. MANION: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman. But I still adhere to the point, without going further in discussing it, that two things are equally necessary—that the control of the high cost of living is as necessary as the expansion of the powers of the Northwest Mounted Police. I regret, Mr. Chairman, that you find it necessary to stop me proceeding with these details, because I think they would be interesting not only to the House and to you personally, but probably to the country at large. However, perhaps on another occasion I shall have an opportunity of dealing with the subject; but at least now I can go as far as to suggest that the Government should do everything possible to control the high cost of living. I wish to say that I support very strongly the proposal to strengthen the Northwest Mounted Police up to at least 1,200 men.

Mr. KEEFER: Mr. Chairman, I differ with my friend (Mr. Manion) from the sister city in asking that the Force be increased only to 1,200 men. Their jurisdiction is to be extended to the head of the lakes, and we know what their services are. In the past, some of us have had business relations with them, not in being arrested, but in carrying out the work which they have initiated. The policy of the Government is, I understand, to recruit up to the full strength of 1,200 men, but that is too small a number, judging from the number of foreign people in the large cities of the West. As the hon. member for West Calgary (Mr. Tweedie) said, the force ought to be increased to probably 5,000 as a permanent force. We have some rather dangerous days ahead of us; there are in this country places to-day where there are hotbeds breeding a possible revolution, and the best force to meet that is the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. We have altogether too few of them in Canada.

I would ask the minister to take into serious consideration some recognition of members of the force who went overseas for the time they were away. I made a promise to a carload of them about the first year of the war. I noticed about as fine a lot of men in "civies" as one would want to see anywhere coming down on the train, and wondered who they were. I went forward and sat in the car with them and found out that they were Northwest Mounted policemen, going back to serve in the Imperial forces, many of them being reservists. While I chatted with them they urged one thing upon me, and I promised that if I ever had an opportunity I would bring it forward, namely, that as they were giving up a dollar a day pay to go overseas to serve and draw one shilling a day in England, if they came back to this country, Canada should, in some way, give them a little nest egg or stake to induce them to return, so that they would have something to settle down on and marry and become citizens of this country. The proposition seemed so reasonable that I promised to do what I could. I wrote the commissioner about the matter at the time and got his reply, the only reply he could give, namely, that Parliament had made no such provision. It is not yet settled that these Northwest Mounted policemen who have gone over and served in the Imperial forces will receive the six months' pay that our Canadian soldiers are getting. It is true they will get the six months' pay or bonus from the Imperial forces, but that will amount to only about $120, whereas if they had enlisted with the Canadian troops they would receive a bonus of six months' pay of $500 or $600. I understand there is difficulty in getting men of the right sort, and where can better men be obtained than amongst those who have had experience, and who have served overseas? Why not urge those men to come back and say to them: If you come back, not only will you be reinstated and your time count for the whole period you have been away, but the difference between the dollar a day you were receiving and the one shilling, or two shillings as it was afterwards increased to, will be paid to you? That will show our appreciation. Canada did that with some of her civil servants in the first part of the war, and why should we not do it with the very best civil servants we have? We should let those men know in every way we possibly can that we appreciate their services. We have possibly dark days ahead of us, and we have two police forces in Canada, one the Northwest Mounted Police, and the other the Dominion Police. They are not members of any union; the Government have not the trouble with them that the city of Montreal or Toronto and other places have with their police force; they are loyal to the country, and any reasonable demand that they make should receive most careful consideration. They cannot urge their grievances as strongly as others can. For instance, there is the question of the bonus which is given to the Civil Service. It is a little out of order, but if the Dominion Police have a request regarding that, it should be most generously met, and we should not wait too long, until we turn their sympathies against us. I merely ask the minister if he will take into his most serious consideration the question of doing something for those men who were on the force, who enlisted and went overseas to serve in British regiments. I had a letter from Curragh camp a year after I had travelled with those boys, and the writer said: "Do you remember the fellow you were talking to in the train along the north shore of lake Superior? Here I am stuck at Curragh camp because they know that I am experienced in training men. Do you remember that freckled-faced boy with the green hat and the blue suit of clothes? That was Micky O'Leary who got the V.C. I wish I could get over and get the V.C. too." That is the type of men we should get back into the force. I urge strongly upon the minister not only to increase the force, but to bring back all the men who went overseas to serve with the colours.

Mr. ROWELL: With reference to the observations of various members, I should first like to say a word or two regarding the observations of the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Stevens) who has brought to the attention of the Committee the question of granting scrip to the members of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police who served in the Rebellion of 1885. It is only right that I should give the Committee the position of the matter as disclosed in the records of the House at that time. At the time when the rebellion occurred Sir John A. Macdonald, who was the minister responsible for the establishment of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, was, I believe, the minister in charge of the administration of the force. The reason why the Mounted Police were not granted the scrip appears to be that stated by the hon. member for Vancouver Centre, namely, that the then Government looked upon their service as being rendered in the performance of duty, as they were responsible for the administration of law, and the preservation of order in the Northwest at that time, and that the citizen soldiers who left their homes in other parts of Canada and went to the Northwest to put down the rebellion were in a different position. That is the ground upon which the then Prime Minister put the case for granting scrip to the volunteers. This is his statement as it appears in Hansard of 1885, page 3376:

> We all agree that the services of our citizen soldiery, who have left their homes and their hearths in order to fight the battles of the country in the Northwest. and to restore peace, order and law, where disorder and insurrection existed, should be duly acknowledged. These resolutions are offered with that purpose, and they are offered with the secondary purpose of opening up that country for the young men of that soldiery, who have seen the Northwest, who know its advantages, and who may, perhaps, take a liking to the country and desire to settle there. It is of great importance too, I think, to that country, and to the whole Dominion, that a considerable portion of that body should take up their habitation in the Northwest to which they have gone as loyal soldiers and as supporters of the supremacy of the law and of the Government of Canada, as it is constituted.

The then Prime Minister went on to say that it was more than probable that a good portion of the militia force then on duty in the Northwest, would not desire to settle there, but might return to their homes, and yet the Government should take recognition of their valuable services. Every one who settled there had the same right as any other settler to 160 acres of land. What was then proposed was to give a second adjoining homestead of 160 acres, or 320 acres in all, instead of the usual 160 acres, and that they should receive their patent free of all charges. Those who returned home and did not become settlers, would get scrip for 80 acres as an acknowledgment of their services. In concluding his explanation Sir John A. Macdonald said:

> The resolutions have a two-fold object. First, that there should be a substantial recognition, beyond the mere daily pay of the militia men who went to the Northwest to fight our battles, of their services, by making them grants of land, or scrip if they don't want to have the land, and at the same time making a distinction between the men who will not settle there and the men who will. The man who does not, and who returns home, gets scrip equivalent to 80 acres; the man who goes there and settles there gets 320 acres.

In 1885 the militia men who were engaged in putting down the rebellion were awarded a medal. Under date of July 10, 1886, the medal was given to the Mounted Police, who were "actually under fire during the said troubles."

At different times the Northwest Assembly passed resolutions asking that the Mounted Police and the volunteers attached to the force be treated the same as the active militia as far as medals and scrip were concerned. In reply to the resolution of the Assembly of September 12, 1893, the Dominion Government passed an Order in Council refusing the request. This Order, under date of June 30, 1894, says:

> When the subject of rewards for services during the rebellion was under the consideration of the Government, a distinction was made between the Mounted Police, whose ordinary duties of maintaining law and order were within the limits of the disturbed districts, and the militia, who were called upon to leave their homes and occupations, at great personal inconvenience, resulting in many cases, in serious embarrassment to themselves and families. This distinction was marked by excluding the police from participation in the issue of scrip and by limiting the issue of the medal to those members of the Northwest Mounted Police Force who were actually under fire.

For these reasons the scrip and medals to those not under fire were not granted. That was the successor to the Government of Sir John Macdonald. So the matter was before not only the Government of Sir John Macdonald, but before the Conservative Government of his immediate successor. Then the matter came before the Government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who was also the head of the administration of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police, and on the 20th of August, 1900, an Order in Council was passed recommending that "The Northwest Mounted Police who were on service in the Northwest Territories during the period of rebellion of 1885 should be dealt with as far as regards the medal, in the same manner as members of the active militia." So that the Order in Council of 10th July, 1886, was amended by striking out the words "who were actually under fire during the said troubles." In other words, the Mounted Police who were not under fire got the medal, but the law was not changed with reference to the grant of scrip, the Government adhering to the decision already reached by two preceding Governments.

The request was subsequently renewed to the Government which preceded the present one, and the same conclusion was reached. Therefore, when the matter came before the present Government, in view of the decision which had been reached by each successive Government during the period from 1886 down to date, the present Government thought it was not justified in opening up this old matter and changing the basis upon which this scrip was granted.

With reference to the Veterans Association to which my hon. friend has referred, I have nothing but the highest appreciation of that force and the branches of it at Vancouver and Victoria. I think it is only right to say that these men have offered to serve as a reserve force. They have made a very fine offer to the Government, and in the Bill which I hope to introduce into the House this week, because certain amendments to the law are rendered necessary by the changes which are being made, I intend asking the House to approve of a provision in the law whereby a reserve of the Northwest Mounted Police may be created and these men who have served their country with such distinction as members of the force in the past constitute a reserve which may be called upon in emergency.

The hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) has brought out one fact to-night which had not come to my knowledge before, and that was that members of the permanent force in Canada did receive some recognition in the way of scrip. That matter I shall be glad to look into and see if it affects the situation as it comes before the Government.

My hon. friend from Victoria (Mr. White) mentioned the question of the pay of the Mounted Police. Since the force came under my administration, two or three important changes have been made with reference to pay. First the pay has been increased fifty cents a day. Separation allowance is provided for the wives of all married men, and will continue to be provided until the general demobilization of the militia force is complete. An additional ration has also been granted to each married man, so that all these combined constitute a substantial addition to the pay. I believe there is good ground for considering that probably some further advance should be made in the pay, and in the Bill which I expect to introduce I purpose recommending to the House that power be given to make a further increase in the pay of the mounted police. Members of the House will also bear in mind that in addition to the pay, pensions are provided for service in the force; and that has to be taken into consideration in considering the pay. As the law stands at present, a man who serves twenty years becomes entitled to a pension upon retirement. In the amendment which I contemplate bringing in, I purpose recommending to the House that the pension also be substantially increased. When these provisions are before the House I think that the hon. member for Victoria will feel that we are dealing absolutely fairly with the members of the force.

With reference to members of the force serving in the Arctic regions, I may say that a special allowance is made to them. They get a larger allowance than men serving in the better settled portions of the country, due no doubt to the higher cost of living in those higher latitudes. The hon. member for Victoria also asked why the force was not now as widely distributed as it was before. The chief reason is this: The provincial authorities, of course, are now responsible for the ordinary administration of law and order throughout the province, and it is not necessary, having regard to the present duties of the force, that they should be located in every town and village throughout the country.

Mr. W. H. WHITE: I asked why they were centred in the large cities, because a great deal of their service is performed at some distance from headquarters. A man may have to go down the line a hundred miles from Edmonton, for instance, and then have to hire a car to take him to where he is required. If a detachment was located at Vermilion or Lloydminster, we will say, the men could go out from there at less expense, and it would be much cheaper for the married men to live and bring up their families; I also think they might be able to perform better service.

Mr. ROWELL: When the force is recruited up to strength there will be more detachments than at present. At present the view that those responsible for the administration of the force entertain is that there is some gain in having a reasonably strong body of police at certain important points throughout the country. As regards the point raised by my hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion) I shall not enter into a discussion of the cost of living. I appreciate what he says about the fine service which the force is rendering and the appreciation of the people of Northwestern Ontario of the fact that there is a force stationed there. My hon. friend from West Calgary (Mr. Tweedie) and my hon. friend from Port Arthur (Mr. Keefer) both spoke on the question of increasing the force beyond the present strength. We are recruiting the force up to the present authorized strength, namely 1,200.

Mr. KEEFER: Is it 1,200 yet?

Mr. ROWELL: It is not yet up to 1,200. My hon. friend from Port Arthur spoke about our asking the men who had been in the force and had gone overseas serving in Imperial units to come back into the force. That is part of the policy of the Government, and we have taken steps to bring to the attention of former members of the force who are now serving in Imperial units the fact that we shall be glad to welcome them back into the force.

Mr. KEEFER: Do these men know of these new regulations?

Mr. ROWELL: Some of them are only covered by the new Bill which is to be brought into the House, but the substance of the regulations was posted up in France. We endeavoured as well as we could to reach the men in the Imperial units, but it is not an easy matter to get into touch with men so widely scattered in so large a force. However, we have provided that any man who retired from the force in order to serve overseas in either the Canadian or the Imperial forces shall have his time service overseas counted in computing his pension, so that they will all have the benefit of the increased pension which we are providing and also the benefit, in computing the time for the pension, of the service they have rendered overseas.

Mr. KEEFER: Has the Government considered extending the war service gratuity to the members of the Mounted Police who served in the Imperial forces?

Mr. ROWELL: That is a much larger question, because there are not only the members of the Mounted Police who served in the Imperial forces but thousands of other men who went overseas to serve in the Imperial forces. I do not see how it is possible to grant a supplementary war gratuity to men who left one branch of our service to serve overseas in the Imperial forces, and not treat every other British reservist in the same way. That is a question of policy which will have to be considered in relation to other departments of the Government as well as the Royal Northwest Mounted Police. I said that we were recruiting up to the present strength. Possibly we should recruit beyond that strength, but that is a question that will have to receive very careful consideration and is now under the consideration of the Government. If we decide to recruit beyond 1,200 it will be necessary for me to come to the House with a Supplementary Estimate to cover it. The present Estimates only cover recruiting up to 1,200.

Mr. W. H. WHITE: How many commissions have been granted? In increasing the force there must be a great many officers, and I would like to know whether non-commissioned officers and others in the ranks are receiving any special consideration. Are the Government granting commissions to men in the lower ranks, or are they going outside of the force for their officers?

Mr. ROWELL: Every commission so far granted has been a promotion from the ranks.

Mr. W. H. WHITE: In support of the remarks made by the hon. member for Centre Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) pointing out that permanent corps like A and B batteries received their scrip, I may say further that not only did the regular batteries receive it but a great many of the settlers that came into police headquarters or barracks as refugees with their families were sworn in to do guard duty. All these home guards really came in for protection but they were sworn to do duty while the police were out on patrol, and they were granted scrip as well as the others. I hope the minister has heard what I have said about that.

Mr. ROWELL: Yes, I will note it.

Supplementary Estimates, 1918-1919—Civil Government Royal Northwest Mounted Police—To provide for a clerkship in the Second Division, Subdivision A, from December 1, 1918—$533.32.

Mr. ROWELL: This man was promoted by the Civil Service Commission, and this is to provide the difference between his former salary and the promotion.

[Mr. Rowell.]

Civil Government—Public Works.
Salaries including Deputy Minister at $6,000, Assistant Deputy Minister at $4,500, and Departmental Solicitor at $3,500—$575,537.50.

Mr. F. B. CARVELL (Minister of Public Works): When this matter was under consideration last, the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) asked some questions in reference to increase of salary of $1,000 to the Deputy Minister. I do not see the hon. member in his place now. It will be borne in mind that the same increase has been granted to the Deputy Minister of Public Works as to all other Deputy Ministers in the public service. I can give no further explanation, because there is none to give. It has been decided as a matter of policy that all deputy ministers shall receive a salary of $6,000 a year. There are only two other items in regard to which inquiry was made. I was asked what had been the reduction in the inside service of the Public Works Department since I assumed the duties of office. There were actually in the department in October, 1917, 307 officials; in April 1919, there were 277 officials, or a reduction of 30. I was also asked how much of the total vote had not been expended last year because the positions were not all filled. The amount voted was $574,955, and we expended $503,130, leaving $71,825 unexpended. I imagine that in the appropriation I am asking for to-night there will be more than that amount which will not be expended. As some salaries may go up, I have decided to ask for an appropriation such as this but I want to assure the Committee that in future, as in the past, there will be no increase in the staff unless it is absolutely necessary. As fast as people leave the service by death or marriage, or whatever the cause may be, there will be no appointment to fill these positions unless they are actually necessary. I think, therefore, that there would be a larger balance unexpended at the end of the present fiscal year than there was at the end of last year.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: The minister made a saving last year of $70,000 and he still asks for about the same sum this year. Why not reduce the Estimates proportionately if he expects to employ fewer rather than more? Does he expect to have a surplus next year?

Mr. CARVELL: I certainly think we will not expend the amount asked for in the appropriation.

Mr. FOSTER: You had a surplus last year of $70,000. Your Estimates should be reduced by that amount.

Mr. CARVELL: I am rather inclined to agree with my hon. friend, but in making up these Estimates in the department there is a strong feeling that we must provide for all contingencies, although I confess it does not look like good business.

Mr. McKENZIE: Who is the chief architect of the Public Works Department?

Mr. CARVELL: Mr. Wright.

Mr. McKENZIE: What has become of our good old friend, the late chief architect, Mr. Ewart?

Mr. CARVELL: Mr. Ewart is still in the department. He occupies a very responsible position as a sort of consulting architect in connection with the construction of the Parliament buildings. I want to say in the most public manner possible that I look upon him as perhaps one of the most valuable men we have in connection with the construction of that new building. While he is considerably over eighty years of age, he possesses all his faculties, he is at his office early and late and very many times in every month I call upon Mr. Ewart for information and he is always ready with it.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: I see that there is an appropriation of $44,000, an increase of $14,000, for travelling expenses. It looks as if there is going to be more travelling, or more joy riding.

Mr. CARVELL: In my judgment no money can be expended by any department, especially the department of Public Works, more profitably than that which is properly expended for travelling expenses. I have found occasion, several times during the past year, to send men from Halifax to Vancouver. We have expended on the construction of military hospitals and other military buildings, since the first of April in the last fiscal year nearly $10,000,000. There is hardly a day when a report does not come in from one of these stations, and we have found that we get the best results by sending a man from Ottawa to make a personal examination, come back and not only make a report but sit down and talk it over. I am personally asking for that increase. I will defend it as vigorously as may be necessary and I look upon it as the best way in which we can spend public money in order to get results.

Ottawa—new public building.. .. 900,000

Mr. SHEARD: I am anxiously awaiting the day when we will be able to occupy a different chamber from this. Those who have to occupy the side benches are suffering a great disadvantage not only because of the difficulty of intelligently following the debates in this chamber, due to the acoustic properties, but also because of the crowded and irregular manner of the seating. It seems to me a lamentable condition of affairs that the Dominion Parliament should be constrained to discharge the greatest public duties that fall to any body under such extreme difficulties. I had hoped that last year would see the last of these conditions. I would like some assurance from the Minister of Public Works that every effort will be made to expedite the work and that the conditions will be represented to those responsible so that we can have some promise that next year we will be relieved from difficulties which, I feel certain, are very trying to a great many, especially the newer, members of the House.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: I appreciate the difficulties that the minister has been operating under during the past year. I am sure that the situation has been very trying. I understand that there was an inspection of the new buildings made by some officials and members at an earlier period of the session. Most of us are not familiar with the present condition of the building, but I think it would be very interesting to the members if the minister would give to those who have not had an opportunity of making an inspection a statement as to how far the building is advanced, and what the possibility is of being in the new House next session.

Mr. CARVELL: I shall be very glad indeed to do so, because if there is one work in connection with the department that I have taken a personal interest in for the last year and a half it is the construction of the Parliament Building. I happen to be chairman of the parliamentary committee because of the position that I occupy. While I do not want to say anything that may be construed as reflecting upon any person, I do not think I would be doing justice to myself, let alone to the House of Commons, if I did not say that I have been very much disappointed with the progress of the work. There has been nothing in my experience as a minister that has given me greater disappointment, I think, than the manner in which that work has been carried on. I have made myself almost a nuisance to many people in connection with it, but I have done my best anyway. I have told the workmen, and I propose to say here, that I do not think we have received value for the money we have paid out, and the fault is not all with the workmen either. There seems to be a general feeling on the part of pretty nearly every one connected with the institution that it is good, easy, government money, and that it is a great mistake to get through with the job too soon. For that reason I am having a lot of difficulty.

As to the possibilities of the future, I am not as pessimistic perhaps as one might gather from the statement I am making, because I do believe that, barring strikes, the building will be in such shape by the first of January next—and I presume there will not be a session of Parliament before that date,—that it can be occupied for parliamentary purposes.

But I may as well tell the Committee that the building will be in no way nearly completed. I believe the House of Commons Chamber will certainly be ready for occupation, and probably pretty will advanced toward completion. The walls are practically all up; I mean the inside lining of stone is practically up. The ceiling is now being plastered and being got ready for the decorative work, and the galleries are started. Nothing has been done to the floors, but it seems to me that in the course of the next three or four months the House of Commons Chamber ought to be pretty well under way. I see no prospect of the Senate Chamber being ready for occupation unless there is a very great change in the movements of the men who are putting up the building.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: That will not affect the Commoners.

Mr. CARVELL: I think I should say there are a number of very fine committee rooms in the building. There are very large reading rooms, and there are rooms which could be easily fitted up for the reception of the Senate for one session. The Senators would be much more comfortable than they are at the present time, and they would be just as favourably situated as they were in the old House. The corridors will be pretty well finished, but probably not altogether. The building is different in the matter of entrances from the old structure; there are really three entrances instead of one. Members will recollect that in the old building everybody went in by the centre entrance and turned to the right and to the left. In the new building there will be a central entrance, which has not been started at all as far as finishing up is concerned, and I am sure, will not be completed. On the other hand there will be a lobby for the House of Commons and one for the Senate. The House of Commons lobby is pretty nearly completed, in fact most of the floors are laid and the stonework in the walls is all completed. Workmen are now engaged upon the decorative work, but that portion of the building is practically completed now. The lobby on the Senate side has not been touched at all, so that it seems to me there is not much hopes of that being finished in time.

But there is another phase of the work which is much more encouraging than that upon which I have been dwelling. The rooms are in a very forward state of completion, and there will be, I think, about twice as much accommodation in the new building as there was in the old. The building is one story higher than the old structure, and it is laid off in a different way altogether. The Senate and House of Commons chambers were in the middle of the building before. Now the chambers are at the extreme ends, so that they have lots of sunlight and fresh air. The space that was occupied by the former Senate and Commons chambers is now taken up by what they call the office blocks, that is, two blocks extending for three floors after you go up the two floors. In other words, two floors are taken up in the elevation of the House of Commons and the Senate chambers and large committee rooms below, and there are three floors in each of these office blocks. I think there are eighty-four very fine rooms which are now practically completed, and when we get delivery of the marble those rooms will be ready for the painters and even for the installation of the furniture in a very short time. In addition to that, there are a tremendous number of rooms—I would not like to say the actual number, but it must go into hundreds—all around the building both front and rear. These rooms are now, I would say. three-fourths and perhaps four-fifths plastered. The floors are laid, and in some cases, quite a number of cases, the plumbing is in a very advanced stage. The heating is also practically complete, so that there will be no question whatever of ample room for the accommodation of members, both of the Senate and House of Commons. With this condition of affairs, with the corridors in such a state that they will be passable, with the House of Commons chamber practically completed, and with plenty of room for the Senate, I see no reason in the world why we should not get into the building for the next session of Parliament.

I think I should state to the Committee, however, that the building is going to cost us a great deal more money than anybody ever imagined it would in the beginning. We have expended already a little over $5,000,000. I estimate that we will expend $2,000,000 during the coming year, and then it will not be anyway nearly complete. I have no accurate estimate with me to-night —I am sorry for that, because I might have had it—but I have not much hesitation in saying that the building will cost $8,000,000 when it is completed.

Mr. COPP: What was the original estimate of the cost?

Mr. CARVELL: About $5,000,000, possibly a little more. But we must remember that there has been an absolute revolution in the building trade since this structure was started. Wages are very much in excess of what they were, as hon. gentlemen know; the cost of materials has gone up tremendously; and had we known everything, or had even my predecessors known everything—because the cost of things had gone up pretty well before I came into office—a saving might have been effected; but they did not like to buy too far ahead, there was always the hope that the war would be over and that there would be a reduction in the price of materials. Well, the war, unfortunately, lasted longer than people thought, the price of materials has not gone down, and therefore the building has cost a great deal more than was anticipated, due entirely to conditions over which perhaps no person had control.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Are you still paying eight per cent to the contractor?

Mr. CARVELL: No, the contract provides for the payment of eight per cent to the contractors up to $4,000,000, seven per cent for the next million, and nothing above $5,000,000, so that the percentage payable to the contractors is practically earned. There is also a commission of five and a half per cent which goes to the architect, and that also stops at $5,000,000.

Mr. CAHILL: Five and a half per cent on $5,000,000?

Mr. CARVELL: Five and a half per cent on an amount not exceeding $5,000,000.

Mr. EDWARDS: Is that commission to the architects?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes.

Mr. EDWARDS: What architects?

Mr. CARVELL: Well, Mr. Pearson, for one.

Mr. EDWARDS: Is he not an employee of the Government under salary?

Mr. CARVELL: No, he gets a commission. The other architect is Mr. Marchand, of Montreal. I do not know just how the commission is divided, but Mr. Pearson gets by far the major portion of it. Mr. Pearson gets, I think, four-fifths, and Mr. Marchand the other one-fifth.

Mr. EDWARDS: I was walking around the library to-day, and I noticed a little shack behind it marked with a couple of red crosses and the inscription "hospital." I understand that at one time a doctor, or two doctors, were employed.

Mr. CARVELL: I think that is correct.

Mr. EDWARDS: Are there two doctors still employed, or any medical man at all?

Mr. CARVELL: No, I am happy to say there are no doctors on the job, and there have not been for over a year.

Mr. EDWARDS: Have there been any casualties on the works since the doctors left?

Mr. CARVELL: I have not heard of any.

Mr. EDWARDS: That is the reason for dismissing the doctors then, I presume there were casualties before? When you got rid of the doctors there were not any casualties; the men did not fall down and get hurt. Who constitutes the committee that is supervising the construction at the present time?

Mr. CARVELL: I think I can give their names from memory. From the House of Commons there are, the Minister of Public Works, who is chairman; the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Marine. I think that is all. From the Senate there are, Senators Lougheed, Watson, and Robertson.

Mr. EDWARDS: Was that Committee named by the late leader of the Opposition?

Mr. J. D. REID: Senator Watson was so named.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes; and Dr. Pugsley, Mr. Lemieux and Mr. Murphy in the beginning. Mr. Murphy, I believe, never acted, and Mr. Lemieux resigned from the Committee at the time it was decided to tear down the old building and rebuild entirely. I believe that Sir Wilfrid Laurier refused to recommend appointments to the Committee after the retirement of Messrs. Murphy and Lemieux. After the Union Government was formed Dr. Pugsley retired, and Mr. Hazen also, and other gentlemen were appointed to fill the vacancies. Senator Watson, the Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid), and Senator Lougheed, I believe, are the only original members of the Committee.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Who supervised the purchase of materials?

Mr. CARVELL: That would be a pretty hard question to answer. For the last year and a half practically everything that could be purchased by public tender has been so purchased. A large part of the work that originally was intended to be carried out by the contractors has been done by a sort of subcontract—for instance, the heating. Members, if they have ever gone over the work, will perhaps realize that the building is to be heated from a central heating plant on the bank of the Ottawa river about a third of a mile from the buildings. The heat is conveyed by steam pipes through a tunnel which is all completed, the steam heats the water, and the hot water is pumped through the building. That work was all done by contract; that is, we called for tenders, a number of people tendered, and the work was given to the lowest tenderer, and he has completed his work.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Do the contractors get a commission on that?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, 8 per cent; that is up to $5,000,000. The same is true of the plumbing.

Mr. EDWARDS: Does that commission cease at $5,000,000?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, the commission ceases when the cost reaches $5,000,000, and as the building has now cost $5,000,000, it really does not make very much difference because they will get no commission in the future. The same is true of the windows, the doors and the woodwork; we called for tenders. There was a good deal of criticism of our standing by that principle in the case of the woodwork, because that was held to be artistic work which some person should be appointed to design and execute. However, we took the ground that it was not impossible to draw specifications, and we did draw specifications and called for tenders. We gave one portion of the work to the lowest tenderer. As to the remainder, the next lowest tenderer withdrew his tender and the work went to the next lowest. We have followed that principle wherever possible, and we have found it possible in nearly every instance. I can scarcely recall the purchase of anything since I have been on the committee that has not been by tender; in fact, any exception would be a matter of very, very minor importance. Of course, we are reaching the point where some of the work cannot be done by tender. We have just completed arrangements with a gentleman to come here and design centres, ceilings, and decorations of that kind. Tenders cannot be called for for that particular work; it has to be done by hiring some person of artistic leanings to carry it out. The same will be true of many other things in the future. But I can assure the Committee that wherever it has been possible we have called for tenders, and invariably the contract has gone to the lowest tenderer, except, I think, one case, the details of which I have forgotten, but there were very good reasons there for departing from our rule.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Has the architect been paid the full amount of his commission?

Mr. CARVELL: I am not positive about that. I think there is some little question at issue.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Does he get 5 per cent on the total cost?

Mr. CARVELL: He gets 5½ per cent.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Up to $8,000,000?

Mr. CARVELL: Up to $5,000,000.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The reason I ask that question is that the architect is getting a very large sum of money and there are particular points about his work that will not be known until the building is completed,—such, for example, as the acoustics. If he has made a mess of that he should not be paid the full amount of his commission, because that is a matter of vital importance. It has been discussed frequently in the House, and the attention of the present minister and of the former minister has been drawn to it. If we get a chamber like this, for example, where we cannot hear what is being said, it would be a calamity after spending so much money, and the architect is the man to take responsibility for that. Then there is the ventilation, which was very bad in the old Chamber, and which we all hope will be good in the new one. I was disappointed to see a corridor around the lower part of the building so that the Chamber is not exposed to the fresh air on any side as this Chamber is; the upper part is. But the acoustics is a matter of vital importance, and if the architect has not been paid his full commission, I would suggest that a portion be retained until the building is completed and it is known if he has done his work properly or not.

Mr. CARVELL: I appreciate the point made by my hon. friend. Of course, I am not responsible for the contract. I have watched the construction of the new building pretty carefully from the standpoint of the architect. I do not think my hon. friend need have the least fear that it will not be the best that money can build—at least, I have seen no evidence of any attempt to stop the expenditure of money. There is one thing sure from Mr. Pearson's standpoint—and I want to say it to his credit, because it is a great national structure,—that he is determined that it shall be the very best of its kind that can be produced. I have discussed with him a good many times the question of acoustics. He has gone to different places in the States to investigate—in fact, he wants to go to Great Britain, and I rather advise that he should be allowed to go in order to discuss and investigate this very important question, because we all realize that the acoustics of the Chamber is the most important in connection with the whole enterprise, outside of having a substantial building. As to the ventilation, if my hon. friend would just take a forenoon and go through the building he would satisfy himself beyond question that the ventilation has been looked after in a manner that has never been attempted before.

Mr. EDWARDS: How do you get through the fence?

Mr. CARVELL: I think if my hon. friend will present his card he will find no difficulty in getting through—in fact, they will be only too happy to send some one with him to point out the different features of construction. Those are the instructions, and I am sure they will be carried out. In fact, I have asked and suggested that members take the trouble to go through the buildings, and I think they ought to do so. If my hon. friend would go into the building and go down into the basement, he would find miles of galvanized iron pipes, some of them four and five feet in diameter, extending all through the building. They come up into the chamber out of the wall about six feet from the floor, and fresh air is being constantly pumped from pipes outside of the building through the basement up through those pipes and distributed throughout the chamber. Then there are other pipes, such as we have in this building, ventilating pipes that take the old air away. I cannot give my hon. friend any guarantee as to the acoustics, but I can absolutely assure him that there will be no question about the ventilation. That takes place in all portions of the building where it is necessary to have ventilation. I do not think that takes place in what they would call the ordinary members' rooms, although it does to some extent. All the windows in the members' rooms are casement windows. There is no wood about them whatever; they are made of steel, copper and glass with a small lever by which they are opened and thrown out a little way, and a thumb-screw keeps them at any angle at which the member wants them.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: Is there a clerk of works in charge of the construction of the building? That is usual in large buildings of this kind. If so, is he paid by the contractor or by the Government?

Mr. CARVELL: In justice to Mr. Pearson, I should have stated—and I intended to when I had the opportunity—that Mr. Pearson himself employs all of his own staff out of the 5½ per cent.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: That is the clerk of works who looks after the construction work?

Mr. CARVELL: Mr. Pearson is responsible for the inspection as the work proceeds. Hon. members must not run away with the idea that Mr. Pearson gets the whole four-fifths of 5½ per cent and gives nothing for it. He has quite a large staff and his expenditures will be very considerable. We may regret the cost of this work, and I have, perhaps, somewhat disagreed with Mr. Pearson, and sometimes, I think, the work has not been done too well in some portions, but that does not make any difference, it is being done the very best it is possible to do it under the circumstances. Mr. Pearson has a competent staff and is responsible for seeing that the work is properly carried out.

Mr. CAHILL: The minister said he was very much dissatisfied with the progress of the work, but he did not tell us just how or why. The question arises as to the commissions to be paid to both the contractor and the architect. If the building up to this time has cost approximately $5,000,000, or the amount that the commission is to be paid on to the architect, what arrangement has been made for the completion of the building? The architect is paying out probably several thousand dollars a month in carrying out his portion of the work. Will he continue until this work is completed to pay that money out of his own pocket, or will an arrangement be made to pay him out of the public treasury? The same thing may be said with regard to the contractor. If his commission ends at a cost of $5,000,000, and the building is estimated to cost $8,000,000 and will go on for another year before it is completed, what provision has been made for supervision by the contractor and the architect?

Mr. CARVELL: There is no provision whatever. They receive this commission on $5,000,000. Of course, the money has not all been paid to them; there is a certain drawback still coming to them.

Mr. CAHILL: About how much?

Mr. CARVELL: The note I have says that one-fifth of the commission which is to be paid upon the whole $5,000,000, will be paid upon the completion of the preliminary sketches. The remaining four-fifths is to be paid pro rata from time to time as payments are made to the contractor. I know some money is being held back as regards Mr. Pearson. There is no provision made for that balance, but it must be remembered that these are honourable gentlemen and that they have received up to the present time a fair return for services rendered. I think I can state both as regards Mr. Lyall and Mr. Pearson that they will go on regardless of whether there will be any more commissions or not. I am satisfied that Mr. Pearson is so wrapped up in the work that if it took the rest of his natural life, he would gladly give it to stay there and see that the work was properly executed. Mr. Pearson, I think, looks upon it as his life's work, and regardless of commissions in the future, Mr. Pearson will stay there and see the work through and make it just as great a success as he possibly can. In saying that as regards Mr. Pearson, I do not wish to cast any discredit upon Mr. Lyall, but Mr. Lyall does not look upon this in the same manner as Mr. Pearson does. Mr. Lyall has many other business interests in Canada and he has to look after them. Mr. Lyall has, unfortunately, been ill for the last three months, and has not been able to give this work any personal attention at all, but from a conversation I have had with him only last week, there is no question he will be able to give it his personal attention and his staff will be there, and this work will proceed just as well in the future as it has done in the past.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the cause of the delay?

Mr. CARVELL: I can put it in very plain language. There is a feeling when men are working for the Government that it is good, easy money and there is no good hurrying themselves too much. It is just that temperamentality running through the whole thing. I have told the workmen to their faces what I am saying here, namely, that I do not think they have given us value for our money. Sometimes they disagree with me and sometimes they blame somebody besides themselves, but that is my view of the matter. And the last time I met them, which was one day only last week, I certainly told them in plain language what I thought about the matter and what I hoped would be the case in the future.

Mr. CROWE: The minister stated that the heating plant was stationed one-third of a mile away from the building. Any person who understands the conveying of heat from a unit to a building must realize that there is a very large percentage of waste. Why was that heating plant put so far away from the building?

Mr. CARVELL: I cannot give the reason why. I have seen nothing to lead me to believe that it is not one of the most up-to-date heating plants in the world to-day. There is this about it: The pipes go through a concrete subway six feet by seven, and if the subway does not stand it is not because enough steel and concrete were not put into it, because reinforced steel was put in underneath even over bed-rock, so that it is going to stay there. There will be no chance for cold getting in; there will be no condensation, and the subway, fortunately, is all uphill from the time the steam leaves the plant until it gets into the building.

I am told that the amount of condensation or loss will be extremely small. The pipes, I think, are nine or ten inches in diameter. The east and west blocks, the Langevin block and the Supreme Court buildings are all to be heated from the same central plant. The engineers have figured out that there will be a very substantial saving in the heating of these buildings from a central plant, as compared with individual plants for the several buildings. But this is an engineering matter, and I have not expert knowledge on the subject. I would say, however, that the engineers must be right, and personally I look for no trouble whatever.

Mr. MORPHY: How far below the surface is the main conduit to the building?

Mr. CARVELL: On an average it is from three to four feet below the surface of the street to the top of the tunnel; the tunnel is seven feet deep and six feet wide. These pipes are suspended in the tunnel, and there are manholes at a few places so that repairs can be made, but these are all air tight. The pipes will be protected by asbestos, and every precaution will be taken that there shall be as little loss as possible in transmission. There is this further advantage: there will be no furnaces, and consequently no soot or dust around the building. This plan, I think, will effect a great economy and be of great advantage from the sanitary standpoint.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: Does the minister's estimate of $8,000,000 include the cost of the furniture?

Mr CARVELL: No, I do not think so. I hope that the committee will realize that when I said $8,000,000, that is only an approximate estimate. My reason for saying that is this: I know about what is expected to be done during the coming year, and I know that $2,000,000 will not finish the tower; in fact, it will not do much more than lay the foundation for the tower. I think it will take $8,000,000 to finish the building exclusive of furniture. We have not considered the question of furniture yet, and I must confess I am somewhat at a loss to know how to go about it.

Mr. COPP: Are you going to use mahogany?

Mr. CARVELL: I presume there will be certain rooms that should be finished in mahogany. I do not see how tenders can be called for for furniture, because you cannot very well draw up specifications. A number of the biggest firms have been discussing the matter and would like to have a chance to tender. I can only say that they will all have the opportunity, but I think even before that time comes, some artistic brain must be set to work to advise the colour scheme and the general arrangement of the furniture and rugs and things of that kind. I confess that it is beyond me. I think I know something about the building, but I am not an expert on the artistic side of it. I can assure the Committee, however, that nothing will be done in the matter until it has been thoroughly considered.

Mr. STEELE: The statement of the minister to-night is very encouraging, so far as it holds out a reasonable prospect of the House occupying the new building next session. It will be a great relief to us who have spent several sessions in this building to get into the new building with all its conveniences and comforts. I should like to impress upon the Committee that the architect and the contractors are not the only ones who have a personal interest in the building. Every member of the House has a very direct personal interest in it, and while many of us may not occupy a seat in it for a great number of years, our successors will. The members of the House of Commons and of the Senate who are privileged to occupy seats in this and future Parliaments will be compelled to spend a very large portion of their lives in that building, and I think men who have spent from twelve to fifteen hours a day for five or six months of each year in this building are entitled to the very greatest degree of comfort that it is possible to give them in the new building now being erected. I trust that the inner arrangements for the comfort of the members will not be overlooked in the larger plan of producing a fine building. I have had the privilege of going over the building two or three times, the last time only a few weeks ago, and from what an inexperienced person like myself could see I must say that the building promises a very great degree of comfort indeed for the individual members of the House. That is necessary if we are to give our best to Parliament. The conditions here prevent us giving our best work; they are destructive to the interest that we take in the House, for the simple reason that we are unable to follow its proceedings. I would therefore again impress upon the Committee the necessity of seeing that the very greatest possible degree of comfort and convenience is provided for the individual members of the House and Senate.

Mr. CARVELL: I quite appreciate the necessity of everything my hon. friend has indicated, and I can assure him that everything is being done that can reasonably be done in order to meet the requirements he has mentioned. There will be sufficient rooms in the new building to give every man who wishes it a private office. I do not imagine that every man will wish it, because in some cases two members would prefer to be together, but I think I can safely say that there will be sufficient space to give every man who really wishes it a private office. The offices will be suitably furnished. The floors will be of nailacrete, which is a little softer than concrete. Over that will be a covering of battleship linoleum, and over that a carpet or rug of some kind. Suitable desks, chairs, lounges and things of that kind will be provided. There will be a hot and cold water basin in every room, I believe, and ten elevators in the building. Lavatories will be provided where required. In my judgment one of the greatest comforts and conveniences of the whole building will be the restaurant, which is being built above the Commons Chamber. Not only will it be beautiful in design, but, overlooking the Ottawa river, I think it has one of the prettiest locations I have ever seen in my life. The kitchens will be on a very elaborate scale. Hon. members can rest assured that everything will be done to provide for their comfort and health and for that of the officials of the House and all those who have to live within its precincts.

Mr. EDWARDS: Will accommodation be provided in the building for the Speaker of the Commons and the Speaker of the Senate?

Mr. CARVELL: It has been decided that the Speakers of the respective Houses shall not reside in the building.

Mr. COPP: I appreciate the last remarks of the minister in regard to the arrangement of the new Parliament buildings and am pleased to see that some interest is being taken in the comfort and personal satisfaction of private members. My experience of the old Parliament was very short, but I found when I came there that I occupied a room in the cellar with five or six other members. We had some sort of desks but there was not a bookcase of any kind in which one could keep books or papers, and we did not find it very convenient. We did not expect anything elaborate here, but it would be impossible for members to do any kind of decent work in the rooms we are occupying here, there being as many as eight or ten in some rooms, and not fewer than four or five in any. It makes it very inconvenient and practically impossible for members to prepare their work. I am not very fastidious about the furniture that is in the rooms. In my room now I have an old desk that was brought down in pieces from the fire in the old Parliament building and nailed together. However, I have not made any requisition for furniture. I may, but I do not know that the Minister of Public Works would grant my request if I did. Speaking seriously, I am very glad to hear the minister tell us that in the new Parliament buildings there will be proper facilities and plenty of room. One or two in a room is all right, but in order to carry on the work of the session and to do any other work which may be necessary, proper facilities are indispensable. We regret that we have had to remain here so long, and trust this will be the last session. It would be gratifying for those who will have the privilege of being in the new building to have adequate convenience and comfort.

Mr. MORPHY: Will there be provided a recreation room in the shape of a gymnasium for the use of members? I am quite serious about this.

Mr. CARVELL: I am serious too, and I will go so far as to say that it has been considered, although I do not think it has been done. I may state what Mr. Pearson has suggested to me, and what I would regard with favour. He proposes that there be a walk all round the library, a place that can be kept in the winter time at a fairly warm temperature, where members can exercise. The suggestion appeals strongly to me. As to a real gymnasium or anything of that kind, I do not think that has been considered, although if it were thought necessary I think space enough could be found in the basement to provide almost anything like that, because there are two floors below the ground floor. There is much more space there than one would ever think unless he went through the building, so that if it were thought advisable to adopt this proposal there could be no difficulty about it.

Mr. EDWARDS: I am very glad that the hon. member drew attention to that feature of the building. There has been a commendable unanimity of opinion amongst members that the new building should conduce to the comfort of the members both of the House of Commons and of the Senate. We spend long hours here, especially the members of the House of Commons. No eight-hour a day schedule applies to members of the House of Commons, and even the shortest day is a long day, and would be considered by any person in any other walk of life as requiring "time and a half" at least if not "double pay" for overtime. We are here twelve, fifteen and sixteen hours a day, week after week and month after month, and I say in all seriousness that there should be some provision whereby members who have an hour or an hour and a half at their disposal can take systematic exercise. That is a common-sense view of the matter. Personally it has always been a case of putting off exercise from day to day, but if there were a gymnasium room—and there would be ample space for a place of that kind—the members could take half an hour and go for an exercise with benefit to their health. Since the minister says that this matter has come up for consideration, I would suggest the advisability of appointing a Committee of this House—I do not know that it would be necessary to have a Committee of the Senate, although we might have some of the younger members of that body if it were thought fit—to confer with the Committee who have supervision of this work to consider the question of having some recreation room in the new building. Some may regard this as of little consequence, but in my opinion it is a matter of great importance, and I would like the question to be seriously considered.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not by any means consider it a matter of small consequence. On the contrary, I have been discussing it with the architects for the last year, and while we have not agreed upon what shall be done it has been practically decided that there shall be a promenade indoors, to which members can resort in winter time. I would very heartily welcome the advice and assistance of a committee of the House. I will bring the matter up at the next meeting of the Parliamentary Committee and also take means, if the House deems fit, to see that a committee is appointed to discuss the question with the Parliamentary Committee, because it is something that touches the health of every member. I do not suppose there are half a dozen members who do not realize that they are not getting sufficient exercise. I am not getting the exercise I should, largely because there is no opportunity without going off to the Y. M.C.A. I regard the matter as of great importance and will take whatever steps are necessary to see that it is brought up in the way suggested.

Mr. MANION: As a medical man, I strongly support the suggestion made by the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) and endorsed by the Minister of Public Works, because I think it is very essential that men who are doing mental work, as we are here, should get sufficient exercise. We are all getting on toward middle life—I would not say that anyone of us was getting past that stage,—and we should consider seriously the establishment of a few rooms in the basement for a gymnasium and place of exercise, where there might also be a few shower baths. This would be all that would be necessary and it would be practically inexpensive. It would give a fair amount of exercise to most members, and the members of the Press Gallery could also work off some of their superfluous energy there.

Mr. FIELDING: Do I understand the hon. minister to say that practically the whole of the commission to the architects has been paid out?

Mr. CARVELL: It has been all earned and a substantial amount paid out.

Mr. FIELDING: It is of course gratifying to know that we are dealing with honourable gentlemen who will fulfil their obligations. But even when one is dealing with honourable gentlemen, regard must be had to business principles. Do we understand that in the making of these contracts the arrangement is of such a nature that we may pay the architect the entire amount of his compensation while the building is little more than half completed?

Mr. CARVELL: I have not the contract before me but I am pretty sure that is about the substance of it. Of course, I can do nothing but carry out the contract. There is no actual written contract with the architects, but there is sufficient correspondence in existence to practically make up a contract. There was some little question whether the commission would be allowed on one certain item, and I believe that a formal contract had never been signed. The fact that the building is going to cost $2,250,000 or $3,000,000 more than anticipated does not make any difference at all; we take it for granted that the architects are entitled to their commission on $5,000,000. I am not in a position to say how much has been paid out, but I know that practically the whole amount has been paid, because the contract calls for it. They get their commission monthly upon the expenditure. That is the contract.

Mr. FIELDING: If that is the contract, of course the minister must fulfil it, but ordinary business principles would seem to indicate that the commission should be paid out pro rata with the progress of the building. Supposing anything should happen to these most excellent gentlemen, of whom I am quite sure I cannot speak too highly, suppose they should be called by death, you would have a building a little more than half completed, the commission paid out and nobody to supervise the work for the remainder of the time.

Mr. PARENT: Were there two contracts, one with the contractors and one with the architects?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes.

Mr. PARENT: Who are the architects who appear in the contract?

Mr. CARVELL: Mr. Pearson and Mr. Marchand, of Montreal.

Mr. PARENT: Are they in partnership?

Mr. CARVELL: In a way. Mr. Marchand acts in an advisory capacity and attends meetings of the committee whenever anything of importance is going on. Mr. Pearson acts as resident architect and inspector of the work and has personal charge.

Mr. PARENT: If a contract has been entered into between these two architects, plans must have been prepared and submitted to the Department of Public Works here. If such was the case, I would like to know whether the plans were prepared by Mr. Pearson or Mr. Marchand and what commission the Government agreed to pay for the preparation of the plans. I understand that there would be a commission paid for the preparation of the plans and also a commission for the supervision of the work.

Mr. CARVELL: They were to be paid one-fifth of the commission upon the whole $5,000,000 upon the completion of the preliminary sketches. It always seemed to me that that payment was entirely out of proportion to the amount of work performed.

Mr. PARENT: That is paid to them jointly?

[Mr. Carvell.]

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, it is a joint contract and they have a private arrangement between themselves as to the division. Then the balance of the amount is paid monthly according to the progress estimates. I feel pretty sure that the bulk of that amount has been paid out both to the architects and the contractors.

Mr. PARENT: Is there provision in the contract by which, if the cost of the work should exceed $5,000,000, the commission shall be reduced?

Mr. CARVELL: No; they simply get 8 per cent up to $4,000,000 and 7 per cent on the next million, and nothing on any amount expended beyond that.

Mr. PARENT: If I should require the minister to place on the Table a copy of the two contracts I hope he will be able to do so and that we will have an opportunity of seeing them.

Mr. CARVELL: I shall be delighted to get them.

Mr. PROULX: The minister said that the architects were paid monthly on progress estimates. Who makes these estimates?

Mr. CARVELL: They are made up by our own staff very largely. Mr. Ewart occupies the position of consulting architect for the department and all of this work is under his special care and attention. He has a staff with him. The deputy minister has to pass on everything, and he is in a sense a member of this parliamentary committee. All the progress estimates are supervised, revised and scrutinized in every way possible by the department before the estimates are paid. The architect makes the plans, and directs the contractor what he shall do and how he shall do it. We have men who are looking after the timekeeping and these reports are handed in to the Public Works Department. The department, under the supervision of Mr. Ewart, goes over these matters fortnightly and makes up the pay list. Outside of the pay list practically everything for the last year and a half has been a matter of contract. There is a pretty extensive pay list. We have something over 600 men employed directly under the contract of Mr. Lyall, and I do not know how many men there are who are carrying out these various subcontracts to which I referred a short time ago.

Mr. CAHILL: Has the minister in mind any plan whereby he might hasten this work? Could the department take over the work themselves, get better results and get the work done more quickly? I do not know what the rate of pay to the men is, but as a general thing when men are getting satisfactory pay they work pretty well provided it is not made to look like a life job to them. We have this undertaking costing $5,000,000, which is practically a dead investment until the work is completed. If you could hasten the completion of the building you would save $250,000 or more a year on the investment. You might bonus the employees to get the work done quicker, and if you did so it would be a great convenience to the members and a benefit to the people generally.

Mr. CARVELL: I am afraid my hon. friend is a little late in his plea for the employees, because they have signed an agreement that will fix their wages until next year. If he had made his plea eight or nine days ago he might have got some political benefit, but that time has gone by now. These employees are getting pretty well paid and they have come to an agreement with the employers in Ottawa. I had nothing to do with it at all. The contractors employing help got together with the workmen, our workmen included, and came to an agreement that was satisfactory to the men and which was signed by them. This contract runs until the first of May, 1920. I do not think there is much use in talking about a bonus to the men. As to the contractors, I do not think anybody will seriously consider that I should pay them a bonus, because I think the sense of this committee is that they are fairly well paid as it is. We possibly might have taken the work out of the contractors' hands but I do not know that any good would have been accomplished by it. I think it would have been a great mistake to have taken it out of the Lyalls' hands.

Mr. COPP: They might be quite willing to be relieved of it now.

Mr. CARVELL: They might be quite willing to be relieved now. I do not feel like relieving them of it. When I came in I was bound by the contract. I do not feel like violating contracts unless there are strong reasons for doing so. But I can say frankly that I have not been satisfied with the progress of the work. I repeat it here. I am doing all I can anyway, but I shall endeavour to see that the work goes a little faster in the future than in the past.

Mr. CAHILL: I am not trying to make any political capital with regard to labour, I represent a farming constituency, and I am not at all worrying about that phase of the matter. But I have had some experience in the building business, and I made it a practice to give my men a bonus if they completed the work before a certain date. I always had good results with that system, and got the work completed much faster than other fellows around who were trying to keep wages down and would not resort to the bonus system. In this case the contractors are practically through as far as regards getting a bonus. Now, they may be honourable men, but as the minister pointed out, they are not spending very much time here, because they have other work to look after, and if the Government could save money and get into the building sooner I do not believe there would be any great difficulty in cancelling the contract.

Mr. EDWARDS: Does the hon. gentleman believe in that policy in regard to all Government buildings?

Mr. CARVELL: I now wish to take up an item in the Supplementary Estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1919.

Ottawa Parliament Building—Restoration, $773,000.

Mr. CARVELL: I think last year a million and a half was voted, but it did not take care of the work. The money was advanced, I think, out of the war funds temporarily, and we are now asking Parliament to vote this Supplementary Estimate to provide for the work that was not covered in the Estimates as passed by Parliament last year.

Mr. FIELDING: That is for the past year?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes. It is included in the estimate I have given of $5,000,000, as being the cost of the work up to the present time.

LOCATION OF RAILWAYS.

Hon. J. D. Reid (Minister of Railways) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 93 (from the Senate), to amend the Railway Act (Location of Railways).

Motion agreed to and Bill read the first time.

THE DOMINION IRON AND STEEL; NOVA SCOTIA STEEL AND COAL.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. A. R. McMASTER (Brome): I wish to draw the attention of the Government to an article which appeared in the Financial Times of the 3rd instant, stating in effect that Premier Borden had communicated with the Dominion Iron and Steel Company and advised them that they were not to amalgamate with the Nova Scotia Steel and Coal Company, and that this action on his part had been suggested, if not insisted upon, by the British Government. I wish first to know whether it is true that the British Government has taken the position of advising our Prime Minister what should be done in connection with Canadian local affairs; and, if true, I would ask how the Government reconciles that position with its somewhat loud protestations in this House of the growth of nationality?

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): In answer to my hon. friend's rather rhetorical question, I may suggest to him that the British Government is not at all likely to interfere, and has not to my knowledge interfered, in any way in such a matter of purely Dominion jurisdiction as the one brought to our attention. So I think I can ease his mind at once as to that. I may say further that it is not within my knowledge that the Prime Minister has recently communicated in any way with the Dominion Iron and Steel Company or the Nova Scotia Steel Company with regard to the matter in question. It did receive some attention during the war, when, I believe, it was thought decidedly inadvisable that the control of the steel industry in Canada should pass from Canadian hands. So far as I am concerned, that would be my position to-day.

RE-CLASSIFICATION OF CIVIL SERVICE.

AMALGAMATED POSTAL WORKERS.

Mr. G. W. ANDREWS (Winnipeg Centre): May I ask my hon. friend the President of the Council, if the Government has received any communication from the Amalgamated Postal Workers in reference to a possible strike?

Hon. N. W. ROWELL (President of the Privy Council): On May 7, the Postmaster General received the following telegram from the Secretary of the Amalgamated Postal Workers, Mr. J. A. Elrick:

> Events seem to indicate re-classification will not go through Parliament this session or if it does we will not have time to represent our opinion. If so must remind you our most important questions were deferred pending same and present restlessness will immediately develop trouble when prorogation becomes obvious. Would appreciate statement for information of membership.

To which the Postmaster General replied on the 8th:

> Your fears absolutely groundless. Newspaper reports entirely without foundation. Matter being printed every day and will be taken up as soon as bound and ready. It will unquestionably be attended to this session and every opportunity given to postal workers for examination.

That apparently did not satisfy some members of the Association, and the Postmaster General received a further telegram on Sunday afternoon pressing for a statement that the re-classification would be brought down this week, to which he replied in accordance with the statement made by the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. A. K. Maclean) in the House yesterday. I have also received the following telegram from Mr. Elrick:

> Re-classification Bill promised May first covers most important grievances of postal workers and its non-appearance and general upheaval driving members beyond control and when definite steps are taken only complete settlement will suffice. Official notification of impatient action will reach me within three days and only quick showing of re-classification will stand the general demands for a tie up and the keystone of the trouble being Government employees will create a dangerous movement at this time. I appeal to you to have re-classification in the House not later than Tuesday.

When the representatives of the Western Postal Workers were here they interviewed the Civil Service Commission and the experts who were re-classifying the service, and they had exactly the same knowledge as the Government had as to when the re-classification would be brought down. They were informed, as the Government was, that it was anticipated that the re-classification would be ready in time to enable the Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce (Hon. A. K. Maclean) to present the Bill to the House during the first week in May. Last night, therefore, I replied as follows:—

Referring your night letter, you and your associates conferred with Civil Service Commission and experts while here and you know we had assurance from them that the re-classication would be completed so that it could be presented to House during first week of May and it was relying on this that Government made its promise to you. Government has been urging utmost expedition and we feel sure that Civil Service Commission and experts have done everything in their power to get schedules completed but it has not been humanly possible to do so. As Postmaster General has wired you schedules are now completed and are all in printers' hands and Printing Bureau has been instructed to have them translated and printed as rapidly as possible. Am advised by Civil Service Commission that printing which has already commenced will take substantially longer than originally estimated and this is one explanation of delay but as everything relates back to first of April, Post Office employees cannot be prejudiced in any way by unavoidable though regrettable delay, and precipitate action on their part would be wholly unjustifiable.

It has been intimated that the post office employees may go out on a sympathetic strike with other parties striking in certain sections of Western Canada. The Government's view is that such a course would be wholly unjustifiable. The Government has taken every possible step to bring the re-classification down at the earliest practicable date, and the post office employees will be in no wise prejudiced by a few days' delay, because the re-classification relates back to the first of April.

UKRAINIA AND GALICIA AND POLAND.

On the Orders of the Day:

Sir SAM HUGHES (Victoria): I desire to ask the leader of the Government whether he or any of his ministers have received a protest on behalf of the Ruthenian, Ukrainian, and, in general, the Galician people of Canada against the annexation of their native land of Ukrainia and Eastern Galicia to Poland, or to any other state whose authority would not be congenial to them.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have not had any recent communications on the subject. Some time ago representations were made which were transmitted to the Prime Minister, attending the Peace Conference.

Sir SAM HUGHES: This telegram came yesterday.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Possibly a similar telegram may be in my office now.

Sir SAM HUGHES: It was sent to the Minister of the Interior (Hon. Arthur Meighen).

WAR EXPENDITURE—$350,000,000 VOTE.

On motion of Sir Thomas White (Acting Prime Minister), Bill No. 68, for granting to His Majesty aid for demobilization and other purposes, was read the third time.

Sir THOMAS WHITE moved:

That the said Bill do now pass and that the title be as on the Order Paper.

He said: I desire to say a few words on account of a discussion which took place in the Committee stage with respect to the borrowing powers which this Bill authorizes. I find upon inquiry that as it stands the Bill is satisfactory to my department. The amount which it authorizes the Government to borrow is $350,000,000, less any amount borrowed in excess of the amounts authorized by any War Appropriation Act. That means that to the extent to which we have over-borrowed in respect of past war appropriations, the $350,000,000 will be reduced. If we have borrowed $100,000,000 in excess of the amount authorized by previous War Appropriation Acts, then the maximum amount which we could borrow under this Bill would be $250,000,000. I was under a slight misapprehension the other night when the Bill was in the Committee stage, and the point drawn to my attention by the member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding) was well taken; that is to say, that section 4 of the Bill authorizes the borrowing of $350,000,000, but less any amounts that have been over-borrowed in respect of previous War Appropriation Acts. The result of this legislation, so far as borrowing powers are concerned, will be—with previous legislation—to give the Government power to borrow for war purposes only to the extent for which expenditures have been authorized by the Acts in question, and no more. Any further borrowing power which the Dominion Government may require in respect of the expenditures authorized by Parliament, either previously or at this session, will be provided for by other legislation. I think, therefore, that the Bill, as it stands, should pass.

Mr. McKENZIE: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER: The Bill has been given its third reading, and the motion that the title pass is not debatable. I thought it was due to the Acting Prime Minister that he should make the explanation which he wished to make, and there should be no objection to the leader of the Opposition putting a question; but there can be no debate on this motion.

Mr. McKENZIE: I did not intend to enter into any debate. I simply want to inquire how much over-borrowing is to be covered by this Bill. What is the exact borrowing power of the Bill?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am unable to answer definitely, but I think $200,000,000 would be the amount which under this Bill we could borrow. As I have stated, if we require further borrowing power in respect of other legislation, we shall provide either in the Appropriation Bill of this year or otherwise for such power.

Motion agreed to.

DOMINION FOREST RESERVES AND PARKS ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Sir Thomas White (Acting Prime Minister) Bill No. 7, to amend The Dominion Forest Reserves and Parks Act—Hon. Mr. Meighen—was read the third time and passed.

MARKING OF CONTAINERS.

On motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce) the House went into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution:

That it is expedient to provide,—

(1) That every can, carton, bottle, box, barrel, wrapper, package or closed receptacle containing human food or any other commodity manufactured, produced, sold or offered for sale in Canada, when such container is in its original unopened or unbroken form as it is usually delivered to consumers when sold or offered for sale in Canada, should be plainly marked, branded or stamped with the name and address of the fillers, and the weight, measure or quantity of the contents of the container;

(2) That this proposed legislation shall not apply to packages for export from Canada, or goods sold in bulk or broken packages, or fresh fruit and vegetables, or articles held in stock by a wholesale or retail dealer prior to the coming into force of the proposed legislation, or packages containing two avoirdupois ounces or less, or one fluid ounce or less, or to any article the sale of which as regards the weight or marking thereof is already provided for under other statutes;

(3) That tolerance and variations shall be allowed for discrepancies due exclusively to errors in weighing, measuring or counting which occur in packing conducted in compliance with good commercial practice, or due exclusively to differences in atmospheric conditions, evaporation or absorption of water;

(4) That penalties may be imposed for violation of the law, and the proposed legislation shall come into force one year from the date of the Royal Assent.

Mr. ROBB: When similar legislation was before the House last year, objection was taken that it would impose additional obligations upon farmers who fill milk and cream for shipment to the cities, and that it would add considerably to the price paid by the consumer. Has the minister taken that into consideration? I presume he has looked up the debate upon the Bill of last year.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Bill founded upon this resolution will be almost exactly the same as passed the House last year. The Bill last year was defeated in the Senate for some reason which I forget at the moment; I think it contained some provisions with regard to firewood and cement, which were objected to by the Senate, and the Bill was not proceeded with further on that account. The Bill does not contain those provisions this year, but simply provides for the marking of containers or receptacles containing human food with the name of the manufacturer and the net weight or quantity of the contents.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Does it apply to drugs?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, but I think the Act which the Bill founded on this resolution will amend applies to drugs. The draft Bill sets forth the exceptions as follows: All goods sold in bulk or broken packages; fresh fruits or vegetables; articles held in stock by a wholesale or retail dealer prior to the coming into force of this Act; packages containing two avoirdupois ounces or less, which packages will be exempt from marking in terms of weight; packages containing one fluid ounce or less; and any article the sale of which as regards the weight or marking thereof is already provided for under other statutes. I am not able to say at the moment whether containers containing milk, which is marketed, without being in any sense manufactured, will be exempt under this Act, and on moving the second reading I shall be in a position to answer my hon. friend.

Mr. ROBB: As the resolution stands the Bill would provide that every bottle containing human food—that might be milk or cream—shall be branded or stamped with the name and address of the fillers, and the weight, measure or quantity of the contents of the container. A very large business is done to-day putting up milk in small bottles to ship them to the cities, and if the minister insists upon the legislation going through in its present form the consumer in the city will have to bear the expense of this additional work.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The enacting clause reads as follows:

Every can, carton, bottle, box, barrel, wrapper, package or closed receptacle containing human food or any other commodity manufactured, produced, sold or offered for sale in Canada, when such container is in its original unopened or unbroken form as it is usually delivered to consumers when sold or offered for sale in Canada, should be plainly marked, branded or stamped with the name and address of the fillers, and the weight, measure or quantity of the contents of the container;

And so on. I am doubtful if milk would come within the meaning of the Act.

Mr. ROBB: Oh yes, it is human food.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is no question about its being human food.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Why should not a bottle of milk be marked? Every dealer should be anxious to have his name labelled on his bottle, so as to let the public know that he is selling good stuff.

Mr. BELAND: It would mean an additional expense.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Milk bottles are washed every day, or should be, and the label would be washed off.

Sir SAM HUGHES: It would not cost a thousandth part of a cent.

Mr. McMASTER: I have some knowledge of the milk business, although I am not in it myself. The investment in glass bottles by the large dairy companies in the cities is very substantial, and if the legislation goes through in the form foreshadowed by the resolution I hope that ample opportunity will be given to the milk dealers to replace their bottles gradually with bottles having their names marked or blown in the glass. The suggestion of the hon. and gallant member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) that the label might be pasted on the bottle or receptacle would lead me to suppose that he thinks the bottles are washed one by one under the tap; that is not the way it is done. The bottles are washed by machinery, and the only efficacious method of marking would be to blow the name in the bottle itself. I trust that the milk dealers will be given an opportunity to use up all their old bottles before being forced to provide these new ones.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I did not suggest a mark on the bottom or on the top or anything of that kind. The label should be placed on the side of the bottle, and for the life of me I cannot see why it should not be required. Sometimes the gentleman who drinks milk will order a bottle and get good stuff, and at other times he gets only skimmed milk. The consumer after all has some rights, and one of those rights is to know whether the bottle of milk placed before him is put up by a man who puts up good milk or by a man who sails as close to the law as possible.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

Mr. A. K. Maclean therefore moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 105, founded on the resolution.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

On motion of Sir Thomas White (Acting Prime Minister) the House went into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution, Mr. Boivin in the Chair:

Resolved, That it is expedient to bring in a measure,—

1. To ratify and confirm the Order in Council of the twenty-fourth day of February, 1919, prohibiting the importation, manufacture and transportation of intoxicating liquors, published in an extra issue of the Canada Gazette of Monday, February 24, 1919, subject to the following amendments:—

(a) Paragraph (c) of regulation one to be amended by striking out all the words after the word "wine" in the last line thereof and inserting in lieu thereof the words "or other intoxicating liquors of limited alcoholic content are permitted," so that the said paragraph shall read as follows:

"(c) 'Prohibited area" means any province, territory, municipality, district, county or other area wherein the sale of intoxicating liquor is under or by any law, Federal or Provincial, prohibited, and shall include any such area wherein the sale of native wine or other intoxicating liquors of limited alcoholic content are permitted."

(b) Subsection one of regulation three to be amended by striking out the words "until the thirty-first day of December, one thousand nine hundred and eighteen" at the end thereof, so that the said subsection shall read as follows:

"3. (1) No person shall make or manufacture intoxicating liquor or cause intoxicating liquor to be made or manufactured within the Dominion of Canada after the first day of April, one thousand nine hundred and eighteen: Provided that in case the sale of intoxicating liquor of any class for beverage purposes is permitted in any province, this regulation shall not apply to the manufacture of such intoxicating liquor in such province."

(c) Subsection three of said regulation three to be amended by striking out the words "until the thirtieth day of April, 1919," at the end thereof, and substituting therefor the words "or to sending, taking, transporting or delivering any intoxicating liquor lawfully manufactured in any province to any place in such province where such intoxicating liquor may lawfully be sold," so that the said subsection shall read as follows:

"(3) No person after the first day of April, 1918, shall send, take, transport into, or deliver in any prohibited area any intoxicating liquor, or cause any intoxicating liquor to be sent, transported or delivered. Provided that any intoxicating liquor actually shipped before the first day of April, 1918, may be delivered in such prohibited area by a common carrier within such period of time as is required for such delivery under the ordinary and usual conditions governing the business of such common carrier but not later than the first day of May, A.D., 1918. Provided that this regulation shall not apply to the sending, taking, transporting or delivering of native wines in the province of Ontario, or to sending, taking, transporting or delivering any intoxicating liquor lawfully manufactured in any province to any place in such province where such intoxicating liquor may lawfully be sold."

(d) Subsection four of said regulation three to be amended by striking out the words "which is in, or" in the third line thereof, and the word "prohibited" in the fourth line, and adding at the end thereof the words "where the sale of such intoxicating liquor is forbidden," so that the said subsection shall read as follows:

"(4) No person after the first day of April, 1918, shall either directly or indirectly sell or contract or agree to sell any intoxicating liquor which is to be delivered within any area where the sale of such intoxicating liquor is forbidden."

2. To ratify and confirm the Order in Council of the twelfth day of April, 1919, concerning the disposal of intoxicating liquors forfeited to the Crown, published in the Canada Gazette of Saturday, the nineteenth day of April, 1919.

3. To provide that for the purposes of this proposed legislation and the schedule thereto comprising the said Orders in Council, the sale of any intoxicating liquor shall be deemed to be forbidden or prohibited in any province, territory, municipality, district, county or other area where the sale of the same is forbidden, except for use in divine service, for medical purposes, for manufacturing or commercial purposes, other than for the manufacture or use thereof as a beverage, or for other similar purposes.

4. To provide that the Minister of Customs and Inland Revenue shall have power to make such regulations as he may deem necessary to prevent intoxicating liquor from being illegally manufactured in or from being imported into Canada, or from being sold, sent, taken, transported or delivered in violation of this proposed legislation and the schedule thereto comprising the said Orders in Council. Any person violating the provisions of any such regulation or of the proposed legislation shall be liable to the penalty prescribed for violation of the provisions of the regulation contained in the said Orders in Council.—The Prime Minister.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: As this is important legislation I think the Committee will expect a statement with respect to its purpose and scope. The object of the legislation which this resolution has in view is to ratify and confirm certain Orders in Council which were passed by the Government during the war under the authority of the War Measures Act, for the purpose of restricting, during the continuance of the war and for a period of twelve months thereafter, the manufacture, transportation and importation of intoxicating liquors as defined by the Orders in Council. The definition of "intoxicating liquors" is to be found in the consolidated order which was dated February 24, 1919, and which is as follows:

> Intoxicating liquor means and includes any liquor or beverage which contains more than 2½ per centum of proof spirit.

Dealing with the various restrictions, I may point out that by the provisions of the consolidated Order in Council, no intoxicating liquor was to be imported into Canada after December 24, 1917, unless actually purchased for importation before that date, and actually shipped before January 31, 1918. Provision was also made in that connection that satisfactory evidence of such shipment had to be submitted to the Minister of Customs. The prohibition against importation was not to apply to wine for use in divine service, to intoxicating liquor used for medicinal purposes, to intoxicating liquor used for manufacturing purposes, and in this latter case provision was made for a special license to be issued by the Minister of Inland Revenue for such manufacture.

The effect of the Order in Council was to prohibit the manufacture of intoxicating liquors after April 1, 1918. There was in that connection a proviso that in case the sale for beverage purposes of any intoxicating liquor was permitted in a province such liquor might be manufactured until December 31, 1918. Manufacture was permitted under license in the case of liquors to be used for sacramental, industrial, artistic, mechanical, scientific or medicinal purposes. In regard to the third restriction, namely, upon the transportation of intoxicating liquors, this was forbidden into any prohibited area in Canada after April 1, 1918. "Prohibited area" is defined by the consolidated Order in Council to mean

> Any province, territory, municipality, district, county or other area wherein the sale of intoxicating liquor is in or by any law, federal or provincial, prohibited and shall include any such area wherein the sale of native wine is prohibited.

In connection with the restriction upon transportation, provision was made to meet the case of shipments actually made before April 1, 1918, delivery to be not later than the date at which such liquor would be delivered in the ordinary course, and in any case not later than May 1, 1918. There was a further provision that no contract should be made to sell after April 1, 1918, although a licensee might send into any prohibited area for delivery for authorized purposes intoxicating liquors in accordance with the terms of the license issued to him by the Minister of Inland Revenue. Similar licensees in prohibited areas were authorized to receive intoxicating liquors under the terms of their license and not otherwise. There was a further regulation made to ensure that such transportation should be only by common carriers, by rail or water, to the end that the provision of the Order in Council might be more effectively carried out.

The purposes for which the Orders in Council were passed are set out in the recital of the consolidated Order in Council as follows:

(1) To prevent waste;

(2) To promote thrift;

(3) To conserve resources; and increase national efficiency.

As I stated, the duration of the measure was limited by the Order in Council to the period of the war and twelve months thereafter. As the orders were passed under the authority of the War Measures Act, it is necessary that they should be now ratified and confirmed by Parliament if they are to continue in effect as was the intention for a period of twelve months after the conclusion of the war.

Mr. RICHARDSON: Does the twelve months mean from the signing of the armistice, or from the signing of peace?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: From the time the conclusion of the war is officially declared. The present position is that we are still at war with Germany, Austro-Hungary, Turkey and Bulgaria. There seems to be no doubt that the period which the Order in Council was intended to cover was the remaining period of the war until officially at an end and twelve months thereafter. The consolidated Order in Council points out that the regulations made therein are to be construed as supplementary to the prohibitory laws now in force, or that may hereafter be in force, in a province or territory and that such regulations should continue in force during, as I have stated, the period of the present war and twelve months thereafter.

It was felt by the Government that the period succeeding the war would, as to many of its characteristics, be similar to the war period. Further, it would be the time of demobilization and it was believed that the country would, for at least a year after the war, be subject to what would virtually be war expenditure and that is the case to-day. The Order in Council therefore provided that the legislation enacted, for it was legislation under the authority, as I have said, of the War Measures Act, should continue during the war and for a period of twelve months thereafter when it was expected that demobilization would be completed.

The resolution provides for certain amendments to the consolidated Order in Council and the other orders which were passed for the purpose of more effectually carrying out the provisions of the consolidated order. "Intoxicating liquors," was defined by the consolidated order to mean and include liquor exceeding a strength of two and a half per cent of proof spirit. At the time the order was passed there was prohibitory legislation, I think, in all the provinces under which the two and a half per cent of proof spirit standard had been adopted. Since the armistice, and as a result of a plebiscite in the province of Quebec, it is lawful under the laws of that province to sell for beverage purposes liquor to the strength of five per cent of proof spirit and, in the special case of wine, 6.98 per cent alcohol.

In the province of Ontario announcement has been made that a plebiscite or referendum will be taken, and it may be that other provinces will pursue a similar course. The Government, therefore, thought it advisable—in view of what has taken place in Quebec and Ontario, and what may take place in other provinces—to modify the Order in Council to the extent, and to the extent only, necessary to permit effect to be given to provincial laws respecting the sale of liquor for beverage purposes. We have therefore provided, as an amendment to the consolidated Order in Council, that liquor may be manufactured within a province to the standard of strength authorized by the laws of that province for sale for beverage purposes. To use a concrete illustration: It will be permissible when this resolution is carried into law for brewers in the province of Quebec to manufacture beer to the strength of five per cent proof spirits in order that it may be available for sale and consumption as authorized by the laws of that province.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Would the minister kindly explain what "proof spirits" means? Those of us who are strictly temperate men, like the President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell), do not know the meaning of the term.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I am so strong a temperance man myself that I could not really give my hon. friend what would be regarded as a scientific definition, but it might be right to say—

Sir SAM HUGHES: Perhaps the President of the Privy Council can give us a definition?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: —that alcohol has about twice the strength of proof spirits—or in other words, that two and a half per cent of alcohol is about the equivalent of five per cent of proof spirits. It is said, and some hon. gentlemen will be able to pronounce as to this very much better than myself, that there is not as much "bite" in the proof spirit beverage, as there is in the alcohol beverage of the same apparent percentage. I think I have stated to the House in sufficient detail the legal effect of the Order in Council and of the modification which we now propose. I have caused to be laid upon the Table a number of copies—sufficient I think for the use of members—of the consolidated Order in Council and the two amendments referred to.

Mr. BELAND: The Acting Prime Minister has given some explanation regarding the use of beer. Would he supplement that explanation by further details in connection, for instance, with the use of wine.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: As to what?

Mr. BELAND: As to the sort of wine which is to be permitted to be consumed in the province of Quebec?

Sir SAM HUGHES: Or in any other province?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is a matter which we had under consideration. I understand that Quebec does not manufacture native wine to any great extent. Am I right in that understanding?

Mr. BELAND: Yes.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The question then arises as to how native wine, or at least wine of the strength authorized there by provincial laws, will be provided to meet the requirements of the people for beverage purposes. I may say to my hon. friend that it was my intention to have modified this Order in Council to the extent necessary by providing that there might be imported into the province of Quebec, or into any other province where similar legislation might prevail, wine of the strength permitted by such legislation. I was informed, possibly erroneously, that there are no wines likely to come from France of as low an alcoholic standard as the wine which is authorized for sale now by the legislation of the province of Quebec to which I have referred; but in order to carry out the principle which I have indicated, I should be prepared to consider an amendment to the resolution which would provide for the importation into a province of wine not exceeding the alcoholic standard authorized by the law of that province. Such an amendment might provide for importation from a country outside of Canada, or for transportation from another province in Canada, into any province where such a law as I have mentioned is in effect. If any hon. member is in a position to say whether wine is likely to be imported, especially from France, of the alcoholic strength which is now lawful by the laws of the province of Quebec in liquor for beverage purposes, I shall be glad to hear his representations in that regard.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not know but that the Acting Prime Minister could have made himself more clear if he had a little of the beverage which he has been describing.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Two and-a-half per cent?

Sir SAM HUGHES: It would have steadied his nerve; he is a little nervous in his explanations. I do not know whether the President of the Privy Council would not have given the explanation much better. I cannot see why this burning and shining light of temperance is over-shadowed by the Acting Prime Minister to-day; we thought this was the former's special sphere. But what I wanted to ask is, why not

4 p.m. make this general rule applicable to all provinces? Why should the maker of wine in Ontario be prohibited from selling his product in Quebec, provided he is not violating the laws of that province, and so on? Make it a universal rule. If France wants us to import strong wines and the province of Quebec will not allow it, there is no harm done; but if that province wishes to import strong wines from France and the laws of Quebec permit it, why not allow such importation?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I have already stated that I would be prepared to consider an amendment, after discussion in the House, which would permit wine to be imported from France, or any other country, and from any province in Canada, such as Ontario, where native wine is manufactured, into a province whose laws authorize its sale for beverage purposes.

Mr. FIELDING: What will be the effect of the law as it will stand in respect to wines in Ontario where they are manufactured?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Under the law as it will stand?

Mr. FIELDING: What will happen to the wines of Ontario, what will be the effect of the law as to them?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The position is that native wine in the province of Ontario may continue to be manufactured because by the legislation of that province there is no restriction upon its sale—that is an exception.

Mr. BELAND: Regardless of percentage of alcohol?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is permitted today by the laws of the province of Ontario.

An hon. MEMBER: What strength?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: There is no limit as to strength.

Mr. FRIPP: As I understand the resolution, it would prohibit the importation into the province of Quebec of beer manufactured in the province of Ontario?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

Mr. FRIPP: That seems to me to create a monopoly in the province of Quebec, and all monopolies are obnoxious and vicious.

Mr. BELAND: We will have to drink the whole of it; we cannot export it.

Mr. FRIPP: You will have to drink the whole of it at a price fixed by your manufacturer. I have not considered the matter sufficiently to give an opinion, but if my recollection of the British North America Act is correct, it seems to me there is difficulty in the way of legislation of this sort. Section 121 of the Act says that the growth, produce, or manufacture of a province shall be admitted free into another province. That, of course, does relate to duty in the sense of customs duty, but it must necessarily mean free importation. How can this Parliament create a monopoly so that one province alone shall have the right to manufacture and sell within its boundaries an article which may be manufactured in another province? I do not know whether the Government has considered that question, but it seems to me there is some difficulty in the way, apart altogether from the point I raise as to a monopoly being created. There are probably millions of dollars invested in breweries in the province of Ontario. Why should not the brewers of that province have the right of entry into the province of Quebec in competition with Quebec brewers, when the latter province gives to its people the right to purchase beer of a certain quality?

Mr. BELAND: We have no objection.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The constitutional question raised by the hon. gentleman was considered carefully by the Department of Justice, and they reached the conclusion that the Government was within its powers in enacting the Order in Council as it stands.

Mr. FIELDING: Is it quite clear and beyond dispute that in the province of Ontario, which I understood was a prohibition province, one has the right to get drunk, provided he gets drunk on native wine? Is that the law?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not think it is so specified in the law.

Mr. CHAPLIN: For the information of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) I might say that the Ontario law does not allow the retail sale of wine other than in undisturbed packages to the house of a consumer; it does not allow the sale of wine over the bar.

Mr. CRONYN: The hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's has raised a question on what has always appeared to me to be the most extraordinary piece of legislation perpetrated by the province of Ontario. There is no doubt that that province has enacted what is in effect the clearest kind of class legislation. It allows, as the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Chaplin) has just stated, the sale of wine, the strength of which is not specified. This is the clause of the Ontario Act covering this point:

Subject to any regulations or restrictions which the Board may impose, manufacturers of native wines, from grapes grown and produced in Ontario, may sell the same in wholesale quantities only, that is to say in quantities of not less than five gallons in each cask or vessel at any one time and when sold in bottles not less than one dozen bottles of at least three half pints at any one time.

Now, the law of the province of Ontario, as I understand it, did not prohibit—I am subject to correction as to this—the manufacture of ale of any strength for export, and if the breweries of Ontario found a market in foreign countries they were entitled to manufacture and export. Under the proposed resolution and Order in Council that market is cut off. Not only are they prohibited from exporting to the province of Quebec beer of 5 per cent proof spirits, or 2½ per cent alcohol, whatever the ruling in Quebec may be—but they cannot export to any other country. That seems to me such an absurd and illogical position that I propose an amendment to the resolution. Subsection 3 of paragraph (c) of the resolution reads as follows:

(3) No person after the first day of April, 1918, shall send, take, transport into, or deliver in any prohibited area any intoxicating liquor, or cause any intoxicating liquor to be sent, transported or delivered. Provided that any intoxicating liquor actually shipped before the first day of April, 1918, may be delivered in such prohibited area by a common carrier within such period of time as is required for such delivery under the ordinary and usual conditions governing the business of such common carrier but not later than the first day of May, A.D., 1918. Provided that this regulation shall not apply to the sending, taking, transporting or delivering of native wines in the province of Ontario, or to sending, taking, transporting or delivering any intoxicating liquor lawfully manufactured in any province to any place in such province where such intoxicating liquor may lawfully be sold.

By amendment I propose to strike out these words:

Sending, taking, transporting or delivering of native wines in the province of Ontario.

If we are to have this legislation imposed let us have it imposed fairly. Do not let us make an exception in the case of some one favoured class or province. I beg therefore, Mr. Chairman, to move that amendment.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It is a complicated piece of legislation and I would ask the hon. member if he will kindly give notice of his resolution.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Might I make a suggestion to the Acting Prime Minister in that very regard? Why not have the Order in Council printed so that we can deal with the matter intelligently? I do not suppose it is a very voluminous affair; it will only take a day.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Copies of the Order in Council are laid upon the Table for the use of hon. members. I think the resolution shows clearly the effect of the amendments which we propose. I still do not quite appreciate the point made by my hon. friend from London (Mr. Cronyn) and I would be glad if he would state again what he has in mind in the amendment.

Mr. CRONYN: By this legislation we are backing up the exceedingly unfair legislation of the province of Ontario. And we are going further; we are adopting, as I understand the resolution, the sale of liquor in the province as a test. As I said, under the legislation of the province of Ontario brewers and wine merchants alike were permitted to manufacture for export. I speak subject to correction.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I do not understand that the legislation of the province of Ontario prevents the manufacture of wine and beer for export. The jurisdiction of a province is with respect of the sale and consumption; the question of manufacture and export I think is a Dominion matter.

Mr. CRONYN: That is undoubtedly right, Mr. Chairman. But the province recognized that situation by providing as follows in section 45 of the Ontario Temperance Act:

Nothing herein contained shall prevent any brewer, distiller or other person duly licensed by the Government of Canada for the manufacture of spirituous, fermented or other liquor, from keeping or having liquor manufactured by him in any building where such manufacture is carried on.

The provincial authorities knew that they had not the right to prohibit the manufacture, and under the law as it stands the wine merchant and the brewer can and do manufacture for export. Under this Order in Council manufacture for export must cease, and that being the case we should be logical. If we are going to be temperate, let us be temperate. Why should the manufacture and sale in Ontario of wine which runs from sixteen to twenty per cent proof spirits be permitted, while the manufacture and sale of beer of five per cent is not permitted?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The principle which should underly the action of the Dominion with respect to legislation of this kind is recognition of the rights of the provinces to enact such legislation within their jurisdiction as they may deem proper. It is true that the legislation of Ontario excepted native wines. No doubt they did so upon considerations which appeared proper to them as representatives of the people of Ontario. The hon. member sees an unfairness in permitting the manufacture of wine of unlimited strength in Ontario, while at the same time a limitation as to strength is imposed in respect of beer manufactured in the province. But that is essentially a matter for the legislature of Ontario. If Ontario, acting within its jurisdiction, sees fit to enact that beer for beverage purposes shall not be sold in Ontario of greater strength than two and a half per cent of proof spirits and at the same time feels justified in authorizing the manufacture and sale of native wine in the province, I suppose that is a matter for the legislature and the people of Ontario. I do not know how far we should be justified in reviewing their action with respect to what is clearly within their jurisdiction under the British North America Act. I am of the opinion that this Order in Council does not prohibit the export of native wine manufactured in Ontario. If Ontario adopted legislation under which wine of a strength not exceeding, let us say, five per cent alcohol, should be sold for beverage purposes there, then under this legislation they could not, I think, manufacture beyond that strength, either for domestic use or for export. But Ontario, I understand, has not placed any limitation upon the strength of native wine manufactured there.

Mr. NESBITT: Would the minister be averse to an amendment permitting Ontario to export to Quebec its native wines at the strength which Quebec allows? Moreover, does this resolution stop the exportation of beer from Ontario to points outside that province?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: According to the law of Quebec, wine of the alcoholic strength of a little under seven per cent is authorized for sale for beverage purposes. Unless that legislation is to be defeated by Dominion enactment, it is necessary to permit importation into Quebec from outside of Canada or transportation into Quebec from any other province where such wine is manufactured. I have stated that I would be prepared to consider a suggestion for permitting the importation from outside of Canada into a province such as Quebec of wine of the strength authorized for sale for beverage purposes by the legislation of that province; and also the transportation into such province from another province where wine is manufactured for the purpose of supplying local requirements in strict accordance with the laws of that province. With regard to beer, the situation is somewhat different. Beer may be manufactured in any province to the extent of the quantity required to meet the consumption needs in accordance with the provincial laws. I think the same statement might be made with regard to whisky. With regard to wine, it is only in some provinces that native wine is manufactured. But if any difficulty arises with regard to the logic of the situation I suppose we would have to meet the condition in a province such as Quebec by permitting importation from outside. There seems to be a very strong sentiment in the community that if a province by its legislation prohibits the sale for beverage purposes within that province of liquor beyond a certain strength, the manufacture of liquor beyond that strength in that province should not be permitted.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Instead of labelling one law for one province and another for another, why not make our legislation universal and apply the same form of legislation to all provinces—having regard, of course, to existing provincial laws?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend will not find the name of any province mentioned in this resolution, or in any amendment. The amendments to the resolution are for the purpose of enabling effect to be given to provincial legislation in any province. I used the illustration of Quebec because Quebec has taken action and no other province up to date has.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Suppose Ontario refuses to go beyond the two-and-a-half per cent for beer, and Quebec goes five; would it be impossible for a brewer in Ontario to make his beer up to five per cent for sale in the province of Quebec?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It would under this resolution.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): I should like, in the first place, to straighten out the hon. member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) as to the meaning of "proof spirits," and I am surprised that the hon. member, so rich in military lore, is not familiar with the historic association between proof spirits and military regulations. The term had its origin in England in the old days when the army was armed with flintlock rifles. In those days it took a certain percentage of alcohol to get the powder to the point where it would explode with a spark. It was found through experiments made by the British army that alcohol could be considerably reduced in strength and still strike fire when used in the flintlock rifle. When the alcohol was reduced to the lowest point at which it would strike fire, it was known as "proof spirits;" it was the test or the "proof." While alcohol has a strength of 165, they could reduce it to a strength of 100, and at that strength the powder would strike fire. That was the origin of the term or standard known as "proof strength."

I want to say a word on the principle involved in the resolution now before the House, because, if I understand parliamentary procedure, we are in order in discussing the principle of the legislation at this stage, and the details later. The Acting Prime Minister has emphasized more than once to-day that this legislation is to give effect so far as possible to the intention and the desire of the provinces as expressed by the legislation enacted by the different provinces. That, I submit, is precisely what will not be done by the legislation founded on this resolution. True, the resolution has been drawn in such a way as carefully to safeguard the wishes and intentions of the province of Quebec, but I submit that it shows no desire or any intention to meet the views of the legislature of the province of Ontario. The connection in which I raise the question of the Legislature of Ontario is this: This legislation is intended to prevent the importation into the province of Ontario of alcoholic liquors of a strength in excess of two-and-a-half per cent proof spirits. Now I submit that in the province of Ontario there has been no desire or attempt on the part of the legislature to avail itself of the rights which it had under the existing law prior to the Order in Council of March of last year, to put an embargo on the importation of alcoholic beverages into the province. I submit that the province of Ontario at the present time has the right to do everything which this legislation proposes to do with reference to importation into the province. The legislature of the province of Ontario has an absolutely legal right under the Doherty Act of 1916, passed by this House, to do exactly what is here attempted to be done in a paternal way. For that reason, I submit that if there is a desire on the part of this Government to give effect to the rights of the provinces to deal as fully as lies within their power with the question of prohibition, then, to be consistent, the whole question should be left to the Government of Ontario to be dealt with by them. I believe that it is the opinion of the province of Ontario that the provincial Government at Toronto was dealing with the question prior to the Order in Council, and is dealing with it now, in a way that is likely to give ultimately the very best results.

Just a word with reference to the Doherty Act. The question of prohibition has developed in parliamentary procedure to an extent never known before, the passing of the buck—of course, I quite understand that many honourable gentlemen do not understand the term. In 1916 when the Ontario Temperance Act was before the Ontario Legislature, the question was raised that under the British North America Act the provincial government had no right to put an embargo on the importation of spirits into the province, any more than it has a right to deal with the question of manufacture. Those of you who were in this House at that time will no doubt remember that a determined campaign was carried on for the Dominion Government to do what it was beyond the power of the province to do. The Ontario Government was quite willing to pass up to the Dominion Government the responsibility of providing the necessary legislation to prevent the importation of spirits into the province; I am dealing only with the province of Ontario because I know nothing about the conditions in the other provinces. The Dominion Government accepted that responsibility, and the Doherty Act was before this House at the same time the Ontario Temperance Act was before the Ontario House. Instead of dealing with the question definitely, the Dominion Government passed the Doherty Act, and then passed the question back to the province of Ontario saying, "Under this Act you have the necessary legislation to give effect to any law that you may pass against the importation of liquor." During the debate in this House the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) in reply to a question of Mr. Sinclair said (Hansard, page 2482-3):

> If the hon. gentleman thinks otherwise, he entirely misapprehends the Bill. Anywhere in Canada, it will be an offence for a man to send liquor into a province where there is a law against it.

In introducing his legislation the Minister of Justice said that its whole object was to give the very fullest power and authority to the Governments of the different provinces to give effect to their wishes in respect of matters which, under the British North America Act, they might otherwise be prevented from dealing with. I am not arguing the question one way or the other but what I say is this: In this respect the legislation before us does not give to the province of Ontario that same measure of provincial control over this question that it is so solicitous to give to the province of Quebec. If, in the opinion of the province of Ontario, there should be an embargo on the importation of spirits into the province, I say that without reference to this Order in Council at all, the province had and has a right to prevent the importation. It might very well be said that this was not law when the Ontario Temperance Act was passed. If that means that this Act had not been passed in this House at the time the Ontario Temperance Act was finally passed in Ontario, that is true. But the fact is that the resolution was in the House and the Bill had been introduced. Apart from that, however, the Ontario Legislature met in 1917, prior to the Order in Council, and there was no suggestion by either the Government of Ontario or the Opposition of Ontario asking for the legislation that is now enacted by this Order in Council. I desire to deal with another feature of this Order in Council, and a feature of the law that will be enacted in pursuance of the resolution. When the Order in Council was passed last year, as all hon. members will remember, it did not become effective until a future date fixed in the Order. It was passed early in March and became effective on the first of April. It would have been just as easy under the provisions of the War Measures Act and under the Order in Council to have had it effective at once. And I submit that there can be only one inference, namely, that the period between the time the Order in Council was passed and the date upon which it became effective was left in order that the people affected might be permitted to stock up, and they did stock up. If it was wrong for a man to have liquor in his possession, there could be no hardship in making the Order in Council effective at once, thereby placing all citizens on the same basis. The result of its not being made effective immediately was that in Ontario those who had the inclination, the foresight and the money—particularly the money—stocked for their requirements for a very long period in the future. There is no possible question about that, and we are face to face with this fact to-day—and I want to impress upon the Government that this is a view of the question which no Government can afford to overlook—that there cannot possibly be a more dangerous form of class legislation than is contained in the legislation which it is now proposed to enact in this House. We virtually say to the people of this country: If you have had the inclination and the means to stock your cellar and to provide against all your requirements for any length of time in the future, the law will protect you. But if, on the other hand, you have not done this, if you have been abroad during the past four years and have not had the opportunity to provide yourselves with alcoholic beverages, there is no way by which you can get them under the law. I submit that if there is going to be an absolute embargo on the importation of alcoholic beverages the Government should have the courage of its convictions and should make it illegal to have private stocks except for medicinal purposes and under the order of a physician. That would place all people on the same basis. Those who represent cities will bear me out when I say that it is fast becoming an established fact in the larger centres that there is no recognized property in whisky. In the city of Toronto, those who are in a position to know, will tell you, Mr. Chairman, that there are on an average as many as twenty and twenty-five cases of theft from private places in a day, where houses are broken into and nothing of value removed except whisky. We do not hear much about that, because the long suffering people of Toronto would sooner lose their whisky in silence than have any one know that they had it. I clipped from a paper to-day the report of a case that will show what a grave injustice will exist in this connection. It is from Ontario and I shall not mention the name. The report says:

> The home of Brig.-Gen. . . . . was entered by burglars last evening and eleven cases of liquor were stolen from the wine cellar. The cases were carried to a wooded part of the grounds, where the contents were removed and taken away in an auto. There was no person in the house at the time, Brig.-Gen. . . . . being overseas and Mrs. . . . . .in Atlantic City.

Thousands, and hundreds of thousands, of men are coming home, and I think it would be a mistake on the part of this House to waive aside the importance of the feeling that is going to be created in this country if the man who has not had the opportunity or the means to "stock up" realizes that his next door neighbour has a well stocked cellar,

Mr. NESBITT: Could they not visit their neighbours?

Mr. J. A. STEWART: They do sometimes when they are away. I submit that it is within the power of this Government to enact that there shall not be any private stocks. If the Government does not do that then I think the matter should be left to be dealt with by the province, and under the Doherty Act it is absolutely clear that they have the legal right to deal with it.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Just to advert to two or three points made by my hon. friend in his very interesting speech. I do not understand that he is suggesting that this Government is asking Parliament to "pass the buck"—to use a vernacular expression that has never appealed to me. We are asking Parliament to pass this resolution. Let me put myself right with the House in view of the implication of the hon. gentleman that nearly all the houses in the city of Toronto, in which I have the honour to live, are largely stocked with intoxicating liquors. I can assure my hon. friend that if he visited my house he would find it very much in the condition of Mother Hubbard's cupboard, and I think that that is the case with regard to the vast majority of houses in Toronto, as in other cities in the province of Ontario. My hon. friend says that under the Canada Temperance Act, while there was a prohibition against the sale, for beverage purposes, or liquor beyond a certain alcoholic strength, it was open to the citizens of the province of Ontario to buy intoxicating liquors from adjacent provinces and have them sent directly to them for their use. He argues that if a province desired to prevent that state of affairs it had the power to do so, and I think from a strictly legal standpoint he is correct in that statement. I think the province of Ontario, through its legislature, has the power to prevent the holding of stocks of liquors for consumption by private individuals, but my hon. friend will not fail to appreciate the impracticability of the Government of Ontario giving effect to any such legislation, which would involve a search of every house in the province, leading to a most undesirable condition of affairs.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Has the province of Ontario the right to search?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think it has.

Sir SAM HUGHES: I do not think so.

[Mr. J. A. Stewart.]

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend may be right, but I have the impression that the Minister of Justice stated, when the Doherty Act was before Parliament, that it was within the power of the province of Ontario, if it thought fit, to enact such legislation as would effectually prevent the bringing in of liquor from other provinces and the keeping of such liquor in the custody of citizens of Ontario.

I point out that, while that may be legally so, there are very grave practical difficulties in giving effect to such legislation. My hon. friend further argued that the province of Ontario did not ask for this legislation and that therefore it should not have been adopted by the Dominion Government. I have already pointed out that it was adopted as a war measure under the authority of the War Measures Act. The Government of Ontario was not opposed to this legislation. Let me read a telegram from the Premier of Ontario, dated December, 1917, and addressed to Sir Robert Borden, Prime Minister:

> Please accept my warmest congratulations on the important action taken by your Government in connection with the liquor traffic. I am sure it will materially assist in conserving the strength of the nation for the struggle in which we are engaged.

This telegram is signed by Sir William Hearst. I put that forward to show that the province of Ontario, through its Premier, had nothing but commendation for the action taken by the Government. I think it is to be conclusively inferred from that telegram that the premier of Ontario welcomed action on the part of the Dominion Government which would prevent the importation for sale purposes into the province of Ontario of intoxicating liquors from adjacent provinces.

I submit there is a good deal to be said for that view. Let us just look at this. A province, such as Ontario, says: There must not be sold within this province liquor of a strength beyond two and a half per cent of proof spirits. That is what they say in the Ontario Temperance Act with respect to all liquors except native wine. If that is the deliberate judgment of the legislature, and presumably of the majority of the people of Ontario, it does seem to me that those who passed that legislation could hardly have had in contemplation a situation in which it would be largely nullified—that is if they meant it, seriously—by a round-about arrangement whereby liquor of any degree of alcoholic strength could be brought in by any citizen from an adjacent province. Some extraordinary expedients were devised. For example, a wholesaler or retailer of the province of Quebec would establish an agency in the city of Toronto, and the order would be given to the agent. The agent would then pass the order on to Quebec, the Quebec House would fill it and send the liquor back into Ontario. I need not dwell upon the incongruity of that. If the people of Ontario did not want—and do not want—liquor of a greater strength than two and a half per cent proof spirits to be consumed in Ontario, they have the right to say so. They do say it through their legislature in the law which they have enacted. I think it is clearly to be inferred from the legislation that it was not the intention of the legislature, or the Government, of Ontario, to approve the use for consumption of liquor beyond that strength. Certainly, the situation which resulted, and which I have referred to, did not seem to me to be a very satisfactory one. The Dominion Government, in order to implement what seemed to be the intention of the Ontario Legislature, provided that there should not be transported into the province of Ontario—I am using Ontario merely by way of illustration—from any other province liquor beyond the strength authorized for sale as a beverage by the legislature of the province. That is all we did. We decided that that should not be done for the period of the war and for twelve months after. That is the enactment that is now before this House for ratification and confirmation if Parliament should think it advisable.

The next point made by my hon. friend is that there was a period between the passing of the Act and bringing it into effect in which large quantities of intoxicating liquor were transported from one province to another, or sold within the province in which they were held, and, as he states, to enable people to "stock up." That statement is not correct. The Government had no such motive or purpose in view. The object of the provision was to enable people who had large stocks on hand for sale to partially dispose of their stocks. That is not an unusual position in connection with legislation of this kind. The effect of this enactment, or Order in Council, was to safeguard the very serious situation, indeed, of firms who were carrying stocks of liquor which they had on hand for sale in the usual course and against which some had borrowed heavily. If suddenly without notice, or time for the partial disposal of those stocks, the Order in Council had gone into effect, and especially if permanent legislation were also passed, these people would find themselves in the position of having been financially ruined without any notice. Those were the considerations which influenced the Government in coming to the conclusion it did.

One other point made by my hon. friend, one which is often put forward and one which is very forcible in the way in which he puts it. It is that those who had means were able to stock up and that they had their cellars full of liquor. From the way my hon. friend put it, it would appear that that was a highly desirable state of affairs from their standpoint. I do not know that it is a great advantage to a man to have his cellar full of liquor.

Mr. REID (Mackenzie): It seems to be so in Toronto.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Then I say it is not good for the man who has it. It is not good for any man to have too much liquor on his premises and I am a moderate in regard to that. My hon. friend puts forward the view that the public are greatly concerned about that on the theory that they have not been able to likewise stock up. I submit that that begs the whole question in so far as the provincial legislature is concerned. If the provincial legislature enacts a law, presumably, it embodies the views, opinion, wishes and desires of the people whom it represents. If the province of Ontario, through its legislature, deliberately passes an Act which contemplates that liquor beyond a strength of two and a half proof spirits shall not be drunk in that province, in so far as they have power to prevent it, I submit that the legislature must be deemed to reflect the wishes of the majority—and the great majority—of the people of Ontario. If they do not want that situation then they can change the law. As far as Parliament is concerned, or any authority external to the province of Ontario, it seems to me that it must be conclusively assumed that the legislature of the province of Ontario speaks in its legislation for the majority of the people of the province until that legislation is changed.

I submit that that legislation does implement the legislation in force in the various provinces of Canada. The Orders in Council in question were adopted for that purpose, and as a desirable war measure; to prevent waste, promote thrift and conserve resources. This is still a war year, having regard to all those purposes, and all that we are asking Parliament to do is to ratify and confirm these Orders in Council in order that the object which we had in view may be carried out for the period for which the Order in Council was to operate.

Sir SAM HUGHES: If this is still a war year, would not every year in the history of any nation be a war year in order to conserve thrift?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I think it very desirable in every year, as my hon. friend has said, that thrift should be promoted and resources conserved; but this is peculiarly a war year because of the enormous continuing expenditure of the Dominion Government for purposes arising out of or connected with the war and demobilization.

Mr. STEWART (Lanark): I would like to say one word, and in doing so do not wish to be placed in the position of opposing the resolution of the Acting Prime Minister. My chief complaint is that it does not go far enough—that if it is intended to prevent importation of intoxicating liquor into a province, it should go further and prevent possession. I submit it would be within the power of this Government to do that. I say also that having regard to the attitude of Ontario that I entirely agree with everything that has been said with reference to giving effect to the wishes of that province. I submit it has been known that this legislation was coming before the House, and it would possibly be of interest to the members to know, not so much what Sir William Hearst thought of this legislation at the time the original Order in Council was passed, but what the views of the Government of Ontario now are, with reference to the extension of that legislation for a further period of twelve months.

Mr. BLAKE: We have heard a lot about conscription at various times—

The CHAIRMAN: Order, the hon. member for Winnipeg Centre (Mr. Andrews) has the floor.

Mr. G. W. ANDREWS (Winnipeg Centre): While the subject is under discussion, I feel that I must say a few words, because I am in rather a peculiar position. Of all the subjects that have been under discussion this session, I think no particular one has brought more grist to the legislative mill than the question of total prohibition. I have been, I think, bombarded by every W.C.T.U. in the country—at least in that portion of it from which I come—and, in addition, representations have come to me from all the churches in my constituency, and from a trade protection society. I quite agree with the minister that there is a very large temperance class which must be considered by the Government in dealing with this question. On the other hand, Mr. Chairman, I have had expressed from the labour organizations the request that this Government should come out boldly and declare for the consumption of beer and wine. Furthermore, I have been brought into contact with the man in the street, sometimes called the "silent voter". He has said to me, "Major, we did not vote for total prohibition, we voted for the Macdonald Act" —I am referring to legislation enacted in my own province—"and I should like another vote. We submitted to this total prohibition as a war measure, realizing that every grain of barley counted. We were willing to submit to that, but now that the war is over we want to see that legislation wiped out". That is a very considerable vote in my constituency, too, Sir. The point has been brought to my attention that this is class legislation between the rich and the poor, but that is not an argument. I never heard it advanced as an argument, except as to how it affects individuals; some fellows have the good luck to have their cellars full of liquor while the cellars of others are very, very empty. I felt that I had to say something on this question, because in my constituency there are a very large number of good temperance people. Personally, I stand absolutely and entirely four-square against total prohibition, and I shall try and give my reasons for occupying that position.

5 p.m.

First of all, as to the medical side of this question. A committee appointed in England by the Central Control Board to inquire into the liquor traffic has recently completed its work, and the report of that committee bearing the imprint "H. M. Stationery Office, 1918" is very interesting. The committee in question consisted of the following gentlemen:

Lord D'Abernon, G.C.M.G. (chairman), chairman of the Central Control Board (liquor traffic);

Sir George Newman, K.C.B., M.D., (vice-chairman), Principal Medical Officer to the Board of Education, and member of the Central Control Board (liquor traffic);

Prof. A. R. Cushny, M.D., F.R.S., Professor of Pharmacology at University College, London;

H. H. Dale, M.D., F.R.S., Head of the Department of Bio-chemistry and Pharmacology under the Medical Research Committee, National Health Insurance;

M. Greenwood, M.R.C.S., Statistician to the Lister Institute of Preventive Medicine, and Reader in Medical Statistics in the University of London;

W. McDougall, M.B., F.R.S., Reader in Mental Philosophy in the University of Oxford, and Fellow of Corpus Christi College, Oxford;

F. W. Mott, M.D., F.R.S., Pathologist to the London County Asylums, and Consulting Physician to Charing Cross Hospital;

Prof. C. S. Sherrington, M.D., F.R.S., Waynflete Professor of Physiology in the University of Oxford, and Fellow of Magdalen College, Oxford;

W. C. Sullivan, M.D., Medical Superintendent of the Rampton State Asylum for Criminal Lunatics.

It will be seen that the committee was composed of very eminent men, whose reputation is world-wide, and to ignore their findings is to ignore the conclusions of scientists—you might as well pull down your colleges and be done with it. With your permission, Mr. Chairman, I will read a few short extracts from the report. The first is as follows:

Apart from the results of its continued excessive use, the main effects of alcohol that have any real significance are due to its action on the nervous system . . . . . The result of scientific research concerning the action of alcohol on the respiration, the circulation, the digestion, the muscular system, is to show that, so far as direct action is concerned, alcohol, when administered in moderate doses, in dilute form, and at sufficient intervals, has no effect of any serious and practical account. (p. 125).

Again the report says:

A further conclusion of capital importance which emerges with equal clearness, is that the action of alcohol on the nervous system is essentially sedative, and—with the possible exception of its direct influence on the respiratory centre—it is not truly stimulant. (p. 125.)

Hon. gentlemen will note that the committee consider the action of alcohol on the nervous system is essentially sedative, and if there ever was a time in our history when the frazzled nerves of a tormented world needed a sedative, it is now.

Mr. ANDREWS: Further the report says:

An exhausting and worrying day may leave a condition of tension and irritability which interferes with appetite and digestion; and in such a condition, and in some persons, it may be that wine or other dilute form of alcohol, taken with the evening meal, will assist the assimilation of food. Again, persons who have overworked to such an extent that they have become too tired to rest may be enabled to sleep when they have taken a small amount of alcohol. (p. 127.)

Gentlemen, those findings are exactly in accord with my own experience, which now extend over some years.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. ANDREWS: I am a father and a grandfather, and I have found by experience that some things agree with me and others do not—I have tried them all. The point I wish to make, Mr. Chairman, is that after a man reaches my time of life he knows pretty well what agrees with him and what does not. If I take coffee for a week I am sick; if I take a little whisky and water with my meals, then everything is all right. It does annoy me when somebody else comes along and tells me what I must drink, and would force me to follow his orders just because he happens to be in a majority. There is a little too much paternalism about that to please me.

I have given medical reasons and my own experience. I will now give the historical reasons. I claim, Mr. Chairman, that the race has not deteriorated under this alcoholic treatment that it has had for many years. No man who saw the "beer-sodden Englishman" at work on the other side can argue that it was too dangerous a drink that he had been taking; and one remembers in 1916 going to that "whisky-sodden Scotland," where every man able to march was on his way towards Flanders; and certainly in regard to the "wine-bibbing Frenchman" one remembers Verdun—"They shall not pass." Are we going to bar from this country the drink of those virile men? I know Canadians can stand it and do good work on it.

It has been pointed out to me by many of my correspondents that it is a very serious moral question. I fail to see that it has anything to do with morality. I have only to point hon. members to the unspeakable Turk, who has been a teetotaller all his days, and rather a mess he has made of it.

I would just say one word as to the rum ration in the army which has been criticised rather severely by the extreme teetotallers. In my humble opinion it saved tens of thousands of our men from the grave, and perhaps worse. After a man has been out in the water all night and comes in chilled to the marrow, there is no place in the wet trench where he can run up and down to stimulate his circulation preparatory to going to sleep. A little shot of rum at that time restores his circulation and soothes his nerves, and he gets to sleep without any trouble.

I have some notes about the "swing of the pendulum," but I do not need to tell you about that. If you go too far the pendulum inevitably swings back the other way. But I would say one word as to the danger of going to extremes, and that is the subterranean traffic which has already been mentioned. It is everywhere springing up, and it is a frightful price to pay for temperance; indeed it is too big a price to pay if you are going to build up a body of law breakers.

My hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Whidden) when he was talking on this subject recently—I am sorry he is not in his seat to-day; he is unavoidably detained—said we should be the dumping ground of the worst elements and the worst type of business men of the North American continent. He was referring to the possible situation if Canada went wet and the United States went dry. I understand that the hon. gentleman lived over there for some years, and is therefore probably better posted than I am, because my visits have been few and far between. But every time I have gone over there I have met some of the best business and professional men imaginable, and I do not remember one who did not take "a little drop" for his stomach's sake. When my hon. friend was talking I could not help thinking, as I remembered the moderate men I had met over there, that I would be tempted to trade off the hon. member and all his followers for them, and give fifty cents to boot. But on second thoughts, Mr. Chairman, I concluded I would not do that; and on third thoughts I decided that probably these extreme men were filling a very useful purpose in life, because unless we had extremists at the top and the bottom there would be no sane middle course for this Government to pursue.

Mr. M. R. BLAKE (Winnipeg North): We have heard a good deal of talk in the last year or two about conscription of wealth, and now we are confronted with conscription of liquor in our homes. I wonder if the hon. member who advocated that will be inclined to inject a little socialistic doctrine as well and distribute the liquor at present in bond, or how else does he suppose the Government will be able to dispose of the liquor if it is all taken over from its present owners?

The point I wish to raise is the point raised by the hon. member for London (Mr. Cronyn)—the making of wine in Ontario for export. There has been a lot of talk in this House about reconstruction, about fostering our industries and improving them as much as possible. I see no reason why this Ontario wine should not be transported to Quebec to meet the requirements of that province, as that province has decided to have beer and wine, and in the event of Ontario in the near future voting to follow suit a great industry would spring up in the Niagara district, where the grapes are grown. I think no objection should be taken to this clause for allowing the manufacture and export of native wine.

As to the breweries in Ontario being allowed to manufacture beer to meet the requirements of Quebec or any other province that may vote wet, I see no objection to it. At the present time the Ontario brewers are manufacturing supplies to meet medical needs, and I cannot see what objection can be taken to their being allowed to go a little further to meet the needs of a sister province, and so being prepared, perhaps in the very near future, to meet the needs of Ontario itself. I think that might well have been included in this motion.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I do not see anything in this resolution about permitting the importation of wine for sacramental purposes.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Order in Council permits the supply of sacramental wine, and we are validating that Order in Council.

Mr. BELAND: Is it the intention of the Government to introduce an amendment in respect of the importing of wines from France—of a percentage of alcohol, of course, not higher than that permitted in the province which imports them? Notwithstanding what the Acting Prime Minister has said with regard to the possibility of transporting native wines from Ontario into Quebec——

Sir THOMAS WHITE: I said that with regard to export from Canada I was of the opinion that native wines manufactured in Ontario of any strength—because there is no restriction—might be sold for export. They cannot be sent into Quebec.

Mr. BELAND: Is it the intention of the minister to introduce an amendment with regard to the transportation of wines from Ontario into the province of Quebec, with the amendment which I have referred to, covering importations from France?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: The Government would be justified, in order that effect may be given to provincial legislation which authorizes the sale of wine of certain strength within a province, to permit the importation from outside of Canada and the transportation from any other province in Canada to such province, of wine not beyond the strength authorized by the law of that province for sale for beverage purposes. When the Bill is in the committee stage I will introduce an amendment to that end.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Public Works—Chargeable to Capital—Harbours and rivers—Port Arthur and Fort William—harbour and river improvements, $300,000.

Mr. CARVELL: This item is to carry on improvements that have been in progress for some time. The amount asked for is not sufficient to complete the works; in fact, it will take very much more than this. The intention is to start the extension of a breakwater on the Port Arthur side and to continue the construction of a revetment wall near the terminals of the Grand Trunk Pacific on the Fort William side of the harbour. We believe that this is about as much money as will be expended during the coming year, although it is possible that an additional amount will be asked for in the Supplementary Estimates.

St. John harbour—Improvements, $750,000.

Mr. CARVELL: This is to carry on improvements in the harbour of St. John. The work, which is under contract, involves also the construction of a dry dock. The amount of the vote will really be applied to harbour improvements. The harbour improvements and the dry dock are both under contract with the same company, the St. John Dry Dock and Shipbuilding Company, really the Canada Dredging Company, which has carried out works at Port Arthur and Fort William and at many places in Canada.

Mr. McKENZIE: At what stage of completion is the dry dock, and what harbour improvements are being carried on by this company?

Mr. CARVELL: The original contract was given in 1912, and provided for the construction of a breakwater, the dredging of a very large area in what is called Courtenay Bay, and the construction of a dry dock. Up to the time that the contract was assigned to the new company it had been carried on by the Norton-Griffiths Company, and about $4,000,000 had been expended on the harbour improvements and about $900,000 on the dry dock. The dry dock is being built under the Dry Dock Subsidies Act. It will cost at least $5,500,000 and the contractors are to receive not a subsidy of four and one half per cent, but interest on an amount up to $5,500,000 at four and one half per cent for thirty-five years. The principal of the bonds, of course, has to be taken care of by the contractors themselves. When the work is completed the harbour improvements will belong to the Government and the dry dock will belong to the company; so that two distinct propositions are incorporated in the same contract. Work is progressing on the dry dock.

The contract calls for the construction of a dry dock and of a ship repairing plant. The ship repairing plant itself comes under The Dry Dock Subsidy Act, but the money will be furnished by the company and not by the Government. It involves an expenditure of, I think, $3,250,000. The company are also laying out a big shipyard, but that is entirely their own affair; we have nothing to do with it whatever; it has nothing to do with the dry dock subsidy contract, nor with the harbour works. Under the contract the dry dock was to be ready for operation in the summer of 1922, but we believe from the progress which they are making and from the reports of our engineers that it will be ready for operation in the summer of 1921.

Mr. McKENZIE: What size ships will it be able to accommodate?

Mr. CARVELL: The largest ship afloat to-day. In fact, it will be one of the largest dry docks in existence. It is 1,150 feet in length, 125 feet wide, 100 feet on the sill, with 40 feet of water at high tide. In every way it will be one of the most up-to-date dry docks in the world. There are only three others on the American continent that will at all compare with it. First, the Champlain dry dock at Levis; secondly, the dock at Boston, and, thirdly, the dock at the Atlantic entrance to the Panama Canal. It will be equipped with the most up-to-date machinery, and, with the ship repairing plant, it will go a long way towards being a shipbuilding plant. I shall gladly give any other information if the members wish it.

Mr. McKENZIE: No doubt there was a written contract between the Government and the company for the building of this dry dock under the Dry Docks Act. That Act is a very short one, and I should like to know if there is anything in the contract itself conserving the rights of the public as to the use of this dock when completed. The dry dock, of course, will be privately owned, but it will be the public who will utilize the dock. Otherwise, the dry dock could not do business. Now we can always trust Government-owned utilities of this kind, because they are the property of the people, and governments have to cater to the wishes of the people. But in the case of a private-owned institution it is well that there should be some control over the fees that they can charge against the tonnage that is put into the dock for repairs. Has any such provision been made in the contract?

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend, if he reads the statute, will see that all that is provided for. The contract is a very short document, and simply provides that the Government agree to pay a subsidy of 4½ per cent on $5,500,000; that actual work must be done to the amount of $1,000,000 before any bonds can be guaranteed. No bonds have been guaranteed as yet; in fact, no application has been made to the department for the guarantee of bonds. No bonds will be guaranteed until the $1,000,000 of work has been done, not on the harbour, but on the dry dock itself by the company. The Act itself provides that there shall be no discrimination, that every person shall have the right to use the dock, when it is capable of being used, of course. There is also provision that the fees charged must be authorized by the Governor in Council. If my hon. friend will read the statute he will see exactly what the contract contains, because it practically incorporates the statute.

The dry docks question is, of course, a big one, which I think the Parliament of Canada ought to consider carefully. Personally, I am very strongly in favour of the construction of dry docks under the Subsidy Act, but in my judgment the Act must be amended if we wish to have dry docks built. The Act has been on the statute book for nine years, and the St. John dry dock is the only first-class dock which has taken advantage of its provisions. A number of second-class docks have been constructed under the Subsidy Act. There is a floating dock of the second class at Montreal, belonging to Vickers; another in Prince Rupert belonging to the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company; another at Port Arthur; and another at Collingwood. There are only four second-class docks in Canada, and the subsidy on these docks is only 3½ per cent for twenty-five years. My opinion is that if we want to have docks built, we shall have to amend the law, but I would not recommend the amending of the Act for the building of first-class docks, because I do not think we require very many docks of that class in Canada to-day. There must be a dry dock on the Pacific coast; and ever since I have been in the department, and I think for some time before, two companies have been proposing to take advantage of the Subsidy Act to build in Vancouver, but so far nothing has come of it, and I think I am safe in saying that nothing will come of it unless the rate of subsidy is increased. It is also proposed to build a Government-owned dry dock on the Pacific coast, but I think it would be quite improper for me to make any pronouncement on that subject until the Government shall have decided what they are going to do. I am pointing out that the Dry dock Subsidy Act has been a failure so far as the production of dry docks is concerned, and I presume it is because the assistance is not great enough. It is quite a problem to know what to do with a dry dock after it is completed. It is very simple to build a dry dock, if you can get the money, but to operate it is a different thing. We have two Government-owned dry docks at Levis. One is a small dock that has been there for a great number of years, and the other is the Champlain dry dock, which is 1,150 ft. long, and one of the finest pieces of work of its kind in the world. But we have no plant at Levis, we have no person to operate the dock. I do not think the Government would be justified in engaging 150 or 200 men down there and saying to the world "Come along with your ships and we will repair them for you." That would be very unbusinesslike. The dry dock is being operated by the Government in a sense; that is, we have a dock master who has the right to say what vessels shall enter the dock, and under what conditions, and we charge a certain rate per day according to the tonnage of the vessel; but the work is being done by a local firm, the Davies Shipbuilding Company. We dock the ship and receive a fee according to the tonnage, and the Davies Company does the work. In my judgment the company has got a very, very fine proposition because it has two dry docks to work in, and their works are between them.

This same question comes up in connection with the proposed dry dock in Victoria. There has been some talk of the Government building a dry dock in Esquimalt. That problem would have to be settled before proceeding with the work. What would be done with the dock after its completion? There are two methods in vogue to-day in the building of docks, one being for the Government themselves to build the dock, which means a tremendous outlay, and there is always the great problem as to what will be done with the dock after completion. If we can get docks constructed by companies under the dry docks subsidy and under Government control and subject to Government ratification of fees that can be charged, they are relieved of a very large expenditure, because the 4½ per cent extended over a period of thirty-five years is a very small matter compared with the initial cost of building a first-class dry dock, and the Government is also relieved of its operation. My hon. friend is enough of a business man to know that there is not much use in talking about operating a dry dock and making money out of it. That cannot be done by the Government. If an up-to-date business concern own the dock, it is in their interest to get business. There will be no question of discrimination, and the only question that will weigh with them will be the getting of enough business to make it a paying concern. Personally, I am very much in favour of the construction of docks under subsidy, but up to the present time we have had very poor success, and I do not believe it is possible to get any other docks built in Canada under subsidy without an increase in the subsidy. My own judgment would be that the second-class dry dock should receive subsidy up to 4½ per cent for thirty-five years upon cost the same as first-class docks. If that were done, dry docks of the second class could be provided in a number of places in Canada without the Government actually paying for them.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I have to call the Chairman's attention to the fact that there is no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN: The Clerk will count the members.

The CLERK: Mr. Chairman, there are 19 members in the House, with the Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN: I shall have to report to the Speaker who will direct the Clerk to count the House.

The Deputy Speaker having taken the Chair:

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: There not being a quorum in the House I will ask the Chairman to take the names of the members present.

The Clerk having taken the names of the members present reported:

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The Clerk having found that there are more than twenty members present I declare that there is a quorum and that the House may resume in Committee of Supply.

The House resumed in Committee of Supply.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not know, Mr. Chairman, that I have anything further to say.

Mr. McKENZIE: Why is this dredging tied up altogether? There does not seem naturally to be any particular connection between the building of a dry dock and dredging at Courtenay bay. While the dry dock is a fixed proposition, years one way or the other will not change the situation, and I think it is perhaps dangerous to make a contract for dredging that will extend over a great many years. Labour and everything is high, but after some years we can hope that matters will be such that the proposed services will be obtained at a cheaper rate than contracts made during the past few years. I would like to know what number of years this dredging arrangement covers, and what amount, apart from the dry dock, the dredging involves.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend's question would be a very apt one if a new contract had been made, but I think he will be surprised to learn that this contract was entered into in March, 1912, and that the work is going on under the prices prevailing then. There is no public work in Canada in which the Government is getting the work done under conditions existing in 1912. Tenders were called for this work, which was advertised perhaps as no other public work was ever advertised in Canada. Every district engineer in Canada had a copy of the plans and specifications, and there were notices running for between two and three months in all the big newspapers. In addition to this, a copy of the plans and specifications was deposited in the Office of the High Commissioner in London. Three tenders were received, all from English firms, the lowest tender being from the firm of Norten-Griffiths Company, Limited, for between eight and nine million dollars, including the dredging of a certain specified area, the building of piers, and the construction of a breakwater. The second part of the tender concerned the construction of a dry dock. When I came into the department I found that about four million dollars' worth of work had been done on the harbour part of it. Work had proceeded on the dry dock, but no subsidy contract had been entered into. The only subsidy contract that was ever signed was that signed about a year ago, with the present company, that is, Norton Griffiths Company Limited. While they did a large amount of work on the dry dock they never had a subsidy contract. Now there is a subsidy contract under the law, and instead of going on and increasing the work we have decreased it. For instance, the channel leading from the main St. John harbour into Courtenay bay was to be 32 feet at low water. That involved some submarine rock work. We have eliminated all the rock work in the channel, and the channel itself will be dredged down to about 22 feet. We have reduced the cost of the channel by hundreds of thousands of dollars and are not doing any submarine rock dredging in the channel, my view being—and perhaps I am taking my own engineering opinions in regard to this work—that no ship will ever dock in St. John at low water. It is well known to many members of the Committee that St. John labours under a great disadvantage, having a high tide of 25 feet normal and 27 feet in spring tides. I do not believe that any ship will ever go into that channel to dock at low tide. Ships do not do it to-day but wait at the bar until at least half tide. Under the circumstances, we thought we could save considerable money and eliminated a lot of that dredging. The construction of the four piers was provided for in the original contract. We have eliminated that from the present contract because we do not consider it absolutely necessary. We want the basin and the entrance to the dry dock completed, but there is a clause in the contract which provides that whenever the present contractors are called upon to complete the piers they must do so under the prices in the contract of 1912. So that if we attempted to call for new tenders to carry on this work under present conditions, it would cost at least 50 per cent more than at the present time, and probably higher than that.

Mr. CAHILL: Did the minister not inform the House last year that this dredging contract had been cancelled?

Mr. CARVELL: I informed the House that I was not sure whether we were going on with the work or not. When I came into the department, it was contended by certain people that the contract was cancelled. I had no hesitation in saying that the contract had not been cancelled. Just before I made that statement I had referred the matter to the Department of Justice. Within about a month, or when the Supplementary Estimates came up, I was asked the question again and I said that we were going on with the work and in the meantime I received a notification from the Justice Department that the contract was not cancelled, that it was still alive. On that assurance I ratified the assignment of the contract by the Norton Griffiths Company to the St. John Shipbuilding Company, or rather consented to it.

Mr. CAHILL: What amount is involved in the subsidy?

Mr. CARVELL: You can figure it out yourself; it is 4½ per cent on $5,500,000 for thirty-five years. No part of this has been paid because the work has not progressed to the point where I feel justified in guaranteeing the bonds. Just as soon as $1,000,000 has been expended, if the company want it, I shall ask council to guarantee the bonds. They have to finance it themselves. At the present time I do not believe they could sell these bonds for sixty, if for anything at all. However, they can take the bonds if they want to because they are entitled to them; that is entirely their affair. They finance it and we do the harbour work. The basin, which will be provided, will cover about 80 acres, and notwithstanding the fact that some derogatory things have been said about it, it is going to be one of the finest harbours in Canada when it is completed. It is true that we have a very high tide to contend with; it is true that nature has not been kind to the port of St. John, but geographically it is in the place where the business is being done. The people of St. John have had the courage and energy to do what no other city or community in Canada has done. They started out to do a transatlantic business and to make St. John a great national port, and they have put up between $2,250,000 and $2,500,000 of their own money, carrying out the work, financing it and taking hold of it themselves. It is urged that the Government should take this port over and put it under a commission. I believe it ought to be done. But, however, they have spent their own money and the Dominion of Canada has spent less on the harbour of St. John than on any other harbour in Canada of its size and importance. There is more business done at the port of St. John than in any other port in Canada save Montreal; in the last fiscal year $221,000,000 worth of business was done through the port of St. John. The business there does not start until after November. The armistice was signed in November, but since that time $175,000,000 worth was done through that port. It is the natural port of Canada in the winter time. There is no use of saying that there are some mud banks and that for that reason we cannot go on. The mud banks may be there, but it is the duty of any man who occupies this position to see that that port is fairly dealt with and that it is put in a position to carry on the business that they have there in the winter time. We must either do that or hand it over to Portland or Boston. It is true that we have the port of Halifax, the finest port probably on the American coast. I am sure there is nothing like it on the whole Atlantic coast.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is not better than Sydney harbour, is it?

Mr. CARVELL: It is far better—and I do not want to say anything derogatory of Sydney harbour. Halifax has a magnificent harbour, the like of which hardly exists anywhere else in the world. But, unfortunately, it is 200 miles farther away from the business of Canada than St. John, and notwithstanding all the war business that has been going through Halifax it has not done a quarter of the business that has been done through St. John. That is on account of the geographical position of St. John.

Mr. McKENZIE: The three greatest harbours in the world are Halifax, Sydney and Melbourne. The great man who made that pronouncement did not undertake to differentiate between them.

Mr. CROWE: What about Vancouver?

Mr. ROBB: The minister said that Halifax was 200 miles farther east than St. John. Is there any difference in the freight rate between a point in Ontario or Quebec on export shipments by St. John or Halifax?

Mr. CARVELL: There is one cent per hundred pounds. Boston, Portland and St. John enjoy the same rate. There is an advance of one cent as against Halifax.

Toronto harbour—improvements, $500,000.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: Does the minister know the condition of Toronto harbour? Last year the matter came up before the House, but since that time there have been many changes in connection with the harbour due to storm destruction. Perhaps the minister remembers that about 1897 the south shore of the island was in a very dangerous condition and it was possible that the whole of the island would be destroyed. The Board of Trade and City Council, realizing the situation, made representations to the Government at that time and it was pointed out that if something was not done there was a possibility of the entire island being destroyed. The Government realized that if that should happen there would be no protection for the riparian rights of the Government along the harbour and it would become a very expensive proposition for them. The Board of Trade and City Council entered into negotiations with the Government. The Government undertook to spend $200,000 if the city would expend $100,000; so that about $300,000 was expended at that time to protect the south shore of the island. That gave temporary protection but in a year or two it was found that the protection was not substantial. They had to adopt another method and again expend more money to protect the south shore. They protected that part of the island. Now we realize, and the Government realize too, that there must be further protection. The minister will remember that the Government agreed to expend about $6,000,000, the Harbour Commission $13,000,000, and the city of Toronto $2,000,000, making an investment in harbour improvements in Toronto of about $21,000,000. There have been, I think, three Orders in Council passed committing the Government to this expenditure. I have here a copy of Order in Council No. 1,426, passed on June 10th, 1913, which describes some of the protective works that were required and which form a part of the contract. Section (b) on page 5 contains this description:

> The construction of a crib breakwater, approximate 18,600 feet long, to protect the lake shore west of the western entrance to the harbour.

Then section (c) of the same Order in Council relates to:

> The construction of a seawall of pile work, approximate 17,295 feet long, to protect the lake shore on the east side of the east entrance to the harbour.

Under the authority of this Order in Council the work was undertaken, and in the western section about 4,100 feet of crib sub-structure has been built at a cost of about $187,000, which is now being protected by concrete coping. I may say that the greater part of this work was destroyed by a storm. The Harbour Commissioners of Toronto spent about $1,240,000 on this part of the western section, and already about $100,000 damage has been caused to the western section of the cribwork on the lake shore. This estimate of damages was made in the early part of the present year, and within the last week a further destruction of the work on this part of the harbour shore has taken place.

At six o'clock the Committee took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

THE CANADIAN WHOLESALE GROCERS' ASSOCIATION.

On the Order: Third reading of Bill No. 45, to incorporate the National Wholesale Grocers' Association, (as amended); and recommending that the title of said Bill be changed to "An Act to incorporate the Canadian Wholesale Grocers' Association":

Mr. CHARLES SHEARD (Toronto South): I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Thomas Foster, that the title be "An Act to incorporate the Canadian Wholesale Grocers' Association."

Amendment agreed to.

Bill as amended read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY.

The House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN: When the Committee rose at six o'clock we were considering item 110 on page 69 of the Estimates. The item had been considered sub-item by sub-item and we had reached:

Toronto harbour—Improvements.

Mr. Foster had the floor.

Mr. THOMAS FOSTER: I would like to say to the Minister of Public Works that the engineer of the Harbour Commission estimated the damage done in the early part of the year along the shore of Humber Bay at about $100,000. Since that estimate was made we have had some very heavy southeast storms which have caused a further loss of $10,000 or $15,000. About two weeks ago I had occasion to go along the shore and I noticed a great change since my former visit by reason of the washing away of the reclaimed land, showing that if something is not done immediately there is going to be a further tremendous loss for the Harbour Commission and the city that the Government will no doubt have to make good. If the work had been completed a year or two ago, as we expected, the Harbour Commission and the city would have saved about $75,000 per annum as well as this loss of $115,000, which makes it a very serious proposition for them.

The cribs that had been completed for section 5 have been lying for almost two years exposed to the weather and they are rapidly deteriorating, and, consequently, a heavy loss is being sustained. To protect this work and to place three 100-foot cribs on section 5, would cost, it is estimated, about $152,448. Surely it would be good business and economy to spend this amount to make use of those cribs and to protect this reclaimed land.

In 1918-19 the Estimates provided for some $500,000, and about $80,000 or $100,000 of that was to meet some drawback, which would reduce the amount intended to be used to complete the ship canal to about $420,000. Whether that has been completed and this work protected or not I do not know, but I expect the minister will be able to explain if there is any balance unexpended. If the Government would expend about $496,180 protection would be provided for reclaimed land that has cost about $1,240,193 to reclaim. If that is done I understand from the engineer that it would not matter so much if the work was then allowed to stand for some time until the minister found it more advantageous to carry it to completion. I also understand from the engineer that the substructure that was put down about two years ago has been for the most part destroyed. I drew the attention of the minister to that fact last year, and I understood him to undertake to place in his Supplementary Estimates some $150,000 to protect that work. I do not know whether he is carrying that forward, but it seems to me false economy to have $187,000 worth of work destroyed for want of an additional expenditure of $150,000 to complete it, and to defer the expenditure of some $400,000 to protect $1,240,000 worth of work. So, while I give the minister a great deal of credit for his policy of economy, yet in a case of this kind I would say that to refrain from making the additional necessary expenditure is not economy and does not show good judgment.

According to this Order in Council the Government is committed to an expenditure of some $6,000,000. I think three Orders in Council were passed by the Government in reference to this expenditure. There was to be a sea wall built from the western channel crossing Humber bay and from the eastern channel to Woodbine avenue, or a little further east. Nothing has been done on the eastern section and as the result there has been further destruction of Kew Beach park, a very valuable section. I understand from the city engineer that it will cost $50,000 to protect a small part of the shore there. In the last two or three days a very heavy storm from the southeast has taken away a considerable section of the southwest portion of the island. According to a report I have received two or three large trees and a couple of hundred feet of concrete walk were washed away, and the water is now very close to some valuable residential property. Surely it is time that immediate action was taken to avoid further destruction of these improvements which have cost a great deal of money, and as the Government is committed to this expenditure I would urge the minister to take the necessary steps to have the work completed.

If the minister has made an inspection of the harbour and of these shores he must appreciate the value of the part of the island of which I speak. This year the water is higher than usual and when there is a strong southeast wind there is often great destruction on the island. We have had an evidence of that within the last three days. I see that the minister is asking for only $500,000 this year as against $702,000 last year. I shall be glad to hear him explain how he proposes to spend that $500,000; I cannot conceive that it will give the protection that is desirable and necessary. A good many years ago we undertook to protect a section of the west side of the eastern channel by building a breakwater there; that has helped to protect that section of the island. But that work has been there over thirty years and has become partly destroyed. If this sea-wall that the Government has committed itself to is not very soon placed in its proper position, the needed protection to that part of the island will not be given, because the old breakwater will not last much longer. On this section of the island there are some valuable summer residences and the erection of a breakwater along this entire shore from the east to the west should be immediately undertaken. Perhaps the minister will give us some information regarding this proposed expenditure and tell us whether he intends to put in the Supplementary Estimates the amount necessary to carry out the policy to which the Government is committed in connection with this work.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend has very fairly indeed stated the condition of affairs from his standpoint, and also from the standpoint of fact. He referred first to the protection of the island and to the fact that a good many years ago the Dominion Government erected a number of groins along that portion of the island in front of Toronto harbour lying westward of what is called the Eastern Passage. I was in that vicinity a year and a half ago but I did not inspect that portion of the work closely enough to be able to discuss it intelligently. The description, however, which the hon. member has given corresponds almost exactly with the information which I have received from the officers of the department. The protection of land in various parts of Canada from the action of the waters of rivers, lakes and the sea is a question with which I have laboured more, perhaps, since I have been Minister of Public Works than with any other question of policy. I have had applications from British Columbia, involving tremendous amounts of money, for the protection of lands in that province from the ravages of the Fraser river and other rivers in British Columbia. I have received numerous applications also from Nova Scotia, Ontario and Quebec. I do not know how many applications I have received from members of Parliament and Boards of Trade and Municipal Councils in the province of Quebec that steps be taken by the Dominion Government to take care of erosion along the river St. Lawrence. I mention these merely to show you that the problem is a very great one. I have a very strong feeling that, theoretically at least, the Federal Government ought not to be called upon to protect the land of any part of Canada from erosion. That is something that is the natural consequence of things; it is something that follows the ownership of land. But it is hard to lay down a policy founded upon principle, because all sorts of things have been done in the past; therefore I cannot say that nothing will be done. I promised the people of Toronto a week or ten days ago that I would go there with my engineer and look into the matter; I will do so. What I call the principle with regard to this matter has been violated so many times during the last twenty-five or thirty years that I think we should consider these cases individually as we find them, and do what is right in the premises.

Now I come to the next portion of the hon. member's remarks which had reference to a scheme partly of harbour development, partly of shore protection and partly of the beautification of Toronto. He is correct in saying that in 1913 an agreement was made between the Dominion Government, the city of Toronto, and the Harbour Commissioners of Toronto under which certain work was to be done. The Dominion's share was a little under $6,000,000 and the Harbour Commissioners of Toronto and the city were to spend $15,000,000. A contract was entered into with the Canadian Stewart Company for the carrying out of the Dominion Government's portion of this work. That contract was very unsatisfactory from the Government's standpoint. The work was to have been completed about the time—I think the very week—I entered the Government, but it was not nearly completed. A tremendous amount of work, involving about $600,000 or $700,000, had been done so badly that the company were compelled to tear it down and build over again.

Mr. McKENZIE: Can the minister explain why work involving $600,000 was permitted to proceed in such an unsatisfactory manner?

Mr. CARVELL: No, I cannot. I can only say that it did proceed and that the department found it out and compelled the Stewart Company to make good. And they did make good; I think that work is the finest of its kind that I have ever looked at. I speak now of the piles and the construction, the development generally, in Ashbridge's bay. When I visited the work in the fall of 1917 the water had been pumped out of the canal so that the character of the work could be seen. The sheet-piling was driven in so closely that you could not find a space of a quarter of an inch between the piles. So far as I could observe, everything seemed to be in perfect order. But I came into this Government with the distinct pledge that I would save every dollar that I could possibly save until the war was over. I did not close up the Toronto Harbour works, but I put on all the brakes I possibly could. My first act as Minister of Public Works was to cancel a contract for a million dollar breakwater at St. John.

I thought that a pretty good place to commence to show that I was in earnest in trying to shut off unnecessary expenditure was at home, and I did it, and I have received a great deal of adverse criticism for doing so. We also closed down the works on the St. Charles river and on the Welland canal. I have closed down construction on every big work wherever I possibly could. Among the works that I partially closed down were the Toronto harbour works. I cannot agree with the figures quoted by my hon. friend, although he quotes them in good faith, having got them from the Toronto Harbour Commissioners. The commissioners have quoted the same figures to me a good many times. They have said that $100,000 of damage has been done to their work, because the Government's part of the work was not finished in the Humber Bay district. I have inspected the work at Toronto. The construction consists of a series of cribs sunk out in the lake about 300 to 400 yards from the shore. The intention is that that crib work is to be covered with cement, and a wall built higher than the waves of the lake. This will leave a sort of lagoon between the wall and the shore. The Harbour Commissioners have had a tremendous quantity of sand pumped out of the lake back against the shore, and in some places this sand is within, I suppose, 500 or 600 feet off the crib work, or perhaps less. The contention of the Harbour Commissioners is that because a concrete top was not put on the crib work there has been a loss of the material which they have pumped back against the shore. It may be all true what they say about the damage, but I could not see it. From my homely way of looking at engineering problems, I have not been convinced that there has been the loss they state.

Mr. T. FOSTER: You will see the damage when you go back.

Mr. CARVELL: Undoubtedly there has been some loss. In fact, wherever works have been closed down in Canada there has been some loss. Last year there was a vote in the Supplementary Estimates for $156,000 for putting the concrete top on the cribs that had already been sunk and for sinking a further short distance of crib.

Mr. T. FOSTER: Three 100-foot cribs.

Mr. CARVELL: The cribs have been constructed and they are now tied up to the shore. The idea was to sink them, and we started out to do so. I called upon the contractors, the Canadian Stewart Company, to sink these cribs and put the concrete top on the cribs that had already been sunk. They took the ground that on account of a letter which had been written to them by the chief engineer in the fall of 1917 their contract was cancelled after a certain amount of work was done. While I did not write that letter, I take full responsibility for it. I did not know whether the contract was cancelled or not. They said it was, and they refused to go on with the work. I submitted the matter to the Justice Department, and the Justice Department said that in their opinion the contract was cancelled. I started out to see if I could get the work done by other parties, but in view of labour conditions in Toronto and all over Canada it was not only an impossibility, but a God-send that we could not go on with the work. At that time you could not get men to perform work of that kind, so I simply accepted the situation and allowed the matter to stand, and nothing was done so far as the cribs were concerned. That is the reason why the total amount of the money voted last year was not expended. In the letter which had been written to the Canadian-Stewart Company we pointed out that they were to do certain work, amounting, I think, to a little over $300,000. They carried out the work in so far as we instructed them. Then they claimed their contract was closed and we were very glad, indeed, that they did claim it was closed. We also claimed that it was closed, so there is no hard feeling on our side. Now they claim that the contract was not closed, and they want half a million dollars damages because the contract was closed down. I want to say here what I have said to them, that the only way they will get their half million dollars will be at the tail end of a lawsuit which will go just as far as the courts of this country will allow it to go.

As to the work in contemplation, there is an item in the Estimates of $500,000 which we estimate is as much money as can possibly be expended on Toronto harbour during the coming season. We may be a little out, but I think not. The work to be performed consists in putting the top on the cribs which have been sunk, sinking the 300 feet of cribs which have already been built and putting a concrete top on them, and finishing up the work in Ashbridge's Bay. Now, $500,000 will not do all this work. We estimate that it will take $800,000, or, perhaps, a little more to finish up the work I have described.

It must be remembered that the Toronto harbour proposition consists of two portions. The development of Ashbridge's bay is purely a harbour proposition, and in my judgment a very good one. Ashbridge's bay is a great level sand bank in front of the city of Toronto, covering some thousands of acres which at certain times of the year are practically inundated; at all events, the water comes almost to the top. When the water goes down, the land will be a foot or two out of the water. The idea was to dig a canal 400 feet wide and about half a mile or a little longer in length right through the centre of the bay. The material that is pumped out of the canal, and out of the big turning basin at the far end of it, is thrown back over the land, and the harbour commissioners are pumping sand out of the lake as well. They are building up the land on either side of the canal for industrial sites, and I have no doubt that Ashbridge's bay will be one of the greatest industrial sites in Canada in the near future; in fact, large concerns have already located there. For instance, the Imperial Munitions Board established a very large plant there.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Who will own that land ?

Mr. CARVELL: The Toronto Harbour Commissioners. We are simply carrying on the navigation work. The spoil has to be taken care of in some way, and it is a great deal cheaper to pump it back on the land than to take it out and dump it in the lake. When this work is completed there will be a canal 400 feet wide, and from one-half to three-quarters of a mile in length, with a turning basin about 1,100 feet square at the end of it, with a breathing space between the turning basin and the island. This will avoid any trouble over stagnant water, and will make the place clean and sanitary. I repeat, I think it will become a great industrial centre.

The other portion of the work is not in any sense a navigation proposition. It is building this breakwater on either side of the city of Toronto, about four miles in length on the western side, and three and-a-half miles on the eastern side.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have never seen the canal the minister has referred to. Will the minister explain why he is endeavouring to improve navigation by cutting through this flat?

Mr. CARVELL: I am not doing it, because it was done before I came in. I examined the work, however, and I looked upon it as a splendid proposition. The idea is to provide a water front on Ashbridge's bay of over half a mile, and my hon. friend will remember that there are no tides in Toronto harbour as in his part of the country. The canal is 24 feet deep, which will take care of any vessel which goes through the new Welland canal. Taking both sides, there will be a series of wharves extending about a mile and-a-half. On both sides of this canal and around the turning basin will be industrial sites. It may be a large contribution to the industrial life of Toronto, but it is a transportation proposition pure and simple from the standpoint of the Government and one which requires no defence, because if any one went and inspected it he would come to the conclusion that it is a real transportation problem.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is really a proposition to reclaim land.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, it is in a sense. Without a doubt it is a proposition to reclaim land, but at the same time it is making available a mile and a half water front which will be of inestimable value.

Mr. DUFF: Is wharf accommodation needed now?

Mr. CARVELL: I do not know. They have considerable wharf accommodation in Toronto, but my friend must remember that the Welland canal when completed will mean a revolution in the water-borne transportation of the whole of lake Ontario, and in fact down the St. Lawrence river as far as Prescott. Then following that comes the next great problem of canalizing the St. Lawrence river.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Should not these reclaimed lands pay for the expenditure involved in these improvements?

Mr. CARVELL: That might be. I can only say that as I understand the contract that is not the case. I have nothing to defend and nothing to conceal; I state the facts as they are. The Government might have said: "We will retain the ownership in these lands and will lease them." But they did not. I do not want to attempt to disguise the thing at all.

Mr. FOSTER: You do retain a section on the west part of the channel?

Mr. CARVELL: We retain a small section but the great majority goes over to the Harbour Commission. As regards the remainder of the work, it would mean the construction of a sea wall of about seven or eight miles in length altogether if the whole scheme were carried out. At present we are carrying out only a small portion of the scheme, and it will certainly be a most beautiful place. The city of Toronto is reclaiming land along the lake front but is doing it at its own expense and of course will own it, but I do not think that even gentlemen from Toronto will claim that that is a transportation proposition as much as Ashbridge's bay.

[Mr. Carvell.]

Mr. PEDLOW: Is it the intention of the Government to continue with the work on that seven or eight miles until completed?

Mr. CARVELL: Not this year.

Mr. PEDLOW: In succeeding years?

Mr. CARVELL: That will be a matter of policy later on. I have no announcement to make except that we propose this year putting on the concrete tops on the cribs that are now sunk and on 300 feet that we intend to sink. We also purpose to finish the Ashbridge's bay proposition. There is no use disguising the fact that there is a contract between the Government of Canada, the City of Toronto and the Harbour Commissioners of Toronto to carry out the whole scheme which will involve at least $7,000,000.

Mr. McMASTER: When was the contract made?

Mr. CARVELL: The Order in Council was passed in 1913 and I believe the contract was made in October of the same year.

Mr. EULER: Is there a time limit for its completion?

Mr. CARVELL: It was to have been completed in October, 1917.

Mr. PEDLOW: How much has been spent to date?

Mr. CARVELL: Practically two and a half millions.

Mr. COPP: What portion was the Government to expend?

Mr. CARVELL: A little less than $6,000,000. The city of Toronto and the Harbour Commissioners—which is the same thing because their bonds are guaranteed by the city of Toronto—were to expend about $15,000,000. The total expenditure was to be about $20,000,000. I think that if we go on and finish our part of it it will cost about $7,000,000 when completed. We have now expended about $2,500,000 and are asking for an appropriation of $500,000 at the present time which will be used in putting the concrete tops on these piers and finishing the Ashbridge's bay part of the work as far as it will extend. It will take about $850,000 to finish up what we have in prospect at the present time.

Mr. McMASTER: Can the minister give the Committee an idea of the water-borne exports from and imports into Toronto?

Mr. CARVELL: No, I cannot do so, but I do not think they are anything like what they will be in the immediate future. I am a great believer in water transportation. I believe that the people will devote their attention to water-borne transportation, especially on inland waters, to a much greater extent in the future than in the past, and when the Welland canal is completed Toronto will be one of the most important seaports on the Great Lakes. Toronto is not an important seaport to-day for the reason that the big ships which navigate from the head of the lakes to Port Colborne cannot come to Toronto and therefore the shipping in Toronto is confined to the 14-foot draught vessel which can get through the Welland canal or down the St. Lawrence. But with a city having the manufacturing and trade possibilities of Toronto, there cannot be any question that when the Welland canal is completed Toronto harbour will be entirely different from what it is to-day. And the Government are not only entitled but compelled to provide necessary transportation facilities in Toronto for the future as they have done in Montreal, St. John, Halifax or any other port. I will admit at once, however, that if the Welland canal were not going to be deepened the Ashbridge's Bay proposition would not in my opinion be justifiable because there would not be traffic to justify it.

Mr. DUFF: When will the Welland canal be finished?

Mr. CARVELL: I hope in about three years, but that is not in my department. It seems to me that it should be completed in three years. This work, I presume, will be completed sometime in 1920. In other words, Ashbridge's bay will be completed a year or two before the Welland canal.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is important to know how the system of connecting Montreal with say Toronto is to be completed. When we get to the eastern end of the Welland canal what position are we in between there and Montreal?

Mr. CARVELL: We are then in a position to reach the largest boats that will come down the Great Lakes as far east as Kingston and there should be good business done as far as Prescott. It would be possible to navigate the St. Lawrence as far as Prescott, although I understand it would require some work in the river channel between Kingston and Prescott in order to make it navigable for large boats. But the moment the Welland canal is completed the biggest boats that ply on Lake Erie and Lake Superior at present will be able to come down not only to Toronto but to Kingston, and any man who looks at the map and who travels over the country and knows anything about its business will realize that Toronto will be a very different port after the Welland canal is completed from what it is now.

Mr. McKENZIE: I am afraid the minister is beginning a big expenditure at the wrong end. I think he should begin in navigable water and continue going inland.

Mr. CARVELL: There are various views about that phase of the question. Of course I did not begin it, although I not only do not have to justify it; but I am heartily in accord with the Ashbridge's bay portion of the Toronto development. There is another thing we must remember. It is all very well to say: "You have started here, whereas you should have begun somewhere else." It means a great many millions of dollars, indeed tens of millions of dollars, in order to make it possible for a 21 or 22-foot boat to navigate from Montreal to Toronto, and I do not think we would be justified in holding up navigation as far as Kingston pending the completion of the bigger scheme. The Welland canal, we know, can be completed and will be completed within a reasonable time. But the other I will not say is very far in the future, but it will require a great deal of study and investigation and the expenditure of a tremendous amount of money before it is finished. In view of this, I am not sure that the Government were not right in starting on the Welland canal. There is always the contention that the construction of the Welland canal is going to benefit the American lake ports, and that wheat will be brought to Oswego on lake Ontario, and sent by canal thence to New York. I am not in a position to discuss that point intelligently and I do not know that it plays a very great part here. I repeat that the Ashbridge's bay proposition is a sound one and will not be completed very much before it is used and used in a very profitable manner.

Mr. McMASTER: The minister has been putting figures before us which I cannot help regarding as simply appalling in view of the financial condition of the country. Has the Government in continuing or launching upon this scheme—I am not prepared to say whether it is a new scheme or the continuation of an old one—made any calculation of what is the probable use these great public works necessitating the expenditure of tremendous amounts of money will be? We are being asked to pass these Estimates and the responsibility is upon all of us for the expenditure of these very large sums. I would feel easier in my conscience if the minister could give us some idea of what the result of this expenditure is going to be.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not know that I can give my hon. friend very much information along that line. This is no scheme launched by this Government. The Welland canal and Toronto harbour works were launched before the war. With a debt of $325,000,000 or $300,000,000 and with buoyant revenues, there was no trouble about expending $10,000,000 upon a transportation problem. We had the money to do it with.

Mr. McMASTER: The situation is absolutely different now.

Mr. CARVELL: It has changed; there is no man in Canada who realizes that so much as I do. I took the trouble on the Address to sound a note of warning and sometimes I think I did not get very much assistance or sympathy from the House.

Mr. McKENZIE: We made all the use we could of the hon. gentleman's statement.

Mr. CARVELL: I tried to point out something about the financial condition as I viewed it. I have not launched out upon any new scheme and I am going to be pretty careful how I do launch out upon any new scheme. But I think I have some idea of business, and when I find in my department a public work upon which some millions of dollars have been expended, and which is absolutely useless until it is finished. I see nothing to do but to finish it in so far as you can. I hope my hon. friend will not charge me with launching upon any new schemes involving the expenditure of large amounts until I know what the results are going to be. But in a case like this I see nothing else to do. We have spent $2,500,000 on the Ashbridge's bay proposition which is two-thirds or three-fourths completed. We have to finish it; otherwise the money we have put into it will be lost. I agree that we ought not to launch upon any new scheme involving the expenditure of large amounts unless we have well considered the business phase of it in order to see if it is going to give us a revenue.

[Mr. McMaster.]

Mr. VIEN: Will the minister tell us if it is his intention to finish up the damming of the St. Charles river at Quebec?

Mr. CARVELL: There is no vote in the Estimates for that. The trouble with the St. Charles river proposition at Quebec is a very simple one. The scheme is to construct a dam across the mouth of the river where it empties into the St. Lawrence. There were to be two entrances from the St. Lawrence up into the basins of the St. Charles river. That was to create practically a lake 12 or 14 feet higher than the ordinary level of the river at low tide and, to some extent, higher than the level would be at high tide. The sewage of at least three-quarters of the city of Quebec enters into the St. Charles river above the location of this dam and before the work was started an agreement was made with the city of Quebec by which they were to provide for the sewage. There was to be a big trunk sewer constructed by which the sewage would be emptied into the St. Lawrence river around and below the dam at the mouth of the St. Charles. It will cost probably $2,000,000. I suppose they had some trouble about financing it during the war but no attempt has been made to take care of that sewage. They have refused to go on with the work until something is done about the sewage. If you build a dam across the St. Charles river and dump the sewage of 75,000 or 80,000 people into the river for a year you will have a pest house; you could not live alongside of it. I would not take the responsibility of consenting to go on with the work until something was done about the sewage. With this I take the same ground that I have taken in regard to St. John and other places. We have about $1,750,000 invested in the St. Charles river work at the present time and it will take another $1,000,000 to finish it. The money we have expended is absolutely lost until the work is completed but I cannot go on and complete it until something is done to protect the health of the city of Quebec.

Mr. EDWARDS: The hon. member for Brome (Mr. McMaster) finds the figures indicating expenditures at Toronto harbour appalling.

Mr. McMASTER: I did not say Toronto harbour. It was the whole thing, the Welland canal, Toronto harbour and other works, that I referred to. I was not especially referring to Toronto.

Mr. EDWARDS: Then the hon. gentleman's interjection occurred at an inopportune time. One would naturally conclude that he was appalled at the expenditure at Toronto. I am glad to know that that was not the case because I have never seen any indication of panic on the part of the hon. gentleman when an expenditure was to be made in the vicinity of Montreal. He could stand any amount of expenditure down there without turning a hair.

Mr. J. D. REID: He has not got any hair.

Mr. EDWARDS: Then my remark is incontrovertible; it cannot be questioned. There is another thing that I want to refer to. The minister would have us believe that a new era of economy, retrenchment and general saving opened up at the time that he entered office. Time and again he has assured us that he is not to be held responsible for any expenditures previous to that event. I have sat in this House for a number of years and I think I am correct in stating that when these expenditures were entered upon at Toronto and other parts of the country they went through without any very serious opposition from the gentlemen who are now sitting on the other side of the House and from gentlemen who are now sitting on this side of the House. The general principle was accepted then. These expenditures, as a general thing, have been justified. In regard to the St. Lawrence route, I did not hear the minister mention anything about the carrying of grain from lake Ontario down through to Montreal. I would almost infer from his remarks that Toronto was to be the trans-shipping point for grain coming down in big freighters when the Welland canal is completed. I hope that is not the intention of the Government because it seems to me that when that time arrives the proper point for trans-shipping the grain carried in these large vessels is the city of Kingston.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend certainly misunderstood me. I made no reference, or even a hint, to a possible trans-shipment of grain at Toronto; I don't believe that will ever happen. What I was talking about was the expansion of the general business of Toronto.

Mr. EDWARDS: Then we are in entire agreement on that point. I do not think the leader of the Opposition has the right idea when he suggests that the proper way to arrange this line of transportation would be to begin at the lower end, at Montreal I presume he means, and canalize the St. Lawrence. Before you undertook to make provision for transporting the grain available for the route from the Welland canal to Kingston or Prescott—before you could possibly complete an enterprise of that kind—that grain would be diverted from Canadian channels to American routes entirely. It does seem to me that something should be done, and done right away, to make provision at Kingston for the trans-shipment of the grain which will come down when the new Welland canal is completed. Kingston is the natural point for trans-shipment, because the grain can be loaded there into any kind of vessel at all by reason of the fact that the route from Kingston to Montreal lies in sheltered water. A vessel which could not stand the heavy seas or storms likely to be encountered on lake Ontario would therefore be quite capable of engaging in the carrying trade from Kingston to Montreal. In my opinion the Government should not wait until the new Welland canal is completed before making provision at Kingston for the trans-shipping of the grain which the big freighters will carry as far as that point. Although I speak from the standpoint of an Ontario man, and one who resides in the neighbourhood of Kingston, the advocacy of this idea is not confined to eastern men alone. I think I am right in saying that some years ago the grain growers of the West, when looking forward to the completion of the Welland canal, suggested that a Government elevator, somewhat similar to the one which is now in existence at Port Colborne, should be built at Kingston. I hope the Government will not delay in providing the necessary facilities at that port because if delay takes place we are going to lose the carriage of that grain; the Americans will promptly provide the necessary facilities to transport it over their own routes.

Mr. CARVELL: I take no exception to the hon. gentleman's reference to the fact that I voted for the expenditure of money in very large amounts prior to the war. I did so, and I have no regrets for so doing. However, I stated some time ago that the financial conditions of Canada have been revolutionized in the last five years. If we wanted ten, fifteen or twenty millions of dollars before the war there was no trouble whatever to get it, and nobody suffered because Canada had the money. Hon. gentlemen will recall that we formerly had surpluses of twenty-five and thirty-five millions of dollars a year. Why the cost of the construction of the Transcontinental down to 1914 was paid out of surpluses. We also could build grain elevators and canals whenever we so minded, there was no difficulty about it at all. I am not posing as an economist because I am fond of doing so; no man who ever occupied the position of Minister of Public Works would like to engage in building as much as I would. I would be delighted if we were able to go on and construct public works, and I have enough optimism about me to think that I can build fairly competently, and I should like to go on and do so. But I realize the changed condition financially which has taken place in this country and that if I am going to be true to the position which I occupy and true to my conception of what a public man in Canada should do, I have got to look before I leap.

Coming to the second part of my hon. friend's remarks, I heartily agree with him. When the Welland canal is completed it seems very reasonable indeed that the big freighters should go eastward as far as they can. I do not think they can ever economically go farther than Kingston at the present time but probably it would not take a great expenditure of money in order to so deepen the channel in the St. Lawrence river, so that those vessels might proceed as far as Prescott. Some months ago I visited Kingston, where I met the Board of Trade and the municipal authorities and certainly had a very pleasant day. To-day a board of engineers, of whom an engineer of the Public Works is one, are considering this very question, and I imagine that within the next month, or two months at the outside, we will have a very comprehensive report as to what in their judgment should be done for the future development of Kingston. Not only from the railway standpoint, but from the transportation point of view, and having in mind the erection of elevators and other facilities, notwithstanding the financial obligations which we have to bear, I think that something has got to be done in order to take care of the transportation problem which will be altogether changed as soon as the Welland canal is completed. What the nature of that policy will be I cannot announce this evening, because it has not been considered by the department or the Government, and I do not make any announcement with regard to matters of policy unless they have been decided upon. However, I quite agree with my hon. friend, we must provide for the changed conditions in respect to transportation which will exist when the Welland canal is completed. We are thoroughly investigating the situation at Kingston, and a report will be presented inside of two months showing what the "layout" will be and the probable cost of any works that may have to be undertaken.

Mr. COPP: What title or interest has the Government in the property which is being improved at Toronto as a result of the channel which is being dredged through Ashbridge's bay? In consequence of the works that are in progress certain industrial sites will be created and I would like to know who will own those sites?

Mr. CARVELL: With the exception of three or four acres on the western side of the channel, the property will belong to the Toronto Harbour Commission.

Mr. COPP: We are spending a large amount of money on the Toronto harbour works, which will amount, when the contract is finally completed, to something like $7,000,000. I can quite understand the Public Works Department building wharves in order to improve shipping facilities, but I remember when this vote was before the House last year, or a similar appropriation, there was a good deal of discussion, and it was claimed by some members that no inconsiderable part of the money was being expended in the improvement of private property. In other words, that the property fronting on the lake was privately owned, and cellar walls were being built on that property out of the public funds. Whether that is true or not I cannot say, but in glancing over last year's debate such is the tenor of some of the arguments that were advanced at that time. The Minister of Public Works last year explained that as a result of dredging a channel through the property in question some very valuable industrial sites would be created—indeed, some of these sites had already been built upon by business concerns, and others were in course of construction.

If that work continues and the property adjoining this channel becomes valuable, and the Government is protecting it, I cannot see why the Government should not have some control over the disposition of it.

Mr. CARVELL: I thought I had already answered that question. I have stated that under the contract this property belongs to the Toronto Harbour Commission, with the exception of five or six acres. There is something in what my hon. friend says, but you must remember that every time you develop a harbour or build a wharf or pier you are going to benefit somebody's property. The Government does not own all the property joining such improvements, and of course it would not be possible for it to do so. It is true that new property is being created by this work.

Mr. COPP: That is the point I make.

Mr. CARVELL: No doubt; and the property will belong to a public body—the Toronto Harbour Commission. I have no doubt that they will lease it, probably at some profit, although I understand that as far as the Toronto Harbour Commissioners are concerned any money they may make is for the purpose of providing extra accommodation, just the same as in the case of money that is being expended by this department. My friend referred to something about cellar walls. That is new to me; I do not know anything about the matter at all. I also want to say that none of this money is being expended for the protection of private property. As I explained before, it is being expended for the development of Ashbridge's bay—which I have described very fully—and for building the sea wall in front of property that has been reclaimed by the Toronto Harbour Commissioners by pumping sand out of the bottom of the lake.

Mr. McKENZIE: My objection to this reclaiming of land is that it is too expensive. There is plenty of land in Canada, and I presume the city of Toronto could grow toward the place where the land is and not go out into the lake for it.

Mr. CARVELL: If Toronto grows inland it will not have water for these industries. I want to make this as plain as I can. The idea is to provide a location for industries, and a very great number of them, that will have both rail and water transportation; and you cannot get both anywhere in Toronto that I know of except in Ashbridge's bay.

Mr. McKENZIE: If the hon. member will satisfy this Committee that the shipping from the city of Toronto is so congested that there is not enough water frontage at present to accommodate it, I readily agree with him that it is necessary to extend the water line. But that is the only condition of things existing in the city of Toronto or any other city that would justify the Government in building frontage at such a high cost as this must be. If this money is necessary in the sense I have suggested I would be in hearty accord with the proposed expenditure, but I am not satisfied that it is a good business proposition to spend this money in order to give more dockage to the city unless it is absolutely necessary. That is my criticism.

Mr. CARVELL: I thought I had answered that criticism once before. I have no figures before me, but in my judgment this additional water frontage is not an absolute necessity under present conditions. But I do believe when the Welland canal is completed and the city of Toronto has access to all the Great Lakes that there will be a great many times the amount of shipping to and from that city that there is at the present time; and that was the only justification, and a complete justification, for the expenditure of this money. There is no attempt to help any private individual, because, as I have already said, this property becomes vested in the Toronto Harbour trustees and there is no private interest involved so far as I know.

Mr. PEDLOW: In view of the fact that this work is not of immediate necessity would it not be well to defer proceeding with it until some later date when it does become really necessary?

Mr. CARVELL: I am deferring it to such an extent that some of my friends from Toronto are not altogether pleased. I am trying to finish up the harbour proposition. I believe it ought to be done, and for the present I am asking only for an appropriation to complete the sea wall in so far as it has been started, and of course it is deteriorating all the time while in an incomplete state.

Mr. CAHILL: Has the Government in mind the deepening of the St. Lawrence to facilitate the passage of deep draught lake vessels to Montreal?

Mr. CARVELL: That would be a pretty big question to answer. I can state this much for the benefit of my hon. friend, that a committee, composed of the engineers of some of our departments in Ottawa, the chief engineer of the Hydro Electric Commission of Ontario, and the chief engineer, I believe, of the Public Works Department of Quebec, Mr. Amos, have been working for some years on the problem of canalizing the St. Lawrence river; data has been collected, and the matter is in such shape that a report will be available in a couple of months at the outside, I would imagine. There is also a proposal, which I think will be carried out, that in a very short time this question should be handed over to the International Joint Waterways Commission in order that they may take the data which our engineers and the American engineers may be able to give them, and investigate what the probable cost of canalizing the river would be, the amount of water-power that could be developed as the result of canalization, what it would cost to develop, what it could be sold for and where it could be sold. So I can assure my hon. friend that we are going into the matter in a thorough way, and I believe that within a year the public both of Canada and the United States will have all the information on the subject that it is possible to obtain. When that information is available, then it becomes: First, an international question; if this work is to be developed, when it is going to be developed, the expense of the development and in what proportions it should be borne, and secondly, how much money it is going to take, how much power can be developed, what is going to become of it, and how much revenue can be made out of it. I sincerely hope that it will be treated as a business proposition, and I believe that it will not be very many years before this great work is undertaken—one of the greatest in the Dominion of Canada. But we must remember that it is an international proposition to a great extent, and therefore it must be worked out between ourselves and the United States authorities. But I believe they are anxious to have it developed, if possible. I know our authorities are of the same mind, and I know we are taking every possible means to gather the fullest data for presentation to Parliament in connection with it.

Mr. CAHILL: What return cargo would be carried by a ship which brought wheat from the head of the lakes to Kingston, say, or to Toronto?

Mr. CARVELL: One would not require a very vivid imagination to foresee the supplying of ample return cargo so far as Toronto is concerned. Toronto will become the distributing point for practically all of western Ontario along the lakes. I do not pretend that Toronto will be able to furnish a return cargo for all vessels carrying wheat down the lakes; that would be an impossibility. I imagine that a large proportion of the wheat carriers must go to United States ports to get coal, which is the big return cargo. But Toronto is the centre of one of the greatest manufacturing sections of Canada. Then, west of Toronto we have Hamilton, which is the next place on the Great Lakes that ought to be attended to. I believe that the Dominion Government has been lax in not going on with the proper development at Hamilton, because that city is becoming one of the greatest manufacturing centres of Canada. A tremendous amount of farm machinery which now goes from Toronto and Hamilton to the West by rail could be sent by water if big vessels called at these ports. I cannot say exactly what these ships will carry, but I think it is no stretch of imagination to believe that there will be plenty of cargo when the Welland Canal is completed.

Public buildings—Nova Scotia, $19,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is the minister going to do at North Sydney?

Mr. CARVELL: The amount of $5,000 is required for an addition at the rear of the North Sydney public building for an examining warehouse.

Mr. McKENZIE: We have been talking about building that warehouse ever since Adam was a baby. When is the work to be finished?

Mr. CARVELL: During the present summer.

Mr. McKENZIE: We have been carrying that vote for five or six years.

Mr. CARVELL: We intend to go on with practically all the work for which I am asking the Committee to pass votes to-night. I do not think there are more than a dozen items in any of these Estimates in respect of which we have not the plans and specifications practically ready to call for tenders.

Mr. McKENZIE: For five or six years the Customs Department for want of space, has been obliged to rent a place quite apart from the public building, and it is absolutely necessary that this wing be added to the public building as soon as possible. Seven or eight years ago I was given a little vote to put clocks on certain public buildings in my riding, one at Sydney Mines, one at Baddeck and one at North Sydney. The clocks were put in at Baddeck and Sydney Mines but my own home town was left out; there was a change of government I think, before the hour arrived for the installation of my clock. Possibly the minister could save enough out of the $5,000 to give us the long promised clock.

Mr. CARVELL: We have $1,000 in this estimate for my hon. friend's clock.

Public buildings, New Brunswick, $35,500.

Mr. LEGER: Last year an amount was appropriated for repairs to the Richibucto public building, but they have not been carried out. I do not see any amount in the Estimates of this year for this work. May I ask the minister whether anything will be done this year?

Mr. CARVELL: Item 113 provides an amount of $25,000 for improvements and repairs to public buildings generally in the Maritime Provinces. The matter to which my hon. friend refers was brought to my attention and I am informed by my deputy that arrangements have been made and instructions given to have the small repairs on the Richibucto building paid for out of this $25,000 vote. That is why it does not appear in the Estimates.

With regard to the item of $10,000 for addition to the Moncton post office, the Post Office Department reported to our department that they required that much additional space. There is no doubt that there is great congestion in that building. No city in the Maritime Provinces has grown as fast as Moncton, and there is great demand for a new public building. The matter developed during the last two or three weeks and I could not make any decision as to what we would do, because a new building would be fairly expensive. I am not sure, therefore, that this $10,000 will be expended. It is only fair that I should make this statement in order that the member for the constituency or any other interested persons may know what the attitude of the department is with regard to the matter.

Mr. McKENZIE: The amount of this vote is not sufficient to build a new public building.

Mr. CARVELL: It would be enough to make the addition, but it would not be enough for a new building. We could not use money that was voted for an addition to the Moncton post office for the purchase of a site for a new building. A new vote would be necessary for that. It may be possible in view of the congestion in that city that this $10,000 may not be expended, and that we may try to get along with the present building in the hope that later on a building more commensurate with the importance of the city may be erected.

Mr. COPP: What I have to say will not be new to the minister because I already have had some conversation with him about a public building for the city of Moncton. The building there now is very small and was erected some twenty-five years or more ago, when Moncton was only a small town. The city is growing very rapidly and has now a population of between 17,000 and 20,000. The building is located at one extreme end of the city, and at the present time the city is expanding in exactly the opposite direction. The present building is used as a custom house and post office combined. It might possibly do as a custom house, if some additions and improvements were made. I am sure that if the minister would have an investigation made he would at once conclude that the proper and economical thing to do would be to erect a new building as soon as possible. I would urge that that be done this year, because business there is expanding very rapidly and it will be absolutely necessary to have a new building very soon. I assure him that the people of Moncton, rather than have a small addition to the present building, would prefer to put up with the present inconvenience a little longer so that a building more commensurate with the importance of the city could be erected in the near future. I am sure that if the minister would have a report made on the situation he would come to the conclusion that a public building must be erected in Moncton in the very near future.

Some of us are very disappointed that no appropriation appears in the Estimates for public buildings in other parts of New Brunswick. I refer particularly to the town of Sackville in the county of Westmorland. We have never had a public building there, although we have a population of between 3,000 and 4,000 and the town is prosperous and growing rapidly. In the town of Sackville we have the Mount Allison institution, which is known all over Canada, if not all over the world, and at which a large number of students attend. It is hardly necessary for me to impress upon the minister that a public building is very urgently needed in Sackville because he knows the locality very well. Apparently, however, the Government does not see its way clear to make an expenditure for this purpose this year. I sincerely trust that the minister will give the matter serious consideration and see if he cannot include an item in the Supplementary Estimates to provide for a public building in the town of Sackville. The building we are now using is one of the oldest in the town and is not much better than a common shed on a farm. It is exceedingly inconvenient for postal purposes, because the proper facilities are entirely lacking. There are hardly any boxes for the delivery of mail and people have to stand in the lobby till the mail is sorted, and sometimes, if the mail train is an hour late, the lobby will be full and people will be standing in the cold outside, which is very unpleasant on a stormy night.

Mr. CARVELL: I may as well state in answer to my hon. friend the position in which I find myself in regard to public buildings all over Canada. As hon. gentlemen know, I come from the province of New Brunswick and I am very intimately acquainted with all the cities and towns of that province. I know the exact truth of everything my hon. friend (Mr. Copp) has said about the town of Sackville, but what can be said of Sackville can be said, I suppose, of fifty or a hundred towns in Canada. When I began to make up the Estimates, after four years of war, I found that promises of public buildings had been made to a great many cities and towns, and in many cases the sites had been purchased. Since the armistice, members of the House, boards of trade, and municipal bodies have told me "Now is the time to implement these promises and start the construction of these buildings." The matter was taken up by Council and considered very carefully. I do not know whether we were right or not, but the policy decided upon by the Government was not to construct buildings in the smaller towns and villages at the present time; and as the Estimates show, we have provided only for the construction of buildings in half a dozen of the larger centres. This was done, as I explained in the debate on the Address, partly for the purpose of providing employment in the large cities where we knew there would be a great number of unemployed, but even in those places we are not erecting buildings if they are not required and will have no economic value.

Personally, I am a great believer in a neat small building for every town in the Dominion of Canada. It adds to the appearance of the town and gives people some local pride. Furthermore, I think that the ground surrounding the building should be beautified. If there is one thing we have neglected in connection with our public buildings in the past, it is the beautifying of the grounds.

Mr. BUREAU: Hear, hear.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend says, Hear hear. He and I had this very matter up a year ago, when I was trying to help him and the municipality of Three Rivers carry out this very idea. I tell the House frankly that the question of constructing public buildings in the smaller towns is a matter of policy for the Government to decide. When the Government decides in favour of erecting these public buildings, I suppose the burden will be cast upon me of saying where the money will be expended, and that is not a pleasant duty, I can assure the Committee. But I must assume the responsibility when that time comes, and do the best I can. If we were back in the days of 1914, and I was Minister of Public Works, I would not hesitate to ask for an expenditure of $4,000,000 or $5,000,000 for the construction of a public building in every town in Canada with a population as low even as 1,000. Considered purely from the standpoint of dollars and cents, it would not be good business, because a building can be rented for much less than the annual interest charge and maintenance, but I think a public building in a small town has an educative value. It gives people a pride in their town, and I look upon it as a good way to spend public money.

These remarks will apply to at least fifty different constituencies in Canada and perhaps a hundred, and I thought it well to make this statement so early in the debate in order that members might know exactly the position of affairs.

Mr. McMASTER: Would it not be possible in connection with the erection of small buildings in towns to have a rule laid down that if the income arising from the Post Office, or the Customs, amounts to so much, that would justify the expenditure of a sum in proportion? To say that we like to see fine public buildings throughout the country is merely to say that we enjoy the beautiful. Everybody does. But we are face to face with a condition which the Minister of Public Works realizes as well as, and probably better than a great number of other people do, and I think it would hold up the minister's hands in his struggle for economy if he would lay down the rule that when an application is made for the erection of a public building in this place and the other, the income must justify the expenditure which will be involved. I would like to know what the minister has to say to that suggestion.

Mr. CARVELL: There is a good deal of merit in the suggestion of my hon. friend in so far as the postal revenue is concerned. I cannot agree with him as regards the Customs revenue, because in very many places in Canada the Customs revenue may be entirely out of proportion to the amount of business actually done, for the reason that it extends to many outside points. As a rule the nearer a place to the border the greater the Customs revenue is as compared with an inland city or town. Take the town in which I live. There are only 4,000 people and we are ten miles from the border. I am not sure, but I think the Customs revenue runs close to $100,000. I am speaking from memory, but I know that it is a pretty large amount for a town of its size. That would not be a criterion as to what kind of a public building we should have because it serves a territory seventy-five miles up the river. I do not think you can take the Customs as much of a guide, but my opinion is that the postal revenue should serve to some extent as a guide as to the necessity for public buildings.

Mr. McMASTER: The minister has hardly answered my question as to whether it would not assist him or any Minister of Public Works in an effort to economize and to restrain the spending proclivities of the people, to lay down the rule that if the postal revenue, for instance, amounted to so much, the expenditure on a post office building should be proportionate. I know of place after place in Canada which for several years was adequately served by a small rented building, and the total expenditure in the upkeep of the building, including rent and everything might be under a thousand dollars a year. Public buildings have been put up in these places and possibly one item such as heating may cost that much money. Of course, I am not giving exact figures; this is merely by way of illustration. I am perfectly certain that hundreds of thousands of dollars have been uselessly expended on the public services of Canada in order perhaps to meet the more or less justifiable pride of this or the other little place which demands public buildings of a character far more pretentious than the circumstances warrant.

Mr. CARVELL: So far as I know, the revenue is always taken into consideration. I have no figures before me, but if my hon. friend should come to the department I could show him that there is not a proposed building in Canada in connection with which we have not the data as to population, postal revenue, customs revenue, etc. We certainly consider that and take all the data into account. There are, however, some cases in which you would have to depart from that rule because you might have a pretty large population which for some reason was not contributing very much to the postal revenues. Very often a train going through the town is the most convenient place to mail letters, and people get stamps from all sources. It is a fair criterion but it is not absolutely perfect.

Mr. COPP: I trust my hon. friend from Brome, who happens to have lived in Montreal, is not trying to excuse the expenditure on the post office in the city of Montreal because the revenues of that city were large.

Mr. McMASTER: My remarks upon this question of expenditure are not influenced either by the part of the country I live in, or by the part of the country I represent. I am endeavouring as far as possible to take a Canadian view of the question. I am thoroughly convinced that very difficult financial times confront the Canadian people unless we change their mentality in regard to what they think they should get from the Government and what they should give to the Government.

Mr. BUREAU: The question I desire to put to the minister is rather influenced by the part of the country I come from. The minister stated that he could not under the circumstances entertain the erection of new buildings in the various towns, but I understood also that he laid down as a principle that it was proper—

Mr. CARVELL: My friend is misquoting me. I have no recollection of making such a statement. I said that the Government had decided before the session that for the present year they would only erect buildings in half a dozen of the large cities, but I said that the matter was one of policy which the Government should decide upon.

Mr. BUREAU: There is a building already erected in the town of Trois-Rivières and my hon. friend knows the facts connected with it. Is it the intention to put anything into the Supplementary Estimates for fixing the grounds around the post office site? It really includes more than the post office—customs, excise, weights and measures, etc.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend knows there was a temporary building erected on a portion of the post office square. We have sold that property and I presume it is being removed.

Mr. BUREAU: It is removed now.

Mr. CARVELL: We certainly intend to fix up the grounds around the new building.

Mr. MICHAUD: The minister says it is the intention to spend some money in connection with the building mentioned by the hon. member for Three Rivers. I would like to know if he intends to spend anything in connection with the post office in my own town.

Mr. BUREAU: He intends to spend some money around the building.

Mr. MICHAUD: There is a great necessity for a public building in my town. We have been paying into the treasury about $75,000 a year for many years and have been asking for public buildings, but have been refused. We have a population of about 4,000 and our town is growing, and a building is required to meet the increasing needs of the place. I have been asking the minister to spend some money in connection with this matter, but—

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend from Restigouche and Madawaska (Mr. Michaud) evidently believes in the scriptural injunction, "Ask and ye shall receive." He came to me about a year ago and requested to have fitted up a building which had been used as a post office for a great many years. He got exactly what he asked for. I will admit it did not cost very much.

Mr. MICHAUD: I asked for a new building and you only repaired the old one.

Mr. CARVELL: The work cost $700 or $800 and—

Mr. MICHAUD: Only $400.

Mr. CARVELL: It made a comfortable post office. I must admit it is not the kind of building the town of Edmundston is entitled to. This is one of the growing towns of eastern Canada. A pulp mill has recently been erected costing over $3,000,000 and the place is growing very rapidly. It is in the class of those towns that I have been talking about. I would like to see a public building erected in all towns of the size of Edmundston and up. The general remarks that I have made in answer to my hon. friend from Westmorland will apply to all these items that may arise all over Canada.

Quebec—Public buildings, $1,118,000.

Mr. CARVELL: These are all pure maintenance items with the exception of two. The first of these exceptions to which I refer is a vote of $35,000 for what we might call ordinary maintenance and repairs and then we come to the Grosse Isle quarantine station. There is a contract existing for the installation of a steam plant in the Grosse Isle station and the price to be paid is $30,000. Then there is a vote of $400,000 asked for the erection of a practically new building at Grosse Isle. I am not in a position to state exactly what may be done regarding the construction of this building until I have positive instructions from the Immigration Department. There is a doubt in the minds of a great many people whether the quarantine station should be at Grosse Isle or at Quebec because that is where the boats all land. Nothing definite has been arrived at. That must be left entirely to the Immigration Department and when they decide what they want the Public Works Department will have to carry out the work. I am taking this vote and unless there is a change of policy I expect to construct the building.

Mr. McMASTER: This seems to be a very large sum. Can the minister give us some idea of the number of immigrants who pass through this station and the average length of time that they remain there, in order that we may have some knowledge of what it costs per capita to entertain these strangers who come within our gates for the few days during which they are detained at the quarantine station?

Mr. CARVELL: I am sorry I cannot do so. In a sense the Department of Public Works is only the agent of the Immigration Department for matters of this kind. Since the beginning of the war there has been practically no immigration passing through.

Mr. McMASTER: I would not want the minister to base his argument on the time that has elapsed from the beginning of the war. Let us take a few years before that which were very active immigration years.

Mr. CARVELL: I am not in a position to give the number of immigrants who pass through that building anually but I will try and get the information. It is at the extreme entrance of the great St. Lawrence river. In the summer time probably nine-tenths of the immigration coming into this country passes up the St. Lawrence river and must go through Grosse Isle. If there is one thing in my judgment that Canada has been lax in, it has been in the management of the quarantine station. I do not think we have paid sufficient attention to the immigrants who came in here. We have not been able to give them a proper medical inspection. Men and women have been allowed into Canada who never should have been allowed in. If there is any public building that ought to be attended to immediately it is the quarantine station. We must look after the health of these people. I admit that $400,000 seems quite an amount to expend in adding to an existing plant. I can assure my hon. friend that if we go on with it there will not be a dollar expended more than is necessary whether the building is erected here or at Quebec. I think there is quite an opinion in the minds of some of the officials of the Immigration Department that better results would be obtained if this building were erected at Quebec.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Is this in addition to the existing building?

Mr. DECHENE: I come from the constituency in which the Grosse Isle plant is situated. This island is divided into two portions. There is a place provided for first class immigrants and also for the second and third class immigrants. The second and third class immigrants are using a shed that we would not think fit for cattle. The lower part of the island is specially set apart for certain diseases and the minister and the immigration authorities know that we had cases of bubonic plague there last summer. In that part of the island there is no proper accommodation whatever. There are a few houses but no hospital of any kind to take care of any serious cases. Millions of dollars have already been spent at Grosse Isle but no accommodation has been provided. The growing town of Montmagny, with a population of 4,000 or 5,000 is not far away and without proper accommodation at Grosse Isle diseases may spread through the town. I would impress upon the mind of the minister the desirability, as soon as possible, of erecting some part of this hospital. It would serve to improve the facilities at the quarantine station and help our part of the country by giving employment to people who were thrown out of work by the closing down of factories at the end of the war. We have a lot of unemployed men. This is a good time to build because so many people are out of work. We might here apply the argument used by the Acting Premier (Sir Thomas White) who says that we should give the people work so that the working classes will not go in for Bolshevism. I have heard that the Government has bought an island near Rimouski with the intention of removing the quarantine station there. Is that right or wrong? I am just speaking from hearsay.

Mr. CARVELL: I am also speaking from hearsay but I have no recollection of having heard anything about that.

Mr. DECHENE: I heard it and I wanted to ask the minister whether there was any truth in it.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not think there is anything in it. The only thing I have heard is the proposition that it might be removed to Quebec. I think the hon. gentleman is correctly describing the conditions which exist at Grosse Isle. The accommodation there is absolutely unfit for human beings, at least it is not suitable for any human beings coming to our country. If we are to maintain the plant at Grosse Isle, we must provide the necessary hospital accommodation for all classes of immigrants.

Mr. DECHENE: Could the minister tell us now many millions have already been expended at Grosse Isle for immigration purposes?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, the expenditure amounts to $1,143,000.

Mr. DECHENE: Has the contract been awarded for the new building at Grosse Isle?

Mr. CARVELL: A contract was awarded last autumn for the construction of a power plant.

Mr. DECHENE: That was covered by the $30,000 vote?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes. The work was not proceeded with during the winter time because of the difficulty of carrying it on at that time in that portion of the province. I think the contractor was given until the first of May to commence the work. I am not sure whether the work has been actually commenced or not. If not, it will be undertaken immediately and will be carried to completion.

Mr. DECHENE: Last year there was a very bad storm and the wharves on both sides of the river were seriously damaged. The steamer carrying on the service between the quarantine station and the mainland has been greatly handicapped in consequence, there being practically no wharf at all on the south shore. Is it the intention of the minister to repair the damaged wharves, one on Grosse Isle and the other on the mainland?

Mr. CARVELL: It the hon. gentleman will refer to the estimates he will find that $50,000 has been appropriated for the extension of the wharf at Grosse Isle, and $6,500 for repairing a wharf.

Mr. DECHENE: The $50,000 is for the lower wharf at Grosse Isle, but there are two wharves.

Mr. CARVELL: As I read the items we are repairing one wharf and extending the other.

Mr. McMASTER: I frankly admit the soundness of everything the minister has said as to the necessity of having proper accommodation for the immigrants coming to this country by way of Grosse Isle, but that is not the point I tried to make. The point is that we are asked to pass an item of $400,000, which is a large sum of money, and the minister, whether he is acting for another department or not, should tell us why this amount is required; what accommodation has to be provided, and why we require to vote such a large sum. After all, the responsibility for the passing of these items is not merely upon the Minister of Public Works, it rests upon every member of the House, and it is a responsibility which I am afraid a number of us take very lightly. I lay it down as a matter of principle that when a minister asks us to approve of large expenditures of public moneys, every reasonable detail that we would exact if we were spending our own money should be placed before us.

Mr. CARVELL: I concur in practically everything which my hon. friend has said, but I have already stated that we must have proper accommodation at Grosse Isle. The immigration officers say that the work there will be proceeded with and that the expenditure of this $400,000 is imperative. I have not personally inspected the work at Grosse Isle, I am not even sure that my engineers or architects have been there. We certainly scrutinized this vote carefully, and we held it up last year because there were no immigrants coming to Canada. We did not care to expend this money while the war was in progress, but now that it is over I look upon the equipment of our quarantine station at Grosse Isle as a prime necessity. If I had time I might go down and look over the work myself.

10 p.m. Failing that, I can only say that the reports I have received from the Immigration Department and the officers of my department, in so far as they have made any report on the matter, are that it is an absolutely necessary work. I quite admit that a $400,000 plant is quite a plant. I have the plans and the full details before me, and they certainly indicate that if the work goes on the plant will be thoroughly up-to-date. There will be nothing in this country, or in fact on the continent, in the way of an immigration plant that will be superior to the one at the mouth of the St. Lawrence river. I do not know that I can say anything more with respect to the work. I certainly do not intend to expend any money unless it is necessary, but I am compelled to accept the report of the officials of both departments, who say that the present accommodation is not suitable and the expenditure of this money in providing better accommodation is therefore necessary.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The disturbing thing to my mind is the statement of an hon. member that over a million dollars has already been expended at Grosse Isle and there is absolutely no accommodation for the immigrants. It is beyond me to understand what has been done with all that money, if that is the condition of affairs at the present time, and whether it can be remedied or not by voting $400,000 I do not know. Surely there must be something wrong with the statement in question.

Mr. CARVELL: I will give my hon. friend a statement of the money which has been spent. The expenditure up to Confederation was $126,000, and from that time until March 31, 1918, $736,000. The balance of $180,000 is for the construction of wharves running away back to Confederation.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What have we got in return for the expenditure of that money?

Mr. CARVELL: I do not know, because I have not been there. We have two wharves at Grosse Isle that were pretty badly shattered during the great storm in November last. We have buildings there and a hospital and disinfecting plant, but they are out of date; they are not fit for occupation. I wish I could give my hon. friends more information than I have done; if further information is desired I will endeavour to obtain it for them.

Mr. McMASTER: The complaint I make is not that the minister does not in a most complete and able manner lay before us the information in his possession. My complaint is that he should have much more information than he seems to have. He should be able to tell us, for example, whether he expects to be able to provide accommodation, under ordinary circumstances, for so many immigrants.

Mr. CARVELL: If the Apostle Paul were here he could not answer that question. I do not know what the conditions are going to be in the next few years. I do not know whether ten thousand or a million immigrants will come into Canada.

Mr. McMASTER: The Apostle Paul is being continuously drawn into the discussions in this House and this is not a theological seminary. If the minister has not any more idea of the number of immigrants that may be expected than he appears to have, why is he proposing to expend the sum of $400,000 for their accommodation? Surely he must have some idea; he is not going ahead in the dark without any definite ideas. It seems to me that he should be able to say whether or not the present equipment is inadequate.

Mr. CARVELL: I have said so.

Mr. McMASTER: Then he should tell us that we require to have a hospital there and that it will cost about so much; that there is need for so many waiting rooms, and they will cost so much. He should give us some idea of how he proposes to lay out this $400,000, and what the necessity for it is. It is easy enough to say that he wants to make adequate preparation. We all do, but what is meant by adequate preparation?

Mr. FIELDING: Does it mean that all the immigrants coming into Quebec will pass through these buildings and be detained there for examination, or does it mean that only those who are sick will go to these buildings? Which of these plans is to be followed?

Mr. CARVELL: As it is a quarantine station I suppose it means only those who are sick will have to be accommodated there; but of course if there happens to be an infectious disease on the vessel the whole passenger list will have to be accommodated. There might be times when there would not be one immigrant there; there might be times when there would be a thousand. That is how I understand it, and I think that is really the condition of affairs.

Mr. FIELDING: I have been on a ship when we were all ordered off at Grosse Isle, and I had a hard job in dodging the order myself. I can understand that for the detention of immigrants you would require a large amount of accommodation; but if only for cases of actual sickness you would not need so much accommodation. I am not complaining about the item, I only want to know what accommodation it is intended to cover.

Mr. CARVELL: Grosse Isle is the place where ships are held up for medical examination.

Mr. FIELDING: All passengers do not land there.

Mr. CARVELL: I know. If a ship comes up the river with a clean bill of health she is merely stopped while the examination is taking place, and then proceeds to Montreal. But if a ship comes in with smallpox or bubonic plague on board, then the whole list of passengers must be disembarked and taken care of at Grosse Isle.

An hon. MEMBER: It is not the intention of the minister to spend the money unless he finds on investigation that it is absolutely necessary?

Mr. CARVELL: No.

Mr. POWER: I find myself for once in full agreement with the minister. Grosse Isle station for the past few years has been in a disgraceful condition—in fact so disgraceful that it was no encouragement to immigrants. We want to build something which will impress immigrants with the feeling that Canada is an up to date country any way. There have been times to my knowledge when four of five ships have been held up at Grosse Isle to be examined, and passengers have had to get off. Some accommodation must be found for them. You cannot run up a camp in a few minutes. I do not know and I do not suppose the minister could tell the number of immigrants on those boats that may be accommodated in the future; but I think adequate accommodation should be provided.

Public buildings—Ontario—$1,982,716.20.

Mr. CARVELL: There are only two items in that amount that I think require more than passing notice. One is the construction of a public building at Hamilton, and the other at Toronto. The intention in the case of Hamilton is to build what I suppose you would call an addition to the existing public buildings. When it is completed it will be sufficient to take care of all the public services in the city of Hamilton. Now we are renting space in different parts of the city, the same as we are doing in many other places. As I have said a number of times, with the great deal of unemployment that is prevalent I think it is a very proper thing to go on with such work. The same can be said about the new building in Toronto. This has been under consideration for a number of years, and is located on the south side of Front street, just east of the new railway station. It will be about 500 feet in length—I am speaking now approximately—with a reasonable depth.

When this building is completed we will be able to house all our public services in that city.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Will this complete it?

Mr. CARVELL: No, it will take $2,000,000. The work is in progress. We called for tenders simply for excavating and preparing the site for the erection of the building. I think Lyall & Son are the contractors. I do not know exactly what we will do next, but my present intention is to call for tenders for the foundation in order that no time may be lost. If we are able to have the place prepared so that we can call for tenders for the construction of the whole building and lose no time during the summer, we will do so; otherwise we will call for tenders and give a contract for the foundations, and that will give us plenty of time to complete the plans for the general structure. But the intention is to keep the work going and use as much labour as is possible in that very congested centre.

There is another item of $520,000, wh ch will complete the Government's portion of the new railway station now being erected in Toronto. Hon. members will remember that one end of that building is being constructed by the Dominion Government as a postal station.

Mr. McMASTER: Mr. Chairman, may I have the permission of the Committee and the minister to ask a question on the last item? What is this public building in Montreal, $500,000 ?

Mr. CARVELL: We skipped over that; I am sure I had no intention of doing so, but the Committee wanted to get along. That $500,000 is to build an extension to the new customs building that was erected some three or four years ago. The land was purchased, plans were prepared, and we are simply now taking up the work as we found it. There again we have called for tenders for the excavation and the foundations, and we will then proceed with the construction work on practically the same lines as I have described in respect to Toronto. In other words, we will keep men working on that building during the whole summer, and I hope it will be far enough advanced to keep them employed during the winter. It will cost probably a million and a half dollars when completed; $500,000 we figure is as much as can be economically expended during the present year.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Do we understand that these buildings, one in Montreal and another in Toronto, are being erected chiefly to provide employment for labour rather than as being necessary for the public service?

Mr. CARVELL: No; I say they are necessary for the public service. We are to-day renting space in Toronto as great as that provided for in the new building, and I think probably more in the city of Montreal than we are providing for. Therefore as these works are a necessity we are constructing them under the present abnormal conditions for the purpose of providing labour for unemployed men. I have no hesitation in saying that we could get along for a year or two, because we could continue paying the rentals which we are now paying, and possibly the cost of construction will go down and money might be saved if we waited for three or four years. But I hope I have made it plain from the beginning that we feel the burden is cast upon the Government to provide as far as possible for unemployment. I am afraid we are facing a pretty serious condition from the labour standpoint. It will not be so bad during the summer months, but when the winter comes I rather shudder at the prospect. I am rather afraid there will be a great many people out of work. Therefore I think the Government should go ahead as fast as it can so long as it proceeds on economic principles and construct works that will be of economic value. As long as we can do that I think we are justified in going ahead and providing work for the unemployed.

Mr. McMASTER: Is there a real want of employment for men engaged in the building trades in Canada?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, without a doubt.

Mr. CAHILL: Is it the policy of the Government to call for tenders for all public works?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, even in connection with the foundations; and invariably we accept the lowest tender. The difference between the highest and lowest tenders in some cases would surprise hon. gentlemen. In the case of the Toronto building the lowest tender was $17,000 or $18,000 and the highest was over $40,000. By calling for tenders in this way we can start work immediately on the first part of the building, and by the time the foundation is completed we have the plans and specifications ready for the whole structure. On the other hand, we may have the plans ready in time to call for tenders for the construction of the whole building, including the foundation.

Mr. McKENZIE: In speaking of the foundation, does the minister mean both the excavation and the concrete foundation?

Mr. CARVELL: The contracts now running are for the excavation. We may call for tenders subsequently for the concrete foundations, to be built to the ground line or perhaps two or three feet above the ground line.

Mr. McKENZIE: What is the excavation costing per cubic yard? The only way of telling whether the work is being done at a reasonable rate is by knowing the quantity that has to be removed and the cost of removing it.

Mr. CARVELL: Before calling for tenders a very careful estimate is prepared by officials of the department, and hon. gentlemen would be surprised to see how close the lowest tenders usually come to the official estimate. Up to the middle of last summer, when prices were going up all the time, the tenders usually ran above the departmental estimate, but during the last six months the tenders have been below the departmental estimate in the great majority of cases. In the case of the Toronto works the tender is a little below the departmental estimate.

Mr. LALOR: Is any principle laid down by the Government with regard to the class of labour employed in the construction of these buildings? People who are not citizens of Canada, who have not taken out naturalization papers, who are foreigners, should not be employed in these public works. The work should be given to Canadian citizens, especially to returned soldiers. That principle should be laid down by the Government so that the contractor will know the class of labour that he must employ.

Mr. CARVELL: We have not begun to lay down, when calling for tenders, the class of labour that must be employed. But we have had a chance now of studying the matter closely, and we find that returned soldiers are not willing to dig trenches; they dug all the trenches they wanted to in France. There is no disguising the fact that the returned soldier does not want to engage in such labour as the preparing of foundations.

Mr. LALOR: I agree.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not know to what extent foreign labour is employed in this particular class of work, but I think there would be some difficulty in getting ordinary Canadians to go into the ground and help take out the foundation for a building. If the time should come when it would be necessary to exclude foreigners from work on the construction of these buildings, I would not hesitate to do so, but we have not reached that point yet. There is not such an abundance of that class of labour in Canada at the present time that we would be justified in drawing the line.

Mr. POWER: With regard to the Quebec Marine Department stores, what steps is the minister going to take to call for tenders? The building is an eyesore in its present condition, situated, as it is, directly under the terrace at Quebec. I hope the minister will do his utmost to have this work finished as rapidly as possible. I understand that more than a month must elapse in connection with calling for tenders, and this delay will bring us into November. If the minister can go on with this work at once he will be doing justice to the city of Quebec and to his department.

Mr. CARVELL: I imagine that the plans and specifications are already prepared. When the percentage of the Estimates was voted two or three weeks ago I instructed the proper officials not to wait for the passing of the main Estimates, but to get out the plans and specifications and call for tenders. Tenders for a great many works are being called at the present time, even before the money is voted. I realize the importance of starting this work as early in the summer as possible. There should be no difficulty in having it finished before next November. I assure my hon. friend that it will be attended to before the cold weather comes.

Mr. McMASTER: It may not be altogether desirable to spend too much money on building or excavating when such a tremendous need for agricultural labour exists throughout the country. Speaking for my part of the province of Quebec, I may say that farmers are complaining very bitterly of their inability to get farm labour. I know that it would be a very difficult thing to do, but if it is at all possible I suggest that currents of labour be deflected from the towns to the country, where labour is very much needed and where, under present conditions, it is not inadequately remunerative.

Mr. CARVELL: That is a very pious suggestion. Perhaps my hon. friend will point out some way of accomplishing it.

Mr. McMASTER: I suggest that in connection with the housing scheme the Government proposes to bring down, some money might very properly be spent in assisting farmers, at a low rate of interest, to put up labourers' cottages in the country. That would help very substantially to get farm labour on the land.

Mr. McCREA: The minister a few moments ago said that one of the objects in going on with public works in different places was to give employment to the idle. If there are so many idle people in Canada that we have to make special provision for them like this, at a time when the cost of labour and material is so expensive, I do not see how the minister can ask for $400,000 for the erection of an immigration building. Surely, if there are so many idle people in Canada we should not have immigrants coming in. Some weeks ago the minister was deploring the financial condition of the country and wondering how we were going to meet our obligations, but judging by the Estimates he seems to have forgotten his fears on that score. I admit that we must keep abreast of the times and put up buildings where they are actually needed, but I do not think it is good business to go on erecting public buildings for the sake of giving work to the unemployed and at the same time encourage immigration to this country.

Mr. CARVELL: Would my hon. friend name one item that he would like to see deleted?

Mr. McCREA: Yes; all the items on the list. The minister is asking for three times as much as he did last year. He is asking for money to construct new buildings and to repair old ones. Perhaps I should not complain, because I am producing and selling the materials used in construction, but it certainly is an expensive time to engage in construction work. I think the item for the immigration building should stand.

Mr. PEDLOW: I notice that a rural mail shelter is to be provided at Walkerton. Is this a new departure for the Government to provide rural mail shelters and what is the nature of the shelter?

Mr. CARVELL: It is only a shed for the protection of the horses of the mail carriers at the Walkerton public building. There are a number of places in Canada where this protection is provided for the carriers of rural mail.

[Mr. Carvell.]

Mr. PEDLOW: Why is it more necessary to have a shelter at Walkerton than at other places in Ontario?

Mr. CARVELL: Wherever my hon friend finds an item of this kind, it has been requested by the Post Office Department.

Alberta—public works chargeable to income—$532,000.

Mr. CAHILL: Will the minister explain this item?

Mr. CARVELL: This amount is required for the erection of a general public building in Calgary. My hon. friend, I think, is acquainted with that part of the country and knows that the only post office accommodation they have in Calgary is in a wooden shack, which they have been occupying for four or five years. We have been compelled to rent space in the Lancaster block for two or three years. Now we are starting the construction of a public building, not a post office building, but a building that will be used by the post office and all other branches of the public service in the city of Calgary. I am absolutely opposed to the erection of a public building simply for the use of the post office or the custom house or anything of that kind. I find that once you hand over a building to the post office, you can never get anything else into it, and when it comes to the custom house, it is as easy for a camel to go through the eye of a needle as it is get other branches of the public service in there. I like to call them public buildings, so that they will be open to all officials of the public service in these cities.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Is this a new building?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes. It will cost $780,000 when completed.

Mr. FIELDING: You are calling it a post office building.

Mr. CARVELL: It will be used by the post office.

Mr. FIELDING: According to my hon. friend's statement, if the post office gets in there, nobody else will be able to get into it.

Mr. CARVELL: We will set apart a certain amount of space for the post office.

Mr. FIELDING: And they will appeal to the vote when you try to get anybody else in there.

Mr. CAHILL: Has the contract been let for this building, and if so, to whom?

Mr. CARVELL: No, but we shall be ready to call for tenders for the excavation almost immediately. I imagine we will carry out the same policy there that we did in Montreal and Toronto.

Mr. McMASTER: This policy of excavating the foundation has resulted, in Montreal at least, in having the foundation, which has cost tens or hundreds of thousands of dollars, remain without any superstructure upon it for several years, and the loss of interest through dead capital must have run into very large figures. I mention this merely by way of warning, but of course it may not be necessary with the present minister.

Mr. CARVELL: I am quite well aware of it, and I am also aware that there has been quite a war on since those foundations were put in.

Mr. McMASTER: We are reminded that there has been a war on altogether too often. That is no excuse for poor business. The war cannot be dragged in as an excuse for something that is otherwise inexcusable.

Mr. CARVELL: The war was a good reason for delaying construction.

Mr. McMASTER: The taunt about there having been a war on is thrown across this floor altogether too often, and I do not propose to continue to bear it with that equanimity which usually characterizes my conduct.

Mr. CAHILL: There is an item of $400,000 for Calgary and $100,000 for Edmonton, and the total is $532,000 on public buildings in Alberta. The population of Alberta is not as large as that of Saskatchewan, and the buildings in Saskatchewan are not any better than those in Alberta. I do not quite understand why we should have to spend over $500,000 on public buildings in Alberta when it is only necessary to spend $38,000 in Saskatchewan. I know that Saskatoon, Regina, and Moosejaw are no better equipped at present than Edmonton. Calgary has only a temporary building, and it seems an unusual thing that Alberta should have over $500,000 and Saskatchewan practically nothing when they require the buildings just as much. If the minister is spending the money in order to provide employment, I think there should be just as much need in one province as in the other.

Mr. CARVELL: I hope my friend does not entertain the idea that I am trying to spend money territorially. I do not purpose to spend a dollar anywhere unless it is necessary, if I can help it. It happens that they do not require public buildings in the large cities of Saskatchewan; they are well supplied, and as I have been in them all I know just as much about the question as does my hon. friend. There are many smaller towns in Saskatchewan where public buildings are needed, and I wish it were possible to grant them. I have explained the situation as regards that class of public buildings. It happens that in Alberta a different condition exists. There is no place for the post office, and there is no post office at all. As regards Edmonton, I was in that city last autumn and went through all the public buildings, and the congestion is serious. We have officials housed in half a dozen different places, and we must be paying, roughly speaking, $35,000 to $40,000 a year in rentals in the city of Edmonton. Something must be done to meet the situation. I have asked for a vote of $100,000. I am not sure that we are justified in erecting buildings. I think we could purchase a building in the city of Edmonton that would meet all the requirements and one that would be cheaper and very much better than any we could construct. I do not know, however, that we would be justified in spending money for the purchase of buildings to-day when we think it is our duty to spend it in such a way as will provide labour for employment. That is the difficulty that exists. I am very much at a loss to know what to do in the city of Edmonton. If I followed my own inclinations and viewed the question as a business proposition, there are two or three buildings I could buy at a great discount on what they cost, and probably for 50 per cent of what we could erect a building for.

Mr. JACOBS: Why not purchase then?

Mr. CARVELL: I have not said we are not going to. We will consider the matter carefully.

Mr. JACOBS: I understand it is the policy of the department to construct buildings wherever they are needed rather than to purchase, in order to give employment to those who are out of work, no matter whether the buildings will cost twice what they would if they were purchased. Is that a good business policy? Is this Government being run on business principles or as an eleemosynary institution?

Mr. CARVELL: I do not think my friend is justified in such an inference. I have not said that I purpose to construct buildings that will cost twice as much as if existing buildings were purchased. I have said that in some places—and have given the details—we will construct buildings because they are necessary. We believe they will cost more than in ordinary times, but we believe that it is necessary to provide work, in addition to the fact that the buildings are required. When we come to Edmonton, the situation is a little different from some of the other places. I do not know that there is the same necessity for employment there as elsewhere, and I am considering seriously whether we would not be justified in exercising the strictest business principles in purchasing rather than building. The matter is absolutely open and will have to be decided as one of policy before we are able to act one way or the other. We must come to a decision before Parliament prorogues.

Mr. JACOBS: This sum now asked for is for the purpose of purchasing.

Mr. CARVELL: No, it is for building.

Mr. JACOBS: The question of purchasing will not be taken into account?

Mr. CARVELL: No, unless we decide as a matter of policy to purchase, in which case we must come back for a supplementary estimate to get the money voted.

Mr. JACOBS: As I understand it, the cost of purchasing will be about half, so that it will not be necessary to have supplementary estimates.

Mr. CARVELL: You cannot buy a building in Edmonton that will be suitable to house the public services there for $50,000 nor $100,000. This is for an addition to the present post office building. If we decide as a matter of policy that we will purchase a building we will not require this money, and this vote will lapse, but we will have to come back to Parliament, set forth the facts, and have the money for purchase voted.

Mr. JACOBS: Is not this the proper time to tell us what the policy of the Government is with respect to the construction or the purchase of public buildings?

Mr. CARVELL: I have not had the opportunity of discussing this question with my colleagues and I cannot make a statement until I am authorized to do so. I have intimated to the Committee my views on the matter. I think there is a very grave question whether we should not purchase in Edmonton rather than build but nothing will be done until Parliament is apprised of it. If we decide to purchase we must come to Parliament.

Mr. JACOBS: Would it not be well to hold this item until the Government makes up its mind?

Mr. CARVELL: I do not think there would be much use in doing that. If we do not purchase we must provide additional accommodation and this vote is for the purpose of providing that accommodation. If we do not require it we shall not use it.

Mr. CAHILL: Do the rentals that are being paid now in Calgary and Edmonton amount to much more than the interest on the capital invested in a new building?

Mr. CARVELL: I am not in a position to give the exact details. Speaking from memory I think we pay $35,000 or $40,000 a year for rentals in both Calgary and Edmonton. I shall be glad to bring the exact figures before the Committee. There is no secret about it. I am sure we are paying as much in rentals now as we would pay in interest on a new building in each one of the cities and every hon. gentleman must see a great advantage in having all the officials of the Government housed in one building with one janitor service and one control rather than have them scattered over a half dozen different places in each city.

Mr. J. M. DOUGLAS: I hope the minister will go into this matter of public buildings in Edmonton very carefully. I heard with a good deal of pleasure his statement as to the possible policy of the department in connection with public buildings, particularly in Edmonton. The services of the Government in Edmonton are scattered over the entire city and from the point of view of the convenience of the public there the arrangement is a bad one. The rental the Government is paying in Edmonton for public service would pay the interest on a million dollar building, and the Government would be well advised to go into the question and consider whether it would not be advisable to buy a building and have the services all under one roof than to build under existing conditions.

Mr. CAHILL: The commission travelling throughout the West now report there is little unemployment in Calgary and Edmonton. Would it not be advisable to leave the Calgary building for another year?

Mr. CARVELL: I cannot agree with the suggestion of my hon. friend. I think we ought to go on with the construction of a public building in Calgary. This work is of such importance as to demand that we shall proceed with it.

Mr. McKENZIE: There are two grounds which the minister could well take for the construction of this building and he has taken both. One is the public necessity for the use of the building, and the other is building in order to give employment for those who are looking for work. My hon. friend (Mr. Cahill) suggests that he is informed there is not much unemployment in the west. A couple of days ago I met a very distinguished westerner, an officer of the Grain Growers' Association, my good friend, Mr. Roderick McKenzie, a well known public character in the west, and he told me it was extremely difficult to get help. I asked him if the farmers were going to get their work done this spring and he said it was extremely difficult to get help on the farm. I do not think any man who can get work on the farm should be the subject of any worry to the Government with regard to providing work for him. We find a great many of our young men in the east willing to go out and work on the farm in what is known as harvesting and I suppose spring work, planting and seeding are not any harder than harvesting. If thousands of our young men used to be able to go out in the west in harvesting time and be serviceable at that season, I do not see why men, rather than being allowed to remain idle, should not be encouraged to go and work on the farm and be of use to the country generally. The minister said that he did not know of any means by which a man could be diverted from idleness in the towns to work on the farm. One good way would be to let them feel the necessity of getting work for themselves and employing their own energies for their own benefit. When I was a young man I had to look for work. I had no Government providing work for me; I had to go and look for it, to get it and then to go to work. I am afraid there is such a thing as too much solicitude on the part of public bodies to-day thus depriving many people of their own initiative and individuality in getting along. I think there is danger in that direction. No person will exert himself to provide for himself if he thinks the Government is going to do everything for him and there is nothing for him to do but to sit down and say there is no work. I do not think that is what our people are looking for. They are looking for a place where they can get work. I think they are willing to do it. If there is plenty of work on the farms of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, I do not think we should be erecting public buildings, building railways, or undertaking any public work, for the mere purpose of giving these men work, if they can get on the farm where their work will be far more productive than it would be in putting up a public building or building a railway. Of course, the building of a railway for the necessities of transportation is another matter. Rather than enter upon any public work for the mere purpose of giving people employment and putting money in their way, I think it would be well to encourage them to go to work on the farm. If conditions in the West to-day are as they are reported to me, and as the evidence seems to indicate before the Government commission that is now going through the West, there does not seem to be very much necessity for the minister to spend money in order to provide employment.

Mr. J. F. REID: With regard to this appropriation for a post office in Calgary, the minister has rightly stated that the building now used is a shack. It is a very ordinary shack at that. It is even worthy to be called a shanty. It is the kind of building that is used in Eastern Canada as a woodshed. If that condition existed in any eastern town, or in the Maritime Provinces, we would soon hear about it. Why should Calgary be discriminated against in this way? Calgary is a city of about 60,000 population and yet an ordinary woodshed is being used for the purpose of the post office.

Mr. TWEEDIE: I am sorry to hear that there is any difference of opinion whatever in regard to this building in Calgary. Arrangements were made for the erection of a new post office in 1914. The old building there was burned down with the result that the city was left without any building for the post office purposes. They had to occupy temporary quarters and when those temporary quarters became absolutely unfit for human habitation they moved into other temporary quarters where they are at present and which are crowded and unsuitable. There was trouble there in connection with the employees. They were very patient up to the time that they were removed to their present quarters. The work is distributed over the city and if there is any place in Canada where a post office is needed it is Calgary. It is one of the largest postal centres in the Dominion. A building is to be erected which will be capable of being used for purposes other than those of the post office. The Government is absolutely justified in appropriating money for this work and I only hope that the Department of Public Works will proceed with the erection of the building as fast as they possibly can.

British Columbia—public buildings, $111,475.60.

Mr. PEDLOW: I notice one small item for taxes on a Government building in British Columbia. I do not notice an item of this kind in any of the other provinces. I would like to know why it is the Government pay taxes on a public building in Victoria and not in other municipalities?

Mr. CARVELL: This is an old post office building that has been abandoned. It is a public building but a new building was erected and this is now being rented. The policy has been adopted all over Canada that when the Government ceases to occupy a building, rents it and receives a rental, it should pay taxes to the municipality. This is a small item for the purpose of paying the taxes and as against it we receive a revenue.

Mr. PEDLOW: Are there no other public buildings throughout the Dominion of the same class?

Mr. CARVELL: Certainly, there are some in Ottawa. There are buildings on Wellington street in this city, in what we call the expropriated area, that are owned by the Government but are rented to other people. We receive a revenue from those buildings, and as a consequence we pay the taxes upon that particular property to the municipality of Ottawa, and we would do so under like circumstances anywhere.

Mr. PEDLOW: There is no item in the Public Accounts to show that.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not know as to that. However, the facts are as I have stated.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Would the minister say what the revenue from this property in Victoria is?

Mr. CARVELL: I could not give the information offhand.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I want to see if we are making any money.

Mr. CARVELL: We are not liable to make much money on an old public building.

Mr. McKENZIE: I do not quite see the force of the minister's philosophy in regard to this renting business. If he uses the building as a post office he gets a great deal more money from the use of it than he would if a person occupied it as a tenant. If the minister is getting $10,000 for the use of a building as a post office, he would not pay any taxes, but he does if some private individual leases the property and pays $100 rent. I do not see the force of that argument.

Mr. CARVELL: The policy may not be based on or be good logic, but it is one with which the present Minister of Public Works is very much in love. My hon. friend knows that under the terms of the British North America Act, the Government is not subject to the payment of taxes upon any of its property; and in every city and town in Canada in which public buildings have been constructed very valuable property is therefore withdrawn from taxation by the municipality. Sometimes I wonder if it would not be better to amend the British North America Act so that the Government would pay taxes to the municipality in which its property was situated the same as any other property owner does. However, it is not necessary for me to express an opinion upon the point, because it is not an issue to-day. At the same time I have a very strong feeling in regard to this matter, and the moment the Government acquires a piece of property which it is not occupying for Government purposes but is renting to some other person who pays a rental, I think we are bound to comply with all the municipal regulations, even as to the payment of taxes. There may not be any legal justification for that, but to me it certainly seems only fair and just to the municipality concerned.

Mr. PEDLOW: I think that the position taken by the minister with regard to a case of the kind he mentions is right and proper, but I would like to know why this item in regard to the public buildings in British Columbia is treated very differently in the matter of book keeping from the buildings in Ottawa?

Mr. CARVELL: I can only say that it is a system which has been followed for some time. In the case of Ottawa the buildings were only purchased three or four years ago, but we are paying taxes just the same, and I shall be only too happy to bring down all the details. If the hon. gentleman will refer to item 120, which is set forth at page 72 of the Estimates, he will find the designation there "Dominion Public Buildings Generally." Now we are paying the taxes on this Ottawa property and other properties throughout the Dominion out of that vote.

Mr. PEDLOW: I think as a matter of book keeping the item should be designated in the same way as respects all Government buildings.

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend may be right, I think perhaps he is, but I will only be too happy to furnish all the details required. We are certainly paying taxes to the city of Ottawa on those buildings which we own and are renting to private individuals.

Mr. McKENZIE: I say at once to the minister that he should stop paying taxes; the Crown is not called upon to pay them under the law. The Crown, or the Government, owns property in every part of Canada, and I think in every part of the Empire, which is exempt from taxation. Why should we make any sympathetic arrangement which is applicable to any one part of the country more than to another? There is no law for that, and it should not be done. The law provides that the property of the King shall be exempt from taxation, therefore, the minister in paying taxes on such property is paying that money out without any authority.

Mr. CARVELL: So far as I am concerned, it is not a question of sympathy; it is absolutely a matter of cold justice as I view it. There may possibly be some question as to whether we have a right to pay these taxes under the British North America Act. All I can read into that Act is that we are not compelled to pay taxes; but if we have a piece of property in a municipality which we are renting and receiving a revenue from I cannot see how the hon. gentleman can argue that we are not compelled to pay the municipal taxes upon it.

Mr. McCREA: What becomes of the rent?

Mr. CARVELL: It goes into the consolidated revenue of the country, of course.

Mr. McCREA: You do not pay the taxes with it?

Mr. CARVELL: No, the money goes into the consolidated revenue and we pay it out in the ordinary way.

There is another thing which I think I must tell my hon. friend: All over the country for years the Dominion Government has been paying to municipalities local improvement taxes. If there is a street, or a sidewalk, being constructed in front of, or alongside Government property, we pay our proper share of the cost of that work, just the same as any ordinary property owner does, and we ought to do so. We owe that duty to the municipalities. I think we are just as much called upon to pay the taxes on a property from which we are receiving revenue, as we are to pay the special taxes for local improvement.

Mr. McCREA: Does the minister not think we are entitled to know the amount of rent we are receiving?

Mr. CARVELL: I shall be only too happy to furnish to my hon. friend to-morrow, or whenever he wants it, all possible information.

Mr. PEDLOW: There is another feature in connection with this vote as to which I would like to make inquiry. I have noticed in the press recently that the Mayor of Ottawa has been expressing dissatisfaction with the annual grant made by the Dominion Government towards the taxation of this city—

The CHAIRMAN: If the hon. member will only wait until we reach the votes for Ottawa public buildings he will be in order in raising the point. Ottawa is very far from British Columbia.

Mr. PEDLOW: I understand that, and I am only referring to the matter generally in connection with this item.

The CHAIRMAN: The hon. gentleman had better wait until we reach the next item.

Mr. TWEEDIE: I think the Minister of Public Works is absolutely justified in the stand which he has taken. Let us assume for a moment that the Dominion Government has two or three buildings in any city in Canada which it rents out and receive revenue from. If it fails to pay its share of the taxes that burden is distributed over the other local taxpayers. So long as the Federal Government owns property which it is using for Government purposes, and is receiving no revenue from, the principle of tax exemption applies and should apply. But there is no reason why this Government should acquire property in any municipality and, in competition with other property owners, derive a revenue therefrom, and not assume its fair share of taxation. I think that is absolutely unjustified.

Mr. McKENZIE: The law, as was pointed out some time ago by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding), may be an ass, but the law nevertheless is that the King does not pay taxes. If the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Tweedie) finds fault with the law it would be better to change it, and enact that the King, or the Government representing the King, shall pay taxes on Government property wherever it is. But while it is the law that the King does not pay taxes, we are not called upon to make such payment. It is preferable to adhere to that law rather than to sidetrack it and from sympathetic ideas, or any notions we may have, pay taxes on a piece of property the moment we receive any revenue from it. The idea of local taxation is that a man gets his children educated, enjoys the benefit of street lighting, police protection, and all the advantages of the machinery of local government in the place where he lives; consequently he pays taxes. If he does not live in the town where his property is located, but in some other place, he should contribute to that general fund which extends to him the general benefit and protection of municipal and provincial institutions. But the King does not enjoy any of these benefits from property and therefore he does not pay any taxes. The King nominally holds this property. At all events, that is the reason why he does not pay taxes, because he does not in those various places enjoy those benefits which come from local taxation. And while it is the law that Government property is not subject to taxation it is better that we stand by the law.

Mr. PROULX: I understand that Government property is not liable for general taxes; but for local improvement rates, such as a sidewalk along Government property, I think the Government should pay its share.

Mr. CALDER: It is not liable.

Mr. CARVELL: We do pay it any way.

Mr. PEDLOW: Discussing this item 119, I would like to call attention to the fact that there is a payment of taxes due the city of Victoria for 1918 amounting to $1,475.60. I inquired as to why this item was there and why a similar item was not in the Estimates for the other provinces, and the minister said that certain Government buildings in the city of Ottawa were paying taxes. The question I wanted to ask before was: What amount of taxes the Government is paying?

The CHAIRMAN: I ruled that question out of order a moment ago, and I hope the hon. gentleman will abide by my ruling.

Public buildings—Generally—$185,000.

Mr. McMASTER: Mr. Chairman, I see in connection with this item a charge of $5,000 for flags for Dominion public buildings, and I would like to make a few observations thereon. First of all, I would draw the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the fact that a great number—perhaps I should say most of those who are concerned in the caretaking of public buildings seem to take very poor care of the flags, and you will find the flags left up in all sorts of weather and flying by night as by day. I think this is a matter which should be brought to the attention of those who are in charge of our public buildings: first, on the ground of economy; second, on the ground of showing an example of thrift to the people; and, third, out of respect for the flag itself.

Now, there is another matter I wish to bring before the Committee, and I think it may properly be brought forward in connection with this item. We have a national flag for marine purposes. Our merchant marine flies the Canadian flag; our navy flies the British ensign on one mast and the Canadian marine ensign on the other.

Mr. DUFF: They were made to take it down.

Mr. McMASTER: I did not know that. But my submission to the Committee is that we should have a national flag for land purposes. The great Commonwealth of Australia has a national flag; I think the Commonwealth of New Zealand has a national flag, and it seems to me that the Dominion of Canada also should have a national flag. I think it would help to create a national spirit, and I believe that in the creation of a sound and sane national spirit lies the cure for many of the racial and religious troubles which are a curse to the Canadian people. The matter has received some attention in the press. I remember reading in the Montreal Weekly Witness a poem by a young lady about the necessity and desirability of a national flag. I would recommend the matter to the patriotism of the Minister of Public Works, who is apparently in charge of the flag department. I would like to see a strong and sound national spirit arise in Canada as characteristic as the flavour of our maple syrup, and I think the matter deserves public attention. Our soldiers who fought across the seas so gallantly were proud not only of being British soldiers, but they were proud of being Canadian soldiers. As we are proud to belong to what I prefer to call the Associated British Commonwealths rather than the British Empire, I would like to see our national flag, a national flag for land purposes, floating over our public buildings.

The CHAIRMAN: In order that I may not have to call any hon. member of the Committee to order, I must point out that the discussion of the adoption of a national flag is certainly not open on the item before the House at the present time, which item is for the purchase of flags for public buildings. It may be very well, and I expected that was the idea of my good friend from Brome, to discuss what kind of flag will be purchased, whether a British flag, a Canadian flag, or a marine flag; but it is certainly not within the power of the Minister of Public Works to make a new flag for Canada at the present time. Therefore it is not in order to discuss the adoption of a national flag on this item.

Mr. CARVELL: I realize that my hon. friend from Brome has brought up a very important subject. I do not propose to answer him as to the kind of flag we are going to purchase; I think that is a matter that somebody else must decide. I quite agree with him that these flags should be taken care of, and I do think for the last three or four years there has not been the amount of care exercised that should have been. The instructions we send out from the department to the caretakers is that the flags shall be put up in the morning and be taken down at sunset, which is a proper and sensible custom. But I am afraid that during the war people wanted the flag up after those hours, and in many cases it was easier for the caretaker from his standpoint to leave the flag up all the time rather than take it down and put it up again.

Mr. FIELDING: Without dissenting from the view of the hon. member from Brome—that is a general question—may I ask the minister what flag is distributed officially for use on the public buildings? The reason I ask the question is that we are using improperly everywhere in Canada a red ensign, which is the flag of the Canadian merchant marine. It is not a land flag, but it is very widely used throughout Canada at any public function; in fact, you will see one-half or more of the flags displayed for decorative purposes will be the British red ensign with the arms of Canada in the corner. That is distinctly a sea flag and is properly used by all our Canadian merchant marine. The British red ensign is the flag of the British merchant marine; the British red ensign with the arms of Canada in the corner is the flag of the Canadian merchant marine; but neither flag is a proper land flag, and yet there is an almost universal use in Canada of the red ensign with the arms of Canada in the corner. Hence I ask the question of my hon. friend, whether that flag is distributed, or whether only the Union Jack is distributed ?

Mr. CARVELL: We distribute only the Union Jack.

Mr. FIELDING: That is correct?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes.

Mr. COPP: I want to inquire of the minister if he has a memorandum before him as to what improvements he is going to make in the experimental farms in connection with the item of $150,000.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes. The item I have is "Central Farm, Ottawa, $35,000." Then are given all the details; for instance, animal husbandry, $16,600; bees, $300; botany, $3,000; cereals, $300, and so on. Then we have branch farms and stations. Tobacco curing stations, $3,525; Charlottetown, P.E.I., $10,510; Kentville, N.S., $3,500; Nappan, N.S., $5,425; Fredericton, N.B., $2,900; Ste. Anne de la Pocatière, Que., $4,450; Cap Rouge, Que., $4,000; Lennoxville, Que., $5,650; Morden, Man., $7,300; Brandon, Man., $3,600; Indian Head, Sask., $2,000; Rosthern, Sask., $3,800; Scott, Sask., $3,450; Lethbridge, Alta., $16,175; Lacombe, Alta., $4,650; Summerland, B.C., $20,200; Invermere, B.C., $4,550; Agassiz, B.C., $5,200; Sydney, B.C., $3,300.

Mr. COPP: I want to protest, as I protested every session that I have been here, against the throwing away of money on these experimental farms. The Central Experimental Farm is a very delightful place to go to for a picnic, but particularly at this time we should not be spending money on a place for picnic purposes. Nobody likes to go there better than I do; I like looking at the things to be seen there. But it is high time that some better method was adopted to encourage agriculture. The farmers do not get any practical benefit from these experimental farms. They are kept as picnic grounds, and to supply certain individuals with hothouse stuff—which is all very nice, but produces no revenue for the country. I simply wish to register my protest against the maintenance of these experimental farms.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Is there any amount in the Estimates to provide for an experimental farm station at Baie St. Paul in Charlevoix county?

Mr. CARVELL: No. We are simply the agent of the Agriculture Department in connection with the construction of these buildings, and I can only answer for what is placed before me. As to the remarks of my hon. friend (Mr. Copp), I have criticised in days gone by some of the expenditures in connection with these farms. I could pick out some of them with regard to which I have very strong views. But I cannot agree with my hon. friend's remarks in regard to the Central Experimental Farm. I realize that the farmer cannot reproduce what he sees there, because he has not the financial means. But the object of the experimental farm is not so much to show farmers how to carry on their work as to make experiments which may be valuable to any man who wishes to learn. I myself go to the experimental farm very frequently for information, and have always been able to get it. I am sorry that the people do not read and digest as thoroughly as they should the reams of information that are sent out annually from that farm as a result of the experiments that are carried on.

Mr. COPP: Could not my hon. friend get the information he desires if the farm were not there?

Mr. CARVELL: No, they must make the experiments in order to get the information. Theoretical information is no good to the farmer; he must have information that is based on actual experience.

Mr. COPP: I have no doubt that every member of the House received to-day a circular from the Agriculture Department containing a photograph of a corn crop that a grub was destroying. I am not much of a farmer, but I know all about the matter dealt with in this circular, as does every farmer in our part of the country. If that is what we are paying for at the experimental farm—it costs something to print these things and send them out to members of Parliament and to farmers throughout the country—we are getting mighty little for our money.

[Mr. Copp.]

Mr. KNOX: I am surprised at the expression of opinion which comes from the East in regard to the experimental farms. We in the West appreciate the benefit that is derived from the farms in the West as well as from the Central Experimental Farm at Ottawa. I point out the great benefit that has come to the country through the development of Marquis wheat, a variety developed by Dr. Saunders, which has been worth millions of dollars to Canada.

Mr. CANNON: A few years ago there was a by-election in Dorchester county in which a member of the then Borden Government, Mr. Sevigny, a Cabinet minister, was a candidate and was elected by a substantial majority. This gentleman made a formal promise to the electors of that county that if he was elected an experimental farm would be established there. No experimental farm, however, has been established in Dorchester county, and I have received several letters from my electors asking that an experimental farm be established there. I see no difference between this Government and the former Government; therefor I say that the Minister of Public Works is bound by the promises that were made a couple of years ago by a member of the Borden Cabinet. Dorchester is an ideal spot for an experimental farm. It is quite close to the city of Quebec and is in the neighbourhood of the constituency of Beauce, represented by my distinguished friend (Mr. Beland) and I think it would be beneficial to the public generally if a farm was established there. The member for Westmorland (Mr. Copp) says that in many cases the expenditure on experimental farms is a waste of money. I think it would not be a waste of money if a farm was established in my county. It was promised by a member of the Cabinet, and I think that a promise made by a minister of a government which is not different from the present one ought to be redeemed. I would suggest that if no provision has been made in the Main Estimates for this farm, the minister should provide an item in the Supplementaries, because he surely will agree that a promise should be kept.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not find any such item in these Estimates, but of course I am merely acting as the agent of the Minister of Agriculture, and I do not know why it has not been included. I have a recollection, however, that according to a Return brought down in this House some two years ago the then government distributed a large quantity of very valuable thoroughbred animals throughout the county of Dorchester, but the people appreciated them so little that they at once proceeded to convert them into benevolent neutrals, and I think the department came to the conclusion that the people of the county of Dorchester really did not appreciate them. If I were called upon to give a reason, I would say that that is the reason why the minister has not included an item in the present Estimates for such a farm.

Mr. BELAND: This promise of an experimental farm which was made to the electors of Dorchester by a former minister has not been carried out, but I understand that the promise was made by a minister of the preceding Government, and not of the Government of which the Minister of Public Works is a member. In view of the fact that a good deal of money was spent in the county of Dorchester during that famous election, and the fact that the county of Beauce is contiguous to the county of Dorchester, that no money was spent in the county of Beauce either during the last election or the previous one, that the county of Beauce, which was at one time mostly a timbering region has of late years been converted into a most successful agricultural district, and the further fact that Beauce county has within its borders the richest maple bushes in the whole Dominion of Canada, with an average yearly crop of some million and a half pounds of maple sugar—in view of all these considerations I really think that the county of Beauce would be an ideal spot for the establishment of an experimental farm. I do not in the least wish to convey the impression that the county of Dorchester is not a rich and fertile county, but it cannot possibly compare with the county of Beauce. The county of Beauce is one of the richest counties in the whole Dominion, both from an agricultural standpoint and in some other respects. It is ideally situated. The county of Compton, the fame of which has gone far beyond the limits of the province of Quebec, the county of Megantic, also of great repute, and the counties of Levis, Montmagny, Bellechasse and L'Islet form around the county of Beauce, as it were, a crown, and I would strongly urge the minister to impress upon his colleague the Minister of Agriculture the real urgency of establishing an experimental farm in Beauce county. It has the best location in the whole province of Quebec, and it is the best riding by far. One has only to think of the maple bushes of the county of Beauce, of its dairying, of its lumbering, and of its cereal cultivation, to come to the conclusion that no other part of the Dominion of Canada can begin to compare with my county.

Mr. CARVELL: I shall be very glad indeed to convey to the Minister of Agriculture the beauties and necessities of the county of Beauce.

Mr. PEDLOW: I am afraid the hon. member for Beauce has not travelled very extensively through the county of Renfrew or he would have a different opinion of the merits of his own county. How much taxation has been paid by the Government to the city of Ottawa on properties owned by the Government and rented out?

Mr. CARVELL: I am sorry I cannot give that information to-night, but I shall be very glad to bring it down, and my hon. friend need not trouble to put a question on the Order Paper. There are a number of places in Ottawa on which we pay taxes. I have a few figures here of the taxes we pay outside of Ottawa: Bowman, $64.60; Estevan, $46.83; Ingersoll, $223.72; Montreal postal station B, $74.79; postal station H, $126.24; postal station S, $100.85.

Mr. PEDLOW: These are taxes on buildings owned by the Government and rented?

Mr. CARVELL: I presume so. We pay these taxes in those places.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: There is an item here of $30,000 for "Dominion public buildings—generally." I would think this item unecessary, because we have already provided for Dominion public buildings in all the provinces. Item No. 113, for instance, provides for Dominion public buildings, improvements, repairs, etc., in the Maritime provinces generally, $25,000. We have voted for Quebec, $35,000; Ontario, $35,000; Manitoba, $18,000; Saskatchewan, $15,000; Alberta, $3,000; British Columbia, $17,000. So as we have passed a general vote for repairs and improvements to public buildings in every province in Canada, I think we might dispense with the item of $30,000 for Dominion public buildings generally.

Mr. CARVELL: My friend is an old enough parliamentarian to realize that it is almost humanly impossible to provide for every emergency that may arise. There may be a storm or fire and it has always been the custom to include these small amounts for emergencies. So long as I have been in Parliament these amounts have been voted and I think they are necessary. There might be a fire or some accident and you would be absolutely tied up because the Auditor General would not pass the account unless there was some item from which it could be drawn. There is no sinister motive in this. It is only carrying out a custom of long standing and one that is absolutely necessary. Last year a building was burnt down on Partridge Island in St. John and something had to be done. There is a vote in the Estimates now, but we were called upon at once to put up something in the way of a temporary building. I do not think there is any room for genuine criticism of this item.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: We have $25,000 of a vote to meet cases of that kind in the Maritime Provinces. I am quite aware that accidents will happen, but why should we make provision twice over?

Mr. CARVELL: There is a vote for the province of Ontario of $35,000. All the public buildings we have in Ottawa are of course in Ontario, and we provide for what we can reasonably assume may be necessary. I do not know that there is a special vote for Ottawa, but it is just a question of emergency. Suppose the vote of $25,000 in the Maritime Provinces were exhausted and accidents happened. Unless we had something like this we could not meet the situation.

Public works chargeable to Income—Rents, repairs, furniture, heating, etc., $3,595,000.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does not the minister think we have done very well to-day? It is now 11.40 p.m.

Mr. CARVELL: I should like to get through with this item if possible.

Mr. McKENZIE: It will provoke considerable discussion.

Mr. CARVELL: Well, I have no objection to letting it stand. We have done a good day's work.

Mr. McKENZIE: When we come to discuss this item I shall have something to ask about the Supreme Court Building. There was a talk of a new building, and I would like some information as to whether it is the intention to do anything in this respect. The present building is not worthy of the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. CARVELL: As far as I know, there is no provision for the construction of a new Supreme Court Building. I feel like agreeing with my hon. friend, but they seem to be getting on well as they are. There is a scheme on foot for the provision of new quarters for the Supreme Court when the next attempt is made at erecting public buildings in Ottawa. It will be across the street on the expropriated area. We are just preparing plans and models and getting ready for it, but it is not the intention to ask for an appropriation during the present year.

Mr. McKENZIE: As a nation we are proud of our public buildings, but we are never very proud to show strangers the Supreme Court Building.

Mr. CARVELL: I quite agree with my hon. friend.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is the most important court in Canada and should have a building becoming its dignity.

Mr. CARVELL: While there is no item providing for a new building I may say that if my hon. friend will go to the Public Works Department to the office of Mr. Ewart he will find material which will interest him. I think he would be pleased to go over the models of the buildings which are being designed for erection at some future date on Wellington street. One of the first buildings he would come across in the plans and specifications and in the actual models is the new Supreme Court Building in conjunction with other buildings. It would be well worth the while of any member to spend two or three hours in Mr. Ewart's office looking over the models of buildings which it is hoped some day to erect on that portion of the Government property in Ottawa.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I notice in the item which we do not intend to discuss to-night a large sum for the rents of buildings, I suppose in Ottawa, amounting to about $1,000,000.

Mr. CARVELL: That covers the whole Dominion.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The city of Ottawa is included in that?

Mr. CARVELL: I think so.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: When this item is considered next I would like to have details as to the buildings that are rented in Ottawa, and the amounts paid.

Mr. CARVELL: I could go on to-night and give those details if the Committee desired.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: I am only suggesting this for the next meeting.

Progress reported.

On the motion of Hon. Mr. Reid the House adjourned at 11.45.

Wednesday, May 14, 1919.

The House met at Three o'clock.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE ON TITLES, HONOURS AND DECORATIONS.

Mr. W. F. NICKLE (Kingston) presented the report of the special committee on Titles, Honours and Decorations.

House of Commons of Canada,
Ottawa, May 14, 1919.

The Special Committee appointed to consider and report upon the propriety of presenting an Address to His Most Excellent Majesty the King, praying that His Majesty may be graciously pleased to refrain hereafter from conferring any titles upon such of his subjects as are domiciled or living in Canada, except such titles as have reference to professional or vocational appellations conferred in respect to commissions issued by His Majesty to persons in the Military or Naval Services of Canada, or to persons engaged in the administration of justice in the Dominion; and that His Majesty may also be pleased to consider the question of taking measures to ensure the extinction at the death of the present possessors of the hereditary titles at present in existence in the Dominion; and further that His Majesty may also be pleased to take into consideration the question of in future conferring honours, titular distinctions and decorations upon subjects of His Majesty ordinarily resident in Canada, including those who have performed overseas, in Canada, or elsewhere, naval, military and civilian services in connection with the war, beg leave to present the following as their report.

Your committee are of the opinion and recommend that an address be presented to His Most Excellent Majesty the King, in the following words:—

"To the King's Most Excellent Majesty,

"Most Gracious Sovereign.

"We, Your Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the House of Commons of Canada in Parliament assembled, humbly approach Your Majesty, praying that Your Majesty may be graciously pleased:—

"(a) to refrain hereafter from conferring any title of honour or titular distinction upon any of your subjects domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada, save such appellations as are of a professional or vocational character or which appertain to an office.

"(b) To provide that appropriate action be taken by legislation or otherwise to ensure the extinction of an hereditary title of honour or titular distinction, dignity or title as a peer of the realm, on the death of a person domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada at present in enjoyment of an hereditary title of honour or titular distinction, dignity or title as a peer of the realm, and that thereafter no such title of honour, titular distinction, dignity or title as a peer of the realm, shall be accepted, enjoyed or used by any person or be recognized.

"All of which we humbly pray Your Majesty to take into your favourable and gracious consideration."

A suggestion was made that the titles of "Right Honourable" and "Honourable" be discontinued, but the suggestion did not meet with the approval of the committee.

Your committee, however, do not recommend the discontinuance of the practice of awarding military or naval decorations, such as the Victoria Cross, Military Medal, Military Cross, Conspicuous Service Cross, and similar decorations to persons in military or naval services of Canada for exceptional valour and devotion to duty.

Your committee further recommends that appropriate action be taken by legislation or otherwise to provide that hereafter no person domiciled or ordinarily resident in Canada shall accept, enjoy or use any title of honour or titular distinction hereafter conferred by a foreign ruler or government.

All of which is respectfully submited.

W. F. Nickle,
Chairman.

Mr. BELAND: I understand that at this stage we cannot discuss the report of this special committee. May I ask the Government whether a day will be set for its consideration?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: It was the desire of the Prime Minister and of the Government that this question should be considered as promptly as possible by the committee and their report discussed in the House. I shall be glad to set Friday or Monday next for the discussion of the report.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Friday "and" Monday?

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Friday "or" Monday. I shall make an announcement to-morrow.

Mr. FIELDING: Monday is a day when many members are absent, and I do not think it is the best day for the discussion of this important matter.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: May I suggest that I should within a few days make an announcement as to when an opportunity will be given for discussion?

Mr. FIELDING: If the minister and the chairman of the committee arrange it, that will be satisfactory.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: Yes.

ST. LAWRENCE RIVER POWER COMPANY.

REPORT OF HEARINGS BEFORE THE INTERNATIONAL JOINT COMMISSION.

Hon. N. W. ROWELL (President of the Privy Council): I beg to lay on the table of the House report of the hearings of the International Joint Commission—

Sir SAM HUGHES: May I beseech the minister to speak out more clearly? Nothing empties the House and drives people to madness quicker than lack of hearing.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. BURNHAM: Will the ex-minister (Sir Sam Hughes) repeat his remarks? I could not hear what he said.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROWELL: I lay on the Table report of the hearings before the International Joint Commission in the matter of the application of the St. Lawrence River Power Company, as printed by the International Joint Commission. It gives the evidence taken on the hearings and includes certain maps and diagrams which the member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes) inquired about the other day. I have arranged that copies of this report, about fifty of which are available, be placed in the distribution office, and hon. gentlemen who wish to have copies may obtain them there.

BIOLOGICAL BOARD ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. C. C. BALLANTYNE (Minister of Marine and Fisheries) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 106, to amend the Biological Board Act. He said:

The object of this Bill is to change slightly clause 5 of an Act that was passed on the 1st of April, 1912, in order more clearly to define the jurisdiction that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and his departmental officers have over the Biological Board. There is no difference of opinion between myself or any of my officials and the Biological Board; this clause in the Act of 1912 was rather ambiguously worded, and the object of the new Act is to make it clearer.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

PROHIBITION.

BILL TO CONFIRM ORDERS IN COUNCIL PROHIBITING IMPORTATION, MANUFACTURE AND TRANSPORTATION OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 107, to confirm the Order in Council of the 24th day of February, 1919, prohibiting the Importation, Manufacture and Transportation of Intoxicating Liquors and the Order in Council of the 12th day of April, 1919, in amendment thereof. He said: This Bill is founded on the resolution which was adopted by the House yesterday.

[Sir Thomas White.]

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE—LEGISLATION PROMISED IN SPEECH FROM THRONE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. J. A. ROBB (Chateauguay-Huntingdon): I desire to draw the attention of the Government to the fact that at the opening of this Parliament on the 20th February, the speech from the Throne mentioned certain legislation, namely, a Bill to amend the Franchise, a Bill for the construction of Highways and a Bill regarding Vocational Education. We have now been in session almost three months. The resolution regarding Highways was brought down on the 24th March, but has not been proceeded with. I think the Government will acknowledge that we on this side have not unduly hindered the passage of Supply; that we have not taken advantage of opportunities to move amendments on going into Supply. For instance, we might have moved for the repeal of the War-time Elections Act, but we have not done so as yet. Yesterday evening, in answer to an inquiry by the leader of the Opposition (Mr. McKenzie), the Minister of Railways (Mr. J. D. Reid) made this statement:

The Acting Prime Minister requested me to say that to-morrow we shall take up the Estimates of the Public Works Department and the Post Office, and if we take up the Supplementary Estimates for the last fiscal year there are a number of items we might put through, after that we would proceed with other Estimates.

It will be observed that we are rapidly approaching conditions where the right of the Opposition to move amendments on going into Supply will be exhausted, and I ask, on behalf of the Opposition, that we have a statement from the Acting Prime Minister, either to-day, or at least this week, as to when the Franchise Bill will be brought down.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): My view is that, through the co-operation of hon. gentlemen opposite and diligence on the part of the Government, we have been making extraordinarily rapid progress with regard to legislation. Although I have been a member of this House for eight years, I have never known a period in which more legislation has been dealt with by the House than during the past month. From my hon. friend's remarks, one would gather that he fails to appreciate the importance of consideration by the House of the Estimates. I do not know of any function which the House discharges of greater consequence than the careful consideration of the Estimates involving as they do the expenditure of immense sums of money, and I do not regard the time of the House as wasted in giving consideration to these Estimates.

As regards the point mentioned by my hon. friend of the Opposition exhausting its opportunities of moving resolutions upon going into Supply, there is no ground for apprehension, because there are in the Main Estimates many remaining items to be dealt with; then there are the Supplementary Estimates of 1918-19, and the Supplementary Estimates of 1919-20 have to be brought down, In addition, there are one or more special Estimates before the House.

The legislation mentioned in the speech from the Throne is all before the House with the exception of legislation relating to vocational education and that relating to to the franchise which has been mentioned by the hon. member. Legislation relating to technical education has been fully considered by the Government and will be introduced within a few days by the Minister of Immigration (Mr. Calder) who has it in charge. The Franchise Bill is an exceedingly important piece of legislation which has been and is receiving the careful attention of the Government, and it is the intention to introduce it at the present session of Parliament.

Mr. ROBB: The Acting Prime Minister apparently forgot the Highways Bill.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: That is before the House in a resolution.

Mr. ROBB: There is no Bill.

Sir THOMAS WHITE: My hon. friend is sufficiently informed as to Parliamentary procedure to know that the passage of the resolution precedes the Bill.

THE MILITARY SERVICE ACT.

ADMINISTRATION IN WRIGHT COUNTY.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN (Wright): I wish to raise a question of considerable public interest, one of which I have already given the minister notice, and I raise it with a certain amount of reluctance. I refer to the matter of dealing with the administration of justice in Canada at the present moment. I do not wish to refer to the Military Service Act unduly, and I do not want to raise any of the nightmares of the war, but there has come to my notice a certain matter which I do not think bears out the principle upon which our constitution is founded, namely, those of freedom and justice to all the provinces of the Dominion. Certain young men who voluntarily reported and were granted exemption by the Military Service tribunals failed to renew their application for exemption after the Order in Council had been passed in the month of April, 1918, cancelling all previous exemptions. When they reached the city of Hull, which is the judicial centre, they found themselves in this peculiar predicament.

Mr. SPEAKER: I regret very much to have to call the hon. member to order, but he is in effect entering into a discussion. If he wishes to submit a question to the Government it will be quite in order for him to do so, but not to enter into a discussion of the merits of the case.

Mr. DEVLIN: It seemed ridiculous to put the question before giving the minister the necessary information. However, I have already spoken to him about the matter over the telephone, and I shall now simply ask him to give the House the reason why the judicial district of Hull, which is in the province of Quebec, should have been declared not competent to deal with any matter respecting the Military Service Act, and why young men coming before the tribunals in that judicial district have been ordered to go to Kingston for court-martial or else be tried before a court in the province of Ontario.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Acting Minister of Justice): Through the courtesy of the hon. member (Mr. Devlin) I have been able to make inquiry as to the point he brings to the attention of the House and in respect of which he asks a question. I apprehend his question to be one demanding the reason why certain defaulters under the Military Service Act whose residence is in the province of Quebec, and, I think, in the county of Wright, have upon apprehension been ordered to appear before a court-martial, or before a magistrate in Ottawa rather than before a magistrate in the county of Wright.

The name of the magistrate in the county of Wright is Mr. Goyette. The House will recall that when, three or four months ago, an Order in Council was passed under the authority of the Military Service Act and the War Measures Act, whereby the prosecution was empowered, should a magistrate by his conduct reveal a lack of appreciation of the meaning of the Military Service Act and of his duties under that Act, to refuse to take any more cases before that magistrate, but to take them instead before a court-martial. That Order was found to be necessary by reason of the idea prevalent in the minds of certain magistrates at all events, that there was in reality no substantial offence in the violation of the Military Service Act demanding more than a merely nominal punishment. I am sorry to have to say that the Department of Justice came to the conclusion that the case of Magistrate Goyette was one that demanded action under that Order in Council, and they refused longer to take cases before him.

Mr. DEVLIN: I understood that that referred to cases where the magistrate had already taken action. In this case the young men were not apprehended, but voluntarily gave themselves up.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is a case in which the magistrate has taken action, and by the character of his action has shown that he is not a magistrate before whom other cases of that kind should be taken.

Mr. DEVLIN: Was any report made by the Justice Department to the Attorney General of the province as to the conduct of the magistrate in question?

Mr. MEIGHEN: None that I know of in the case of Magistrate Goyette. There was one made in the case of a magistrate in the city of Quebec, which I am sorry to say was not very fruitful of results. As to Magistrate Goyette—I speak now with moderate, but not with absolute certainty—some time ago it was considered by reason of his conduct that these cases should be taken elsewhere. Subsequently, evidence was brought forward that he would better discharge his duty, and return to his jurisdiction was made. This month, however, by reason of his action in a series of cases it was determined that we could no longer submit the administration of the Act to him as a magistrate. In this connection I cannot do better than read a report made to the Acting Chief Commissioner of Police at Ottawa by an official of the Dominion Police in respect of the action of the magistrate this month. The report is dated the 9th of May, and reads as follows:

> Attached copies of several reports from my inspector with reference to cases recently prosecuted before Magistrate Goyette at Buckingham, Que., and also at Hull, Que.
> I wish specially to draw your attention to the cases which were dismissed by Magistrate Goyette on the grounds that the men were sick at the time they were ordered to report, and that they did not recover until the armistice was signed. These men had been ordered to report as far back as March 18, 1918, and it is unreasonable to suppose that they were sick all this time. These cases were remanded previous to the sentence being passed, and I am of the opinion that this was done to give these men an opportunity to put in a defence so that the magistrate could have some grounds to dismiss them.
> Further, I wish to draw your attention to the several cases which were dismissed in Hull today on the grounds, my inspector informs me, that the magistrate considered that these men were farmers and were doing their duty much better as such than they would as soldiers.

In other words, he was assuming the jurisdiction of the tribunals under the Act, instead of acting as a magistrate sitting upon the case of a defaulter. The report continues:

> In connection with these cases, none of the accused appeared in person, but Mr. Fortier, M.P. defended them, and it looks very much to me as if he has considerable influence with the magistrate in regard to his decisions.
> In view of the large number of cases which have been dismissed where there is really no legitimate excuse or defence made, do you not think it would be advisable to again turn over the defaulters apprehended in this district to the A.P.M. for court-martial?

To this report the Acting Chief Commissioner of Police appended his note "Submitted for approval," A. J. Cawdron, and Mr. Newcombe appended his note "Yes, court-martial." In support of that, I shall read some subsidiary reports on individual cases:

Ottawa, May 7, 1919.

Memorandum for Chief Inspector A. H. Holden.
Daily Report for the 6th instant.

Re: Joseph Hamelin, SC 253364, Buckingham, Que., Group 3.

I beg to report that the subject appeared before Judge Goyette at Buckingham.

This case was dismissed through affidavits that he was sick at the time he was supposed to report, and when he got better the armistice was signed, so he thought all was over.

The date this man was ordered to report was May 2, 1918, so he has been in default something over a year.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Who made that report?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Arthur J. Dumais, Inspector of Dominion Police. The other cases are as follows:

Ovide Robitaille, Buckingham, Quebec—I beg to report that the subject appeared before Judge Goyette at Buckingham. This case was dismissed through affidavits that he was sick at the time he was supposed to report, and when he got better the armistice was signed, so he thought all was over.

William Laberge, Masson, Quebec—I beg to report that the subject appeared before Judge Goyette at Buckingham. This case was dismissed through affidavits that he was sick at the time he was supposed to report, and when he got better the armistice was signed, so he thought all was over.

Oscar Goulet, Masson, Quebec — I beg to report that the subject appeared before Judge Goyette at Buckingham. This case was dismissed through affidavits that he was sick at the time he was supposed to report, and when he got better the armistice was signed, so he thought all was over.

Mr. JACOBS: Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. It seems to me that the hon. gentleman is going pretty far in his criticism of the Bench, and in that connection I wish to refer him to Bourinot, page 358, as follows:

All references to judges and courts of justice and to personages of high official station, of the nature of personal attacks and censure have always been considered unparliamentary and the speakers of the British and Canadian Houses have always treated them as breaches of order.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not understand that the reference has anything to do with the Bench whatsoever; it merely concerns a magistrate.

Mr. JACOBS: I understand the criticism is made in regard to a magistrate sitting as a judge on the Bench.

Mr. SPEAKER: That rule has never been held applicable to magistrates; only to judges.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The next case is that of Hyacinthe Dubien:

Hyacinthe Dubien—I beg to report that the subject appeared before Judge Goyette at Buckingham. This case was dismissed through affidavits that he was sick at the time he was ordered to report and when he got better the armistice was signed, so he thought all was over.

Napoleon Lavergne, Masson, Quebec—I beg to report that the subject appeared before Judge Goyette at Buckingham. This case was dismissed through affidavits that he was sick at the time he was supposed to report, and when he got better the armistice was signed, so he thought all was over.

These are the cases of protracted, chronic illness. Then, there is another class of cases that came before this magistrate, as shown by the report of the inspectors, dated the 9th May:

Athanase Durocher, Angers, Quebec—I beg to report that the above-mentioned man appeared before Judge Goyette and his case was dismissed. Reason that he was a farmer's son and that he was doing his duty working on the farm and that he did not see any reason why he should not be discharged. He said when Mr. Bywater was here he said Mr. Fortier had a list of young farmers' sons that were exempted by him through Mr. Fortier, M.P. Mr. Fortier said that on his honour that he had given a list of these young men to Mr. Bywater but Mr. Bywater said he did not really think he had the list so the judge said that he did not think Mr. Fortier would lie about it.

Mr. DEVLIN: May I ask the hon. gentleman if he is reading the judgments of the court or simply a report by one of his officers; an inferior officer of the department?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am reading the reports of the inspectors of the Dominion police on each individual case, which reports came before the chief inspector and were submitted to the Justice Department as a ground for the transference of future cases from Judge Goyette.

Mr. DEVLIN: Are these all the cases which were tried by Mr. Justice Goyette, or are they the exceptional cases?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not understand that there is a "Mr. Justice Goyette." I understand he is a magistrate in the county of Wright. These are not all the cases. These are cases that latterly were brought to the attention of the Justice Department as grounds for the course which was taken. I presume there were other cases to which objection was not taken. But I understand that they produced a list of cases some time ago to which objection was taken and which I am reading here.

Rene Philion, Angers, Quebec—same report.

Jean Baptiste Durocher, Angers, Quebec—same report.

Dolphis Durocher, Angers, Quebec—same report.

Romeo Roberge, Lac Ste. Marie—same report.

Donat Philion, Angers, Quebec—same report.

Arthur Lavernois, Hull, Quebec—I beg to report that the above mentioned man appeared before Judge Goyette in Hull and was remanded until May 14th on their personal bail. I told the judge I wanted this man to be held under at least $300 which he declined to do. I saw the judge before court and told him about the record he had at the Hull police station. He told me he knew he was a bad boy but he said he came by himself this a.m. He will be here on the 14th inst.

Joseph Lavernois—same report.

By reason of the submission of these cases, action was taken.

Mr. DEVLIN: What induced the department to go to another magistrate in the province of Ontario and not to another magistrate in the province of Quebec?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Newcombe, the deputy minister, on the submission of the matter to him, recommended recourse to court-martial. I gathered from the hon. gentleman's remarks that they were given the option of coming before the police magistrate in Ottawa, the neighbouring city, instead of going before a court martial. The Justice Department recommended a court martial.

Mr. DEVLIN: That is perfectly correct but there is where I find fault with the department. Why not have a reference to another magistrate in the province where these young men resided whether in the county of Wright or in other counties?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In these matters the department is no respecter of provinces. Hull and Ottawa are all in the military district the centre of which is Kingston. They were permitted to appear before another magistrate or a court martial.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is not Wright county in the 3rd Military District?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

RETURN OF OUR SOLDIERS; PORT OF DEBARKATION.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. C. G. POWER: Mr. Speaker, I wish to call the attention of the hon. the Minister of Militia and Defence (Major-General Mewburn) to a despatch that was published in all the papers of Canada to the effect that 55,000 Canadian troops were to be landed in Canada during the month of May. Those 55,000 were to be loaded on some 25 or 30 boats, of which three were to come up the St. Lawrence. The remainder were to go to Quebec and Halifax. Is it a fact that of these troops, some 9,000, if I remember the figures correctly, are to come to Quebec and Montreal and the remainder to go to Halifax? Without saying anything derogatory of the ports of Halifax and St. John, is it possible for the department to find railway and sleeping car accommodation sufficient within one month to ship 40,000 or 50,000 troops from Halifax and St. John?

Major-General MEWBURN: I have no definite information as to the actual number of troops to arrive at Halifax, Quebec, or Montreal. I announced to the House several days ago that we had made arrangements with a large number of vessels for the opening of navigation, and that we expected that the bulk of the troops for the province of Quebec and for west of the Great Lakes and Ontario would disembark at Quebec and Montreal. I said that the troops for the Maritime Provinces would disembark at Halifax, and that in order to meet the situation created by that movement of troops in the Maritime Provinces and possibly through some portions of Ontario, we would have to use day coaches. We have secured a number of extra boats, and we have also got the Aquitania, the Mauretania, and the Olympic. These large boats object to proceeding up the St. Lawrence.

Mr. POWER: For what reason?

Major-General MEWBURN: The only information I have is that the Minister of Shipping announced that these large vessels will disembark the troops at Halifax and then proceed to New York.

Mr. POWER: And these boats are chartered by the Dominion Government?

Major-General MEWBURN: No, they are not. These boats immediately return to New York to carry back cargoes from that port. It was with a great deal of difficulty that we got these ships. Wherever possible we have asked that troops for west of the Great Lakes and Quebec should disembark at Montreal.

SUPPLY.

NON-SECTARIAN NATIONAL SCHOOL SYSTEM.

On the motion of Sir Thomas White for Committee of Supply:

Mr. JOHN WESLEY EDWARDS (Frontenac): Mr. Speaker, before you submit the motion to go into Committee of Supply

I desire to occupy a brief period of the time of the House in discussing a matter which I consider as of vital importance, having regard to the future peace, prosperity and well-being of Canada. Early in the session I placed the following resolution on the Order Paper:

> That in the opinion of this House it is desirable that the British North America Act should be amended so as to secure the establishment of a non-sectarian school system throughout the Dominion of Canada.

Being unable to reach that motion in the ordinary course of the transaction of the business of the House, it was finally withdrawn from the Order Paper, and I now wish to make it the basis of such remarks as I shall offer this afternoon. I am well aware that in approaching this subject I shall encounter the opposition of some who seem to regard with the gravest apprehension any attempt to interfere with the British North America Act. In general, such apprehension might be well founded, having regard to the constitutional usage of our country. Yet there have been times when the British North America Act has been amended at the request of this Parliament; I think I shall be able to show before resuming my seat that there have been occasions when that Act has been violated, both in the spirit and the letter, as a result of the action of the Canadian Parliament.

A short time ago—to be exact about the second or third of April—an article appeared in the Montreal Gazette, which was reproduced from another paper published in the same province called Le Pays. The article in question deals with compulsory education and in part reads as follows:

> In face of the hostile attitude of the clergy and the manner in which the debate on the question of obligatory instruction was closed, we have no further hope for any educational reform from that quarter. In order to obtain anything we must turn our eyes towards Ottawa, as the central Parliament, by amending the British North America Act, would take over the control of educational matters.

So, Mr. Speaker, it will be seen that the idea of transferring the control of educational matters from the provinces to the Federal Parliament does not originate from myself; there are some in the adjoining province of Quebec, who hold that that is the proper course to take. I do not go that far. I do not say, nor do I wish to be understood as saying, that I think the full control of matters of education should be taken from the provinces and vested in the Dominion Parliament. That is not my idea of what should be done; but I do say, Sir, that in my opinion little can be done here towards the formation of a homogeneous Canadian people without the direct intervention of the Federal Government in matters of education. As to how far that intervention should go, would, it seems to me, be a proper subject for consideration by the Dominion Parliament and the several provincial legislatures.

The matter of the establishment of non-sectarian national schools is not by any means a new one. Such a system of schools exists in the United States and in Australia; and some fifty or sixty years ago a non-sectarian national school system was introduced into Japan. I might also say that France, Belgium, Italy and Portugal have all brought education under the control of the State, and I have only to mention in contrast such countries as Spain, Austria, and Mexico, and the South American Republics, where the schools have for centuries been under ecclesiastical control, to justify me, if any justification were necessary, in advocating a change in our present educational system.

I am well aware, Sir, that in raising this matter I shall be subjected to criticism from different people based on varying grounds. One class of critics there are who, I suppose, will honestly differ from me in regard to non-sectarian national schools. For those who honestly and sincerely differ from me in that regard I wish to say that I have the greatest respect. I direct my appeal especially to such men who sincerely hold views opposed to mine, and I invite the consideration by them of the arguments which I shall attempt to advance in this House to-day in favour of doing something to improve the conditions in regard to education which exist at the present time in Canada.

There is another class of critics who perhaps agree in the main with my viewpoint, but regard the present time—in fact any time for that matter—as inopportune for a discussion of this question. They are men who are fearful of arousing antagonisms in this country, and while holding perhaps just as strong views as I do in regard to this matter, are afraid to broach the subject for fear of giving offence to some person. Well, Sir, I confess I do not clearly understand how a public man can take a position of that kind. There are certain Canadian journalists who regard any discussion along this line as a menace to the well-being of the country. They offer no reasons for holding such a view, and the only reason that occurs to me is that they are afraid as newspaper men of a fair and free discussion of what I regard as a very important matter.

I wish to draw the attention of the House for a while to past history in connection with educational affairs in Canada, and I purpose to do so very briefly, going back to 1841. At that time the population of Upper Canada, was 78,119 Roman Catholic and 351,837 Protestants; the population of Lower Canada was 99,553 Protestants and 572,643 Roman Catholics. So in the two Canadas the Roman Catholics were in a majority of about 100,000. I mention this fact because I think it has a direct bearing upon the subject, for you will understand that the minority was not the same religiously at the time of the Act of Union as is the minority to-day. I believe I am right in stating that Lord Durham in suggesting the Act of Union had in mind the bringing of Upper and Lower Canada under one code of laws and a common language. I am not going to discuss the language question to-day; that is not my purpose; I want more particularly to direct the attention of hon. members to religious instruction in our schools.

The advocates of dogmatic religious teaching in schools had the principle recognized in the first Common School Act passed by the Union Parliament in 1846. May I mention here that the Union Parliament of 1841 was composed of 42 representatives from each of the provinces? Up to 1852 only 50 separate schools had been established in the province of Ontario, and 32 of these had lapsed. But in that year the Roman Catholic Church started a very active campaign for the extension of separate schools, and by 1858 there were 100 such schools in the province.

In 1860 the Hon. R. W. Scott introduced into the Union Parliament a Separate School Bill, which was defeated on three different occasions, but in 1863 it finally passed, the vote, so far as the Ontario members were concerned, standing 26 against the Bill and 16 for it. That is, there was a majority of 10 from the province of Ontario opposed to a Bill which, I desire to impress upon the House, concerned only the province of Ontario, not in any way the province of Quebec. The point I wish to emphasize is that separate schools were fastened upon the province of Ontario against the wish and will of its people as expressed in the Union Parliament.

In 1864 a conference was held in the city of Quebec, at which the late Hon. Oliver Mowat moved that the provincial legislatures should have control of educational matters. The Hon. D'Arcy McGee added to the motion these words: "Saving the rights and privileges which the Protestant or Catholic minority in both Canadas may possess as to their denominational schools at the time when the Constitutional Act goes into operation." I maintain that from this it is clear that the constitutional limitations were only meant to apply to Ontario and Quebec.

In 1867, when the Scott Separate School Act was incorporated in the British North America Act, there was no system of separate schools in the province of Quebec as there was in the province of Ontario. I know it is frequently said that this was a compromise, that separate schools were given to the Roman Catholics in the province of Ontario, and separate schools were also given to the Protestants in the province of Quebec. I wish to say, Sir, that that statement is not a statement of fact. I assert that there is no such thing, and there never has been such a thing as a Protestant separate school in the Dominion of Canada. You may tell me there are Protestant separate schools in the province of Quebec. I say; No; there are Protestant schools in Quebec, but those schools are non-sectarian; Roman Catholic children can attend those schools without any detriment to their religious beliefs. But that is not the case where Roman Catholic separate schools are established either in Ontario or in any other province; Protestants are excluded from those schools because of the fact that they are strictly religious schools.

4 p.m.

Mr. THOS. VIEN (Lotbiniere): Will the hon. member allow me to put him right on this point? There are a number of Catholic schools in the province of Quebec which receive Protestant children with no interference in so far as their religious teaching is concerned. I might cite in Montreal the Ville Marie school, the Sault au Recollet school, the Convent of the Sacred Heart, Montreal College, Lévis College—where I received my own education—and St. Mary's College. A number of Protestant students attend those schools without being obliged to receive any religious teaching.

Mr. EDWARDS: I maintain, Mr. Speaker, that the public schools of the province of Quebec which are under the control of the dominant church in that province are schools to which the Protestant population cannot send their children because of the fact that religious dogma with which they do not agree is taught in those schools. It may be that there are some schools in that province where they make provision for religious instruction during a certain part of the day.

Mr. BUREAU: None whatever.

Some hon. MEMBERS: No, no.

Mr. EDWARDS: Well, there is no use mincing matters in regard to this. Hon. gentlemen know perfectly well, as does every person else in this country, that a Roman Catholic separate school is separate for religious purposes. What is the use of trying to get around that?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. ROBB: Mr. Speaker, will the hon. gentleman allow me a word at this point? If I thought I could convince the hon. gentleman that he was wrong—

Mr. EDWARDS: The hon. gentleman will have an opportunity to speak when I have concluded. I do not propose to allow half a dozen hon. gentlemen opposite to interject remarks when I am speaking.

Mr. VIEN: State the right facts then.

Mr. EDWARDS: I hope that they will discuss it as fairly as I intend to. I make this assertion, Mr. Speaker, believing it to be true—

Mr. BUREAU: It is unfounded.

Mr. Edwards: —that there are no places in the province of Quebec where no provision is made for the education of isolated Protestant children. And I make this further assertion, that there are no places in the province of Ontario where no provision is made for the education of isolated Roman Catholic children. That is what I mean to say—

Mr. BUTTS: Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. EDWARDS: No, I will not. My hon. friend may speak when I get through.

Mr. BUTTS: Just one simple question.

Mr. EDWARDS: I repeat that wherever you have a Protestant public school system such as we have in Ontario, it is open to Roman Catholic children just as it is to Protestant children; there is no possibility of embarrassment in the matter of their religious belief. But where you have a majority in a community conducting a separate school, the few Protestant families who may be in that community are precluded from getting an education because of the fact that that school is a Roman Catholic separate school. Let me give an illustration of that, taken from my own county. We have in the county of Frontenac a small island known as Howe Island, all the families on which, except four or five, are Roman Catholics. Up to a number of years ago the three schools on that island were public schools, attended alike by Roman Catholic and Protestant children, who grew up together without any trouble arising between them. No religious instruction was given in the schools; they were conducted as other public schools were conducted. But the archbishop demanded of the Ontario Government that these three schools be converted into separate schools on the ground that nearly all the population was Roman Catholic, and to-day the three schools on that island are separate schools. The result is that as soon as the children of the four or five Protestant families there become of school age they must be sent to Kingston, Gananoque or some other place in order to receive their education. You cannot point to a single place in Canada where Roman Catholic children who happen to be in the minority are subjected to that kind of treatment. That is manifestly unfair; it does not make for peace and unity. So long as you have such a condition of gross injustice as this, you have something which rankles in the hearts of the people who are subjected to it; you have something which makes for antagonism and hostility among the people. It is in the interest of peace and harmony and unity in this country that that condition of things should pass away and that we should have a common system of schools where Roman Catholic and Protestant children may be educated and grow up together, side by side, leaving to the priests, the clergy and the parents the imparting of religious instruction.

In 1866 Sir A. T. Galt resigned from the Government because of failure to get legislation securing to English Protestants in Quebec a fair share of public funds for the Protestant schools. About the same time the Protestant teachers of Quebec sent a petition to the Imperial Government. What was the general tenor of that petition? They said to the Imperial Government that the Protestants in Quebec were deprived of the benefits of a general system of education such as the Protestants of Ontario enjoyed; that the Protestants of Quebec were liable to a tax to support Roman Catholic schools; that it was difficult for them to establish non-denominational schools or seminaries for themselves; that the settlement of Protestants in Quebec was discouraged and many families were forced to leave; and that they would prefer a general non-sectarian school system. It was not until 1869 that the legislature of Quebec gave statutory recognition to Protestant schools in that province. Section 93 of the Confederation Act reads as follows:

> In and for each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject and according to the following provisions:
> Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons have by law in the province at the Union.

Of all the provinces now forming this Dominion, Quebec and Ontario alone had separate schools at the time of the union in 1867—existing by law in Ontario and in practice in Quebec. Section 93 applies only to Ontario and Quebec, and was inserted in the Act to preserve rights or privileges created by these provinces when they were separate sovereignties. With regard to Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, Prince Edward Island and British Columbia, no restrictions or conditions were imposed; therefore, those provinces are free to legislate regarding education as they may deem proper. I maintain that the same is true with regard to Saskatchewan and Alberta. Both the spirit and the letter of the British North America Act were violated by the Parliament of Canada when they passed the Autonomy Bills in 1905. A distinct attempt was made at that time to fasten upon Alberta and Saskatchewan separate schools for all time. Since then certain provisions in the Autonomy Bill have been referred to by advocates of separate schools as something which the province could not get over. I am going to take a little time in regard to this matter, because in my judgment it is within the jurisdiction of the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan either to have or not to have separate schools, just as they like, notwithstanding anything contained in the Autonomy Bills of 1905.

Saskatchewan and Alberta were carved out of territory acquired from the Hudson Bay Company in 1870. As there were no white inhabitants in that territory at that time, no provision was made for the government of the territories until 1875, when the Northwest Territories Act was passed. The legislative powers conferred by the Northwest Territories Act were temporary and entirely subject to the guidance, control and supervision of the Dominion Parliament. Section 11 of the Northwest Territories Act made provision for separate schools. But I would have you remember this: at that time there were only about 500 white people in that territory. These people had no representation in the Dominion Parliament and therefore had no say in regard to a matter in which they were more interested than any one else.

When the Act came before the House in 1875 Hon. George Brown protested against the extension of separate schools to the Territories. He said:—

> This provision is contrary to the British North America Act. Nothing is more clear than that each province should have absolute control over education.

In 1892 the Territorial Assembly passed an Act which was called the Haultain School Ordinance Act, under which all schools, public and separate, were brought under control of the Territorial Government from 9 in the morning until 3.30 in the afternoon. That is to say, by that Act, they established in the Territories national, non-sectarian schools, from 9 a.m. to 3.30 p.m., the teaching of religion being restricted to half an hour per day between 3.30 and 4 p.m. At that time the Roman Catholics claimed that their rights were impaired and they appealed to the Federal Government, but Sir John Thompson, who was then Minister of Justice, declined to interfere. I call attention to that, because that was an admission on the part of the Federal Government in favour of local control of education.

In the session of 1894, Dalton McCarthy moved in the House a resolution to repeal section 11 of the Northwest Territories Act, that is, the section providing for separate schools in the Territories, his idea being that with such a law on the statute book of Canada, it might afford the Dominion Government at some future date an excuse for perpetuating separate schools when new provinces were created. Subsequent events have proved that Dalton McCarthy had at that time considerable foresight. Sir John Thompson, at that time, made use of these words in discussing the resolution moved by Dalton McCarthy:

> What the constitution of the future provinces shall be, in view of the pledges which have been referred to, or in view of any other set of circumstances, will be for Parliament to decide when it decides to create those provinces.

I want to give the House this expression of opinion by a man well known by reputation to every hon. member, namely, the hon. David Mills:

> When the people of the territories, or any portion of the territories, are sufficiently numerous to constitute a province, when, in fact, they attain their majority in regard to local matters, and when they propose to set up for themselves, this Parliament has no right to exercise control over them, no right to exercise any authority; it can give good advice, but it has no right to give commands. But we are not dealing with the future. When the territories have a sufficient population to entitle them to become a province they must decide for themselves whether they will have separate schools or not.

So far as the Territories were concerned—I do not at all admit that the introduction of separate schools there stands upon the same footing as the introduction of separate schools in the province of Ontario, or of the dissentient schools in the province of Quebec. In these provinces they were protected under the constitution; they cannot be interfered with by the local legislature. But in the Northwest Territories, as the hon. minister has said, it has been a matter not of right, not of guarantee to any particular class of the population, but a matter of policy. They were introduced with the view of preventing conflict in this House upon the subject of separate schools, and for the reason that they were introduced there they should be maintained as long as these Territories are under the control of this Parliament. When this Parliament has discharged its duties and the people of the Territories have received the population to entitle them to enter the union, they must assume the responsibility for deciding for themselves under the British North America Act how far they should maintain the principle of separate schools or maintain the non-denominational system.

I also wish to place on Hansard the opinion of Sir Louis Davies, given at the same time:

My opinion is now and has been for years that when that time comes you cannot withhold from the provinces so erected the right to determine for themselves the question of education one way or the other. I would be the last to favour this Parliament imposing upon the people there any system of education, either free or separate. I only claim that when a Bill is introduced to erect those Territories into provinces that the Bill should contain a provision enabling the people of the different provinces so created to decide what system of education they should have.

In accordance with the view I have always held and hold now, I have no hesitation in expressing, respectfully, that the people of those new provinces should have the right to determine what system of education they shall have.

Next in chronological order is the memorable struggle which took place in Manitoba for national schools, a struggle which began with the Manitoba School Act of 1890 and resulted in the defeat of the Tupper Government in 1896, the defeat of the Roblin Government in 1914, and in the final repeal by the Norris Government in 1916 of the Laurier-Greenway Settlement of 1897. Perhaps I had better put on Hansard what that agreement was. It is contained in section 258 of the Manitoba School Act and reads:

When ten pupils in any schools speak the French language or any language other than English, as their national language, the teaching of such pupils shall be conducted in French or such other language, and English, upon the bilingual system.

I am not going to follow that any further because, as I said before, my remarks are going to be concerned more with the religious aspect of teaching than with the language question.

In 1905, this Parliament passed the Saskatchewan Act and the Alberta Act, otherwise known as the Autonomy Bills. When the Autonomy Bills were being considered, the Hon. Robert Rogers, and the Hon. Mr. Campbell, of the Manitoba Government, came to Ottawa to urge the extension of Manitoba's boundaries. The Papal Ablegate sent for them and suggested, that if the province would agree to re-establish separate schools, there would be no difficulty regarding the boundary question. I protest against that sort of thing, and I leave it to the judgment of hon. members that if the Imperial Government or the King himself had undertaken such an interference with legislation in this House as was undertaken by the Papal Ablegate, there would have been a howl that would have been heard from the Atlantic to the Pacific. The people would not have stood for it for a minute. We need not stand for that sort of thing, and I have a right to express my opinion in regard to it, and in doing so I am not making an attack on any gentleman's religion.

Mr. PROULX: What is the hon. gentleman's authority for such a statement?

Mr. EDWARDS: My authority is one which might not appeal to hon. gentlemen opposite. The statement was made without contradiction in this House by one of the gentlemen to whom I have referred, namely, the Hon. Mr. Rogers. Does the hon. gentleman say that was not the case?

Mr. PROULX: I do not think Mr. Rogers was in the House at the time.

Mr. EDWARDS: The hon. gentleman was ready to ask a question but he is not ready to answer one.

Mr. PROULX: I doubt very much whether it is the case.

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not doubt it and therefore I will give it. In 1905, when the Autonomy Bills were before the House, Sir Wilfrid Laurier made this statement regarding the language question. I want to put these words on Hansard because I want to make an application of them:

The fathers of Confederation did not pretend to authorize the French language in any part of the Dominion except in this Parliament and in the province of Quebec. Everywhere else the people were left free to deal with the matter as they saw fit.

I mention that because, if the principle of local control is sound as regards language, why should it not be in regard to religious instruction? It should be as good in the one case as in the other.

As regards the Autonomy Bills, I want to refer to the educational clauses of the Saskatchewan and Alberta Acts of 1905, because I think I can show that while some people in this country are ready to hold up their hands in horror at any thought of interfering with the British North America Act, the Parliament of Canada did lay violent hands on that Act and did violate it in principle and in letter in passing the clauses I am going to read. Section 3 of the Saskatchewan Act, which is the same as the Alberta Act, reads as follows:

The provision of the British North American Acts, 1867 to 1886, shall apply to the province of Saskatchewan in the same way, and to the like extent as they apply to the provinces heretofore comprised in the Dominion, as if the said province of Saskatchewan had been one of the provinces originally united, except in so far as varied by this Act, and except such provisions as are in terms made, or by reasonable intendment may be held to be, especially applicable to or only to affect one or more, and not the whole of the said provinces.

Why the exception in that clause? What is the purpose of it? The purpose is more clearly shown in the succeeding sections. Section 17 says:

Section 93 of the British North America Act, 1867, shall apply to the said provinces, with the substitution for paragraph 1 of the said section 93, of the following paragraph:

1. Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to separate schools which any class of persons have at the date of the passing of this Act under the terms of charters 29 and 30 of the ordinances of the Northwest Territories, passed in the year 1901: or with respect to religious instruction in any public or separate school, as provided for in the said ordinances.

2. In the appropriation by the legislature or distribution by the province of any moneys for the support of schools organized and carried on in accordance with the said chapter 29, or any Act passed in amendment thereof or in substitution therefore, there shall be no discrimination against schools of any class described in the said chapter 29.

3. Where the expression "by law" is employed in paragraph (3) of the said section 93, it shall be held to mean the law as set out in the said chapters 29 and 30: and where the expression "at the union" is employed in the said paragraph, it shall be held to mean the date at which this Act comes into force.

[Mr. Edwards.]

That was in 1905. Here we have, in effect, an amendment to the British North America Act of 1867, because it inserts certain ordinances passed by the Northwest Territories Assembly in 1901 under a delegated authority from the Parliament of Canada. The provisions of the constitution are departed from and are only to apply "except in so far as varied by this Act." Subsection 1 of section 93 is abolished, and subsection 3 is amended by placing upon it an interpretation it could not otherwise bear.

What does the expression "in the province at the Union" mean? If it means 1905, then no amendment was required for the purpose of separate school establishment. If it does not mean 1905, by what authority did the Parliament of Canada change that Imperial Act? "At the Union" means when the territories were united to the rest of Canada and became a part of the Dominion, namely in 1870. There were then no white people in the territories, and consequently no schools, separate or public. The Saskatchewan Act and the Alberta Act were designed to perpetuate certain privileges created by the Act of 1875, and this was done by over-riding the constitution. Let me quote the opinion of Hon. Edward Blake in 1869:

It is perfectly clear on great and obvious principles that the basis of union settled by the British North America Act is not capable of alteration by Parliament.

Yet the spirit and intention of the Act was unquestionably altered by these Autonomy Bills passed in 1905. Mr. Clement, in his work on "The Canadian Constitution," says (page 352):

Can a new province be established with a smaller sphere of authority than that occupied by the provinces named in the British North America Act, 1867? . . . . . It is submitted, therefore, that any new province created must be given full provincial autonomy and powers as defined in the original British North America Act, 1867.

On March 22, 1905, on the second reading of the Autonomy Bills, Sir Robert Borden said:

In establishing a new province, can this Parliament wholly or partially alter the basis of Confederation? Can it change the distribution of legislative powers? That, I submit, can only be done by the Imperial Parliament. Surely it cannot be contended that in giving to a new province the constitutional rights conferred by the British North America Act we can reverse the scheme framed by the Fathers of Confederation and embodied in an Imperial statute. Yet that is what the right hon. gentleman seeks to do to-day by the provisions contained in section 17 of the Bill. I submit we have no duty, nay we have no right or power to shatter the foundations then laid or to re-write the compact into which we then entered.

Sir Robert Borden moved an amendment, but it was voted down. Mr. Speaker, I have referred to these Autonomy Bills and to the history leading up to their passage by this Parliament for a purpose, which no doubt has already been plainly indicated. I say that the power lies within the legislatures of the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, notwithstanding the special provisions in the Autonomy Bills of 1905, to establish in those provinces a nonsectarian school system whenever they feel disposed to do so. I want to place a few statements before hon. members, and to ask them to consider them fairly and to meet them with argument if they have arguments to refute them.

I say that as regards privileges, all our citizens should stand on the same level regardless of the church they are connected with. I say that an educational system founded upon special privileges fosters disunion and disintegration, and leads ultimately to national disaster. I sincerely believe that, and I invite hon. gentlemen who do not agree with me to present their arguments in refutation. I say that all classes of our people without regard to race or creed should share equally in the responsibilities of citizenship. Will any person object to that statement? I say therefore that there should be sufficient uniformity in our systems of education to ensure a uniform and common knowledge of what the responsibilities of citizenship are. If any hon. gentleman objects to that statement, I shall be pleased to hear his objection.

Mr. BUTTS: May I ask a question?

Mr. EDWARDS: Not until I get through.

Mr. BUTTS: I thought the hon. member invited questions. Oh, bigotry where is your blush?

Mr. EDWARDS: Am I then to be charged with bigotry because I say that one class of the community should have no special privileges over another class? That is the assertion I have made. Am I to be charged with being an enemy of religion because I say that I favour a non-sectarian school system? Am I to be charged by the hon. gentleman with intolerance because I say that the church of which he is a shining ornament should have no special privileges above any other denomination in this country?

I want to tell him and any other hon. members of this House, if there are any who share his view, that if it means being a bigot to say that one class shall not have special privileges over the other, I am willing to be called a bigot and I will not have as much reason to blush for being called a bigot as the hon. gentleman will have reason to blush for some of the sentiments that he is hiding behind the newspaper that he is holding up before his face.

When there are widely different standards of education, there are bound to be widely different conceptions of patriotism and national duty. That seems to be an obvious and reasonable statement to make. The great war has made it abundantly clear that some of the peoples of Canada have no proper conception of their duty to the State and can not be relied on in a great national crisis. The responsibility for concerted action in the war which has just closed rested where?—on the Provincial Governments or on this Government? The responsibility for concerted action rested on the Dominion Government and not upon the Provincial Governments. The Dominion Government has no say whatever in regard to the matters which, I say, make for the unity or disunity of this country. Sir William Peterson, former principal of McGill University said:

> By what I think a most regrettable provision of the Constitution of Canada, the Federal Government is not supposed even to know that Education is being carried on in the Dominion. Education is remitted by the practice of the Constitution of the country to the Provincial Governments.

He adds:

> Now against that I have always protested.

In my opinion, Mr. Speaker, the greatest human agency for eliminating the differences which divide the Canadian people is a non-sectarian national school system. I want to repeat that as being my earnest conviction and my warrant for speaking this afternoon. I say that in my opinion the greatest human agency for eliminating the differences which exist in this House, and which divide the Canadian people today, is a non-sectarian school system. I believe that is true and, believing it to be true, I think I am entitled to credit for my sincerity even if some hon. gentlemen do not agree with my statement. Canada is filled by peoples of all races and creeds and if each chooses to have its own peculiar system, harmony and concerted action are impossible and confusion is inevitable. Unwise concessions have been made resulting in bitterness and strife. Are they to be perpetuated? Are we to perpetuate these unwise concessions? Surely no person is going to say or to assume that those who undertook to establish the school systems of this country fifty or sixty years ago are to determine the character of our institutions for the millions who live in Canada to-day and the greater number of millions who will live in Canada in years to come? To give you an expression of opinion from another distinguished Canadian, let me quote what Sir John Willison says:

> We have had in the educational clause of the British North America Act a source of misunderstanding and confusion which has not made for national solidity and more than once has filled the country with the angry clamour of violent sectarian controversy.

Is that not true? Yet I suppose Sir John Willison is to be charged with bigotry by the hon. gentleman because he gives expression to what is an undoubted fact. He continues:

> We have had during the whole period of Confederation a resolute and unceasing effort to read into the Constitution a guarantee of sectarian schools for every province of the Confederation and a steady denunciation of those who insist upon a different interpretation and contend for the right of the provinces to control over education subject to their conception of the constitutional limitations.

We have passed through a great testing time which has shown Canada's greatness and also its weakness. We have—I want to inform the hon. gentleman (Mr. Butts) before he goes——

Mr. BUTTS: I have paid too much attention to you.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. EDWARDS: We have in this country a divided allegiance the fatal danger of which must have been brought home to every thoughtful man. No country can possess the peace and harmony necessary to stability whose people are not of one mind as to where the sovereign power resides. The fact is we have been trying to get along under two governments, the one at Ottawa and the other a self-constituted authority claiming the right to regulate federal and provincial legislation in regard to education. I have never meddled in my life with the doctrines, dogmas or ceremonies of any church. I have never had any desire to do so. I have never had any desire to interfere with any man in his right to worship as his conscience dictates. The last thing that would occur to me would be to interfere with him in the exercise of that right. But surely I am not guilty of intolerance when I assert that the Government should not favour one creed more than another. Is that intolerance? Is it fanatical to say that public money should not be spent on sectarian education? Is it bigotry to assert that all citizens stand on the same level as regards privileges? Should I be charged with a desire to destroy religion because I believe that a system of national, non-sectarian schools will conduce to harmony and national unity?

We often hear it said that our differences in this country are due to misunderstanding. I dissent from that statement at once. I say our differences are not due to misunderstanding. We understand perfectly. It is because of the thorough understanding that we do have the differences that we have to-day. Do you mean to tell me that a man who resides in a certain section of the country and finds himself in the position that his children cannot attend the only school that there is for them because of certain religious dogmas being taught that he does not agree with, feels a sense of injustice because of misunderstanding? Not at all. He understands that he is not getting a square deal. There is not a man in this House who can argue successfully that he is getting a square deal. It is not a question of theology or of doctrine or religious dogma but it is a question of civil rights and a square deal for every man in this country.

Let me ask this question: Is a Government justified in conferring special privileges on any one section of the people? That is a fair question. If not, if you answer that in the negative, if you say that the Government is not justified in conferring special privileges on one section of the people, then you must agree with me that separate school laws are wrong in principle because they are a violation of the equality of civil rights which is the basis of free government.

What do I suggest in regard to this matter? I know that education in so far as Ontario and Quebec are concerned is fixed by the terms of Confederation. I do not wish to be understood as saying that I think this Parliament should take away from these provinces the rights which they have under the constitution. But surely that does not prevent us from discussing the question here as to whether another system would be preferable. We have had over fifty years of Confederation and the idea of the Fathers of Confederation was unquestionably in the main to try and unite the people.

I leave it to any hon. gentleman here who has studied past history and who reads the press to say if he is satisfied with the conditions which exist in this country at the present time. After over fifty years of confederation have we got unity in this country? Not by any means. We have not got unity, and why have we not? Because, Mr. Speaker, we have had in the public life of this country in times past men who were willing to put party expediency and party exigencies before their duty to Canada; that is why. Because we have had in this country men calling themselves statesmen and posing as being especially broad-minded who have been too cowardly to deal with questions such as this on their merits. That is why—at any rate it is my own opinion.

Now, Sir, I would suggest that this matter of education does concern the Federal Government and does concern this Parliament. Surely we have some interest in a democracy in Canada which is getting its ideas of Canada and of Britain, and of Canadian and British history, through the medium of half a dozen different foreign languages? Surely some right is vested in the Federal Government as to the kind of democracy we are creating in this country? Is it not true that under existing conditions to-day we have less efficiency all over the country in regard to educational matters in our primary schools than we would have, had there been only one system of national education? You cannot dispute that for a moment. A short distance from where I live, in a good settlement, there are two schools, one a Roman Catholic separate school and the other, three-quarters of a mile away, a public school. The taxes of the people of that community are going to maintain two schools. It must be manifest to every person that the combined taxes of those people would maintain a far better school if there was only one; that both Roman Catholic and Protestant children would enjoy better educational advantages if there was only one school than they do at present with two schools. There is not only waste of money at present, but what is of more importance still, there is less efficiency in our school systems, because of this division. What choice has the family of a man got who happens to be living in a section of the country where nine-tenths of the people, we will say, happen to be Roman Catholics, and where the only school in the community is a separate school? What choice in the matter of education have the two or three Protestant families got who chance to be located there? The children are excluded from that school unless the parents are willing to allow them to go there and hear religious dogma taught with which they do not agree. I am not discussing whether that dogma is right or is wrong, but I do say that the opinions of the minority should be respected and that the Protestant children are excluded from that school. What choice is open to the parents in such case? They must either send their children miles away from home and pay their board, or sell their farms and move to some other part of the country. How in the name of Heaven can you expect to obtain unity in this country when the children from two families—one a Roman Catholic family and the other a Protestant family, are going to different schools—one to this school and the other to that? Why, from the time they emerge from the cradle these children of opposite religious faith are taught to look with hostility and antagonism upon each other. How can you expect when they grow up to manhood that they can work together for the general welfare of this country? It is absolutely impossible; hon. gentlemen in this House, whether they favour separate schools or not, know that it is unfair and unreasonable to expect that they should.

I would favour first of all, Mr. Speaker, the creation of a Dominion bureau of education, because I believe the Dominion Government should have some voice in regard to educational matters. I would favour the holding of a conference in the city of Ottawa of leading educationists from the various provinces of Canada. Surely such men can come together on something which would promote the desired object, and surely they should come together. Surely we are within our rights as members of Parliament in advocating a condition of affairs where there will be some semblance of uniformity in teaching, because that uniformity in our public school teaching is necessary if we are to produce a united people in Canada animated by common national ideals.

This question, Sir, is one which affects, and very seriously, the people in Western Canada. According to the census of 1911 there were in the four Western Provinces 412,995 persons representing five nationalities,—Germans, Austrians, Russians, Poles and Scandinavians. Nearly half a million people of those five nationalities in those Western Provinces in 1911, and there are more than that number there now. We know to what extent we can rely upon those people in a crisis such as the one through which we have just passed. Should we not in the interests of the future welfare of this country, try and devise some system whereby we will have some hope of Canadianizing these foreigners who come to our shores? But, Mr. Speaker; it is not only in regard to the West that I am speaking. May I call your attention to something very much nearer, something, it seems to me, that we ought to have at least a right to protest about? In 1912 a certain book was authorized for use in the schools in a part of this country. That book referred to Quebec as the capital of Canada, Toronto still figured as York, and Ottawa was not mentioned at all. Winnipeg did not even figure as Fort Garry; it was not even mentioned. The four Western Provinces are referred to in that book as "regions unknown except under the designation of New Caledonia, a wild region of no importance except for its furs." That is only an extract from the book in question. I could give the House other illuminating extracts if it was desired, but fancy a book being used in any province of Canada which issues such stuff as that to the children of this country at as recent a period as 1912. I do not know whether that book is still in use at the present time or not. Mr. Speaker, I believe it can be shown that text books have been used in the schools of this country lauding and praising Germany and Germans to the skies during the last four and a half years, while our boys have been overseas in France and Flanders giving up their lives in the struggle against those very people. Will any person tell me that the Federal Parliament has no right to intervene in a matter of that kind, and at least offer advice? I am perfectly well aware that there are some people in this country—like the hon. gentleman from Cape Breton (Mr. Butts) who interrupted me a while ago—who will not attempt to present any arguments on a question of this kind, who will not attempt to argue the subject on its merits, who will not advance any reasons at all in support of their views, but will simply shout " bigotry " because they know it is the only expression which is applicable to themselves beyond the slightest doubt. I do not care, Mr. Speaker, a snap of my fingers for the opinions of such people either in this House or outside of it. I have been honest in giving my views on this matter, because, Sir, I am a Canadian, and as a Canadian I would like to see a better state of affairs existing in this Dominion than has existed for many years. I would like to see more unity, more harmony, more peace. I would like to see our people of different races and creeds working shoulder to shoulder for the future well-being and upbuilding of this Dominion. It is because I do sincerely wish to see that desirable condition that I have given expression to these views this afternoon, and I trust that hon. gentlemen either on this side or opposite will not find in anything I have said any attack on their religion. I have never in my life attacked the Roman Catholic faith.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. EDWARDS: Hon. gentlemen are free, of course, to offer the insult of a laugh. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I have been in this House for the last ten or eleven years, and I defy any hon. member to point to one single word, line or sentence of mine uttered in this House reflecting on any man's religion. Now, laugh if you have got a laugh in you.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. EDWARDS: If hon. gentlemen opposite instead of laughing possess the quality of courage, let them get busy and present to me any statement of mine in this House or outside reflecting on any man's religion. I have never, Mr. Speaker, had any desire to reflect on any man's faith—never in my life, and I have never done so. But I will say to members of this House that when the Roman Catholic Hierarchy, or the Anglican Church, or the Presbyterian Church, or any other religious denomination through its ecclesiastical dignitaries sticks its nose into public affairs, I, as a public man, am going to hit that nose as I think it ought to be hit. Will any hon. gentleman tell me that on educational matters, on which the Roman Catholic Hierarchy have very distinct views and have given expression to them—and they have a perfect right to do so—will hon. gentlemen tell me that as a public man I have no right to express my views? That is what I would assume from the attitude of at least one hon. gentleman judging by his expression a while ago. I have endeavoured to present this matter—which I repeat again I regard as of very great importance to the Dominion—in a series of statements very deliberately thought out, and again I invite hon. gentlemen to direct their attention and their arguments to some of those statements, which have been delivered with the best of intentions and without any ill-feeling towards any person, class or creed in this country.

Mr. JAMES A. ROBB (Chateauguay-Huntingdon): Mr. Speaker, we upon this side of the House did not have notice from my hon. friend that he was going to bring up the resolution to-day. Indeed, it had been so long on the Order Paper that we had concluded that it might, like the Highways Bill, have fallen by the wayside. With his plea for national unity we upon this side are in common accord. There may be places in some of the provinces where there is not national unity, but I wish at once to assure my hon. friend that in the province of Quebec in which I live we have national unity.

My hon. friend (Mr. Edwards) seemed to be concerned more particularly regarding the school system in the province of Quebec, and for that reason I purpose to devote a few moments to an expression of my experience as a school trustee covering a period of perhaps twenty or twenty-five years—longer than I care to remember. A few moments ago when my hon. friend was charging that there were schools in the province of Quebec which Protestants could not attend because of the religious training imparted, it brought to my mind a matter that I would rather not speak much about under these conditions, but in justice to my fellow citizens I am going to mention it. My only child for a number of years attended a Roman Catholic convent. As she was without a mother, naturally I watched very closely to see if any influence was brought to bear upon her, and I never was able to observe the slightest attempt to sway her religious feelings.

5 p.m.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Might I ask the hon. member a question? Did not the hon. member for Frontenac make it clear that he was speaking of primary schools?

Some hon. MEMBERS: No.

Mr. ROBB: I am dealing with the question generally. I have no knowledge that primary schools are any different in that respect from other schools. I have in mind places in the province of Quebec where there is perhaps only one school, a Protestant school, or a Catholic school as the case may be, and both Catholic and Protestant children are attending it. I was told not long ago by a prominent public man that all the education he had ever received was in a Roman Catholic school in the province of Quebec. That man is a Protestant and to-day occupies a very high position among the judiciary of the province of Ontario.

I do not want to get away from the main point. As I said, I have had an experience of from twenty to twenty-five years as a school trustee in the province of Quebec. We have at the opening of our schools in the fall two difficulties: one difficulty is to provide sufficient space for the Roman Catholic French children who want to attend; the other difficulty is to get the newly-arrived Englishman to send his child to school instead of putting him in the local mill. In the town in which I live the local Roman Catholic college has three hundred boys in attendance, and there are many Protestant boys among them,—they go there because they wish to acquire the two languages,—and I have never heard that any attempt ever was made to influence their religious opinions.

But my hon. friend (Mr. Edwards) destroys his whole argument. He states that Article 93 of the British North America Act guaranteed separate schools to the provinces of Ontario and Quebec. Surely after all these years we are not going to reopen this question? If the hon. gentleman is sincere in his desire for peace and harmony throughout this country, I ask him in all fairness: can we accomplish that by reopening the question of religious training in schools? My hon. friend said that there might have been a better condition of things in this province of Ontario if the public men of the past had not been so cowardly In making that statement my hon. friend made a very serious attack upon that great statesman of whom he is a follower and admirer, and of whom we all are admirers, the late Sir John A. Macdonald. Sir John A. Macdonald had no such views as those entertained by the member for Frontenac. Listen to these words of that great statesman with regard to this school question, spoken in the House of Commons of Canada:

> I have no accord with the desire expressed in some quarters that by any mode whatever there should be an attempt made to oppress the one language or to render it inferior to the other; I believe that would be impossible if it were tried and it would be foolish and wicked if it were possible. The statement that has been made so often that this is a conquered country is "à propos de rien." Whether it was conquered or ceded, we have a constitution under which all British subjects are in a position of absolute equality, having rights of every kind, of language, of religion, of property and of person. There is no paramount race in this country, there is no conquered race in this country, we are all British subjects, and those who are not English are none the less British subjects on that account.

That was the statement of a man who desired unity in this country, and it has the ring of true statesmanship. I submit in all seriousness that no good can be served by bringing this question up from time to time. My hon. friend seems to think that Protestants in the province of Quebec are suffering. Let me, as a representative Protestant, assure him that we are perfectly satisfied with the system we now enjoy, and that we see great dangers ahead for us if the idea which the hon. gentleman presents to-day should prevail. Let me ask him, should we have national schools? Should we have one school as he suggests? What would be the language in the province of Quebec were his idea adopted? Where would the Protestants in that province stand? We are satisfied now with our school system; how would my hon. friend improve it?

Mr. EDWARDS: I do not see any reason why the question of language should be brought in or how it affects the matter at all. If you had non-sectarian schools in Quebec, you would get along just as well so far as language is concerned. My idea is that the primary schools should be non-sectarian.

Mr. ROBB: Very well; then the majority will rule. Only two or three years ago my hon. friend argued in this House that the schools in the province of Quebec were inferior, particularly that the Roman Catholic schools were inferior; and that the Protestant schools in that province were much superior to the Roman Catholic schools. Does he want to put us back to the position he said we were in when he made that argument three years ago? If so, as a Protestant from Quebec, I cannot agree with him. Let me refer my hon. friend, who seems to be somewhat ignorant of the school laws of the province of Quebec, to the Acts upon which our school laws are founded. There is a Council of Public Instruction, composed of Roman Catholic and Protestant members. In the performance of their duties the members are subject to the lawful orders and instructions given to them by the Lieutenant Governor in Council. The Council of Public Instruction is divided into two committees, one composed of Roman Catholic members and the other of Protestant members. The Protestant Committee may associate with themselves six persons and the Provincial Association of Protestant Teachers may each year at their annual meeting elect one of their members to be also an associate member of the Protestant Committee for the following year. The persons so added shall not form part of the Council of Public Instruction, but shall have in the Protestant Committee the same powers as the members of such Committee. School questions in which the interest of Roman Catholics and Protestants are collectively concerned are under the jurisdiction of the Council of Public Instruction and shall be decided by it. That is fair; we are satisfied with that.

My hon. friend may think I am advancing a prejudiced idea; that I am making an argument simply because I am on the opposite side of the House. Let me put in evidence here a statement of the Inspector General of Protestant schools in the province of Quebec. In 1914, in a pamphlet written by Dr. G. W. Parmelee the English or Protestant Secretary of the Council of Public Instruction, and Mr. J. C. Sutherland, Inspector General of Protestant Schools of the province, my hon. friend will find, at page 41, the following:

> A perusal of the previous pages has probably made it clear that the Roman Catholic majority and the Protestant minority work harmoniously by dividing the educational regulations and administration into two separate parts in regard to all matters that would give rise to a conflict of opinion between them.
> Inasmuch as these regulations include courses of study and provisions for religious instruction, and inasmuch as each committee approves of the textbooks for use in the schools of its own faith, ample guarantee is thus given to the Protestant minority that in vital matters the control of Protestant education will remain in Protestant hands, and at the same time the Roman Catholic Church is assured that religion in accordance with the tenets of the church shall continue to be inculcated as the basis upon which true education rests.

An annual meeting of the Dominion Educational Association was held in Ottawa in February, 1917. Mr. J. C. Sutherland, Inspector General of Protestant schools in the province of Quebec, attended that convention, and met there representatives from various parts of Ontario. At that convention he said:

> There has never been a particle of friction in the department in this respect since Confederation or before that date. . . . . We (the Protestant minority) have wonderful freedom, and whatever is needed is given. We never have any trouble. . . . . We have a complete system of reporting for the census, and also for the school attendance. . . . . .

That is the evidence of a public servant who travels throughout the province of Quebec, covering a territory extending from a point 180 miles north of North Bay away down to the Gulf—Quebec is a big country. I am bound to say, therefore, that he has greater opportunity of learning the true feeling throughout the province of Quebec than has the member for Frontenac, who devotes most of his time to this House. As a Protestant from the province of Quebec, therefore, I certainly am not in favour of the resolution proposed by my hon. friend. Like him, I desire national unity. If national unity does not prevail in the other provinces of Canada, we wish to do all we can to bring it about. But in our province we get along very well, and we look with disfavour on any attempt to introduce anything that will change the good feeling now existing between the English-speaking and the French-speaking people, the Roman Catholics and the Protestants of my province.

Let me remind my hon. friend that as the basis of representation for all the provinces, Quebec is entitled to sixty-five members in this Parliament. Has it occurred to him that almost twenty-four per cent of the representation in Parliament is English-speaking? That proves, it seems to me, that we get along fairly well from the school right up to manhood when we get into larger walks of life. So that I ask my hon. friend not to press a resolution which, in my judgment, can do no good and may do much harm.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Maisonneuve): I do not wish to add anything to what has been so well said on this subject by the member for Chateauguay-Huntinglon (Mr. Robb) except to thank him, on behalf of his French Canadian colleagues in the House of Commons, for the fair statement that he has made. As for the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) I am sorry that he thought it proper, having had his motion on the Order Paper since the beginning of the session, not to give notice to some of us that he would bring it up this afternoon.

But after all, it is just as well that the question came up as it did, because, while I do not wish to be unjust to my hon. friend, nor would I like to be severe on him, I do not think he has added much to his reputation by bringing, at this particular juncture, this irritating question before the public. It is more academic than anything else, if, indeed, it is anything else. The question of separate schools or non-sectarian schools was settled long ago, and I do not know, unless one has some special motive to serve, why one should start another school agitation at this very trying time in the history of our country.

The facts are, it seems to me, very simple. My hon. friend expresses the wish that we should have in Canada a non-sectarian school system, but the fact stares him in the face that the constitution of Canada, which he should respect as I respect it, settled that question in 1867, and if it may be said without offending my hon. friend, his study of Canadian history should lead him to know that long before Confederation the question had been settled between fair-minded Canadians of both races and creeds. My hon. friend, a moment ago, said that Lord Durham had come to Canada with a very high mission and that he favoured the idea of having one set of laws, one language and one system of schools for Canada.

Mr. EDWARDS: I did not mention schools in connection with Lord Durham.

Mr. LEMIEUX: But my hon. friend, speaking of what was in Lord Durham's mind and what runs through his famous report, said that Lord Durham's idea was that we should have national unity in Canada, and Lord Durham, in his report, speaks of one language and of one law for Canada. My hon. friend added, if I followed him well, that if at that time we had had, pursuant to Lord Durham's mission, one system of schools, we would have had national unity in Canada. Indeed, Lord Durham had a very important mission when he came to Canada and he succeeded but only partly in his mission. One who reads his report must admit that in his now famous report he laid for us Canadians and members of the British Empire, the foundation of responsible government. In that he succeeded, but when Lord Durham, radical though he was, expressed the opinion that there should be one code of laws and one language for the country, he made a fatal mistake, and that mistake is still very apparent to-day. Under the conditions which made this country British it cannot be expected that we shall ever have in Canada one system of laws for all the provinces, because the question was settled by the Act of Quebec in 1774, which Act we of the minority regard as our Magna Charta. We must expect that as long as there is a French Canadian province in the Dominion there will be a different system of civil laws for French Canadians within their own province. That is an Imperial Statute, and we shall adhere to it. There is no danger that French Canadians will fall short in population; they are increasing yearly, and in so doing they are observing the command of God and of their conscience. As regards their language, let me say this without any boasting: As long as there beats a French heart we shall maintain intact the language which was given to us as a sacred legacy by our forefathers. It is a language of which any civilized man must be proud, because the French language, the language of Joffre, of Foch, of world diplomacy, is too noble a language to be abandoned by those of us who represent French traditions and ideals in North America. My hon. friend said that if Lord Durham had insisted upon a system of non-sectarian schools—my hon. friend shakes his head—I take my hon. friend's denial in good part, and I say that the inference that I drew from his speech was that if Lord Durham had insisted at that time upon a system of non-sectarian schools we would have had true national unity in Canada. Sir, in 1841 French Canadians were in the majority in Lower Canada, but there was also in Lower Canada, the old French province, a respectable minority of English-speaking Protestants, as there was also in Upper Canada quite a minority of Catholics, both Irish and French. The common sense of the people of those early days settled the question without any statutory enactments. In Upper Canada there was a system of public schools, but the fair sense of the people agreed that there should be a separate school for those who wanted Catholic tuition for their children under Catholic supervision. In Lower Canada, notably in the Eastern Townships, there was, as I said, a Protestant minority, and there again the common sense and fairness of the people, without any special statutory enactment, decided that those Protestants should have their own schools. In 1841 the Union took place. It was not a success. The only thing which Union secured to Canada was responsible government, which had been fought for during and before the rebellion; and after 1841, thanks to the alliance of liberal-minded people from both Upper and Lower Canada, responsible government had to be conceded by, first, the Governor General, and finally by the Imperial authorities. But all those who are familiar with that period of our history know the wranglings that took place between both provinces and both parties during the period which elapsed between 1841 and 1867. Hon. Louis Joseph Papineau was then just back from exile. He had been brought back from Europe by Sir Hippolyte Lafontaine, and it is to his credit that in order to repatriate Hon. Louis Joseph Papineau he went even so far as to lay his resignation in the hands of the then Governor General of Canada. Mr. Papineau came back again and began at once to agitate in favour of representation by population, because in his opinion the French representation should have been the largest, as the population of Lower Canada was the more numerous of the two.

[Mr. Lemieux.]

Mr. Lafontaine, who afterwards became Sir Louis Hippolyte Lafontaine, took issue with Mr. Papineau, on the ground that the flow of British immigration would soon give Upper Canada the majority, and when that happened we could not expect a larger representation for Lower Canada. Later on, events proved that Mr. Lafontaine's attitude was the right one, but in the meantime the school question became very acute. The School Act of 1855 was first passed, and then the Act of 1863, an Act which had been fathered by Mr. Scott, who later became Secretary of State under the Laurier Government, which position he also occupied 18 years before under the Mackenzie Government. The legislation of 1863 enacted practically what was later embodied in the Act of Confederation itself. Mr. Brown was then a member of the legislature, and he tenaciously opposed the separate school system. Long and acrimonious discussions took place, and as my hon. friend said a moment ago the leader of the Conservative party, Sir John Macdonald, himself favoured a system of separate schools for Upper and Lower Canada in order that the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec and the Catholic minority in the province of Ontario might be protected. Later on, when Government under the Union became a failure, because every ministry changed after three or four months in office, Mr. Brown again took up the question of representation by population and advocated Confederation as the only solution compatible with the principles which had been advocated by Mr. Papineau. The English minority had then become the majority. Mr. Brown was so insistent on the question of Confederation that I think I am within the mark when I say that he was really the man who did most to achieve the anactment of 1867, but in order to succeed, Mr. Brown, nobly I must say, accepted a compromise on the vexed school question. In 1863, and in fact all throughout the regime of the Union from 1841 to 1863, Mr. Brown had been the most vigorous opponent of the separate school system and had carried with him the bulk of his party in Upper Canada. But Mr. Brown knew that in order to achieve Confederation he had to make some sacrifice of opinion, some concession, that he must accept a compromise. And what was the nature of that compromise? I would point out to the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) that at times, especially in a country like this with its two great races, where there are different creeds and languages it is fair, it is well that there should be compromise. Mr. Brown, who was a statesman, understood that. I dare say there has never been a man in Canada who was more insistent on non-sectarian schools than the late Hon. George Brown. Indeed, his paper, the Toronto Globe, and before that the Leader, every day contained articles written by Mr. Brown advocating his view of non-sectarian schools. But in 1867, in order to achieve the higher ideal of Confederation Mr. Brown accepted a compromise. I have here his very words which I shall read, in part, to the House. Speaking on clause 6, which read as follows:

Education, saving the rights and privileges which the Protestant or Catholic minority in both Canadas may possess as to their denominational schools at the time when the union goes into operation.

Mr. Brown said:

I need hardly remind the House that I have always opposed and continue to oppose the system of sectarian education, so far as the public chest is concerned. I have never had any hesitation on that point, I have never been able to see why all the people in the province, to whatever sect they may belong, should not send their children to the same schools to receive the ordinary branches of instruction. I regard the parent and the pastor as the best religious instructors—and so long as the religious faith of the children is not interfered with, and ample opportunity afforded to the clergy to give religious instruction to the children of their flocks, I cannot see any sound objection to mixed schools.

Further on he says:

Now, it is known to every hon. member of this House that an Act was passed in 1863 as a final settlement of this sectarian controversy. I was not in Quebec at the time, but if I had been here, I would have voted against that Bill because it extended the facilities for establishing separate schools. It had, however, this good feature, that it was accepted by the Roman Catholic authorities and carried to the Parliament as a final compromise of the question in Upper Canada.

Mr. EDWARDS: Does my hon. friend say that the conditions now surrounding the separate schools are the same as under the Scott Bill which was incorporated in the Confederation Act of 1867?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Practically the same. I am citing the opinion of Mr. Brown in order to show how he compromised on the separate school question, in order to achieve the higher ideal of Confederation. He went on:

When, therefore, it was proposed that a provision should be inserted in the confederation scheme to bind that contract of 1863 and declare it a final settlement, so that we should not be compelled, as we have been since 1849, to stand constantly to our arms, awaiting fresh attacks upon our common school system, the proposition seemed to me one that was not rashly to be rejected. I admit that, from my point of view, this is a blot on the scheme before the House; it is confessedly, one of the concessions from our side that had to be made to secure this great measure of reform. But assuredly, I, for one, have not the slightest hesitation in accepting it as a necessary condition of the scheme of union, and doubly acceptable must it be in the eyes of hon. gentlemen opposite, who were the authors of the Bill of 1863.

The opinion of Sir John A. Macdonald has already been quoted by my hon. friend, and I have now given the opinion of his great antagonist and rival, the Hon. George Brown. The one had already committed himself in favour of separate schools for the sake of national unity, and the other accepted them by force majeure, I must say, but in order to achieve Confederation. I hope my hon. friend will accept these two high authorities in favour of the system which has obtained in Canada since.

But my hon. friend went further, and though I will follow him in his arguments, in doing so I do not intend to re-open the debate on the famous Autonomy Bill. He seemed to make a special appeal on behalf of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta. Sir, what are the facts of the case? In Manitoba the system of separate schools was established when that province entered Confederation. By a judgment of the Privy Council in 1895 the Government of the province was reminded that the legislation which had been passed in the nineties was contrary to the constitution and that remedial legislation was necessary in order to give the minority in Manitoba the rights to which it was entitled. We all remember the agitation which followed. We know that those who represented the minority in Parliament and outside sought to obtain justice for the Catholics of Manitoba. Finally a settlement was arrived at known as the Laurier-Greenway settlement. It was, indeed, a settlement based on the minimum of rights and yet the minority accepted it, some with loud protests and others in the hope and expectation that the majority would at least live up to the agreement. I regret to say that twenty-three years after, a so-called Liberal Government in Manitoba has thought it wise to wipe out the Laurier-Greenway agreement and to treat the French Canadian minority in that province on a footing of equality with the foreign immigrants who have no such constitutional guarantee as has the minority which joined Confederation with Manitoba.

Mr. EDWARDS: Did not the Laurier-Greenway settlement put the foreigner on the same footing as the French?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes, but was it just, was it fair that the Norris Government as they did three years ago should enact legislation wiping out all such moderate terms as were agreed upon in the Laurier-Greenway agreement? To-day, Sir, the French Canadian Catholics of Manitoba, notwithstanding the terms of Confederation, are treated on a footing of equality with the foreigners who settle in that province, coming as they do from Europe and all parts of the world without the guarantee which had been given to my fellow countrymen at the time when Manitoba joined the Union.

I leave it at that. History will pronounce judgment on the action of the majority. History will say if it was the true British spirit which instigated Mr. Norris, and before him Mr. Roblin and the others, in curtailing every year, until they wiped them out entirely, the minimum rights which had been secured under the Laurier-Greenway agreement. I leave it to history, Mr. Speaker.

As regards the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, my hon. friend knows that in 1905 legislation was passed by this Parliament to implement the legislation of 1875, when the Northwest Territories were created. When those Territories were created, guarantees were again given to the minority. I promised you, Mr. Speaker, that I would not weary the House with any long quotations, and if I refer for a moment to a now historic debate it is only to answer with facts and data the assertions made by my hon. friend; I do not wish to be at all controversial, nor carried away on this question.

Sir SAM HUGHES (Victoria): Was not the issue which was fought out in 1896 by the Liberal leader and the Liberal party in Quebec antagonistic to the demands made by the then Liberal-Conservative government to give what they considered justice to the minority in Manitoba, and did not the great Liberal leader, backed up by his colleagues from the province of Quebec, fight to a finish on that issue?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes. In 1896 Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his friends contended that Parliament should not pass any drastic legislation which Manitoba would not accept and would ultimately lead to civil war. Sir Wilfrid Laurier, as I have stated already in this House in another debate, acted under the inspiration of Mr. Edward Blake, who, with Mr. Ewart, K.C., of Ottawa, had nobly represented the Catholic minority before the Privy Council. Mr. Blake suggested that it would not do to apply remedial legislation to Manitoba, but that through friendly proceedings between both governments the same object might be attained; and it was under that suggestion of Mr. Blake, and with the conciliatory spirit of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, that the Laurier-Greenway agreement was arrived at. But I was referring to the condition of things in 1875, when the Northwest Territories were created. In the Bill passed by the Dominion Parliament, during the session of 1875, we have the foundation laid of the rights of the minority in the two later provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. Upon the creation of the Territories a system of separate schools was established, and again the eternal question of separate schools came up before the House of Commons and the Senate. There again the powerful voice of the late Hon. George Brown, who throughout his life had been an opponent of the sectarian school system, was raised in favour of the Northwest minority as a matter of compromise. Mr. Brown spoke as follows:

> Hon. Mr. Brown said he concurred with what had fallen from his friends on the treasury benches, and from hon. gentlemen who had spoken on the amendment, with respect to the propriety of allowing separate schools. But the question was not whether those schools were right or wrong, good or bad, but as to whether it was wise for this country to deal with this question. He quite admitted the importance of the issue which had been raised—whether this matter should be referred to the province interested for settlement, or be brought to the Dominion Legislature. The moment this Act passed and the Northwest became part of the union, they came under the Union Act, and under the provisions with regard to separate schools.

Mr. Brown therefore admitted that the separate school system had to be established in those Northwest Territories by the terms of Union. We are aware of what happened when the Autonomy Bills were presented to this House in 1905. They contained the exact status quo which had obtained in those territories since 1875. We remember what an agitation took place in 1905. Amidst such storms, racial or religious, the experience is—and history is a great teacher in these matters—that the minority has to suffer and has to submit to compromises and accept concessions. Minimum rights were agreed to by clause 16 in those two Bills; and I am happy to say that the legislatures of Saskatchewan and Alberta have observed those minimum rights. I know that attempts have been made of late to curtail whatever rights were granted under section 16 of the Autonomy Bills; I also know that encroachments have been violently advocated. If they are accepted by the religious authorities of those provinces I have nothing more to say; but I appeal to the sense of honour of my hon. friends from Alberta and Saskatchewan. Let it not be said by history that their provinces have not lived up to that spirit of British fair play which we are so often called upon, we of the minority, to respect and to revere.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Edwards) alluded a moment ago to the minority in the province of Quebec. It is the first time I hear that there are localities in that province where the Protestant minority do not get the means of sending their children to school. I have been myself at various colleges and schools, and have rubbed elbows with young Protestant friends who have remained my dearest friends throughout my career. My hon. friend from Chateauguay and Huntingdon has referred to the case of his only daughter, who had been educated in a Catholic convent, Sir. I had an only son who as a lad was educated at a Catholic college, but, who during the last three years of his life was a student at Bishop's college, Lennoxville, an Anglican institution. I can say for Bishop's university, as my hon. friend said for the Catholic convent at Valleyfield, that the religious faith of my son was never so well protected as during the happy days he spent at Lennoxville. Mr. Speaker, we have no such bickerings and no such quarrels between Protestants and Catholics in the province of Quebec, and I wish no better brief than the statement made the other day by the Protestant educational authorities in Quebec with regard to our school system. I have here a statement made by Mr. Sutherland, the Inspector General of the Protestant schools of the province in 1914. Speaking of the regulations in regard to those schools, he made the following statement:

> Inasmuch as these regulations include courses of study and provisions for religious instruction, and inasmuch as each committee approves of the textbooks for use in the schools of its own faith, ample guarantee is thus given to the Protestant minority that in vital matters the control of Protestant education will remain in Protestant hands, and at the same time the Roman Catholic Church is assured that religion in accordance with the tenets of the church shall continue to be inculcated as the basis upon which true education rests.

At the annual meeting of the Dominion Educational Association held at Ottawa in February, 1917, the same Mr. Sutherland made the following statement:

> There has never been a particle of friction in the department in this respect since Confederation or before that date. . . . . we (the Protestant minority) have wonderful freedom, and whatever is needed is given. We never have any trouble.

Dr. Carter, who was present, put the question:

> You are getting along very harmoniously and you seem very optimistic?

And the answer of Mr. Sutherland was:

> We never had any trouble; we are as happy as clams down there.

I wish again to emphasize the statement he had made prior to that:

> We (the Protestant minority) have wonderful freedom, and whatever is needed is given. We never have any trouble. . . . . We have a complete system of reporting for the census, and also for the school attendance. . . . . .

The other day, Mr. Speaker, the most influential English paper of Canada, the Montreal Gazette, commented as follows on a letter written by Mr. Howard Murray, who, by the way, had extolled our Quebec school system:

> Mr. Howard Murray, a member of the Protestant Committee of the Council of Public Instruction, writes a letter giving his views on some recent propositions having in view the establishment of a federal educational system throughout Canada. He holds that under the system of administration adopted at Confederation the idea is not justified. So will think the great majority of those who give study to all the factors in the situation. By the constitutional law education is made a matter of provincial duty. The considerations that moved the framers of the British North America Act are as strong to-day as they were in 1865 and 1866. No wise man would start an agitation to re-open the issue and bring about a change in the federation compact, that would be resented by such a large minority of the people that years would not heal the sore that would be created. And it is not sure that a federal education law would be an improvement on those now in force. Quebec is not the most illiterate of the provinces; and those who have followed the development of its schools know that through the efforts of earnest men, of both languages, the advance in educational status has been steady and notable. The same quiet work that has been effective so far will be effective in the future. The talk about putting the schools under federal control should cease. It is mischievous; and it is doomed to be ineffective.

I wish to say en passant, and only as a matter of history, that the separate school system was established under the Union Government in 1863 by a majority vote of the representatives of Upper Canada. If I cared to worry the House I would give names and dates.

Sir SAM HUGHES: What Government was then in power?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I forget.

Sir SAM HUGHES: The Sandfield Macdonald-Sicotte Government.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yes, you are right. But the majority of the Upper Canada representatives voted in favour of the system of separate schools which was then established.

Mr. HOCKEN: No, no.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I have the evidence here, but it is too long to quote and, besides, it is beyond the question. As Sir Richard Cartwright once said in 1896, in answer to Sir George Foster, who had referred on several occasions to the subject then under debate as an accomplished fact: "The hon. gentleman has made a very elaborate and eloquent speech, and has proven beyond a shadow of doubt that an accomplished fact is an accomplished fact." Well, the separate school system is an accomplished fact. Whether or not it was carried by a majority or a minority vote of Upper Canada does not really matter, although I have here with me the evidence to show that it was carried on first and second reading by a majority vote of the representatives of Upper Canada. However, as I said, that is only a matter of history.

Mr. HOCKEN: I think that is very pertinent evidence.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Mr. Speaker, one word more. My hon. friend says that he advocates a non-sectarian system in order to attain an ideal, that ideal being national unity. I suppose he means Canadian unity. If he means that, we who belong to the French Canadian minority—I say it with all deference—have no lesson to receive from him. We are Canadians, our ancestors sleep their last sleep in God's acres not only of the province of Quebec, but indeed of all parts of Canada, and our record goes back over more than three hundred years. We are Canadians to the core, aye Canadians first, last and always. But if it is an Imperialistic ideal he is striving to achieve, then we must part company with my hon. friend. We remain Canadians, we remain British —not even Anglo-Saxon, no. I want my English-speaking friends to drop the "Saxon." It has a German flavour. Let them be British. We are British, and just because we are British we remain Canadians. Mr. Chamberlain on one occasion was speaking at the University of Edinburgh and was extolling before the young students what he called Anglo-Saxon civilization. He was interrupted three times for using the expression "Anglo-Saxon," and was told by the Scottish students, "Drop the word 'Anglo-Saxon' and speak of British civilization." And, Mr. Speaker, he was tactful enough to take their advice, hard-headed as he was.

I am convinced that the separate school system is the only one suitable to our conditions, historically it is the best, and if we value our national existence we should see to it that in every school of Canada, whether Catholic or Protestant, there is religious tuition. I am a layman, I hold no brief for the church, but I tell my hon. friend that in the years to come, if the Bolshevistic wave should reach the shores of Canada—but God forbid that it should—the strongest bulwark against that wave will be the old province of Quebec, with its system of sectarian schools, wherein religion is taught the children at an early age. Religion is needed in the world, Mr. Speaker. Human agencies alone will not be able to stop the fury of the revolutionary tide that is sweeping Europe to-day. I repeat, religion is needed. Let my hon. friends take that advice from a humble layman.

But one more word before I resume my seat. My hon. friend stated that the Papal Ablegate told Mr. Rogers at Ottawa, in 1905, that the Manitoba boundaries could be extended if the Roblin Government would agree to a separate school system in the Keewatin Territory. That story is not new; we have heard that old fable and it was denied long ago. A letter was read in Parliament denying the absurd charge made by Mr. Robert Rogers, who was not then a member of the House. My hon. friend apparently has a very short memory. Some in this House think that Roman Catholic diplomacy may err at times, but surely, Sir, not to the extent imagined by Mr. Robert Rogers and by my hon. friend from Frontenac. The Papal Ablegate denied that legend. He should have ignored it, because the wild statement having been made by Mr. Robert Rogers carried its own refutation.

I am through, Mr. Speaker; I regret to have spoken at such length. I hope I have raised no bitter controversy. I wanted simply to state that there are on this vexed question facts which have to be presented in their true colours.

At six o'clock the House took recess.

After Recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ROBERT KING ANDERSON (Halton): Mr. Speaker, the resolution introduced this afternoon by the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) is a very important one. In rising to address the House as its seconder, I realize that many people in this country will consider it as not belonging to the arena of federal politics. They will say that the question of education is entirely provincial, and that the Federal Government has nothing whatever to do with it. But the Act passed by the Fathers of Confederation in 1867 can hardly be said to stand for all time with regard to education, when conditions in the country are changing. The Fathers of Confederation scarcely had a glimpse of the great progress which had been made since that time in all affairs, especially in the scientific world. We are living to-day under different conditions; we are not the same people that we were in 1867; consequently, this question of national non-sectarian schools is very appropriate at the present time.

Public opinion must first be educated to accept measures which are vital to a country's growth before popular support will warrant their incorporation in the statutes. There must be a demand, a compelling force behind a movement in order to make it a success. That there is such a demand—a growing demand—all over this country for non-sectarian national schools, no one will deny. That demand has been growing for a number of years; it has become intensified during the period of the war. Great events change the current of the people's thoughts and suddenly illuminate the public mind to popular defects that act as barriers to national progress. The day has gone by when the British North America Act is regarded as unchangeable, like the laws of the Medes and Persians; if it contains clauses which are inimical to our progress and our unity, those clauses should be removed.

The British North America Act passed in 1867 by the Imperial Parliament, is the constitution of the Dominion of Canada. That constitution was brought about by a compromise between the two races living in this country at that time, and who came together on an agreement under which Confederation was made possible. I do not intend, Mr. Speaker, to advocate that that agreement should be dealt with as only a scrap of paper. I believe that it is possible that all the provinces of this Dominion can come together on a system of national, non-sectarian schools which will be satisfactory to all. Such a consummation of this question is eminently to be desired.

A great national spirit has been born out of the travail of this war and Canada has burst into nationhood. Our sphere has suddenly become larger and we stand before the world to-day as one of the great nations of the future, where yesterday we were unknown. We are no longer a loosely connected system of provinces, largely interested in provincial affairs, jealous of one another, fearful of our special prerogatives, looking to the Federal Government for preferment and acknowledging it as our only tie of union. A great unifying national spirit pervades all the people of the various provinces. A trail of blood crosses this country from ocean to ocean, uniting the many diverse elements in our population with a tie that the lapse of time can only serve to strengthen. The war brought us one of the greatest opportunities in our history, if we but utilize it to the full. What this country needs in the present critical hour is a man, a statesman with a vision, who can give the people a common objective and a lofty ideal of national life. Every nation has a destiny, a destiny which is founded upon the character of its people, guided by the will of God. Every nation that is worthy of the name has a soul. It cannot, properly speaking, be called a nation until it manifests that soul. Canada has a soul; the war revealed it. It is the collective soul of her people, and as the people are, so is the nation. The individual characteristics of a people find expression in their national life and determine the nation's status in world affairs. If Canada is to take a high place among democratic peoples, we must have leadership of a high order to concentrate public sentiment and public service on well-defined lines of national endeavour.

The average man and the average woman should be enabled to visualize our future. This implies education of all the people on broad, national lines; education in everything that goes to make the name "Canadian" mean character. Canada has the nucleus of a national character now. When our soldiers and nurses appeared on the European battlefields, they were quickly recognized as representing a distinctly Canadian type. This was not noticeable twenty-five years ago; when we were submerged in the general term "American." Owning the same cosmopolitan parentage as our cousins to the south, we are not like them. That difference is growing more marked year by year. Neither are we like the Europeans, from whom we have sprung. Climate, environment, the blending of nationalities and the natural obstacles with which we cope, have left their impress upon our character and mark us out as a people having a distinct destiny of our own. In the working out of that destiny the elementary schools of our country will take a high place. Our public school is the most vital factor in the formation of Canadian character. It is the crucible into which the polyglot population of this country is thrown, mixed together, ground up and moulded into the finished product of Canadian citizenship. Peoples of all languages, races and creeds go into that crucible and must be subjected to the moulding process in order that Canada may work out her destiny among the nations.

Our public school, then, is a national issue, and should be made a national institution, purely Canadian, and undenominational in its character. Anything that interferes with its efficiency in turning out Canadians imbued with a love for home and country is detrimental to the future of Canada. Any influence that favours segregation, that divides our population into classes on any claim of expediency, of self-interest, of community interest, or of denominational interest, is dangerous and obnoxious and is bound to re-act to our national dishonour and our national disintegration.

This country has a great future. We have all the elements of a great nation—a vast extent of territory, illimitable resources of a diversified character; millions of acres of arable land stretching from ocean to ocean; a large system of inland waterways of great commercial importance; vast stretches of forest country; great areas of lands containing minerals of all kinds; a climate which is conducive to a hardy, virile race, and a dominating Canadian personality that has placed its hall-mark on our native-born population. This country is in the eye of the world as never before, and an ever increasing stream of immigrants from war-swept Europe will continue to find its way to our shores. These people will come here with pre-conceived opinions of freedom of government, and with revolutionary ideals.

They will come here with social and religious opinions as varied as the people themselves. They will come here representing all grades of humanity, the fit, the unfit, and the misfits, asking for an opportunity to live out their allotted span on the virgin soil of Canada. If we admit them—and I submit, Mr. Speaker, we must admit them, by a selective process, if you will—then we must shoulder the responsibility for their education, future protection and support.

The North American continent has been the melting pot for the surplus population of Europe for two centuries. As has been so well said, the nineteenth century belonged to the United States, and the twentieth century will belong to the Dominion of Canada. The words of the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White), that within fifteen years we may have a population of 20,000,000 people, are prophetic. I believe it is within easy distance of this country to attain by a progressive immigration policy. These surplus peoples have been and will be flung promiscuously into the arms of Canada that she may take them to her broad bosom and make them her own. They do not come here by accident, not by any mere chance, but in the fulfilment of a Divine plan. The hand of destiny directs their course, and the finger of destiny points the way for Canada to link her future with theirs.

How best to assimilate them, to transform them into good, law-abiding progressive citizens, is the problem this country must solve; and we expect Union Government to adopt a national policy on this question, to throw down the barriers of race and religion and to unite our people in a common national ideal that will consolidate this country from coast to coast into a permanent Canadian entity. The Dominion Government cannot shirk the issue by delegating it to the provinces, but should co-operate with the provinces in co-ordinating our school system on a national basis, having for its object the assimilation of the foreigner, the blending of nationalities, and the formation of a permanent Canadian type that will stamp its mentality forever on the Land of the Maple.

Education, then, is the imperative duty of the State. We may as well face the situation that confronts us to-day and prepare for eventualities. Everything points to further disturbances the world over. There is no permanent peace in sight. The world is in a dangerous mood; Europe is seething with revolution, and our foreign element is restless in sympathy with their home countries. Nothing prevents Bolshevism from raising its ugly head in this country but the scattered condition of its votaries, and the sane attitude of our industrial class, combined with the efforts of the Government to give employment to the masses. I compliment the Government on its progressive policy in this respect. It is worthy of the support of every man who has the welfare of his country at heart. Bolshevism is autocracy in reaction. We have had many examples of it in the world, but the latest one is Russia. A people held under the leash of autocratic restraint for centuries suddenly find their bonds are severed and rush to the opposite extreme of lawlessness, rapine and murder. Every man his own lawmaker; human passions unrestrained, surge and flow in the widest confusion, reducing the immortal soul of man to a depth of degradation beneath the lowest grade of the brute creation. Russia to-day exhibits to a shuddering world the most beastly spectacle of human depravity that ever stained the pages of history. Nothing remains but to confine them within their own boundaries until their passions recoil in horror from their terrible excesses. Bolshevism is rooted in ignorance. Ignorance is slavery, a slavery that fetters the intellect and stunts the soul. Let this country rise to the occasion and baffle this mediæval monster masquerading under the guise of freedom. Education on broad lines of justice and truth is the remedy. Education of all our people without regard to the restraints of race or religion is the only hope of democracy. We often hear the statement made that democracy must be made safe for the people, but, Mr. Speaker, democracy is the people, and the people must be educated in order to be safe for democracy. The greatest guarantee for the security of life and property is education. If you inculcate into the youthful mind a love for the eternal principles of truth and justice, democracy will take care of itself.

There is more illiteracy on the North American continent than most people believe. By illiteracy I mean inability to read or write in any language. According to Secretary Lane, the United States had 700,000 men of draft age who could neither read nor write a military order, while in the whole population of the United States there were 7,700,000 people over ten years of age who could neither read nor write in any language, or 7.7 per cent of the total population. In the Dominion of Canada, according to the census of 1911, there were 663,453 persons over five years of age who could neither read nor write in any language. By provinces, the percentages are as follows, and I am giving these with the lowest percentages first:

	Per Cent.
Ontario	6.51
Prince Edward Island	7.61
Nova Scotia	10.04
British Columbia	11.61
Quebec	12.66
Alberta	12.72
Manitoba	13.31
Yukon	13.58
Saskatchewan	13.70
New Brunswick	14.05

According to a census of 1916, there were in the Prairie Provinces 102,425 people who could not speak English, and it was found that when foreigners were allowed to settle en bloc there was the greatest illiteracy and least knowledge of English. It was found by the educationists in those provinces that segregation prevents education and retards assimilation.

According to the census in 1911, we find that of people over five years of age, the following percentages were illiterate:

	Per Cent.
Canadian-born males	11.45
Canadian-born females	9.81
British-born males	3.78
British-born females	4.13
Foreign-born males	16.89
Foreign-born females	16.97

Hon. members will see from this that those coming from the Mother Country show the least amount of illiteracy; they are better educated than the people in this country, and 11.45 per cent of the total Canadian-born over five years of age is a rather high percentage for the Dominion of Canada. It must, however, be remembered that quite a number of these people had foreign-born parents and that would give a certain reason for their illiteracy, but we should not have such a large percentage of the second generation of our foreign people unable to read or write. The same census shows the following percentage of illiteracy amongst those over twenty-one years of age:

	Per Cent.
Canadian-born males	9.55
British-born males	3
Foreign-born males	16.56

That shows that when they grew up to manhood, quite a large number of these illiterates still retained their illiteracy. In other words, of 107,366 men over twenty-one years of age who were illiterate, 37,745 were Canadian born and 57,389 foreign born. This would indicate that we really need a more progressive policy with regard to the education of the foreign-born people in this country, and especially for the children of the foreign-born who are allowed to grow up in an illiterate state. For the information of the House I will give a few percentages of the illiteracy the world over: Austria, 18.7 per cent; Belgium, 12.7; France, 14.1; Greece, 57.2; Italy, 37; Portugal, 68.9; Rumania, 60.8. Russia, where Bolshevism is at present running riot, is the most illiterate country in Europe, and possibly in the civilized world, with 69 per cent of illiterates.

Mr. BELAND: Has my hon. friend the figures for Sweden?

Mr. ANDERSON: No.

Mr. BELAND: I ask because it is generally understood that Sweden has no illiterates at all. I do not know whether that is true, and I only ask for information.

Mr. ANDERSON: Perhaps that is why Sweden is not in the list I saw. Australia's percentage is 1.8; New South Wales, 2 per cent; New Zealand, .9 per cent; Queensland, 2.5 per cent. I believe that these figures will indicate that the countries that have national non-sectarian schools have the least illiteracy. The percentage of illiterates in Australia, which has non-sectarian schools, is 1.8, while North America—the United States and Canada—we have as high as 7.7 and 11.45.

The census of 1911 shows that there was a total population in the Dominion of 7,206,643, of whom 54.08 per cent were British, 28.5 French, and 17.41 foreign born. There were 752,732 foreign-born in Canada in 1911, and of these 62 per cent were in the four western provinces. Of these foreigners, 45.77 per cent were naturalized, and 54.23 per cent were aliens. The percentage of foreign-born in the leading cities is as follows: Toronto, 8.8; Montreal, 9.2; Hamilton, 9.4; Calgary, 20; Edmonton, 22; Regina, 22.6; Winnipeg, 24.2; Vancouver, 27.6, and Fort William, 28.2. This will demonstrate that the larger part of our foreign element is in the country west of the Great Lakes.

From the same census I find that the people belong to religious denominations as follows: Presbyterians, 1,115,324; Methodists, 1,079,892; Anglicans, 1,043,017; other Protestants, 457,470, making a total of 3,735,703. Roman Catholics, 2,833,041; Greeks, 88,507, a total of 2,921,548. This does not take into consideration the other denominations which can scarcely be classed as Protestants or Roman Catholics, and which make up a small part of our population. These various people were divided among 72 religious denominations.

From these figures it will be seen that the bulk of our foreign-born immigrants are in the Western Provinces. Of the naturalized foreigners, 71.85 per cent are in the Western Provinces; that is, more are naturalized in the Western Provinces than in the East; 16.01 per cent in Ontario and 2.19 per cent in the Maritime Provinces. It will also be seen that Canada is overwhelmingly British in its population, and it is likely to remain so on account of the sane immigration legislation introduced by the present Government. I believe it is in the interests of this country that that should be so. The Anglo-Saxon race has placed its mark indelibly on the North American continent. The language, the customs, and the habits are theirs. English is spoken by 110,000,000 people on the North American continent, and by four-fifths of the people in the Dominion of Canada. It is essential to the economic and social welfare of every citizen of this country that he should be able to speak that language; otherwise, he will be under a very serious handicap. This does not mean the exclusion of other languages from our public or private life. I believe that the French language which has a hold in this country should be taught; it is a beautiful language, and I am only sorry that I cannot speak it myself. I do not think any person in this country should be debarred from speaking or studying that language, and there should be no objection to it being taught in our national schools.

A national non-sectarian school is not a question of religion or of race, but a question of what kind of education in the interests of the country as a whole shall the State provide for the children in our public schools, for the maintenance of which all the people are taxed without regard to race or creed. Experience tells us that this education should be of a harmonizing, unifying character, blending the children of our cosmopolitan population together with common aims and common hopes. That being the case, has the State any duty to perform in regard to education in our public schools. That question will be answered in the affirmative by four-fifths of the people in this country.

As we have at least 72 different religious denominations in Canada, it is not in the interests of this country that any one of those denominations should be singled out for special privilege. Such special privilege is a signal for distrust and attack. The system is vicious in principle, and dangerous in practice. To give concessions to a minority because it is a minority is entirely wrong. What is good for the majority should be equally good for the minority. It is claimed that the Protestant minority in the province of Quebec have been granted the same privileges as the Roman Catholic minority in the province of Ontario in their public schools; I think hon. gentlemen opposite have said so today, and I believe it is correct. I believe that the Protestants have the same privileges in the schools of the province of Quebec as the Roman Catholics have in the province of Ontario. This may appear fair on the surface, but it works out rather to the disadvantage of the Protestants. In Ontario the Roman Catholic children have the privilege of going to the public school if there is no separate school in their parish. There they receive a good common education on secular subjects without any interference whatever with their religion; there is no attempt whatever to give them any religious instruction. But in the province of Quebec, if the Protestant sends his children to the Roman Catholic school, they are always hearing the religion of that faith taught in the school. They are not compelled to study it, but they are young and their minds are impressionable, and when they hear this religion taught repeatedly they gain a certain insight into a faith which their parents are not in sympathy with. Consequently, it works out rather to the disadvantage of the Protestant.

The parochial, or separate, or confessional, schools—call them what you will—are getting some hold in the Canadian West, particularly among the foreign element which have these schools in their own country. These schools are a relic of the past, and it would be a retrograde movement to have them established in this country. The struggle for secular schools has been long and bitter, and the fruits of that struggle should not be endangered. The parochial school is usually under the control of some particular denomination and is inclined to be narrow in its character. It places too much stress on the teaching of religious subjects without teaching religion, and its main object is to perpetuate ecclesiastical control.

Parochial schools favour segregation and prevent that social intercourse which is productive of friendly relationship. They are productive of class interests and class hatred. They divide the people on racial and religious lines and retard assimilation. The parochial school, as we have it in this country, is almost entirely racial and in that sense is unnational. It favours disruption rather than unity. Unless under strict supervision by the education authorities it is a menace to the future peace and progress of this country. This is more clearly seen in relation to the great tide of immigration which is coming to our shores. In the Canadian West there are foreign communities, people coming from foreign lands, from the autocratic countries of Europe, living in communities where they have their own churches, papers, schools, and stores, and speaking their own language to the exclusion of the French and English languages. Democracy can have no chance in a community such as that. These people are the representatives of autocratic countries in Europe and they are propagating the ideas they imbibed there. There is no Canadianization going on amongst them, assimilation is at a standstill, and it is not by that means that they can be made into good Canadian citizens. You will find these communities in different parts of the West. Communities of Ruthenians can be found in Manitoba near Gimli, Sifton, Starbuck and Shore Lake; in Saskatchewan near Kenora, Rosthern and Vonda, and in Alberta near Starz and Pakan, northeast of Edmonton.

I am aware, Mr. Speaker, that it is a difficult matter to prevent these communities from forming. These people want to live together and our own Canadian element is not desirous of living amongst them. But I contend that these people should be compelled to have our public schools in their midst, that they should be taught the English language, and the responsibilities of Canadian citizenship and be made acquainted with our laws. If we ever want to make them citizens of this country we must exact these conditions. We are handing out to these people the vote when they have absolutely no knowledge of what a vote means. They are simply parts of autocratic Europe scattered over our Canadian West and living in the heart of a democratic country.

The British North America Act, as I said before, was a compromise between the two dominating nationalities inhabiting this country at the time of Confederation. The object of this Act was unity; the intention of the Fathers of Confederation was to effect such a confederation of the provinces as it was fondly hoped would unite the various parts of British North America on terms of equality and unity. It was hoped that the races would in time amalgamate into common entity and become what they must ultimately become, a distinctly Canadian type. Neither race should dominate the other; in fact, neither race will dominate the other but all races represented in this country must fuse imperceptibly into each other so that Canada may fulfil the great destiny intended for her in the civilization of the world. There is little use to kick against the pricks; an inexorable fate shapes our course. Time and the tide of immigration coming to our shores will ultimately break down all barriers and leaven the whole into one common mould.

That leavening process has gone on and is making considerable progress; so much so in fact that there is a Canadian type easily recognized now. But so far as the two dominating races are concerned, there is no fusion and there is only the semblage of unity. The British North America Act is a failure in this respect. After fifty years trial this must be admitted by any impartial judge. The alignment of this House proves it. The cause of the present cleavage is significant and demands an explanation. Unless the cause is found the remedy cannot be applied. I believe it to be in our educational system. Our schools are too narrow in their scope. They are too provincial. They fail to take that broad national character which can visualize Canada as a whole and which is productive of sound Canadian citizenship. The main object of our schools is to produce Canadians worthy of their greatest heritage, Canadians pure and simple, not Englishmen or Frenchmen, not Protestants or Roman Catholics, but Canadians without regard to race or creed. The public school then is a national issue. It is imperative that we have a national policy on education.

In the working out of our school system the personalty of and the equipment of the teacher should not be overlooked. The teacher is the greatest benefactor in the land —the school-mistress and the school-master are the pillars of civilization—without whom this old world would soon revert to barbarism; and yet there is no class of public servants so shamefully underpaid. There is very little to tempt them to begin and nothing to induce them to remain.

During this reconstruction period when old superstitions and social fallacies are being swept aside with such astonishing swiftness, something should be done to raise this important profession to the high financial standard its usefulness deserves, so that our returned soldiers many of whom have already nearly qualified may be tempted to enter the profession. I would respectfully draw the attention of the Government to the importance of giving these men every assistance to induce them to enter the teaching profession. None are so capable to give our public schools and high schools that patriotic atmosphere which is so essential to the production of sound Canadian citizenship.

There will be many monuments erected by a grateful people to the memory of our heroic soldiers. These monuments will be placed in the most prominent positions in every city and town across this broad country. They will represent the local ideas and will be representative of the community characteristics of the people. They will take many forms in accordance with the diversity of opinion in the various sections interested. An effort should be made to make them as beautiful in form and as lasting in material as skill can erect.

Canada is a young country but already rich in inspiring traditions which should be kept well before the notice of our growing population. These monuments will have a great educational value. Their importance in this respect should not be overlooked. The creation of a patriotic national sentiment is inseparable from them. They point to our part played in the great struggle for human liberty which has just been brought to a successful conclusion. They will inspire future generations to emulate the heroic self-sacrifice and loyalty to the Empire of our young men who so promptly came forward to offer their services in defence of human liberty.

A day should be set apart as a national holiday for the decoration of these monuments. A suitable day for this purpose would be the day on which peace is signed by the great powers. It will come at a time of the year when flowers are available and the weather suitable for outside celebration, a day on which it is fondly hoped the dove of peace on expectant wings will slowly settle down on a blood-stained world. Veterans of the Great War could have reunions, and the public could meet to hear patriotic addresses having for their purpose the intensifying of a national sentiment, in which this country is deficient.

The graves of our heroic dead 3,000 miles away cannot be decked with the flowers which loving hands would fain place on them. These monuments could be decorated "In Memoriam" of them with flowers, and this would give the occasion that touch of solemnity necessary to deep, abiding sentiment. Canada is commencing a new era of untold possibilities. We can only glimpse our wonderful potentialities by taking a mental vision of the years ahead. A hundred millions of people will inhabit this country in less than a century, and they will be a people which only a northern clime can produce, a people who will sway the civilized world with their wealth and commercial power. The foundation is now being laid, and it is the supreme duty of the hour for all our people to unite in giving up racial and religious differences and in laying the foundation on the rocks of truth, justice and honour.

Mr. H. A. MACKIE (Edmonton East): In the discussion of this subject I have already been criticised adversely by many friends who say that by national schools we aim a blow at civil and religious liberty; that we seek to increase the influence of the Dominion Government; that we are unconstitutional; and those who know my constituency best say that I am, by speaking on the subject, sealing my political damnation. I do not propose to argue any of the objections made to national schools unless those objections are supported by sound arguments. So far as the unconstitutionality of this question is concerned, the consent of the province will remove all difficulties in the way; and so far as my political damnation is concerned in my own constituency, if to occupy a public position means that a man is going to sacrifice his personal conviction and be a slave to factions moved by personal interest, bias, bigotry or religious narrowness, then somebody else can be the slave, for I prefer not to have the unenviable distinction.

We have heard in this House during the present session a number of men who have been wont to speak of the Society of Nations as though Canada was a nation, when, as a matter of fact it is not, in spite of what may be said by opportunist politicans who seek to foist upon us as realities the dreams of their political and speculative imagination. Granting, however that Canada enjoys the status of a nation, I am going to ask you, Mr. Speaker, the following question: Does it constitute a nation to have a collection of warring provinces? I am willing to grant you, for the sake of argument, that we have the full status of nationhood. Are we then a nation when you find various provinces viewing important questions of public life in Canada through different glasses? What then, you may ask, is a nation? It is defined as an agglomeration of men, of people, who have had the same love and the same hatred; who have tasted the same joys, and undergone the same reverses; who revere the same great historical figures; who salute the same flag, and interpret its meaning in the same way, because they have received in the same school the same mentality; in other words, an agglomeration of men whose intellectual, moral and political formation is the same. Sir Martin Conway defines a nation as follows:

> What in fact is a nation? It is not merely a number of individuals dwelling within a particular geographical area, nor a population talking a common language, nor is it to be defined by the possession of a common stock or blood-relationship. A nation is the whole population of an area, organized into a single crowd by the possession of a common ideal. It is patriotism that makes a nation, not vice versa. Thus Africanders will be a nation, if they are not so already, when their feeling of unity overpowers and submerges their attachment to their component race-crowds. There is no reason even to desire an individual to forget whether he is of British or Dutch origin. That is an immaterial detail once the passion of the over-crowd is stronger than that of the section. When that has been brought about a nation exists; and the common ideal once created is liable to grow into that kind of passion which, as Mr. Tim Healy informed Mr. Winston Churchill, can be recognized when it shows itself to be 'something that men willingly die for.'

Now, Mr. Speaker, geographical location, language, race, religion, and economic conditions are not essential factors in the formation of a nation. The Jewish nation is as real as any, yet it is scattered all over the world. Switzerland speaks many languages, and no one will deny that Switzerland is a nation. Two religions hold equal sway in Germany without menacing the existence of the German nation. Two absolutely distinct races inhabit Belgium, and yet we salute with respect the Belgian nation. So far as the economic side is concerned, were not the Germans more attached to their own people than to the Poles, with whom they had the most lucrative commercial relations? The essential primordial factor in the formation of a nation is mentality; and no matter what may be the geographical location, religion, race or economic conditions of the Canadians, if they possess the same mentality, then, and then only, will they be a nation. The national school, according to my view, is the instrument with which to accomplish efficiently and successfully this object. How can the people of Ontario, Quebec, the western provinces, and the Maritime Provinces discuss harmoniously the rights and the duties of the citizen, the family, and the state, if they possess three or four different mentalities; the flag of Canada means a different thing to each group. Let me give you a few examples of this most perplexing question. In 1884, at the time of the Sudan war the flag meant one thing to the French and another thing to the English. In 1889 at the time of the Boer war the same thing occurred. In 1914 the message of the flag was heard for the third time, and you know the results as well as I do. A certain author says:

> Narrowness, provincialism, bigotry, describe a personality in which unity of purpose is won at the sacrifice of breadth, outlook and sympathy. The highest type of personality grows out of many far-reaching selves which have been selected and organized into unity by a dominant purpose. It is no easy task to unify often divergent and conflicting impulses, habits, memories and ideals into a harmonious heirarchy of aims. But such singleness of ideal and effort creates power. The ideal personality includes many selves organized by a masterful purpose and unified by a spirit of harmony.

Ruskin says:

> Education does not mean teaching people to know what they do not know—it means teaching them to behave as they do not behave.

The French are probably more fortunate in the use of language. They have two words for the English "Education". In French the word education means the bringing up, the conduct of people in the sense referred to by Ruskin, and they use the word "instruction" for the learning which a person may gain. "I will do it," promises a South African. "On the word of an Englishman?" inquires his friend. "Yes, on the word of an Englishman". That is the finest tribute to the English public school and the English university that the country affords. That emphasizes absolutely what we should have in this nation when I speak of mentality, that people should so conduct themselves that their word is their bond, that it means everything.

Let me ask you candidly this question: Are you going to profit by the triple experience of 1884, 1899 and 1914 and lay the foundation of a school system, the result of which will be that my boy in the western provinces will have the same mentality as the boys of Ontario, Quebec and the Maritime Provinces; or, far from changing your views with regard to the primordial factor in the formation of a nation, will you continue to invade our western provinces with your retrograde mentalities because they are provincial and so create unfortunate reactions?

[Mr. Mackie.]

I do not agree entirely with previous speakers when they refer to a national non-sectarian school. Why is it that the eye of God to-day, the only sanction of true morality, has been replaced in some of our western schools by the eye of the world,—a Pharisaical sanction; unless it be on account of the machinations of opportunist politicians who seek to place on our children the yoke of their respective religious organizations? Is there in this country a single thinker who would not be willing to make provincial sacrifices in order to endow the whole Dominion with a school system based on knowledge, respect and love of God? All nations that have achieved greatness, which still lives although the nations themselves may have disappeared, and whose thought still enchants the world—the Greeks and the Romans,—taught in their schools their children the knowledge, respect and love of God, who punishes the nations and individuals who transgress and rewards those who observe the principles of right and justice. If the non-sectarian school means that you are to ignore these fundamental principles, I could not support it.

Mr. Speaker, some people say that it is a question of the preservation of laws. I say it is not, for laws are merely the expression of facts, and, consequently, are transient. It is not a question of clinging to this or that organized church. We all know in what sect we were born and initiated, but after twenty, thirty or forty years can any man state with certainty to what creed he adheres? To quote the great Newman: "To live is to change; and to be perfect is to have changed often."

One of the previous speakers has given the key-note of what is expected of Canadians so far as the future is concerned, and in that connection I would like to read you what a returned soldier said regarding education. I quote from an article written by Capt. L. H. Lang in The Western Veteran of November 16 last:

> That means to say that the real task that lies before Canada to-day is the building up of a free and vigorous national spirit which will bring to her a great position amongst the nations of the world. No greater task has ever faced a country before. The days, too, of sectarianism are over and gone. Those of us who have been out to the Front are appalled and disgusted by the sight of churches whose duty it is to bear witness to a God of Love, dissipating their energy upon their little points of difference rather than presenting a united front against the powers of evil and self-centredness. The churches exist not for their own advancement or material success, but they exist to show the world at large the road to a higher, deeper and more beautiful conception of human fellowship.

That is true of men who have been abroad and witnessed for themselves the political organizations which reside within their own churches.

It is said that national schools imply a question of language. I wish not to be misinterpreted in this regard because I state that it is not a question of language. Nature has settled that question in the valley of the St. Lawrence for all time to come with all its political, social and economic consequences. But, of course, it would be imprudent, it would be unpardonably clumsy, yes, it would be politically suicidal to allow certain affective, mystical and collective illusions to die out in Canada. I stated some time ago in this House that I knew a constituency in Alberta where there are three absolutely distinct national mentalities supplied by three different school systems, thanks to the methodical issue of permits. The member for that constituency has a triple political organization—English, French and Russian. When the fight is on they go forth with three battle cries. When among the English at Boyne Lake and Ashmount it is "Long live the British Empire"; then at Plamondville and Lac Labiche it is "Long live Quebec"; and when at Cache Lake and other Ruthenian centres it is "Russia for ever." You can quite understand that the member himself does not stoop to these religious and racial prejudices, but his organization is doing this work. There you see this system in all its crudity, and you appreciate how full of turpitude it is. If the school system in Alberta, for instance, permits this kind of thing, what can you expect of the rising generation? If to-day you have the Ukrainians of Western Canada petitioning the Dominion Government to establish national schools, it is because they were told they could have their separate schools just as the French have their primary course in the schools of the West. It is because the Government of each province has exploited the people for political reasons and has left them to-day under the impression that they are to be deported. When those people ask why they should be deported the answer is, that they have not become assimilated. They are not Canadians. The result is that having been cajoled into this unfortunate position by politicians, they are asking the Dominion Government to take hold of this question and to give them national education so they can become Canadianized.

9 p.m.

The Western Provinces differ somewhat from the Eastern Provinces in the matter of education. We have a large number of Americans coming in there, and often those men get permits to teach school the same as men from other provinces receive permits to teach in different languages, sometimes carrying on a French school entirely, sometimes a Russian. If you wish to keep the provinces united, if you wish to keep Confederation intact, it is necessary that something should be done in the way of education for our Western Provinces. We are being Americanized at a rapid rate, as will be admitted by every member from the West. At the present time if you go through the streets of some of our Western cities you will find the boys wearing a button on the lapel of their coats with the words, "We did it." Do you think any Canadian would be allowed to wear such a button on his coat in New York or in any of the other large cities of the United States?

The American would see that the bottom was removed. But out in the Western Provinces we do not pay any attention to these things. We are being Americanized, and it is not necessary that we should have a national school or some sort of schools to replace those of the present day.

I do not know whether all the facts have been given in connection with the literacy of the Western Provinces and of Canada as a whole, but something of interest struck me the other day when I was reading one of the local newspapers. It was the statement that four million American-born children never learned to read and write. The article goes on to say:—

> 100,000 of our public school teachers are only 19 years old.
> 50,000 of them are without high school education.
> The salary of a graduate teacher is no more than that of a milliner's apprentice while she is learning her trade.

An article by H. Addington Bruce deals with the American situation so far as teachers are concerned. I venture to say that what is true of the United States is true also of Canada, and more particularly of Western Canada. Young girls receive from $60 to $80 a month to teach in a school which is 150 or 200 miles from any large centre. Probably she is from sixteen to nineteen years of age, possessing only a permit, or sometimes the requisite diploma. How can children of this age—because they are children in reality—impart Canadian mentality to the younger men and women of the country? A girl of sixteen or eighteen has to teach boys, Russians and Ruthenians, of twenty-two and twenty-three. These young people require more than the attention of a girl of sixteen to nineteen.

Again, how can you expect education in the Western Provinces to be properly carried out by teachers who do not intend to make teaching a profession? It is a fact that most young men and women who teach do not intend to make teaching a profession. With the man, it is a stepping-stone to the study of medicine or of some other profession; with the girl, it is only an interim occupation which she is prepared to give up at any time for a suitable marriage. In my opinion, the Government of Canada has as much to do with the education of its people as it has to do with its national defence. If the State is the fountain of all rights, on that principle I would say that it is the source of all duties, and it is the duty of the Government to make some arrangement with the provinces whereby the teaching profession shall be made one of permanency, whereby an inducement shall be given to men and women to remain in the teaching profession and whereby such remuneration shall be given to teachers that they may be anabled to travel and themselves acquire that education which they have not been able to acquire and can never acquire except by travelling.

I ask you, Sir, if the suggestions made in this House by hon. members do not constitute the proper way of building up a nation? One thing that disgusts me every time I hear it is the question which is often put by a French-Canadian or an English-Canadian whenever there is a disturbance of any consequence in the political, social or economical life of Canada: "Why should we not become part of the United States?" In 1775 Franklin offered us that national status, and we refused it because we knew what it meant. At the rate we are going now, it would appear that Canada can never be all English, nor yet all French, and if the motive is ever to perpetuate affective, mystical and collective illusions, then let them be French in Quebec and English in Ontario. That is the last resource of our patriots. Let us not forget that both the English and the French lost America through political and religious narrowness. The former withheld freedom from the thirteen colonies; the latter withheld refuge from the Huguenots. To-morrow the West will predominate. Is it not imperative to solve the problem of the school and to base our educational system on lines essentially Canadian and religious? We all want the system to be democratic. Let us take the first step in that direction by making it uniform.

Mr. H. C. HOCKEN (Toronto West): Mr. Speaker, the very deep interest that has been taken in the question of national schools in Western Canada has made it inevitable that the subject should at some time be discussed in this House, and it seems to me that this is the most appropriate time for its discussion.

I learn that in August next there is to take place in the city of Winnipeg the largest educational convention ever held in Canada. His Excellency the Governor General is to preside, and educationalists will be gathered together from all over the continent of North America. That being the case, it is interesting, as I think it is opportune, that some expressions of opinion should be given in this House upon the principal points that will be raised at that conference.

I compliment the mover of the amendment (Mr. Edwards) upon the courage that he displays in bringing before the House a question of this kind. I knew before he started that he would be charged with bigotry and intolerance. I do not think that he was animated by any such sentiment as that; I am quite certain that I am not when, following in his footsteps, I advocate the establishment in this country as soon as possible of a national non-sectarian school system.

We are indebted to the member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) for information and quotations which show that the member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) was in good company in bringing this question before Parliament. The member for Maisonneuve told us that the most outstanding advocate of non-sectarian schools in Canada was the late Hon. George Brown, the man who founded the party which hon. gentlemen opposite represent, the man who in the early days made a great fight for Liberal principles. Every Liberal since Hon. George Brown's time who has lead the party represented on the other side of the House has been his follower. He was an out-and-out, convinced and vigorous opponent of separate schools, and the attitude that he took in his day is practically the attitude that is taken to-day by the member for Frontenac on the floor of this House. He argued then, as we argue now, that two sets of schools tend to disunion and disintegration rather than to national unity and mutual understanding. The member for Maisonneuve stated the case exactly when he told us that the late Hon. George Brown accepted forcibly the principle of separate schools being drafted into our Act of Confederation. It was not because he was brought to believe that it was the right thing to do; he found it to be impossible to effect the Confederation without making this concession to the advocates of the dual school system. He was disposed to sink the lesser in the greater. That is the explanation of his acceptance of the principle of a dual school system of the two provinces of Canada. But the separate schools and the separate school law that we have in Ontario to-day are very different from the statute which was assented to by the late Hon. George Brown. His biographer has told us that when he returned from Ottawa to his home city and was criticised for surrendering his views on the school question, he stated that what had been conceded was innocuous and that, in his judgment, the concession was so small that it could never be profitably worked. I do not know whether he was right or not, but I am inclined to think he was. But this is what happened: No sooner was that particular concession made than the advocates of separate schools proceeded to work on the provincial government and particularly upon the then Prime Minister, the late Sir Oliver Mowat, and during nearly the whole term of his premiership which lasted about thirty years, one concession after another was given to separate schools until, although that is a special privilege to one sect in Ontario, the schools, which they desired and which had been given to them as a special privilege, are almost on a parity with the public school system. That never was in the mind of the late hon. George Brown, because he believed, as my hon. friend said, that what was adopted in 1867, and which was practically the law of 1863, was to be a final settlement. But it is stated in Mr. Hodgins' book upon the Separate School Act of Ontario, in which he quotes all the correspondence of the late Edgerton Ryerson, that while Bishop Charbonnell and Bishop Macdonald agreed that this should be a final settlement, the ink was scarcely dry on the Act of 1863 before additional concessions were demanded. The story that is told in that book is a very interesting one. The writer, Dr. Edgerton Ryerson tells this story that he had a conference with the two bishops and he put this question to them: Is this to be a final settlement of the separate school question in Ontario? Neither of the bishops said a word, but both of them bowed their assent to his proposition, and he accepted that as a statement from them that it was to be a final settlement. As I say, it was only a few months afterwards before those same ecclesiastics were back in the city of Ottawa demanding further extensions of the separate school principle. This is laid down very clearly in Mr. Hodgins' book.

I wish to correct the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) on another point. In the course of his address to-day, he stated that Separate schools were adopted by the United Parliament of Upper and Lower Canada, with the consent of a majority given by the representatives of Ontario. That was not the case. There was an understanding in the Parliament of the United Canadas that no question affecting one province should be made into law unless there was a majority from that province favourable to it. That undertaking was observed on the part of the representatives of Ontario with the utmost faithfulness, but it was departed from on the part of the representatives of Quebec when the late Hon. R. W. Scott introduced his Separate School Act, and when it came to a vote on that question, it will be found recorded that the vote from Ontario was 26 against and 10 for, with a solid delegation lacking one from Quebec supporting the 10 who voted in favour of Separate schools for Ontario. Therefore, the Separate school system was forced upon Ontario against the will of the majority of its representatives and by a solid phalanx from Quebec.

I think every true Canadian will approach this question of national schools with the desire to see all classes of the population living in harmony and co-operating to realize the great potentialities of our country. As I understand the situation in Canada, it is only by educating our children to be Canadians and by introducing a system that will develop their initiative and cultivate their native talents that we can hope to create a citizenship equal to the great tasks that lie before us. National unity is something that we all profess to regard as essential to our progress, prosperity and happiness as a people. To bring this about, we must understand each other. This does not involve a surrender of our cherished convictions, but it requires an effort on our part to find a way of getting closer together than we are to-day and one that will lead our children to higher levels of service where they may be able to work more harmoniously while maintaining their distinctive views on political and religious questions. There is a wide range of subjects upon which we all unite in educating the citizens of to-morrow. Those subjects that separate us are very few and, in my opinion, they are easy of adjustment, granting that there is a desire on the part of all, the leaders of both races and of both creeds, to unite for this purpose. I think I may say and be within the judgment of the House that the one particular thing that divides us is religion so far as education is concerned. We have on the one side those who believe that no educational system is satisfactory unless in the primary schools religious dogmas form an important part of the curriculum. We have on the other side those who are quite as sincerely convinced that secular studies and religious instruction should be separated. I am a strong advocate of religious instruction; in my opinion there is nothing more important in the training of children than the teaching of the principles of Christianity, but that should not be imparted at the expense of the State, nor by public officials. It is the duty of parents and of the church to provide for that kind of instruction. I believe too that it will be much more effective when it is performed by such agencies than if it is conducted as a part of the studies in the public schools. My conception of religion is such that I do not think religious principles can be properly impressed upon the minds of children when those principles are imparted under the strict and sometimes punitive discipline of the schools. As I understand religion, the centre and substance of it is love, which is, in the child's mind at least, pretty largely divorced from the idea of punishment by its teacher.

My conception is that it is better for the child, better for his morality, that he should receive his religious instruction under different auspices. I know that in holding these views I differ with many sincere people; yet holding these views it becomes my duty to try and give effect to them. I would not put any obstacles in the way of any church teaching the children of its congregation the tenets of its creed. On the contrary, I would afford the church the most ample facilities, but I would divorce religious instruction from secular study, and I believe it would be to the advantage of the children from both standpoints.

To attain the desirable end of national unity we must begin with the children. It is by intimate association that one child will be led to see the good qualities in the other. That cannot be accomplished by separation. It can only come from daily contact, in the thousand-and-one relations where one helps the other, and the inner life and spirit of the children is revealed. We all know that the friendships made in school days are the strongest and most enduring in the experience of men; that needs no elaboration because it is within the knowledge of every member of this House. That being the case, it is nothing short of a national crime to keep the children apart and organize them into two different camps on the basis of religion. We did not organize the army in that way, and if we had attempted to do so we would soon have discovered that we had made a capital mistake. Is it not the case that separation leads to misunderstanding and breeds distrust and suspicion? It is so in all the relations of life. Therefore, it is not surprising that the divisions that begin in the primary schools of this country are perpetuated to a greater or lesser degree all through the lives of the people. How any man can hope to bring about national unity under these circumstances it is hard to understand.

The sentiment in favour of a national non-sectarian school system has been growing rapidly in the last few years, and I am convinced that the more the matter is discussed the stronger the sentiment will grow. In Canada to-day all the Maritime Provinces have school laws that provide for one non-sectarian system of education. In the province of Prince Edward Island the benefits of this system obtrude themselves upon the visitor from another province. Any friction that exists in the province of Nova Scotia or New Brunswick is due to evasions of the law, by which the children are separated in their school life notwithstanding the provisions of the Act. It would probably be impossible to persuade the electors of those two provinces to change their school laws and establish conditions such as are to be found in the province of Ontario. Therefore, the proposal contained in the resolution does not affect the situation in the Maritime Provinces at all.

In my judgment, the most striking example of the benefits of national schools is to be found in the province of Manitoba. The Government in power there is a Liberal Government; the political affiliations of its ministers are supposed to be with the dominant political party in Quebec. Nevertheless, the Norris Government has revolutionized the school system of the province, to the immense advantage of the people generally. In that province the principle of separation had been carried to the most extreme limit. The hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) to-day stated the terms of that Act, by which any school with ten children of a certain nationality might have its own language used in the school for instructional purposes. Under that law, prior to 1913, the schools were conducted in at least five different languages. If the majority of a school section were German, German was the language of the school; if the majority were Poles, Polish was the language of the school. When by reason of newcomers entering the district the majority was changed from one nationality to another, the language of the school was changed also. The result was confusion and grave disorder, rapidly approaching a condition of anarchy. When the Liberal Government of Hon. T. C. Norris was confronted with the responsibility of bringing order out of this educational chaos, it was decided to adopt the principle of a non-sectarian school with one language, and in the short space of five years a veritable transformation has been effected. The schools have been made efficient, the children are keen to learn, and their parents are proud of the achievements of their little ones. I have visited schools in the province of Manitoba in which every child present was of foreign parentage, and yet by tact and patience the teachers were bringing on the pupils as rapidly as in any other school in the country. The good effects of this system are not confined to the children. Their parents, the new citizens of this country, are inspired by the success of their young folk to acquire a Canadian outlook. They cease looking backward to the land of their birth, and now face forward and strive to become good Canadian citizens. I should like to quote a paragraph from a letter written by Mr. F. B. Lacey to Dr. Thornton, Minister of Education for the province of Manitoba, after an inspection of the schools in the foreign districts of that province:

> While travelling around amongst the people in the organized portions of Manitoba one cannot help but notice the changes that have taken place among the people who came from Central Europe a few short years ago. They are amongst the most progressive people in Canada, and in ten years from now when those who are now attending the schools to-day shall have grown up and gone out into the various fields of labour open to them, we shall find among them some of our best women and men. The teaching of the English language, British ideals, sanitation, etc., is lifting these boys and girls up into a different and a better life.

That is the unbiased opinion of one who has made a thorough inspection of the schools in Manitoba. In the other Western Provinces the example of Manitoba has proved contagious, and there is a growing sentiment in favour of one national school system, which will eventually lead to the adoption in those provinces of the Manitoba law. At the last session of the Legislature of Saskatchewan important changes were made in the school laws by which all the schools have been put upon a new basis, approximating the plan in operation in Manitoba. No discerning man can doubt the ultimate adoption of a national school system throughout all Western Canada.

And now I come to the province of Ontario. I have already referred to the way in which the separate school was grafted upon the educational system of the province, and I am satisfied that the great majority of the people of Ontario would welcome such changes in the school law as would make it possible for all our children to be educated together, to play together, to grow up together, to develop a common ideal.

To show you how that works out, I refer you to two of the smaller towns in the eastern part of Ontario. The town of Port Hope is a considerable industrial centre and it is only a few miles from the town of Cobourg. In the town of Port Hope there are no separate schools, and there is a feeling of unity in that town that is admirable in every way. Those who have different faiths go their different ways on Sunday, but during the rest of the week they are friends and neighbours co-operating in all the activities of the town and joining in all those things of community interest. A few miles away is the town of Cobourg. There they have separate schools and there friction exists and there is no cause to which we can attribute it except the fact that the children, young men and young women, have been brought up in the two different schools and taught from their childhood that they should not get together for community purposes. If you speak to any young man in the town of Cobourg, he will tell you that the children of one school organize regular quarrels, snow-balling fights and sometimes instead of snow-balls they throw stones at one another. They are not old enough to know why they do that, but they have had it impressed upon them that there is the difference between this school and that school. Instead of coming together on the football or the baseball field, they show intolerance one of another, and that is directly attributable to the instruction that goes out from these separate schools.

I have a very striking quotation here which I would like to read to the House, because it seems to me to indicate, not only as I interpret it but as an important and influential newspaper of my own province interprets it, that this condition is the result of the teaching in the separate schools of Ontario. I quote from the Christian Guardian, published in Toronto. The writer begins by saying:

> Do Roman Catholics feel the same loyalty to the state that Protestants do? Without hesitation we would answer that some of them do; but it is certain that some of them do not, and this is explained in a recent issue of the Catholic Record.

The Catholic Record, of London, is, in my judgment, the most ably edited and the best-written Roman Catholic paper published in the Dominion of Canada. The men who conduct that weekly newspaper are capable journalists, and theirs is the most creditable journalistic representative of the cause for which it speaks. The article in the Christian Guardian goes on to quote this paragraph from the Record:

> We cannot understand the abnormal enthusiasm that the sight of the flag evokes among our intelligent non-Catholic fellow citizens. They are an enigma to us, and we perhaps are just as much of an enigma to them. Their enthusiastic display of loyalty seems to us puerile and even idiotic. This is because we do not realize that there is nothing that holds a higher place in the affections of the majority of our non-Catholic Britishers than the flag. In a word, their mentality is different from ours because, if we may use the expression, our household gods are not theirs.

This paper represents the advocates of separate schools in the province of Ontario, and declares in cold type, and after deliberation, that the enthusiasm of the English-speaking Protestants of Ontario for the flag is "puerile and even idiotic." I submit that it must be clear to this House that if we have a system of schools in Ontario that turns out graduates who regard enthusiasm for the flag of the country as puerile and idiotic there is something wrong with the system, and the sooner it is corrected the better it will be for the cause of national unity. I can see no reason why the children of Canada cannot receive their secular instruction together and their religious teaching separately. That is the way the Hebrews in Toronto inculcate their religion. Special classes are held by the Rabbis, or their assistants, after the regular school hours, and the Jewish children attend for instruction in religion. There is no reason why that plan should not be followed by the Anglicans, Methodists, Presbyterians, and all other denominations. Then we would have a guarantee that the hours in school would be devoted to preparing the next generation for the secular duties of citizenship. If the churches as a whole would undertake the religious education, I am sure the results to the children would be better than those obtained by mixing secular and sacred as at the present time.

What must impress the members of this House as a significant circumstance is the fact that the question of establishing a national school system was first introduced by a representative from the province of Quebec. He introduced this question into the Senate. That his resolution represents the views of a considerable minority in that province seems to be established by several incidents that have transpired during the past year. The province of Quebec for reasons that are within the knowledge of hon. members, is perhaps the last place in Canada from which we might expect such a proposal to emanate. And yet a vigorous propaganda is being carried on there for educational reform. Not much has been accomplished as yet but experience and history teach us that once a question of this kind is presented by earnest men it gains in strength with great rapidity. Already some concessions, such as uniform text books, have been secured and a compulsory attendance law is bound to follow before long because it has proved to be a wise measure in every country where it has been tried. When it is advocated by men like Lord Shaughnessy and Senator Dandurand and scores of the most prominent lay leaders in the province, it cannot be long resisted. The opposition given to the agitation made by Mr. Bouchard, of St. Hyacinthe, has had the effect of making most of the people do some thinking on that important question. As a consequence of the study given to it we find the Trades and Labour Council of Montreal—two-thirds of the members being French Canadians—passing a resolution in favour of a national school system. These men constitute the parliament of labour in the largest industrial centre of the Dominion. They speak for the workers, whose children are the ones most vitally affected by any inefficiency of the school system.

They are men who have come up through the existing schools. They know by personal experience the shortcomings of the schools and with deliberation and earnestness they discuss this question, and by advocating a national school system condemn that which is in vogue. If there is any class of citizens whose voices should be heard with respect on an issue of this kind it is that class who must depend upon the state schools to educate their children.

But it is not only the working classes that are dissatisfied. When men like Mr. Bouchard, Senator Beaubien, and many other French Canadian leaders, feel constrained to utter their protest against the inefficiency of the system it becomes apparent that the public sentiment in favour of the motion is widespread and that it includes many different circles.

The press of the province as a whole gives no support to the demand for national schools. Perhaps it is too much to expect that at this stage of the movement. The influences against it are too powerful and apt to resent any attempt to press it forward. Still, there are some papers published in Quebec which speak for the movement and do so with the greatest frankness. Among these is L'Autorité, of Montreal, which in September, 1918, said:

> Give us less of the stories of Jonah inside or outside the whale, and more of arithmetic. We will even go farther than that and ask that the control of education be transferred from the provincial to the federal domain. Nothing, in fact, is more logical than this, for the reason that where the greatness and the unity of our country are concerned we should have national schools.

That is not the only paper which talks in that way. I have also a clipping from Le Pays, of Montreal, which in an issue of March of this year, declared:

> If the men of age to carry arms had been raised in national schools the voluntary recruitment would have given much better results and this province would have received more benefit, for the reason that it was Quebec which suffered most in her reputation.

While I do not offer the opinions of these papers as an expression of the general sentiment of the people of Quebec, they represent a minority which, in my judgment, are thinking along right lines and furthering a movement which meets with the sympathy of the majority in every one of the other provinces.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am going to try and demonstrate the necessity for some Federal supervision or action, to such limited degree as may be thought wise in connection with their educational system. I submit that it is well within the province of this Parliament, and of the Dominion authorities, to see that a national sentiment of the right kind is created in Canada. In this connection I want to enlighten the House as to the kind of school books that are being used in the English-speaking public schools of Quebec, which books, I may say, I have examined personally. I find that in the third reader there are three lessons which are complimentary to Britain, and six lessons which are laudatory of Germany; and that book, Mr. Speaker, was reprinted in the year 1917, three years after the war had started. If that is the kind of stuff that is being taught in schools anywhere in this Dominion, I think it is only right and proper for the Federal power to endeavour to rectify it. In another reader used in the same class of schools I find the same thing to exist: Two of the lessons are favourable to Britain, and seven are complimentary to Germany. If this had happened ten or fifteen years ago, when we had a different idea of Germany from that which we entertain today, one might not have been surprised; but when such books as these are reprinted in the year 1917, there must be exceeding carelessness somewhere on the part of the authorities, and I submit, some effort should be made to rectify the condition. Certainly a national sentiment, whether it be French or British, cannot be developed by teaching lessons of such a nature.

Now I desire to refer for a moment to the textbooks that are used in the French schools of Quebec. A careful examination of these discloses nothing at all in their contents that would teach a child that it is going to grow up to be a British citizen; the sentiment inculcated throughout is purely French. I have no objection to the school books in the province of Quebec favouring the very romantic and interesting features of the early French discoveries and developments; I have no objection to the maintenance of French sentiment in Quebec; but I do say that at the very least there should be lessons in those books such as would teach the children of that province that they are British and are destined to take a part in the government of a British dominion when they attain to manhood. Although I have had a good deal of the contents of these books translated, I will not detain the House by reading at any great length, but I find within their covers such paragraphs as these:

> When the United States threw off the yoke England was taught at last that her interests commanded her to moderate the severities of her iniquities,—) and so on.

Then again:

Let us hasten to add that these moderations did not change the hostile spirit of the conquerors towards the colonists who suffered from it for nearly a century . . . . . In spite of the pernicious influences they guarded the faith, the light of their hearths and the joy of their hearts. They kept themselves from revolutionary ideas, remained submissive to legal authority in conserving scrupulously their manner of living, their language, their traditions, their love for France, their religion. By the dignity, by the admirable loyalty of their conduct, they finally brought the Protestants to honour their noble virtues.

Then at page 52 of the French textbook from which I am quoting I find this paragraph:

They excite the astonishment of all strangers who cannot understand the existence in Canada of a people distinct from those who inhabit North America, how 60,000 poor French colonists, abandoned almost a century ago on the banks of the St. Lawrence, have been able, under the stringency of conquest, to develop a numerous and strong people, with their religion, their language and their laws.

French Canadians are really a nation. When one sees a population of nearly a million souls rise like a single man to reply to his name, speaking the same language, proclaiming the same faith; when one sees it hold by the heart, to the institutions and to the laws which their ancestors have bequeathed to them, working courageously to develop the soil which they have acquired at the price of their blood which they have watered and fertilized by the sweat of their brows. . . . . A development so prodigious through so many vicissitudes and in the presence of so many difficulties is quite truly the seal of the work of God. . . . . Yes, we repeat it with happiness for the past and confidence in the future, we Canadians, we the descendants of these noble families which have given martyrs to the church and heroes to our well beloved country we are to-day a nation. The land which the blood of these martyrs has purified and sanctified, the soil which the valour of these heroes has so legitimately conquered, defended and kept with so many sacrifices is our patrie or fatherland.

The point I want to make, Mr. Speaker, is this: That it is impossible where the children of one province are being taught to regard the inhabitants of that province as a separate and distinct nation from the rest of the people of Canada, that we can ever hope to establish national unity throughout the Dominion.

I suppose I shall be criticised for raising the point in this way, and yet if we are going to be frank with one another and try to reach some basis on which we can build up this country to its fullest possibilities we have to face these facts. I venture to say that so long as the children of the province of Quebec are taught that they belong to a separate nation within Canada, we cannot hope for Canadian national unity. I find the same thing, Sir, on another page, where I read this passage:

Foreign immigration among us and the emigration of our people to the United States rendered this society necessary for strengthening the French Canadians in their patriotism and in keeping distinct the lines of their nationality.

So, Mr. Speaker, the youth of the province of Quebec are being taught that they are not a part of Canada except in so far as Canada is represented by the province of Quebec. Under such conditions I think it is hopeless for us to expect that those children can understand the children of another province.

That is not all. I have taken the trouble to go over the German text books used in the province of Saskatchewan, and I find they are teaching in the German schools there "Die Wacht am Rhein," as a prominent lesson. All the text books of that province show the same strong tendency to teach the children to admire what is German instead of instructing them in Canadian citizenship.

When we have regard to the situation in the Western provinces it is serious. I have here a diagram showing the different locations of the various nationalities in Western Canada—Austrian, French Canadian, German, Russian, and Scandinavian. There are 327,000 of the population of the province of Saskatchewan who are not English speaking, of whom 32,342 are French; the rest are Germans, Russians, and Scandinavians. I would suggest that Hansard take this variegated diagram for a cover and so make the official report so much more attractive than it is at the present time.

While we have the population of these provinces so much divided among the different nationalities, unless we take some strong measures, and unless this Government takes a hand in regulating the education of the Dominion in some supervisory way, we are never going to reach the point we ought to reach if we are to make Canada the nation it is capable of being made.

Another thing that I think should concern this Parliament and this Government is the fact—upon the authority of a responsible senator—that we have 5,000 children in the city of Montreal for whose education no provision whatever has been made. These children are neither Roman Catholics nor Protestants. Neither the Protestant committee nor the Roman Catholic committee has the funds to educate these children, and they both refuse the responsibility. Is it not a matter of concern to this Dominion that there should be in the city of Montreal a block of 5,000 children growing up in illiteracy and no attempt made to provide for their education—no money voted, no system of schools to which those children can go? What chance have they got? And while it may be a very serious deprivation for them, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that it is a far more serious matter for the state. For democracy, to be successful, must have a literate population.

Now, I have not been speaking merely for the purpose of uttering criticisms; I will tell you what I think ought to be done.

10 p.m

If this Parliament would follow in the footsteps of the United States Congress it seems to me it would be taking a wise course. There education is in the hands of the states, as here it is in the hands of the provinces. But it has been found necessary there to organize a National Bureau of Education, and a Bill, known as the Smith Bill, provides for an expenditure of $100,000,000 a year of Federal money to assist and encourage the improvement of education throughout the Union. They purpose to spend $7,500,000 annually for the removal of illiteracy; $7,500,000 annually for the Americanization of foreigners; $50,000,000 annually for the equalization of educational opportunities within the various states; $20,000,000 annually to co-operate with the states in the promotion of physical health, education, and recreation, and various sums for other purposes, making a total of $100,000,000.

If it has been found necessary in the great Republic to go so far as to provide additional sums of these large amounts to supplement the state expenditure for education, do we not find in Canada the same responsibility; are we not faced with the same problems that are confronting the people of the United States; have we not here a great deal of illiteracy which should be removed, or which at least some attempt should be made to remove; and is it not necessary in this country to spend some money in trying to Canadianize the foreign portion of our population? There are 600,000 people in the Dominion of foreign birth and extraction who ought to be turned into good Canadian citizens. That is a work purely of education. It does not appear that the provinces are able to cope with it, or that they are even willing to cope with it. At all events they have not succeeded in coping with it effectively to date, and I do not see any reason to hope that they will do so in the near future. But, referring particularly to the Western Provinces, I think they would regard it as a most desirable thing if this Parliament were to enact such a Bill and make the necessary appropriations in order that the people out there might be Canadianized quickly and illiteracy removed.

I do not see why this Government should not make a very careful study of the reasons for illiteracy, and then apply the remedy which may be found effective in each case, whether in New Brunswick, Ontario, Quebec, Saskatchewan or British Columbia. Illiteracy in all those provinces, I believe, would be found to be accounted for in different ways, and it might require a different remedy in each province. But I argue that it is the business of this Parliament to remedy that illiteracy and to give us an educated electorate, to acquire the proper ideals of citizenship and so to be good Canadians.

Another thing that I would suggest to this House is that under the aegis of the Federal Bureau of Education we should have uniform text books, at least in the shape of readers and history. And I would like my hon. friends opposite to understand that in advocating a uniform history I would give full and adequate prominence to those chapters of our early history that centre in their province. The early history of Canada forms one of the most romantic and heroic chapters in the history of the world, and unfortunately our children do not know it.

They get a smattering of it—perhaps one side of it; but there never has been written a history for the boys and girls of Canada, for the schools of Canada, that is adequate for the purpose. If the Federal Government did nothing else in this matter than produce a history that would give every child in Canada a real understanding of the beginnings of our history and how we have developed from the days of Champlain down to the present time, that work would be a monumental one for whoever achieved it.

Mr. BELAND: There is not one school in the whole of the province of Quebec in which the history of the pioneers of Canada is not taught.

Mr. HOCKEN: I quite believe that that particular side of our history is taught in the province of Quebec, but I wonder if the other side of our history has been taught.

Mr. VIEN: Another side of our history which is also taught in the schools of Quebec is the fact that in 1776 our bishops kept this country for the British Empire.

Mr. HOCKEN: That is an old tradition that does not rest on a very stable foundation. I am prepared to agree that the bishops kept Canada from joining in the revolution, but they did it as a bargain, and they got their price. If the hon. gentleman would have us understand that they did that out of pure love of the mother country, he is absolutely and entirely mistaken. They did it because they used that opportunity to get concessions for their hierarchy and for their institutions that they never could have got otherwise.

Mr. VIEN: Is that the kind of history that the hon. gentleman would advocate in the uniform books which he would circulate in our schools? If it is, we are sufficiently enlightened.

Mr. HOCKEN: I would not put that into them; a highly controversial point of that kind might well be left out of any history. But there are many other things about the development of British power in this country that the people of Quebec do not understand, because they have never learned about them. Due prominence and due space is given to that portion of history upon which the people of that province place so much stress; due prominence should be given also to the development of British power in this country. The people should be made to understand what it is to be a citizen of the British Empire and a subject of the King.

Mr. POWER: Does the hon. member know as many men on his side of the House who can speak both languages as there are on this side?

Mr. HOCKEN: I would like the hon. gentleman to understand that every member on this side of the House has studied French. But that they are as fluent in the use of French as the French members are in the use of English——

Mr. POWER: Pardon me; I am not a French Canadian. Born and bred in the province of Quebec, I am an Irishman, and proud of being a Quebecker.

Mr. HOCKEN: Mr. Speaker, I still want to make my point. I quite understand that the people of the province of Quebec are more proficient in the use of English than the people of Ontario are in the use of French. Every child in Ontario who passes into the secondary system of schools studies French—my children studied French. All children who pass through more than four or five grades of the public schools study French, and some of them become quite proficient in that language—at least sufficiently so to pass somewhat difficult examinations, both in the high school and in the colleges and universities. But after they do learn the language they have no opportunity of keeping it up in our province. My friends of the French race on the other side have ample opportunity of keeping up their English; they speak French in their homes and English in their business.

Mr. BUREAU: Oh, no, they speak French in their business.

Mr. HOCKEN: In every large urban centre they certainly need to speak English to get along properly.

Mr. POWER: Je parle le francais et l'anglais, et je suis fier de parler les deux langues.

Mr. SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. HOCKEN: There is nothing to get excited about. I am trying to explain that there are men sitting all around me who have taken exhaustive courses in French and who cannot follow a French debate today, for the very reason that I have stated. If my hon. friends were in the same position with regard to the English language as we are with regard to the French, they would not know English any better than we know French. But I do not see why we could not have books of history that would give due place and prominence to all phases of Canadian history; I do not see why we should not have readers containing stories that would tend to develop our British citizenship. I am not entirely satisfied with the school books used in Ontario. I do not think the province has done enough in this connection. I should like to pay tribute to a brother of the member for Victoria (Sir Sam Hughes), Dr. James L. Hughes, who during the time that he was Chief Inspector of Schools for Toronto, taught patriotism in the schools of that city. One of the reasons why there was such a remarkable recruitment in Toronto was because of the work that had been done by Dr. Hughes over a period of twenty years.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Forty years.

Mr. HOCKEN: There is a collegiate institute in Toronto, round the corner from where I live. I took the trouble to ask the principal of that institute last Sunday night how many of his boys went overseas. Five hundred boys went to the front from that school. The bodies of sixty-eight lie in France. This collegiate institute is presided over by Col. Hagarty, one of the good loyalists of our city. All these boys went through the public schools of our city and came under the hands of Chief Inspector Dr. James L. Hughes; and if the school books had done their part as well as the inspector did his, there would be nothing to complain of in Ontario.

I believe that this Government intends to give some assistance to technical education. That is a side of education that might be gone into much more thoroughly than it has yet been gone into by the Government. Toronto spent over $2,000,000 on a technical school, and it has not received a cent by way of assistance from this Government or from the Provincial Government. It should have had assistance from this Government; any city should which puts up a high-class technical institution for the perfection of the trades and industries of the country. That is a phase of the work of the proposed Bureau of Education that, I think, would be very valuable.

I have another suggestion to make. The Government, under the direction of such a Bureau of Education as I have briefly mentioned, might appropriate a million dollars a year for scholarships to be given to children, not in the high schools, but in the primary schools. Two or three thousand of these children—those who win the scholarships—could be taken every year on a two-months' trip over the country. If you took two hundred children from the province of Quebec on a trip through Ontario and the Prairie Provinces to the Pacific coast and back, they would return much better fitted to go on with their studies than they were before they started on the journey.

They would know a good deal more about Ontario and the western provinces than they ever will without some such visit, and to have them visit those provinces in that way involves an expenditure which the parents are in most cases unable to meet. I would take the Ontario children and send them to Quebec, to the Maritime Provinces, to western Canada, and so I would take the children of every province in this country and send them out through other provinces, at the rate of two or three thousand every year. Thus in the course of ten or fifteen years we would be getting to the point when it would not be easy to say that one province did not understand another. We often hear the statement made that the people of Ontario do not understand Quebec. I fancy that the people of Ontario understand Quebec a great deal better than the people of Quebec understand Ontario.

Mr. VIEN: We tried something of that kind with grown up citizens in the Bon Entente movement, and it resulted in the Unionist Publicity Committee and the Citizens' Publicity Committee in Toronto.

Mr. BUREAU: That was a political dodge.

Mr. HOCKEN: The war put an end to the Bon Entente. I do not care to elaborate that. The men who initiated the movement in Ontario before the war did not endeavour to carry it on after the war got rightly started.

Mr. VIEN: I beg pardon—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order.

Mr. VIEN: I will make the remark—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. I must remind the hon. gentleman that the House is not in committee and that it is only with the permission of the hon. member that he may ask a question. He may not interject a remark.

Mr. VIEN: I was proceeding to ask the hon. gentleman a question, and it is to correct him on this point that the Bon Entente movement—

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: Order. That is not a question. The hon. gentleman is not in order.

Mr. VIEN: I will put it in the form of a question. Does the hon. gentleman know that the Bon Entente movement was organized in 1915, one year after the war had been declared?

Mr. HOCKEN: It did not last very long, did it? The reasons the hon. gentleman knows as well as I do, and I do not think it is necessary for me to state them. What I propose will, I am sure, be one of the best things for Canada if there is any desire to bring about national unity in this country. I am satisfied, as I said last session, that the French Canadian is potentially as fine a citizen as we have. Many of them are not only so potentially, but are so in fact, and those who are only potentially among our finest citizens are so rather because of the fact that they have not had the broadening education which is all that is lacking to make them good citizens. I am one of those who would rather like to assist in that very laudable object.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I submit that in a democracy such as Canada a liberal education should be placed within the reach of every ambitious boy and girl. The stability of our institutions depends upon the literacy of our people. They rule the country. The Government will be such as they make it. Therefore, it is of the highest importance that every one should receive an education. An illiterate population is the greatest danger to democracy. Unless the people who by their ballots determine the kind of Government we are to have are able to read and write, unless they have their reasoning powers developed by education, they become an easy prey for demagogues and designing manipulators. They must be able to read in order to form their own judgments upon public questions and the more thorough their training is the better qualified will they be to perform their duties as citizens. We have been endowed by Providence with marvellous material resources. It is ours to cultivate the mentality of the common people, to make them ambitious and enterprising by setting before them a high purpose and a goal worth striving to attain. If we fail in this we fail in everything, for it is as true to-day as when Goldsmith wrote:—

Ill fares the land, to hastening ills a prey
Where wealth accumulates and men decay.
Princes and lords may flourish or may fade;
A breath can make them as a breath has made.
But a bold peasantry, a country's pride
When once destroyed can never be supplied.

SUPPLY.

Motion agreed to, and the House went into Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Mr. J. D. REID: We shall take up the Supplementary Estimates for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1919, and if the Committee will let them pass to-night, any of the items may be discussed on the Main Estimates. We would like to get these through so that we can have the Governor General give his assent to them.

Charges of management—printing Dominion notes—further amount required	$30,000
Clerical assistance in connection with transfer and registration of war loan bonds, etc.	170,000
Total	$200,000

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will the minister explain the second item?

Mr. J. D. REID: That is a matter which the Minister of Finance (Sir Thomas White) has charge of, and he has gone home. He will give the explanation on some other item.

[Mr. Hoeken.]

Civil Government—Department of Justice, including penitentiary grant, contingencies, $5,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: While I do not wish to delay the progress of the Estimates, I purpose bringing to the attention of the Acting Minister of Justice (Mr. Meighen) a question which was brought to the notice of the public during last summer by the press in connection with the administration of justice. On the 8th of June last, the Toronto Globe published on page 13 of its issue the following startling news with big headlines:

Young girl posed as man. Outrageous sentence upon her rouses a storm of indignation. Two years in prison! Trying to help country, she contravenes some old statute.

And then follows the despatch:

Kingston, June 7.—Because she posed as a man, had her hair cut in military style and went so far as donning a man's attire in order to do her bit in a log-driving bee for the Chaleur Bay Pulp Company, at Restigouche, "Venus" Coté, Rimouski, Quebec, aged 23, is now a prisoner in the Women's Ward at the penitentiary here having been sentenced to two years for this awful crime. The girl was brought here in male attire, and the authorities at the big prison—

The CHAIRMAN: Order. I am very sorry, but I shall have to call the hon. member to order for two reasons, first, because his remarks are not relevant to the item under consideration which is merely for a sum of $5,000 for contingencies for penitentiaries, and second, that he is anticipating the discussion of a motion which is already upon the Order Paper.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I bow to your ruling, Mr. Chairman, but would just point out that the motion I have on the Order Paper has no chance of coming up this session, and I thought this was the proper time to bring the matter to the attention of the Acting Minister of Justice.

Mr. J. D. REID: The Acting Minister of Justice is not in the House at present. I would suggest that when we come to the main Estimates of the Justice Department, with the consent of the House, the hon. member might bring the matter up then.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That will be satisfactory.

Department of Immigration and Colonization—To provide for the sum of $1,000 for Deputy Minister of the Interior, to cover additional salary while acting as Deputy Minister of Immigration and Colonization during the fiscal year 1918-19, $1,000.

Mr. FIELDING: Would the minister explain what this item is for?

Mr. CALDER: When the Department of Immigration and Colonization was created in, I think, October, 1917, Mr. Cory, the Deputy Minister of the Interior, was appointed acting deputy of the new department. When the Estimates were brought down for the year 1918-19 a vote of $5,000 was taken for a deputy minister, but he has never been appointed. I am sure the Committee will realize the position we were in so far as immigration was concerned during the past year, and instead of appointing a new deputy for the department, I thought it as well to continue Mr. Cory as acting deputy, and he has consequently acted in that capacity from October, 1917, down to the end of the last fiscal year, and is still so acting.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is to put him on a footing of equality with the other deputy ministers, I suppose?

Mr. CALDER: No, because during that period other deputy ministers were receiving only $5,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: But this year they receive $6,000.

Mr. CALDER: Yes. While the department was not active last year in so far as actual immigration was concerned, we have done a great deal of work in reorganizing the department, particularly in Canada and the United States. The entire service in Canada has been reorganized, and Mr. Cory has given a great deal of his time and attention to the work that has been done during the past year. When the Main Estimates of the department are before the Committee, I shall be able to give a fuller explanation of what has actually been done in the way of reorganization. I thought it but fair that as Mr. Cory had been appointed acting deputy and has given a great deal of his time and attention to the department during the year he should receive some remuneration for it.

Mr. FIELDING: The gentleman referred to is a most excellent officer, and if I make any reference to this item it is simply because of the principle involved, and not because I have any objection to Mr. Cory. He is a deputy minister. Other deputy ministers last year with one or two exceptions, received $5,000. Is it contemplated by this item to pay Mr. Cory $6,000 for the last year?

Mr. CALDER: Yes.

Mr. FIELDING: The principle of paying a deputy minister for extra work is a bad principle, and I would certainly ask the minister to consider it very carefully. A deputy minister is supposed to give all his time to the service of the country, and if he gives a portion of his time from one department to another, is that a reason why he should be paid extra? I have acted as minister for a dozen departments at different times, and every one of the ministers on the front benches to-day is acting for some other department, but are they to be paid an extra salary because they are acting in the absence of somebody else? I think the principle involved is a bad and dangerous one. I have no objection to any salary that may be given to Mr. Cory as a deputy. I am very glad that the deputy ministers are to receive a salary of $6,000; that has my support. But the idea of paying any official in the public service for extra duties is to me a bad and dangerous principle. I think the example of this case will lead the minister into trouble. I repeat, I have no objection to Mr. Cory. He is an excellent officer and I should be glad to see him get the best terms given to deputies of equal rank; it is the principle I object to.

Mr. CALDER: I quite agree with what my hon. friend has said as to the principle involved. It is one that should be used with very great discretion. Under the circumstances in this particular case I submit to the Committee that there is justification for the vote. I hesitated a good deal for the very reason advanced by the hon. member, to suggest to the Government that this sum should be placed in the Estimates, but the position was briefly this: Had I taken advantage of the vote of $5,000 that was passed in the Estimates last year for a deputy minister, and appointed a deputy, I suppose there would not be the slightest objection at all. Instead of doing that, I have tried to save money for the country. I hoped to save by this method some $4,000. It is quite true that the services of any official of any department should be available when required, but under the circumstances that existed I do not think it would be fair to ask a deputy who has his own work to do, and who should have some time at his disposal to come to my department and my house night after night and spend hours and hours upon work that really was not his own. Now, because I did not take advantage of the vote passed last year, but thought it advisable under the circumstances to try and save $4,000. I am severely criticised. I quite agree that the principle is one which should be safeguarded in every way, but at the same time occasions may arise where the circumstances would justify the Government in doing just what it is proposed to do in this case.

Mr. FIELDING: I think that in the case of minor officials who are receiving but small salaries, allowance should be made for circumstances under which something additional may be paid to them, but even in that case I would rather have it in the shape of a direct plain vote for the salary. But those officials who are receiving a generous salary, whether it be a judge or any other official—and I should like to see all the high officials generously paid—owe their whole working time to the public service, and any service that they can render to the public they have already been paid for and they should not receive any extra allowance for it. There are many illustrations we may have to give as the Estimates come up, because I think the principle of paying a man in two or three different places is a bad one. I lay down the principle, and I think the minister will agree with me, that the man who receives $4,000 or $5,000, which is a fair salary, not too large—I am not advocating small salaries—owes his whole time to the public service, and any time he may give to the public service is time for which he has already been paid, and he is not entitled to extra pay for such extra work.

Mr. JACOBS: Does the hon. member think for a moment that this official is obliged to go to the minister's house night after night and work for hours without receiving anything extra?

Mr. FIELDING: Certainly, unless the custom is changed. Every deputy minister does that. I am speaking from my own experience and I venture to say that every minister to-day is obliged to have his deputy go to his house many a time at night to work.

Mr. M. CLARK: The principle of working night and day in the public service works out very badly anyhow. It does not require a medical man to point out to the minister that if a deputy is working night as well as day his efficiency in the daytime will be impaired; and you will not get the work out of him you otherwise would.

But where is the minister going to get the money to do these things? I understood the Government were in difficulty about money. We have been told that all session. Yet we are asked to vote extras here and extras there. This is the time to be concerned about a few hundred millions. We are using up $30,000,000 in shipping and thousands for salaries. If we are going on in that way where are we going to land? I do not want to anticipate the Budget, but I want some assurance that there is some prospect of this money being paid. I want to emphasize the point that was so well made by my hon. friend from Shelburne and Queens (Mr. Fielding), that the whole time that a deputy can give to his work ought to be got out of him for his salary as a deputy. If it is not enough, increase it. With regard to extras in another department, that seems to be a slovenly and peculiar manner of doing public business. This increasing of our expenses is something that is going to land the country in bankruptcy.

Mr. CALDER: I am afraid the hon. gentleman (Mr. M. Clark) did not catch the drift of my remarks. He thinks that instead of saving money we are spending additional money here. As a matter of fact, as I stated to the Committee, last year we took a vote of $5,000 for a deputy minister. I had authority to appoint a deputy minister at a salary of $5,000, and if I had done so, this matter, I suppose, would not have been mentioned. I had some concern for the growing expenditures of the country by trying to save $4,000. Now I am severely criticised because of that. I quite agree with the position taken by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens, the principle is not a good one, and if the practice is to be followed at all it should only be where there are very special circumstances. I have stated these circumstances to the Committee. I cannot say anything further about it. The Committee may agree or not. Under the circumstances that existed in connection with the creation of this department, I feel that I was justified in not appointing a deputy. The department had been created in the regular way, a minister was put in charge, and I had a full right to appoint a deputy. But, in the interest of economy I did not do so. With the statement made that the time of every officer of the Government should be at the disposal of the Government, I quite agree, but it does not appear to me as fair that you should take a man who happens to be in another department and call upon him to give a great deal of his time to work that does not belong to the department of which he is in charge.

Mr. PROULX: This department is only a branch of the Interior Department.

Mr. CALDER: No.

Mr. PROULX: The work done by the Immigration and Colonization was formerly done by the Department of the Interior.

Mr. CALDER: Yes.

Mr. PROULX: There was very little work done, I understand. There has been no immigration during the war. I do not think that there was much more work to do than this officer had been doing before the department was created.

Mr. CALDER: During the last year Mr. Cory, the acting deputy minister, gave more of his time to the work of the department than he had done in any year during the last eight or nine years when immigration was active. Early in the year I undertook the reorganization of this department in the United States, in Canada, and to some extent in Great Britain. This required a good deal of thought and study, and Mr. Cory's services were used for that purpose. He gave more time to that department when it was not very active than he did before when it was very active.

Mr. VIEN: It is probably due to overpressure of work that the deputy minister overlooked some of the accounts for the Department of Immigration and did not check up all the details when they came in. It is probably in that way that a $32 waste basket came to be purchased. If the appointment of this acting deputy minister of the Department of the Interior to the Department of Immigration has saved $4,000 by way of salary, much of it has leaked away owing to overpressure in work which has prevented him from closely checking the accounts that came in.

Mr. CALDER: I am not so certain of that. Probably we will have an opportunity of discussing that account when we come to our Estimates. I shall have an opportunity later to have something to say regarding that.

Mr. FIELDING: If Mr. Cory gave so much of his time to the duties of the deputy minister of Immigration, what happened to the duties of the deputy minister of the Interior?

Mr. JACOBS: As I understand it, the Deputy Minister of Immigration last year was also Acting Deputy Minister of the Interior. Was there not an estimate of $5,000 passed this year for the Deputy Minister of Immigration? In the Immigration Act provision is made for the appointment of a deputy minister, and I assume that in the Estimates there will be $5,000 for his services for the coming year.

Mr. CALDER: It is $6,000.

Mr. JACOBS: This work was done last year by Mr. Cory at the same time as other work was done in the Department of the Interior, at a cost to the Government of $6,000—$5,000 plus $1,000. He assisted the minister, working night after night with the minister in the creation of this new department.

Mr. CALDER: That is right.

Mr. JACOBS: I consider Mr. Cory should have $5,000 instead of $1,000.

Mr. McCREA: I understand that the minister is proposing that his deputy should have an increase of salary. If you have a good staff of men who are reliable, trustworthy, honest and industrious, it is poor policy to underpay them. I think this Government are possibly spending a good deal of money in other directions that might well be spent in paying the employees good, fair, liberal salaries. If the minister of a department comes to this House and makes a statement to the effect, as the minister has done, that he has a good, reliable, trustworthy man on his staff, a man who has been doing not only his own work but the work of another department, and he asks for some compensation for that man, I think we should trust the minister sufficiently to accept this statement and grant the request.

Mr. CALDER: I want to be perfectly frank with the Committee. This is not a question of increasing salaries. The point raised by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens is a very important one. I had a good deal of hesitation in doing this on account of the precedent that is likely to be established and which will probably give the Government trouble in other directions. But it seems to me, taking all the circumstances into consideration, that we will not be establishing a troublesome precedent in this case. I had a good deal of hesitation in suggesting this should be done but at the same time I think it is only fair it should be done.

Mr. PROULX: Who is the deputy minister of Immigration?

Mr. CALDER: Mr. Cory is still acting. I have nobody in sight at the present time but somebody will be appointed shortly.

Department of Railways and Canals, Salaries —$2,250.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has the Civil Service Commission passed on each of these appointments?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes. What happened was this: We have a Purchasing Branch under Mr. Lavoie. A number of the men who belong to that staff and who were employed in the Outside Service have gone to Toronto. Those that are left belong to the Canals Branch and will be paid out of the vote for canals.

Department of Customs and Inland Revenue —To provide for a clerkship in the First Division, Subdivision B, Private Secretary—$2,100.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Who is the private secretary referred to here?

Mr. J. D. REID: The private secretary to Mr. Sifton, Minister of Customs, who is overseas with his chief at the present time.

Post Office Department—Contingencies, clerical and other assistance, further amount required—$10,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: We would like an explanation of this item.

Mr. ROWELL: The vote is required to pay certain temporary employees who were engaged to take the places of civil servants who had enlisted and were serving overseas.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Are the temporary employees who are engaged during the rush season appointed by the Civil Service Commission?

Mr. ROWELL: The appointments are all passed upon by the Civil Service Commission.

Mr. COPP: What amount appears in the regular Estimates with respect to this item?

Mr. ROWELL: I have not that information. That refers to last year's vote, and this is a special appropriation to cover the pay of twenty-three temporary employees who were brought in to take the places of employees who had enlisted and gone overseas.

Mr. COPP: Is this amount intended to supplement the salaries of the twenty-three temporary employees?

Mr. ROWELL: No, these persons have not been employed for the whole of the war period. As various permanent employees enlisted, or were called up under the Military Service Act, other men were engaged to take their places and the vote asked for here covers various periods during the year.

[Mr. Calder.]

Mr. LEMIEUX: I received a letter some time ago from a captain attached to the Canadian forces now in Germany, who belongs to an outside branch of the Post Office Department. He has received his salary and military pay, but desires to know if the bonus granted to the civil servants in Canada will apply to those serving overseas as well?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, he will not get the bonus.

Civil Service Commission—to provide for the promotion of one clerk, and contingencies, $20,225.

Mr. LEMIEUX: When a vacancy occurs in a country post office is it necessary that the Civil Service Commission should advertise and send out circulars inviting candidates to compete for the poorly-paid position of postmaster?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I would not think so.

Mr. LEMIEUX: What is the practice in that regard? I have received circulars drawing my attention, for example, to the fact that there is a vacancy in a post office in British Columbia, or that an engineer is to be appointed in a certain province at a salary of $1,000 or $2,000. I have no interest in such appointments, and it seems to me that those circulars should be sent only to the district affected, thus avoiding a waste of money.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think my hon. friend's remarks are quite proper in so far as a certain class of positions is concerned, such as in the Post Office. There is, however, another class of positions which I think should be advertised throughout the whole country.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Technical positions.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes. Some discrimination should be exercised, of course. I shall be very glad to call the attention of the Commission to the remarks of my hon. friend.

Legislation—Senate—To provide an amount for the Speaker of the Senate of $3,000 for the fiscal year 1918-19 in lieu of residence and attendants—Further amount required, $1,845.

House of Commons—To provide an amount for the Speaker of the House of Commons of $3,000 for the fiscal year 1918-19 in lieu of residence and attendants—Further amount required, $750.

Mr. PROULX: How much was voted before?

Mr. J. D. REID: The difference between $1,845 and $3,000.

Mr. PROULX: Is not $3,000 a large amount?

Mr. J. D. REID: Not when you take into account that the Speaker has to rent a house, engage servants, and so on. He had all that accommodation in the House of Commons.

Mr. PROULX: The Speakers get $4,000 besides their sessional indemnity. I do not see why they should have to rent a house; they could board at a hotel like ordinary members.

Mr. J. D. REID: Before the destruction of the Parliament Buildings it had always been the custom for the Speaker to have a residence inside the buildings, together with attendants, fuel, and other things. This is merely to replace the loss that he is under on account of living outside.

Mr. PROULX: But I do not see why it should take $3,000 to pay for the rent of a house or of rooms at the hotel. So far as attendance is concerned, I do not see why he needs any. He has a private secretary who is paid by salary. I think there is too much extravagance in that.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think it is due to the Committee that I should say a word or two in explanation. When the Parliament Buildings were burned down the Government asked the then Sergeant-at-Arms, Col. Smith, to make a report as to what he thought should be allowed to the Speaker in lieu of residence. The report he made was to the effect that he regarded the residence, its furnishing, heating, lighting, attendants and so forth, supplied to the Speaker heretofore as worth much more than $3,000 per annum; but he felt that he could not recommend that a larger sum should be allowed owing to the circumstance that it would make the salary of the Speaker higher than that of a cabinet minister, and that was thought to be unwarranted. The Cabinet in accepting his suggestion put an item in the Estimates providing for a certain amount per diem, I think $15. The first year that amounted to a trifle over $3,000; last year it amounted to $2,250. Last autumn an arrangement was finally effected whereby it was decided to make the amount a fixed sum of $3,000 per annum to the Speaker of the House and the Speaker of the Senate in lieu of residence. The item which is now before the Committee is to make up that sum for the past year.

I think the Committee should know that at the figure as now proposed, of $3,000 a year, the country would be saving a very considerable sum over what it has cost heretofore to maintain the Speaker's residence. I am convinced that the sum does not make up to the Speaker by a very large amount, speaking purely from the standpoint of dollars and cents, what he had in accommodation in the old Parliament Buildings.

On the subject generally of the salary of the Speaker, I think it is due to the Committee that they should know that the Speaker, including this vote, receives a smaller sum than does the Speaker of any of the other British Dominions. The Speaker of the House of Commons of the South African Commonwealth receives a salary almost double; the Speakers of two or three of the Australian States, with a population in some instances of less than a million, receive more than the Speaker of the House of Commons of Canada. I am giving this information after having gone into the situation somewhat carefully.

If these facts are borne in mind, I do not think that the sum which is now asked is at all excessive. From the experience I have had I would much rather be supplied with a residence, light, fuel, and furnishings, than be paid the sum of $3,000 and furnish a house, which I am now endeavouring to do in order that I may be able to carry on in some small measure the duties of the Speaker as they apply to his office, apart from the work in the Chamber itself. I can assure hon. gentlemen that at the present cost of living the Speaker is not by any means compensated as compared with the position he occupied at the time he had his residence in the old Parliament Buildings. I venture to say that the sum of $3,000 per year which is now voted to the Speaker in lieu of residence did not cover a half, yes, I venture to say, did not cover a third of the cost to the country of the maintenance of the Speaker's quarters in the old House.

11 p.m.

Mr. PROULX: It looks to me, Mr. Chairman, as if this were an attempt in an indirect way to increase the salary of the Speaker. I would much prefer that the country pay the actual cost of renting rooms or a house. I understand that the Government is now furnishing a house for the Speaker. Last session I believe he was rooming at a hotel.

Mr. CARVELL: The Speaker is paying rent to the Government for the house he occupies.

Mr. PROULX: But this money was for last year; it does not cover this year when he is occupying the house, I understand. If he files a Bill of what he has to pay for rooms I think it would be much more satisfactory than asking for a lump sum, when we do not know whether it is costing that amount or not.

Mr. JACOBS: Mr. Chairman, might I ask if there is a proposal on foot to house the Speaker in the new buildings when they are completed?

Mr. CARVELL: No, it is not the intention.

Mr. JACOBS: We are departing then from an old and traditional custom?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes.

General—To pay for Provincial Voters' Lists supplied after the passing of the War Times Election Act, 1917, $7,000.

Mr. VIEN: Explain.

Mr. BELAND: What is that, Mr. Chairman?

Mr. CARVELL: Under the law as it stood before 1917 the legal custodians of the voter's lists in the various provinces made up their accounts and sent them to the Clerk in Common Chancery. The War-Times Election Act, as you will remember, was passed in September of 1917. Most of these lists are made up in the autumn, and a number of them were forwarded to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. I believe the contention was that those officials were not acquainted with the fact that it was not necessary to prepare those lists, and after a good deal of consideration a compromise was effected, by which those officials who had actually made up their lists and forwarded them were paid a portion of the amount, and in very many cases the whole.

Those, of course, who had not made them up—a notice was sent out as soon as the clerk found they were coming in—did not receive anything. This $7,000 is required to pay those who actually did send lists in.

Mr. BELAND: The money is paid to some provincial official, I assume?

Mr. CARVELL: Under the old law the legal custodian of the voters' list was to make up annually and file with the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery a list as found in his office. The Dominion Government paid that official so much per hundred words for furnishing that list.

Mr. VIEN: There was something more than that. The new Elections Act provided not that the electoral list should be made, as formerly, by the various secretary-treasurers of the municipalities, sent to the registrar in the county and by that official forwarded to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, but that enumerators should be appointed and Federal lists specially prepared for the purposes of the coming election. The Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, probably overlooking the machinery provided by the new Elections Act, sent the usual formal notices to the registrars in the various counties to provide him with the electoral lists as in the ordinary course. That was an error on the part of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery which is now costing the country $7,000. I agree that the registrars of the various counties should be paid for work that they did at the request of an official of the Crown, but the attention of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery should be directed to the fact that he made an error which involves an expenditure of $7,000 on the part of the country.

Mr. CARVELL: I assure my hon. friend that the fact has been brought to his attention on more than one occasion.

For purchase of seed grain—Governor General's Warrant, October 7, 1918, $3,000,000.

Mr. VIEN: Is this for seed grain for 1919?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes.

Mr. VIEN: This seed grain will be distributed now and paid for when it is distributed?

Mr. J. D. REID: It is sold to the farmers on certain terms—probably the cash is not paid until the crop is harvested.

Mr. VIEN: But the amounts are to be repaid? The Government is not to lose anything?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Government will not lose anything.

Mr. COPP: Where is this seed grain distributed?

Mr. J. D. REID: There was a crop failure last year in several parts of Western Canada, chiefly, I think, in Southern Albelta and Saskatchewan; and this grain was secured to provide the farmers in those districts with the necessary seed grain.

For purchase of cotton seed meal—Governor General's Warrant, November 19, 1918, $150,000.

Mr. COPP: Is it the policy of the Government to buy feed and to furnish it to anyone who is short of that commodity, extending to him the credit of the country until the price is paid?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: During the latter part of 1918 it was very difficult to secure cotton seed meal and farmers throughout the provinces were very anxious to get it. The Department of Agriculture accordingly purchased cotton seed meal and distributed it among the dealers, and the treasury was recouped.

Mr. COPP: Last fall it was impossible for the farmers of our part of the country to get hay and grain for their cattle, and they had to sell their stock at a great sacrifice. If the Government was assisting the farmers in other parts of the country, I cannot see why they should not assist the farmers in the Maritime Provinces.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: During the war the Government made a great many purchases on behalf of certain of the people of Canada; it was absolutely necessary that they should do so. For instance, all the wool that was imported into Canada during the last year was imported and paid for by the Government, and, through some Governmental agency, distributed to manufacturers in Canada who desired wool. Tinplate was also purchased by the Government and re-sold to dealers—to their advantage, because it was purchased by the Government at a favourable rate. Cotton seed meal was purchased for the same reason. It was practically impossible for private dealers to make the purchases, so the Department of Agriculture did it, and distributed the cotton seed meal among dealers in the various provinces. The treasury was immediately recouped.

Mr. COPP: Did any of this cotton seed meal go to the Maritime Provinces?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think so.

For purchase of stock feed—Governor General's warrant July 2, 1918, $300,000.

Mr. COPP: What feed is that?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Government controlled the price of by-products of elevators and flour mills during the war period, particularly during the past year. They purchased from the mills bran and shorts, and through some agency or other, they were sold to the public.

Mr. COPP: What agency?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Some department of Government or some Government agency carried out the details of the work.

Contribution towards the cost of the monument to Louis Hebert at Quebec, $1,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: In connection with public monuments, may I remind my hon. friend that the Royal Society of Canada last year recommended that a monument be erected in the city of Ottawa to the memory of Edith Cavell, and I understand, that subscriptions have been solicited and a certain amount of money collected. Mr. Benjamin Sulte, our well known writer and historian, has taken the lead in the matter and has enlisted the sympathies of many citizens in and around Ottawa. I have been asked by the society, of which I am a member, to request the Government to do its share in connection with the erection of this monument. I hope I shall be able to convey to the Royal Society which meets next week in Ottawa the glad tidings that the Government of Canada will do its share towards the erection of this memorial.

Another point about art—because this item is under the heading of "Arts and Agriculture." I noticed in the Montreal Star last night that two paintings were, amongst others, to be sold at auction in Montreal. As hon. gentlemen are aware, the famous Kreigoff paintings represent Canadian scenery. I have seen a few of those Kreigoff paintings in Senator Edwards' residence in Ottawa and some too in that of the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy). They are very rare and highly appreciated, and I think our museum should have those paintings on its walls. I also noticed in a paper yesterday that the collection of the late Sir George Drummond, containing some of the great masterpieces in the world, was to be sold in London, England. As hon. gentlemen know, there is a law in Italy which prevents any foreigner from taking masterpieces out of Italy to another country. We should have a similar law here. It is known that there are in the residence of at least three or four wealthy Canadians masterpieces of immense value—if they can be valued in money. The collection of the late Sir George Drummond is known not only in Canada but in Europe, and the Art Commission which was appointed some years ago ought not to let this opportunity pass and should see that this collection is retained in Canada for the National museum in Ottawa. I call the attention of the Government to this fact.

Mr. ROWELL: I do not think the matter of the Edith Cavell monument has come before the Government, but it will be taken into consideration.

Pensions—European war—Further amount required, $3,500,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The Minister of Militia (Mr. Mewburn) knows that a committee is at present investigating the question of pensions generally, and I suppose he will make a statement to the House some time during the session. Many people are advocating a revision of pensions. I mentioned to the minister the other day some cases of hardship, and I have a promise from him that he will consider the question and later on make a statement to the House.

Major-General MEWBURN: The question of pensions does not come under the Department of Militia and Defence; it is entirely under another department. I am familiar with the cases which the hon. gentleman has mentioned and which I have already referred to the Committee. I have not the privilege of being a member of that Committee. The President of the Privy Council (Mr. Rowell), who is chairman of the Committee, will, I understand, make a statement to the House.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The statement of the minister is quite correct with regard to the general question of pensions, but under the old law, widows of generals were entitled to small pensions, and I think that Act was administered by the Minister of Militia and Defence.

Major-General MEWBURN: My hon. friend is quite right. I thought he referred to this item of general pensions.

Mr. LEMIEUX: No.

Major-General MEWBURN: I hope to bring in a Bill amending the Militia Pension Act. There are one or two cases of hardship. I know the case of the widow of a general who served thirty years in the Canadian service, who lost three sons and one son-in-law in this war, and who lost one son in South Africa. Under those old regulations she draws a pension of only $500 a year. I hope to bring that up on an amendment to the Pension Act.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Another case is that of a widow of a man who served in the Militia Department as general for many years. Since his death she has received a pittance of $500 a year. She has lost her only support in the war, and she naturally expects that the Government will do the fair thing by her.

Mr. BELAND: Just for information, as I was absent last year, I should like to know the total amount voted to meet the exigencies of the Pension Board in this regard.

Mr. ROWELL: The amount voted last year was $15,000,000. This is to meet the excess expenditure for the year. It is due, first of all, to there being a larger number of pensioners that was anticipated when the estimate was originally provided; secondly, to meet the increased allowance for children which was provided during the course of the year, particularly orphan children; thirdly, instead of paying the pensions in advance they are now paid at the end of the month, which means a double payment.

Mr. BELAND: The amount paid last year for pensions was $18,500,000?

Mr. ROWELL: Approximately.

Pensions—salaries and contingent expenses of the Board of Pension Commissioners for Canada—further amount required, $500,000.

Mr. FIELDING: We understand that the item of pensions must be large, but here is half a million dollars for the salaries and contingent expenses of the board. Is the item correctly worded? It looks a very large amount for salaries and contingent expenses.

Mr. ROWELL: It is quite true that the item is a large one, and the explanation is this: The Board of Pension Commissioners, when they presented their estimate to the Government of the cost of administering, estimated some $250,000 in excess of what the Government actually allowed. The Government, in the hope of keeping down the expenditure, cut down the estimate which the Board of Pension Commissioners had presented. As the end of the year approached the board reported that not only could they not keep within the appropriation, but for reasons which they explained to the Government it was necessary that they should exceed even their own estimate by the sum of $250,000. This additional sum was required principally, as I recall it now, for three reasons: First, the working out of their organization in administering the pensions throughout the country had involved a substantial increase in their staff over what they estimated a year ago; secondly, owing to the conditions which prevailed, they have had to pay larger salaries in many cases than they contemplated a year ago; and, thirdly, the expenses incidental to the office and management here in Ottawa at headquarters and at the various centres throughout the country where the board has its branches in each military district have also increased.

Mr. FIELDING: Taking this $500,000 and the former estimate, what will be the expenditure on salaries and contingent expenses?

Mr. ROWELL: A total of $1,250,000, the former appropriation being, I think, $750,000.

Mr. FIELDING: I am not complaining. I take for granted that there is an explanation. But what is the organization of the Board of Pension Commissioners which involves an expenditure of $1,250,000 on salaries and contingent expenses? I am not objecting to the amount, but simply asking for information. The amount seems very large.

Mr. ROWELL: The amount does seem large, and that was the reason the Government a year ago cut down the estimate. I have not the details here, as I did not expect the item would be up, but when the main estimate is before the Committee I will have full details as to the numbers employed and expenses.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has the resignation of Commander Ross been accepted?

Mr. ROWELL: Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Who succeeds him?

Mr. ROWELL: No appointment has been made yet.

Department of Militia and Defence—gratuities, $7,950.39.

Mr. VIEN: Will the minister explain what these gratuities are for?

Major-General MEWBURN: I have the particulars of each one. William Taylor served for 13 years and 13 days as caretaker at headquarters in military district No. 2 at $1.50 per diem. The basis on which the gratuity is calculated is one year's pay for each twenty years of service. N. Villeneuve was caretaker at the Quebec drill hall for 22 years and 124 days. All these gratuities are calculated on the same basis.

Railways and Canals—chargeable to capital —Quebec and Saguenay Railway—construction —further amount required, $250,000.

Mr. J. D. REID: The work is nearly completed. This balance is required to carry on the work until the end of the fiscal year.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Can my hon. friend state positively when the trains will run into Murray Bay?

Mr. J. D. REID: The chief engineer assures me that the regular passenger trains will be running into Murray Bay not later than the first of July. The work trains will be going into Murray Bay before that, and you could get into Murray Bay on them about the middle of June.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Will there be a daily service?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes, after the first of July, during the season.

Mr. CASGRAIN: There is in the county of Charlevoix, along the line of this railway near St. Urbain, a great deposit of a certain kind of iron or ore which was largely used during the war by the General Electric Company of the United States in the manufacturing of war material. I know this company owns a mine there. There is also another company interested in these deposits known as the American Titanic Ore Company. The name is American, but the capital stock is owned by Canadian people in Quebec and other parts of the province. This company owns a big mine, but they are unable to operate it at present. During the war they did not have working capital enough. The ore has to be hauled by wagon and horses from St. Urbain to Baie St. Paul, and the haul is too expensive. I noticed one day near Baie St. Paul as many as ten or fifteen cars of ore that had been taken from the mine, and it cost five or six dollars a load. The General Electric Company of the United States are able to exploit their mine, because they have a large amount of capital available. I was asked by the people who are interested in this Canadian enterprise to see if it would not be possible, now that the railway is operating to Baie St. Paul, to have a branch line constructed to the mine from Baie St. Paul. This would not only open up the mine, but would give employment to the people of the county, and would also facilitate the transportation of farm products. The distance would be about nine miles. There is also in the county of Charlevoix near St. Urbain, but in another direction, the National Park which belongs to the province of Quebec. Here the Provincial Government keeps magnificent herds of moose and caribou, and other wild animals.

I have no brief for the provincial government but I invite the minister to come down to that part of the country and make one of a shooting party. It would be in the interest of the country if a branch line were constructed there as soon as possible. Would the minister be able to make a statement upon that work?

Mr. LEMIEUX: I give my earnest support to the request made by my hon. friend from Charlevoix (Mr. Casgrain), as I happen to know that part of the country just as well as I know Ottawa or Montreal. The question of the Saguenay railway has been so many times before the House that I need not repeat the arguments pro and con but the Government has a chance to meet its expenditure in that district by constructing a line to St. Urbain. It is only a matter of 9 miles. There is a large capital invested for the exploitation of that mine, and I am quite sure that if my hon. friend would build a branch line nine miles only in length he would recoup himself for the losses on other sections of the line. This is an industry which ought to be developed. We are very modest in our demands. Whilst my hon. friend is giving forty-four lines to the people of the West surely he will not refuse us this little branch line from Baie St. Paul to St. Urbain. My hon. friend has promised me to pay a visit next summer to that district, and I shall make it my duty to accompany him.

Mr. J. D. REID: I think the hon. member (Mr. Lemieux) will agree that we have about all the railway building on our programme that we can undertake this year. If we complete the Quebec and Saguenay to Murray Bay I think that is about all we can do this year. But I will have the engineer look over the other and make a report.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will my hon. friend send an engineer there?

Mr. J. D. REID: I will tell Mr. Grant to have the suggestion looked into and a report made.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Will my hon. friend do that this year?

Mr. J. D. REID: I will instruct him at once.

Railways and Canals—chargeable to income—miscellaneous—surveys and inspections—railways—further amount required, $10,000.

Mr. COPP: What survey is that?

Mr. J. D. REID: This refers to the inspection of railways and surveys. We have men inspecting railways. Different items are paid out of this account. It is an annual vote. Last year we reduced it by $10,000 and then we found that we had to put it in again. Some of the expenses were paid in connection with the investigation of the Canadian Northern railway and there was a small balance of that which is included in this item.

Labour—Conciliation and Labour Act, including publication, printing, binding and distribution of the Labour Gazette, and allowance to correspondence, and for clerical assistance in preparing tables of statistics—further amount required, $10,000.

Mr. BELAND: What did the Labour Gazette cost beside the $10,000?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I cannot tell my hon. friend at the moment what the amount was last year. It fell to the Department of Labour during the last year or two to do a great deal more than its ordinary work. There was the Cost of Living Commission which involved the collection and preparation of statistical information.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It did not reduce the cost of living.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It increased the expenditure of the department. That is true also of the vote for industrial disputes investigations; there have been more industrial disputes and consequently additional expenditures have been made.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Disputes in the Government or outside of it?

Administration — Employment Office.—Co-ordination Act. — Further amount required, $10,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Please explain.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Under an Act passed by Parliament, I think at its last session, employment offices have been established in all the provinces, and the work of the Federal and provincial Governments in connection therewith is co-ordinated. Grants have been made by the Federal Government in connection with these offices, I understand.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Parliament passed an Act last session authorizing the creation of labour bureaux in the various provinces. I know there is such a bureau in Montreal, and there are others in the West. I would like to get from the minister some statistics concerning the work done by the officers at these bureaux. Have these offices been of real service?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Can the minister state approximately the number of men who have been given employment through these bureaux?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The employment offices have done excellent work, and have been instrumental in securing work for many thousands of persons. I did not expect that the Supplementary Estimates for the Labour Department would be reached this evening, and therefore I am not able to give the data asked for. When the main Estimates of that department are before the House, I shall be in a position to give exact information in connection with this work.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I shall be pleased to have it, because, according to the reports of the meetings of returned soldiers which I read in the press, there is great dissatisfaction among them as regards the operation of these bureaux. The returned soldiers generally say that they have not experienced any satisfaction from them. I do not know whether the statement is true or not, and I would like definite information.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Where is the employment office located in Montreal, and who is in charge of it?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I could not say, but I will be prepared to give him full information on the main Estimates. I think very probably that the selection of the employment office in Montreal rested with the Provincial Government.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I would like to know who is in charge of the office, who the staff are, and what salary is paid to each officer?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is a Provincial Government office, but the Dominion contributes to the cost of administering it.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Would the minister object to letting the item stand until the information which I have asked for is forthcoming?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There will be opportunity for discussion on the vote in the Main Estimates.

Mr. CAHILL: What amount has been paid to each province under this vote?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The amount varies. For instance, in the Maritime Provinces I think the Provincial Government pay for the buildings and the furniture and the Federal Department of Labour defrays the entire cost of administration. In the case of these provinces the cost of administration is probably not a very large amount.

Mr. CAHILL: What amount does Prince Edward Island, for instance, get out of this vote?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think it would be a very small sum, but I could not at present give the exact figure. Even if the office in Prince Edward Island has been opened as to which I am not sure, the administration cost to the Federal Government would be very small indeed.

Mr. CAHILL: We should have information as to the amount paid to each province. Last year an appropriation of something like $50,000 was made, and now we are confronted by a Supplementary Estimate.

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not think my hon. friend was present when the Estimates now under consideration were taken up. These are Supplementary Estimates covering the twelve months up to March 31 last. We are now passing these items so as to get a Bill through and obtain the Royal consent when His Excellency the Governor General attends for that purpose in a day or two. We have not as much information concerning these Estimates to-night as we would have had had we known that they were coming up, but when the Main Estimates are under consideration the fullest information will be given.

Mr. CAHILL: When this item was discussed previously I asked the minister what amount would be apportioned to the different provinces in connection with these employment offices, and I was told that the information would be forthcoming later. Now we have the Supplementary Estimates and still the desired information is lacking. I think the minister who administers the Labour Department ought to be able to tell us how much each province receives.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It was only about the time of the signing of the armistice that the Dominion Government came forward to assist these bureaus which had already been organized and were in operation under the auspices of the Provincial Governments. My impression is that $10,000 is the amount which has been expended upon them up to the close of the last fiscal year. The expenditure for the current fiscal year will, of course, be very much in excess of this vote.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: The minister states that the amount expended for this purpose since the armistice was signed is only $10,000?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There was an amount voted last year, but after the signing of the armistice the expenditure on this account would increase very rapidly because the problem of unemployment became quite severe about that time. Many new offices were established by the Provincial Governments, and in some instances by the Federal authorities, and last year's vote was found to be short by the amount asked for here.

Mr. DuTREMBLAY: I understood that the Government intended to render substantial assistance to these labour bureaux and that quite a large amount would be needed. If the Government is really in earnest in its desire to co-operate with the provinces in this matter, my opinion is that the sum of $10,000 would only be sufficient to meet the necessities of the office in Montreal.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The amount that will be needed for the current fiscal year will be very much in excess of last year's expenditure, as the Federal and the Provincial Governments have all been obliged by the necessities of the unemployment prevailing throughout the country to expend considerably more money.

Mr. CALDER: If I am not mistaken a vote of $50,000 was taken last session, and I think no portion of that money, or at least, only a very small amount, was used until the armistice was signed. Then we had a meeting here of representatives from all the provinces, and it was decided to establish these bureaus without delay, either immediately after or immediately prior to the armistice. Since then somewhere in the neighbourhood of seventy-five bureaus have been established. So that the expenditure has been largely since last November.

Mr. VIEN: In all the provinces?

Mr. CALDER: In practically all the provinces. If I am not mistaken the total expenditure will amount, with this $10,000 to something like $60,000. You will find in the Estimates I think for this year a sum of $200,000 to cover the same class of work.

Mr. CAHILL: The Minister of Immigration and Colonization last year had this Bill in charge.

Mr. CALDER: No, the Minister of Labour.

Mr. CAHILL: At least, he explained it to me. He explained at that time that it would ease the labour situation, and if I remember rightly, that it was very urgent. I think before we pass this item we should have an explanation of what has been done with the $50,000 and the $10,000.

[Mr. A. K. Maclean.]

Mr. CASGRAIN: If we are called upon to vote $10,000 in addition to what was formerly voted, there must have been lots of additional work that was not foreseen. I think we should receive this information.

Soldiers' Land Settlement — Salaries of Board of Commissioners—Further amount required, $199.01.

Advances to soldiers settling upon the land, and cost of administering The Soldier Settlement Act, 1917, including clerical assistance, and amount payable to W. F. O'Connor, K.C., as special Counsel to the Board, at the rate of $2,000 per annum, from December 1, 1918—Further amount required, $666.66.

Mr. FIELDING: This item is a small sinner, but the principle is the same. I have no objection to any liberal salary that may be given to Mr. O'Connor, but I wish to suggest to the minister that in the Main or Supplementary Estimates next year Mr. O'Connor's salary whatever it may be, be voted straight and square and not scattered over two or three places.

Mr. COPP: Who comprises the Board of Commissioners and what are their salaries?

Mr. J. D. REID: I have not the information here. If the hon. member will let it stand until the Main Estimates are brought down we will give the information then.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the item carry?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Let it stand.

Mr. COPP: I think we ought to have the information. I would like to know where this money is going to, and how many individuals are to receive it. I think it is only fair that the information should be furnished.

Mr. CALDER: There are three members composing the board. Dr. Black is chairman and gets a salary, I think, of $6,000—no, I think he gets the same salary as a deputy minister, $5,000; but he will get $6,000 under our Estimates for this year. He was formerly principal of the Provincial Agricultural College at Winnipeg. Major Ashton is the second member of the board, and gets a salary of either $4,000 or $5,000, I am not sure which. Then Mr. Maber, who was one of the chief officers in the Interior Department, is the third member, and gets the same salary as Major Ashton. If I am not mistaken their salaries are fixed under the legislation which created the board.

Mr. COPP: I am very grateful for the very lucid information the minister has given. I asked for the members of the board and their salaries. I am given the names, and I am told that one gets $5,000 or $6,000, the minister does not know which; the second member gets $4,000 or $5,000, the minister does not know which; and the other member gets the same as the second one. That is the sort of information the Government is giving in answer to what I think is a fair question.

Mr. J. D. REID: The Minister of the Interior is not here this evening.

Mr. COPP: Then the Government should not ask that the item be passed.

Mr. CARVELL: This item only refers to salary payable to Mr. O'Connor. He receives $2,000 per annum as counsel to the board, and this item is to provide his salary from the date of his appointment to the end of the fiscal year; it has nothing whatever to do with the members of the board.

Mr. COPP: The item begins with "Salaries of Board of Commissioners—further amount required, $199.01."

Mr. PROULX: What is Mr. O'Connor's salary as an officer of the Justice Department?

Mr. J. D. REID: It is $5,000.

Mr. PROULX: I understand that he works for the Soldiers' Settlement Board. It is a bad principle to divide the services of an official and pay him more than one salary. There is too much camouflage in this.

Mr. PARENT: What are Mr. O'Connor's duties in the Justice Department?

Mr. J. D. REID: Mr. O'Connor did work for both the Labour and Justice Departments; his salary was $2,000 with the Labour Department and $5,000 with the Justice Department.

Mr. VIEN: In what capacity does he serve in the Justice Department?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The drafting of Bills and special work.

Mr. PARENT: Did he draft Bill 91, about the defaulters?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not think so. That Bill was drafted in the Justice Department, but not by Mr. O'Connor. With regard to the statement made by the hon. member (Mr. Fielding), I merely wish to remark that the criticism is not without some substance, and the matter should be corrected in some way. However, the amount which the Committee is asked to vote is for services rendered last year. Mr. O'Connor has been assigned to special work. During the Parliamentary sessions he has had a great deal to do with legislation. Previously he had a great deal to do with the Labour Department, in connection with the Cost of Living Commission. He has drafted, and is now drafting, legislation which is coming before Parliament at the present session. During the last Dominion election he was assistant to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery; he was engaged during several months in concluding that work. It can never be said of Mr. O'Connor that he wastes his time, because he is an exceedingly industrious man and really does give to the State full value for anything that he is paid.

Mr. PARENT: I give the minister the instance of Bill No. 91.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not know what Bill No. 91 is.

Mr. PARENT: We know on this side. It is the Bill against defaulters.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That does not affect this item.

Mr. VIEN: It is a surprising thing that when we on this side speak of a question of principle ministers nearly always admit that the principle is sound, but that there is an exception here, an exception there, an exception somewhere else. Mr. O'Connor should have definite duties to perform and he should be paid a definite salary. We should not be called upon to pay him $5,000 as an official of one branch, and $2,000 as an official of another. If Mr. O'Connor's services are retained in the Justice Department they must be required there, and if they are required there we should get some one else to perform those services if he goes to another department. If Mr. O'Connor has time to spare in the Justice Department he should be called upon to fill the office of some other official of that department. If there are too many employees in the Justice Department let us reduce the number. Civil servants should have definite duties to perform and should not have the right to supplement their salaries by performing other duties in their spare time.

Mr. COPP: I have asked for certain information, which I have not yet received. I again ask that some member of the Government furnish that information.

Mr. CALDER: I am sure that the hon. gentleman wants to be fair.

Mr. COPP: Absolutely.

Mr. CALDER: It is not that the Government has no desire to give the information; it is simply that the minister of the department concerned does not happen to be in the chamber. I endeavoured to give such information as I could, and the hon. member calls me to task because I do not carry all this information in my head. If he insists that the information be given to-night the only thing to do is to send for it.

Mr. COPP: I do not take my hon. friend to task at all; he gave all the information he had. If it is not his duty to pilot this item through the Committee I have no fault to find with him.

Mr. CALDER: The minister is not here.

Mr. COPP: My hon. friend attempted to give some information, but he gave none that I did not have myself. He said that there was an item of $6,000 or $5,000 for Dr. Black, $4,000 or $5,000 for somebody else, and a like amount for somebody else.

Mr. CALDER: I think the hon. member will find they are statutory salaries.

Mr. COPP: I asked the question simply to get information, and I think it is information that should be given to the Committee.

Mr. CAHILL: Can the minister in charge of the Estimates mention any Bill which Mr. O'Connor had had in charge or prepared?

Mr. ROWELL: He drafted the Soldiers' Land Settlement Bill which the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen) introduced the other day. He has had to do with the drafting of the Bankruptcy Bill, and he has worked on some other very important Bills.

Mr. CASGRAIN: The Franchise Bill?

Mr. ROWELL: I think he has had something to do with that. Mr. O'Connor has spent weeks of his time working on some of the largest Bills which the Government has introduced this session.

Mr. VIEN: Why should he receive a higher salary than deputy heads of various departments? As counsel to the Board he has a salary of $2,000 per annum. Why should he not be paid about the same salary as a deputy head, say in the Justice Department, and be called upon to render some legal assistance in his capacity as an employee in the Justice Department?

Mr. ROWELL: The hon. member is possibly not aware of the fact that the deputy head of the Justice Department is paid a salary of $10,000 per annum.

Mr. LEMIEUX: And more; he receives fees besides.

[Mr. Calder.]

Mr. ROWELL: I believe the Government have to pay that salary to Mr. O'Connor if they desire to retain his services. The reason of his being on the Soldier Settlement Board is this: The Soldier Settlement Board need a solicitor to advise them in connection with the many important agreements and forms which they have to draft in carrying out their work. Mr. O'Connor was in the Justice Department rendering a certain service. He was also rendering certain service as Cost of Living Commissioner. He was no longer required for the latter, and the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Meighen), the head of the Soldier Settlement Board, found that the Board could avail itself of Mr. O'Connor's services without engaging a new solicitor at a substantial salary. He, therefore, arranged to secure part of Mr. O'Connor's time for the work of the Soldier Settlement Board, and to continue paying him the salary which he had hitherto been drawing. He had been drawing $5,000 from the Justice Department and $2,000 as Cost of Living Commissioner, and the same amount is paid to him in a different form. I appreciate what the hon. member (Mr. Vien) and the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) have said about paying two salaries. That is open to criticism, and the explanation in this case is that this particular official is rendering services to each of two distinct departments and the salary is divided.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Is that the same Mr. O'Connor who is going to be appointed official returning officer in place of the late clerk of the Crown in Chancery?

Mr. ROWELL: I have not heard of any such appointment.

Mr. FIELDING: The requests for information on all these points are reasonable, and if they are passed, the ministers could fairly be asked to hold the items over. On the other hand, I can appreciate the desire of the ministers to get though with these items so that they may wind up the accounts of the last fiscal year, and I think hon. gentlemen may be content to accept the assurance that information on all these matters will be brought down at another stage. With that statement, I would urge that the ministers be allowed to get through with these Estimates to-night.

Mr. LEMIEUX: There has been no obstruction that I know of, and I think that what has been passed so far has been passed pretty rapidly.

Miscellaneous — Canada Gazette — further amount required,—$6,000.

Mr. CAHILL: What is this additional amount for?

Mr. J. D. REID: Increased cost of labour.

Distribution of Parliamentary documents and other Government publications—further amount required, $8,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What are the "other" Government publications?

Mr. J. D. REID: This is printing ordered by the House. The increased cost of this is for the same reason as in the other case, namely increased cost of labour and materials in connection with printing.

Mr. CASGRAIN: That seems to be the answer for the first part—distribution of parliamentary documents. But there is the other item "Other Government publications." What does that mean? Does that include the Daily Record and other papers published by the Government?

Mr. J. D. REID: A list of parliamentary documents is always printed in the Canada Gazette.

Mr. PARENT: Who gets the printing of the documents?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Printing Bureau. This is simply a cross entry.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Is an amount included for the Daily Record?

Mr. J. D. REID: No, that is a separate item.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What is the cost of that publication?

Mr. ROWELL: Some question was asked early in the session and I brought down the exact figures at the time. I think the cost was approximately $50,000 a year.

Mr. CALDER: I find on turning up the Soldiers' Settlement Act that the Chief Commissioner gets $6,000 a year and each of the other commissioners $5,000.

Mr. COPP: Since the minister has gone back to that item, that is not all the information. Are there any other expenses in connection with the Soldiers' Settlement Board than the salaries of the commissioners?

Mr. CALDER: Yes, hundreds of thousands of dollars of expenses.

Mr. COPP: I should like to have the information regarding that.

Mr. J. D. REID: We shall get that for the hon. member.

To provide an amount to meet expenses in connection with the visit of Prince Fushimi of Japan, $16,374.01.

Mr. PROULX: When did this prince come here?

Mr. ROWELL: Last autumn. Prince Fushimi of Japan was returning a visit paid by Prince Arthur and was the guest of Canada while travelling through this country. The Government provided the necessary special car for the prince and his party and also necessary travelling expenses through the country.

Mr. BELAND: How long was his stay in Canada?

Mr. ROWELL: The total stay would not exceed a month. He travelled through Canada from the Pacific to the Atlantic and visited various centres in this country.

Mr. PARENT: Does the minister say that a prince cannot travel in Canada without his expenses being paid by the Canadian people?

Mr. ROWELL: I feel quite sure I am within the judgment of the Committee when I say that having regard to the fact that Japan was one of our Allies in this war it was but fitting, when the representative of Japan, the son of the ruling sovereign, was passing through Canada on his way to visit His Majesty in Great Britain, that every respect should be paid him because of the high position which he held, and the Government acted accordingly.

Mr. BELAND: But Canada can hardly afford to pay the expenses of foreign princes travelling through this country.

Mr. ROWELL: He was going as the official representative of the Government of Japan to visit the Government in Great Britain, and he was the guest of Canada while passing through this country. He became our guest as he landed, and remained our guest until he left. It was exactly the same courtesy that we paid to General Pau and his party—exactly the same respect that Japan paid to Prince Arthur, the representative of Great Britain in Japan. We treated the representative of the Government of Japan and the representative of the Government of France exactly the same in every respect.

Mr. PARENT: Is there an item in the Estimates about General Pau?

Mr. ROWELL: The money has been paid. I presume an item will be in the Estimates for this year unless the money comes out of the War Vote. General Pau was the guest of Canada, and we were very glad indeed to have the honour of entertaining him.

Excise—travelling expenses, rent, fuel, stationery, etc.—further amount required, $10,000.

Mr. CAHILL: What is this item?

Mr. J. D. REID: Last year the amount was $90,000, to cover the travelling expenses of the officers, rent of buildings, fuel, stationery, etc. The officers state that the estimate was $10,000 short of the amount required, due no doubt to the increased cost of transportation and of fuel.

Mr. CAHILL: Where do the officers use fuel?

Mr. J. D. REID: For heating the buildings in which they are housed. In my home town, for instance, the Excise Department has ten offices, and used from twenty to twenty-five tons of coal last winter. The cost of fuel is very much higher than it was a year ago.

Railways and Canals—Chargeable to collection of revenue—Canadian Government Railways—working expenses—further amount required, $6,000,000.

Mr. J. D. REID: This is to make up the loss in the operation of the Government Railway System during the fiscal year ended March 31.

Mr. VIEN: Is $6,000,000 the total deficit?

Mr. J. D. REID: Yes. The total working expenses of the Canadian Government Railway system during the year were $42,981,603.98, and the earnings $37,493,802.11, which leaves a deficit of about $6,000,000. The deficit is made up as follows: Intercolonial Railway, eastern lines, working expenses for the twelve months, $27,361,349.39, earnings, $25,770,345.70, deficit about a million and three-quarters. Prince Edward Island Railway, working expenses $1,534,846.69, earnings $765,936.52, deficit about $750,000.

Mr. CAHILL: What is the estimated cost of the Prince Edward Island railway?

Mr. J. D. REID: I have not the figures here. This item is for the operation. The working expenses of the International Railway for the year were $532,834.63 and the earnings $198,827, deficit about $300,000. Transcontinental, eastern lines, working expenses $4,088,325.30, earnings $2,904,101.29, deficit about $1,100,000.

Mr. CAHILL: What does the minister mean by the eastern lines?

Mr. J. D. REID: From Quebec to Moncton. Transcontinental, western lines—between Quebec and Winnipeg—working expenses $9,176,663.71, earnings $7,745,835, deficit about $1,600,000.

Mr. VIEN: Will the minister explain how the Government system could not make ends meet while the Canadian Pacific Railway made a good profit? I can understand a deficit on the Transcontinental, but why does not the Intercolonial pay its way?

Mr. J. D. REID: One reason is that since the McAdoo award, in April of last year I think, we have been paying very much higher wages. Coal also cost us very much more, probably $3 or $4 a ton more. The increased freight rates did not come into effect until about September, and in the meantime we were put to the extra expense of increased wages, as well as paying more for coal and other materials. The loss on the Grand Trunk, the Canadian Northern, and, in fact, all the railways, was heavy during that period. The Canadian Pacific also lost very heavily during that period. Of course, that road has earnings from other sources. Its steamship lines, for instance, were making a lot of money, and some even of its railway lines were paying. The Transcontinental and the Intercolonial, of course, have not got the feeders that the Canadian Pacific has.

Mr. PARENT: Has the minister a statement showing the earnings between Quebec and Cochrane?

Mr. J. D. REID: I do not think they keep a record of the revenues earned on different parts of the line in that way, although they keep a record of the revenues earned on the branch lines. They would keep a statement of the revenues between Quebec and Winnipeg, but not between Quebec and Cochrane. If we had a small line, as we have in New Brunswick, they would keep a record of the earnings in their books.

Mr. PARENT: I believe that if an answer had been given to my question it would have shown that the line between Quebec and Cochrane would have been a paying proposition, although the Government have not spent any money there. On the contrary, it has done everything possible to destroy whatever benefit the country might have derived from the construction of a line from Quebec to Cochrane or Quebec to Moncton. That particular part of the Transcontinental was neglected for certain reasons by the Government from 1911 to 1917, I shall not speak of the Government from 1917 up to the present time. All the harm that has been done to the city of Quebec has been done by the Government since 1911. If there is a city that has been particularly neglected so far as railways are concerned it is Quebec. On the south shore of the St. Lawrence, at Levis, you find the most disgusting situation that any one could imagine. I believe there is no city in Canada with a population of 10,000 or 15,000 where a more intolerable situation exists than that at Levis to-day, where, for the last ten or twelve years, the station having been burned down, it has not been replaced. The reason for the course which has been pursued nobody can understand except it be that this city happens to be in the province of Quebec. Although the Quebec bridge has been completed, we have not seen a Transcontinental or Intercolonial train passing over it. Why? There is a city of 125,000 people with the Transcontinental and Intercolonial coming to its door, and yet the Government has not found a way to have a station of its own in that city. What it did was to make an arrangement with the Canadian Pacific, which at that time was quite friendly to the Government. By that arrangement all the trains of the Transcontinental railway will go to the Canadian Pacific station, with the result that all the Canadian National railway business will pass through the terminals of the Canadian Pacific railway. Nothing is done at Quebec and the Government is doing its best to reduce to nothing the $13,000,000 spent on the Quebec bridge. I believe the minister means well, and I would urge upon him that something shall be done. If something is done as a result of the representations which I have made to the minister the few words which I have uttered will not be spoken in vain.

Mr. BELAND: Are the freight rates on the Intercolonial and the Government railways the same as on the other railways in Canada?

Mr. J. D. REID: There may have been some differences in some of the items but I think they were pretty nearly the same.

Mr. BELAND: Will they be the same in the future?

Mr. J. D. REID: The Railway Commission will have to decide whether they should be the same or not.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Does the Transcontinental operate a daily train between Quebec and Amos?

Mr. J. D. REID: I could not say offhand. I understand from the officials that they are making more use of the Transcontinental railway system between Moncton and Quebec and they are getting it in good shape so that they will be able to handle more traffic than in the past. In addition to that they have been running a train between Quebec and Winnipeg three times a week. It is two or three months ago since I discussed the matter with the officials, and they told me that they were going to put more trains on both divisions of the Transcontinental.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I am very glad to hear that, because the Abitibi region where there is a splendid colonization movement going on is going to become more and more the hinterland of Quebec. I read not long ago a lecture delivered in Montreal by a young man named Mr. Authier, the Quebec Colonization agent at Amos. He was describing that district and deploring the fact that the railway facilities were not adequate to the movement of population there. I would ask my hon. friend to look into that question and meet the wishes of the people of that district. The Quebec Government intends to settle returned soldiers there. They have offered lands to them and I think we will see in that district within a very few years another province of Quebec.

Mr. J. D. REID: I agree with the hon. member. I was talking it over with Mr. Brady last year. The traffic is increasing very rapidly. In fact, the statement I have just read shows that to be the case. And they must provide for it. We have been short of equipment of all kinds on account of carrying soldiers. All the passenger cars we could get were required. It is probable that they will be putting the service on that road in the condition in which it should be.

Mr. DECHENE: The hon. member for Quebec West (Mr. Parent) has spoken about the situation at Levis. We, who travel on the south shore, pass there very often, and I regret to say that people have to wait on the platform of the station. They refuse to go into the station. It is practically impossible to go in there and see anything.

Mr. J. D. REID: That very question has been brought to our attention.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It was raised in the Senate the other day.

Mr. J. D. REID: The estimates submitted by the departmental officials for consideration some time ago, before we brought down the Main Estimates, contained an item for a new station at Levis. That item now appears in the Estimates presented to the House, and the station is to be proceeded with this year. I was discussing the matter only a few days ago with the officials, and I can say that the erection of a new station will be undertaken in the near future. I was also discussing the proposed new station at Levis with the hon. member for Lotbiniere (Mr. Vien), and the hon. gentleman will confirm my statement that the officials intend at once to proceed with the work. I realize that a new station should have been built before this. The former structure was destroyed by fire, but by reason of war conditions it has not been replaced at an earlier date. However, the question will not be raised at the next session, because the new station will have been built by that time.

Mr. VIEN: The work was started, but unfortunately it was badly started. The intention of the officials was to put the passenger station on the south side of the tracks, and the freight station on the north side, whereas everybody who is conversant with the conditions there, knows that ninety per cent of the travelling public using the Government railway go from Quebec to the Intercolonial, or from the Intercolonial to Quebec. Yet it was proposed to put the passenger station on the south side of the railway so that all the travelling public would have to cross four or five tracks in order to get to the ferry to cross to Quebec. Furthermore, eighty per cent of the freight that goes into Levis station is for the benefit of the population at Levis and the vicinity. Despite that fact, it was proposed to erect the freight station on the north side of the tracks so that the people of Levis or the neighbourhood would have to cross those tracks to get at their freight. I brought the matter to the attention of the minister whilst Mr. McLeod was in the city, and the minister kindly promised that he would give it his most earnest attention. I hope it will be more than official attention which such promises ordinarily mean; also that the passenger station will be erected on the site of the former structure, and that the freight station will be placed on the other side of the tracks. This question was fully threshed out ten years ago when the first station was erected, but the officials, through some misunderstanding, wished to transpose the new freight and passenger stations in the way I have described, which is contrary to common sense.

Mr. FOURNIER: What is the revenue at Levis station?

Mr. J. D. REID: I will get the information and either give it when we are considering the Estimates later, or send it to my hon. friend.

Mr. FOURNIER: I can furnish the minister with the desired information, and I am able to tell him that the Levis station pays well.

Mr. J. D. REID: I know that.

Mr. FOURNIER: I am able to tell my hon. friend that the tickets taken out there are all local tickets. The revenue of the Intercolonial at that point is about $300,000 a year, the revenue of the Quebec Central about $75,000, and that of the Grand Trunk $25,000, whilst the average number of persons using that station is about sixteen hundred a day. I venture to say these figures represent a traffic that ought to be taken into account. There is no question as to the desirability of building a modern station there, because the present Lévis station is about one of the filthiest structures owned by the Canadian Government.

Mr. J. D. REID: I know it is a bad place.

Mr. FOURNIER: Notwithstanding the poor accommodation a very handsome revenue has been collected at Lévis. That fact should be taken into account and a modern station built there without further delay.

Mr. CAHILL: Does the Government purpose taking into account the capital cost of these railways in estimating the loss to the country? There has been a loss of $6,000,000 on operating expenses, and in view of the public ownership proposition now resolved upon, I want to know if the Government at the present time, or in the future, intends taking into account the cost of the undertaking, and the interest on it, as a part of the carrying cost of the railway?

Mr. J. D. REID: We have never up to the present time taken into consideration the cost of construction in the case of either the Intercolonial or the Transcontinental railway. The statement annually brought down merely showed the earnings and the cost of operation. In future the statement will disclose the total earnings and the cost of operation as in the past, and in addition the amount paid out as intetrest on any liabilities in connection with any of the railways comprised in the Canadian National Railway system. Then hon. gentlemen will know, and the public will understand, the amount invested in the Intercolonial, and if there is any surplus over and above the cost of operation, after all liabilities have been met, that would be set against the capital outlay on the Intercolonial or the Transcontinental. My own impression is that there will not be any surplus for some time; I do not think the public look forward to any surplus from either the Intercolonial or the Transcontinental. On the contrary it has always been supposed, at least in connection with the Intercolonial, that as the construction of that railway was one of the terms of the agreement at Confederation, there would not be any great profit made on the capital investment.

Mr. CAHILL: That is not quite an answer to my question. There is no indebtedness, as I understand, on either the Intercolonial or the Transcontinental Railway, but there is an investment on the part of the Government of something in the neighbourhood of $400,000,000 in the case of these two railways, and Canada is paying five and a half per cent for the money, free of taxation. Now the two railroads represent an investment on the country's part, and in order to get at the merits and demerits of the nationalization of these systems, which has been resolved upon, we must determine their value. In order to ascertain what we are actually doing by reason of their nationalization, we must know what the interest charge is as well as the operating deficit. I therefore wish to know if it is the policy of the Government in future, not only in regard to the Canadian Northern and the Intercolonial and Prince Edward Island Railways, but in regard to all the Government railways, to take into account the actual value of these roads and figure the interest charges together with the operating deficits, so that we can get some idea as to where we stand.

Mr. J. D. REID: We will bring down at the end of the fiscal year a statement showing the total amount of earnings and of operating expenses and the total cost of all the different railways comprised in the Canadian National Railway system. So the House will have a statement showing what the loss or profit may be on the whole system.

Mr. VIEN: Does not the Government think it would be possible, with efficient management, to make these railways at least pay their expenses?

Mr. J. D. REID: The estimate made at the first of the year for the operation of what is now the Canadian National Railway system, if my memory serves me right, shows a deficit of about $7,000,000, that is after paying all fixed charges in connection with operation, interest on bonds, and so on; but that would not take into consideration anything for interest on the Intercolonial or the Transcontinental. The impression conveyed to me by the management is that each year that deficit will decrease. But, you see, we are met with other conditions; for instance, at the present time there are demands for increased wages from all of the employees, and the cost of fuel has gone up, while to offset that there is not any increase in freight rates.

Mr. CAHILL: I hate to delay the Committee, but the minister has repeated a statement now which he has made twice before, when I have asked him for information. He states that the loss will be $7,000,000 and that the surplus of earnings over operating expenses will amount to $3,000,000. Whereas the interest on the Canadian Northern investment alone would amount to $18,000,000, which would mean a loss in the neighbourhood of $15,000,000.

Mr. J. D. REID: When you take the total interest charge of $20,000,000 the loss last year would be $15,000,000 or $16,000,000. But as I explained the freight rates were not increased until September, whereas the increased wages of the employees and the higher cost of fuel ran from practically the first of the year. The management estimate that if they had operated during 1918 with the increased freight rates starting at the same time as the increased operating charges, the loss would have been brought down to about $7,000,000.

Mr. CAHILL: So that according to the minister's statement the loss on operation with the interest on the investment in the Intercolonial and the Transcontinental would be $22,000,000, while with the $15,000,000 on the Canadian Northern undertaking the total deficit would be about $37,000,000. That would be for 1918.

1 a.m.

Mr. J. D. REID: Let me put it my way, which I think is practically the same. The Canadian Northern system, we will say, lost $15,000,000 after paying all interest and other charges. The Intercolonial and the Transcontinental, or the Government Railway system, lost $6,000,000. Those two sums make a total loss of $21,000,000 on operation. Over and above that, if you take into consideration the interest on the investment in the Transcontinental and Intercolonial, there is that further loss, but that has been paid long ago and has not been taken into consideration at any time in bringing the Estimates down.

Mr. CAHILL: There is just one other matter I would like to draw to the minister's attention. At Amos on the Transcontinental there is a very poor station—in fact, it is only a shack. Amos is one of the points at which most of the business on the Transcontinental is done between Cochrane and Quebec, and the people of the district have asked me repeatedly to try to get a better station for them. I have brought the matter to the attention of the Railway Department, but have had very little satisfaction. The settlers also claim that they have great difficulty in getting cars for their pulp wood, and pulp wood is their crop. If they cannot get cars they cannot sell their wood at its proper value, but have to take a ruinous price offered by scalpers. I have known instances where wood that should sell for $6 a cord has had to be sold for $3, or less than the cost of taking it out. The result is that settlers are discouraged and get out of the country as quick as they can.

The road has cost a great deal of money. It is a first class road, running through a good territory. The soil is good and all conditions are conducive to settlement if adequate railway facilities are provided. I hope the Government will take into consideration the necessity of getting people into that part of the country in order to get traffic for the road and make it pay. The passenger service is very bad, and I have been told by people in that district that there is no mail service on that railway; in sending money from one place to another they have to take a chance with the baggage. There is a bank at Amos, which takes in large sums to pay for pulpwood and other commodities. The man in charge of that bank told me that he was worried every day of his life lest something might happen to the large sums of money that were being taken into that country, and asked me to try to get a better mail service in that district.

Mr. J. D. REID: Mr. Brady told me last fall that they had cleaned up every bit of pulpwood along the Transcontinental. Since we got the new cars I have not heard any complaint about getting cars for the pulpwood. As to the train service, I took that up with Mr. Brady and it is the intention to put a better service on that line. I will bring to the attention of the management the question of a new station at Amos. I assure the hon. member there will be no more delays for the want of cars. We had many complaints about a year ago, but during the last few months there have been practically none.

Mr. PARENT: Last fall a flood on the line of the Canadian Northern railway caused the destruction of part of the line at Cap Rouge and since then it has not been in use. Will the repairs be made at once?

Mr. J. D. REID: I took that up with the general manager a few days ago, and he assured me they were going to make those repairs at once.

Mail service—further amount required, $475,000.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Does this provide for increases of salaries to rural postmasters or mail carriers?

Mr. ROWELL: It includes increases to rural mail carriers and increases for railway transportation due to a larger service. Many trains that were taken off in 1916, were restored in 1918 at the same rate and that involved an additional expenditure of $130,000. Where new contracts for land conveyance have to be made the prices have been so much higher that an additional charge of $345,000 is involved.

Mr. CASGRAIN: Is it the intention of the Government to increase the salaries of rural postmasters? On account of the high cost of living these people can hardly make both ends meet. It is hard to get a man to take a rural post office; it is not a paying proposition. We have been voting increases to deputy ministers, judges and others; there is even talk of increasing the indemnity to members of Parliament. These postmasters ought to be given an increase.

Mr. ROWELL: This item does not deal with that matter. I stated when the subject was discussed on the Main Estimates that certain representations had been made to the Government, that about the midsummer of 1918 an increase had been granted, and that the view of the department was that we should see what the effect of that would be, and probably take action next year. The matter, however, is still before the department for consideration.

To cover unprovided items, 1917-18, as per Auditor General's Report, part b, page 3, 1917-18, $83,296.75.

Mr. COPP: What is the explanation of this item?

Mr. FIELDING: This is not an appropriation; it is a book-keeping entry which the Auditor General asks for at the close of the year to meet a lot of small items amounting in the aggregate to the sum stated.

Mr. COPP: I have looked up the Auditor General's Report and I find that in every case the grant has not been all expended. In the case of Pensions, for instance, the amount of the grant not used was $2,764,135.

Mr. FIELDING: I have not looked at the items; I was only explaining the custom of the Auditor General in putting in such an item as this.

Mr. COPP: At page B—3 of the Auditor General's Report there are columns for the grant in respect of each service, the expenditure, the grant not used and the grant exceeded. In the case of pensions, the amount of the grant not used was over $2,764,000, and the amount of the grant exceeded is stated to be $62,000.

Mr. ROWELL: That relates to the Public Accounts for 1917-18 whereas the vote we are making to-night is for 1918-19.

Mr. LEMIEUX: This seems a very improper way of voting money—" to cover unprovided items, 1917-18." We are entitled to get the details as we have them for the other items.

Mr. COPP: What are the unprovided items?

Mr. J. D. REID: The items are all given in part 3, page 3. The Auditor General says that in the item " adulteration of food," for instance, there is an excess over the grant of $191.36, then charges of management, an excess over grant of $2,359.75, and so on. He gives the items in detail, amounting to $83,296.75.

Mr. COPP: What is the grant not used, Trade and Commerce, $1,023,276.22, when the same item shows, grant exceeded, $2,989.04?

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is very unsatisfactory, and when this item comes up the Auditor General should not be exempt from the responsibility of giving the nature of the items on which the grants were exceeded, so that we may know what the money went for.

Mr. J. D. REID: If hon. members want this item to stand we can strike it out and pass the Bill without it.

Mr. ROWELL: I have not seen the page of the Auditor General's Report, but is not this the explanation? I presume, where an appropriation is for a particular item, even although it may not be all expended, the Auditor General has no authority to pay excess expenditure on any item out of an item on which there is an excess. I should presume the items represent the aggregate of the item in which the expenditure was in excess of the estimate.

Mr. COPP: It does not say so; it says just the reverse.

Mr. CAHILL: What harm is there in letting this item stand?

Mr. ROWELL: We cannot introduce the Bill to give effect to this estimate until all the items are through, and we want, when His Excellency the Governor General comes down within the next two or three days to assent, to have this Bill ready for assent.

Mr. VIEN: Will there be any possibility of coming back to the item at a later date if we pass it?

Mr. J. D. REID: We can get from the Auditor General the whole details of this and a letter explaining the matter, and put it in Hansard to-morrow.

Mr. CAHILL: We shall have to pass it first.

Mr. ROWELL: I have just had an opportunity of glancing at this, but the explanation appears on the face of the statement. It gives the different items in which the grant is exceeded.

Mr. BELAND: Will the minister look at the item pensions—grant exceeded, $62,475.31; grant not used, $2,764,135.97? The amount voted was $10,000,000, the amount expended $7,000,000, part of the grant not used, and then the Auditor General wants $62,475.31 more.

Mr. ROWELL: There appears to be some mistake there.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I think we have done very well this evening, and we shall get the report to-morrow and then pass the item.

Mr. J. D. REID: I would let this item stand and pass the others and introduce the Bill without this one. I would like to pass the Bill, because we may not go into Supply again to-morrow as we were going on with Bills.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If the minister will bring an explanation from the Auditor General to-morrow, that is necessary.

Mr. J. D. REID: I will put the whole details on Hansard to-morrow.

Mr. COPP: That may be all right, but I cannot understand what this means.

Mr. J. D. REID: I admit it requires explanation.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by asterisks.)

CANADIAN NORTHERN RAILWAY SYSTEM.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough):

1. What was the aggregate amount of fixed charges (interest or securities) on the Canadian Northern Railway System for the year ending December 31, 1918?

2. With reference to the statement of the Honourable Minister of Railways (page 1678 Hansard) that the net earnings of the Canadian Northern Railway System for the calendar year of 1918 were $3,562,303.40, did the minister make provision in striking this balance for the payment of the said fixed charges?

3. If not, what would be the deficit for the said year after all fixed charges were provided for?

4. With reference to the statement of the minister that the Government has not assumed the outstanding liabilities of the Canadian Northern System, is it possible for the Government to nationalize and become the owners of this railway system without assuming its liabilities?

Hon. J. D. REID:

1. The amount of fixed charges on the Canadian Northern railway system for year ended December 31, 1918, is $17,735,522.31. Included in this amount is interest payable to Government amounting to $3,900,529.15.

2. No.

3. The deficit for year 1918 after the fixed charges were provided for is $14,333,085.07.

4. The Dominion Government are shareholders of the Canadian Northern railway, and as such do not necessarily assume all its liabilities.

LAND GRANTS TO RELIGIOUS DENOMINATIONS.

Mr. BOYCE:

1. How many grants of land have been made to religious denominations and institutions by the Federal Government since 1896?

2. What was the amount of each grant?

3. When, and to what religious denomination or institutions was it made, and where located?

4. Have requests been made for grants which have not been acceded to?

5. If so, by whom and where located?

Hon. Mr. MEIGHEN:

1. 290.

2. Answered by No. 3.

3. Schedule attached. (Placed on Clerk's table.)

4 and 5. No record kept of requests for grants which have not been acceded to.

UNOPPOSED MOTIONS FOR PAPERS.

Mr. PEDLOW:

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, reports, letters of reference, agreement, correspondence, and other documents between Dr. F. Montizambert, Director of the Bureau of Public Health, the Department of Agriculture, and the Department of Immigration; regarding the appointment of Dr. W. H. Drury to position of Assistant Medical Superintendent and Bacteriologist at William Head Quarantine Station, Victoria, B.C.; and Professor Gunn, Secretary of American Journal of Public Health, the Principal of Institute Technology, Cambridge, Mass.; the Principals of Harvard and McGill Universities, Dr. R. Nelson, of William Head Quarantine Station, Victoria, B.C., Military Officers, of Victoria, B.C., and elsewhere. Report of investigation held at request of Dr. Drury, by A. B. Cook, at Victoria, B.C., on December 30 and 31, 1918. Letters from Hon. A. J. Calder in reference to this subject and investigation, covering the period from January, 1917, up to present date.

Mr. SINCLAIR (Antigonish and Guysborough):

For a return showing the quantities of fresh (frozen) and salt fish shipped from Canada to England, France and other allied countries overseas, under the direction of the Canadian Government, during the war, distinguishing between salt and fresh fish; also setting forth the quantities supplied to the Canadian troops overseas and the quantity sold to the ordinary consumer; also a statement in detail showing the names and Post Office addresses of the parties from whom the said fish was purchased and the prices paid therefor, respectively.

COMMITTEE ON FISHERIES.

On the Orders of the Day:

Hon. W. S. FIELDING (Shelburne and Queen's): May I be permitted to call the attention of the Acting Prime Minister (Sir Thomas White) to an omission in the matter of a committee? It has been customary during the last two sessions for the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Ballantyne) to be a member of the Committee on Fisheries, but by some accident his name has not been included this session. I would think it very desirable that the minister should be a member of that Committee, and I would suggest that the Acting Prime Minister move for the addition of his name.

Sir THOMAS WHITE (Acting Prime Minister): I am glad my hon. friend has drawn the matter to my attention. I shall make the motion to-morrow.

SUPPLY BILL.

Sir THOMAS WHITE moved the third reading of Bill No. 113 granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial year ended the 31st March, 1919.

Motion agreed to, Bill read the third time and passed.

FERTILIZERS ACT AMENDMENT.

House again in Committee on Bill No. 74, to amend the Fertilizers Act, 1909, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 2—phosphoric acid content or other ingredients to be stated.

Mr. McKENZIE: I understood the minister was going to have the Bill reprinted.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It was reprinted and distributed. The other evening the member for Brome asked why phosphoric acid or phosphorus was stated in terms of ammonia and in reply to him I said that in the trade phosphorus or phosphoric acid was so expressed. Superficially, that might amount to a contradiction in terms. Ammonia is recovered as a by-product in the manufacture of gas from coal, but the greater proportion of ammonia is nitrogen. In 17 pounds of ammonia 14 pounds would be of the other ingredient. The technical officer of the department has never been in favour of expressing this particular ingredient in the terms of ammonia, and he has always been willing and anxious to use the term nitrogen. In many countries the term nitrogen is used instead of ammonia, and since our discussion on this Bill the other night he has expressed a preference for an amendment. I am of the same opinion and move that the word 'nitrogen' be inserted instead of 'ammonia.'

Mr. DUFF: Why is it necessary to have the word 'agent?' The agent might be a man selling goods after receiving them from the manufacturer's factory.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The main Act provides that when fertilizer is manufactured outside of the country the manufacturer must be represented here by an agent on whom processes might be served, in every way as if the manufacturer was resident here.

Sir SAM HUGHES: What is the Association of Official Agricultural Chemists of North America? I know who they are, but what is the official permanent constitution?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It is merely an association of agricultural chemists, the membership of which includes Canadians as well as Americans.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Have they any corporate or official existence?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes. They have a corporate existence but have no official recognition. They are, however, regarded on the continent of North America as the association best capable of expressing accurate scientific opinions on these matters.

Sir SAM HUGHES: From what source do they obtain their constitution—the United States Government or the Canadian Government, or what?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: They have a corporate existence, but it is merely an association. Originally the membership was composed entirely of Americans, but recently it was opened to Canadians. At the present time I think there is only one Canadian a member of the association, that is Dr. McGill, the chief analyst of the Dominion Government.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Is not this very slipshod legislation? We are practically giving a constitution to a body that has no official recognition.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There are many things analogous to this. For instance, the British Pharmacopoeia is recognized as a standard work by all countries, although it has no official recognition other than that given it by statute. There is an association of engineers—I forget the exact designation of it—which includes American and Canadian engineers, and they recommend standards that are accepted all over the world.

Sir SAM HUGHES: They have a constitution. The Society of Canadian Engineers and the Society of American Civil Engineers have each a constitution.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes, which they make themselves.

Sir SAM HUGHES: Under control.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No, not under control.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What is meant by "organic products"?

Mr. MACLEAN: Animal products as distinct from mineral products, as, for instance, tankage and offal from abattoirs, and products of that kind.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Fish offal?

Mr. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: And mussel mud, spoken of the other night?

Mr. MACLEAN: No.

Mr. SINCLAIR: That is not included?

Mr. MACLEAN: No.

Mr. SHEARD: With regard to the percentage of nitrogen, is this free nitrogen or nitrogen in compounds?

[Mr. A. K. Maclean.]

Mr. MACLEAN: Nitrogen in compounds. The only possible way of getting free nitrogen would be to grow clover and plough it into the soil.

Mr. SHEARD: You can get it from the air.

Mr. MACLEAN: Clover and one or two other agricultural products such as peas and beans, are the only plant life which can absorb nitrogen freely from the air and transmit it to the soil.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—registration number:

On section 9—stamps to be affixed to packages:

Mr. COPP: How will this license fee be paid?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The fee is to be paid by the manufacturer according to the ingredients contained in the fertilizer. If it contains nitrogen, phosphoric acid and potash, he will pay $24; if there is only one of these ingredients, $8, or if two, $16. The purpose of this section is to get a revenue to assist in meeting the expense of the administration of the Act. In connection with most Acts of this character, where there has to be an official inspection and oversight of the manufacture and distribution of the article, it has become the practice to make a charge. In the United States and some European countries the license fee is determined upon the principle we are adopting in this section. It seems to be satisfactory to the trade; at least, I am instructed that the officers of the department have conferred with the manufacturers and that they do not disapprove.

Mr. COPP: It seems to me that this charge will only be passed on to the consumer of the fertilizer. Fertilizer is selling at a very high price now; it will continue high, and the extra license fee of the dealer will naturally be added to the price and the farmer will have to pay for it.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not think it will seriously affect the price to the consumer. At any rate, the State is entitled to some contribution in connection with the administration of the Act.

Mr. COPP: The minister said that it seemed to satisfy the trade. Has he had any correspondence with the consumers and farmers who have to purchase this fertilizer or with any farmer's association?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I cannot say that there has been any consultation with the consumer. I would like to impress upon my hon. friend that the tax is merely upon the brand. It is not $8, $16, or $24 per ton. The manufacturer may sell 100,000 tons of a certain brand but he will only be charged $24. It will not afford any substantial proportion of the cost to the department of the administration of the Act. I do not think it is a burdensome tax or that it will meet with any opposition from the consumer.

Mr. McCOIG: This seems to be a very simple matter to take up the time of the House with. As other matters come before the House, as commissions and officers are appointed, the department itself provides for defraying the expense, but when it comes to such an important question as fertilizer is to the producers of this country and also to the consumers, it does seem ridiculous that a little cent or two cent tax has to be collected to defray the expenses of the officer who administers the Act. I do not see why the department does not assume the responsibility itself and pay the expenses of the administration of the Act instead of having some officer pulling a cent or two cent tax or a hundred pounds out of the purchaser of the fertilizer and administering the Act at his expense. In the department there are men who are being paid by the Government to look after matters of this kind without penalizing the consumer by collecting a cent on every hundred pounds or twenty cents on every ton. They will have to keep a lot of bookkeepers to keep track of the administration of this Act and the distribution of the stamps. It is going to involve a lot of unnecessary expense.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I assume that my hon. friend knows that all fertilizers manufactured in Canada must be inspected by technical officers under a department of government.

Mr. McCOIG: Will the minister not admit that that has already been provided for?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That is being done now and largely for the protection of the public. It is also in the interest of the manufacturer that this inspection shall take place because it is a guarantee to the public of the character of his products. The tax imposed under this section is very small indeed and it will not yield more than one-tenth of the total cost of administering the Act. It is a tax that the manufacturer alone will pay. It will be so small that I do not think it will be placed on the consumer. This is a step in the right direction. Furthermore, it has the support of precedent in all countries of the world. I think it is fair legislation.

Mr. COPP: My hon. friend says that the tax is not to be imposed at the rate of so much per ton or anything of that kind. That is quite correct. It says "no manufacturer or agent shall sell or offer for sale." At the smaller points throughout the country districts there will be a number of agents appointed to handle fertilizers and each one of them must pay this fee, as I understand.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No; the word "agent" has a definition. I have not the Act before me but provision is made that every manufacturer who exports from another country into Canada must have registered with the minister the name of the Canadian agent. Before that agent can sell in Canada on behalf of his principal he must get a license. This license is not required by every dealer or retailer.

Mr. COPP: That is the point I was making because the section says "no manufacturer or agent."

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The word "agent" has a special definition.

On section 10—how analysis is obtained:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: This clause is the same as the one in the present Act with the exception of the last sentence reading as follows:

The certificate of the analyst shall be accepted as legal evidence in the courts.

Mr. SEXSMITH: What is the object of charging a dollar for the analysis referred to here? I think that is detrimental to the working of the Act?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The fee is a nominal one and intended to aid in reducing the cost of administering the Act. It is a provision which has been in force ever since the Fertilizer Act was enacted.

Mr. SEXSMITH: It does not seem wise to demand a dollar from a man who purchases fertilizer and then asks the department to make an analysis of it. I think the department should make the analysis without charging the public any fee whatever. It would then be some protection perhaps to the public and it would be the making of such analyses. I do not think the Government requires the payment of this fee in the case of other products.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am afraid that if the department were to undertake to make analyses of fertilizers without any charge whatever, the time of the officers would be fully taken up for the whole year. The levying of the fee is rather a guarantee of the bona fides and the responsibility of the man who sends in the sample for analysis. So far as I am aware there is no objection to its payment.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Where analyses are made by departments of the Government, under other Acts, for example in the case of seed wheat, samples can be sent in and the analysis does not cost anything.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The scientific determination of the ingredients of a fertilizer is much more difficult, I think, than an analysis of grain seeds, and occupies a good deal of time.

Mr. SEXSMITH: In the case of such commodities as pepper, samples are required to be sent in to the Government from time to time, and those who forward the samples are not required to pay for the analysis.

Mr. BURNHAM: I think if the minister will consider the circumstances, he will agree that those who sell fertilizers should be responsible for the good quality of the product. If a merchant says, "I have fertilizer for sale," and induces a farmer to purchase it and spread it over his farm, and subsequently the farmer ascertains that it is of bad quality, surely the latter should not be made responsible for that? Surely the same care that is shown by the department with regard to seed wheat, and other seed grain, should be bestowed upon fertilizers?

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the clause carry?

Mr. SEXSMITH: No. I think that under the provisions of another Act the title of which I do not at present recall, the millers and other persons who produce stock foods are required to brand and indicate the percentage of proteins and food values of the different foods which they sell upon the package but they are not charged any fee such as is imposed here. Any one producing those foods can forward a sample to the department at Ottawa and have it analyzed in order to determine what the percentage of food value is, and if it is in accordance with the brand, and percentages marked on the package. In such cases as that the Government does not collect a fee, I do not think it should be done in this instance. To my mind the imposition of a fee is unnecessary; the Government should perform that service free of charge.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not think my hon. friend really has any substantial objection to this small fee. The fertilizer is inspected and analyzed at the place of production by our own inspectors. Inspectors are on the spot making purchases themselves from the dealers in order to make certain that there is no evasion of the Act by the disposal of inferior brands to the public. The number of requests for analyses of fertilizers made by private individuals throughout Canada to the department is very small, indeed, and I do not think that anybody who wants an analysis will object to paying a fee.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Perhaps the exaction of a fee is the reason why such a small number of samples for analysis has been received. I do not think you will find the number is small in the case of other products where there is no charge for making the analysis.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is a fee of one dollar.

Mr. SEXSMITH: My impression was to the contrary.

On Section 15—Penalties.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Under what circumstances is a fine imposed upon the purchaser?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: It would only apply to a case of a purchaser who proposed to sell the fertilizer again and become the principal in the transaction.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: The clause does not make that clear. As now worded, I think it would apply to any purchaser.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Section 14 of the Act declares:—

> This Act shall not apply to fertilizers which are manufactured to the order of the purchaser, and are not intended for sale, unless such fertilizers be actually sold by such purchaser.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Any one acting as an agent for the manufacturer of fertilizers, or a merchant dealing in fertilizers, will feel it to be incumbent upon him to have an analysis made in order to determine that the product before the sale is made is up to standard. If not he is liable to a penalty.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. McCOIG: Where will the stamps for these packages be obtained? Will special offices be established in different municipalities for that purpose? I wrote the department some time ago about an officer stationed in a town in my constituency who was paid a salary of $600 or $700 a year, and only sold a few dollars' worth of stamps.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: We have abandoned the method of taxing through stamps, and substituted for it the imposition of a license fee for the brand amounting to $8, $16, or $24, according to whether or not the fertilizer contains one, two, or three of the three specified ingredients—nitrogen, phosphoric acid, and potash.

Mr. McCOIG: Will the stamp go with the license?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The license will cover the stamps.

Mr. McCOIG: It will not be necessary to have an inland revenue officer in a particular locality to sell stamps?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Not to sell stamps.

Mr. McCOIG: Is not the inland revenue officer in the town of Wallaceburg still selling stamps for the Inland Revenue Department?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: No. The Fertilizer Act of 1909 did not require these stamps to be affixed. The Bill introduced a few days ago did, but the policy has since been abandoned.

On schedule A:

Mr. SEXSMITH: You provide in this schedule that a representative of the department taking a sample for analysis must take it in the presence of one or more witnesses; but where an individual purchases fertilizer and sends to the department for analysis a sample of one pound accompanied by a dollar, and the sample is found to be below the proper standard, the agent or manufacturer is liable to a penalty without the benefit of any safeguard so far as the taking of the sample is concerned.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If a farmer, for instance, sends to the department for analysis a sample of fertilizer which he has purchased, having in mind probable action against the manufacturer, he must be able to prove in court that the sample he sent to the department is the same as the fertilizer purchased. The department is merely asked to make an analysis of a certain fertilizer. That is all they propose to do, and that is all they can do.

Mr. SEXSMITH: Then it seems to me there is all the greater reason why we should not charge that dollar fee. A purchaser of fertilizer in order to find out whether the article is up to the guarantee or not has to send to the department a sample of one pound accompanied by a dollar, and if on analysis the sample is below standard he has to take legal action himself. The result will be that no individual will ask the department for an analysis under those conditions, and you might just as well have that clause struck out.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Section B of the Act in reference to samples submitted by a purchaser deals with that. It is:

> Samples of fertilizer submitted by a purchaser for analysis must be enclosed in glass jars or bottles and properly sealed, and samples must be taken in the presence of the vendor or his representative.

Bill reported as amended.

BANKRUPTCY ACT.

House again in Committee on Bill No. 18 respecting Bankruptcy.—Mr. Guthrie.

The CHAIRMAN: When this Bill was last before the Committee all the clauses had been considered, but a certain number were allowed to stand.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We might refer again to one or two of the early sections because there are still some clerical errors to be corrected. I refer to p. 2 of the Bill, subsection (j).

I move that we insert the word "bank" before "chartered bank" in the fifth line on p. 2.

Mr. McKENZIE: Will the minister please explain the reason for the insertion of the word "bank?" Are not all banks chartered banks?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Because both terms are used in the Bill. Some clauses contain the word "bank," other clauses the words "chartered bank." We want a definition applying to both terms. I move also that the word "operating" in the second line of subsection (j) be struck out and the words "carrying on the business of banking" be substituted therefor; and that the words "of Canada" at the end of the subsection be struck out.

Amendments agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

On section 14—appointment of trustees:

Mr. GUTHRIE: I move that the words "and he may in his discretion revoke any such appointment made" at the end of subsection (1) be struck out. Section 31-K of the Interpretation Act gives power to remove, pertaining to all appointments.

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

On section 20—powers exercisable by trustee with permission of inspectors:

Mr. GUTHRIE: It has been pointed out since this section was adopted that there is no provision in it with regard to what estate a trustee can convey. Of course, it is assumed that he can convey all the estate of the debtor. It has been suggested that a declaration to that effect be incorporated in the Bill. It has also been drawn to my attention that there is a difficulty in the province of Quebec in regard to trustees' deeds; they do not operate in that province quite in the same way as they do in other provinces. It
4 p.m. seems that liens, mortgages, hypothecs and the like are not removed by trustee's deed and a clear title cannot be conveyed. Several prominent members of the Bar of the province of Quebec have directed my attention to this fact and have suggested an amendment so that we might give to a trustee's deed in that province the same effect as is now given to a sheriff's deed. Personally I see no objection to inserting a clause to that effect, if it is the desire of the Committee. I move that the following be added as subsection (3):

All sales of real estate made by the trustee shall vest in the purchaser all the legal and equitable estate of the debtor therein.

That will be the general clause. Then I move that the following be added as subclause (a) of subsection (2):

(a) In the province of Quebec a sale of real estate made by the trustee shall have the same effect as to mortgages, hypothecs or privileges then existing thereon as if the same had been made by a sheriff in the said province under a writ of execution issued in the ordinary course, and the title conveyed by such sale in the said province shall have equal validity with a title created by sheriff's sale and the conveyance of the trustee shall have the same effect as a sheriff's deed in the said province.

Mr. JACOBS: The section is much improved by the amendment suggested by the Solicitor General.

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

On section 24—reports to creditors by trustee:

Mr. GUTHRIE: It has been suggested that we put in some clause which will give the public an opportunity of examining the records referred to in subsection (2) and, if necessary, of obtaining copies. I move that the following be added as subsection (3) of section 24:

Any person shall be entitled to examine and make copies of all or any of the documents mentioned in subsection (2) hereof.

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

On section 14, subsection 4—general security to be given by trustee:

Mr. GUTHRIE: The hon. member (Mr. Jacobs) was going to move some amendment providing for interest on cash securities.

Mr. JACOBS: When this subsection was before the Committee a few days ago, I suggested that interest at the rate of 5½ per cent be paid on any cash deposited with the Government. I am not wedded to any particular rate; the rate might be 5 per cent, but any party who makes a cash deposit should receive some interest on his money while it is being used by the Government.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I do not think any cash will be deposited as security. I think the deposit will be in the shape of guaranteed bonds, but if cash is deposited, current bank rates on deposits, namely, 3 or 3½ per cent, might be given. If my hon. friend will draft an amendment, I shall be glad to consider it.

Subsection stands.

On section 14, subsection 8—additional security to be given by trustee:

Mr. GUTHRIE: This stood at the request of my hon. friend (Mr. Jacobs), who thought that we should put in a specific clause that the registrar might enforce any bond in event of default. I have given the matter a good deal of consideration, and I think the clause is properly drawn as it is, but if my hon. friend has any suggestion to make, I will consider it.

Mr. JACOBS: If the Solicitor General (Mr. Guthrie) as such, will assume the responsibility that the clause is all right, I will let it go, but some day he may have to run the gauntlet of the court, and if I have to argue the matter, I will argue that the desire of the Solicitor General prevailed and not mine.

Subsection agreed to.

On section 14, subsection 11—security surrendered:

Mr. JACOBS: Under this section, there are to be given by the trustee two forms of securities, one to the Government and the other to the registrar. Therefore, it might be well to indicate that both these securities would have to be turned over.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The subsection says "the security provided for by this section," and both forms are provided under this section. I think that would include them both.

Mr. JACOBS: Why not say "securities" instead of "security?"

Mr. GUTHRIE: Subsection 4 provides for the general security; subsection 8 provides for the additional security which the creditors may require. Subsection 11 reads:

Upon payment by the trustee of the final dividend the security provided for by this section—

I think that would cover it all.

Mr. JACOBS: The two securities?

Mr. GUTHRIE: If there were a dozen, they would be covered by this subsection.

Mr. JACOBS: The Solicitor General thinks it would refer to the securities provided in subsections 4 and 8?

Mr. GUTHRIE: As a matter of fact, the $10,000 security would not be discharged, because it would be of a continuing character. If the trustee asked that it be discharged, he would be disqualified for the future.

Subsection agreed to.

On section 15, subsection 1—new trustee may be substituted:

Mr. GUTHRIE: This stood at the request of the hon. member for Royal (Mr. H. H. McLean). I think in small estates he desired that creditors representing three-fourths in value of the estate should have the right to appoint a trustee to manage the estate. I think we should pass the clause as drafted and stick to the authorized trustee.

Mr. JACOBS: As the hon. member for Royal is not here, I ask that the clause be passed forthwith.

Mr. PROULX: If those trustees are only in large centres, there will be small estates in small places where it would not be convenient for the trustee to act. Indeed, he may not care to act. Can he not delegate somebody to act for him?

Mr. GUTHRIE: So long as he assumes the responsibility, he may delegate somebody to act for him, but the authorized trustee must be the responsible party. He may, I have no doubt, operate through an agent in a small estate.

Subsection agreed to.

On section 29, subsection 1—avoidance of certain settlements:

Mr. GUTHRIE: Perhaps I might be permitted to make a short explanation in regard to section 29 for the benefit of some members of the Committee who are not lawyers. These three subsections are somewhat intricate and drawn in legal and technical language. The object of them is to avoid certain settlements commonly known as voluntary or fraudulent settlements as against creditors, and at the same time due care has, I think, been taken to protect all genuine, bona fide settlements entered into for good consideration and for laudable purposes. Section 29, subsection 1, applies to what I might call settlements which have been made and completed prior to bankruptcy. There are three classes of settlements to which it was not applied. First, it does not apply to a settlement made before and in consideration of marriage; second, it does not apply to a settlement made in favour of a purchaser or incumbrancer in good faith and for valuable consideration; third, it does not apply to a settlement made on or for the wife or children of the settlor of property which has accrued to the settlor after marriage in right of his wife.

With these three exceptions it applies to all other voluntary settlements, and if they are made within one year of the date of the bankruptcy such settlements are to be void against the trustee. If the bankruptcy happens within five years of the date of settlement they will be void against the trustee unless the parties claiming under the settlement can prove the following: First, that the settler was, at the time he made the settlement, able to pay all his debts without resort to the property which comprised the settlement; and, secondly, that the interest of the settler in the property passed out of his hands at the time of settlement. Subsection 2 seeks to avoid as preferences certain marriage convenants or contracts which are not uncommonly made in this country, but which are more prevalent in Great Britain, that is, covenants or promises made in consideration of marriage that at some future time the husband or the wife, as the case may be, will settle on the other party property of some kind, either in money, securities or in land. Subsection 2 provides that any covenant or contract to settle at a future time made by a person in consideration of his or her marriage, either for the future payment of money for the benefit of the settlor's wife or husband or children, or for the future settlement on or for the settlor's wife or husband or children, of property wherein the settlor had not at the date of the marriage any estate or interest whether vested or contingent, shall be void as against the trustee, except within certain very stringent limitations. Subsection 3 applies to any payment of money or any transfer of property which may hereafter be made by the settlor pursuant to any promise or covenant made before marriage. These sections apply only to settlements hereafter made. We do not seek by this clause to interfere with settlements which have been made, or covenants or promises which have been entered into prior to the coming into operation of this Act. But for the future, covenants or contracts entered into for the settlement of property in consideration of marriage will, speaking, generally, be void in the case of bankruptcy as against the trustee for the creditors. That is the object sought to be attained by section 29 and the three subsections. It is merely carrying into effect, and perhaps extending a little, a principle which has been known to English law from at least the days of Elizabeth, because it is under the statute of XIII Elizabeth that we first find any law in regard to voluntary or fraudulent preference or conveyances. Away back in the reign of Queen Elizabeth it was enacted that any conveyance which has the effect of hindering, defeating, delaying, or defrauding a creditor is void unless it be made for good cause and be bona fide. We have carried that law up to the present time in Canada and in all the provinces of Canada. This section 29 is merely declaratory of the extent of that law, and expressly states in what limitations certain settlements and covenants will be upheld in the future as against a trustee in bankruptcy. I move as an amendment to subsection 3 of section 29 that in line 47, after the word " insurance," the following words be inserted:—

[Mr. Guthrie.]

In favour of the husband, wife, child or children of the settlor.

The effect of this will be that no policy of life insurance in favour of the husband, wife, child, or children will be attacked as preference. That, I think, is in accordance with modern law on the subject, where these various parties are recognized in matters of insurance as privilege persons.

Mr. PROULX: Do you not include the mother? Under the Insurance Act the mother is in the preferred class.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I have not included the mother. The insurance privilege applies only to the husband, wife, child, or children. I also move that the word " persons," in line 2 of page 25, be replaced by the word " person." It should be singular.

On section 30—avoidance of general assignment of book debts:

Mr. GUTHRIE: I move that the word "authorized" in the second line be struck out. It is improperly there.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 31, subsection 3—when transaction deemed a preference:

Mr. GUTHRIE: I move that subsection 3 be struck out. I suppose that there is no clause in any Bankruptcy Bill or any assignment and preferences act which causes as much trouble to the bar, the public and the courts as the question raised in section 31 of the present Bill. It is drawn with the purpose of avoiding anything like a preference as between creditors, and at the same time with the idea of protecting whatever is a bona fide transaction. The first part of the clause is an adaptation of section 44 of the English Bankruptcy Act. It goes a little further than the language of the English Bankruptcy Act, and so do many of the Statutes of the provinces of Canada. We have declared in section 31, as drawn, that where a transaction is entered into with a view to giving a creditor preference over other creditors it shall be null and void, or where a transaction is one which has the effect of giving such creditor a preference over the others it shall be void as against the trustee. These last words are not in the English section but have been for many years in the Ontario Act, and, I think, in the Acts of a great many of the provinces of Canada.

An attempt was made in subsection 3 of section 31 to extend the law considerably because in that the drafter of the Bill undertook to define what should be deemed to have the effect of giving a creditor a preference. That is going a step beyond any legislation on the subject of bankruptcy as far as I know. A great many protests were received in regard to subsection 3. Many of the ablest lawyers have communicated with me on the subject and various commercial bodies have also sent their representations. Upon the whole, I am inclined to think it would be wiser simply to eliminate subsection 3 altogether and in its place to substitute a clause which will be section 33 when we come to that section. I therefore move that subsection 3 of section 31 be struck out.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 32—recovering proceeds if reconveyed:

Mr. GUTHRIE: Clause 32 I think is misplaced in so far as its order goes. I am going to move that this clause be numbered 33 and that sections 32 and 33 be transposed. I therefore beg to move:

That clause 32 be numbered clause 33 and that clause 33 be replaced by clause 32.

Motion agreed to.

On section 33 (now section 32)—protection of bona fide transactions without notice.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That clause is an innovation and goes farther than any legislation I am aware of up to the present time. It is open to the same objection as was section 31 subsection 3. After considering the matter and having the benefit of the best legal ability I have concluded that the clause should be struck out and a new clause substituted therefor almost identical with the clause that now appears in the Ontario Assignments and Preferences Act. The clause which I beg to move to take the place of clause 32 is as follows:

Nothing in the next preceding section of this Act shall apply to any bona fide sale or payment made in the ordinary course of trade or calling to an innocent purchaser or person; nor to any payment of money to a creditor, nor to any bona fide conveyance, assignment, transfer or delivery over of any goods or property of any kind which is made in consideration of a present actual bona fide payment in money, or by way of security for a present actual bona fide advance of money, or which is made in consideration of a present actual bona fide sale or delivery of goods or other property where the money paid, or the goods or other property sold or delivered bear a fair and reasonable relative value to the consideration thereof.

Section 32 as amended agreed to.

On section 37, paragraph 9—no action for dividend:

Mr. GUTHRIE: That was allowed to stand because I was not quite sure of the explanation of the language used. Subsection 9 provides that no action shall lie against the trustee for a dividend but that you shall apply summarily to the court for an order. The court may make an order and under the clause providing penalties, section 96, the trustee is subject to fine and imprisonment if he fails to obey the order. It makes provision for recovery of anything in the hands of the trustee very simple and expeditious.

Mr. JACOBS: When we were discussing that subsection a few days ago there was a suggestion that the first portion of it should be left out. It reads:

No action for a dividend shall lie against the trustee.

It would then read

If the trustee refuses to pay any dividend the court may, if it thinks fit, order him to pay it, and also to pay out of his own money interest thereon for the time that it is withheld and the costs of the application.

I cannot see the utility of having the first part of the section stand as it is.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The object is to prevent the estate from being put to undue costs or money being frittered away in needless actions. We do not want to permit an action to be taken because a summary application would be a cheaper process. The English Act forbids action being brought under the same circumstances.

Mr. JACOBS: We are trying to arrive at the same idea. Why insert the words:

No action for a dividend shall lie against the trustee.

Why should they not be eliminated?

Mr. GUTHRIE: If these words were not there, the creditor could bring action and the estate might be let in for a lot of costs.

Mr. JACOBS: That would be an action between the creditor and the trustee personally.

Mr. GUTHRIE: He might sue the trustee on behalf of the creditor and this is to prevent action being taken.

On section 37—paragraph 10—unclaimed dividends to be paid to Minister of Finance:

Mr. GUTHRIE: I beg to move that a subsection be added, as subsection 10 in the following language:

37. s.s. 10. It shall be the duty of the trustee within six months after notice and distribution of final dividend has been given and made by him in accordance with this section to pay to the Minister of Finance all unclaimed dividends remaining in his hands.

(a) If such unclaimed dividends are afterwards duly claimed by the creditors entitled thereto they shall be paid over to such creditors with accrued interest thereon.

This clause has been taken out of the Winding-Up Act.

Section as amended agreed to

On section 41—Discharge of trustee:

Mr. GUTHRIE: A question has been raised under this section by various bodies. It has reference to subsection 2, paragraph (a):

Such discharge may be granted,

(a) by resolution of the inspectors expressed in writing;

Objection has been taken to that provision. Some people think that the discharge should only be granted by a meeting of creditors, not by inspectors; another suggestion is that the release should only be granted by the court. It was to permit of further consideration of that aspect of the matter, that the section was allowed to stand.

Mr. McKENZIE: I think the latter proposition is the best. As the court has to deal with most of the matters involved here, it should have the power to grant a discharge.

Mr. GUTHRIE: How would it be if power were given to the creditors to do this at a meeting duly called or, in default of action by them, that the court should exercise the power? The idea, of course, is to avoid applications to the court as far as possible. The objection made is that the inspectora and the trustee may be rather friendly in the matter, and one agree to release the other, and that would be the end of it. I think it would be a protection if the creditors were the persons authorized to grant the discharge, and failing them the court.

Mr. JACOBS: The creditors will not go to a meeting.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That is the trouble, they will not go.

[Mr. Guthrie.]

Mr. JACOBS: I think the suggestion of the leader of the Opposition ought to be accepted.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would accept it because I think it is quite reasonable. I therefore, move to amend clause 41 by striking out paragraph (a) and the letter (b) so that subsection 2 will then read:

Such discharge may be granted by order of the court.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 48—postponement of husband's claim:

The CHAIRMAN: This clause was allowed to stand.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I think it is a pretty good clause.

Mr. JACOBS: Since the request was made that this clause should be allowed to stand I believe the Solicitor General has been in conference with several members of the bar of Quebec, and they seem to be satisfied that the clause should pass in its present form.

Mr. PEDLOW: In reading over this clause it seems to me to impose a hardship on a married woman whose husband has been adjudged bankrupt and who has obtained a loan of money from her. If she has an estate separate from that of her husband why should she not receive the same consideration as in the case of any other separate estate? For instance take the case of a married woman who has inherited property from her parents, which is entirely separate from the estate of her husband, and has advanced money to him to carry on his business. I fail to see the wisdom or the fairness of the change. I think the wife is just as legally entitled as any outsider to rank as a creditor of that estate. Her money and her property are her own in that case, and she makes the loan as a purely business transaction so far as she and her husband are concerned. It seems to me, not looking at it from the legal aspect, but from the ordinary business aspect, that the woman should have the protection of the court for her estate as against her husband, and that he on his side should have similar protection against his wife.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It is the experience of all lawyers in the courts of this country that there is no door quite so open to all kinds of manipulation and of wrong-doing in regard to financial matters, and particularly as they pertain to creditors, than the relationship that exists between husband and wife. I call my hon. friend's attention in the first place to the fact that this section applies only to the future. So that husbands and wives will know after this Bill becomes law that if they loan money one to the other for business or other purposes they are taking chances under this section, and their claims may be postponed to those of other creditors. The reason for the section is that in the majority of cases of assignment a husband or a wife prefers a large claim against the estate. It may be that the claim is perfectly valid in most cases, but there are many cases in which the claim is decidedly invalid and should not be allowed to prevail as against the creditors. Such fictitious claims are so easily made and so hard to defeat that you must in some way protect ordinary creditors against them. To do so we must enact something such as we have attempted by section 48. That section has been largely used in England, and it will be used in this country, too, in future, I am sure. Case after case comes up when not only does the husband or the wife prefer a claim as a creditor for money loaned, but in addition a claim for wages. Those claims may be proper enough, but in future, if this Bill becomes law, husbands and wives must take notice that such claims will only be paid after the claims of other creditors. If with that notice staring them in the face they allow their claims for wages to accumulate they will have to take the consequences. It is in order to defeat the large number of fictitious claims which are presented in cases of bankruptcy, that it has been found necessary, I think, in every civilized country which has a bankruptcy law to include a clause of this kind. If it had a retroactive effect I would not support it as I do; but it only applies to the future.

Mr. PEDLOW: The enactment of this clause absolutely precludes the advisability of a husband advancing money to his wife in case she is in business; or, where the wife has a bona fide estate of her own, it precludes the advisability of her making a loan to her husband. Therefore it would be much better apparently that she should make a loan to some other woman's husband.

Mr. GUTHRIE: She can do it through a third person and the transaction would be quite valid.

Mr. PEDLOW: I have no quarrel with the other items enumerated in this clause, but where the transaction between husband and wife is a bona fide one why should either be penalized? It seems to me that it should not be an impossible thing on investigation to determine between bona fide and bogus loans.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It has kept the courts pretty busy for the last generation.

Mr. JACOBS: I might point out to my hon. friend from Renfrew South (Mr. Pedlow) that that is one of the risks and responsibilities which people incur when they marry.

Section agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Clause 51 was allowed to stand,—Priority of claims.

Mr. GUTHRIE: At the request of the hon. member for George Etienne Cartier (Mr. Jacobs) I think that clause might be agreed to now.

Section agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN: Clause 52 was allowed to stand.—Right of landlords to distrain or realize rent to cease, but priority accorded.

Mr. McKENZIE: Does this interfere in any way with the common law right of landlords in respect to levying for rent?

Mr. GUTHRIE: Yes, Mr. Chairman, this is a restriction. We have not at the present time a uniform law in all the provinces in regard to this matter. In the province of Ontario in case of assignment we allow the landlord one year of past due rent as a preference, and also three months future rent. I understand that in the province of Quebec the landlord can legally claim one year's future rent, and I think varying sums are permitted in the other provinces. The Committee which had this Bill in charge last year paid a great deal of attention to this section. It was urged that if we interfered with landlords' rights landlords would insist on stiffer terms when leases were negotiated, and that the rent probably would become payable in advance. However, a body representing almost thirty thousand retail merchants of this country, who are the great tenant class among the merchants, appeared before the Committee and specifically approved the enactment. So far as they are concerned they are not afraid of the terms which may be imposed upon them by landlords in the future. This section provides that when bankruptcy proceedings take place the landlord's right to a preference over other creditors shall be for rent for the last three months of the term, and it will be a first charge upon the estate. A landlord can always protect himself; he does not need to let his rent get three months in arrear. He has special privileges which other creditors do not possess; he can distrain the goods of his tenant and can realize at almost any moment. He is negligent if he allows his rent to become more than three months in arrear; and for the protection of the general creditors the Committee thought that three months was a fair and reasonable amount of rent to allow as a preference over the claims of other creditors. It was with that view that this section was drawn as it now appears. Of course, he is not deprived from claiming for all the rent due, but for anything beyond the three months he can only claim as an ordinary creditor. The Committee thought that was pretty fair treatment for the landlord, and it would be a good thing to make it uniform throughout Canada.

We must bear in mind that landlords have always been creatures whom our legislation and British legislation have favoured from time immemorial. Our present law of landlord and tenant is a relic of the feudal system and was made when landlords sat in Parliament, but tenants did not. Up to fifty or sixty years ago the law was so one-sided in favour of the landlord that it was practically a disgrace. Gradually the hardships have been ameliorated by legislation; but to-day in Ontario a landlord is permitted too large a claim, in my humble judgment, when he is allowed one year of arrears and three months advance rent in the case of assignment. I do not know what view the Committee will take of the clause, but in my judgment it is a very fair one.

Section agreed to.

Mr. GUTHRIE: I would ask the Committee to refer to clause 55. I have given a good deal of thought to it, having regard to the discussion which took place on the question of absconding debtors. It will be remembered that at the last meeting of the Committee considerable discussion took place as to what provision we should insert. I find that the dictionary meaning of the term "abscond" is:

> To remove one's self from the jurisdiction of the court; to place one's self in hiding.

In my judgment, and it has been confirmed by the conferences I have had with some very prominent lawyers both from Ontario and Quebec, I think the section would be improved if we inserted the words "from Canada" after the word "abscond". The section would then read: "Abscond from Canada." It must be remembered that the Act has Dominion wide application. The mere fact that a debtor goes from one province to another would hardly in my judgment constitute absconding; he is still within the jurisdiction of the bankruptcy court, and he is not in hiding.

Therefore I move:

> To amend section 55 by adding the words "from Canada" after the word "abscond" in the twelfth line of the said section at p. 44 of the Bill.

It will then read:

> If, after the presentation of a bankruptcy petition against him, it appears to the court that there is probable reason for believing that he has absconded, or is about to abscond from Canada, with a view of avoiding payment of the debt in respect of which the bankruptcy petition was filed, or of avoiding appearance to any such petition or of avoiding examination in respect of his affairs or of otherwise avoiding, delaying or embarrassing proceedings in bankruptcy against him.

Mr. PROULX: Canada is a very large country. A man might go from Nova Scotia to British Columbia and be a long distance from his creditors. I would prefer to keep the section as it is.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Members of the bar of Ontario and Quebec advise me that the section would be improved by the suggested amendment, because there is a jurisdiction of these courts all over Canada. If a man goes to another province in Canada he may be got at there under the courts constituted by this Act.

Amendment agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

On section 63—Courts jurisdiction.

Mr. GUTHRIE: An amendment was adopted to this section which declared that these courts should be additional courts for the better administration of the laws of Canada under section 101 of the British North America Act. At the last sitting of the Committee I could not see how that amendment could prejudice the working of the Act, although I did not think it was a necessary amendment. However, having obtained the benefit of the advice of the leading members of the bar of Quebec and Ontario, I am inclined to think that the amendment had better be struck out. As one eminent constitutional authority told me, the amendment is an untried experiment which had better be left alone. He pointed out that our own clause was just as wide as, and perhaps wider than, the similar clause in the Winding-Up Act, under which the provincial courts obtain their jurisdiction. The clause as originally printed is of equal import, even broader in its language, because our courts are declared to have original, auxiliary and ancillary jurisdiction. I therefore move that the amendment made to this section be struck out and that the section be adopted as printed.

5 p.m.

Motion agreed to, and section as originally printed agreed to.

On section 74—court may review, etc.:

Mr. GUTHRIE: This is the section which deals with appeals. It has been brought to my attention that there is no provision for an appeal where a debtor has been granted a discharge or where the creditors or the judge refuse to grant him a discharge. I think there is some reason for allowing an appeal under those circumstances. I therefore move that the following be added as paragraph (d) of subsection 2:

(d) if the question to be raised on the appeal involves the granting or refusal of a discharge to the bankrupt or assignor where the aggregate claims of unpaid creditors exceeds five hundred dollars.

So that if the discharge is granted and the creditors object or the discharge is refused and the debtor object, either party may appeal, provided the aggregate amount of the indebtedness unpaid is over $500.

Mr. JACOBS: I notice that we restrict by section 74 the right to appeal to the Supreme Court of Canada. Such appeal may not be allowed unless special leave to appeal is obtained from the judge of the Appeal Court. Why is that?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The tendency in modern law making is to discourage multiplicity of appeals.

Mr. JACOBS: Surely the debtor is vitally interested in having his case brought before the highest court in the land when the question of his discharge is concerned. Why should appeal be restricted in so important a matter as discharge from bankruptcy or anything arising out of bankruptcy? Why should the clause not read as follows:

(3) The decision of the appeal court upon any such appeal shall be final and conclusive unless appeal therefrom is taken to the Supreme Court of Canada.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Certainly it was our view that appeals should be limited. I am heartily in sympathy with that limitation.

Mr. JACOBS: As a lawyer, or as a lawmaker?

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Suppose the claim is $500, and part of it is disputed and part is not. Does the $500 apply to the amount in dispute or to the amount of the claim as a whole?

Mr. GUTHRIE: It applies to the amount "involved," which is the word used. I fancy that would be the amount in dispute.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended, agreed to.

On section 76—application to limited partnerships.

Mr. JACOBS: When this section was previously before the Committee, it was pointed out that a limited partnership, at least in Quebec, is in many respects similar to the interest of a stockholder in a joint stock company, and it was suggested that the whole clause should be allowed to stand over for further consideration. Has the Solicitor General had views from the Bars of the various provinces regarding this matter?

Mr. GUTHRIE: We had quite a discussion on this matter in Committee and since then I have not heard of it. In Ontario, we have a law regarding limited partnerships, but in my experience I have never come across any. The clause will have a very limited application and is inserted in case anything in the way of limited partnerships should arise.

Mr. JACOBS: In Quebec, limited partnerships are quite common. A man may want to invest, say $10,000 in a business. Under a limited partnership, he may invest that money, but he must not have any dealings with the affairs of the business; his name must not appear in the firm, and he must not be engaged in any way in the business. He simply puts up his money as if he were investing it in a joint stock company. If anything goes wrong with that company, the individual, who has lent his money in the way indicated, should not be subject to the provisions of this legislation.

Mr. GUTHRIE: He is dealt with just as he would be in England. We have copied this section precisely from the words of the English Act. He is protected from everything the English statute would protect him from.

Mr. JACOBS: Can the party who advances his money in this way as a limited partner be thrown into bankruptcy if the business becomes insolvent?

Mr. GUTHRIE: In like manner, as if a limited partnership were an ordinary partnership.

Mr. JACOBS: I can understand this applying to members composing the partnership itself, but not the limited partner.

Mr. GUTHRIE: The party's liability would still be limited to the amount he invested.

Mr. JACOBS: That is to say, he would be treated like an ordinary stockholder in a joint stock company?

Mr. GUTHRIE: The partnership would be wound up as an ordinary partnership, but there would be a limitation of liability according as the partnership was formed, and the liability of any partner who was under that limitation would not be increased beyond that limitation.

Section agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Archambault the Committee reverted to the consideration of section 8.

On section 8—application of part 1.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: I desire to move an amendment to this clause. I object to the application of Part I of the Bill to non-traders. This is the first time that there has been brought into the House of Commons of Canada a Bankruptcy Act which includes non-traders in its application. The Bankruptcy Act of 1875, which was repealed in 1879, and the Bill introduced in 1897 by Mr. Fortin, who is now judge of the Superior Court, did not apply to non-traders. I have gone carefully over legislation on bankruptcy of different countries, and I believe the only countries in which Bankruptcy Acts apply to non-traders are Great Britain and the United States. In France, Belgium and other countries, the Acts do not apply to non-traders. My principal objection to the extension of the law to non-traders is this: The enforcement of a bankruptcy law is a serious matter; it means a searching investigation into the affairs of a man by his creditors. It is encroaching on private rights. It allows the creditors to find out private secrets of all kinds and, in fact, it is a grave violation of property rights. The debtor ceases to have charge of his business and his creditors take his place and as Thallier says in his study on bankruptcy, only the most important reasons can justify such an action. The necessities of trade afford Parliament an opportunity of adopting such measures, although this is clearly odious to private rights. Credit requires such legislation, such violation of the liberty of the proprietor, and business cannot dispense with it. In what position would a trader be if he could not obtain credit from his banker or other creditors? That is the reason for a bankruptcy law. The law should give the banker or other creditors the assurance that if the debtor should fail, a trustee will be named who will take charge of his assets for the benefit of all creditors, present or absent. Otherwise, without this law there would be no protection for the creditors in contingencies against which no one can be safeguarded. In business relations many creditors now reside far away from their debtors, while other debtors are more easily accessible. If the insolvency law were abolished, creditors living near the debtor and being consequently more in touch with him than those who are distant, would seize his assets first, to the prejudice of those living far away; and without insolvency legislation there would be this further effect, that only cash sales would be made. There would be no more credit, and in consequence practically no trade. This consideration, however, does not, I submit, apply to non-traders. The judge, the doctor, the lawyer, or the professional man lives on his income or his salary, and has no justification in living beyond his means. His profession should preclude the necessity of speculations inherent to trade, and if he obtains credit it is not on the guarantee of any assets but merely on his personal promise to pay, and his creditors will wait until he receives his income. Unlike the case of the trader, to whom credit is a business necessity, society is not interested whether the man who receives a salary gets credit or not. Admitting that the non-trader contracts debts, it is highly improbable that his creditors will either be so numerous or most of them so far distant that some living in proximity to the debtor will reap all the benefits to the prejudice of the others. Besides that, there is a constitutional viewpoint to consider. I will grant for a moment that the law of bankruptcy in regard to the trader, even if it touches civil rights and property, as it necessarily does, is within the province of the federal power. But I contend that subsection 21 of section 91 of The British North America Act evidently conferred such power, because it pertained to the trade and commerce legislation, which is exclusively within the purview of the Federal Government. I am sure, however, that the intention of the legislators in reference to subsection 13 of section 92 of the British North America Act, which gives the province control of legislation in regard to property and civil rights, was not to extend the bankruptcy legislation to anything outside trade and commerce, and it would undoubtedly go beyond their intention if this law were made applicable to non-traders. I therefore move, seconded by Mr. Jacobs:

That subsection 1 of clause 8 be amended by striking out all the words after the first line of said section, being line 21 of page 8, and substituting the following words: "non traders."

Mr. GUTHRIE: The motion raises a point upon which there might be considerable argument. There is no doubt that in the Insolvency Bill of 1875 an attempt was made to confine the operation of that Act to traders, and one of the objections to the Act always was that it was so confined. It is contended that there is a large class of non-traders who are debtors and should be treated as ordinary citizens of the country, amenable to the ordinary laws, whether of bankruptcy or otherwise. Another difficulty is to give anything like an adequate definition of the word "trader." The definition in the Act of 1875 was certainly defective, but it covers almost two pages of typewritten matter, defining almost all classes of business enterprise we know in Canada. But still it would not suffice for a definition at the present time, because we have a great many avenues of trade and commerce to-day that were not in existence then. So that it would be extremely difficult to define just who were and who were not traders. In England the experience has been that the Act should apply generally to all classes. I think that about fifty years ago, in the sixties, the Act was limited to traders, but after an experience of some years, that Act was extended, and the British and the United States Acts to-day both apply to all classes of the people in regard not only to obligations created by the Act, but to the benefits which are conferred upon the honest debtor in the way of obtaining his discharge. I know, however, that in France, Belgium, and one or two other continental countries the bankruptcy Acts are still confined to traders. Having heard from as many public commercial bodies as I could upon the subject, and having heard a long discussion in the Special Committee by a great many interested classes, I concluded, and the Committee concluded, that this Bill, in order to have a fair chance of operation, should be made general in its application. For instance, it was urged by the very large association of retail merchants which has a membership in Canada of some 30,000, that it was unfair to them to put all the imposition on their shoulders and allow them none of the benefits. As it was pointed out that one of the great debtor classes was professional people, the question was asked, why should they not be included? and the Committee took that view. My own view is that if you are to give the Act a fair chance of success you must extend it beyond the trading classes. If it should prove to be burdensome or to be an undue imposition upon the people, within a year of its operation there would be a demand for its repeal. But I do not think it will be burdensome. On the contrary, I think it will be a great benefit to both the debtor and the creditor classes, and I certainly support the present generality of its terms.

Mr. CAMPBELL: Why not include the farming classes?

Mr. GUTHRIE: A special case was made out on behalf of the farming classes. It is said that the farmer is very much more subject to unforeseen accidents than any other class of people in the community. He may be solvent to-day, with bright prospects for the coming year, and when everything looks promising he may experience a disastrous accident. He could be put into bankruptcy by reason of his inability during a season to meet maturing liabilities, and he might be sold out and his farm taken from him. But in the ordinary course, if he were given another year or two, he would have big crops and be on his feet again and be re-established. He might be the victim of natural causes beyond his control, and for that reason the Act was not made to apply either to the farmer or to the small wage-earner.

Mr. JACOBS: I support the hon. member for Chambly and Vercheres in his amendment that the provisions of part 1 of the Act shall apply only to traders. My reason for supporting the amendment is that if we force into bankruptcy the non-trading classes we may have a condition of affairs in this country which may amount to something approaching a scandal. For instance, there may be men who now occupy high positions in this country —on the Bench, and in Parliament, and others occupying public positions,—who would be forced into bankruptcy by this Act at the whim and caprice of persons who for some reason might desire to embarrass them.

Mr. GUTHRIE: We have provided against malicious proceedings.

Mr. JACOBS: It might not appear to be malicious; the debtor may owe money which he cannot pay. Suppose a public man has incurred the ill-will of a political opponent. Knowing that this public man is not in a position to pay his debts at the moment he could, under this Bill, force him out of public life and into the bankruptcy court.

Mr. GUTHRIE: That would be malicious.

Mr. JACOBS: Not necessarily.

Mr. GUTHRIE: Any indirect motive is malicious.

Mr. JACOBS: The onus will be on the party against whom the petition is granted to show that he is in a position to pay his debts and if he cannot show that he must go into bankruptcy.

Mr. GUTHRIE: It will only apply to future and not to past debts.

Mr. JACOBS: The Solicitor General seems to think that in future every person in public life is going to be in a position to pay his debts. The fact that a man is in public life is a sort of presumption that he is not in a position to pay his debts. Take the case of judges on the bench. There may be men who are obliged to go on the bench because they are not able to make a living at the bar and in addition have gone behind. These men might be forced into bankruptcy and no judge could possibly continue to occupy his position under such circumstances. The remark that the Solicitor General made to the effect that these people should not be above the law has no force, for the reason that you make them amenable to the law if they wish to take advantage of it by voluntarily applying to be put in bankruptcy. There will be nothing in this section, if amended, to prevent any person from taking advantage of the Act and voluntarily going into bankruptcy. The objection I take is that men who are not traders are going to be forced into bankruptcy in the same way as the ordinary trader. In the case of the trading class it is incidental to the business that they must owe money. In a case of the non-trading class it is accidental that they should owe money. The Solicitor General would be well advised if he accepted the amendment of my hon. friend from Chambly.

[Mr. Jacobs.]

Mr. COCKSHUTT: It appears to me that the amendment moved by the hon. member for Chambly is altogether too broad and would cut out from the operation of the Act a large number who might not be classified by trade.

Mr. JACOBS: It does not cut them out from the operation of the Act. They may voluntarily go into bankruptcy.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: It does not bring them under the operation of the Act. It says that the provisions of this Act shall not apply to non-traders.

Mr. ARCHAMBAULT: My idea is that they may not be forced into bankruptcy but of course they can go into bankruptcy voluntarily if they wished to. It has only reference to that part of the Act which applies to forced assignments.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: A professional man who is receiving large amounts of investment funds very often gets into trouble—

Mr. JACOBS: Then he goes to jail.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: —by not investing these funds in accordance with his client's wishes. Should he not be amenable to the law? He might be a non-trader. We should be very careful in defining what a non-trader should include.

Mr. JACOBS: The case which the hon. gentleman mentions is one that may occur but the party who misappropriates or embezzles funds is imprisoned. He can take advantage of the Act, come before the court but not get a discharge. The man who applies voluntarily for bankruptcy can obtain his discharge under the wording of the amendment. We want to make some distinction between traders and non-traders. This question has been discussed not only in this House but outside of it and the general impression was that the Solicitor General would agree to this amendment. I was somewhat surprised to find that for some reason known to himself he has declined to agree to it.

Amendment (Mr. Archambault) negatived.

On section 14, subsection 4—general security to be given by trustee:

Mr. GUTHRIE: I beg to move to amend this section by adding thereto the following words:

If the security required is provided in cash the trustee shall be entitled to be paid thereon such interest as may be prescribed by the general rules.

Section as amended agreed to.

Bill reported.

PROPRIETARY OR PATENT MEDICINE ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. A. K. Maclean (Acting Minister of Customs) Bill No. 53 to amend the Proprietary or Patent Medicine Act read a second time and the House went into Committee on the Bill—Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On paragraph (d), section 2—Proprietary or patent medicines:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I wish to move an amendment by inserting in line 22, after the word "minister," the words:

The national formulary of the United States of America.

Which is merely another pharmacopœia standard.

Amendment agreed to.

Paragraph as amended agreed to.

On section 2, subsection (2)—Appointment of agent:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I propose to amend the subsection by striking out the word "manufacturer" in the first line, and inserting in lieu thereof the word "proprietor." In the third line I propose to strike out the word "proprietor" and substitute the word "manufacturer."

Amendment agreed to.

Subsection as amended agreed to.

On section 3, subsection (1)—Certificate of registration:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I propose to strike out the words "and every" in the second line and substitute therefor the words "or the." The sentence will then read:

Every manufacturer of a proprietary or patent medicine, or the agent and so on. That means the agent of the manufacturer who does not reside in Canada.

Mr. STEELE: Would the retail druggist who manufactures some special line or article be included under the term "manufacturer" in this section? If so it seems to me that it would be an injustice that the retail druggist who perhaps manufactures one or two preparations and sells them should be compelled to pay the same fee as a wholesale manufacturer of patent medicines who perhaps sells preparations to the amount of $100,000 a year.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The answer to the point raised by the hon. gentleman is contained in the definition of "proprietary or patent medicine" in the second section of the Bill. The definition applies to "every artificial remedy or prescription manufactured for the internal or external use of man, the name, composition or definition of which is not to be found in the British Pharmacopœia," and so on. If the pharmaceutical preparation to which my hon. friend refers is not to be found in any of the pharmacopœia mentioned under the definition of "proprietary medicines" then the Act will not apply to it. Otherwise it would be a proprietary medicine.

Mr. STEELE: We may take it then that many of the medicines that are put up by the retail druggists and sold by them in their own shops in limited quantities would come under the designation of "proprietary medicines," and before such retail druggists could sell these articles they would have to pay a fee of $2.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. STEELE: It seems to me that if the fee were reduced to $1, and it could not well be any less, it would remove some of the injustice which will otherwise result. I also think that the wholesale manufacturer might well pay a larger fee than $2.

Mr. BELAND: Hear, hear.

Mr. STEELE: I would imagine that the wholesale manufacturer would be getting off exceedingly light if he is made subject to a less fee than $25.

Mr. KEEFER: I want to ask the minister a question about affixing the revenue stamps on these patent medicines. That has to be done, to-day, I understand by the druggist when he sells the article.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That has reference to a revenue Bill.

Mr. KEEFER: Is not the practice such as I have stated?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. KEEFER: I have had some complaints from druggists saying that this requirement was very unreasonable and unfair. Why should not the wholesaler be compelled, especially now that he is required to register, to put on all the revenue stamps needed at the time he ships his goods out? Why should the druggist be compelled to look after the manufacturers' business and be liable to a fine if he does not do so? Several very reputable druggists have made representations to me asking if they could not get some relief from this obligation.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I should be very glad to convey to the Minister of Finance the remarks of my hon. friend which have reference to the taxation measures of the country. I stated here a few days ago—in what connection I just forget—that when the Finance Act, I think of 1914, was introduced, and which taxed patent medicines among other things, it was provided that the tax be paid by the wholesaler. Representations were later made to the Minister of Finance by wholesalers which had the effect of inducing him to abandon that form of applying the tax. I am of the opinion that the obstacles in the way of carrying out the original intention to which the wholesalers alluded are quite substantial. The wholesaler imports a great many patent medicines in packages containing a gross, or two gross of bottles, and if he were obliged to open the package and put the required stamp on each bottle it would be highly inconvenient.

Mr. KEEFER: It is much more inconvenient to the local druggists to do that.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I admit it is quite inconvenient. However, the hon. gentleman's point might be much more suitably raised when the Budget is under consideration.

Mr. KEEFER: Why should not the manufacturer put on the stamps?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I have endeavoured to give my hon. friend one reason why it is difficult for him to do so.

Mr. KEEFER: That is in the case of importations, but the same difficulty would not exist in the case of patent medicines of local manufacture.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The manufacturer might sell other medicines in bulk, and the retailer might perhaps put those medicines up in smaller packages and sell them by retail. In that case the wholesaler would have no opportunity of affixing the stamps.

Mr. KEEFER: There is an excellent opportunity now to require them to register. Why not issue a regulation?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: That I thought might very well come up later when the Budget is before the House. With reference to the remarks of my hon. friend from South Perth as to clause 3, I propose submitting an amendment by which the manufacturer will be entitled to have the tax refunded, if he is able to prove to the satisfaction of the minister that his sales have been less than $25 a year. The tax of $2 refers to each patent medicine and is quite a substantial burden in some cases.

Mr. JOHN A. STEWART: The question of affixing the stamp was very fully canvassed when the Act was passed. The retail drug trade, as well as the manufacturers, were heard and the present practice was the result. One argument advanced at the time in favour of that practice was that the stamp was intended as a war tax, and to be paid not by the manufacturer or by the druggist, but by the purchaser or consumer.

Mr. KEEFER: It always is paid by the consumer, no matter where it is put on.

Mr. J. A. STEWART: Yes. I am giving you the argument advanced at the time. If the stamp were affixed by the manufacturer the cost would be added to the invoice price and would be paid for by the druggist when he paid for the goods. Therefore the druggist would have a capital investment of the value of the stamps affixed to all articles on his shelves which were liable under the Act; and, this being a war tax, when it was repealed, as it logically would be at the conclusion of the war, the druggist would still have everything on his shelves stamped which under the Act had been subject to this stamp duty, while the purchaser of new goods subsequently purchased would be relieved of the amount of the tax. That was the consideration that carried weight, and I have reason to believe that many of the retail druggists are not averse to the present practice. There is no possible question, though, that the tax might very well come off altogether, because it is stated that 62½ per cent of the revenue has gone in expenses of collection and inforcement. There is undoubtedly a very strong agitation on the part of retail druggists to have the tax done away with altogether. But I have reason to believe there is some difference of opinion in regard to any change in the manner of collection if it is to continue, for the reasons I have stated.

The CHAIRMAN: I must remind the Committee before any other hon. gentleman rises to speak that a discussion of the question of inland revenue stamps on patent medicines is not in order in connection with this Bill.

Mr. GAUVREAU: This will come up when the Budget is before the House. We are losing our time.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: I would like to support the point brought up by the member for Perth South (Mr. Steele). Two dollars is not a sufficient fee. I think it is absolutely ridiculous to let any firm off with a yearly fee of $2 for making patent medicines, especially in these times when revenue is in such demand.

Mr. STEELE: To make it clearer, Mr. Chairman, I may say that the custom of the retail druggists of Ontario—I can only speak of them—is that each will have probably a line of goods which he puts up and sells for his own profit; he may have two or three or as many as ten or fifteen remedies of his own prescription. Very seldom does he do any wholesale business. If he has to pay $2 for the registration of the formula of each of these remedies it is a fairly heavy tax, and at the maximum would mean $30. The wholesale druggist may be manufacturing two or three lines, but selling thousands of dollars worth, and only paying a tax of $4, $6, or $8, while the retail druggist is paying two or three times that amount on his small sales. It may be an argument that the Act cannot be enforced against retail druggists. But if it is enforced over every part of the country as strictly as any other Act is enforced, I think it will work a great injustice against retail druggists who manufacture their own lines of patent medicines.

Mr. ANDERSON: If a druggist puts these prescriptions on his counter, and a person comes in complaining of bronchitis, and the druggist says, "I have a remedy," and hands him a bottle from the counter, he is practising medicine contrary to the Act. I think if this Bill is passed he will be precluded from that practice, because it says that no medicine shall be given out as a proprietary medicine for any specific disease.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: If a man desires to register the formula and the name of his medicine he has only to do that once, and it would cost him, under the law as it now stands, $2. That protects his proprietary rights in that patent medicine.

Mr. COWAN: For how long?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: For ever. I do not think we can distinguish between the wholesaler and the retailer. Besides, I can assure the Committee that the retailer is not objecting to this charge of $2; we are instructed that it is quite satisfactory. Further on in the Act you will find that any manufacturer of proprietary medicine must also pay annually, for a license to sell, a fee of one dollar in respect to each medicine.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I do not think this fee of $2 is enough, because we are flooded with all kinds of patent medicines in which there is practically nothing to help the health of the public. We should impose a higher tax just to prevent the flooding of the market with such nostrums.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I hardly think you could restrict the manufacture of patent medicine by increasing the fee.

Mr. KEEFER: A fee of two dollars seems trivial for the privilege of a trade mark registration for all time to come.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The fee is small for the registration of all trade marks.

On subsection 2—contents:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Later in the Bill it is proposed to establish an Advisory Council Section 7 A (2) will provide:

> The advisory board shall have power to prescribe what shall be deemed a sufficient medication of medicines containing alcohol in excess of two and a half per cent to make them unfit for use as beverages.

There is a considerable agitation in all the provinces in connection with the sale of patent medicines and the fact that they are too high in alcoholic content. Any patent medicines containing over two and one half per cent of alcohol must be approved by the Advisory Council before they can be sold. I wish to amend this section by inserting after the word "registration" on the second line the following:

> Or any medicine containing more than two and a half per cent of alcohol or containing any of the drugs mentioned in or added to the schedule of the Act.

We are not amending the schedule, which contains a list of dangerous drugs which can be used only with the consent or permission of the Advisory Council. Two and a half per cent is fixed by reason of the fact that in no province is that alcoholic content in drugs or patent medicines prohibited.

I wish to amend the subsection further by striking out the words "essential formula and composition of such medicine" and inserting in lieu thereof the words "quantity of alcohol or of such drug or drugs contained in such medicine." This will put the Advisory Board in a position to determine whether the alcoholic content is in excess of two and a half per cent, and will also give information as to the drug or drugs contained in such medicine. The section as it now stands requires the disclosure of the essential formula and composition of the medicine. It was deemed possible that that would be unfair, because it would compel the proprietor to disclose all knowledge relating to his property.

Amendment agreed to; subsection as amended agreed to.

At six o'clock the Committee took recess.

After Recess.

The Committee resumed at eight o'clock, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 3, subsection 3—preparation of medicine to be supervised:

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I move:

That in section 3, subsection 3, the following words be deleted:

"The preparation of the medicine shall be continuously supervised by a pharmacist legally qualified in the province in which the medicine is being prepared."

And the following words substituted in place thereof:

"Whenever required by the minister, for good cause shown, the preparation of any medicine containing more than two and one-half per cent of alcohol, or containing any drug included in the schedule to this Act, shall be continuously supervised by a pharmacist, a chemist, or other qualified person."

The purpose is that the preparation shall be continuously supervised only when required by the minister. In many cases it was deemed by the trade too expensive to require this supervision, and the officers of the department thought that a clause along the lines of this proposed amendment would ensure sufficient protection to the public.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: Surely such companies are not manufacturing medicine for the public without having trained men in charge, and if they have trained men in charge, it does not seem to be necessary to amend the clause.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I should like to have the sense of the Committee on the matter. There are many preparations known as proprietary or patent medicines which are very simple of preparation, which are not dangerous and which are sometimes made in a small way. While there is a great deal to be said in favour of the maintenance of the clause as it is, I thought that if the minister were empowered to direct supervision whenever he thought it was necessary, that would be sufficient protection.

Mr. SHEARD: There is considerable justification for the amendment. I presume the object is to permit the dispensing of medicines in the ordinary drug store by a pharmaceutical student who would not be a legally qualified pharmacist. If, under the section as it stands, every prescription brought into a drug store has to be dispensed by a duly licensed druggist, I can quite see the need for this amendment, because it would be impossible to conduct a drug business on any such arrangement.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: I do not think my hon. friend (Mr. Sheard) has grasped the point at all. As I understand it, we are allowing anybody without any training at all to manufacture these medicines, and to use some of the most dangerous drugs in the pharmacopoeia. I think the amendment is dangerous.

Mr. COWAN: Neither of the two hon. members seem to have grasped the idea. As I understand it, this proposes that an unqualified person may put up preparations which do not contain dangerous drugs. But that is not the danger. This unqualified person may be putting up non-dangerous drugs in a place where there are dangerous drugs, and he might easily mix dangerous drugs in what is really a simple preparation. Therefore, we should not allow unqualified persons to handle these things at all. In every drug store there is a competent druggist. Why not let him supervise every preparation that is put up?

Mr. STEELE: I think a better amendment to this clause would be to insert after the word "pharmacist" the words "or a chemist, or other person registered as such in the province." I quite agree that qualified persons only should be entrusted with this work, but there are in Canada wholesale manufacturers employing as chemists men who are absolutely qualified but who are not registered pharmacists. My suggested amendment would also cover the case of medical men, of whom there are many, operating drug stores throughout the country, who are registered as pharmacists or druggists and who are supposed to be quite well qualified to supervise the preparation of these medicines, and yet who would not wish to employ registered duly qualified pharmacists every time they wished to make up a few dozens of a simple preparation which they sell over the drug store counter.

Mr. J. A. STEWART: The hon. member for South Perth states in a fairly accurate way the condition that exists in most of the laboratories of the manufacturing pharmacists. The fact is that many chemists in charge of work with manufacturing pharmacists in Canada to-day are chemists who have come out from England, and the suggestion made by the hon. member is a good one. The amendment proposes that where a preparation is to contain more than 2½ per cent of alcohol or to contain any drug included in the schedule, it is necessary that the preparing of it should be continuously supervised by a legally qualified pharmacist or chemist. In putting up many of the other preparations which do not contain any of the drugs included in the schedule, or alcohol in excess of the proportion stated, the manufacturers are equally interested with the public, and there has been no complaint in the past as to the sufficiency of the supervision with the manufacturers.

Mr. BELAND: I understand the hon. member for South Perth is going to submit a sub-amendment.

Subsection stands.

On section 5—license to sell; fee; term.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Earlier in the evening I referred to a proposed amendment to this section. The first part of the section reads:

> Every manufacturer of a proprietary or patent medicine shall apply annually for a license to sell such medicine, and shall pay an annual fee of one dollar for each such license.

I move that the section be amended by adding after the word "license" the following words:

> Provided that if at the end of the year, the manufacturer is able to prove to the satisfaction of the minister, that his sales of any registered article for the year amounted to less than twenty-five dollars, the license fee paid may be repaid to him.

This is to meet the case mentioned by some hon. gentleman this afternoon in dealing with another clause. A man might take out a license for $2 and pay a further license fee for selling, and his total sales for the year might be very small.

Mr. DUFF: Why should the license fee be so low in the case of the manufacturer of a patent medicine and so high in connection with fertilizers? This afternoon we passed an Act compelling the manufacturer of fertilizers to pay $8, $16 and $24 for licenses, and the manufacturers of patent medicines, which to my mind, in a great many cases, should not be allowed to be sold, pay only a small license fee of a dollar. I think the fee in regard to patent medicines should be made $24 and in regard to fertilizers $1.

Mr. MACLEAN: There is one reason why the fee in the case of fertilizers should be larger. The officers of the department must travel throughout the country administering the Fertilizers Act, and scientific determination of the ingredients of fertilizers is not an easy matter and can be carried out only by scientific men. On the other hand, the registration of a patent does not entail a great deal of work on the department, and after all it is merely for the purposes of a record. The registration number is open to the public and any one can get all the information that goes with the registration by application to Ottawa. In the one case there is considerable work on the part of the department and in the other there is not.

Mr. DUFF: I cannot agree with the minister's explanation. I think it is more important to the people that inspectors of the department should analyse patent medicines than that they should analyse fertilizers. The matter is twisted. We are really considering provisions that should be incorporated in the Fertilizers Act, so far as license fees are concerned. It is important that the public should be safeguarded, and if there is any inspection to be done it is more necessary in the case of fertilizers.

Mr. MACLEAN: Under both this and the Fertilizers Act we are protecting the public. This is not a revenue Act.

Mr. DUFF: Why should the Fertilizers Act be a revenue Act?

Mr. MACLEAN: It is not a revenue Act. The license is simply to secure some revenue to contribute to the expenses of the administration of the Act, and that is all that is intended here. If it is proposed to secure revenue from the sale of drugs, that is a matter that could be considered in discussing the Budget or revenue Bills.

Mr. DUFF: I think the fee should be at least $20.

Mr. COWAN: I do not agree with the hon. member. I think the minister is absolutely right. This is not a revenue Act. Its purpose is to regulate the business and see that people get the drugs they pay for and nothing else. If we want to make a revenue out of the sale of drugs the Minister of Finance can get after these people, and it does not matter to me how hard he goes after them. But let the proper department deal with that matter.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: Would the revenue derived from a fee of $1 make the department in charge of this work self-supporting? It seems to me that this department like every other ought to be self-supporting.

Mr. BELAND: That is a very pertinent question, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. McGIBBON: We are making provision for an advisory board, the members of which I presume will have to be paid salaries. If a fee of $1 is sufficient to meet the expenses of the department, I see no reason to increase it; but the department should be made self-supporting.

Mr. MACLEAN: I am sorry I cannot give my hon. friend very accurate information. The administration of the Act will probably cost about $30,000 a year, and I think the license fee proposed should contribute very substantially to the cost of administration. If after a year's experience it is considered that a higher fee should be imposed, a further amendment can be made. For the time being I think the proposed license fee is reasonable.

Mr. BELAND: The minister has by him an officer of his department. Perhaps he can tell the Committee how many licenses are paid for and issued in the course of a year. Then we can form an idea as to what proportion of the expenditure is met by this extra tax of $1.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Heretofore the manufacturer of patent medicines was required to secure but one license covering the whole range of his production and one fee covered, say two hundred productions. Under this Bill he must register each patent or proprietary medicine and must pay the fee upon each. By reason of our legislation, as it has stood up to the present time, the department is not in a position to give the information which my hon. friend asks. If this Bill becomes law, all patent medicines must be registered and in a year we will have a very accurate idea of the number that are being made in Canada and the revenue they will afford. I imagine there are quite a number of patent medicines made in Canada to-day.

Mr. GAUVREAU: As I said before, I do not see why we impose a tax of only one dollar on patent medicine. The people are flooded with all sorts of patent medicines. When a druggist wants to sell a new patent medicine he will not be deterred from doing so by a tax of one dollar. He will try to multiply his patent medicines in order to make the people swallow them. If we impose a tax of $5 or $25 on each patent medicine he wants to put on the market he will be a little more careful about it. I propose to amend that section by substituting the word "five" for the word "one" so as to make the tax $5 instead of $1. You have Wampole's cod liver oil and Wampole's hypo-phosphate; they pay only $1 a year and they perhaps make millions of dollars out of them. I am told there is no more cod liver oil in the former preparation than there is in the finger on one of my hands.

Mr. FOURNIER: Will the minister tell us how this law will operate? I do not know if he is aware that most of the druggists buy, for example syrup of white pine tar. Some of it is made by Parke, Davis & Co., some by John Weyth & Co., of Philadelphia, some by Sharpe & Dohme, and some by Frost. If there is a license imposed upon that article the manufacturers, such as Sharpe and Dohme, manufacture for each of the druggists and put the druggist's name upon it. If this Act is going to operate in this way, how much does the minister think that he is going to get out of it? He will get millions of dollars. The druggists are paying for it whether the patent medicine is manufactured by Sharpe & Dohme, John Weyth & Company or the other manufacturers. This is looking at the question from the druggists' point of view. All those proprietary medicines that we see on the druggists' shelves are made in the same way by such manufacturers I have mentioned. These are all standard firms, their goods are of a high class, and if you impose this license every druggist will have to pay on the same article.

An hon. MEMBER: And the consumer will have to pay.

Mr. FOURNIER: The consumer will have to pay. I suppose in the city of Ottawa there are fifty druggists. Fifty druggists will have to take out a license to sell syrup of white pine tar, or some other syrup. There ought to be some provision safeguarding this point.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Does my hon. friend from Temiscouata (Mr. Gauvreau) say that the license should be $5?

Mr. GAUVREAU: I want to press my amendment just to know what the country thinks about it.

The CHAIRMAN: There is already one amendment to the subsection. We had perhaps better carry that amendment before taking up the amendment of the hon. member (Mr. Gauvreau).

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The proposed amendment of the hon. member (Mr. Gauvreau) is rather a negative to the motion to pass this clause. I do not know what is in my hon. friend's mind when he proposes this resolution. Does he propose it with the view of exterminating, limiting or curtailing the manufacture of patent medicines; or does he suggest it for the purpose of adding to the revenue?

Mr. GAUVREAU: Certainly, it is to increase the revenue, and to prevent people from flooding the market with patent medicines that are good for nothing.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: In any event I think my hon. friend's resolution is not well founded. This is not a revenue Bill.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I will withdraw that and I will say it is to prevent manufacturers from flooding the country with patent medicines.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The manufacture of patent medicine is either a fair business or it ought not to exist at all. You cannot fairly and justly treat it as being different from any other class of business. True, in its very nature, it must be carefully carried on. There must be safeguards. That is one of the purposes of amending the Act this session. But we have no right to endeavour to reduce the manufacture of patent or proprietary medicines by restricting it in any way by taxation. That is not a good business and not good legislation, and I cannot accept the amendment whatever be the view of the Committee. If my hon. friend means that we should get more revenue from it, then I say that is the duty of the Minister of Finance. I have not a very intimate personal acquaintance with the patent medicine business. I have no doubt it is of use to some extent and serves purposes, and particularly for poor people. There are a number of people who really think that the manufacture of proprietary medicines plays a very important part in the life of the country.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Perhaps I have been too moderate and instead of proposing $5 I should have asked for $25 or $50. I am not a druggist or a doctor by profession, I am simply a notary. But physicians in my riding have written to me protesting against a fee of $1 being imposed on each kind of patent medicine.

They say the sale of patent medicines should be controlled by imposing a higher fee. If the license fee is only one dollar these people will make and sell any patent medicines they like; but the increase of the fee to five, ten, or perhaps twenty-five dollars will make them think of their purses before putting a patent medicine on the market.

Mr. STEELE: Let me point out this concerning the amendment proposed by the minister. My only object in suggesting a change of the amendment is that the interests of the retail druggists shall not be unjustly affected. If the Bill is passed in its present form the retail druggist who manufactures his own line of patent medicines and sells them in very small quantities, is going to pay a very large proportion of the revenue derived from this business. I think that revenue should be collected from the large manufacturers of patent medicines. It may be interesting to the Committee to know that patent medicines to the amount of $20,035,954 were manufactured last year in Canada, which, when resold to the consumer, would probably bring in a return of $30,000,000 or $40,000,000. This great quantity of patent medicines was produced by the large manufacturers, and I think they ought to pay a higher fee for each article they produce than $1. On the other hand, the retail druggist should not be taxed over one dollar for each article which he puts up and sells as a patent medicine. I would suggest that the retail druggist be exempted from this fee and that he simply have to pay his registration fee of two dollars. I have shown that the tax is not equitable as between the retail druggists and the large manufacturer.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The Bill does not propose to impose a tax; my hon. friend has a mistaken notion of its purpose. It provides that every manufacturer of a proprietary or patent medicine shall register the same at Ottawa, so that the department may know what patent medicines are being sold to the public. and the technical officers of the department can investigate concerning the ingredients and qualities of their medicines. If on investigation a patent medicine is found to be one that should not be sold it would be put on the forbidden list, or to deal with it may require an amendment of the Act. The purpose of the Bill is that all men should register any patent medicine they make. Upon what principle can we say that the ordinary druggist should pay less than the wholesaler or the manufacturer? If the manufacturer makes more money than the retailer, as he probably does, the revenue of the Government should get some of that money in the shape of income tax. If we are not getting enough now from that source then the income tax should be raised.

Mr. MORPHY: I am not a doctor or a druggist; I am merely interested in this matter as a citizen. I would like to know just what the intentions of the Government are in regard to the Budget in this connection? If this Bill goes through, the fee to be paid by a manufacturer of $100,000 worth of patent medicines will be $2 in respect of each article manufactured. You get protection from the point of view of the analyst, but the country does not derive any revenue unless that manufacturer is hit by the Budget.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is a well understood formula which supplies an answer to my hon friend's question: it is not customary to announce the Budget proposals in advance of their submission to the House.

Mr. JOHN A. STEWART: The remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Steele) are very likely to create a misapprehension in the minds of the members of the Committee. When he states, as he has done, the volume of the goods manufactured the inference might be drawn that that volume of business comes under the provisions of the license which has to be taken out under the Bill. But under the provision of the Proprietary and Patent Medicines Act the manufacturer of a patent or proprietary medicine has two courses open to him. He may put upon the label of his goods the formula of the contents. If he does not do that he must register it as a proprietary or patent medicine. The only preparations which will be subject to this license, as I understand it, are those which are registered. Now a very small proportion of the business referred to by the hon. member (Mr. Steele) represents a registered business. In addition to those patent or proprietary medicines which do not contain the formula upon the label and which come under the license, there is a very large volume of preparations which are manufactured for dispensing—preparations which are manufactured for the druggist and dispensed upon the prescription of physicians. All that business does not come under the necessity for a license, as I understand the Bill. It would therefore be a very great mistake to imagine that anything more than a small proportion of the volume of business concerned will come under license at all. In fact I may say that some of the largest selling proprietary medicines on the market to-day are sold with the formula on the label and are not registered.

Mr. LEGER: I favour maintaining the clause as it now stands requiring a license of $1, for the reason that, as everybody knows, patent medicines in the rural districts are generally regarded as the farmer's "doctor." If the license fee were raised the druggist would not suffer; he would increase his price and the consumer would have to pay.

Mr. McISAAC: I certainly would not be in favour of increasing the license fee on patent medicines. A very large quantity of patent medicines are used by the poorer classes. Whether they are good or harmful in their effect, the fact remains that a great many people believe they derive benefit therefrom and therefore have recourse to these medicines to a very large extent. As has been said by the preceding speaker, if a higher license fee were imposed it would result in increasing the price of patent medicines, with the result that the masses will experience more difficulty in purchasing them and will labour under a sense of injustice.

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: If I am correctly informed, a license is imposed on millers who grind grain and make flour, which I think is proper, the object being to make the department which has supervision of the industry self-sustaining. I think the department in this case ought to be made self-sustaining, and we should have some information on that point.

I think it would be a great mistake to place the department at the disposal of any organization and give them the benefit of what the Government is paying for. I think the crux of the whole matter is to see that the fee is high enough to make this department self-supporting.

Mr. COPP: A number of druggists put up their own preparations. For instance, John Jones might put up his own remedies, such as Jones's Cough Mixture, Jones's Toothache Cure, Jones's Corn Cure, Jones's Face Beautifier, and a dozen others. Would he have to pay a dollar for each one of those preparations?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes, for each patent medicine.

Mr. COPP: I do not think that is right. You might have fifty preparations.

Mr. CHISHOLM: That would be all right, if he had a hundred.

Mr. COPP: He might sell only a few of those preparations.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: My proposed amendment to that section takes care of that.

Mr. COPP: Suppose he sells only $26 worth and had to pay $2 on each preparation?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Under my amendment if he sold less than $25 worth the fee would be returned to him.

Mr. CANNON: Will inspectors be appointed to see that the fees are properly collected? If those inspectors are given reasonable salaries, the salaries alone will eat up the fees. A dollar or a two-dollar fee is awfully small.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Those who are inspectors under the Adulteration Act will be inspectors under this Act.

Mr. GLASS: I wonder whether the minister would consider raising that amount of $25? Even a tax of $1 on a sale of $25 would be 4 per cent. Why should not that $25 be doubled?

Mr. FOURNIER: The fees, I believe, are $2 for the registration of each patent medicine, and a dollar for the license to sell?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Yes.

Mr. FOURNIER: That is a revenue Bill.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Does my hon. friend think it is excessive?

Mr. FOURNIER: It would certainly be excessive. Under this Bill you will provide at least $250,000.

Mr. BELAND: So much the better.

Mr. FOURNIER: I venture to say that the public will have to pay it, as they always do; the manufacturer does not pay anything. Many of the preparations of Parke, Davis and Company and the other manufacturing chemists are made according to the same formula, and under this Bill each of those preparations will have to be registered, although they are precisely the same and you can get them from every druggist.

The CHAIRMAN: Shall the amendment carry?

Mr. GAUVREAU: Provided I can bring forward my amendment afterwards.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I move that the fee be increased from $1 to $5. I want to test the Committee on that. Call it fee, or tax, or whatever you like; I think it should be increased. It seems to me it is wrong to have too many patent medicines on the market, and I want to prevent these men deluding the public with nostrums which are good for nothing.

Mr. FIELDING: May I venture to suggest the question, whether it is in the power of this Committee to increase a tax?

Mr. GAUVREAU: The minister says it is a tax; I contend it is a fee.

The CHAIRMAN: The point of order raised by the hon. member for Shelburne and Queen's (Mr. Fielding) is well taken: fees cannot be increased in Committee.

Subsection as amended agreed to.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I desire to amend section 5 of the Bill by adding as subsection (3) thereto:

> No proprietary or patent medicine shall be sold in Canada unless a license as above has been granted for such sale, and the period for which the license is granted shall determine the time limit during which legal sale may be made.

That really is the substance of the clause enacting that no patent or proprietary medicine can be sold without a license.

Mr. CHISHOLM: Does this clause apply to any person who sells patent medicines? For instance, retail stores sometimes handle patent medicines that do not contain any poison.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The manufacturer will have to pay for the license. Somebody must have a license before patent or proprietary medicines may be lawfully sold.

Mr. PEDLOW: Is there any provision in the Act with regard to the disposition of stocks at present in the hands of retail druggists?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: Not as yet.

Mr. PEDLOW: Should there not be?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: There is something to be said in favour of the suggestion; I see my hon. friend's point. This Act is a very important one. Some important amendments are proposed in the new sections 6 and 7, and as they are very closely related I would ask the Chairman to read these sections together, so that the Committee may get the sense of them. Personally, I should like to get the opinion of the Committee with regard to these two new sections.

9 p.m.

The Chairman read the proposed new clauses 6 and 7, as follows:

6. All proprietary or patent medicines containing opium, or any derivative of coal-tar, and intended for administration to children over one year of age shall be labelled with the words "Dangerous for infants under one year old."

7. (1) No proprietary or patent medicine shall be manufactured, imported, exposed or offered for sale or sold in Canada,—

(a) if it contains cocaine or any of its salts or preparations;

(b) if it contains alcohol in excess of the amount required as a solvent or preservative;

(c) if, containing alcohol, it does not state clearly on the label and wrapper of the bottle, box or other container the percentage by volume of alcohol present;

(d) if, containing alcohol above two and one-half per cent by volume, it is not sufficiently medicated to make it unfit for use as a beverage;

(e) if it contains any drug which is included in the Schedule to this Act the name of which and the amount per dose of which are not conspicuously printed on and an inseparable part of the label and wrapper of the bottle, box or other container, or if the quantity of such drug exceeds the amount permitted by the Advisory Board;

(f) if it contains any drug which is included in the Schedule to this Act and the name of such drug as used on the label be not the commonly employed name of such drug;

(g) if the article be represented as a cure for any specific disease;

(h) if any false, misleading or exaggerated claims be made on the wrapper or label, or in any advertisement of the article.

(2) No proprietary or patent medicine intended for administration to infants under one year old shall contain any opium or any derivative of opium, or any derivative of coal-tar.

Mr. BELAND: We have come to the most important clauses of this Bill. With regard to the new section 6, it will strike every member of the Committee that if a drug is "dangerous for infants under one year old" it is dangerous also for children a year and a half old. The most important question in connection with the manufacture and sale of patent medicines is that which relates to the use of soothing or calmative syrups for children. The use of these preparations in Canada has assumed such formidable proportions that we cannot ignore the subject. What they contain is well known to the medical profession, to pharmacists generally and to the better-educated class of the population. They contain opium and the derivatives of opium—that is, morphine, codeine, heroine, thebaine and other narcotics. If the good Canadian mothers were cognizant of the ravages caused among their dear ones by the use of these preparations, they would immediately and entirely abstain from administering them to their children. They are induced to use them by the alluring descriptions on the labels. It may be argued that you should not interfere with a well-established trade in Canada. But what is the importance, I ask, of the advantages reaped by manufacturers of these patent medicines as compared with the necessity of preserving the health of those beings who to-morrow will constitute the very essence of the Canadian population? It may be known to some—it is not to me—that heartless mothers, knowing what they do, administer calmative syrups for the purpose of soothing their children.

But it is well known to every one that, for instance, in the absence of the mother, an unscrupulous servant may administer those syrups in large quantities, and the mental and physical consequences cannot be measured. Therefore, I intend to move an amendment to section 6, reserving for myself the right to express my opinion further on clause 7. I am not going to adhere to the wording of this amendment; if it be found that an amendment suggested by some member of the committee or by the minister may be more effective, easier of administration or of carrying out, I am ready to accept such suggestion. I move to amend clause 1 of the present Bill by striking out the proposed section 6 and replacing it by the following:

6. The manufacture, importation or sale of all proprietary or patent medicines containing opium or its derivatives or any derivatives of coal tar intended for administration to children under fifteen years, are prohibited.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I support the amendment with pleasure. I am quite sure, after having discussed this matter with some of the medical authorities, that many of the subjects fit for our asylums or even for our jails, were the early victims of these soothing syrups, because all their troubles in life can be traced to the use of opium and narcotics generally. The other day, a very distinguished doctor from Montreal told me that he could point out on the street young men of twenty or twenty-five years of age whose demeanour showed the use of narcotics when they were infants. It is admitted to-day that it is a great misfortune that we should allow any of this poison to be served by fathers or mothers to their children. Many associations of ladies, doctors, members of all sects and denominations, have taken a special interest in what is called baby welfare. The other day I received from the Baby Welfare Committee of Montreal a letter which has doubtless been sent to the minister. This letter informs me that the following resolution was adopted unanimously at a meeting held at Montreal a few days ago:

Whereas, there is a Bill to amend the Proprietary or Patent medicine Act now before the House of Commons, sponsored by Hon. A. K. Maclean, which, in the experience of the medical adviser and child welfare specialists connected with the various units of the Baby Welfare Committee of Montreal, does not safeguard the moral or physical entity of the young child, inasmuch as under section 6, of the proposed Act, opium-containing medication is readily procurable for any infant or child: and, inasmuch, as the Act applies solely to opium in section 6, without reference to its more dangerous habit forming derivatives, as morphine, heroin, etc., being fully considered.

Therefore, be it resolved that this committee go strongly on record as disapproving of section 6 and 7, as at present constituted, and that we urge the manufacture and sale of opium, or its derivatives, in medication be absolutely forbidden in Canada, as not being conducive to the moral or physical betterment of our younger citizenship. In default of this recommendation being adopted, that a conspicuous skull and crossbones emblem, with the word "Poison" distinctly printed across the container, be employed as a deterring influence upon the promiscuous distribution of this unnecessary class of narcotic medication, destined for popular sale and consumption among infants and children in Canada.

I would not only put this sinister emblem of a skull and cross-bones on the bottle containing this poisonous substance for the children, but bar the substance completely from the homes of Canada. It is a crime to allow those soothing syrups, made up of opium or other narcotics, to be exposed for sale in our drug stores or be sold by quack doctors travelling throughout the country. We have already too many subjects in our asylums, too many juvenile delinquents in our jails who have acquired their bad habits by the use early in life of those so-called medicaments. I hope the Committee will accept the wise amendment and that we shall not hear any more of those soothing syrups which are nothing less than poison.

Mr. STEELE: I quite agree with the amendment so far as it goes. I am sorry only that it does not go further. What is not good for a child of fourteen years of age is not good for a child of sixteen years of age. Had this amendment not been moved, or should it be rejected by the Committee, I would suggest another amendment, that a sub-clause be inserted in clause 7 to the effect that no proprietary or patent medicine should be manufactured, imported, exposed or offered for sale in Canada if it contains opium or any of its derivatives. I would exclude all patent medicines containing opium from sale or importation, whether administered to children under fifteen years of age or to adults over fifteen years of age. They should certainly be prohibited for children. The facts presented to the Committee by the hon. members for Beauce (Mr. Beland) and Maisonneuve (Mr. Lemieux) to-night clearly indicate the views of the people who are engaged in baby welfare work, the people who, perhaps, above all others, are qualified to speak of the results of the administration of medicines containing opium to our little children. No doubt opium serves a good purpose sometimes, but too often, in fact in the great majority of cases, it is used to sooth a child suffering from some ailment which should be corrected if the child is going to enjoy good health. It covers up the real ailment affecting the child, keeps the child quiet, and if this goes on long enough, the child will no doubt be found in a moribund condition from the disease from which it is suffering, assisted possibly by the doses of opium. There is another effect which it has on the child, and which, I think, is admitted by all who have given the matter study, namely, that upon the brain. The brain of a child undergoes its greatest development in the first six months of life.

The brain of an adult weighs on an average from 1,400 to 1,500 grammes, and that of a baby six months old on an average about 1,000 grammes. Yet, during these six months of infant life, there are thousands of babies being fed daily on these remedies, call them what you choose, whose chief ingredients are opium or its derivatives, and the development of the brain of a child so fed is interfered with to the extent to which opium is administered to it. The chances of children fed that way for growing up healthy both physically and intellectually are greatly reduced. We not only think that opium should not be sold indiscriminately for administration to children, but that, in Ontario at least, it should not be sold indiscriminately for the use of even adults, who experience considerable difficulty in purchasing opium in any drug store in Ontario. The purchaser of opium has to sign the poison book and observe all the precautions with which the law surrounds its sale. Every person realizes that it is not in the interest of even adults that they should be permitted to buy opium freely and use it as they please. That being so, why should they be allowed to purchase it indiscriminately and with the greatest freedom in the form of patent medicines? I think we should exclude it entirely in patent medicines, and when people want opium they should procure it under proper supervision, duly observing the precautions and restrictions which the law imposes. It will be observed that the first sub-clause prohibits the importation and sale of any medicine containing cocaine or any of its salts or preparation. Now, we all know that cocaine so used is not likely to be nearly so injurious as opium, and if we prohibit cocaine the arguments in favour of the prohibition of opium are very much strengthened. For these reasons I certainly would vote for the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Beauce. If, however, it is not considered satisfactory to the Committee, I would move the amendment which I have suggested, that the entire importation, manufacture and sale of any patent medicines containing opium or its derivatives be prohibited. I believe that now is the time for us to take this step. The very fact that liquor is being restricted in its sale is an argument for us at this early date to protect the people against the indiscriminate use of opium and more injurious drugs which too often will be substituted for the liquor that is prohibited.

Mr. GAUVREAU: I rise to a point of order. You ruled some time ago, Mr. Chairman, that the point was well taken by the hon. member for Shelburn and Queens (Mr. Fielding) that I had no right to move an amendment for the increase of the amount of the license fee in the Bill now under consideration. I now ask your ruling on the point, as to whether the Senate could pass the Bill. Bourinot at page 492 says:

> If any Bills are sent down from the Senate with clauses involving public expenditures or public taxation, the Commons cannot accept them.

The CHAIRMAN: The point of order raised by the hon. member for Temiscouata is that the present Bill which was introduced and passed in the Senate before being submitted to the House of Commons contains clauses involving public taxation in the form of license fees and therefore could not originate in the Senate and must be rejected by the House of Commons. It is true that section 53 of the British North America Act expressly provides:

> Bills for appropriating any part of the public revenue, or for imposing any tax or impost shall originate in the House of Commons.

But there are many precedents where Bills of this nature have been passed in the Senate and the money clauses embodied in the Bills have been later submitted to a Committee of the Whole House. Bourinot at page 493 says:

> It is frequently found convenient to introduce bills involving public expenditure in the Senate, and in such a case the money clauses are embodied in the bill as presented, in order to make it more intelligible. . . . .These clauses are always considered in a previous Committee by the Commons, and regularly referred to the Committee of the Whole on the bill.

The same practice applies to Bills imposing any tax or impost and should be followed in all cases when the House of Commons insists upon its rights and privileges. These rights and privileges are laid down in rule 78, but rule 87 provides that in order to expedite the business of Parliament, the House will not always insist on the privilege of laying aside a Bill sent from the Senate because it imposes a tax, an impost or a penalty. The House of Commons undoubtedly had the right and privilege of laying aside this Bill until it had been preceded by a resolution which would have been considered by a Committee of the Whole House, but the proper time for the exercise of this privilege was when the order was called for the second reading of this Bill. It was read a second time without objection and is now under consideration in Committee. A committee has no power to refuse the consideration of a Bill which has been submitted to it by the House, and I must therefore declare that the point of order is not now well taken.

Mr. J. A. STEWART: To resume, Mr. Chairman. A very wrong impression is apt to be created in the mind of the public by the resolution which associates derivatives of coal tar with opium. There are many of the derivatives of coal tar in very general use not only under prescriptions from practising physicians but on sale to the public. As to their effect on young children, that is a matter on which members of the medical profession in the House are more competent to judge than myself. But in associating the derivatives of coal tar with opium, I think an entirely wrong impression is likely to be created as to the injurious effects of these coal tar derivatives. This is particularly objectionable at present. There is no branch of research that is likely to produce more useful preparations than the future development of the coal tar industry. I suggest that if in the opinion of the medical men certain of the coal tar derivatives could be used without injury, they should be permitted for children up to the age specified in the amendment, provided that the preparation was approved of by the Advisory Board as being harmless to infants over a certain age.

Mr. SHEARD: I have great pleasure in supporting the amendment of the hon. member for Beauce. I think we should put on the statute-book a distinct and positive limitation to the general sale of opiates and narcotics of that class, especially when they are sold in such a way as to be procurable by nurses and those having the care of infant children. The ordinary soothing syrups that are sold so commonly in the drug stores owe their value largely to the opiate and morphine which they contain. These are readily purchasable, and they can be readily procured by unscrupulous or careless nurses for the sole purpose of securing quietness on the part of an infant, irrespective of the harm they do. The apprehensions which have been expressed by various members of the House are well grounded, and I think strong legislation should be provided so as to prevent the general sale of these articles. Nearly the whole of the so-called soothing remedies for children owe their pernicious influence to the opiate derivative in the form of codeine and morphia which they contain. I think there is something in the exception taken by the hon. member (Mr. Steele) to linking up, particularly the preparations of coal tar with opium preparations. If you can link up coal tar derivatives, carbolic acid and other preparations, which are very largely family medicaments, or which are used for various disinfecting purposes, it is a question how far we should go in that particular inclusion. I think that might be reconsidered and we might specify more accurately what particular preparations of coal tar should be included. The family of coal tar products is a very large one. I am not sure that it would not include many of the analine dyes and preparations that are not medicinal at all. Certainly it would include many of the ordinary domestic disinfectants, which are used as disinfectants pure and simple, sometimes by the gallon. I do not suppose it is the intention of the Act to prohibit their employment in that connection, and yet they might be construed to be included in coal tar products or derivatives under this Act.

Mr. BELAND: This amendment would cover only medicines which are intended for internal use.

Mr. SHEARD: That would be satisfactory if you did that.

Mr. BELAND: That is the meaning of the amendment.

Mr. FIELDING: May I ask if the Committee may have the amendment read again? I do not think it was fully understood.

The CHAIRMAN: Mr. Beland moves to strike out the proposed clause 6, on page 3, and to replace the same by the following:

> The manufacture, importation and sale of all proprietary or patent medicines containing opium or its derivatives, or any derivative of coal tar intended for administration to children under fifteen years of age, are prohibited.

Mr. MANION: I should like to support the amendment to the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Steele).

The CHAIRMAN: The amendment proposed by the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Steele) is not a sub-amendment, and does not affect clause 6.

Mr. MANION: Might I say to the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Beland) that I support his amendment entirely, but the hon. member for Perth (Mr. Steele) went further and I should like to ask the hon. member for Beauce to go as far in his amendment as the hon. member for Perth has gone in his so as to bar out patent medicines containing opium not only for children but for adults. There are in this country very many young men who are cocaine users, or as they call them in the West, snow eaters. That is the expression used in the West to describe cocaine and opium users. It is claimed by many people who are supporting anti-prohibition measures that since prohibition has been adopted the cocaine users are much more numerous than they were in the past. I do not think that a drug of the strength of opium should be used in any medicine except under a prescription of a practising physician. I would like to ask the hon. member for Beauce to strengthen his motion by introducing into it a provision to eliminate opium from all patent medicines.

Mr. BELAND: I might suggest a wording for my amendment which would cover what the hon. member for Perth has in mind. It would mean that the manufacture, importation and sale of all proprietary medicines containing not only opium but the derivatives of coal tar should be prohibited. I do not know that the Committee is prepared to go so far as to prohibit patent medicines containing derivatives of coal tar for administration to adults. In order to meet the wish of the Committee I shall be willing to strike out the words "derivatives of coal tar" although I think that antipyrine or acetanilid could not safely be administered to children in any form without the supervision of a regular, qualified physician. But it would be a great step in the right direction if we adopted this amendment:

The manufacture, importation and sale of all proprietary or patent medicines containing opium or its derivatives intended for internal administration are prohibited.

That would cover people of all ages and it would leave out the derivatives of coal tar. Nobody could then come forward with preparations intended for children containing any opiates.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I do not intend to proceed to a conclusion with this clause to-night. In any event I purpose having it stand over. I anticipated that it would have to be amended; in fact, I have some amendments myself which I shall propose but I wanted to get the sense of the Committee on sections 6 and 7. There are many considerations which must be kept in mind when preparing this amendment and I should like a little time to consider the amendment which has been proposed and perhaps submit a different amendment of my own. I would propose that we let this clause stand.

Mr. FIELDING: Are these words "intended for administration to children" drawn from any existing Act?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: At the present time there is no limitation upon the sale of patent medicines containing opium, or any of its derivatives, when administered to children.

Mr. FIELDING: What I desire to know is whether there is any means of determining the "intention"? The Bill speaks of medicines intended for a certain purpose; is there any difficulty in determining the "intention"?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think it would be very difficult of determination.

Mr. STEELE: I would be very glad indeed to accept the amendment of the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Beland).

[Mr. Béland.]

Mr. PETER McGIBBON: May I ask who was, so to speak, the father of this clause? It does not appear to me that in this age one legitimate excuse can be offered for putting up in a patent medicine any form of opium to be dispensed by the laity to children. The proposal seems to be absolutely contrary to the rapidly growing practice in the medical profession which is to eliminate it as far as possible, in treating diseases not only of infants but of adults. We in the medical profession know that from time to time an emergency call comes from some home where an infant has, through ignorance or other cause, taken an overdose of opium, laudanum, paregoric, or some form of the derivatives of opium; and many of us have seen lives pass out of this world owing to the fact that medicines of that nature were easily procurable and were more or less daily used in the home as household remedies. Now the object of this Bill is to protect the public; it could have none other. It does look to me, I must say, as though the interests had not been very far away when this Bill was drawn—not only as regards the present but with respect to other succeeding clauses. This measure has all the earmarks of a Bill which had, I was going to say, been commercialized, or the earmarks of a commercial transaction. We must not get away from the fact that our object is to pass a Bill that will protect the public. I do not think any professional man or any layman can adduce a single argument to-day that will justify putting any derivative of opium into the hands of the public to be administered to children without knowing its nature, because that is what this Bill means. If you are going to give the public any form of medicine containing any of the derivatives of opium for goodness sake let it be indicated on the bottle so that the purchaser can read it and know they are administering some form of a drug which is very dangerous and very injurious. Opium, of course, has its uses, but I think I am within the mark when I say that practically the only great use it has is to alleviate pain; all other uses are detrimental to health and are absolutely dangerous to children.

Mr. LEMIEUX: If the clause is allowed to stand it seems to me that after having obtained the sense of the Committee, as we have done this evening, when the Bill once more comes up for consideration the minister must eliminate this clause from it. We have a full attendance of members this evening, and I am agreeably surprised to see so many hon. gentlemen present. If we wait until another occasion when perhaps there will be a bare quorum of members, the objectionable clause may perhaps pass contrary to the sense of the Committee as it has been expressed. I hope my hon. friend will take that into consideration, because it seems to me the general feeling of the Committee is against these poisonous syrups, and they must be done away with. I do not know why we should not follow the sound course of adopting the amendment of my hon. friend from Beauce.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I never expected that this clause would pass the Committee in its present form——

Mr. LEMIEUX: It passed the Senate.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I am not satisfied with the phraseology of the amendment proposed by the hon. member for Beauce, and I should like a little time to consider its redrafting. I should like also to inquire how far the derivatives of coal tar should be excluded from the provisions of the clause. I think probably it would be a mistake to have the provisions so comprehensive.

Mr. LEMIEUX: It is a good German product.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: My hon. friend from Muskoka inquired who was the father of the Bill. The measure was prepared in the Department of Commerce by the departmental officials who are responsible for the administration of the Act. Up to the present moment there was nothing in our law restricting in any way the sale of drugs carrying opium or any of its derivatives, and I think the officials were under the impression that a reform of this kind could be accomplished possibly by stages rather than at one step. I have no personal knowledge of the investment in these particular drugs or patent medicines. If you prohibit the manufacture and sale of them at once you may be striking at what was at one time a perfectly lawful business, and I should like to think over what the likely effect of the prohibition would be. For instance, if the further manufacture of this particular drug is to be prohibited hereafter you have got to deal with the question of the stocks now on hand.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Does my hon. friend mean the stock of medicines or the stock of infants?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I mean the stock of drugs on hand. For the reasons given I should like to have some time to consider the matter further and would therefore ask that the clause stand.

Mr. MANION: I would suggest, while consideration is being given to the question of opium and its derivatives, that the minister should also consider a drug which I do not think is referred to in the Bill and which has not been mentioned here to-night —I refer to chloral.

Mr. BELAND: I think that appears in the schedule.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I think it does.

Mr. BELAND: In order to meet the objections which were very properly raised by some hon. gentlemen, I have redrafted the amendment, and it will now read:—

The manufacture, importation or sale of all proprietary or patent medicines containing opinum or its derivatives for internal use are prohibited.

I will lay the amendment on the Table, Mr. Chairman, for the consideration of the minister and the department.

The CHAIRMAN: Is it the pleasure of the Committee that the hon. member have leave to withdraw the amendment which he first proposed?

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: I will have a conference with my hon. friend from Beauce in regard to the amendment which he has just submitted. I move:—

That the further consideration of clause 6 and the amendment thereto be now postponed.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN: The balance of the Bill outside of clause 7 I do not expect will be very contentious, and should not take up a great deal of time. Therefore I do not think I shall proceed further to-night. I move that the Committee rise and report progress.

Progress reported.

SUPPLY.

The House again in Committee of Supply, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Public Works—Rents, repairs, furniture, heating, etc., $3,595,000.

Mr. McMASTER: Mr. Chairman, the item is very large and I should think might preferably be taken up clause by clause. The information I seek, it seems to me, should properly be asked under this heading. My idea is that it would be interesting to the Committee to find out what rental is being paid by the Government for accommodation in privately-owned buildings in Ottawa, and how that rental will compare with the current rate of interest on the capital investment for the new buildings which, I understand, are to house the different departments now scattered all over the city.

Mr. FIELDING: I would suggest to the minister that he might properly accept the first part of my hon. friend's proposal and call these items individually, otherwise we shall roam over the whole thing; and my hon. friend's question will come up a little later.

Mr. CARVELL: I think that will be the wisest course.

Ottawa public buildings—Elevator attendants, $55,000.

Mr. McMASTER: Is that elevator attendants for all the buildings?

Mr. CARVELL: All the buildings in Ottawa.

Gas and electric light, including roads and bridges, $65,000.

Mr. McMASTER: I think we should have some information about this. It is lumped together in a very general way.

Mr. CARVELL: I can only say that there is an increase of $5,000 over last year. That is because more space is now occupied, and the rates for electric light are based entirely upon the rates charged by the two electric light companies in Ottawa. I suppose one might say that the Hydro-Electric sets the rate—I do not know just which it is, sometimes one, sometimes the other company—but whatever it is the two companies charge exactly the same rate, and we pay the same rate as the ordinary user of electricity. We have a contract with the older company, the Ottawa Electric Company, made, I think, in 1916, and in that contract are set forth the amounts which we pay. The rate is $20 per horse-power for all power consumed, either direct or alternating, and we pay the same meter rate and square area rate—whatever that is—as is charged to the public.

Mr. McMASTER: Where is gas used now?

Mr. CARVELL: Gas is not used to any very great extent, but you will find it in the post office building; it is used for sealing purposes.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: What have roads and bridges to do with lighting?

[M. McMaster.]

Mr. CARVELL: There are a good many things that are almost unexplainable to the ordinary citizen unless he happens to live in the city of Ottawa. This has been the Capital for a long time, and a custom grew up years ago—which I would almost call an abuse—under which the Government did work on behalf of the municipality of Ottawa which they would not do in any other part of Canada. For instance, we take care of the approaches to the bridge across the Ottawa river, just below the falls. It is not a very great amount of money, but there is some expended every year in keeping that up. I cannot justify it, I cannot give any reason for it; I can only say: It is there. The Plaza in front of the Chateau Laurier comes under that category, the reason being that a great many years ago the Government maintained the bridges over the canal, known as the Dufferin and Sapper bridges, and those having been converted into the Plaza, we still take care of the maintenance. Then there is the Laurier Avenue bridge, which is also maintained by the Government. They are grouped together, and that is the meaning of the phraseology.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: How much do the bridge appropriations amount to?

Mr. CARVELL: I am told $2,400.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: I remember last year when I criticised those expenditures, the minister told us that he was quite new at the job, but he admitted that too much money was being expended on the grounds. I see this year that he wants some $350,000. Will he explain now why, instead of reducing that expenditure, he is more lavish than ever? Does he understand his job better this year?

Mr. CARVELL: My hon. friend's memory must be bad. I do not remember making the statement that too much money was expended on the grounds. Had I said so, I would have remembered it.

Mr. McMASTER: Was there not a promise of economy?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, and I have tried to carry it out. There is no increase of $300,000 on grounds in Ottawa. The totals in these two columns include rents, repairs, furniture, heating, lighting, etc., for all public buildings in Canada.

Heating, including salaries of engineers, firemen and watchmen, $250,000.

Mr. COPP: Who supplied the coal last year?

Mr. CARVELL: The coal was bought last year by the War Purchasing Commission. So far as Ottawa was concerned, it was purchased direct from the mines. Hundreds of people supplied coal, from different portions of Canada. Under the present system all purchases of coal and things of that kind for public buildings, if the amounts run over $500, come under my personal supervision. Invariably we call for tenders and before I sign for the goods I know how many tenders were submitted, whether public tenders were called for, and so on. I cannot commence to name the persons from whom coal was purchased, but that is the method pursued in purchasing it.

10 p.m.

Departments generally—care and cleaning of departmental buildings, including amount of $100 to E. Snowdon for firing noon gun—formerly voted under Civil Government Estimates, $310,000.

Mr. FIELDING: Does that mean that this item is hereafter to be under the Public Works Department?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes.

Mr. FIELDING: The Minister of Finance should be supremely grateful.

Mr. CARVELL: I think he should, judging from my experience during the last six or eight months. However, we have to take it.

Mr. COPP: How does that amount compare with the expenditure last year?

Mr. CARVELL: I do not think there is any change. This charwoman service, which was formerly administered by the Finance Department, was transferred to the Department of Public Works at the beginning of the last fiscal year; therefore this is a new item in our Estimates.

Mr. COPP: I should think the amount would be higher.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not think it is. I think we have effected some slight reforms in this particular service.

Mr. FIELDING: Is there not a question of increase now pending?

Mr. CARVELL: I do not think there is any question pending; there may be a wish pending.

Repairs, furniture, grounds, snow and street maintenance, etc., $450,000.

Mr. McMASTER: Roughly, how is this amount divided?

Mr. CARVELL: There are 157 men on the workshop staff; they cost last year $146,066. Then there are the following items: mechanical engineer's staff, 60 men, $63,390; grounds for the Dominion buildings, 20 men for maintenance, $13,934; five men attending to flags, Dominion buildings, at 25 cents a day, $360; maintenance of roads and bridges, removal of snow in winter, etc., 16 men, $12,831; Wellington street repair staff, 14 men, $10,841; purchase of material, such as lumber, oil, seeds, bulbs, glass, etc., $202,577. That also includes purchase of carpets, furniture, etc., for all departments. I can give the name of every man employed, his salary, and how much he has been paid for the year.

Mr. McMASTER: I will not go that far along the lines of inquisition. But I would ask the minister what he considers to be the proportion maintained between the number of men engaged and the work they do?

Mr. CARVELL: I have a very strong impression on that point. If I were hiring men for this work I would put one-half or two-thirds the number of men on the job, and would get a little more work out of them. But they are doing about as much work as most men do who work for the Government.

Mr. McMASTER: You would not include ministers of the Crown in that category?

Mr. CARVELL: Oh, no; or members of Parliament.

Mr. VIEN: The minister has said that part of that amount goes to repair of Wellington street. Is that for pavements?

Mr. CARVELL: We maintain Wellington street from the Plaza to what is called the Perley Home—practically to the waterworks.

Mr. VIEN: What are the arrangements between Ottawa and the Dominion Government—I mean, our relations generally?

Mr. CARVELL: Ten years ago an arrangement was entered into between the Dominion Government and the city of Ottawa which expires on the first of June of this year. Under that agreement the Government was to take care of certain streets and bridges. But we have always adopted the policy of paying our share of local improvements, in Ottawa and elsewhere. In Ottawa, we go a little further than that, and all the construction, maintenance and repair of Wellington street is, as I understand it, done by the Government.

Mr. McMASTER: Does the Government do that through a contractor?

Mr. CARVELL: No, by this staff of men. My hon. friend, if he had followed me, would have heard the number of men employed in each one of those works, for instance, Wellington street, repair staff, fourteen men, amount, $10,841.

Mr. McMASTER: Does that mean that for the maintenance of one street, which is considerably less than one mile in length, fourteen men are kept working all the time?

Mr. CARVELL: That is what I mean to say.

Mr. McMASTER: I am sure that does not strike the minister or the hon. member for Brome as a wise or business-like proposition.

Mr. CARVELL: I quite agree with my hon. friend that I could take $10,000 and get a good deal more work done for it, but this is for repairs. There is something in that.

Mr. McMASTER: We would like to hear the minister propose some reform.

Mr. CARVELL: If my hon. friend will watch me long enough, he will, I think, get something that will satisfy him. He may get some information before I get through with these Estimates. There is no question that a system has grown up in Ottawa, the growth of half a century—we have a great body of workmen here who get their pay each day, and I hope they are working every day, but I cannot go out and watch them as I have something else to do.

Mr. McMASTER: There is only light traffic on Wellington street, and there cannot be $10,000 worth of repair work there every year.

Mr. CARVELL: The foreman says those men work there; he sends in his report and they get their pay. I think they do work there; they put in their time there anyway.

Mr. L. A. LAPOINTE: There should be some reform in regard to this matter, and while I believe the minister is looking for some reform, I do not see the reform coming. I notice that every year we are voting $450,000 for repairs, furniture, grounds, snow and street maintenance, etc. Surely when a thing is once well done, there should be some reduction in the estimate for the following year. When the minister says that he wants $450,000 this year exactly the same sum as last year, that does not show any intention of making a reform. I can understand a piece of ground being improved one year but I cannot understand why it should be being perpetually repaired, and surely in some year less money should be voted for this work. If that were done I would see some reform about which the minister preaches so often.

Mr. CARVELL: If my hon. friend would give a little more thought to this than he has given already, I am sure he would come to the conclusion that there are two sides to the case. Since this House has assembled I have been asked a number of times to make changes in the rooms in this building. Such changes are not very great and I give them only as an illustration. It takes men and material to make those changes, and, so far as I know, they have all been granted. With the great congestion of civil servants in the last three or four years—and it has been great—a staff gets so big that it cannot occupy its premises and other premises must be provided for it and it has to be moved. There always must be changes. This is like a man moving into a new house—no man ever moved into a house in his life but his wife wanted some papering done or something else; she wanted a change of some kind. That is the way with civil servants—they want change and one has to have a staff to provide for such changes, and we have a staff of 157 men. I must say I think those men are pretty busy most of the time. Sometimes I wonder if it would not be possible to get a better system than we have in regard to the changing of staffs; but with the congestion that we have had to contend with in the last year and a half we have done the best we could, and I do not see the possibility of any improvement until the Dominion of Canada owns its own buildings. I do not believe one-half of our staff is housed in our own buildings to-day, and even when the new Hunter building is completed, as I hope it will be in July or August next, still nearly one-half of the staff will be housed in rented buildings. And every time we make a change in the occupation of those buildings or any portion of them it costs money to move the staffs, and something must always be done, such as the buying of new furniture. Civil servants are just like other human beings; they want things and they usually get them. I can give no other explanation. I have no doubt at all that in this Committee there are a dozen men who could take those 157 men, if they could deal with them as hired men, and put competent foremen over them, and who would get more work out of them than the country is getting. But I cannot stand over them myself. In the last year and a half those men have been hired and they have been fired, if necessary, entirely by the superintendent in charge of them. No man, excepting the clerk of works, has anything to say as to who shall go on that staff; he has an absolutely free hand. I have talked the matter over with him many times; I have found fault that those men are not giving as much service as they should give; but he assures me they are, and unless I can find time to go out and supervise them personally, I do not see how I am going to change conditions. I want to treat the Committee fairly and tell them exactly the situation. I think a change should be made; I think our staff is too big, but now these men want an eight-hour day. They want nearly everything except work.

Mr. McMASTER: I would not be against an eight-hour day. I dislike working more than eight hours a day, and the man who works hard for eight hours a day has done a pretty good day's work. I do not object to a man's getting an eight-hour day so long as he is working during the eight-hour period.

Mr. CARVELL: I rather agree with that view.

Mr. McMASTER: The frankness of the minister invites criticism and makes one desire to give helpful criticism. Let us take this question of Wellington street. Has the minister any idea of making with the city of Ottawa some contract whereby the city would take over the control and maintenance of that street? It is the height of ridiculousness to maintain one plant for keeping one street in repair in a city which I presume has an adequate plant for maintaining all the other streets in repair.

Mr. CARVELL: If the hon. member has been reading the newspapers lately—and I presume he has—I think he will find that the city of Ottawa is not in a very receptive mood at the present time for taking over services hitherto performed by the Government. The city wants the Government to take over a large proportion of the services hitherto performed by the city, and we are having some very interesting discussions at present over this very question.

Mr. McMASTER: My humble observations may strengthen the minister's hand in dealing with the municipal authorities.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: It would be satisfactory if the minister could give us a statement of how much we are contributing altogether to the city of Ottawa. We find the items scattered over the Estimates in various places, and I do not think any member of the Committee has a very clear idea of how much money we are paying to the city of Ottawa. I understand the city of Ottawa is dissatisfied, but we want to know whether it has a good reason to be dissatisfied or not.

Mr. CARVELL: Ten years ago an arrangement was made with the city of Ottawa by which the Dominion Government agreed to pay $100,000 a year to the Ottawa Improvement Commission for the maintenance of parks and driveways and $15,000 a year to the city of Ottawa by way of remuneration for the fire protection which we receive from the city. That contract expires on the 1st of June. There have been a number of conferences between the city of Ottawa and a committee of the Government as to the terms of the renewal of the contract. The Mayor of Ottawa published a very exhaustive statement in January last setting forth his contention as to what the Government should pay, the amount he fixes being about $800,000 a year. We had a meeting before Parliament met and a great many since, and finally, representing the Committee, I made an offer of $150,000 a year to the Ottawa Improvement Commission for the next ten years—$100,000 a year to go to the city to cover all services performed by the city for the Government, and the Government to relinquish to the city the right of taxing civil servants upon their incomes. For a great many years there has been an arrangement by which the city of Ottawa has not taxed the incomes of civil servants by reason of amounts which the Government has been paying to the city. I have taken the ground that it is none of our business. The civil servant resident in the city is an ordinary citizen and should pay his taxes the same as any other man. In my proposal we relinquish in favour of the city the right of taxing civil servants. The city think they can raise $57,000 a year from income taxes, but my opinion is they should get $75,000 or $80,000 a year under a proper administration of the law. Taking the city's figure it would mean that instead of $150,000 going to the Commission there would be a sum of $307,000. The city claim that we should pay on the basis of taxation.

Mr. COPP: An increase of $182,000?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, but not $182,000 of actual money paid out by the Government. There would be an actual increase of $135,000 a year paid by the Government. Under the British North America Act, Government property is not taxable, and the city of Ottawa claim that because of this fact we should pay them an amount representing what the taxes ordinarily ought to be. Of course, we cannot admit that, but there is one matter with which I have a great deal of sympathy. One of the most antediluvian laws regarding water or any public utility that I have ever heard of in my life exists in Ottawa. A man pays $2, I think, on the first $1,000 valuation of his property, and after that pays a greater rate on every other $1,000. And you pay that no matter whether you use water or not, or whether you have half a dozen bathrooms or none at all; and even if it is a vacant lot you pay the same water rate. They say that a fair valuation of Government property in Ottawa would be about $20,000,000, and that therefore we should pay water rates according to this valuation. I say that we should pay water rates according to the number of thousand gallons used, and I have offered to the city of Ottawa to put a meter on every service in the city and pay a fair meter rate, and that if we were not able to agree on a fair rate we could leave the matter to arbitration. We are also using their sewers to a certain extent, and pay a certain amount for that. They say we should pay one-fifth of the total maintenance charges of the sewers, but we have not agreed to that. My opinion is that all public utilities, whether used by the Government or by private individuals, should be metered; in other words, that a man should pay for what he consumes, no more and no less. But the city says: No, we should pay for all our services on the basis of their method of taxation and upon their valuation of our property. I think we shall agree in the end. I am of opinion that there is a lot of ordinary politics in it, and no doubt in the next fortnight the city will accept the offer we have made them, which I think is a generous one.

Mr. McMASTER: Has the minister considered the fact that generally the people come to a town because of the advantages the town has in itself, while Ottawa has its present population because people are attracted by the fact that this is the federal capital ?

Mr. CARVELL: If there is any argument we have not advanced along that line I should be glad to hear it. We have put up to the city every argument conceivable in that direction, and have not made much impression.

Mr. McMASTER: I trust that in the new arrangement made by the city this duplication of road maintenance equipment will be eliminated.

Mr. CARVELL: We shall certainly consider it.

Mr. LEGER: I think the Government might go further. I would suggest that in view of the fact that the sessions of Parliament are getting longer every year, and the fact that hon. members would undoubtedly like to bring with them their families, and as it is extremely difficult many a time to get necessary accommodation, the Government might provide apartments for such hon. members as desired to avail themselves of such accommodation. The members might occupy the apartments for the period of the session, or probably for the year, if they cared to, and could pay rent to the Government. Under such an arrangement they would know exactly where to go when the session convened, and the House might sit for four or five or six months without the inconvenience that members suffer at present by inability to have their families with them because of lack of accommodation.

Mr. JACOBS: The Government might take the matter up under the new housing scheme.

Mr. CARVELL: It is worth considering.

Mr. FRIPP: As I have the honour to represent the city, I cannot allow some of the remarks which have been made to pass without objection. In the first place, I would point out to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Carvell) that he is in error when he casts some doubt upon the quantity of work done by the men employed in his department. I have some personal knowledge of the work these men do, and venture to say that the working men and mechanics in the departments in Ottawa work as hard and as faithfully as those who work for private corporations.

In regard to the agreement which is now being entered into between the city of Ottawa and the Government of Canada I submit that the amount which the Government propose to offer is entirely inadequate. What is the situation? One-fifth of the whole taxable property of the city is owned or held by the Government.

When a Government leases a building the revenue which the city would otherwise derive from that building and the land upon which it stands immediately stops. The result is that the Government, unless it is placed in the position of the ordinary citizen, escapes the payment of a large share of the taxation. I fail to understand upon what principle the Government should not be treated as all the other citizens of Ottawa are treated. If the Government had to pay the city of Ottawa, the amount of payment would be in the neighbourhood of $600,000 instead of $100,000 that they propose to give to the city under this new agreement. I am not speaking for the moment of the $150,000 which the Government propose to give to the Improvement Commission, because the city of Ottawa has no control over that commission or the expenditure of that money. The Commission is one appointed by the Government, it is responsible to the Government and it spends this money upon the parks and driveway which surround the city of Ottawa, presumably for the benefit of the people of Canada and incidentally for the benefit of the people of Ottawa. But, in carrying out the scheme of the late lamented Sir Wilfrid Laurier to make Ottawa "the Washington of the north," it was suggested that this Commission should be formed independently of the corporation so as to beautify and make attractive the city for those who have to come here to do business. The city of Ottawa is to receive only $100,000 for the services it renders. What services does it render? It supplies water to the Government and, although the supply is not under meter, the best information that the corporation officials can obtain is that the Government uses water, if it were metered, to the value of nearly $100,000. There is no restraint upon the use of it in any way; they use what they want.

Mr. McMASTER: We do not even have hot water to wash our hands with.

Mr. FRIPP: That is not the fault of the city of Ottawa. Then the city gives fire protection. That is an important item. The Government uses the sewers of the city; and there are other services supplied which if supplied to a private individual or a resident would cost that individual from $50,000 to $100,000. Why should the rest of the people pay for the services rendered to the Government of Canada? I hope the Minister of Public Works and the Committee who are still dealing with this question will further consider a more reasonable settlement in connection with the items I have mentioned.

It is true that there has to be set off against the extreme amount, say, $600,000 or $800,000 a year, the advantages that the city derives from the fact that it is the Capital. There is no doubt that there are numbers of people who come here on Government business who would not come to Ottawa if it were not the Capital, and that a certain amount is spent and business is increased by that fact. But I think if the matter were gone into carefully and fairly with the view of placing the arrangement with the city of Ottawa upon a business basis, we ought to receive at least $300,000, allowing for all those other incidental advantages which are brought to the city by reason of the fact that it is the Capital of Canada.

I still hope and trust that, notwithstanding what the minister has said, he has not yet made up his mind not to meet the city, and its position as stated by the mayor, more fairly, from the point of view of the city, at all events, and make an amicable arrangement upon the basis of the value of the services rendered.

I would ask the Committee to remember that one-third of the people of Ottawa including their families, are Government employees and that the city loses a large sum of money that it would not lose if these people were engaged in some other industry. If we could have an industry in Ottawa employing 15,000 men and women we would gain, it is quite evident, not the amount that the Government has proposed to pay, but a much larger sum in return for the services rendered in connection with water, fire protection, sewerage, and hospitals. We supply the hospitals for the city of Ottawa and these are used by the civil servants. The Government indirectly gains a benefit in that respect. We could tax their incomes, but the cost of collecting the income tax from the Civil Service would probably eat into a large portion of the revenue derived from that source. The arrangement heretofore has been that the city should not collect the income tax from the civil servants, it being, in a sense, paid by the Government under this arrangement.

I can only commend to the Minister of Public Works the spirit of the late lamented Sir Wilfrid Laurier and express the hope that he will follow in his footsteps in his desire to make Ottawa, what it should be, as the Capital City of Canada, and to make it really the city of the whole people. If my hon. friend will adopt the spirit of the late lamented gentleman of whom I have just spoken, I am sure that a better, a fairer arrangement can be made with the city of Ottawa than that which, apparently, the minister proposes, namely, the payment simply of $100,000 into the treasury of the corporation.

Mr. CARVELL: I appreciate the fair manner in which the hon. member for Ottawa (Mr. Fripp) has discussed the matter. I realize that it is a matter somewhat personal to him and one which is of interest to his constituents. I think I have approached it in the fair spirit of the late Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and that I have even gone very much farther because I realize that the city has grown larger and that the world has advanced in ten years. Whereas Sir Wilfrid Laurier made an arrangement for the payment of $100,000 to the commission, I have offered $150,000 a year, and whereas he made an arrangement for $15,000 to go to the city, I have offered $100,000 and the right to tax the Civil Service which will represent about $50,000 or $75,000. It seems to me that, if you are going to make comparisons, I certainly have not been less generous than was the gentleman who has been referred to.

I do not want to discuss it any further than is necessary but I want to state to my hon. friend that the remarks which I made about the work done by employees were made from personal experience and knowledge, and not from hearsay. Of course, I have not had an opportunity of watching these men in a great proportion of their work, but I have had an opportunity of seeing with my own eyes certain things in the year and a half that I have been connected with the department, and I want to tell him that I would not feed some of these men for what they are doing. I would not have them on my premises at all. Why, the Speaker of the House told me only yesterday that he had a lot of these men repairing a room for him—one little room that a man would paint in one-half or three-quarters of a day. Yet six or seven men spent four or five days on the work. Wherever you go it is the same thing.

Mr. COWAN: Upon what ground are these men retained? If they were working for me I would fire them.

Mr. CARVELL: So would I.

Mr. COWAN: Why don't you?

Mr. CARVELL: I would like to get hold of a few special cases like that. The trouble is I cannot get the information. I happened to get this instance in conversation with the Speaker yesterday, when we were talking about the work of these men.

Mr. COWAN: I would fire every one of them.

Mr. FIELDING: Reference has been made to the determination to make of Ottawa "the Washington of the North," and I notice that in a recent discussion in the press mention is made of what the national government in the United States does for Washington and the question is asked, what is our Government doing? I wish to ask my hon. friend whether any proposal has been made to adopt the Washington system here? There is something to be said in favour of it, but its adoption would wipe out the municipal government in Ottawa as well as the individual citizen, so far as active participation in municipal affairs is concerned. In Washington the matter is left in the hands of a commission appointed by the Government. The Government pays a very large part of the cost of administration—I think one-half—and the citizens of Washington, unless there has been some change of late, pay the other half, and have no representation or voice in the administration. Has that proposition been put to my hon. friend?

Mr. CARVELL: No. That proposition has been discussed with the committee representing the city but it did not find very much favour at their hands.

Mr. FIELDING: Then the references made to what the national government in the United States is doing for Washington are scarcely applicable to Ottawa?

Mr. CARVELL: Hardly.

Rideau Hall (including grounds), improvements, furniture, maintenance, etc.—$65,000.

Mr. McMASTER: How are these items divided up?

Mr. CARVELL: There is, for example, a maintenance staff.

Mr. McMASTER: What is the amount required for that staff?

Mr. CARVELL: The staff includes one upholsterer, one carpenter, three painters, one carter, one plumber, three engineers, three firemen, nine labourers, and one repairer, and the amount required is $16,791.

Mr. VIEN: Do we need all these men?

Mr. CARVELL: I have not gone there to investigate. There are some things that the Minister of Public Works rather fights shy of.

An hon. MEMBER: If the grounds are kept in good order during the present fiscal year I do not see why you require so large an amount for improvements for the next fiscal year.

Mr. CARVELL: Then there are 16 men employed on the gardens, grounds and roads, for which $12,857 is asked. About 25 labourers, engineers, carters, plumbers and such like are employed in maintenance and other kinds of work. Some of them, however, are only employed for a part of the year. In connection with greenhouse, gardens and roads I would say about 15 or 18 men are employed. I have every reason to believe that all these men are necessary.

Mr. VIEN: Upon whose recommendation are these men appointed?

Mr. CARVELL: They are employed by the Clerk of Works without any recommendation from anybody.

Mr. VIEN: Is the Clerk of Works an official of the department?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, and he has the right to hire these men and to dismiss them for cause.

Mr. VIEN: I would suggest then that many of them should be fired. I understand we occupy rather a delicate position when we discuss this matter, but this is a yearly expenditure of $65,000. If the appointment of these men comes under the Clerk of Works and the officials of the department their attention should be drawn to the fact that quite a few of these employees are unnecessary; it is only common sense to say that. If a careful study of the situation were made, I think it would be found that we could economize and save a few thousand dollars on this item.

Mr. JACOBS: Do I understand that the $65,000 represents the upkeep of this mansion?

Mr. CARVELL: It does.

Mr. VIEN: No, it does not. The very next item is a vote of $17,000 additional for fuel and light.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, that is right.

Mr. JACOBS: Is that $17,000 in addition to the $65,000?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes.

Mr. VIEN: That represents a total of $82,000 for the maintenance of this mansion. I think without curtailing the accommodation at Rideau Hall or the comfort of the high officials who reside there—comfort that should not be limited by any means—there are some unnecessary expenditures which it is our duty to diminish.

Mr. CANNON: Will the minister tell the Committee if $65,000 were spent last year?

Mr. CARVELL: No. The amount spent was $58,579, leaving a balance of $6,420 unexpended.

Mr. CANNON: If $58,000 sufficed last year, why should it not meet the necessities this year?

Mr. VIEN: With the cost of everything going up.

Mr. CARVELL: It is impossible to foresee exactly what repairs may be necessary, or what emergencies we may have to meet. With the care that we are giving this expenditure, I feel the Committee would be safe in trusting the department with $65,000. If that amount is not needed, I can assure the Committee it will not be expended.

Mr. McMASTER: Has there not been an item similar to this in the Estimates for many years past?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes. Ever since Confederation we have had to maintain Rideau Hall.

Mr. McMASTER: Has the cost of maintenance always run up to figures like this?

Mr. CARVELL: I cannot speak from memory, but I know the figures have been fairly generous as long as I can remember.

Mr. CANNON: Who looks after the expenditure of that money?

Mr. CARVELL: The Clerk of Works, as far as labourers are concerned.

Mr. CANNON: Does he report to the department where the money has gone?

Mr. CARVELL: He puts in the timesheets, from which it appears to be correct that these men work the number of hours for which they are paid.

Mr. PEDLOW: It seems to me that if the Clerk of Works were given a "curtain lecture," it might have the desired effect.

Mr. CARVELL: I do not know as to that. I am inclined to blame the system rather than the Clerk of Works, who is one of the officials of the department for whom I have the highest regard. I have talked this matter over with him many times, and I believe he is doing his duty. I am afraid the only way to provide a remedy is to adopt very drastic measures, perhaps more drastic than I would feel like taking. However, I want to assure my hon. friends that from the knowledge I have at the present time, I think there will be a change in the future.

Mr. JACOBS: What is the name of the Clerk of Works?

Mr. CARVELL: Mr. Croll. He is Clerk of Works on government work.

Mr. CASGRAIN: What is his salary?

Mr. CARVELL: It is $1,600.

Mr. CANNON: Could the minister tell us what was done last year?

Mr. CARVELL: No, I have not the details here. It must be remembered that this item provides for the maintenance of the buildings, the grounds, the greenhouse, the gardens, and the roads. And all the expenditures are set forth in detail in the Auditor General's Report. I have not all the details here, but I will gladly give my hon. friends such information as I have. I have brought here all that one could reasonably expect to be asked to furnish the Committee.

Mr. McMASTER: I remember that at the time when our present Sovereign came to the Throne it was stated that he looked very carefully into the administration of the Royal Palaces and was able to effect very drastic reforms and economies in regard to the conduct of matters which had grown up many years before. Perhaps something of that sort is required here.

Mr. CARVELL: It may be.

Mr. CANNON: Spencerwood, the residence of the Lieutenant Governor of Quebec, is far larger than Rideau Hall, but, although the Provincial Government does not spend anything like the amount provided for here, the property is always well maintained. Really I cannot understand how we can spend $62,000 on Rideau Hall—

Mr. VIEN: $82,000.

Mr. CANNON: —as there are hardly any trees and the grounds are not in very good condition. I do not think we are getting our money's worth there.

Mr. VIEN: It is not the idea of any one on this side of the House at any rate to curtail the comforts of His Excellency or of his staff, and I am sure that His Excellency might feel embarrassed about dismissing any of these employees, who are practically forced upon him as soon as they are appointed by the Government.

Mr. CARVELL: His Excellency has nothing to do with their appointment; these men are purely members of the Public Works Department staff.

Mr. VIEN: That is why we are freer to discuss it.

Mr. CARVELL: Absolutely.

Mr. VIEN: Because we would not wish to be discourteous towards His Excellency. But I think if the appointments are entirely under the hand of the department the attention of the Government should be drawn to the matter. That is what we are doing now; and even if we vote this item we are taking the word of the Minister of Public Works that special attention will be paid to it next year.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes.

Mr. JACOBS: Do I understand that Mr. Croll, the Clerk of Works, attends exclusively to the work in and about Rideau Hall?

Mr. CARVELL: That is right.

Mr. JACOBS: The minister spoke a few minutes ago about another clerk of works who was attending to the work on Wellington street.

Mr. CARVELL: That is Mr. Shearer. He is the official who has charge of all the men working on the lawns, roads and buildings generally in the city of Ottawa.

Mr. JACOBS: I suppose we could not make Mr. Croll a Shearer in order to cut out the expenses?

Telephone service, $62,000.

Mr. McMASTER: I see there is no allowance there for the increased rates which the Bell Telephone Co. are threatening to charge.

Mr. CARVELL: We hope to save the extra expense by a reduction in the number of phones.

Mr. McMASTER: Hear, hear.

Dominion Public Buildings—Dominion Immigration Buildings, repairs, furniture, etc., $13,000.

Mr. VIEN: Is that waste paper basket contained in that item?

Mr. CARVELL: I rather imagine it is.

Mr. VIEN: It should be.

Dominion Quarantine Stations—Maintenance, $4,000.

Mr. McMASTER: That seems to be a very small item to maintain a building that is going to cost $400,000.

Mr. CARVELL: I think myself that the item is too small. These Estimates were made up, of course, before the session opened. A careful investigation is being made of the immigration buildings. The Minister of Immigration has had a couple of competent men travelling all over the country trying to effect every possible economy, and last week I agreed with him to send an engineer from the Public Works Department to accompany one of his men and inspect these buildings and report what necessary improvements should be made. I am not speaking of Grosse Isle station; that is provided for in another way. When we have satisfied ourselves what should be done we will come to Parliament for a special vote. This $4,000 could not accomplish very much, and I have a suspicion that the money voted yearly has perhaps been spent in a very perfunctory manner, because I am told that the Halifax and St. John plants are in a very dilapidated condition.

Fittings and general supplies and furniture, $100,000.

Mr. McMASTER: What is this especially for?

Mr. CARVELL: For supplies and furniture for public buildings all over the Dominion.

Mr. PEDLOW: Does that include furniture and fittings only for buildings outside of Ottawa?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes.

Mr. PEDLOW: Not inside?

Mr. CARVELL: Oh, no. We have passed the item for the city of Ottawa, except the rents.

Mr. CANNON: How are those fittings and furniture being purchased?

Mr. CARVELL: Through the War Purchasing Commission.

Mr. CANNON: How is it that the money is appropriated to the Department of Public Works when the purchases are being made by the War Purchasing Commission?

Mr. CARVELL: The commission simply act as agents for the Department of Public Works in purchasing these supplies, and we take delivery and pay for them. In a word, we do the paying, not the purchasing.

Mr. PEDLOW: Mr. Chairman, I am sorry I forgot to refer to that item of $450,000, repairs, furniture, etc., for buildings in the city of Ottawa. I am sure it will be quite apparent to all hon. members that there is an omission in the furnishing of this building—I refer to proper accommodation for members on the cross benches. I think provision should be made for these members in the way of suitable desk accommodation. That brings me to another point: if provision is being made in the new Parliament Buildings for accommodation of third party members, or members on the cross benches? There is quite a contingent of these members in the present House, and I understand it is getting larger every day, and when we change over to the new House it is difficult to say what proportions this contingent will have grown to.

Mr. COWAN: It will be the chief Opposition then.

Mr. PEDLOW: I think accommodation should be provided for them in the new House, and for the time being in this Chamber.

Mr. CARVELL: We have not reached the point where we are considering the accommodation of the new House.

Mr. McMASTER: May I bring something to the minister's attention about which I spoke to him privately some time ago? The Hall of Fame in the new Parliament Buildings, I understand, was broadened but the roof was not raised, resulting in a tunnel-shaped hall.

Attention was drawn to the matter, and the hall was broadened out, but the roof was left at the same height. Even the best architects sometimes make mistakes. I understand from those who have visited the place and who are connoisseurs in matters of architecture that the general lay-out of the Hall of Fame will be very imperfect unless the roof is raised so that the height of the hall will correspond with its breadth.

Mr. CARVELL: A day or two after my hon. friend spoke to me I went to the building, accompanied by the architect, and looked the situation over. I am not an artist or an architect, but I became satisfied that the proportions of the hall are about as correct as they could be, and that there was nothing in the story which was told to my hon. friend.

Lighting, $175,000.

Mr. McMASTER: A new sheriff who was appointed at Montreal some few years ago, by assigning an employee to the duty of going from room to room and turning off the electric lights when they were not required, cut down the electric light bill for the court house by one-half. Perhaps the minister is doing something of that nature; if not, it is a suggestion which is worthy of consideration.

Mr. CARVELL: The caretakers of all these buildings have instructions to do just what my hon. friend suggests; how faithfully they are carrying out these instructions, of course, I am not able to tell. If the light bills show an increase, 11 p.m. the caretakers are always asked for an explanation. But it is a pretty hard matter to control. For instance, if we had some one running round this building and turning off lights all the time, you can imagine what kind of row there would be. A housewife living on one side of the street may be able to get along with half as much electric power as that used by a housewife on the other side of the street; yet it would be hard to convince the second housewife that she could substantially reduce her electric light bills. It is just so with public officials.

Mr. VIEN: I suggest that a saving might be effected by installing a plant to develop electric power for the purpose of lighting all Dominion buildings. Big institutions have adopted this course and have found it economical. The East and West Blocks, the Langevin block, the Connaught building, could all be lighted by a plant of their own.

Mr. CARVELL: I cannot agree with my hon. friend. If there is one service that the Government is obtaining which is a real, straight business proposition it is the electric light and power service that they are receiving in Ottawa. The rate is lower than it is in all places but a few in Canada. I admit that we may consume more current than we ought to, but imagine where you would land with $65,000 in attempting to pay the interest on an expenditure sufficiently large to establish and maintain a plant for the lighting of these buildings. You would not even get started; you would have to spend $165,000 a year, and then some. I am afraid my hon. friend is becoming converted to the idea of government ownership and operation of public utilities.

Mr. VIEN: Laval University, the Quebec Seminary, the Quebec Parliament buildings are all lighted in that way, and the method is found to be economical.

[Mr. McMaster.]

Mr. CARVELL: I will give an example of the other side of the story. When the Grand Trunk station was built in Ottawa the company installed a steam plant with the idea of lighting their station, grounds and buildings, including the Chateau Laurier, and using the exhaust steam for heating purposes; but they had to go back to the outside companies for their electricity. There is no use in talking about the Government trying to run an electric plant in Ottawa; it could not be done for $200,000 a year.

Mr. PARENT: Does this item include the lighting of the Quebec post office?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes.

Mr. PARENT: The Quebec Railway Light and Power Company is providing power for the lighting of the different public buildings in Quebec City. There are two competing light and power companies there, the Public Service Corporation of Quebec and the Quebec Railway Light and Power Company. My information is that when a lighting contract is given it goes to one company, without prices being asked from the other. The public interest would be better served and lower rates would be obtained by getting prices from both companies.

Mr. CARVELL: I have no knowledge of that. I find from the notes placed before me that we are paying $800 a year for electric light in the Quebec post office, $750 for the custom house, and $1,000 for the examining warehouse.

Mr. PARENT: Is it correct that a five-year contract has been awarded to the Quebec Railway Light and Power Company without tenders being called?

Mr. CARVELL: I can say that it has not been done in my day. I will look into the matter and give my hon. friend the facts.

Mr. VIEN: Is the lighting of public buildings done on the basis of a meter rate, or of a flat rate?

Mr. CARVELL: On the basis of a meter rate wherever possible. We try to follow the custom, whatever it may be, in the city, town or village concerned. We always pay the same price that the ordinary consumer pays.

Mr. CROWE: What is being paid per kilowat for lighting power in Ottawa?

Mr. CARVELL: A contract was entered into with the Ottawa Electric Company, under which a flat rate for power of $20 per horse-power, both alternating and direct was charged. Then for street lamps on bridges, streets, parks, etc., where the company supplies and maintains the poles, lines, lamps and hangers, the charge is $45 per year per arc lamp of 6½ amperes. Where the Government owns and maintains the poles, lines, etc., the charge is $22 per arc lamp of 6½ amperes.

Mr. CROWE: The consumer's rate in the city of Ottawa is two cents per kilowatt. I was wondering whether the Government got a reduction on that.

Mr. CARVELL: I am sorry I cannot give the information now, but I will get it for my hon. friend.

Mr. PEDLOW: In going through several of the public buildings in Ottawa, some of which are owned, and some merely rented, by the Government, I have noticed that the electric wiring is far from what I would call efficiently or properly installed. If the same installation were in a building owned by myself in Renfrew, the inspector of the Hydro-Electric would condemn it instantly and my insurance rates would be considerably increased. I understand that the Government carries its own insurance, or rather it does not carry insurance on its property. But the Government is responsible not only to itself and its employees but to the city in which its buildings are situated, and if a fire occurred through the negligence of the Government or its employees as regards defective wiring, if the ruling of inspectors is to be a guide in this matter, the Government would be responsible. If the Government are responsible, I should like to know who would be the one that would be considered guilty in this connection under an enactment passed here a few weeks ago, to amend the Criminal Code respecting the prevention of fires. One section of the Bill says:

> Every one is guilty of an indictable offence and liable to two years' imprisonment who, by negligence, causes any fire which occasions loss of life or loss of property.

Mr. CARVELL: Theoretically, that would come back to the minister.

Mr. PEDLOW: I would like the minister to get busy on the job at once, because the wiring is undoubtedly not in proper shape either in this building or in any other buildings in the city owned or leased by the Government.

Mr. CARVELL: This is the first I have heard of the matter. I will have an investigation and a report made. There have never in the past been any fires in Government buildings in Ottawa on account of defective wiring.

Dominion public buildings—rents, $915,000.

Mr. COWAN: Does this cover rents throughout Canada outside of Ottawa?

Mr. CARVELL: This covers the total rents in Canada.

Mr. COWAN: This is a tremendous price we are paying for occupying the humiliating position of tenant, and it would be a good thing to have public buildings in all small places. That is going pretty far, but this item proves that the Department of Public Works should adopt a policy of putting up in every capital city in the Dominion a public building capable of housing all the employees of the Government. In the city in which I live, which is the capital of Saskatchewan, it is the most difficult thing for an ordinary person entering the city to find a Dominion officer. It is most inconvenient, and the Government is being held up by landlords on every possible occasion. Whenever landlords get a chance to raise the rent, they do so. The only way to get rid of landlords is by putting up buildings of one's own.

Mr. CARVELL: I ought to take a little time to tell the Committee what we are paying in rents outside of Ottawa. The hon. member for Regina (Mr. Cowan) is absolutely right when he states that rents are being put up and up all the time, and there seems to be no way to prevent it. The last three or four years have been abnormal ones, and there has been a great increase in the Civil Service in every portion of Canada, very largely due to war services, and now we have two or three other services starting up, namely, the Soldiers Land Settlement Board, the Soldiers Civil Re-establishment Department, and the Income Tax Branch.

Mr. COWAN: The latter will be permanent.

Mr. CARVELL: There is no doubt at all that the Civil Service outside of Ottawa is not going to decrease nearly as rapidly as many of us would wish. We must face the situation, and the suggestion made by the hon. member for Regina is good, sound business. I will give the Committee a few figures to show what we are paying:

	Ordinary rents.	Rents on war account.
Nova Scotia	$ 15,632	$ 13,828
New Brunswick	1,497	9,805
Prince Edward Island	542	940

Quebec	$46,748	$104,135
Ontario, outside of Ottawa	62,285	157,838
Manitoba	21,307	50,565
Saskatchewan	22,890	46,482
Alberta	61,430	72,794
British Columbia	33,507	71,782

Mr. CROWE: What was the amount of rents paid in Vancouver?

Mr. CARVELL: It would be over $60,000. I can give my hon. friend the items but it would take a long time to read them. In regard to the city of Ottawa, my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), the last time the Committee sat, asked me for a statement. I have prepared for him a statement of all the rentals in the city of Ottawa, and it shows $645,066 on ordinary rentals, and $111,482 on war account—a total of $756,549.

Mr. VIEN: Could the details of these be given to the Committee?

Mr. CARVELL: I intend to lay it on the Table or give it to the hon. member for Guysborough, and it will be available to any one who wishes to see it. It gives the names of all the several buildings.

Mr. VIEN: Not only the details in regard to Ottawa, but the other document as well.

Mr. McMASTER: It could be inserted in Hansard.

Mr. CARVELL: It would take a great many pages of Hansard. However, I would be glad to treat it as a return showing all the rents paid and the details.

Mr. PEDLOW: What about rents received for buildings owned and rented by the Government, as well as the taxes paid on them?

Mr. CARVELL: Taxes paid by the Government on Government-owned property rented in Ottawa total $8,219.25, and if we pay within a certain time we get a discount. It figures out a total of $7,769. That is in Ottawa.

Mr. PEDLOW: Have you the total rentals received on Government property on which you pay taxes?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, $25,874.

Mr. MANION: I have a suggestion to make regarding public buildings. I have often been struck by the waste space in some public buildings outside of Ottawa. If you go to some customs buildings you will see more than ample room for the requirements of the work, and yet the agent at that point will insist that he barely has enough room. I have been in customs houses in small cities where the building was large enough for a city five times its size. The Government might do well from an economical standpoint to have an independent inspector look over these buildings with a view to seeing if they could not find space for more departments of public service than those for which they are now used. The hon. minister has been doing that to some extent, because in my own city he has put a number of offices into the customs building.

Mr. CARVELL: I have had a few trials —I think that is the word I should use—in regard to the matter suggested by the hon. member, but I have not succeeded very well. I will go so far as to criticise the policy that has been in vogue for a great many years of having too big examining warehouses which were not properly arranged for office purposes, involving a great waste of space, I will not say of public money, because the buildings no doubt actually cost the money paid for them. The most notable example is the city of Calgary. In the customs warehouse there, there is enough waste space to take care of the post office of that city, for which we are going to spend $750,000 to put up a building.

Mr. McMASTER: Why not use it?

Mr. CARVELL: You cannot get light and the conveniences necessary. I went to look it over and I can assure my hon. friends that it cannot be used. The space is there. There are a few packing boxes in a room as big as this, but they will tell you that they need every inch of it. My hon. friend from Fort William (Mr. Manion) is absolutely right in his criticism, and that is why I said the other night that any buildings I had anything to do with would not be called either post office or custom house, but would be known as public buildings, to be used for the public services.

Mr. McMASTER: I do not think there is any provision in the law which gives the Government the right to expropriate buildings for Government purposes.

Mr. CARVELL: Yes, there is.

Mr. McMASTER: I know there is a right to expropriate land for a railway, but I did not know there was the right to expropriate what I might call the use of a building.

Mr. CARVELL: I think there was passed last year an amendment to the Exchequer Court Act which gives the right of such expropriation.

Mr. McMASTER: I am glad to hear that there is such a law, because it is only right. A farmer can have part of his farm taken from him for a public utility, and the landlord should be under the obligation to give up his property for public purposes under urgent necessity.

Mr. CARVELL: There is such a right because I have exercised it a dozen times in the last six or eight months.

Mr. VIEN: Is the lease mentioned in these lists that are to be filed as sessional papers?

Mr. CARVELL: Not the dates.

Mr. VIEN: But the duration?

Mr. CARVELL: No.

Mr. VIEN: Are they for several years?

Mr. CARVELL: Some are for five years. We have adopted the policy for the last year and a half that as these leases fall due we renew them for not later than the first of May, 1920, and in many cases not later than next December. The reason is this: The Hunter building will be completed, we hope, in July and certainly in August. That will provide about 140,000 square feet of floor space, and will house a great many civil servants now accommodated in other parts of the city. But as there are some new departments being established, such as the Soldiers' Civil Re-establishment, the Land Settlement Board and the Income Tax office, the idea is to have a general rearrangement of the offices of the different departments when the Hunter building is finished. We have rented the whole of what is called the Rea or Daly building of which we get possession on the 1st of July. So that in July or by the 1st of August we hope to be able to make a re-arrangement by which we shall have each department in one place. I am sorry to say that two important departments will still be distributed in sections in different places around the city, but we are making very short term leases and hope within the next year and a half, at the outside, to get rid of a great many buildings now under lease and to reduce to quite an extent the amount of rental paid in Ottawa.

Mr. G. B. NICHOLSON: While that general plan for re-arranging the offices in Ottawa is being carried into effect, has the minister considered the unit system in the organization of Government offices to conserve space, and do away with so many partitions and doors in the buildings? It seems to me, in going through the departments as they exist at the present time, that one of the great difficulties is that the buildings were never designed as office buildings. Looking at the Hunter building from the outside it does seem to me to be the first approach to a successful modern office building that has ever been designed in connection with the Government service in any part of Canada. If it is carried out on that system it will not only conserve space but it will ultimately result in reducing the cost of the entire office staff.

Mr. CARVELL: I accept the compliment which my hon. friend offers regarding the Hunter building but I take no credit to myself; whatever credit there is belongs to the deputy minister who was the author of the building and for whom it has been named. I agree that this is the first attempt that has been made in Ottawa to have a real office building. The building is constructed on the unit basis. There are nine floors all practically alike. The only difference is that there is a well in the centre 100 x 50 feet. The building is 200 x 150 feet. That gives a row of offices all around the position of the well 50 feet wide. There is an 8-foot passageway which leads between two 20-foot offices, one on the outside and one on the inside. The great long corridors have been divided up according to the necessities of the departments intending to use them. Some of the space may be divided up into rooms 10 x 12 and in other cases there will be rooms from 30 to 50 feet long. We have consulted several departments which are going to use the different floors and have divided and partitioned the space according to the arrangements of these departments.

As to the future, I think I suggested on a former occasion that it would well repay any member of the House of Commons to take a forenoon, go to Mr. Ewart's office and see the models which he is preparing for the new building which we all hope in the not-too-far-distant future to see erected on the expropriated area on Wellington street. That idea is being carried out there exclusively. We propose to adopt the unit system in so far as the unit system can be applied to that building. The first unit will contain the Supreme Court room, and after that there will be a series of office buildings practically all built upon the same general plan to carry out the idea that my hon. friend suggests.

Mr. JACOBS: What will the cost of the Hunter building be?

Mr. CARVELL: Including land, $1,500,000.

Mr. JACOBS: You have 140,000 square feet of floor space?

Mr. CARVELL: Yes. It is by far the cheapest office building in Ottawa. If you figure light, heat, elevator attendants, and all you can possibly figure it will amount to from 68 to 69 cents per square foot per annum. We are paying all sorts of prices for rents but for a modern building we are paying around a dollar a foot. We look upon this building as a good business investment. It will also be an investment from the civil servants' standpoint because they will be housed in offices such as they never had before, and that means increased efficiency.

Mr. McMASTER: It is half past eleven, we have done a splendid evening's work, we have learned a great deal about the public service and it would seem fitting that we should adjourn.

Mr. CARVELL: I have no objection although I had hoped to get rid of the rest of these Estimates.

Mr. McMASTER: We worked until two o'clock this morning.

Mr. CARVELL: These harbour and river items are unimportant. Of course I am in the hands of the Committee.

Mr. McMASTER: They are not important on the whole but they are sometimes very important to certain constituencies and they might possibly give rise to a certain amount of discussion. The minister agreed with me about the advisability of an eight hour day.

Mr. CARVELL: That does not apply to members of Parliament.

Progress reported.

On motion of Hon. Mr. Carvell the House adjourned at 11.35 p.m.

Bill No. 111, for the relief of Mary Ann Scheib.—Mr. Fripp.

Bill No. 114, for the relief of Vernon Balm Bailey.—Mr. McCurdy.

THE WINNIPEG STRIKE.

On the Orders of the Day:

Mr. P. F. CASGRAIN (Charlevoix-Montmorency): I wish to draw the attention of the Government to this startling headline which appears in the Montreal Gazette this morning: "Winnipeg sees general strike in full effect—27,000 workers quit in sympathy with metal men—minister powerless—bakers, firemen, postal employees and railway shopmen among those out." The Minister of Labour is reported as saying that the Government can do nothing in the matter. I should like to know what steps the Government are going to take in view of the extraordinary circumstances, and what action will be taken to prevent the recurrence of strikes on such a huge scale in the future. I remember that when there was a little disturbance in the city of Quebec last year the military forces were called out, and I think this is the proper time——

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: The hon. member is perfectly in order in asking a question, but he is out of order in referring to anything that may have occurred last year.

Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Acting Minister of Labour): The Minister of Labour has been closely in touch with the situation at Winnipeg during the past ten days. He is being advised of events from moment to moment, and he is ready at all times to do everything he can in the circumstances.

Mr. J. A. ROBB (Chateauguay-Huntingdon): Has the Government any statement to make with regard to the strike of postal employees at Winnipeg?

Hon. NEWTON W. ROWELL (for Postmaster General): Nearly all the postal employees in the Winnipeg post office have gone out on a sympathetic strike in accordance with the action taken by the labour organizations in Winnipeg. The Government considers that such action on the part of the postal employees is entirely without justification. We are advised that efforts are being made to intimidate the employees who are still faithful to the public service. The Government will stand absolutely behind all the employees who are performing their duty in the service of the Government and in the administration of the post office in Winnipeg.

Mr. FRANK S. CAHILL (Pontiac): I understand that a number of the employees of the railways and telegraphs are also on strike. Has the Government any information as to their grievance?

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Railways): I have received no information from the officials at Winnipeg.

ROYAL NORTHWEST MOUNTED POLICE ACT AMENDMENT.

PAY AND PENSIONS.

On the motion of Hon. Newton W. Rowell (President of the Privy Council) the House went into Committee to consider the following proposed resolution, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

Resolved, That it is expedient to amend the Royal Northwest Mounted Police Act, chapter ninety-one of the Revised Statutes, 1906, and to provide,—

1. That all members of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police Force on active service in the naval, military or air forces of His Majesty during the European war, which began in August, one thousand nine hundred and fourteen, shall, for the purposes of pension for service in the said Force under the said Act, be entitled to have such active service counted as service in the said Police Force: Provided,

(a) that the amount of any pension, gratuity or allowance which any member of the said Force receives or is entitled to receive or apply for, in respect of any injury received by him while serving in the military, naval or air forces aforesaid, shall be deducted from any pension, gratuity or allowance to which such member would be entitled under the said Act, other than a pension for years of service, irrespective of any infirmity of mind or body or bodily injury;

and,

(b) that no widow or child of any such member who received or is entitled to receive or apply for, any pension, annuity, gratuity or allowance in consequence of the death, incapacity or injury of any such member while serving in the forces aforesaid, shall be entitled to any pension, annuity or allowance under the said Act.

2. That in case of the re-appointment or re-engagement in the Force of any person who was a member of the Force, and who, subsequent to the fourth day of August, one thousand nine hundred and fourteen, resigned or purchased or otherwise obtained his discharge from the Force for the purpose of serving in the military, naval or air forces of His Majesty during the said European war, and who served therein, the period of such service in such forces shall, for the purposes of pension only under the Royal Northwest Mounted Police Act, be deemed to have been served in the Force, and in any such case such member shall be repaid any money paid by him to purchase such discharge.

3. That the rates of pay as fixed by chapter forty-seven of the statutes of 1913, be increased as follows:—

"Eight staff sergeants, each per diem	$3 00
Other staff sergeants, each per diem	2 50
Other non-commissioned officers, per diem	2 25
Constable, per diem	$1 75
Scouts, per diem	2 50
Trumpeters and buglers, under eighteen years of age, per diem	1 25
Working pay to artisans and others specially employed, per diem	0 75"

. That the Governor in Council may authorize extra pay to be paid to members of the Force employed as detectives, to those serving in the Northwest Territories and the Yukon Territory, and for a period of five years from the first day of June, 1919, to any other member of the Force.

5. That an officer who is retired compulsorily for any cause other than misconduct or inefficiency after ten years' service, shall be entitled to a pension for life, not exceeding one-fiftieth of the pay and allowances of his rank or permanent appointment at the time of his retirement for each completed year of service.

6. That the Governor in Council may, as to him seems fit, grant a pension to the widow and a compassionate allowance to each of the children of any officer who, having completed twenty years' service, was at the time of his death on full pay, or who, having completed ten years' service, is at the time of his death in receipt of a pension.

7. That the pension of a widow shall be,—

(a) if her husband was at the time of his death on full pay, an amount equal to one-half of the pension to which he would have been entitled if he had been retired compulsorily immediately before his death; or,

(b) if he was on pension, an amount equal to one-half of such pension.

8. That pensions to widows heretofore granted under the provisions of the said Royal Northwest Mounted Police Act may be readjusted in accordance with the provisions of these resolutions, but no such readjustment shall authorize the increase of any payments for pension that accrued before the passing of the Act based upon these resolutions.

9. That every constable who is a member of the Force at the time of the passing of the Act based upon these resolutions, or who hereafter becomes a member of the Force, shall be entitled, upon retirement, to a pension for life, as follows:—

(a) if he has completed ten but less than twenty-one years' service, one-fiftieth of his annual pay and allowances for every year of service:

(b) if he has completed twenty-one but less than twenty-five years' service, an annual sum equal to twenty-fiftieths of his annual pay and allowances, with an addition of two-fiftieths of such pay and allowances for every completed year of service above twenty years;

(c) if he has completed twenty-five years' service, an annual sum equal to thirty-fiftieths of his annual pay and allowances, with an addition of one-fiftieth of such pay and allowances for every completed year of service above twenty-five years; Provided, that the pension shall not exceed two-thirds of his annual pay at his retirement. But for the purpose of estimating any such pension, neither working pay nor extra pay of any man shall be considered.

10. That the Governor in Council may authorize the Commissioner to appoint, by warrant under his hand, such officers and men, who have served in the Force, to be a Reserve, to be known as the "Royal Northwest Mounted Police Reserve,"

(a) such officer or man when called up for duty to hold the rank and draw the pay which he received on the date of his retirement or discharge from Force; and,

(b) any member when called up for training for a period not exceeding seven days in any one year, to receive the same rate of pay as when called up for duty.

Mr. ROWELL: The members of the Committee will see that this resolution gives effect to the policy I announced the other evening when the Estimates for the Royal Northwest Mounted Police were being considered. The first section provides that the time in which any member of the Force may have served in the overseas forces shall count for the purposes of pension. Under the Mounted Police Act as it now stands the members of the Force become entitled to a pension on retiring after twenty years' service. A large number of the members of the Force were granted leave of absence without pay to serve overseas, and others retired or purchased their discharge for this purpose. Our view is that all who withdrew from the Force in order to go overseas, if they intend to resume their place in the Force should have the time they spent overseas counted in estimating the amount of their pension. Provisos (a) and (b) are to ensure that for a disability suffered in the service overseas for which they are entitled to a pension under the general pension law applying to all who served overseas in the Canadian Expeditionary Forces, they shall not be entitled to a pension under the Mounted Police Act. This, of course, does not affect the pension for length of service.

Section 3 provides the statutory authority for the increase in pay which I intimated to the House had already been granted to the Force last year under Order in Council.

Mr. BUREAU: What is the percentage of increase granted?

Mr. ROWELL: The amount is fifty cents per day for constables and n.c.o.'s. As the Statute stood, before the Order in Council was passed, the rate of pay for the men for the first year was $1 a day, for the second year $1.10, and for the third year $1.25, the maximum being $1.25. This increases the maximum to $1.75, and the same ratio of increase will continue as before.

Mr. A. THOMPSON: How much extra pay do the officers and men serving in the Yukon territory receive?

Mr. ROWELL: Under the present Act it is as follows: Officers, $1.25; staff sergeants and sergeants, 75c; corporals and constables, 50c.

Section 5 of the resolution changes the law in reference to the period of service to earn a pension. At the present time if a mounted policeman retires after twenty years of service he becomes entitled to a pension on account of length of service. This section will permit of a pension being granted after only ten years service, under the conditions mentioned therein.

Sections 6, 7 and 8 deal with the pensions of officers' widows, making provision for some increase. Section 9 deals with the pensions of private members of the force and non-commissioned officers. At present the officer's pension is based on pay and allowance, and this is to put the pension of the private in the Royal Northwest Mounted Police on the same basis. Section 10 of the resolution provides for creating the reserve to which I referred the other evening, that is, the reserve of the men who have served in the force and have retired from it.

Resolution reported and concurred in.

BANKRUPTCY ACT.

On motion of Hon. HUGH GUTHRIE (Solicitor General), Bill No. 18, respecting Bankruptcy, was read the third time and passed.

FERTILIZERS ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Hon. A. K. MACLEAN (Acting Minister of Trade and Commerce), Bill No. 74, to amend the Fertilizers Act, 1909, was read the third time and passed.

LOCATION OF RAILWAYS ACT.

On motion of Hon. J. D. Reid (Minister of Railways), Bill No. 93 (from the Senate), to amend the Railway Act (Location of Railways), was read the second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 1—R.S., c. 37, ss. 157 and 159 amended:

Mr. J. D. REID: Perhaps I may explain the purpose of this Bill. In the Railway Bill which is before the Special Committee these clauses have been changed so as to vest in the Board of Railway Commissioners the authority to approve of route maps, this authority having in the past been exercised by the minister. When a charter was granted by the House for the incorporation of a railway, before they could proceed with the construction of the railway a route map had to be approved of by the minister. We now purpose to change that to provide that the Board of Railway Commissioners shall have this power of approval. It is the intention to have this Bill put through in case the regular Railway Bill does not pass at this session. I should like to have this Bill go through the Committee now and put down for third reading, and if the Railway Bill now before the special committee were passed I would not proceed further with this Bill. In the event of the Railway Act not being passed at this session, we are desirous to provide that the authority for approving of route maps shall be placed in the hands of the railway commissioners. The reason for this is that practically speaking there are only two railway systems in Canada, and it is advisable that the Board of Railway Commissioners should decide on the route maps to be approved of. The Government railway or the Canadian Pacific railway might be involved and there might be a conflict of two interests.

Section agreed to.

On section 159—sanction by board:

Mr. McMASTER: Suppose the Railway Bill now before the special committee does not go through, would we not have to examine this Bill with the same care? Should we not examine it with the care that would be exercised if it were certain that the Railway Bill would not go through?

Mr. J. D. REID: Under the Railway Act as it now stands the Canadian Pacific railway or the Canadian National railways before they can proceed must come to the Minister of Railways and get his approval of the route map. The only difference that is now contemplated is to provide that instead of coming to the minister the Canadian Pacific or the Canadian National or the Grand Trunk or any other private companies will go to the Board of Railway Commissioners who will look into the whole situation and give their approval. I think the Railway Bill will go through this session; at least I hope it will, in which event I shall not move the third reading of this Bill. However, if the Railway Bill does not go through I have no objection to having this referred back to the Committee in order to have it more closely examined if it is deemed fit.

Mr. BUREAU: Do I understand that these clauses are an exact repetition of the clauses contained in the new Bill which has been considered by the special committee?

Mr. J. D. REID: I have not compared the clauses closely, but I instructed Mr. Gisborne, the Parliamentary Counsel, to see that they were identical. If we have to go any further with this Bill I will look into the matter closely and explain the situation. Then we can go into Committee again if necessary.

Mr. CAHILL: What difficulty does the Government anticipate in connection with the new Railway Bill? It contains only a few contentious clauses, and the closure is in good working form, so that if any difficulties arise the Government can overcome them. Why should there be any hesitation in applying the gag in the case of this Bill, which is a Government measure, when there was no hesitation in invoking the closure on an earlier occasion?

Mr. J. D. REID: I have no doubt at all about the Bill going through this year as reported from the Committee in some form. I am not able to apply the gag to the Senate, otherwise there would be no difficulty in passing the Bill as it leaves this House. The trouble is that when we send it to the Senate they may not pass it in the form in which it leaves the Commons. That was the difficulty two or three years ago; this House agreed unanimously on the form the Bill was to take, but when it reached the Senate they amended it there, and we could not get it through in the shape in which we wanted it. If I was sure that Senate would pass the Bill in the form in which it leaves us, there would be no difficulty whatever.

Section agreed to, and Bill reported.

HUDSON BAY AND STRAITS.

ASSENT OF HOUSE ASKED TO ATTENDANCE OF A MEMBER BEFORE SENATE COMMITTEE.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that a message has been received from the Senate requesting that the House permit Hon. F. Cochrane, one of its members, to attend and give evidence before the special committee of the Senate appointed to take evidence and report at this session upon the navigability and fishery resources of the Hudson bay and straits, and upon the character of ports of said Hudson bay with regard to their fitness as railway terminals.

DOMINION WATER-POWERS ACT.

On the motion of Hon. Arthur Meighen (Minister of the Interior) Bill No. 94, respecting Dominion Water-Powers was read a second time, and the House went into Committee thereon, Mr. Boivin in the Chair.

On section 2, paragraph (a)—Definition of "Dominion Water-powers."

Mr. McMASTER: Did the minister set forth the purpose of this Bill on the first reading? I do not remember his having done so.

Mr. BUREAU: Even so, we are entitled to further information.

Mr. MEIGHEN: At present the Interior Department embraces a Water-Powers Branch, which has for some years been engaged in the administration of water-powers under the authority of section 35 of the Dominion Lands Act. That section is for administrative purposes, brief and inadequate. Other countries administering water-powers have been driven to the enactment of comprehensive basic legislation. We are following their example by this Bill. The terms of the measure are easily discernible by its perusal, because it consists in no sense of amendments; it is complete in itself. The Bill simply declares what the property of the Dominion is, and what the authority of this Government in relation to that property shall be, as regards water-powers and everything incidental to water-powers, and determines the principle upon which those water-powers shall be administered.

Mr. MURPHY: The definition of "water-powers" in this section suggests that the control of the administration of water-powers may be under some other branch or department of the Government than the Interior Department. Is that the fact, or is it intended that all water-powers in respect of which this Government may exercise jurisdiction will be under the department presided over by the hon. Minister of the Interior?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are all under the Department of the Interior.

Mr. BUREAU: Could the minister give us a concrete instance of "water-powers" which are the property of Canada, and which have been or may be placed under the control and management of the Minister of the Interior? The definition is:

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

"Dominion water-powers" means any water powers on lands of the Dominion, or any other water-powers, etc.

Is there an instance of any other water-power coming under the control of the Minister of the Interior?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The reason for the insertion of that phrase is this: If possible the Federal Government may at some time, obtain jurisdiction over waters where it does not own the bed of the stream—that is the land underneath. It is further conceivable that the bed of the stream may have been parted with, reserving the rights in the stream itself. That is to say the Government may have parted with the bed, or surface rights, and not have parted with the jurisdiction of the stream itself, in which event the water-powers would still be ours.

Mr. BUREAU: That seems a queer condition of things. What purpose could be served by any one getting the bed of the river itself unless they might acquire servitude, or some such right, for the purpose of erecting a public dock or pier, or running a pipe underneath the stream? I do not see that this is a case where that is liable to happen, and I would like the minister to instance a case where a Government, or any individual, parts with the bed of a river and reserves the right to the water. As far as navigable rivers are concerned, we know exactly where we stand in this country as to the ownership of the bed of those rivers and the control of the flow of water.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Supposing, for example, a company, or a person acquired the bed of a stream for the purpose of taking out sand or gravel, or exercising quarrying rights; those rights would be quite valuable without the rights to the stream itself. I am not aware of any instance where that has been done, but the draughtsman who prepared the Bill believed it was quite possible, in which event the jurisdiction and ownership of the power rights in the stream would still be vested in the Dominion. It has been the practice for some time to exclude the bed and shore of waters or streams from ordinary land grants, but there might be land grants where the bed and shore were not excluded but the stream itself was.

Mr. BUREAU: Would the term "water-power" include streams and everything of the kind where no power could be generated? I do not know the conditions in certain provinces, but where the water-powers on any rivers are exploited I do not think it would be to the advantage of any man to lease the bed of the river to get sand or gravel which might be under the rapids or falls.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The grant might be made over an extended area and there might be a fall in that area. The water-power must be of commercial possibility.

Mr. BUREAU: That explanation would not cover the present case, because water-power is described here in this way:—

(g) "Water-power" shall include any force or energy of whatever form or nature contained in or capable of being produced or generated from any flowing or falling water in such quantity as to make it of commercial value.

It is very improbable that any man who is going to lease or buy the bed of a river for the purpose of getting gravel or sand would do it where there were rapids. Take these words:—

or any other water-powers which are the property of Canada and which have been or may be placed under the control and management of the Minister of the Interior;

How can these water-powers be placed under the control or management of the minister? If the Government buy them, all right. We know that anything purchased by the Dominion of Canada is the property of the Dominion—except the Canadian National railway! I do not see how we become owners unless there be a specific case, and I would ask the minister to explain why these words are inserted?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not arguing that this is of vital consequence, because I do not think there are likely to be many, if, indeed, there are any. But it cannot do any harm, because the power must be ours or the definition will not cover it. In the Yukon, ownership of the bed might be given for mining purposes, but not ownership of the stream rights; that is quite possible. The instance that I gave before of grants of land for the purpose of taking out sand and gravel might be over an extended area on much of which there would be no water-power at all. I know, for example, of grants made for that purpose in Ontario, but I do not recall one for the moment in the provinces where we own the water-powers.

Mr. F. CAHILL: Has the Government now any water-powers except those acquired from private individuals or the provinces? For instance, I understand the water-powers of the eastern provinces are the property of the provinces, that is, they own the land. How do you acquire these powers, or what powers have you in mind? Take the case of Dominion ownership of land in Saskatchewan on the Saskatchewan river where power would be developed, would that give you ownership of the power at that point?

Mr. MEIGHEN: We do not need to have them given to us, we have them now. All water-powers of the three Prairie Provinces are the property of the Dominion; they are included in the term "natural resources," and they are administered now under the Dominion water-powers management and have been for many years. Also the water-powers in the railway belt are our property, but by virtue of two statutes the right of administration of these powers was ceded to the province of British Columbia, for the reason that the strip of land was narrow and the streams frequently ran in the delta owned by the Dominion as well as in land in the provincial jurisdiction. So an arrangement had to be arrived at.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: This Act does not apply then to the eastern provinces at all? In what case would it apply to the province of Nova Scotia, for instance?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Act has no substantial application to the eastern provinces. I purpose adding a clause which will form the statutory authority and basis for the work we are now doing in reference to water-powers in the eastern provinces—work that we only can do by agreement with the provincial governments. That is really the only clause that has much interest for the eastern provinces.

Mr. ROBB: The Dominion has water-powers on every canal throughout Canada. These water-powers are under the Department of Railways and Canals, some of them being leased on the basis of ninety-nine years, and others on the basis of twenty-one years, with right of renewal. If I understand this Act aright, the minister will have power to take over all these water-powers from the Department of Railways and Canals, and then they will be administered under this Act. Is that correct?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes; in fact that could be done to-day without this Act at all. Any administrative responsibility of a department may be taken over by another department. But it is not the intention to transfer the administration of canal water-powers to the Interior Department; that has never even been considered.

Mr. BUREAU: Water-powers generated by the construction of canals which are now under the control or jurisdiction of the Department of Railways and Canals are Dominion water-powers under this Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think so.

Mr. BUREAU: How are they classified?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because they are not under the control and management of the Minister of the Interior.

Mr. BUREAU: Unless we decide that water-powers generated as the result of constructing a canal are not water-powers under this Act, an exception ought to be made.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I do not think the hon. gentleman has read the definition clearly. They are not Dominion water-powers under the definition of this Act until they are vested in the Minister of the Interior. So this definition does not include any water-power on a canal.

Mr. BUREAU: Then the water-powers will not be under the same department.

Mr. MEIGHEN: No; they are not now. This makes no change.

Mr. BUREAU: What is the object of the Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The object of the Act is mainly to establish the principles of statutory authority for the administration of such water-powers as are on Dominion lands, or any other water-powers the administration of which may hereafter be vested in the Department of the Interior.

Mr. BUREAU: Has not the Interior Department at the present time authority to administer all those water-powers which are on Dominion lands?

Mr. MEIGHEN: It has under section 35 of the Dominion Lands Act, which section has in many respects proved inadequate for the proper administration of these powers. For instance, section 35 does not enable the Department of the Interior or the Government at all to exercise any control over the appurtenances to water-power, over the transmission of the power developed, over the provision of dams, the securing of land necessary, and all such requisites. The very purpose of this Act is to provide for a more complete utilization of Dominion water-powers.

Mr. BUREAU: Do I understand that the powers of the Department of the Interior as defined by section 35 do not go far enough to permit the acquiring of these lands or the development of these powers by that department?

Mr. MEIGHEN: They do not.

Mr. BUREAU: What about the general Expropriation Act, which vests power in the Government to acquire lands necessary for the carrying out of any public work?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Even if the Dominion does assume the business management of a water-power development, the clauses of the Expropriation Act are not adequate for the purpose. But it is not worth arguing whether they are or not, because the powers of the Expropriation Act do not apply where the Dominion does not expropriate, but leases the power subject to certain conditions, and the expropriation right is required by the lessee. These are some of the restraints under which water-power administration has laboured; we require that these restraints be removed. We simply desire the establishment of an adequate statutory basis upon which the administration may proceed.

Mr. BUREAU: This Act allows the Dominion Government to do what any private company may do, lease or develop water-power, and have all the rights inherent thereto. Is there a provision in this Act that will vest in the lessee from the Government power to expropriate?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. Of course, he cannot do so under the Expropriation Act, because he is a private person and must go before the ordinary courts. But he may set expropriation proceedings in motion under the Railway Act, with the authority of the Governor in Council.

Mr. BUREAU: There is provision for that here?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. ROBB: What department of the Government controls the waters along the rapids of St. Lawrence and at the foot of lake Ontario, where there are vast water-powers?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not sure that I can give a very satisfactory answer to that question. The Department of the Interior, as a department, has no administrative responsibility in the St. Lawrence river. If works were to be constructed, then it would be determined whether they were under the Public Works Department or under the Department of Railways and Canals. But as regards the power features of these works, which are inextricably linked up with the navigation features, the Dominion Power Board, of which I am chairman, is constituted for the purpose of advising the Government in relation to water-power development.

Mr. ROBB: Will the Department of the Interior have any administrative responsibility in regard to power on the St. Lawrence river after the passing of this Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. MURPHY: The doubt my hon. friend expressed seems to relate only as to which department of the Dominion Government these powers along the St. Lawrence are under. The doubt does not extend, I take it, to the question whether the jurisdiction is of the Dominion or of the provinces.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not touch that point at all. The Dominion is concerned inasmuch as the stream is an international stream, and any arrangements that would require to be made of an international character would necessarily have to be made by the Dominion. That is one subject. As to the question whether the powers so developed should belong to the province or to the Dominion, I made no statement.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: Suppose the stream was not an international stream. It is contended by some that the ebb and flow of the tide in the bay of Fundy twice a day constitutes a very important water-power. The bay of Fundy, of course, is a navigable water. Has the Dominion Government power to regulate that water-power or to give to any person the right to develop it, or would an applicant for such right have to go to the province of Nova Scotia?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The question which the hon. member raises has no reference to the present Bill, which deals with water-powers on lands owned by the Dominion. The Dominion's interest in respect of, say, the bay of Fundy or the St. Lawrence river arises primarily from its jurisdiction, its sole responsibility, in connection with navigation. But any improvements looking to navigation in a river or a bay where water-powers are developed is necessarily mixed up with water-power development; consequently the Dominion cannot keep out. That is the primary source of interest we have in the whole thing. As to whom the power should belong to, the province or the Dominion, that is a subject that I think the Committee should not now be led into.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR: That is the question I want answered.

Mr. BUREAU: I want to be quite clear about this definition. Two things are required, first that the water-powers be on Dominion lands; second, that they be under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior. Water-powers owned by the Dominion under other conditions than these would not be considered as Dominion water-powers?

Mr. MEIGHEN: No.

Mr. ROBB: In section 3 I notice that an exception is made of British Columbia. Why is that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: On account of the Dominion Railway Belt Water Acts of 1912 and 1913, which divest the Dominion of its authority to administer the water-powers of the railway belt and places that administration under provincial authority.

Mr. ROBB: The Fraser river would come in there?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. CAHILL: Are there any developed water-powers which come under this Act?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh, yes, we have very large developments in Western Canada that will be directly under this Act. All the water-powers, for example, that supply Winnipeg city with power. The Grand du Bonnet power in the Winnipeg river is now being developed. About 100,000 horse-power is now developed there, and about 400,000 horse-power is still to be developed.

Mr. CAHILL: Those water-powers are still vested in the Dominion Government?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—application of Act:

Mr. BUREAU: What is the particular reason for excepting British Columbia from the operation of this measure?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because the British Columbia Government administer the water-powers on the railway belt, as well as the other water-powers of that province. They do so under authority of this Parliament vested in them by the statutes named in the section.

Mr. BUREAU: Is there any definition of the word "lands"? Would that comprise the bed of any river which would be required and which, as explained just now by the minister, had been leased or disposed of ?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I think the Bill covers all previous grants of water-powers as well as any grant since the passing of the statutes mentioned in the section.

Section agreed to.

On section 4—title to water-powers in Crown:

Mr. CAHILL: Why is this declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada?

Mr. MEIGHEN: In order to establish Dominion jurisdiction without question. That is to say, there is no doubt at all that jurisdiction in the Dominion is complete so far as our ownership goes, but by declaring that an undertaking that now is or may be formed to be a work for the general advantage of Canada, our jurisdiction is extended to anything within the definition of the word "undertaking," and consequently our control is extended also.

Mr. CAHILL: What purpose can be served? Is it for the development and distribution in towns or for the transmission of power?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The only way in which water-powers may be usefully and properly administered is by the administering body having jurisdiction ample enough to extend not only over the power itself, but over everything connected with that power development and the transmission and distribution that follow. You cannot sever jurisdiction and at the same time have adequate and successful administration of the power. I do not think it would be asked on the part of the province that the jurisdiction should be so severed. If the administration of the power itself, the mere waterfall, the mere energy that the waterfall develops, is to be under one Government and everything else under another, successful administration is impossible. The purpose of this section, and, in fact, of the whole Bill—and this is merely in harmony with the rest of the Bill—is to extend the jurisdiction of the Dominion in order to enable it adequately to administer the power itself. The word "undertaking," as defined in section 2, is made a work for the general advantage of Canada, thereby extending the jurisdiction of the Dominion to the full extent of that definition.

Mr. CAHILL: If the Government disposed of power under this, would the power carry the same character as if it were developed by the Government itself?

Mr. MEIGHEN: If the Government disposes of power it does so in accordance with this measure; it does not do so by granting a fee simple; it does so by lease, subject to such terms and conditions as may be imposed. The terms and conditions necessarily have to do with the distribution of the power developed, that is to say, with the undertaking. This section establishes our jurisdiction to make those terms and conditions.

4 p.m.

Mr. CAHILL: I do not know that I made my question clear. At least I do not understand the answer. Supposing the Government disposes of one of these powers or leases it for, say, ninety-nine years, or whatever the term may be, would the company acquiring the power be declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The company would not be, but the works would.

Mr. CAHILL: The company would control the works that were declared to be a work for the general advantage of Canada?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes.

Mr. CAHILL: The minister mentioned the distribution. Would this give such a company the right to distribute power without the consent of municipalities? It certainly gives them the right to go through municipalities with transmission lines.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This would not give them any rights except the lease itself. They would have any rights of water-powers vested in them by the lease. In fact, I do not think any right of distribution would be given at all. Conditions of distribution would be imposed, and no rights that I can conceive of now would be granted.

Mr. BUREAU: In the interpretation clause, I do not see any definition of the term "water-power", except that the term "Dominion water-power" is defined. Section 4 says:

> The property in and the right to the use of all water-power is hereby declared—

And so on. Would it not be better to insert the word "Dominion" before the word "water-power?" The term "all water-power" is pretty broad.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It might be just as well. After all, the intention was that water-powers would be limited by clause 3, which defines what the Bill applies to, and that clearly says that it applies to Dominion water-powers. I would agree that the word "Dominion" should be inserted.

Mr. BUREAU: I move that in section 4 the words "water-power is" at the end of the first line be struck out, and the words

"Dominion water-powers are," be substituted therefor, and that the word "power" in the fourth line be changed to "powers."

Amendment agreed to, and section, as amended, agreed to.

On section 5—essential lands also remain Crown property.

Mr. BUREAU: That would cover the bed of a river, I suppose.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh yes. I beg to move that the words "right of entry" be inserted in line 25 after the word "permit."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. ROBB: Does the minister think that the Dominion has control over the beds of streams that are not navigable?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Only in the three Prairie Provinces. My statement did not refer to any other province.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 6—expropriation of private lands where required by the Crown.

Mr. PARENT: Does the minister think this would cover non-navigable streams?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Yes. If it happened that part of the bed of a river of a non-navigable stream was required for a Dominion water-power development, it could be expropriated.

Mr. PARENT: It would apply also, I presume, in the case of a water-power owned by a private individual. There is a law in the province of Quebec which gives about the same rights as this section would.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The Dominion could acquire such bed of a river under this section.

Mr. BUREAU: Not in Quebec.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Oh no, because we have no Dominion water-power there. I beg to move that the word "or" at the beginning of line 44 be struck out.

Amendment agreed to.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 7—taking of private lands by applicants or licensees:

Mr. BUREAU: This is the section I was asking the minister about just now. It provides that any person who is authorized by the minister shall have the power to expropriate. Now I think that is a pretty broad provision. Generally speaking, powers of expropriation are granted by the legislative body. The power to expropriate is limited very strictly. When the minister authorizes a man to take another man's property against his will for the benefit of a private individual he is delegating a power which I think should rest alone with the legislative body. The power of expropriation is used only in case of public utilities, on the principle that the public good prevails over the individual good but under this section it is a case of the individual against the individual. Some person may acquire from the minister a water-power for the purpose of his farm, and he may want to back up the water. Under this section, upon the authority of the minister alone, he may go to his neighbour and say: "I cannot agree with you as to price, so I am going to expropriate your land which is required for the development of my water-power, which is useful to me alone." I think that is against the law.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The whole theory of this Act is that water-powers are essentially and increasingly a public utility. All water-power developments of business organizations developing and transmitting water-power are more and more public utilities. Consequently, the power of expropriation, under the very principle which my hon. friend has enunciated, is necessarily vested with the Government. We do nothing more here than is done under the Government. We do nothing more here than is done under the Irrigation Act. Under that Act the very same authority to expropriate under similar circumstances is vested, and the same with the Railway Act. It would never do to require every company that is developing a water-power to come back to Parliament when it wanted to expropriate a few acres that might be needed in connection with the development of its water-power. Water-power development is necessarily, in a sense, local—not like a railway which runs over a considerable length of line—and in connection with its development only a very small acreage may have to be expropriated.

They may expropriate if the minister is convinced that it is a proper case for expropriation; that is to say, if upon the advice of his water-power authorities it is shown to him that the land is required in connection with that public utility, then the clauses that Parliament has passed will be invoked, but only then. Surely that is a sufficient safeguard. I would be quite willing to have "Governor in Council" substituted for minister, and it would be along the same line as the preceding clause which authorizes the Governor in Council to expropriate lands in a proper case where the development is a public undertaking. In this case it is a private undertaking under lease from the Crown, and we say that it being a public utility, if it is shown that certain land must be acquired to make that utility useful and effective, then the power to expropriate is granted.

Mr. BUREAU: I do not think it would improve matters to make it "Governor in Council." If you intend to assume the control of water-powers, to lease them and have them developed, it is a very easy matter for this Parliament to pass a law defining in what cases power of expropriation shall exist. We have a law in Quebec whereby any private individual, provided he can develop so many horse-power, can expropriate, but there is a limit, and it cannot be confined to a private individual for his own purposes. It would be fair and more within the rights of expropriation of eminent domain if there were a general law applicable to every man, and if the powers were graded. There are certain powers that cannot be public utilities owing to the very small amount of horse-power that can be developed, and they can be used only for limited purposes. Let us have a general law grading these powers and it would prevent the cession by Parliament of what I think is its most sacred prerogative and duty, the protection of private rights, not leaving either in the minister or in the Governor in Council the power to give any individual the right to go over the land of his neighbour and take it from him.

Mr. BUTTS: I agree with the hon. member for Three Rivers that the granting of powers of expropriation is not always sufficiently considered by Parliament. I happen to have sat in the legislature of Nova Scotia for a number of years, and one of the things I continually railed against was the power of expropriation given by the Nova Scotia Government to the Dominion Coal Company. I always contended that where the public welfare was being served, the Government might well and legitimately grant powers of expropriation. But they went so far at one time down there as to grant the Dominion Coal Company the power of expropriating for the building of their own houses to accommodate their workmen. This, to the average man, would appear to be a very extreme measure, and I therefore suggest to the minister that he should be somewhat more cautious in the matter of expropriation. It is a dangerous undertaking that may work injustice in many cases. I am of the opinion that this section is a little bit extreme in that it gives almost absolute power of expropriation and very nearly takes away the right of private ownership of property. We cannot always ignore the rights of a private individual to his ownership of his own land. I have not considered the section with sufficient care to offer an amendment, but I think it is rather loosely drafted and perhaps the minister might reconsider it and make it more in keeping with the views that have been expressed.

Mr. MEIGHEN: In 1897, not so very long ago, Parliament enacted the following legislation with regard to irrigation companies:

> Lands required for the works of any applicant, as shown by the maps and plans filed, in whomsoever they are vested, whether in the Crown or in any other applicant or licensee, or in any railway company, or in any other person whomsoever or in any interest in or right or privilege with regard to such land which is so required, may be taken and acquired by such first mentioned licensee; and to this end all the provisions of the Railway Act which and so far as they are applicable to such taking and acquisition, shall apply as if they were included in this Act.

The rest of it is the same as the wording here. That was re-enacted again in 1906 and is the law to-day. Now, this is a public utility; it must be essentially so. It may be only in a small way and it may be in a large way; but if in a small way, surely we are not going to require the expense of coming to Parliament for a special Bill. That much ought surely to be trusted to administration. That is the whole principle upon which the administration of legislation operates. The power is not granted absolutely, as the hon. member for Cape Breton seems to fear. There is no absolute provision here. The minister must be convinced—I am ready to have it made the Governor in Council—on representations of his water-power authorities that the land is required for the development of that water-power. If so, then they have to acquire it and pay for it under the provisions that are laid down. It seems to me that there can be nothing expensively cumbersome about that method.

Mr. BUREAU: I absolutely agree with the minister that it would not be fair to ask every little company to come before Parliament for expropriation powers. That is not what I contended. What can be done without expense to the man who is going to buy water-power is to pass general legislation applying to all Dominion water-powers which could be classified without being named specifically. We could classify them by the amount of horse-power that could be developed, and limit the extent of the powers of the individual intending to develop them. The minister is the person to decide whether or not the land is required. Plans have to be filed with him, all the records will remain with him, and the owner of the land will just receive a notice under the Railway Act and then the arbitration takes place if they cannot agree upon the compensation. That is all the consideration shown the owner.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Section 35 of the Dominion Lands Act, passed in 1908, in this regard is just the same as the section we are enacting now, but the interposition of the minister is the check which exists. A company when it has authority may expropriate, under the law as it is to-day, and we are not asking for any more power in this case.

Mr. BUREAU: It is not a good reason that because section 35 of the Dominion Lands Act contains these powers that they should be embodied in the present Bill. To my mind it is wrong to give a man the right to take the property of his neighbour under certain conditions, and we should prevent as much as possible the delegation of any such power.

Mr. MEIGHEN: We have such water-power legislation now.

Mr. BUREAU: That may be, but when we find it necessary to pass a new law why not improve on the existing legislation? If the existing power is sufficient and greater than that for which the minister is now asking, I do not see the necessity for this Bill. If the minister is asking for certain powers, and we find that they ought not to be granted to him but left with Parliament, why not take that point into consideration? I do not say that every man who wants to develop water-power should come before this Parliament and ask for the right to expropriate, but it is easy for Parliament to legislate generally with respect to cases where men wish to develop water-powers and ask for the right of expropriation, and to declare in that Act that the development is intended for public and not private purposes. The expropriatory power should not be left subject to the whim of a man's neighbour because he has more money to pay for water-power development than the owner of the property who has this water on his farm or domain. That is the reason I say a general law should be passed regulating this matter, and the power which this Bill seeks to confer upon the minister or the Governor in Council should not be granted. I do not say this in disparagement of the minister; but it is a matter of principle that this power ought to remain with Parliament and not be delegated to any one, except under general legislation defining the powers that can be developed and the circumstances under which the expropriation can take place.

Mr. McKENZIE: I have not heard the whole of the discussion on this Bill, but I very largely agree with the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) and the hon. member for South Cape Breton (Mr. Butts) that it is rather too great a power to grant any private individual the right to expropriate his neighbour's property. This Bill particularly deals with Government-owned water-powers, and we cannot criticise the Government in laying down rules as to property of which it is the owner. But right alongside of that Government property there may be privately-owned property which the owner himself may need for the development of the water-power which it contains. But suppose a man who is better off than the owner, and is prepared to go on with the development at once, buys the adjacent water-power from the Government. Under this Bill he could obtain authority from the Government to take his neighbour's land and possibly for all time to deprive that neighbour of the opportunity to develop the water-power on his own land or to utilize the property for a thousand and one other reasons for which he may require it. It is quite possible for the wealthier individual to step in and under the provisions contained in the Railway Act take his neighbour's land. I think that he should be left to deal with his neighbour just as would be the case if a person wanted to build a store on his own property and required some adjoining land for the purpose of keeping a cattle yard, or for some other reason in connection with the running of his store. In such a case as that the man contemplating the purchase must deal with his neighbour and buy the land in the ordinary way. Nobody would think of giving a man who wished to build a warehouse the right to go and expropriate his neighbour's land. He would be told at once "Make your bargain in the ordinary way, and if you cannot get the property you will have to go without. The fact of your wanting to establish a stock-yard in connection with your business does not affect the public, and therefore we cannot pass over to you the power of expropriation." I cannot see very much difference between that case and the case of a man who buys a piece of property on which there is a waterfall or a creek that is strong enough to furnish hydraulic energy. I don't see why such a man should have the right to compel his neighbour to yield his property to him if he does not want to do so. I have not heard the minister advance very much argument on the point, and I would like to be convinced that there is any real necessity for any such right to be vested in a private individual. If it was a corporation that had to develop a certain amount of horse-power before their proposition would be considered by the Government at all—a corporation, for example, that were prepared to go on and develop power for the general benefit of the country, or for the benefit of a town or local industries, or something of that nature—I could understand it. As I read the section, however, it gives the right to any individual who wishes to build a saw-mill, a grist-mill, or anything of the like, for which he requires water-power entirely for the benefit of himself, to take his neighbour's land and use it for such private purpose. I cannot agree with any such proposition.
